FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 1) respecting the administration of oaths of office.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a Speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:—

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In addressing the Parliament of Canada for the first time, in fulfilment of the important trust which has been committed to me as Her Majesty's Representative, I desire to express the satisfaction with which I resort to your advice and assistance.

I am conscious of the honor which attends my association with your labors for the welfare of the Dominion, and it will be my earnest endeavor to co-operate with you, to the utmost of my power, in all that may promote the prosperity of the people of this country, the development of her material resources, and the maintenance of the constitutional ties which unite her provinces.

It is to be regretted that the treaty concluded between Her Majesty and the President of the United States, for the adjustment of the questions which have arisen with reference to "The Fisheries," has not been sanctioned by the United States Senate, in whom the power of ratification is vested; and that our legislation of last year on the subject is therefore in a great measure inoperative.

It now only remains for Canada to continue to maintain her rights as prescribed by the Convention of 1818, until some satisfactory readjustment is arranged by treaty between the two nations.

A measure will again be submitted to you to amend the Acts respecting the Electoral Franchise, for the purpose of simplifying the law and lessening the cost of its operation.

It is expedient, in the interests of commerce, to assimilate, and in some particulars to amend, the laws which now obtain in the several Provinces of the Dominion relating to Bills of Exchange, Cheques and Promissory Notes; and a Bill with this object will be laid before you.

A Bill will also be provided for making uniform throughout the Dominion the laws relating to Bills of Lading.

During the recess my Government has carefully considered the subject of Ocean Steam Service, and you will be asked to provide subsidies for the improvement of the Atlantic Mail Service, and for the establishment, in concert with Her Majesty's Government, of a line of fast steamers between British Columbia and China and Japan. Your attention will also be invited to the best mode of developing our trade, and securing direct communication by steam with Australasia, the West Indies and South America.

A Bill will be submitted for your consideration for the prevention of certain offences in connection with Municipal Councils, and to give greater facilities for making enquiries as to such matters.

Several measures will also be presented to you for improving the Law of Procedure in Criminal Cases. Among these will be a Bill to permit the release on probation of persons convicted of first offences, a Bill authorising regulations to be made for the practice in cases partaking of the nature of criminal proceedings, and a Bill to make the Speedy Trials Act applicable throughout Canada.

Bills relating to the inspection of timber and lumber, for the improvement of the Postal System, and for increasing the efficiency of the North-West Mounted Police, will also be submitted for your consideration.

The Royal Commissioners on Labor having concluded their enquiries, I hope to be able to lay before you at an early day their report with the important evidence collected by them in various parts of Canada.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The Accounts for the past and the Estimates for the ensuing year will be laid before you. These Estimates have been prepared with a due regard to economy and the efficiency of the public service.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I now commend these several subjects and the others which may be brought before you to your earnest consideration, and I trust that the result of your deliberations may, under the Divine Blessing, tend to promote the well-being and prosperity of Canada.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House,—The Report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That Select Standing Committees of this House, for the present Session, be appointed for the following purposes:—1. On Privileges and Elections. 2. On Expiring Laws. 3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. 4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills. 5. On Standing Orders. 6. On Printing. 7. On Public Accounts. 8. On Banking and Commerce. 9. On Agriculture and Colonisation; which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 3.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 1st February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, a certified copy of the judgment of the said court in the election appeal of Poirier vs. Fiset, said judgment dismissing the appeal.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return of Alphonse A. C. LaRivière as Member for Provencher.

REPORTS.

Annual Report of the Department of Public Works for the year ending 30th June, 1888.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

The Public Accounts for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1888.—(Mr. Foster.)

Annual Report of the Department of Marine for the year ending 30th June, 1888.—(Mr. Tupper.)

Report of the Commissioner, Dominion Police, under Revised Statutes of Canada, Chapter 184, section 5.—(Sir John Thompson.)

Tables of the Trade and Navigation of the Dominion of Canada for the year ending 30th June, 1888.—(Mr. Bowell.)

Report, Returns and Statistics of the Inland Revenues of the Dominion of Canada, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1888.—(Mr. Costigan.)

DEBATES COMMITTEE.

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. Speaker, before calling the Orders of the Day, I wish, with the consent of the House, to make the usual motion for the appointment of the Hansard Committee. The motion is as follows:—

That a Select Committee be appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present Session, with power to report from time to time; to be composed of Messrs. Baker, Béchard, Charlton, Colby, Davin, Desjardins, Ellis, Innes, Scriver, Somerville, Taylor, Tupper, Vanasse and Weldon (Albert).

The names are the same as those which have been on the committee for the last two years, with the exception of Mr. Royal. It is proposed to substitute Mr. Vanasse for Mr. Royal.

Mr. LAURIER. With regard to this motion, I wish to ask will the hon. gentleman tell the House that this is substantially the same committee as was appointed last year?

Mr. BOWELL. The names of the committee are precisely the same with the exception of the substitution of Mr. Vanasse for Mr. Royal, who is now Lieut. Governor of the North-West Territories.

Motion agreed to.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

EDWARD COCHRANE, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of East Northumberland, introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald and Mr. Taylor.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I have to ask from this House that indulgence and kindly consideration which have always been generously accorded to young and inexperienced members—an indulgence and a consideration the more needed in my case, because I cannot stand on the floor of this House without having pressed home upon me the recollection of the circumstances under which I came to have the honor to be here. When this House met a year ago another voice spoke as the representative of Cardwell, the voice of one whose public services were deemed by his constituency, by a generous and loyal people, to merit the election of myself as his successor in this House. Since Parliament prorogued we have speeded a parting Governor General and welcomed a coming one; and I am sure I but echo the sentiments of every gentleman in this House when I say that Lord Stanley, the present Governor General, since his advent to Canada, has manifested his appreciation of the importance of the Dominion, the magnificence of her resources, and the splendid opportunities afforded her of building up a powerful and prosperous country in alliance with Great Britain. He has done, Sir, more than that; he has shown himself to possess a hearty sympathy with the aspirations of the people of this Dominion; he has, in the speeches he has made throughout the country, urged them to cultivate a national sentiment, and to rally round the Dominion as the central power; and I think I can confidently express the conviction that when Lord Stanley, having served his term, comes to say farewell to this country, he will receive the unanimous testimony of the Canadian people to his earnest endeavors to co-operate with them in all that tends to promote the prosperity of the people of this country, the development of her material resources, and the maintenance of the constitutional ties which unite her Provinces. The first question touched upon in the Speech of His Excellency is one of very considerable importance, that of the fisheries. It must be a matter of regret to every gentleman in this House that the work of the Joint High Commission, which met at Washington a little over a year ago, has been rendered inoperative by the action of the Senate of the United States. Sir, since Parliament prorogued, since the very thorough discussion of that question which was had on the floor of this House, it has passed through several phases. It will be remembered that President Cleveland consented to the appointment of a Joint High Commission, and no doubt he had an accurate knowledge of the proceedings of that Commission from time to time; and in submitting to the Senate the treaty which was agreed upon, he used this language:

"The treaty meets my approval, because I believe that it supplies a satisfactory, practical and final adjustment upon a basis honorable and just to both parties, of the difficult and vexed question to which it relates."

Well, Sir, after a discussion continuing through some months, the Senate of the United States, by a strict party vote, rejected the convention, and two days afterwards President Cleveland sent down to Congress what is known as his retaliatory message. Everybody must regret most sincerely that that message was sent down, and I think I do not exaggerate when I say that the position taken by the President of the United States in that document was an illogical and inconsistent one, directly opposed to his whole anterior course in relation to the question. Sir, it seems to me I am justified in holding that that message was prompted by the exigencies of party politics in the United States, and that Canada was made, on the eve of a general election, the football of both parties, to be kicked about for the amusement of the Anglophobes in the United States. Now, Sir, may I be permitted for a moment to refer to that retaliatory message? It began by reiterating the President's approval of the convention that had been shortly before concluded between Great Britain and the United States. In it the President declared:

"I fully believe that this treaty just rejected by the Senate was well suited to the exigency, and that its provisions were adequate for our security in the future from vexatious incidents, and for the promotion of friendly neighborhood and intimacy without sacrificing in the least our national pride and dignity."

So that, you will observe, he repeated in express terms his approval of the treaty which had been concluded between the two nations. Then he went on to propound his retaliatory policy, the ostensible pretext for which was, to quote his language, that:

"In forbidding the transit of the catch of our fishermen over their territory in bond and free of duty, the Canadian authorities deprived us of the only facility dependent on their concession, and for which we could supply no substitute."

That is to say, the Canadian people were threatened with a measure of commercial non-intercourse, not because they had declined to treat, not because they had refused to accept a new convention covering the fisheries, but because the Republican majority in the Senate had rejected the work of the Joint High Commission. Canada did, it is true, and does yet, as I understand, deny the privilege of transhipment of catch, and what is her warrant for that course? The Treaty of 1818? Yes, no doubt; but not the British and Canadian interpretation of that instrument alone. There is yet another, and, perhaps, a higher justification of Canada's course, namely, the full and absolute recognition by the United States Government of the right of such refusal. The treaty concluded in February last year, the treaty to which President Cleveland gave his consent, upheld every material and substantial claim made by Canada under the Convention of 1818. By that treaty United States fishermen were excluded from the purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits; transshipment of catch, for transport by any means of conveyance, and shipping of crews, until and only when Congress abolished the duty on Canadian fish imported into the United States. If that convention, to which President Cleveland had given his assent, had been adopted by the Senate of the United States, American fishermen would still have been debarred from the privilege of transshipping their catch in bond through Canada, and from enjoying commercial rights in our ports. So that you will observe the inconsistency of Mr. Cleveland's course in first of all recommending to the Congress of the United States the adoption of this very treaty, which provided for the exclusion of American fishermen from the right of transshipping their catch, and then, when the Senate rejected that treaty, turning round upon Canada and menacing us with the threat of commercial non-intercourse because we declined to allow, in contravention of the Treaty of 1818, American fishermen to transship their catch to our country in bond. It must, I am sure, have been a matter of gratification to every member of this House, to observe the admirable temper in which that threat of retaliation was received by the people of Canada. The press of both parties, I think, almost without distinction, declared that the course of the Canadian Government was the right one, and that we should not, in the face of a threat, recede from the position we had assumed. There was, indeed, one voice—and I presume that during this Session the subject will be referred to—raised, if not in support of the position of the United States, at least in opposition to the course of Canada. I refer to the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Laurier), who declared at St. Thomas, some two or three days after the retaliation message was sent down to Congress, that the policy of the Canadian Government was a vicious policy, that it was an unfriendly, injudicious and a harsh policy, and that it ought to be reversed. Why? Because it was said that Canada, in the enforcement of her interpretation of the Treaty of 1818, had pursued an illiberal, vicious course towards the United States; and yet, within a few days after that statement was made, President Cleveland sent down to Congress a message, in which he declared that since March 3rd, 1887—that is to say, through two whole fishing seasons—"No case has been reported to the Department of State wherein complaint has been made of unfriendly or unlawful treatment of American fishing vessels on the part of the Canadian authorities, in which reparation was not promptly and satisfactorily obtained by the United States." It seems to me that that statement affords sufficient answer to the contention that the course of Canada, in the enforcement of her rights under the Treaty of 1818, has been harsh and illiberal. What has been the course of Canada? She has pressed for the last thirty-five years for an arrangement with the United States which would suspend the operation of the Treaty of 1818 and supplant that by a new arrangement based upon mutual concession and mutual advantages. The Treaty of 1854 was concluded with that object in view, and so was the subsequent Treaty of 1871. Both treaties were terminated by the United States. The latest effort to settle the question has also been rejected by the United States; and if to-day the provisions of the treaty of seventy years ago are deemed oppressive, if to-day they are found to be harsh towards the United States fishermen and to operate to their injury and disadvantage, the fault rests, not with Ottawa, not with London, but with Washington and the Congress of the United States. There is, therefore, no other course now open to the Parliament of Canada than that of firmly maintaining the rights solemnly covenanted between the two countries in 1818; and I am in hopes that the incoming

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell.)

Administration in the United States, controlling both Houses, a Republican Administration, which, both in 1854 and 1871, concluded treaties that have been in force, will regard the position in another light than that in which they have regarded it during recent months, and will be able to devise such a basis of settlement as will be satisfactory to the two countries and promote those friendly relations we all desire should exist between them. Had that threat of retaliation been listened to, had the recommendation of President Cleveland been acceded to by the Congress of the United States, Canada would undoubtedly have suffered for a time more or less seriously; but I may point out this fact, that while the transit trade of Canada across the territory of the United States, in 1832 and 1883, averaged about $66,000,000 annually, in 1886 and 1887 that trade had fallen to an average of only $32,000,000, or to one-half, showing the growing independence of Canada with regard to her channels of communication with foreign countries. His Excellency, in the Speech from the Throne, has intimated that a measure will be introduced this Session for the purpose of amending, in some particulars, the Franchise Act. That Act has undoubtedly enlarged the electorate by broadening the basis of the suffrage, and has secured the advantage of practical uniformity the country over. The subject of the franchise has been debated more or less since 1885, in the press, on the platform, and on the floor of this House, and I think it is a fair interpretation of the discussions to say that the current of opinion has favored the principle of the Dominion law, and that the only objections advanced to the measure have had relation to the expense of the revision and preparation of the lists and the somewhat complex character of the law. The House has, therefore, I am sure, heard with pleasure the intention of the Government to simplify the law and lessen the cost of its operation. These reforms effected, there should be little to cavil at in the Franchise, for its character is already so liberal as virtually to confer the suffrage on every citizen who is not a confirmed pauper, who, in a word, has a stake in the country's progress and prosperity and is interested in the maintenance of law and order. But by far the most important subject alluded to in the Speech from the Throne is that in which we are promised measures looking to the improvement of the Atlantic mail service and to the establishment of steam communication between British Columbia and China and Japan. There can be no doubt of the importance of perfecting the chain of communication via Canada between England and the East, and of making the Canadian route the principal avenue of the inter and transcontinental trade. If there could be any cause for hesitation in the adoption of this policy, I imagine it would be based upon the consideration of the expense involved, because it is presumable that in the establishment of a line of steamships on the Pacific, and in the improvement of the Atlantic mail service, some additional expenditure will have to be made by Parliament; but I may recall to the House this fact, that, thirty-five years ago, the old Province of Canada thought the establishment of direct communication between Canada and Great Britain of so much consequence as to warrant the granting of a subsidy of no less than $220,000 a year for that purpose; and it seems to me that the Dominion, with the immense development which has taken place in the past thirty-five years, with the vastly increased wealth and resources of the country, is quite well able to stand any expense which the establishment of this service may entail. As evidencing the improved financial condition of Canada in recent years, let me quote this fact, that between Confederation and 1879, in the first twelve years after 1867, of the total increase of $67,200,000 in the debt of the country, every dollar but $6,000,000 was obtained from London by means of loans, whereas in the last nine years of the total increase in the net debt of $91,500,000, no less than $43,200,- 000 has been obtained from the Canadian people alone. And of the interest payable on our debt in London between 1867 and 1879, the first twelve years after Confederation, the amount of that interest increased $2,178,600, whereas in the last nine years the increase has only been $1,084,100. That is to say, our people, through their increased wealth, are able to carry a larger proportion of the debt of the country than ever before, and to make a larger contribution to capital account for works of general utility. It is true that we have spent a good deal of money in the past, largely in connection with the Pacific Railway, but, while, when these expenditures were first contemplated, it was stated that the result would be bankruptcy and ruin to Canada, we find in the last year that the Government has been able to effect a loan in England on the best terms ever obtained by this country, that is, at 95-10 for a 3 per cent. loan, thus placing the credit of Canada on a parity with that of India and very nearly as high as that of the mother country herself. This is due to the material development of Canada which has resulted from the policy of the present Government. In the Speech from the Throne, attention is also called to the best mode of developing our trade, and securing direct communication by steam with Australasia, the West Indies and South America. These are countries which afford markets of exchange and not markets of competition. Canada has already made some progress in the development of its trade with these countries, the aggregate trade of Canada with the West Indies, South America and China and Japan, having increased in the last nine years from $6,000,600 to $10,518,540. In order to show the possibilities of that trade, let me mention that in 1887 the United States traded with these countries to the extent of $234,437,000, as against an amount of $10,518,540 for Canada; and I cannot better illustrate the promise of that trade than by making such a contrast as this between the two countries. The trade of the United States, in 1887, with South America was $1.55 per head of the population, while the trade of Canada with South America was 48 cents per head. The trade of the United States with the West Indies was $1.50 per head of the population, while the trade of Canada was $1.17 per head. The trade of the United States with China and Japan was 85 cents per head, and that of Canada was only 45 cents per head. The aggregate trade of Canada with these different countries amounted to only $2.10, while the trade of the United States was nearly double, being $3.90 per head. It is known to you that we possess the materials of trade to the same extent, or nearly so, as the United States. If we lack anything in the way of natural products it is in respect of raw cotton, but our facilities for the manufacture of cotton are quite as good as those on the other side, and an instance of this is the fact that during the past year there have been exported from the product of the Canadian cotton mills to China and Japan no less than 12,000 bales of manufactured cotton. As another illustration of the ability of Canada to carry on successfully commerce with foreign nations if sufficient facilities are provided, I may mention that Canada's trade with Great Britain last year was $17.90 per head, while the trade of the United States with Great Britain was $8.85 per head, only half that of Canada. That is to say, our trade with the mother country is double that of the United States, while with South America, China and Japan, and the West Indies, it is only half that of the United States. What we require is improved facilities of communication, and these improved facilities of communication cannot be obtained without some expenditure on the part of the Government, but the results to be achieved will fully justify such an expenditure in the future, as they have justified the expenditures in the past, in relation to which I cannot state a better instance than that the cost of transportation has been so largely decreased on railroads which have been assisted by the Dominion of Canada. We find that the cost of transportation on these railways is lower than the cost of transportation over the railway system of any other country in the world, and the credit of the country has at the same time been enhanced by its enterprise in material development. Various other measures are indicated in the Speech from the Throne, all of them designed to promote the welfare of the people, to perfect the machinery of administration, and to provide for the uniformity of the laws. If there is not much legislation proposed, we may remember that it has been said to be good policy not to make many laws, because many laws occasion much transgression. Finally, we have the usual reference to the estimates and the accounts, and it will be learned with pleasure by the House that the financial results of the last six months have assured a large and substantial surplus during the present year. The trade of the past year has been generally favorable. The crops, which contribute so largely to the revenues of the country, have not been notably prosperous, I grant you, but the harvest has been a fair one, and the prices for nearly all cereal products have been higher than usual. I quote only one fact in order to show the steady progress the country is making, and that is, that the assessed valuation of real property in the cities of Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Sherbrooke, London, Hamilton and Halifax, which are the only returns I have been able to obtain, has increased last year by no less than $26,191,000, or more than $10,000,000 over the total increase of the assessment from 1873 to 1878. I have to thank the House for the patience, courtesy and kindly consideration which it has given to me, and, in conclusion, I beg to move:

That a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to thank His Excellency for his gracious Speech at the opening of the present Session; and further to assure His Excellency that we are grateful to him for intimating to us that, in addressing the Parliament of Canada for the first time, in fulfilment of the important trust which has been committed to him, as Her Majesty's Representative, he desires to express the satisfaction with which he resorts to our advice and assistance.

That we thank His Excellency for informing us that he is conscious of the honor which attends his association with our labors for the welfare of the Dominion, and that it will be his earnest endeavor to co-operate with us, to the utmost of his power, in all that may promote the prosperity of the people of this country, the development of her material resources, and the maintenance of the constitutional ties which unite her provinces.

That with His Excellency we agree that it is to be regretted that the treaty concluded between Her Majesty and the President of the United States for the adjustment of the questions which have arisen with reference to "The Fisheries," has not been sanctioned by the United States Senate, in whom the power of ratification is vested, and that our legislation of last year on the subject is therefore in a great measure inoperative.

That we concur with His Excellency in the view that it now only remains for Canada to continue to maintain her rights as prescribed by the Convention of 1818, until some satisfactory re-adjustment is arranged by treaty between the two nations.

That we learn with satisfaction that a measure will again be submitted to us to amend the Acts respecting the Electoral Franchise, for the purpose of simplifying the law and lessening the cost of its operation.

That, having been informed by His Excellency that it is expedient, in the interests of commerce, to assimilate, and in some particulars to amend, the laws which now obtain in the several Provinces of the Dominion relating to Bills of Exchange, Cheques and Promissory Notes, any Bill with this object will receive our earnest consideration.

That we will carefully consider any Bill provided for making uniform throughout the Dominion the laws relating to Bills of Lading.

That we thank His Excellency for informing us that during the recess his Government has carefully considered the subject of Ocean Steam Service, and that we will willingly enter upon the consideration of a measure to provide subsidies for the improvement of the Atlantic Mail Service, and for the establishment, in concert with Her Majesty's Government, of a line of fast steamers between British Columbia and China and Japan; and that we are grateful to His Excellency for the intimation that our attention will also be invited to the best mode of developing our trade, and securing direct communication by steam with Australasia, the West Indies and South America.

That His Excellency may rest assured that any Bill submitted for our consideration for the prevention of certain offences in connection with Municipal Councils, and to give greater facilities for making inquiries as to such matters, will receive our thoughtful attention.

That we learn with interest that several measures will also be presented to us for improving the law of procedure in criminal cases, and that among these will be a Bill to permit the release on probation of persons convicted of first offences, a Bill authorising regulations to be made for the practice in cases partaking of the nature of criminal proceedings, and a Bill to make the Speedy Trials Act applicable throughout Canada, and that all such measures will be willingly considered by us.

That we assure His Excellency that any Bills relating to the inspection of timber and lumber, for the improvement of the Postal System, and for increasing the efficiency of the North-West Mounted Police, which are submitted for our consideration, will receive our earnest attention.

That we thank His Excellency for informing us that the Royal Commissioners on Labor having concluded their inquiries, he hopes to be able to lay before us at an early day their report with the important evidence collected by them in various parts of Canada.

That our thanks are due to His Excellency for informing us that the accounts for the past and the Estimates for the ensuing year will be laid before us, and that we will respectfully consider these Estimates, which will, we trust, be found to have been prepared with a due regard to economy and the efficiency of the public service.

That His Excellency may rest assured that these several subjects and any others which may be brought before us will receive our earnest consideration, and that with him we trust that the result of our deliberations may, under the Divine Blessing, tend to promote the well-being and prosperity of Canada.

Mr. LÉPINE. (Translation.) It is with a feeling of gratitude, Mr. Speaker, but at the same time with much diffidence, that I rise to support the resolution, which has just been moved in such eloquent language by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). With much hesitancy, I say, because I feel that I am incapable of accomplishing satisfactorily the task which has been set me. Nevertheless, without desiring to occupy the attention of the House for any great length of time, I will presume to make some remarks on the matters which have been laid before Parliament in the Speech from the Throne. Allow me to premise by saying that I experienced a lively pleasure in hearing the representative of our Sovereign express himself in the French language with as much ease, with as much eloquence as an academician could have done. French Canadians ought to be proud to see the representative of our Sovereign speaking so fluently our beautiful language. He has set a noble example which all Canadians ought to follow, no matter to what nationality they may belong, in becoming conversant with the French and English languages, in order that all may work together, with a common agreement, for the prosperity, the increase, the wealth, and the future of our magnificent and extensive country. His Excellency regrets that the Fishery Treaty has not been ratified by the American Senate. As a fact it is much to be regretted, Mr. Speaker, that this Fishery Treaty has been attacked, that it has been fought against with so much ferocity, not only in the Senate of the United States but during the entire presidential election campaign. It was alleged that the Fishery Treaty had been drawn up in the exclusive interest of those in Canada, that the rights of the Americans had been absolutely sacrificed. Notwithstanding this, however, Mr. Speaker, if reference is made to the Debates of this House, it will be found that our Government was also found fault with in the matter of this Fisheries Treaty; it will be found that this treaty was vigorously attacked; that the Government was accused of having been too generous towards the United States, of having disregarded the interests of Canada, of having sacrificed her rights, and of having surrendered a property which was one of the chief resources of the country. Does not such conduct on the part of the Americans show that the action of our Government, at this juncture, was most praiseworthy? Future events showed that those who prepared this treaty, Mr. Speaker, had done so while inspired with a most profound love of their native country; that they had been most jealous for the interests of Canada. This question of the fisheries is, in fact, one of the most important, and deserves the most undivided attention on the part of this honorable House. This branch of industry is carried on to a very considerable extent; it gives employment to an immense population, to thousands of workmen engaged in an employment arduous and exposed to many dangers. I am happy to see that the Government is endeavoring to enact measures to protect this vast number of people, by causing the treaties signed in the past to be respected. The Governor General tells us also that there will be submitted a measure having for its effect the amendment of the Electoral Franchise Act. This is a very important measure. I am sure that both sides of this House will give it equal attention, and that the members on the Government side will approve of its conduct in thus endeavoring to improve the law of elections by making it as inclusive as possible, while at the same time keeping out all persons who are not worthy to enjoy the privilege of the suffrage. During the recess, the Government has considered the subject of ocean steamship service. The result demands that we should place ourselves in more direct communication with the countries with which we have already established relations. Such a course has also in view the opening of new outlets and new markets, by means of which the trade and industries of Canada will be greatly benefited. A Bill will be submitted for the prevention of certain offences in connection with municipal councils, and to give greater facilities for making inquiries as to such matters. Most certainly such a proposed law will be well received, for it will ensure a better administration of municipal matters, and will re-establish public confidence. For several years nothing has been heard of but inquiries and boodle, and never as yet has a law been suggested to render more effective these inquiries, and to allow of the arm of the law being placed on those municipal representatives who engage in dishonest practices. Several measures will also be presented for improving the law of procedure in criminal cases. Among these will be a Bill to permit the release on probation of persons convicted of first offences. For a long time back Canada ought to have possessed such a law. Many persons who have been convicted of a first offence and who have been committed to prison, have, in consequence, become irreclaimable criminals; while we see in other countries where such a law exists, persons convicted of a first offence and set at liberty on probation, make excellent citizens. I doubt not but that this measure will produce the same results in Canada. It will not cause you surprise, Mr. Speaker, if I attach much importance to that portion of the Speech referring to the Labor Commission. The laborious and very lengthy inquiry made by this commission, is the most convincing answer that can be made to those who persist in regarding this commission to be a political engine. By the creation of this commission, the Government has shown itself to be a staunch friend of the working classes; it has given substantial proof of the interest with which it regards the working classes, and of its determination to render justice to all ranks in the community, without distinction. Before this inquiry, open as it was to all persons, and during which masters as well as workmen came forward to make their respective grievances heard, to pronounce their opinions and express their hopes, no one in the country had an exact knowledge, a positive knowledge, of the labor question. The revelations made before this commission have excited the indignation of all men of feeling, and voices of men of more weight than myself, have, even in this House, denounced in forcible terms the guilty employers. It is in great part owing to this inquiry that I have the honor of sitting in this House; and I believe it to be my duty to set forth plainly and honestly the object aimed at by the electors who have given me their trust. The population of the electoral division of Montreal East, the largest division in the Dominion of Canada, which has been represented of late years by a very intelligent man, by a distinguished legislator, by an upright citizen, by a good patriot,—had no object of an aggressive nature, when it selected its candidate. Those who are acquainted with our noble workmen know that they are absolutely devoid of all revolutionary ideas; they only desire one thing, to live peacefully and honestly on the fruits of their labors, under the protection of just and equitable laws. The workmen of Montreal East, in choosing one of themselves, had but one object—that of representing themselves in the council of the nation when the question of their interests was being discussed. By their interests, Mr. Speaker, I do not mean their material interests, I do not refer to the question of wages, for Parliaments are powerless to regulate such matters, but I mean their much dearer interests—their self-respect, their future and the future of their families. It is to put an end to monstrous abuses, to iniquitous regulations, which have been complained of for a long time past, that the Labor Commission has been appointed, and that the electors of Montreal East have elected me as their member in the House of Commons. It is to explain in a public manner, in the face of the whole country, the harshness of the laws which affect them in the matters of debts or contracts. It is to publish to the representatives of the country the unknown sufferings, the injustice submitted to, the thousand and one difficulties which the workmen have to overcome, and which they cannot even oppose. It is to unmask all these things to the House that the electors of Montreal East have chosen me as their representative. I am aware that the task which has been imposed upon me, on me an inexperienced workman, is a difficult one; so difficult that, to come out well, I rely more than ever upon the powerful assistance, upon the generous support of a great number of the members of this House, who have already yielded me their confidence and have given me their support. But I reckon above all upon the assistance and co-operation of the hon. Ministers who form the Government. In fine, I reckon on the good-will of all; because, Mr. Speaker, I represent here not only the workmen; but, further, all the electors who during the last campaign have magnanimously abandoned their former notions respecting the labor question. I represent all the large-hearted men who think that the laboring classes should be represented in Parliament. Workingmen—and I can say it emphatically, Mr. Speaker—do not demand any exceptional laws in their favor; they do not ask for any special legislation which may be antagonistic to capital. Workingmen only ask for one thing: that is, justice; and from justice they expect but one thing,—sufficient protection to place them on a footing of equality with the capital which purchases their labor. At the present moment, Mr. Speaker, I shall refrain from speaking about the laws respecting the protection of the lives of workmen; or respecting the laws having reference to the regulation of employment of women and children; or about the doing away with assisted immigration, which flows naturally and strongly from the principles of the National Policy. I think it useless to take up the time of the House in setting forth my views at greater length on the labor question; especially as a discussion will soon take place on the presenting of the Report of the Labor Commission to the House. Let me be permitted to say, however, that the constitution of the country renders the solution of the problem raised in the labor question all the more difficult of solution, as unfortunately there exists in the minds of our legislators a doubt about the powers bestowed on the Provincial Legislatures by the British North America Act, in all matters respecting the relations between capital and labor. I hope that during the present Session this difficulty will be removed and each will obtain the privileges belonging to it. Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne acknowledges that it is absolutely necessary that certain questions in commercial matters should be regulated by a uniform law applicable to all the Provinces. I would wish that the same thing could be done as respects all questions bearing on the labor question. If a practical solution can be arrived at for the first named cases, I see no reason preventing us from proceeding to obtain the same advantages in all things respecting work and labor. I should, however, add, Mr. Speaker, that uniformity which I desire, I do not wish to secure at the expense of the rights recognised as belonging to the Provinces by virtue of the Act of Confederation. I will fight against any measure which might injuriously affect the autonomy of the Provinces; whereas, on the contrary, I will support any scheme which might bring the Provinces to an understanding, either by means of an interprovincial conference, or by any other means which the House might adopt, for the establishment of a system of legislation common to all the Provinces and acceptable to all the Legislatures. The Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, announces that the Government will present Bills relating to the inspection of timber and lumber, and also for the improvement of the postal system, and for increasing the efficiency of the North-West Mounted Police force. The increase in the efficiency of the Mounted Police will doubtless prevent the Americans from committing on our borders depredations, which have been long a subject of complaint. Besides, we cannot pay too much attention to such a territory as that known as the North-West, which is almost as large as Europe, and which is destined to give a renewed prosperity to all the other Provinces of the Dominion, which, thanks to the National Policy, are already very prosperous and very contented. I conclude, Mr. Speaker, in thanking you, as well as the other hon. members of this House, for the attention which they have given to my few remarks, and I repeat that it is with pleasure that I second the resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White).

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, it is, I am sure, with more than ordinary pleasure that the House has listened to the speech of the hon. mover of the Address, and to that of the seconder. Those hon. gentlemen had charged themselves with a task ever difficult, under any circumstances, and perhaps especially so under present circumstances, in a manner most creditable to themselves; and I am sure it will be a pleasure to their colleagues to extend to them their hearty congratulations. The mover of the Address has furnished additional evidence that the aptitude and inclination for public life which are so common among young men in the mother country, are not deficient with us. The name which the hon. gentleman so worthily bears, and to which he so feelingly alluded, is, I can tell him, a name still fresh and green in the memory of all the members of the House, on account of the great ability and genial qualities of him whom a premature death has removed from the service of his country. I am sure that it was with special gratification on this occasion that the House cheered the hon. member when he rose, and cheered him again as he proceeded and gave unmistakable evidence that he was a chip of the old block. As to myself, if I may be pardoned a personal reference, I was not at all surprised at the manner in which the hon. gentleman acquitted himself. He alluded to me a moment ago in his speech, and his allusion reminded me that this was not the first time I had met his steel. It was my advantage, or, perhaps, my disadvantage—at all events, my pleasure—a few years ago, to meet the hon. gentleman on the stump, in the good old Province of Quebec; and I have ever since carried a recollection of the value of his steel, and this recollection adds to my individual pleasure in congratulating him on his entry to this House. Well, Sir, although I have listened to the hon. gentleman with intense pleasure, as I have also listened to the speech of the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Lepine), there is but very little indeed in what they said in which I can agree; but I can most cordially agree, and on this side we all most cordially agree, in the genial compliment which the hon.

gentleman who moved the Address paid to His Excellency the Governor General. Sir, it is a pleasure to state that ever since Confederation Canada has been eminently fortunate in the selection made by the Imperial Government of those who were to represent in this House the Majesty of the Throne, and to preside over our destinies. One and all of our Governors have been men of distinguished though different merits; and one and all have left this country and carried with them into their new spheres of usefulness, the respect of the Canadian people, and, in some instances, the affection, I may say, the deep affection of the Canadian people. Lord Lisgar, our first Governor, was a man of sound judgment and conciliatory disposition, and, therefore, well fitted to render, as he did render, valuable services at a most critical period of our history. Of his successor, Lord Dufferin, it is useless to speak. His name is familiar, not only in this country, not only throughout the British Empire, but throughout the world wherever the English language is spoken. His successor, Lord Lorne, was also very popular among us; and it is impossible to mention the name of Lord Lorne without at the same time mentioning the name of his gracious consort, the Princess Louise, to whose presence among us, no doubt, Lord Lorne himself would admit, was due a good deal of his popularity. Her Royal Highness, while she was a resident of Canada, exhibited very many of those womanly virtues and qualities which have made the name of her Royal mother dear, not only to her subjects, but to all those in any quarter of the globe who appreciate womanly qualities and virtues, appreciable everywhere indeed, and especially so when found in so exalted a station. The course of Lord Lansdowne was not only popular, not only unimpeachable, but marked, it is only fair to him to say, with qualities of the higher order. Now, His Excellency Lord Stanley of Preston comes to us, bearing one of the greatest historical names of England. The name of Stanley is to be found on almost every page of English history amongst warriors and statesmen, and nowhere shining more conspicuously than in our own day, when proudly borne by the great Earl of Derby, whose eloquence has long held sovereign sway over both Houses of Parliament. It has been the privilege of His Excellency to be engaged from early life in the public service, and it is therefore an easy task for him to adapt himself to any position to which he may be called by the choice of Her Majesty; and it is in no spirit of fulsome flattery, but with entire truthfulness, that I cheerfully say that in the few months that His Excellency has been with us, he has already exhibited qualities of mind and heart which have won for him the respect and the sympathy of the Canadian people of all classes, nationalities and religions. But now, Sir, having said so much, it is my sad duty, I must say, and my unpleasant duty, to leave these topics and to come to the hard and dry matter of the Speech. I am sure the right hon. gentleman will agree with me when I repeat the usual expression that he has presented us with a very "meagre bill of fare." I have heard the expression before; but it is, perhaps, even more meagre than usual. Of this, however, I do not complain, because I believe that Canada to-day is in a position where she requires very few reforms of immediate application, save the great reform of the extension of our trade with the great and powerful nation to the south of us. In all candor, Sir, I must say that I did not expect even that measure of reform in the Speech, but I do not despair—and I say this in all candor also—I do not despair of seeing the right hon. gentleman some day a convert to that idea. It is not expecting too much either, that some day or other he will see more clearly, and that this great reform will press itself upon his attention, and that he will relieve us from the duty and the pleasure of putting it upon the Statute-book. But, Mr. Speaker, if I did not expect that reform to be announced in the Speech from the Throne, I did expect to see other reforms announced, and I am disappointed on account of their absence. I expected to see some of that long promised legislation in favor of the workingmen. We have been looking for it, not one year, not two years, but three years. It has been put off from to-day until to-morrow, and from to-morrow until the next day; and this year again it is put off until to-morrow. We had reason to expect something better. It is true that in the Speech there is an allusion made to a commission which has been investigating the wrongs of the workingmen—which, indeed, are visible to the naked eye, and which we, on this side of the House, could remedy, I am sure, without any commission, if we had the power. Reference has been made to that commission, and we are led to expect a report at no distant day. But, Sir, is it possible that this commission is also affected with the disease of procrastination, too prevalent in the present Government of Canada? Is it possible that the report of the commission which was to be ready to-day is to be postponed till to-morrow? The remarks which fell from the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Lepire), would lead us almost to infer something of the kind, because, from a remark that fell from his lips, I find that the Government are overwhelmed with the great constitutional difficulties which attend legislating for the workingman. Well, Sir, I say we had reason to expect something better; and from a special circumstance which took place lately in the province to which I belong, I had reason, when I came here—I have such implicit confidence in the press of hon. gentlemen opposite, which is understood to speak the truth, and of course always the views of hon. gentlemen opposite—to expect that we should have such legislation. Sir, some time ago—not very remote, not two weeks ago—there was an election in the good county of Joliette, and one of the organs of the Government, Le Canada, published in Quebec, under the heading "Joliette Election," stated as follows on 19th September:—

"The two parties in this county are in the field, the county having been opened by the unseating of Mr. Guilbault, the Federal member. Mr. Guilbault is the Government candidate again, and his old opponent, Mr. Neveu, is the Liberal candidate. The election will take place at an early date. The contest will be sharp on both sides, Mr. Guilbault having been elected at the last election only by the casting vote of the returning officer. It is, however, said that the chances of Mr. Guilbault are much more favorable now than the Federal Government have favored this county with several important works—namely, a post office."

But, Mr. Speaker, was there not also a post office in Haldimand? It is astonishing the importance which the institution of post offices has assumed at the present time. Then this paper goes on to say:

"Mr. Lepine is to address a meeting of the workingmen of Joliette on Thursday next, and it is probable that all the workingmen will support the candidate of the Conservative party as they did in Montreal East. As the Government is to propose at the next Session several measures in the interest of the working classes, it is reasonable to suppose that the workingmen will support the Conservative candidate."

I took it for granted, Mr. Speaker, when I saw this announcement in the organ of the Government that we would have such measures proposed this Session in favor of the workingmen. But the wily workingmen of Joliette saw, and had good reason to believe, as the event now shows, that promises made to-day would be violated to-morrow, and they decided not to wait till to-morrow to vote against the Government, but voted against them at once. There is another measure, and the reform which I expected to find announced in the Speech from the Throne. I am sure the mercantile community at large will be disappointed to observe that no measure is to be introduced this Session by the Government to amend the Customs Act. The manner in which the Customs Act has been administered, not, I am sure through any fault of the Minister in charge, but on account of the provisions of that Act, is such as to incite revolt in the commercial community. What do we see? We find that, last year, almost $100,000—to be precise, something over $98,000—were levied upon the commercial community in the shape of seizures, fines and forfeitures, and this amount was distributed almost wholly, with the bare exception of something like $5,000, among the officers of the Customs Department. At present what do we see? Officers with salaries of $1,000 and $1,600 respectively added to their salaries, one $1,200, the other $2,000, and other officials obtained as high as $5,000. The truth is these men are making for themselves princely incomes out of spoils derived from the mercantile community. What did we see last year and the year previous? Merchants had their books seized, their stores closed, their business stopped at the will of revenue officers without any process of law, and those merchants were forced to defend their business and their honor in the courts of law, at tremendous expense. It is said that the firm of Ayer & Co. spent $30,000 in order to obtain justice in the courts at the hands of the Canadian Government. And yet these outrages which have been denounced again and again, and to which the attention of the Government has been called, are to be left unredressed. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do hope that this Session will not pass without some measure being introduced to alleviate the position in which this class of our population is placed. But if the Customs Act is to remain the same—

Mr. BOWELL. It is all the same.

Mr. LAURIER. It is all the same in the way of remedial legislation. If this Act, I say, is to remain the same, there is an Act which is more privileged. It is the Franchise Act. Every man must admit, even hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House must admit, that the career of the Franchise Act has not been a glorious one. It would seem almost as if the Government had been ashamed from the first of their progeny. They had provided that the Act should be enforced year after year, and yet, having put the light of the Act under a bushel for one year, now they are prepared to amend it. I do not know what is the nature of the measure which is to be proposed, but I am quite sure it will be merely patchwork. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who proposed the Address, stated that the criticism which had been applied to the Act was simply with regard to the preparation of the lists. It appears to me, astonishing as the fact may be, that the hon. gentleman does not read the Montreal Gazette; for, if he did so, he would be aware that not later than last Monday it contained the opinions of the Hamilton Spectator, of the St. John, N. B., Sun, and I believe another leading Conservative organ, to the effect that the Act should be amended—in what manner? Not in regard to the preparation of the lists, no, but in the direction of an extension of the franchise. Still I am confident that the reform which is asked by the whole of the Conservative press, by the whole of the Conservative party, and by hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House, a reform in the direction of an extension of the franchise will not be proposed, and the Government will not dare to bring in a measure to extend the franchise. What is asked by the Conservative press and by the Conservative party of all the Provinces except one, is manhood suffrage; and I believe the hon. leader of the Government, himself, would not be averse to manhood suffrage, because we know he is in favor of womanhood suffrage. Though he is prepared to grant womanhood suffrage, yet he will not grant manhood suffrage. Why? Because of the very reason why we on this side of the House voted for that Act, because it is a measure of legislation which should be left to the Provinces and not to the Dominion Government. Why is it that the hon. gentleman does not answer to the call of the press which supports him in Ontario and in the Maritime Provinces? Why is it that he does not grant manhood suffrage? Because, Sir, the condition is imposed that it must be regulated in accordance with all sound principles, according to the views, the methods, the manners and the social habits of the people in the different Provinces. Those are the views which were held in 1855, when this Act was introduced. Those are the views which all authors who have treated that question have developed, and in that respect let me quote here the opinion of Judge Story upon the American Constitution. Speaking on this very question he said:

"So that we have the most abundant proofs that among a free and enlightened people, convened for the purpose of establishing their own forms of government and the rights of their own voters, the question as to the due regulation of the qualifications has been deemed a matter of mere state policy, and varied to meet the wants, to suit the prejudices, and to foster the interests of the majority. An absolute, indefeasible right to elect or be elected, seems never to have been asserted on one side or denied on the other; but the subject has been freely canvassed as one of mere civil polity, to be arranged upon such a basis as the majority may deem expedient, with reference to the moral, physical and intellectual condition of the particular State."

Those reasons apply, Sir, not only to the regulation of the franchise, but they are the very reasons which are the basis of the federative form of government. Why is it we have a federative form of government? It is simply because the manners, and the habits, and the interests of the people will vary from one State to another State, or from one Province to another Province. And in all reason, since we have a federative government, it should also be left to the Provinces to determine in what manner the franchise in each Province shall be exercised. No greater evidence of the statement which I now make is to be found than in the conduct of the Government which resists the will of the majority of their organs who are asking for an extension of the franchise, who are asking for manhood suffrage; and though some of them are in favor of that system, yet the Government will not grant it, because there are some Provinces—amongst others, the Province to which I belong—which would not look upon an extension of the franchise to that extent favored. I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that, whatever may happen, the Conservative press, which have been asking for an extension of the franchise to the extent of manhood suffrage, is doomed again upon this occasion to bitter disappointment. There are other measures, Mr. Speaker, which are mentioned in the Speech; one relating to bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes and bills of lading, offences in connection with municipal councils, improvement of criminal procedure, inspection of lumber and timber, improving the postal system, and increasing the efficiency of the Mounted Police. But of all these I have only to say that none of them will set the world on fire. They may be good or they may be bad, but we do not know, and I will not pronounce upon them until they are brought down. They are without importance most of them, and I do not know that they will have any effect but that of tinkering with the recently Revised Statutes, and of making up a big volume of statutes for this year. Now, among the only other measures which are announced is a measure for promoting our trade with Australasia by means of a subsidy. As to the subsidy itself I have nothing to say at this present moment, and we had better wait until the details of the measure are brought down, in order to see what they are with regard to the general idea which they are supposed to involve, viz.: extension of trade with Australasia. I need only say that, on this side of the House, we shall ever be disposed to favor an extension of trade with any part of the world. It is the basis of our system; it is our very policy to extend trade. When the hon. gentlemen want to go to the Antipodes in order to get a trade, I am only sorry that they cannot see the advantage of knocking at the door of our neighbors where they would be sure to find a better and more extended trade. But, Sir, in the Speech to which we listened yesterday there is a very novel feature. As far as my memory goes, for the last ten years we have never found the feature which we see to-day in the Speech. There is not the slightest self-congratulations which hon.

gentlemen generally indulge in, as to the happy condition of the country, due primarily to their own efforts, and then to Providence. There is not the slightest reference to the prosperity of the country, due in the first place to the National Policy and then to the good crops, the benefit of Providence. Neither the hon. gentleman who proposed the Address, nor the hon. gentleman who seconded it, indulged, as was usual in former years, in congratulations as to the benefactions which had been bestowed upon this country by the hon. gentleman and his colleagues. Well, Sir, I want ever to be a generous foe.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. Nay, more, I claim to be an admirer of the hon. gentleman for many causes; and for many other causes also, if I were to scan his career, I would find reason for blame and censure. To day, however, since his followers have failed to bestow upon him the praise to which he is entitled for his policy, I will do so. How is it, Mr. Speaker, that no reference has been made to-day—or only very slight reference, which was not coupled with any congratulations at all—to the increase in the price of cereals? The hon. gentleman who moved the Address stated that though the crop had not been a very good one, still the prices of cereals had largely increased since last season. Can it be, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentlemen shall not receive their due meed of praise because the price of cereals has been increased. They have forgotten that the inducements given to the farmers of Ontario in 1878 was that they could regulate the price of wheat and other cereals by Act of Parliament. They were not flies on the wheel; they knew all the resources of legislation, and if only they had the power in hand what would they not do? The price of cereals would always be kept up, it would never go down. In fact, after a few years that the National Policy had been in force, when the boom was prevalent from one end of the country to the other, their followers could stump the country and ask the people to vote for the Government because, as they said, the Government had increased the price of wheat from 79 cents to $1.40 a bushel. It is true that afterwards the price fell, and the hon. gentleman no doubt was applied to again and again, to resort to those powers of legislation of which he had boasted while in Opposition, and to restore the price. But still for many years the hon. gentleman was obdurate; he put it off from to-morrow until to-morrow, but now at last we have the price of cereals gone up again. And why, I ask again, no mention has been made of this? The hon. gentlemen have not been accustomed in the past to so much modesty, and I want to give them the due praise to which they are entitled. But, Sir, if no mention of it is made to-day it is because the farmers of Ontario who at one time believed in those promises, have seen their utter folly. The farmers have now understood that the duty on wheat and cereals, though it is an impediment to trade, though it is an injury to those in the Maritime Provinces and the Province of Quebec, who have to buy wheat, and though it is fatal taxation, still that duty is no benefit to them, and they now understand that the National Policy so-called, in so far as they are concerned, is a mockery, a delusion and a snare. Snare, I say, and the word is not too strong. It has been the habit, one of those little habits which we can always forgive, of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, not exactly to say that they were the dispensers of the favors of Providence, but jocosely to refer to them; and a few days ago, while hunting for some other material, I happened to fall upon a speech delivered by my hon. friend at St. Andrews in New Brunswick, on the 8th of August, 1887, and which it may, perhaps, give him some pleasure for me to recall to the House. He then said:

"It is a great pleasure to me, wherever I go, to find signs of good Conservative Government. I find a first-rate crop in every part of Canada."

ada, and of course this great boon is due to a good, strong, honest and patriotic Government. We have always tried to show the Grits the great mistake they made in not supporting us. With Grit rule first came the Hessian fly, next the weevil, and later on when the Mackenzie Government was in power, came the Colorado bug. Now we have smiling crops, a contented people and a prosperous country."

Well, Sir, by parity of reasoning, if the hon. gentleman had gone to the vicinity of the city which he has the honor to represent in this House, the good city of Kingston, last summer, he would have seen there some evidences of a good, strong, honest Conservative Government; he would have found places where every vestige of vegetation was destroyed by the sun.

An hon. MEMBER. He was away from here then.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, in the Eastern Provinces and about the Lower St. Lawrence, he could have found other evidences of a good, strong, honest Conservative Government, in fields devastated by rains. Now, it seems to me that Providence has forsaken the hon. gentleman, for the country is visited by fire and water at the same time. I understand that this unfortunate region about the city the hon. gentleman represents, which is a dairying region, is now almost in a state of famine. The papers were telling only a few days ago of a farmer who had to sell two yearling cows and a spring calf for $25, and I understand, from neighbors there, that this is not an isolated case; and if it were not for the railway facilities we have, there would actually be a state of famine in that section of the country. If the people of that section are compelled to sacrifice their cattle because there is not sufficient market in that Province, would it not be to their advantage to be able to sell their cattle on the other side of the line, if we had reciprocity of trade? I am told, however, that this is a bargain which cannot be made by one party alone, but which requires, not only the consent of our Government, but that of the American Government as well. But there is a thing that might be done by our own Government—it could remove the duty on coarse grains; and since this is a dairying country there cannot be a shadow of doubt that the removal of that duty would be a benefit to those people. But as that is part and parcel of the National Policy, it must be left intact even if it impoverishes the farmers still more than they have been impoverished already by the hand of nature. But be this as it may, the policy of the Opposition has received the strongest illustration which it could receive by those unfortunate events of last summer. I believe I can say at least for some sections of the country that that policy is gaining ground. All the growers of natural products—the fishermen, the farmers, the lumbermen—now see the utter hollowness of the promises made to them in 1878. The voice of the tempter is always sweet, and it was the mistake of the farmers in 1878 to listen to that voice. But as our foremother, Eve, yielded to the voice of the tempter, we can forgive the farmers if they did the same thing. But now, after an experience of ten years, they see that the true policy does not lie in the restriction of trade, but in the extension of trade as far as possible I say we have the producers of natural products with us. The manufacturers are still against us.

An hon. MEMBER. Not all.

Mr. LAURIER. Not all, I am glad to say, and the day is not far distant, I have no doubt, when all manufacturers will come to a better understanding of the true principles of political economy. Last summer there was a meeting of cotton manufacturers in the city of Montreal. I find a report of that meeting in the good Conservative organ, the Gazette, and among other things in it I see the following statement, not made editorially, but by the reporter who attended the meeting:

"By actual comparison, good farmers' shirting can be obtained in Canada to-day at a lower figure than the same material can be purchased for in the United States. This is one effect of the National Policy and is a great boon to the agricultural community. The country, however, requires about 600,000 more people in it to maintain the present number of cotton mills, but these are quickly coming, as 100,000 landed on our shores last year."

Now, Mr. Speaker, that statement has to be taken with more than one granum salis. 600,000 is a big figure, but we have been accustomed in the past to big figures. Year by year we were told that hundreds of thousands of people were coming into Manitoba and the North-West Territories; but these figures, when they came to be investigated, dwindled to very small proportions. But leaving that aside, it is now stated that good shirtings can be manufactured in this country at a lower figure than in the United States. Why, then, should the cotton manufacturers be afraid to throw down the barrier which is keeping the American market from them? Their advantage would be to have, not only an increased market of 600,000 souls, but of 60,000,000. Therefore I have every reason to hope that not merely a few manufacturers, but all the manufacturers of the country, will before long be convinced of the truth of the policy we have offered them. The most important feature of His Excellency's Speech is the paragraph referring to the Fisheries Treaties. The statement is not as clear and as simple as I would have desired, and I suppose we shall have occasion before long to revert to it, when we shall have a more precise communication from the Government. The only thing I would say at present is this: It now only remains for Canada to continue to maintain her rights, as prescribed in the Treaty of 1818, until some satisfactory re-adjustment is arranged by treaty between the two Governments. This is a matter which should be approached with a great deal of caution and deliberation. For my part, at this moment, I am not disposed to enter critically into the announcement which is here made, but will content myself with offering my suggestion as to what, in my estimation, should be the true policy to be followed. As I understand, the Government have determined to fall back upon the Convention of 1818, and to assert all the rights claimed as belonging to Canada under that convention. Before going further I would say sincerely I agree in this with the mover of the Address, that it is to be deprecated that the treaty of last year was not ratified by the Senate of the United States. Not that it was a satisfactory treaty; on the contrary, it was a very unsatisfactory treaty. It forced upon Canada concessions without giving any adequate return, but, in my opinion, the worst feature of the treaty was that it left open many of the causes of irritation which in the past had disturbed the cordiality of our relations with our neighbors. Still, it was a step in the right direction towards closer relations, and, though a feeble step, it would have met, as it did meet, with our approval as far as it went. Now, however, that treaty has been abandoned, and it is proposed to revert to the enforcement of the Convention of 1818. The only suggestion I would offer to the Government, approaching this question, not critically, not in any partisan spirit, would be that the Government should not be too hasty in adopting such a policy, but that perhaps it would be prudent on their part to wait until the month of March, when the new Administration is to come into power, and then ascertain how far they are prepared to meet our views. We must remember this, also, that although we have contended for a certain interpretation of the treaty, and although we have claimed to enforce rights under that treaty, we have also to a certain extent admitted, by the fact that we became party to the negotiation of a new treaty, that there were causes for considering the possibility of entering into new arrangements as far as our rights were concerned. We have thus admitted that the contention of the Americans that our views of the treaty are antiquated is, to some extent, true. The American statesmen say that our interpretation of the treaty is antiquated. That may or may not be the case, but, if it be antiquated, it would be more logical, and more friendly as well, on their part, to make that representation when it can be coupled with an offer to negotiate a new treaty. I know that the position of our Government in that respect is not a facile one; I know that it is full of difficulties, and I recognise all those difficulties, but it would be, in my judgment, the part of prudence to enforce our rights, when our rights are to be enforced, with as gentle a hand as possible. I have stated elsewhere that the relations between the two countries have not been satisfactory. The hon. gentleman who moved the Address stated that I had taken an exceptional position on that question. Nay, the position which I took was the position always held by the Liberal party, that it was fair, right and just that our views of the treaty should be enforced; still, there were some acts which had been done by us which could not be condoned. Whatever you may say, when men are sent back in distress to sea and refused provisions, there are no mere technicalities which would force me to approve such an act. I say that this treatment cannot be condoned, and it was this treatment which I denounced last summer. As I said a moment ago, those were my views then and they are mine now, but I do not intend to enter critically upon that question to-day. We shall have occasion to do so at a later day when we will have more complete communication from the Government on the subject. The only thing I have to say at present is this, that the whole subject, in my judgment, should be approached in as friendly a spirit as possible. There are those among us who believe that a friendly act towards the American nation is an unfriendly act to Canada and to England. Such is not my view. My view, on the contrary, is that every act of friendship done by Canada to the United States is a good service to England. My hon. friend from Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in the most admirable speech which he delivered some time ago in Ingersoll, elaborated the idea, at great length, that England would never have any better ally than the great Republic to the south of us, and it must strike everybody that if to-day or to-morrow England were entangled, as she may be any moment, in a continental war, her strength would be ten-fold, if she could depend upon the moral sympathy—I say, moral sympathy alone—not only of her colonies but even of the great American Republic; and if I were to speak my whole mind on the subject, I would say that any act done anywhere which would increase the friendship among the branches of the Anglo-Saxon family the world over is a step forward in the civilisation of the world. Further, I will not say to-day. We are not many on this side of the House, not as many as we should be for the good of the country, but few as we are we intend to do the best we can for the country; and though we shall exercise in a perfectly free spirit our right to criticise the acts of the Government, we shall at the same time do our best to accelerate the business of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can congratulate the House and the country on the very kindly and good-natured manner in which my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, has addressed the House. That has always, however, I am free to admit, been his course both before and since he assumed the responsible position which he now holds, and I hope and believe the tone which he has adopted will be followed not only by his own friends, but by those who are opposed to him politically, and that while we may agree to disagree on many points of public policy, we will forget all the old acerbities and continue, during this Session, the kindly, the parliamentary tone which my hon. friend has adopted. I can heartily agree with my hon. friend in the cordial and graceful compliments which he has paid to the mover and seconder of this Address. I shall say no more, leaving it to this House and the readers of the Debates, to consider the compliment given by my hon. friend as just and well deserved. My hon. friend has, in a very good-natured manner criticised the speech. He says it will not set the world on fire. Well, we do not want to set the world on fire; and I do not believe my hon. friend, although he raises that objection, is much of a fire-eater except, perhaps, in the far North-West, so that I do not think this objection will be taken to heart by the hon. gentlemen who sit behind me. My hon. friend, however, complains that there is a very meagre bill of fare, but I, as leader of the Government, considered myself in a delicate position, and in settling this meagre bill of fare, I considered the weak digestion of hon. gentlemen opposite. Milk for babes and strong meat for men, you know. My hon. friend opposite is still in the infancy of his political position, and consequently we have kept the diet down so as suit his digestion. My hon. friend is very much pleased to observe in the Speech that there is an announcement of the extension of trade to all parts of the world, even to the Antipodes. He says he is willing that we should extend our trade to Australasia, to South America, or to New Zealand, but he says, why do you not extend your trade to the near south? The hon. gentleman knows why we do not extend our trade to the south. He knows full well that the reason is that they will not allow us to do so. We would be willing to do so; we have been always anxious to do so. From 1854 to the present moment Canada has shown her readiness to enter into the most friendly relations—into the most friendly commercial and social relations—with the United States; but they will not have us, except, perhaps, at a price that we do not choose to give. The hon. gentleman himself, I think, would not offer to give that price if he stood where I do. It has been announced by leading men in the United States, by men who will in the future, perhaps in the near future, govern the political course of the United States, that we shall have no extension of intercourse with the United States unless we are content to sell our heritage for a mess of pottage, unless we choose we give up our allegiance to our Sovereign and to change our proud position as a member of the greatest Empire the world ever saw, and to become a mere outskirt of the neighboring Republic. I know that the hon. gentleman himself would not pay that price, and, unless we do pay that price, our hopes of the extension of trade to the south cannot be satisfied, and the project of commercial union, I think, must be dropped in silence. The hon. gentleman said that, although I have been hopelessly wrong in my political economy, he hopes to see that, by-and-bye, I may change my opinion. Well, I like power; I like place; I like my present position. All I can say is that I believe that moment I adopted the hon. gentleman's advice and changed my opinions and my course in regard to the commercial and fiscal policy of Canada, I would have to give up all I like, and assume the position of the hon. gentleman opposite. I am in no hurry to do that, and until he and his friends, with all their ability, can induce the electors of Canada to change their fixed opinions on that point, I am not likely to change mine, or to change my course. The hon. gentleman deplored that, among the many omissions in the Speech, there is not a single word about the protection of the rights of the workingman. Mr. Speaker, if we had introduced measures such as he would indicate, the course of the hon. gentlemen opposite would at once be to declare that we were treading on the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislatures. We have heard that cry before in this House. We have heard, when measures relating to the position of the workingmen and the laws affecting them were introduced, that the different Provinces could deal with these subjects and had full power to deal with them. However, I believe that we have certain powers here in regard to that matter, and that the Provincial Legislatures have certain powers also; and, whenever the report is obtained from this Commission which the hon.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD,

gentleman spoke of in rather a disparaging tone—I really do not know why—I think this House will receive sufficient instruction as to the subjects dealt with by that Commission, in regard to the manner in which the position and status of the workingmen can be improved, to enable it to take up the subject with full knowledge of all the grievances, or alleged grievances, of the workingmen, and will be able with that information to do whatever is necessary by legislation to improve their position. The hon. gentleman also complains that there is no announcement that there is going to be an alteration in the Customs laws and he specially complains of the sufferings of the mercantile community. Well, I think the commercial community can take care of themselves, and if the law relating to the Customs or to the administration of the Customs presses unduly on the commercial body, they will let this House and the country know it. But where do we find any complaint from the commercial people in regard to this matter? Where do we find any petitions from Boards of Trade or Chambers of Commerce laying their grievances on this Table and calling the attention of Parliament to the wrongs which they suffer under the Customs law? Of course, that law is a stringent law. It would be no law at all fit for the purpose if it were not stringent. The wiles of the smuggler and the dishonest trader are dark, and those men have to be watched closely. When we adopted the system of protecting the manufactures of this country, we were obliged to make the law under which that protection was given efficient, and in order to do that we had to pass a stringent Customs law, or the whole policy would be nugatory. We know what false invoices are, we know what the devices of dishonest trader are. We know the Protean changes of action which the dishonest trader adopts for the purpose of evading the law, and, notwithstanding our protective system, of making this practically a free trade country. Sir, whenever the commercial men of this country feel that the law is doing them wrong, they will let us know it, but the law is for the protection of the honest trader, of the honest man who pays the full duty according to an honest invoice on the articles which he imports, and he is to be protected against the smuggler and the dishonest tradesman who make false statements, false affidavits, and undersell the honest trader, and so prevent his having the fair protection which is afforded by the strict enforcement of the law. Oh, yes, the honest men of the country, the honest commercial men, do not complain of this law. The smuggler does, the dishonest man does; the man into whose warehouse the Custom house officer walks and finds the smuggled article, finds out the fraud and finds out the double invoice on looking at the books of the dishonest trader—all such men complain; but the honest trader recognizes the necessity of a stringent law, and I believe among the commercial community of Canada, there is no man standing higher than my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, for the manner in which he has carried out the law and protected the honest man against the smuggler and the swindler. The hon. gentleman says that there is one other omission in the Speech, that we have not congratulated ourselves upon the happy state of the country, and that we have not inserted into His Excellency's Speech a clause which may be laudatory of ourselves and of our administration. There is no necessity, Mr. Speaker, to praise ourselves—the country does that for us. The hon. gentleman says of his following: "We are a small body." Why are they a small body? Because the country does not give them the same complimentary confidence that it does to us. The hon. gentleman knows that under the dome of St. Paul's in London, there is a celebrated epitaph to Sir Christopher Wren: Si monumentum requiris, circumspice—"if you seek for a monument, look around you"—at this magnificent building. We say the same thing in a humble spirit:

Look around at the prosperity of this country, look at the undiminished confidence in us of the people of Canada from one end to the other. That is our best monument, and I expect by-and-bye to see something of that kind inscribed on my tombstone.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). He will see his own tombstone.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will be looking down upon my tombstone; I will be looking down upon the Conservative majority, which I shall leave in such good heart and spirit that they will carry on the traditions that have guided them since 1854, and especially since 1878.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In the same grave yard.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend is rather inconsistent in his remarks about the Fishery question. I quite agree with him that we must be exceedingly cautious in all that is said in this House or in Parliament at present. In the present state of the relations between the United States and Canada, and England, as the paramount power, it will be exceedingly unwise if, by any hurried or false step, we should intensify the critical position of that question. I think my hon. friend will admit that on that question, at all events, "to-morrow" is a good cry. My hon. friend regrets greatly that that treaty was not ratified. To be sure, it was declared last Session to be a very unsatisfactory treaty. Yes; I do not remember whether he himself spoke against it, but those who are surrounding him spoke very strongly against the treaty as giving up everything—giving up a great deal too much, at all events, without getting any concessions whatever. I think the hon. gentleman took that line when the Bill for ratifying the treaty was before the House. Now the hon. gentleman says, unsatisfactory as it was, because it gave up Canadian rights which ought not to be given up, and without sufficient compensation—now, he says, we must be very cautious, and that we must not adhere to these antiquated claims, that we must deal with this subject denovo, as it were; that the true way, in fact, to settle with the United States is to forget the old Convention of 1818, and with the spirit of amity, and the spirit of increased friendship, and with the spirit of further concession, we should endeavor to settle this question. The hon. gentleman has just said that the treaty conceded too much, but he advises us now to be very cautious, to go slow, and by new concessions, by new exhibitions of friendship, to try to induce the United States to make some treaty with us. Mr. Speaker, we ought not to be drawn, and I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman does not desire that we should be drawn, into a discussion of that subject now. The fishing season is over, it is mid-winter now; and when the spring season commences, as the hon. gentleman said, there will be a new President in the United States, a new government; and I am very happy to know that in any arrangement which may be made with the United States in the near future the question will not be embarrassed in the fact of the President, the head of the executive, being unsupported by the Senate, the paramount branch of that executive. We have no right or reason to suppose that the Government, when it comes in, will be less friendly to England or Canada than the outgoing one; we have no reason to suppose that they will not be as anxious or desirous of entering into negotiations for removing any cause that may exist of disturbing the amity between Canada and the United States. We have the satisfaction of knowing and believing that if any arrangement is come to between the President of the United States and England, on this question, it will in all probability receive the support of the Senate of the United States, which is politically in accord with the incoming President. Mr. Speaker, I shall say no more. I again repeat my congratulations to my hon. friend on the tone he has adopted, and my hope and belief that we will get on very well during the Session, and although we may not set the world on fire, that, with his assistance, and with his candid criticism, we will pass a number of useful Bills which will tend to the development and the progress of our beloved Canada.

Paragraphs one to fourteen agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the said resolutions be referred to a Select Committee composed of Sir Hector Langevin, Mr. White, Mr. Lépine and the mover, to prepare and report the draft of an Address in answer to the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, from the Committee, reported the draft of an Address, which was read the first and second time and ordered to be engrossed, and to be presented to His Excellency by such members of the House as are of the honorable the Privy Council.

PRAYERS.

MEMBERS INTRODUCED.

JOHN WALDIE, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Halton, introduced by Sir Richard Cartwright and Mr. Paterson (Brant).

ALPHONSE A. C. LARIVIÈRE, Member for the Electoral District of Provencher, introduced by Mr. McDowall and Mr. Joncas.

REPORTS.

Report of the Department of Militia and Defence for the year ending 31st December, 1888.—(Sir Adolphe Caron.)

Annual Report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1888.—(Mr. Foster.)

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 2) to permit foreign vessels to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 6) to prevent the practice of fraud by tree peddlers and commission men in the sale of nursery stock.—(Mr. Boyle.)

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. BROWN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 3) to make further provision as to the prevention of cruelty to animals, and to amend chapter 172 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intituled "An Act respecting Cruelty to Animals."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. BROWN. I am prepared to explain the nature of the Bill, but perhaps it would be more convenient to the House to explain at a later stage.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Now.

Mr. BROWN. As it seems to be the desire of some hon. members that I should explain the nature of the Bill, I desire, in very few words, to say that the object is to prevent cruelty to animals, not already provided for by law, such as cock-fighting and dog-fighting, but mainly the cruel sport of trap-shooting, where pigeons and small birds are often confined in boxes in cold weather for the sake of enabling men to engage in this sport, ostensibly for practice in shooting, when they could have every opportunity of distinguishing themselves in that particular by the use of clay pigeons without cruelty to innocent birds. I am sure I have the sympathy and support of a large majority of the members of this House in introducing this measure. I know that I am sustained by all the humane societies of the Dominion of Canada, and I hope that when this measure comes to be discussed, as it will be at a later stage of its progress, the strong sympathy of this House will be given in its support. I am certain that there is no education so demoralising for the young as that which leads them to treat with indifference any kind of cruelty to dumb animals.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 4) further to amend the Revised Statutes, chapter 5, respecting the Electoral Franchise. He said: I will merely call attention to a few of the features of this measure, and will explain it more fully at a later stage. It is substantially the same Bill as was introduced last Session at an advanced period and deferred until this year, partly because the time at the disposal of the House did not warrant the taking up of the Bill, and partly because the printing of the lists was being proceeded with in the Government Bureau; and the Bill was unnecessary until this year in so far as it would apply to the lists being printed. The scheme proposed by this Bill for the revision of the lists is that, immediately after the 1st of June, the revising officer, availing himself of the sources of information to which he is directed to refer by the present statute—the electoral lists, the assessment rolls, and information of that kind—is to proceed with his revision, and he is to make supplementary lists of voters and of the names to be struck off the voters' lists—the supplementary lists giving the corrections—the additions to, and the subtractions from the list as sent to him from the Government printing office. These supplementary lists are to be sent to the Queen's Printer and printed and returned to the revising officer. The officer is then to post them up and fix a day when all parties interested shall be heard. Then the revision is to take place by inserting the corrections which are made in the list in the Government printing office. The supplementary lists having in that way been fixed by the revising officer, are to be sent to the Queen's Printer, and the whole list is finally to be struck off and distributed in the manner provided by the present Act. Another provision of the Bill is that the list, as then established, is to be final as to the qualification of voters, and a further provision is that the polling districts shall be sub-divided, so that from time to time they shall not exceed 250 voters in all. The present statute says 300. In addition to that, the form of the list of voters is simplified very materially, so as to curtail expense.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. BROWN.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE, CHEQUES AND PROMISSORY NOTES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 5) relating to bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes. He said: The object of this Bill is to render uniform in almost every particular the laws throughout the Dominion with respect to these contracts. The law under this Bill will be uniform in every particular, except as regards statutory holidays, in respect of which special provision is to be made as regards the Province of Quebec. I may say that the Bill is principally the codification of the existing law relating to bills, cheques and promissory notes, and that the changes which are made in our law on these subjects are in the direction of making it uniform with the English Statute law. The changes thus made will render our law similar to the English law, excepting in two or three unimportant particulars, and the principal one of these is the preservation of the present system of payment when the last day of grace falls on a Sunday or statutory holiday. Our existing provision is that in such a case, the bill or note shall be payable on the following day, while under the English statute it is payable the preceding day. In that respect, this Bill proposes to continue our present system. I may mention, briefly, for the information of the House, the alterations in the common law which the Bill proposes to make. The first is that:

"Unless the contrary appear on the face of the bill, the holder may treat it as an inland bill."

I presume it will be more convenient to the House that I should merely mention the changes without making any comments or entering into any explanations. The next is that:

"A bill may be made payable to two or more payees jointly, or it may be made payable in the alternative to one of two, or one or some of several payees. A bill may also be made payable to the holder of an office for the time being."

The next feature of that kind in the Bill is that:

"When a bill contains words prohibiting transfer, or indicating an intention that it should not be transferable, it is valid as between the parties thereto, but is not negotiable."

"A bill is payable to bearer which is expressed to be so payable, or on which the only or last endorsement is an endorsement in blank."

"A bill is payable to order which is expressed to be so payable, or which is expressed to be payable to a particular person, and does not contain words prohibiting transfer or indicating an intention that it should not be transferable."

Further changes are:

"Where a bill expressed to be payable at a fixed period after date is issued undated, or where the acceptance of a bill payable at a fixed period after sight is undated, any holder may insert therein the true date of issue, or acceptance, and the bill shall be payable accordingly."

"Provided that where the holder in good faith and by mistake inserts a wrong date, and in every case where a wrong date is inserted if the bill subsequently comes into the hands of a holder in due course, the bill shall not be voided thereby, but shall operate and be payable as if the date so inserted had been the true date."

"The drawer of a bill and any endorser may insert therein the name of a person to whom the holder may resort in case of need, that is to say, in case the bill is dishonored by non-acceptance or non-payment. Such person is called the referee in case of need. It is in the option of the holder to resort to the referee in case of need or not, as he may think fit."

"When a bill payable after sight is dishonored by non-acceptance and a drawee subsequently accepts it, the holder, in the absence of any different agreement, is entitled to have the bill accepted as of the date of first presentment to the drawee for acceptance."

"Where a bill purports to be endorsed conditionally, the condition may be disregarded by the payer, and payment to the endorsee is valid whether the condition has been fulfilled or not."

"A bill payable on demand is deemed to be overdue within the meaning and for the purposes of this section, when it appears on the face of it to have been in circulation for an unreasonable length of time. What is an unreasonable length of time for this purpose is a question of fact."

"Where the holder of a bill, drawn payable elsewhere than at the place of business or residence of the drawee, has not time with the exercise of reasonable diligence, to present the bill for acceptance before presenting it for payment on the day that it falls due, the delay caused by presenting the bill for acceptance before presenting it for payment is excused, and does not discharge the drawer and endorsers

"Presentment in accordance with these rules is excused, and a bill may be treated as dishonored by non-acceptance, where the drawee is dead or bankrupt or insolvent, or is a fictitious person, or a person not having capacity to contract by bill; or where, after the exercise of reasonable diligence, such presentment cannot be effected; or where, although the presentment has been irregular, acceptance has been refused on some other ground."

There is a further provision that:

"Where a qualified acceptance is taken, and the drawer or an endorser has not explicitly or impliedly authorised the holder to take a qualified acceptance, or does not subsequently assent thereto, such drawer or endorser is discharged from his liability on the bill. The provisions of this sub-section do not apply to a partial acceptance whereof due notice has been given. Where a foreign bill has been accepted as to part, it must be protested as to the balance. When the drawer or endorser of a bill receives notice of a qualified acceptance and does not within a reasonable time express his dissent to the holder, he shall be deemed to have assented thereto."

There are also the following provisions:—

"The return of a dishonored bill to the drawer or an endorser is, in point of form, deemed a sufficient notice of dishonor.

"When the acceptor of a bill is or becomes the holder of it, at or after its maturity, in his own right, the bill is discharged.

"When the holder of a bill, at or after its maturity, absolutely or unconditionally renounces his rights against the acceptor, the bill is discharged. The renunciation must be in writing unless the bill is delivered up to the acceptor.

"Where a bill or acceptance is materially altered without the assent of all parties liable on the bill, the bill is avoided except as against a party who has himself made, authorised or assented to the alteration, and subsequent endorsers; provided that, where a bill has been materially altered, but the alteration is not apparent, and the bill is in the hands of a holder in due course, such holder may avail himself of the bill as if it had not been altered, and may enforce payment of it according to its original tenor.

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, where a cheque is not presented for payment within a reasonable time of its issue, and the drawer or the person on whose account it is drawn had the right at the time of such presentment, as between him and the banker, to have the cheque paid, and suffers actual damage through the delay, he is discharged to the extent of such damage, that is to say, to the extent to which such drawer or person is a creditor of such banker to a larger amount than he would have been had such cheque been paid.

"Where, by this Act, any instrument or writing is required to be signed by any person, it is not necessary that he should sign it with his own hand, but it is sufficient if his signature is written thereon by some other person by or under his authority."

And in the case of a corporation it is provided that it is sufficient if the instrument is sealed with the corporate seal, but it is not required that the seal of the corporation should be affixed. It is further provided that:

"Where a bill or note is required to be protested within a specified time or before some further proceeding is taken, it is sufficient that the Bill has been noted for protest before the expiration of the specified time, or the taking of the proceeding; and the formal protest may be extended at any time thereafter as of the date of the noting. Where a dishonored bill or note is authorised or required to be protested, and the services of a notary cannot be obtained at the place where the bill is dishonored, any justice of the peace, resident of the place, may present and protest such bill or note and give all necessary notices, having all the necessary powers of a notary in respect thereto."

It is also provided that this Act shall not come into force until the 1st September next, in order that its provisions may be fully known by time being given for the publication of the statute, as well as for the information which will at once be desired as to the changes in the present law. These are the changes which it is proposed to make in the law. Some of them, as the House will have observed, are either declaratory of the common law, or partially so, or they ratify the practice of the mercantile community in respect to these matters. One of the changes which it is necessary to make in the direction of uniformity is in relation to the Province of Quebec, and this Bill will require a protest in the case of foreign bills only, making the Quebec law uniform with that of the other Provinces. I may further observe that the Bill proposes to establish in Canada the English provisions in respect to crossed cheques.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WRECKING AND COASTING PRIVILEGES TO UNITED STATES VESSELS.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) to admit United States vessels to wrecking, towing and coasting privileges in Canadian waters. He said: In the first clause of the Bill, provision is made for vessels belonging to the United States of America being allowed to assist vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters. In the second clause, it is provided that vessels belonging to the United States of America may tow vessels belonging to the United States from one port to another as well as vessels of any other nationality. The third clause provides that vessels belonging to the United States of America may enjoy the privileges of the coasting trade of Canada, by coasting from one port to another, subject only to the same regulations as Canadian vessels are subject to. The fourth clause provides that the Act shall go into effect when the Government of the United States have passed a similar law giving like privileges to the vessels of Canada in the waters of the United States.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. EDGAR asked, 1. Has the Government caused to be printed the lists of voters as revised in 1886? 2. What numbers of such lists have been struck off, or are to be struck off, for each electoral district? 3. What number of such lists will be sent to each revising officer, and when? 4. Are such lists to be supplied to any other persons than revising officers; or have they been supplied to, or obtained by any other persons? 5. If it be permitted to any person, other than revising officers, to obtain copies of such lists, to whom should application be made for them; and is the price thereof to be regulated by analogy to the prices under section seventeen of the Franchise Act, or what price is fixed? 6. What number of copies of the lists as preliminarily revised is it proposed to print off for the revising officers to enable them to meet the demands of persons applying for such lists, under section seventeen, sub section one, of the Franchise Act?

Mr. BOWELL. 1. The electoral lists prepared after those revised in 1886, have all been put in type. 2. Fifty copies or proofs of each have been struck off. 3. This will necessarily depend on the size of the constituency, and may depend to some extent on the legislation which may take place during the present Session. The lists will be furnished in sufficient time to enable the revising officers to proceed with their revision at the proper time. 4. Lists have been issued to several parties when elections to the House of Commons, or under the Canada Temperance Act were going on, or about to be entered on, and only then. 5 and 6. No regulations have yet been made upon these points.

SUBSIDY TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has the Government of Prince Edward Island drawn any sum of money from the Government of Canada, from the 1st day of January, 1888, to the 1st day of February, 1889, from capital or other than usual subsidy?

Mr. FOSBER. The Government of Prince Edward Island withdrew a sum of money from its capital account on the 14th of January, 1889, for local improvements. The sum was $200,000.

PREVENTIVE OFFICERS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is it the intention of the Government to appoint preventive officers for Tignish and Nail Pond, Prince Edward Island, in room of James Phee and Benjamin D. Waite, who were both dismissed in 1888?

Mr. BOWELL. It is not the intention of the Government to appoint preventive officers for Tignish and Nail Pond, until, in the opinion of the Government, such officers are necessary for the protection of the revenue.

SUBWAY ACROSS THE STRAITS OF NORTH-UMBERLAND.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is it the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates, during the present Session, a sum sufficient to build the subway across the Straits of Northumberland, connecting Prince Edward Island with the mainland, in accordance with the terms of Confederation, and as promised by Sir John A. Macdonald in a letter to Senator Howlan, dated January 28th, 1887?

Mr. FOSTER. The final clauses of the question are scarcely in order, as containing a statement of alleged facts. If my hon. friend will consent to the withdrawal of those, I will answer the question by saying that the intention of the Government will be shown in the Estimates which will shortly be laid before the House.

THE BROTHERS LÉBOURDAIS.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked. Whether the Government has had any correspondence respecting the trial of the two brothers, Lebourdais, from the County of L'Islet, which took place in Liverpool, England, in December last; and if so, whether the Government has taken, or will take, any action in the matter?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I find that the Government has had no correspondence on the subject, but a memorial was presented within the last few days, and in that memorial the wish was expressed that the case should be transmitted to Her Majesty. The conviction referred to in the question took place in Scotland, and His Excellency the Governor General has been moved to transmit the memorial for the consideration of Her Majesty's ministers.

FRAUDS UPON FARMERS.

Mr. BROWN moved:

That a Special Committee be appointed to enquire into the fraudulent practices which have prevailed, and still prevail, in various parts of the Dominion, by which farmers and others have been and are induced to give their promissory notes and securities to a very large amount in the aggregate, for seed, agricultural implements, grape vines, and other goods and merchandise, by various false pretexts; the goods in some cases never being delivered, and in other cases being comparatively worthless, the makers of such promissory notes being obliged to make payment, while the perpetrators of these wrongs evade justice; with power to send for persons, papers and records, and examine on oath or affirmation, where affirmation is allowed by law, such witnesses as may appear before the said committee, and to report what remedies exist in such cases, or what further remedies should be provided; said committee also be empowered to employ a shorthand writer to take down such evidence as it may deem necessary, and to consist of Messrs. Amyot, Barron, Brown, Carpenter, Coochane, Desjardins, Fisher, Ferguson (Welland), Hale, McMullen, Marshall, Mills (Annapolis), Moncrieff, Rowand, Smith (Ontario), Welsh, and Wood (Brockville).

He said: In making this motion, I desire to say that the committee appointed last Session prosecuted their labors with all diligence during the limited time they had, and the work they did has borne very good fruit. During the recess the members of the committee, from the various parts of the country, in their several constituencies, have received further information as to the frauds committed and especially in that part of the country from which I come, vine-growers have been swindled, and desire to give evidence before the committee.

Mr. PERRY.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I think, before the House consents to this motion, we ought to have some information as to what the probable cost will be, and also what has been the cost of the enquiry that was gone into last Session. You are aware, Mr. Speaker, that a large committee was appointed last Session; a large number of witnesses were brought here, no doubt, at great expense, from a great distance; a large amount of evidence was collected, which was printed and distributed. Now, I submit that all that must involve a large cost to the country, and the question comes up, whether the results to be obtained are sufficiently important to justify the additional cost. These are points on which the House should be satisfied before they commit themselves to further expenditure in this matter. It seems to me that the evidence taken last year, voluminous as it was and costly as it was, was certainly sufficient to form a basis for the Government and the House to judge whether such legislation was necessary or not, and on what line such legislation should be enacted. I am one of those who have not much faith in that kind of enquiry and that sort of legislation. The fact of the matter is, that the great mass of the farmers of this Dominion and others, to whom reference is made, are not fools. It is true that here and there are found a few who can be gulled by such practices as those referred to, but they form a very small minority, and I submit that the great bulk of the farmers and traders in the Dominion are perfectly capable of taking care of themselves, and, so far as that small minority is concerned, committees might sit from now till doomsday, and enact as many laws as they please, and yet fail to save them from being taken advantage of. I hold that sufficient enquiry has been made to enable the House to judge whether such legislation is necessary or not, and what that legislation should be, and there is no necessity to burden the country with further cost for procuring evidence.

Mr. McMULLEN. In regard to the remarks of the hon. member, I may say that I happened to be a member of the committee in question. The committee got to work very late in the Session, and the opportunity to gather information of the kind necessary to enable them to form an opinion as to whether legislation was needed or not, was very limited. The information secured was of decided advantage to those who possibly might, from limited information and experience, be taken advantage of by those who are always waiting to take advantage of simple-minded men. I endorse to some extent the remarks made by the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong); still I contend that there is a very respectable percentage of the farming community and the trading public who, from time to time, are victimised by men who make it a business to go from door to door and take advantage of these people. If we can, by any investigation or by any legislation enacted by this House, give those people information or pass such legislation as will prevent repetition of the frauds perpetrated, I think it will be wise and prudent on the part of this House to aid in any possible way the hon. gentleman who is asking for this committee. I am willing to consent that the expenditure should be incurred, and I know the expense last year was very limited. I can say for the chairman of the committee that he was exceedingly careful in regard to the expenditure, and that, when any person was asked to be brought before the committee, it was only when it appeared that he would be able to give good evidence, and, after an idea of the expense had been obtained, the chairman ordered the witness to be subpoenaed. I have no doubt he will follow the same prudent course this year, and, if he does so, I believe the committee will be of decided advantage to the simple-minded people in this country who are taken advantage of from time to time.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved :

That a Special Committee of seven Members be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed, lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees, ordered by the House on Thursday, the 31st ult., and that Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Hector Langevin, Sir Richard Cartwright, Sir John Thompson, and Messrs. Bowell, Laurier and Mills, do compose said Committee.

Motion agreed to.

INLAND REVENUE REPORT—CORRECTION.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I desire to call the attention of the House to an error which has occurred in one of the appendices to the report of the Inland Revenue Department, just published. I need not say that it is to be regretted that such an error should have occurred; but my attention having been called to the fact, instructions were immediately given to take measures to have it corrected, so that those to whom the reports were sent should be in possession of the correct figures. It has been insinuated that the commissioner was guilty of gross dereliction of duty in this matter, and it has also been insinuated that the error was purposely made in order to prejudice the case of the Scott Act, and that the statement of the great consumption per head of the population was in fact made against the Scott Act by those who were opposed to it. In reply, I need only call the attention of the House, after having admitted that a very serious blunder has been made, and one which is to be regretted, to the fact that the commissioner in his report himself states at page 19, paragraph 21 :

"It may be remarked that after reducing all spirituous and malt liquors and wines, domestic and foreign, to the basis of alcohol, the allowance per head of the population for the past decade does not exceed three-quarters of a gallon per annum, barely one-third of the quantity per head consumed throughout Europe."

The compilation of the appendix has for some years past been entrusted to Mr. Campeau, an old officer, and one of the most careful and industrious officers in the service. He is absent at present, or I would have procured from him a statement as to how the error occurred. I may state further that this paper was one of the last returned by the printers, and the schedule was not prepared before the last day for the report to be handed in. The House will no doubt be satisfied that this error must have accidentally crept into the table, it having been prepared by an officer of the standing of Mr. Campeau, whose work has always been found correct, and who has discharged his duty with great faithfulness. The House will no doubt also be satisfied that there was no intention to mislead, and I can assure hon. members that every means will be taken to place the correct figures into the hands of those who have received the report.

Mr. EDGAR. I did not catch the correction made by the Minister, if he made one.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The correction will be given. I have instructed the preparation of a corrected table, which will be ready in a day or two, to be supplied to members, to take the place of that which is incorrect.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister does not know yet what the correct figures are?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I know the percentage arrived at here in this report. It is three quarters of a gallon per head.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 4 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 5th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN presented the report of the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report Lists of the Select Standing Committees for the present Session. He moved that the portion of the report relating to the Committee on Standing Orders be adopted, as follows:—

ON STANDING ORDERS.

Messieurs

Bain (Wentworth),	Gillmor,	Paterson (Brant).
Bergeron,	Gordon,	Patterson (Essex),
Brien,	Jones (Digby),	Pery,
Burdett,	Landerkin,	Porter,
Casgrain,	Langelier (Montmor'cy),	Rinfret,
Coughlin,	Lavergne,	Robertson,
Coulombe,	Macdowall,	Smith (Sir Donald),
Denison,	McKeen,	Stevenson,
De St Georges,	Marshall,	Sutherland,
Dessaint,	Meigs,	Thérien,
Dupont,	Mills (Annapolis),	Turoot,
Ferguson (Leeds & Gr.),	Moffat,	Wilmot,
Ferguson (Renfrew),	Montplaisir,	Wilson (Lennox), and
Ferguson (Welland),	O'Brien,	Wood (Brockville).—44.
Gigault,

And that the Quorum of the said Committee do consist of Seven Members.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved :

That a Select Committee composed of Sir Adolphe Caron, Messrs. Blake, Amyot, Chouinard, Colby, Davies, Davin, Desjardins, Kirkpatrick, O'Brien, Scriver, Thérien, Weldon (Albert), Weldon (St. John), and Wright, be appointed to assist the Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, in so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as members of a joint committee of both Houses of the Library, and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honors therewith.

He said: This Committee is the same as last year, except that Mr. Edgar has been replaced by Mr. Blake, by consent of the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Report of the Postmaster General for the year ending 30th June, 1888.—(Mr. Haggart.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 8) to provide for the examination and licensing of all persons employed as stationary engineers, and all persons having charge of steam boilers and other devices under pressure.—(Mr. Cook.)

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COOK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 9) further to amend the Railway Act. He said: This is a similar Bill to the one I introduced last year. It has reference, in the first place, to the landing of passengers on the platform. It is the custom of the railway companies throughout this country to drop passengers wherever they see fit, and I think the travelling public should be protected against this. Another question dealt with by the Bill is the manner of handling baggage. It is well known that the baggage of passengers on railways has been smashed and destroyed by railway officials to a great extent, and this Bill proposes to prevent these two actions which are against the public interest.

Motion agreed to; and Bill read the first time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3:20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 6th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That a Message be sent to the Senate, requesting that their Honors will unite with this House in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing of this House, namely, Messrs. Amyot, Bergin, Bourassa, Bowell Charlton, Davin, Desjardins, Foster, Granibois, Innes, McMullen, Putnam, Somerville, Taylor, Tisdale, Trow and Vanasse, compose the committee.

Motion agreed to.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. LANDRY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 10) to amend chapter 127 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, entitled "An Act respecting interest." He said: The Bill requires very little explanation beyond this, that it seeks to fix the amount of interest charged on any contract.

An hon. MEMBER. To limit it?

Mr. LANDRY. Of course, if you fix it, it is limited. Of course I have my own ideas as to what it should be; but I should like to know the opinion of the House as to the amount at which it should be fixed, if it is thought reasonable to limit the interest.

Mr. EDGAR. Is it the same Bill the hon. member introduced last Session?

Mr. LANDRY. It is the same Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

Mr. WALLACE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 11) for the prevention and suppression of combinations formed in restraint of trade. He said: I think the necessity of this Bill is conclusively shown by the investigation that was held during last Session. The object of the Bill is to prevent any persons or corporations or companies from granting exclusive privileges to any person; to prevent them from denying privileges to any person that are granted to other persons in similar capacities and under similar conditions; also for preventing an undue restraint of traffic in certain articles of merchandise, and to make it impossible to prevent or restrain the manufacture, or production, or supply of articles that are either produced in this country or imported into it. The penalties provided by the Bill for infraction of these provisions may be either a fine or imprisonment, or both. There are three clauses in the Bill. The last clause provides that the Bill shall not interfere with chapter 131 of the Revised Statutes, relating to Trades Unions.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BONSECOURS MARKET HALL, MONTREAL.

Mr. CURRAN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to compensate the corporation of the city of Montreal for deterioration of the Bonsecours Market Hall during its occupancy by the volunteer corps?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not the intention of the Government to compensate the corporation of the city of Montreal for alleged deterioration of the Bonsecours Market Hall during its occupancy by the volunteer corps. A positive engagement existed, on behalf of the corporation of Montreal, to furnish to the Department of Militia drill accommodation. From reports received by the department from the Deputy Adjutant General, the building is shown to have been returned in as good order as when it was placed at the disposal of the militia.

BRIDGE OVER THE LACHINE CANAL.

Mr. CURRAN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to provide a new bridge over the Lachine Canal, to afford adequate facility for traffic between the city of Montreal and Point St. Charles?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government has not yet come to any decision on this matter.

CROSSING THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY IN MANITOBA.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court, given on 22nd of December last, in the case submitted to them respecting the validity of the statute of the Province of Manitoba authorising the construction of a railway crossing the Canadian Pacific Railway, it is the intention of the Government to propose legislation this Session to repeal or amend the provisions of the Railway Act upon which the question was raised by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or to pass a declaratory Act affirming the construction put upon those provisions by the Supreme Court, in order to avoid uncertainty as to the state of the law in other cases?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not at present the intention of the Government to do this.

PINE TIMBER UPON INDIAN RESERVES.

Mr. BARRON asked, At what date was the sale completed of the pine timber upon Indian Reserve No. 6, under the Robinson Treaty, known in the Treaties as Shawanakisic's Reserve? To whom was the said pine timber sold? What was the cash bonus paid by the purchaser to the Government?

Mr. DEWDNEY. In answer to the first part of the question, I beg to state that the sale of the timber was completed on the 30th September, 1886, and the license issued on the 14th October, 1886. The timber was sold to Mr. Robillard. The cash bonus paid was $316.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Mr. BARRON asked, Have the Trent Valley Canal Commissioners, appointed to take evidence and report as to the further progress of the work, yet sent in their report to the Government? If yes, do they report for or against further progress of the work?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The report has not yet been sent in.

COST OF ISSUING BUDGET SPEECHES.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved for:

Return giving the total cost of issuing the Budget Speech each year since 1880, together with a statement showing the number of copies issued yearly during said period.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no objection to the adoption of the motion, but I would like my hon. friend to amend it by having the return brought down for each year from 1867, so that we may have the information complete.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I had already thought it would be desirable to have it extended back to the beginning of Confederation.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. RINFRET (translation) moved for:

Copies of all petitions, reports and other documents respecting the granting of subsidies by the Dominion Government to the proposed line of railway between Montreal and Lévis, known as the Great Eastern Railway.
SIR ADOLPHE CARON.

He said: In making this motion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw the attention of the Government to the great importance, keeping in view the general interests of the country, that will be derived from the construction of the "Great Eastern Railway." This line will be the shortest and the most direct between the city of Montreal and the last station of the Intercolonial Railway at Lévis. It will be, without doubt, especially during the winter season, the route over which will pass a great portion of the freight from the west and the north-west, coming by way of the great Pacific Road to its destination in the Maritime Provinces. Those who are acquainted with the blocked up condition of affairs on the Grand Trunk Railway between Montreal and Lévis, and especially between Montreal and Richmond, cannot but admit that a second line on the south side of the St. Lawrence would greatly facilitate the moving of freight between the two points I have named, and would give the Intercolonial a very appreciable increase in its receipts. The policy of the Government, Mr. Speaker, has been, in later years especially, directed towards the building of railways. At the present day they are to be found running all over the country. Several of these lines less useful, doubtless, than the Great Eastern line, only looked to the satisfaction of local interests, without any thought of future revenue to the public treasury. The Great Eastern line, it is true, would cost several thousands of dollars paid as Federal and local subsidies, but the result would be in a few years to pay back to the public treasury both interest and capital, by way of the considerable surplus of revenue which it would earn for the Intercolonial. I will at this point presume to cite a short extract from an article in the Monde, the organ of the Minister of Public Works, bearing date the 2nd February last, in support of the statement which I have just made:

"There is a special reason which pleads in favor of a liberal grant from the Federal Government to this line, namely, that it is really a continuation of the Intercolonial Railway, and will be the latter's most important branch. The increase in freight to the Intercolonial which will be the result of its completion, will be an ample recompense to the Government for any subsidy which it might grant."

But there is another reason for which the Government should give its attention to the building of this line, and that is the reason afforded by the justice of the act. Upon the south side of the St. Lawrence, between Montreal and Quebec, are found the oldest parishes in Canada. These parishes are, generally speaking, prosperous, in spite of the enormous public burdens which rest upon their shoulders, during the past twenty-five or thirty years, for the construction of railways in all parts of Canada. These parishes have contributed their share in the building of the Grand Trunk, the Pacific and the Intercolonial, which have cost the country millions and millions—not to mention a host of other lines of less importance. If I make mention of these facts, it is not by way of criticism on the acts or the conduct of the Government. I desire simply to remind it—and especially to secure the attention of the Minister of Public Works, the acknowledged chief of his party in the Province of Quebec—I wish to remind the Government that these parishes have not received their share in the distribution of the public expenditure. In the Counties of Lotbinière, Nicolet and Yamaska, railways are conspicuous by their almost entire absence. All that has been spent so far in the parishes of these counties—with the exception of two parishes of the county which I represent and which are traversed by the Grand Trunk—may be summed up as follows. I quote from the last Report of Railways (1888):—

"By the Act 49 Victoria, chap. 10 authority was given for the grant of a subsidy to an extent not exceeding $32,000, on an estimated distance of 10 miles, towards the construction of a line from Yamaska to the River St. Francis, P. Q.; and the Great Eastern Railway Company having applied, and having satisfactorily shown their ability to perform the work, a contract was made with them on the 12th October, 1886, under the authority of an Order in Council of the 9th of that month, the time for completion being fixed as the 1st of October, 1887."

"The road having been completed and inspected, the whole of the subsidy due for its actual distance, 6 miles, namely, $19,200, has been paid under an Order in Council of the 27th March, 1887."

And further on, under the heading "Montreal and Sorel Railway Company," this is what I read:

"By the Act 48-49 Victoria, chapter 59, a subsidy not exceeding $72,000 was authorised to be granted to this company for a line from St. Lambert to Sorel. Under an Order in Council of the 2nd October, 1885, a contract was made with the company on the 14th and under the authority of Orders in Council, the last dated 10th November, 1886, payments have been made, amounting in all to $69,922, the road, 44.67 miles long, having been completed, with the exception of a small quantity of work, to secure the finishing of which $1,550 was retained."

Perhaps altogether, nearly $90,000 was spent on the road up to date. There was another sum of $96,000 voted, but of this but a very small sum has been paid. There was, however, no lack of demands made, Mr. Speaker. I know that a great number of petitions were forwarded to the Governor General. The electors of these various parishes have, by returning to the matter on various occasions and in many ways, shown their lively desire to have this railway. The Hon. the Minister of Public Works knows something about this. We know that on the 6th September last, a political picnic was gotten up in honor of the hon. the Ministers of the Province of Quebec. According to the Monde's report, the greatest enthusiasm reigned without ceasing among the political friends of the hon. Ministers. I had not the pleasure of being present at the meeting, but I think I am in a position to state that we must paint somewhat of a shadow over the smiling picture as executed by the Monde, and that at least some of the electors were slightly disappointed when they found that the hon. Ministers made no allusion whatever to the building of the "Great Eastern Railway." I have just said that I was not present, and I only speak from what I read in Le Monde newspaper, the organ of the hon. the Minister of Public Works. Was it through forgetfulness that these hon. Ministers made no allusion to the most important subject that they could, under the circumstances, have touched upon? It could not have been through forgetfulness, if the fact is considered that on the very day the Minister of Public Works received, from the Bishop of Nicolet, a very flattering letter; and one which allowed him to see between the lines that the construction of the "Great Eastern Railway" was not a thing to be treated as entirely foreign to the invitation which had been extended. I will venture to quote the following few words from this letter:—

"Our town has not much to offer that is attractive to a visitor of your importance; it has only just begun to receive the favors of fortune. On its behalf one must discount the future in order to answer satisfactorily the requirements of the present day. A harbor of refuge for the humbler vessels navigating the St. Lawrence, and the needs of our traffic in firewood; a railway in the direction of the interior parishes; and, above all the rest, the important project of a railway on the south shore, which, by affording a new outlet for the Intercolonial, will place Nicolet on the grand chain of communication binding Halifax to Victoria, and of which your opportune arrival places the first link in our soil of Nicolet."

So pretty a letter ought to have deserved, I think, some reference in the speech of the Minister of Public Works. The construction of this railway will be costly enough, Mr. Speaker; if I can rely upon certain information which I have received, it will cost nearly $20,000 per mile. There must be added to this the cost of three or four very important bridges. One of them will cost more than one quarter of a million of dollars. The total cost of this railway will not be much less than three millions and a-half or four millions of dollars. During last Session a delegation waited on the hon. the First Minister, with reference to the bridges which I have just referred to. I do not recollect all the persons who composed this delegation, but I think that the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Vanasse) formed part of it. We were cordially received by the hon. Minister, but up to the present time we have received no answer. Towards this immense undertaking, which will contribute so greatly to the prosperity of Canada as a whole, all the subsidies paid so far, if I have been well informed, amount to from $90,000 to $100,000 from the Dominion Government, and about $145,000 from the present Government of the Province of Quebec. This sum bears no proportion to the importance of this undertaking. In conclusion, I trust that the hon. the Minister of Public Works, who is especially charged with the interests of the Province of Quebec, will take this matter into his serious consideration, and that, with the assistance of the two Governments, the expectations of the Bishop of Nicolet will be realised, and at the same time justice will be rendered to the electors of three or four counties on the south shore of the St. Lawrence.

MR. BOISVERT. (Translation.) It is with pleasure that I rise, Mr. Speaker at this time, to second the motion which has just been presented by the hon. the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret). It is also with pleasure that I find the hon. gentleman take such a lively interest in this railway, in order to hasten its completion at the earliest date; and this in the interests of the population on the south shore through whose country this railway must pass. You are doubtless aware, Mr. Speaker, how greatly the people in the parishes of the south shore are isolated on account of the want of railway communication. And this is especially irksome to us, the inhabitants of the town of Nicolet, who have the great advantage and blessing of possessing in the heart of our town the episcopal residence of the Diocese of Nicolet; who have in addition a vast seminary to which a great number of students from the surrounding parishes, and even from the United States, come, in order to prosecute their classical studies,—without counting several other religious schools at which the students receive, to their advantage, a careful training. In fact, for the town of Nicolet, which possesses a great number of mills and manufacturing establishments, affording employment to a great number of workmen, this question of a railway is one of the gravest importance. On account of the above enumerated attractions, and by reason of several others which it would be a too great loss of time to enumerate at this moment, a great number of persons are compelled to come to Nicolet at all seasons and days of the year, and it is hardly necessary for me to state that they reach the place with difficulty whether by water or land. Besides, the hon. the Ministers of Public Works (Sir Hector Langevin) and of Militia (Sir Adolphe Caron) know something about this, owing to the visit that they made us on the 6th September last, when Nicolet had the honor of receiving them. They must recollect very well that they narrowly escaped destruction in the mouth of the River Nicolet. Well, Mr. Speaker, for these various reasons, I hope that the Government will do all in its power to complete at an early date this railway, which will prove most advantageous for the people on the south shore, alongside of whom the railway must pass—for commerce in general—and also for the Government. In fact this railway must unite with the Intercolonial Railway, and by such an union increase the freight, and the receipts of the latter railway. I conclude these few words by expressing the flattering hope that I will soon see the opening for traffic of this Great Eastern Railway.

SIR HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) It is not my desire, Mr. Speaker, to leave unanswered the remarks which have just been made by the two members who have moved and seconded this motion. I will take this occasion to congratulate my hon. friend the member for Nicolet (Mr. Boisvert) upon his maiden speech. I am convinced that we shall hear from him more than once during the Session. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) alluded in his speech to an address delivered by me last autumn when I went to Nicolet. The hon. member knows perfectly well that the speeches as reported in the newspapers are never complete, and that, therefore, he should not place to my credit or discredit the address as reported. As to the very flattering letter which the Bishop of Nicolet sent me about this time, there is no doubt but that prelate referred not only to the Nicolet River, that is to say, to the work done in and about it, but also to the railway; and in the remarks made by me I alluded to the two undertakings. The hon. member knows that for several years past grants have been made by the Government, and at the request of the Government,—in order to carry outworks on the River Nicolet, more especially to make a harbor of refuge of it. When this harbor is completed we shall possess a work of great usefulness. As to the railway, the hon. member cannot be ignorant that there have been several grants made towards that portion of the railway already built. He knows, besides, that there still remain, at the present moment, grants to be disposed of,—to be used for the purpose of driving the railway as far as St. Grégoire, on the Arthabaska Branch. These are now drawn on by contractors to push on the works. In proportion as these works are completed conformably to law, the grants will be expended. The hon. member has alluded to the continuation of this line. He ought to know that London was not built in a day, and that a little time must be given in order to build the railway throughout its whole length; probably as far as the Chaudière or to the Intercolonial station at Lévis. But, as regards this portion, I cannot pledge the faith of the Government, because this question will be brought before Council at the proper time. However, the hon. member should perceive that the Government has not lost sight of the opportunity for endowing with public works and railways such portions of the country which never possessed them, as, for example, the counties of Yamaska and Nicolet. The hon. member is perfectly right in wishing to have this portion of the country opened up by railways; and I am certain that in a short time the terminus of the road will be reached. I have no objection to this motion being carried.

Mr. PRÉFONTAINE. (Translation.) With the permission of the House, Mr. Speaker, I will add a few words to the remarks which have already been made respecting the construction of the "Great Eastern Railway" by the hon. members for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) and for Nicolet (Mr. Boisvert). I myself represent a county which is as much interested as it is possible for a county to be in the extension of this railway, that is to say, in the junction of the two terminal sections which are now either built or under construction. It must be stated that there are already 45 miles of this railway nearly completed, that is, the railway from Montreal to Sorel, which extends from St. Lambert to Sorel. These 45 miles are not at the present moment in actual running order, because the company has not received the assistance from the Dominion Government which it ought to have received. I do not say this to criticize in any manner the proceedings of the Government, but it is a certainty that this company has only obtained, up to date, from the Government of Canada, the sum of $70,000, whereas at the last session of the Local Legislature that Government gave a grant of $112,000. I am satisfied that if the Federal Ministry would keep its promise,—because it appears to me that a promise was given at the time,—if an additional sum of $70,000 was given, a great portion of the "Great Eastern" would now be in actual operation. Now the importance of continuing this line of railway is plain to the eyes of the whole world. This portion of the country has certainly been neglected. As I said a moment ago, I have no intention of criticizing the Government, but the time has come for putting this region in communication with the great centres. There lie there seven very rich agricultural counties, each of which contains quite populous villages and even towns, such as Sorel, Nicolet, St. Ours, and others whose names I forget; and all these small centres are deprived, during the winter, of communication with the great centres of Montreal and Quebec. The advantages that the building of this railway would give to the Intercolonial are evident to everybody. The Intercolonial costs us considerable sums of money every year, and I am persuaded that if this road could take a short line to reach Montreal the receipts would be increased, or at least the deficits would be lessened. I cannot allow this question to pass, Mr. Speaker, without insisting upon immediate action on the part of the Government, and upon the granting of a subsidy this Session for that portion of the railway which is actually built—I mean the railway from Montreal to Sorel. I am convinced that if the Government would grant a fair subsidy to assist in the extension of the road, the Provincial Government would do its duty in turn and would give such money assistance as would result in the construction of the whole line. I venture to hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Government will take the matter into serious consideration this Session, or at latest during the coming Session, on the eve of the Dominion elections, say: this would be a good way of pleasing the seven counties which are interested in the building of this railway. Some of them returned Opposition members—the county of Chambly, for example; but if the Government would do what we ask of it, there is no knowing what might happen.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) I will say but one word, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Préfontaine). I will not discuss the question whether sufficient grants have been made by one Government or the other; but I do not wish to leave the House under the impression that it is because the grant was not large enough that the railway from Montreal to Sorel was not in operation this winter. It is useless to re-open discussion on this point, but I will not admit that it is on account of the insufficiency of the grants from the Dominion Government that this railway is not now in running order.

Motion agreed to.

SOUNDINGS IN THE RICHELIEU RIVER.

Mr. GIGAUT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to complete the surveying and sounding operations still required on the Richelieu River in order to permit of the preparation of a chart for the guidance of masters of vessels navigating that river between the International boundary line and the St. Lawrence?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, I must say that the Department of Public Works has not made an examination of this river with the view of preparing a chart to be placed in the hands of the public. The Department of Railways has made a survey from the boundary, as far as St. John's, for the purposes of the canal. From Chambly proceeding downwards to Sorel there are buoys which mark the channel.

HOMESTEAD INSPECTORS IN MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for:

Return of copies of all inspections and reports made by Homestead Inspectors in Manitoba and the North-West Territories, from the 1st day of January, 1887, to the 1st day of January, 1889, the dates of the several inspections and reports, and the name of the inspector.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think, when the hon. gentleman has heard from me the amount it will cost to furnish the particulars covered by his motion, he will probably not press it. I may state, for the information of the hon. gentleman, that the number of reports made in 1887 by homestead inspectors was, as shown in the return presented to the House by Sir John Macdonald on the 19th May, 1888, 2,487; and 3,898 reports were made by them from 1st January, 1888, to 31st October, 1888; so that 6,385 reports were made during those 21 months. The cost of copying each report, at five cents per folio, would amount to at least one dollar; many of them would cost two dollars each, but my officers have averaged them at one dollar, which was considered a very low average. The hon. gentleman also asks for copies of the reports made during the three remaining months of 1888; so that the return would cost, according to information I have received from my officers, $7,500, if it were prepared. I thought I had better mention this fact to the hon. gentleman, and ask him what course he proposes to follow under the circumstances.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps it would be preferable, under all the circumstances mentioned by the Minister, that the motion be allowed to stand till another day, so that the hon. gentleman would have time to consider what course to adopt.

Motion allowed to stand.

HIDE AND LEATHER INSPECTOR IN MONTREAL.

Mr. CURRAN moved for :

Copies of all papers and documents furnished the Government by the Board of Examiners in connection with the recent examinations of candidates for the office of Hide and Leather Inspector in the city of Montreal.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this motion on account of the surprise that was created in the city of Montreal at the result of the action of the board by which so many of the candidates who presented themselves for examination, and who were supposed in the public estimation to be men of qualification, some for the inspection of leather, and others for the inspection of hides, were not provided with certificates by this board of examiners. The facts are pretty well known that amongst those who had applied were men who carried on the leather business in various forms for a great many years. In one case there was Mr. Donovan, an old and experienced tanner, very well versed in the leather business, and there were also a number of French Canadian gentlemen who also had been engaged in this business, all of them occupying a very high position in the trade. I may say that one candidate was formerly a member of the board of examiners himself, and on a not remote occasion he issued a certificate to the inspector for the county of Hochelaga. He found himself plucked, or set aside; at all events, he did not get a certificate. There was a feeling of very considerable surprise that only two or three out of all these gentlemen who applied, should have been furnished with certificates by this board of examiners. This state of affairs caused us to look into the law as it now exists, and we find that in a number of cities in Canada the Board of Trade is authorised to appoint a board of examiners:

"Five fit and skilful persons, any three of whom shall be a quorum, for each class of articles to be inspected, in each such locality or county, to examine and test the ability and fitness of applicants for the office of inspector or deputy inspector of such articles."

This leads us to believe that the board has something more than the power to investigate the actual capability of any candidate aspiring to a certificate enabling him to fill such office; that is to say, that the board has also to judge of the fitness; and that, despite the second clause of the same section, which says:

"Every such board shall grant such certificates, and such only as to the qualification of the candidates who present themselves for examination, as the knowledge and proficiency of such candidates require or justify."

I think that, under those circumstances the board, or rather those who represent the board of examiners, and who are authorised to call in skilled persons to assist them, are, to some extent, assuming a responsibility which ought to devolve on the Government, as to the fitness of the persons who may apply for the certificates or for appointment to the office that may happen to be opened. The mode in which those examinations have been conducted will be explained, I trust, by the documents that will be laid before the House, and that some substantial reason will be given why persons who are supposed to be so thoroughly competent have been set aside and the number of those who received certificates reduced to the number required to fill the offices that happened to be vacant. I think that there is another very objectionable feature in the state of the present law. If these inspectors are to be appointed, they are supposed to be skilful persons, thoroughly versed in their art; and I cannot see why they should not be subjected to the same test of examination as any other person requiring special skill. I think it would be far preferable if the Government would take the power into their own hands; and where an inspector is required for any of the articles enumerated in the statute, that say: The three senior inspectors of the Dominion should be a board, that would pronounce upon the capability of the candidates who would present themselves. This board would then be composed of persons outside of the trade, and persons who are not called upon to be in direct communication with those who are seeking a certificate at their hands. In almost all those cases, in fact, in every one of them, whether it be for inspector of leather, potash, flour, or anything else, the very men who are on the board of examiners are liable to have business connections with the gentleman appointed the very day after he receives his commission. I think that an independent board of examiners should exist, composed of persons skilled themselves, and who would not require to call on experts in order to assist them in their examinations. Above all, the board should not pronounce on anything but the ability of the persons who seek for a certificate, leaving the question of fitness to the responsibility of the Government itself. I direct the attention of the Government, and especially of the hon. Minister in charge of this particular department, to what I conceive to be a state of the law that is not calculated to promote the best interests of the trade and commerce of the Dominion. I trust that not only shall we have some light thrown upon the mode of conducting these examinations in the recent past, but also some explanation as to why men who were supposed to be thoroughly competent were set aside. I trust, also, that we shall have from the hon. Minister a statement that the Government intends to amend the law, in some way, so as to arrive at a more desirable result in the future.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not propose to enter into a discussion on this question before the papers are brought down. I may say, however, in view of some of the remarks which fell from the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution, that it may be necessary, after consultation with the Minister of Justice, to make some amendment to the Act which would remove all doubt, if any doubt exists, under that law. The suggestion that these examinations should be held by the three senior inspectors of our department would involve considerable cost. This service is different from the service under any other department. It is not a compulsory act; it is an optional law, which the people can have at their request put into operation in any district. The officers are not paid by fixed salaries, but by fees. The choice of the board of examiners is left to the boards of trade in large cities, which I think are properly considered to be well qualified to make a selection of suitable examiners to examine candidates for the different inspectorships under that Act. The only question that arises in my mind is as to whether some doubt has not arisen on account of the inconsistency, if I may use the term, of the two sections just read by the hon. member. That, as I have said, I will bring to the notice of the Minister of Justice. I may say, however, that the law itself, with regard to such appointments, clearly limits the choice to the persons who hold those certificates. The Government cannot appoint a man who does not hold a certificate; we have no right to go behind the reports of the examiners. All we have to be satisfied about is that the persons have passed the examination and obtained certificates.

DISMISSAL OF THE HON. WM. ROSS.

Mr. LAURIER moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council, reports, correspondence and papers relating to the dismissal of the Hon. William Ross from the Collectorship of Customs at the port of Halifax.

He said: It has been rumored that the Hon. Mr. Ross has been dismissed for an act of courtesy which he extended to a foreign vessel. If this rumor is true, it is an action which ought to invite the scrutiny of the House. But I do not desire to judge of the question; I simply move for the papers, to-day, hoping that they will be brought down at the earliest possible date.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return of the Receipts and Expenditures, in detail, chargeable to the Consolidated Fund, from the 1st day of July, 1888, to 1st February, 1889, with a comparative statement of the same from 1st July, 1887, to 1st February, 1888.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Return in the form used in the statements usually published in the Gazette, of the Exports and Imports from the 1st day of July, 1888, to the 1st day of January, 1889, distinguishing the products of Canada and those of other countries.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Return of the names of all chaplains of public institutions under appointment of the Government, together with the dates of their appointment, the amount of their salaries, and the religious denominations to which they belong.—(Mr. Innes.)

Return showing—1st. A list of all the present shareholders of the Témiscouata Railway Company; 2nd. The number of shares held by each shareholder; 3rd. The amount paid by each of them on their respective shares.—(Mr. Dessaint.)

PATENT BALLOT BOX.

Mr. BROWN moved:

That a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. Edgar, Girouard, Hudspeth, Kenny, Lépine, Madill, Skinner and Ward, be appointed to examine and report on a ballot or voting box invented by John Waddell, of Harriston, and constructed, by order of the House, under the superintendence of Mr. John R. Arnoldi, chief mechanical engineer of the Department of Public Works.

He said: It will be in the recollection of the House that the Select Committee appointed by the House to examine this box reported very favorably upon it, but desired that one should be made under the supervision of the chief mechanical engineer of the Public Works Department. That box has been made, and the object now in having this committee appointed is to examine the box, and report to the House upon it.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman opposite made some enquiries about the ministerial changes, when I was not in the House, yesterday. They are as follows: It was thought well that Sir Charles Tupper, the Minister of Finance, should resume his position as High Commissioner in London, and he, therefore, resigned the position of Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Foster, was appointed in his stead and Mr. COSTIGAN.

now holds that office. Instead of Mr. Foster as Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. C. H. Tupper was appointed. In place of Mr. McLelan, who was appointed Lieutenant Governor of his native Province, Nova Scotia, Mr. Haggart, the member for North Lanark, was appointed Postmaster General; and in place of the lamented Mr. White, Minister of the Interior, Mr. Dewdney, the member for West Assiniboia, was appointed to that office.

Mr. LAURIER. No one certainly would complain that the explanations, or rather the recitation, of the hon. gentleman has not been perfectly lucid. If anybody amongst us has failed to read the Canada Gazette for the last seven or eight months, and to notice what was going on with regard to the offices in the Cabinet, he cannot now have any doubt as to the changes that have taken place. But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the occasion would have been right for some comments on the part of the hon. gentleman rather than the very meagre, bare statement of fact which he gave; and, perhaps, such comments will not be out of place at this moment. In the first place, I desire at once to tender my congratulations to the present incumbent of the portfolio of the Minister of Finance. He is one of the young members of this House, his promotion has been very rapid, and he has a very arduous task to perform. My hon. friend, the First Minister, can be congratulated also upon the fact that he has at last found a Minister of Finance for this country. It was, if I remember rightly, Diogenes who, in the street at Athens, went along with a lantern in the day-time seeking to find a man. The hon. gentleman, very much in the same way, went through the ranks of his party seeking to find a Minister of Finance. He went from one constituency to another, until at last he came upon the county of King's, N.B. Still, all I can say to my hon. friend, the present incumbent of the office, is that I wish him, with all my heart, the strength, the courage, and the patience to resist the many applications which will come to him, from day to day, from the many friends of the National Policy, who, ever praising that instrument as being everything that is good, right and fair, still are never satisfied with it, but always want it tinkered at, and, like Oliver Twist, are always begging for more. As to the hon. the Postmaster General—well, from what his record has been in the House in the past, I can only say I believe he will be a very efficient Postmaster General. And now, as to my hon. friend, the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries. My hon. friend is a young man, which is an advantage. I think he is ambitious, which is not at all a fault, and he has been placed at the head of one of the most onerous departments in the service of his country. I have no advice to tender him, and perhaps if I were to do so, he would accept it; but all I can say is that if he will realise, and realise early, that restriction, obstruction and hardship are not the true lines to be acted on in his department, but that breadth of thought and action, generosity in thought and deed, are the best attributes that can be applied, not only to domestic affairs, but to international affairs as well, he will have the opportunity of being most useful to his country. As to the hon. the Minister of the Interior, I am sorry to say—I need I am very sorry to say—that in my conception of public duty and of the discharge of what I conceive to be my duty, not only to the House, but to my own conscience, I cannot say otherwise than that his appointment to the office he now occupies cannot be met but in terms of the most grave censure. Against the hon. gentlemen personally, as a man, I have not the slightest feeling, nor would I do him the slightest injury, but I cannot be indifferent, and am not indifferent to the fact which must stare every man in the face who has followed the history of his country for the last few years, that the appointment of the hon. gentleman to the onerous post he now occupies cannot be viewed in any other manner than as an unfortunate one. He has been called to what is, in my judgment, the most important of all the departments of the state. The importance of that department is derived from the fact that its executive sphere extends over those vast territories which only a few years ago were added to the Dominion of Canada, and in which advancing civilisation and receding savagery are every day coming more and more into contact and are exposed every day to come into conflict; where the various interests, rights, wants, passions and prejudices of the active and enterprising white man, and of the indolent, shiftless, diffident and jealous Indian, and of the only half-tutored half-breed, are always to be met, some to be checked, others to be advanced, all to be kept in hand in order to prevent possible collision, and therefore require an ever-watchful eye and an ever ready hand. The hon. gentleman has been for more than seven years up to a recent date, from the fall of the year 1881 up to the early months of this year, in the capacity of Lieutenant Governor of these territories, in the capacity of official responsibility to the department of which he is now the head, and who has in charge the destinies of those territories; and now, for the services which he has rendered, I suppose, for the zeal and efficiency with which he has discharged the duties which were incumbent upon him, he is promoted to be head of the department to which he was lately responsible. What has been his services? What has been the discharge of his duty? When the hon. gentleman took office, an important body of the population of that country, the half-breeds on the Saskatchewan, were petitioning, and had been petitioning for some time, the Government for what they conceived to be their just rights, arising out of the new condition that was imposed upon them by the transfer of their territory to the Government of Canada. That was, after all, a very simple matter. They asked simply that the same treatment which had been meted out to the half-breeds of Manitoba should be meted out to them. It has been the policy of England, wherever she has taken up a new country, to deal fairly with the aborigines. It has been her policy never to take possession of their lands without giving compensation. That treatment was allotted to the Indians and half-breeds of Manitoba as well as to the first white occupants. The half-breed titles were extinguished as well as the Indian titles, the latter, though not in the same manner, in a manner peculiar to itself. In Manitoba the Indian title was replaced by free grants of land to heads of families and to minors, and the same rights were asked for the population in the territory of the Saskatchewan. In Manitoba all the holdings which the half-breeds had taken, after the manner of their own forefathers of the French race, were granted to the half-breeds without any difficulty. The half-breeds on the Saskatchewan asked for the same privileges. The propriety, the fairness, the justice of those demands were more than once not only acknowledged, but recommended to the Government by the North-West Council, over which the hon. gentleman presided, and over which his predecessor, Governor Laird, had also presided. Yet, those demands, just, fair and equitable as they were, stipulated as they were, not only by the North-West Council, but by all men in authority in the North-West, were disregarded and never listened to. An agitation grew among the half-breeds to obtain what was refused to them, an agitation just, constitutional, right and legitimate, but growing gradually unconstitutional, turbulent, violent and dangerous, ever growing more dangerous, until at last it broke out into civil war and rebellion; and for the horrors of that civil war, for the millions of treasure spent, for the property destroyed, for the blood shed, for the lives lost, for the scaffold and prison, the men responsible are not the poor half-breeds who one day, goaded to madness, driven to despair by the silent contempt with which all their demands had been met, took their lives in their hands and risked everything dear to man—life, limb and freedom—in order to get justice, and finally got it. No, they are the men who now sit on the Treasury benches, who never listened to the demands of the half-breeds, but who, deaf to their entreaties, their prayers, at once fell down on their knees the moment the rights of those men were enforced by the bullets at Duck Lake; and of all the men who now stand on the Treasury benches, I say that the man who is most responsible is the hon. the Minister of Interior. The hon. gentleman had a duty to perform, not only to those over whose destinies he had been appointed to preside, but to the Government also who had appointed him. And what was it? It was to present the case of those people. It was to call the attention of the Government to what was going on, and as that agitation became more and more dangerous, it was to endeavor to do everything in his power in order to rouse the Government out of its lethargy. What did he do? I charge against the hon. gentleman that for the long time he was in office, though that agitation was going on in the territory, he never once called the attention of the Government to the claims of the half-breeds on the Saskatchewan. I have here the blue-book brought down by the Government in reference to this matter. I have here all the correspondence which was exchanged on that subject, and I fail to see in any of these documents a single line written by the hon. gentleman in reference to the condition of the half-breeds of the Saskatchewan River, in reference to their claims, or in reference to the dangerous character of the agitation which was going on there. This is a very voluminous document. It extends to 113 pages, and I find four communications from the hon. gentleman, one enclosing the memorial of the North-West Council, recommending special surveys and grants to land occupied by half-breeds. That is dated the 19th October, 1883. Another is dated the 22nd March, 1882, enclosing the resolutions adopted at a public meeting held at Prince Albert. Then there is a letter of the 19th March, 1883, setting forth that the lands occupied by the half-breeds should be sold, and the price distributed among them. The last communication is dated 29th August, 1882, which is a letter on the same subject. In reference to the state of the half-breeds of the Saskatchewan River, there was never a word sent to the Government by the hon. gentleman. There is more than this. We have it in evidence from the letter addressed by Bishop Grandin to the Minister of Public Works, which was introduced in this House by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) in 1884, that the hon. gentleman visited the Saskatchewan district and was met not only with coolness, but with discourtesy, on account of the long delays which the half-breeds had met with in the settlement of their rights.

Mr. DEWDNEY. No.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman says "No." This is what the bishop says, under date of 13th June, 1884:

"I take the liberty of addressing to your honor the accompanying letter to the hon. premier, containing the cause of complaint communicated to me by the half-breeds of the district of Lorne on the occasion of my journey to Prince Albert. I cannot express to you the pain I felt on learning that they had sent a message to Louis Riel, and that they had given so unbecoming a reception to the hon. Governor of the North-West. On seeing their state of excitement and discontent, almost amounting to revolt, I perceived them to be under some painful, hostile influence. I was even convinced of this by communications made to me by certain most respectable persons of Prince Albert. They detailed their sources of discontent and grievances to me. Whilst not approving some, I must acknowledge that there are many with which I heartily sympathise. I deeply deplore the scornful way in which the Government has a fashion of treating the native half-breeds. The gentlemen of the Government cannot be ignorant of the fact that the half-breeds, as well as the Indians, have their national pride; they like to meet with attention, and are greatly irritated by the contempt with which they, rightly or wrongly, believe themselves to be treated."

It appears, therefore, from this letter, that the hon. gentleman visited the district of the Saskatchewan, that he met with no courteous treatment on the part of the half-breeds, some of them presented their claims, some of which were not entertained while some were afterwards allowed; but it does not appear that the hon. gentleman communicated these facts to the Government of which at that time he was an officer. I ask the House if such an offence as that can be condoned, and if there was ever such an offence in any part of the world, followed by such results, which could be condoned. It was the duty of the hon. gentleman then and there to report to the Government the dangerous condition of the North-West; it was his duty, and it should have been his pride to be the protector of these people, because they had no other protector there; it should have been his pride to be their friend, because they had no other friend; and it should have been his pride to speak on their behalf. He never did, he never gave any warning, and the consequences we know; we know the storm which was raised, and which reached himself in his gubernatorial home in 1884, and afterwards swept over the prairies of the North-West. Under the circumstances, I say that there was a time in the history of England, and perhaps in the history of this Country, when such an offence would have brought the hon. gentleman to the Bar of this House. In these days, perhaps such a course could not be adopted here; but, though the hon. gentleman's action may be condoned elsewhere, it cannot be properly condoned on the floor of Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman opposite cannot get over the events of some years ago. It will be remembered that, in one of his works, Dickens refers to a man who, though ordinarily in the enjoyment of a reasonable amount of intellect, always had the head of Charles I coming in between him and any conversation or employment in which he might be engaged. My hon. friend opposite, though rational, and more than rational on general subjects, cannot forget that he sympathised with those battles on the banks of the Saskatchewan.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hon. gentlemen do not like to hear that statement, but it is true; and the hon. gentleman finds himself unable to forget the views which he expressed, perhaps more warmly than loyally, and he now throws across the floor of the House these accusations against my hon. friend who is in every way his equal, and in some respects I would not compare them. The hon. gentleman says that he holds my hon. friend behind me primarily responsible for the events in the North-West. My hon. friend had just as much to do with those events as the hon. gentleman who attacks him. The half-breeds were not Indians. They stood in the position of white men with Indian mothers, with a little more or less of the bow and arrow in their strain, but their cases were to be judged just the same as those of any settler in the country, just the same as the case of any man who was altogether white. They had their claims, and they made their claims, and through whom did they make them? Not through my hon. friend as Indian Commissioner, because as Indian Commissioner he had nothing to do with the half-breeds; not through my hon. friend as Lieutenant Governor of the North-West, because in that capacity he had nothing to do with the land granting department. He could not influence the officers of the Dominion Government as to the granting of a single quarter-section in the North-West. His duties were altogether limited by the Act of Parliament which was passed in reference to the North-West, which did not give any control of the land or the settlement of the claims of any man—red or white or half breed—as to lands or compensation for lands, or anything of that kind. My hon. friend had nothing in the world to do either with the half-breed question or the half-breed claims, no more than any hon. gentleman in this House.

Mr. LAURIER.

An hon. MEMBER. Who had?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government of the day; and having been a member of the Government of those days, I desire to take the whole responsibility. If there is any blame to be thrown it is on the Government of those days, or of this day, and not upon my hon. friend. I think it was an ungenerous and unfounded attack of the hon. gentleman on my hon. friend. It was altogether unwarranted, it was altogether baseless. No matter what my hon. friend's sympathies may have been, no matter whether he thought the half-breeds had a good case or a bad case, he could not in any way decide those claims or adjudicate upon them. These went to the different land agencies in the North-West, and from the land agency to the chief officer at Winnipeg, and from the chief officer at Winnipeg to the Government at Ottawa. As to our responsibility, as to the responsibility of the Government of those days, we have had that discussed ad nauseum. We have had it from year to year, and this House, and a previous House, and the people of the country, have declared upon the conduct of the Government with respect to what is called the North-West disturbance. We are quite willing to rest our case upon the facts as laid before Parliament; we are quite willing to rest upon the decision of Parliament; we are quite willing to rest upon the decision of the people with respect to the unhappy events to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. But I declare in my place that in no way whatever can the hon. member from East Assiniboia (Mr. Dewdney) be charged with neglect. He was not a member of the Government, he had no control over the Government in any respect, and he cannot be charged with complicity or with neglect, with sins of commission or omission of any kind, with respect to the events in the North-West. If there was wrong done, it was the Government of the day who did the wrong. If there were any evil consequences arising from the policy of the Government, they must be held responsible for them; but the hon. gentleman, having no power, having no commission given him to act in any of these matters, having no means to influence in any respect any of those matters—I say the attack upon him was undeserved, altogether uncalled for, I must say altogether hasty and unconsidered; and my hon. friend has not acted with his usual sense of justice in making this attack. The hon. gentleman says that he does not find there was any correspondence brought down between the Government and my hon. friend when he was Lieutenant Governor of the North-West. Mr. Speaker, what would be the value of any correspondence? In those days, with trouble impending, with threats of all kinds held out to the Government, with claims pressed unduly and disloyally, and with the whole country in a state of disturbance—what would have been the value of official reports made by the hon. gentleman? The whole value of any such reports lies in their confidential nature; and I can state in my place, as having been First Minister in those days, that an active, and a constant, and a continual confidential correspondence was conducted between the Government at Ottawa and my hon. friend behind me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I say so—that he expressed his views. If he received any information he conveyed that information, and he did not hesitate to write continually, to communicate everything that he considered of value to the Government; and not only that, but we had still more important communications from the officers who were responsible—from the Indian agencies, from the Indian inspectors, from the land agents, from the land inspectors. Those men were responsible, those men did report, those men spoke with authority. My hon. friend, in any communications to the Government, made them confidentially, as being a high officer in the Government and anxious to convey all the information within his power. But, Mr. Speaker, he had no authority, he had nothing to do with the land grants, he had nothing to do with the claims of the Indians, he was not called upon to make a single report, and he could not have the means of making a report, as to the justice or injustice of the claims of these half-breeds, or any of them; and, therefore, I say again, that I regret the attack made upon my hon. friend. Now, as the debate has gone on, I may state the reason of the appointment. My hon. friend was selected to take his present position from his long acquaintance with that great country west of the Province of Ontario. Those hon. gentlemen who have sat in Parliament for some time remember my hon. friend as a British Columbian, representing a British Columbia constituency. He represented that country for some time, and he was resident in that Province for many years, and held a very high professional position as civil engineer and surveyor before he came here. He knew that Province thoroughly. He had been appointed by the Government, of which I was the head, as Indian Commissioner, and he had been in the North-West for some time. He knew the Indian tribes, he knew the Indian habits, he knew the best mode of dealing with the Indians, from his long experience as Indian Commissioner; and if any hon. gentleman will make enquiries, from the great chief of the Blackfeet, Crow Foot, down to the smallest chief in the North-West, these will answer without a single exception that they look up to him, and did look up to him, as their father and as their chief. I say this, that from every one, from one end of the North-West to the other, there have been unanimous expressions from the Indians of their confidence in him as the head of the Indian Department, and as Indian Commissioner. Then, with respect to his conduct as Lieutenant Governor of the North-West. Sir, he has been, I was going to say, smothered with roses. All kinds of compliments have been paid to him by those who knew what his conduct was as Lieutenant Governor of the North-West, from Bishop Grandin, whom the hon. gentleman quoted, from Archbishop Taché, and Father Lacombe, and all those who knew what his conduct had been—they all, without exception, congratulated him on his appointment to the office he now holds, and which I believe he holds to the satisfaction of the country. Every one knows the straightforward, clear, single-mindedness of the apostle to the Blackfeet, Father Lacombe, and in his letter he says to him:

"I congratulate you on getting your present office because you are the right man in the right place."

And so did Bishop Grandin say; so did the Catholic clergy say; and they were men who at first, before they knew the value of my hon. friend, might have raised an objection to his appointment. They have as one man stated that he was the right man in the right place. In the first place, my hon. friend was thoroughly acquainted with British Columbia, he was thoroughly acquainted with the North-West, he was thoroughly, and is thoroughly, acquainted with the Indian character, and the Indian wants, and the Indian frailties, and the best mode of managing the Indians; and, besides that, he is a man that I, who am responsible for the choice of my colleagues, have every confidence in, and I am quite satisfied that he will justify—aye, and more than justify—his selection. It was of very great importance that there should be a selection made from those portions of the Dominion lying west of the four old Provinces. A feeling of dissatisfaction had arisen, and was being rather loudly expressed, that the four old Provinces should control the whole of this vast continent, and there was no representative man from west of the western boundary of Ontario; and in the selection of my hon. friend, beside his personal qualifications, which, I think, as I have stated, fully justify his appointment—the fact of his being a British Columbian, the fact of his having had a long experience in Manitoba and British Columbia, and the fact of his coming here as a representative of a North-West constituency—went far to allay that dissatisfaction and to introduce the practice of having all portions of this vast Dominion represented in the government of the country.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may mention that, in my opinion, this debate is somewhat irregular, because there is no motion before the House. Although this is a very important discussion, it would be better to have a formal motion to adjourn so that the debate could be regularly continued.

Mr. MITCHELL moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Although, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to question your ruling, I may remark that, on all occasions on which I have been present, debates arising on ministerial explanations, have proceeded without the necessity of a formal motion being made; still, I daresay, you, Sir, are correct, technically at all events, in deciding that a motion should be before the Chair. Now, with respect to the question, I am bound to say that I think if the First Minister had taken the trouble to examine the newspaper criticisms made on the appointment at the time, he would have noticed one thing at all events, that a very large percentage of the newspapers on both sides of politics regarded the present appointment as a very extraordinary one indeed. But I do not myself regard the appointment as half so extraordinary as some of the propositions that have been put forward by the right hon. gentleman in defence thereof. The right hon. gentleman was good enough to tell us that all we have to do is to look to the Government of the day. No doubt he is right this far, that they are primarily responsible beyond all question for the good government and good administration of this country. But I take it that this House and this country, too, have a right to examine and to criticise, with the utmost possible freedom, the conduct of the agents, whomsoever they may be, who may be employed by the Government of the day, and I think I am most strictly in accord, not only with Canadian but with British precedent, in saying that on all occasions, on every occasion, the House of Commons here and elsewhere has reserved to itself the very fullest right to criticise the conduct of agents of the Government, even when, for reasons which have very little to do with the merits of the case, it may have appeared fit to a majority of the Government supporters in the House or out of it to sustain, on the whole, the Government of the day. There is but one point on which I disagree a little with my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, and that is this: the hon. gentleman, if I took down his words correctly, declared he held the present Minister of the Interior to be the man of all others in Canada who was most responsible for the rebellion, for the civil war which lately broke out in the North-West. I differ from my hon. friend. I think the First Minister, for once in his life, was correct: he, and not the Minister of the Interior, was the man who before heaven was most responsible for the lives that were lost, who was most responsible for the mischief done to this country, who was most responsible for the irritation between the two races inhabiting this country which was created. To his negligence, to his scandalous malfeasance of office, to his criminal negligence of the plainest duties which appertain to his office—to those more than to any other thing else was due the late rebellion, and he was right in taking on his own shoulders the chief burden and responsibility for that event. But it does not at all follow that the man appointed by the Government of the day, who was paid a large salary out of the funds of the people of this country to watch over the events occurring in that region, to report to the Government what was going on in the district which he had in charge, that he is to go scathless because we may hold the Government primarily responsible. Sir, it is altogether beside the question to say that the present Minister of the Interior had no means whatever for seeing that the wrongs said to be inflicted upon the half-breeds of the Saskatchewan or elsewhere were brought to light and righted. It was his bounden duty, whether he had authority or not, on his own proper motion, to recognise those events, to make himself acquainted with the state of feeling from one end of that country to another; it was his bounden duty, if there was any wrong and injustice inflicted on those people, to call the attention of the Government of the day to those wrongs, and to do all that in him lay to have them righted. Some of the statements made by the First Minister do indeed go to show that it is possible—we have no means of judging of that at present—that the conduct of the Government, bad as we know it to have been, was infinitely worse than we had supposed it. If the present Minister of the Interior did his duty as he ought to have done; if the present Minister of the Interior kept the First Minister and the Government of which he was the chief, duly advised of the state of things and of the feeling existing on the banks of the Saskatchewan, if he warned them in good time of the risks they ran, of the danger of a revolt there, if he did his duty as the Premier appeared to imply he did, then these gentlemen opposite were ten times more guilty than any one has supposed them to be. We know they had warnings sufficient, that men of all sorts and conditions had, time after time, times without number, addressed appeals to these hon. gentlemen. Probably it is fair for us to suppose that when they received those appeals they applied to the officer in charge of that territory, that they asked him what he thought about it, what really was the state of the case. Up to the present statement, judging from the evidence laid on the Table of the House, we had a right to suppose, that the hon. gentleman pooh-poohed those reports, that he contributed to deceive and to blind the eyes of the Government. If it was otherwise, if he did his duty, if he warned them, if he corroborated those statements, then I say that the guilt of the Government is very great indeed on that account. Sir, how stands the case? We know this much: that a rebellion broke out three years ago on the banks of the Saskatchewan. We know that to suppress that rebellion we expended $8,000,000 and, what was very much more important, sacrificed valuable lives, and to-day our pension list is there reminding us that there are many men maimed and disabled from one end of Canada to the other who rue the consequences of the neglect of the present Government. We know, Sir, that the Government had ample warning. But so far as the evidence before us goes, so far as the reports laid on the Table of the House by the Government in reply to the repeated demands made for information go to show, it appears, save only for the statement made by the Premier to-day, that the present Minister of the Interior, the Governor in charge of the territory, sent no warning, gave no notice, did nothing for his part to open the eyes of the Government to the dangers they were incurring. Here we find that after the rebellion had arisen under circumstances which, as I have said, amply warranted us in believing, up to the present moment at least, that the present Minister of the Interior had entirely failed in the discharge of his duties, we find that the man who next to the Premier of this Dominion was responsible in virtue of his office of Governor of that territory, that that man in whose time and under whose eye this rebellion sprung up is especially selected for reward. Sir, one of two things is perfectly clear: either the Minister of the Interior knew the state of the country and knew what was coming, or else the Minister did not know. If he knew it and if he failed to give information to the Government, then, Sir, there is no man here who will say that he was not guilty of a very great breach of duty. If, on the other hand, he was deceived, if with all the appliances and means for obtaining knowledge at his disposal, if with every opportunity for information, he failed to understand the state of things immediately under his own eye, I say from that fact alone, he is manifestly and evidently utterly unfit for the important position he now holds. And, Sir, in that case the appointment would be an insult, not only to the intelligence of the House, but an insult to every hon. gentleman who follows the First Minister on the other side.

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps there was a third reason. May be it was his reward for keeping his mouth closed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend suggests there may be an explanation for all this, and no doubt not a few parties have suggested the same; that the Minister of the Interior had it in his power at the time, and has it in his power at the present moment, to prove that what we suspect is correct, and what the First Minister has almost admitted is correct, to prove that he gave ample warning, and to prove that the Government sinned against light and knowledge. To prove also, that the Government with wilful deliberation, almost I will say of set malice, brought about that unfortunate insurrection in the North-West. Sir, that is about the only explanation that can be given consistent with the circumstances of the extraordinary step that the hon. gentleman has taken. The one thing, Sir, that is perfectly clear in this matter is, that if the hon. gentleman deserves the encomiums which the First Minister has paid him, and if the hon. gentleman is really thoroughly fitted in all respects for his office, then, Sir, I repeat that it is impossible to over-estimate the misconduct of which the First Minister and his colleagues were guilty, after being warned by that authority, in allowing the rebellion to take place at all. Sir, I would like to know, are we to understand for the future, that the avenue on the part of governors for high promotion is that they should permit a rebellion to spring up in their territory? Are these rebellions the fruit of spontaneous combustion, or do they come from causes pretty well understood in this House? Do they come from the negligence, do they come from the corruption, do they come from the misconduct of the officials who receive our money and are responsible for the administration of the government of the country? Possibly it may be found that there is another lesson which is to be drawn from this remarkable appointment, and from some of the appointments that followed it, and I present it fairly to hon. gentlemen on the other side. Finding appointments of this kind made I would advise them all—and I think they have seen very good illustrations of the wisdom of the advice I am about to give them—I would advise them all to assert themselves, and not to sit down dumbly, and tamely, and allow such things to be perpetrated without expressing their opinions forcibly. I think, Sir, some of those hon. gentlemen have profited by the lesson, and I do think that others in the future will not be found slow to mark, and follow, and profit by it also. Under those circumstances I say this: I say that the Government, by their own act, are condemned; that the hon. gentleman who now sits in the position of the Minister of the Interior, if he be fit for his office, and if he did discharge his duty, if he did give warning, then, Sir, the severest things that have been said by my hon. friend, or any of his supporters as to the misconduct of the Government, are more than justified by the act of the Government itself.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, if there is any doubt about who moved the adjournment of the House I beg to say that I did, and for harmony's sake I would withdraw the motion, as I consider quite enough has been said about it. I will say, before doing so, that I rather sympathise with the views expressed by the hon. gentleman on my right here, than I do with the conclusions the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, propounded; not that I disagree generally with his views, but in putting so much blame on the Minister of the Interior as he has done I think that he has made a little mistake. I think the suggestion I made to the right hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) is correct, that the appointment of the present occupant of the Minister of the Interior is a just reward for his silence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5:10 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 7th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Lieut.-Gen. JOHN WIMBURN LAURIE, Member for the Electoral District of Shelburne, introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir John Thompson.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, an approved Minute of Council, appointing the Right Honorable Sir John Macdonald, G.C.B., President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, the Honorable Sir Hector Langevin, K.C.M.G., Minister of Public Works, the Honorable John Costigan, Minister of Inland Revenue, and the Honorable George Eulas Foster, Minister of Finance, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the 13th Chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intitled: "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

GOVERNMENT HOUSE.

OTTAWA, 6th February, 1889.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 12) to provide for a regular Ferry between the city of Quebec and the town of Lévis.—(Mr. Choquette.)

Bill (No. 13) to require the owners of elevators and hoists to guard against accidents.—(Mr. Madill.)

THE FRENCH LANGUAGE ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether any petitions, letters or other documents have been forwarded to the Government, or to the Department of Railways, respecting the appointment of a superintendent, able to speak and write the French language, for that section of the Intercolonial Railway which traverses the Province of Quebec; and if so, by whom were such documents or petitions forwarded, when they were received, and what answer was made thereto?

Mr. BOWELL. No such letters, petitions or documents have been received by the Government or by the department.

RIVER RICHELIEU SURVEY.

Mr. GIGAULT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to complete the surveying and sounding operations still required on the River Richelieu, to permit of a chart being prepared for the guidance of masters of vessels navigating that river between the International Boundary line and the St. Lawrence?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In answer to the hon. member, I may say that the Department of Public Works has made no survey of the river with the view of preparing a chart to be put in the hands of the public. The Department of Railways has made a survey from the frontier line to St. Johns, with the view of building a canal. From Chambly down to Sorel there are buoys indicating the channel.

REPORTS OF HOMESTEAD INSPECTORS IN MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. McMULLEN. When my motion for copies of all inspections and reports made by homestead inspectors in Manitoba and North-West Territories from 1st January, 1887, to 1st January, 1889, was before the House yesterday, the Minister of Interior made a statement with regard to the probable cost of bringing down such return. In the face of that statement I am quite willing to withdraw the motion; but I would ask the hon. Minister whether it would be possible for me to be permitted the privilege of examining these returns in the Department of the Interior. If I were permitted that privilege I could gather the information I require.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Of course I have no objection to that being done by the hon. gentleman. I shall be glad to give him all information in the office. Some of the reports may be at Winnipeg, but any information we possess I shall be glad to give to the hon. gentleman.

Motion withdrawn.

THE QUEBEC CONFERENCE.

Mr. EDGAR moved for:

Copies of the resolutions passed at the conference held in 1887, at the city of Quebec, of delegates from the several Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Manitoba, and of all papers and correspondence relating thereto.

He said: In October, 1887, a conference was held at the city of Quebec, composed of delegates from all Provinces of the Dominion, except Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. The matters which were chiefly discussed by the delegates on that occasion were the relations between the Dominion and the Provinces, more especially with regard to their legal powers, their executive functions and their provincial affairs. They arrived at the conclusion, I believe, that our written constitution, embodied in the British North America Act, after 20 years of trial, could be improved in several particulars by amendment. The result of their deliberations was embodied in a series of resolutions, which, I understand, have been forwarded to the Government of the Dominion. The Government have not, I think, yet chosen to lay those resolutions before the House; but they are so important that the House ought to be placed at the earliest possible moment in a position to judge of them, by being placed in possession of the same information as was in the hands of the Executive. If the motion is adopted, I hope the Government will lay the papers on the Table without delay.

Motion agreed to.

RETURN ORDERED.

Return showing the receipts by the Trustees of the various town sites in the North-West Territories, from sales of lands and otherwise; and, also, of all expenditures in connection therewith, since the year 1882.—(Mr. Davin.)

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of Indian Affairs, for the year ending 30th June, 1888.—(Mr. Dewdney.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 3:30 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 8th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Shanly.)

Bill (No. 15) respecting the Kootenay and Athabasca Railway Company.—(Mr. Mara.)

Bill (No. 16) to provide against frauds in supplying milk to cheese and butter factories.—(Mr. Burdett.)

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved :

That, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended to Friday, 22nd instant, and the time for presenting Private Bills to Thursday, 28th instant.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE COMMISSIONER TO SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, 1. What has been paid to Simeon Jones, Esq., of St. John, New Brunswick, on account of remuneration or expenses as Trade Commissioner to South America? 2. Is any further sum claimed by or payable to him, or on account of expenses or services rendered by him in connection with said commission?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Jones has been paid $1,000 on account. This is not the total amount of his expenses. His bill, I think, is in, and is before the Auditor General. Neither does that include any remuneration for services outside of expenses, on account of which nothing has as yet been paid.

THE FISHERIES QUESTION.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to treat the temporary offer made by the British Plenipotentiaries to those of the United States at the time of the signing of the Fishery Treaty in Washington, November, 1888, and known as the Modus Vivendi, as still in force, and to issue licenses as therein provided to American fishermen for the fishing season of 1889?

Mr. TUPPER. That subject is now under the consideration of the Government.

THE ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, What is the total amount expended up to date on the preparation, revision, printing, &c., of the electoral lists, in pursuance of the Electoral Franchise Act?

Mr. BOWELL. I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to be kind enough to let that stand, as I have not yet been supplied with the figures, I hope to have them on Monday.

THE DREDGE PRINCE EDWARD.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is the Government paying Captain Doyle, of the dredge Prince Edward, wages or salary during the time said dredge is laid up? If so, what is the amount?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. In accordance with the rule which obtains on the spoon dredges of the department in the Maritime Provinces, the master and engineer of the dredges are retained in the employment of the department, and are employed in looking after and superintending the repairs which have to be made annually. Mr. Doyle receives $90 per month.

PINE TIMBER ON INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. BARRON asked, Whether the pine timber on the Indian Reserve No. 6, under the Robinson Treaty, known as Shawanakiskic's Reserve, was sold in 1886 to a Mr. Robillard? Is the said Robillard the same as Honoré Robillard? Is the said Honoré Robillard a member of the House of Commons of Canada; and, if so, what constituency does he represent?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Timber was sold to Mr. Robillard in September, 1886. Honoré Robillard is the licensee. Mr. Robillard was not then a member of the House of Commons. He is now member for Ottawa city.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1890, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

OTTAWA, 7th February, 1889.

THE ESTIMATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to take this opportunity to enquire of the Government, whether they intend to pursue the practice introduced by Sir Charles Tupper last year, of proceeding forthwith with the consideration of the Estimates before the annual financial statement is made, or whether it is their intention to have the financial statement made before the items are considered in detail?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the intention of the Government to follow the practice introduced last year in this House for the first time, I believe, and which is followed in England—that is, to go on with the Estimates without waiting for the financial statement. I hope there will be no objection to taking up the Estimates on, say, Tuesday next.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I always thought that the English practice was a very good one, and I have no objection in the world on my part to offer to the suggestion of the Minister.

THE RECENT LOAN.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved for :

Return showing amounts received on account of loan recently negotiated, together with a statement of the sums (forming portions of the same) placed on deposit with Canadian or other banks since the 1st day of July, 1888, and the rate of interest agreed to be paid on the same.

Mr. FOSTER. I see the hon. gentleman has asked for "statement of sums placed with Canadian or other banks since the 1st of July." That, if I interpreted it literally, would not give him what he wishes. Probably he had better amend it by saying "30th of June, 1888."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very well, Sir, "30th of June, 1888."

Motion agreed to.

ACCOUNT OF D. O'CONNOR.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for :

Return showing, in detail, the account of D. O'Connor for law cases, counsel fees, &c. amounting in all to $18,890.02, as shown on page A 11 of Auditor General's Account for fiscal year ending 30th June, 1888.

He said: Since placing this notice on the paper, I have decided that I can reach the object I have in view better and more quickly by moving for the return in the Public Accounts Committee. I will, therefore, with the permission of the House, withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

THE DREDGE PRINCE EDWARD.

Mr. PERRY moved for :

Return showing what repairs have been done to the dredge Prince Edward during the year 1888, the date of commencement of work, and when finished, with cost of said work; also the amount of work done by said dredge during the year 1888.

He said: I desire to say, in connection with this motion, that I cannot understand the reason why the dredge Prince Edward has been kept idle for nearly two years, at any rate more than a year and a-half. It is well known that there are several harbors about Prince Edward Island that require to be dredged; and why the Government are so delinquent in their duty in this respect I do not understand. It appears that, whenever any work is asked for Prince Edward Island, the Government look upon it as part of New Zealand, Newfoundland, England, Ireland, Scotland or some other country, instead of part of the Dominion of Canada. I maintain that Prince Edward Island is part and parcel of the Dominion of Canada, and that whatever work is required there is not for Prince Edward Island alone, but for the whole Dominion. In 1887 the dredge Prince Edward was at work dredging out Tignish Harbor, where she continued at work until the 27th of August, when she was brought to Charlottetown and put on the stocks for repairs. I was under the impression that on the 1st June last that boat would have been fit for work, and would have been sent to Cascumpec, Victoria, Summerside, or some other harbor, for there are so many harbors requiring dredging about Prince Edward Island that it would take a long time to enumerate them all. I believe it took the whole of the summer of 1888 to repair that boat. Why, Sir, it took four times as long to repair her as it took to build the new steamer Stanley, which cost $150,000. Why the harbors of Prince Edward Island are neglected in this way, I do not understand. I presume the hon. Minister of Public Works will be able to explain why this dredge was left at Charlottetown all winter. I suppose some friend of the Government had to be accommodated with the opportunity to import stuff from the other side, and could not import it in the fall, and the boat had to be left there all winter, while the captain was receiving $90 a month for walking about with his hands in his pockets doing nothing. I do not know how the Government are going to justify themselves for having done such an injustice to Prince Edward Island. We may be able to see by this return how long it took the Government and their agents in Charlottetown to expend a few thousand dollars to repair that dredge.

Mr. WELSH. I wish to say a few words on this matter. The dredge was laid up for repairs, I believe, in August, 1887, when she was brought down from the north end of the Island to Charlottetown, and ordered to be hauled up in the marine slip there. She remained there all the following fall and winter, and during that time there was not a hand's turn done to that boat, although the captain and the engineer have been kept on full pay from the time she was laid up for repairs until the present time. When the Northern Light was laid up for the summer, her captain was sent off on half pay. It is now going on three years since this dredge was laid up for repairs; and I venture to say that if a commission were appointed to examine into the matter, it would find that four times as much has been expended for the work as was necessary, taking into consideration the time which has been lost while she has been doing nothing; for I consider the loss of that time to be more serious than the amount of money expended on the repairs. Instead of having one dredge for Prince Edward Island, we ought to have four or five, considering the number of harbors requiring to be dredged. If we go on in this way, we shall not have one harbor completed in twenty years. If that boat had been taken to Pictou and put in the marine slip there, I could have had all the repairs done in six weeks, and I venture to say for one-half the money, and the country would have been $30,000 better off than it is to-day. Hon. gentlemen may clap and make as much noise as they like, but it is the truth, and the truth will stand when your jeering will not stand. I think it is time for the Government to look into these matters. The amount of money that has been expended on this dredge, I am bound to say, reaches three times the amount that has been laid out on Prince Edward Island for all the harbors and piers on the Island this year. I will have something more to say on this subject later on. Indeed I have been waiting to see the hon. Minister and have a conversation with him on this subject before bringing up some matters connected with this dredge, and I do not intend just now to deal with it fully. However, as the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Perry) has brought the matter forward, I thought it my duty to say a few words. I would earnestly urge on the Government to see that some man of practical experience is consulted in the future with regard to the repairs made to this dredge. The Government have a very competent man in St. John's, N.B., who looks after the dredging, and if the matter were left in his hands I have no doubt things would be different. It is a serious matter to the people of the Island to see their harbors neglected and their dredge lying idle. The dredge has not done a stroke of work since August, 1887. The balance of 1887 has gone by, and 1888 has gone by without anything being done. I hope the Government will see that this matter is looked after and the deficiencies supplied.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am very sorry the mover of this motion did not let me know he was about to attack my department on this point, as I would then have been ready to answer him. But I will take another opportunity of replying to his strictures. It would have been as well to let the papers come down, and then take up the subject. I do not find fault with the hon. gentleman, for, of course, he was within his right in making the strictures he did, but I reserve my right to answer him later on.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) A great deal of dissatisfaction exists as to the manner in which this enormous expense has been made. I would suggest that the motion of my hon. friend should be amended by adding to it a return for the names of the officers and the amount paid to each of them during the period.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I answered that on a question. I said the captain and the engineer were the only two officers.

Motion agreed to.

LOBSTER FACTORIES.

Mr. PERRY moved for :

Return of the number of Lobster Factories round the coast of Prince Edward Island, the number of fines imposed during the season of 1888, the amount of each fine, the names of parties who have paid the fines, and the names of parties who have not paid the same; also, the nature of offence in each case.

He said: I desire to say that, as far as I can judge, the regulations of the department do not give satisfaction. I am well aware that, last year, application was made to have the close season changed as regards the south shore of Prince Edward Island. Now the close season all around the Island begins the 15th July; that is the time the fishermen must take up their traps, otherwise they are liable to a penalty. I believe there ought to be regulations protecting the lobster fisheries around the coast of Prince Edward Island as well as elsewhere; but I find that when the lobster fisheries are closed on the south side on the 15th of July, there is not a sufficient quantity of lobsters then caught to warrant any man investing capital in carrying on that industry. I have a statement from a lobster packer on the south side, for the summer of 1887, which shows that—though he had a thousand traps out, from the time he commenced to fish for lobsters, on the 26th of May, to the 15th of July—he only obtained 175 boxes of canned lobsters, although he employed 1,000 traps and several boats manned by ten men each, besides a lot of men employed on the shore. Now, from that date to the 17th of August, the same traps and the same number of men yielded 835 boxes, which goes to show that if the close season on the south side of the Island be the same as on the north side, the catch will not be sufficient to warrant the investment of any amount of capital in the business. The reason why the lobsters do not make their appearance early on the south side I do not know, but there must be a reason. I find that lobster fishing from the 1st of May to the 15th of July does not result satisfactorily. Several packers in my neighborhood have been fined because, unfortunately, they allowed lobsters under the regulation size to be boiled. I would ask particularly the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to understand that on the Gulf shore it is impossible for fishermen or packers to see that the lobsters are all up to the size required. It is impossible, where the sea is heavy—and these men have to get the lobsters out of the trap as soon as possible—for them to avoid occasionally bringing three or four small lobsters ashore; and the overseers and wardens, should they detect this, cause these men to be fined. Let me tell you that the imposition of one or two fines on a lobster packer will amount to more than the profit he makes the whole year round. I have also to complain that it appears to me these wardens wear two kinds of spectacles, so that when they approach a factory carried on by a poor unfortunate Grit, the lobsters appear very small, while when they come to other factories the lobsters are magnified in size. I do not blame the department for this gross injustice, but I say that the officers who have charge of the coast—and I speak from experience—are not dealing fairly and justly with the packers. I am sorry to say that they allow political prejudices to creep into their dealings, and I am desirous to find out the amounts which have been paid under the regulations. I know parties in my own neighborhood who have had to pay the full amount of the fines, and I know other persons, belonging to the Tory party, who have not paid the fines yet, and I doubt if they ever will. I know one pet of the Government who has been fined time and again for fishing out of season, and has not paid a cent. I may be wrong, but that is my information, and I have been told that he has appealed. I want to know if the authorities have carried out the regulations in regard to the lobster fisheries on the coast, fairly. I may also say that, although it is wise for the department to have certain regulations in regard to that matter, as they exist they cannot be complied with by the fishermen along the shore of Prince Edward Island; and I believe that it is not right or prudent in any case to make regulations which the people cannot comply with. Such a course tends to make bad subjects. With reference to this regulation as to small lobsters, it may happen that a fisherman may bring to the shore a few small lobsters of 8½ inches, and for that reason he must be fined. How could he help it? If those lobsters brought to the shore are to be put back in the water, they might as well be boiled, because they will not live. What we want to see is that there shall be officers who will see that these small lobsters shall be put back out of the trap, and then they will live. I hope the department will take these grievances into consideration and see that these regulations are carried out so well and fairly that they will not injuriously affect the trade. It would be better to close the factories than to allow men to try to make a living in them, with this fine hanging over their heads. It would be better to close the factories than to make regulations which the people are not able to comply with.

Mr. TUPPER. Of course there is no objection to bringing down the return which the hon. gentleman has just moved for. I may say, however, in regard to the remarks he has made as to the regulations in reference to the lobster fishery, particularly in Prince Edward Island, that the regulations of last year were to some extent experimental, and were made for that year only. The regulations for this year have yet to be settled, and I was very much pleased to have the views of the hon. gentleman as to how these regulations might be settled for one of the districts in Prince Edward Island. In reference to the remarks which the hon. gentleman made as to the enforcement of these regulations, I have a word or two to say. He is somewhat vague in the charges, and the very serious charges, which he brings against the officers of the department in that part of the country. I have not heard any charges of that kind before. No specific charges of any sort have been made to the department in reference to any of the fishery boards or other officers engaged in enforcing the regulations in Prince Edward Island; but I may assure the hon. gentleman that if any specific case is known to him, I would be most happy to take it up and deal with it in the most impartial manner. Of course it would be most improper and most reprehensible for any officer to be guilty of the acts which the hon. gentleman states some officers have been guilty of, and I can assure him that if any proper evidence of such actions were brought before me, such an officer would no longer hold a place under the department. Of course the fines are fixed by the magistrate who tries the case, but there is an appeal, and if any party feels aggrieved, he has the opportunity of presenting a petition to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in reference to the matter of fines, or in reference to any other matter, as to whether the fine should be reduced or not imposed. I have never enquired about nor known—though I have had several matters of that kind brought to my attention since I occupied the position I now hold—the political views or opinions of either the magistrate or the party fined, and I never intend to do so. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman that the regulations are too severe. I am strongly of the opinion that these fines are not nearly so severe as they should be, nor as the corresponding penalties are which are enforced in the United States, particularly in the State of Maine. The hon. gentleman has referred to a warden who allowed political friends to violate the law, and has prosecuted political opponents, who are opponents of the present Government. As I said before, if the hon. gentleman will give me the name of the officer to whom he refers, I will have strict enquiry made into the case. I will have the papers brought down at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. KIRK. The Minister has stated with regard to the regulations for lobster fishing in Prince Edward Island, that they were experimental for last year. The Minister is aware that regulations were also made last year for other parts of the Dominion as well. I would like to know whether he intends to say that there are to be new regulations for other parts of the Dominion as well as for Prince Edward Island, or whether his remarks apply only to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. TUPPER. I merely referred to Prince Edward Island, because that was the Province to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Perry) referred, but the regulations were experimental in regard to all the Provinces. Those for Prince Edward Island were included in the regulations for the other Provinces. Those regulations terminated at the end of 1888, and at present there are, practically, no regulations.

Mr. KIRK. Are there to be new regulations for Nova Scotia?

Mr. TUPPER. There are to be new regulations for all the Provinces.

Mr. KIRK. That is, for next year?

Mr. TUPPER. This year.

Mr. KIRK. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to lay a copy of those regulations on the Table?

Mr. TUPPER. Of course, so soon as the regulations are made, the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of seeing them.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOR AT NAUFRAGE, P.E.I.

Mr. McINTYRE moved for :

Copy of Engineer's last report on the feasibility of constructing a harbor at Naufrage, King's County, Prince Edward Island.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no objection to the motion being adopted, but the report has not yet been received, consequently the hon. gentleman cannot complain if some delay occurs.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF SAWLOGS.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for :

Return showing the amount of importation of pine and spruce sawlogs, board measure, from the State of Maine into the Province of New Brunswick, for the purpose of conversion into lumber in Canadian mills, and subsequent shipment to the United States under the provisions of the American tariff admitting such lumber free of duty, for each year from 1867 to June 30th, 1888, said return to designate the respective amounts of pine and spruce, if possible; otherwise to give the total importation of pine and spruce from Maine without such respective designations.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to the motion, but I fear much of the information asked for by the hon. gentlemen will be difficult to obtain; but as far as the information which he desires can be obtained, I will see that the returns are made out. I may state that I have made enquiry as to the feasibility of obtaining the information asked for, and I was told that it was very doubtful whether the statistics would give the information which the hon. gentleman desires, but so far as it can be obtained, it will be produced.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Correspondence between the Minister of the Interior and any officials of his Department, and Thomas Sioni, and others, Indians of the Huron Tribe of Lorette.—(Mr. Langelier, Montmorency.)

Return showing: 1st. The full amount of legal and other expenses paid in connection with the suit, "The St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Company vs. the Queen," from the commencement of the suit up to the 1st January, 1889. 2nd. The party or parties to whom paid, the amounts paid, and the date of payment.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Return showing the quantity of wheat and flour imported into the Dominion of Canada from the United States, and entered for consumption, during the six months ending 31st December, 1888; also the quantity of flour remaining in bond in Canada on the 31st December, 1888.—(Mr. Smith, Ontario.)

Return showing the amount, respectively, of pine and spruce sawlogs, board measure, exported in each year from 1867 to 30th June, 1888; the amount of export duty collected in each year from each class of logs; the rate of duty in each year upon each kind of logs, and the amount of export of each kind of logs, and amount of duty collected upon the same, by Provinces.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 4.5 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 11th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

FRANK S. BARNARD, Esquire, for the Electoral District of Cariboo, introduced by Mr. Dewdney and Mr. Mara.

REPORT.

Report of the Secretary of State for Canada, for the year ending 31st December, 1888.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

SPEEDY TRIALS ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 17) to make further provision respecting the speedy trial of certain indictable offences. He said: I may explain that the changes which the Bill proposes are simply to bring the Speedy Trials Act into effect in the Province of Nova Scotia. That Province is now the only Province to which the Act is not extended.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INCOMES OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

Mr. ELLIS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 18) to authorise the assessment of the salaries or incomes of persons in the service of Canada. He said: The object of the Bill is to provide that where assessments are levied for municipal or school purposes on incomes or salaries, the law shall apply to the civil service.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Shanly.)

Bill (No. 15) respecting the Kootenay and Athabasca Railway Company.—(Mr. Mara.)

EXPENDITURE ON ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, What is the total amount expended up to date on the preparation, revision, printing, &c., of the electoral lists, in pursuance of the Electoral Franchise Act?

Mr. BOWELL. The total amount expended on the first revision, printing, &c., of the electoral lists, before the Government assumed the work, was $414,574.39. Since the Government assumed the work by the printing bureau, not including plant, the amount expended has been $21,502.79. The amount of plant required for the printing of these lists, for the present and for the future, is $63,849.80.

INVITATION TO VISIT THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Has the Government, directly or indirectly, received from any person or company, an invitation to be presented to this House, to visit the principal cities of the United States? If such invitation has been received,—when and from what person or company? And what has been the answer of the Government?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government has not, directly or indirectly, received from any person or company an invitation to be presented to this House to visit the principal cities of the United States. I may say that I got a private note from an American gentleman saying that it would be a very good thing if this arrangement could be made.

PACIFIC MAIL SUBSIDY.

Mr. PRIOR asked, Whether, in the event of the Government granting a subsidy, in conjunction with the Imperial Government, to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or any other company, for carrying the mails between Vancouver, British Columbia, and China and Japan, they will insist upon the vessels carrying said mails calling on both the inward and outward trips at Victoria, British Columbia, the capital of British Columbia?

Mr. FOSTER. The arrangements for mail service between British Columbia and China and Japan have not yet been concluded with the Imperial Post Office authorities, and will depend to a great extent upon the conditions which may be imposed by Her Majesty's Government.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE—HOUSE FOR COMMANDANT.

Mr. PLATT asked, Have the Government agreed to purchase a house in the city of Kingston for the use of the commandant of the Royal Military College? If so, what amount do they propose to pay for said house, and at what distance, or about what distance, is said house from the Royal Military College?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Government have agreed to purchase a house in the city of Kingston for the use of the commandant of the Royal Military College, for which they propose to pay $12,500. The house is about 2,000 yards from the college.

PUBLIC WORKS IN YARMOUTH COUNTY, N.S.

Mr. LOVITT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide a sum in the Estimates for repairing and rebuilding the abutments washed out of Port Maitland breakwater, county of Yarmouth; also a sum for removing the gravel from the inside of Cranberry Head breakwater, in the said county?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sorry I cannot answer that just now. The hon. gentleman will have to wait, I think, until the Supplementary Estimates come down.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

Mr. THÉRIEN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to reduce the rate of postage on letters in the Dominion of Canada to two cents?

Mr. HAGGART. It is not at present the intention of the Government to reduce the rate.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill, this Session, amending the Dominion Lands Act?

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. DEWDNEY. That matter is under the consideration of the Government.

RIVER ST. LOUIS IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. BERGERON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to continue, this year, the works commenced at River St. Louis?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

BEAUHARNOIS CANAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. BERGERON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to commence this year the deepening and widening of the Beauharnois Canal?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That matter is under consideration.

ISLANDS IN THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked, Whether any petitions have been presented by the township councils of the front of Leeds and Lansdowne, front of Escott and the front of Young, praying that the islands in the River St. Lawrence, opposite these townships in the county of Leeds, Ontario, be sold? If so, what action the Government have decided on with reference to the same?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Some representations have been made in the direction stated in the hon. gentleman's question. The Government have taken no action. I propose myself next spring visiting the islands, after which I shall be in a better position to make representations to the Government.

DUNDAS AND WATERLOO ROADS.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth) moved for:

Return of copies of all correspondence, reports, petitions or other papers respecting the sale, ownership or condition of the Dundas and Waterloo macadamised road, since the return brought down under an Order of the House dated 17th February, 1885.

He said: I should apologise to the House, perhaps, for speaking for a few moments on a question of this kind. It is a matter of purely local interest to my own county; but I may say that it has always puzzled me to understand in what respect the road in question could be called a work for the general advantage of the Dominion of Canada, and thus constituted a Dominion public work. It is a local highway, built away back, in the early days before the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada were united, as a Local Government work, and is confined to the county of Wentworth and one adjoining county. It happens to be one of the two main outlets for the travel of that and the adjoining counties to the two main markets of the locality, the town of Dundas and the city of Hamilton. The larger proportion of the travel in this county is forced, whether or not from local circumstances, to go over one or the other of these two means of access to the city of Hamilton; because those who know the locality, know that Burlington Bay and the canal together give access to vessels going up the valley, past the city of Hamilton, to the town of Dundas, and crossed only at one point on Burlington Heights by a bridge. A few years ago—the Desjardins Canal Co. being involved in financial troubles—we found ourselves suddenly face to face with a difficulty that threatened to be most serious to those who travelled over the only other source of access to the city of Hamilton. Those who know the influences which a large city having two representatives in this House, and which a corporation such as the Great Western Railway and which the Desjardins Canal could wield, know they were much greater than any one representative in this House could hope to control. And these gentlemen, either tacitly or actively, made the endeavor to shift the expense of the maintenance of the bridge on Burlington Heights, from the shoulders that always bore, and properly bore it, the canal company or the railway, to the electors of that county who were obliged to travel over that road; and the result was they smuggled a clause into the Act, providing that by an Order in Council the Government might at some future time impose a toll for the maintenance of the bridge crossing the Desjardins Canal. With the aid of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), we at that time induced the House to set aside that legislation. In fact my hon. friend (Mr. Blake) had no difficulty in convincing the then Minister of Justice that the whole thing was illegal and unfair, and we were relieved of the difficulty that then threatened us. Since then other legislation was obtained, and this road and bridge passed to a company who kept them in bad repair, but looked after the tolls. After patience had ceased to be a virtue, and they had endured too long the tax which they were forced to pay in the shape of tolls for bad roads and bridges, they finally combined their forces and took the case into court, with the result that they got the parties within the purview of the Ontario Act which regulates road companies, and latterly the road company has been forced to abandon collecting toll over that road to the city until they shall put it properly in repair. The Waterloo road, unfortunately, is in a different position. Being a Dominion work, the powers that control that road cannot be brought under the operation of the Ontario Joint Stock Companies' Act, and there is no other means of redress except by bringing the question before the Department of Public Works here. To enable the House to realise the position in which we are placed, it will be necessary for me to state, briefly, the circumstances under which this work was originated, and how we have remained in a dead-lock for the last three or four years. As far back as the year 1839, the road was built under commissioners appointed by the old Government of Upper Canada. Debentures were then issued to the extent of £25,000 and placed at the disposal of these commissioners to build the road through the county of Wentworth, from the town of Dundas, up through a portion of Waterloo, to the town of Galt. The original road projected was some 25 miles in length. The commissioners, after expending a little over £25,000, found themselves, in August, 1839, in a position to place two tolls on this road, and commenced to collect revenue. In subsequent years, by means of additional aid, the road was completed, and connections made through to the town of Galt. From that time down, whether the road was in good order or in bad order, they have always managed to persistently collect the tolls. The Government of the day, shortly after the road was completed, saw fit to offer it at public sale, and it was transferred into private hands, with the result that, after a few years, it fell back into the hands of the Government, the plea of the purchaser being that the Government having subsequently chartered the Great Western Railway, that railway, when it was opened, took the travel entirely away from this highway, and made it comparatively valueless to the owners, and they also used that plea as an excuse for allowing the road to get out of repair. It was subsequently leased to the two corporations of the towns of Dundas and Galt for a period, in two leases together, of twenty years, expiring in April, 1885. Then the Government, believing, I suppose, that there was no necessity to the Dominion at large for longer retaining this work, put it up for sale at public auction, after duly advertising it and imposing certain restrictions upon the purchaser. At the time it was offered for sale by the Government, the road was 20 miles long—17½ miles with three toll gates being inside the county of Wentworth, and 2½ miles with one toll gate being inside the county of Waterloo. It was sold to Dr. Walker, of the town of Dundas, for $21,300, a deposit of $3,000 being required from the purchaser at the date of sale, and a few months after one-half of the balance, making altogether $12,150 paid by the purchaser. It was assumed, at the time the sale was made under the Public Works Act, that this road would be transferred to a company, and would be subject to the ordinary rules and regulations affecting road companies, passed by the Ontario Provincial Legislature. But it was found that the Public Works Act, while making provision for the sale of abandoned or unused public works that were no longer intended to be maintained as public works, to private individuals, contained no provision to enable the Government to convey any public work, to be maintained as a public work, to a private individual, and the hon. the Minister of Justice, to whom the matter was referred by the Government, stated:

"It is where a public work is transferred as a work, and with the intention that it should be maintained as such, that section 54 and the following sections of 'The Public Works Act' apply, and in such cases a transfer to an individual is not authorised by the statute."

I may say, with respect to Dr. Walker's purchase, that the difficulty in the way of a transfer to him would be overcome by his procuring incorporation as a road company; and a few days after this information was conveyed to Dr. Walker by the Government in the following very mild terms:—

"It will be necessary that you obtain incorporation as a road company under the Ontario Act, when the transfer can be made to the company, as otherwise it would be necessary for the Dominion Government to obtain special legislation in the matter. It appears to this department that the course suggested by the Department of Justice is the more desirable one to pursue."

I need not say that, so far as the public interests are concerned, we all feel that the line that was suggested by the Minister of Justice was the desirable one to adopt. The House can realise the difficulty that obtains the moment a public highway is vested in a private individual. His finances may become embarrassed, and the public interests may suffer in consequence; or the road may pass into the hands of minors and may be involved in trusts, and, in the meantime, unless the public look sharply after the matter, the result will be that the people will have to pay tolls over a road that is not in such a condition that tolls should be collected for it. However, for reasons which will appear, Dr. Walker declined to become incorporated as a road company. On the 6th February the firm of McCarthy, Osler & Co., solicitors for Dr. Walker, replied:

"Dr. Walker has informed us that you suggested to him that he should incorporate under the statute, and transfer the road which he purchased to this incorporated company. He instructs us to say that for two reasons it is impossible for him to do so. The first is that the property belongs to him solely, and that it takes at least five persons to obtain an Act of incorporation under the Ontario statute; and the second is that, if he did incorporate, he would subject himself to serious loss owing to certain provisions of the Ontario law and to the situation of the road, intersecting as it does with the Brock road."

And with a further eye to Dr. Walker's interest they add:

"We have again to ask that you will permit Dr. Walker to erect the check gates for which we on his behalf have formerly applied."

On the 10th March, 1885, the hon. the Minister of Public Works introduced an Act providing for the transfer of this public work to Dr. Walker, as suggested in the communication from the Minister of Justice. At that time I waited upon the Minister and suggested to him that, as there had been considerable difficulty between Dr. Walker and the people on the question of check gates and changes in the location of the gates on this road, and as the provisions under which the road was sold simply required that notices of application for changing the location of the gates or erecting check gates should be published only in the Canada Gazette, the Minister, if he would not place the road under the provisions of the Ontario Act, should require that, when the proprietor of the road made application to the Government for these extended powers, he should publish his application for thirty days in at least one local newspaper in Galt and in Dundas, where the people resided who paid the tolls and who were interested in the highway, so that they might know that the application against their interest was being made. The Minister declined to take my view of the matter then, and said he thought this might safely be left in the hands of the Government. I told him that, under the circumstances, I felt I would have to oppose the passage of the Act in the House in its existing form. The result was that, in consequence of that statement, in consequence of the long summer Session which those who were in the House at that time will remember we had in 1885, and for various other causes, the Bill was laid over from time to time until, on the 9th June, the Minister withdrew the Bill from the House, intimating that in the interim the Premier of the Province of Ontario had written to him on the subject, putting in a claim to the work as being exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Province of Ontario; and the Minister stated that, until such time as the Government had the opportunity to investigate the original construction of the work and the circumstances surrounding it, he proposed to withdraw legislation on that question. The result was that the Bill was withdrawn from the House in June, 1885, and it has remained in that position ever since. I want to call the attention of the House very briefly to a few other circumstances, so that the Minister of Public Works and this House may realise the difficulties under which the people are laboring in consequence of this extended delay. I am not attaching any blame to the Department of Public Works in this matter, but sometimes the public interests suffer from these very prolonged delays. At the time this road was sold by public auction, the provisions under which it was sold were to this effect:

"That the tolls to be collected on the said road shall not exceed the maximum amount of tolls now imposed and which the present lessees have the right to receive and collect. No toll gate or bar shall, without consent of the Governor in Council, be erected or placed on the road nearer to the towns of Galt and Dundas than the site of the first gate from said towns now erected on said road, nor shall the number of toll gates or bars now standing on said road be increased without such consent. The purchaser and his heirs, &c., shall at all times keep the works in good condition, the efficiency of such order and condition to be established by the inspection of an Engineer of the Department of Public Works."

It will occur to anyone who has had experience in toll roads, that, if this highway had been brought under the operations of the Ontario Joint Stock Road Companies Act, the public would have had much better facilities for reaching the management of the road, if it was unsatisfactory, than they could have in being required to appear before the department at Ottawa in order to have an engineer sent from Ottawa for the purpose of inspecting that road. But the public interest in that road was awakened by another movement which was inaugurated by Dr. Walker as soon as he acquired possession of those roads. The road was sold in March, 1884, and Dr. Walker entered into possession on or about the 25th April, 1884. On the 9th May, although he had been only a few days in possession, we find the road decorated with three check gates for the purpose of enabling the doctor better to collect the tolls on this road. One of these was erected within half a mile of the first gate out from the town of Dundas, and within 200 yards of where another leading macadamised road branched off from this road and led up through the county in another direction. The result was that those who travelled for 200 yards on this road for any other business were required to pay full tolls for travelling that short distance. When the House realises that one of the largest flouring mills in that locality, doing a very large gristing and merchant trade, and having a large number of consumers and purchasers, was wedged in between the two gates, and that its traffic had to be carried on between the two leading highways from which the wheat of the county reached the mill on one side, and the flour was sent to market on the other, and that this condition of things was imposed under circumstances, which, by evading the Ontario Act, enabled Dr. Walker to impose full tolls in these cases, it will realise how great the disadvantage was and why he so soon was anxious to be outside of the Ontario Act and have all the privileges of a road built and owned by the Dominion Government. One of the results of it was that Dr. Walker asserted that the Minister of Public Works had authorised him to put up these check gates; but the late Mr. Webster, the gentleman that owned this mill, an active and energetic supporter of the Government of the day, by the way, and one of that class of Englishmen that does not allow himself to be sat upon without a good and sufficient reason, cited one of Dr. Walker's toll-gate keepers before the authorities to give an account of the ways and means by which he proceeded to collect this additional toll. I think, perhaps, I cannot more concisely put the facts than by reading two short extracts from Mr. Webster's correspondence with the Minister of Public Works, as it states them in his own words and from his own standpoint. It is dated May 3, 1884, scarcely two weeks after the road had passed under the new management. It is addressed to Sir Hector Langevin, Minister of Public Works, Ottawa, and states:

"At the late sale of the Dundas and Waterloo macadamised road, Dr. Walker of Dundas became the purchaser from the Government. He is now erecting a check gate at Bullock's Corners, about half a mile above the present toll gate No. 1, near Dundas, claiming to have permission from the Governor in Council to do so. I write this to enquire whether such permission has been obtained. The only object to be obtained by the erection of the check gate, would be to compel all persons coming to my mill to pay toll, and it is the only interest affected. Situated as my mill is, between the two proposed gates, it would be extremely disastrous to my business and unjust to the public. I trust such permission has not been given. I feel assured that if the circumstances of the case were fully known, that such consent would never be obtained. Such a departure from the conditions under which the road was sold, the inconvenience to the whole agricultural community for miles round, the serious, I may say ruinous effects upon my private business, and the absence of any reasonable claim that the road proprietor can have for such an extension of his privileges. I can scarcely fancy that the Government would consent to such a measure."

Again on the 15th June he writes, because this matter was not settled in a day or two; it was subject to several delays in adjudication:

"When I wrote my last letter I was a good deal troubled to believe that the Dominion Government would commit so great an error, and also from my point of view, so great an injustice. Dr. Walker seems determined to carry things with a pretty high hand. Two of his check gates on the Galt end of the road have been burned, and it is said that his proceedings have not only been overbearing but positively dishonest. The feelings of the people are just now under restraint, not knowing how far the Government are justifying him in his high-handed proceedings. I think I may be pardoned in saying that any concessions in his favor would be at the expense and to the inconvenience of the public. After purchasing the privileges of the road at public auction, he can have no right to claim further advantages, and for the Government to concede further privileges would be at the expense of public justice and their own popularity."

This trouble finally culminated in a lawsuit, in which Dr. Walker's gate-keeper was fined, on the 9th of July. But he still kept up the war with the proprietor of this mill; he abandoned collecting toll at the main gate and collected the whole toll at the check gate; and that continued for some time with the result that the public travelling over one of the highways was obliged to pay full toll for travelling on this road, less than 200 yards. You may say that the injustice could be easily remedied, but such was not the case, for the simple reason that the Ontario Joint Stock Road Companies' Act does not apply, and the road being under the control of the Dominion Government is outside of the ordinary Ontario laws that regulate these roads. The correspondence went on between Dr. Walker and the Department of Public Works, and he made repeated applications for an Order in Council to enable him to place the check gates upon the road. But the department refused to take any further action, and the result of the application of the Ontario Government claiming the ownership was that it brought the whole question to a standstill, and the Government declining to grant Dr. Walker power to erect check gates, he finally abandoned this check gate, and the other two check gates disappeared in the night—it is supposed by spontaneous combustion. Anyway, they were there at night, and were not there in the morning. Now, with respect to this matter of check gates, one strong reason that I had at the time for opposing the action of the Government and asking them to give notice to the public before even an application could be made for check gates, was simply this, that I find, appended to a memorandum of the Department of Public Works, recommending legislation, a short notice from the chief engineer of the department, couched in this somewhat significant language:

"With reference to check gates, the chief engineer recommends that no action be taken till after the required special legislation has been obtained."

Now, in these numerous applications that had been made to the Department of Public Works for this much coveted Order in Council, and from this recommendation of delay, and from the fact, which every member of this House knows, that there are not half a dozen people in the county who ever see the Canada Gazette with notices of applications, I felt that it was doubly essential to the interests of the people who use this road, that some provision should be made by which they would be made aware that application was being made for the purpose of having these check gates imposed. I have no hesitation in saying that, from my personal knowledge of the location at which this check gate, above gate No. 1, near Dundas, was proposed to be placed, that it was simply, in effect, imposing a second toll upon the large class of the community who are helpless to avoid it. The locality is such that people have to go over this highway, because there is no other alternative. By even going around several miles there is no other road by which they could reach the town of Dundas or the city of Hamilton, without going through some other toll gate, and even if considerable expense was incurred, the position was such that no other road could be conveniently opened, and the people were placed in this position that they had to travel this road and the community felt that it was an imposition on the travelling community that used this highway; and it was for that reason there was such a strong feeling in connection with this matter. Under these circumstances I felt it was only fair they should have notice. I am not finding any fault with the action of the Governor in Council; but everyone knows the influences which can be brought to bear, in the absence of representations on the other side, that may secure a coveted advantage, in a case like this, without the public being aware of it until such advantage is granted. I desire to draw the attention of the House, for a few moments, to the condition in which this road has been kept. Away back in 1882, while the towns of Dundas and Galt were lessees of the road, the public felt that it was not being maintained in a condition such as was required, and after asking the mayor of the town of Dundas to take steps to have it placed in a good condition, but without success and without notice being taken of the application, the people petitioned the county judge, in conformity with the provisions of the Ontario Act, with the result that they found that the road was beyond the control of the county judge, the case being dismissed because the judge had no jurisdiction. I find in Dr. Walker's correspondence that, when asking for power to erect check gates, he says:

"I have so far spent double the receipts on repairs of the road and shall have to continue to do so until the end of the season. This year the road has not returned any interest on the investment, as it was in such very bad repair."

Perhaps the doctor put his case strongly in asking for this special privilege from the Government; but this House will easily realise that when the Government were not in a position to convey this road to Dr. Walker, he naturally spent no more money in maintaining it than was absolutely necessary, and so it has continued from 1885 to the present time, with this result, that the people have been required to pay toll over the road, and, as I have said, if they had the opportunity to choose another highway it would not have mattered so much, but from the contour of the country and the way in which the locality is placed, this road is the great outlet for travel from the north riding of Wentworth, and whether the people desire it or not, they are obliged to use it, in good or in bad condition, in order to reach their market. I have to apologise to the House for occupying the time of hon. members with a purely local matter, but it happens that this road, which is purely a local road, is under the control of the Dominion Government. Whether the fact that the Great Western Railway crosses the road makes this a matter of general interest to Canada I do not know, but we have this result, that there is a bad road which the people are obliged to travel over and pay toll or stay at home. I desire to urge on the Minister of Public Works that this matter should be pressed forward, and the question of the ownership of this road settled, so that we may be in a position to enforce the proper maintenance of the road. At the present moment the condition of the road is so bad that the county council, in its session in January, passed a resolution asking the Government to ascertain who the real owners of this highway are; and since I came to the House I have received a memorial from the reeves of the two townships of West Flamboro' and Beverly, through which the road runs, which I have forwarded to the Minister of Public Works, asking that an engineer be sent to inspect the road in the early spring and ascertain the condition of the road-bed. I have to ask the Minister to press this matter to a conclusion without delay. Personally, I suppose, if there is to be a general election before the questions involved in this road matter are settled, no great harm will be done to me individually by having the question left open, because I can place the responsibility upon the shoulders of the Minister of Public Works, and it may weaken the hands of some of his friends in that locality; but I say, in the interest of the community there, that this controversy which has existed for three or four years as to who are the owners of this road should be settled, and the fact that in the meantime the road has been allowed to run down, to the great disadvantage of the people of the locality, it is but right that some steps should be taken to remove this grievance at an early day.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have no objection to the adoption of the motion, and the papers will be brought down. I have listened to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and in the last portion of them he certainly brought out the point at issue, namely, the ownership of the road. That point is being investigated, and my attention was called to it by the document the hon. gentleman sent to me the other day.

Motion agreed to.

ARTIFICIAL FERTILISERS.

Mr. MULOCK moved:

That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution: "That it is expedient to remove the duty on Artificial Fertilisers and to place them on the Free List."

He said: I may briefly inform the House, and especially those members who are not familiar with the tariff regulations on the subject covered by my motion, that at the present time there is a duty of 20 per cent. on artificial fertilisers. The matter was brought before the House in 1887, coming up on a motion by the then Minister of Finance to change the duty from the ad valorem one of 20 per cent. to a specific duty of $6 per ton. A discussion took place upon that motion, and a motion was made that, in lieu of the specific duty of $6 per ton, artificial fertilisers should be placed on the free list. I had the honor of seconding the motion on that occasion, but the Minister of Finance postponed the further consideration of the whole subject by withdrawing his original motion to change the duty from an ad valorem to a specific duty. Accordingly, the law is to-day as it was in 1887, and there is an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent. upon all artificial fertilisers coming into Canada. Under the circumstances, I think it is worthy of the consideration of this House whether that duty is in the interest of the most important class in Canada, the Canadian farmer. For my part I consider the tax, for it is nothing more than almost a direct tax on the farmer, is wholly indefensible. It is not sound as a matter of political economy, it is not fair as a matter of justice to an already overtaxed people. It is said that we have plenty of phosphates in Canada, that they can be manufactured at home, and are being manufactured here to-day, and, therefore, some will urge perhaps that the tax through the custom house is no tax at all, that it simply excludes foreign competition. I am unable to agree with that conclusion. The Government have in many ways rendered it impossible for the Canadian farmer to obtain cheap artificial fertilisers. They have increased enormously the cost of production. I understand that certain acids enter very largely into the manufacture of superphosphates—sulphuric acid for one—and are necessary in the production of artificial fertilisers. The Government has placed a duty on sulphuric acid necessary for the manufacture of superphosphates and fertilisers, amounting to 25 per cent., or a specific duty of one-half per cent. per pound, which is about one-quarter of the selling wholesale price of sulphuric acid. I am informed that the selling price of sulphuric acid is about two cents per pound, and if so, the custom house duty of one-half cent per pound is one quarter of the actual wholesale price. Of course, not much of this acid will come into the country under those circumstances, but the Canadian manufactured article, which is a by-product of some of our mineral resources, is sold at a necessarily enhanced value. The result is that the cost of production is increased by the cost of protection given to acids. Whatever may be the argument, or whatever may be the reason for this, I hope that the time has come when this duty shall be swept away, in so far as it increases the cost to the farmer, on the agricultural fertiliser. When this matter was before the House in 1887, some hon. gentlemen said we should not make a motion of this kind because there was such a small quantity of artificial fertilisers introduced into Canada. It was stated, and stated correctly, I believe, by gentlemen who opposed the motion, that, in 1886, only some $1,400 worth of fertilisers came into Canada. That only proves that the protective tariff has become a prohibitory tariff and has placed the cost of the imported article beyond the reach of the farmer. There is no doubt in my mind—and I do not venture to speak for others than myself—that if the Canadian farmers are to keep pace with their great rivals in the United States and in England they must every year, in increasing quantities, resort to artificial fertilisers. The lands have become impoverished in the older districts in Ontario and some of the other Provinces, and they are not now so fertile as they were in years gone by in the production of wheat and other cereals. The farmers have, therefore, to resort to the use of artificial fertilisers to improve their exhausted lands. Every year, in England and in the United States, a rapidly increasing quantity of these fertilisers is used by the advanced farmers of those countries. It is the custom on all occasions in this House, when my hon. friends seek to defend the high tariff which this Government has established, to point to the United States and to adopt its practice as a model. In this case they cannot find any such consolation or defence for their course. According to the law of the United States, fertilisers are admitted duty free, and not only fertilisers but sulphuric acid, also, which enters so largely into the manufacture of fertilisers. Permit me to quote a few items from the American Tariff of 1883, which, I believe, is the last Act of the United States Congress amending the Tariff. On reference to the Act, page 515 of the United States Statutes, Vol. 22, you find the schedule of the articles placed on the free list. These were not on the free list of 1883 for the first time, but although some very considerable changes were made in the United States Tariff in 1883 (some of them nominally in the direction of reduction, but which were rather in the direction of increasing the duties), yet in regard to the important subject of duty on fertilisers the United States Congress in 1883 re-affirmed their former attitude, and held that the class of manufactures to which I refer shall continue on the free list. On the free list of the United States we find the following articles of import shall be exempt from duty:—

“Bones, crude, not manufactured, burned, calcined, ground or steamed. Bone-dust and bone-ash for manufacture of phosphate and fertilisers. Carbon, animal, fit for fertilising only. Guano, manures, and all substances expressly used for manure.”

Thus our American neighbors have adopted free trade in regard to articles of this kind; and I think that, in this regard at all events, they have shown a very wise discretion. The result of the policy of the Administration in Canada, in taxing the manufacture of superphosphates (because that is what they have done by making it expensive to the manufacturer to manufacture by putting a high tariff upon the imported acid), has enabled the manufacturer to increase the cost to the consumer of the manufactured article here, and by doing this the Administration has practically placed superphosphates beyond the reach of the Canadian farmers. What is the result of this? A large portion of the natural wealth of Canada which is to be found in the great phosphate deposits of this Ottawa district, and in other parts of the Dominion, instead of being made valuable to the Canadian farmer is being exported in increasing quantities every year for the benefit of farmers beyond Canada. Our natural deposits of phosphates are now being imported to the United States and into England duty free, thus enabling the farmers there to raise grain so as to compete with our grain and at a less cost than we ourselves can produce it. We are preventing our Canadian farmers from using the fertilisers at their own doors and enabling their rivals in the markets beyond Canada to undersell our Canadian farmers, or at all events to make their products so much less in value. Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think the time has arrived when we should place those fertilisers upon the free list. If it be necessary that the Canadian farmer shall in any way bear this burden, let the Government, if they choose, take the tax off all the raw material, and then the Canadian manufacturer can manufacture at the cheapest price. Let them take down the barrier against the importation of superphosphates from foreign countries, and then, and not till then will our farmers be on a fair footing to compete with their competitors beyond our Dominion.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, if this motion were an attack upon the general principles of the National Policy, I should leave it to be answered by others more experienced, but as it refers to a special industry in which my constituency is largely interested (an industry which owes its existence there to the National Policy), I feel it is my duty to make a reference to the facts of the case, so that hon. members, before deciding on this question, shall have facts on one side as against the theories advanced by my hon. friend on the other. There is at Capelton, within a few miles from Sherbrooke, a deposit of copper pyrites, which, next to the Rio Tinto mines in Spain, is the largest in the world. The ore carries about three per cent. of copper, and between forty and fifty per cent. of sulphur. Their existence has been known and the mines have been worked for the last twenty-five years. For the first few years they were worked for the copper alone, and to obtain this product the ore was roasted on the surface of the ground, not only wasting the sulphur, but destroying vegetation for many miles around. These deposits attracted the attention, about ten years ago, of an enterprising firm in New York, G. H. Nicholls & Co., large manufacturers of all the ingredients used in fertilisers, principally sulphuric acid. They bought an extensive property, and have worked it vigorously from that time to this. Until within the last year, they took out the ore and sent it in the raw state to New York. As it was from this firm that the principal ingredients for manufacturing fertilisers were imported into this country, I used what influence I could to induce them to place their works in Canada. Their answer was that it was more economical, they thought, for the Canadian farmer to have the fertilisers produced, as they were producing them, on a large scale in the United States, and that it would be more in the interest of the Canadian consumer that the duty should be removed—in fact, just the same argument as that which has been used by my hon. friend in support of his motion. But finding that the Government were firm in maintaining the duty, these gentlemen changed their policy, and during last year they have erected works at Capelton on a large scale, where they are not only making fertilisers for the Canadian market, and shipping them in iron tank cars—manufactured, I am happy to say, at Sherbrooke—but to their own surprise they are receiving orders from and sending their sulphuric acid to New England. Their intention has been from the first to take up the manufacture of superphosphates in this country, and for that purpose they have expended over $100,000 in the purchase of phosphate deposits at Buckingham, within twenty miles of this city; and the only cause of delay, is the question of the location—whether they will erect works at Montreal, where they could obtain the use of the albumen and other products of the abattoirs, or in the neighborhood of the mines. With this illustration before it, the House has, on the one hand, to consider the actual fact of foreign capital invested in the country in this industry under the policy of protection, and, on the other, the theory of my hon. friend of what the result would be if the duty were removed. Agreeing as I do with my hon. friend on almost all questions of a social nature, it is with regret that I have to differ with him on so many questions of a public character. If he and his friends would give to the National Policy a support as consistent and persistent as both political parties in the United States have given to their tariff, I believe we should soon see in Canada similar results, and a commercial union would be brought about such as we could all agree with—a commercial union, resulting from the application of foreign capital to our native products, on Canadian soil. Entertaining these views, and feeling that the motion of my hon. friend is in direct contradiction and contravention of that policy, it seems to me that it is not entitled to the support of this House.

Mr. CASEY. I do not wish to speak at any length, because my own part of the country is not interested in this question of artificial fertilisers to any great extent at present, whatever may be the case in the future when our land becomes more exhausted. But in this matter, as in others, I feel that we should consider not only the interest of our own neighborhood, but the interest of the farming community throughout the Dominion. It is undoubtedly the case that a large number of Canadian farmers do require to use artificial fertilisers on their land. I have often heard that, in the Province of Quebec particularly, the use of such fertilisers would be of great advantage and profit to the farmers, a great deal of whose land is in need of those superphosphates which come under the head of artificial fertilisers, and I feel called upon to say something on their behalf. It is quite clear that the existing duty on fertilisers, and on the materials for making them, does increase the cost of those articles in this country else there would be no object in maintaining those duties. My hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) has argued that the duty should be maintained for the purpose of stimulating the investment of foreign capital in Canada. The only way that it can be stimulated is to increase the cost of the fertilisers. Therefore, my hon. friend's argument is that the price of these fertilisers to a large number of Canadian farmers should be maintained at a higher than the normal price to encourage a few capitalists to come in and make money by manufacturing them. His argument was for the profits of the manufacturers at Capelton, against the interests of the farmers who use their product. His argument was that any reduction of the duty would be subversive of the National Policy, and that, therefore, this motion should be thrown out. We remember that when the National Policy was introduced it was urged that it was as much for the benefit of the farmer as anybody else; but now it would seem that, although the name of the National Policy has remained the same, the object of the National Policy has changed. It would appear that it is for the benefit of the manufacturers at the expense of the farmer. I cannot call such a policy a national policy. I will call it a policy of protection to manufacturers; but under these circumstances when the interests of the farmers are held to be naught as against those of the manufacturers, I cannot call it a national policy, seeing that the farmers constitute the largest number of our people, produce the greatest part of our wealth, and pay the largest amount of duties of any class in the Dominion. If my hon. friend's (Mr. Hall's) friends, the manufacturers, have told him correctly about their business dealings, they need not be afraid of the competition which the motion of my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) would induce. My hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) has said that these manufacturers are able to sell sulphuric acid in New England in competition with the manufacturers there. If that is the case, why are they afraid to compete with them in Canada? He has knocked the bottom out of his own argument in this one admission. Those who send sulphuric acid to New England must pay the American duty on the article, and if they can do that, why could they not compete in an open market here where neither side would have any duty to pay? The hon. gentleman has told us that $100,000 of capital has been invested in phosphate lands at Buckingham, and I do not know how much in the manufacture at Capelton; and his argument is that because of the investment of these, perhaps $200,000 or $300,000, the monopoly should be kept up for the benefit of the foreign capitalists who have invested this money—for the benefit of these Yankees, against whom all loyal men must now feel so strongly. For the benefit of these the farmers of Canada are to be taxed. The hon. gentleman's argument is not sound. The only possible argument which could be made against the motion would be that the owners of the phosphate lands might be injured. I do not know how that would be; I do not know how far they would be injured. I believe that if sulphuric acid was allowed to be imported freely, the manufacture of superphosphates would be largely increased, and the value of phosphate lands be augmented; and that with our cheaper labor in Canada, notwithstanding the admission of fertilisers free, the motion of the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) would involve a greater manufacture of superphosphates in Canada and an increased value to phosphate lands. Even if there was a choice to be made between the two, we should look to the interests of the majority, the interests of the farmer, as against the interest of the comparatively few who are concerned in this industry.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am sorry to have to differ with my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall). I have always admired the candor with which he has always discussed the questions that come before the House, but in my opinion this is the same old story over again—the protection of the few brought about by the taxation of the many. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) has put the whole matter in a nutshell when he says what is now miscalled the National Policy means the protection of the few by the taxation of the many. This fact is beginning to be realised by the country. The people are beginning to realise that the farmers, who form seven-tenths of the people of this country, and who pay the great bulk of the taxes, are not protected in any way in any one item. The only thing that the National Policy does for the farmer is to tax him. Now the farmers, in asking for this little concession, are not asking very much. I am a practical farmer myself. I live by it and have obtained all I have by it. What I have to say with regard to the farmers is that they ask for no protection. All they ask is to be let severely alone and be allowed a fair chance in the struggle for wealth and position. That is all they want, and with less they will not be satisfied. So far as this matter of fertilisers is concerned, though apparently a very small matter, it is, when you come to probe it, found to be a very important matter. Every hon. gentleman knows that you cannot protect anything which the farmer produces while you tax everything he uses. The taxation commences with the necessaries on his table, and everything thereon, except what he raises on his farm, is taxed to the very highest point. Take one item, an article in general use and a necessity on the table, the article of sugar. The duties upon sugar are prohibitory. Sugar never was cheaper in the markets of the world than it is at present, and one-half what the farmer pays for what he uses is paid in the shape of taxes. The clothes that he wears are taxed from 30 to 50 per cent. for the benefit of the manufacturers, and for their benefit alone. The implements which he uses are taxed even in a greater degree. Those who know anything about farming know that iron is a large component part in farm implements, and any one who will look over the tariff will see that a prohibitory tax is placed on this raw material—a tax which is paid by the farmer. Is it then too much to ask that this small matter of fertilisers be allowed in free? I need not tell you, Sir, that the great source of the income of this country is the products of the farm, next to which come the products of the forest. First of all the industries of the country is the farming industry, and upon it mainly the country has to depend for the increase of its wealth and the Government for the taxes they collect. How is the high standard of fertility, the high standard of production in farming to be kept up? It is only by correct methods of farming, by scientific methods of farming, and in every successful method of farming the price of fertilisers plays an important part. It is the most important of all considerations in connection with farming. I found out many years ago that the simple question whether farming is to prove a success or a failure depends, not so much on the methods used, not so much on the capital employed, as upon the increased quantity produced from a given surface. If 15 bushels of wheat to an acre will pay all expenses and enable the farmer to live, 20 bushels to the acre will give him a clear profit of five bushels. If he is to obtain that he can only do so by a judicious system of farming and by a liberal use of fertilisers. I may remark that this question is assuming gigantic proportions. I need not tell hon. gentlemen that the system we have been pursuing, of exporting so much from the country, has a deteriorating influence upon the soil, that it is gradually exhausting the fertility of the soil. You cannot raise or feed an animal and export it without taking away a portion of the fertility of the soil. That exhaustion is accelerated in a very large ratio when we export in the shape of cereals. You are then rapidly deteriorating the fertility of the soil, and unless that loss is supplied in some way or other rapid deterioration must result. Let me point out how one item affects the farmers. Why is it that Britain is, notwithstanding her comparatively barren soil, the richest and most productive country in the world? The reason is simply that she has largely imported coarse grains and turned them into fertilisers of the soil, in fact has made Britain the feeding ground for the coarse grains of the world. Many years ago, before the year 1879, we had the privilege of importing coarse grains free of duty into this country for that very purpose, and that is the policy that ought to have been pursued in the interests of our farming community. Our farmers imported western grain, fed it to their cattle, shipped the cattle to Great Britain, and made a profit, and were becoming richer all the time. But the farmer had to be taxed, and a tax was laid on these coarse grains, and that trade was completely knocked on the head. If fertility is to be kept up in the soil, we have to employ some other means than merely the products of the soil. Just so long as the produce of the soil is exported, so long will this process of deterioration go on. Some years ago, I went through the Island of Prince Edward, one of the finest farming sections, as far as I can see, in this Dominion of ours. I never saw finer land to work upon. They export from that Island a large quantity of oats and potatoes, and of living animals. What enables them to do it? If it were not for the use of artificial manures and fertilisers, such as mussel mud, that Island would be one barren waste, unless it were for the fertilisers which they scatter over their lands and which keep up the fertility of the soil. The motion now before the House asks for a very small matter, and the parts of the country which import fertilisers the most are those which need it the most. In the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia they have not such a rich soil as we have in the West and as they have in the North-West. Their soil is comparatively unproductive, when placed in competition with ours, and it is necessary that they should have some facilities afforded them, that they should have some cheap means of keeping up the fertility of the soil. If you want to assist the farming community and to enable them to compete in the markets of the world, you must remove the duty from the fertilisers and give the farmers a chance. My friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) has alluded to the fact that as yet only small quantities of these fertilisers are imported, and he pointed out correctly that the fact results from the existence of a prohibitory duty upon these fertilisers amounting to no less than one-fifth of the price. I have much pleasure in seconding the motion of my hon. friend, the member for North York.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I am compelled to consider this motion in the interest of the agricultural community. The National Policy was brought into existence, as it was stated, for the particular benefit of the farmers as well as the industrial classes, and yet, notwithstanding all the improvements in machinery and the cheapening of the cost of production in every line, excepting in that of farming, notwithstanding all the improvements which have been made in agricultural machinery, the farmer is not able to produce a single acre of grain cheaper than he was before agricultural machinery was improved. The cost is just as great now as it was before. Allow me to give a statement which is taken from the returns of the Bureau of Industries of the Province of Ontario, as to the cost of producing an acre of the principal grains which are exported from that Province. This is taken from the report of the Bureau of Industries for the year 1887, and is compiled from the reports of 197 farmers representing all parts of the Province of Ontario. This report shows that the cost of producing an acre of fall wheat was $19.53. The whole value of the acre of wheat produced was $17.18, so that it cost $2.35 more to produce an acre of wheat than the farmer realised from its growth. Barley cost $14.83 to produce per acre, and the farmer realised $18.63, making a profit of $3.80 per acre on barley. To produce an acre of oats it cost $14.73, and the value of the growth was $16.95, or $2.17 more than the cost of production. Peas cost $15.47 to produce, while the value of the product was $13.87, or $1.60 less than the cost of production. So, if a farmer having 100 acres had 40 acres laid out in this way—10 acres of fall wheat, 10 acres of barley, 10 acres of oats and 10 of peas, he would only have a net profit of $20.20 on those 40 acres above the cost of production. Hon. gentlemen will say that the only safety for the farmer is to increase the product, as the amount of manual labor cannot be reduced, and this must be done by the increased elements of fertility which it is possible to send back into the soil. I believe that the farmers in Ontario, and all over Canada, will not long continue to farm under the old system of raising coarse grains and cattle in order to send them to a foreign market. They must keep cattle at home, and keep and fatten them on the farm, because my experience as a farmer tells me that one of the great wants which we feel in this country now is a sufficient quantity of fertilisers, either natural or artificial, and no farmers who continue to follow the old system can possibly hold their position unless the Government chooses to give them relief in some direction. From the statement of my hon. friend from Middlesex, the result of protection to the farmer has been that it has increased the price of almost every article we sell, and has also narrowed the markets for our products. Between the two we are in a very peculiar position. Since the Government, in their wisdom, have seen fit to follow the example of most other countries by establishing experimental farms, there is no doubt that at the farms they will experiment on fertilisers and artificial manures, as well as on other matters; but it is an impossibility for any farmer to tell by the experiment made on the experimental farm, what the effect of the fertiliser would be on his own farm or on his fields, without making an actual experiment for himself. At one time it was attempted to show by agricultural chemistry what was necessary to use in order that a good crop might be raised, but now it is admitted that it cannot tell the amount of plant-food the soil contains in an available condition. Thus, although the experimental farm may show what may be done there, and what the different parts of the fertilisers may be, still every farmer must experiment for himself on his own farm, and it is only the fertiliser which suits that land which will be beneficial to him. I hold that it is the duty of the Government to give, as far as possible, every facility to the farmer for obtaining cheap production, and that can only be done in regard to fertilisers by removing the duty upon them. Some people may say that the only fertiliser to be depended upon is what the farmer produces on his own farm. It must be remembered, however, that a large number of the products of the farm are sent to foreign countries, and it is necessary that we should supply the want of those by the use of artificial manures. I hold that the Government should give this relief to the farmer by taking this one duty off. It may be said that a small amount is used. So long as we had practically a virgin soil, artificial manures were not required; but now, in many older parts of the Dominion, it is found an actual necessity for the farmer to use every means in his power to bring the fertility of the soil back as nearly as possible to its original condition, and that can only be done by using all the manure he can make upon his own farm, and getting in addition all the artificial manures that he can afford to pay for. I was astonished to hear the hon. member from Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) proposing to keep on these duties, particularly when he said that these manufacturers could compete successfully with manufacturers of artificial manures in the United States. If they can compete successfully with the manufacturers of the artificial fertilisers in the United States, why impose a duty? Why compel the farmer to pay an increased price? I hold that it is the duty of the Government in this matter to do everything they possibly can to lessen the cost of the production to the farmer. I have been very much astonished at certain members in this House who have been interesting themselves in behalf of the farmer; they have been doing everything they can to relieve the farmer and protect him. I am sorry the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) is not in his seat, because I notice that he made a motion the other day for a committee to be renewed to enquire into the frauds perpetrated upon the farmers of this country by certain individuals. Well, Sir, I saw a little item in the Mail to-day stating that this hon. gentleman was one of a deputation who went before the Minister of Customs to see that the duty on fertilisers is not taken off. I think he has been running with the hare and hunting with the hounds, because all the other benefits that he asked extend to but a very small portion of the agricultural community. There may be a very few farmers who have been imposed upon by these individuals, but they are a small minority. The majority of the farmers of the Dominion of Canada are well able to take care of themselves and to protect themselves from frauds. Now, when it comes to a matter of imposing a duty upon one of the principal elements of success for the agriculturists, we find that hon. gentleman supporting the duty; he is doing everything that he can to have the committee continued, but he is not willing to give the farmer that relief he is entitled to. I like to see consistency, and I hope hon. gentlemen opposite who have been getting up committees to enquire into the combines that exist throughout the country and into the frauds perpetrated upon the farmers, will see their way to assist us in getting the duty on fertilisers removed, believing, as I do, that the success of Canada depends upon the success of the agricultural community, and the success of the agricultural community to-day depends on cheapening as far as possible the cost of production, and that can only be done by making an acre of land produce a greater amount. We cannot in any shape reduce the amount of labor that we have got to give to an acre of land; for the longer land continues to be worked, and continues to yield, the more labor you have to put upon it in order to put it into proper condition, and the only way to do that is by increasing its fertility.

Mr. SPROULE. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat feels that he has been doing a great good to the interests of the farmer, and I believe that the farming community in general will come to the same conclusion to which he has arrived, providing they accept his reasoning as correct and conclusive. But, unfortunately, there is something even behind this that is of more importance to the farmer than taking the duty off. At present we have upon our statute-books a law passed in 1884 that compels the analysis of artificial fertilisers offered for sale in Canada, as a guarantee that they must contain a sufficient percentage of those elements which are necessary to replenish an exhausted soil. That is, to-day, a guarantee that when a farmer buys a fertiliser it shall contain in itself something of absolute value. If the duty were taken off many people would buy their fertilisers in the United States, they would bring them here, and after wasting the money they had paid out for them, and the labor expended in cultivating the soil upon which they were to be put, they would only find by experience that the money was virtually thrown away, and they had received no value for it in return. Now, that would be the condition of the Canadian farmer were the duty taken off to-day, because I know of my own personal knowledge that fertilisers of this character have been brought from the other side. I know that they are manufactured very extensively and were sold to the farmer here as being valuable, before the duty was imposed which now keeps them out, when in reality they contain no value for the purpose for which they are intended. If the duty is kept up no person will offer these inferior articles for sale, because, before doing so, he must have an analysis; but if the duty is taken off the Canadian farmer will make his purchases on the other side and will find these fertilisers to be of little or no value. It is a fact to-day that the Americans are importing leached ashes from Canada, are taking them over to the States and sending them back to Canadian farmers as valuable fertilisers, when in reality we have them at home and would not use them at all. Now, were it not for the fact that this Act was upon our statute-book which compels the analysis of these fertilisers, I believe a much more extensive fraud would be perpetrated upon the agriculturists of this country. We have in our own country all the chemical elements that are necessary to make up the most beneficial fertilisers for our farmers, and I believe with the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) that it only requires this protection to bring capital into the country to start up these manufacturing establishments, and to have made in our own country valuable fertilisers that will be a benefit to our farmers, who, when they purchase them, will find that they have received some value for the money expended on them. Until we have some means of stopping frauds it would be a detriment to the Canadian farmer if we allowed these fertilisers to come in free. I think if we could devise some means to increase the value of fertilisers that are being sold, and some means of bringing into operation manufacturing establishments that would use the material in our own country, we would be doing that good which the farmer is so anxiously looking for much more effectually by extending the duty than by taking it off these fertilisers. I can only say, from the knowledge I have of the use of these articles—because they have been used in our country and found to be practicably worthless—that I believe it would not be in the interest of the Canadian farmer that this duty should be taken off. It is true that exhausted farms require something to recuperate them and bring them up to their former condition. The agriculturists of the country are raising more stock and by that means they are bringing back to themselves some practical return; but if the duty is taken off fertilisers, every dollar expended on them, in nine cases out of ten, would be squandered for a worthless commodity, and they would be wasting their money upon something that would bring them back nothing in return.

Mr. FISHER. I am sorry to see that the Minister of Agriculture is not in his seat this afternoon, in order that he may give the views of the Government on this question. I have no doubt, however, that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) has practically given the official view upon this point, and that the supporters of the Government are conducting this discussion on the principle that it is necessary to build up the manufacture of artificial manures in this country, and that therefore we must retain the duty on these manures in order to prevent outside competition with this home industry. The hon. member for Sherbrooke, in the argument he made, as my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Casey) said, has practically given away his whole case. Already allusion has been made to the fact, which he himself stated, that the firm manufacturing sulphuric acid in his neighborhood have been able to sell it in the Dominion and the United States, to be used for the manufacture of fertilisers. It is very evident that one of two things must be the case: either that the firm does not need protection against the manufacturers of sulphuric acid in the United States, or else that they are making of the United States what is commonly called a slaughter-market for goods which we help them to make in this country at our expense. It has been stated, not very long ago, that when our manufacturers exported articles to other countries they sold them to foreigners at lower prices than they sold them to our own people, and that, practically, we were called upon to aid and support them in manufacturing goods in this country, while at the same time they sold them abroad to foreigners at lower prices. I can hardly believe that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) can be so unpatriotic as to maintain and support a firm which would adopt that course, but at the same time I can hardly conceive any other satisfactory explanation of the fact that those gentlemen alluded to require protection against the manufacturers of sulphuric acid in the United States, in order to be able to manufacture sulphuric acid in this country, and at the same time are able to send it into the United States and pay the duty imposed by the American Government upon it.

Mr. HALL. There is none.

Mr. FISHER. Still they would have to pay the freight to the United States and other charges. And yet they are asking protection in their own market on the ground that without it they cannot carry on the manufacture of sulphuric acid in this country against the competition of manufacturers in the United States. It seems to be a most unreasonable proposition and one I cannot understand. But I believe the true facts are that, at the present time, sulphuric acid is not so cheaply manufactured here as in the United States, and were it not for the duty placed on sulphuric acid the farmers of this country would be able to obtain artificial manures at a much cheaper rate than they do to-day, and that is the real reason why the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has made this motion and why I support it. Even supposing for a moment that the abolition of the duty would hurt the manufacturers of sulphuric acid or of artificial manure made here, I contend that ultimately, in the interests of the manufacturers of such manures, it would be of great advantage to them to have the duty removed, and I will explain my reasons. In this country, and especially in the Province of Quebec, the use of artificial manures is not widespread. In fact there is very little used, because our farmers are unacquainted with their merits and have not made the experiments which the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) alluded to as being necessary. Such experiments are expensive, and it is almost impossible for the poorer farmers to make the experiments which would lead to the use of artificial manures, and it will be only at such time as they can be made more cheaply than at present that it will be possible for our farmers to make them. I contend, although I advocate the use of artificial manures under certain circumstances, and I know well that the use of artificial manures to a large extent, without previous experiments having been made by a farmer on his own land, is a dangerous and risky undertaking. It is an experiment, and I would not advocate it to be tried on a large scale; but the farmer must make experiments himself, and accordingly if each farmer was able to buy manure as cheaply as possible, he would be called upon to incur no greater risk than was necessary. I regret to know that, in consequence of certain regulations made by the Customs Department, the importation of artificial manures has been rendered more difficult than the duty alone would lead one to suppose it would be, and that practically to-day the duty, taken in connection with the customs regulations, renders prohibitory the importation of artificial manures. But, were the duty removed, and were artificial manures allowed to come in from the United States and other countries, I believe such an effort would be made by the great manufacturers of the United States to extend the sale of their wares here, that farmers would be able to make those experiments to which I have alluded, and would be enabled to purchase artificial manures almost too cheap I might say, that is, obtaining the manure at a lower price than the manufacturers would be justified in exporting it with a profit for the purpose of encouraging experiment, and in that way our farmers, especially in the Province of Quebec, would be led to utilise artificial manure and would be induced to rush into the market for artificial manures and so greatly increase the market which the manufacturers of this country have at their disposal. The Government also are responsible, to a large extent, for the need of these manures; and I say this advisedly, because to-day the Government are imposing a heavy duty on feeds which the farmers formerly imported for the purpose of stock-feeding and for improving their barnyard manure. Instead of buying artificial manures our farmers prefer to buy feed and thus obtain a double profit, not only the profit obtainable from making beef, milk or cheese which the feed would produce, but the greater profit lying in the improvement in the manure made by the cattle thus fed. But, in consequence of the higher duty placed upon corn and other feeds, which were formerly imported from the United States, our farmers are debarred from buying them and consequently are not able to improve their manure heaps. The result is that under the present condition of our farming, which must necessarily be at the present stage of our progress more and more scientific, and more and more carried on under a thorough system, our farmers are driven into the experiment to which I have alluded, of using artificial manures, and, eventually, the widespread use of them. The hon. gentleman who spoke from the other side of the House, in alluding to this question, spoke of the protection we have given to our farmers with regard to the testing of artificial manure manufactured here. The same test and analysis could very easily be made, as they are to-day, if the duty were removed. The duty does not analyse the manure, as my hon. friend beside me suggests. The analysis has to be placed on every package imported, and the analysis is tested by our Customs Department or by our Inland Revenue Department, as the case may be, and every such package imported is analysed. That is one of the difficulties I pointed to, and one of the troubles which importers have had to contend with, and to which I alluded when I spoke of the Customs regulations. But the fact of the matter is that our farmers have got to-day that protection under the Fertilisers Act and under the Customs regulations. This motion does not pretend or intend, in any way whatever, to do away with that protection, but it is introduced with a view to enable the farmer to obtain those artificial manures more cheaply than they are able to obtain them to-day, and anyone who knows anything about the principle of protection knows that the duty is imposed simply for the purpose of enabling those parties who could not otherwise manufacture them to be able to manufacture them. I do not wonder that members of the Government and members on that side of the House consider this is a blow against their protective policy, knowing that such an action as this, if it were adopted by this House, would be a condemnation of the whole protective policy. I do not wonder that they object to it, and that, knowing the weakness of the arguments which they would have to lay before this House, they prefer to meet this motion by a vote instead of answering it by argument or by showing that they are right on the question. I know very well that they cannot answer it by argument, and I also know very well that they will not attempt to do so, but I fear greatly that by their party discipline they will be able to vote the motion down, notwithstanding that I and others on this side of the House have supported it by argument and will endorse it by our vote.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). Mr. Speaker, as the author of the notorious Fertiliser Bill of 1884, it may be perhaps necessary that I should say a few words on this subject. I may say that my object in introducing that Bill was not to protect the manufacturer of either superphosphates or fertilisers, but to protect the farmers of the country from imposition and robbery at the hands of their American neighbors. If those gentlemen who have spoken on the other side desire to protect the farmer they must protect him by either prohibiting the importation of artificial manures which are entirely valueless, or by analysing all those imported. This is the only protection you can give the farmer. In my own county, which is situated close to Buffalo, the farmers were in the habit of buying a great many kinds of manure from manufacturers in the States. After investigation I found that the laws in each one of the States imposed an analysis on the manures which were sold in the State, but manures intended for exportation were not to be analysed at all, so that all the refuse from American factories was imported into this country. I found that the law to analyse fertilisers was passed in South Carolina, Georgia, and other States, and that nearly every State of the Union, for its own protection, passed the same law to prevent and prohibit the importation of worthless fertilisers from an adjoining State. It is important for this House to know that by the laws of each State of the Union an examination by a chemist is imposed on all those fertilisers, and the article is made to answer to a certain standard. The fertilisers manufactured in the United States and which is intended for exportation, has not to be analysed at all. This was my object in introducing the Fertiliser Bill, and it was also the object of an import duty upon such commodities. I may say that fertilisers which cannot be manufactured in this country, such as guano and some others, are now allowed to come in free of duty.

Mr. McMULLEN. How is that? Why is duty imposed?

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). You will find that a great many fertilisers are allowed in duty free. I am not prepared to name them now, but I think the Minister of Customs will be able to give the list.

An hon. MEMBER. Why do they collect duty then?

Mr. BOWELL. They don't.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). Those fertilisers which are exempted are known to be pure and of good quality. In support of the position which I hold here, I may say that not one of the American fertilisers examined by our analysts came up to the standard. They were all of inferior quality and unfit for use by the farmers of this country. Permit me to say again (and I do not intend to prolong the discussion) that the object of every member of this House who is interested in the welfare of the farming industry—the most important industry in this country—ought to be to protect our farmers against imposition and fraud at the hands of his neighbors of the United States. This is the object of the duty upon fertilisers. And if we had not that duty upon fertilisers we would have all kinds of inferior stuff sent over to be purchased by our Canadian farmers.

Mr. MULOCK. Does not your Act apply to the imported articles?

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). Analysis might be had of those imported articles.

Mr. MULOCK. It must be had.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). You might apply analysis to those fertilisers, but until some further legislation is had to prevent imposition and fraud upon the farmers of this country by our neighbors across the line, and to prevent them sending spurious stuff over here, I do not think we can do any better than we are doing now in the interest of the farmer.

Mr. MULOCK. Would the hon. gentleman say whether the Act of 1884, which he had passed, does not require the imported article to be analysed the same as the manufactured article?

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss whether the protective policy is for the benefit of the country or not, or whether the system of protection is, or is not, for the benefit of people engaged in commerce, in manufactures, or for the benefit of the agriculturists. That question has been imported into this debate, and I may remark that it has been decided long ago by this country that the policy of protection is for the benefit of all classes.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. HAGGART. Well, it is acknowledged to be, at any rate, and it will for a number of years, I venture to say, be the policy of this country. One of the hon. gentlemen opposite has introduced a motion by which he points out that it bears particularly hard upon a certain class of the community to impose a duty on manufactured manures coming into this country. What are mineral manures? They are principally composed of two ingredients. Phosphate of lime and sulphuric acid. The whole value of them to the agricultural community depends upon the quantity of the superphosphate of lime in them. In this country, strange to say, we have the largest deposits of phosphate of lime in any part of the world, and that in its purest and best form. It has been exported continuously from this country to Great Britain and Germany and other parts. We have the material for the manufacture of such an article, with the greatest percentage of phosphate of lime lying at our very doors. The other ingredient necessary to make superphosphate of lime (as is known to every individual who has studied the question) is sulphuric acid. We were in the habit of importing that and manufacturing it out of the sulphur found in Sicily and in the southern part of Italy. It has been found that we have lots of material in our own country—iron pyrites and copper pyrites, which contain sulphuric acids—which can be extracted cheaper than by bringing the sulphuric acid from Sicily to this country. So much is this the case that American capitalists have invested largely in the copper mines which abound in the neighborhood of Capelton. They had been in the habit of working those mines and carrying the ore to New York, there extracting the sulphuric acid and returning it back to this country. By the policy of the Government we have compelled them to erect sulphuric acids works in Canada. The sulphuric acid is now being manufactured here out of material found in the country, and it can be manufactured cheaper than any imported from a foreign country. We have, then, all the materials in this country necessary for the manufacture of the commodity. We have the raw phosphates and the sulphuric acids in our country in abundance. We send them to foreign countries—to Germany and Great Britain. Is not the policy which would develop that trade and cause the manufacture of that article in this country not one for the benefit of the country? Is it one that would increase the value of the article to agriculturists? It is the same as any article manufactured in this country which is native to the country, and which it would be to the benefit of the country to start the manufacture of. The consequence of this policy will be that in a few years we can manufacture superphosphate cheaper than it is possible for it to be imported from any foreign country. We can supply not only our own demand, but we can send superphosphates to other countries. The result will be another illustration of what again and again has been repeated, of the benefits which the system of protection will confer on this country.

Mr. WELSH. The question of fertilisers is a question in which I have always taken a deep interest, and it is one which I consider to be of great importance to the farmers of this country. Looking over the Hansard for 1887, I find that the Minister of Finance introduced an item imposing a duty of $6 per ton on artificial manures. I objected to it at once, and made a motion to have it taken off, and, after considerable debate on the question, it was taken off. I see that that motion was seconded by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) who has brought up a motion to-day to remove the duty of 20 per cent. altogether. I have much pleasure in supporting that motion. The agricultural interests of this country are, I suppose, of greater importance than any other interests in the country. My hon. friend from North Lanark (Mr. Haggart) has said that the manufacturers are able to manufacture these fertilisers in this country more cheaply than they can be manufactured in any foreign country. If so, what is the use of keeping on a duty of 20 per cent. a ton? The people of this country are not fools enough to import fertilisers and pay 20 per cent. a ton more for them than they could get them at their own door. My hon. friend from Welland (Mr. Ferguson) speaks of the quality of the imported fertilisers. Well, I do not see what that has to do with the duty. You can analyse these fertilisers if you like, and see that no inferior quality comes into the country; but that is no argument for the duty. My hon. friend from Wellington said that he had visited Prince Edward Island, and he had never seen a finer farming country, but that if we had not the resource of the mussel-muck to apply to our land, we would have been in a very poor condition. I quite agree with him, and I hope those decayed oyster-beds, commonly called mussel-muck, will continue to provide the farmers of Prince Edward Island with a fertiliser. There is no doubt that as time goes on, we shall need to import fertilisers more largely for the improvement of our land; and I do hope that as the late hon. Finance Minister thought proper to withdraw his proposition to place a duty of $6 a ton on fertilisers in 1887, the Government will see their way clear to removing the duty altogether in the interest of the farming community of this Dominion. I hardly know what amount of revenue has been received from this duty, but I decidedly recommend the Government to take it off. I have not studied the subject very much, but when the subject comes up in committee we shall be able to bring further proof of the necessity of removing the duty.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). To those who are interested in the farmer's occupation, I think one thing must be patent in listening to the discussions from the other side of the House, that is, that hon. gentlemen opposite think that the farmers are a class of people who specially want to be taken care of. If there is a patent agent, or a seed wheat agent to be looked after, there is a committee appointed to look after the farmer's interest to see that he is not imposed on. My hon. friend from Welland (Mr. Ferguson) comes out on another line. He says the farmers in his neighborhood are so innocent and green that they buy those bad superphosphates made in Buffalo which are below the grade made in Canada, and he supports the Government in keeping the duty on, because those farmers do not know enough to buy the better article; and when my hon. friend the Postmaster General took the field, I was reminded of the ancient history of the early discussions on the National Policy. Again we had golden promises of what was going to happen in the future, how we were going to manufacture sulphuric acid more cheaply than it could be manufactured in Sicily or anywhere else, and how we were going to develop our resources and send it all over the world. In the meantime, the farmer has to pay the price that a few manufacturers impose, and wait a little longer for the good time that is said to be coming. Now, Sir, I think it is time we faced this question on a different basis. If we have these great undeveloped natural resources in this country, as I am proud to think we have—and I agree with the hon. the Postmaster General in every statement he has made with respect to the value of our beds of phosphates, and our pyrites from which we manufacture sulphuric acid so cheaply—I wish to ask the House where the distinct protection of the National Policy to the farmer comes in? When this subject was discussed in the early days, we found that almost every product of agriculture was placed in a schedule, in which we invited a free exchange with the United States; and we have left that invitation there, so that if the United States allowed our products to enter that country duty free, we should be bound to do the same with respect to their products. Is that the protection the National Policy gives to the farmer? We, on this side, have said that that would be good for the farmer; but we ask the principle to be extended a little further. We say, if the farmer is to sell in competition with all the world on even terms, give us a chance to buy on even terms, and then we will ask no favor, but take an open field. It struck me, when the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) spoke on this question, that he gave away the whole case of the manufacturers of sulphuric acid, and I will tell you why. He says that their business has so developed that, to their own surprise, they were able to send the sulphuric acid into the United States, to compete with the article manufactured there. Would it not be better for the Government to place that article in the list of free exchange with the Americans with the products of the farmers, and let us have competition? The Americans are talking about retaliation pretty lively just now, and suppose they just clap a duty on that sulphuric acid going into the United States, what would be the result? These manufacturers in my hon. friend's county, who, I am glad to hear, are manufacturing sulphuric acid so cheaply, would suddenly find their American market gone, and the result would be that their market would be limited to Canada. Everyone knows that the initial difficulty is that when you place the cost of these manures parallel with the price the farmer gets for his products, their cost is too high to enable him to use them successfully and profitably in his general agricultural crops. But if you will give him a chance to get those artificial manures at the lower rate, but still containing a fair and honest percentage of valuable manurial agent, they will immediately go into general consumption, but this waiting upon and protecting the manufacture of superphosphates or anything else, and keeping up prices is, in the meantime, an obstruction to the general consumption of those articles. Everyone knows that the farmers of this country have to take the advantage of every conceivable mode of cheapening production, as they cannot look forward to a continued range of the high prices which heretofore have existed in the markets of the world, and they will have to bring their ingenuity to bear in the production of every article, both to cheapen the cost of production and increase the production per acre. There are only two ways of doing that. With the advantages of labor-saving agricultural machinery they are able on that side to reduce the cost of production, but every farmer knows that the protection given by labor-saving machinery is a limited protection. If, by any means, you can supplement that by the use of cheap agricultural fertilisers, with a fair share of fertilising ingredient in them, you place within reach of the farmer another means by which he can increase the income from his farm, because if you can increase the production per acre from 15 bushels, which may be just a paying quantity, to 20 bushels, that means a clear profit of 5 bushels to the farmer. I ask the Government to take these matters into consideration. I ask them: Where is the protection to the farmer to come in, assuming, as the hon. the Postmaster General has said, that the National Policy has come to stay? If it has come to stay, give the farmers a fair chance along with other people. Do not make them the field upon which every man who has a particular interest to advance shall march to the Government and ask that another 20 per cent. be added to the farmer's taxation, and so much more money be taken out of his hard earnings. Let the blessings of the National Policy be extended to the farmer as well as to those who invest their capital in manufactures. So far as I am personally concerned, I deny the charge that we, on this side of the House, are hostile to the manufacturers. But I say that there are other interests that deserve a fair share of protection at the hands of the Government, and I ask the Government, in the interests of four-fifths of our population, that they should not be asked to pay tribute exclusively to the other fifth, but should have a fair chance to share in the benefits of the National Policy. Do not ask us to wait for a good time to-morrow. The artificial fertiliser business may be a small one at present, and I am free to say it is a small one, but we know that the farmers are slow to change their ways; and supposing you took off the duty to-morrow, I do not say that the consumption of fertilisers would go ahead by bounds, or that they would immediately become to the farmers all that some parties claim they would. But I say that if the Government persistently continues this course of repression towards the farmers and leaves him at the mercy of every individual who thinks he has an interest to advance, and which can only be advanced to his exclusive benefit and their detriment, the farmers cannot be expected always to wait, and that the position of the agricultural interests to-day is such in this country and everywhere over the broad face of the world that we are face to face with an era of low prices without the probability of any immediate change; that the markets of the old country, though they are free to everybody, are not so favorable to us as they were ten years ago, because to-day the facilities for distributing supplies are such that the mother country draws her supplies from the ends of the earth. I ask the Government whether it is not pushing the National Policy too far, and whether it might not be wise and fair for them to take into account the position of our agricultural population and do something to show that their vaunted policy is not worked exclusively in the interest of the manufacturer, and to the detriment of our agricultural population.

Mr. FOSTER. The debate has taken a wide range, far wider than the specific subject which called it forth would warrant. The question has been very exhaustively treated on both sides, and I imagine those who are in favor of the resolution have brought forward their best arguments and put them in their best manner. I cannot help saying that, so far as their presentment of the case is concerned, I do not think it has been strong enough to induce the Government to change its policy with regard to this matter. In the first place, a great deal has been said with reference to the large amount of duty which the farmer has to pay. Well, I find in looking over the returns that the whole amount of duty paid last year was the immense sum of $2,491. That certainly is not a very large burthen. But hon. gentlemen say that the import would be greater if the duty were taken off. Yet in the next breath they say, and it is a strong argument, that artificial manure is a thing which it is dangerous to experiment with, that it should be experimented with in very small quantities and upon a very limited area, and that of all manures, the natural manures, so to speak, are by far the best, and are most largely consumed. It has also been shown upon this side of the House, and shown very conclusively, and I think it will be patent to the experience of those who are practical men in the matter, that the fertilisers which come from the other side have been of a poorer quality than the excellent material we have here, and which is now about to be worked up in large quantities, gives warrant of being produced here. Then again, I think it has been shown conclusively that there are few countries in the world, if there are any, which have such magnificent deposits of the natural raw material for the making of artificial fertilisers as the Dominion has. Not only is that known in this country, not only is that being utilised in this country, but I find that last year we exported of phosphates alone to the value of about $400,000. My hon friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) read a list of the articles which were allowed in free by the United States. If he will turn to our tariff he will find that those same articles, with almost no exception, are let free into this country, which go into the manufacture of artificial fertilisers. Sulphuric acid is not admitted free; but, on the other hand, as was conclusively shown, sulphuric acid is being more largely manufactured in this country. The facilities for manufacturing it are of a very superior kind, and we are manufacturing it now so as not only to supply our own market but also to export to our neighbors. Hon. gentlemen say if sulphuric acid can be made here and sent to the New England States, why is it necessary to have a duty upon it? And why not, on the same argument, take away the duty upon fertilisers? There is a great difference between the starting of an industry and the industry after it has had years to grow to a large state of development, and the whole argument in favor of the protection of industries is based very largely upon the recognition of that distinction. Therefore, taking these things into consideration, I do not think, as far as the case has been made apparent to the House, that any ground has been made for the passage of this resolution or for any change in the tariff law in accordance with this resolution. I am not going to take up the time of the House in debating the matter further. I thought it had been debated thoroughly before I arose to suggest these few considerations.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The position taken by the hon. the Minister of Finance is precisely what we would have expected he would take on this question. The hon. gentleman is a pronounced protectionist, and, as a pronounced protectionist, he finds it necessary to extend the same protection to those who are undertaking to engage in this business as has been extended to others, altogether apart from the interest of the consumer. The hon. gentleman has, in this question, done precisely what hon. gentlemen on that side have for a series of years. They have altogether overlooked the interests of the consuming population of this country, and have confined their attention exclusively to the interests of those who have been engaged in initiating these enterprises. The hon. gentleman tells us that the producers of sulphuric acid and of other things which enter into the production of these artificial fertilisers are the promoters of infant industries, and that it is necessary to extend to them now a protection which will not be necessary when they cease to be infant industries. It is a remarkable fact that, in this country as well as elsewhere, all the industries which are fostered as infant industries remain fostered whether they are infant industries or not; and, if the hon. gentleman should remain Finance Minister for a long time to come, I have no doubt that he would find at the end of his time the same necessity for the care of the Government being exercised over these infant industries as at the present day. The hon. gentleman has repeated here, as the Postmaster General did, an argument used by Mr. Mills in the first place, but misused by the hon. gentleman, and misused by his colleague—that such industries may be entitled or may require to receive from the Government consideration which, after they have been established, after the experiments have been performed, after the parties who are employed in them have acquired the necessary skill, they would not be entitled to claim. Well, the hon. gentleman has not shown that there is any special skill, that there is any long series of experiments, that there is any necessary knowledge to acquire here that has not been already acquired wherever these manufacturing industries have been carried on. The hon. gentleman has not taken the first step to satisfy the House that in this country, in order that these industries may be properly established by securing persons of the necessary skill in their employment, they should be supported in the way which the hon. gentleman mentions. I think that all the information the House has had before it on this question, and the information given by the press in relation to these manufacturing establishments, show that they are as competent to carry on, with due economy, industry and capital, these manufacturing works to-day as they will be in a quarter of a century hence, altogether apart from any further discovery or improvement which may be made in the appliances of the manufacture. These people have not to provide any new kind of machinery—that is, any new process of manufacturing the particular articles from which these fertilisers are obtained. They have all the necessary information to-day, as well as the results of what has been accomplished elsewhere, as if they had a quarter of a century for their experiments. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman overlooks altogether the interest of the farming population. In the interest of the manufacturers, he permits the raw material to be brought into the country free of duty; he permits the cotton manufacturer to import raw cotton free of duty; he permits the woollen manufacturer to import the wool free of duty; but he will not permit the farmer to have the same opportunities; he will not allow him to import what he requires, in order that he may obtain the largest return from the smallest expenditure of money. No; he imposes a protective tariff on the raw materials, which are necessary to the farmer for the production of his crop. The farmer's crop is a manufacture as far as the farmer is concerned. The fertilisers which he uses, the agricultural machinery and so on which he employs are the appliances by which that manufactured article is produced. And yet the hon. gentleman will not permit the farmer to have the same opportunities as he grants to other classes. He will not apply to the farmer the same policy which he applies to the manufacturer. He applies to the manufacturer a wholly different policy from that which he applies to the farmer, and, that being so, I say he is not consistent in his policy when he undertakes to impose on these articles duties which he would not impose if the same articles were being imported in the interest of the manufacturer. The hon. gentleman overlooks the fact that the farmer has something to learn, that he does not always adopt what is immediately best in his own interest, that it is in the interest of the Government not to put impediments in the way of the improvement of agricultural methods, that it is against the interests of the country that the Government should adopt such a policy. Yet, whenever the Government imposes a duty on anything which tends to make the farm more productive and more fertile, it must be aware that it is discouraging the use of fertilisers to that extent, and that in that manner it is injuring the advanced style of farming. Look at the number of persons who are engaged in agriculture in this country. Look at the amount of capital in real estate which is represented by the agriculturists of this country; and yet the hon. gentleman proposes, in the interest of the smallest fractional part of the population, to put burdens on all the farmers and to put impediments in the way of improved agriculture in order that one or two manufacturing establishments should represent larger profits to their shareholders than they would otherwise do. The fair amount which they should derive is that which they would obtain by the sale of their products in a free market. If you, by the interference of the Government, increase the price which they have to pay, you take from those who consume the article some portion of that additional price, and you hand that over to those who never earned it. That is what the Government are doing to-day; and it is in the interest of agriculture, and in the interest of every man who sits either on this side or that, representing an agricultural constituency, to defend the people against any one who undertakes to do this, in the interest of a few men about whom we know nothing, who do not belong to this country, whose interests we are not specially concerned in promoting. If the Government and the supporters of the Government adopt a policy of that sort to increase the price of the production of these manufacturing establishments at the expense of the farming population, there is not a representative of a farming constituency in this House who supports that policy who will not be a marked man at the next election. The farming population are becoming awake to this. Their lands have been diminished in value, and they have been impoverished by the operation of this policy. Their farms have not increased in value in consequence of the policy which they accepted. In fact, there is no portion of the country with which I am acquainted in which farming lands have not diminished in value since the adoption of the National Policy. They have diminished in value during the past five years at least 30 per cent.—

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I challenge the hon. gentleman to appoint a committee and to bring before this House representatives of the various loan companies of this country, and I can establish to a demonstration the fact that agricultural lands during the past five years have diminished at least 30 per cent. in value. They have diminished in consequence of the policy which the Government has pursued, a policy that has been inimical to the interests of the agriculturists of this country, and it is of the first importance to the people of this country that these men should be unburdened so far as it is possible to unburden them. I see before me the Minister of Agriculture; the hon. gentleman knows well that what I state is a fact with regard to the value of real estate. Why, Sir, let him consult the Erie Company, let him consult the Dominion Loans and Saving Society, let him consult any one of the large loaning companies of the city in which he resides, he will receive but one answer from them, and that answer will be in accordance with the statement I have made. Then, I say, that being the case, it is of the first importance to the interests of the farming population that whatever enters into the consumption of the agriculturists should have the duty diminished. To take the duty off these fertilisers is the first step towards the relief of the farmer, and it will be the first step towards securing a better system of agriculture, and encouraging a better system of farming than has hitherto prevailed. And if we have those natural fertilisers in this country, and if they can be produced as cheaply as has been said, they do not require the interference of the Government in order to secure their protection. Capital will be attracted in that direction, capital will be invested in working these phosphate mines, and in the preparation of the material for the use of the farming population of this country. Men will devote their money to that which will pay best if they are let alone; all the Government has to do is to leave these parties alone, and they will invest their money wisely, if the hon. gentleman is correct, it will be a wise investment. Let them manage their business economically, but let not the Government impose a burden upon the farming population in order that the manufacturers may reap a profit which they could not obtain otherwise on account of extravagant and improvident management.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5:55 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 13th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 19) to incorporate the Assiniboia, Edmonton and Unjiga Railway Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Bill (No. 20) to incorporate the Hawkesbury Lumber Company.—(Mr. Labrosse.)

Bill (No. 21) respecting the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Railway Company, and to change the name of the Company to the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway Company.—(Mr. Wood, Westmoreland.)

Bill (No. 22) to incorporate the Assets and Debenture Company of Canada.—(Mr. Edgar.)

Bill (No. 24) to incorporate the Dominion Life Assurance Company.—(Mr. Trow.)

Bill (No. 25) to amend the Act to incorporate the Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Brown.)

OTTAWA AND MONTREAL BOOM COMPANY.

Mr. GIROUARD moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 23) to incorporate the Ottawa and Montreal Boom Company.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon. gentleman explain that Bill?

Mr. GIROUARD. Certain gentlemen ask for power to purchase or acquire any wharves, piers, slides, dams, booms, or other improvements in the River Ottawa, from the Chaudière Falls to the north-western end of the Island of Montreal, and to construct any dam, slide, wharf, pier or other work necessary to facilitate the transmission and towing of rafts, timber, railway ties, cedars and sawlogs, down the Ottawa River, and to blast rocks, dredge, or remove, shoals or other impediments, or otherwise improve the navigation of the said river, upon payment of compensation to any individual injured thereby.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. RYKERT moved:

That the Public Accounts for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1888, the report of the Auditor General on Appropriation Accounts for the same year, the statement of the Governor General's warrants issued and expenditure made on the same since last Session of Parliament, and a statement of the expenditure on account of miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses from 1st July, 1888, to 31st January, 1889, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think that the hon. gentleman can make that motion. When the hon. gentleman read the Message from His Excellency the Governor General on the Estimates the other day, he did not give any notice that he would move the House into Committee, or that these Estimates should be referred to the Committee of Supply. Without such motion it is quite impossible for the hon. gentleman to now move that the House go into Committee of Supply. The hon. gentleman will see, on looking at Hansard, that no such motion was made.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I made that motion. I remember that it was agreed upon by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that there would be no objection to our going into Supply to-day.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There would be no objection if the hon. gentleman had made the necessary motion, but he did not. I was giving special attention to the hon. gentlemen's statement at the time, and I heard no such motion made.

Mr. LAURIER. This question involves a point of procedure which should be at once settled. It must be admitted, as a matter of fact, that no such motion was made at the time, though it is entered in the Votes and Proceedings as having been made. I understand that the Clerk of the House entered the motion as having been made as a matter of course, taking it for granted that it was made. I do not know how far the Clerk will be justified, though I do not wish at all to censure him, in entering such motion. As a matter of fact it was not made.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The rule is laid down in Mr. Bourinot's work as follows:—

"The answer to the Speech having been agreed to, a Minister of the Crown—always the Minister of Finance when he is present—will propose the two following resolutions in accordance with the Order of 1874: 'That the House will in future appoint the Committees of Supply and of Ways and Means at the commencement of every Session.'

1. "That this House will on ..... next resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the supply to be granted to Her Majesty;

2. "That this House will on ..... next resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

"Before the House goes actually into Committee of Supply, the Finance Minister will bring down the Estimates by Message from the Governor General, and when the Message has been read in English and French by Mr. Speaker, or by a clerk at the Table, the Minister will move 'that the said Message, together with the Estimates accompanying the same, be referred to the Committee of Supply.'

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I find by the records of this House that, on Friday last,

"On motion of Mr. Foster, the said Message and Estimates were referred to the Committee of Supply."

This appears in the Votes and Proceedings, and, if any objection is taken, it should be taken the next day. The Votes and Proceedings are furnished to every member for the purpose of enabling him to make objections if he desires, and, if no objection is taken, the Votes and Proceedings of the preceding day are taken as being read and approved of. That is the usual practice, and it seems to me necessary to ask what object the hon. gentleman has in interrupting the proceedings in the manner he is doing. The hon. gentleman knows that the Clerk of the House, for the convenience of the House, prepares a series of motions which are intended to put the House in working order. I cannot recollect, myself, whether this particular motion was made or not, but I find here on the records that it was made, and I think the House will accept the report laid before it and not objected to at the time on the ground of inaccuracy.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) has no object in this matter other than to see that the law is perfectly observed, and for that, of course he must have an authority greater even than that of the Prime Minister himself. But the Clerk informs me that he has followed the practice who has been adopted for five years past; that the motion has never been made, but that it has been taken for granted that it has been made. That is a sign that the Government has been falling into very loose habits, and, if we have referred to this matter, it is not to interrupt the business, but to see that the law is properly carried out for all parties, including even the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad to learn that the Opposition have been able to find one fault on the part of the Government, and I am sure the House will agree that it is a very small fault, if it be a fault at all. It was understood, however, that this was according to the ordinary rule, and that we would go on with the Committee of Supply to-day.

Mr. LAURIER. We are quite willing to go on to-day; but I would call the attention of the Minister of Finance to this point before we go into Committee of Supply. As we are following the English practice in this matter of going into Committee of Supply before the Budget Speech is delivered, we should also follow the English practice and go into such items only which are matters of administration, and leave all those items which entail principles or policy until after the Budget Speech has been delivered.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Any very important item which does not immediately affect the administration of affairs will stand over, not of necessity, but as a matter of convenience, and because it is expedient that it should be so.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sure the hon. gentleman will admit that it would be very inconvenient, before the Budget Speech is delivered, to go into matters involving general policy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, that is quite true.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My point of order was that the Rules of the House required this motion to be made first.

Mr. SPEAKER. Do I understand that the point of order is withdrawn?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman wants a decision, it places me in a very awkward position. I must take as correct the proces verbal which is laid before the House. It was laid before the House as early as yesterday, and the attention of the Speaker or of the House not having been called to this irregularity, I must take it that the proces verbal is correct. It is now alleged that the motion was not proposed or put, although entered by the clerk pro forma, as it has been done for four or five years past. I do not think it advisable to stop the proceedings of the House on this alleged irregularity. In the meantime I hope that this incident will be taken notice of, and that in future members will be more careful in following the strict rules laid down in the Rules and Orders of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Charges of Management..... $184,283 18

Mr. LAURIER. In the absence of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), I would ask the Minister of Finance to allow this item to stand.

Governor General's Secretary's Office.....$9,950

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to this item, there is nothing but four statutory increases of $50 each, making a total increase of $200.

Mr. LAURIER. Is there any change in the staff of the office?

Mr. FOSTER. There is no change in the staff.

Privy Council Office..... $26,492 50

Mr. FOSTER. There is a decrease in this to the amount of $100. There are eleven statutory increases at $50, making $550; one statutory increase at $30; and a promotion provided for, making an increase of $300, or, in all, $880 in increases. The decreases are shown in the difference between Mr. McBride's salary and the vote of last year, making a difference of $180, and the transfer of one messenger, making the total decreases $980, or a net decrease of $100.

Mr. LAURIER. I suppose that is the effect of the change in the management of the finances of the country.

Mr. FOSTER. We will take it so.

Department of Justice..... $20,707 50

Mr. FOSTER. In this item there is an increase of $652.50—three statutory increases at $50, $150; one at $37.50, a broken term; one at $15, broken term; a promotion from first class to chief, that of Mr. Fraser, from $1,650 to $1,850; and one from the third to second class, Mr. Blakader, $1,700, making in all the sum I stated. In the Penitentiaries Branch there is one statutory increase of $50.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like some information in regard to the expenses under this item in connection with the suit with the St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Co. I notice that a considerable amount has been spent upon that suit, and I would like to have some information on that point.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has moved for a return on that subject. It is nearly prepared, and I suppose it will be down to-morrow. It has nothing whatever to do with the business of the department. It is outside litigation, not conducted by the department, and is placed in the hands of counsel.

Mr. LAURIER. I cannot help remarking that we are getting to be a very litigious country. We are here charged with something over $80,000 in legal fees and expenses. In the Province of Quebec we are called a litigious people because we are descendants of the Normans. We have the reputation in the Old Country of being fond of litigation; and, to my personal knowledge, I am satisfied we have not gone back upon the tradition of our ancestors. But I am afraid that spirit is becoming contagious, and is extending to other parts of the Dominion, because $20,000 in one year for fees and legal expenses is certainly an enormous amount. I suppose the largest part of the money went into the pockets of the lawyers, and, therefore, being one, I cannot complain; but perhaps the ratepayers of this country will find that it would be advantageous to the country if somehow or other these expenses were curtailed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No doubt there has been a good deal of litigation within the last few years in the conduct of the Government, arising mainly from the expropriations necessary for public works, and defending claims arising therefrom. The whole amount, however, has been saved seven times over by the defence of the single suit that has been mentioned, that of the St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Co.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to make one remark in relation to these legal expenses which the country has had to pay. There is a litigious spirit growing up in the Department of Justice. In the good old days of Colonel Bernard we never had any appeals taken out of the highest courts of Canada and decided adversely to the Government. But in the present days I find the Government are not satisfied with judgments given by the highest court in Canada; and if the newspapers are to be believed, they do tell the truth sometimes.

Mr. LAURIER. The Herald, especially.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, it tells more truth than some people like. But what I would observe is this: that there is a tendency to appeal almost everything after the courts have decided against the Administration of the day. Now, it strikes me that the people's money should not be used to test the people's rights after the highest court in the land has decided that the individual should get his money. I simply call attention now to the growing tendency. It grew under the deputy-headship of Mr. Lash; it had been growing under the deputy-headship of Mr. Burbridge; and I am very much afraid it is not going to fall off in its character for litigation under the present deputy-head. They are all clever men; I do not pretend to speak in the slightest manner disrespectfully of them, but it seems that a policy of litigation is pervading the department which I think is unfair to the people of the country. I think an individual bringing a case against the Government, or if the Government brings an action, and parties have been put to a great expense—as in a case that I could name, if necessary—and to a great deal of delay, I think, when the highest courts in the country, like the Supreme Court, has decided in favor of the people, that it is a gross injustice to the people—except in case of fraud—for the Government to resist. I think the individual should get his money without any further litigation, because, when it is carried to the Privy Council, when the country is put to an enormous expense, the Government is found to be fighting the people with the very money of the people themselves. Now, there is another feature about this. I do not know whether any hon. gentleman referred, while I was out, to the St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Co. It appears to me there is a case that the Government ought not to have taken up, of which they ought not to pay the expenses, and that in a case like that we should let the litigants fight it out themselves.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As regards the past year, I may explain that only one case has been taken to appeal by the Government from the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada—that is the case which the hon. gentleman mentioned—and the appeal has resulted in establishing the right of Canada to be recouped a sum of money at least seven times as large as the cost of the whole litigation of the year.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no hesitation in telling the hon. gentleman that the case to which I referred was one that I saw mentioned the other day in the papers, a case in which a claim has been made against the Government for years past. The hon. gentleman will have it in his mind's eye; I do not care to name it here—although I can name it, if required—but in that case I know, for a certain fact—it was a case arising out of the Intercolonial Railway affairs—Mr. Frank Shanly was appointed arbitrator, and he decided against the Government. The Government refused to pay it, as they refused to pay a great many other cases, under similar circumstances. Then the person, after some years, got a fiat, and within the last two or three months, the Supreme Court of Canada—Mr. Justice Fournier, I believe, was the judge—decided against the Government, and gave the litigant a verdict of $120,000. Now the papers say that that case also is going to be appealed. I do not know that it is different from any other case, but unless there is some grave injustice in it, I do think that, as a matter of principle, the money of the people ought not to be used to litigate individual claims that are made against the Government when the courts of the country have decided against the Administration.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The case to which the hon. gentleman has referred, if I am right in understanding his reference, has not yet been decided by the Supreme Court of Canada. It came before one judge sitting as an Exchequer Judge; there has been an appeal from him to the Supreme Court itself. The appeal has been taken not only because the amount involved was a very large one, but because it depended entirely upon the construction of a statute; it was a question of law, and it involves not merely the sum in litigation in that suit, but millions besides. In a matter like that I think I am bound to advise the Government, as I would a private suitor, to appeal, if the Government has a fair prospect of success and large amounts depend upon the litigation. We have decided to test the question in the highest court in the country, before submitting to the decision.

Mr. MITCHELL. I take exception to the illustration that the hon. gentleman has given. He says that he would feel bound to advise the Government in the same way that he would advise a private suitor. Now, there is a distinction between the two. In a matter in which the Government is involved the Government are fighting individuals with the people's money which they contribute in taxes; but in the case of a private suitor he can take any course he likes, as he has to risk his own money, and that is the distinction.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We use the money of the people simply to defend the people's rights.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not fully comprehend the answer to the objection raised by my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). It is understood that any party who has a case against the Government is placed at a great disadvantage. In the first place, he has to obtain the consent of the Government to the appeal being taken. In the next place, when the case is adjudicated upon by the first tribunal, it is very often taken by the Government to the Supreme Court. The hon. gentleman said that only one appeal was taken to the Supreme Court. That may be true, but I believe there have been several appeals taken, not only last year but in several years previously, from the Exchequer Court to the Supreme Court. In nine cases out of ten, almost invariably, the Government have not been successful, and the awards granted by the Exchequer Court have been maintained. It seems to me that when a suitor has the misfortune to be compelled to go to law with the Government, when he has had to undergo the ordeal of obtaining from the Government the right to proceed, and when the court of first instance has decided in his favor, unless there is a clear and manifest error, no appeal should be taken; in fact, if there is only an error which can be waived, pro and con, as to whether the decision should be maintained or reversed, there should not be an appeal from the decision of the court, and if the decision is in favor of the litigant it should be acquiesced in by the Government.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no ordeal undergone by any citizen in obtaining a petition of right. He has simply to file his petition, stating the cause of action, and, if he is entitled to a fiat, according to principles perfectly well recognised and established in all parts of the Empire, he gets his fiat as a debt of justice from the Crown to him; it has never been refused, and there has never been any difficulty in getting it unless it has been in consequence of some previous litigation in which the party's right has already been exhausted. As regards appeals from the Exchequer Judge, the hon. gentleman is entirely misinformed, if he is informed that almost invariably the decisions of the Exchequer Judge have been affirmed on appeal;—more especially during last year, in regard to which I suppose this discussion is taking place. In a number of the cases the appeals have been successful, and I say it without any disrespect whatever to the gentleman now exercising the functions of Exchequer Judge, or to any one who exercised them in times past. Error is a thing of which any human being may be capable, no matter how high his skill or how eminent his attainments in his profession. As regards what the hon. gentleman said with respect to cases nicely balanced, and where the decision may be one way or the other, I may say that in such cases we generally advise against appeal; but to limit appeals solely to cases of manifest error would be impossible, because it would be presumptuous in us to say that a manifest error existed after trial by a tribunal such as the Exchequer Court, and judgment there given. We exercise in that regard precisely the same judgment that a private counsel would do in considering the interests of his suitor.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is where you do wrong, I think.

Mr. LAURIER. I am glad to learn that no ordeal has now to be passed through by a suitor in seeking his fiat. It was not so in former times, for, to my personal knowledge, a party would be kept waiting six or seven months in order to get it. I am glad to hear that such is not the case now.

Mr. McMULLEN. This item of law costs is annually increasing. I have been watching it ever since I took my seat in the House, and it is quite evident that the lawyers are exercising too much influence on the Minister of Justice, and that, whenever there is a little matter of litigation to be attended to in the interests of the country, the lawyers of that particular section exercise influence in order to get a job and then charge an enormous fee. It is time a stop was put to this state of things. It is not in the interest of the country that every law firm should look upon itself as a barnacle on the State, prepared to suck what advantage it can out of the people and draw upon the resources of the country from time to time for payment for legal services. In looking over the list of legal expenses I notice that there are sixteen law firms which drew last year $58,438, or equal to $3,666 each. I cannot believe that litigation to such an extent is necessary in the interest of the country, or that the Minister of Justice is so overcrowded with his duties as to make it necessary to employ sixteen law firms at a cost of nearly $60,000 a year. Last year the situation was not quite so bad; the year before it was not so bad as last year; this year is the worst yet. Then I notice that there were employed 179 other law firms, throughout the country, to do petty work, for which they drew sums from $2,000 down. Altogether, the country paid $83,000 for law expenses. If the Minister of Justice and the Government were disposed to consider the interests of the people, they would be satisfied that we have reached a time in our history when it devolves upon us to cut these items down seriously. I hope we will not have any more such cases as that of the St. Catharines Milling Co., or any more such quarrels to fight. We are tired of that kind of thing. It has been hanging on our hands for three or four years, and a very large sum has been paid under that head. I am glad to know we have reached the last court; if there was another court of appeal open it would, no doubt, be taken there, but we have reached the summit and can go no further. Let us hope this item will now be dropped from our annual report. I earnestly hope, too, the Government will quit the present system. It is absurd to have sixteen law firms drawing nearly $60,000 and 179 other small firms drawing the balance of the $83,000. I am not a lawyer, but I begin to think that the lawyers on the other side of the House are exercising altogether too much influence on the Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. They are infant industries.

Mr. McMULLEN. If they are infant industries, they are growing up very rapidly, and last year assumed vast proportions.

Mr. MITCHELL. They are young lawyers.

Mr. McMULLEN. No doubt; we are paying very highly for brains employed, perhaps far more than would be paid under ordinary circumstances. But, joking aside, this has become a very serious matter, and it is the duty of every hon. member to set his face against the influence exercised by lawyers on the Government to obtain suits, and I hope, if hon. members on this side of the House get into power, they will put a stop to the practice.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not exactly agree with the sentiment expressed by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), who censured the Deputy Minister of Justice for these very large and increasing expenses. My opinion is that the responsibility rests elsewhere. The Minister of Justice has referred to the justification for the suit against the Province of Ontario, incidentally raised in the St. Catharines Milling Co.'s case, and the hon. gentleman said they were amply justified in the appeal because they are entitled to be recouped by the Province for the moneys expended in connection with the treaties made within the limits of the Province of Ontario. The hon. gentleman made one important admission when he gave utterance to that statement, namely, that the Province of Ontario, as represented by its Government, always expressed willingness to pay that sum. In every instance when the question was before the courts, the Province of Ontario informed hon. gentlemen opposite, or their counsel, that they were not disposed to dispute the right of the Dominion to compensation for the moneys expended in extinguishment of the Indian title. But that is not the question. The hon. gentleman who leads the Government, the Prime Minister of Canada, is the gentleman who is primarily responsible for all the expenses which arise in connection with that case. The hon. gentleman, in 1882, I think it was, informed the people of York, and informed the people of the city of Toronto, that there was not one pound of mineral, there was not a stick of timber, there was not a lump of earth north of the watershed that did not belong to the Dominion of Canada, and that it was not the property of Ontario. If the hon. gentleman had always entertained that view there might have been some justification for the position taken by him; but, Sir, at the time that British Columbia was admitted into this Union, the question as to the right of property in the soil, whether it was in the Crown or whether it was in the Indian's in occupation, was raised, and the hon. the First Minister, who was then responsible for the negotiations with British Columbia, recognised the right of the Province of British Columbia to the soil. He recognised the fact that the property in the soil was in the Crown and not in the Indian occupants, and he dealt with the Province of British Columbia upon that assumption. Now, the hon. gentleman sold the right to cut timber over a very large area, and for a very small sum of money, to the St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Co. The Province of Ontario enjoined the Milling Co. from cutting this timber, and the company, rightfully I think, under these circumstances, called upon this Government to defend the title which they had given. The Government did defend the title, and they did not only defend that title before the Chancellor of the Province of Ontario, but before the Court of Appeals there, before the Supreme Court, and before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. In every instance judgment was given against this Government. I suppose that the Minister of Justice looked into this matter and that he formed an opinion upon the subject. I dare say he knew what the Indian title was in the Province of Nova Scotia, and he knew that the Indian title would be in every Province precisely the same character. We all recognise the Minister of Justice as an able lawyer, and as one who is thoroughly conversant with the law of the country and the principles of jurisprudence, and as one not likely to make a mistake in forming an opinion. I am inclined to think that if the Minister of Justice would deal frankly with us in the committee here, and tell us the conclusions at which he arrived, that we would discover that the Minister of Justice himself was not individually responsible for those appeals, but that he was overborne and governed in the matter by his chief, the First Minister, who insisted upon the Province of Ontario being fought in every court before which it was possible to put this claim in issue. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman has referred to a case in which he says they have been recouped, or will be recouped in consequence of the judgment that was given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The hon. gentleman will see that there are a number of other items in connection with these legal expenses which it is important that we should have explained. For instance, here we find Mr. Ferguson, during the past year, receiving upwards of $3,000. I am not aware that there were any important matters in litigation which Mr. Ferguson was called upon to conduct on behalf of the department. Was Mr. Ferguson engaged in doing work that properly falls upon the Law Clerk and upon the clerks of the department or the Deputy Minister of Justice? The hon. gentleman can tell us what Mr. Ferguson has done for this sum of money. Then, again, we find that D. O'Connor has received nearly $19,000 for law expenses. What important services has Mr. D. O'Connor, or his firm, rendered to the Government and to the people of this country for this large sum of money which he has received? I think, Sir, in looking over these legal expenses, we will find that there are many large items that require explanation. As regards the item for the case of the St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Co., we understand that. The question has been discussed before the House and the country, and it has been discussed in the newspapers, but that large sum of money which has been paid Mr. O'Connor has not yet been explained. The large sum of money paid Mr. Ferguson has not been explained; and the very large sum of money that was paid to the partner of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has not been explained. We find that Mr. Wallace Graham has received, during the past year, $7,360 odd. I think, looking at the relation which that hon. gentleman stands to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that we are entitled to a very full explanation for this expenditure. We are entitled to know what important services he has rendered the country for those moneys. Is this expenditure in connection with that unfortunate American vessel that was tied up so long for violation of our fishery regulations and which was not judicially dealt with, I think, up to the time that we parted here last Session. The hon. gentleman, the Minister of Justice, will be able to tell us about this matter, and what the hon. gentleman cannot say upon the subject I am sure the Minister of Finance can. Really, when we look, Mr. Chairman, at these legal expenses one will see how gigantic the character of the Department of Justice has become. Why ought not a number of those gentlemen be taken into the Department of Justice. If the Department of Justice were really discharging the duty that pertains to it in the same way as every other department of the Government does, instead of letting out by contract those professional duties, what would be the character of that department? The hon. the Minister of Justice knows that he cannot defend his department on the floor of this House, even though it be constituted as it is through the agency of the Franchise and the Gerrymander Acts. I say that the committee is entitled to full explanation from the Minister of Justice with reference to each of those large items that are found in the report of the Auditor General.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am sure that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) does not expect me to follow him in the attack which he has made, from a political point of view, or to answer his criticisms in this respect. He does not expect that I should quite agree with him in the observations of that character which he has made, and I shall only attempt to answer him in so far as the business of the vote is concerned, and in regard to the observations he has made in reference to the expenses. The hon. gentleman has again alluded to the case of the St. Catharines Lumber and Milling Co. for the purpose of telling the House that the Government had not the justification for appealing to the Privy Council which I thought it had, because the Ontario Government had signified its willingness to refund the amounts which the decision of the Privy Council decided the Government of Canada were to have. I can only say to the hon. gentleman, without disparagement to the sources of his information, that there is no such information in the possession of the Government or of any of its members. I have heard to-day for the first time, the statement that the Ontario Government was ever willing to repay the Government of Canada a dollar of the money paid in relation to the expenditure to which he referred. The hon. gentleman has desired that I should state frankly whether I had formed an opinion as to the probable result of this litigation, and state to the House what that opinion was. He has been good enough to intimate that I might be guided by my knowledge of the Indian title in Nova Scotia—my own Province. I did not require any such source of information as that to induce me to make up my mind that an appeal to the Privy Council was an expedient course, because I found that two of the most eminent judges on the bench of the Supreme Court decided that question, as far as they were able to decide it, in favor of the view put forward on behalf of the Federal Government. This was decided by two judges, more eminent than whom do not exist in this country, and who come from the Province of Ontario themselves. The hon. gentleman will, I am sure, acquit me of any want of candor as to expressing an opinion formed on the state of the Indian title in Nova Scotia, which never existed, when I had such eminent authority as to what the law of Ontario was, and it was the law of Ontario that was under consideration. I submit to the hon. gentleman, that while I am perfectly willing to give him at all times, as regards any matter in my department, the fullest information in my power, it would be unreasonable for him, in the discussion of the vote for Civil Government to ask me to go into an explanation of the thousands of items which appear in connection with the litigation of the various departments of the Government and which are very incidentally only under my control. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), the other day, in relation to the account of Mr. O'Connor, moved for a return, and with perfect propriety he stated afterwards that it was inexpedient to press the motion because he would have an opportunity in the Public Accounts Committee to make a fuller investigation than he would get by a return. For this reason I laid aside the preparation of any memorandum upon that subject. Let me tell the hon. gentleman, and the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) also, what the practice is as regards the employment of counsel, for they both seem to think that counsel are employed under pressure from themselves, either as professional men or political friends. Such is not the case. I have no communication whatever from professional men as to any litigation which is likely to take place on behalf of the Government. The information that litigation is desirable, or that defence is desirable, comes from the departments immediately concerned, and all that devolves upon me is the task of taking the instructions from the department as I would from a client, and instructing our agent in the Province where the litigation takes place, and entrusting the case to him under such supervision as is possible at headquarters. I do not remember the items of Mr. Ferguson's account. I do not remember the services which he rendered, excepting services in connection with a protracted arbitration which took place for the purpose of settling the amount which should be paid for the expropriation of several pieces of property for the Experimental Farm. If the hon. gentleman desires to know the other items, they will be laid before him as soon as possible.

Mr. McMULLEN. While there may, perhaps, be some reasonable ground for employing persons to attend to litigation at a distance from Ottawa, I cannot see how the Minister of Justice can justify the expenditure of such a large amount of money as has been expended in Ottawa itself. If the hon. Minister, with the aid of his deputy-head and other officers in the department, attended to these duties in Ottawa, and relieved the country of the enormous expenses that have been incurred during the last year, we might reasonably expect that some little expenses would be incurred at distant points where the hon. Minister or his assistants could not conveniently attend. But we find that here, in the city of Ottawa, right under the nose of the Minister, the firm of O'Connor & Hogg drew $18,800 for legal expenses—$60 a day. Why, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Justice himself does not draw $60 a day for the eminent services he renders to the country. If it is necessary for the Minister of Justice to increase his staff, the country would certainly save money by employing a lawyer with as much legal ability as Mr. O'Connor for less than $60 a day. We have not only paid Mr. O'Connor that amount, but other firms in the city of Ottawa—Mr. Ferguson, Pinhey & Christie, and several others—have been employed and paid large amounts. If the Minister of Justice finds that the duties devolving upon his department in the city of Ottawa are so large that he or any of his assistants cannot attend to them, let him increase his staff, and save the country a great deal of this money. With regard to the suit of the St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Co., very large fees have been paid out in connection with that suit. The objectionable feature of it is not altogether that it was defended by the Dominion, and that large law fees have been paid out to lawyers outside of the Department of Justice, but the fact, which I think will not be denied, that an hon. gentleman who occupies a distinguished position on the other side of this House has been drawing, no doubt through his firm, large fees in connection with this suit. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) may be, I have no doubt he is, a very eminent lawyer, but I say it is decidedly objectionable that a man occupying that position should be allowed to use the influence which it affords him to draw from this Dominion enormous fees for litigation services. I think it should not be permitted; I think the people of this country are not prepared to endorse a course of this kind. I hope the discussion which has taken place at this time will have a beneficial effect. If the Minister of Justice feels that the duties devolving upon his department in the city of Ottawa are so enormous that he has to parcel the work out among the legal firms of this city, he will have any number of law firms in this city. When the Conservative friends of hon. gentlemen opposite see these accounts in the Auditor General's Report, they will say that Ottawa is a good place to come to and open a law office in; the hon. gentleman will have them hanging around the department like leeches, and the fees will continue to increase year by year. I think there should be a stop to this thing. I think the Minister of Justice, if left to himself, would stop it, but I think the influences exercised to get the work for these law firms are perhaps too much for him. But this course will cause considerable trouble in the future if it is persisted in.

Mr. CASEY. The explanations of the hon. Minister of Justice, I think, will prove rather astonishing to the larger portion of the public; I mean his explanations as to his duties as Minister of Justice. It has been generally understood that he stood in the position of legal adviser to every department in the Government, and to the Government as a whole in regard to all legal action they might take, and that he had supreme control of the management of all litigation directly conducted on behalf of the Government. Now, his statement is different from that. He says that in regard to official litigation, he is not in direct communication with the lawyers employed to conduct the suits; that he is merely advised by this or that department that certain litigation is necessary on its behalf, and he takes instructions from that department as he would from any private client, and in turn instructs the provincial agents.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is entirely different in every particular.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend hazards the statement that his explanation is entirely different in every particular as I have given it, from the one he has already made. I will leave that question to be decided by reference to Hansard to-morrow, and I think it will be found that what I have said expresses, though perhaps in different words, exactly the hon. gentleman's statement. I remember perfectly, the hon. gentleman said he was advised by the department whether litigation was required or not, and that he in turn advised the provincial agents as to the conduct of the suit, and that he had no personal communication with the lawyers who actually conducted the case. I am positive that that is the statement conveyed by the hon. gentleman's remarks. Everyone has hitherto supposed that when litigation was proposed to any department, that department must first consult the Minister of Justice as to whether it was judicious and proper to take action, as to whether it would pay to go into litigation or not; and everyone supposed that the hon. Minister would go over the case with the head of the department in question and come to a decision. That is what was always supposed to be his duty. Now, if the hon. gentleman's interpretation of his duties as Minister of Justice be applied to other Ministers, let us see how it would work. If the Minister of Public Works was to say: I merely act as the mouth-piece of other departments, and when any department says they want something done I give instructions to have an item put in the Estimates for that work, without consulting whether we can afford it or not; if the Minister of Finance said he merely responded to the calls of the other departments without considering the pros and cons of each proposal, such a system would soon lead to a state of chaos. We certainly must think it very strange that the Minister of Justice should assert he is merely a solicitor to instruct some lawyer who actually conducts the case. Our understanding of his duties and rights is different, and the hon. gentleman will be held responsible for any litigation unwisely entered into, for any costs unnecessarily incurred, and for any distribution of patronage in connection with litigation that seems to us to be contrary to public interest or contrary to the Act concerning the Independence of Parliament. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. McMullen) has already called attention to the peculiar position of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who is at the same time a member of this House supporting the Government, and a lawyer employed under the directions of the Minister of Justice—or rather not employed under the direction of the Minister of Justice, but employed by a company whose legal expenses in this matter are borne by the Government. It is in the hands of Mr. McCarthy, the lawyer—I am not speaking of him now as the member of Parliament—to dictate what steps shall be taken and what costs shall be incurred in connection with the suit.

The Dominion Government is obliged to pay whatever costs Mr. McCarthy the lawyer incurs, to Mr. McCarthy the member of Parliament and his firm. This places that hon. gentleman in a peculiar position. I do not mean to insinuate anything against his character, but I say his position as a member of this House would be improved if he were not connected with Government patronage, if he had not a double who is a member of a law firm which is paid so heavily by the Government. The firm of Mr. McCarthy the lawyer does not appear in this list, but the entries are made against the St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Co., under the head of legal expenses and taxed costs. I do not see the object, except to leave out the name of the hon. gentleman, because no legal expenses can be paid to a company which is not composed of lawyers; and it would be better to enter the name of the lawyer who conducted the case for them as the recipient of those legal expenses. Another gentleman's name appears here, Mr. Graham, of Halifax, who is also so nearly connected with an hon. member of this House, being the law partner of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that we can hardly suppose that political considerations were not taken into account in appointing him as Government lawyer in these cases. All these matters of patronage justly come up for consideration under this head. I quite agree with the hon. the Minister that he could not be fairly called upon to give all the details of the legal expenditure under the head of the present discussion, but his exercise of patronage in retaining this or that lawyer or in instituting suits does, I contend, come up under the head of Civil Government. I think the hon. gentleman's explanations have been in the highest degree unsatisfactory to the House, and will be so to the country.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman must have very much misunderstood what I said, or I must have been very unfortunate in expressing myself, if I gave him to understand at all that I was not bound to exercise my judgment upon matters of litigation which pass through my hands.

Mr. CASEY. That is the impression I had.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not intend to give the hon. gentleman to understand that I was only a medium of communication. I was distinguishing between taking instructions from a department as I would from a client, and taking instructions, as the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has put it, from professional men. In taking instructions from the departments, I mean instructions with reference to the facts of the cases which come before us. True, in every matter that passes through my department I am bound to exercise judgment, and give the other department advice as to the propriety of litigation before giving instructions. As regards the observations made with reference to Mr. O'Connor's account, as I said before, I think the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) will have more light on that subject when he has the account in detail, and I would have been happy to give it to him if he had not dispensed with its production. But he will find it includes services in other places besides Ottawa, and, besides very considerable amounts for disbursements which Mr. O'Connor had incurred, and his reward for professional services is nothing like the sum the hon. gentleman has mentioned. The hon. gentleman is mistaken also as to the number of firms employed. He has been misled in that particular by taking it for granted that all the names of firms which appear in the Auditor General's Report are firms employed by the Department of Justice. In many cases they are firms employed by private clients against the Crown. For instance, an expropriation of land for a public work takes place in a distant part of Canada, and the Department of Railways and Canals, or whatever department may be concerned, is advised by its valuers on the spot as to the amount which should be tendered as compensation for the property. A tender is made and refused. Litigation results, necessarily, either before the arbitrators as referees or before the Exchequer Court, or perhaps before the court on appeal; and if the amount is increased to any considerable extent, the costs of both sides are paid by the Crown, and such charges appearing in the Auditor General's Report, have been mistaken for items of expenditure by the department in the exercise of patronage. That accounts for the number of firms to which the hon. gentleman has called attention. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken as to the nature of the duties which devolve on the department and the extent of those duties when he supposes that either the Minister or the Deputy Minister can undertake to manage the litigation which takes place even in the city of Ottawa. To do that would employ the whole time of the Minister and his deputy, and they would be fortunate if they were able to accomplish that work, even by expending their whole time upon it. In any case, that would involve an entire neglect of the duties required to be performed for Parliament, of the necessary attendance at Council, and of the necessary discharge of the duties of the department and the advice which has to be given to other departments. As to my conducting litigation, I will submit to be put in the wrong if any member of the House will investigate the duties I have to perform, and will then say that I have time to attend to litigation as well; but I think that I discharge, and that my deputy discharges, the duties of the department by the expenditure of all the time that any two men can give to them; and the work done outside must necessarily be given, as it always has been given, to others, even when the work of the department was not more than one-fifth of what it is to-day.

Mr. McMULLEN. The explanation which the Minister has given shows very clearly the way in which the $32,000 has been spent. It is quite clear that the Department of Justice is not referred to in regard to all matters of litigation, but that the several departments carry on their own expenditure in connection with litigation, and then the Department of Justice is supposed to account to the House and the country for the expenditure of this money. I do not think it is right that the Minister of Justice should be held directly responsible for all these items, if they are expended by the different departments. The Minister of the department should be prepared to offer explanations as to the grounds on which he felt it necessary to expend that money. The Minister of Justice, however, appears to assume the responsibility, and we ask for the information from him as the head of the Department of Justice, and we are entitled to that information. Now, the hon. gentleman evades the point and does not give us the information asked, on the ground that he does not superintend the expenditure of all the items, but that the different heads of departments expend money for litigation where they find it necessary, and then it is all presented to us under the head of the Department of Justice. With regard to this item in connection with D. O'Connor of Ottawa, I cannot but affirm, as I have already stated, that, if litigation is to be conducted from year to year and it is necessary to have men to discharge the duties of counsel in the interests of the Dominion, it would be better to extend the Department of Justice and to secure the best services that can be possibly had in the Dominion, and to pay the men so employed a respectable salary. We would save money by the adoption of that course, because I do not believe there is any other firm in this Dominion, or any man in the legal profession except the most eminent counsel that we have—and I have never heard that Mr. O'Connor was an eminent counsel—who has an income of $19,000 a year in one line and from one client. The Minister says I am mistaken as to the number of firms employed by the Minister of Justice, which I have shown by the Auditor General's account. We cannot come to any other conclusion than that which I have stated, from the manner in which the statement is brought before us. I must still insist that there should be a method adopted by which a very large amount of this money could be saved. I think, if the Government would alter the system entirely and have all the duties that can possibly be performed in Ottawa discharged by the department here, even if it is necessary to increase the staff, it would be very much better. I quite agree with the Minister of Justice that the duties devolving upon him in his position are very onerous and require all his time, without his undertaking any duties outside. At the same time, he has a number of assistants, and if necessary they could be added to so that the duties required in the city of Ottawa could be discharged by himself and his subs; and, if any were required outside of Ottawa in places which his assistants could not reach, the bills should be subjected to rigid taxation: and that is all we should be asked to pay.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Justice Department, Penitentiaries Branch..... $6,200

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I should like to ask how much expense was incurred by the Department of Justice for law costs in reference to the protection of fisheries. I see that a very large sum was paid to the gentleman who represents the Minister of Justice in Halifax, and I presume it must have been largely in connection with the services which he rendered in regard to the fisheries, because the amount paid to him is disproportionately large as compared to that which was paid to the representative of the Minister in New Brunswick.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am not prepared to state the amount at this moment. No doubt there was some expense in connection with the fisheries in Mr. Graham's account, but that does not amount to a very large sum, because in the detail he will see that the total amount for legal expenses in reference to the fisheries is only $3,831. A large part, no doubt, of Mr. Graham's account is in reference to the extension of the railway in Cape Breton.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does that $3,831 mean all the legal expenses in connection with the seizures of vessels during the year?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. All payments made, certainly. There may be others which have not been paid.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There may be a large amount outstanding, as far as the Minister knows?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not a large amount. It would be a very inconsiderable amount, but I cannot say at present how much.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Minister cannot say how much was incurred in reference to the detention of the David J Adams, which was subsequently released?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot say how much that came to.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Perhaps before getting through Supply the hon. gentleman will tell me.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Department of Militia..... $42,500

Mr. FOSTER In this there is a net decrease of $100. The increases are occasioned by nine statutory increases at $50, two new clerks at $1,000, the promotion of two third class clerks, and one second class, making in all $2,750. The decreases are made by a difference between the salary estimated to be paid for a third class clerk, $150; the difference in the salary of a second class clerk, $300; and a chief clerk off, $2,400; making $2,850, or a net decrease of $100.

Mr. McMULLEN. We desire to present our sincere congratulations to the hon. gentleman for having reached a turning point in this department. There have been enormous increases in the past, and now we are happy to learn that the pruning knife has been applied to the extent of $100.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Perhaps the Minister will explain to us the very large item for travelling expenses which I see charged here, between $1,400 and $1,500.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that we discuss these items under their appropriate heads. We are now dealing simply with salaries; we will come afterwards to deal with contingencies, and the hon. gentleman will have full opportunity at that time.

Mr. LAURIER. There is a new appointment I see here.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The new appointment is that of Mr. Ardouin, who has been transferred from the Department of the Interior to my department. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the work of the department has increased very largely for the last eight or nine years, and from the report of the deputy and the heads of the various branches, it was considered indispensable to increase the staff by the appointment of one extra clerk. However, I am glad to say that that increase was made without increasing the total for salaries—indeed it was made with a decrease of $100, in so far as the general estimate is concerned.

Mr. LAURIER. There can be no great fault found when you increase the staff by diminishing the expenses. But I am astonished to know, and to know for the first time, that the work of the department has been increasing very much of late. I hope we are not following in the track of Germany and Russia, and the continental powers, who are always adding to their army; I hope we are keeping our army on a peace footing. I am astonished that the work can have so much increased.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I fully concur in the hon. gentleman's peaceful disposition. I know that, as a rule, he is not anxious to embroil himself in a foreign war. The increase in the department has not been caused at all, as the hon. gentleman seems to think, by the peace footing of the Canadian army having been enlarged; and if the hon. gentleman had given a little of his valuable attention to matters connected with the Department of Militia, he might have known that whereas eight years ago there were only two permanent corps in the whole Dominion of Canada, today we have in the various Provinces: Infantry Schools, a Cavalry School, a Mounted Infantry Corps, each of which, quoad the work of the department, take as much time as a full regiment would do in the regular army. The correspondence, the clothing, looking after the discipline of the corps, involve a great deal of hard work. The hon. gentleman must consider that whereas we had at one time only "A" and "B" Batteries, numbering about 300 men, we have today 1,150 composing the permanent corps. Now, in various other ways the work of the department has greatly increased. A portion of the repairs which were carried out by the department so ably presided over by my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, have been transferred to the Department of Militia; and I think, if the hon. gentleman will look into the matter, he will agree with his friend behind him in congratulating the Minister of Militia in having been able to carry out those reforms without increasing the expense.

Mr. LAURIER. As I understand, the Canadian army at present numbers 1,150 men.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, the permanent corps.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, the peace of Europe will not be disturbed by that. But I am surprised that it requires such a large amount of money as is here asked for from the Canadian taxpayers to maintain an army of 1,150 men only. It is a warning to us to keep as far as we can from building up a standing army, and I hope my hon. friend, as long as he remains at the head of the department, will see that the army is not increased beyond its present number.

Mr. CASEY. I suppose that the increase of work arises from the fact that the battery in British Columbia, composed, at one time, of Sergeant Kinsella and one man, has now its full complement of men, and therefore the services of an extra chief clerk is necessary to correspond with the battery. I would like to ask one question about this chief clerk. What was his rank in the department from which he came?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend calls my attention to the fact that the question put by the hon. gentleman across the floor was in reference to a chief clerk. I understood that it was a second class clerk. I explained by saying that Mr. Ardouin had been transferred from the Department of the Interior to my department. The chief clerk who is now created, is Mr. Sulte, who has been made chief clerk in lieu of Mr. Wright, whom it is contemplated to superannuate. Mr. Sulte will take the position which Mr. Wright now occupies in the military branch of the department.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not quite see that the hon. gentleman at the head of the Militia Department is entitled to the credit which he takes to himself for increasing the standing army of this country from 300 men to 1,150. I do not see the necessity for that. I think we ought not to encourage the establishment of a standing army—for it is a standing army. I can understand encouraging volunteer corps throughout the country, and giving them every aid and assistance. It is said that my hon. friend does not give them the aid and assistance which they claim they are entitled to; I know nothing about the merits of these complaints. But I do protest against a standing army in this country. The hon. gentleman, in eight years, has increased it from 300 to 1,150, and if he goes on in the same ratio, increasing it in the future, we shall be in the position described by the hon. leader of the Opposition, in which to-day we see Germany, Austria, Italy and France—a world in arms. Does he propose to do the same thing on this side of the Atlantic?

Mr. CASEY. It is an infant industry as yet.

Mr. MITCHELL. Seriously speaking, I wish to protest against this increase of a standing army. We do not need it. We ought to give every encouragement to the volunteers, give them every aid and keep up their skeleton organisations, or their practical organisations—whatever you like to call them—but I protest against the increase of a standing army in this country; I protest against a standing army at all.

Mr. CHARLTON. I should like to ask the Minister how many appointments have been made to the Imperial service from our Military school?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Imperial Government give four commissions to the successful candidates; those who obtain the highest number of points receive commissions in the different branches of the Imperial service. If the hon. gentleman wishes to know the number of those who have accepted commissions in the Imperial service, I shall have to refer to the records of the department to give him that information, but I can do so at any time when the hon. gentleman wishes to have it.

Mr. LAURIER. Is the number of commissions allotted by the Imperial Government only four? Has it been reduced from that of former years?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. Have the appointments been made strictly upon the conditions named by the Imperial Government, as rewards of merit given to the candidates having the highest number of marks?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes; altogether. The commissions are given after the examinations are passed. The commandant of the Military College makes his recommendation, and the names are sent to the Imperial Government.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman's statement is not in accord with the information I have received and with representations made to me, which are that the appointments have not been made with regard to merit at all but with regard to favoritism. I should like the hon. Minister to submit to this House, for its information, the standing of the various parties who have been appointed, as compared with the standing of other parties who have been passed over. I understand that those who would be entitled by merit to appointment have not received appointment, and that the hon. gentleman has recommended for commissions those who were barely able to pass their examinations; that those who stood at the very bottom of the lists in the examinations are among those who have received commissions, while those who were entitled to them from the manner in which they passed their examinations, have not received them.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I saw the statement. I can tell the hon. gentleman that those commissions have been given absolutely according to merit. In no way as Minister of Militia can I interfere in the granting of those commissions. I am prepared to bring down, if the hon. gentleman wishes it, the report of the commandant of the Royal Military College upon whose recommendation every commission was given, and, I repeat, I never interfered in any case.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the hon. Minister should not wait for any expression or desire on the part of the House to be made before bringing down the reports referred to. An impression has gone abroad, although of course it may have been erroneous, and I hope it was, that there has been favoritism, and that favoritism and not merit formed the basis for the appointments. I hope that impression is wrong, and the hon. Minister would do himself justice by bringing down all the information in his possession with regard to these appointments.

Mr. CASEY. I would suggest that the Minister bring down a list of those who have been appointed, showing whether they have been graduates or not, because it has been asserted that some were not graduates—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Some were not.

Mr. CASEY—and their position in the classes, in whatever year they were.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. LISTER. I understand that the four cadets passing the highest examination are entitled to receive the Imperial Government's commissions.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. LISTER. Suppose they do not accept the positions, are there still four cadets appointed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. LISTER. The next highest take the commissions?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. There was one year when there were more than four appointed.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. One year, just about the breaking out of the Soudan war, or shortly afterwards, the Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Imperial Government, requiring a larger number of officers than they had at their disposal at that particular moment, gave us six more commissions, or ten—I am speaking merely from memory and I am certain of six and think there were ten more—and asked us to recommend some men, not men who were graduated, but men who had been in the Royal Military College. In that case I followed the same rule in so far as the cadets were concerned. I asked the commandant of the Royal Military College to make out his list, according to what he considered to be the merits of those cadets. It was sent over to England and was accepted. The Order in Council was passed, and the gentlemen who had been recommended received their commissions; but, in regard to that matter again, I am quite prepared to bring down a statement and give all the names.

Mr. MULOCK. I quite sympathise with any effort made to prevent any unfairness in regard to dealing with candidates who may be graduates of the Royal Military College. I think it is exceedingly important in the interest of that institution that the Minister of Militia should be particularly careful to see that in no way favoritism creeps in. A short time ago it was publicly stated in the press of Canada, in a certain portion of the press, that a special examination was held in the Kingston College for the purpose of enabling a formerly unsuccessful pupil to pass an examination and thus obtain promotion. I dare say the Minister knows quite well the case to which I refer; it would not be fair to the parties concerned to more clearly indicate it on the floor of Parliament. I believe there can be no doubt of this, that a candidate—I am not saying he shall be prejudiced by it, but he has the political favor of the Administration—being unsuccessful in passing the regular examination at the Military College and being extremely desirous to obtain a commission in the Imperial army, a special examination was held for him. He succeeded in that second examination, passing, and received his commission. Is that the case?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No; I am not aware of any such case.

Mr. MULOCK. If the hon. gentleman is not aware of it he is probably the only person of the five millions of inhabitants of Canada who is not aware of it. That can be readily understood, considering he is presiding over the department. If he is not aware of it perhaps he will be good enough to ask the first person he meets on the street if it is so or not. I had an opportunity of discussing the matter with a person who is aware of it—a person who took a part in passing the gentleman at that examination—I will not say unfairly. It is, however, a fact, if the Minister is not aware of it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am not aware of it.

Mr. MULOCK. I can understand the hon. gentleman not being aware of it. It is convenient sometimes for people not to know things. That has taken place, however. I will not say the Minister is wilfully innocent of the fact, for I must accept his explanation. I regret that it is impossible for the hon. gentleman to give that attention to the service for which he is engaged. If that is the case, if the fact is so, a very serious injury has been done to the reputation of the institution; anyone can see that. Anyone can understand that if the public lose confidence in the fairness of the examination and consider that the rewards are to depend, not upon merit, but upon influence or favor, we had better close up the Military College, or, at all events, let us not hold out to the youth of Canada the idea that preferment goes with merit. Let us state that, as in the Civil Service and many other branches of the service at the present time, rules are to be made to exclude objectionable applicants, but they are abandoned when it may suit those who have the control of those rules.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I would like to know whether the reports current in Quebec, that the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence is going to be superannuated this year, to be replaced by a gentleman of most distinguished position in the Local Legislature of Quebec, have any foundation? Those reports have been in circulation and they have not been contradicted even in the ministerial papers. I suppose the Minister would not tell me as to the appointment, but he might say whether it is the intention to superannuate the present Deputy Minister or not?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am very happy to be able to tell the hon. gentleman that this question of superannuating the Deputy Minister of Militia has not yet even been considered. He has fulfilled all the duties of his office remarkably well, and I see no reason why he should be superannuated even to be replaced by a distinguished member of the Local Legislature.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the Minister of Militia, are there any fixed periods for holding examinations at the Military College, and if so, by what authority are they fixed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Does the hon. gentleman mean the graduating examinations?

Mr. MULOCK. Or the examinations for promotion to the regular service? Take the regular examination, for example.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, there are fixed periods for holding them.

Mr. MULOCK. By what authority are they fixed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. By the commandant, who makes his report. It is approved of by the Minister of Militia, and the period has never been changed.

Mr. MULOCK. Can an additional examination be held in one year without the consent of the Minister of Militia or the Government?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The examinations are yearly.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, but has the commandant authority to hold a special examination without the authority of the Minister of Militia?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I repeat again that I am not aware of any such case.

Mr. MULOCK. If an examination was held at an irregular period it must have been with the sanction of the department.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It must have been, of course.

Mr. LAURIER. I am delighted to hear from the Minister that the country appreciates the services of the deputy head of his department, and that it is not the intention of the Government to superannuate him. This statement refers only to the action of the Government, and I suppose the Minister would hesitate to say that the appointment of a distinguished member of the Local Legislature has not been discussed elsewhere. As this is not a public matter we can afford to let it stand for the present. I will ask if the hon. gentleman will, in the papers which he will bring down, include also the correspondence which must have taken place with the Imperial Government in regard to those appointments?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. Could the hon. gentleman give information to the House as to the statement made a few days ago with regard to the purchase of a house for the superintendent of the Military College at Kingston?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I answered the question yesterday which was put to me in reference to this very matter of which the hon. gentleman now speaks. I stated that a house had been bought, that the price paid was $12,500, and that the distance between the house and the college was 2,000 yards.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman must agree that this is a very bad feature of the bargain that the house should be at such a distance from the department. The rules of discipline would require that the superintendent should be within easy distance of communication with the college. Being at such a distance as 2,000 yards it would be hardly possible for him to have over the students confined there that care and that exact supervision which is so very necessary.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have acted in this direction. The present house is much closer than the house occupied by previous commandants. The other commandants of the college lived at a greater distance than the present one does in the new house.

Mr. COOK. Does the hon. gentleman propose to buy another building next year? He says he is working in the direction of bringing the house nearer the college.

Department of the Secretary of State .....$34,972 50

Mr. FOSTER. In this department there are 17 statutory increases of $50, one statutory increase of $50 not estimated in 1888-89, two statutory increases at $30, a messenger, transferred, at $450, estimated at $300 last year; making a total increase of $1,110.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would just like to call attention to an item in the Auditor General's Report, page C 32, in connection with this department. I notice that arrears for eight years, amounting to $400, have been paid to one man. Now, I cannot understand how it is that we have arrears to pay to some of our officials.

Mr. FOSTER. What is his name?

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Brousseau.

Mr. FOSTER. I will enquire into the matter.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot understand how it is that these arrears are brought up from time to time. Once the principle is admitted that a man, after serving a number of years, can go back and trump up accounts for the purpose of making claims like this, we shall have no end of them.

Mr. MITCHELL. I see a charge on page C 32 of the Auditor General's Report, "P. Pelletier, from March 1, $600." Can the hon. gentleman say what he is appointed for, and whether he went through the Civil Service examinations? I am instructed, if he is the man, that the chief service he rendered was at the Hull election here, in which a slight row occurred. Will the hon. gentleman get that information too?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would ask the hon. gentleman to what class Mr. Morgan was degraded last year, and whether he has received his statutory increase during the past year?

Mr. FOSTER. He was a chief clerk at $2,400, and was made a first-class clerk at a maximum salary of $1,800, a reduction of $600. He has not received any statutory increase.

Department of Public Printing and Stationery. $21,310

Mr. FOSTER. The increases are seven statutory increases at $50, one at $62.50, estimated short in 1888-89, and two at $30; making a total increase of $472.50. The decreases are caused by the difference between Mr. Young's salary of $2,100, and the salary of Mr. Bronskill, which is $1,850;

two third-class clerkships not filled, and now dropped, $1,300; one promotion provided for in 1888-89, but dropped, $100; a packer and messenger dropped, $900; a first class clerkship for eight months, not filled, $933.32; making the total decreases $3,483.32, leaving the net decrease $3,010.

Department of Interior..... $128,512 50

Mr. FOSTER. The increases are caused by 31 statutes at $50, one at $37.50, one at $25, one at $30, an increase to Mr. Hall of $400, an increase to Mr. Deville of $225, a promotion of Mr. King from first-class clerk to chief clerk, $50; a promotion from second to first, $25; two other seconds to first, $100 and $125 respectively; five thirds to seconds, $1,012; an additional messenger, $500; and two new third class clerks, $1,050; making the total, $4,910. The decreases are $1,650, consequent on the transfer of Mr. Pope from that Department to the Privy Council; and $1,275 from one death. The total decreases are $2,925, the net decrease being $1,905.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the Department of Indian Affairs is embraced now in the Department of the Interior?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes, they are under the same Minister.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And the Geological Branch?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. I see there are two officials of a new kind in the Department of the Interior, one called geographer of the Department of the Interior, and the other astronomer, at $1,800 each. I would like to have some explanation of who they are and what they are needed for, because it seems to me the business of the Department of the Interior must be much less now than it was a few years ago, when the real estate boom was in progress in the North-West, and vast tracts of territory were being surveyed.

Mr. DEWDNEY. On the recommendation of my deputy, Mr. Johnston, who is the chief draftsman of the department, who has been in the service since 1874, and who was originally selected by Col. Dennis for his admitted skill as a draftsman and geographer, was appointed a technical officer with the title of geographer of the department of the Interior, without any increase of salary. It was Mr. Johnston who prepared the standard map of Canada which, I have no doubt, hon. members have all seen.

Mr. CASEY. The Estimates show an increase.

Mr. DEWDNEY. A transfer from the first class. He was a first class clerk at the maximum.

Mr. CASEY. His duties are as draftsman to draw maps?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; entirely.

Mr. CASEY. Then it is merely a change of name?

Mr. DEWDNEY. A change of name.

Mr. CASEY. Is the same true with regard to the astronomer?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Mr. King, who is one of our best astronomers, is transferred in the same way. He is a very able man and has been doing good work. We are carrying out trigonometrical surveys, and he having been recommended by the deputy to be put in the same position, I saw no objection to it.

Mr. CASEY. I do not see the object of changing the name unless it was with the view of establishing a position in which these men would be better paid afterwards.

Mr. LISTER. Were any additional appointments made at all?

Mr. DEWDNEY. One messenger.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would call the attention of the hon. Minister to page 9 of the Estimates, where the expenses of the Department of the Interior are estimated at $128,512.50. That, I presume, includes what he calls Department of the Interior on page 13, and also the Geological Branch on page 14. Then the estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs are entered on page 9 as a separate item, amounting to $42,415. Will the hon. gentleman tell why these are put as two separate items on page 9, and why they are three separate items on pages 13 and 14?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The only reason I know of might be that the Geological Survey and the Interior Department may be nominally connected with each other under one deputy.

Mr. FOSTER. These two, I believe, have always been under the one Minister, while the Department of Indian Affairs has been under a different Minister, the Minister of the Interior; and I followed the same order, in making the Estimates, that has been followed before. They are all virtually one department now.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has dealt with them as if they were three in the one case and two in the other. This is confusing and calculated to deceive the House, I do not say intentionally. The hon. gentleman says there is but one deputy of the Department of the Interior and the Geological Branch taken together. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the director of the Geological Survey is continued in the rank of deputy head, and is obliged to have all his affairs supervised by the deputy head of the Department of the Interior, properly so-called? Is it the case that in sending out his exchanges and in doing everything he is obliged to consult the deputy and cannot act directly—that he cannot consult directly the Minister, but must consult the deputy?

Mr. DEWDNEY. There is really only one deputy; and Dr. Selwyn, the director, is deputy head. When I took charge of the Department I found that such had been the practice, and there was considerable friction, and I have been endeavoring, for some time, to bring about an arrangement to correct it. The practice has been that the work of the deputy head has been done directly through the deputy of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to make a suggestion for the hon. gentleman's consideration, regarding parties that go on surveys in connection with the Geological Survey. I understand this branch is never able to make up parties or to enter on surveys until after the House has voted the moneys, and it sometimes happens that the vote takes place at a late period of the spring, so that these surveying parties are all the summer getting started. It would be very much better if you could know at the earliest possible moment at the beginning of the year how many you are going to put into the field, and that they should be able to take the field at the earliest possible moment. In some parts of the Dominion they could be in the field the whole year round, but in other parts, where the season is short, it is necessary for them to be in the field as soon as the season opens. I do not think we get full value at all for the cost of fitting out expeditions.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, and the question was brought to my notice by the director himself a short time ago; and we are at once going to take up the question with regard to the different parties going out the coming season, in order to have them in a position to get to work as early as possible.

Mr. MULOCK. Do you intend adopting some general scheme whereby, at the earliest possible moment, irrespective of proceedings in Parliament, these surveying parties will be able to take the field?

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is the intention.

Mr. LAURIER. I observe the staff of the department is very large. I could understand how such a large staff would be necessary at the early days of Confederation, or even quite recently, when large surveying parties were in the field, and the reports were coming in to be investigated and maps had to be drafted; but I do not see why such a large staff should be required at present. Are the surveys still going on?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; every year a certain amount of surveys are going on. But the staff of surveyors is not anything like as large as it was a few years ago, and the hon. gentleman will notice that the amount voted for this purpose is much smaller than heretofore. With regard to the department itself I made enquiries, and found it impossible to cut down the staff. All the officers are kept steadily at work. I would have been glad to be able to reduce the staff, but my deputy informs me that it would be impossible.

Mr. LAURIER. What I say is not with any view to criticise the department, as I have not the necessary knowledge at hand to do so. It may be that the staff, although it is a very large one, is not too large for the proper discharge of the business of the department; but it seems to me, as the hon. gentleman has admitted that there are fewer surveys in the field than formerly, that the work of the department must be consequently much less onerous than it was a few years ago. The hon. gentleman says it is impossible to diminish the staff. The work of the department must have grown, therefore, in some other direction. Can the hon. gentleman give us information in regard to that?

Mr. DEWDNEY. We have reduced work in the survey portion of the staff, but not in the general staff of the department. All the surveyors, as the hon. gentleman knows, are employed during the summer months, and when the work is completed they are paid off. In that part of the staff there has been a reduction.

Mr. LAURIER. Last year there was a very important investigation going on in the other branch of the Legislature, by a committee of that Legislature, as to the basin of the River Mackenzie. Have any steps been taken to have a thorough investigation made of that important part of the Dominion?

Mr. DEWDNEY. None, with the exception of getting reports from Mr. Ogilvie and Mr. McConnell, who have spent nearly two years in the far North-West. They have just returned, and I hope I shall get valuable information from them.

Mr. LAURIER. Then I suppose the reports of these gentlemen will form part of the next report of the Minister of Interior, next year?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; but as these gentlemen have only lately returned, they could not prepare their reports in time to get into the blue-book this Session. I shall be glad, however, to bring their reports down as soon as they are prepared.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. gentleman has erred in his statement with regard to the astronomer and geographer. In looking at page 13, I see that, in the number of parties employed, there is a deputy head, one each year; chief clerk or secretary, one each year; chief clerk or surveyor general, one each year; chief clerk of patents, one in each year; chief clerk, accountant, one in each year. Then you have these two officers to whom there is no one corresponding in 1888-89.

Mr. FOSTER. They were first class clerks in that year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The number of first class clerks is the same in each year, and there is only one increase in the number of second class clerks. The difference is in the third class, of whom there were thirty-seven in 1888-89 and are to be only thirty-four in 1889-90. That makes three less.

Mr. FOSTER. Those three went up.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that there has been promotion.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There have been third class clerks made second class clerks, and possibly there have been second class clerks made first class clerks, so that, although the number of clerks has not been increased, the ranks have been very greatly changed. These two gentlemen may not have received any higher salary or rank than before, but in that case somebody else must have done so.

Mr. FOSTER. I read the information on that point to the House at first, and my hon. friend cannot have caught the statement.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think some reasonable effort should be made to cut down the expenses of this department. The number of clerks and the amount of the expense is at present unreasonable. No doubt, the opening up of the North-West and the very arduous duties which fell upon the head of this department at that time increased the necessity of hiring a number of clerks, but we are all aware that the duties now devolving upon this department cannot possibly be as great as they were a year or two ago; but, notwithstanding that fact, we find the expenditure increasing. We reasonably expected this year to find a reduction instead of an increase, but the amount is still increasing. I hope the hon. gentleman who has been placed at the head of that department, when he has obtained some experience in regard to its working, will be able to report to the House next year that he has very materially cut down the expenses. There must be room for a considerable reduction, and, though he may not have seen his way to do that yet, we hope that he will see that the expenditure is reduced. In connection with the Board of Land Commissioners in Winnipeg, there is an enormous expense, and there is a very large staff of officers that I could never see the necessity of keeping up at all. The duties which devolve upon that board should be discharged by the officials here. It is absurd to keep two boards, one at Winnipeg and the other at Ottawa, to deal with these matters. I think that board at Winnipeg could be wiped out altogether and the duties performed by the department here, and this would save an enormous expense. There are items to which I think the head of the department should devote his personal attention at once. I have been through the North-West, and I am satisfied, from what I gathered when I was there, from officials of the Government and others, that there is ample room for a very serious reduction in the expenditure on the whole official staff there, and here as well. It is our duty to press this matter upon the Government, and we take this opportunity of saying that we think the time has come to make this reduction, and we hope the Minister will realise before next year that very serious reductions ought to be made.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman has nothing to say in reference to what has been stated by my hon. friend behind me (Mr. McMullen). Apart from the question of expenditure, the hon. gentleman must know that a great deal of annoyance is caused by the existence of the two boards, one in Winnipeg and one in Ottawa. Settlers have been sent from Pilate to Herod and Herod to Pilate—from Winnipeg to Ottawa and from Ottawa to Winnipeg—and in consequence a good deal of discontent, as far as my knowledge goes, has been aroused among the settlers. The hon. gentleman knows—probably better than anyone else—that the working of the Act in regard to the Department of the Interior, as far as the settlement of the North-West is concerned, is not as satisfactory as it should be. Instead of facilities being given to settlers, the settlers have been hampered by regulations upon regulations, and by officers upon officers, until some of them have given the thing up in despair and have gone over to the other side of the line. The hon. gentleman is new to his present office, and he will find that he can occupy his time very profitably and valuably by using it on this question in the way which I indicate.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad this has been brought before the House. I was under the same impression as my hon. and learned friend (Mr. Laurier), that a great deal of evil resulted from the settler being sent from Pilate to Herod, and being hurled back again from Herod to Pilate, and I went into the question with the late lamented Mr. White, and he showed me how completely my idea was a misconception. As a fact, nearly  $\frac{3}{10}$  of the ordinary business of the settler is done in the office at Winnipeg, without one word being heard outside. Occasionally, in the case of here and there a settler, correspondence does take place which is protracted, and in such cases there would appear to be an advantage if we communicated directly with Ottawa; but when once I saw that the whole of that part of the business was done in Winnipeg, I saw it was clearly an advantage to have an officer so near, because if you were to aggregate the business in Ottawa, you would have still to have the same number, or very nearly the same number of employés, for the work is a vast one. What would be the result? Instead of the settler being able to get an answer to his enquiry in a single day, or two days at the furthest, he would have to wait five or six days. I was entirely under the same impression as my hon. and learned friend, because, naturally, the only cases which came before me, or which created trouble, were those in which the man was irritated. I thought, if it is necessary that I should write to Mr. Smith, and, if I am not satisfied with what he says, I am to write to Mr. White or to the Minister of the Interior, why should I not have the communication direct? That was the impression made on me, and the impression which naturally would be made on anyone who looks at the question from a superficial standpoint, as I had done; and, as I say, with great respect to the hon. gentleman, every member must look at it who is not engaged in the question from time to time as the members from the North-West are, or who is not in the department managing the matter as the Minister or the Deputy Minister is. I said to him: "Is not this too bad, that we should have the two offices? Would it not facilitate matters if we were to deal directly with Ottawa?" He smiled and said "yes,"—just as I say now—"it is a very natural idea." And then he said: "Now come and look at the way the thing stands." He showed me that the great bulk of the business was done at Winnipeg, all the ordinary business was done at Winnipeg, and that we only hear of those cases that created a difficulty. As I am speaking, I may be permitted to say, that there is a step that I should like to see taken, and it would still further advance the efficiency of the department—I would like to see the office removed further west.

Mr. LAURIER. Will you kindly tell us where?

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I should not object to Regina. But I should like to see it removed further west, for this reason: that henceforth the bulk of the business will be done in the Territories, and, in proportion, as there is an advantage in having the office at Winnipeg, as now, on account of postal facilities, in the same proportion there would be an advantage in having the office removed further west.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. McMULLEN. I just want to say a word in reply to the hon. gentleman. In my experience, a double duty has been performed by the Department of the Interior in dealing with cases at Winnipeg, and then dealing with them here. I have had several letters myself from parties who had settled in the west complaining that in cases of disputes about land, they came first before the Board in Winnipeg, and as the party who lost was dissatisfied with the decision at Winnipeg, he writes down here to some member of Parliament who brings the case before the department in Ottawa. In that way there are practically two courts in connection with the Department of the Interior, one at Winnipeg, which first decides the case, and afterwards there is an appeal here, and all the papers are ordered down here and gone over the second time. Now I say that is not at all necessary. The proper course would be to have one court, as it were, from which there would be no appeal. You cannot prevent men from writing and complaining when they think an injustice has been done in the matter of disposing of the claims for land. I have had several cases. At the time of the lamented death of the hon. gentleman who presided so efficiently and so ably over the Department of the Interior, I had in my possession no less than six different complaints in regard to claims that had been brought before the court at Winnipeg and there disposed of; but the parties who had been disappointed in their efforts to get claims, wished their cases to be brought before the Department of the Interior at Ottawa, in order, if possible, to get a reversal of the decision that had been given in Winnipeg, or some other change in the decision, so that they might be placed in possession of what they considered their rights. Now here is one of the evils of the division of the Department of the Interior: one portion sitting in Winnipeg and one portion sitting in Ottawa. The sooner that system is done away with the better, and then, when people reach a decision with regard to disputes in connection with the settlement of the land, they will know that there is no further appeal, and will save themselves a great amount of trouble and annoyance. I know of two or three cases myself that were brought before the hon. gentleman the late Minister of the Interior. The papers were sent for from Winnipeg; it took a considerable time before these papers could be brought here; it was some two or three weeks before all the necessary papers could be produced in Ottawa in order that the disputes might be looked into. After they came here they were investigated, and after looking the matter over we felt satisfied that the decisions that had been given by the board at Winnipeg were about correct—everything straight. At the same time the trouble had to be gone through with, and it will continue to be a trouble year after year, so long as people are not satisfied with the decisions at Winnipeg; they will give up their papers and documents, which will be sent down here and a re-investigation will be held before the Minister of the Interior. I say that state of things should be dispensed with at once, and the whole business in connection with the department should either be transacted up there or else be transacted here, and we should quit this division of responsibility and the continuous agitation that is carried on whenever a party there is not satisfied, or another party here is not satisfied.

Mr. LAURIER. I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks which fell from my hon. friend, the member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). Now I am not the man at all to grudge any favor that has been shown to any man here, friend or foe, and I congratulate my hon. friend that he was so lucky as to get himself disabused of a false impression which at one time he entertained as to the working of the Interior Department. But the Government gave him a privilege which has hitherto been denied to the House.

He is not the only man who labored under the delusion that two offices were too many, that one would have done better than two. There are thousands of others, I may say millions of men, in this Dominion, who are now of the same mind that he was formerly, before the late Minister of the Interior took him into his confidence and gave him the explanations which were, unfortunately, given to him only. If the Minister of the Interior had taken the House and the country also into his confidence, and given publicly the explanations which were given to my hon. friend and which completely satisfied him that two boards were necessary, and that, in fact, one of the two boards was not far enough west, then the Minister of the Interior would have disabused, probably, the mind, not only of the hon. gentleman himself, but of the entire public. For my part, my confidence in the Government is not great; it might be greater, and if I were to speak my own mind, I would say that I think they have erred and are erring in many ways. Now, if the Government wish to show that the public was in error, if they wish to do themselves justice, I would ask that some hon. gentleman opposite should now give the explanations on the floor of the House which were given to the hon. member for Assiniboia, and which completely satisfied him that the criticisms, which were general at that time, were not well founded.

Mr. DAVIN. I will give them with the greatest pleasure to my hon. and learned friend. I will give the explanations which were given to me, viz.: that 95 per cent. of the work passed quietly through that office at Winnipeg without creating any irritation; and my hon. and learned friend, who speaks with so much charm whenever North-West matters are introduced, is under a complete misapprehension as to the Department of the Interior. He supposes there are two boards. There is no such thing. You have got a board at Winnipeg and then you have got the Minister here to whom you may appeal. But the Land Board at Winnipeg is one thing, and, of course, whether you have a board here or whether you have it at Winnipeg, you still have the Minister to whom the decisions of that board may be appealed. Now, I will ask my hon. friend, in view of the explanation that the Minister gave me, viz.: that 95 per cent. of the work is done quietly at Winnipeg—will he say for one moment, if that be the case, that it is not a real advantage to have the office near the settler, and not to have it far away? The hon. gentleman is a lawyer; he knows very well that one of the things that characterises a good government is to bring the law near the people, to bring it within easy reach of them.

Mr. COOK. It comes too mighty near, sometimes.

Mr. DAVIN. I dare say it does. I know you have been in the Election Courts.

Mr. COOK. I have always had enough to pay the costs.

Mr. DAVIN. Don't get angry or I will cook your goose. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hold that in my way, as a funnel, so to speak, conveying what information was given to me, I have conveyed it to my hon. and learned friend.

Mr. MILLS. Balaam.

Mr. DAVIN. What is Balaam? What has that to do with it?

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman is just in the same unfortunate position. The hon. gentleman says he is the funnel through which this information is conveyed to the House. Balaam had a funnel also through which he conveyed views.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman is completely astray. He is ass-tray, as an hon. member said. I had to point out last year the want of biblical knowledge on the part of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). The ass in the scriptural story was not the funnel of Balaam; on the contrary, the ass recognized the angel which Balaam could not recognise, and so he did not convey any views that Balaam entertained, and was, therefore, in no way Balaam's funnel. I am sorry to have to give the hon. gentleman, which I had occasionally to do last year, a little scriptural instruction. But turning away from the ass, I will come to the subject in hand. I say that in view of the explanation that 95 per cent. of the work is done in Winnipeg without any noise, you have only to take the geographical fact that it is nearer the people and you occupy a position that is simply unanswerable, and no silvery eloquence on the part of my hon. friend, whom we are always glad to hear, can affect it, although just now he thought there were two boards; and, last year, he thought we had no municipal system. I advise hon. gentlemen opposite, and in doing so I speak against my own party, and I am now saying the worst thing I can say against my own party—

Mr. MITCHELL. Be careful.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, yes, I am very careful. I know that I am speaking not only in the presence of the two parties, but also in the presence of the third party, which for the moment is the most formidable.

Mr. MITCHELL. The most independent, at all events.

Mr. DAVIN. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to make any impression on this House and to lower the numerical strength of the Conservative party, the first thing they will have to do when dealing with the North-West question is to study facts. They are really in a state of deplorable ignorance on the subject, and silvery eloquence and loud rhetoric such as is sometimes used is but as the idle wind.

Mr. MITCHELL. You will supply the fiction if they supply facts.

Mr. DAVIN. I will, with pleasure, if they will pay me for it.

Mr. WATSON. I am sure this side of the House will be very thankful to the Minister—not the Minister but the funnel of the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. MITCHELL. He is the coming Minister.

Mr. WATSON. He was looking for the position. It will astonish anyone coming from the North-West to learn that the work of the Department of the Interior is administered with such great diligence, especially that part which has reference to claims in the North-West. The hon. gentleman must have been more fortunate than is the case with others in the North-West. I know of many persons in Manitoba who, day after day, corresponded with me on the subject of getting their patents; in fact, people are constantly writing to me to get patents issued and land matters adjusted that cannot be adjusted in Winnipeg. The hon. gentleman says that 95 per cent. of the work has been done in Winnipeg. I believe it was a good move on the part of the Government to establish a land board in Winnipeg, but if 95 per cent. of the work is now done there and only 5 per cent. done in Ottawa, this being the more difficult work, I fail to see why the whole administration of the department should not be removed to Winnipeg, and the department be administered by a responsible individual in Winnipeg or some point in the North-West—I do not care if it was Regina. I believe if we had responsible men there to deal with the individual claims of settlers it would be better for the people at large. No doubt great delays occur in the Department of the Interior in connection with claims of people who have entered for homesteads and desire to prove their claims. Delays occur not only in these cases, but also in cases where there has been some little irregularity, not altogether on the part of the applicant, but also on the part of the department, and I should like to see a responsible individual located in Winnipeg or some portion of the North-West who would be in a position to deal, and deal finally, with all claims coming before him for adjudication. If I visit the Department of the Interior to obtain information, or with reference to any application for a patent, the case is referred to the Land Board in Winnipeg; they have to report and send their opinion here, and I then get an answer. That proceeding, of course, involves delay. The Land Board in Winnipeg should be entrusted with full power to issue patents.

Mr. MITCHELL. Who are they?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Smith is the head of the Land Board in Winnipeg. He is from Peterboro', I think. I believe the gentleman who presides over that board is giving satisfaction and is doing all he can under the powers given him as Commissioner of Dominion Lands in the North-West. There is undoubtedly great dissatisfaction in the west on account of the trouble involved in getting the machinery in motion for the issuing of patents and the settlement of claims. I know claims that have been hanging over for the last ten or twelve years under the promise that they would be investigated. Such, for instance, are the old settlers' claims in the city of Winnipeg and throughout the old Province of Manitoba, claims in regard to land to which the people declare they are entitled under an agreement made with the Hudson's Bay Company before the transfer of the North-West to the Dominion. The Interior Department and the Government have been deaf to the demands of these people, but I hope before the Session closes, the Government will appoint a commission to enquire into their claims and grievances and report on them. If the people are entitled to any recompense in connection with their claims then they should be dealt with fairly and the matter settled; if not, they should be so informed and the agitation be allowed to drop.

Committee rose; and, it being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I regret very much that the Minister who has charge of the department, and whose special interest it is to give the House information on this subject is not present.

An hon. MEMBER. Here he is.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I refer to the real Minister and not to the hon. gentleman who has dignified himself with the name of the funnel.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me a moment, Mr. Dewdney is not here, but I believe it is through no fault of his own in one sense. He has an engagement which he is obliged to keep and which was entered into beforehand. This item was pretty fully discussed, and the discussion can be brought up again on succeeding votes which are intimately connected with this department. It might be that the hon. gentleman will allow this item which is simply for salaries to pass. When the vote comes for the Land Board at Winnipeg and other services we can resume the discussion. I throw that out as a hint.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It may be that the Minister of the Interior could not be here, but it is rather an unusual thing that when the estimates of the Minister's department are under consideration he should not be in the House to give information upon the subject. I do not suppose that any observations that I would make would alter the policy of the department, but, notwithstanding, I think that it is only right and proper that I should express the views that I have formed in reference to this Land Board in Winnipeg, the office of commissioner, and the duties that the commissioner has to discharge.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I might make one more suggestion. I think the Minister will be in, in the course of a little while, and we might let this item stand for a moment and proceed to the next.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. MILLS. Very well, we will do so.

North-West Mounted Police..... $3,860

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to this item, Mr. Chairman, the only increase is that caused by the statutory additions. There are three statutory increases at $50 each, and one at $30, making $180 in all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That officer is now in residence in Ottawa, is he not?

Mr. FOSTER. Do you mean the comptroller.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has there been any change in the regulations in reference to the force in the North-West?

Mr. FOSTER. I have been informed that there has been no important change. An opportunity will be afforded to discuss that subject in the general estimates.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is a point I wanted to bring out. I suppose it is better to wait till then because I think the Minister of Finance might not be in possession of the information.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make a note of that.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). We can take it on the other items.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is to be regretted that the First Minister who has charge of the administration of the affairs of the Mounted Police is not here for the purpose of giving us some information on the subject. The force is very much larger than it was a few years ago, and it was increased at a period when the country was much agitated, when a civil war had broken out, when a rebellion had occurred and when the recurrence of that rebellion threatened the country. This force is, in fact, a part of the expenditure in connection with the Indian branch although it is really separate, for the main duty of the force is precautionary duty, relating to the maintenance of peace and order, so far as the Indian population is concerned. Now, I understand that the Indians have remained contented upon their reserves, that there has been no indication of discontent, amounting at all events to rebellion, and it would be most important that the expenditure in connection with the maintenance of this force should be diminished, if this can be safely done. If 300 mounted police were sufficient in the early period of the administration of the affairs in the North-West, when the means of communication were very different from what they are at the present time, it seems to me that this force could be very largely reduced without any risk to the peace and the good order of that section of the country, and if so it would certainly be to the public interest that a reduction should take place.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I might say, Mr. Chairman, that, perhaps, the Minister has observed in the public prints, even in some that are favorable to the Administration, that there have been rather serious complaints about the way in which matters are conducted at what I might term the head-quarters of the force at Regina. I dare say that the Minister will have seen articles bearing upon that question. I have in my hand a paper in which a very serious charge is made against Commissioner Herchmer, who is in charge of the force there. It is alleged that a canteen has been established in the barracks, and that beer of sufficient strength to produce intoxication is being sold; that that canteen has special surroundings, that it is a monopoly for beer drinking, that its result is demoralising to the force; and, altogether, speaking in such a way in reference to the matter I think it would be well for the Minister to be able to give some explanation in reference to it. For instance, I have a short article here dated the 29th September, in a paper entitled the Regina Leader—I think a paper that is favorable to the Administration—in which it says that this canteen is demoralising the force. The article is headed, "The Canteen must Go," and it goes on to say:—

"It is an outrage, savoring of boodle for those who brought it here, and demoralising, ruining, debauching the men it pretends to serve. A correspondent writing from the barracks gives particulars which none but an ass or a ghoul would deny were reasons sufficient for wiping it off the face of the earth. But the latest outrage who will defend? Here are the facts: one of the corporals—T. B. Wright—fell under its temptations. He has been drinking heavily since New Year's, spending at the canteen all his money, and the bulk of his time, and generally indulging, like many of his fellows, in a prolonged spree. He is a married man; his family living at the barracks. His wife, an excellent woman, has endeavored by her own work to add to the pittance he gave her. On Friday he was missed. A search party of 20 men scoured the country but could find no trace of him. It is supposed that hearing he would be punished for his offence of drinking to excess the strong beer which those in authority aided in placing under his nose, he deserted—leaving a weeping wife and children. His deserted wife is not alone in condemning the canteen as a curse. Before the canteen came the men had the healthy outing of a run down town. Here they could take a drink, but the temptation was not constantly before them and there was but a fraction of the amount of drinking which goes on now."

I think, Sir, when a statement like that appears in a paper—

Mr. LANDERKIN. What paper is that?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Regina Leader—known to be favorable to the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What subsidy does it get? Possibly the subsidy was stopped at the time.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not know of my own knowledge who edits it, but it is commonly reported to be a gentleman in this House, and I have no doubt he will say something on the matter. I have seen articles in other papers on the same subject, and I submit that it is of such importance that some explanation should be given. In another article it is insinuated, if not openly charged, that the commissioner himself is benefited by the existence of this institution, which is said to be demoralising the force. I have no doubt the hon. Minister of Finance will have taken some interest in this matter, and will be able to say whether it is true that a canteen has been established there under Commissioner Herchmer, whether it is true that he actually profits by it himself, and whether, as is charged in another place, a car load of beer which he was having taken in was seized. This is the point on which I wanted to get some information.

Mr. FOSTER. All that has been stated in the newspapers will not, I suppose, be taken for granted even by my hon. friend. There may be some truth in it, or there may be not. I am not the responsible Minister of the department which has control of the force, and the vote we are taking now is for the officers of the department who are here. I have no doubt at all that the First Minister, who has it under his care, and who is not here to-night, because he is feeling unwell, will be quite able to give the hon. gentleman a full answer when we come to the item which provides for the maintenance of the force in the North-West. These matters have been, no doubt, brought to his attention.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This department is intended for the special direction and surveillance of this force, and, therefore, my hon. friend's remarks are in the strictest sense pertinent. The comptroller is bound to see, if such irregularities exist, that they are repressed at once. I think the hon. gentleman had better suspend this item until the officer properly in charge is here to offer explanations, and he might revert to the Minister of Interior's Department, which he asked to stand on the score of his absence.

Department of the Interior.....$128,512 50

Mr. DEWDNEY. I must apologise for not being here when you took the Chair, but I had a little dinner party, and was able only to get as far as the fish, and I left as soon as I could. Before I arrived I believed an explanation was asked in reference to the Land Commissioner's office at Winnipeg. Before I took charge of the department I had somewhat similar views to those expressed by some hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to that office. I had not given particular attention to the matter in the North-West; it was not until it was intimated to me that I was coming here that I went into the matter particularly, and the more I have seen of the administration of this office the more I have become satisfied of the necessity of it. Shortly after I took office, a large number of applications were made to me from different parts of the Territories in reference to land matters and I thought from what I saw and knew then that there were a great many matters which appeared to me to be grievances on the part of the settlers—so much so that I wrote to the commissioner to ask him who, if anyone, had sufficient discretion, or any discretion, to settle those grievances. He replied to me that there was no discretion in the matter at all—that the law was very clear in regard to all land matters. I then found that no patents could be issued without the certificate of the Land Commissioner at Winnipeg. It was his duty to get all the information he could from his officers with regard to the occupation and improvements of the different settlers; and until the Government had a certificate of course no patent could be issued. Some parties in the North-West thought that was unnecessary, and it was intimated to me that it would be better if the application was made direct to Ottawa, and the patent issued from here. But since I have had the honor to administer the department, I have come to the conclusion that such a course would place the Minister in a false position, and for that reason, if for no other, I think it was a very wise measure to place the office of the Land Commissioner at Winnipeg. I may say that while I have been in the Territories up to the day I left I have not heard any intimation from the settlers themselves that they wished to have the land office removed and the whole of the business done here at head-quarters. In fact, quite the reverse was the case. I do not know if the hon. gentlemen are aware that, during the last meeting of the Local Assembly, a resolution was passed expressing the opinion that the land office should be removed further west in order to be nearer the people who have now the principal amount of business to transact with the Land Department. In regard to the advice extended to me by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) I take it in the spirit in which it was proffered; I have no doubt it was given with good intention. I am sure no one is more anxious to reduce the expenditure of the department than I am, when it can be done without impairing its efficiency; and, so far as my experience goes, I find all the Ministers anxious to reduce the expenditure as far as they can. We have a Finance Minister of a very economical turn of mind and who is anxious to make a good showing. I think you will find, when the Estimates are down, that they are not excessive, at any rate as far as my department is concerned. But I fear that the wishes of the hon.

gentleman cannot be fulfilled, because it appears to me that, in a young country like ours, the business in the North-West instead of decreasing must increase. Therefore, I cannot hold out any hope that in the course of a few years the hon. gentleman's wishes will be realized.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I must say that I regret the hon. gentleman has arrived at this opinion. In my opinion a very large reduction might be made in the expenditure connected with the department, and at the same time the efficiency of that department might be greatly increased. The hon. gentleman asks for an expenditure of $128,000 connected with his department here; the expense of the Indian branch will exceed $120,000, and there is in connection with the commissioner's land office at Winnipeg a further expenditure of $185,000, making an expenditure connected with that office for the mere administration of public affairs of upwards of $300,000. I can point to figures in the history of the Illinois Central Railway, whose sales of lands were double that of the department which the hon. gentleman has in charge, at any time during the last ten years, which show the expense of the administration of those lands was not ten per cent. of what the Interior Department costs at present for the same purpose. The hon. gentleman knows that the expenditure of his department, which was about $50,000, including the expenditure of the branch at Winnipeg in 1876 and 1878, has increased four-fold, and there is no corresponding increase in the public service to warrant this very large expenditure. The hon. gentleman will find, if he looks at the expenditure connected with the land office at Washington, no such cumbersome machinery in connection with that office as that which the hon. gentleman thinks necessary in connection with his department here. I think we might profit by the experience of our neighbors, and avoid having a second Department of the Interior stationed mid-way between the plains of our North-West and the capital of Canada. The hon. gentleman, in my opinion, proposes to perpetuate a useless institution by the maintenance of the commissioner's office at Winnipeg. When that office was first established, there were serious difficulties in the way of rapid communication with the central office here. There were no telegraph lines and no railways, and no means of communication for a very considerable portion of the year, except through the adjoining republic, and the facilities often through that country were far from being great. In consequence of the isolation which existed for a considerable portion of the year, it was found necessary to establish an office at Winnipeg, which was intended to serve as a temporary expedient, and to dispose of those simple matters about which there could be no dispute, in order to facilitate the issuing of patents to the settlers and to facilitate the settlement of disputes that might arise between conflicting claimants, by taking the evidence of the parties. In my opinion, if the Government would retain the land offices which are easy of access to the settlers and intending settlers in the various portions of the country, there is no public business that requires intervention between the Department of the Interior and those land offices by the means of such an institution as that of the Land Commissioner at Winnipeg. If the hon. gentleman has land offices easy of access in various portions of the Territories—and I judge from the large sums asked for the payment of salaries of public land agents in various parts of the North-West that such is the case—why should such an institution as the Land Office at Winnipeg be perpetuated? If there be serious difficulty or dispute between claimants, one of the parties will not rest content with the decision of the commissioner. There will be an appeal to the Minister, and the sooner that appeal takes place—with all the facts communicated that may be furnished by the agent in the immediate locality, to the Minister—the sooner the affair will be disposed of, the patent issued to the party entitled, and the dispute settled. Now, there is nothing which this commissioner has to do that the Minister himself could not do quite as well. This commissioner must act upon information and evidence. The commissioner at Winnipeg is, in many cases, 500 or 1,000 miles away from the disputants in the Territories. In but few instances can he be visited by the parties whose case is in controversy. They must communicate with him through the mail, and those communications might just as well come directly to the Minister of Interior here as reach him indirectly through the commissioner, whose decision is not accepted. Then I know that the fact of having a commissioner often tends to delay matters. The commissioner will say that he is waiting for the decision of some matter at Ottawa. The Minister at Ottawa finds that the papers which the commissioner represents as having been sent to him are in the office at Winnipeg, and so the parties whose case is in controversy find that months are allowed to elapse before either the commissioner or the Minister is heard from. Now, it is to my mind perfectly evident that the present means of communication, the facilities of mail service and telegraphic communication, do away with the necessity for such an office as that at Winnipeg. Look at the expense. You have a commissioner with a salary of $5,000 a year; you have a superintendent of mines with a salary of $3,200; an inspector with a salary of $2,200; secretaries with salaries of $2,000; seven homestead inspectors. Why, the amount paid to these homestead inspectors is almost as much as has been derived in some years from the payment of fees and the issuing of patents. You find that the sum is increased up to $54,000, and that this does not cover all the expenditure in connection with the service there. I am convinced from what I know that, without any increase whatever in the staff here or in the expenditure incurred in connection with the department here, this office at Winnipeg could be disposed of by substituting for it a local land office there, such as there are in other portions of the North-West. Certainly the people who have disputes with regard to lands, and who are anxious to have their patents issued, are not likely to favor the continuance of this office. It simply serves to diminish the responsibility of the Minister and to enable him to charge, and in many instances justly charge, the delays that are incident to such a cumbersome system, upon the officer connected with the office in that city. When you look at the question of the North-West Territories, it is perfectly apparent that the office at Winnipeg, unless the seat of Government were removed there, can be of no advantage to the people who are settled hundreds of miles away from the capital of the Prairie Province, and so I think it is to be regretted that the hon. gentleman should, at so early a period of his official career, have come to the conclusion that this office should be maintained in that city. I am satisfied that neither efficiency nor economy is promoted by the maintenance of the office there; that if, in a country so large as the United States, with territories extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the 49th parallel, it is not found necessary to have such an institution, it cannot be necessary to have it in the much more limited area which we find it necessary to administer in connection with our Federal Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would call the attention of the hon. Minister to one particular item. I find that the receipts during last year from the North-West on account of Dominion Lands, from all sources, amounted to $217,083.07, including homesteads, pre-emptions, improvements, general sales of lands, map sales and office fees, inspection fees, cancellation fees, &c., fees for change of entries, surveyors' examination fees, timber dues, grazing lands, stone quarries, mining fees, hay permits, &c., miscellaneous and Rocky Mountains National Park. All these put together amount to $217,033. Now we find that the item which the hon. gentleman is asking the Committee to pass, including the cost of the Land Board at Winnipeg, is $180,000, without contingencies. When you add the contingencies, you virtually swallow up every dollar received from the North-West from every source in connection with the department here and the Land Board in Winnipeg. The contingencies will be over $22,000, making a total of $202,000 for the expenditures, while the receipts from all sources are only $217,000. Can it be necessary to keep a board at Winnipeg and a large staff of officials here for the purpose of doing business which results in a total receipt of $217,000 with an expenditure of $202,000 and only $15,000 left? I think there is a great deal of force in the argument of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that an immediate step should be taken to abolish the office in Winnipeg with its large staff. I believe there are seven or eight homestead inspectors in the North-West. I have been trying to get at the bottom of the duties performed by them. Certainly those duties are not as great as they were a year or two ago, but the same staff is kept on. We have dispensed with one officer, it is true, in connection with the inspection of colonisation companies.

An hon. MEMBER. He is employed in another way.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, it is good to have got rid of him in some way, because his salary would have added at least $3,000 to this estimate. I do not think the Minister can defend the enormous expenses in connection with the management of this department when he looks at the receipts and expenses. Certainly it shows that everything is not sound in Denmark.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I am not able to verify the figures which the hon. gentleman has just quoted, but, if he will allow me a little time, I think I can make a better showing than that. I know that the sum he has just mentioned does not fairly represent what we have received from the North-West lands, because I think the hon. gentleman has not taken into account the amount of scrip paid in for lands, which I think amounts to $300,000 or $400,000, but I am not at present able to say how much. With regard to the homestead inspectors that the hon. gentleman thinks are too numerous, I can only say that the people of the North-West are calling out for more; that their duties are at times very onerous, and that they may be called upon at any time to report on the homestead of any gentleman who is anxious to make application for his patent. So far from there being too many, what I hear is that there are not enough to do the work.

Mr. McMULLEN. The statement of figures which I gave was taken from No. 18, page 48 of the Public Accounts of this year, and I have enumerated all the sources from which the revenue has been obtained. I am not to blame if the Public Accounts are not correct.

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is the cash receipts, and no doubt it is correct.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). At page 103 of these Estimates, it will be seen that the amount the hon. gentleman asks for the Winnipeg office this year is $185,748. I may inform him that I purpose asking for the opinion of the House on that estimate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Over and above these various sums, which make up nearly $300,000, there is an amount of $100,000 asked on capital account for Dominion Lands. Altogether the result is this: That we received in the year 1888, in actual cash, $217,000 from all sources. The scrip to which the hon. Minister alluded is, I presume, simply in payment of obligations incurred to half-breeds and others. That is the case, I think?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not cash in any sense. When you add together these sums of $185,000 for the Commissioner's Office in Winnipeg, and $82,000 on the page we are now considering, and $18,000 for contingencies, and $7,000 for the Minister's own salary, and $100,000 charged on page 110 for capital account, you have a total of $392,000 which the hon. gentleman requires for the service of this department, while we had net receipts last year of only $217,000. I desire to ask the House this question: Only one year and a half is to run until the $58,000,000 which we were promised as the net receipts from the lands of the Dominion to defray the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway will be due, and how is that to be met by receipts of $217,000 a year as against an annual expenditure of $392,000? I think the House would like to have some explanation on that point, and, if the hon. gentleman cannot give it, then the House would like to have the explanation from the First Minister, who promised us this result on—I think it was—the 1st of January, 1891.

Mr. WATSON. In some instances, the inspectors do not do their duty. Last season, I know that the Crown Timber Inspector, who has to do with charging dues for cutting hay on the Government lands, in many cases duplicated the permits, and granted permits over the same ground two or three times, and in one case I know there was almost bloodshed as the one set of men drove out the other with pitchforks. The name of the inspector is Gunn. It has been the same on timber land, that permits granted for cutting wood on Government land have been often duplicated. I call attention to this fact in order that the Minister may instruct his inspectors to be very careful and not to grant more permits for cutting hay or wood than the country will bear.

Department of Indian Affairs ..... $42,415

Mr. FOSTER. The net increase is $1,517.50. There were twenty statutory clerks at $50, one at $30, one at $25, one promotion of a second to a first class, Mr. Scott, $50; and three additional third class clerks at $400. The decreases are: differences in salary of third class clerks, one at $850, one at $612, one at $600, one at $450, allowance to solicitor, $400.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There was an appropriation taken last year for a solicitor. Was a solicitor employed, and what were his duties?

Mr. FOSTER. That sum was paid to the Deputy Minister of Justice, and has been paid to him for years as solicitor for Indian Affairs. It has been dropped this year. I believe he is to have it, but it is to be paid out of the Indian funds. I think it is now paid out of the Consolidated Revenue for the Provinces, and then recouped from the Indian Fund. I am not quite certain about that, and I will look into it further.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was formerly given to the Deputy Minister who acted as legal adviser to the department?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says he was heretofore paid out of the Indian fund. Does he mean that the Indian fund in the old Province of Ontario bore the whole of this expenditure?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot give the full answer to that because I have not looked it up; but it has been paid in some way out of the Indian fund.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister will see that it is very unfair to charge it against the Indian fund of certain of the Provinces. For instance, he might wish to consult with regard to Indian affairs in British Columbia. There is no Indian fund there out of which any portion of this salary could be paid.

Mr. FOSTER. I find that in the earlier part of the item of statements here, it is stated that part of this is paid from Indian Affairs. I do not know whether it is the whole $400, or whether it is payment for part of the year or for the whole year. However, I will get full information on that point.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice there has been a superannuation in connection with the Indian Department last year. Will the hon. gentleman give us some explanation with regard to the appointment that has been made to fill that vacancy? I have noticed that in cases of superannuation, as a rule, the salary given to the incoming servant is not equal to the amount that had been given to the party who was retired. But the rule has not been followed out in this case. I would like to know, first, where was Mr. McPherson, who has been superannuated, located as Indian agent, and how this officer, who has come after him, has been placed in an office at the same salary that Mr. McPherson had when he retired and was put on the list as a superannuated officer?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I am sorry to say I am unable to give the explanation now. It occurred before I took charge of the department. If I had known that the hon. gentleman had wanted the information I could have obtained it for him. Mr. McPherson was superannuated, and I think Mr. Pither was appointed in his place. I will get the information in regard to salaries. Mr. Pither had been an old agent, and, therefore, I presume, he was appointed at the same salary he had been receiving previously. He had been agent at Fort Francis.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have noticed that, as a rule, when superannuations take place a reduction is generally made, and the Government claim that in that way the country saves considerable money. That rule should have been followed out in this case. A man is given a retiring allowance, and another man is put in his place at the same salary.

Mr. FOSTER. But the officer who took the place may have been an old officer at another place, and he would receive the same salary he had been receiving at the place from which he was taken.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What promotions have taken place in the department here?

Mr. FOSTER. Only one promotion, from second to first, Mr. Scott.

Office of the Auditor General. .... $25,825

Mr. FOSTER. There has been a net decrease of $325. There were ten statutory increases, $500; one statutory increase at $25; two second class clerks have been transferred from this department, and two others are to be promoted from the third class at lower salaries to take their places, making in all an increase of $2,175. The decreases are: two second class clerks transferred, making $2,700; one third class clerk, $1,000; less transferred to Audit Office from the Post Office Department, one at $725 and one at $675. Difference in Mr. Patterson's salary, $200.

Department of Finance and Treasury Board... $53,597 50

Mr. FOSTER. In this department there has been a net decrease of $382.50. The increases were, 21 statutory at $50, one $30, total, $1,080. The decreases are, difference between the salaries of Messrs. Stanton and Jenkins, $187.50,

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. Stanton having been transferred to the Fishery Department when Mr. Jenkins, who was private secretary to the Minister, was transferred to the Finance Department. Difference, salaries, Messrs. Nash and Coffin, $275; one third class clerk dropped, $1,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What superannuations occurred in the department?

Mr. FOSTER. Only that of Mr. Nash.

Department of Inland Revenue..... $40,960

Mr. FOSTER. In this department there is a net decrease of $415. The increases are represented by thirteen statutes at $50, one at $25, and two at $30. Additional to Mr. Gerald's salary, $300; additional to Mr. Quain's salary, $200, making $1,235. The decreases are represented by a first class clerkship being omitted, Mr. Lamotte having been superannuated, $1,450, an allowance to Mr. Himsforth, $200, making a total of $1,650. The net decrease is $415.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the cause of that superannuation?

Mr. FOSTER. I think ill-health.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was his age?

Mr. FOSTER. I will ascertain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is he returned in the superannuation list brought down the other day?

Mr. FOSTER. I understand so.

Mr. McMULLEN. Another important superannuation has taken place in that department, that of Mr. Aubin, inspector of gas, with a salary of $2,000. He is given a retiring allowance of $560. The person appointed in his place receives $1,200.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The late inspector of gas was receiving $1,600 a year, and he received a further salary as consulting inspector of $400 per year, making a total of $2,000. He was upwards of 70 years of age, and for the last year has been thoroughly unfit, from illness, to attend to his duty and other officers had to be paid for discharging it. Accordingly he has been superannuated and his place has been filled by an officer with a salary of $1,200.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the Minister can furnish particulars with regard to the superannuation of Mr. Lamotte.

Mr. COSTIGAN. His superannuation arose from the fact that his health entirely failed. He was quite a young man, and his chances for promotion were not only good but he might have confidently expected to have been promoted to a first class clerkship within a short time. He was, however, compelled to leave and to give up his prospects on account of the total failure of his health.

Mr. LANGELIER (Québec). I do not complain of the superannuation of Mr. Aubin who was a very old officer, but I understand that he failed to obtain any addition to the number of years of his service. He was a man of extraordinary ability, being perhaps the most competent man, as regards the inspection of gas, in America. He happened to be appointed in 1876 or 1877 when the law for the inspection of gas was first put into operation. Ever since that time he has fulfilled his duties very efficiently, but on account of old age he could no longer attend to them. I understand a request was made to have done for him what was done in other cases of the same kind, that is to say, on account of the exceptional nature of his service, it was suggested that the Treasury Board might add a number of years to his service in order to give him a larger superannuation allowance. This was not acceded to, and the superannuation allowance is so low that he cannot live on it; I know he has not sufficient to live independently. I should like to know why the addition could not have been given to him as it has been given to other officers not so deserving.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman will have the means of satisfying the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that the retiring allowance is not too high after all. It is quite true that Mr. Aubin represented that he had a fair claim to come under the clause of the Act which provides that, in certain cases, an additional number of years may be added to the actual service of an officer about to be superannuated. The law provides that when a man has attained a certain age and who was taken into the service for special qualifications, that point may be taken into consideration when he retires from the service, and any number of years, not to exceed ten, may be added to his years of actual service in order to increase his retiring allowance. Mr. Aubin had his case considered by the Treasury Board. It is true that years ago a number of years were added to the time of service of certain retiring officers, but I can assure hon. gentlemen that during the last few years the cases in which additions of that kind have been made to retiring officers have been very few indeed and under very exceptional circumstances. Mr. Aubin claimed that he was taken into the service on account of possessing certain special qualifications. That was quite true. On the other hand, the ground on which the Treasury Board based its decision was the very liberal salary paid to this officer during his time of service.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I contend that the fact should be taken into consideration that, when this officer was first appointed, it would have been next to impossible to have organised a system of gas inspection if he had not accepted the position. He left a very lucrative business as an engineer to be useful to the Government. I know, from personal experience of some cases in which he saved a good deal of money. He was an exceptionally competent man, not only for that particular line of business, but for other lines, and he was one of the best mechanical engineers in America. He was an inventor; he was the inventor of a system of gas which bears his name and which, I think, is very largely used in the United States. I believe he deserves some consideration on account of the peculiar circumstances that, when he was appointed, his services were almost indispensable to the Government. I am not far wrong when I say that he went into the service more out of friendship for the gentleman who was then in charge of the department than for any other reason and in order to assist him in the carrying out of the new law. It was not to make profit that he entered the service of the Government, because he was making more money in his own profession than the salary he got from the Government.

Department of Customs.....$35,650

Mr. FOSTER. There are sixteen statutory increases at $50, two promotions from third to second class, $200, making an increase of $1,000 in all.

Mr. CHARLTON. I notice in the report of the Auditor General some rather peculiar revelations with regard to this branch of the service. I see a list here of 115 officers of this department who have largely supplemented their salaries by sharing in Custom house seizures. Six of those gentlemen have received from this source of revenue a larger sum than their salaries amounted to, I will give you a few of those names, with the amount of salaries received by each, and the amount of their emoluments derived from this source of profit in the Custom house. J. D. L. Ambrose, Appraiser, Montreal, salary $1,700, share of Custom house seizures $1,360.83. C. Baker, Appraiser, Toronto, salary $1,400, share of Customs seizures $587.28.

C. Banting, landing waiter, Woodstock, Ont., salary $600, share of Customs seizures $1,280.63, somewhat more than double his salary. Mr. Benson, collector of Customs at Windsor, Ont., salary $1,800, share of Customs seizures $838.04. J. D. Bonness, special preventive officer, salary $900, share of Customs seizures $841.53. Wm. Cowan, Customs clerk, Windsor, Ont., salary $1,200, share of Customs seizures, $573.25. J. Douglas, Customs surveyor, Toronto, salary $2,000, share of Customs seizure, $321.41. A. Drouillard, landing waiter of Windsor, Ont., salary, $500, share of Customs seizures $644.53. George Frye, Customs surveyor, Victoria, B. C., salary $1,800, share of Customs seizures $1,529.01. A. Girard, Customs clerk, Montreal, salary $800, share of Customs seizures, $1,307.75. J. A. Gross, special Customs officer, salary $1,200, share of Customs seizures, $1,902.23. T. A. Heffernane, collector of Customs, Guelph, salary $1,200, share of Customs seizures, $507.50. R. Hunter, sub-collector of Customs, Stickeen, salary $1,600, share of Customs seizures, $457.11. H. Jokish, Customs clerk, Montreal, salary $900, share of Customs seizures $712.02. J. W. Laing, preventive officer, Windsor, Ont., salary $550, share of Customs seizures, $284.17. C. W. Lewis, landing waiter, Fort Erie, salary $600, share of Customs seizures $417.18. A. R. Milne, Customs appraiser, Victoria, B. C., salary $1,600, share of Customs seizures $5,555.54. S. W. McMichael, Customs financial inspector, salary $1,600, share of Customs seizures $6,020.84. J. C. Newbury, Customs clerk, Victoria, B. C., salary $1,000, share of Customs seizures $500. W. J. O'Hara, chief Customs clerk, Montreal, salary $2,000, share of Customs seizures, $1,641.07. P. J. O'Keefe, special Customs agent, salary $1,200; share of Customs seizures $641.41. Thomas Sargent, Customs appraiser Toronto, salary $1,600; share of Customs seizures $312.82. J. Shaughnessy, special preventive officer, salary $600, share of Customs seizures $536.06. J. A. Van Ingen, Customs collector, Woodstock, Ontario, salary $1,200, share of Customs seizures $1,280.63. R. G. Warren, Customs officer, Fort Erie, salary $1,050, share of Customs seizures, $454.91. These are a few instances collected from this list of 115 officers of Customs who largely supplement their salaries, and in some cases get two or three times as much as their salaries amount to from their share of Customs seizures. I imagine that those officers are specially careful to discharge that particular part of their business, and that their energies will be directed mainly to the business of making seizures. It strikes me that there is danger that these men may in some cases entrap importers into difficulties of this kind for the purpose of pouncing upon them and making seizures of their invoices so as to get their portion of the spoil. It occurs to me that this is a most vicious system. It must, I imagine, lead on the part of these officers to a particular care that they will discharge this kind of duty which neither the public nor the Government expect of them. I hear in various parts of the country complaints as to the characteristics of the Customs officers. It is said that they are in the habit of treating importers as men who are natural-born scoundrels requiring to be watched, and not entitled to the ordinary business courtesy that one business man extends to another. This system is practically productive of such a result. It is exactly the system to create a class of officials in the service who will be exacting, tyrannical and inclined to make seizures upon the slightest pretext. The importer is, in a measure, at the mercy of these officers. He presents his invoices, and if the official chooses to make a seizure the importer has no remedy. The case is referred of course to the head of the department, who will naturally feel inclined to sustain his own officials, and, in the great majority of cases, will do so when the circumstances will give the least excuse for doing so.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. The system promotes tyrannical conduct on the part of the officials of the Government. It is in every respect a most vicious system, and these men will pay more attention to their own interest in the matter of making seizures than they will to the public interest. Wherever it is possible for them they will prey upon the individuals who are so unfortunate as to be called upon to do business with them. I hold that these men should be debarred from participating in the profits of those seizures. It is no part of their duty, and it has the tendency to prevent them faithfully discharging their real duties. I do not believe that any great commercial country in the world encourages a system of this kind which is in force in the Customs Department of this country, and I think it is desirable that a change should be made in the regulations of the Customs Department in this respect.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I quite agree with most of the remarks made by my hon. friend on the other side of the House in connection with this matter. This system is a most vicious one, and living, as I do, on the frontier, I have an opportunity of knowing it. I may say that some of those officers whose names have been read out, appear in last year's Public Accounts as deriving not less than $11,000 in the shape of seizures, salaries and travelling expenses. Some of them $9,000. They are planted everywhere in this country, and they deal very unfairly with importers. I have known them in my town to go in and compel druggists to remove the bottles from their shelves, and to make them go to the cellars and spend two days' time in unearthing invoices for years back, without discovering one jot or tittle of evidence that they were dishonest in their dealings. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that some check should be put upon men whose only object is to have this power placed in their hands, in order to get money out of the public whether rightly or wrongly.

Mr. FOSTER. If a discussion is to be raised on this subject, had we not better let it stand until the Minister is present.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no objection to let it stand after I make my brief statement. I am much obliged to my hon. friend on my right for bringing this matter up. It will be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen who were in the last House, and those who were in the previous House, that ever since the Consolidated Customs Act was passed in 1882 or 1883, I fought, step by step, and stage by stage its objectionable features, the most objectionable feature of which was this very feature of allowing the officials of the Customs houses to participate in the seizure of goods. Hon. gentlemen have mentioned some cases, and it would take all night to repeat the history of the gross acts of injustice that have been perpetrated—not against the roguish importers, but against many of the most honest importers in the Dominion. Some of the first men in trade in Montreal have been arraigned before the courts on the merest possible suspicion, and these men have been discredited before the public. There have been, occasionally, cases where frauds have been discovered, and it was the business of these officials to find those out, whether they participated in the profits or not. But I will relate a case which is worse than any of them. There was the celebrated case of Ayers & Co., in which the seizures amounted to over $400,000, and in which the profits to those officers, it is said, would have been nearly $100,000. They allowed Messrs. Ayers & Co., after they had gone to the department and told them what they were doing, and asked their opinion about the construction of the statute—allowed them to go on, year after year, and import goods and enter them, as stated, and accepted by the department, and then came down and seized those goods from them, although they had full knowledge of the fact, after years of such entries.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. MULOCK. And so did the Minister know it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, the Minister knew it; and they allowed them to import those goods until they amounted to $400,000 or $500,000, and then they came down and closed up the establishment, took the company's books, papers and property, and discredited them before the world, not only on this side of the line, but on the other; and if these men had not been in the strongest and wealthiest position, the company would possibly have been brought to ruin. That case was tried in the Supreme Court of the Dominion, and I refer you to the shorthand notes of what the Chief Justice of that court said of Mr. O'Hara, who occupies a prominent position in the Custom house of Montreal, and who was to participate in this large amount of money. There you can see what Chief Justice Ritchie says, using the strongest possible language of condemnation of those men for leading a respectable firm on year after year with the knowledge that they were entering goods in a certain way, with the knowledge of the Government and its officers, and as they, the importers believed, according to the statute. I am sorry the hon. Minister of Customs is not here. I regret to say this behind his back; but he knows that time and again I have addressed him from my place in this House about the iniquities of this system, not only during the passage of the Act, but also last year, and every time the Customs Act has come up. It is time that this injustice should be put a stop to; and while I quite agree with the hon. Finance Minister that it would be well to have this matter stand over until the responsible officer is here, yet when the matter was started, feeling that I had for years endeavored to get these abuses remedied, I felt it my duty to add my voice against the iniquitous system perpetrated by these officers, and which is sanctioned and allowed by the Government of the day.

Department of Postmaster General..... $184,960

Mr. FOSTER. In this department there is a net decrease of $715. The increases are 134 statutes at $50, twelve at $30, two first class clerks $2,800, one second class clerk at $1,100, making $10,960. The decreases are one chief clerk $2,400, one chief clerk for three months who has been superannuated $600, difference in salary $400, two second class clerks $2,800, difference in salaries of nineteen clerks $5,399, difference in salaries of four packers $150, making the total decrease $11,675.

Mr. CHARLTON. There is one matter, I presume, I might as well bring to the attention of the hon. Postmaster General now as at any other time, that is, in reference to letters not sufficiently prepaid. Under the regulation of the department at present, such letters are sent to the dead letter office, and a notice is sent to the party to whom the letter is addressed that a letter is there, and he is required to send the deficiency in postage to the dead letter office, and after a good deal of circumlocution he gets his letter. It seems to me it is a very absurd system. It strikes me it would be better to send the letter to the person to whom it is addressed with the shortage stated upon it, and require him to pay it. It may be a letter of importance, and it appears to me that it would serve the department as well to take that course.

Mr. HAGGART. That matter I have been considering for some time. You will remember that in a debate in the House the present system was insisted upon for this reason, that it was felt that it would not be judicious to trust clerks in the post offices, who might be acquainted with individuals to whom letters were addressed, and allow them to open letters, and it was decided that it was better to send them to a central office and have them redirected. The difficulty could be got over by another system, that is, the American system. Under that system, if a letter is insufficiently prepaid, notice is sent from the place where it is posted to the individual to whom the letter is addressed, stating that upon his remittance of the amount necessary to cover the postage the letter will be forwarded. The objection to that plan is that it is impossible to keep track of the accounts of the different offices throughout the country, and the expense of keeping these small accounts far exceeds the amount of revenue collected.

Mr. CHARLTON. If there is so much difficulty in settling this matter, probably the better way would be just to send the letter on. I do not suppose the department would lose more than a few dollars at the utmost by doing so.

Mr. HAGGART. The same objection would apply if the letter were sent on not sufficiently prepaid, and the office at which it arrived was given the duty of collecting the sum of money. Accounts would have to be kept and considerable difficulty would arise in that respect.

Mr. CHARLTON. Has no account to be kept in the case of a dead letter?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes; they are under direct control here, and there is a check which is the simplest and cheapest that possibly could be adopted.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is a system that entails great loss of time in the delivery of the letter. It seems to me it involves a great amount of clerical work to send a letter to the dead letter office, then to send word to the person to whom the letter is addressed requiring him to write a letter to the dead letter office covering a remittance, and finally to send on the letter. I do not understand why the shortage could not be charged to the person to whom the letter is addressed, and require the post office of his locality to collect it.

Mr. HAGGART. I am considering that question at present for the purpose of reaching a solution.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that in former times the custom suggested by my hon. friend was adopted without material inconvenience. That was to send forward letters that were insufficiently prepaid, provided they had any stamp on them at all, and the shortage was collected from the parties to whom they were addressed. That did not add materially to the expense of the post office.

Mr. HAGGART. It did not, but, unfortunately, it added a good deal to the cost of getting returns from the different post offices, which was greatly in excess of the extra amount collected.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is the first time we have had an opportunity of addressing the hon. gentleman in relation to his department, and as his appointment is one of the few which the Government has made in past years that I approve of—there are one or two more, but they are not very numerous,—I take this opportunity of asking him what truth there is in the rumor which has appeared in some Government papers in relation to making a uniform rate of postage between Canada and the United States. It was stated in the Government organs the Postmaster General was considering the desirability of reducing the postage in Canada, from three to two cents so as to make it uniform with that of the United States. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us what progress he has made in that direction.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman was not in the House, perhaps, yesterday or the day before, when the question was asked and I answered it. I stated that it was not at present the intention of the Government to reduce the postage from three to two cents.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am very sorry for it. I would like to see so popular a man as my hon. friend, I believe, will make himself, inaugurate his promotion to so important an office by making a reform which would be so much appreciated by the general public.

Mr. ELLIS. I perceive quite a difference in the way the Estimates are brought down this year compared with last. Last year they were all under sub-heads; this year they are grouped together. Does that point to a change in the mode of carrying on business in the Post Office.

Mr. HAGGART. No.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Before we leave the question of postage and the reduction of rates, I would ask the hon. the Postmaster General if he has considered the propriety of increasing the weight of a letter from half an ounce to an ounce? I think the American system allows an ounce instead of half an ounce for the two cents. I think he might perhaps see his way towards making that concession in the public interest. I presume it would not involve a very large sacrifice, and, in many cases, it would be found a convenience to business men.

Mr. HAGGART. There are a good many changes proposed, which I intend to introduce in a Bill this Session, and I may tell the hon. gentleman that the change suggested by him is one of those I intend to adopt.

Mr. LANGEЛИER (Quebec) I would draw the attention of the hon. the Postmaster General to a great complaint with reference to dutiable mail matter. Formerly the duties were collected at the Post Office, but now they are collected at the Custom house. A book, for instance, comes through the mail from a foreign country, which is worth about 25 cents. Instead of delivering the book to the party to whom it is addressed and collecting the duty from him at the Post Office, the party receives through the Post Office a notice from the Custom house informing him that there is a dutiable package for him at the Custom house. He has, therefore, to go to the Custom house, which is often a mile or more away, and pay cab hire there and back, besides the 15 per cent. duty, all to obtain a book which is worth about 25 cents. I do not blame the Postmaster General for this system, and I am glad to say that, on my writing to him on the subject, he answered that he shared my views. I saw in some of the papers that the system had been put an end to, but very lately it was applied to myself, so that it is evidently still in existence. I am quite sure it costs the Government three times more than they get from it. I have taken the trouble to get information as to how it is worked. The last book I received through the mail I paid eight cents duty on, and in order to collect that the Government had to make the following entries:—At the post office, after the book arrived, the post office people had to get a receipt from the Custom house officer to whom it was sent. That officer had to make an entry in his books of his receipt of the book; then he had to write a note to me informing me that such a book was there. That notice was sent through the post office. After receiving it I paid twenty-five cents to go to the Custom house and twenty-five cents to return, and all to get a book worth fifty cents. I do not see that there can be much difficulty in altering the system. One of the post office clerks might be entrusted with the duty of collecting those small amounts.

Mr. BURDETT. I would take the liberty of suggesting to the hon. the Postmaster General, the propriety of having the postmasters, in places where the people have boxes, to place in those boxes all unstamped letters, which bear on their face the names of the parties sending them, in order that those parties might sufficiently stamp them, or where the parties are going to the post office two, three or four times a day, to notify them that their letters are insufficiently stamped. It not unfrequently happens in matters of importance, where persons or firms have important matters to attend to, that there is insufficient postage, and, before the letters reach them from the dead letter office, the time for attending to the important matter has passed. It has happened in my own case that letters containing important legal documents have been insufficiently stamped, sometimes a week has elapsed before I would hear from the dead letter office; and the rule might come up on the second day after the notice was mailed, and had consequently been delayed.

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), I may say that there is a great deal in what he has stated as to the annoyance which has been caused by such practices as those to which he referred. I have been endeavoring to remedy that, but there has been a good deal of difficulty in consequence of the friction between the Post Office Department and the Customs.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am sorry to hear that there is trouble in the Cabinet.

Mr. HAGGART. We have been trying to arrange this matter satisfactorily, and I propose to introduce in the Bill which I intend to move this Session two clauses to remedy the difficulty which the hon. gentleman speaks of. As to the point raised by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Burdett), I have given instructions to the postmasters that, where the senders' name is on the envelope when there is not sufficient postage, and the senders have boxes in the city, they are to give notice to them and allow them to put on the stamp and then let the letter be forwarded.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice that there were 17 superannuations in this department last year. A year ago I asked the Postmaster General to find out the amount that had been allowed to the postmaster at Victoria, who was superannuated last year in order to make room for an hon. gentleman who once sat in this House. He stated that the superannuation allowance and the salary granted would not exceed the amount which had been paid to the postmaster in that city. I find that the postmaster was getting $2,400 a year salary, and that the Government have allowed him $672 as a retiring allowance. They are paying the new postmaster $2,000 a year, so that the amount now paid is $2,672, whereas it was only $2,400 before. I find that there have been no less than 64 superannuations this year, and that the superannuation fund has been drawn on to the extent of $27,000 for the superannuations of this year, in addition to those of last year. As I said, there were 17 superannuations in the Post Office Department, and I see that there are eleven positions occupied by parties who were superannuated which have yet to be filled. I desire to know if it is the intention of the Postmaster General to fill all the vacancies created by superannuation, or if it is the intention to abolish some of them?

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. gentleman mean that there is a difference of eleven vacancies between the Estimates and the number of clerks I have? I do not require so many third-class clerks as I did before. I think, though, that those to whom the hon. gentleman is referring are the ocean mail clerks, who were superannuated, as there was no further use for them. That was something which took place before I entered into office. I do not remember more than one superannuation since I have been in the office.

Mr. BURDETT. While thanking the Postmaster General for having already acted upon the suggestion which I brought forward, I would call his attention to another matter which has been the subject of some correspondence between myself and his department, and I think also with the Principal of the Deaf and Dumb Institute at Belleville, as to the rate of postage which is charged upon the examination questions and answers of the pupils in that and similar institutions. The only means that parents, who have children who are unfortunate enough to be born deaf and dumb, have to know what progress they make is by being able to scan the questions and answers of their children during the time they are pupils at the institute. Formerly the questions and answers were to be permitted to be sent through the post office at a very low rate—I think one cent. That practice prevailed for some years, and was found eminently satisfactory. A different system has recently been adopted, by which a much higher rate has been charged on these questions and answers. They are, you may say, in the shape of printed or manuscript matter, and the charge to the Government would be very small if they permitted them to go to the parents from the institute, under the hand of the principal, free of postage, or at most for one cent postage. It certainly is a matter which I believe should engage the attention of the hon. gentleman. These institutes through the country are doing a large amount of good. A great many young people, afflicted or deprived of certain faculties as they have been, are being educated, informed and made useful and prosperous citizens by means of these institutes. The Provincial Governments have been at great expense in building and maintaining these institutes, and so far they have worked well in the interest of the country and of the pupils. I believe the Principal of the Belleville Institute has corresponded with the Postmaster General on this matter, and I ask the hon. gentleman to consider it as he is considering other matters in his department, and to have an order passed by which the questions put to the pupils by their teachers in the institute and the answers to the questions may be sent home to the parents of the children either free of postage or at a very low postage rate. I do not believe that any member of this House or any man in the country would take exception to such a course. It is a matter in which we are all interested as citizens, and we all ought to be willing that the Postmaster General should permit these questions and answers to be sent home to the parents of the children as cheaply as possible, if not free. No abuse could arise, in my opinion, if they were sent free, because they could be sent under the frank of the principals, and they are men whose characters are above reproach, and who are above making any improper use of any authority which might be given to them in this way. I had intended to move for returns of correspondence on this matter, but possibly it is more convenient for the hon. gentleman and myself to mention it now, and it will occupy less time.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not at present remember what the correspondence was, but the duties of the Postmaster General are ministerial, they are fixed by statute, and he cannot make exceptions. It would be a dangerous power to give him.

Mr. BURDETT. But I understand the hon. gentleman is going to change the statute.

Mr. HAGGART. I am; but I have not thought of this matter in connection with it.

Mr. BURDETT. I hope you will.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like the Postmaster General to state exactly what is done with a sum of $162,000, which I dare say he will remember is carried forward to the credit of next year. The actual deficit in the working of the Post Office for 1888, as he, no doubt, is aware, was $729,000. But by bringing forward a certain sum which appears there to have been retained, as I understand, by certain of the post office officials, five-quarters, so to speak, are put into the year 1888. Now, what I particularly want to know is whether that money has been paid into the Treasury whereas it formerly was not paid in, or whether it simply exists in the form of an alteration in the book accounts. The reason I ask is because I notice in the statement of the Post Office in the Public Accounts that the total sum deposited to the credit of the Receiver General up to the 30th June, 1888, is $2,216,000, and immediately below there is this sum of $162,000, which he will find on page 16 of the Public Accounts, No. 3. Immediately below is this sum, which, so far as I can understand, does not appear to have been placed to the credit of the Receiver General, or to have come in cash.

Mr. HAGGART. The balance due by the postmasters throughout the country, the alteration of the time at which they made their returns, threw five quarters into one year instead of four.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman has not looked into it, it can be investigated in the Public Accounts Committee; I just mention to him what I want to understand. Apparently from this statement, all that actually went to the credit of the Receiver General was the sum I stated, and I want to know whether the other sum has gone in cash, or whether it simply exists in the form of a book credit? He can let me know when we meet in the Public Accounts.

Mr. HAGGART. I will let you know. It must be a cash sum, I think, because it is included in the revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It does not so appear in this case.

Department of Agriculture..... $56,270

Mr. FOSTER. There is a net increase of $5,050. There were 17 statutory increases, two at $25, two at $30, and one at $20. Additional to Mr. Johnson, statistician, $600; additional to Mr. Pope, $550; two promotions from third to second class, $200; new third class clerks, one at $500, one at $450, four at $730. The decreases are made up of difference between Mr. Low's and Small's salaries, $475; two third-class clerks not filled, $800; one packer, not filled, $300; difference between Mr. Small's and Mr. Lynch's salaries, $575. Total decrease, $2,150, leaving a net increase of $5,050. It is only fair to state that a large part of this increase is made up by a decrease in contingencies, some of these being officers who have long been employed and paid from contingencies, and who have in this estimate been made permanent, the sums being deducted from the contingencies as the House will see.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I would like some explanation as to the increase in Mr. Johnson's salary. And why did the Government deem it necessary to increase his salary? It would appear that he has not been in the service very long, and therefore could hardly claim that he was entitled to that increase.

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Johnson was employed in the first instance at the salary we now vote for him. He filled the place of Mr. Layton, who was at the head of that branch before he died, some 12 months ago. Mr. Layton's salary was $1,800, but the salary given to Mr. Johnson was $2,400, the maximum of a chief clerk. Mr. Johnson is one of our very best statisticians, and we thought his services well worth the amount of money we give him. He was paid that last year.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Am I to understand that the previous officer who occupied that position was not an efficient officer? That he did not do his work well? If he did his work well why was he paid less than Mr. Johnson is paid?

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Layton, the previous officer, was certainly a very good man, a very efficient man, but he had not the general knowledge and information in regard to statistics that Mr. Johnson has. I believe there is no man in Canada who has more general knowledge as to statistics than Mr. Johnson, and we were glad to secure his services at the head of that particular branch.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are two alterations here of considerable moment. I see a reduction of $400 here under the heading of chief clerk. Has an officer been superannuated?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Small comes up and becomes chief clerk and secretary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What has become of the previous chief clerk?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Taché was superannuated, Mr. Lowe went in deputy head, and Mr. Small took his place.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the cause of the increase of the deputy commissioner of patents? Last year $2,250 were asked for him, and now $2,800, an increase of $550.

Mr. CARLING. That was the salary that was paid to the late Mr. Cambie, and the Act passed last Session fixed the salary of the deputy commissioner of patents at $2,800. Mr. Cambie only received this salary mentioned by the hon. gentleman. He was voted the difference between the salary of Mr. Cambie, and the vote fixed last year by Act of Parliament.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Who is the officer now?

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Pope.

Mr. McMULLEN. What Pope is that?

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Had this Pope been in the service before?

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). What position did he occupy in the service?

Mr. CARLING. He was Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Oh, I think I have heard of him, then. Would the Minister give us to understand that it is on account of services rendered to the Government that he receives his increased salary, or that he was simply transferred from one position to another in order to give him an increased salary?

Mr. CARLING. This is not an increase of salary. This is the amount voted him last Session by an Act passed by Parliament.

Mr. WILSON. Did he get it last Session?

Mr. CARLING. He was paid it last year.

Mr. WILSON. I understood that this increased amount of $550 was not asked from the House, that the item was dropped. We so understood it, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. gentleman shakes his head. If the Government feel that Mr. Pope did them a special service we may yet find that the Ministers have paid it out of their own pockets, recognising, as they ought to recognise, the fact that Mr. Pope did them a special service. I repeat that I understood that the item was dropped. If during last year only $2,250 was voted, how can the Minister state that they paid Mr. Pope an increased sum of $550? I should like to have the hon. gentleman explain the matter.

Mr. CARLING. The best explanation I can give I have already given, namely, that his salary was fixed by Act of Parliament at $2,800, and he has been paid that salary in accordance with that Act.

Mr. MILLS. Was he appointed at that time?

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite aware that the statement made by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wilson) is correct. Last year a Bill was brought in; a very extended discussion took place over it, and the result was that the First Minister, who is not now in his place, withdrew the Bill in order to get on with business, and it was not again brought before the House.

Mr. FOSTER. It was the previous year it was dropped out of the Estimates.

Mr. McMULLEN. No, it was last year; I would not be certain, but my impression is so. This is the third attempt to increase the salary of Mr. Pope, and I would suggest that if the Government wish to get through a vote to increase his salary in the present Parliament, the best course they can adopt, in view of our recollection of the irregularities in the gazetting of members, is to change his name, and then they may possibly be able to get through quietly a Bill to increase his salary. It is undoubtedly objectionable to the Opposition to be asked to quietly consent to an increase in the case of this man. We have very vivid recollections of the irregularities in the gazetting of members after the last election, and we cannot be expected to forget or forgive the conduct of that man. It is our duty to bring the matter pointedly before the House as well as before the country in order to warn any man who permits himself to be made the tool of any Government for the time being that his case will receive special attention when he applies to Parliament for an increase of salary. We do not want unreasonably to pounce on Mr. Pope, but we cannot forgive and will not forget for years his action in regard to the gazetting. We have now the same strong objection to granting an increase to his salary as we had when it was brought before the House before. It appears on the face of it as a reward for conduct decidedly objectionable to us although it might be pleasing to hon. gentlemen opposite, and it cannot be expected that we will quietly sit and permit a Bill or resolution to pass and to forget and forgive the injustice done to us at the last election in the gazetting of the returns of representatives of the people. It is quite clear that that gentleman has been removed from the position he occupied owing to the irregularities having taken place, and had he continued to discharge the duties of Clerk of the Crown in Chancery we would have looked forward to similar irregularities occurring again. The First Minister deemed it to be his duty to remove him and give him another position, and then he brought a resolution before the House to increase Mr. Pope's salary. That resolution was withdrawn when first presented; whether it was passed last Session I am not positive, but I am under the impression it was not. At any rate we cannot be expected to sit quietly here and allow an increase to be granted to a man for whom we have the utmost contempt for the course taken by him in connection with the gazetting of the returns of members at the last election.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is greatly to be regretted that this party should have been retained in the public service. Two years ago his conduct was made the subject of discussion; an explanation was demanded from him by the House for his gross disregard of the provisions of the Election Law and of his duties under that law. He sent down to the House a statement utterly devoid of truth, one which upon the face of it disclosed the fact that he had the effrontery to make an indecently false statement to this House. The Government came down a few weeks later with a proposal to add $400 or $500 to Mr. Pope's salary, to increase his salary as Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, to increase the salary of a man who showed such utter disregard of the duties which devolve upon him under the law. It was perfectly obvious to every member on both sides of the House that this proposed increase of Mr. Pope's salary was a reward for his misconduct in office, that there was an attempt made on the part of hon. gentlemen who sit upon the Treasury benches to reward a man who was guilty of this conduct and who by that malfeasance of office had interfered with the rights and liberties of the electors of this country. There can be no doubt of that. We find then, Sir, when the Government were compelled on that occasion to withdraw the proposal to increase Mr. Pope's salary in order to get along with the public business, that they undertake to keep what seems to be their engagements with Mr. Pope by transferring him from that office to another office and by increasing his salary from $2,250 to $2,800. Now, I say that a grosser and more flagrant act of misconduct on the part of a public officer cannot well be conceived; a gross act of misconduct that is only surpassed by the proposition of the Government to reward him for his misconduct in this particular way. I regret, Sir, that the duty of submitting an estimate of this sort should devolve upon the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Agriculture. I am of opinion, and I hope I do the hon. gentleman no more than justice to say, that his sense of justice must have revolted at a proposition of this sort. Why, Sir, every member in this House knows that Mr. Pope, under the Act, is required to gazette the returns of members to this House in the order in which he receives them. Every member on both sides of this House knows that Mr. Pope did not do that. We know that he did this: that he purposely withheld the returns which he received from being gazetted, and that the result was that he gave, in some instances, those who were opposed to the members returned at least thirty days longer than the law gave them to protest the elections. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) was not gazetted for four weeks after the returns received by Mr. Pope, and I myself was not gazetted for upwards of four weeks after that return was in his hands. Other hon. gentlemen were treated in exactly the same way. There were eighty members on this side of the House who were not gazetted as the law required they should be gazetted. We suppose that this House represents the people. We suppose that the electors are upon a footing of equality, and that the members returned to this House are upon a footing of equality before the law. I ask the hon. gentlemen opposite to put themselves in our places. Our whole system of responsible government is a system of forbearance. It is necessary that the hon. gentlemen who command the majority in this House should deal fairly and honestly with those who are in the minority, and that they, above all others, should see that the protection that the law intended should be given to the minority, is extended to them. I want to know in what way those hon. gentlemen who sit upon the Treasury benches have discharged this part of their duty. I want to know if they were on this side of the House, and we were on that side of the House, whether they would be willing that the opportunities for contesting their elections should be extended for three or four weeks beyond the time fixed by law. I want to know whether they would be satisfied with the conduct of this public officer who is sworn to discharge the duties that the law imposes upon him, and that the First Minister who would lead us should enter into a contract with that officer, that he should disregard his oath of office, that he should deal unfairly and unjustly with the Opposition, and that he should extend the time that the law gave for enquiring into the due returns of these members, and that he should receive a reward of $400 or $500 a year as compensation for his infamy and misconduct in that matter. This is in effect what the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House have done, and this is in effect what the Administration has made the hon. Minister of Agriculture do in this instance. The hon. Minister says that this appropriation was provided for by law. If it were so it would not be in those estimates. It would be a statutory appropriation.

Mr. CARLING. It is a statutory appropriation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then it should not be here. The hon. gentleman will see that he is giving to this officer $550,000.

An hon. MEMBER. Take off the thousand.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I should say $550 a year more than he received before; more than the officer who preceded him in office, and more than is given to any chief clerk in any other department of the Government. Why, Sir, what construction is to be put upon that? It is simply this: that this officer, or any public officer who chooses to be guilty of malfeasance in office as a servant of the Government, and in the interest of the Government, and against the opponents of the Government, may look to the Government for the reward of his infamy. I, Sir, as a representative of the people in this House, protest against this conduct. I protest against it as utterly subversive of the principles of parliamentary government, and I trust that no hon. gentleman on this side of the House, who wishes to see the law fairly administered will give his countenance and support to a proposition that is so monstrous in itself.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If it is a statutory allowance that $2,800 must be given to the occupant of that office, but the gentleman who now occupies it should never have been appointed. That is the ground we take. We hold on this side of the House, and we think gentlemen on the other side of the House should hold, that when a public servant has been convicted of such dereliction of duty amounting to a positive malfeasance of office as that gentleman was proved to have been guilty of on the floor of this Parliament, he should be punished, and when it was impossible for any Minister in the House to rise to defend his conduct or a single soul of all the supporters of the Government to say one word in justification of what he had done, then, Sir, I say it was conclusively proved that he was not a fit subject for promotion. It is an outrage on this Parliament and nothing short of an outrage. It is an outrage on decency that the Government should come down with a proposition to raise the salary of this individual.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And to make him a judge too.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) Sir, consider the position he was in. Occupying a judicial office and sworn to do his duty, he received the returns sent to him by the different returning officers. His sworn duty was to gazette the returns of those members as they came to him. It was evident on the face of it that instead of doing what the law required, he selected the Conservatives and gazetted their returns immediately, but in the case of the Liberals, the opponents of the Government, he deliberately let their returns lie for week after week, week after week, and week after week, till it ran to three or four weeks in some cases. I, myself, on coming to Parliament, had to take the precaution to bring the certificate of the returning officer in my pocket, for I was not sure whether I would be permitted on the floor of this House at all, my return not having been gazetted until, I believe, the Saturday before the House opened. Sir, it is not personal animosity in this case, but the interest of the country demands that this matter shall be denounced. It is only common justice, and the purity of the country demands that this thing shall be denounced, and denounced at every Session and at every opportunity as long as the Government persist in what they are now doing. Why, Sir, the Minister told us to-night in reference to another gentleman who occupied a position in the Civil Service that he had been reduced from the rank of chief clerk to a lower rank. Then, Sir, there is such a thing as promotion by way of degradation of rank known to the Government. I would ask what the gentleman was guilty of, that he was lowered to an inferior rank? I am not in a position to say what he was guilty of, but I venture to say it was impossible for him to have been guilty of a fouler transaction than this man was guilty of whose salary we are now asked to increase. I make these remarks, and I make them somewhat warmly, not on my own account, for I have no feeling of revenge against him, but I say he outraged the principles of common fairness, of common justice, and of common decency. It is little short of an outrage on Parliament to ask us to increase his salary as a reward for such services as he may have rendered in the interest of anyone be he who he might. The Government should be above taking advantage of services rendered in such a way. But, Sir, when we find they were sitting there without defending the man who was not present to defend himself, we were forced to attack him. He had committed the offence, and their duty was to have defended him if his conduct was capable of defence. Incapable of defending him, as they proved themselves to be, I ask what is their effrontery in coming forward and asking this Parliament, year after year, to sanction an increase of salary to that man, whose conduct not one of them dared to defend when it was challenged in this House.

Mr. TUPPER. I think hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly the two hon. gentlemen who last addressed this Committee, have entirely forgotten the facts connected with the case they pretend now to discuss. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has stated that, so far as his recollection went, nothing had been said on this side of the House, when this man's conduct was arraigned and when his character was violently assailed, as it has been assailed to-night, on a basis largely and chiefly composed of the suspicions of hon. gentlemen opposite. Just after they came from the country, smarting under a defeat, and found themselves to their surprise and chagrin in a very large minority, those gentlemen suspected that some man must have been guilty of great misconduct for their being placed in such a position; and when they found that certain prominent hon. gentlemen on the ministerial side of the House were first gazetted, and many prominent gentlemen on the other side were gazetted later, their suspicion was that that must have been the result of a plot.

Some hon. MEMBERS. So it was.

Mr. TUPPER. Hon. gentlemen have no proof of that. They sat there as a responsible Opposition. They sat there with certain powers under the Rules of this House, and to this day they have been able to do no more than produce those returns in the Gazette, and on that basis charge this man with all the crimes in the calendar. I was able myself on that occasion to point out—as merely a coincidence, and to show that their presumption was not altogether sound—that because these returns appeared in the way they described them, misconduct or malfeasance occurred—I was able to point out that, in 1874, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, the same irregularities to some extent occurred; prominent members on their side of the House were first gazetted, and prominent members in the Opposition were gazetted last. I pointed out that there were many hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—myself and my colleague from Pictou among the number—who were gazetted among the last, although our returns were received among the first. I was not suspicious of the existence of the reason which hon. gentlemen opposite suspected, and yet I had just as much right so to do. I think it unfair, unmanly, and beneath the dignity of members of this House to charge this man in the way these hon. gentlemen have done. He has not had a fair trial, and has not been proved guilty.

Mr. McMULLEN. Why not give a commission?

Mr. TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman keep cool? What I say is that until that charge is brought home to that officer in a proper, British, manly way, these hon. gentlemen should satisfy themselves with their suspicion, and keep that suspicion to themselves. Why, after several years have elapsed since all these horrible misdeeds have occurred, are we treated with these charges again? Why do hon. gentlemen fling them again and again before the people? They repeated them on the hustings in various Provinces, and a great deal of space has been occupied in the newspapers with them, and why should the business of the country be delayed while they repeat the old charges and rake up an old debate that is gone and past? The House has expressed its opinion on the matter; the people, on different occasions, have expressed their opinion; and the result has been the same in the country as in the House. The majority of the bye-elections have sustained the Government; the Government is responsible for this man, and the House has declared its opinion on the question.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am certainly somewhat surprised at the coolness and effrontery of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper). Sir, he does credit to his ancestor who could with the boldest effrontery get up and call white black and black white. I had great respect for that hon. gentleman's audacity as for his ability, and I am gratified to find in the hon. gentleman a worthy descendant of his father. For a young gentleman to get up in this House and coolly charge hon. gentlemen on this side with first bringing charges that were baseless—

Mr. TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. True, there was no charge tried, Government refused a committee to try it; but when this matter first came up charges were boldly made against both the officer and against the Government. It will be in the memory of the House that I stated that I believed that the First Minister, and I told him so at the time, was at the bottom of this plot, in order to try to get myself and others protested against by having our returns kept back for over four weeks after the time they should have been gazetted. Does the hon. gentleman not know that when this very thing occurred, the conduct of this officer was arraigned? He speaks of the thing as having been passed over and tried several Sessions ago. This is only the third Session of this Parliament. We did arraign that officer. We could not arraign the Government, because they had not then been guilty of the outrageous audacity of promoting and increasing the salary of the man who was guilty of that misconduct, but they did so promote him last Session and attempted to increase his salary in which latter they failed. The hon. gentleman says the Government have been sustained in the bye-elections, and on this ground believes that the country has condoned the iniquitous act. We all know that a bye-election is no test of the opinion of the people, because with the powers the Government possess they have always the advantage, and yet they have been beaten in several cases; and my hon. friend gets up and gives that as a reason why this matter should not be brought up to-day. Does the hon. gentleman not know that a committee was moved for by gentlemen on this side of the House last Session, and that that committee was refused by gentlemen occupying seats on the Treasury benches? It comes with a bad grace from the members of the Government to charge us with bringing up an old thing that had been tried and settled, for it has not been tried and it has not been settled. I want to say to the hon. members of the Cabinet that I intend to bring up this question every Session until justice be done to hon. members on this side, and the criminals, whoever they may be, punished. The regular Opposition here may take what course they like, but I tell this House that, every Session, while I hold a seat in it I shall arraign at the bar of public opinion the party that contributed to reward, and the Administration that rewarded, this man and placed him in a better position for his treachery and his treason against right and common justice. The hon. gentleman would have done well to have thought of the position in which he was placing himself when he boldly rose and justified the conduct of this officer, and contended that nothing had been proven against him, but that he was arraigned merely on suspicion. Was it mere suspicion to charge that he had kept the publication of my return back four weeks while he published the returns of other gentlemen which had not come in when mine had been received? Would it have been an injustice if the Government had managed to succeed in bringing about a contestation of my election that might have cost me two or three thousand dollars? That is what the hon. gentleman who leads this Government wished to do in my case particularly, and I will, every Session, arraign the Government on this subject until I rouse public opinion and get justice done.

Mr. PLATT. I cannot say that I think the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is much more to blame than his colleagues. He is simply a little bolder than the others in defending the act for which they are responsible. The Government as a whole not only defended this man, but rewarded him for the conduct we have been condemning. There is a serious aspect to this question, which it is perhaps of more value to the House to consider than the mere increase of salary. It has been well said that that gentleman now occupies a position of honor and trust in this country—a semi-judicial position. I would like to ask this House, especially those members who believe there was a charge fairly proven against that gentleman two or three years ago, whether they will have any confidence in the transactions he may perform in his new department? I would like to know how many in this House will place any credence whatever in the returns brought down from the Patent Office, especially if they are under the signature of the Commissioner of Patents. It has been stated that nothing has been proven against this gentleman. I may state that I have proved, as conclusively as words and documents can prove, that not only was there malfeasance in the gazettement of the returns of hon. members, but that the return itself, as laid upon the Table of this House, was falsified. I proved that in my individual case, and I proved it by records from the post office, that he falsified the return. That has not been denied, and it just leaves the case in this position: that we have an official in Ottawa occupying a high position of trust, who may be called upon to act in the interest of various people in this country, and in whose conduct the people, judging from his past record, can have no confidence whatever. How are we to know how those who come before him will be treated? Are we sure that those who present their petitions for patents will be considered in the order in which they were presented, or is it likely if two or three come in the same day the one on top will be taken up first and the others laid aside, if we are to judge by the only excuse he made last year, and if a return is brought down by the department can we place any credence in it, especially if it be signed by the Commissioner of Patents? I, for my part, if it were one in which I was deeply interested, would place very little reliance on it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has invited the attention of this House to the evidence which was laid before them by my hon. friend, I will refresh his memory and that of the House as to the facts. The facts were, and let the House remember how these facts speak trumpet-tongued of the honesty of the present deputy commissioner of patents and the man who suborned perjury:

On Monday the 7th, sixteen members were returned—eleven Tories and five Reformers. In the Gazette of the Saturday following all the Tories were gazetted and but one of the five Reformers. On Tuesday there were fifteen Tories and eleven Reformers returned. In the Gazette of the Saturday following the whole of the fifteen Tories were gazetted and but two of the five Reformers. On Wednesday there were sixteen Tories and four Reformers returned, and on the Saturday following fourteen Tories and one Reformer were gazetted. On Monday there were six Tories and five Reformers returned, and in the Gazette of the Saturday following six Tories and not one Reformer were gazetted. On Friday, the day preceding the issue of the Gazette, eight Tories and ten Reformers were returned, and there were five Tories, and no Reformers, gazetted. For the week there were fifty-seven Tories and thirty-seven Reformers returned, and of the fifty-seven Tories fifty-two were gazetted, while of the thirty-seven Reformers but five were gazetted.

Does any hon. gentleman mean to tell me, has even the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the sublime audacity to rise up and tell the House that this was an accident? Fifty-two of his friends were returned and gazetted—and but five on this side were returned and gazetted—and this by pure accident; and this accident occurred, not only once or twice or three times, or even six times. The plain facts of the matter, as disclosed by the returns laid on the Table, as proved again and again, were these: that this man, who it is now proposed to reward for deliberate breach of his oath of office with an additional salary of $700 or $800 more than he received when he committed that breach, deliberately broke his oath, as we have now clear proof he did, at the instance of Ministers of the Crown. I do not accuse the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries because he was not in the Cabinet at the time, but I say the Ministers of the Crown then in the Cabinet were guilty of inciting this man to deliberately violate his oath of office, and that a more disgraceful transaction was never perpetrated in Canada than that now rewarded by a vote of public money. And the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries dares to get up and say that we were afraid to bring this man to trial. The records of the House show that we demanded he should be brought before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that our demand was voted down. If the hon. gentleman desires now to have a public trial, let him grant a committee, and let this man state on oath how he came to make the returns and whether he did this thing on his own motion or at the instance of certain Ministers. I remember challenging the Ministry, and other gentlemen also challenged them, and but one, the Secretary of State, ventured to rise in his place and deny the charge that he had held communication with Mr. Pope on the subject of the returns. My hon. friend is perfectly justified in his remarks. We have the amplest proofs, which no one can pretend to gainsay, that there was no possibility of accident in the gazetting of the returns, but that they were deliberately made, for a dishonest purpose, and no opposition was ever more just than that now offered by us to the rewarding of this man for an act of treachery, and a gross violation of the duties he was sworn to perform.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman might have shown me the courtesy, while speaking in that rather excited manner, when I wished to interpose—since I was foolish enough to imagine he wished to enlighten the House on the whole case—to have allowed me to do so, and to read from the same Hansard which he read, in regard to the facts of the last return the evidence as to the dates of the receipt of the returns and their gazetting in 1874. I am not guilty of that sublime audacity, which I think the House generally understands that hon. gentleman himself to have a monopoly of. I am not guilty here of taking the position that the hon. gentleman endeavors to make this House believe I am guilty of doing. What I said, and what I say again—and I hope the hon. gentleman will understand me now—is that suspicion is not proof, that that curious state of affairs which he read from the returns is not evidence and would not be evidence, or that kind of evidence, which would be sufficient in any court of law to hang a cat. The hon. gentleman is not familiar with the rules of evidence. He has shown ignorance, gross ignorance, of all the rules of evidence which obtain in British courts of justice, and it is not sufficient for him to say that he arraigned the Government, and that these statements of his sufficiently established the guilt of this man. The hon. gentleman should be able to show more than the suspicion brought to his mind by that document. He should have come to this House regularly and in due form, and he and his friends should have taken the proper course when they sought to prove these charges. If we were to infer every matter of wrong-doing which every hon. gentleman opposite may suspect someone to have been guilty of, we could not get on with the business of the country in a year. All hon. gentlemen on that side suspect all hon. gentlemen on this side of doing the most atrocious things; they charge them with doing these things, but the trouble is that very few people in the country agree with them in regard to these charges. If these hon. gentlemen really intend to prove the serious charges they made against Mr. Pope at that time, they should not have been content with the statements made by a member, which simply went to show not Mr. Pope's guilt, but that, in the large number of returns which went to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, his own return was not picked up the first in the heap, they should have come not with their suspicion, but with some solid and substantial evidence sufficient to put the man on his trial. The House decided that, notwithstanding the statements so made, after the letter which Mr. Pope sent in, a long letter which was published in the Votes and Proceedings of 1887, page 186, the latter was consistent with the state of things to which these hon. gentlemen alluded. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not deny, no one will deny, that the hon. member who last spoke is a hot-headed partisan. Some of his party like that style of a man, but men who calmly consider these facts, men who would act as jurymen in an ordinary criminal trial, after reading the statement which the hon. gentleman just read, and the statement of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery which is recorded in that page, would come to the conclusion that it was quite possible, to say the least, that he was innocent.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. TUPPER. That is my conclusion, and I am content to leave it to the public to decide again. That is the opinion also of many respectable and well informed people in the different counties in which I have been. I would ask the hon. gentleman to take the trouble to read calmly and carefully the statement of Mr. Pope, together with the returns, and I challenge him then to stand up and say, as he has said, that it is impossible for that statement to be true.

Mr. MITCHELL. During my hon. friend's remarks, he referred to something which occurred in 1874, when Mr. Mackenzie's Government was in power, as justifying the Government in defending Mr. Pope's conduct in this case. This the gentlemen on this side of House deny. I will let both sides of the House fight this out, but, as an independent member, whose election was affected by Mr. Pope's action—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, an independent man—though not very friendly to the Ministry, I admit;—I say it is no justification for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to state that, when my friends on this side were on the Government benches, they treated some one in that way. That is no justification to the public, and it is no satisfactory answer to me. I say, further, that, in my opinion, if it is possible to make out a case against any man short of positive eyesight, or a confession by the man himself of his guilt, that case was made out in this matter. If my hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, was so satisfied as to the innocence of Mr. Pope, or if the hon. gentleman who leads him was so satisfied of his innocence, why did they rally their forces and prevent Mr. Pope's going before the Committee on Privileges and Elections to have the matter investigated? We know that all the old gentleman at the head of the Government has to do is to pull the string and up they jump; and so they did then when he pulled the string and prevented his going to the committee. I have no hesitation in saying that my belief is that the hon. gentleman, who is not present now, I am sorry to say, but who leads the Government, would, if this had gone to that committee, have been convicted of a conspiracy to drive some of us out of the House; and, in his own interest, he prevented it. Now he comes to this House and asks Parliament to reward the criminal by increasing his salary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am surprised at the statement which was made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when he undertakes to tell this committee that there is no evidence beyond suspicion against Mr. Pope. The evidence which we adduced against Mr. Pope was evidence which would be taken in any court of law to convict any party of any crime, however serious. What is his statement in his defence? He says, in his report to this House, by way of explanation, that, when a few names were left over from one day to the next, the returns which were received in the meantime were put on the top of those which had not been dealt with. If he had done that, what would have followed? It would have resulted that the returns he left over the first day would have been the last to be dealt with. Is that the case? Is there any instance where the return of a member on the other side of the House passed the second week of the Gazette? How did he get at those if the others were put on the top of them? It is perfectly obvious that Mr. Pope, in undertaking to explain this matter to the House, made a false statement, and that what he said happened could not have happened in consequence of what he did, if what he did as he reported actually happened. Then the hon. gentleman says that the same thing was done in 1874. There is not a tittle of evidence of the same thing being done in 1874.

Mr. TUPPER. I did not say the same thing happened.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, a similar thing.

Mr. TUPPER. I said there were similar instances.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman said there were similar grounds of complaint. I deny that any such grounds of complaint existed, but, if they did, that would be no defence whatever for Mr. Pope's conduct. If he was guilty of that conduct on a former occasion it would not be any defence for his conduct now; but there is no evidence whatever of that. The statements adduced by the hon. gentleman before, by way of extenuation of Mr. Pope's offence, do not establish that any former Government had been guilty of what we charge against the hon. gentleman of sustaining Mr. Pope in his conduct, and that is the matter of which we complain.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would suggest to my hon friend (Mr. Mills) that a charge of that kind having been made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries against the former Government, it is due to himself and his colleagues and the people who sustained him on that occasion, that he should now get up and challenge the Minister to let the whole matter in reference to 1874 and 1887, go before the Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation.

Mr. TUPPER. Let me set myself right once more. Both the hon. gentlemen who have spoken imagine that I alluded to 1874 as a tu quoque argument. I did not. I am not of the opinion that any wrong was done in 1874. I am of opinion, however, that, to some extent, the returns came in in the same way. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. I gave the circumstances at the time. The hon. gentleman will remember that he moved for the returns, and on the discussion of his motion I brought before the House the facts which led me to the opinion that something similar had occurred in 1874, and I stated then that I did not impute wrong either to the officer or to the Government of the day; that it seemed to me that it was possible, with a large number of cases and a large majority of men on one side, that for a long time the names might run in one particular party, with here and there a member of the smaller party. I did not use the weak argument at all of saying that because wrong was done in 1874 the hon. gentlemen should say nothing in 1887. I simply cited it to prove that in both instances it was a mere accident.

Mr. LANDERKIN. In reference to the gazetting of 1873, although the Minister of Marine has spoken of inviting us to a comparison, the Minister must know, as he has been a member of this House for some time, and is now a member of the Government, that the law at that time in reference to protesting elections was very different to what it is now. He knows very well that the Controverted Elections Act was not passed, and that protests were entered after the assembling of Parliament, consequently there could be no inference drawn between the gazetting at that time and at the late election. At that time protests were filed after the assembling of Parliament. Every person against whom a protest was entered had it filed in the same way, so that the cases are not analogous at all. Now, if you look into the returns for evidence of want of fair play on the part of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery at the last election, you have only to look at the return that he presented to the House. Now, out of this pile of returns, how does it happen that some that were received earlier were gazetted later? It does not appear to have been a result of chance at all; it appears certainly to have been the result of a deliberate intention on the part of that officer—whoever inspired that officer to act in dereliction of his duty, and in violation of his oath of office, it is not for me to say, but that it was done is a self-evident proposition. Now, I will name a few elections from the list. Take, for instance, the case of Bothwell. The return was received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on the 10th of March, and was not gazetted until the 2nd of April. In the Haldimand election the returns were received on the 18th of March and gazetted on the 19th of March. Now, take the case of South Grey, the return was received on the 16th of March and was not gazetted until the 26th. Here is a return that was received two days before the return of the Haldimand election, but was not gazetted until seven days after the gazetting of the Haldimand election. What does that go to show? It goes to show that the member elected for Haldimand supported the Government; it goes to show clearly that there was collusion between the Government and the officer; it further goes to show that the member who was elected for South Grey did not support the Government, and the consequence was that the gazetting of his return was delayed. Take the case of Wentworth. The return for North Wentworth was received on the 5th of March and was gazetted on the 26th of that month. The member for North Wentworth is Mr. Bain, and he is sitting on this side of the House. The return for the other Wentworth was received on the 7th March, and the member was gazetted on the 12th of March, two weeks sooner, although his return was received two days later than the other. One of these gentlemen supports the Government, and the other is opposed to them. Do you think that was all accident; that there is not evidence of collusion and dishonesty on the part of that officer? Sir, it is clear to me, and I think it is clear to the people of this country, that there was collusion, that there was injustice, that there was a dishonesty on the part of that officer, which was connived at by the Government of this country. It is a sad commentary on the Government of this country, in this age of enlightenment and civilisation, that they should be found to back up an officer, to increase the salary of an officer, who has been proved to be so derelict in his duty. There is the Minister of Agriculture who used to pose as honest John Carling. Look at the idea of honest John Carling raising the salary of a dishonest officer, who has been shown to have violated his oath, and to have proved himself unworthy of his position.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The House can congratulate itself on the fact that while it has the misfortune to have upon this side of the House a new, young, untried member like the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) who ventures to be audacious at times, we have an old parliamentarian, a man whose temper is so cool, whose judgment is so well balanced, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who can so nicely rebuke him in such a proper and judicial spirit. It is an evidence that justice can be done even if there be some who speak upon the question with some warmth. It is to be regretted, however, that there are not more judicial minds, that there are not more who can take that high judicial stand, that is taken by the Minister of Marine—I mean on both sides of the House. I notice that there is not another one on the other side of the House possessed of a judicial mind equal in capacity of the task he undertook to-night; that so far we have failed to find one whose judicial mind is balanced precisely the same way as that of the hon. gentleman. They hesitate to endorse his opinion; they have not been quite convinced by his reasoning. But I call attention to this fact, that that gentleman who is possessed of this eminent legal and judicial mind, coming into this case unprejudiced, either one way or the other, has only been able to say with respect to this officer, that there is a possibility that we judged him rather harshly,—that is all that he ventured to say. Well, now, if there is but a possibility that he may not have been as bad as pictured, I would ask, is it not good ground that we should hesitate in advancing his salary until we have a little further investigation of the matter, and ascertain whether that possibility even exists or not? They have been challenged, the Minister has been challenged. He is a member of a government that is all powerful in this House. They have been challenged now. He says the matter has not been proved. We challenge them now to give a committee where they may be examined under oath, the other members of the Government and this official that is charged. Sir, we ask them to give that, and we ask them to withhold any increase of salary, any promotion, any honor to be done to this man that we believe to be guilty of malfeasance in office, until this is done. Will the hon. gentleman, with a calm and judicial mind, and recognising that it would be a proper thing for him to do, that it is the only way that the suspicion can be removed that this man's conduct has excited, and which the hon. gentleman, in his remarks, admits to be suspicious—will he agree to this? He says the evidence that was produced before this House would not be sufficient to hang a cat upon. Well, Sir, it is upon evidence that was adduced before this House that is sufficient for this Government to advance a man to a higher position and salary, and he himself admits that the evidence was so strong that it left a bare possibility that he could offer some excuse some way in mitigation of his conduct. We heard the statement made by a member of this House, that he had the documentary evidence proving, not only malfeasance in not gazetting the returns according to law, but we had the proof on the floor of the House that when he made his return to the House he made a falsified return. The hon. Minister heard that, and yet he says there is a possibility, a bare possibility, that there may be some extenuation of his conduct. If hon. members wish to act in a judicial manner, and have the least respect for this man, it is strange that that hon.

gentleman alone has had the courage to defend his action. Whether it was wise courage on his part or not, time will prove, but his shouldering the matter, and the lame attempt made to furnish an excuse, does not vindicate that man's character against the charges brought against him. There is only one way in which that can be done. Let it form matter for investigation and examination before a committee. Then that man can be put on oath, and the members of the Government can be put on oath, and if it be then found that ill-founded charges have been made, which cannot be substantiated, those who have made them will acknowledge their satisfaction that this officer has been able to prove his innocence. But shirking from that course now, as they have done before, the evidence of which is the fact that they dropped the proposed increase two years ago, wiping it from the Estimates—the hon. gentleman's father consenting to drop it out—because the feeling of the House was so strong that it was an outrage to propose to increase the salary of a man lying under those charges, now the new Marine Minister trusting that time had blunted our memories and made us unmindful of the transactions that had taken place, becomes the first man who has ever ventured to say a word in defence of that officer. The hon. gentleman, however, has not been supported to-night by any other Minister. Hon. members on the other side, ever ready to applaud and to defend almost everything done by the Government, have, on this occasion, proved unequal to the task of defending this officer. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) even has not risen to defend the transaction. It is true he ventured a "hear, hear," but the vast majority of the members opposite never expressed approval of the hon. Minister's remarks. No; I rejoice in this fact, that though the Parliament of Canada did consent to the placing of that gentleman in another position where he received a higher salary, it maintained its character in so far that hon. members did it reluctantly, did it in silence and said nothing in justification of what it had done.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand from the silence of the Government that they do not promise to permit an enquiry into the serious charges again brought to their attention before pressing this increase to a vote. If that is the case, let us see what principle the Government propose to affirm in this action? A former officer of this House, a man who took an oath of office, in which he swore that he would be true and discharge his duties as the law required, is, in consequence of some influence, no doubt the influence of the Administration, which is standing by him to-day, proved guilty in the minds of all reasonable men of having in at least fifty cases violated his oath of office. That charge is brought to the attention of the House; and opportunity is presented for proper judicial enquiry, but the Government using their majority refuses an enquiry. The charge is made by hon. members on the floor of this House, notably by the member for Prince Edward County (Mr. Platt). He said that in his own knowledge, when certain returns were placed in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, that officer denied in the first place the receipt of the returns within the time mentioned. When, however, the evidence of a government office, the post office certificate, was produced, the officer was convicted as having made a misstatement; he then shifted his ground and offered another explanation, namely, that what happened was the result of chance. The second explanation was equally as fallacious as the first. Then the Government came to his rescue, and I assume that from that time forward they bore the whole burden of the charge. At that time the then Minister of Finance had the courage to propose an increase in the officer's salary, but when the charge was brought to his attention, when he saw what the sentiment of the House was, when he found that the Government had not the courage to permit an investigation, he then adopted the better part of valor and discreetly withdrew the proposition. To-day his successor, not in office but in lineage, younger and rasher perhaps, makes a defence to-day which the then Minister of Finance did not feel himself permitted to do until an investigation was held. Not a member of the Government responsible at that time, however, dares to rise in his place and defend the act. They set up a Minister who is capable of giving negative evidence, that he was not one of the conspirators, and is, therefore, able to make a statement with regard to the matter. He was not in the Government and did not conspire with the officer to do wrong; but I repeat that not a member of the Government of that day dare deny complicity and permit an enquiry, when such Ministers could be placed under oath and compelled to state what they had to do with the matter. I ask the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs who were then in the Government if they dare deny complicity in this matter. If he were present, I would ask the First Minister, the principal defender in this case, to deny complicity, and to permit enquiry where he could be put on oath. The Government have too many opportunities to defeat the ends of justice by refusing a proper judicial enquiry, and having sheltered this officer they propose to reward his breach of duty and reward him by increasing his salary and permitting him to hold a high judicial position. There are upwards of 5,000 officers under the Government engaged in discharging duties connected with the conduct of public affairs. They are all under obligation to discharge their duties honestly, and many of them have taken a similar oath to that taken by this man. To those 5,000 officers and upwards the Administration have said, in so many words: violate your oath of office, consider perjury as a step in the course of promotion, so long as you serve us in office we will reward you accordingly. What sort of an admission can this be, what must be their views on morality when a government incites to perjury and rewards the perjurer? Of course the reward must follow, the Government must stand by the men who do their wrong doing; but when the hon. Minister of Marine tells us there has been an enquiry, I say, let him tell it to the marines but not to the intelligent people of Canada. The matter has never yet been investigated, and even if it were to be investigated, judging from the extremely judicial spirit manifested by the Minister of Marine, I presume we could very well anticipate the verdict. It would be just such a verdict as was rendered in the case of the hon. member who now sits for Queen's, N. B. Has there ever been a case since the present Government came into office that every man from the second in command down to the lowest in the ranks was not compelled to do exactly what the Premier told him to do? When you outraged public opinion and sealed it with a vote of Parliament, and seated a man who had been rejected by the constituents of Queen's County did not every member on the Government side of the House except two, yield to the tyranny of their chief and vote that the people's representative should be excluded from this House? To the honor of the man thus seated let it be stated that he refused to accept the verdict of the Government and the majority in this House, and abandoned his seat and went back to the people his masters. But that act had the endorsement of the gentlemen opposite as every other act had that was questioned, and as I suppose every other act will have that will continue to be questioned. Under those circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I think it is indecent to apply public money to compensate wrong-doing. If this man has to be paid, then the money to pay him should come out of the pockets of those whose work he did. Let the Government pay him if they like out of their own money. If they have profited by his conduct let them pay him properly, but do not use the public money to encourage and endorse wrong-doing, and at the same time prevent an enquiry into those charges. Can anybody say that these charges are not well founded? When we find that an enquiry is denied into these serious statements what conclusion must a reasonable man draw? None but that these charges are well founded. So long as a proper investigation is denied there can be but that one conclusion. As a matter of evidence alone it would be held by a judge of the land that where such statements as these were made and an enquiry was prevented it must be assumed that they were well founded. If they are not well founded let the Government clear the atmosphere by holding an enquiry, and then, and not till then, will they be true to the interests of the people of Canada, and not abuse the trust imposed on them, even though they have a majority in this House that may do (as I assume it will do) what the First Minister will order them. The Minister of Finance I see is itching to get out of his seat to state what he knows about this matter. He is the man who is looking after the money, and I understand he is to put the pruning knife to the expenditure. He is, however, in this case increasing the expenses of the Patent Office over which this officer presides by several thousand dollars a year. That is the first act of the Minister of Finance. He may save $50 here and there by dispensing with the services of some worthy official, and he may condone the dismissal from the service of the Crown of a man like the Collector of Customs at Halifax. Such an officer may receive the condign punishment of the Minister of Finance, but a man who can commit fraud, who can commit offences against the criminal law is to have his salary increased, and the expenses of his department raised by many thousands of dollars. I hope the Minister of Finance will not continue his record as he is beginning it in this regard at least.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to suggest as this is the first night's sitting we have had, and with due regard to the motion that is introduced by my hon. friend from the opposite side of the House—

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it I?

Mr. FOSTER. Not you; your brother there. And in order to preserve the good health of the House, as there has been a pretty full presentation of the case from the opposite side, we might pass the item.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Tell us what you think about it.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it would be well to pass the item.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to call the attention of the House to a statement which I knew I had made, and which I have looked up in answer to the observation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I took the trouble of going over the Gazettes, and I found that the hon. gentleman's statement that there was an analogy between the gazetting of members in 1874 and 1887 was altogether unfounded. I have before me the statement that I made at that time with reference to those returns and I call the attention of the House to this fact: that of those gazetted, as near as may be, there appeared in the Gazette members of both sides of the House in proportion to the number of members returned. This was true with regard to the returns from every Province. There was no analogy whatever between the proceedings of Mr. Pope in 1887 and in 1874. In 1874 there were gazetted on the 7th February, 35 members. Of these 35, 22 were Reformers, and 12 Conservatives. The hon. gentleman will remember that at that time in the House there were, I think, something less than 60 of the Conservative party returned; the remainder were Reformers, and the number of members that were gazetted on each occasion as near as may be, corresponded to the proportions of the parties returned at the time. In the next Gazette we find—

Mr. TUPPER. What date is the next Gazette that you refer to?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has the hon. gentleman the same page before him that I am looking at? I have page 210.

Mr. TUPPER. No; I have page 338.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman will look at page 210 he will find there the statement. I need not repeat those statements, but members will find there an analysis of the result of the returns that were made in 1874, and which is altogether different from those in 1837.

Mr. TUPPER. Not so much difference.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will find that, apart from those who were returned by acclamation, the gazetted of members in every instance was as near the proportion as could be.

Mr. TUPPER. On the 21st February there were ten of the other side gazetted, and two Conservatives. That is somewhat similar.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, there could not be any similarity when there were no more members returned. The hon. gentleman will see that in the other case where there were fifteen Conservatives and eleven Reformers returned, that the eleven Reformers were not gazetted, that they were not gazetted even in the next Gazette, and that some of them were not gazetted in the third Gazette. Nothing of that sort occurred, after the election of 1874.

Mr. LAURIER. I agree with the Minister of Finance, that there has been a very full presentation of this case made by this side of the House, and as there has been no answer whatever from the other side of the House, we can allow the item to pass, and the country to judge.

Mr. FOSTER. The passing of the item will compensate for the other.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am very sorry that the leader of the second great party in this House, has taken this course, but I suppose we will get the opinion of the House on concurrence.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes; on concurrence.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to have it a little earlier than concurrence, but, of course, my party is not sufficiently strong to bring about that result.

Mr. BOWELL. But it is made of good fighting material. Committee rose and reported progress.

THE BUDGET SPEECH.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the House is adjourned I wish to know what is the intention of the Government with regard to the annual financial statement. I presume they are not intending to make it within the next week. As we have made a departure from our ordinary practice, which was that the financial statement should precede the consideration of the Estimates, it would be convenient that reasonable notice should be given before the hon. gentleman makes his financial statement. I would suggest, if it suits his convenience, that he should announce the fact four or five days in advance of the time he proposes to make it. I suppose he will have no objection to do that.

Mr. FOSTER. I will do that.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11:15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 13th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MARINERS' CERTIFICATES.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 26) to amend the Act respecting certificates to Masters and Mates of Ships, chap. 73 of the Revised Statutes. He said: The Bill proposes simply to extend the coasting trade as defined by the Act relating to the certificates of masters and mates, so as to embrace ports in the West Indies and the Islands of St. Pierre-Miquelon. Under the Act at present, it is confined to ports in the United States, Canada and Newfoundland.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 27) to amend the Weights and Measures Act, chap. 104 of the Revised Statutes. He said: The only change proposed is with regard to the branding of barrels. At present barrels require to be branded, either by marks burned or cut into the staves of the barrel. By this Bill it is proposed that the marks shall be made on the head of the barrel, for many reasons. They are more accessible there, and we find that when the marks are on the staves, in the process of rolling and handling they become obliterated. On the other hand, we afford much greater facilities to those obliged to mark barrels by providing that the marks may be made by branding, cutting or painting.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. JONCAS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 28) to amend the Dominion Elections Act, chap. 8 of the Revised Statutes. He said: The proposed amendments are of purely local interest, relating exclusively to the County of Gaspé. I am asking for the same delay in that county as there is in Algoma and Cariboo. I am sorry to say communications are not easier now in the County of Gaspé than they were ten years ago, and it would be impossible for the returning officer to appoint the nomination day within eight days from the reception of his writ.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE JESUITS ESTATE ACT OF QUEBEC.

Mr. BARRON asked. 1. Has the Bill, 51-52 Victoria, chap. 13, intituled: "An Act respecting the settlement of the Jesuits Estate," yet been before the Government for their consideration? 2. Have they reported thereon to His Excellency the Governor General? 3. If so, did they report in favor of allowing or disallowing the Bill? 4. Has the Government communicated the purport of the report to the Government of Quebec? If so, when? 5. When does the time, in ordinary course, expire up to which disallowance of the Bill might take place?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The answer to the first question of the hon. gentleman is, that the Act referred to has been before the Government for their consideration; to the second question, that the Minister of Justice reported on that Act to His Excellency the Governor General on the 16th January last; to the third question, that the Minister of Justice reported that the Act in question, together with 112 other Acts passed at the same Session of the Quebec Legislature, should be left to its operation; to the fourth question, that the report of the Minister of Justice was approved on the 19th January, 1889, and the result was at once communicated to the Government of Quebec; to the fifth question, that the Acts of the Legislature of Quebec for the Session of 1888 were received by the Secretary of State on the 8th August.

PIERS IN LAKE ST. LOUIS.

Mr. BERNIER (for Mr. PRÉFONTAINE) asked, Whether the Government have come to a decision as to the expediency of constructing piers in Lake St. Louis, or elsewhere in the St. Lawrence, with a view to diminish the danger from inundations on both banks of the river; if so, is it their intention to place a sum in the Estimates this year for that purpose?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The matter has been under the consideration of the Government and they came to the decision, for the present, not to build piers, as suggested in the enquiry of the hon. member.

LONGUEUIL WHARVES.

Mr. BERNIER (for Mr. PRÉFONTAINE) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause the work on the Longueuil wharves to be completed, with a view to render the same useful to navigation?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. At the time the works were undertaken, it was not intended that they should be extended to the shore. The matter is now under consideration.

POSTAL SERVICE IN LONGUEUIL.

Mr. PRÉFONTAINE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take action, in view of the complaints made against the postmaster of the town of Longueuil, and respecting the management of the post office in that town; and also to improve the postal service for the town and parish of Longueuil?

Mr. HAGGART. The Post Office Inspector reports that the postmaster has been unable, notwithstanding his continued efforts to do so, to find any suitable building for a post office at a rent within his means. There is not at present any proposition before the department for any change in the mail service to Longueuil.

COUNTY COURT JUDGES FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. MARA asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint County Court Judges in the Province of British Columbia at an early date; and if so, how many?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is the intention of the Government to ask Parliament for the authority to make three appointments to the County Bench in British Columbia. If the authority be given, it is intended that the appointments shall be made as early as possible.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT MONEYS.

Mr. ROOME asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during this present Session, to enact legislation whereby the moneys accumulated in the hands of the county treasurers of the different counties, where the Canada Temperance Act is and has been in force, from fines, &c., may be divided amongst the different municipalities in each county, proportionate to the amounts which have been realised from the different municipalities?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not the intention of the Government at present to propose any legislation of that kind, the view of the Government being that the rights of the various municipalities have been fixed and determined by the Order in Council dealing with that subject.

BELLEVILLE DRILL SHED.

Mr. BURDETT asked, Whether the Government intend placing any sum in the Supplementary Estimates to aid in the construction of a drill shed at Belleville?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Unfortunately, I cannot give the answer now. The Supplementary Estimates will show what the Government has decided upon.

ARTHABASKA FISHERY OVERSEER.

Mr. TURCOT asked, What was the amount of revenue collected by P. C. Bourke, fishery overseer, acting for the Government, in the District of Arthabaska, during the past fiscal year; and what was the amount of his salary, his travelling expenses, and his allowance for his office?

Mr. TUPPER. No revenue was collected by P. C. Bourke, fishery overseer in the district of Arthabaska, in the past fiscal year. His salary was $75, and his travelling expenses amounted to $41.10. There is no allowance for his office.

REDUCTION OF LETTER POSTAGE.

Mr. TURCOT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to reduce the postage on letters within the Dominion of Canada to three cents per ounce weight; and to lessen the charge for the carriage of parcels sent by mail?

Mr. HAGGART. It is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill to reduce the postage on letters within the Dominion to 3 cents per ounce weight. It is not the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill to lessen the charge for the carriage of parcels sent by mail.

CHAMBLY-LONGUEUIL CANAL.

Mr. PRÉFONTAINE asked, Whether the Government would be opposed to the incorporation of a company undertaking the construction of a canal from Chambly to Longueuil?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It depends altogether on the terms of the Bill. We would be better able to judge when we see the measure the hon. gentleman proposes to bring down.

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPH LINES.

Mr. DENISON moved:

That a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into the desirability of the Government acquiring all the electric telegraph lines in Canada, and that the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to hear such telegraph, railway companies and proprietors as may wish to be heard, by themselves, their counsel or agents, and to report to this House.

He said: I intend to take up only a few minutes' time of the House, as, last year, in introducing a similar motion, I placed pretty fully before the House some facts as to the telegraph lines in the old world and elsewhere. I then pointed out that nearly every country in the world, except Canada and our neighbors to the south, had acquired their telegraph lines. In France, Austria, Germany, Switzerland, Denmark—in fact, nearly all over Europe, 20 years ago, the telegraph lines were acquired by the Governments of their respective countries. If we would be a progressive country we should not be behind the old world in this matter; being a new country, we should be more progressive, and I think the time has come that we should take some step towards acquiring the lines and having them owned by the Government of the country. I certainly am aware that it would require a large sum of money to buy out old companies, but it is in the interest of the community at large that these lines should be owned by the Government. Now we have to pay two or three rates across the continent, whereas, if the Government owned the lines, they would all be under one management from end to end. The Government now own certain lines in the North-West Territories and also down in the Eastern Provinces. It is true the Government has built these lines in sections of the country where there were none before; I do not object to that, but if it is well for the Government to build lines in sparsely-settled sections where they can get no revenue from them, it ought to be good for the Government to own the lines in the older settled parts of the country where we may expect a dividend to be paid. The present companies pay a dividend on their stock, and as the Government could borrow money at a lower rate of interest, we may assume that we would have a sufficient revenue to pay a certain percentage on the outlay. At present it is a great shame that a person living outside of Canada should have the means of, in a manner, manufacturing public opinion in this country. It is a great power to leave in the hands of a foreigner. We had a practical illustration of this not long ago, when a despatch was sent by Mr. Wiman, saying there was a proposal to buy out Canada. Here is the despatch:

"New York, Sept. 29.—I deem it my duty to say that information from Washington reaches me of a reliable character to the effect that the Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs have, during the past few days, in furtherance of the views of its chairman, Senator Sherman, been discussing the question of inviting the Dominion of Canada to join the United States. So far have matters progressed that it is not at all unlikely that a resolution will be reported for the concurrent action of both Houses, declaring it to be the duty of the President to open negotiations with Great Britain looking to a political union between the English-speaking nations on this continent. The condition attending the invitation of Canada is understood to be that the United States would assume the entire debt of the Dominion, estimated at three hundred millions of dollars. Commercial union was urged as the basis of the proposed negotiation, on the ground that while a large majority might be secured for it, only a small minority favored political union, but the sentiment of the committee was so strong in favor of proposing at first political union that it was impossible to contend with it.

"ERASTUS WIMAN."

Then we have a telegram addressed to the papers, saying:

"We are now requested by Erastus Wiman to withdraw his communication in reference to the doings of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the American Senate. Will you please do this and greatly oblige,

"G. N. W. TELEGRAPH CO."

These messages were sent about the country, deadhead, I suppose, and the stockholders in Canada of the Montreal Co. have to pay their share for these messages. The public generally are beginning to see that it is desirable that the lines should be owned by somebody else, for we find them crying out for some change. One paper says this:

"These telegraphic messages from the United States should always be regarded with suspicion, not only because they are naturally apt to be biased, but also because the transmission and, to a certain extent, the collection, of news is in the hands of the telegraph ring, and that is almost identical with the clique which is promoting the agitation for annexation."

Another paper says:

"We can all remember the unsatisfactory results that arose from the establishment of a monopoly by the amalgamation of companies, and these were aggravated in many ways when the combine came under the control of a foreigner, himself the mere lieutenant of the great telegraph monopolist of the United States, the whole system being virtually one concern, which, at least, cannot be said to put Canadian interests in the first place."

I think these items show that it is dangerous that this great power should be placed in the hands of a foreign company, and although I know that it is a matter of spending considerable sums to purchase the telegraphs, I think the time is drawing near when the Government ought to be in a position to do so. I have put this motion on the paper with the object of drawing the attention of the House and the country to this matter, and I should be glad to see it supported by other hon. members.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is the second time my hon. friend has made a motion of this kind in Parliament, and I must say that he shows he has studied the subject. However, I do not think the time has come for the Government of the country to take possession of the telegraph lines of this country. The hon. gentleman is aware that, besides those lines in the hands of telegraph companies, there are other lines that belong to railway companies, and I think it is hardly feasible for the Government to assume the lines used by railway companies. Moreover, the purchase of these lines by the Government would require a very large sum of money, and I do not think that the question is sufficiently ripe to justify Parliament and the people of this country in going to so large an expense. True, my hon. friend says that these lines will give a revenue; they would give a revenue, but it is well known that these large companies, like large railway enterprises, always pay a better revenue in the hands of private individuals than in the hands of the Government. That is perfectly well known, the results are there, and therefore I think that, in the case of some of the companies which pay large dividends to their shareholders, it would not be increasing that revenue, nor would it maintain that revenue, for the Government to take them into its own hands. My hon. friend says that, inasmuch as the Government are building telegraph lines where they do not yield much revenue, therefore it will be proper that the Government should take over the lines which yield a large revenue. Well, there is no doubt that we would be glad if the lines already constructed by the Government, and being constructed by the Government, would give a large revenue, but those lines have not been built for revenue purposes, but rather for the general utility of the country. These telegraph lines have been built on the lower St. Lawrence, on the Atlantic coast, on the Pacific coast, and some in the North-West Territories, for the purpose of protecting life and property. They are designed to procure relief to crews of vessels wrecked on our coasts, and it is by means of these lines that the necessary help can be given. These lines, moreover, afford the means of giving valuable information in many cases to the fishing interests, and they furnish the country a return in that way. Thus the returns, though they are not made in so many dollars placed in the hands of the Government, are such as to repay and reward the country for the expenditure. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech, stated that telegraph despatches sent over the lines are often in the interest of one firm or one individual, and that sometimes those despatches are false. How could that state of things be avoided even if those lines were under the control of the Government? If they are to be the telegraph lines of the country, they cannot be the telegraph lines of the Government or of any set of men, but the lines of the people at large, and therefore, although the lines were in the hands of the Government, every individual who now sends a despatch over them would have the same right to forward it as at present. You could not prevent some of the despatches being false. On account of the competition between the different lines now in operation it is very soon ascertained whether any despatch is true or not. Moreover, and I have reserved this as a bonne bouche, politics run rather high in this country at times, and perhaps our friends on the other side of the House would not have the same confidence in the secrecy of their despatches at election times as we would have ourselves, and perhaps if the hon. gentlemen opposite were occupying these benches, we, being then on the opposite side of the House, might share the want of confidence they might have now in us. It is proper that, in considering questions of this kind, we should take up the different points and examine them in all their bearings. I hope my hon. friend, having brought the question before the House and made his speech, and having heard these remarks made by me on behalf of the Government, will be satisfied with having made his motion and will not press it, but ask permission to withdraw it.

Mr. DENISON. I beg to withdraw my motion.

Motion withdrawn.

FISHING IN ONTARIO INLAND WATERS.

Mr. DAWSON moved for :

Return of all licenses granted and all applications made for license to fish in the inland waters of Ontario, north and north-west of Lakes Huron and Superior; also, of all correspondence between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of Ontario, in respect to the expediency of permitting net fishing by white men in these inland waters; also, of all correspondence between the Indian Department and any other department of the Government in regard to the distress and destitution which would be brought upon the resident Indian population by unrestricted net fishing in the waters from which they derive their chief means of subsistence.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in making this motion, I desire with the permission of the House, to draw attention to the effect that unrestricted net fishing in the inland waters to which it refers would have on the Indians. In the region to the north and north-west of Lakes Huron and Superior there are many inland lakes of greater or less extent, and where they are of considerable size, a few Indian families will always be found residing near them. Some of these families, indeed many of them, have advanced so far in civilisation that they cultivate little gardens, and these, with the fish which they can always easily procure, both in summer and winter, afford them a sufficiency of food, while the furs obtained by hunting, being always ready of sale, enable them to clothe themselves comfortably. This has until now been the happy condition of these Indians, and is so, except in a few instances, still. So that, although the larger game, such as the caribou and moose, is fast disappearing before the deadly rifle and reckless hunting of the white man, they still manage to live, except in certain sections, with comparative comfort in their own primitive way. But the white man, not content with annihilating the moose and the caribou, is now invading their fisheries, and unless means can be found of putting a stop to this, the result must be great distress, if not actual starvation, among the Indians. The indiscriminate slaughter of the buffalo at the time the Union Pacific Railway was being built, brought destitution to the Indians of the plains, and the consequence has been, as both the Dominion and United States Governments feel to their cost, that on both sides of the international boundary line they have to be fed and clothed, at an enormous annual outlay. Surely no one could wish to see such a state of things existing in the regions to which this motion has reference, and yet it will most assuredly come about unless timely measures are taken to prevent it. The fish of the inland waters are to the Indians of the forest what the buffalo were to the Indians of the plains—the staff of life—and if they are exterminated, the Government will have to provide food for additional hordes of very deserving and very hungry Indians. Already the destructive pound-net has, in some cases, reached the inland lakes to which the motion refers. This implement of destruction is fast depleting the great lakes, and what its effect will be on the small inland lakes can easily be imagined. A single pound-net in a lake of say ten miles in length by two in width—an average size—could be so used as, in one season, to entrap almost every fish therein above the size of a minnow, at least, so I am told. With these nets there is no respite for the fish. A pound net can be set in the fall and left under the ice all winter to do its deadly work. There is no escape for the fish. A guide net, perhaps miles in length, is extended along the bottom; this leads to a labyrinth of skillfully constructed net chambers which the fish are sure to enter, and from which they are drawn up at will through convenient openings cut in the ice, and shipped by hundreds of tons to the United States markets, so that, in course of a single season, one of these inland lakes can be so completely swept of its fish as to leave none for the poor Indians, who, in consequence, must strike camp and leave the waters which from time immemorial they and their sires had looked upon as their own. Is it reasonable, is it just or in accordance with the treaties made with the Indians that this should be permitted? Certainly not. In the treaties made with the Indians of Algoma, it was most unequivocally provided that they should, forever, have the right of fishing and hunting over the territories thereby ceded. This right was, in fact and in effect, a part of the price for which they relinquished their acknowledged right in the land. But it may be said it was not an exclusive right. True, but still it was a right, and is it to be rendered nugatory and of no effect by a destructive invention which was never dreamt of by either Indian or white man at the time the treaties were made. To permit the use of an implement which in effect renders a provision of the treaties void is surely, to all practical purposes, an infraction of the treaties. A recent judicial decision in New Brunswick, it is said, gives the control of the inland fisheries to the Provinces.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The Supreme Court decided that too.

Mr. DAWSON. I am thankful the hon. gentleman has informed me that the Supreme Court has decided this also. This may be so, but still it belongs to the Dominion Government to see that the faith of Indian treaties is upheld. In as far as this Province of Ontario is concerned, I am happy to say that the present Government thereof has so far respected the rights of the Indians in this matter, and, as I have reason to know, has, with a humane desire to guard their interests, absolutely refused to grant licenses to fish in the inland waters of which I speak, as will be seen by a letter which, with the leave of the House, I shall now read. The paper in which it appears says :

“THESSALON, 31st January, 1889.

“It has been stated that fishing with the nets has been carried on in the inland lakes of Algoma. Mr. Dobie, of Thessalon, while in Toronto lately, on hearing of the matter, took steps to ascertain whether any person had really received a license to do so or not. He telegraphed the department at Ottawa and received the following message :—

““OTTAWA, 14th January, 1889.

““Has no license from this Department. Lakes mentioned are within jurisdiction of Ontario Government or riparian proprietors.

““JOHN TILTON.”

“The Ontario Government was then interviewed, and the following letter was received :—

“DEPARTMENT OF CROWN LANDS.

““SIR,—I am in receipt of your letter of 15th inst., respecting fishing in the inland lakes of the Province, and have to say in reply, with reference to those lakes to which you refer, that the exclusive right of fishing in the lakes near Thessalon, in the Townships of Day, Gladstone, Kirkwood, Bright, &c., belongs to the Province of Ontario, and that no person has the right to fish with nets in these lakes without authority, either for private use, barter, sale or export.

““No permit or license to fish with nets in the inland lakes of the Province has been issued to any person by the Commissioner of Crown Lands.

““Any person so fishing is guilty of a contravention of the law and is liable to prosecution and punishment under the Ontario Fisheries Act.

““I send by mail a copy of the Act and regulations.

““Your obedient servant,

““AUBREY WHITE,

““Assistant Commissioner.

““J. B. DOBIE, Esq., Walker House, Toronto.”

This admirable and well conceived letter is greatly to the credit of the Ontario Government and it will have an excellent effect in restraining the more respectable fishermen, but who is to prevent poachers from setting pound-nets without license. At the Lake of the Woods and in the country bordering on its tributary streams, there are no less than three thousand Indians who, now that the game is disappearing, depend largely on the fisheries for the means of subsistence. Sturgeon of excellent quality are still very abundant in these waters, but they are easily exterminated. Pound-net fishing has been already attempted at the Lake of the Woods, and if it is permitted to go on, the Government will have three thousand additional Indians to provide for. Surely some understanding could be come to between the two Governments whereby the fisheries in these inland waters should be reserved to the Indians, until they shall have so far advanced in the ways of the white man as to be able to provide for themselves otherwise. There are over ten thousand Indians, mostly in isolated families, scattered over the wide district which I have the honor to represent, and I conceive it to be my duty to draw the attention of the House and the country to this important matter. The opening of the Canadian Pacific Railway has rendered the inland waters in many cases easy of access to fish poachers with the terrible appliances of modern times, and to permit the use of these engines of destruction in the waters from which the Indians derive their chief means of subsistence, would be, to express it in few words, to take the bread from the mouths of the poor wards of the nation.

Mr. DAVIN. In support of the statement of my hon. friend the member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), I do not wish to go over the ground that he has travelled so ably, but to suggest to my hon. and learned friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that when he deals with this question he should extend his view, and take into consideration the state of affairs in the North-West Territory. Nearly every word that has fallen from my hon. friend will apply to many of our lakes in the North-West. Inspection is urgently needed there, for the most wanton destruction of fish is carried on. I hope, when my hon. and learned friend deals with this question, he will deal with it in a comprehensive manner and not confine himself to Ontario, but consider the needs of the North-West as well.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is very unfortunate that there should be a conflict of jurisdiction between the Ontario and Dominion Governments with reference to the fish in inland waters. Practically, as matters are at present, nobody is in a position to deal with this question. The Dominion Government very properly say, that as the Ontario Government claim any revenue that can possibly arise from these waters they will not go to the expense of protecting them. On the other hand the Ontario Government say, "Everything in these waters is ours and we won't allow the Dominion Government to interfere." Between the two there has been a very rapid destruction of fish in all these inland waters. In the constituency which I represent there are hundreds of lakes, which did contain, and to some extent still contain, fish of a very valuable character; but they are rapidly being exterminated in just the manner described by the hon member for Algoma. I have done my best to devise some means of meeting the difficulty, but, for two years back, I have always received the same reply from the Department—that the Ontario Government claim these waters, and we have been unable to arrive at any settlement. I have searched in vain for any legal authority by which it can be determined what waters belong to the Dominion, and what waters belong to the Province. If you take the rule that navigable waters are excluded from the jurisdiction of the Ontario Government, you exclude from their jurisdiction a large area of those waters, because there are hardly any of these lakes which are not at some time navigated by a steamer. At the same time, it does not appear, from anything I can ascertain, that this is a proper rule for deciding the question. The only decision given on the subject is that given in the New Brunswick case; but that simply settled the question, as I understand it, regarding riparian proprietors on ungranted Crown lands. The question still remains at issue with regard to granted lands. I do hope the Minister, not only for the considerations urged by the hon. member for Algoma, but for various other considerations, and especially that means may be found to protect the fish from destruction, will endeavor to come to terms with the Ontario Government, under which a rule may be laid down by which the question of jurisdiction will be settled. I fancy that there can be no serious difficulty in the way of a settlement; if no precedent exists, there is surely intelligence enough in these two Governments to make a precedent. The subject is an important one to the constituency I represent, as well as to Algoma, and no doubt the same difficulty has arisen in many parts of Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The question has not received much attention in the past, but I can assure the Minister that there are many people besides Indians who are deeply interested in it. My constituents are very much interested in having these fish preserved, as they are a great attraction to that part of the country. What is the use of this Government spending hundreds and thousands of dollars in establishing fish-breeding establishments and propagating fish, in the different parts of the country, when they allow them to be destroyed in this way? The two positions are inconsistent. The Dominion and Ontario Governments should come to some understanding by which this valuable property may be preserved.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think my hon. friend is in error in stating that there is any conflict of jurisdiction between the Provinces and the Dominion. The decision of the court has no reference to the question of jurisdiction, but simply is that the riparian owners have the right of fishing, as incidental to their occupancy of the soil, and, therefore, where the rivers are upon granted lands the different grantees possess the right of fishing. In the case of ungranted lands or Crown lands belonging to the Province, the right of fishery is, of course, incidental to their property in the soil. Therefore, there is no conflict of jurisdiction between the Provinces and the Dominion. Under the British North America Act the regulation of the fisheries is placed under the charge of the Dominion; and, therefore, it is the duty of the Dominion Government to protect the fisheries in our waters, not with the object of bringing any revenue to the Dominion Government—as, of course, any benefit must necessarily enure to the grantees or owners of the fisheries—but for the benefit of the public, more particularly in the tidal waters, where the fisheries are a public right, a jus publicum. Of course, the fisheries there are beyond any provincial control, being entirely for the public, and vested in the Crown as represented by the Dominion Government. I quite agree with my hon. friend that it is very important that steps should be taken to protect the fisheries. There is no doubt that it is a very important branch of industry, not in Ontario alone, but in all parts of the Dominion.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I should like to say that the Ontario Government do claim a jurisdiction over those waters, for they have undertaken to assert a jurisdiction by appointing fishery officers.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). On their own property, I presume, just the same as grantees on rivers. The Restigouche River, in New Brunswick, for instance, is owned to a large extent by private parties, who keep up a large force in addition to the Dominion officers.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is not one of these places I refer to where the riparian rights are in the possession of the Crown. They are all in the hands of private parties, and yet the Ontario Government is exercising jurisdiction over them.

Mr. EDGAR. I would suggest to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that he would greatly distinguish himself if he would make a fishery treaty with the Provinces, and if he cannot, that he would at least try to arrange a modus vivendi.

Mr. MADILL. There is considerable uncertainty with reference to prosecutions for violation of the Fisheries Act. If the Dominion officials threaten to proceed against parties for violating the laws, those parties telegraph to the Ontario Government, and the Ontario Government telegraphs back that the matter is in dispute between the Province and the Dominion. Therefore, I agree with the hon. members who have spoken, that some understanding should be come to between the Dominion Government and the Ontario Government in regard to this matter.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would like to bring before the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the desirability of protecting white men as well as Indians. I understand that there has always been some difficulty as to the rights of the Province and of the Dominion in regard to fishery matters. I would like to refer to one case in which the law of the Province of Quebec appears to be in conflict with the views of the Minister of Justice. The case is in connection with the lease of the River Matane. My contention was, and is, that the riparian proprietors of the river have the exclusive right to the fishing in the river, and that the Government, having leased the estuary, had gone beyond its rights. The tidal waters, I grant, in general, would be under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, but in this particular instance the right of fishing was ceded to the seigniors of Matane, and these seigniors have since ceded their right to the riparian proprietors. Therefore the Government, in leasing the right to fish in the estuary of the river, actually granted a right which had been granted 200 years ago by the Kings of France to the seigniors of Matane, and the lease or title given by the Government is not a valid one. I do not deny the jurisdiction of the Government over the regulation of the fisheries, but as to giving licenses to strangers over the riparian proprietors, I deny their right to do that. I sent to the hon. the Minister a memorandum on the case which, I think, had a certain effect, for, though the lease was continued, it was granted under the condition that no warranty whatever was given to the lessees, Sir Alexander Galt and his friends. Thus, hereafter the Government may view the rights of the riparian proprietors differently. Though these proprietors are actually the real owners of the rights of fishing, they have been, under the color of a license, sued, condemned and fined, two or three of them heavily, for having fished in their own waters. That is a very hard case indeed. These men are too poor to bring their case before other tribunals, and I think their claim should not be passed over in future.

Mr. TUPPER. The discussion on this motion has been very interesting and, no doubt, instructive. I think, however, it has gone a little beyond the purposes of the hon. the mover of the resolution. The hon. gentleman drew the attention of the House chiefly to certain waters now under the control of the Local Government; but I may say with regard to the different decisions to which allusion was made, concerning these Crown lands and lands granted to riparian proprietors, that there has been, up to this date, no clashing of jurisdiction. We have yielded to the claims so far of the Ontario Government, certainly as regards the waters mentioned, as my hon. friend knows, and I fancy his remarks were more particularly directed to the intention of that Government. I believe that the Government are making greater efforts for the proper protection of those waters. We, on the other hand, have refused to grant licenses. The only licenses that have been granted in the last few years have been either granted by the Government of Ontario or not granted at all. So in Quebec. Where the Local Governments have undertaken to protect the fisheries and to appoint fishery officers, as in certain cases they have, the Federal Government has not been anxious to duplicate these officers, and to double the expense and so produce, to some extent, confusion. Having in charge so many of the streams of this great country, and having, of necessity, such an enormous staff of officers, the Federal Government has only been too glad to receive the co-operation of the Ontario Local Government in the protecting of the fisheries. I take it that the hon. gentleman will not press the first part of the first two paragraphs of his motion. There is no objection to it. I think his object has been attained; but, after what I have said, he will see, for instance, that we have granted no licenses and that we are granting none in these particular waters. That will dispose of the first portion of the motion; and in regard to the second, there has been, so far as my department is concerned, no correspondence with the Government of Ontario on the matter, but, of course, I am not prepared to speak for other departments. The last portion of the motion relates to the Indian Department, and I think my hon. friend has gained his purpose in bringing before the attention of this House, and, indirectly, before the attention of the Ontario Government, the great necessity for the vigorous protection of these waters. I understand, and other gentlemen who know anything about it will know, how difficult it is, no matter where the jurisdiction may be, to properly protect our inland waters. The large expanse of inland waters which we have, makes it almost impossible for us to place officers all over those districts, and illegal fishing will, no doubt, continue as long as there are fish to catch; but, of course, an effort is made as far as possible to prevent illegal fishing. I understand that the Government of Ontario have not only arranged for the protection of these particular waters, but that they are laying claim, and we do not dispute their right, to grant licenses to fish there.

Mr. LISTER. Does not the Ontario Government claim the proprietary rights in all the inland fisheries, Lakes Huron and Superior and the rivers?

Mr. TUPPER. No, they have not gone so far yet.

Mr. LISTER. Have they made any such claim at all?

Mr. TUPPER. None that I am aware of; certainly not since I have been in the department.

Mr. LISTER. I understand they do, and that they have made the claim that the only right of this Parliament is to regulate the fisheries, and that the proprietary rights are in the special province of the Local Parliaments. I understand them to claim this, although this Parliament has assumed the right to license the exercise of proprietary rights. This is a question which will have to be determined, because I am satisfied one Local Government claims this Parliament has gone beyond its powers in undertaking to license fishermen to fish on the inland waters of this country, and on this matter have usurped the rights of the Local Legislature.

Mr. TUPPER. In reference to the larger inland waters, that question has not been raised. At present the Federal Government, without serious question on the part of the Ontario Government, is granting licenses to fish in these large inland waters, and in no instance has the question been raised, to my knowledge, in the courts as to the validity of those licenses.

Mr. LISTER. The Ontario Government, I suppose, does not wish to raise the question unless it becomes absolutely necessary. I believe the Government here is treating the licensees all along the coast with great liberality, and there has really been no reason for bringing the matter before the courts, except at the instance of the lessees, who may go before the courts themselves. It could come up, however, if you refused a license, and the Ontario Government granted it.

Mr. DAWSON. I have no objection to the amendment of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Perhaps his view, however, might be met by striking out the first clause altogether. What I meant to draw the attention particularly of this House to was that neither the riparian proprietors or the Provincial Governments have any right to override a treaty. A treaty made with the Indians, by which they relinquished their lands, takes precedence of any other Act, rule, or regulation. It cannot be abrogated. That condition was a part of the price which they received for the land, and it would not be respecting the treaty, it would be actually setting aside the treaty, not to take that into consideration. However, I have no objection to the amendment the hon. gentleman suggests, that the first clause be struck out.

Mr. TEMPLE. As this question has been brought up, there is one matter to which I would like to call the attention of the Minister. In the western part of my county, which adjoins the State of Maine, there are a number of large lakes, in which are a great many fish. I think there are some 40 or 50 miles of lakes, through the middle of which the boundary line between the Province of New Brunswick and the State of Maine runs. On the American side they protect their fish by having wardens to look after it, but on our side there is no protection whatever, there is no one to look after it, and the people do just as they like. I bring this to the notice of the Minister, in the hope that it will be attended to in the future, and that some one will be appointed to look after our fisheries on those large lakes.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

YORK-SIMCOE BATTALION—KIT ALLOWANCE.

Mr. MULOCK moved:

That this House regrets the action of the Government in refusing to pay kit allowance to the York-Simcoe Battalion whilst on active duty in the North-West in aiding in suppressing the Rebellion.

He said; I regret that it is necessary again to trouble the House with the oft-told tale of the faults on the part of the Minister of Militia in dealing with this important question; and if, at this stage, it has assumed the serious character it now takes in this motion, I think there are certain features preceding this motion which fully justify the view I now present to the House. It is within the knowledge of hon. members of this House that in the year 1885—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MULOCK. Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I was going to ask the hon. gentleman not to press his motion, and to tell him that, on a strong remonstrance and representation made by hon. members of this House, the Government have reopened the question, and are now having it under consideration. I would, therefore, ask him not to press his motion just now.

Mr. MULOCK. Do I understand the First Minister to say he wishes the motion to stand?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. Will it lose its place on the paper?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. MULOCK. Of course, in regard to this I am a little tired out. I have been for four years asking for this act of justice, and I do not care to have it lose its place on the paper or before the House. I do not wish to be too inquisitive, but I would like to ascertain about how long the hon. gentleman thinks it will take for the Government to make up their minds on this matter?

Mr. LAURIER. To-morrow.

Mr. MULOCK. I wish to do everything on my part to aid in carrying out what the First Minister seems to have promised, but I do not wish to do anything to jeopardise the bringing on of this motion in the way I intended, unless a favorable decision is arrived at.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I ask the hon. gentleman to allow the motion to stand, and I will settle with my hon. friend as to when it is to be brought on.

Mr. MULOCK. I will allow it to stand to-day, and I presume when it is called again a similar request will be made.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is a very vague engagement.
Motion allowed to stand.

BELLEVILLE AND NORTH HASTINGS RAILWAY.

Mr. BURDETT moved for:

Return of all correspondence between the Grand Trunk Railway authorities and the Government respecting the subsidy granted for the completion of the line of the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company from the Village of Madoc to Eldorado, in the North Riding of Hastings, and in reference to the work done towards the completion of such work and respecting the acceptance and opening up the same for traffic.

He said: Perhaps I may be permitted to make a few preliminary explanations in regard to this work and the importance of opening up this short line of railway. I believe it has been the policy of the Government, with which policy I do not propose to quarrel, and in fact which policy I approve, to grant aid to railways, for the purpose of opening up the country as the settlement and the development of the country require. I think, then, the Government having adopted that policy, and approving of that principle, it is their duty to see that railways to which subsidies are granted or promised are properly constructed, that they are put in running order, and that the companies are compelled to run the same in the interests of the public. With this object in view, large grants had been made by municipalities in aiding and assisting companies in constructing railways. The wisdom of municipalities in making those grants I do not propose to question at present. But I will say this, that the city of Belleville, in the past, has granted the sum of $175,000 to aid in constructing railways in order to open up the country and to develop its resources in that vicinity—one line of railway extending from Belleville to Peterboro', and on to the Georgian Bay. Last Session a charter was granted from the vicinity of Belleville in that direction, and another by way of Tweed from Belleville to Lake Nipissing. I will also add that the County of Hastings has paid $50,000 for the construction of the Belleville and North Hastings Railway, of which the portion now under discussion is a part. That railway has been completed and is now running, and has been running for some years, from Belleville to the village of Madoc, in the County of Hastings, a distance of some 26 miles. A line has been constructed from Picton extending north through to the village of Trenton, cutting the Canadian Pacific Railway, and then through to the village of Marmora, to reach the Coal Hill mines in North Hastings, the charter permitting it to be extended much further for the purpose of opening up the country. Grants have also been made to a railway extending from Napanee, running into the interior north of Belleville. With the construction of these railways I entirely agree, and with the policy of the Government in aiding in constructing these railways I entirely agree. All I ask the Government to do is, when they grant money to aid and construct railways, to see that the money is properly, judiciously, and economically applied for the purposes of the works to aid which it is granted; because I am opposed to money being granted to railways simply for the purpose of allowing men to make a profit out of railway charters, and getting assistance to build railways that they may traffic in charters the same as they do in lumber or cordwood. This line of railway is of vast importance and utility to the people of Belleville and to the people of North Hastings. The link from Madoc to Eldorado, where it will intersect with the Central Ontario Railway, is a distance of about 8 miles; 4 miles of that has been constructed, and ore has been brought over it to Belleville and shipped to the States from the Walbridge hematite mines, from which a large and valuable quantity of ore has been taken. Its owners allege that there is still subsisting larger and more valuable quantities of ore to be taken from that mine, to be smelted either in this country or in the States. I wish to ascertain whether it is the fault of the Government, or whether it is the fault of the Grand Trunk Railway, that this road is not completed from Madoc to Eldorado, and a junction made with the Central Ontario, in order that the ore, produce, and timber of the great country north of Belleville and Madoc, may be brought to the front. There are over 6,000, I may say in the neighborhood of 10,000 people living in these northern townships, and there are others going in. The country is being developed, mines are being discovered and opened up, men are going in there with portable saw mills, and in many other ways people are developing the country. They are building cheese factories, saw mills, grist mills, carding and woollen mills, and other machinery has been taken in for the purpose of assisting in clearing up and developing that country. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that these people should have direct communication with the front. They should have direct and immediate communication from the north to the village of Madoc, the principal village in North Hastings. There are other important villages in North Hastings, growing and thriving, and I consider that it is of the utmost importance to the people of these villages, and to the people of Belleville, that they should have direct communication with the people in the northern part of the county. Vast sums of money have been spent, a great number of miles of railway have been constructed, in order to open up portions of the country for a far less number of people than are now living there, and for people who have undergone far less trials and difficulties than the people of Hastings have undergone to make the northern townships what they are to-day. Now, the object of this motion is to ascertain why there is this delay, after this grant has been made, after this Government has said that this railway is in the interests of the Dominion of Canada, after it has been taken out of the hands of the Ontario Government, who had jurisdiction formerly over these lines of railway. This Government has charged itself with them. Have they neglected their duty? I wish to find out why that line is not completed and operated. I am informed that the work has been done, but that the Government has refused to recognise the work, accept the road and pay the subsidy, and, therefore, it has not been run and is now lying idle. If that be true, the Government is to blame; if it is not true, the Government is not to blame. As I said before, if public relief is granted in aid of railways I respectfully submit that the Government ought to insist upon the money being properly applied, the work done, and properly inspected and accepted in order that the people may have the use of them. In the present state of railway building in this country, it is much better to see that the roads now in existence are properly run, and properly managed, and at reasonable rates, than it is to open up new and imaginary lines. I ask for information in order, if possible, that the blame, if any, may be placed upon the right shoulders. I know that the Minister of Customs, who represents North Hastings, is as anxious as I am to see that country developed, that he is as anxious as I am to see that the County of Hastings, a very large, and important county of this Province, situated in the central part of Ontario, is developed; and that the forests and the mines in that district are developed. My hon. friend's riding is over 100 miles long; the county itself is as large as the whole of Prince Edward Island, and the people have a right to enjoy these roads for which they have granted large sums of money and for which they are now heavily taxed. They have a right, I respectfully submit, to see that this railway is opened and run in the interests of the public. I have no doubt that, when the attention of the Government is called to it, they will do all in their power, as they ought to do, to assist in having this road opened and run in the interest of the public at large. I mentioned that people were going out there and building cheese factories. The cheese industry is one of the principal industries in that part of the Province at this time; in fact if it were not for that, the farmers would have very little to depend upon. That county is particularly adapted for pasturing and grazing purposes; and if railway facilities are given to these people by which they can get in their supplies, and carry out their produce, it will be of vast benefit to them, and will aid very much in developing that part of the country. There are thousands of acres of good land—arable land, valuable land, productive land, and if facilities are afforded the people of the country to go into the interior and develop it, there will be no necessity, Session after Session, of talking and making recriminations regarding who is to blame for our young men leaving the country and seeking homes in other lands. We have ample land for them here, if proper facilities are afforded them to develop it and make a living for themselves at home.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I learn from the hon. gentleman that he approves of the subsidy granted to the several lines of railway that he alluded to in his part of the country. Those subsidies were granted for the purpose of opening that mineral region giving connection with the rear, and with the great leading railway that runs to the North-West through the County of Prince Edward, and through the County of Hastings and all that country. The hon. gentleman moves for the correspondence between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway; if there be any correspondence—I suppose there will be some—it will be brought down at once, so that the hon. gentleman can see whether there is any blame attaching to the Grand Trunk Railway or the Government. I do not see how any blame can attach to the Government. The Government have no power to compel a subsidised railway company to build their road. The subsidies are granted, as the House knows, to railways which Parliament thinks cannot be completed by private enterprise or municipal enterprise, and which are of such merit that Parliament and the country should assist in their construction. Some of these grants have not been sufficient to inspire public confidence and to induce the parties who hold the charters to build the road. The Government cannot help that; they have given a grant of $3,200 a mile, or whatever it may be. The statute provides that the road must be commenced within a certain period and finished within the time stated in the Act or the subsidy is cancelled, and it appears that a road has no great merit when, with such substantial assistance, the promoters and the country through which it will pass, have not been able to accumulate sufficient funds to build it. From what dropped from the hon. gentleman—I am not aware of the circumstances myself—it would appear as if the Government had withheld money from the Grand Trunk which they had a right to have as they had completed the road. I rather fancy that when the matter is looked into this will not be found to be the case. The pressure of these roads on the Government is generally to be resisted, as it is in the direction of obtaining subsidies before they have been fairly earned, and the Government and my colleague, the Minister of Railways, who understands this subject thoroughly, has always been most anxious to assist any railways subsidised by not raising objections on immaterial grounds. If the work has been substantially done for the number of miles required by the contract between the Government and the railway (generally ten miles at a time), any minor deficiencies are overlooked and the subsidy is paid. However, I speak in ignorance of the particular circumstances of this case, and I can only again assure the hon. gentleman that the papers will be brought down without delay.

Mr. BURDETT. I have not charged the Government with any dereliction of duty, and I think they are able to perform their duty when it is called to their attention. What I understand the fact to be is, that the road has been completed, but the Government engineer, or some person in the employ of the Government, has refused to accept it because the bridges or culverts—there are no bridges of any importance—were of wood instead of iron, or something of that kind. I want to get at that difficulty; and the First Minister has said he will help me as far as possible.

Mr. SHANLY. Is the road graded?

Mr. BURDETT. I am told so.

Mr. BOWELL. The road referred to by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Burdett) is one that had been constructed, and had been running. For certain reasons it had fallen into disuse, and a subsidy was granted to the Grand Trunk or the Midland system, in order to repair it and put it in such a state as would enable traffic to pass over from the Ontario Central road to connect with the Belleville and North Hastings road at Eldorado, in Madoc. I certainly could have no objection to the hon. gentleman taking the north riding of Hastings under his personal charge. I am very glad, in this instance, that I agree fully with the hon. gentleman as regards the desirability of developing the resources of the whole of the country, whether to the north or to the east. As the First Minister has already said, my hon. friend will find, when the papers come down, that not only has the attention of the Government been called to the subject covered by his motion, but that the representatives of both ridings, apart from the other positions they hold in this House, have had frequent interviews with, and called the attention of, the Minister of Railways to the necessity of doing precisely what my hon. friend says should be done—to have the railway properly constructed, so that it could be used for the purpose for which the grant was made. The Government have not been derelict in this particular, as the hon. gentleman will find, and I hope that all their acts will meet with his approbation as much as I am quite sure they will do in this instance, when the papers are brought down, and the hon. gentleman knows the facts.

Mr. COOK. In regard to this matter the Premier stated that it was not the policy of the Government to compel people to build railways, and they were unable to do so. That is very true. The Government have been very liberal in assisting the construction of railways all over the country. I wish the Government would pay a little more attention to the question of freight rates on those railways they have assisted to such a large extent. In some sections we have railways running in different directions from the north for the purpose of developing the resources of the country by bringing out lumber and otherwise acting to the general advantage of the district. In a great many instances the railway companies do not comply with the conditions on which they obtained bonuses from the Government; they charge excessive rates, and the Grand Trunk is particularly severe in matters of this kind. That company not only charges excessive rates, but they have, as it were, gobbled up many of the smaller roads running to the north, and have side-tracked these districts so as to make the roads of no great advantage. I am aware that the Governor in Council has power to regulate the rates of tolls for freight. They have not exercised that power to any great extent in the past, but I trust they will hereafter look a little more closely into this matter. I should have been much pleased if the Bill introduced by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), to establish a Railway Commission, had passed, for it would have relieved the Government of any responsibility, and would have placed the question of rates in the hands of men of ordinary common sense—as the hon. gentleman stated at the time he moved his motion—and the people would have been better served than they are at present. I believe there is now a question of litigation in regard to lumber carriage on some of the roads in the north. The railway company not only gives special rates to individuals, thus allowing one party an advantage over another, but sometimes they will not furnish the cars required, and this has been not only a very serious inconvenience, but, in some instances, a matter of almost ruin to lumber manufacturers and other parties in the northern country. That is a matter which should receive the serious attention of the Government at a very early day, and I trust the leader of the Government, who has shown a desire to look into the matter covered by the motion moved by my hon. friend, will also look into this matter of traffic rates and see that the section of country traversed by railways that have received aid from the Government do perform the work for which they were constructed.

Mr. TISDALE. I cannot allow the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman to pass without offering a few observations, because I have some knowledge of the extension of the Grand Trunk and other railways into the northern country. I am prepared to say that had not the Grand Trunk taken over 200 miles of road, of which I am personally cognisant, and operated the road, it would otherwise have been closed to-day. It is exceedingly unfair for the hon. gentleman to have spoken of the Grand Trunk or any other railway in the general manner he has done. The Royal Commission appointed by the Government, upon whose report the Bill introduced last year by the Government was founded, considered these questions very fully and carefully, and, in accordance with their recommendations, power is now vested in the Government to enquire into any of these matters which the hon. gentleman has mentioned. If he would bring down specific charges, as he should do when he rises in this House where the parties charged cannot reply, and makes such general statements, then they could be met, and the Government would see that justice was done, if any injustice had taken place. It is very unfair to rise in this House and in a general way arraign any railway, when the hon. gentleman dare not formulate any specific charges so that they could be brought before the proper tribunal.

Motion agreed to.

FREIGHT TRANSIT THROUGH CANADA.

On the Order, motion of Mr. IVES, for:

Select Committee to enquire into and report upon the amount of tonnage and kind of freight, during the year 1887, going to or from Canada, and passing through the United States in bond, its destination and place of shipment, both as to exports and imports, and what changes or improvements are necessary to be made to make it advantageous to shippers and importers to have such freight carried by lines of transit wholly through Canadian territory and received at or shipped from Canadian ports. Also, to enquire into and report upon the cost of transportation of such freight, and the probable cost had such freight been carried over lines of transit not passing through any portion of the United States. Also, to enquire into and report upon the tonnage, kind of freight, destination and place of shipment of all merchandise during the same period passing through Canada in bond from one part to another part of the United States. The said committee to be composed of Sir A. G. Archibald and Messrs. Burns, Charlton, Davies, Ellis, Jones (Halifax), Joncas, Kenny, Laundry, Langelier (Quebec), Perley, Skinner, Weldon (Albert), Wood (Westmoreland), and the mover. That said Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to employ a shorthand writer to take down such evidence as the committee deem necessary.

An hon. MEMBER. Stand.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to call the attention of the Prime Minister to this motion. It is a motion of some importance, in which many of the members feel interested, and I ask whether it would not be better to have an early day set for its discussion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have had some conversation with my hon. friend in whose name this resolution stands, and I made a suggestion to him he will probably adopt, in the direction of altering the motion.

Mr. LAURIER. It has been altered once already. Is this a second amendment?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A second edition.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). A further alteration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, a further amelioration.

Mr. CASEY. We are to understand that the motion stands at the request of the Government?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. It is well to understand this, because it has been taken as a matter of course too frequently, recently, that motions should stand.

Motion allowed to stand.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. JAMIESON moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes. That the enforcement of such prohibition, and such manufacture, importation and sale as may be allowed, shall be by the Dominion Government through specially appointed officers.

He said: I again bring before this House the question of prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. I do so this time at the request of the temperance people of this Dominion, as expressed by them in a large and influential convention held in Montreal in July last. Two years ago I submitted to this House a resolution in similar terms to the one which I submit to-day. After a somewhat lengthy discussion that resolution received the support of seventy members of this House. A year ago I again submitted for the consideration of this House the resolution which I put forward to-day, but owing to the late period of the Session at which the matter was reached, it was found impossible to fully dispose of the question. The debate was adjourned, and, unfortunately, we did not afterwards reach it, so that no division took place. I do not think that it requires any apology on my part to again bring up this question in this Parliament. It is quite true that this is the third occasion on which it has been brought before this House during the present Parliament. I fear, however, that we shall have to face the question, not only in subsequent Sessions of this Parliament, but also in future Parliaments, until it is settled in some satisfactory manner. I do not think it advisable on my part, after having on several former occasions given my reasons at some length in support of this resolution, to again trouble the House with those arguments. However, this is a question of very great moment to the people of this Dominion, and no question of greater and more far-reaching consequence to the whole of the electors of the Dominion can come before this Parliament. The moral sentiment of this country is forcing this question to the front, and I regard it as the great moral issue of the day. We are dealing with very extensive questions here which affect the trade and commerce of this country, and I believe it to be our duty likewise to deal with questions which affect the morals of the people. I know of no question which so deeply interests the people in this respect, as the traffic in intoxicating liquors. Anything which touches the home life of the people must necessarily be of great interest to the people, and any evil which affects our home life must necessarily attack the very foundations of all our institutions. I trust that this question will be considered fully and fairly in connection with the introduction of this motion. I am quite aware that it is surrounded with a great many other considerations which have to be dealt with. There is, we are told, the question of the revenue, which must be provided. I do not purpose at any length to discuss this issue on the present occasion. I am satisfied, however, that should the traffic in intoxicating liquors be prohibited, the revenue will, at all events before any lengthened period has elapsed, properly take care of itself. The people have to pay the revenue of the country, and it would be much better for them to pay it upon commodities which do not injuriously affect the lives and the welfare of the people. Again, there is the question of compensation to be dealt with. Some contend (and perhaps with some show of reason) that we ought, in connection with the consideration of this question, to decide the other questions which arise as a corollary to it—for instance, the compensation to those engaged in the traffic of intoxicating liquors. I do not know what turn this debate may take before this resolution is disposed of by the House, and it may be that this question will be forced upon our consideration. I can only speak for myself in this matter, and I have this much to say, that, if by conceding to those engaged in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors the right of compensation, were to secure to this country the blessings and benefits of the entire abrogation of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, I for one would be quite prepared to put my hand in my pocket as a ratepayer and contribute my share for that purpose. I know, however, that there are large numbers of people in this country who contend, and with an equal show of reason, that those engaged in that traffic are not entitled to compensation. However, in my judgment, the proper time to consider that question is when we have before us for our consideration a measure providing for the suppression or prohibition of the traffic. I do not think that it would be advisable to pronounce upon this aspect of the question, in advance of the submission to this or to any succeeding Parliament a measure having in view the suppression of the traffic. This question is not one which is moving the people of this Dominion alone, but in every civilised country on the face of the globe it is forcing itself to the front. I was very glad to see not long ago that the Government of the mother country were taking steps to inform themselves in reference to the legislation of this country. I have not had the privilege of examining the report which was sent from this Government to the Home Government at their request, in reference to the working of our local option law, known as the Canada Temperance Act. I expect, in a return which will likely be brought down in pursuance of a motion of which I have given notice, to have an opportunity of perusing that document. But there is one thing in connection with the request of the Home Government which has given me some satisfaction at least, and that is the fact that the Government of Great Britain is interesting itself in this question which vitally affects the people of the United Kingdom as well as the people of this Dominion. It has been said that prohibition does not prohibit, and we have been told that there is a retrograde movement on this question in this Dominion. About a year ago several repeal votes were had upon the Canada Temperance Act, and, in my judgment, very unfortunately, the people had to some extent taken a retrograde step upon this question. My judgment is that the Canada Temperance Act has been a benefit in the direction of suppressing the traffic in intoxicating liquor. The statistics of the country afford ample evidence of that fact. I have some figures here to which I wish to call the attention of the House, to show the effect which the movement for local option, which has had its rise within recent years in this country, has had upon the traffic. Take, for instance, the Inland Revenue returns for the four years, commencing with 1884 and ending with 1887, and we find that the spirits taken out for home consumption aggregated $12,166,257, an average of $3,041,541 for each of those years. When we come, however, to the year 1888, we see something which is remarkable as indicating the lessened consumption of spirits in this country. We find that in that year the value of spirits taken out for home consumption was $2,326,327, or nearly three-quarters of a million less than was taken out on the average during any of the preceding four years. It seems to me that this fact indicates very strongly that the local option movement has had a very salutary effect in reducing the consumption of intoxicating liquors in this Dominion. Then, there is another test which I would like to present to the House as indicating in another way the salutary effect of the local option movement in lessening crime in the country. I suppose the commitments for drunkenness should be regarded as a sort of barometer to indicate the degree of drunkenness prevailing in the country. Now, I wish to compare the returns of commitments for drunkenness in fifteen counties of the Province of Ontario prior to the adoption of the Canada Temperance Act, with those after the adoption of that Act. Take, for instance, the first whole year under license, before the adoption of the Canada Temperance Act, the year 1884, during which, in those fifteen counties, the commitments for drunkenness numbered 692. Then I take the year 1887, being the first whole year under the operation of the Canada Temperance Act, and I find that the number of commitments, in the same fifteen counties, was only 186, which, I think, demonstrates very forcibly that the local option law has had a very salutary effect in reducing drunkenness in the Province of Ontario at least. But it may be said that there is a general improvement in the morals of the people, and that this is a result of influences which are outside altogether of the operation of the local option law in those counties. Well, I will apply another test. I will take a group of fifteen counties which have never been under the operation of the Canada Temperance Act, and I will compare the number of commitments for drunkenness in them for the same two years. In those fifteen counties I find that the commitments for drunkenness numbered 2,985 in 1884 and 2,999 in 1887, an increase of fourteen, showing that there has been at least no decrease in the number of commitments for drunkenness in these counties, and proving conclusively to my mind that the operation of the local option law has had a salutary effect. Now, Sir, if local option, which is necessarily a very imperfect law, and is only partial prohibition at best, has had such a salutary effect on the morals of the people, may we not reasonably ask what effect would not general prohibition have on the morals of the people? I think we are fully warranted in coming to the conclusion that a general prohibitory measure in this Dominion would be a vast improvement upon the license system which now prevails, and that ultimately not only the revenues of the country, but the morals of the people, and, above all, the happiness of the people of this Dominion, would be very largely promoted. Now, as I am exceedingly anxious that we should reach a division upon this question, I do not propose taking up the time of this House at any greater length. I have, in as brief a form as possible, given my reasons for bringing this very important question before you, and I trust that, after proper discussion and consideration of it has been had, we shall deal with it in the most searching and serious way, and give to this resolution greater support than it received on any former occasion.

Mr. WOOD (Brookville). I beg to move in amendment that:

All after the word "purposes" in the original resolution be omitted and the following substituted therefor: "When the public sentiment of the country is ripe for the reception and enforcement of such a measure of prohibition."

Mr. TAYLOR. I beg to move in amendment to the amendment that:

All the words after "purposes" in the original resolution be struck out and the following substituted: "If it be found, on a vote of the qualified electors of the Dominion having first been taken, and a majority thereof are in favor of a prohibition law which shall also make full provision for compensating those engaged in the manufacture of such liquors."

Mr. FISHER. I am not at all sorry that this question has assumed its present shape. We can quite understand the objects and intentions of those gentlemen who have moved these amendments. We can quite appreciate, from their action, that they are not desirous of voting upon the question as it has been put before them on former occasions by the temperance people of this country, or as it has to-day been put before them as a square issue, but prefer to mix it up with other matters in such a way that the real square issue may be avoided, and that we may be compelled to deal with two matters entirely extraneous to the principle of the original motion. On former occasions similar efforts were made to introduce the question of compensation, and on such occasions I always took the opportunity of saying that I believed it was not wise or right to introduce the question of compensation until we came to discuss the details of a prohibitory law. When those details are really before the House, it will be the duty of everybody to discuss them and decide as to whether it is wise or right to give compensation for the loss of such industries as might be destroyed by a prohibitory law. But, at the present stage, I do not believe it is in the interest of the country at large, and especially of the future of this temperance cause, that we should have a bare opinion in this House on this question of compensation. The other side issue brought up is that of the way in which this prohibition should be brought about. Heretofore, on many occasions, when this question was discussed in the House, we desired to proceed by the constitutional methods long tried and well understood in this country, but by the amendment to the amendment which the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has now before the House, we are asked to introduce an innovation. We are asked to take the vote of the people directly upon a question of the highest interest; we are asked, as a body representing the people of Canada, to relegate to the people a portion of that authority and power which they have placed in our hands. I am not prepared to say that that would be a wise step for us to take. Personally, I am well satisfied with the constitutional methods of this country. I believe that if they are followed carefully and wisely, we will arrive at the conclusion which we deem right in the interests of the people. I believe that the representatives of the people assembled here have been delegated sufficient authority and are competent to act in the matter; but there are some reasons why it should be wiser and better that a plebiscite should be asked and this great question brought directly before the people, to be pronounced upon by them apart from any political strife. No doubt, the representatives of the people here were not elected upon this direct issue alone; no doubt, they stand here representing many conflicting interests; no doubt, at the general elections held a few years ago although this temperance question was one of the most prominent brought before the electorate, still the electorate did not pronounce absolutely upon it, and therefore there may be good ground for submitting this question to the people apart from any other political matter. There is also no doubt that, when this temperance question is being discussed before the country, frequently political issues aside from it have been dragged into the discussion. There is no doubt that, on many occasions, those gentlemen who have been taking part in temperance discussions have been influenced by political preferences and political interests, and that they have not voted or acted simply in accordance with temperance principles, or in the interest of the cause they were pretending to advocate at the time they spoke. It is however, doubtful in my mind whether even such an object would justify the substitution of what is not a constitutional method in this country for our ordinary constitutional procedure; but, if I believed that the cause of temperance would be advanced by bringing this question to a plébiscite in this country, I would be inclined to depart from our ordinary constitutional method. I have so much at heart the temperance cause that I would adopt any legitimate method in the interest of that cause by which it would be advanced to a triumph, so that the people of Canada could come under the enforcement of entire prohibition. But I do not consider that the present moment, and the present way in which the question of a plébiscite is brought before this House, is such that it is right or fair to ask us to deal with it now. It is brought in as a side issue and as an amendment to such an important question as that which was proposed a few minutes ago by my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson). The question before the House was a direct and clear proposition. How the result may best be brought about is a side issue, and it is not desirable that the minds or the attention of the people or of this House should be drawn aside from the main question to discuss the details as to how it can be brought about. Then, when we find that the amendment to the amendment includes another question—that of compensation—I feel that I cannot accept or adopt the amendment to the amendment or acknowledge that there is any justification for it in preference to the original motion. I shall, therefore, feel it my duty to vote against the amendment to the amendment. Then, when I deal with the amendment to the original motion, I find that, practically, it is the same expedient that was adopted a few years ago to emasculate the motion made by the hon. the Minister of Finance, then the member for King's, New Brunswick (Mr. Foster). It is practically the amendment which was then proposed by the late hon. Thomas White, then member for Cardwell, and which, when added to the original motion, was adopted unanimously by the House. But, although that occurred five or six years ago, we find that the adoption of that motion did not in any way advance the temperance cause, and that it was in no sense a help to us who have been advocating temperance in Canada since that time. On the contrary, we found that the test of the opinion of this House on the temperance question was not taken at all on the original motion, but on its being amended as it is now proposed to amend it by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood). When the amendment was adopted to the prohibitory resolution which was introduced during that Session of Parliament, the whole press and people of this country, and especially the temperance people, looked upon the vote on the sub-amendment as the crucial test of the temperance view of this House. My hon. friend, the then member for Shelburne, Nova Scotia, introduced a sub-amendment that the resolution should be immediately acted upon, and that the people of Canada were ready for prohibition. That sub-amendment was lost by a considerable majority, and everywhere throughout the country those who voted for that sub-amendment, and those only, were accepted as the true defenders of the temperance cause. It was then thoroughly acknowledged and understood through the country that the motion for total prohibition, amended as it then was, and as it is now proposed to be by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood), was practically of no avail, and that those who voted for it did not really endorse, or sustain, or support, or pledge themselves to the temperance cause of this country. I cannot, therefore, believe that it is in the best interests of the temperance cause that the amendment to the original resolution should be adopted here, and I believe it is absolutely necessary, if we wish to put on record the opinion of members of this House on the temperance question, that they should vote straight and square on the original motion, and should say whether they are or are not in favor of total prohibition in this country to-day. I do not consider that it is necessary, or that it is my duty to go into the merits of these side issues, as I contend they are—the merits of compensation or the merits of the plébiscite, further than I have done. When the details of a prohibitory law are before the House, I shall be ready, and it will be my duty, to discuss compensation as a portion of those details, and I shall be ready then to say what my opinion is in regard to it; but at the present moment, I do not consider that is the question at issue or the question before this House, and therefore I have no hesitation in voting against the sub-amendment, in voting against the first amendment, and in voting for the original resolution proposed by my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), and seconded by myself.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Brome has commenced the discussion of this question as he does all others.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman having moved an amendment, it is the same as if he had spoken on it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move the adjournment of the debate, in order to give my hon. friend the opportunity of getting this question properly before the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. I thank my hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell) for having—he being an old parliamentarian and a friend of prohibition—taken an opportunity to place me in order, so that I might say a few words on this question. I was going to say that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) commenced the discussion of this question, as he generally does, by charging hon. gentlemen on this side of the House with not being loyal to the temperance cause, charging my hon. friend the member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) and myself with not being favorable to the original resolution, with not having the backbone to face it. I will not yield in my loyalty to the temperance cause to the hon. gentleman or to any other hon. gentleman in this House, when it is brought forward apart from politics; but, if politics are to have first place in temperance resolutions, I generally stand by my politics. We threshed this subject pretty well out to-day in another part of this building. We had a meeting for the purpose of discussing this and other questions, and my hon. friend took there, as he does here, a strong political side of the question. He argues that the amendment to the amendment is unconstitutional. I would like to have him point out to me in what respect it is unconstitutional. I do not say in that resolution that this Government shall find out the sentiment of the majority of the people. That can be done by the temperance people of this country, it can be done by the Provincial Legislatures of this country, it can be done by the municipal institutions of this country. When there is a strong public sentiment shown for prohibition, then the Government are going to give it to us; as soon as we can prove to them that a majority of the people are in favor of prohibition, it will be the duty of the Government to give us prohibition. I expressly guarded my resolution so that it should not be in conflict with the constitution, so that my hon. friend may take that part of his excuse back. He has, I believe, and I believe that the Temperance Alliance has, no other object in view in bringing that resolution here, year after year, and having it voted down, than to make some political capital for their friends through the country and against the Government. I explained to-day, in another part of this House, the way the Scott Act is being enforced throughout the Province of Ontario, an Act which has been passed and sustained in this House time and again, and which has proved itself to be all that is required by the temperance people. The Dominion Alliance met here the other day. Are they coming before this Parliament and asking any amendments to the Scott Act? No. They say the Scott Act is all right, that it is workable. That Scott Act has in it fines and penalties for first, second and third offences. We have had it in force in our counties for three years, and every hotel man in those counties during those three years has been selling liquor right along. And has any one of them been fined for second or third offence? I say no. And who is to blame? The officials of the Ontario Government have not enforced that Act. Yet my hon. friend wanted to censure the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West to-day for having simply done his duty clearly within the law of this country. They want to censure him. Let him come nearer home and censure the Ontario Government for not having enforced the Scott Act, which was passed by this Government with all the machinery for making it workable, which my hon. friend admits by not coming to this House and asking for amendments to it. I told my hon. friend that I would move an amendment to the resolution of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), asking for a plebiscite vote, asking that the voice of the electors of this Dominion might be had, asking for prohibition pure and simple. I believe that in asking for prohibition we should do as the English people did in removing slavery from their country—they bought it out. Let us not have any grievance to trouble us in the future after we get prohibition. Those men have invested their money in the manufacture of this article, under the sanction and authority of all Governments that have been in power; let us, while we are removing the manufacture, indemnify those who have invested their money in that manufacture. Then we will remove that grievance and, with the majority of the people at our back, this Government, or any Government that may be in power, will provide the ways and means for carrying on the Government without any revenue from liquor. These are my sentiments on the temperance question, and I will not yield to my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. Fisher), or to any other temperance man in this House, in being true to temperance when temperance comes up independent of politics; but when men like my hon. friend opposite try to make political capital out of temperance then they may count on my opposition.

Mr. FISHER. I think it is hardly necessary for me to reply to the hon. gentleman when it is so very evident to the House that he has introduced politics, while I am sure that no one can possibly find any politics in the words which I uttered here when I spoke a few minutes ago. As to what occurred in another place in this building—I believe I may refer to it, as we were not in committee of this House—the hon. gentleman did say that he proposed to move an amendment, something in this sense, to the motion of my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson). I then suggested to him what I said just now, that it would be very much better to move a substantive motion, and allow an expression of this House to be taken upon what I call a side issue, or, at any rate, another issue, that of the plebiscite. But he, knowing that there was a desire on my part and on the part of some other members, to have an expression of the opinion of the House on that question, deliberately preferred to mix it up with this other question; and I then said that I clearly would have to vote against the plebiscite, and in substitution to the amendment which I myself was seconding on the floor of this House. I confess that I cannot quite make out the explanations which the hon. member has made of his own motion. I am very glad that my hon. friend the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) moved the adjournment of the debate, so that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken might make an explanation of his amendment. But his explanation leaves me more in the dark than I was before; because I understood at the time I spoke before that his amendment was that a plebiscite should be taken, and that this Parliament should make such arrangements as would procure the opinion and desire of the people of Canada on this question. But a minute or two ago, in his explanation to this amendment, the hon. gentleman said that he was careful not to throw the onus of doing this upon the Dominion Government, but that it might be done by the Local Legislatures, or by anybody else who chose. Now, I think that would be a very great mistake. If we are to take a plebiscite it is absolutely necessary that it should be taken in such a way that the people of the whole of the Dominion of Canada, from one end to the other, should be able to vote upon it. The Government of the Dominion are the only authorities who can bring about such an expression of opinion on the part of the people, and, as I said a few minutes ago, if such an expression of opinion is asked for, let it be taken in such a way that party politics cannot be introduced into it, in such a way that the people may speak on that question alone. But if we were to put upon the Local Governments the duty of taking plebiscite, among the first to question their methods would be the hon. gentleman from Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Taylor). He has here, without any excuse whatever, without any question having arisen in regard to it, taken upon himself to bring up the question of the enforcement of the Scott Act by the Ontario Government, whom we all know he is ready to criticise at any moment. The hon. member alluded to a question which arose this morning in another place in this building. The hon. member knows that in that place not a word was said of the Ontario Government, or of any other Government, until he brought the matter up himself; that no question whatever arose as to party politics until he told us—not myself alone, but everybody in that meeting—that we need not go to the North-West to censure anybody, but that we could come before this Parliament and censure those who are nearer home. The hon. member acknowledges that he did so, and he knows very well, and everybody who was present at that meeting knows very well, that up to the time he introduced party politics, no mention or allusion was made to them by anybody, incidentally or remotely. The fact of the matter is, the hon. member, I suppose, was desirous of screening somebody—it is possible from the way he spoke that he may be now desirous of screening somebody. I do not know, I hope it is not so, but after what he has said I must believe it is so. But, Sir, I believe that the amendment he has proposed here involves the direct duty of the Government of which he is a supporter to take immediate steps to bring about the plebiscite in this country. The hon. gentleman nods. I understand, then, that he does throw that responsibility upon the Government which he supports, and that if this motion is carried, as he proposes that it should be carried—

Mr. TAYLOR. You say that would be unconstitutional. It was put in that way.

Mr. FISHER. I wish the hon. gentleman to understand fully what is my argument. I do not say that a plebiscite would be unconstitutional. I say that Parliament has a perfect right to introduce into Canada the system of plebiscite if it chooses to do so; but to-day we have in Canada constitutional methods by which a prohibitory or any other law can be imposed on the people, and it is not necessary to make an innovation on our constitutional method. But if the hon. gentleman's motion is carried it casts immediately upon the Government the duty of bringing about a plebiscite, and I do not think my hon. friend foresaw that little dilemma. If he does that, he will be practically casting a reflection upon the Government which he supports because they have not taken that step before this. If this motion is carried it is practically a censure on the Government for not having before this time taken a plebiscite and compelling them to take it as soon as possible and find out what is the will of the people of Canada upon prohibition; and when that will has been expressed it will be the duty of the Government to carry it out. It has been stated over and over by various speakers in Parliament and elsewhere that it is the duty of the Government to carry out the express will of the people, and no doubt the Government would carry out that expressed view, were it declared at the polls. The only objection I have to a plebiscite is that it is an innovation on our constitutional methods. If that innovation is going to bring about prohibition, I am ready to support the motion, but I do not consider it is going to help to bring about a plebiscite, or to help to bring about prohibition. I desire that the vote should be taken on the original motion, which is the motion proposed in this House before, which is the motion drawn up by the representatives of the temperance people in this country, assembled in convention, and which is on the journals of Parliament; which is the resolution passed by the temperance people in convention held in Montreal last fall, at which were gathered representatives from all parts of the country, a convention which could have been attended by the hon. gentleman, or anyone else holding his views, and at which convention it was decided, after much discussion, to have this resolution proposed in the House of Commons, and a vote of the House challenged upon it. I consider, therefore, it is the bounden duty of those who believe that the temperance people know their own minds, to vote for the original motion, and leave out altogether those side issues which have been imported into the question.

Mr. ROOME. As seconder of the motion moved by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) I desire to offer a few words. As a temperance man, and one who has always been so, I believe this motion is in the interest of temperance in this country. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) has pointed to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and referred to the introduction of politics into this discussion at a meeting of temperance people which took place this morning. That meeting was held for the purpose of considering a vote of censure on the Governor of the North-West Territories, and while there we discussed the temperance question as applied to the whole country and in doing so the action of the Ontario Government on the Scott Act was brought forward. I claim that that Act should be a warning when we attempt to place another Statute on the Statute-book without having a majority of the people prepared to carry it out, for in such an event it would be useless. The Scott Act had not sufficient power behind it to carry it out and for that reason it has failed. I claim there are several reasons why it has failed and why it will be repealed in every county of Ontario as soon as a vote can be taken upon it. One reason was that at the time the Act came into force it had not a majority of the people at its back, although it was carried by a majority of votes polled in each county. This was due to the fact that those who were indifferent to the question did not come forward and vote, but when the Act came into force it had not a majority of the people to aid in carrying it out. A second reason was the lack of compensation to those engaged in the liquor traffic. Under the Crooks Act, many of these men were called upon to expend all their means in fitting up their houses, so as to be able to get a license under that law, and when they had succeeded in placing their houses in a position to receive a license the Government stepped in and said: You cannot sell. A certain amount of sympathy was aroused for the liquor dealers by their friends, and this did something to assist in defeating the Act. In this motion we propose that when a vote has been taken and the majority of the people of the Dominion have expressed themselves in favor of a prohibitory Act, then it will be time for the Government to take action, and, by giving a certain recompense to those engaged in the manufacture and sale of liquor, it will remove that influence which tells against the Scott Act in the different counties—not that the men are to be paid for what they have invested in the trade, but that a certain amount be allowed, which will tend to remove that feeling which would otherwise prevail. A similar course was adopted many years ago by Great Britain in regard to the abolition of slavery. The Government devoted a certain amount of money to remove that curse, and by so doing saved much to the country. Our neighbors across the line did not see fit to remove slavery in their midst in that manner, and were afterwards obliged to expend millions of money and sacrifice millions of lives to suppress it. It will be the same in our case with the liquor question. If we devote a certain amount to recompense those engaged in the liquor traffic and manufacture, it may assist in bringing about prohibition, but to pass a law at present to prevent the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, without the majority of the people being in favor of it, would be to place a useless Act on the Statute book. Judging from our experience of the Scott Act, it would be impossible to put in force any prohibitory law unless it were supported by a majority of the people. The amendment to the amendment, proposed by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), is, therefore, one which should meet the views of the temperance people of Canada, and of the temperance members in this House. I should like to see prohibition brought about and carried to a successful issue, as I believe liquor to be one of the great curses of our country, and it should be the aim of every temperance man to lay aside his politics, to a very great extent, and assist in bringing about the enactment of some measure, not by trying to make political capital out of the question, which has been done too much in Canada in past years, but by joining together and supporting some plan which by degrees would in the end bring about prohibition. The amendment to the amendment, I therefore think, should meet the approbation of the majority of members of this House.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REBATE OF DUTY ON CORN.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved :

That, whereas distillers are allowed a rebate of duty upon corn imported for use in the manufacture of spirits for export, it is, in the opinion of this House, but just and right that farmers and stock raisers who import corn to feed cattle or other stock for export, should also receive a similar rebate.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution is very clear and apparent. Under the present law distillers who import corn for the purpose of manufacturing it into whiskey, or other spirits, are allowed a rebate of the duty on the grain that they import, but the farmer who imports corn to feed his cattle so as to convert them into beef has to pay a duty of 7½ cents a bushel on the grain imported for this purpose. The difficulties that arise, and the injuries done the farmer are of a more serious character than the mere matter of the duty, for while the distiller is allowed a rebate on the grain, he is not charged any duty on the slop which he uses for the purpose of fattening cattle in order to compete with the farmers' cattle. Hence the farmer is obliged to pay this duty which is commuted to the distiller, who enters into competition with him in fattening cattle for export. This is one of the anomalies of the fiscal policy of the Government. This is one of the difficulties which it creates and which are becoming more and more apparent from year to year. We see very many instances in the operation of the tariff of how the farmers are discriminated against, and how many articles are allowed to come in free as raw material to enter into the manufacture of goods, which afterwards come into competition with the products of the farmer. Another instance of this unfair discrimination is to be found in the case of wool. The manufacturer is allowed to import wool free, to use it in manufacture, and yet the farmers are in no way compensated. In the case of this duty on corn, they were told that the duty was to be placed upon it, for the purpose of increasing the price and for the purpose of preventing corn being brought in, to compete with and lessen the value of their own corn. This end has not been attained, for the price has not been increased. The question now arises did this duty raise the price of corn for the Canadian corn grower? I think the examination of the prices of corn will show that the price has not been increased. For instance in 1878 the price of corn in the United States was 47½ cents a bushel and in Canada at that time it was 66¼ cents a bushel, so that our farmers received 19 cents more than the farmers of the United States obtained for their corn. In the year 1888, about 9 years after the tariff had been in existence, our farmers had received but 66 cents for corn and the price of corn in the United States had increased to 55 cents a bushel, the difference being then only 11 cents a bushel in favor of our farmers. I quote from the Statistical Record on page 164, and we find, that in 1881, in Montreal, the price of corn was 66 cents a bushel and that in the United States it was 65 cents a bushel. In 1885 in Montreal corn was 49 cents a bushel and it was also 49 cents a bushel in the United States. The period at which the Canadian farmer received the highest price for his corn was the period during which there was no duty on corn. He then received 19 cents a bushel more than the American farmer and at no period since the duty has been on has the difference been so great in his favor as it was at that time. In the mean time our people have paid a good deal of duty on the corn that came into Canada. Last year the duty paid was $173,384.72, and the duty on cornmeal amounted to $53,837.17. We exported last year to the United States 40,047 head of cattle and the United States exported to England 241,360 cattle. Now the United States have apparently taken our cattle for export. They have their grain to fatten the cattle and send them to England, whereas if our farmers had been allowed to buy American corn to feed their cattle they might have fattened them at home and have had the advantage of the direct export. They would also have had other advantages in connection with this matter which are of very vital consequence to the farming community. Not only would they have fed their cattle but they would have kept the manures, and the value of manure from a ton of corn fed to cattle is given by the highest authorities at $7 40. I contend that the farmers have just as much right to this rebate of this duty on corn as the distillers have, and I think the Minister of Finance will agree with me in that proposition. I think also that the members of this House will agree with me that the farmers are as much entitled to the consideration of the members of this House as are any other class in the community. We find further that this principle of rebate injures the farmers in several other ways. If this rebate was not given to the distillers, the distillers would be obliged to buy the rye grown by our farmers and to use it in the manufacture of spirits, instead of using American corn. It is said, and I believe with a good deal of truth, that a great deal of the corn that was used in the manufacture of spirits last year was not the produce of Canada.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRIVILEGE—THE INFORMER LECARON.

Mr. FLYNN. Before the House proceeds with the Orders of the Day, I desire to call the attention of the Government to a cablegram from London which I have seen in to-day's issue of the Ottawa Free Press. I regret that the hon. First Minister is not in his place, for I should much prefer that he were here when I read it.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the hon. gentleman had better wait until the First Minister comes. He will be here soon.

Mr. BOWELL. No objection will be taken to the hon. gentleman reading it, though it is not at the time of calling the Orders of the Day.

Mr. FLYNN. I will read it now to give the Government the earliest opportunity of denying the statement made in this cablegram. It is as follows:—

London, Feb. 13.—Sir Charles Russell before the Parnell Commission yesterday, directed his questions to the career of Lecaron as a spy and paid agent of the British Government. Lecaron was forced to admit that he had received fifty pounds per month for years from the British Government and far more from the Canadian authorities, and that he was still under the pay of both, and that a considerable sum was due him."

Mr. BOWELL. We will leave that to the First Minister.

ARTIFICIAL FERTILISERS.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Mulock:

That the House do go into Committee of the Whole forthwith to consider a certain resolution declaring it expedient to remove the duty on artificial fertilisers and to place them on the free list.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In rising to resume the debate on the resolution of my hon. friend from North York, I beg leave to trouble the House for a short time while I express my views on this question. Underlying the question itself, there is a principle involved which is probably more important to the class more particularly interested than perhaps any other immediately under consideration. We are not here on our own responsibility to speak simply for ourselves on this matter, but we are endeavoring to speak in the name and on behalf of the great class which we represent here, and which is known as the agricultural class of the Dominion. We are not here representing our own individual opinion, but the opinion of nearly one-half of the people of this country. When we consider the number of farmers in the Dominion, we must see that their interests are of the greatest importance and should be recognized by the representatives of the people, when a question of this nature is brought before them. We have no less than 208,000 farmers in the Dominion of Canada who are interested in this question; 208,000 farmers represents no less than two millions of people who derive their livelihood directly from the products of the farm; and, therefore, we are speaking not in the name of a few, but in the name of nearly a majority of the people of Canada. Again, we speak in the name of that class who represent the greatest amount of investment of any class in the Dominion. As compared with the investments of the farmers, the investments of the manufacturers sink almost into insignificance. Their investments amount to no less than $1,500,000,000, and therefore when we speak in their name and on their behalf, we claim the attention of the people of this country to what we have to say. Not only are they the greatest in number and in investments, but they are the greatest taxpayers in the Dominion of Canada. But they are not only the greatest taxpayers, they are the greatest employers of labor; and therefore we have the right to consider their interests under all circumstances and to extend them every consideration that would be conducive to the advancement and development of the industry in which they are employed. Now, Sir, what do we claim for this class? We claim in this instance that the artificial fertilisers they use for the purpose of increasing the fertility of the land shall be permitted to come into this country free of duty. Now, in asking that, in the interest of such a large class, surely we are not asking too much of this Government. The lands of this country are not so fertile as they were many years ago, and they require to be fertilised in order to be brought up to such a standard as will enable the farmers to produce from their lands sufficient to meet expenses and to yield a reasonable profit. But we find that the profits of the farmers for the last few years have not been what we would like to see; and when we find that the soil is not so fruitful as it was at a time when it did not require the same manuring, underdraining and other attention that it requires to-day, it is the duty of this Government to extend every advantage to this great class, whose prosperity in my opinion is the foundation of the prosperity of every other class in the Dominion. But again the land has not only been depreciating in fertility, but it has been depreciating also in value, and it is reasonable to suppose that it is depreciating in value because the receipts of the farmers for the products of their labor are not equal to what they have been in years past, and the consequence is that if they wish to dispose of their lands they cannot reasonably expect to realise as much for them as they could a few years ago. I know it is contended by many hon. members that farm lands are as high in price to-day as they were many years ago, but this is certainly not the case. I am sure I shall be borne out by those who know the value of farm lands throughout the country when I say that they cannot realise within 15 or 20 per cent. of what they could a number of years ago. Now, the fertilisers are raw material to the farmer, and we admit the principle in our legislation that raw material should be brought in free. In fact, in this country we have no less than 8,500,000 pounds of wool brought in free of duty as raw material for the manufacture of woollen goods, so that our manufacturers may be able to place on the market their woollen goods to better advantage than if they were not permitted to import the raw material free. We import into this country, free of duty, no less than 32,000,000 pounds of cotton as raw material, as a basis for our cotton manufacturers. We have permitted to come in last year free of duty no less than 2,157,000 tons of coal, which is, to a very large extent, the raw material of many manufactures in this country. We allowed to be brought in free of duty no less than 184,000,000 pounds of salt, which is raw material to the fishermen of the Eastern Provinces, in order that their employment might be thus made more lucrative. If it is right to permit such a large quantity of raw material to come in free to assist our manufacturers and other parties engaged in various industries, upon the same principle it will be right and just that we should allow fertilisers, which are raw material to the farmer, to come in free of duty. Now, I want to draw the attention of the House to another feature of this question. The endeavor has been made by those who have spoken against the removal of the duty to show that it would interfere with the manufacturers of this country, but under our National Policy we have bound ourselves to expose, at the will of the United States, the products of our farms to open competition with the farmers of that country. We have told the United States in plain words: If you will permit our wheat to go into your country free of duty, we will permit your wheat to come into Canada free of duty. But, on the other hand, these hon. gentlemen contend that if we were to say to the United States, allow our fertilisers to go into your country free of duty, and we will allow yours to come in free, that would be interfering with our manufacturing industries. In many ways our farmers are exposed to competition. Why not open up our markets so that our farmers will stand on equal footing with the manufacturers. I will now refer to the objections that were brought against this motion by hon. gentlemen the other day. My hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall), who, I believe, is a prospective Minister, who is likely to be appointed to that high position which is now occupied by the Minister of Railways, and who therefore no doubt spoke with authority, said, in commencing his speech, that if it was the general policy of the Government, which was attacked by this resolution, he would say nothing, but that there was a sectional matter upon which he rose to speak; and he went on to show that there was a large manufactory of fertilisers in his section of the country, that of Messrs. Nicholls & Co., of Capelton, formerly of New York, which, if this resolution were carried, would be injuriously affected. I would ask, is it right and just to tax the farmers of this country in order to support a foreign company which established itself in Sherbrooke for the purpose of manufacturing fertilisers? The hon. gentleman went on to say that he placed the interest of the capital of this foreign company in the one scale, and the theory, as he called it, of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) in the other. But you must remember, Sir, that it was not a theory which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) advanced, and that upon the one hand the hon. member for Sherbrooke was placing the interests of this company, and on the other the interests of the farming community, and then asked Parliament to support the company by a protective duty at the expense of the farmer. I say it is unfair to a most important class of the community that we should impose a duty for the purpose of increasing the profits of a certain company and increasing the burthen of those who already bear the heaviest burthens imposed by the National Policy. Another hon. gentleman, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who is generally fluent and pretty clever in putting his case, attempted to argue in favor of this tax, but on this occasion he had no case. He said that the farmers were being defrauded by artificial fertilisers of inferior quality being brought into this country. He must conclude that our farmers are not so sharp as they really are. You will find, Sir, among them men as sharp, as capable of discharging business and of investigating matters in their own behalf as you will find in this House to-day. The hon. gentleman said that because no analysis was made of importations of fertilisers, inferior fertilisers were brought in, and our farmers cheated out of their money. Another hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) argued that the fertilisers brought from the United States were of an inferior quality, that the analysis only took place of fertilisers for use in that country, and therefore he contended that this tax should continue in the interests of the farmers of this country. But the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) was himself the author of a Bill brought in in 1884 and placed upon the Statutes, which contains the provision that fertilisers imported from foreign countries into the Dominion must be subjected to analysis here before they can be entered, and that the materials manufactured in this country must also be analysed. I have the Bill before me.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there anything in the Bill about analyzing fertilisers from foreign countries brought in by private individuals?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In order to prove that I am right in my contention, I will read the clause. The preamble of the Bill reads: "For the prevention of frauds in the manufacture and sale of agricultural fertilisers." Then the 5th section gives a definition of agricultural fertilisers. It says the expression "agricultural fertilisers used in this Act shall be construed to mean any and every substance imported, manufactured, prepared or exposed for sale for fertilising or manuring purposes." That plainly refers to any articles imported as fertilisers from foreign countries.

Mr. SPROULE. It says, "manufactured or exposed for sale." But if I send an order to Buffalo, as a private individual, and the fertiliser is sent to me, is there anything to prevent my going over the line and bringing it across and using it without its being analysed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron.) I understand from this Act that all fertilisers must be analysed. If each individual were allowed to bring the article across, what would be the use of putting on the Statute-book an Act for the protection of farmers. It would be useless if each private individual had a right to violate its provisions?

Mr. SPROULE. That is how it is being done.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Therefore, there is ample provision for the analysis of fertilisers, and that provision includes articles imported from foreign countries as well as manufactured in our own. Another argument that was adduced was one brought forward in that pleasing style which is characteristic of the Postmaster General, who has generally a gentlemanly way of putting things in a fluent, off-handed style, but with that positiveness which is peculiarly characteristic of him. He showed that we had all the materials in abundance close at our hand for the manufacture of those articles which are used as fertilisers. He pointed out in eloquent terms, and truly, that we had large beds of superphosphates in this country, and also deposits of copper pyrites from which the sulphuric acid is manufactured. If we have these raw materials in abundance, and have every facility for their disposal, why should any manufacturer require a high protective duty to sustain him in the market? The same hon. gentleman told us that we could manufacture sulphuric acid in this country so cheaply that we could send it into the United States and compete with the manufacturers in that country. Then, why should we not be able to control our own Canadian market without a protective duty of 35½ per cent. on sulphuric acid? That is the duty now imposed in favor of the manufacturer. But, if it can be manufactured here as cheaply as it can in the United States, and if we have the raw material ready to our hands, is it to the interest of the farming community, who have to pay this duty, to keep it standing as an extra profit to the Canadian manufacturers of artificial fertilisers? If we have these phosphate beds, and if we have these two elements which are required to enter into the manufacture of these fertilisers, is it reasonable to keep this duty on in order to put the extra amount into the pockets of these men at the expense of the agricultural community? I say it is not, and therefore we ask the Government to remove that duty. Another gentleman corroborated that argument. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, who is always capable of making the best out of the worst, who is almost able to make black appear to be white, corroborated this argument. I was astonished at the weakness of the position which he took. He showed that we had rich beds of superphosphates in this country, that we had every convenience for manufacturing sulphuric acid, so that we could compete with any country in the world, and we were told that these articles were sent to England, and to foreign countries and competed in foreign markets. If that is so, is it right that a high duty should be put upon these articles in order to put an extra profit into the pockets of the manufacturers here? When he was asked the question: Why do you put on the duty? he said, you must remember that they are infant industries. We have heard that expression from time to time for the last ten years. So often do I hear this statement that our industries are of an infant character that I almost conclude that our Dominion is a foundling hospital, and that the Government and their supporters are simply nurses to care for the foundlings. What constitutes an infant industry? You give every facility for the introduction of the raw material which the industry requires, you give it every facility for its development. Has not a Canadian as much skill, as much energy, and as much push, to enable him to go into that industry and make it a success as one of any other nationality? and especially so when these hon. gentlemen, out of their own mouths, unite in saying that we have greater facilities in this country for the production of artificial fertilisers than they have in any other. What constitutes an infant industry? Is it not time to take off the long clothes from the infant? Will it develop its muscles and strengthen its bones as long as you do not allow it to walk? Take off the swaddling clothes from these infants, allow them to use their muscles and those muscles will develop and their bones will harden, and they will grow up in the same way as the industries of the United States have done. Take the infant industries in Michigan. In every town and village in Michigan they have small industries which have to compete with the oldest in the United States, and yet their goods go into every State and compete with those of the oldest manufacturers in the country. They have grown largely, they are increasing the number of their hands, they are increasing their investments in these industries in the West; and, when you remember that Michigan and Illinois and other States are younger than Ontario and most of the Provinces of Canada, I call the attention of the country to those who vote against this motion to-night, in order to show that they stand by their party rather than by the people of the country. In order to sustain foreign capital and foreign investments in this country, they are willing to burden the Canadian farmer to add to the large profits of the manufacturers of artificial fertilisers. I might continue much longer in dealing with these matters, but I would remind the Government that they are leading the country into some serious difficulties in connection with these restrictive measures. I see to-night that a Retaliatory Bill has been introduced by C. S. Baker, of New York, into the Congress of the United States, that is going to impose a heavier duty on our products. He proposes in his Bill to put 15 cents a bushel upon barley, and the United States is our only market for barley; 5 cents a dozen upon eggs, and we exported to the United States last year nearly $2,000,000 worth of eggs; 25 cents a bushel on potatoes, and how will the people of Prince Edward Island, whose principal product is potatoes, be able to pay 25 cents a bushel to get their product into the United States market, the only market they have for it? If we irritate the United States by these retaliatory tariffs, this is what we must expect. It is time to face this question, and to come to a wise conclusion as to what is best for the country. In putting burdens upon the great industrial class of this country we are committing a crime against them, and at the same time are leading to retaliatory measures on the part of the neighboring Government. Instead of throwing open our markets as they have been doing to us—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MITCHELL. What about fresh fish?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Yes, they allowed our fresh fish to go in there free since 1883. They removed the duty on shrubs, and vines, and seeds four or five years ago, and it was not until last year, and then by force of circumstances, that this Government removed the duty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And then they taxed the baskets.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). And then they proposed to tax the baskets, and they did. They permitted the fruits to come in free, and put a duty on the baskets in which they were imported. The nurserymen of our country are allowed to go into the State of New York without any obstacle being thrown in their way at all to sell their goods, and now I see in a Bill before me that an obstruction is to be thrown in the way of those who come from the United States into our country to do the same business that we are permitted freely to do in theirs. I do not wonder at human nature standing up on its dignity and that the Americans say to themselves: If the Canadians are going on in such a course so much in opposition to our interests, we have a right to retaliate in the matter along the lines on which we have been attacked. I think it is the duty of this Government to give earnest heed to what they are doing, and to change their policy to something of a more reciprocal character, so that peace, good will and harmony may exist between the two great nations that are adjoining each other.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). Since having a seat in this House it is not often that I have asked the indulgence of its members to speak upon any question which may have been under discussion, and I do not know that I would do so to night were it not for the fact that this question which has been introduced by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) is one which affects the class of which I have the honor to belong, the farmers of this country. While I may not be able to use the eloquence and the glib tongue of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, it is possible that upon this question I may be able to vote with my party and to act in the interest of my country. Sir, we have been told by the hon. member for Middlesex that the farmers of this country ask for no protection. Now, I take it that the question has been decided not only by the farmers of this country but by the people generally in 1878, 1882, and in 1877; they do want protection, and they have said that this Government has given them protection. I need scarcely point out in what direction the Government has given them protection. We find in the case of wheat, in the case of oats, in the case of pork, which are large elements in the production of the farmers of this country, that a very essential protection has been given them. Now take the case of wheat. We find that large importations have been made into this country. We find that 15 cents a bushel have been placed upon wheat, and 50 cents a barrel on flour. Now, if there had been no protection, the Americans would have placed their wheat upon this market. But the point is here, that the price in Canada must have been greater because the price of wheat is ruled, as we are told, by the Liverpool market, and if the price had not been greater in Ontario, they would have sent it where they could have got a higher price, but they sent it into Ontario, after paying 15 cents upon wheat and 50 cents upon flour. And let me express this wish, that the Government of the day will see it to be in the interests of the farmers of this country to allow the duty of 15 cents a bushel upon wheat to remain the same, and to increase that upon flour; and that instead of allowing it to remain at 50 cents, they make it at least 75 cents or 80 cents. I believe the farmers and the millers of this country are looking in that direction. I believe there can be no question that if it were possible to get the feeling of the farmers and of the millers, they would unmistakably pronounce in that direction. I have spoken in regard to oats and pork. We find that many times during the last 4 or 5 years oats could have been brought into this country, had it not been for the duty placed upon them, a great deal cheaper than those who had to use them could get them in Canada. The fact is that we have a large surplus of oats and peas in this country. Let me also mention Indian corn, which has been touched upon in this debate. We were told by the hon. gentleman that corn was dearer without the duty in Canada than it was in the United States. He also told us that it was of the same price with the duty of 7 cents a bushel upon it that it was in the United States. Well, it appears to me that the Americans could have no difficulty in bringing in their corn if corn was higher in Canada without the duty that it was in their own country. But the point is this, that if American corn is allowed to come into Canada free, it must displace just so many bushels of our peas and oats. Those cognisant of the fact know that there are many sections of our country that are not adapted to growing wheat and some of the finer kinds of grain, but are well adapted to growing coarse grains; consequently, every bushel of American corn that comes into this country must displace either a bushel of oats or a bushel of peas that has to be sent out of the country. Now allusion was made to the fact to-day that the distiller is allowed to import his corn for certain purposes free of duty, but that the man who feeds the corn has to pay 7 cents a bushel upon it. Now, just let me say that there is a large number of cattle exported to the United States at a very low cost, and those that are exported to Britain cost perhaps four times as much as those that go to the other side. Well, the distiller in Canada who feeds a great many poor cattle, buys cattle fixed at a price between the two, and in that way he helps the Canadian farmer. Now, let me touch upon the question of pork. I do not deny that we require a good deal of pork, and the Trade and Navigation Returns will show that upon a certain portion of the pork imported into this country the duty is 1 cent a pound, upon other portions 2 cents. If you take the Trade and Navigation Returns for the last three or four years you will find that the Canadian farmers have upon pork alone, with the duty of 1 cent a pound, been able to put in their pockets over one million dollars. Now, the hon. member for South Huron tells us that the farmers of Ontario, all over the Province, will not long continue to farm under the old system of raising coarse grains and cattle, in order to send them to a foreign market; they must feed them at home and be consumed in this country on the farm. Then, almost in the same breath, they tell us that the policy of the Government was made mainly in the interest of the manufacturers. How in the name of common sense are these grains to be fed upon our soil? How are these cattle to be consumed in our own country, if we have not a population to do it? It does appear to me that the manufactures in this country have got to be fostered in every conceivable shape, and I admit the policy. I agree with the statement of the hon. member for South Huron that these things should be consumed in our own country, but I must confess that I cannot see how it is to be done, unless the population of this country is very much increased over what it is at the present time, and I believe that that cannot be done in any better way than by fostering the industries of the country. Now, I come to the question introduced by the hon. member for North York, that of fertilisers. I agree with the statement made, I think by the hon. member from Brome (Mr. Fisher), that they are not very generally used by the farmers of this country, but that possibly the day is not far distant when they would be more used than at the present time. But does any hon. gentleman on the other side mean to say that if the duty were taken off these fertilisers, there would be even one pound more used in Canada than at the present time? This hon. gentleman states that these fertilisers can be bought cheaper when their comparative value is known. Do they mean to say that they can be bought cheaper on the other side of the line than in Canada? No, I believe they do not, and they cannot prove that statement. There is another point in connection with this matter and it was referred to by the introducer of the resolution, that on the free list of the United States, are "bones crude, not manufactured, burned, calcined, ground or steamed, bone dust and bone ash for manufacture of phosphate and fertilisers." I venture to take this position that there is not an hon. gentleman opposite who does not know that bones and phosphates are taken to the other side and manufactured there, and hon. gentlemen opposite desire Canadian farmers to pay the freight upon those bones and upon those phosphates, sending the raw products there and bringing them back in a manufactured state and paying the freight both ways. Is that reasonable or in the interest of the Canadian farmer? It appears to me that the resolution introduced by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), is one that is not in the interest of the Canadian farmer. Possibly I may not be able to convince many members of this House in regard to this matter, but I am speaking with regard to something of which I know, and while our lands in many sections of the country do require a certain amount of fertilisers, and whilst perhaps their use may be steadily increasing, we have in our own country deposits of phosphates and also the material out of which we can make sulphuric acid; therefore if we go to a foreign country for those phosphates, we are not true to our country, we are unwise to our best interests and the Canadian farmer has sunk far below what I think he has. Let me say this with respect to the Canadian farmer, that he knows pretty nearly what he is about, and although we have been taunted that we require others to look after our interests, we really want the reward of our labor to go to the honest farmer and not to the rogue.

INFORMER LECARON.

Mr. FLYNN. When you, Sir, resumed the chair at eight o'clock I brought to your notice an article in the Free Press of this evening. I regretted that the First Minister was not in his place, but since then he came into his place, and I presume his colleagues communicated to him the statement I made to the House. I read the paragraph which appears in an evening paper in order to give the Government the earliest opportunity to contradict it, if they could contradict it, and I presume they will be able to contradict it. Lecaron made some extraordinary statements, but none more extraordinary than the statement that he was also in the pay of the Canadian Government. I, therefore, read this paragraph in order, if it is not true, as I hope it is not true, that the Government might have the earliest opportunity to contradict it. I wait for the answer.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not hear the quotation read by the hon. gentleman, but perhaps the hon. gentleman will wait until the First Minister is here, and then repeat his statement.

Mr. FLYNN. As I stated before, immediately when you, Sir, resumed the chair, I brought this matter to the notice of the Government. I was then requested to wait for the First Minister—I regretted he was absent, and was anxious he should be here. He came in a little while afterwards, and I presume his colleagues communicated the statement to him. I look upon this as a very important matter. The right hon. gentleman has left the House and I do not know when he will return, and, moreover, I may be absent when he does return. I suppose he is within the building and his colleagues could intimate the matter to him. I have, however, discharged my duty; I have asked the question of the Government, and if they think it is not of sufficient importance to deny it, the responsibility is theirs.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not hear the statement, as I was out of the House myself at the time, coming in at perhaps a quarter or twenty minutes after eight. If the hon. gentleman would be kind enough to repeat it now, perhaps I might answer him.

Mr. FLYNN. I will read the statement. It appears in the Free Press this afternoon and is dated London, February 13th. (Paragraph re-read.) That was the statement.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have been in the Government for a long time and I think if such a thing had existed—

Mr. FLYNN. If desired, I will read the paragraph again, as the First Minister is now in his place. (Paragraph re-read.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I can only say that I do not know Lecaron, I never saw him, I never corresponded with him, I never paid him any money, I am not aware we are paying him any money now.

Mr. MILLS. Are you paying anybody for such a purpose?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, we are paying nobody.

ARTIFICIAL FERTILISERS.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the motion is put to the House I claim its indulgence for a few moments. The debate has taken a rather wider range than the motion involved and this I regret, because it is calculated to perhaps cloud the discussion of this particular question and perhaps prejudice it in the minds of some hon. members. However I disclaim any desire whatever to touch upon that subject commonly called the National Policy. I consider the granting of the motion in question is entirely consistent with the principle of protection or as it is called in this country the National Policy, which principle is in no way involved in the issue now before the House. I should like to ask the hon. gentlemen who have defended this tax of $10 a ton on commercial fertilisers, is it the consumer or the manufacturer? The defence of the tax was led off by my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall), for whom I entertain as warm a personal feeling as he can towards me; but hon. members will remember well that he stated that he defended this tax at the request of a man or a firm engaged in the manufacture and not the purchase of the fertilisers. He was representing the seller. Now, who is representing the buyer? The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who support this tax do not pretend to support it by argument. They do not pretend to support it in the interest of the consumers, but in a side way, some for one reason and others for another, they try to defend it. For example, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) said it is necessary to exclude foreign fertilisers, or otherwise this country would be flooded with inferior grades of the article. At the same time he discredits his own bantling, the Act he passed in 1885, a very excellent measure indeed, and one which supplies all possible protection against the adulterated article whether manufactured in Canada or imported. That Act is in full force, and not one pound of the fertiliser from abroad can be sold without having passed the Government analysis. Therefore, so far from attaching any importance whatever to the argument of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) I think the statute of his own creation on the Statute-book, is a complete answer to his argument. If this Act be defective, let him apply to the House to remedy it, and I am sure that the same spirit which suggested the passage of the measure will help him in causing it to accomplish what the desire of the House at the time was. The Postmaster General favored us with a few remarks on this subject, and in so far as he told us of the natural resources of Canada in connection with this question, I entirely agree with him. I agree with him when he says that we have in Canada, through the gift of a bountiful nature, all the natural products necessary to manufacture this article. He truthfully says that we have here, almost under the shadow of the walls of this House, large deposits of phosphate richer than are to be found in any other part of the world and in greater abundance. I also agree with him when he says that the only other article necessary for the manufacture of fertiliser is sulphuric acid, and that we can now in Canada manufacture this acid cheaper than in any other part of the known world. Well, Mr. Speaker, if we have at our doors the two natural products necessary for the manufacture of this article and if as he says "they are found under conditions more favorable than they are to be found in any other part of the known world," what is the need of a duty of $10 a ton upon the manufactured article? Wherein comes the necessity for protection in a case like this? Why, Sir, the very nature of the article itself is all the duty that you require. The American people are our nearest neighbors, they do not protect their acid, and it is admitted that they have to import it from Canada for their own use. They have no protection and the best protection that any country requires in regard to acids, sulphuric acid for example, is, that it is a dangerous and expensive article to transfer from locality to locality, and the freight therefore is so high as almost to prohibit its transference, whereby to place it in competition with any article produced in the country to which it may be sought to be imported. I entirely agree with the facts stated by the Postmaster General and I only wonder that a man of his excellent judgment and great ability is compelled by influences, the thralldom of which he cannot escape, to draw conclusions not justified by the premises and to arrive at conclusions which are unsound in every regard. If we have all the products necessary for the production of this article within our own country, and in the most favorable conditions under the sun, why add to the cost of the manufactured article by an unnecessary duty. Why is this done? It is done to put money into the pockets of the favored few and to extort money out of the taxpayers, the burden carriers of Canada, the farmers who are the source of our great wealth. It is done because there is nobody in the government to speak in the interests of the farmers or to defend them. Who is the member of the Government to-day, from the Premier down, who honestly stands up for the welfare of the farmers whenever their interests are involved. No one. They are willing to try and deceive them with sophistry, but whenever it is sought to increase the taxes who are the advisers of the Government on behalf of the farmers? Those who promote the increase of the taxes, are not the buyers but the manufacturers. Does the Government ever ask the buyers to come before them when they are deciding judicially whether they will yield or not to the claims of those who ask for increased duties? No; they listen to the advice of interested parties, they put on the screws, they raise the tariff, and when the election time approaches they pass around the hat to get a little into their own coffers. That is the way the thing works and the man who has to bear the burden is never consulted except about election times. Then the Premier and his friends will go to the farmers and say: "See what friends we have been to you, the cloth men came to us and said: 'Put up the price of cloth to keep out shoddy' and we did raise the tariff to keep out shoddy" but still the question remains: Is shoddy kept out? We might go through the whole list of articles on which an inordinate duty has been put on and we will find fallacious reasons advanced to humbug the consumers. The persons who advanced those fallacious reasons, who endorse them and promulgate them over the whole land are the Administration of to-day. So it is in regard to this transaction. No possible excuse or justification can be advanced in support of this measure. The Premier himself I am quite sure will not defend it but he will vote for it all right and he will make his followers vote for it, he will not allow one of them to escape from his whip. I challenge him to stand up and defend his position on this question by argument, he has no argument in favor of it, the only argument that has taken place with him, was in a caucus somewhere with the manufacturers.

Mr. PLATT. The red parlor.

Mr. MULOCK. No, the red parlor comes later on. Then the Premier will again remind them of the relative position they occupy in this vale of tears, and of how he will be again up the tree, and they will be taking shelter under the all spreading branches, and become fat through his activity amongst the branches above. No, Mr. Speaker, there is not a member on that side of the House from the Premier down—or perhaps I should say from the Premier up—who will defend logically the course which they propose to take in this matter. But yet they will all vote to increase this burden on the farmer. I submit that what the Government insist on to-day is nothing more than a direct tax on every farmer who may desire to use the fertiliser in question and it is as much a direct tax as if you were to pass an Act of Parliament to charge the farmer a dollar for every load of barn-yard manure he chooses to haul out from his yard to spread out on his fields. As a matter of justice you might as well pass a measure of that kind, but you would not do that because you know very well that he would quite understand what you were up to. I think that two members like the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and the member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) who assert that the Canadian farmer has not enough intelligence to know what he is about, will possibly find that later on they have misjudged him in this regard.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman when I made such an assertion.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman, I believe, endeavored to give his enlarged views on this question on Monday last. I believe that was the day on which he made the assertion.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, I want most emphatically to contradict that I ever made such an assertion.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, the contradiction does not get him out of the difficulty. He said that the farmers of Canada did not know what they were buying, that they had to be protected, that they were innocent children, and that it was necessary to throw some mantle about them to prevent them going into the markets of the world where they could best buy what they wanted.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not make any such statement. I said they could buy the article in the United States and bring it here, and if they did not expose it for sale, there was nothing to compel them to analyse it, and they did not know whether it was an article of value or not.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, the hon. gentleman did not know what he was talking about when he said they could go into the United States and do all these things. Do the farmers of his county go with a wheelbarrow into the United States and buy a bag of fertilisers and wheel it all the way up to the County of Grey?

Mr. SPROULE. They send their orders.

Mr. MULLOCK. I do not know a farmer who gets his fertilisers in that way. If they buy these manufactures, they buy them from middlemen in Canada, and if the hon. gentleman looks at the Statutes of 1884 he will find an Act for protecting the farmer under these circumstances.

Mr. SPROULE. No, it does not.

Mr. MULLOCK. Well, I am perfectly satisfied that the hon. member for East Grey is an embodiment of greater wisdom than all the rest of the House of Commons and the Senate put together. They thought differently when they framed that Act. They thought it an Act which would meet the case. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) obtained the assistance of a special committee to prepare that Act; he prepared it with very great care, and it has been put into force; and if he looks into the accounts he will find the revenues that have come in under the operation of that Act. If the hon. member for East Grey were right, which he is not, the House, I have no doubt, would cheerfully amend the Act and protect the farmers from fraud, if it does not do so already. So far as the hon. gentleman is concerned, I think I have made good my statement of what he said when he endeavored to mislead the House, or perhaps did not understand himself what he was saying, when he tried to make this House believe that the Canadian farmer was not safe to be allowed to go out at night alone. This case, I say, is a most clear one, and in conclusion I desire that its consideration shall be in no way clouded by being confused with the general question of protection. While protection may be good as a relative term, while protection may be approved of, there are of course cases to which it is not applicable; and in this case, the fertiliser being as has been well said by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), raw material to the farmer and one of the most important aids to his husbandry, I will beg the House to come to a conclusion wholly irrespective of party considerations, to deal with the subject on its own merits and to remove this tax of from $6 to $10 a ton on what is a necessary article for carrying on the farming industry of Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. I would just like to set myself right with the House, seeing that the hon. gentleman has so emphatically attributed to me what I neither intended to say, nor did say. I said that the Act on the Statute-book at the present time would not prevent any farmer from sending away to the United States for a fertiliser, having it brought in here, and using it himself, so long as he did not expose it for sale, without being aware whether it was of any value or not. I think when I read the clause of the Act, the House and the country will agree with me. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), notwithstanding all his intelligence and extensive information, both professional and agricultural, would be unable to tell himself whether such a fertiliser was of any value unless it was analysed. The Act says expressly that every person who manufactures, sells or disposes of, or offers to sell or to dispose of any agricultural fertiliser, by barter, exchange or otherwise, shall affix to every barrel, sack, box or package thereof a stamp. Now, the farmer does not either manufacture, sell or expose it for sale, but he sends his orders to the United States; and were it not for the customs law, it could come in here; but even with the customs law it can come in if he pays the duty, and the farmer can use it on his farm without knowing the value of it. I speak from what I have seen and from what farmers have told me. One farmer told me that he had paid $60 for a fertiliser, and after he had put it on his land he would make his affidavit that he did not believe it was worth five cents. I read the Act very carefully before I spoke on this subject, and I came to the conclusion then that it would not prevent any individual farmer from bringing in and using a fertiliser for himself. It is not to be expected that the farmer can tell how much phosphoric acid or other substances there are in the article he buys. Every farmer is not a chemist, and it is not to be expected that he should know; and if we are not here for the purpose of protecting the farmers when they are not in a position to protect themselves, what are we here for?

Mr. MULLOCK. How does the duty protect them?

Mr. SPROULE. When the farmer pays the duty, there is no analysis because he does not expose the article for sale. This Act only applies to an article manufactured in the country or exposed for sale by the middleman; but the farmer is not a middleman.

Mr. MULLOCK. How will the duty protect him?

Mr. SPROULE. It will protect him in this way. When a man finds that these articles are not worth the duty he pays, he will not bring them in. This Act prevents middlemen from bringing them in and exposing them for sale. There is where the evil is done. If he exposes them for sale, they must be analysed, and the analysis must show what quantity of phosphoric acid and other elements are in them. Notwithstanding the statement of the hon. member for North York, I say there is not an intelligent farmer who reads that Act who will not agree with every word I say, that there would be nothing to protect the farmer if it were not for the Customs duty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Surely the hon. gentleman must see that his entire argument goes to show that the Act put on the Statute-book by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) is imperfect. His whole argument goes to show that the Act requires these articles, if manufactured in this country, to be analysed, but if imported from abroad enables them to escape the operation of the Act.

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman's argument is good, all he has to do is to get the Act amended. But I understand him to argue that it is all right for a man to import the article from abroad although it is worthless, provided he pays the duty. What benefit can it be to him if the article is worthless, and he pays $10 on it? He is so much worse off. The hon. gentleman knows that the farmers are practical people, and learn from experience as quickly as others. If the hon. gentleman's friend imports $60 worth of these fertilisers from the United States and finds them to be worthless, beside having paid $10 duty to the Government, he will not import the same articles next year. When he finds the article to be worth nothing, he will not import it, whether it be dutiable or not.

Mr. SPROULE. He might try another kind next year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is altogether astray. If he wants to make the Act apply to imported phosphates, let him do so. That does not touch the question raised by the motion of my hon. friend. The question now is simply whether the raw material, which it is necessary for our farmers to use in the cultivation of their land, should have a revenue tax put on it or not.

Mr. CARLING. I have no desire to take up the time of the House, as the question has been very fully discussed by hon. gentlemen on both sides. But the remarks that were made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) should not, I think, be allowed to go to the country uncontradicted. The hon. gentleman said he is prepared to prove that the value of farm lands in Ontario has, during the last five years, decreased 30 per cent. This I deny, and I think the hon. gentleman is not able to prove the statement he has made. I find in the returns published by the Ontario Government—the annual report of the Bureau of Industries of the Province of Ontario—compiled by Mr. Blue, that the value of farm lands in 1882 in Ontario was $632,000,000, while in 1887 it was $636,000,000.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is a larger area.

Mr. CARLING. That does not look like a reduction of 30 per cent. Farm buildings in Ontario, in 1882, were valued by Mr. Blue at $132,000,000, and in 1887 at $184,000,000. Farm implements in 1882 were valued at $37,000,000, and in 1887 at $49,000,000. Live stock was valued at $80,000,000, in 1882, and in 1887 at $104,000,000. These are the valuations made by Mr. Blue, the gentleman employed by the Ontario Government. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said that he could prove by the leading loan societies of Ontario that his statement was correct, and he referred to the Huron and Erie and other prominent loan societies. I find in the report of the Erie and Huron Loan and Investment Society, that the arrearages for last year were only 4 per cent. of the capital invested, that they were 22 per cent. less than they were the year before, that only two-thirds of one per cent. of the capital employed came back in the shape of property, and that the farmers in the vicinity of their headquarters had placed in the hands of the society over $1,000,000 for investment. The Canadian Company at its annual meeting held in January last, were informed by the president, first, that the company had reduced its rate 1 per cent. in 1887, and, second, that the prices obtained in 1887 from the sales of land were 25 per cent. higher than in 1886. The North of Scotland Canadian Mortgage Company held its annual meeting in January, 1888, and in his address the chairman referred to the falling off in interest received on mortgage in Canada, which he explained by the fact that a considerable number of mortgages made three or four years ago at a higher rate of interest have fallen in and the money has been lent at the much less rate of interest current now. This company also reported the amount of real estate fallen into the hands of the company through foreclosure was but $30,000 out of $3,000,000, or but 1 per cent. All the companies doing business in Canada and reporting to the Federal Government loaned in 1880 $56,600,000 on real estate security in the city and country. This had increased to $86,900,000 in 1887. Yet, whereas in 1880 the amount of principal and interest overdue and in default was $4,100,000 on $56,000,000, in 1887 it was $3,200,000 on $86,900,000. This, coupled with the fact that the amount placed in the hands of the loan companies for investment has increased, including debentures sold in Canada, from $12,258,300 in 1880 to $25,500,000 in 1887, is conclusive evidence that the farmers of Canada have been making progress. Now I find that the statements that have been made by my hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen on the opposite side have been to show that Canada is going backward instead of progressing, and I think statements of that kind have a tendency to injure our country abroad. These statements are to be deplored, as we ought all to unite to build up our country and make it appear as good as it is, and not endeavor to injure it. I find that the sales by the sheriff of lands in the Province of Ontario in 1878 amounted to 138 and in 1888 were only 51. The sales under process of law in the Province of Quebec in 1878 amounted to 805 and in 1887 to 302. In Nova Scotia these sales, in 1878, amounted to 100 against 90 in 1888. In New Brunswick they amounted, in 1878, to 62, as compared with 18 in 1888; and in Prince Edward Island they amounted, in 1878, to 71 against 23 in 1888. This comparison shows clearly that our country is in a much more prosperous condition under this Administration than it was under the policy of the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. Then, it has been said that the farmer must pay higher prices to-day on everything he purchases than he did formerly. Now I say, without fear of contradiction, that, taking an average of the different articles which our farmers purchase, it will be found that they pay 25 per cent. less to-day for them than they did in 1878. I have the figures here by me to prove this:—

This is pretty clear evidence that the National Policy has not injured the farmer, and that the farmer is able to buy his agricultural implements, his tea, his sugar and other articles much cheaper to-day than he could under the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite. I believe these hon. gentlemen when in power put a tax on tea, so that every farmer's wife had to pay a tax on the tea she consumed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You put it on the tea kettle.

Mr. CARLING. You cannot make tea without the kettle. I might give a number of figures to show that the farmers were never better off than they are at present. I am satisfied that it is the case in Ontario, and that it is the case in all the Provinces of the Dominion, and the more it is discussed and enquired into, it will be found that the farmers in 1888 are much more prosperous—and are enabled to purchase everything they consume for 25 per cent. less—than they were in 1878.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. Minister had remained in his seat, I should not have troubled the House on this occasion, but, as the hon. gentleman has chosen to bring forward a quantity of statistics not having a great deal of reference to the duty on artificial fertilisers, it may be as well to spend two or three minutes in referring to the fallacies, not new, but old and stale fallacies, which he once a year inflicts upon this House. In the first place, we will take his argument, so called, that within eight or ten years the value of the farms in Ontario rose from $632,000,000 to $636,000,000. If that did occur, bearing in mind the fact that in those 8 or 10 years, at least 500,000 or 600,000 acres of land were added to the area of the Province, it shows not a rise in the value of land, but a relative depreciation to a considerable extent. But these statistics, as has been admitted over and over again by those conversant with them are necessarily imperfect and little to be relied upon, and especially those which refer to the first years. If my memory serves me aright, a couple of years after the first date to which he refers, the value of farm lands was considerably over $636,000,000, and it has decreased to the extent of $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 since. I have not the figures here, but that is my recollection. However, I did not rise so much to call attention to this as to make a proposition to the hon. gentleman. It does not appear to me to be very desirable that we should spend our time in merely hurling contradictions across the House on a matter of this moment. I know, I may say, of my own personal knowledge and experience that, in at least five or six important counties in Ontario, there has been in the last eight or ten years a remarkable depreciation in the value of land. That I know to my own knowledge, and in many cases to my cost. I know that there has been a depreciation in the value of land in the County of Frontenac, in the County of Lennox, in the County of Addington; and in half a dozen other counties which I could name, there is nothing like the same actual selling value which was obtainable in past years. My proposition to the Minister of Agriculture is this: He disputes the assertions made by my hon. friend of his knowledge and by myself of my knowledge, and by many hon. gentlemen of their knowledge. I think that, for once, a committee might be of value, and I would suggest that a committee should be appointed to ascertain the actual state of the case. It is of great moment to know if the value of the 20,000,000 or 30,000,000 of acres in the Province of Ontario, and the land also in the other Provinces, is rising or falling. My information, derived from those who are dealing with land, is that, in Ontario at all events, the actual selling value—I do not refer to the assessed value, which I think is all Mr. Blue has to deal with—is much less than it was ten years ago. It is hardly worth while to go on contradicting each other in this House. Let the matter be investigated, and let the committee ask for information on the subject from persons who are conversant with the actual sales that take place in the different counties. There are many persons in each county who could give information on this point, and who, if applied to by a proper committee, would give that information. If the hon. gentlemen would grant such a committee, I think it would serve a good purpose. As to the other argument, that there has been a considerable reduction in the cost of certain articles, we know that the world does not stand still, and we know that improvements are made in manufactures by which many articles are produced cheaper to-day than they were ten years ago, cheaper than they were twenty years ago, and cheaper than they were thirty years ago; but to say that is because you put taxes on certain articles it is as absurd a statement as anything I have ever heard on the floor of this House, and that is saying a great deal—a very great deal. On the other hand, if the prices of a few articles which the farmer has to purchase have been considerably reduced within the last few years, the price of every article the farmers have to sell has been reduced also, with very few exceptions, within the last few years. Our farmers cannot obtain now anything like the price they did obtain for many of the articles which they produce.

Mr. CARLING. What are they?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not now speaking of the sudden rise in the price of wheat, or anything exceptional of that kind, but I say that a comparison of the average prices of beef-cattle and cereals, and other products of the farm ten years ago, with the prices of to-day will show that there has been a very considerable reduction. We are in a position to prove that statement, but it would be absurd at this time and on this question to enter into a discussion of this matter which the hon. gentleman has challenged. If the hon. Minister wants to obtain the actual facts as to the selling price of farms in Ontario, and throughout the whole Dominion, these facts can be obtained easily in the way I have pointed out; and, if that were agreed to, I think it would be found that the statement made by my hon. friend, which I endorse, is correct, that, over the greater portion of Ontario to-day, farms have fallen very largely in value and cannot be sold for anything like as good a price as they could a few years ago.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have in my hand the valuations of cleared lands in Ontario from 1883 to 1888. In 1883, the valuation was $654,793,000; in 1887, the valuation was $637,883,000; while in 1886, it was $648,000,000, showing the reduction from 1886 to 1887 to be about $12,000,000. But the value of newly cleared lands in Ontario added since 1883 was $14,210,000, and if the hon. gentleman will add that to the decrease, he will see that there is really over $25,000,000 of a reduction. He has, therefore, evidently not quoted perfectly from the book. I may give an instance from my own section of the country. He has cited two or three companies whose lands have not been reduced in value. Well, I know they have. One of the companies had in my section a farm on which there was a mortgage for $2,200. That farm was valued for about $3,200 at the time they lent the money upon it; they offered it for sale and they could not get a buyer for it at all. Eventually there was a party who made an offer to purchase at $1,600 for their mortgage of $2,200, and they accepted it, feeling that it was the best that they could do. Is not that a positive evidence that the value of land has decreased in our section? I can give you another. Two days before I came here a farm that was sold in my section 7 years ago for $3,500, was put up for sale, under mortgage, at a reserve bid of $2,850, and they could not get a buyer. Is not that evidence that the value of land is receding. I, myself, acted as an executor for an estate in which there was a farm left as part of the estate. Ten years ago that man was offered $7,500 for that farm; we offered it for sale at public auction and we could not get a buyer at a figure that we thought we would be justified in selling for, the prices were that low. At last we got from the Chancery Court an order to sell the farm for what we could get for it, and it was sold for $4,900. The buildings were in just as good order as they were before, and are standing there to-day. For the hon. gentleman to say that land is not receding in value, is to talk about something that he really knows nothing of, at least so far as our section of the country is concerned. He bases his theory upon the reports he gets. But the farmers have practical experience with regard to the shrinkage of the value of lands, and are in a better position to speak than the Minister of Agriculture. I challenge him to-day to go through any agricultural district in this country, and call a meeting of intelligent farmers and ask them to say whether the price of land is receding in value or not, and he will find from their answer, unless they are so blindly devoted partisans that they would persist in any statement he might wish—they will say that lands have diminished in value. I am sorry personally to have to admit that they are very seriously reduced. A great many men have lost seriously in lands owing to reduction in value. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, is a very large land-holder; if he were forced to sell to-day, he would not begin to realise the price he could have got some years ago. But perhaps he forms his impression from sales made in the city of London. Now, he said that the farmers were getting binders for $150; but if it were not for his National Policy the farmers would be able to buy binders for $100. If the hon. gentleman will give a committee of this House I will prove to that committee that one of the largest manufacturers of binders in this country turned out a lot of binders last year for $74 each, and he sold them for $150. The actual cost was $74, and under the National Policy he charged the farmers $150, simply because they had a protection of 35 per cent. against the American binders. In regard to fertilisers, the hon. member for Welland said that it was necessary to keep up the duty because the farmers were so simple, they were so poor judges of fertilisers, that they would buy bad stuff, and in order to protect them from being victimised it was best to put the duty on and keep the stuff out. I suppose the Minister of Agriculture will say the same thing in regard to binders. In order to protect the poor innocent farmer from buying American binders at $100 say, if the duty was off, they kept the duty on, and make him pay $150 for a Canadian binder. Now, I will give him another evidence. If the hon. gentleman will make one single investigation this year, if he will search the records in the different counties in this country, he will find that there have been more chattel mortgages recorded by farmers in the Province of Ontario within six months than there have ever been in the same period before. Still, we find men for political purposes, even those who occupy high positions in the country, daring to state in the face of an intelligent people, and those who have the evidence before them, that there has been no shrinkage in value; they still persist in stating that land is keeping up to its full value. It is unfair to make those statements; men should blush when they dare to stand up, and make such statements before the House and country.

Mr. PORTER. I did not intend to take any part in the debate at all, because I considered that the subject before the House for discussion was simply a sort of preliminary skirmish in reference to the subject which will probably come up in a larger debate later on in the Session. The hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches have strayed away very far indeed from the subject introduced by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). Instead of confining themselves to the subject according to the rules of the debate, they have dragged in almost every question it was possible to bring into the discussion. More especially they have shown their intention by the subject they have now introduced of making an onslaught upon the Government's National Policy. Sir, I do not intend at the present time to defend the action of the Government on this subject. I have already by my vote in the House proclaimed my convictions on that matter, and the people of the country have recently proclaimed their convictions on that matter. But there is one thing particularly worthy of notice in the speeches of members of the Opposition who have spoken on this matter; it is this, that they particularly and peculiarly constitute themselves the champions of the farmers of Canada. Now, Sir, I object to that. I do not know by what right they alone speak in the interest of the farmers, and insinuate, nay, almost declare positively, that we on this side have no regard for the farming interests of the country. I beg to assure those hon. gentlemen that we are just as much interested in the welfare of the Canadian farmer as they possibly can be, and if we differ from them in any part of the policy it is simply a matter of conviction, and not at all a matter of party servility, as they charge upon us. We, Sir, have the interests of the farmers at heart, we think of them and consider what shall be best for their welfare in every action and every vote which we give in this House; and if our policy and our actions do not meet with their approbation then we can only say that it is a difference of opinion between the two parties who are, perhaps, equally willing to forward the best interests of our country. Sir, there is one thing most remarkable in this discussion, and more especially it is distinguishable in the observations of the last gentleman who addressed the House. He emphasised very forcibly indeed the decrease in the value of farm lands, in the Province of Ontario especially, and I may say also, from his remarks, that to follow the example set by the hon. member for South Oxford, ex pede Herculem, that really his opinions went to show that the National Policy was a great injury to the farmer. If the hon. gentleman were not speaking from a party point of view, if he were not entirely eaten up with partisan rancor, why did he not declare also that owing to certain circumstances which are now pervading the world over, lands have decreased in value in countries that are pre-eminently free trade countries? When he talks of the decrease in the value of lands in Canada, and the loss this has been to the farmers, why did he not also call our attention to the large decrease of the value of lands in England, Ireland and Scotland? These are free trade countries. If the National Policy has any influence or effect upon the value of land so also has free trade, and, therefore, the hon. gentleman's attempt to fasten the decrease of values on the National Policy was altogether irrelevant, uncalled for and illogical. I was somewhat amused also with the observations of certain hon.

gentlemen opposite, I refer particularly to an hon. gentleman who has the honor of representing a section of the country from which I come. When he was speaking I could not help thinking of a cartoon I saw in Punch many years ago. The famous English statesman Disraeli at one time of his life was a champion of protection to the farmers in England. This cartoon represented Disraeli, who was a man small in stature but of course quite pugnacious in character, and behind him there is an English farmer of very ponderous proportions, tall, well-built, strong and muscular looking; and the little man before him is turning round and saying: "Now, do not be afraid my good fellow, I will protect you." It is very singular indeed that this gentleman should constitute himself a champion of the farmers of Canada and ask them to keep their courage up because he will protect them. So many illustrations of the ridiculousness of the position which hon. gentlemen opposite crowd upon me that it is almost impossible to enumerate them, but there are one or two points to which I will allude. The Minister of Agriculture made a quotation from the reports of Mr. Blue. He quoted very correctly. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) called in question the accuracy of those reports.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. PORTER. The appropriateness of them.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. PORTER. I agree very much with the statement made that these statistics are scarcely reliable, and that many people intimately acquainted with the circumstances, attach very little value to them. In regard to fertilisers, I agree with the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) that the time has not yet come, but is perhaps near, when artificial fertilisers will be necessary to the carrying on of successful agriculture in our country. Not only do I agree with him in that opinion, but also in the opinion that the farmers must look very particularly and carefully after the stable manure on their own farms, which is undoubtedly the best manure they possess. But if it is necessary to obtain artificial manures, I consider it is in the farmer's interest that the best quality of such manure shall be supplied to him, and it is not safe to risk the importation of manures from those who would no doubt take the farmer's money and sell him a poor article. I consider the motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) would move in that direction, and is not therefore at all beneficial to farmers. In fact, I think it would be very injurious to them. The duty now paid on these articles renders it much more likely that the farmer will obtain a better quality of fertiliser, and at the same time it fosters an industry in our own country which will supply him with that article, and in that way both agriculture and manufacturing are benefited. I have no sympathy with those hon. gentlemen who make such vigorous attacks on the manufacturers on every occasion; indeed they appear to have a dagger somewhere about them, and the moment a manufacturer is presented to them they stab him to the heart. Not a word can be said with regard to the trade question, not a single discussion can take place on any commercial matter but the manufacturer is brought before the House and hanged, drawn and quartered. I object to that policy. I consider the manufacturers of every country are a most necessary class of the population. It was very well observed by the member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) that we wish to have a consuming people as well as a producing people, and we know very well that if the manufacturers were banished from the country, if they were repressed by improper legislation or compelled to abandon manufacturing by untoward circumstances, the farmers would suffer great hardship and misfortune. So I consider the vituperation of manufacturers on all occasions not of service to the country, but on the contrary a very great injury. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not thus rendering a service to the farmer, but on the contrary are injuring him most seriously. The products of his farm are more profitable if consumed at home, and the nearer home the better for the farmer. So I consider all these are irrelevant issues introduced into the question of fertilisers, and the hostility which hon. gentlemen opposite manifest to the manufacturers is unwise and not in the interest of the farmers of this country.

Mr. MASSON. I do not intend at this hour, after this matter has been discussed so long to enter into the wide field into which hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavored to drag the discussion. I do not intend, in other words, to discuss the National Policy, nor yet to prove, which I think has been frequently proved, that the National Policy is of great benefit to the farmer, not only in giving him a comparatively higher price for the products of the farm, but also, as has been explained to-night, in enabling him to purchase his goods at much lower prices. That, however, is not really within the question before the House. The motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), as I understand it, has reference solely to fertilisers, and in introducing that motion he claimed that he and the party surrounding him were the farmers' friends and champions. Great importance is given to the question because it refers to an important class, namely, the farmers of this country. We hear the changes rung upon the farmers of Ontario, what a most important community they are—and I admit they are important. I consider them to be of very great importance. The farmers are of very great importance, not only to one Province, but to all the Provinces, and especially so to Ontario. So to measure the importance of this question I thought it desirable to ascertain to what extent the farmers were importing artificial manure, and turning to the Trade and Navigation Returns I found that the farmers of Ontario for the year ending July, 1888, imported artificial manures to the value of $347, on which was paid a duty of $69.40. That, to a certain extent, shows the importance of this question, the duty collected from importations of artificial manure into Ontario during that year being only $59.40. The whole Dominion imported from various sources artificial manures to the value of $12,025, on which a duty of $2,405 was paid. So, in so far as the farmers feel the necessity of importing artificial manures the quantity imported does not show that they consider it of very great importance. It may, however, be said that if the duty were removed a larger quantity would be imported. I do not think the quantity would be very much increased, because certain classes of manure are imported free, and we find that of vegetable manure imported into Canada duty free the farmers of Ontario imported only to the value of $18, and the whole of Canada imported $53 worth. On the other hand we have fertilisers of our own and we find that they have been exported largely. Ontario exported of "bleached ashes"—a very readily applied fertiliser and one admitted to be of very great value, especially to those farms we hear gentlemen opposite speak of as being run down and reduced in value—last year to the United States $12,571 worth, and Canada exported to the United States, in other places, $16,222 worth of the same material. If we turn to "bones," another class of fertilisers, the raw material of fertilisers, we find that Ontario sent to the United States $15,234 worth, and that Canada sent to the United States and to other parts $22,261 worth. These questions show the great interest that the farmers of Ontario must necessarily take in the free introduction of fertilisers. The mover of this resolution expressed a wish that the debate would be confined to this subject; but how did these gentlemen who with him are supporting the motion carry out his wish? I find one gentleman launching out with the statement that the farmers are the highest taxed people in this country. That statement has been refuted time and time again. Wherein are the farmers the highest taxed people? They buy what they have to buy cheaper than they could buy before this policy was introduced, and then of the articles which they buy, what do they pay taxes on? Go into their houses and look at what they eat and ask yourselves on what do they pay taxes; on very few articles of the farmers diet are taxes paid. Look at what they wear and you will find that on few articles of their apparel do they pay duty. Look in their houses and farm yards and see on what articles which they purchase do they pay duty. On very few articles indeed. I ask members on the other side of the House, is it right that they should come forward on every available opportunity—not only when fertilisers are being discussed but when any subject is before the House, to come forward as if they were champions of the farmers and say that the farmers are the highest taxed class in the country. We were told apparently with very great glee that the farm lands had depreciated in value. Two gentlemen speaking of their own personal knowledge told us this, but to my personal knowledge they are not farmers and their knowledge of the value of farms is rather as mortgagees. It is well known to all farmers that when once a mortgagee gets hold of a farm the land does depreciate in value and I suppose it is as mortgagees that these gentlemen speak. Now, I do not think the question as to whether farms have decreased, or increased, in the Province of Ontario, or what has been the cause of the decrease or the increase, unless it can be proved that the duty placed upon fertilisers has decreased the value of the farms. If that is so, it is a proper part of the discussion; but to bring it in for the purpose of decrying the country and of sending broadcast over the Dominion and the world, the statements that the price of farm lands in Canada, and Ontario particularly, are diminishing year by year in value, is as unnecessary as it is unfounded. For what purpose is this done by gentlemen on the other side? What great gain is it to hon. gentlemen opposite that they should take every available opportunity to decry their country and say that our farmers are going to the dogs, that their farms are diminishing in value, that they do not get what they should for what they sell and that they have to pay too dearly for what they buy. I do not intend to take up time in going over these statements, but I say that as far as is necessary, I would give each and every one of those assertions a most emphatic denial. I point to the country, I point to the farmers of Ontario, I point to their homes, to their houses, their barns and the stock on their farms, to prove that they are better off to-day, that their wives and daughters are better clad, and that they live in more luxury and with greater ease than they did even eight or ten years ago. It is admitted by every gentleman who referred to the matter on the other side, that we have abundant resources in this country for the manufacture of these fertilisers, and for what reason then (even though it be to offer the farmers of Ontario $69.40) should this duty be taken off? This motion is only part and parcel of a plan of which I see little pieces cropping up in this House to decry the National Policy. They have attacked that policy year after year since its introduction in 1879 to the present time. Formerly they attacked the policy as a whole, but in those attacks they failed, and now they are going to try to attack it piecemeal. We find one hon. gentleman striking at the National Policy in relation to fertilisers, and another gentleman on another item and so on. That is their system of attack in detail. We have one gentleman attacking the duty on corn, but I suppose we will have the opportunity of discussing the corn question, when I think it can be satisfactorily shown that the farmers are not anxious that corn should be admitted free.

Mr MASSON.

Mr. SEMPLE. We have heard a lecture to-night about hon. gentlemen on this side of the House not adhering to the text. That assertion was made by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Porter), and I think if there is any member in this House that this accusation might be justly applied to, it was the Minister of Agriculture. The question under discussion had reference to fertilisers, and he who is at the head of the farming community and at the head of the Agriculture Department never uttered a single sentence in regard to the subject. Hon. gentlemen opposite talked about the large deposits of phosphates overlooking this city, and which were so easily obtained for fertilisers, but the Minister of Agriculture never experimentally gave them a trial, or, if he did, he did not give us the result of his experience. The practical Department of Agriculture in the Province of Ontario the Opposition there tried to make of it a factious question. They tried their best to make political capital out of the Department of Agriculture in Ontario, but in this they failed, and I am very happy to say that as far as the department under my hon. friend is concerned, he has had no factious opposition. We wish to see the Department of Agriculture a success, and I rejoice to find that there are so many members in this House who are looking after the farmers' interests. There are some who are looking after a certain class who go around to sell patent rights on hay forks, lightning rods or something of that kind, and when a person has been victimised, and not over one in a township is, a committee is appointed and witnesses are brought here to have a good time at the expense of the country at large. Now, the men who do these things are not so much to blame as the capitalists. These agents understand human nature, and know where to go to get their victims. The men who shave notes at 40 or 50 per cent. and move in high society, they are more to blame than the individuals who go to the farmers with a fair story and induce them to buy what is of no value. An hon. member spoke of the small amount of revenue obtained from the duty on fertilisers. If that is the case, it is a good reason why the duty should be taken off. One reason why so few fertilisers are used is their cost, and if there are such fine advantages for manufacturing them in this country, why need the manufacturers be afraid of competition? But it seems to me that these gentlemen do not wish to give the farmers the benefit of cheap fertilisers. The miserable sum realised from the duty is a good reason why it should be taken off, and doing that would show that there is a disposition to do something for the farmers. It is well known that, in former years, after the country was cleared the soil was rich, but it has been cropped so largely that now in order to obtain a good yield it is necessary to use fertilisers, which would not only result in larger crops, but would increase the value of the land. Now, I think this is only a small thing to ask on behalf of the farmers. The total value of farm property in Ontario is $975,000,000, including the implements, buildings, and live stock, and such being the case, the farmers should certainly receive some consideration. It has been asserted that farm lands have not decreased in value. I know of one case where a farm of 170 acres was bought five or six years ago for $10,000, and was recently sold under mortgage for $6,500. This gives some idea of the reduction in value of farm land. The valuation made by the assessors does not give a true idea of the value of the land, because the assessors very seldom change the valuation of farms from year to year; they simply take the valuation as they receive it on the rolls. But people who live in the country and watch the prices at which farms have been sold are in the best position to judge. The Minister of Agriculture stated, I think, that the mortgages on farms in Ontario amounted to $86,000,000. I have received a return showing that, in that Province, there are 66 loan and investment societies which hold mortgages on farms to the amount of something like $90,000,000. I am sorry that it is so, but it is a fact, and we may as well look at the facts of the case as to boast about prosperity where it does not exist.

House divided.

ADJOURNMENT—COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. There is on the Order Paper a very important motion of my hon. friend the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) on commercial treaties. Perhaps we can arrange for a day to take up that question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, I had some communication with my hon. friend in reference to that, and I think we agreed that next Monday would be a convenient day.

Mr. LAURIER. And continue it from day to day ?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know that we can do that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Probably in that case we had better make it the First Order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, make it the First Order of the Day. Let my hon. friend move that it be the First Order after Routine.

Mr. LAURIER. I move, then, that the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright, with reference to commercial treaties, be taken up as the First Order after Private Bills on Monday next.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10:40 p m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 14th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BALLOT BOX COMMITTEE.

Mr. HESSON moved :

That the names of Adam Brown and Dr. Landerkin be added to the Committee appointed by the House to enquire into and report on the ballot or voting box constructed by direction of this House.

Motion agreed to.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 29) to amend the Militia Act. He said: The purpose of the Bill is to amend the Militia Act and to make further provision for the payment of expenses incurred in calling out the Militia in aid of the civil power. Before the Militia is called out, a deposit must be made by the municipality to meet the expenses to be incurred by the calling out of the Militia. Another clause provides that the permanent corps or the training schools shall not be called out without the sanction of the Minister of Militia.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill amending the North-West Territories Act, so as to secure to the Territories Government powers as full as those of the Provinces, with the exception of the power of borrowing money ?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not the intention of the Government to bring in such a Bill this Session.

REBATE OF DUTY ON CORN.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion :

That whereas distillers are allowed a rebate of duty upon corn imported for use in the manufacture of spirits for export, it is, in the opinion of this House, but just and right that farmers and stock raisers who import corn to feed cattle or other stock for export, should also receive a similar rebate.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair, last evening, I had called the attention of this House for a few minutes to the resolution I have the honor of submitting. I had given some reasons why I thought the farming community should be placed in the same position as any other class in Canada; and I pointed out what I considered to be an injustice to the farmer in this regard. I thought that if a duty was imposed for the purpose of raising the price of the productions of the farm, it was very unjust to the farmers that this duty should be commuted to any class in the community that were importing it as a raw material to enter into their manufactured goods. I think that if it is right, if it is just, and if it is in the interests of the country that the distillers should get the duty refunded to them, I cannot understand how this House can refuse to refund the duty to any other class in the community. If the distillers were manufacturing an article that could not otherwise be produced, and if it was an essential element to the welfare of this country, then there might be a reason for overstepping the ordinary course that should be pursued by this House. But the article they manufacture is not of so much importance as the productions of the farmers, and I pointed out then how unfair and unjust it was to the farming community that they should be brought into competition with those who are allowed a rebate on the duty. If it is right to allow the distillers a rebate on the duty, it must certainly be right to allow the farmers a rebate also, providing they wished to use the corn for the purpose of feeding stock that they intend to export. I cannot understand why it is that the distillers should be thus favored. It is well known that they have a very high protective tariff, that has been imposed by this Government for the purpose of preventing others from entering into competition with them, and I cannot see why it is that they should have, not only a high wall of protection thrown around them, but also have a rebate given to them over and above that. I have not a word to say against the distillers, nor against any other class of people in this community. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, will say anything that is to be said against them, although he is not working in the line of temperance that he formerly used to advocate very strongly in this House, and I believe he does not advocate it just as strongly now as he did some years ago. The giving to one class of the community their raw material free, and taxing the raw material of another class, is a principle which this House should not readily assent to, though it is a well-known fact that on many occasions a majority in this House—

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

CHARLES WESLEY COLTHER, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Haldimand, introduced by Sir Richard Cartwright and Mr. Charlton.

Mr. LANDERKIN—That is another protest against class legislation, Mr. Speaker. That is another evidence of a desire on the part of the people to have extended trade relations, and it is a further evidence that they desire to have fair play accorded to their representative. The gentleman who was just introduced into the House has been elected on three occasions before, but by some hocus-pocus arrangement he has been deprived of rights that he was elected by the people to enjoy. It will be gratifying to the Government to find that the principles that we are advocating in this House are meeting with a hearty response in the country. This is the third indication we have had of it during this Session, and still they are coming. I will refer briefly to some of the views that are advanced by our friends from the other side of the House, in reference to the tariff. When the tariff is increased on an article, and when the Minister of Finance tells the House that the increase of that tariff will reduce the price of that article, nearly every one behind that hon. gentleman will say, that is so. When the tariff is taken off an article and the hon. gentleman says that it will lower the price of the article, every hon. gentleman behind him will say, that is so. If the tariff is put up, or if the tariff is put down, the same effect is produced in the minds of the hon. gentlemen who support the Government in this House. We were told when this tariff was introduced that it was the most perfect tariff it was possible for the mind of man to conceive and to place before the country. It was the acme of perfection, one of those systems which was likely to stand and be loved and revered by the people of this country for all time to come, that there was no necessity for tinkering with it, that it would become an established fact and the law would remain on the statute-book as the promoters placed it there for time immemorial. But what is the fact? Day after day we have depositions here asking for changes in this beneficent law, asking that the duty be reduced in many instances, and in other instances be raised, and we have had abundant depositions during the present Session. I will, if the House will permit me, point to a number of the depositions that have waited on the Government this year with a view to obtain changes in the tariff. We had a deputation waiting on the Government from Cape Breton asking for an increased duty on bituminous coal. Another deputation came asking that the item under which worsted yarn came in should be changed and a duty be imposed on dyed or finished wool. Another deputation from Montreal asked for an increased duty on fine leather. Another from Hamilton asked an increase in the duty on bent felloes. A deputation came from Bryson asking that thoroughbred dogs be put on the free list. We supposed they were going to let loose the dogs on farmers' sheep. There was a deputation from London asking an increase on chains and dairy material. From Toronto we had Mr. Polson, who wished that certain iron and steel articles used in steamship building be placed on the free list. When the Government increase the duty they say they lower the price, and when they take off the duty they say they lower the price. Such are the utterances of the supporters of the Government in this House. Here is a gentleman asking that the duty be taken off. I do not know what excuse hon. gentlemen opposite will give, but I admit they are clever at giving excuses. If there is one thing I admire about the Government and their supporters it is their ability to make excuses; and whether a duty is increased or decreased the same excuse is given, and it goes down with the Government supporters. Then we had a deputation from the boot and shoe manufacturers of Ontario protesting vigorously against any duty on fine leather. So we had a deputation asking for an increase of the duty, and another asking for the removal of the duty on fine leather. We had a deputation from Goderich asking an increase of the duty on flour. We have had a resolution brought into this House asking that fertilisers be placed on the free list, and we have also had a deputation of Tory members asking that fertilisers be not placed on the free list. A rather very important matter under the National Policy apparently is that relating to dogs, for we first had a deputation of dog fanciers on the subject, then a deputation of Tory members asking that the duty on collie dogs be removed. We have also had a deputation asking that the duty on small fruits and berries be re-imposed. Then we had a deputation, introduced by Col. Denison, asking for greater protection on piano actions, and last a deputation in favor of combines. Thus we have had depositions asking for greater and for lesser protection. I do not propose to ask any change in the tariff in the resolution I submit to the House. I do not propose to strike off a duty or to add a duty. I propose to allow the duty to stand, but I ask this House to take such steps as will ensure that not only the farmer but every other class be placed in the same position. I ask nothing for one class that I am not willing to give to another. I ask that the advantage given by the Government to one class in the community over every other class should be removed so that every class shall have a fair field and no favor.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I desire, as the hon. gentleman has brought this subject to the notice of the Government and the House, to say a few words in regard to the question of the duty on corn. While I cannot endorse every statement the hon. gentleman has made, especially with regard to the general effect of the tariff and the dissatisfaction which he seems to think prevails in this country in regard to its various provisions, I shall yet be glad to assist the hon. gentleman in so far as I can in any honest attempt to improve the tariff, which I believe has had a very beneficial effect upon the country at large. I would be very glad indeed if the Government, in revising the tariff as they may find it necessary, could see their way clear in some way to remove the duty on corn when imported for feeding purposes. As hon. gentlemen are no doubt aware, the raising of stock and dairying have become very important branches of agricultural industry in the Maritime Provinces. While the climate and soil of the Lower Provinces are admirably adapted for root crops, and while we have hay in abundance there, the farmers engaged in fattening stock are obliged to import a considerable quantity of other feed in order to carry on their operations successfully. They have long felt the duty on corn to be something which weighs heavily on their industry, and there is a general desire that this duty should be removed. It is true that their importations at the present time do not indicate a very general use of corn, but if the duty were removed the consumption of corn for feeding purposes would be largely increased. I scarcely think that the plan proposed by the hon. gentleman on the resolution now before the House would be practicable or workable, but some arrangement might be made by which corn for all purposes except for distilling would come into the country free. It is in the interest of the Maritime Provinces that the duty on cornmeal should be reduced or removed entirely. Some years ago I advocated the adoption of some such policy. I desire, as this matter has come up again, to express these views, and I trust the Minister of Finance will take up this matter seriously and adopt some means by which this duty can be removed.

Gen. LAURIE. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Landerkin) has, in the first place—if he will permit me to refer to one of his remarks—pointed to the new member who was introduced this afternoon as one of the proofs that this country is against the present fiscal policy of the Government. He also alluded to the fact that there were two other proofs that the people were against this fiscal policy. It is quite possible there were those proofs; but were there not also proofs of approbation of that policy? I think my presence here speaks for itself. There are others beside me who also discussed that question before their constituents, and they, like myself, have been sent to this House to defend this fiscal policy. The hon. gentleman's position is a little illogical and inconsequential. He stands before us as the mover of a resolution which he declares is not to interfere with the tariff, in fact he appears before us as a free trader, and yet he does not wish to see the duty removed from corn. I want to go further. I stand here as a defender of the National Policy. I hold, however, that corn is a raw material for manufacture. And speaking of that, I believe it is a reasonable position for a defender of the National Policy, as I am, to take, that the duty should be removed from corn altogether.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear, hear.

Gen. LAURIE. The hon. gentleman says, "hear, hear." Why does he not propose it?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I wish to explain to the hon. gentleman that my motion covers that, and refers specially to the duty as regards class legislation. I did not say I was opposed to corn being put on the free list.

Gen. LAURIE. If you amend your resolution so as to make it read that the duty should be removed altogether, I will be happy to support it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Move an amendment.

Gen. LAURIE. I prefer to let this resolution stand. I have plenty of time to take further action in this respect. This House will sit for some time yet, and it will be quite within my power to do so at a future time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Do it now.

Gen. LAURIE. Why should I do it now? I believe I am within my own discretion in this matter, and I can do it when I think proper.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Move the amendment now.

Gen. LAURIE. I am obliged to the hon. gentlemen for the promptings I receive, and I hope when the time comes that I shall have their support for such a motion. I can see that this, to a very large extent, is a Maritime Province question. When we come to consider the figures of the importation of corn, and to what Provinces it is imported, we will find that it is mainly to the Maritime Provinces that this importation is made. I find that in the last four years 512,000 barrels of cornmeal were imported into Canada. Of that I find that Ontario only imported 25,000 barrels, Quebec, 6,500 barrels, Manitoba and the North-West, 3,958 barrels. In all, the Upper Provinces, from Quebec to the west, have imported 35,000 barrels of cornmeal; while the Lower Provinces, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, imported 477,000 barrels. Therefore, I say it is largely our question and I trust that the members from the Upper Provinces, who recognise that we are prepared to meet them in supporting a duty on articles which they produce, will be willing to concede their support to us in obtaining, free of duty, articles which they do not produce. As I have shown before, the total import of American manufactured cornmeal into Canada was 512,000 barrels, of which 477,000 barrels were imported into the Lower Provinces. During this same number of years we ground in our own mills only 200,000 barrels, so that out of the total consumption of 677,000 barrels in the Lower Provinces, we ourselves ground less than one-third. I claim, Sir, that it would be a very great advantage to us if the duty was taken off this grain so that our people could be employed in grinding that corn in our own mills. I do not ask that the duty should be taken off cornmeal, but I ask that corn should be recognised as a raw material, that it should be free of duty, and that we then should have an opportunity of grinding it ourselves. If we examine the question further we will find that if such were the case that our own mills would have 200 per cent. more employment than at the present time, to the amount of $50,000 in labor for putting up that grain and grinding the meal in our own mills. I have already brought the matter to the notice of the Government, and I am informed it is under consideration. I sincerely trust it will receive such consideration as will result in the removal of the duty on corn and in the recognition of what I believe to be the true principle of the National Policy, that raw material should come in free to be manufactured here so that our own people may be employed. As regards the request that I should make an amendment now, I beg to say that I prefer to leave the matter in the hands of the Government, in the hope that when they take it into consideration they will see their way to foster our industries to the extent and in the direction I have indicated.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this motion I would say that the object of the farmer is to improve the soil and to produce as much growth as possible on a small quantity of land, as well as to raise live stock for the market. As this question includes the fattening of stock for the English market, allow me to refer to its bearing in this aspect and to say that this is a very important industry in Canada at the present time and one that is rapidly increasing in importance. I find that in 1878 we only exported 29,900 head of cattle, and of that number only 7,400 were sent to the English market as fat cattle. There was the large number of 17,000 sent to the United States. When we consider the extent of this trade at the present time we see the importance of this industry and the rapid increase it has made in Canada. We find that in 1888 we exported over 100,000 head of cattle, and of that number 54,000 were sent as beef cattle into the English market and 40,000 were sent into the American market as stockers. When we take those figures into consideration, it must be apparent to every gentleman at all acquainted with agriculture, or with the condition of the country at the present time, that this is a very important and a rapidly growing industry and one that requires every encouragement from the Government and from all other sources that possibly can give it encouragement. We find, Sir, that the quantity was more in 1885 and 1887 than it was during 1888. We find that during the year 1888 the whole amount of cattle exported was only $5,000,000 worth, while in 1887 it had reached $6,000,000, and in 1885, $7,337,000 worth, showing that the export of cattle has not increased during the last year or two. The view of a great many of the most progressive farmers of Canada, to-day, is that fattening cattle does not in reality pay the farmer. If any means could be adopted for giving the farmers a cheaper feed for their cattle it would be a great benefit to the farming community. If the feed that they are not able to raise on their own farms could be cheapened, and an arrangement made whereby they could sell their own produce and invest in cheap feed, so as to give them better returns in raising cattle, it is the duty of the Government to adopt such means. We find that at the present time corn, in the United States, is sold at 33 cents per bushel, and within the last two or three weeks it has been sent to the western part of the Province of Ontario at 59 cents a bushel in bond. But, when we add 7½ cents per bushel to that price, it raises the price to more than 46 cents, and it is not in the power of the farmers to pay such a price for it for feeding cattle and to get a profitable return. Let us enquire into the facts and see whether or not the imposition of duty on corn has had the effect of reducing the consumption of corn brought into the country. I find that the duty has reduced the consumption of corn by one million and eighty eight thousand bushels between 1878 and 1880. With those facts before us we will see that it is certainly the duty of the Government to give us some relief, especially when we find that there is another class of the community not so important a class as the farmers; a class that does not increase the welfare of the country in the same ratio as the agricultural class do, and who yet are more favored. I refer to the distillers. Since they are favored with a rebate of the duty upon the corn that they manufacture into spirits and export from the country, I do not see why the farmers should be denied the same privilege, seeing that they are the greatest producers of wealth and the greatest exporters of produce out of the Dominion of Canada. There is another view which has to be taken in connection with this subject. We must remember that the distillers, besides getting a rebate on corn, have the grains left to feed their cattle, and the distillers use this feeding to a large extent. They have this also free of duty of any description, which is a further injustice to the farmer. They can even enter the markets, and, by buying stock steers and feeding them, enter into competition with the farmers of Canada. We are certainly entitled to that consideration at the hands of the Government, and I was very much pleased indeed to see the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) rise and state that he would favor, not only the rebate of the duty to the farmers of the Dominion, but the removal of the duty entirely. He stated that the Lower Provinces are more affected by the duty on corn than the people of the other Provinces; but I say that no

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron),

Province is more interested in the removal of that duty than the Province of Ontario. I find that in the year 1888, the whole amount of duty paid on corn imported into the Dominion, was $173,384, of which the Province of Ontario paid $143,215, leaving only $30,000 to be paid by the other Provinces. But when we come to corn meal, I find that in 1888, the amount of duty paid in the whole Dominion on that article was $53,837, of which Ontario only paid $3,419, while the Province of Nova Scotia paid $42,221; and that is a duty on the food of the fishermen and workmen of that Province. Now, Sir, when we take into consideration that, according to Sir John Laws, one of the foremost agriculturists of the British Islands at the present time, one ton of corn meal has a manure value of £1 11s. or $7.44, we can see that it is of the utmost importance to the farmers of Canada to get a cheap feed for cattle and also to increase the supply of manure, seeing that we do not produce this article of food in our own borders, to make it as free as possible to our people. Now, we find that last year 40,000 stock cattle, and the previous year 45,000, went into the United States from Canada; and one reason why the feeders of the United States are able in this way to purchase our cattle, pay a duty of 20 per cent., and take them into their own country, is that they possess this cheap food. It is not because the United States require our cattle, for they are large exporters of cattle themselves. We find that the United States export to the British market 241,360 head of beef cattle; so that the 40,000 they take out of the Dominion of Canada and fatten in their own country, either goes to the English market to compete with our beef there, or they supplant a certain number of their own cattle. Therefore, in order that we may be able to hold our own in exporting beef and carry that important industry to a successful issue, it is the duty of the Government to give the farmers this relief. It is only in justice to ourselves that we ask this. But it may be said that there are certain portions of the Dominion which would be injured by the removal of the duty, as proposed by the hon. member for Shelburne. Well, I take exception to the statement. There is no proof that the duty has increased the price of corn to producers. By the Trade and Navigation Returns, I find that in 1878 corn was brought into Canada at 47½ cents a bushel, and exported at 66½ cents, showing a profit of 19 cents per bushel; and I find in an abstract which has been placed in the hands of every member, that in 1881 corn was 55 cents per bushel in the United States, while it was 66 cents per bushel in Montreal; but when we come down to 1886 we find that corn was 49 cents per bushel in the United States and 49 cents in Montreal. Certainly it is proof positive that the duty on corn has not benefited those who produce corn in Canada, but rather the opposite, when we find that the producers of corn in Ontario under the National Policy did not get as high prices as they did before the National Policy came into existence, when compared with prices in the United States. There is another proof that the imposition of duty on corn has injured the trade of the country. We find that in 1878 there was a profit of $790,000 made upon corn, which for one item is certainly no insignificant sum, whereas in 1888 there was only $138,000 of profit on corn; so that besides not benefitting the farmers, the duty injures the trade of the country. There is another very important industry in the country which at the present time requires to be nurtured in every possible shape, that is, the dairy industry. The experience of those who have entered into that industry for the last two or three years is that it is an actual necessity to sow a very large amount of corn for green feed and ensilage, which is being adopted very rapidly in Canada, therefore I hold that it is the duty of the Government to allow corn to come in free, seeing that all the seed we get for sowing, both for fodder and ensilage, comes from the United States. Any gentleman who has paid any attention to the dairy industry within the last few years knows that the farmers must supplant their pastures if they are to be successful. Now, I am just going to speak of another feature of the National Policy, and then I am done. I have been actually astonished at statements that have been thrown across the floor at us on this side of the House. One of those statements is that the farmers of the country pay almost no taxation. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson), no longer ago than yesterday, stated that the farmers paid almost no duty. "Go to the farmer's house," he said, "and see his table, and see what quantity of things are on that table on which duties have been paid." I would ask if the farmers of the Dominion of Canada do not set as respectable a table as any other class of the community? I would ask if the farmers of Canada only feed upon the husks of the food that goes to supply the tables of those not engaged in that industry? And yet, Mr. Speaker, I find farmers sitting on the other side of this House who are willing to swallow the bait and take down every indignity thrown at them as a class. Then, again, we are told that on their clothing the farmers of this country pay no duty. Why, Sir, let the hon. gentleman examine the tariff, and see if the clothes worn by the farmers and farm laborers of this country do not pay a higher duty than the clothing of those in other positions. I say we are taxed more heavily on these goods than any other class in the Dominion, and I say it is an indignity thrown against the farmers of this country to point to their table or their dress as an indication that they do not pay an equal amount of duty to that paid by any other class in the country. We were asked last night by the hon. member for the south riding of Ontario (Mr. Smith), what we would do with our cattle if we did not get a large population into the country to consume them. I beg to inform that hon. gentleman that the export of our fed cattle is rapidly on the increase, and that whatever other effect the National Policy may have, it has had no effect at all in keeping our cattle at home, despite the assertion by the hon. the First Minister, when introducing that policy, that not only our agricultural products, our butter and our cheese, but our cattle, would be consumed in our own country, when all these tall chimneys would be in full play. Well, we have had ten years' experience of the National Policy, and yet to-day we export more of that class of produce than we ever did, and the exports are continuing to increase. We were told by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture that we can purchase goods 20 to 25 per cent. cheaper now than we ever did, but we cannot purchase them as cheaply as the reduction in the old country markets, which I have visited three times within the last four years, would warrant. I have been told there that the improvements in machinery and in methods of manufacture have reduced goods more than 30 per cent; so that, even admitting the statement of the hon. gentleman to be correct, we do not get the full benefit of the improvements in manufactures which have been obtained in other parts of the world. I hope the Government, therefore, will see their way, if they cannot remove the duty on corn, to give to our farmers a rebate upon the amount used in feeding cattle, as soon as they prove satisfactorily to the Government that the cattle have been exported.

Mr. MASSON. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken made reference to the debate of last night, and to the statement which fell from me that the farmers, as a class, pay but little of the import duties. I expected that the hon. gentleman, when he challenged that statement, would at least have advanced some argument in behalf of the contrary contention, or have brought down some details or some facts to show wherein our agricultural community pay anything like the import duties that other classes do. He referred to the workingmen in our cities. Well, I say that the laboring classes in our cities pay more of the import duties than do the farmers. When I pointed to the table of the farmer, the hon. gentleman contended that I wished to infer that it is not as well furnished as that of other classes. I did not mean anything of the kind, but we all know that the farmer produces a large proportion of what he eats, and that no duty is paid on that. It is only begging the question to go off on tangents of that kind and make broad and sweeping assertions which are not backed by any fact or argument. Let hon. gentlemen opposite point to the articles of diet, and of clothing, let them point out what there is to be found around the farmer's place which is imported. The hon. gentleman said that the farmer pays a duty on woollen goods. I would ask, do the farmers, do the laboring classes, or even the professional classes, as a rule, wear imported woollen goods? No, thanks to the National Policy, our Canadian woollen goods have taken the place of the imported articles, and are worn by all our laboring classes and farmers and by our professional men. As to this resolution before the House, I agree with one portion of the remarks of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), that it is impracticable, and to that point of the resolution I will address myself first. We are asked that a rebate be given on imported corn which is fed to cattle that are exported, and not on that fed to cattle slaughtered and used in this country. Now, that would mean that the farmer would import a certain quantity of grain to be fed to cattle to be consumed in this market, and a certain quantity to be fed to cattle to be exported. There would have to be an inspector in every farm-yard, as there is in every distillery now, to find out how much of the corn was consumed for the one purpose and how much for the other. It is clear that it is utterly impracticable. We have inspectors in the distilleries for various purposes, so that there is not much expense in having them take note of the quantity of corn used there; and there is a great distinction between the two classes as regards the consumption of corn. One of the classes being composed of men who are under the direct scrutiny of the Government from the time the raw material comes in until their product is exported, it is in their case easy tracing how much corn is used for that purpose; in the other, the effect of making any distinction would be to allow corn in free for all purposes. For once the corn came into the hands of the retailer he would sell to people feeding for export and for home consumption. How could the line be drawn? A young animal is fed for two years—when can it be said he is to be fed for exportation? If he is to be fed for the calf for exportation, all that he consumes should be free of duty. The whole thing is impracticable, and if there is any object in the hon. gentleman's resolution, it is to bring about covertly the free importation of corn. What the effect of the free importation of corn would be to the farmers of Ontario is perhaps a matter that requires very close investigation. I have for some time been trying to satisfy myself as to what the result would be, and I have come to the conclusion that it would be a serious disaster. The reason is this: corn, as a grain for feeding purposes, would then come directly into competition with our oats and other coarser grains, the prices of which would be thereby reduced. On a former occasion in this House I went into considerable detail as to the effect of the free importation of oats. I then made, as a summary of my remarks, the statement that the difference between the price of oats in Chicago and the price in Toronto and Owen Sound and other lake ports was, on an average, from 12 to 14 cents, that it was seldom under 12 and frequently over 14 cents. I find in yesterday's paper that in Toronto to-day oats are quoted 36 to 37 cents, and in Chicago they are quoted at 25 cents, which shows a difference of from 11 to 12 cents. What is the cause of that? Why are oats lower in Chicago than here? The reason is that in Chicago they have to come into direct competition with corn which is quoted to-day at 34 to 35 cents in that market. Therefore the relative properties of feeding being greater in corn than in oats, it is not to be expected that oats would continue to fetch 36 to 37 cents in Toronto, if corn which is selling at 34 to 35 cents in Chicago was allowed to be imported free. The result of that would be that, in my opinion, the effect of the free importation of corn would be to reduce the price of oats in Ontario at least 10 cents a bushel. Now, if that would be the effect on the price of oats, we have to consider the quantity of oats grown in Ontario in each year. We export from two to three million bushels of oats a year, but that alone would not be affected to the extent of 10 cents a bushel. Every bushel the farmer has to sell, amounting to between twenty-five and twenty-eight million bushels, would mean a loss to him of 10 cents a bushel. That would be a serious matter. But that is not the only grain which would be affected by this. In many parts of Ontario they grow large quantities of peas, and I think they do the same in the other Provinces. Twenty years ago, the north-western States of the Union, the State of Michigan particularly, grew a great quantity of peas. Michigan is not so situated as to enable the people to grow corn. They cannot grow corn, but they can grow oats and peas. Ontario, up to the present day, does grow a large quantity of peas, and the farmers find it not only a good profitable crop, but a good crop in regard to the improvement of the land. What has been the effect of the growth, or the increase in the growth, of western corn on the pea crop of the United States? It has actually driven it out of existence, so that last year our neighbors took off the duty on peas in order to allow peas to be brought in and allow the Boston belle to have her pea soup. You find now that peas are not in the American market reports, they are not in the market in Michigan or in any of the northern and eastern States. It is a serious matter for farmers to consider. These few men who have gone largely into stock raising and are specially interested in stock feeding, because that is what is more referred to than stock raising, want to get the corn admitted free for food. They wish to buy their grain and feed their stock at the expense of their neighbors who are not interested in that way, and who trust to the sale of their grain. We have no evidence that the grains we grow in Canada do not turn out as good cattle and as well-fed cattle as any cattle can be. We know that our cattle take the markets of England, and that the cattle which are so fed are well received here in Canada. Why, then, should half a dozen people in a township—because I doubt if there are many townships in Ontario where you will find more than half a dozen, or a dozen at the outside, who devote their attention to stock feeding and do not grow the grain they feed—be benefited at the expense of all the others? I heard one man say that if he could buy corn, he would sell his oats. Yes, but he could not sell his oats at the same price, for the lumbermen, and all those who want corn cheap, would not buy oats at all unless oats were proportionately cheap; so it is absurd to say that we would gain by the importation of corn. I think the result in a few years of carrying out this proposal would be that the value of oats would sink to the level of the Chicago market, that is, 10 or 12 cents below what oats are worth now, and that our peas would be driven from the country. I do not wish to detain the House much longer, although this is very important. It is only one of the kicks which hon. gentleman are giving at the National Policy. They have attacked it as a whole and have been foiled. The country has repudiated them and sustained the Government on the general ground, and now they are making an attack upon it in detail, they are attacking it piecemeal, and this is one of the attacks on which they hope to catch the farmers' vote. If this were adopted, the farmers of Ontario would not have to thank those hon. gentlemen a year hence. The hon. gentleman who took his seat just now said that the duty had not increased the price of corn. If that is so—and I had not time to check his statements in order to see whether that was true or not—why it is that the Americans are forcing their corn on the market? Whenever they get a drop in the home market and have corn on their hands, they thrust it in to take possession of our markets. We import large quantities of oats and corn. My hon. friend from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) stated that Nova Scotia and the Provinces by the sea did all the importing of corn. Perhaps he referred more to cornmeal. It is Ontario that does most of the importing of corn. Of the 2,331,667 bushels of corn which were imported according to the last returns, Ontario imported 1,909,540, leaving all the other Provinces a little less than half a million bushels. What is that imported for?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Distillation.

Mr. MASSON. A great deal of it is imported to be ground, but, if the people of Nova Scotia import it only for the purpose of grinding, the duty of 7½ cents per bushel would not much increase the amount paid by any family, and would not be a very serious burden. The hon. gentleman says he is willing that allowance should be made for what we grow in this country. We in Ontario have allowed duties to be put on as part and parcel of the National Policy. The people of Ontario have yielded item after item in favor of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MITCHELL. What are they?

Mr. MASSON. And those people have insisted on the exchange being made.

Mr. MITCHELL. Tell us what they are.

Mr. MASSON. They want to set off all these duties by the duty on wheat.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon. gentleman permit me for one moment? Will you tell me what they are.

Mr. MASSON. If the hon. gentleman will only possess his soul in patience, I will answer in due time.

Mr. MITCHELL. Tell us what they are, then.

Mr. MASSON. There is one matter which is clear to every person in Ontario. There is one duty from which we hoped to reap a benefit in time, but at first it was entirely to the benefit of the Lower Provinces, and that is in reference to iron. The duty which was put on iron was put on with special reference to the Lower Provinces, where they have both the coal and the iron. In Ontario, we have the iron, and we hope to develop smelting works and all that kind of thing in time, but the Lower Provinces are reaping the benefits now and they ask us to be satisfied with the duty on wheat and to crowd out all the other products. Ontario sends supporters to the present Government in quite a large number. Quite a large majority support the right hon. gentleman here. Compare those behind the Treasury benches here with those who support Mr. Meredith, the leader of the Ontario Opposition, and representative of the same party in the Ontario House, and see the great difference, one with a handful at his back, a large majority against him, while here the large majority is on the other side. All that results from the support given to the National Policy of the Government in the matter of protection to the farmers. That is the matter which they control, it is the rural districts which have made the change, and not the manufacturing centres. We find the representation of the cities much the same in both Houses, but when you come to the rural districts you find the farmers supporting the Conservative party, because they see and can understand that it has affected favorably their home markets, as compared with other markets. When they see, as the farmers in my riding did see, Chicago oats, at the opening of navigation, coming into their harbor on the first vessel that entered it, and a drop take place in one day from 40 cents to 28 cents—that is something that they recollect. Now they see the price in their market from 12 to 14 cents above the price in the Chicago market. They point to the National Policy and say, that is how we keep our markets up, and have our home market protected for ourselves and for our own benefit. It is for these reasons that the National Policy has received the sanction and support of the farmers of this country. Now, I think that the free importation of corn would not be to the advantage of the Ontario farmers. The other point which might be taken out of this resolution is that it is unfair that the distillers should have a rebate on their corn which they produce into spirits for exportation. Now, I am willing to agree, to some extent, to that part of the resolution. I do not myself see any particular reason why the distillers should be allowed that rebate. I know the theory on which it is based, which is, that if so much grain is imported into this country as a raw material, and is manufactured here into spirits, and these are exported, the operation gives labor to so many men in this country. I do not think that when we look over the distilling business and find it is in the hands of a few men, large concerns, scattered here and there over the country, and when we find the exporters reduced down to about two—at least in the Province of Ontario; because when others export they do so in small quantities only—I cannot see that it can be a great benefit to the distillers. When we find that so few persons are benefited, I cannot see that there is any real corresponding benefit to the rest of the community. As pointed out by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), a large portion of that material, and perhaps the most profitable portion of that material, is brought in duty free, or the duty is entirely rebated—that is, the refuse that is used for feeding cattle, and we find that this is used in competition with other feeders; so that I do not myself see any particular reason for that rebate being continued. I only give that as my individual opinion. I can see the theory on which it is based, but, practically, I do not see that it is of much benefit. Although I am not a supporter of my hon. friend's motion, made last night, for total prohibition, I am not one who would say that the distillers are a class that should be particularly favored, and for that reason I do not see why a rebate, that amounts to a very large sum of money, should be given back to these men, merely for the purpose of increasing their profits. I think also that the excise duties increase the price of their produce. That duty is a direct tax, and they take advantage of that, and these gentlemen, I believe, take an undue advantage of it, that they increase the price on all their brands to the full amount of the excise duty. Therefore, I do not see any reason why this rebate should be continued—speaking personally on the subject. However, the resolution in its present form, as I have said, is certainly impracticable, and the only result that might follow from adopting it would not be beneficial to the class that it is intended to help. Now, I know that our friends down by the sea make a cry about their fishermen. Their cry is much like that about the farmers—they are the two classes without any protection. Now, if I am right, I think the fishermen do receive protection; I think there is something like fishery bounties and all that sort of thing. Surely if that is so, it is an offset to the  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cents a bushel on corn that they have to pay. I do not see that they can ask to have their bread buttered on both sides, and then a little jam thrown in. In Ontario we are quite willing to bear our own share where burdens are to be imposed; but where favors are to be received, we want our own share. I think it is to the interest of the farmers of Ontario that their coarse grains should be protected, and I think that our friends down by the sea should not object to that protection.

Mr. FISHER. I have been much pleased to hear the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. I was much surprised, however, to hear that hon. gentleman, who, I believe, represents an agricultural constituency in the Province of Ontario, describe the fishermen of the Lower Provinces as a class of people who desire to have their bread buttered on both sides and a little jam thrown in to help them. He said that in that respect they were similar to the farmers of this country, who wanted more protection from this House. Sir, it comes very ill from an hon. gentleman who pretends that he represents a farmers' constituency, to intimate that the farmers are so unjust, so illogical, in their demands for fair play. I do not believe that is in any sense a fair or a right representation, either of the fishermen of the Lower Provinces, or of the farmers of this middle part of the Dominion of Canada. The farmers are perfectly ready and willing, and able to stand by themselves and work for themselves, to earn their own living and to be contented with it. But in earning their living they do not wish to be obliged to work at a disadvantage with the other people of the country; and when, as the hon. gentleman himself stated, we find that in this particular instance the farmers are working at a direct disadvantage in competition with a certain class of the community, the distillers, I think it behoves that hon. gentleman, who represents, I suppose, many more farmers than he does distillers, to work for their interests, and to see that their interests are promoted. In connection with this question of the distillers, I cannot refrain from pointing out at once that there is a very unfair competition on the part of the distillers, who obtain their corn free of duty, against the farmers who are made to pay a duty on the same corn. We all know very well that in this country there is a large number of distillery-fed cattle exported to the old land. These cattle are fed with the refuse of the distillery, and in that refuse we know that there is a large portion of the solid ingredients of the corn which the distillers have imported, and upon which they have not paid the duty, and which they feed to those cattle in the distillery barns, and in this way they enter into competition with the farmers who are obliged to buy corn and pay a duty on it, and then feed it to the cattle which they send to England. I contend that the distillers stand to-day in the position of having obtained an unfair advantage over the farmers, with whom they come in direct competition, in regard to feeding cattle. It is an unfair state of things, that the distiller who feeds animals for the English market should not be obliged to pay duty on the corn which he partially uses in that feeding, while farmers who feed animals on an adjoining lot are obliged to pay the full duty upon their corn. The burden of the argument of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, against the original motion is that it is an entirely impracticable motion, that it is not possible to enforce it because it would be impossible that the corn fed to animals exported could be accurately measured. I agree, to a certain extent, with the hon. gentleman, not that it would be an impracticable motion were it carried, but that it does not go quite so far as I would like to see Parliament go. I quite agree that this motion would not dispose entirely and adequately of the injustice under which the farmers lie, as compared with the distillers and other protected industries. As a matter of fact the motion would only apply to those farmers who are feeding stock for export. It happens that I come from a section of the country where the feeding of cattle is not largely carried on; but we have another industry which is perhaps even more important: I allude to the great dairying industry. Any one who is familiar with the export trade knows very well that the products of cheese and butter are greatly in excess of the value of the meat we send to the old country. I contend that if farmers choose to buy cornmeal and corn and feed it to cows instead of to oxen designed to be slaughtered, they ought to obtain a rebate of the duty paid on that corn just as much as the farmer who feeds it to stock or the distiller who puts it into whiskey. Believing this to be the case and granting, as I do frankly, that it would be rather difficult to find the exact measure of the corn which would be contained in the butter and the cheese or the animal exported to the old country, and wishing to go further than the original motion, I propose to move an amendment to the motion to place corn on the free list. I think that would meet any suggestion as to the impracticability of the motion and also remove the objection I myself feel that this motion does not go far enough in protecting all classes of farmers in this country and removing all discriminations against them and in favor of the distiller. The hon. gentleman who just resumed his seat made several remarks with regard to the question of corn being free. In that connection he specially dwelt upon the danger that such action would interfere with the ruling prices of peas, oats and barley in this country. In regard to the section from which I come, I do not think it would matter very much, because we in the Eastern Townships are not a grain-raising community; but I am quite willing and desirous of protecting all portions of the farming community, although I may not be personally interested. If I thought serious injury would arise to the great bulk of the farmers I would not urge this proposition, but I have full confidence that it would not do so, and I regard the hon. gentleman's argument in regard to the prices of peas, oats and barley as wholly unavailing. In the first place, before the tariff was instituted, before the duty was placed on corn, our peas, barley and oats entered into competition with corn and maintained their prices in comparison with corn at that time, and as a matter of fact, as we export a very large portion of our barley and oats, and a considerable quantity of peas, the prices of those articles in a general way are regulated by the export prices. It matters not whether corn is bought a little cheaper or dearer. If it is the fact that the prices of those grains are largely dependent on export prices, then the price of corn for feeding purposes would not influence their prices. Where there is one farmer who buys other grain for feeding purposes there are a dozen who endeavor to buy corn for feeding purposes for cattle and the ordinary prosecution of his business. Furthermore, it is a well-known fact that for fattening purposes, and largely for dairying purposes, corn is one of the cheapest feeds for animals, and in a general way it would pay our farmers better to sell their peas and barley for other purposes, to sell their barley for malting purposes and to export their other coarse grains and buy corn, and in that way they would reap the full benefit, not only of their skill in growing, but of their business skill in securing as much profit as possible. In the present stage of our farming this is absolutely necessary. Not only must our farmers be efficient tillers of the soil, but they must conduct their business according to the best business methods known in the country. The hon. gentleman who just resumed his seat also alluded to another fact, which is well known to all of us and in regard to which our farmers and the country may well be proud—that our cattle entering England have a great advantage as compared with the cattle of the United States. It has been our good fortune to avoid contagious diseases in our cattle, which are not scheduled in England on landing as are those of our neighbors to the south, and this is an advantage which I hope and feel confident we shall be able to maintain. If that is the case, there is all the more reason why our farmers should be able to reap the fullest and best advantage in regard to cattle feeding, and if we are able, by importing feeding stuffs from the United States, to fatten our cattle and send them to England under better conditions and more favorable circumstances than our rivals in the United States, then let us not only retain the trade we already have, but let us, I was going to say, steal from our neighbors a certain portion of their cattle business. If we can raise beef in this country, and retain the manure from the cattle to enrich our soil, we are reaping a double advantage, and Parliament should afford every facility possible to our farmers to reach that position. Some hon. gentlemen who have spoken, have declared they are in favor of free corn. I sympathise with the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurier), and also with the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), and if they desire to have the opportunity to express their opinions on this question, by their vote, I will give them that opportunity as soon as possible. I believe the people of the Maritime Provinces, and the people of my own Province especially, as well as the farmers all through the country, are going to be benefitted by having the free importation of corn, so as to be able to buy the raw material in the cheapest market and from it manufacture beef, cheese or butter. I move in amendment:

That all the words after "that" be struck out, and the following substituted:—"That corn be placed on the free list."

Mr. CORBY. I understood the member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) to say that the duty collected on corn in Ontario was $ 02,000. Let me tell him that the distillers in Ontario out of that sum pay over $90,000, and this leaves a comparatively small amount for the farmers of the Province to pay. Hon. gentlemen have spoken about the amount of rebate on exported spirits and the rebate on the corn to the distillers. There is not more than $150 allowed to the distillers in Ontario as rebate on exported spirits. The distillers have been referred to very frequently in the course of this debate by hon. members, and I just state these facts to show the exact position in which they stand with regard to the duty they pay and the rebate given them.

Mr. FLYNN. While I agree with the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) and the member for Brome (Mr. Fisher), I would go a step further in this matter and express a desire that the duty should be taken off cornmeal. There is no portion of the population on which that duty bears more heavily than on the people of the Maritime Provinces and it affects more especially the poorer class of the community. Let me point out that the duty on cornmeal is altogether out of proportion to the duty on flour. While the duty on the finest grades of flour is only 50 cents a barrel, the duty on cornmeal, which, as a rule, is about half the price of flour, is about 40 cents, making it nearly double the duty on flour. We were told at the time the National Policy was introduced in 1879, that if a duty was put on flour and cornmeal we were given a compensation, inasmuch as a duty was also put upon coal, and that if the people of the Maritime Provinces had to pay a duty on flour and cornmeal, the people of the Upper Provinces would have to pay a duty on coal. We all know that the duty on anthracite coal was struck off two years ago, and I considered then, together with some gentlemen who supported the Government in the policy of taxing cornmeal, that when the duty was taken off anthracite coal it should be taken off cornmeal as well. I move that the following words be added to the amendment of the member for Brome (Mr. Fisher):—

And that cornmeal be admitted into Canada free of duty.

Mr. CASEY. Before proceeding to the motion actually before the House, I cannot help spending a few moments in calling attention to some remarkable statements made by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson). He said that the farmers pay very little duty on the articles that they consume, or use. He told us that he believed that even the laborers in cities pay more to the revenue of the Dominion than do the farmers, and he asked us to look at the farmers' tables, and to see that they produce nearly everything they eat, and that therefore they must pay much less duty than the laborers in town. The hon. gentleman has forgotten that a man does not live on bread alone, nor on meat alone, nor on maple sugar, nor on "garden sass," nor even on milk alone. There are a great many things that even a farmer wants to use that he does not grow on his own farm. For instance, he does not grow sugar, nor tea, nor spice, nor coffee, nor tobacco, and there is a thing that some farmers use—though perhaps they should not use it—but on which they have to pay a tax—that is, spirituous liquors, or fermented liquors, at all events. I think it would be found, as a general rule, that people pay into the revenue of the Dominion, in the first place, according to their wealth, and in the second place, according to the number of the family they have to provide for. If the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) means to intimate that the farmers of his county are not, on the average, richer than the laborers of the city, I think he has mistaken the condition of the farmers of the county, and that he will have a little trouble explaining that to them. What if the wealthy farmers who live on 200 acres of land—and some of whom are worth $1,000 or $20,000 in hard cash, if they were sold out—are told that their representative in this House says that they pay no more into the revenue of the Dominion than the laborers in Toronto.

Mr. MASSON. I did not say that.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman's statement is in the Hansard and he cannot get out of it by any means in his power. He says that the farmers produce all they eat. Suppose that they eat nothing but the produce of their flocks, and herds, and fields, does he suppose that they eat off the bare table with their fingers? I do not think that the farmers of Canada, as a rule, eat with their fingers, and least of all in that highly intelligent constituency of North Grey, which has sent such a representative here as the hon. gentleman. I cannot believe that they eat their food out of their fingers. They have surely a table-cloth on their table, and they are taxed on the table-cloth. They have some nice delf plates (if they do not go in for china to put their food on) and they are taxed 66 per cent. on those delf plates, while the china brought in for the use of the rich people of the city—the laborers, for instance—is only taxed 30 per cent., but the farmers' crockery has to pay 66 per cent. duty. The farmers generally have knives and forks in their houses, and there is a heavy duty on cutlery. They generally have spoons, and there is a duty on spoons. They generally have chairs to sit upon, and there is a duty of 35 per cent. on furniture. They generally have a best room with a carpet upon it, and there is a heavy duty on the carpet as well as on the furniture in that room. There is a duty on the wall paper that goes on the wall, and I believe a duty on the very glue that goes into the whitewash which is put upon the walls of the house. There is a heavy tax on the glass in the windows, a tax on the stove, a tax on the tongs, a tax on the poker and a tax on everything he uses in his house, from the ground floor up to the attic. If he uses iron anywhere, or nails, there is a tariff on these. Everything in and about his house is taxed—everything that the farmer uses, from the cradle he rocks his baby in to the coffin he buries his grandmother in—or his mother-in-law, as my hon. friend suggests, although perhaps he would not mind that tax so much as some others. Then, if we go out of doors, we find that there is a duty of 35 per cent. on his farm implements. Hon. gentlemen say that is nothing, because we do not import farm implements, and competition has run the price down so that the farmer pays no more for them than he would if there was no duty. Does anyone suppose, when American implement makers can send implements to Manitoba, even with the duty, that we could not get our implements cheaper if that duty was off? I do not say that we would import them, but the manufacturer would sell them cheaper, and in most cases he could afford to do it and make a fair profit. On the more elaborate machines, such as harvesters and binders and other patented machines, I do not know that there is such a large profit; but on cheap forks, hoes, scythes, axes, and other ordinary implements, a specific duty amounting in many cases to from 75 to 100 per cent. is imposed. Everything the farmer uses is taxed, and if he does not pay the duty into the Dominion treasury, he pays it into another treasury where it does not benefit the country at large. It would be much better if he paid it into the Treasury of the Dominion than into the pockets of a few manufacturers whom this Government have put over him with the right to collect taxes from him. Well, Sir, I think that is enough for me to say in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson). Now I wish to speak briefly on the general question. My hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), who introduced this motion, is merely attempting to carry out the alleged principles of the National Policy as explained to us when that measure was introduced into this House. It was to be a policy for the encouragement of all sorts of industries—the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing, and every other. It was not to be a policy for the manufacturer alone, but a policy to encourage all industries equally, and to make them all prosperous. It was pointed out that as a general rule the raw material of each industry would be admitted free or at a very low duty, while the finished product would be protected sufficiently to yield the producer a profit. This was to be done equally all around: every man's raw material was to come in free, and every man's finished product to be protected. I may say incidentally that my hon. friend the Minister of Customs has no doubt found out by this time, perhaps more fully during the last few days than before, how difficult it is to decide what is raw material and what finished product. He has found that one man's finished product is another man's raw material, and I fancy he has not had a bed of roses to lie upon in deciding the question. But that is the Nemesis which has come upon the Government for undertaking to admit every man's raw material free while protecting every man's finished product; and I must say it serves them right; when they have found a way to square the circle, they will be able to do that. But this policy has been carried out with some attempt at fairness in the case of the manufacturers. Many articles are admitted free because they are the raw material of the manufacturers. The total importations under the free list amounted last year to over $33,000,000, nearly all of which were the raw materials of some industry or necessary articles for carrying on manufacturing industries. For instance, over $3,000,000 worth of cotton wool, over $1,000,000 worth of tin, and $1,250,000 worth of steel rails, were allowed to come in free, these being all raw materials to those who use them. But this rule was not carried out with regard to the farmer. The manufacturer of cotton, the manufacturer of woollens, the manufacturer of various other articles, and railway men, got the largest proportion of their raw materials and plant in free; but the manufacturer of beef has still to pay a duty on the raw material of his industry, and I insist that this industry should be recognised as much as any other. Too often, on both sides of the House, in discussing the question of the National Policy and cognate matters, the word industry has been taken to mean merely a manufacture. Now, what is an industry? Is it not any occupation which gives employment to capital and men, and which produces wealth in the country? I think that is the only sound definition of an industry. Now, which of all the industries in Canada is the most important? Undoubtedly, as the Trade and Navigation Returns show, the farming industry. For the last ten years we have been protecting the manufacturing industries, both natural and artificial, paying millions of dollars every year out of our pockets for that purpose, and now let us look at the results. How much net wealth has been realised for the benefit of the country by these protected industries? Let us judge by the exports—by what they have sold abroad, and brought value for into the country for the enrichment of the country. Last year the manufacturing industries of the country exported only $4,161,000 worth of goods. Now look at the exports of the farmer. Leaving out $2,000,000 worth of furs, the exports of animals and their products have amounted to $22,732,000, and the exports of agricultural products to $20,875,000, or, in all, $43,607,000 worth of products of the field and farm. Compare the two—compare the exports of $4,000,000 by the manufacturers, with the exports of nearly $44,000,000 by the farmers, and tell me which is the leading industry of the country—and whether the farming industry or the manufacturing industries, taken altogether, are the most deserving of protection. Why, one is about eleven times more important than the other, as shown by the products they have sent out of the country for which we have received value. Again, compare the exports of $44,000,000 of farm products with the exports of $16,609 worth of whiskey and other spirits with which we are more particularly concerned just now. Which of these industries, the $44,000,000 industry, or the $16,000 industry—apart from all moral questions connected with the two—which of the two, in regard to wealth and importance, deserves the most consideration at the hands of this House? The former, I should say, most decidedly, and yet here, as in every other case where any kind of manufacture comes into rivalry with the manufacturing interest, the former has been favored. The distiller has been allowed, not only to manufacture corn free in bond into whiskey for exportation, but to use the bye-product of that free corn to feed cattle with, and thus compete with the farmers' cattle. There is where the greatest injustice comes in. The distiller is not only given a rebate of duty on the corn converted into whiskey, which he exports, but he is allowed to keep the greater bulk of that corn still for the purpose of feeding cattle. I have been through the place of Mr. Walker, of Windsor, and saw as many as 2,800 head of cattle, which were being fed there. Gooderham & Worts have still a larger number, and all these swill-fed cattle being thrown on the market at the end of the feeding season, greatly derange the market to the disadvantage of the farmers. Swill-fed cattle destroy the farmers' market, yet the distiller has had a large portion of the food which he has given to those cattle free of duty, while the farmers are compelled to pay a duty on what they feed to their stock. Not only is the raw material admitted free in this way to distillers, while the farmer is not allowed to import his free, but raw material of a great many other kinds, which compete with the farmer, is also admitted free. For instance, $1,320,000 worth of wool, $1,619,000 worth of hides, $258,000 worth of walnut timber, were imported last year free of duty. Other articles also which I might mention, if the list were not too long, come under the same category, making a total of over $3,250,000 of raw material for the use of different industries which has been admitted free and which comes into competition with farm produce. In the face of all these facts, on the basis of the National Policy itself, even if we are to admit that the principle of that policy is sound, we are compelled to ask, in regard to the motion directly before us, whether the farming or the distilling interest does most good to the country. We are compelled to ask which adds most to the wealth of the country, which gives most employment to labor, and which uses the greatest amount of capital to the greatest advantage. If the House decides that the distilling industry is, on all moral and material grounds, to be preferred to the farming industry, they will maintain the scandalous discrimination which now exists in favor of the distiller against the farmer. If they decide otherwise, they have two courses open to them. They may put all corn on the free list or compel the distiller to pay the duty as the farmer does. Of the two, I prefer to put corn on the free list altogether. I take this stand as the representative of a county very largely interested in growing corn. The county of Elgin grows a great deal of corn, but we do not grow it largely for export; we generally manufacture all the corn we grow into beef and pork on our own farms and export it in that shape. That is the most profitable way to handle corn, even in the counties of Kent and Essex, or anywhere else where it is largely grown. You get a better price when you export in the shape of meat, and you have the bye-products of the manufacture left to enrich your farm. For that reason, I have no hesitation in supporting this motion to put corn on the free list, even though it should have the effect of somewhat reducing the cash value of that article in my own county. But I do not believe it would reduce it to any appreciable extent, and even if it did, I would vote for the motion, as it is better for our farmers to turn the corn into meat than to sell it direct. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) said the admission of corn free would reduce the prices of other coarse grain. Oats and peas are the only other coarse grains, which would be affected thereby. I do not see any quotation of peas in to-day's Empire, but I find that there is only 2 cents or 3 cents difference in the price of oats between Buffalo and Toronto, and that represents the freight between the two points. There is no reason to suppose there would be any considerable difference in the price of oats, for, after all, corn and oats do not come into opposition to anything like the extent some people imagine. A bushel of corn is of greater value for feeding purposes than two of oats, and is used for purposes for which oats are not used at all. There is, therefore, not much danger of competition between the two. For all these reasons, I have great pleasure in supporting the original motion of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) to remove this scandalous injustice from the Statute-book. I would also support it with the addition proposed by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher); and even if the addition proposed by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) were added to it, I would support it even more heartily for the sake of the people in the Eastern Provinces who would benefit thereby.

Mr. GIGAULT. The majority of the members of this House and the electors of Canada consider that the protective tariff has had a beneficial effect upon the country. I am of that opinion, and I believe that if we are to retain the protective tariff, it must be general and be applicable to all agricultural produce competing with our own Canadian agricultural produce. We must not deal with this question from a provincial standpoint, but in dealing with it we must try to promote the general interests of the country. For that reason, I was sorry to see the hon. member for Shelburne, (Gen. Laurie), take the stand he did. We have no coal mines in the Province of Quebec. Would that be a reason for us to oppose a policy which develops the coal mines of Nova Scotia? We do not produce in the Province of Quebec enough wheat for our own consumption. Would that be a reason for us to oppose a duty upon foreign wheat? Certainly not. So I believe that the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), if he is favorable to the maintenance of the protective tariff, is wrong in attempting to remove the duty upon foreign corn. The duty upon foreign corn is beneficial to the farmers of Canada. It is not only my opinion I express here, but I express also the opinion of some Liberal members of this House, because in 1878 they made a motion in this House to impose a duty upon foreign corn and oats. On the 9th April, 1878, Mr. Béchard moved in amendment:

"That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved that a large quantity of corn and oats having been imported into Canada within the last few years, this House is of opinion that the interests of Canadian farmers would be promoted by the imposition of a duty upon the importation of those products."

There was a division upon that motion, and, among the members who voted for it, I see the names of Messrs. Barthe, Béchard, Bourassa, Coupal, and some other members. The member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), in making his motion, made a speech and a good one. He said that the Canadian manufacturers were protected, but that unfortunately the Canadian farmers were not protected, and for that reason he wanted to have a duty imposed on foreign corn and oats. Well, I am of the same opinion as the member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard). I believe in a protective tariff which protects not only the Canadian manufacturers but also the Canadian farmers, and I believe that the imposition of a duty on foreign corn is very beneficial to the Canadian farmers. The free traders resort to some queer reasoning in opposing the protective tariff. They say that the duty on wheat has not the effect of raising the price of wheat. They say we raise more wheat than we can consume, and therefore the imposition of a duty on foreign wheat is completely useless. On the other hand, they say that the imposition of a duty on corn is useless and is detrimental to the interests of the country because we do not produce enough corn for our own consumption. Sometimes, when they oppose the National Policy, they do not want us to favor the development of manufactures for which we have not the raw material, such as cotton manufactures, and yet not a long time ago, when we wanted to favor the development of industries for which we had the raw materials, they said that the imposition of a duty upon foreign artificial fertilisers was useless and that they were not in favor of such a policy. I need not add any more, but, like the member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), I say that the existence of a duty on foreign corn is of a nature to favor the interests of this country.

Mr. LISTER. So far as the motions before the House are concerned, there is no member here who cannot vote for one or the other. Hon. gentlemen who are in favor of placing the farmer in the same position as the distiller in regard to this matter, can vote for the motion of the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin). Those gentlemen from the Lower Provinces who think that corn should be admitted into this country as a raw material will have the opportunity of voting squarely on the question, and they cannot shirk the vote; while those who think that cornmeal as well as corn should be brought into Canada free of duty have also the opportunity to vote in favor of their view. During this discussion it was mentioned that the election of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Colter) was a condemnation of the policy of the Government, and the hon. gentleman from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), whom, if any gentleman on this side of the House is to represent that county in this Parliament, I am as glad to see here as anyone, felt it to be his duty to inform the House that his election was an approval of the policy of the Government. There happens to be a newspaper published in his section—they are an intelligent lot of people there—and that paper is published in the interests of the Conservative party, and I find that after the hon. gentleman's election the paper came out approving of that election, and I find that the mottoes—because they erected arches in that county in honor of the hon. gentleman's election—were such as these: "Sir John A. Macdonald," "General Laurie," "The Farmers' and Fishermen's Verdict," "Unrestricted Reciprocity."

Gen. LAURIE. It was: "Unrestricted Reciprocity Condemned."

Mr. LISTER. Does the hon. gentleman say that was the motto?

Gen. LAURIE. I distinctly say so, as an eye-witness.

Mr. LISTER. I quoted from the issue of the 26th October, 1888.

Gen. LAURIE. If the hon. gentleman looks at the same paper three issues later, he will find that was corrected. That paper is not printed in my county. The hon. gentleman is entirely incorrect.

Mr. LISTER. It does not matter where it was published. It was printed in the hon. gentleman's Province, and I have no doubt that in that election he was, as he has avowed himself over and over again to be, a free trader, that he was as much in favor of unrestricted reciprocity as the man who was opposing him; and three days afterwards it is all very well for him to say that this was a mistake. To-day he is in favor of free corn, and to-day he will have the right to vote against the Government, and let him see that he does not shirk it. That hon. gentleman, that warrior, is too honest to deceive the electors of that county. Surely he would not tell them that he was in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, when in his soul he was opposed to it, and yet that is what he wants us to understand to-day. I am not going into an argument as to the whole trade policy of the Government. This motion is only for the purpose of placing the farmers on the same ground as the manufacturers and others who are allowed to obtain their raw material free of duty. My hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Corby) should not have any objection to this motion, because a very small portion of the whiskey manufactured in this country is exported; but I was surprised to hear the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson)—that staid and logical gentleman—argue as he did. I hope in the discussion of his cases he brings more logic to bear than he brought here in regard to this matter, when he told the members of this House, and told the country, that the laborers, and the farmers, and the consumers of Canada pay no duty, because they wear garments which are manufactured in this country and because these garments are made from wool raised in this country. Does he not know that for every dollar received by the Government upon goods brought into Canada, $3 are paid into the hands of the manufacturers of Canada? Does he not know it to be a well accepted fact when the duty is placed upon a commodity manufactured in this country, the effect of that duty is to bring the price up equal, or nearly equal, to the cost of the manufacture, plus the duty, and that the consumers of the country have to pay that? Does he not know that natural competition does not come to bear in the sale of these goods, because, in a small country like ours, the manufacturers are able to combine for the purpose of keeping up the prices, so far as the consumers of the country are concerned? He says that the duty does not keep the price itself up. If it does not keep it up, if it is not obviously keeping up the price, why is it that the duties are imposed and the tariff becomes a tax on every man that eats, drinks, or wears anything? Every man that buys any commodity protected by that tax contributes to the revenue of the country, and is taxed to the extent of the impost by the Government. So when he tells the people, and the members of this House, and when he tells the country that the effect of the duty is not to raise the price, he states what is manifestly not the case. Sir, the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) has introduced a Bill for the suppression or regulation of combines. Why is it needed? Because the manufacturers of the country, highly protected as they are, form combines for the purpose of extorting from the people of the country all they can, and he has introduced an Act making these things illegal, in order that there may be a fair competition, so far as the manufacturers are concerned. Everybody knows that is the case, everybody knows that these are the facts, and they are so plain and so clear that it is impossible to controvert or to contradict them. The people of the country are taxed, and they are praying those taxes to the manufacturers of the country. It is not only the man who wears imported clothing, but it is every man who wears anything that is manufactured in the country, or who uses anything that is manufactured in the country, that is taxed; that man pays the duty as well as the man who buys a foreign article, the only difference being that the man who uses the home-made article pays the duties into the pocket of the manufacturer instead into the public treasury. Now, Sir, these are merely side issues of this question. The only point here, as I stated before, is whether the farmer should be placed upon an equal footing with the rest of the community, or whether they should be placed in a position of unfairness, having their interests prejudiced. Sir, so far as I am concerned I am prepared to support the motion and the amendment.

Gen. LAURIE. My hon. friend from Lambton read an extract from a newspaper of which he vouches for the accuracy. Now, I am a little surprised to find that my hon. friend assumes that I defended unrestricted reciprocity. He must surely be a little puzzled when he finds that the name of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald and mine were associated with unrestricted reciprocity, as being supporters of it. I think, at any rate, it could hardly be said that the electors of Shelburne discovered that the First Minister was a supporter of that policy. At the same time, I wish distinctly to state that this question was the principal issue raised at that election between my opponent and myself, it was the question of all others that was placed before the electors. My opponent was supported by the Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia, who, over and over again, advocated unrestricted reciprocity. I asked him what he meant by it, and the only answer that I could obtain from him was that he meant unrestricted reciprocity, and he supposed that was an answer. Now, Sir, I challenged the question. We met on that issue, and I am here; and I say that is the distinct answer of the electors of Shelburne to the question whether they approved it or not.

Mr. LISTER. Thirty-five majority—that is not much to brag about.

Gen. LAURIE. Quite enough for all practical purposes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. As this is a very important question affecting the interests of the people in the county that I have the honor to represent, I am sure the House will bear with me for a few moments while I defend the position that I intend to take upon this question. Looking at it upon its face, I do not see how any hon. gentleman can object to the proposition made by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin), that is, that whereas the distillers are allowed a rebate upon corn imported for the manufacture of spirits for export, it is only right and fair that the farmers should be placed in the same position. Now I take this ground, that if the first proposition is a good one, if the first proposition is right, there certainly ought not to be any objection to placing the farmers upon the same footing. If it comes to a question of granting favors to any particular class, I think there can be no doubt whatever that the favors should be granted to the larger number, and to those who are doing the most good to the country; and there can be no question, looking at it in that light, that the farmers should have the favors if there are any to be granted. But not only should they have those favors on that ground, but also because they employ a larger amount of labor, they give employment to a far greater number of men than the distillers, and if any favors are to be granted at all they should certainly go to those who are doing the most good to the country. Now there is another thing. The farmers, as has been stated before, are a class of manufacturers, and if the object of this motion is to facilitate the manufacture of wheat for instance, for the home market, there ought to be no impediment and no obstruction of any kind put in the way of the prosecution of that laudable enterprise, but it should be encouraged by all the means that we can bring to bear upon it. But while I take this ground, I also contend that it is a great injustice to the farmers of this country that the distillers should be allowed to import their corn free. I say it is a crying shame that a class of people that are making such large profits as the distillers of this country—for I venture the assertion that there is not single branch of industry, there is no large manufacture that can be engaged in, that will return such large dividends as the manufacture of spirits—therefore, I say, it is wrong for the Government of this country especially to favor that particular class of individuals. I also take the ground that it is wrong because it is lowering the price of corn that is raised by the farmers of this country. There is no question in my mind that the imposition of the duty upon corn does increase the price to the farmers of this country. I think there can be no question whatever about that, when we look at the quantity of corn imported and exported in this country we find that the quantity of corn raised in the Province of Ontario averaged for the last five years, about 5,630,000 bushels, and we have also entered for home consumption, in the year 1888, no less than 2,311,000 bushels. I take this ground, that if we do not raise sufficient for our home consumption any duty you place upon an article will necessarily enhance the value of it, and so far as our farmers are concerned the price of corn is enhanced by the duty. I further take the ground that this is the only cereal there is the price of which is enhanced thereby. I have no hesitation in saying that the amount of duty placed upon wheat does not enhance the value of it to the farmers. Last year the imports of wheat for home consumption were 32,042 bushels, whilst we exported of wheat no less than 2,164,000 bushels. I question very much whether there is any hon. gentleman who will say that when we have 2,160,069 bushels more than we require, the placing of a duty upon the small quantity imported has any effect in raising the value thereof. It has been stated that the placing of the duty on oats increases the value thereof to our farmers. I do not think that statement can be substantiated. Why? Because we exported of oats last year no less than 566,000 bushels, while we imported only 10,422 bushels. It is, therefore, obvious that we had a larger quantity of oats than we required and consequently the prices we obtained for what we exported in all cases would regulate the price of the home product. Then again, it has been stated that the duty on peas increased the value thereof to the farmers. I differ with that statement, because I find in the Trade and Navigation Returns that last year we imported 7,660 bushels, while we exported no less than 2,166,000 bushels. So there again we had a large quantity to export and the same argument will stand there, that the price we receive for our surplus is what regulates the price of the whole. Then again, it has been stated that our farmers are protected by the duty upon wool. I say the present wool duty is one directly opposed to the farmers of this country. We raise a certain grade of wool in Canada. We exported last year of wool no less than 954,006 pounds, but there is a duty on the particular grade of wool grown here of 3 cents per pound on all coming into the country. The fact is we do not import any of that particular wool; to be precise, we imported 508 pounds, on which a duty was collected of $15.25. At the same time we imported of the finer grades of wool no less than 8,398,000 pounds. If the Government want to protect the interests of the farmer, and encourage the wool and sheep growing interests of this country, they would not allow these finer grades to come in free, but they would place a duty on all wool imported and thereby raise the value of the product grown in this country, thus giving a better price to our farmers. In regard to the amendment, I repeat that the only cereal raised in Canada to-day in regard to which the farmers are benefited by the duty imposed is corn, and as the county I represent is largely interested in the raising of corn I feel it would be against the interests of my constituents that I should vote for the abolition of that duty. I find that the quantity of corn raised in the County of Kent averaged for the last three years nearly 1,000,000 bushels. I am glad to say that, owing to the good weather last year, the crop has been very largely increased, and this year I think the quantity will reach about 1,500,000 bushels. This being the only article in regard to which farmers are benefited by the National Policy, I think it would be wrong on my part to vote for the abolition of that duty. If the Government will free all the articles, if they will place the farmers on an equal footing with other classes, if they will remove the duties from tools, implements, household goods and the articles used by our farmers and which they must necessarily buy, then I say they would be able to paddle their own canoe and compete in the markets with our neighbors to the south or with the people of any country. I consider it to be my duty, notwithstanding the fact that my friends and hon. gentlemen I very highly respect have seen fit to take another course, to support the original motion and retain the duty on corn coming into Canada and also on cornmeal. Cornmeal is a business in which the millers of Canada are some what largely interested. If you want to encourage them you must maintain the duty, and, therefore, for the reasons I have stated I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I did not expect to take part in this debate, but as the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) has referred to a motion I had the honor to submit to Parliament in 1878, I desire to say a few words in explanation. When I made that motion I was satisfied that I was doing right, and I have no reason to regret it. I believe to-day that if my motion had been adopted and duties generally imposed on the importation of cereals in this country, the elections of 1878 would have resulted otherwise than they did. When I made that motion I did not intend that it should be made part of a great protective system to be adopted in this country. It was confined to the interests of farmers. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) says to-day that we must not touch that duty on corn because it is part of a large protective system which has been adopted by the Parliament of this country. If the hon. gentleman will look at the fact that distillers import corn free of duty, or that the duty they pay is refunded to them, which is equivalent to paying no duty, he will find, I think, that the great system of protection for which he has so much admiration has been greatly encroached upon by his own friends. I thought in 1878 that the manufacturers of this country were sufficiently protected for the development of their industries, and I think so still. I am ready to stick to the policy, advocated then, of imposing a duty upon the importation of corn, provided that policy is applied to all classes in Canada; but I find that the duties imposed upon the importation of corn apply to farmers and other classes, except those who manufacture whiskey. If it is found justifiable to give a rebate to the manufacturer of whiskey who imports corn, it is equally justifiable to refund it to the farmers who are the most important body in this country. Therefore I am prepared in this case to support the motion which is made in accordance with the proposition of my hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Landarkin), if the policy of refunding the duty on imported grain to the distillers is maintained. I have one word more to say. Times change. In 1878 there was no talk of reciprocity with the United States; to-day a good deal is said about it, and I have reason to believe that the people of this country will yet pronounce themselves in favor of reciprocity with the States. I am in favor of such a policy, because I think there is nothing which would so promote the interests of all classes in Canada as reciprocity or free trade with the United States, and the adoption of a liberal policy towards that great country would, I think, be the best way to induce them to establish free commercial intercourse with Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have listened with a good deal of attention to this debate, because the question involved in it is one that for years past I have annually brought before this House, either in the shape of a motion or by referring to it when the Estimates were up and we were discussing the duties which were to be applied. Sir, in the matter of cornmeal which, before the duty was put on, formed a very large element in the food of the people of the county from which I come, I feel that the imposition of a duty upon that article—which, as the member for South Grey (Mr. Landarkin) admits, is not raised in this country—was imposing a tax on the people of my county, which it was unjust and unfair to apply to the food of the people. In discussing this question on the many former occasions on which it became my duty to bring it before this House, I commented on it at greater length than I shall do to-day. I am not going at this hour of the evening to enter largely into the discussion, because the question has been amply and fully treated of by gentlemen who understand the bearing of it, quite as well as I do myself. I have risen on this occasion merely to reply to some of the remarks of the member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) when he spoke of the compensation which the Maritime Provinces received for the imposition of the duty upon the food of the people of those Provinces. When the hon. gentleman made the statement that the people of the Maritime Provinces received full compensation for the imposition of those duties which protected the farmers of Ontario, I rose to ask the hon. gentleman would he please enumerate in what particular the Maritime Provinces derived any special benefit not derived by the other portions of the Dominion of Canada? but I was met with quite a number of voices calling "order, order," and I was prevented from getting a distinct reply from the hon. gentleman at the time. But later on he gave me an answer, and he enumerated three cases in which he said the people of the Maritime Provinces had a special benefit. He enumerated the duty on iron, he enumerated the duty on coal, and the bounties that are given to our fishermen. Let me answer those in detail. I do not see the member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) in his seat, but I will state to the House what the facts of the case are as far as the duty on iron is concerned. He says that in Nova Scotia the iron and coal lie close together and that great industries will be developed which will give vast employment to the people. I challenge the gentlemen on the other side of the House to point to a single new development of the iron and coal industry which the National Policy has created in Nova Scotia I do not think they can enumerate one, yet when some Sessions ago these heavy duties on iron were imposed we were told about the villages which were going to crop up through the Province, about the number of hands it would give employment to, about the population which would flow into us and about the capital that would come from abroad to establish that industry in the Province. I repeat again that I do not know a single one of that class of industries which has been established in the great Province of Nova Scotia by reason of this policy. I frankly admit that in Nova Scotia iron and coal lie close together, and I freely admit capital ought, on account of the close relationship of those two elements, flow into the country and a flourishing industry ought to be the result, but that result has not taken place. I think we might very well find a reason for that in the fact that our small community of five millions of people are unable to find consumption for the large outlay which would be necessary to carry on that industry and to compete with the manufacturers of other countries where they manufacture on so much a larger scale that all the facilities which exist in Nova Scotia are counterbalanced by the fact that the material can be transported from Liverpool or the Clyde, or the Bristol Channel, across the Atlantic for less money than we can carry it from Pictou to Montreal. Who asked for that heavy imposition of duty on iron which was applied some years ago? Were there petitions flowing from the people asking for this duty which levies a heavy tax on every farmer and every lumberman who requires the use of an axe, or sledge shoes or horse shoes to carry on his business, and which also imposes a tax on the fisherman who requires the iron and the nails in the construction of the boats with which he floats over the seas in pursuit of his calling? Did these people ask for the imposition of this duty? No, Sir, it was conceived in the mind of a gentleman who had a great deal of influence in Nova Scotia, and who thought that it would be a capital idea with which to tickle the fancy of the people of that Province, and to induce them to support the Administration of which the right hon. gentleman is the head. Were there petitions from the people to have that duty imposed upon coal? No, Sir, there were not, and I am not sure that there were petitions even from the coal owners. But I am satisfied that there were no petitions on the part of the general mass of the people of the Lower Provinces for the imposition of a duty on coal. I will tell the hon. gentleman from North Grey (Mr. Masson), that so far from the imposition of that duty on coal being a benefit to the people of the Maritime Provinces, it has been a positive tax on every household in those Provinces that uses coal. Outside of Nova Scotia we have no coal in the Maritime Provinces; in neither Prince Edward Island nor New Brunswick is that industry carried on to such an extent as to make it a commercial pursuit. If any Province has benefited by the imposition of the duty, it is Nova Scotia, and my impression is that the operation of the duty is a tax even to the people of Nova Scotia. It is a benefit to the coal miners, no doubt, because it enables them to get that much more for their coal in the markets of Montreal and Quebec; but I do not think it can go much farther than Montreal, because beyond that point it begins to come into competition with American coal. But in every town and hamlet where there is a manufacturing industry in those Provinces, the fact of the imposition of a duty on foreign coal keeps up the cost of production and increases the price of coal to the people who consume it. I think I have dealt with the first two points in the argument of the hon. member for North Grey. Now, I wish to say a few words on his third point, which is, that the people of the Maritime Provinces received compensation for the duties they have had to pay on their food, in the fishery bounties which were given to them. Is my hon. friend so ignorant of that transaction as not to know that the money which went into those fishery bounties did not come out of the revenues to which Ontario contributes. It is a portion of the money which the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, as well as Newfoundland, claimed they were entitled to; and Newfoundland received directly a million dollars as her share alone of the compensation which was due for the fisheries having been opened to the American people. Does any man pretend to say, then, that that payment should be considered as an offset for the duties they have to pay on the food they consume? That money was paid by a foreign country, and our fishermen got only a small portion of what they were entitled to. Now the people of my county are not a manufacturing people. They are a hard working, industrious people, composed chiefly of fishermen, lumbermen and farmers, a great many of whom do a little lumbering and farming together and others a little fishing and farming together. There is scarcely a manufacturing industry in the county, beyond one or two very trifling ones, and I say it is unfair of the Government to initiate a policy, and maintain and carry out a policy, which imposes on those people, a great many very poor people, the necessity of paying a tax upon the cheap food they used, and the importation of which has been stopped. I could quite understand that if this were a corn-growing country, we might have a duty imposed on corn; but when there is no corn grown in the country to any extent—for the corn grown in the county of my hon. friend behind me is chiefly consumed in that district, and cannot come into competition with the corn imported—the duty is of no benefit to anybody. The hon. and gallant member for Shelburne referred to the statements read by the hon. gentleman in my eye. He said it could scarcely be possible that Sir John Macdonald and himself could be coupled together as being in favor of reciprocal trade. He pointed to Sir John Macdonald as a man who was opposed to it. Sir, Sir John Macdonald is an opportunist. He knows that when he started the theory of a protective policy, he openly stated over and over again that he did it for the express purpose of using it as a lever to force the Americans into free trade or reciprocal trade. Over and over again that was stated by him, not only in Ontario and Quebec, but by a resolution in this House. Sir, do you suppose that I with my free trade notions would ever have consented to go on and impose duties as they have been imposed under that policy? One of his statements was that a maximum of 25 per cent. would be levied; and when I was led into supporting that policy, I was led to believe that no duty would be imposed on the food of the people at any rate. Sir, I suffered from that; I lost my election in 1878 for supporting the National Policy, and from that time to this I have never ceased, as many here know, in my endeavors to induce the Government to remove what I believed to be a gross outrage on the people of the Eastern Provinces. This discussion has taken a very wide range, but I felt that I would not have been doing my duty if I had not taken some part in it. I did not expect it would take this shape, and I was not prepared for it, for I intended, and may still take an opportunity, to deal with this question on going into Supply, if it were not taken up by some other gentleman. Sir, I do not think any one will say that what is now called the National Policy at all resembles the thing that was propounded when the right hon. gentleman was lecturing throughout the country in 1878. Did any man then dream that there would have been an average duty of 45 per cent. on iron, one of the articles most necessary in this civilised age? Did any man ever contemplate that the farmers of the country would have to pay 35 per cent. on their implements, 35 per cent. on their cotton goods, that vast fortunes would have been made by the refiners of this country, and that the people would have to pay twice as much for their sugar as it can be bought for in Liverpool or London? No, Sir; no man imagined anything of that kind. If anything of that kind had been imagined, there is one man who would not have supported a man who attempted to get into power by such false pretences. I do not want to take up the time of the House, but I want to reiterate the arguments I have before used on the floor of this House in regard to this matter, for a great many members of this Parliament are new men and young men, who may not have heard the matter put forward so fully before, not merely by myself, but by other hon. gentlemen as well. I ask hon. gentlemen who are listening to me to take the matter home to themselves and place themselves in my position. I would ask them if they represented, as I do, a county composed of an industrious people who have no facilities for manufacturing and are mainly consumers, would they like to see the taxes on everything these people eat and use or wear grow from year to year until in some cases, as I have been informed by a respectable wholesale merchant, a man of truth and reliability, they have reached 125 per cent. on certain classes of goods imported and not manufactured here. If the Government are going to let cotton in free, which is a raw material and not grown in this country, why not let corn in free, which is also a raw material and not grown in the country? If they are going to give rebates to the distillers, why not give the farmer a rebate on the raw material with which he feeds his cattle for exportation? If they want to protect the farmers, let them do it, but do not let them deceive the farmers in this House and in the country.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BROWN. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) contended before recess that no good results had come to the iron trade from the tariff imposed by this House, but that the iron industry had languished—

Mr. MITCHELL. What I said was that no new iron industry had been developed and no new coal mine had been opened since the increased duties were put on under the National Policy.

Mr. BROWN. I did not so understand the hon. gentleman, but at all events I challenge his statement even as he now puts it. The whole drift of the hon. gentleman's speech was to prove that the iron tariff was a failure. I am not going to refer to his remarks respecting the coal industry, as that subject will be referred to by those who are more competent to speak concerning it; but in addressing this House on the progress made in the iron industry under the tariff I know of what I am speaking and can substantiate by facts what I say. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite, in their caucuses, to lay their heads together and seek to discover some side wind by means of which they can attack the National Policy and make literature which they think will pass current with the people. But they have been attempting to pass for silver money of brass in this country during the last twenty years, and the people have too well discovered the worthlessness of their coin to be deceived by these issues which they raise after a good deal of sitting and hatching. On three great occasions the people have ratified the National Policy in a most unmistakable manner, and are not going to be shaken in their faith by any side issues which hon. gentlemen opposite may bring up, they have nailed their spurious coin to the counter. The hon. gentleman sought to convey to this House that the iron tariff had been a failure. When this subject of the tariff was before us, I ventured to make a prediction, and I then read the views of those engaged in the iron industry in the western part of our country as to the effect which would result if the iron tariff were placed in the position in which it now is, namely, that it would greatly stimulate the efforts and the energy of those engaged in that trade and increase the output immensely. Those predictions and views have been fulfilled, and when the hon. gentleman says that the iron industries of Canada have languished I want to tell him—

Mr. MITCHELL. I never said that.

Mr. BROWN. It is the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite to torture language and to torture facts, and to allow the public to draw their own inferences from these distorted statements. But so long as I occupy a seat in this House I will never allow an opportunity to pass, when I see endeavors made to convey false impressions to the people, without rising in my seat to denounce such endeavors. In Hamilton, perhaps the city in which there are more iron manufacturers than anywhere else in Canada, we have rolling mills, iron pipe foundry, forge works, bridge works, besides other iron industries, and I am prepared to state that in every case these companies have very largely increased their capacity, and in some cases have actually doubled their capacity since the introduction of the iron tariff in 1887, are all fully employed and have orders ahead.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon. gentleman persist in misrepresenting me? I do not think he would like to do it willingly, and I will set him right again. The remarks I made about the coal and iron industry were in reply to the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson), who stated that the lower Provinces had got compensation for any duties on corn and provisions by the fact that they had received protection upon their coal and iron mines, and I simply dealt with those two questions. I never dealt with the question of whether under protection the manufacture of pipes or of re-rolling old iron had increased and developed or not.

Mr. BROWN. All right; the hon. gentleman attacked the policy and declared there had been no results. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman who will follow me in the defence of their position in the Maritime Provinces will show to the hon. gentleman exactly how they stand in regard to the remarks he has made as far as those Provinces are concerned, inasmuch as the iron question was touched and the idea conveyed to the House that the iron tariff has not been productive of any good. I wish to say to the House that seven of the firms engaged in the iron industry in Canada, which has been developed and brought to a state of great vitality by the iron tariff, have $3,000,000 of money invested in their business and give employment to 2,500 operatives, who work full time. When that tariff was passed these men felt they had to battle against one serious element. The Government allowed the importation of iron for a number of months, and the importers brought large supplies from England. These men had, therefore, to fight against these large importations. Now, however, these importations have been exhausted, and the mills are supplying the country with iron from Halifax to Vancouver—not only with good iron, but, notwithstanding the predictions of hon. gentlemen opposite that the people would be taxed and ground to death under this tariff, they are supplied with iron at less money than it can be imported for. I have a letter in my hand from the Ontario Rolling Mills, of Hamilton, in which they say:

"We are now selling iron to large importers at considerably lower prices than they could import for, and are giving them entire satisfaction, which feeling is often expressed to us by some who were the most rabid at the time the tariff change was made on iron and steel."

The predictions of hon. gentlemen on this side have all come true. We stated that proper protection to native industries would not raise the prices to the consumer, but that the competition among those industries would result in lowering the prices. Why, in this article of iron we are able to supply the people with as good and perhaps better iron at a lower price than it could be imported at. Statements have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite regarding the prices which the people have to pay in consequence of the high tariff under the National Policy. I do not propose to enter into that subject at all. It has been threshed out over and over again in this House. It has been threshed out before the people, and the people have given their decision in a manner unmistakable to hon. gentlemen opposite. These hon. gentlemen may try as hard as they like by side issues to counteract this decision, but until they change their policy so as to suit the views of the people, they will remain in the cold shades of opposition for many a long year. I do not propose to occupy the time of the House at any length on this subject of corn, but, as an outside observer and one not very conversant with the subject, I may say that it occurs to me that any proposition for the admission of corn into this country in the way hon. gentlemen are advocating would very materially injure the interests of the farmer. What is the fact to-day? Western corn can be laid down in Canada for 46 cents a bushel of 56 pounds, paying a duty of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cents a bushel. Peas can be laid down for 54 cents a bushel of 60 pounds, and oats for 23 cents to 30 cents a bushel of 34 pounds. Is it not transparent that, if the duty were taken off this article of corn, the price of peas and oats would relatively fall, and would not that be an injury to the farmer? The low price of corn, moreover, affects the interests of barley, and that is a very important matter for Canadians to consider. By some recent discovery in the United States, they are making a proportion of corn with a proportion of barley, and are so affecting the price. A reduction in the price of corn would seriously affect the interest of the farmers in respect to their other coarse grains. I would like to hear from the members who represent such counties as Kent and Essex, what they have to say as to the admission of corn free into this country. A great deal has been talked in reference to this corn question, and I am sorry to see that there crops up now and then a certain amount of provincialism. I am happy to believe that this House is being educated to a higher view than provincialism, and takes the view that we have to regard the whole Dominion and not any particular section. No man is fit for a seat in this House who seeks to confine his views to the narrow confines of the part from which he comes. We should legislate for the whole Dominion, and I feel that I am as much representing Vancouver or Halifax as the city of Hamilton. That is the spirit which ought to animate all the members in this House. What affects the one should affect the whole. That is the broad view which we should take, and we should not legislate from any narrow or selfish standpoint. I only rose to establish the view that our industries have prospered under the tariff of 1887, and I have on my desk before me the testimonies of men engaged in all these industries that this policy will be capable of greater development so that it will be able to meet the demands of the whole country no matter how great the trade may be, and to develop the iron industries of the country and keep the labor within our own borders. We have now the proud satisfaction of knowing that iron and steel for our wants are now produced in this country, and I hope the day is soon coming when every steel rail required on a Canadian railway will be manufactured in Canada.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am pleased that my hon. friend has given me an opportunity, legally and properly, without my being called to order, of replying to the extraordinary speech of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown). He opened by saying he was going to refute the statement and the misrepresentations made by the member for Northberland, and he went on to speak of certain misrepresentations hatched in caucus—I suppose he meant by myself. Let me tell him that I have never attended a caucus since I attended the one in 1873, when I refused to vote for the election of Sir John Macdonald as our leader two days after we fell. Since then I have not attended a caucus on one side or the other. That should relieve his mind of the idea that I have been hatching anything in caucus. What is the general effect of the speech of the hon. gentleman? He has created a figure of straw to battle with and to knock it down. He has put words in my mouth which I never uttered. He has answered statements which he says I made which I never made. His whole speech was a tissue of answers to what I must call misrepresentations of what I did say. What I said I will repeat, and I say that every statement I made before recess on this subject was founded upon facts, and the expressions that I gave utterance to were the honest convictions of my mind. What I did say in relation to the iron and coal industries of this country—and what I said had reference alone to those—was in answer to my hon. friend the member for North Grey (Mr. Masson), who stated that he was speaking of the removal of the duty on corn and cornmeal which was sought for by the Maritime Provinces. He stated that the Maritime Provinces had no reason to complain, that they had received compensation by the duties which were put on coal, by the duties put on iron, and by the bounties that were given for the fish they caught. I answered the hon. member for North Grey, and, while I admired the force and vigor of the hon. gentleman's speech, I felt that, when he referred to these compensations, he was speaking of a subject he did not quite understand, and I want him to understand it now. I took up first the question of bounties. I said that the bounties which were given to the Maritime Provinces, as he ought to know if he does not, were given as compensation for the privileges which were taken from the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces when the Washington Treaty was made and the American fishermen were allowed to come in to compete on our fishing grounds. Is that any matter of compensation when we are entering into another question of a great and gross grievance which exists in regard to which our people are unfairly taxed? No; the money which was granted by the arbitrators at Halifax was the money of the people of the Maritime Provinces, and the proportion of it which they received was nothing like what they were entitled to. It is enough to prove what I said on that subject to point out that of the total amount of $5,500,000 which was awarded, $1,000,000 was granted to Newfoundland for giving up her fishing rights. The balance came to Canada, but the Maritime Provinces claimed that it was their money, and should be spent among the fishermen there whose business had been greatly reduced by the facilities afforded to the Americans to come and compete with them. The amount which was voted by way of bounty was given as the just right of the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, and I have never recognised and never will recognise that that is to be put against any class of duties which have been unjustly imposed upon them, because they received those bounties from money which was their own. I come next to the statements, or rather the misstatements made by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown). He has taken me to task, and has put words in my mouth which I never uttered. He said he would prove that the iron industry is flourishing. I never expressed an opinion, whether it was flourishing or not. What I said, and what I repeat is that, since the imposition of the duties under the National Policy, not a single new iron industry, or a new coal mine had been opened or developed in the Maritime Provinces, that, as far as my own Province is concerned, we have no iron industries or coal mines, and the same is true, in regard to Prince Edward Island, and that if any benefit was derived, it was a benefit derived by the Province of Nova Scotia. Then, Sir, I said: What benefit was derived by the Province of Nova Scotia from any additional stimulus that was given to the coal mines? I said, and I repeat it now, that if there were any benefits derived from the bounty upon coal given in Nova Scotia, it was a benefit and an advantage to the coal owners, the coal proprietors, the monopolists in coal, and not to the masses of the people at large. That was my contention. I say the same thing about iron. There has been throughout Canada no new development of smelting works at all. The only one I know of existing is that in Londonderry, and I would ask: Is it for that single institution that this whole 5,000,000 of people, that all this Canada is to be taxed from 40 to 45 per cent. on an average for the purpose of building up one mammoth industry and making millionaires of the men in connection with that industry? These were the contentions that I made, and I defy my hon. friend, I defy any one on that side of the House to refute the propositions I have made. I do not wish to have either the iron men or the coal men get up and put words into my mouth that I did not utter. I never said for a moment that the imposition of these duties upon coal coming into the country had not benefited somebody. Who is it? It is the coal owners, the owners of the mines, those dozen men, or dozen proprietors, who own, probably, a dozen mines throughout Nova Scotia—they get the benefit. Does the people of Nova Scotia at large get the benefit? No; I will be told they give advantages to the workingmen who work in the mines. True, they do. I have no doubt that, to that extent, it benefits a few people in Nova Scotia, but does it benefit the people of Nova Scotia at large? Does it benefit New Brunswick? Is it any benefit to Prince Edward Island? These are the three Maritime Provinces to which my hon. friend referred. I say no, and so far from benefiting them, the effect is exactly the contrary. Every ton of coal that is used by every workingman, by every citizen in those Maritime Provinces outside the immediate range of the coal slides, is a tax upon the people who have to consume it and use it. I think that ought to be an answer to my hon. friend. I say the same thing about the iron men. My hon. friend quotes letters from Hamilton. Since I came into this chamber to-night I received a letter which I have in my pocket; unfortunately it is marked private; it is the opinion of an iron man as to the effect of this National Policy. He says it is a ruin to the trade, and will be a ruin to the country. Sir, I do not doubt that my hon. friend can get sheaves of letters from these protected men from the city of Hamilton from which he comes, and which he represents so well—because I think he does represent them well when he makes such bold, bare-faced statements as he has made, putting words in my mouth that I never uttered, and drawing conclusions from my remarks which they will not bear, and creating an impression in this House and among this audience that I have made statements that are not warranted by the facts, and which he has attempted to refute. Does any man doubt that the industries in Hamilton have been increased? I know they have, I admit it. But how have they been increased? At the expense of the people of the country, at the expense of every farmer in the country who requires iron in the prosecution of his business—for his ploughs, his harrows, his cart-wheels, for the nails when he builds a stable. Does any man doubt but that the great nail-makers, both in Montreal and Hamilton, and in other cities, have been benefited? Yes; and how have the people suffered by paying additional prices for what they required to use. That is the way the thing works, that is the benefit to which my hon. friend refers as resulting from the National Policy—this national curse, I call it. Sir, does my hon. friend want any more information about it? Let him get it before he gets up to answer the member for Northumberland, trying to repeat statements of mine which I did not make, to put words into my mouth which I did not utter, and endeavoring to draw conclusions which the facts and the statements would not warrant. While I am on my feet I may say a word about the National Policy. I did not intend to speak again upon the subject, and would not have done so had I not been forced into it. Let me explain to the coal men, some of whom misunderstood my remarks. I explained to one of them privately, who discussed the matter with me since I spoke before recess, and I assured him that I did not say what they seemed to have understood me to say. They seemed to be under the impression that I stated that the imposition of half a dollar a ton on coal was no benefit to the coal industry of Nova Scotia. I never said that, I said it was no benefit to people at large, that the coal owners got the benefit of the additional imposition of 50 cents. I admit that; but are we to be taxed that in order that a few coal owners may get the benefit, and grow rich at the expense of the people at large, fattening themselves out of the sweat and industry of the people? I say no; that is not what the National Policy was imposed for. The National Policy, I repeat again—I am sorry that the Premier is not present to hear me—the National Policy, when it was put forward, was not to exceed the maximum of 25 per cent.; it was put forward as an argument to be used to force the Americans to give us reciprocity in trade, or free trade. That statement was made publicly not alone by the right hon. Premier throughout his travels in Ontario and Quebec, and elsewhere, but it was made on every platform by every orator who followed him, or was associated with him during those campaigns—it was put forward for that purpose. What is it to-day? It is a protective tariff. He has abandoned the National Policy, he has abandoned the name by which he used to call it, and he calls it by the honest name which it deserves, a high protective policy; and let us all understand that when we are dealing with it we are no longer dealing with the National Policy with which the hon. gentleman started out, and with which he inveigled the country into placing him in a position to enable him to impose higher duties than had existed before. That is the truth of the case, and I wish to say to my hon. friend that whenever he wishes to deal with my remarks I shall be only too glad to have him do so, and to be put right if I am in the wrong, for no man in this House is more ready to get up and own it when he is proved to be wrong; but do not let him make these statements about me, and do not let him draw conclusions that my language has not warranted.

Mr. BROWN.

Mr. McKEEN. I simply wish to reply to a statement made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), and in doing so I have no desire whatever to misquote or misrepresent any assertion he has made. If I understood that hon. gentleman aright, he stated to this House that the duty on coal was no benefit to the Maritime Provinces, but was a positive tax on the Provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. I do not wish to misquote the assertion made by the hon. gentleman, but that is the way I understood his remarks. Now, I think the hon. gentleman must have spoken without duly weighing the statements that he has made. No one who is cognisant with the progress that the coal industry has made since the inception of the National Policy, but must be aware of the great advance made by that industry during those years. What have we got, Sir? Take the 4 or 5 years previous to the National Policy, and you will find that our average sales of coal were some 700,000 tons at the outside. Since that time the business has advanced at the rate of about 50,000 tons per annum. In 1880 the output of our mines in Nova Scotia footed up the immense quantity of 1,600,000 tons. I am speaking from memory, and subject to correction, but I know

I am very near the mark in making these statements. Now, of the quantity that we mined last year I find that some 700,000 tons or thereabouts, came up into the Gulf of St. Lawrence. That coal came here under the protection of a duty of 60 cents per ton; there is no hon. gentleman who will deny that statement. Previous to 1878 our exports to Montreal and the St. Lawrence were under, if I mistake not, 80,000 tons and there has been an increase in the St. Lawrence trade of 62,000 tons per year since the inception of the National Policy. Will any hon. gentleman undertake to say in the face of these figures that the National Policy has done nothing to develop the coal industry of our country? Why, we have in Nova Scotia fourteen mines now in active operation. They are capable of supplying even much larger markets than those we possess. In reply to the statement that the duty of 60 cents per ton operates against the consumer or householder in New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island, I can say that the competition existing in Nova Scotia between the mine owners is such as to keep down the price of coal. I venture to ask the hon. gentleman to make enquiries with regard to the subject, and he will find that during the last ten years householders in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have supplied themselves with fuel at lower rates than ever before. I am speaking from memory, but I know that at no time in the history of the coal trade has coal for domestic purposes been sold at lower rates than during the last ten years. The question is whether the coal trade to-day is of any benefit to Nova Scotia. These 700,000 tons enable you to carry on your works. The only outside market which the coal owners in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton possess, namely the St. Lawrence region and Newfoundland, is due entirely to the protection of 60 cents per ton. I think these statements will be borne out by the opinions of the largest coal consumers of Montreal. At the present time, on account of low rates of freight and a direct line opened to Pittsburg mines, foreign coal is offering at lower rates than ever before. I contend that it is necessary to our coal interests that we should have this protection. In regard to the statement that the duty has benefited only a few coal owners, such is not the case, for we have the fact that some 15,000 or 20,000 of men, women and children are dependent for existence upon this industry. So we must admit that the whole benefit is not going into the hands of a few monopolists and capitalists. Every one admits that no industry can be developed in any country giving employment to a large number of people which will not benefit the country by the amount of money disbursed and by the employment given to the people of the different districts. Take for instance the town of Springhill. It has grown within two years, I am told, from having a population of 300 or 400, to a population of 5,000 or 6,000. I am speaking from memory now. Can anyone dispute the fact that the protection afforded has not done good in distributing money and giving employment to our people? It is absurd for anyone to argue the contrary. The statement has been ventured here that this is a positive tax for the protection of coal owners. It will be admitted by every one that a revenue is necessary to carry on the business of the country, and, if such is the fact, I would like to ask why a revenue should not be paid on coal and iron as well as on other articles? This coal, if I understand the trade aright, is used not so much by householders in Montreal and in the St. Lawrence district as by the larger corporations. Is there any reason why those corporations should not contribute part of the revenue by the country affording protection on coal as well as on any other article? I have heard it contended, and I have heard it admitted even by free traders, that a duty on kerosene oil was right and proper, but yet that coal used for a similar purpose, namely, in the manufacture of gas, should not pay any duty. I do not see the force of the argument.

Mr. McKEEN.

I contend that protection for revenue purposes or any other purpose, which enables us to develop the coal industry, is right and just in the interests of all concerned. I did not intend to offer any extended remarks on this question. I take exception to the statement made by hon. gentlemen with regard to the coal trade, and I will be borne out in the statement by every member from Nova Scotia, that this protective duty has done much to develop the coal industry. I do not know any other industry that has advanced in like proportion since the inception of the duty. What other market is open to us than those of the St. Lawrence and the lower Provinces? We have no show in the American market. In the autumn of last year I failed to place a cargo of coal in Boston at $2.30 per ton, duty paid. That will show the condition of the American market, which is from time to time held up to us as being for our advantage. It is impossible to obtain any foothold in that market, and, therefore, the only market open to us outside of the Dominion is Newfoundland. I contend that any attempt to remove this duty would be perpetrating a wrong on any industry that is doing a great deal to develop the resources of the country. As regards the iron industry, I think the strictures of the hon. gentleman opposite will be replied to by hon. gentlemen who are probably more conversant with the business than I am; but I may say that we believe that in due time the iron resources of our country will be largely developed through the protection now afforded to the iron industry. We must not, however, be too impatient—industries cannot spring up in a day. We know that in order to secure the proper development of the iron industry and to build smelting works time is required. I have it on the authority of a gentleman who has been working up an iron property in the County of Pictou, that in the course of a few years or less time there will be large smelting works established there. I hope the whole House and country will not only see that the protection is continued to the coal industry but that they will be heartily in accord in having that duty continued. As to the motion before the House, I am not acquainted with, and know little about corn or cornmeal; but I know this, speaking from a miner's standpoint, and every miner in the country would support me in that statement, that we would to-day rather pay a duty of $1 per barrel on cornmeal than have the duty removed from coal.

Mr. CHARLTON. As the representative of one of the corn-growing counties in the country lying north of Lake Erie, I, perhaps, will be excused by the House if I say a few words in relation to the motion now before it. However, I crave permission at the outset to make a few remarks in reply to the observations of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKeen) with respect to the coal duty. That hon. gentleman informed us that some 15,000 or 20,000 people derived their subsistence directly or indirectly from the business of mining coal in Nova Scotia. That business, I believe, is confined to three counties in that Province, and the duty designed to protect fifteen or twenty thousand people in three counties in Nova Scotia is made to bear with extreme severity upon many important manufacturing industries, and upon the interests of the general public in the Dominion at large. Our importations last year of coal amounted to 1,325,000 tons, the value of which was $3,644,000, and upon the whole of this vast amount of coal imported a duty was exacted for the benefit of a portion of the population of three counties in one of the Provinces of this Dominion. Now, Sir, the imposition of that duty upon coal has a direct tendency to render unsatisfactory any attempts at engaging in iron manufacture in this country. Coal is a raw material, and from coal is produced the coke which it is necessary to use in the reduction of iron ore into pig iron; yet the Government by imposing a duty upon coal and upon coke, a product of coal, used in the manufacture of iron, have almost if not entirely neutralised the protection it affords, by a duty upon pig iron and by bounties. I hold, Sir, that coal is a raw material, and that the imposition of a duty upon it bears unjustly upon the whole population of this Dominion who require to use coal as fuel, and with unjust and undue severity upon the iron interest and the other industries in this Dominion where coal is used either for the conversion of ores into metal or as fuel for propelling machinery. I repeat that I consider this an impolitic and an unjust tax. Now, Sir, with regard to the corn question on which I rose to say a few words. A good deal has been said to-night about the disastrous effects caused to the agricultural interests of this Dominion by the importation of corn free of duty, and about the necessity for the imposition of the duty in the interest of the farmer. I propose to go back to the period anterior to the imposition of duties upon corn, and to point out the effect upon the agricultural interests of the Dominion that the admission of free corn had in the year 1877. This was the year when the largest amount of corn was imported of any year in the history of the country, and a year when the effect of the importation of a large amount of corn on the agricultural interests of Canada may very fairly determine the question as to whether the importation of corn is a disaster to the farmer or whether it is not. I go back to the year 1877, because it is just anterior to the introduction of the National Policy. In the year 1877 we find that the net import of corn, after deducting cornmeal, was 5,176,000 bushels, and the average price was 51 cents a bushel. The importation of that corn enabled this country to sell the whole of the export of oats for that year amounting to 2,970,000 bushels which was equivalent in weight to 1,800,000 bushels of corn. Thus 1,800,000 bushels of corn filled the place that would have been filled by the entire export of oats and which would have to be retained in the country but for the importation of the corn. Then again 1,745,000 bushels of peas were exported that year, and that export was replaced with 1,870,000 bushels of corn, to fill the place that would otherwise have to be filled by the peas. The balance of the import of corn, amounting to 1,506,000 bushels, took the place of 1,736,000 bushels of barley that would have been required for food for stock or for other purposes had the corn not been imported. Had it not been for the importation of corn we would have had to use all the oats and peas we exported, and then we would have had to feed up 1,736,000 bushels of barley to fill the place that was taken by the corn we imported. The net result of this importation of grain is as follows:—We bought 1,800,000 bushels of corn at 51 cents a bushel, and sold 2,970,000 bushels of oats at 42 cents a bushel, leaving a difference in favor of the country of $250,000. We bought 1,870,000 bushels of corn at 51 cents a bushel and sold 1,745,000 bushels of peas at 85 cents, leaving a difference in favor of the country of $523,000. We bought 1,506,000 bushels of corn at 51 cents and exported 1,736,000 bushels of barley at 71 cents, leaving a difference in favor of the country of $466,860. We imported 292,843 barrels of meal, at $3 a barrel, and exported in its place a corresponding amount of flour at $5.50 a barrel and the gain from this source was $632,107, making a total gain in consequence of the importation of corn and the selling of the coarser grain, of which it took the place at a higher price, of $1,873,000 in the year 1877. If you take from that sum the cost of the transportation of the grain from the port of entry to the points of distribution all over the country and the cost of transporting the coarse grain from the point where the grain was received to the frontier, and which I estimate at $445,000, we find that the net gain to Canada in 1877 from the importation of corn was not less than $1,438,000. The truth is that the importation of corn is an advantage to the farmers of this country, it is only imported in large quantities because it can be brought in at a cheaper price than the coarse grain can be sold for. We have been told that the importation of corn depreciates the price of coarser grain, but the figures which I have given will contradict that assertion. Here was corn admitted at 51 cents a bushel, and during that year we find, from the Trade and Navigation Returns, that oats were worth 42 cents a bushel, barley 71 cents a bushel and peas 85 cents a bushel, and the difference that I have shown between the price paid for the corn imported and the price received for the grain exported of $1,438,000. The farmer is not injured by the importation of corn for he is simply permitted to sell one kind of a coarser grain at a higher price and buy another at a lower price and make money by the transaction. He was permitted in the year 1877 to sell peas at 85 cents and buy corn at 51 cents. He was permitted to sell oats at 42 cents and buy corn in their place for 51 cents. He was permitted to sell 48 pounds for 71 cents, and buy 56 pounds for 51 cents. He was permitted in all those cases to make a large sum of money upon the transaction, and to trade oats or peas or barley for corn; and he or somebody else made nearly one million and a half dollars in 1877 because the trade in corn was wisely untrammelled by duties. To-day, at the present prices, if corn were admitted to Canada free of duty, with oats at 34 cents a bushel and corn at 40 cents per bushel (the price at which it can be laid down without duty in Toronto), there would be a gain of 12 cents on each bushel of corn exchanged. At the current rate there would be a gain for the exchange of peas for corn of 16 cents a bushel, and a gain of 24 cents a bushel on every bushel of corn exchanged for a bushel of barley. This, Mr. Speaker, is the state of the corn trade, and we see how much it is in the interest of the farmer to leave the importation of corn untrammelled by duty, for the farmer can sell his coarser grains at a high price, and buy corn at a lower price, and corn suits his purpose better as a food at the low prices. I do not know, Sir, that I have anything further to say in relation to this question, except this, that my experience is that the duty has had no effect whatever in raising the price of corn in the county in which I live or in any of the other counties of the corn producing belt; but the price of corn is actually lower now than the current rates that prevailed before the imposition of the duty. It has had no effect in raising the price when the farmers had a surplus to sell, although they do not raise it for the purpose of selling, but for fattening stock; but it has interfered with the privilege and right which the farmer formerly possessed of selling his oats, his peas and his barley at a higher price relatively than the corn cost him, and making large sums of money each year in the transaction of exchanging the one for the other.

Mr. HESSON. I do not propose troubling the House at any great length on this question which has been so thoroughly debated in years gone by. I had supposed that not only had the corn question been thoroughly threshed out, but every other question relative to the National Policy introduced in 1879. But hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have learned nothing from the past. They again attempt, though in another and I must confess a more dangerous way, by removing one brick at a time, to destroy, if possible, that noble structure which has been created for the advantage of the people of Canada. Now, Sir, this apparently very harmless and modest resolution of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) has in it a sting which I think is of a very dangerous character to the National Policy. The hon. gentleman, in a way peculiar to himself,—for he is a very able man indeed—and in a way by which he would catch the popular ear if he were not answered, has endeavored to damage the farming community in this country, while at the same professing to be their very best friend and supporter. Sir, I claim that this is not a question between the distillers and the farmers, as the hon. gentleman's resolution would seem to imply; but it is a wider and greater question than that. I am sure the House has heard enough on this question to have arrived at all events at this conclusion, that for the insignificant sum of $300, which is about the amount paid by the Government as a drawback to the distillers for the corn they have imported in bond, the hon. gentleman would now attempt to draw a red herring across the track in order to remove, if possible, the keystone of this great National Policy which the people of this country have favorably pronounced upon. Now, Sir, it has been demonstrated by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and ought to have been acknowledged by hon. gentlemen on that side, that the quantity of corn imported into this country under the National Policy has not been anything like the quantity imported under the old free trade system; and I think I shall be able to prove to the satisfaction of every hon. gentleman in this House that it is not to the advantage of this country to permit any larger quantity of American grain of any kind to come into this country without the imposition of some restriction upon it. What are the facts? The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who has just taken his seat, states distinctly that under the free trade policy of the Reform party in 1878, corn was imported into this country at a cost of 51 cents a bushel to the consumer, and he admits to-day that in the face of a tariff of 7½ cents a bushel, it can be laid down in this country at 46 cents a bushel. The hon. gentleman should learn from that that no policy can be made so sure as never to require revision or consideration again. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have repeatedly hurled the accusation against us that we are continually tinkering at the National Policy. Well, Sir, if we do it is with the sole object of making it as perfect and complete as any policy can be made while the circumstances of the people and the country are changing from time to time; and what might not now be a very serious drawback to the farmers of Canada, might drive them to destitution and poverty and ruin in the circumstances in which they stood in those dark years from 1874 to 1878 under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, when Canada was a free market for the grains of the United States. I say it is a most dangerous position to assume in this country, and the Government I have the honor of supporting, I am glad to see, are endeavoring not only to benefit the manufacturers of this country who are an important branch of industry, but the farmers, who are the greatest and best of all. Hon. gentlemen opposite always pose as the friends of the honest farmer and his only friends. It is a most remarkable thing that the farmers have not been convinced by their arguments. They are wise in their generation; they are not the fools they are thought to be. I tell you from my own experience in the county where I have lived for nearly half a century, one of the best districts of Ontario, that I know the feelings of the farmers there on this question and they will never consent to send a member to this House who will not support a National Policy which will prevent all those products of American farmers from coming into our market and destroying the best and greatest interest of all, the agricultural interest of this country. Now, let us see for a moment what the effect would be. Hon. gentlemen stand up here in the presence of this intelligent House and pretend to be the farmer's friends, but they will again see the same result throughout this Dominion. I tell you distinctly that I know what the farmer's feelings are. I move among them a great deal, and having had the experience of farming among them myself, I know where they require the assistance of this House. I said I would endeavor so show the great interests at stake in this matter. I dare say that many hon. gentlemen from the eastern Provinces do not suppose that we in Ontario are producers of corn to any great extent; but I take up the report of the Bureau of Industries, published by the Reform Legislature of Ontario, which I believe to contain accurate statements, because they are made up from the returns of the farmers themselves to that bureau, and from that report I learn that in the past six years, from 1882 to 1877 inclusive, no less than 11,269,601 bushels of corn have been produced annually in the Province of Ontario; and when I tell the House that a large portion of that corn is grown in the western portion of Ontario, I am sorry to see hon. gentlemen from that district rise in their places in this House and to take upon themselves the responsibility of declaring that they are opposed to the protection of that great interest, the corn interest of their own Province. I am not here to advise those gentlemen, but I fear that in some counties in the west, the Counties of Essex, Kent and Elgin, which produce no less than 5,000,000 bushels annually, the people will not thank these gentlemen for asking that the Canadian markets be thrown open in order that American corn may be allowed to compete with our own productions. I say further that the coarse grains which are raised by our farmers are of the utmost importance, and the effect on them of the free admission of corn could not fail to be very injurious. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was bold enough to admit that the free admission of corn will displace our coarse grains, which would have to be sent to a foreign market; but our endeavor has always been to give our own people the control of our own markets, and I am sure it is not to the advantage of the farmer that he should be compelled to send his coarse grains to a distant market and take his chances there. I find that the oats produced in Ontario, during the last six years, averaged 54,419,000 bushels, that the peas and other coarse grains during the same years averaged a production of 12,932,450 bushels, and that the production of corn averaged 11,250,000 bushels annually. These great interests must be preserved, and if we have admitted some 2,300,000 bushels of corn into Canada during the past year, that import has yielded a revenue to the country, and our farmers have been protected to the extent of seven and a half cents a bushel. Hon. gentlemen opposite need not presume to be greater friends of the farmer than we are. We all know that we have to live by and through them, and I am glad to say, from my experience, that the farmers, throughout the Province of Ontario, stand in a better position to-day than they did under the old free trade policy, when our markets were completely at the mercy of the Americans, who could swamp them with their supplies, from time to time, as they chose. Of that 3,271,000 bushels of corn that came into Canada, 1,600,000 bushels went through the distilling process. From that the Government had a revenue of seven and a-half cents a bushel, and the whole debate in this House has arisen mainly upon the fact that the farmer has not got the advantage of the importation of free corn as well as the distiller. We find that the Government, whether wisely or unwisely, passed an Order in Council whereby any quantity of distilled corn or liquor exported out of this country and manufactured out of the imported corn shall have a drawback, I presume upon the value of the corn as imported, seven and a-half cents per bushel, and the total amount refunded by the Government is something under $300. I have not touched one of the most important branches, in so far as the farmer's interests are concerned yet, and I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite to consider what the effect might possibly be if American coarse grains were permitted to flood our market. In Chicago oats are worth 25 cents and in Toronto from 36 cents to 37 cents. What then would be the advantage of a market like that to Canadians? The American oats can be laid down in Owen Sound for 1½ cents to 2 cents a bushel, and for 3 cents a bushel in Toronto. What advantage would it be to our farmer to compete with a market like that? What would be the advantage to him in the market of Toronto, where he is accustomed now to receive 37 cents or 40 cents a bushel for his oats, to be told that if he did not choose to accept 28 cents, American oats could be laid down there at that figure. Hon. gentlemen may say it is not fair to make a contrast between Toronto and Chicago, but the difference existing in prices is 12 cents and 13 cents, and the freight is only about 3 cents. Let us come nearer home and contrast the Buffalo market with ours. In Buffalo to-day sellers are asking 32½ cents and buyers are offering 29 cents to 30 cents for oats, while in Toronto oats are selling at 36 cents and 37 cents. Was that the case in the years between 1874 and 1878? Was there ever a year during that period in which the prices in Toronto were for oats and wheat and all coarse grains except barley higher than in the American market? No; just the opposite was the case. To-day, however, our prices are infinitely higher than the Americans for almost every product of the farm. I said that one of the most important interests had been omitted in the calculations of my hon. friends opposite. It is true that the farmer must have cheap feed for his stock, and that, if circumstances and seasons are favorable, he will make proper provision for the stock he has. He knows he has to rely upon himself. The more labor he can put on his farm and the more employment he can give to those who are about him, the richer the country will become, and it will be so much the better for him if he is not dependent upon the fluctuation of foreign markets. What do I find in reference to one of the most important industries in connection with the farms—that is the cultivation of root crops—according to this Statistical Record? I find that no less than 7,460,475 bushels of mangolds have been raised per year for the past six years; that the average production of carrots for the same period has been three millions and a half, and that turnips averaged thirty-eight millions and a quarter. Do hon. gentlemen reflect what it means to cultivate and raise crops of such importance and value to the farming interest of this country? What does it mean to the feeder of stock? It gives him a much better quality of land after raising such crops as those instead of depending upon the imports of corn from the United States, and not cultivating his farm except for the production of oats and peas and matters of that kind. When those crops are raised, which are of the utmost importance to the farmer, the farm is better cultivated and gives more employment to those who are upon it and the farmer is more independent of the American market. I do not desire to detain the House. This is not the last occasion on which we shall have the opportunity of discussing this question, but those hon. gentlemen have formed a policy which is probably wiser than that of attacking the whole National Policy at once. They are now attacking it here and there, and endeavoring to take a brick out of that noble edifice at a time, hoping that they will tumble the whole building down about the ears of the citizens of Canada. I believe there are men in this House who would be gratified to do that although the country might suffer very disastrous consequences. I fear there are some gentlemen who would not object to see a disastrous result and to see the farmers put in the position they were before of being under the heel of the importer, and to have it brought to their attention and to their memory that the Americans would purchase at prices which gave them better profits. The farmer had to submit to that at a time when they required that attention which it was the duty of the Government to give them.

Mr. BRIEN. I have never been, and I am not yet, a supporter of the National Policy, and I wish to be consistent with the position I took last year. I am still as much in favor of reciprocity with the United States as I ever was, but, so long as this country sees fit to maintain a National Policy, I think this industry is just as important as any other industry in this country to be protected. We have been, of late, accustomed to follow the dictates of the National Policy, which tells us, as far as the action of the people is concerned in the past, that you are to get all you can and keep all you have. I think I shall be consistent, therefore, in voting against the motion and amendments which are now before the House. As far as the farmers of the country in general are concerned, I think there has been an injustice done to them in this matter. The farmer has not been granted the same privilege which has been granted to the distiller. I would not propose to the farmers to take the course which they might, which would be to ask for the abolition of the rebate on corn granted to the distillers, an increase on the duty on corn, and the formation of a combination of the southern counties to raise the price of corn. The total amount of corn raised in Canada in 1886 was 10,805,305 bushels, of which the county I represent raised 2,347,000 bushels, or about twenty-five per cent. of all that was raised in the country. In 1887 there were 8,404,000 bushels produced in this country, of which Essex produced again nearly 2,000,000. This is a very important industry, and it would be rather unfair, where all other industries in the country are protected, to remove the protection which is pretended to be placed on the corn industry. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) has stated the position, in which I exactly agree with him, that, by allowing a rebate on corn to the farmers, it would bring the American corn into direct competition with the Canadian corn. The fact is that the protection to corn has not had its proper effect because of the rebate allowed to distillers, the result of which has been that American corn has been brought into competition with Canadian corn; and, if that holds good in one case, it will hold good in another. Only 2,311,000 bushels of corn were imported into this country during the past year, and, if the southern counties improve in the future as they have in the past, they will be able to supply all this quantity. I say to my friends who are anxious to have the best corn in the world and to raise the best stock, that all they have to do is to come to the County of Essex, where they will have all the opportunity they desire of raising the best corn and the best stock, and I am sure that we will be able to find room for them and will be glad to welcome them there and so to gratify their ambition. I did not intend to make any lengthened remarks on this subject, but I desired to justify the position I take. It is not often that I find myself in accordance with my hon. friends on the other side, but on this occasion I feel, like some who have spoken, that my loyalty is to my constituents rather than my party.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The motion which has been placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) is one of a series of resolutions which, according to the organs of the Reform party it is the intention of the Opposition, during the present Session, to place before the House and before the country, avowedly to endeavor to create the impression in the country, and more particularly amongst the large and influential class to which so much reference has been made to-day, that the present Government are dealing unjustly with them. Now, Sir, there are two points that have been brought to the attention of the House by the discussion which has taken place to-day. In the first place we have, I think, learned that my hon. friend, the leader of the third party, has entirely recanted the faith which animated him in 1877-78. You, Mr. Speaker, as well as myself, having had a seat in Parliament during those years, can remember very well what aid and assistance the hon. gentleman gave to the Conservative party during those years, by his eloquent voice and by his vote in Parliament, in supporting the propositions which we then laid down, advocating the policy which the Conservative party have advocated from 1876, down to the present time. I am a little astonished that my hon. friend the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), the leader of the left centre, has not been able to give to the House, and to the country, better reasons than he has given upon the floor of Parliament to-day, for that recantation, the exhibition of which he has given upon the present occasion. A great statesman like my hon. friend, leading a great party as he does, ought to take a broader view of these questions than he has exhibited on the present occasion. If I understood him aright he took the ground that he would support the two amendments which were made, first the amendment to remove the duty altogether on corn, and, secondly, the amendment to remove the duty from corn-meal, not because he thought it would be in the interests of Canada that it should be done, but because it would be in the interests of the electors of the County of Northumberland.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not express an opinion about supporting either of them.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Well, then, if my hon. friend does not intend to support them.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not say I did not intend.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Certainly the hon. gentleman's speech indicated that he did intend to support them, and the reason why he intended to support these amendments was because it was in the interests of the electors of the County of Northumberland. I say Sir, that the leader of a great party such as the hon. member for Northumberland, ought to have taken a wider and broader view of this question than he has done. It is not my intention to enter into the general discussion which has arisen upon this motion with reference to the trade policy of the country as it affects other interests than those that are especially referred to in the motions which are in your hands. I listened with a good deal of attention to my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I have heard that hon. gentleman make many speeches upon the floor of Parliament; I have heard him first taking one line in regard to the discussion of a trade policy, and then another line; I have heard him make many calculations as to the effect of different policies upon the interests of the people of Canada; and to-night we have heard him again giving to the House a series of figures from which he proves to his own satisfaction, at all events, that the policy that prevailed during the time that the Mackenzie Administration was in office, was more beneficial to the farmers than the policy which at present prevails. He gave us certain figures respecting the effect of the importation of corn in 1877, having admitted, as he did at the time, that we imported during that year a very much larger quantity than we now import, and we allege that the diminution in the importation since the imposition of the duty, has inured to the benefit of the farmer. The effort which the hon. gentleman made in his speech before the House was to prove that no such benefit had inured to the farmer from the diminution of the importation of corn, and he told us that through the large importation of corn we were enabled to export from Canada in 1877 nearly 4,000,000 bushels of oats. But in his calculations, and in the information which he was giving to the House, he forgot to tell us that in that year 1877 we imported 1,697,000 bushel of the same article. You will find, Mr. Speaker, and my hon. friend for North Norfolk will find, the same to be the case if he examines the Trade and Navigations Returns; that the export of oats from the country during that year was only some two millions of bushels more than we had imported, and Sir, the whole of that importation of oats has now ceased altogether. We do import hardly a single bushel, during the past year we imported only 20 000 bushels altogether. Then he told us that we exported in 1877, 1,753,000 bushels of peas, but he forgot to tell the House and the country that we exported during the last year ending 30th June, 1888, of the same article, 2,164,069 bushels. The contention I make in regard to this matter is this—I do not speak from the standpoint of an eastern Province man. When we were discussing the National Policy in Opposition; when we were discussing the probable effect of the National Policy, I think the hon. member for Northumberland concurred that it would be impossible, unless the different Provinces agreed to a certain line of policy, and if each particular interest, if the interest of each particular Province was to be consulted—it would be impossible ever to arrive upon a basis protecting the interests of this great Dominion. We did arrive upon the basis of taxing Ontario for the benefit of Nova Scotia, the iron and coal industries of that Province; at the same time we agreed on the policy of advancing the interests of the farmers of Ontario and Quebec by imposing a duty upon the agricultural products which were largely imported previous to that time.

Mr. MITCHELL. When did New Brunswick and Prince Edward come in?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). My hon. friend goes back, I see he has enlarged his views from the County of Northumberland to the whole Province of New Brunswick. I will tell him where it affects the interests beneficially of the Province of New Brunswick. Let him go to the great cotton mill of Mr. Gibson down in the Province of New Brunswick, let him go to Moncton, and he will find that the National Policy has, to a considerable degree, beneficially affected the interests of his Province.

Mr. MITCHELL. What dividends have they paid? That is the point.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I am not aware what dividends they pay, but I know this much, that whether they have paid dividends or not, they have paid the hands that have been employed in those factories in the prosecution of these industries.

Mr. MITCHELL. Two or three hundred hands.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Whether it has inured to the benefit of the promoters of those industries, it has inured to the general benefit of whole Province of New Brunswick. But, Sir, it does not lie in the mouth of my hon. friend to taunt us that no dividends have accrued to the promoters of those industries, when he and his friends have been telling us for the last ten years that we have adopted and maintained a policy which has been in the interest of the great cotton and sugar lords of the country, and against the interests of the people of Canada. I say if it has added to the distribution of money, if it has added materially, as it has added, to the employment of labor in the Province of my hon. friend, it has thereby materially advanced the interests of that Province. I am endeavoring, however, to confine myself more particularly to the question before the House. I say that as far as my observation goes, the imposition of a duty upon coarse grains coming into Canada has been more beneficial to the farmers of this country than any other portion of the tariff policy of the present Government regarding the importation of any other article into Canada. And when it is shown, as can be conclusively shown by the Trade and Navigation Returns, that the importation of corn has been reduced from upwards of 8,000,000 bushels in 1877, down to a little over 2,000,000 in 1888; and that the importation of oats and other coarse grains has been reduced from 1,690,000 bushels in 1877, down to 20,000 in 1888, I think no more conclusive argument can be offered to the farmers of Canada that the policy of the Government in reference to this matter has been beneficial to them, in that respect at all events. But I need not have labored to convince the Opposition that the policy of the Government with regard to this matter had been beneficial to the farmers. Why, notwithstanding the fact that from 1879 down to the present Session we have heard from the other side of the House of Commons the statement made year after year that it was impossible that the imposition of duties on grain coming into Canada could be beneficial to the farmer, yet today we have the extraordinary spectacle of hon. gentlemen supporters of the leader of the Opposition rising and telling this House candidly that while they agree with the motion of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), they do not intend to vote for either of the amendments made to that proposition, thereby giving the most positive evidence it is possible for hon. gentlemen to give that they have been convinced by the logic of facts that the policy we adopted in 1876, and which I am glad to say the present Government has maintained down to the present time, has been beneficial in the direction in which we intended it to be beneficial. So much for the question as to the amendments which have been submitted. As regards the main motion itself I am quite free to admit there is a good deal of reason in the proposition laid down by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). It does not seem to be an unreasonable proposition that if we admit the system of drawbacks at all, it ought to apply not in a limited but in the fullest sense possible. I may say I am not favorable to the system of drawbacks; I do not believe the system is a wise one or one in the interests of any country; but whilst that system exists and is upon the Statute-book it must be applied by the Government, I presume, in the best manner possible.

Mr. MILLS. That is against the farmer.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Yes; the hon. gentleman says for the benefit of the farmer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Against the farmer.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Let me say this: that in the resolution submitted by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) and that which was submitted a day or two ago, the Opposition have given evidence that they cannot rise very high in regard to matters of trade policy. I am not going to refer to the discussion which took place yesterday on the motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), but I may say that the whole export of spirits, as I am informed and as I gather from the public documents, upon which a drawback is paid amounts to about $16,000, and that the whole drawback paid to the distillers amounted to about $300 or $400. I do not pretend to say that because the trade is so small in its proportions it alters the principle in the slightest degree, but I do say that I believe if you are to apply the machinery of the Minister of Customs, which is somewhat cumbersome, and which we sometimes think a little arbitrary, to the feeding of cattle in bond, I think you would very soon find, and hon. gentlemen opposite would very soon find, that the farmers would say: For God's sake do not give us any drawback on the feed we give our cattle, but let us feed them as we choose.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is hard on the Minister of Customs.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Perhaps it is hard on the Minister of Customs. I am standing here as an independent member, and whilst I give the Government an independent support because their policy meets with my views, I think I have a right to criticise even the actions of my own leaders.

Mr. MITCHELL. But you should be here.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The reason I am not there is because the policy, or rather the non-policy, of hon. gentlemen opposite does not meet with my approval, and the general policy of hon. gentlemen on this side does meet with my approval; and whilst I am quite free to criticise their acts when they are not in the public interest, their general policy is such that it would be disastrous not only to the interests of my own constituents in North Renfrew, but to the interests of the whole Dominion if they were turned out of office and hon. gentlemen opposite took their places. For this reason, although I am free to admit there is a great deal of plausibility in the motion of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), I believe it would be impossible to apply it in such a way as to benefit the farmers, and, therefore, I will vote against the amendment which has been submitted and against the main motion itself.

Mr. CHISHOLM. I do not desire to reply to remarks made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, but I should like to say a few words in regard to the view we take on this subject in the Province from which I come. The fact of the matter is that previous to the adoption of the National Policy our farmers were struggling and were very poor. They had to compete with farm produce brought across the lines, and farm products were brought in which slaughtered our market. At that time the wild lands on the Fraser River were worth about $5 an acre, at the present time those lands are worth $30 an acre; cultivated lands at that time were worth about $20 an acre, at the present time they are selling at about $75 to $100 an acre. I was sorry to hear the other evening that land had depreciated so much in value in this part of the country, for such is not the case in our Province, and since the National Policy has been in operation lands have been advancing rapidly in price from year to year, until the day before I left a farm of 160 acres on an island in the Fraser was sold for $100 an acre. That shows that the National Policy has been good for our Province, and we are in favor of it. We are in favor of it in its entirety; we do not want to do away with any part of it. If I made any other statement in this House all the farmers on the Fraser River would bring me to a severe account indeed. In my statement I will be supported by every hon. member from the Province, a constituency of which I have the honor to represent, and so far as the National Policy is concerned I will support it in its entirety. I believe it is a good way to raise the revenue which is necessary for every Government, and it is desirable to protect all the industries in the country, whether agricultural or manufacturing. With these few remarks, and without offering any comment on statements made by hon. gentlemen either on this side of the House or on the Opposition side of the House, I conclude by desiring that the House should know how we in British Columbia feel on this question, and the view held in the Province from which I come.

Mr. AMYOT. I think it proper that so long as the United States protect themselves against us we must protect ourselves against the States. I hold that this country would be greatly benefited if we were allowed to trade freely with the States, but for my part I want one thing or the other: either protection against the States or free trade with the States, the latter of which would mean a partnership between the States and ourselves to protect the whole 65,000,000 of people, which would be the united population, against the rest of the world, and the giving to us of an immense market in the whole market of the States, and giving the States the market of Canada. But I do not believe that we should smash up into fragments our system of protection so long as we do not obtain free trade with the United States. Of course, if you take in detail every article of the tariff, you will find that some parts of the country would be benefited by a change, but we must take the tariff as a whole. Some parts of the Dominion produce a large quantity of corn, and if you admit the corn from the States free it will be detrimental to those who produce corn. If you admit cornmeal free of duty it will be against the interests of the millers of Canada and of those employed in those mills. I do not think, however, it is necessary to go into those details, but we should rather look at the question in its broad view. Last year I voted against admitting flour free of duty on the same principle. Of course those who do not produce wheat would benefit by having it a little cheaper; if the tariff makes any change in the final result of the market, but we must remember that those who produce wheat pay duty on coal and other articles. I hold that as long as we have not free trade with the United States we must protect ourselves. If you take the question of corn you find that you may manufacture it and export it, and if you take fertilisers, on which we voted yesterday, we find that we can manufacture them here and export them to the States or elsewhere with profit to ourselves. I believe that we should have free trade with the States, and that is the sentiment in the part of the country which I represent, but so long as we have not an entire system of reciprocity of commerce we must have reciprocity of tariff; we must protect ourselves as the United States protect themselves against us. It is the duty of us who believe in free trade with the United States to let that country know that we are ready to deal with them on that score, but so long as we do not obtain this reciprocity we must support the National Policy for our own protection. The National Policy was introduced in 1878 as a means to obtain reciprocity with the United States. I hope that very soon we will have that reciprocity for the benefit of the country, and that we may be able to trade freely with the intelligent and wealthy people of the great country south of us.

Mr. SPROULE. After the exhaustive debate which took place on this question I would not trouble the House were it not for the fact that I come from the same part of the country from which the hon. member (Mr. Landerkin) comes, who made the original motion in this House; and, in addition to that, ours is a part of the country composed largely of agriculturists who perhaps have benefited more from the National Policy or equally as much at all events as those in any other portion of the Dominion of Canada. I am much surprised at the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) making this motion; it is one of the peculiar motions which he brings forward for the purpose of catching the unwary. It is one of those motions that he makes for the purpose of endeavoring to convince the people of Grey that some great injustice is done to them by the Government of the country, or that by some piece of class legislation that others have benefited by the National Policy, and that they and they alone are left out in the cold. Whether the hon. gentleman framed this motion himself or by the advice of others, it is framed in the best possible way it could be for the purpose of deceiving the people. It says:

That, whereas distillers are allowed a rebate of duty upon corn imported for use in the manufacture of spirits for export, it is, in the opinion of this House, but just and right that farmers and stock raisers who import corn to feed cattle or other stock for export, should also receive a similar rebate.

Take the bare and bald motion as it appears here and go to the country districts in East and South Grey, and say to the farmers that the distillers of the country are allowed a rebate on all grain they bring in for the purpose of feeding cattle which they sell in the same market as the farmer, while the farmer is obliged to pay 7½ cents a bushel duty and it is natural that they should feel that they are the injured parties. But the hon. gentleman would not tell them in addition to this bald statement about the small quantity of corn which is brought in for that purpose. He would conveniently omit to tell them that during last year the rebate on all grain brought into Canada for that purpose was only between three or four hundred dollars. He would lead them to believe that the large quantities of grain brought in by the distillers were entirely imported for that purpose, and, therefore, that the farmers of the country must receive some injustice because they cannot get that rebate. I regret that the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) is so short-sighted as to suppose that he could delude the farmers into believing injustice is done them in this respect. If there is one part of the Dominion of Canada more than another where the National Policy applies directly in the interest of the farmer, it is in his constituency and mine. I have the honor to be one of his constituents and to live in one of the townships that helped to send him here as a representative of the people, and I can tell him that no longer ago than the present season a large portion of the oats grown in the Townships of Glenelg, Artemesia, Euphrasia, Holland and other townships were sent to the north shore of Georgian Bay for the purpose of feeding the horses and other stock belonging to the lumbermen who were engaged in operations in that part of the country. Were it not for this policy oats would be largely brought, as they were brought before the National Policy was introduced, from the State of Michigan, or some of the Western States of the Union. It is not so long ago since 1878; and I distinctly remember that lumbering men on the north and south shores of Georgian Bay brought nearly all their oats and pork from the Western States. I think the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook) belonged at that time to a firm who imported the food for its men and horses from the Western States.

Mr. COOK. No.

Mr. SPROULE. I know that some of his men informed me that their supply of pork and oats came from the Western States previous to 1878, and they also told me that they could get rattlesnake pork from Chicago much cheaper than Canadian pork, and it was in the interests of the employer to import it. I do not wonder at the hon. member from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) supporting this motion, belonging as he does to a large lumbering firm who are carrying on their operations on the north shore of Georgian Bay, because it would be to his interest and a benefit to his pocket that he could bring in the oats from Michigan instead of bringing them from East and South Grey. I know that before navigation closed in the present year buyers in my locality paid 5 and 6 cents a bushel more for oats than they could if we had not protection. They sent oats from the ports of Owen Sound and Collingwood to the lumbermen and got a better market for them than they could by sending them east. When navigation closed oats had to come down a little, but were it not for the fact that our oats are protected in this direction, persons could not pay the prices they are paying for them to-day. I remember distinctly, in the locality where I live, in the heart of one of the finest agricultural sections in Ontario not only corn from Chicago, but prairie-raised oats from the Western States, which were much cheaper than the oats our farmers could raise, were being brought in, and I remember distinctly that the value of oats dropped 20 cents a bushel in two days when two steamer loads of oats came into Collingwood and were distributed throughout the Counties of Grey and Simcoe to compete with the oats which were sold at higher prices by our own farmers. Will anyone tell me in the face of that fact that it would be in the interest of the farmers of South Grey to have the duty taken off corn, which would seek to come into competition with the coarse grains raised largely by the farmers there? Unfortunately it has been the experience of the farmers there within the past few years that they have not been able to raise wheat as successfully as they could years ago; they are obliged to turn their attention to coarse grains. Peas, oats and barley are the staple crops in that country, and if you allow corn to come in free every bushel that is brought in will reduce the value of the oats, peas and barley the farmers grow, because these are the grains they use for feeding their cattle. We find them taking them to the mill and getting them mixed together, and if the duty were taken off corn as the result of this motion, I can tell the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) that he would find no stronger opponents than many men who are now his supporters. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell the farmers that not one single article they have to sell is raised in price by the tariff. If that is the case, why do they ask that the duty should be taken off? If the removal of the duty will not bring down the price of the corn to the farmers for feeding purposes, why do they ask that it should be taken off? There is something lame, unreasonable and inconsistent in their logic, and I can tell the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that if he goes to the Georgian Bay, either on the north shore or the south shore, he will require a great deal more logic than even he can command, to convince any farmer that it is in his interest to have the duty taken off. They may tell him: If you belong to a Michigan lumber firm, you can buy there the pork to feed your lumbermen or the oats to feed your horses; but if you come here, as long as this duty is on corn, we will compel you to buy from us, and we will still believe that it is in our interest, notwithstanding what figures you produce; for the hon. gentleman seems to be an adept at figures and able to prove anything from them, at any rate to his own satisfaction, but, I am sure, not to the satisfaction of the farmers. I would not have spoken on this subject at all were it not that I come from the same locality as the hon. member for South Grey, and that I believe that it is strongly in the interest of the farmers that this duty should be kept up, and would be much to their detriment if it were taken off, as it enables them to obtain increased prices for these coarse grains which are the staple commodities they raise in that country, and which must be so for all time to come.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I desire before the vote is taken on this question to add a word or two to what I have already said in regard to the observations of some of the speakers in the course of the debate. I think it was the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) who said that if the members from the Maritime Provinces could not vote for the original motion, they would have an opportunity of voting against the Government on one of the two amendments which have been proposed. The original resolution provides for a rebate on corn imported for stock feeding; the first amendment provides that corn for all purposes shall be admitted free; the next amendment provides that cornmeal shall be admitted free. Hon. gentlemen opposite appear to pursue the same policy with regard to this question that they have pursued on other occasions. They have not very clearly defined their position, and we on this side of the House, at all events, are at a loss to know, should hon. gentlemen opposite by any means assume power and have the framing of the tariff, which of these three different policies they would adopt. I shall not, however, be at all surprised if the hon. member for Lambton, and the majority of the members on that side of the House, be found voting not only for one but for each and all of these three different motions, provided they think they have any chance by doing so of defeating the Government. Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time this question has been discussed in this House. It was discussed a few years ago when a motion was introduced on the other side of the House proposing to place corn on the free list. Those of us who favor the National Policy, although we come from the Maritime Provinces, and would be glad to see this duty removed in the interests of the consumers of cornmeal in that Province, voted with the Government to maintain this duty. This question was one of the prominent questions discussed in the election contest of 1882, which I believe was the first opportunity I had of expressing my views publicly upon it. It was contended then by those opposed to us that this duty was imposed upon the people of the Maritime Provinces for the especial benefit of the farmers of the Province of Ontario. So far as I was concerned I accepted that statement as true, but I contended that it was a part of the general policy of protection adopted by this Government, that that policy as a whole would be beneficial to the people of the Maritime Provinces, and that, therefore, if we are disposed to accept it we must accept it as a whole. The electors of Westmoreland county on that occasion agreed with that view, and expressed their verdict accordingly. That is the position which I took then and which I have always held from that time to the present, and it is the position I hold to-day. Now, I would like to say just one word with regard to the first amendment, which proposes to place corn on the free list. That was no doubt moved with the view of compelling some of us who support the Government to vote against the Government on that particular question. So far as I am concerned, I desire to say this, that while I should be glad if any arrangement could be made which could relieve the consumers of corn and cornmeal in the Maritime Provinces from this tax, I consider that it would not be in the interest of the farmers of the Dominion, as a whole, to have this duty wholly removed. I find by looking at the statistics that the production of corn in Ontario amounts to some 10,000,000 or 11,000,000 bushels annually, that there is imported besides 2,300,000 bushels, that the principal part of this imported corn pays duty, and that the principal part is used in the manufacture of whiskey. Now, while I am a supporter of the National Policy and in favor of encouraging manufactures in this country, I am not in favor of extending any special encouragement to the manufacture of whiskey, and instead of admitting corn free for all purposes, including the manufacture of whiskey, if any change is to be made, I shall favor another change which has been suggested, and that is taking away the rebate which is now allowed on whiskey exported. I have nothing further to say on this question, except to refer to a remark which was made by some of our friends on this side, that we, from the Maritime Provinces, were disposed to discuss this question in a sectional spirit. I am not disposed to do that, and I think the views I have expressed will satisfy any hon. gentleman that I am not discussing it in any narrow provincial spirit. I am one of those who believe that the Maritime Provinces have received a fair share of the advantages which have resulted to the whole Dominion from the policy of the present Government. While admitting that in this particular instance a small tax is imposed upon them, yet the railway policy and the tariff policy of the Government, as a whole, have been beneficial to almost every interest in the Maritime Provinces. I am glad to say I believe the farmers of the Maritime Provinces appreciate the advantages of this policy. I am glad to say that they are in a better position to-day than they were in at any other time in the history of the country, and that they are giving the general policy of the Government a more hearty and generous support now than they ever accorded it before. I wish simply, in closing, to affirm the position which I took at the opening of this debate, and while I desire to see the duty upon corn imported for stock-breeding purposes and for manufacturing purposes removed, I am still a supporter of the National Policy, and I only desire this change, while it can be done in the interest of the farmers of the Dominion as a whole.

Mr. DAVIN. I intend to occupy the time of the House but a few minutes. Had I spoken before my hon. friend from Renfrew (Mr. White), I might have gone into several of the positions taken up on this side of the House. But my hon. friend so admirably and so succinctly dealt with these that I shall only trouble the House for a few minutes while I call attention to one or two points in the debate, which seem to me remarkable. In the first place, it is now admitted that protection protects. That principle is now admitted by professed free traders. One hon. gentleman after another belonging to the Reform party has stood up and declared that he would stand by the duty on this one article so long as protection happens to be the rule; but they should know that, according to the political economists, they should, if they are to be consistent free traders, advocate the abrogation of the duties on that or any other individual article, because the theory of the true free trader is that protection does not protect. Then the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) tells us that, strange to say, the duty has made no difference whatever in the price of corn. That is exactly what we say in regard to a great many other things on which a duty exists to-day. It makes no difference in the price except, in some instances, to reduce the price. We have, therefore, two great admissions. Two or three gentlemen on the Opposition side have stood up and declared that they will vote with the Government, because they think it is in the interest of their constituents that the Government policy should be carried out in this one article, so long as protection exists. In other words, they believe that protection protects, and my hon. friend, who is in his heart a Protectionist, although he wears on his sleeve the badge of an assumed free trader, tells us that the duty makes no difference whatever in the price. I will keep my promise and not go into statistics, but will merely refer to what my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) said about the protection of coal in the Maritime Provinces. If I were to go into statistics, I could show that ever since the present Government came into power the production of coal has gone on increasing, until to-day nearly 3,000,000 tons are produced all over the country. Another point which this debate emphasises is that there is an educational process going on which promises to rid us of a sinister aspect of the Reform party. Here to-night, as on other occasions, what do we see? Do we ever see the hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side discuss a question from the general standpoint of the prosperity of the country? No. They take up some small patch of country and they peg away at that. They are creatures of detail; they cannot rise to a large conception; they have to look at everything in small figures.

An hon. MEMBER. Through a funnel.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, through a very small funnel. My hon. friend behind me speaks of a funnel, and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), using a phrase that I used myself, compared me the other night to a funnel. I only wish I could taper the funnel a little so as to get some information into my hon. friends' heads, because the bottles are too small for the funnel. The two points to which I would call the attention of the House are two important points. They show that in this question, after it has been threshed out for the last ten years, the educational process is going on, the yeast begins to rise and the Reform party, such as it is, is breaking up. Several of them will come over to my right hon. friend to-night and vote for him for the first time. This debate has taken a wide range. I am not sorry for that. It shows that the whole National Policy hangs together; it shows that you cannot touch it here and there, but that it is part of a great system under which this country has made extraordinary progress. And when my hon. friend from Northumberland

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland).

(Mr. Mitchell) who I am sorry to say is not here, for I like to see his genial countenance, gets very angry and prophesies that this country is going to the dogs, instead of making great progress, he furnishes another instance of Cannings' Needy Knife Grinder. They are asking the country what its grievances are. If the country were to ransack its head for the next three months it could not tell you a grievance. Everything is going on prosperously, and I say that the wide range the debate has taken shows how every part of the National Policy hangs together. What do I see? I take up a paper, and I see this, and it is a thing which happens again and again. I read here a dispatch from Windsor:

"N. B. Perkins and J. W. Hull, of the Globe Furniture Company, of Northville, Mich., are in town with a view to start in Windsor a factory for making church and school furniture for the Canadian market. They propose from the start to employ not fewer than 100 persons in supplying Canadian demands. The firm desires to secure the Canadian trade, and has concluded that it would be cheaper to manufacture in Canada than to continue paying 35 per cent. duty on their foreign made articles."

That sort of thing is going on the whole time. My hon. friend the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) would bring out figures to you in reference to this matter. The figures would be laid down with all the regularity of soldiers brought out on parade. He will marshal them and look at them with affection, and it shows how much he admires the figurative work of his own hands. He will show that it would be better for our people to go over to Michigan and buy their furniture there, than that we should by a wise policy, force these people, if they are determined to have anything to do with our markets, to come over here. Before I sit down, I will refer simply to one incident in the debate which rather varied it. An hon. friend, who is a member of the House for the first time, and with whom I fought a battle in Haldimand some years ago—more years ago than I care to remember—was introduced to you, Sir; and the wit of the House, the Bernal Osborne of the House, my hon. friend here (Mr. Landerkin) spoke afterwards, and with that charming humor which is characteristic of him, he rang the changes on this, that the Reform party was winning seat after seat, that one after another the outworks of the Government were being stormed, that member after member on the Reform side was being brought in, and in fact there was a great deal of clucking about a very small egg; but knowing what I know is going on in that county—and I say it with all sympathy for my friend, for he was a strong foe, and I always have a kindly feeling towards a strong foe—and knowing what is likely to be the result twelve months hence in Haldimand, perhaps my hon. friend, with that facility of quotation which belongs to him, will be able to be equally happy twelve months hence, and when another member is being led in by my right hon. friend and presented to you, Sir, he will be able to address him, parodying the language which the Prince in "Romeo and Juliet" addresses to one of the great Veronese houses:

"Come, Montague, for thou art early up,
To see thy foe and heir more early down."

Mr. McDUGALD (Pictou). This resolution is evidently one of a series by which the Opposition intend to attack the National Policy piecemeal. The debate has taken a much wider range than the terms of the resolution would indicate, and if it had been confined to the duty on corn and cornmeal, I would not have troubled the House with any remarks. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), as has been his custom for one or two years past, has undertaken to make an attack on the great industries of coal and iron. He, who in the past, as he admits himself, was a supporter and founder of the National Policy, claims that we have changed our position and that the policy which has been approved by the people on many occasions is different from the policy which he supported in the past. He has adopted a policy now which I contend is not a National Policy. He has singled out for attack now and on previous occasions all the great industries of the country which in any sense could be called national. He has dealt with the great interest of the farmer and with the great mining interest of the country. He has made the statement in relation to the iron duties, for instance, that they have not been asked for by the public and are not in the interest of the Maritime Provinces, and that no substantial progress has resulted therefrom. In relation to that matter, full statistics were produced during the debate on the Budget last year to show that substantial progress had been made in that direction, and since then the position has not retrograded but has improved. To cite only one instance, the furnaces at Londonderry, which in 1877 employed only 300 men, were last year employing 800 men; works which were then stagnant have been revived; and, of the two furnaces, one is in full operation and the other will be ready for operation in a very short time. Another industry is the steel works in the County of Pictou, which have been doubled in capacity, and the great impetus which has been given has been such as to attract attention to the facilities for the manufacture of iron in Canada, and I believe that in a short time these smelting industries will be so fully established as to produce all the iron required for consumption in Canada. My belief in that result is based on the fact that we have undoubtedly in the midst of us all the conditions for successful manufacture, conditions which do not exist to the same extent on any other portion of this continent. All these resolutions have been designed to draw the support of the farmer from the National Policy. It is contended that these duties which have been imposed bear heavily on the farmer, and, as an example, it has been stated that the duties on iron imported were last year from 40 to 45 per cent. As a matter of fact the whole duties last year on the iron which was imported did not exceed 30 per cent. excluding the free goods. In 1886-87 the duties were not over 22 per cent. I do not contend, and no consistent supporter of the National Policy or of a protective policy could contend, that in a new country protective duties do not in the first instance increase the price of goods in some cases, but I do contend that the labor which is employed in the country will be an offset at an early date to the enhanced prices. I can cite the example of the United States. Less than a quarter of a century ago, their iron industries were of comparatively small dimensions. To-day they are equal in amount, if they have not actually outstripped the iron production of Great Britain, and, in machinery and in the higher branches of iron manufacture requiring skill, they furnish their goods as cheaply at least as can be obtained in Great Britain. An examination of the Trade and Navigation Returns of the last two years will bear out this statement, and show that our importation of these articles is tending rather in favor of the highly protected country than of the country which has a policy of free trade. Then, in relation to the charge of the enormous impost on iron, that duties on iron range from 40 to 45 per cent. these percentages if they are not examined closely are misleading in the general estimate of them in the public mind. To arrive at the correct amount we have to come down to the actual payments in dollars and cents, and if the extra duties imposed upon iron are reduced to specific figures, we find that outside what would be considered an ordinary revenue duty in the minds of any free trader, the increased duties do not really, on the average, extend beyond from  $\frac{1}{10}$  to  $\frac{1}{5}$  of a cent. per pound on the raw material used in the manufacture. When such material is worked up the actual cost to the consumer is even less than that. As an example of the tendency of prices from 1878 to 1889 in relation to a few articles manufactured out of iron, I will cite some figures which have been furnished me this evening, which show that not only are these articles manufactured cheaper to-day, and that may be, to some extent, owing to an improvement in operations, but the figures show, at all events, that these goods are supplied at very reasonable prices. Take the articles used by the lumbermen. First take ball corks. In 1878 these were furnished at \$1 per 100; now they are furnished, double the size, for 60 cents. Bolts assorted were furnished at \$5 per 100, while now they are but \$3. Horse shoes were \$5 per keg, they are now \$3.25. Boom chains were \$3.50 each, now they are \$1.20. Cross cut-saws were 80 cents a foot, now the improved lance tooth saw can be had for 70 cents a foot. Scouring axes were \$14 per dozen, now they are \$13. Chopping axes were \$12 per dozen, now they are \$9, and the pay of the mechanics employed in the manufacture of these axes is 30 per cent. higher to-day than it was in 1878. Nails were then \$3 per keg, and now they can be had for \$2.75. In regard to agricultural implements, mowers cost \$80 a piece in 1878, now they can be had for \$70. Reapers have diminished in price from \$120 to \$80; horse rakes from \$33 to \$28; self binders from \$175 to \$150. I think these figures go to show that, so far as the iron industry is concerned, no material injury has resulted to the people of Canada from the tariff, while substantial progress has already been made, considering the short space of time during which those duties have been in operation. The question of coal duties has been effectually dealt with by the hon. member for Cape Breton, and I do not intend to go over the same ground, only to make a brief statement, of the facts which will show that the coal duty has been an advantage to the Maritime Provinces, particularly to Nova Scotia; and they will also show that they have not only been an advantage to Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, but also to the greater part of the Province of Quebec. In 1878 the total output was only 693,511 tons; in 1887, the output was 1,519,684 tons, or an increase of 120 per cent. being, in round figures, 826,000 tons. The Upper Provinces took in 1878, only 83,710 tons; in 1887 they took 567,148 tons, or over six times as much. The charge has been made in relation to the duty on coal that it has not been a benefit to the Maritime Provinces, but a positive tax to Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, and that the prices there have been enhanced to the local consumers. I join issue with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) on all these statements. I say that the duty on coal has not enhanced the price in the Maritime Provinces, but, on the contrary, it has enabled the consumers to obtain coal at a much cheaper rate than if the duty had not been imposed; and I ground my statement on the economic laws that the greater the production the cheaper the relative cost. If the duty had not been imposed, all the collieries would have been closed, to a very large extent, and instead of furnishing coal at a low rate, as they do to-day, the prices would have been very much higher, and only a few struggling coal mines would have been in operation. Take the market of Quebec which, after all, apart from the local market, is the chief market of the collieries of Nova Scotia. The duty has not resulted in any serious disadvantage to us; on the contrary, I think it has had a regulating effect and maintained the prices at a more equal rate, on the whole, than if no duty had been imposed. Without the duty the collieries could not have existed. Consumers would have been subjected to very irregular prices, dependent on the importation of coal, which at times would have been small, and at other times very great. To-day bituminous coal is sold at a low price, not only in the Province of Quebec, but in other parts of the eastern portions of Canada. Reference to the Trade and Navigation Returns will show that the average cost of the coal supply, the invoice price, is \$2.80 per ton, for imported soft coal. Impartial enquiry will prove that the coal industry has been materially benefited by the duty on coal, and that no disad-vantage has resulted to the Dominion of Canada as a whole. Now, in respect to the duty on corn and cornmeal. I wish to say that I was elected as a supporter of the National Policy, and I intend to carry out the mandate which the people entrusted to me, and to support the National Policy as a whole; and to give no support, either by vote or by speech, which would tend to discredit the policy which has received the approval of the people in the past. The question that has been raised now is one, as I said before, intended to draw away the support of the farmers from the Government. The duty imposed on corn and cornmeal, if it had any object at all, was imposed mainly in the interest of the farmers. If they did not wish to see that duty continued, I should willingly bow to their decision, but I doubt if the farmers of this country have any such desire, and I think that the members of the opposition do not fairly represent the wishes of the farmers. No proposition ever submitted to this House was based on more untenable grounds than the proposition of the hon. member for South Grey for the removal of the duty on corn. The whole argument is based on the fact of certain drawbacks being allowing on corn used in the manufacture of an article for export. The whole sum representing the drawback does not exceed \$150, as I am informed, and whether that is a sufficient reason to change a policy in the interest of the farmers, which is good in itself, I leave the intelligence of the farmers of this country to decide. An effort has been made in all these resolutions to raise class against class, farmer against laborer, labor against capital. The same tactics of the Opposition have been tried in the past and have failed, as they will fail now. The interests of all parties are common, we have to give and take, and I, as representing a very large laboring element, being perhaps, the first representative sent to the House of Commons peculiarly charged as a representative of that body—I stand here and say that I stand by the National Policy as a whole because it is intended to give employment to labor in this country, and to exclude the importation of goods which can be manufactured here with reasonable hopes of success, because such an importation is a displacement of Canadian labor and is a loss to Canada. I will close by citing the observations of an eminent gentleman on the other side of the line who, in dealing with this question of breaking up in detail a policy which has to stand as a whole, said:

“For myself, I will stand for the protective system and the maintenance of such rates of duty as will ensure the development of the resources of the country, increase the number of its industries and perpetuate its national independence, commercial and industrial as well as political.”

Mr. CARGILL. As coming from the locality of the hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution I may be permitted to offer a few remarks. The resolution appears at first sight to be a very reasonable one. The distillers are permitted to import corn for manufacturing liquor and a rebate of duty is given them on the quantity of the liquor which they export. That being the case, it is apparently very reasonable that the agricultural community of this country should be permitted to import corn for the purpose of feeding cattle for export. How does the object in view differ in the two cases? The object of the National Policy was first for the purpose of stimulating and fostering manufacturing industries. The object in placing a duty on corn imported into this country was to protect the agricultural community against the importation of coarse grains, which would have the effect of depreciating the value of coarse grains produced by our farmers. I say, therefore, that, although it is in the interest of this country to allow distillers the privilege of importing corn for manufacturing purposes, I hold that it would be detrimental to the interest of the agricultural community to allow all corn to be imported free. As I come from the locality of the mover of the resolution I might say that in that neighborhood we have an agricultural community, many of whom are in affluent circumstances, but the great mass of them do not feed cattle. Consequently although this resolution, if adopted by this House, would be in the interest of a few, I consider it would be detrimental to the interests of the agriculturists in the Dominion. Apparently when we on this side of the House make any attempt to introduce legislation for the benefit of the agriculturists our efforts are turned into ridicule by our opponents, and one hon. gentleman opposite took occasion to say that we looked upon the agricultural community as being simpletons and unable to take care of themselves and therefore required the intelligence of the representatives in Parliament to look after their particular interests. When the hon. member for Hamilton introduced a motion for a committee to inquire and investigate into the combines which were in existence, which were said to be detrimental to the best interests of the country and were the means of compelling the farmers to pay much more for their goods than was necessary, I considered he was quite sincere, that he was doing it in the interest of the people; and our effort certainly is entitled to the commendation of all parties in this House when the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who does not very frequently agree with legislation emanating from this side of the House, approves of our efforts in that direction. On the other hand, hon. gentlemen opposite declare that the farmers are a very intelligent class of people. I admit that, and I assign that as the very reason for a majority of the representatives of the agricultural community in this House being on the Treasury benches. It is certainly owing to the intelligence of the farmers and their keen perception of the beneficial results of the policy adopted in 1878 by the leader of the Government. I had thought that after the last general election the question of the National Policy would not in any manner be discussed on the floor of this House. The leader of the Opposition went throughout the country not only voicing his own sentiments but pretending to voice the feelings of the great Reform party of this country. He also took the liberty to mention specially the name of Sir Richard Cartwright. He said that he used the name of that hon. gentleman for the reason that their opponents were so much in the habit of quoting him as being hostile to the National Policy. I think it was termed the alternative policy; he had a policy adapted to the interest of each Province in the Dominion. I certainly thought when our opponents on that occasion sacrificed every opinion they formerly advocated, when they put their views in accord with the views held by representatives on this side of the House and in accord with the policy adopted by the Government in 1878, and then failed to enlist a sufficient number of electors at the polls to place them on the Treasury benches—when they not only had the benefit of the policy adopted in 1878 by the Government, but whatever benefit might accrue from anything they might add to it—when, notwithstanding all this the general electors refused to place confidence in them and to place them on the Treasury benches, they would have ceased attacks on the National Policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in the habit of speaking on every occasion as if sympathising with the agricultural community. I venture the assertion that if an investigation were made and the banking accounts of the agricultural community compared with those of the manufacturers, the farmers, with very few exceptions, would prove to be infinitely better off than the manufacturers. I know farmers in our section who have accumulated an estate in real and personal property amounting from $50,000 to $100,000. I know quite a number in my county who have accumulated that amount. I venture the assertion that there is not a manufacturer in my native (Halton) county who can make so good a showing. I think that I would be perfectly safe in stating to this House that some of the members on the Opposition benches who so frequently take up the cause of the agriculturists of this country the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) for one and the hon. member the agriculturist for East Huron (Mr. McMillan) that either of those men would not exchange their financial positions for that of any manufacturer who resides in their county. I make that assertion, and I am quite satisfied that I can prove it. The manufacturers they refer to as having become bloated monopolists, are men who acquired wealth previous to the induction of the National Policy. Take Harris & Sons, of Brantford, for instance, as well as others I could mention, and these gentlemen accumulated an immense amount of wealth before the introduction of the National Policy. Take the manufacturing industries that have sprung up in my own county town and in the rural sections of the county and you will find that they have hard work to struggle along and eke out a subsistence. I am satisfied they are in a much worse position financially than some of the agriculturists of the county. If this National Policy had not been productive of great benefit to the whole community of this country then I think they would have just reason to complain, but all the predictions made as to the beneficial results that would accrue from the introduction of the National Policy have been realised. We asserted that it would stimulate and foster the manufacturing industries of the country, and it has largely increased those industries and given employment to a vast number of laborers. Consequently there has been a vast increase in the home consumption to the benefit of the agricultural producers of the country. Gentlemen of the opposite side may say that prices have fallen, but other causes have brought about that. They certainly cannot deny the fact that a large increase in the consumption of agricultural products has taken place since the introduction of the National Policy. I know that the prices of everything consumed by the people of Canada are much lower to-day than they were previous to the National Policy, and that people can live much cheaper now than they could then. Although agricultural products have shrunk in value we know that everything which enters into the consumption of the agriculturist has reduced much more in price than the farm products have. Take, for instance, the binders manufactured by Harris & Son at Brantford. Before the National Policy the binders sold for $300 and to-day you can buy one for $150. That is a reduction of one hundred per cent., and agricultural products have not shrunk so much in value. If you go all through the list you will find the same thing occur. Although our opponents on the other side of the House oppose the National Policy they would be quite willing to join their fortunes with a country which has a protective tariff more than double what ours is to-day. These hon. members resent the imposition of the duty as a tax. They say it is a tax upon the people of this country. I will suppose for the moment that it is a tax and I will compare the taxes levied on the people of Canada with the taxes levied on the people of the United States, and we will see in what a much better position we stand. The constitution of the United States provides that the public lands and timber limits are vested in the Federal Government at Washington, the proceeds of the sales of which go into the treasury at Washington, not one cent being contributed towards state legislation. In Canada the receipts from the sale of those lands and of timber limits and mines belong to the Provinces of the Dominion. In addition to that our Government at Ottawa pay to each of the Provinces a subsidy equivalent to about 80 cents per head. In 1887 there were $66,000,000 collected from the people of the United States for the purpose of supporting the state legislatures; that amounted to $1.10 per head on a population of sixty millions, and it amounts to $3.40 per thousand on every thousand dollars of the assessed value of real and personal property through the entire United States. Now a farmer, or a mechanic or any other individual living in the United States assessed for $5,000 has got to contribute towards the taxes of his country $17 more than a man in a similar position in Canada. During the twenty years from 1867 to 1887 the highest annual average of the duties imposed by the Federal Government at Washington was 49½ per cent. and the lowest rate was 25 per cent., while in Canada the highest annual average rate imposed by the Dominion was 21 per cent. and the lowest 10 per cent. The amount of money collected from the people of Canada from 1867 up to the present time under the duty which we imposed upon them was $231,000,000. Had we imposed the American duty upon the people of this country in place of Canadian duty we would have collected $609,000,000; the difference being $327,000,000. We are said to have a national debt of $227,000,000 and deducting that from $327,000,000 it would leave a surplus of $100,000,000. We have paid during these twenty years $70,000,000 to the different Provinces in the shape of subsidies, so that if the people of Canada had contributed in the shape of revenue the same as the people of the United States have done, we would not only have our national debt paid off but we would have a surplus of $170,000,000. I am not in favor of interfering at all with the National Policy. I believe that the best interests of this country are to be promoted by not only the retention, but the extension of the National Policy whenever it becomes necessary. I understand that the millers of Ontario are grumbling considerably about their investments. They are complaining that they have not a sufficient duty on flour. Some years ago I put up a flour mill myself at considerable expense. At present I have that flour mill rented, and it pays me about three per cent. interest on the investment, and the tenant is unable to pay the rent; so that taking into consideration the amount of capital invested, I think more protection is due to the milling industry of this country, and I hope those hon. members from the eastern Provinces, who have been lauding the benefits which have been accruing to them from the National Policy, will take no exception to the Government putting a little extra duty on flour to increase the protection of the Ontario millers. I noticed a short time ago that a smelting furnace had been erected in British Columbia for the manufacture of lead. The present duty is $3 a ton, and the Government are going to be asked for an increased duty. I hope the Government, in their wisdom, will see the propriety of acceding to the request, because the present duty in the United States is $40 a ton. Now, the reason I am such a strong supporter of the National Policy, is because I generally look at things from a non-political standpoint. In order to get at the real merits of the case, I take that view of it, and I notice that in many of the towns and cities of the Dominion, Reformers and Conservatives alike, whenever occasion requires, are ready to vote to impose a direct tax upon themselves for the purpose of establishing a manufacturing industry in their own midst. The little town of Walkerton, in my riding, has given bonuses to the amount of $20,000 for the purpose of stimulating manufacturing industries, and both Conservatives and Reformers unite in imposing upon themselves a tax for that purpose, and the tax is imperative they make the poor people of the town contribute. The marked difference between that policy and the policy of the Government is that the policy of the Government leaves it optional with the people to contribute or not to the support of the industries they protect. Those who do not choose to pay the duties they impose can get along without doing so. I think that is a very strong argument in favor of the National Policy. I think the town of Woodstock, in the County of Oxford, some years ago voted a bonus of $35,000 to one manufacturing industry there, the Patterson Manufacturing Company, and people in a town or city who will impose a direct tax upon themselves for the purpose of stimulating and fostering manufacturing industries should certainly approve of the policy of the present Government.

Mr. BOWELL. Before the question is put, I desire to say one or two words in reference to the question of drawback which has been paid to distillers and other manufacturers. The motion moved by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) deals with the one question alone; from that has evolved this discussion of the National Policy, and now we have three motions before the House. If the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to come to the Department and ascertain what the policy of the Government was, or to ask the simple question as to whether any application had ever been made by those who have to use corn or any other imported grain in the feeding of cattle, I would have been able to inform him that no application of that kind had ever been made, and consequently no refusal on the part of the Government could have followed. When an application is made for a rebate on corn or any other imported grain which is fed to cattle to be subsequently exported, I trust that I shall be enabled to deal with that question as I have with others of a like character. The hon. member for North Grey, and the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) and also the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher), pointed out the difficulties which would present themselves in coming to a correct conclusion as to the amount of drawback which would have to be paid on grain fed to cattle intended for exportation. I do not propose to enter into the minutiae of that question at the present moment. I have simply to repeat that when the question comes before the department, I shall be enabled to deal with it, I hope, to the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman who placed the motion on the Notice Paper. But I think his object was more to attack the Government through the Department of Customs upon this flimsy drawback—I use the word flimsy in reference to the amount which has been paid to the distillers—than to benefit those whom he has taken under his particular charge. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Brien) and the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) told the House that the drawback which had been paid to the distillers had materially affected the interests of the farmers of this Dominion. When I tell you that the only amount that has been paid to all the distilleries in the Dominion has been upon one exportation, and that amount not exceeding $400, on corn which was used in the manufacture of spirits which were subsequently exported, and when you are told that this has so materially affected the interests of the farmers, it is difficult to come to a conclusion as to what the effect might have been—probably the ruin of the whole of them—if the distilleries had imported millions of bushels of corn, manufactured it into spirit, and then exported it out of the country. It seems to me nineteen-twentieths of the gentlemen on the Opposition side wish to convince the House that this is not a corn producing country. If it be not, then it is difficult to ascertain how the manufacture of corn into spirits, which are subsequently exported, could materially affect the farmers who grow other coarse grains. I am, however, glad to learn to-night that there are two hon. gentleman on the opposite side who have been converted to the National Policy, at least to the extent of the maintenance of the duty for the protection of the corn which is produced in the western section of the country. Now, I have no more to say at present upon the question of the drawback. When that question is brought before the Department, I repeat I shall be able to deal with it, notwithstanding the difficulties and the supposed reflections which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) thought the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) cast upon the Minister of Customs. I may say, however, that I am not a little surprised at the motion made by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher). He, we know, is the advocate par excellence of the principle of prohibition. He, I have no doubt, is desirous of preventing the consumption of that which he says is so deleterious to the health of the human race in this country, and yet he objects to its being exported, and he attacks a policy which will enable the manufacturer to export it out of this country and prevent at least the hon. gentleman's friends and those who live in the country from consuming it. I do not know that he could have any other object in view than to make whiskey cheap, especially as it is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite to increase the purchasing power of the people in this country in this respect, so that they will be enabled to get this fluid at a cheaper rate and thereby consume more of it. At least that principle was laid down in a report made to this House in 1878, presented and signed by an honorable gentleman, whose name is Wilfred Laurier. I do not know whether that was the gentleman who now leads so well and so valiantly the Opposition, but I think it was, if my memory serves me right, for I had the honor of a seat in the House at that time. That hon. gentleman, in presenting his report to Parliament, told the people that the reason there was not so much spirits consumed in this country as formerly was because the purchasing power of the people had materially decreased, but that he had hope in the future that as the purchasing power of the people increased so would the consumption of spirits increase, and thereby the revenue would increase in equal proportions. I suppose the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) is desirous of increasing the purchasing power of the people in this particular article.

Mr. CARGILL,

Mr. FISHER. No.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman says "no." Then I am surprised that he should ask to have an article placed upon the free list which would enable the distillers to produce spirits cheaper than they can while the duty is imposed upon it; and if they can produce whiskey with cheap corn, they will give it to my hon. friend or those who like it at a cheaper rate than they do now. Whether that will be his mode of advocating prohibition I do not know, but it seems to me it would be much better for his consistency if he would ask to have the corn put upon the free list for the purpose of feeding cattle, and of feeding the people if necessary, and to have a tax put upon that used in the manufacture of whiskey. That is what I supposed he would have done, but we have instead the bald proposition before us now to give cheap corn, as the hon. gentleman says, to the farmers and to the distillers; and it is the distiller that pays $99 out of $100 and more which is collected upon this article. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) pointed to my young friend from Hastings (Mr. Corby) and said that he certainly could vote for this motion. There is no question but that he could. If the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Corby) would vote for this motion it would be putting annually from about $3,000 or $5,000 in his pocket, for that is about the duty he pays on the corn used in his distillery; but my hon. friend is too patriotic for that. He is conducting a business that can stand the tax, and he knows that the admission of free corn would injure the farming population who have sent him to this House, and he has their interest at stake rather than that of his own pocket. But hon. gentlemen might say that the higher the tax the higher would be the price of whiskey to those who drink it. For one I say that as high a rate should be imposed as can be taken out of the distillers, and if I buy whiskey I have no objection to paying well for it. I, therefore, do not follow the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) in the position he has assumed, that we should furnish the raw material free in order that we may get cheap whiskey. I rose merely to explain the policy of the Government in reference to the question of drawbacks and nothing more. If the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) were here, I would say that I differ in toto from the position laid down, as to the benefits to be derived by the country from the granting of drawbacks to manufacturers who export their products. The principle of granting drawbacks on the articles exported is incidental to the principle of protection. If the manufacturers have a surplus and they desire to carry on their industries in order to keep their men employed, they must get rid of that surplus in some way, and so long as a foreign market is open to them, the Parliament of Canada and the Government should adopt, in my opinion, such a policy as will enable them to export their goods and compete in that foreign market with the manufacturers of other nations. I am glad to know that at present our manufacturers are exporting organs, sewing machines, threshing machines, nails and horse shoes, and almost every article which is manufactured in the country. Out of $1,250,000 output of one industry in Toronto during the past year, about $250,000 worth has been exported; and I have no doubt, if we extended the principle of drawbacks to that industry, the manufacturer will be enabled to double and perhaps quadruple his export trade. It has been advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite, who profess free trade principles, that we should not only grant drawbacks on articles imported of the rate of duty paid, but that we should give them a drawback equal to the duty on the articles manufactured in Canada. That would be adopting the American system of bonuses, and it is a great question whether in our country we would be justified in extending the principle to that extent, but I am not sure if in the interest of manufacturing industries and of those employed by the manufacturers, that step would not be advisable if Parliament desired or thought proper to adopt the system. There is much more I would like to say on this question, but I think the debate has been well sustained. I am not sorry that the whole principle of the National Policy has been attacked, because the country will learn that the principle which was enunciated by the ex-leader of the Government in his speech at Malvern is being adopted at present. In that speech he said the people could not, under the circumstances and under the requirements of the country repeal the National Policy, as it then existed, but that there should be a certain readjustment, and in view of that readjustment the Opposition were to attack the duty on wheat, corn, and one or two other articles by which they hoped to catch a few stray votes in the Maritime Provinces. Beyond that their great intellects never thought of going, and the country by this time will have learned what the true policy of the Opposition is.

Mr. SCRIVER. With regard to what my hon. friend the Minister of Customs has said in reference to the position taken by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher), accusing him of inconsistency in the motion which he made because, forsooth, if corn were introduced into the Dominion free of duty, the distillers would be able to make whiskey cheaper, I desire to say this: My hon. friend the Minister of Customs is, I think, a good temperance man. I believe he has been so for a long time, and I think he is a consistent one, but he forgets that he belongs to a Ministry that has favored distillers at the expense—I will not say at the expense, but as a class—in preference to other classes of the community, and I do not think that, under those circumstances, he can accuse my hon. friend from Brome of inconsistency. In fact, my hon. friend from Brome could hardly be consistent with his political views in regard to protection if he placed his motion in any other way than he did. It would not be consistent for him to discriminate against any class. He moves that corn shall be admitted into the country free of duty, and it would not be proper for him or for the party to which he belongs to say that any class of persons using that article should be discriminated against. I think, therefore, that the Minister of Customs has failed to make his point against the member for Brome or to show that he has been, in his motion, or in any of the remarks he made, anything but strictly consistent. I desire to say just a word in reference to the broader motion made by the hon. member for Brome. It occurred to me, when the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) made his motion that, if it were possible that such a motion could pass, there would be a great practical difficulty in carrying it out, and I was glad, because of the principle involved, that the member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) enlarged the motion by his amendment. I was glad, because I think it would be greatly for the interest of the greater part of the Dominion, and especially for the Province from which I come, if the farmers were permitted to bring in corn free of duty. I am satisfied from my own observation, and from what I have learned from other representatives of different parts of the Province from which I come, that the agricultural interest is not nearly so prosperous as it has been for some years past, particularly in the valley of the St. Lawrence, where the people depend almost altogether for their gains or profits on the raising and the sale of coarse grains. I was surprised to hear the remarks of my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) on this question. My hon. friend represents a county which, like most of the counties in the valleys of the St. Lawrence and the Richelieu, depends largely on raising and selling coarse grains, and the people have, by the processes they have pursued, greatly exhausted their farms. They not only raise and sell these coarse grains, but they also sell large quantities of their hay. If I am not mistaken, the county which my hon. friend represents is a very large exporter of hay, and has been for many years past, and I was surprised two or three years ago to hear him speak approvingly of the condition of things which existed in his county, of the prosperity which existed in his county, and the great sums of money which were realised from these products. My hon. friend is an able man and a shrewd man, and, although he is not a farmer, I have no doubt his observation has been sufficiently attracted to those practices to enable him to see the injury which they inflict, not only on his own county, but upon all the counties situated as his county is. I believe that the only possible salvation for these counties is a change in the system of agriculture. Their only salvation will be in following the example set by the county I represent, and by the people of the Eastern Townships counties generally, and that is, a system of mixed farming, and especially a system of dairy farming. I am sorry to say my neighbors to the north of me in the valley of the St. Lawrence and in the valley of the Richelieu pursue this system of farming to a very limited extent, and this process of exhaustion is going on, and its evils are becoming more and more marked; whereas in the Eastern Townships counties, and particularly in the County of Huntington which I represent, the dairy system which was very small a few years ago has assumed large proportions and has caused a great improvement in the condition of those counties. In the county which I represent there are some fifty cheese factories, and some $300,000 were paid to the farmers last year for that product. The farmers are not only feeding the coarse grain which they raise themselves, but that which they import from other parts of the country; and, but for this duty on corn, they would import it from the United States, and have it ground with their own coarse grains and use it very largely. For that reason, the people generally of that district in the Province of Quebec, and, in fact, of all parts of that Province, are very largely interested in being allowed to import corn free of duty.

Mr. KIRK. Were it not for a remark which fell from the member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) in the course of the speech he made, I would not ask the indulgence of the House at this late hour. That hon. gentleman stated that the people of the Maritime Provinces were compensated by duties placed upon industries belonging to those Provinces for the high duties they had to pay on articles belonging to other Provinces, and he instanced the article of iron, the article of coal, and the fishing industry. As to the first two, I shall have nothing to say, because they were well answered by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). The hon. gentleman, however, thought proper to say that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces had their bread buttered on both sides and wanted some jam thrown in. How did he attempt to prove that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces had their bread buttered on both sides and wanted some jam thrown in? He said that this Parliament paid bounties to fishermen. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has already shown that the moneys paid to fishermen in the way of bounties did not belong to anyone but the fishermen themselves, and therefore, when Parliament voted the $150,000 per annum to be paid to the fishermen, it voted only the money to which they were entitled, irrespective altogether of the National Policy, and not as a compensation for the moneys taken away from them for duties on other articles. They have had their bread buttered on both sides, it is true, and how buttered? The irritating policy of the Government towards the United States, the severe Customs regulations enforced against the fishermen of that country, have had the effect of preventing the United States Government from taking the duties off fish. When the fishermen of this Dominion send their fish there, they find that they must pay a high duty before they can offer them for sale. Their bread on one side is buttered there by the high duties they have to pay in the United States. Then, again, when duties were placed upon fish coming from the United States, this Government also placed duties upon fish coming from Newfoundland. The fishermen of this Dominion were to be protected from all quarters, and what was the result? They had their bread buttered on the other side in the interests of the Ontario millers and Montreal flour dealers; they have had their bread buttered on the other side by this Government throwing the market open to Newfoundland fish in order that they might obtain a free market in Newfoundland for flour. In that way the interests of the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces were sacrificed to the interest of an Ontario industry; therefore it did not lie in the mouth of an Ontario representative to say that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces had their bread buttered on both sides in order to compensate them for duties they had to pay in the interests of Ontario. And then where does the jam come in? The jam comes in by the duties placed upon flour and meal. My hon. friend from Cape Breton is prepared to raise the duty to a dollar a barrel on cornmeal, providing the Government will only be good enough to leave the duty of 60 cents a ton upon bituminous coal. Well, I have heard of people willing to sacrifice all their wife's relations in order that they might save themselves. That is just the way with the hon. member for Cape Breton; he is willing to sacrifice every other interest if only his darling pet is well fed. Now this is all that I intended to say when I arose, although some time ago, at an earlier hour in the evening, if I had had an opportunity, I would have said something upon the other two industries mentioned by the hon. member for North Grey, but as it is so late I shall defer the remarks that I have to make until some other time.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not at all intend to enter into this discussion, but there is one remark that I wish to make before it is closed. I have listened to the speech just delivered by the Minister of Customs, and though he has introduced my name in it, I fail to see in what connection he could do so, or what argument he could make out of it. The only point made by the Hon. Minister of Customs was as to the rebate paid by the distillers. The hon. gentleman stated that it was not worth while for my hon. friend who moved this motion, to make it, because, he said, if he had taken the trouble to go into the department he would have found that the rebate made by the distillers during the last year was something like $400. He said: "Surely for the paltry sum of $400 it was useless to make all the fuss that has been made on that side of the House"—speaking of this side. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not simply a question of fact introduced by my hon. friend, it is a question of principle. If the distiller makes profits on the rebate only to the extent of $400, he can profit to the extent of $400,000, and if the principle is there that rebate is given to the distillers who exports whiskey, why in the name of creation should not the same privilege be allowed to the farmer who exports cattle? The tariff is framed in such a manner as to encourage the distiller to manufacture and export whiskey; why not also frame it so as to encourage the farmer to import corn and to convert it into beef and export it? This is what is claimed by my hon. friend from Grey. It is a question of principle, and if the principle is allowed in one industry, why should it not be allowed in another industry? If the principle is allowed in a very small industry like the distilling of whiskey, why should it not be allowed in the largest industry of all and the most meritorious? It is the old question at issue between the Government and ourselves. I will not at this hour of the evening say more; we may come back to this question some other time, but I will just say this, that in these few words of the Minister of Customs lies the whole difference between the Government and the Opposition. The Government are favoring the mighty few, and we are working for the struggling masses.

Motion negatived.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.35 a. m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 15th February, 1869.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of Agriculture for the year ending 30th June, 1868.—(Mr. Carling.)

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 30) respecting the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec.—(Mr. Denison.)

Bill (No. 31) to incorporate the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 32) to incorporate the Victoria, Saanich and New Westminster Railway Company.—(Mr. Prior.)

Bill (No. 33) to amend the Act to incorporate the Prescott County Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to "The Central Counties Railway Company."—(Mr. Edwards.)

Bill (No. 34) to incorporate the Canadian General Trusts Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 35) respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland.)

Bill (No. 36) to incorporate the St. Helen's Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Curran.)

Bill (No. 37) to amend the Act incorporating the Massawippi Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Colby.)

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Department of Marine..... $27,887

Mr. FOSTER. The total increase in this department is $2,825. There are nine statutory increases of $50 each, one increase of $25, and one chief clerk, a transference from the High Commissioner's office in London, $2,350.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What were the circumstances that led to the transfer?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chipman, who was the clerk transferred, had been in the High Commissioner's office in London, and had acted while Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Finance during last year as his private secretary here? In the re-organisation of the office in London Mr. Chipman was transferred to the Department of Marine, and he became private secretary to the Minister of Marine. Another transference of a clerk, at a less salary, has been made to the London office.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So, as a mere matter of convenience apparently to a gentleman who has served in the London office, the expenses of this department are to be increased by about $2,000. I must say that appears to be about as unsatisfactory an explanation as I have ever listened to or heard offered in this House. Year after year these charges for civil government are swelling to an enormous extent, monstrosly out of proportion to the total amount of money expended, and now, apparently without rhyme or reason, we find at one bound the Department of Marine increased by over 10 per cent., from $25,000 to $27,885. It appears to me that this is a perfectly uncalled-for and perfectly unreasonable expenditure with which to saddle that department.

Mr. FOSTER. It is quite true that this increase of $2,350 appears here, but, if it appears here, it was taken from a place where it appeared last year and where the whole amount was paid last year, with the exception of the $50 increases. It is simply a transfer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is no excuse for adding to the expense of the Marine Department. If an inferior officer at less salary can do the work in London, by all means let him do it, but that is no sort of excuse for adding $2,350 to a department that is already costing quite as much as it is worth.

Mr. TUPPER. I would say in regard to this matter, and as offering some explanation to the hon. gentleman, that it would not be possible, or, at all events, I do not suppose the hon. gentleman would propose that if an officer with a less salary could do the work in London, this officer should lose his salary altogether. This officer receives simply the same salary this year as he received last year. There is not one farthing increase to the public. The question of the transference is an entirely different matter. If the hon. gentleman proposes to take issue with myself or with the Government, in regard to the necessity of putting an additional officer into the Marine Department, that is an entirely different question; but the public pays no more in connection with this transference than it did last year, as was apparent from the explanation of the Minister of Finance. I may say to the hon. gentleman, whether he will accept the statement from me or not, that we have by no means too many officers in the Department of Marine to-day. It is a department controlling an enormous expenditure, made up of almost thousands of petty accounts, as the hon. gentleman will recollect was the case in his time. The accounts are increasing every year of necessity, as new lights and new causes of expenditure occur, and I may tell him—perhaps he is not aware of it—that the work of the department has largely increased of late, because we have adopted a system of more direct supervision over the expenditure at the different agencies; and I am happy to be able to say that since we inaugurated that system, while additional work has been thrown on the head office, I am prepared to show a saving of $50,000 a year. I think that would be an explanation to a large extent satisfactory, even to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not hear the Finance Minister's explanation of this transfer. Do I understand that the gentleman transferred now to the Marine Department was engaged in business connected with the department before?

Mr. TUPPER. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then, there is a distinct increase in the staff of the department.

Mr. TUPPER. Certainly, as I say, but not to the service generally.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not an answer.

Mr. TUPPER. The transfer imposed no additional tax on the people of this country. It was a transfer from one office to another, and the officer who took the place of this officer in the High Commissioner's office, was already in the service.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The answer to that may reasonably be given, that this officer was employed before the transfer, in work that was not required to be done, and he is transferred now to another department. Under these circumstances I must join in the language used by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and say that there has been no good reason shown for this change. A year or two ago I rose in my place in this House and protested as vigorously as I could against the division of the Marine and Fisheries Department, because I believed it was done for the purpose of perpetrating a job upon this country. That department was divided into two branches, with a deputy head for each, and I predicted then, what all previous experience had shown would be the result, that as soon as those deputy heads were appointed they would not be satisfied until they increased the expenses in each of their departments. No deputy head in Ottawa would be satisfied with having a less staff under him than the other deputy heads. I predicted then that in a few years we would have as large a staff in the Fishery Department as in any other branch of the service. The then Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. McLelan) contradicted that, but what has been the result? Year after year the expenses of that department, which ought to be diminishing, are increasing rapidly. I hold that our predictions have been fully justified by the results since, and I must say that in the absence of further explanation there is nothing to justify the transfer of another official to the Marine Department, unless you can show that there was some extra work requiring his services. Is it to be contended that because so many men are in the public service that they are to be retained there for ever, and that the people are to be congratulated when officials are transferred from one department to another on the Minister stating that the general expenses have not been increased. That is no answer, and unless the work of the department required his services his transfer cannot be justified. We have yet to hear a satisfactory explanation from the hon. Minister. I should like to have his opinion—but if he has not studied the question I do not ask for his opinion—as to whether he thinks it is necessary to have that department divided into two and to have a deputy head presiding over the Fishery branch and another over the Marine branch. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) shakes his head as if he wishes to indicate that the division was necessary. I differ with him on that point. I may not have as good an opportunity of judging as he has, but, from all the information I can gather, I have come to the conclusion that the division was made for the purpose of perpetrating a job on this country and of appointing a man to the position of deputy head who was not entitled to it. I would like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether he has given his attention to that question and whether he is prepared to justify that division of the department before this House. I know that there is a large amount of work in the Fisheries Department, but it is work created to a great extent by themselves. A very large amount of the work consists in paying the bounties which they give to fishermen, and I have no hesitation in saying here that if the members of this House think that the distribution of those bounties is a great boon to the fishermen they are very much mistaken. I make the statement deliberately that not 50 per cent. of the bounties ever find its way into the pockets of the fishermen. It is anticipated by middlemen here and there and the amount is very small when the fisherman gets it. My colleague from King's County, who comes from the very centre of the fishery district, told me, the other day, that in many cases a man gets only two, three or four dollars. The fisherman has to go to the customs officer, some five or six miles away, to get it; some hitch occurs, and he has to walk back to make an affidavit before a justice of the peace. He tramps around for three or four days, and after an amount of redtapeism, having lost his time, he obtains a couple of dollars. I do not say that this is unnecessary, for it may be necessary to prevent frauds, which I know have occurred, but large numbers of them frankly admit that the system of paying those bounties is a false one, and that the fishermen do not get the benefit which the Minister and others who devised the system think they do get. Apart from the work entailed by this bounty system there is no other work requiring a division of that department, in my opinion. I protest against the yearly increase that is going on in the different departments of the Government, and especially in the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MITCHELL I am sorry I have got to differ with a gentleman with whom I am so much in accord on so many points. I do differ with the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), in relation to the necessity for the division of the Departments of Marine and Fisheries. In 1867, when I had the honor of organising that department, I recommended that there should be two deputy heads, but the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government then, and at the head of the Government of to-day, in his wisdom on that occasion thought, as there was no precedent for having two deputy heads, that he could not afford to let the Fishery Department have a second deputy. I must say that having the two branches under the one deputy did not work well. The deputy head of Marine did not understand the question of Fisheries, and the duties of the two branches are quite distinct, and have nothing whatever in common with one another. I feel that I should say, in justice to the Minister, that the division is one in which I entirely approve, and I do not think there was any job perpetrated when that department was divided. But, Sir, in relation to Mr. Chipman, I do not know the reasons which necessitated his transfer from the office at London to the Marine and Fisheries Department here. It may have suited his convenience to be so transferred. Mr. Chipman occupied a confidential position with the High Commissioner in London, and he is one of that hon. gentleman's constituents in Nova Scotia. He may have desired the change, and it is always very desirable to meet the wishes of the employees of the Government, and to place them where they can be more conveniently situated in connection with their relation to their families, than perhaps they would be if they had the Atlantic rolling between them. But a transaction of that kind should be made without any sacrifice to the public interest. I do not think that any additional help was needed in the Marine and Fisheries Department, and if it were, we ought to have some fuller explanation about it. While I am on my feet, I may as well ask the Minister two or three questions, and I trust he will give the information which I desire, in relation to matters connected with the fisheries of my county. For years, Sir,—

Mr. TUPPER. That will come under the next item. The Fisheries is a separate book, and this is for the Marine Department.

Mr. MITCHELL. All right; I will reserve it.

Mr. TUPPER. I have just a word to say on this matter. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has given a far better and more valuable opinion to this House in connection with the necessity of dividing this department than I can possibly give, my experience being limited. The hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies) has no experience in the matter, and what he has said in this case is his hard-and-fast opinion on the subject. Nothing but a little experience, which he may possibly have some day, will, I think, alter that opinion. For the present I will leave the defence of this matter in the hands of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). Next Session, or the Session after, I will be able to speak with more weight and authority from the result of experience as to what the interests of the service are with reference to that division. At present I can only say that the officers of both those departments are worked as hard as any officers in the service of the Government can possibly be worked. They have as much as they can do. I may say further to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies), that I think he is not in touch with the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces in his criticism of the bounty system. I can tell him in reference to the remarks he has made regarding the distribution of the bounty money to the fishermen, that so popular and so valuable to the fishermen is that bounty system that only this last season, when on many parts of the coast the shore fisheries were not as good as in ordinary years, we received letter after letter from the representatives of the district and from the fishermen themselves, praying that we would make extra speed in the distribution of that bounty; and although my experience in the department is limited, I can assure the hon. gentleman of this fact, that I have not yet received any charges of unfairness in the distribution of that money by the different officers. Of course, the hon. gentleman knows that the department is bound to exercise the closest scrutiny, which involves some delay in connection with the different claims sent in, and he knows that of necessity some of these claims must be rejected; but there have been no serious complaints to the department before this season, when one of the Cape Breton members, the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) called on me and informed me that there was some dissatisfaction in his district; and that hon. gentleman will bear me out that I at once told him that I would make the closest examination into the matter, as I will do. But that is the only complaint which has been made as to the distribution of these bounties since I have been in office. So that I think the hon. gentleman will not make much of that point. Now, I am not going to repeat what I said about the services of Mr. Chipman. The hon. gentleman says that I have not shown that his services were necessary. Well, if the hon. gentleman will come and spend a day with me in the department, that will be the best way to satisfy him; he will not take my statement, and I can give him no better proof that we did need the services of this officer. I gave him what I thought was an intelligent reason, that the work in the department had increased largely in consequence of centralising to a great extent the supervision of the spending power, and the fact that we exercise a greater control over the different agencies and the construction of lighthouses throughout the different Provinces than existed before, and with good effect. I think I shall be able to show to the House that we have saved some $50,000 a year by that system. I thought, and I think now, that that is some explanation. A considerable portion, I readily admit, depends on my experience, and it is difficult to lay that all before the House in this way.

Mr. MITCHELL. As I was interrupted a little while ago, and as the hon. gentleman has dealt with the fishery question, I wish to take exception to two or three things he has stated. The hon. gentleman has passed the most severe censure upon his predecessors in that department that any public man can do. In a department that is not the first department of the Government, although it is an important one, he says he has saved $50,000 and ascribes that to a better supervision over the different branches and over the construction of lights. I would like him to show where he has performed so much extra services in the construction of lights. I cannot find it in the blue-books, and I do not think any system he has adopted for the supervision of the branches of the department is very much improvement. I recollect when that department built thirty lighthouses year after year with a much less staff than it has to-day, and with much less cost to the country; and I do not think the hon. gentleman pays much of a compliment to the gentlemen who immediately preceded him, the present Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia, the present Minister of Finance, the late Hon. Mr. Pope, or the late Sir Albert Smith; and, for myself, I can only say that I would like my hon. friend to institute a comparison and bring down a statement of the expenditure of the department to-day compared with the expenditure during the years when we did three times the amount of work in connection with lighthouses, while our expenditure was considerably less. I do not say this by way of attacking the expenditures of the department, but I merely wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention as a young Minister to the reflection which he has cast upon his predecessors as well as upon myself, and I do not intend to lie under any imputation that is not true; it is not my practice to do so. I think it would simplify matters if, while on my feet, I dealt with both the marine and fishery matters together, and with the permission of the Chair, I will do so, as it will save the necessity of my speaking again. What I wanted to find out from my hon. friend was, first, something in connection with local matters in my own county, and then, something on a great public question. Last night it was said that I am a local man. I am a local man, and I am proud to be so; but I think I am broad and expansive enough to deal with the interests of this whole Dominion, which I am helping to govern, for, although I am not on the inside, I govern it a good deal from without, and I intend to continue trying to do so in future. There has been a great deal of dissatisfaction in my county in relation to the restrictions put upon the fishing of smelts in the Miramichi River. If my hon. friend chooses to obtain the statistics of the quantity of smelts shipped from that river, he will see that it is one of the most valuable rivers for winter fishing in this Dominion, perhaps none more so. The complaints which have come from the fishermen have been very loud and very often repeated. I say this, not to reflect upon the management of the department by my hon. friend, but in order to get information. I would like my hon. friend at some future day to bring down copies of the Orders in Council relating to the charges in connection with the smelt fishing during the last ten years; it will enable me to judge whether or not my constituents who follow that pursuit have been unfairly dealt with or not. If the hon. gentleman will bring me down that information, he will save me the trouble of making a motion for it in the House.

Mr. TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. The next point I want to understand is the position we stand in towards the American fishermen, and assuming the modus vivendi, the benefits of which we heard so much about two years ago, is to be put in operation or suspended? I would like to know in what position our fishermen are going to be with regard to American competition in our fishing waters when the next season opens, and whether any negotiations or steps have taken place recently with the American Government for the purpose of bringing about an entente cordiale in relation to matters concerning which great difficulties have arisen and retaliation is threatened? I would like to ask another question, whether the policy of the Government is to enforce that absurd restriction of preventing the transport of fish over the railways of Canada to the United States? That is a question upon which I never agreed with the Government. When the fisheries difficulty arose some two years ago, when the first recent seizures were made, I felt that the Administration of the day were making a great mistake in pursuing a course which was going to give great offence to the people of the United States without at all benefitting the people of Canada. What possible harm could it do to us to have our railways employed in the transport of American fish? When the Treaty of 1818, under which we have been claiming those exclusive privileges, was made, there were no railways in existence in the country, there were no lines of transport, and no mutual arrangement for a bonding system and a transport system between the United States and Canada. All that has sprung up since then, and I blame the right hon. the leader of the Government for having ever made that extraordinary attempt to have a one-sided arrangement by refusing the Americans the right to transport their fish over our railways while we asked them to allow us the right of transportation and a bonding system through their country into Canada. A large part of our imports come over American railways. They come from Portland by the Grand Trunk, from Boston by the South Eastern, from New York by the Delaware and Hudson, the New York Central and other lines, and we should have been in a very awkward position in former years, if that bonding system had not been in existence; and when the American Government very fairly granted us the right of bonding goods through their country, they pursued a course in the interest of the railways of the United States and at the same time in the interest of the people of Canada. Yet, on the first opportunity that we have had of making a claim to check and interrupt that friendly arrangement, that opportunity was taken advantage of by this Government over which the right hon. the Premier presides. He at once stopped the transport of fish on the plea that the stoppage would embarrass American fishermen. Sir, when that agreement of 1818 was made there were no railways, and vessels did not require to come into our ports to transport their fish, because there were no means of transporting them. Hon. gentlemen opposite ignored the progress of civilisation and commerce in dealing with that question. I hold that they made a serious mistake, and I think that my right hon. friend will recollect that two years ago, in the lobby, I told him so, but he did not agree with me, and as I am not one of his responsible advisers, he paid very little attention to what I said. We now see the effect of his course. It has created great animosity in the United States, and it is very hard to tell what the result will be. I saw a few days ago the important announcement that a Bill had been introduced in the Congress of the United States, according to which the fishermen of Canada are likely to be called on to pay one cent a pound on the fresh fish that now goes free into the United States. I would like to ask if this is a fair protection to our fishermen, and a fair consideration for that large and extensive interest, a good proportion of which I have the honor to represent. The Government made a fatal mistake when they raised that point of refusing to allow our railways to be used for the transport of American fish. There can be but one outcome of that. The Americans will, if it is persisted in, inaugurate a policy of retaliation. They will say to us: If you refuse to transport our fish or other goods—no matter whether fish or merchandise—from your ports to our country, we will refuse to transport your goods from our ports into Canada; and this will greatly embarrass and interfere with the successful prosecution of trade and business in this country, and cannot fail to result in calamity to the Government. Probably the Government will not pursue that course. I warn them that if they should, it will be detrimental to the interests of the people I have the honor to represent, and also to the true interests of the country. So much for the bonding system. As to the modus vivendi, I think we have a right to know what course the hon. gentlemen opposite intend to pursue in that regard. The High Commissioner, when he had a seat in this House, dilated, after what he believed was a successful arrangement in Washington, but which I always condemned, on the great advantage that would come from allowing this modus vivendi to go into operation. It is due to Parliament that the Government should state now what course they intend to pursue, whether they intend to enforce that bonding system they have commenced to enforce—and, I believe, they discharged a custom house officer in Halifax because he had allowed the transport of goods.

Mr. TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman has taken rather a wide range in the discussion of this vote. It is not, of course, my intention to follow him on the very important questions he has raised, and which the House will understand would require the opinion not of myself, but of the leader of the Government were the time opportune to discuss them. The hon. gentleman will understand it is from no lack of courtesy that I shall refrain attempting to speak for the Government as to its policy in reference to the modus vivendi or the question of transport, or any of those important and general questions which he has raised.

Mr. MITCHELL. Your chief is there and can do it.

Mr. TUPPER. Exactly. I have no doubt if this were the proper time, he would be quite ready to give the hon. gentleman all the information proper to the subject. I may say also to my hon. friend that he must not conclude that, in giving the reasons to the committee which I gave in connection with the appointments under discussion, I wished to convey the idea that I was improving upon my predecessors. The system I allude to I do not say was a system inaugurated by me. It was the system inaugurated of late, and it was necessary in consequence of the growing expenditure—and the necessary growing expenditure—in that department. The decrease proportionately of expenditure was what I wished to allude to, and as the hon. gentleman thinks the duties have not increased since he had control of the department, let me call his attention to the fact that in 1874, when he went out of office, the number of life stations was 342, while to-day it is no less than 569. In 1874, there were 380 lighthouses under his charge; whereas to-day there are no less than 664. In 1874, there were 18 fog-whistles, and there are 23 to-day, and the hon. gentleman will well understand that even if there was not a change in the system of management, the duties have been largely increased, because, as he well knows, the duties of the department are not merely confined to the lighthouses, lightstations, &c. Now, in connection with the matter the hon. gentleman insists on bringing up, and to which I have no particular objection, only I thought the House would prefer it came up on the next vote, my hon. friend mentioned he intended to allude to this important question as well as the fisheries in the Miramichi district of New Brunswick. It is a most important matter, regarded as such by every Government of the day. And the regulations that have been in force have been adopted with the view of preserving that most valuable fishery, not for our own generation alone, but, if possible, for all time to come. He well knows the trouble and difficulty which have occurred in the endeavor, on the part of the Department of Fisheries from its first organisation, to preserve the other branches of the fisheries for all time to come, and in some cases, as he knows, our best efforts have not been crowned with very great success, especially in connection with the lobsters fishery, but those efforts have been very successful in regard to the smelt fishery. The hon. gentleman asks me to give him some information on that subject, and I have very much pleasure in doing so. In March, 1875, the Government of the day, with the object of preserving those fisheries, passed a regulation which prohibited the catching, killing, buying, selling or having in possession any smelts between the 15th April and the 15th May in each year, only then going so far as to adopt a close season. The fishermen, anxious, of course, at all times to catch as many fish as possible, without giving much attention to the effect of their action on the succeeding season, began to use certain contrivances which made a wholesale slaughter of the fish. So, in July, 1877, the Government of the day adopted regulations prohibiting the use of bag nets having meshes of a less size than 1½ inch extension measure. After that regulation was passed, seines were used, and an immense number of these fish were caught in a hurry, which never found a market, which were caught in a bad season, at a time when the weather was changing and a thaw occurring, and a large, unnecessary slaughter of these fish took place. On the 26th July, 1877, the Government adopted a regulation absolutely prohibiting the use of seines for the purpose of catching smelts.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand my hon. friend to speak of seines being used in the winter?

Mr. TUPPER. No; I presume it refers to bag nets in winter and seines after that. But the fish were caught with the seines in such quantities that they really became a drug in the market.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am afraid my hon. friend is not very well posted in regard to smelt fishing. I never knew a seine to be used in the smelt fishery in the river Miramichi, which is the largest smelt fishery in the country.

Mr. TUPPER. That is a very serious reflection on the previous Government, who adopted this regulation prohibiting the use of seines for the purpose of catching smelts.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think my hon. friend will find that the regulation about seines applies to smelts.

Mr. TUPPER. I am simply quoting the Order in Council, which was based on a different idea from that of the hon. gentleman, namely, that seines were used, and that it was necessary to prohibit them. I think he must have got his view from the course pursued since that regulation was adopted, and he is quite right in saying that seines are not now used in the smelt fishery.

Mr. MITCHELL. And they never were used in the smelt fishery.

Mr. TUPPER. It is evident that the report to the Government was of a different character, and that it led to that action being taken. Later on in 1877, it being found that the smelts were caught in such large quantities as not to be marketable, and were consequently used for manure, the Government passed a regulation prohibiting the use of smelts for manure. No other regulations were passed until 1886, when, after attention had been drawn by the Inspector of Fisheries in New Brunswick to the fact that this valuable fishery—valuable both in itself and as attracting other and even more valuable fish to our coasts and rivers—was being depleted, the Government, on the 17th February, passed the following regulations:—

"No person shall fish for, catch, kill, buy, sell, or have in possession any smelts between the 15th day of April and the 15th day of May (both days inclusive) in each year.

"Smelts shall not be fished for, caught, or killed by means of any kind of bag nets having meshes of a less size than one inch and a quarter extension measure.

"The use of bag nets for the purpose of catching smelts is prohibited except under special license from the Minister of Fisheries."

That was considered necessary, in order to restrict the use of that very formidable engine in connection with the catch of this fish. My hon. friend may not recollect that, in some of the States of the Union, the use of these bag nets is totally prohibited for catching smelts. I have a statute to that effect before me now, and in Scotland the regulations prohibit the use of these fishing engines altogether.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will my hon. friend suggest any means of catching these fish without using bag nets?

Mr. TUPPER. A great many are caught by hook and line.

Mr. MITCHELL. A few are caught by hook and line, but not as a matter of commerce.

Mr. TUPPER. I am simply giving the regulations which were passed under the last Government, and under this, for the information of the hon. gentleman, and did not expect to enter into a discussion on the subject.

Mr. MITCHELL. If my hon. friend will permit me, I would say that as to catching smelts by hook and line, I am informed that they have shipped on some days, by the Northern and Western line—Mr. Snowball's line—over 100 tons of smelts in a day. It would take a long time to catch that quantity by hook and line.

Mr. TUPPER. And that is the reason why bag nets have been prohibited in some places, because they lead to such wholesale destruction of fish. On the 27th October, 1887, the regulations now in force were passed. They are virtually a consolidation of the previous regulations, with one principal addition:

"No one shall fish for, catch, kill, buy, sell, or have in possession any smelts between the 1st day of April and the 1st day of July (both days inclusive) in each year.

"The use of seines for manure is prohibited.

"The use of seines for the purpose of catching smelts is prohibited.

"Smelts shall not be fished for, caught, or killed by means of any kind of bag nets having meshes of a less size than one inch and a quarter extension measure.

"The use of bag nets for the purpose of catching smelts is prohibited except under special license from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and then only between the 1st December and the 15th February in each year.

These are the regulations which are now in force.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am much obliged to the hon. gentlemen for the concession which he made and the information he has given. I was anxious to know what change had been made in the regulations, but the licensing of nets for smelt fishing has been in force for many years, and I have heard a great many complaints as to the manner in which these licenses are given out and the restrictions which are placed upon them. The information which I have from the most experienced persons in smelt fishing, and the result of fifty years of my own experience, are that the smelt fisheries of this country are more plentiful to-day than they were fifty years ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the Minister of Marine is able to effect a saving of $50,000 in his department, we will be delighted, I am sure, and so will the country; but I may observe that whenever increases are asked for by any Minister we are always regaled by the same story, that there has been either an enormous increase in the work of the department, or that an immense saving is going to be made. Now we have grown somewhat sceptical as to the saving; we find that the increase in the department always remains; once that occurs, it not only never is diminished, but it goes on increasing, and apparently will go on increasing, I may say, to the end of the chapter. But as for the mythical savings that are going to be made, why, Sir, we are obliged from experience to place them on the same footing with the promise of the 53 millions which the First Minister used to allege was inevitably to come from the sale of land in the North-West, or the 640 millions of bushels of wheat which long since the hon. gentleman's progenitor was in the habit of holding up for the delectation of gentlemen on the other side of the House as soon as their policy in Manitoba had reached a successful conclusion. Now, there is one question which was put by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) which I can answer, that was as to the relative cost of these departments in the past. I find that in 1878, the last year of the Administration of my friend, Sir Albert Smith, the whole cost of administering that department, less the Minister's salary, amounted to $25,301, for the Department of Marine, plus the Department of Fisheries. I find to-day that these two departments cost about $44,000 a year, that is to say, not very far from double the expenditure that they involved some years ago. Now, I do not myself believe that there has been any sort of increase in the work of the department to warrant that increase in the expenditure of nearly 100 per cent., nor can I admit that it ought to follow as a necessary consequence, admitting a considerable increase in the outdoor work, that there should be a proportional increase at headquarters here. It may be that it does cost more to supervise 500 lighthouses than 400, but the increase should not be in proportion; it ought not to require 25 per cent. more to inspect the other 100. Once you have obtained the staff you require a very small additional clerical assistance to enable you to work 500 with very little more practical expense than 400; and so on in other ways. Surely it appears to me that we are allowing the expenses of the civil government to increase at a very reckless rate, and in no department is that more visible than the department which the hon. gentleman presides over. He is not responsible, of course, for the increases which have occurred up to this time, but he is most undoubtedly responsible for the increase, amounting, I see, to about $4,000 in the two departments, which he now proposes to inflict upon the country. I beg to tell him that up to the present time, barring this hypothetical saving of $50,000, which we have not yet realised—and which, in my experience, it is very doubtful if we ever will realise—he has not given a satisfactory explanation for making this large addition. I do not think that there is any such addition, within the last year or so, to the work of the department to cause him to require 10 per cent. more than the Minister of Finance required. Nor do I think that it is at all likely that he will gain any corresponding benefit from bringing over this gentleman, who had no special experience, as I understand, in connection with the fisheries, who is just put in there, apparently, for convenience, or, apparently, because he has been, I daresay, a useful public servant somewhere else. I submit, Sir, that this is not a sufficient reason for adding $2,800 to the expenses of this department. I say the fact that I have just mentioned, that we have now verily increased the expenditure in these two Departments of Marine and Fisheries to something very nearly double what they were under the administration of my friend, Sir Albert Smith, is a sufficient justification of the line taken by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, that it is a mistake to have any division in these departments that can be avoided. The moment that you create a deputy head, that gentleman, almost of necessity, desires to magnify the importance of his office, he is sure to add to the expenditure of it, and so we get the result that within a few years, practically, the working expenses at headquarters have nearly doubled.

Mr. TUPPER. I do not want to prolong the discussion needlessly, nor to contradict those hon. gentlemen, or to take issue with them needlessly, but I think my hon. friend who has just taken his seat is hasty in his conclusion. It may be a fair matter of argument as to whether the action taken by Parliament some years ago in the division of the department, was wise or not; but I think the hon. gentleman, in his comparison of the work, taking the year of 1878 with the present year, in other departments, has forgotten to consider several important matters. In the first place, there has been an increase in the number of lighthouses, stations, and so on, under the charge of the Marine Department; while in the Fisheries Department the work is to a large extent different from that of a previous time. For instance, I may mention that there is entirely new work in connection with this subject that was discussed to-day, the distribution of the bounties under license; and there is, moreover, a very important addition to the work, that is, the protective service and its supervision, which is no light matter. A large addition to the fleet in charge of the Government was made in the year to which he alluded, and that has entailed a considerable amount of additional work, and work of a very important character. The hon. gentleman will find another feature in the Fisheries Department which has added tremendously to the work, as compared with that time—I refer to the great addition to the staff of fishery guardians, overseers and officers in every Province. The increase, too, was made necessary in consequence of additions to the close seasons for various kinds of fish; and my hon. friend will recollect perfectly well, in his experience as Finance Minister, that where you attempt to enforce a longer close season, or apply it to different kinds of fish, you have of necessity to increase your staff. More than that, the old staff obtains, in proportion, a greater amount of money in the shape of disbursements. Your officers have to line the rivers and lakes as well as they can, they have to travel, and for all that extra supervision an additional amount of money is charged, and those additional amounts have to be investigated in that department. So, I think it was rather unfair to make so sweeping a charge in connection with the work of the department. The hon. gentleman also states that I am responsible for some $4,000 of increase in both the Fisheries and the Marine Departments. On second thought, I am sure he will not say that; I am sure he will say that the only item for which I am to any extent responsible is the item now under discussion, because, as the Finance Minister explained, the other increases are all statutory, and in the sense in which he was arguing, I am sure he does not mean to make me responsible for that, beyond coming to Parliament and taking charge of these estimates. But this increase has nothing to do with that. For the present increase I do take the responsibility, and I have put, as well as I could, the reasons for that before the House. I am glad to be able to say that, while that officer is an additional officer in that department, we paid him before just the same amount of money that I am asking for now; we would have paid him the same amount of money had we left him in his former position, instead of bringing him into the department, I may again recall the hon. gentleman's attention to a system which I think has pretty generally prevailed, that when a member takes office as the head of a department, he, as a rule, does not take his private secretary from the officers of that department, and I could show several instances of this practice; at all events, I have one in my mind in which the secretary under the hon. gentleman's own administration was made an additional officer in the department, and, so far as I recollect, that was the usual course. The Minister chooses as his secretary very frequently one who is not in the department and not in any department, and I think I am about the first Minister who has had to make so long, and, perhaps, so labored an explanation to justify the selection made of a private secretary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it is not proper to allow this matter to pass without tendering my acknowledgments to the Minister of Marine for his remarks on my having ventured to ask for any information on the subject-matter of a vote passing through Parliament, much more on my had the temerity to form an opinion on a departmental matter. An old-fashioned notion existed in this House, drawn from English practice, that members of Parliament had some rights in regard to watching public expenditure, and some duties too.

Mr. TUPPER. And some discretion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It was an old notion that they had the right and that it was their duty to inform themselves in regard to the expenditure of public money, and that they failed to discharge their duty if they allowed sums to be voted year after year without questioning the Ministers as to why and where those funds were required. It was also thought that when departmental expenses were increased, members of Parliament had a right to inquire and inform themselves as to whether or not departmental alterations involved an increased public outlay. But it appears I am all wrong. It appears that the hon. gentleman and his friends, who have a monopoly of office, wish further a monopoly of criticism.

Mr. TUPPER. Not so.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We must not express any opinion, and unless we have been a Minister we are debarred, forsooth, from expressing an opinion as to whether a large increase in a public department is justified or not. I remember well when the increase in question was proposed in this House. We questioned the Minister as to the grounds of the change, and failed altogether to obtain a satisfactory answer. From that day to this, no one has informed the House why the Department of Marine and Fisheries was divided. When I to-day asked the Minister, who has been in office six or eight months, as to whether he had formed an opinion, he coolly told me he was unable to form one yet and the matter was open to debate. If that is the case, why has he challenged my right to form an opinion? Have I not examined the reports of the department, have I not followed the expenditure, and have I not eyes and ears to see and hear what goes on in my Province and know something about the matter? I have never yet been able to satisfy my own mind that the change carried out was in the interest of the public service. I think the contrary. I had good grounds for predicting, as I did, that the very thing that has taken place to-day would come about, that as soon as the department was divided into two heads each would require for his particular department an expenditure equal in amount to the expenditure in any other department. They must be up to the times; their department must be a large spending department, and the object of many public servants—I will not say all, because I know the contrary in very many instances—is how much money they can spend. I tell the hon. gentleman he went a little too far when he challenged my right to ask for information and to form an opinion on this matter. I claim a perfect right to criticise, and I intend to exercise that right, not only in regard to the hon. gentleman's department but any other department of which I have information which justifies me in addressing this committee. Now, what do we find? We find in this department an increase of $2,800. I suppose $400 may be statutory increases; $2,400 is for a new officer.

Mr. TUPPER. $2,350.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) $2,350, to be accurate. Has there been the ordinary promotion of those who have been in the service year after year? I should not enquire, I suppose, as I may be trespassing. It may be impertinent on my part to enquire whether the ordinary rule of promoting those who have been in the service for years has been carried out, whether merit has been rewarded in the department? It appears not to have been recognised. At all events, a gentleman has been brought in from abroad; I do not know his qualifications, he may be a competent man or not. I am merely asking for information, but the hon. gentleman has given me to understand that I should not do so as I have not been a Minister of the Crown. I may never attain that exalted position; I have not very much desire to acquire that exalted position, certainly I have no desire whatever to attain it in the present Government. It is, however, a very reasonable ambition for any member of Parliament to entertain. I want to know whether, in the meantime, I have to keep my mouth as close as an oyster. I think not. I have not yet heard any reason to justify the Minister in placing that officer over the heads of others in the department, and have not heard any justification of the increased expenditure. The hon. gentleman has stated that he hopes to save a certain amount of money in the department. I see no evidence of any fruition, so far.

Mr. TUPPER. You have not looked very carefully.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have looked very carefully. I see that under civil government the salaries are increased, that the amount for contingencies is increased, and very many other items are increased. We shall have, no doubt,
Mr. DAVIES, (P.E.I.)

some further discussion on this promise of the hon. gentleman to curtail the expenditure by $50,000 a year. I think he will be a public benefactor if he will do so. He will receive warm commendation from me, provided the reduction is not done at the sacrifice of the efficiency of the service. If the hon. gentleman saves any money I shall exercise my right to commend him as I claim my right to criticise his action when I think it is wrong.

Mr. WALDIE. The Minister has stated that there have been fishery inspectors employed in other Provinces besides the Provinces down on the sea coast. I have reason to be aware of that fact, because there has been recently appointed a fishery inspector in the county I represent. That fishery inspector was employed in securing evidence in an election trial against myself. That officer, appointed by the Minister of Fisheries, stood at the back of the prosecuting attorney at my election trial for two days, furnishing him with questions to put to witnesses. Is that the kind of fishery inspection you pay for?

Some hon. MEMBERS. They were fishing.

Mr. WALDIE. Yes, they were fishing. But I want to know if the Minister is aware that this is the employment at which his officer is working? It is an unjust and improper expenditure of public money, if the travelling expenses of that fishery inspector are charged against the public revenue when employed in hounding the representative of the people and trying to displace him from the position in which the people had placed him.

Mr. TUPPER. I must answer the hon. gentleman at once. I think, because the hon. gentleman is a member of Parliament, he has no right, it is not fair, at all events, to make a statement of that kind on the floor of Parliament with regard to a man because he is in the service of the Government. The hon. gentleman has used some very strong language, and he has not made enquiries and ascertained the facts from the proper course, or he certainly would not have dared to make the statement he has made. In the first place, let me tell that hon. gentleman that if he were more acquainted with the subject-matter with which he has dealt—

Several hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. I hope the hon. gentlemen will "hear, hear," but not interrupt. If the hon. gentleman had acquainted himself with the matter with which he is dealing, he would have found that no travelling expenses of any officer in the public service, as inspector or otherwise, are paid except upon the production of satisfactory vouchers, and those vouchers include a statutory declaration. He declares not merely that a certain amount was wanted, but he shows in that statement the miles that he travelled, the business on which he travelled, and the work he did. He has to sign that statutory declaration, and more than that, that account and that voucher is then sent for examination and approval to the department as to whether, in the opinion of the department, that service was necessary in the interest of the protection of the fisheries. In the case that he mentions, what does he suppose would be done?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Promote a man.

Mr. TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman suppose, if his friends were in office that they would ascertain and anxiously enquire whether at the time a successor was to be appointed there was an election to take place, and that this would make the slightest difference. I have to tell the hon. gentleman that Mr. Sergeant, to whom he refers, was appointed by me as an officer for a district including Halton, and that the appointment was made in the general way in which those officers are appointed. He was appointed at a very small salary, some two hundred dollars a year, and Mr. Sergeant has not yet, I think, received one single sixpence for travelling expenses. However, of that I am not quite sure, but the hon. gentleman, I think, should have made enquiry before he entered into this discussion as to what Mr. Sergeant had obtained for travelling expenses. All those matters are open to him and to every hon. gentleman in the House, and he could have got the information at once. I have to repudiate the insinuation and the charge made against that officer, who, so far as I know, from the day that he was appointed performed his duty satisfactorily and was a fit and proper man to appoint to the position.

Mr. WALDIE. Just one word in reply. A vacancy occurred here and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has done in that case what he has been charged with doing in another case—he has appointed two men for one man's duty. Mr. Kerr, the fishery inspector for Halton, died, and there were two inspectors appointed instead of one. The only duty that Mr. Sergeant has been employed in is fishing for evidence in the Halton election trial.

Mr. TUPPER. That last statement of the hon. gentleman is as correct as his former statement. The facts are these: One officer, a Mr. Kerr, had a district, large in extent and, in the general opinion, too large for one officer. Mr. Kerr having died, a redistribution of those districts took place; but it was not attended, as the hon. gentleman states, with additional expense, but with a saving on the whole. I am able to state to the hon. gentleman that the redistribution reduced the expense, and that we will obtain three officers for three divisions of what was once too much for one officer, at a less amount than we had to pay to the late Mr. Kerr.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope my duty to my friend behind me will not entitle me to be sat upon by the sage and experienced gentleman who, no doubt from his own merits, and not in the least on account of being his father's son, happens to fill the office of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries today. Now, Sir, the hon. member said nothing about what my hon. friend (Mr. Waldie) very justly objected to, and that was, that a paid servant of the Dominion Government was actively interfering in an election petition, or in the prosecution of an election petition against a member of this House. I do not hesitate to say that that conduct on the part of an officer was an indecent and an improper proceeding. I do not hesitate to say that a great number of the officials appointed by that hon. gentleman, and not a few other officials, are in the habit of interfering very improperly indeed, in election affairs, and in prosecutions against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Further, what I wanted to call attention to was this: The hon. gentleman said that he had a perfect right to bring in a private secretary from another department, and that it had often been done before. That may be true enough. No doubt there are reasons for bringing in private secretaries who do belong to other departments, but that is no reason whatever for appointing a new officer in the department. It may be desirable to bring private secretaries in, and that they should have, in addition to their salaries as private secretaries, a position in the department, but the usual rule is to arrange, as it can be easily done, for an exchange with the department from which the private secretary comes, and not to create a new and expensive office, not to create an office inflicting a charge on the public of $2,200 or $2,300 a year, as appears to have been done in this case. I submit that from first to last, no sort of adequate excuse or reason has been offered for the appointment of Mr. Chipman at his present salary, nor can I accept the statement that a saving was effected in the general expenses as an excuse. That saving could be effected just as well with the staff the hon. gentleman had, as with the staff that he now proposes to increase.

Mr. FLYNN. A little while ago the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said that the system of bounties was a great boom to the fishermen. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing that point, but I rise to tell the Minister that whatever benefit or advantage bounties would be to the fishermen, that that benefit would be enhanced if the bounty cheques were distributed much earlier in the year than they have been in the past. The statements made, on the affidavits of the fishermen, that they have caught the required quantity by law are returned to the department on the 31st December. That being the case, I see no reason why those cheques should be delayed so late as the month of June or July, as has been the case in the past. It will be quite apparent and obvious to everybody that in the winter season, or perhaps in March or April, when the fishermen want it most, that this bounty, little as it is, would be of greater advantage to the fishermen. If he gets the cheque in June he is then in the middle of the fishing season and he has the means then to supply his wants, and is apt to spend the bounty perhaps in a useless way. At all events, whatever advantage the bounty may be—and I will not discuss that point now—it would be greatly enhanced if the Minister would see that those bounty cheques are distributed to the fishermen at least in the early part of April, and sooner than that if possible.

Mr. TUPPER. I think the committee will somewhat understand, after what the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has stated, that perhaps some of his criticism is due to the fact that I am, as he says, my father's son. I know the hon. gentleman is not altogether free from spite, and I know that he has cause enough to remember the hon. gentleman whose son he says I am. He is quite right in that statement, and I only wish he was as correct in his other statements. Perhaps he has cause to remember that hon. gentleman with not altogether the calmest feeling. I daresay that, though he has in his time not been able to repay him nor to have entire satisfaction in connection with their wordy warfare, he will do his very best to pay the debt back to the father's son, and I am prepared to receive it in any coin he chooses to pay it in. I never knew before that legitimacy was any disgrace, but perhaps the hon. gentleman's training and experience is different, and he may be delicate on that score. I am surprised, however, that he would allude to the matter in the way he has done. He has given me this satisfaction at the end of this debate, ostensibly upon Mr. Chipman, but really upon the father's son. He says it would be all right and proper if this was a mere exchange of officers and not, as he says it is, the creation of an office. If he had not been carried away by his feelings he would have found, from what I said, and from a general investigation of the facts, that this is the precise justification of the vote to-day. It is not the creation of a new officer, it is the exchange of an officer. Very often that occurs in the public service, and I think I have, towards the end of this little discussion, ample justification from the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) for the vote now proposed.

Mr. COOK. It has been stated that the service has been considerably increased in reference to the appointment of extra officials. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat, the recently elected member for Halton (Mr. Waldie), has stated that a gentleman was appointed fishery inspector who performed his duty by hunting up evidence against him with the view of unseating him. Well, Sir, in the county I have the honor to represent there was a fishery inspector at the time Mr. Mackenzie's Government was in power; but since that time this Government have found it necessary to appoint another inspector to aid him to do the work which he had done quite intelligently and properly alone. But the new official was appointed somewhat on the same plan as the gentleman in Halton, as an electioneering agent. Mr. Fraser goes from one point to another, and if he finds votes that are inland a considerable distance from the edge of the waters where his duties lie, he travels inland to get those votes for his party, and his travelling expenses in doing so are paid by the country at large. I can easily understand how the expenses have almost doubled in that department since this Government came into power. Not in one department alone, but in almost every department of the Government you will find electioneering agents, who are paid out of the public moneys by the hon. gentlemen now in office. I say it is a crying shame; it is a disgrace; and I am of the opinion, which was held by hon. gentlemen on the other side at one time, that those officials should not be allowed to electioneer for their party, but the franchise should be taken from them, particularly men who are so unscrupulous as many of these men are who have been appointed by the present Government. I will not travel beyond this department now under consideration; it is not necessary for me to do so, because there is ample justification for the statements I am making, and similar statements can be made by many gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice, by the return laid on the Table of the House a few days ago, that there have been seven superannuations in connection with the Marine Department during the year. It is generally understood that when superannuations are made they are made in such a way as to reduce, as far as possible, the expenditure. I notice, however, that these seven superannuations have caused an increase in the superannuation expenditure of $2,282.90. The salaries paid to those who were superannuated amounted to $4,880, and the salaries paid to those installed in their places amount to $4,530, a difference of only $350, while there is an addition to the superannuation allowances of $2,282.90; so that the amount we are paying out in superannuations is about equal to the amount we are now asked to pass as increases in salaries. In this connection I might say that Capt. Scott, who drew a salary of $2,000, has been superannuated, and is now getting a retiring allowance of $1,080. I notice also that ten years have been added to his time, he having served 27 years. I would like to know how it is that this has been done. It is well known that under the superannuation system we are paying out over $165,000 more than we receive. If we received a sum equal, or nearly equal, to the amount we are paying out, there might be some excuse for increasing the allowance for faithful service to a man who had served the Government for many years; but, under the circumstances, I cannot see why ten years should have been added to the time of this man's service, in order to increase the allowance. But that is not the worst. It is generally admitted, that when a man is superannuated at an advanced age, the man who is appointed in his place should receive a much less salary; but I notice that in this case the man appointed in place of Capt. Scott draws a salary of $1,850; so that there is only a reduction of $250 in the salary paid, while $1,080 is added to the superannuation expenditure. Then I notice that a Mr. Argyle, who received $600 a year, has been superannuated, and a man has been appointed in his place at $1,200. He has been, apparently, appointed to fill two positions. I wish to know if he is drawing the $1,200 to do the duties performed by Mr. Argyle, as well as those of the assistant, or is he to hire an assistant, a party to suit himself, and pay him the $600? I think it is an unfortunate arrangement that any civil servant should be placed in a position to draw $1,200, and should pay $600 to whatever assistant he likes to get. Those are the points on which I would like to get an explanation from the Minister of Marine.

Mr. TUPPER. I think it is scarcely usual that under one item all the branches of the service should be discussed; but I am willing, as far as I can, to give reasonable explanation.

Mr. Cook.

Since I came into office there have been several superannuations. The hon. gentleman has mentioned two. Capt. Scott was chairman of the board of examiners of masters and mates, and was commissioner of wrecks, &c. He came into the service a long time ago, at the inception of the system of cruisers for the protection of our inshore fisheries; and if the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) was in his place, he could bear testimony to the value of the services that gentleman—who was a captain in the Royal Navy before he came to this country specially to take this position—rendered to the country in connection with the office he held. It was under that hon. gentleman's administration that Capt. Scott inaugurated the marine police for the protection of the inshore fisheries. But a far greater service he rendered to Canada was this: Before that officer came into the service we had no authority in Canada to grant certificates to masters and mates which would be recognised in England by the English Board of Trade. Under the administration of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), that hon. gentleman entered into correspondence with the Home Government, and finally, the only objection appearing to be that we had no officer whose standing was such that the Imperial Government would recognise the papers issued on an examination held by him, that objection was surmounted by arranging that this officer of high standing in the Imperial service should come out and take that office. Capt. Scott came out in 1870 or 1871; he served continuously in the Maritime Provinces, and organised a system under which, ever since, certificates to masters and certificates granted here have been recognised at home. Under these circumstances, in view of the provisions of the Act, and considering the services rendered by Capt. Scott, and the fact that he was broken down absolutely by a serious and permanent illness, I recommended that ten years should be added to the time of his service, and that recommendation was adopted. Now, in the case of Mr. Argyle, I do not think the hon. gentleman has exact information. It was an appointment in British Columbia to which the hon. gentleman alluded, but it has just occurred to me that the necessity there for a large salary to the incoming officer was the fact that a steam-whistle has been added to the light, and you could not possibly obtain the services of a successor to Mr. Argyle for less than the salary given. That is my recollection of the matter; and in connection with his superannuation, I do not think there was anything exceptional at all. Of course, if the hon. gentleman wants a full explanation, I will have to look up the matter again, and I think I will be able to show him there is nothing to which objection can be taken. As to the salary of the successor to Capt. Scott, we were fortunate in being able, as all gentlemen familiar with this kind of work will understand, to get a man of sufficient standing to succeed Capt. Scott and be acceptable to the English Board of Trade, at a salary of $1,800. That is the salary now given to Mr. Smith, who was one of the captains employed in the Allan line, and a member of the Royal Navy Reserve. I think hon. gentlemen who are familiar with shipping matters and the importance of that office, and who know Mr. Smith, will be quite surprised that we should have been able to obtain his services at a salary of $1,800.

Mr. McMULLEN. In connection with the first item, in the case of Mr. Argyle, my attention was at once drawn to the fact that he only received a salary of $600, while I noticed that his successor is given a salary of $1,200. I thought, therefore, it was a fair question to put to the hon. Minister for explanation. I also noticed his successor being allowed $600 for an assistant, and thought we should have some explanation as to whether the appointment of an assistant was in his hands or that of the Marine Department.

Mr. TUPPER. That explanation is due to the hon. gentleman, and, of course, an assistant was rendered necessary by the fact that there was a steam whistle.

Mr. LOVITT. I rise to bear my testimony to the valuable services which Capt. Scott has rendered this country. It is to him we are indebted for the system under which we can grant licenses to masters and mates that are recognised by the English Board of Trade. I may add that, apart from that important service rendered by him, Capt. Scott is entitled to recognition, from the fact that the illness which resulted in the breaking down of his system was caused by his incessant and arduous labor in the service of the Government.

Mr. WELSH. I heartily corroborate the remarks of my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Lovitt), and quite approve of the pension granted Capt. Scott.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). With regard to the statements made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Waldie) and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook), I would ask the hon. the Minister of Marine if he is prepared to follow in Ontario the example pursued by his predecessor in the case of the fishery overseer in New Brunswick, who was dismissed, I believe, because he took some part in politics. The hon. gentleman should apply the same rule in Ontario which his predecessor applied in New Brunswick.

Mr. TUPPER. We did not dismiss the fishery overseer in Ontario. He died.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). You dismissed him in New Brunswick.

Mr. LISTER. I would ask whether Mr. Moodie is still in the employ of the Government as overseer in West Lambton?

Mr. TUPPER. There are some 1,200 officers, and I cannot keep track of their names.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There are a number of matters in connection with the department which might be better discussed when we come to the votes on the department generally, but it will be impossible to discuss the Estimates properly before we get the Fishery Report. When may we expect it? It is, somehow or other, always the last report presented.

Mr. TUPPER. The reason that the report cannot be presented earlier is that, unlike the reports of the other departments, which deal with matters up to the end of the fiscal year, this deals with matters to the end of December. The Fishery Report is held over until the reports of the different overseers and inspectors in all the Provinces are received. I think I will be able to lay that report on the Table before we reach the regular estimates in that branch.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It would be better to bring the report only to the 1st of October?

Mr. TUPPER. The custom has been, for many years past, to comprise the whole year's work in the report, because we must take note of the different seasons so as to have a full review. It would be awkward to change that system now.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would draw attention to one point with regard to the superannuation of Capt. Scott. I notice that he served twenty-seven years and that ten years has been added to his time. If I understand the Superannuation Act rightly, a superannuated officer is only permitted to draw  $\frac{2}{3}$  of the salary he received for the last three years. How is it that in this case  $\frac{3}{4}$  has been allowed him? I am very glad to find expressions on both sides of the House complimentary to Capt. Scott for his efficiency. At the same time I felt it my duty to ask this question.

Mr. TUPPER. Of course, I am unable to answer that at the present moment. I do not remember now the amount which Capt. Scott is allowed, but I can give the hon. gentleman the information. It is impossible to carry in my memory the exact proportion in which the superannuation allowance was calculated. That is done at the Treasury Board.

Mr. McMULLEN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give me the information at a subsequent stage?

Mr. TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the Minister another question as to the appointment of Mr. Chipman in his office. He says he is a very efficient officer, and was taken from another department where he was not needed.

Mr. TUPPER. I did not say that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understood him to say that there is no additional expense in the department from which he was taken, that the public are paying nothing more now than before, and that Mr. Chipman was transferred from a department where his services were not required, where they could do without him, and without substituting anyone else in his place.

Mr. TUPPER. I did not say so. I said the very contrary. I said there was an exchange of officers, that Mr. Chipman was taken from one office and another officer put in his place. I stated that about a dozen times to-day.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. Minister is mistaken. He has said that now for the first time.

Mr. TUPPER. Well, look up the Hansard.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has not improved his position by the statement he has made at this moment.

Mr. TUPPER. Those are the facts.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It does not matter whether they are the facts or not. If Mr. Chipman had been replaced by an officer taken from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, then the hon. gentleman's explanation would serve as an argument, but he does not say that anyone has been taken from his department and transferred to the London office when Mr. Chipman was taken from the London office and brought here. His statement is that there is no addition to the public cost, that there is no additional officer employed in consequence of this change. There must, therefore, be a vacancy somewhere. If there is plus one in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, it is clear that there is minus one in some other department, and whether that is the London office or some other office, it is taking an officer from a place where he was not required. Of course, the hon. gentleman says there was not a sufficient number of officers in his department, and it was necessary to appoint an additional officer. That of itself is a justification, no matter where Mr. Chipman came from, if that fact is made good. But I did not rise to discuss the propriety of the appointment of Mr. Chipman to the office, but to ask the hon. gentleman whether he contemplates uniting the Department of Marine and the Department of Fisheries again under the charge of one officer, and whether that officer is to be Mr. Chipman? Is Mr. Smith to be retired, or is Mr. Tilton to be retired? Is there any deputy Minister who has passed the time of life when he can be no longer useful to the department, and is his place to be filled by a more efficient officer in the person of Mr. Chipman? That would be an interesting piece of information to the House, and I am sure the hon. gentleman is able to give it.

Mr. TUPPER. I have no intention of recommending the retirement of Mr. Smith from the service; I have no intention of recommending the retirement of Mr. Tilton, and have no intention of promoting Mr. Chipman from the position he occupies at the present time.

Department of Fisheries..... $16,187 50

Mr. FOSTER. There has been a net increase in this department of $762.50. There are eight statutory increases at $50, $400; two at $62.50, $125; one increase for an optional subject, $50; the difference between the salary of Mr. Stanton, transferred from the Finance Department to the Fisheries Department, and Mr. Jenkins from the Fisheries Department to the Finance Department, $87.50; making the total increase, as I said, $762.50.

Department of Public Works..... $45,190

Mr. FOSTER. The increase in this department has been $1,680. There are 17 statutory increases at $50, $850; one at $30, and there is an addition of $800 to the salary of the chief engineer, making the total of $1,680. The chief engineer is Mr. Perley, a very valuable officer, whose services, I think, would not be overpaid by the addition which has been made to his salary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We should have some explanation as to the increase which has been given to the chief engineer.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Perley is the chief engineer of the department, and, as hon. gentlemen know, the work of that branch of the department has been increasing very largely. We have had lately, besides the ordinary work of the department, the work of the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec thrown on the department. We have now the graving docks, and the new graving dock at Kingston, which entail a large amount of work on the chief engineer, and a very grave responsibility. I may add that I know personally that Mr. Perley, whose valuable services to my department are appreciated, not only by me, but by all those who have had the opportunity of meeting him, had an offer, some two months ago, of a position in England which would give him over $5,000 a year. I asked him not to leave the department or the service, but to wait, and I would ask my colleagues, and most likely they would assent and would ask Parliament to increase his salary to this amount, which will not be the amount he was offered in England, but, which I thought would compensate him for his services, inasmuch as if he becomes disabled or unfit for work, he may rely upon having his superannuation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What salary does he get now?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $3,200.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) With the increase?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, the increase will give him $4,000, instead of the $5,000 he was offered.

Mr. WELSH. I am glad to hear that we have the services of such valuable men. I should like to ask the Minister who is the valuable man who has been appointed to look after the piers in Prince Edward Island? There are some 23 or 24 of them, and they are falling away and breaking up. I have brought this to the notice of the Minister for three years, and I have had the promise that the Government would send an engineer—a valuable engineer I suppose, because they are all valuable—to look after those piers. At present they are falling into the water, and people cannot ship from them. I would like to know from the Minister who is this valuable man who is charged with the piers of Prince Edward Island? I understand that there is an engineer from New Brunswick, that he has applied to attend to them, but we do not know where he is, nor when he comes; in fact, we have no responsible person at all to whom we can apply about these piers. I would like the Minister to answer me. What is the name of this engineer, and where is he to be found, and what is his address?

Mr. TUPPER,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman knows that the officer to whom he should apply is Mr. Perley, at headquarters here; and besides that, we have in the Lower Provinces an officer, Mr. Grey, I think is his name, who receives his instructions from the chief engineer in Ottawa, and acts on those instructions. I am pretty sure that the hon. gentleman is right in saying that certain piers on the Island are not in a condition in which he would wish them to be, and in which I wish them to be. I applied the money I obtained from Parliament for that purpose; that amount was increased last year, and the same amount is asked for in these Estimates. I hope that with these amounts I will be able to do a great deal in the line that the hon. gentleman has suggested, that is to say, to repair these piers, or as many of them as can be repaired, with the money at my disposal. The hon. gentleman knows that we are unable to do everything in the same year, we have to do it by degrees. The repairs of the piers on the Island have been going on in the same way as those in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and elsewhere. Of course, we know that the coasts of the Atlantic and the Gulf are more exposed to storms than are the piers on the coasts of the St. Lawrence or the lakes. Whenever severe storms occur they sometimes damage a pier, an examination has to be made, a report is obtained, with an estimate, and if the work is pressing, I obtain from my colleagues a vote of money, and if a case of that kind is unforeseen, I obtain the warrant of the Governor General and ask Parliament to give us the money afterwards.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There are few more disgraceful chapters in the history of the Department of Public Works than that which relates to the repairs of the piers in the Island. A few years ago the Government up here, as I thought for political considerations, took from the Government of Prince Edward Island a large number of piers, on the report of the chief engineer whom they sent there, on the ground that these piers were of Dominion importance and that it rested with them as a matter of legal right to take charge of them and keep them in repair. They agreed with the Local Government upon those piers they were to take over, and those they were to leave, and those they took over became immediately afterwards Dominion property. I do not think that my colleague has stated the case as strongly as the facts justify. There has been no such thing as a repair of the piers. They have been allowed to fall to pieces, to rot, in some cases almost to float away. Now, Prince Edward Island, the hon. gentleman knows, perhaps, is the most thickly populated portion in the whole Dominion for its size, the people are a farming community almost entirely, and they have to ship their produce in a very short time in the autumn of the year before the rivers freeze up, and they require a large number of piers, because they have not got the railway communications that are open to the farmers in other parts of the Dominion, and they require a large number of wharves and piers where they can ship away their produce. These wharves are absolutely essential—the people cannot live without them. Now, when this Government and the hon. gentleman's department took them over, it became their bounden duty to keep them in such a reasonable condition, at any rate, as would enable a ship to lie alongside of them, so that the farmers could ship off their products. They have not done so. The management has been absolutely disgraceful. I have been applied to, and so have numerous other public men in the Island, for personal subscriptions to pay for laying the planks on some of those piers, and we have contributed the money out of our own pockets in a number of instances, and the farmers have gone to work themselves to put on the copings and the top work on the piers, to enable them to ship off their produce. I cannot conceive, from my experience in this House, and knowing what the hon. gentleman is, I cannot conceive that these things have been brought home to his knowledge; but somebody in the department, or some of his subordinates, have blundered most shamefully; there has been gross mismanagement, unpardonable mismanagement. In consequence of their negligence the people have suffered very much, so much so that there is not a representative from the Island in this House who is not burdened with letters from people in all parts of the Island complaining of the Government because it does not recognise the duty which rests upon it of keeping the piers that it assumed as its property, in reasonable repair. The whole thing is disgraceful. I say nothing against Mr. Perley, I have always heard him highly spoken of as an officer; but I will say that if he is responsible for the state of the Island piers, the grant of an addition to his salary is something that I would oppose very strongly. I do not know if he is responsible; I have never been able to find out who is responsible. The Government, I know, are responsible as a whole, but I want to get at the officer whose duty it is to inspect the piers and report to the Government. I want to know why that is not done. If Mr. Perley is at the head of the department it is his duty to see that it is done. The hon. gentleman wonders sometimes why it is that six men are sent here from the Island to oppose the Government? Why, what can the people do except to express their sense of dissatisfaction in that way at the disgraceful mismanagement of the public piers on the Island? If the hon. gentleman lived in a part of the Island where there were 75 or 80 farmers who had to haul their produce to market, like potatoes and oats, and on coming to the pier where they were to put them in ships, found that the wharf was rotten, and they had no way of shipping their produce, do you tell me that they would not go away dissatisfied with the administration of the Government? Sir, there is dissatisfaction from one end of the Island to the other among the farming community. The Island has been treated most shamefully, most disgracefully, and in the hon. gentleman's department more than in any other. I here raise my voice in solemn protest against any officer who has had such an amount of public works under his control as Mr. Perley has had—if he is responsible; I leave it to the Minister to say if he is—if so, I here raise my voice in protest against his receiving an increase of salary. If I knew who the officer was I should have made it my duty to correspond with him, and asked him to see to these wharves. I have been taken to some of these wharves by my constituents. All that I could say was, that in coming to Parliament I will bring this to the notice of the Minister. But what can I do? I cannot force his hand, I can only bring it to his notice. The hon. gentleman knows that there are a number of piers that have not been taken over by this Government, and it has been an open question between himself and the Local Government whether to take them over or not. What is the consequence of this being left an open question? The Local Government will not lay out a dollar upon these piers. The Local Government say, the Dominion are going to take these over. The Dominion say: Well we have not decided yet. What is the consequence? The people are suffering between the two, because the piers which the Government have not taken over are in a worse condition than those which they have. The hon. gentleman knows that in most parts of the Island the inhabitants are all engaged in agriculture; he knows that they must have wharves within 8, 10 or 15 miles of where their crops are; and if these wharves are allowed to rot down it is an absolute necessity that they should be rebuilt, and the people have to do it. If such a state of things happened in any other part of the Dominion as happens in Prince Edward Island, you would see the whole time of this House taken up with it. Why, Sir, representatives from the North-West and British Columbia are never slow to complain of any grievance, but when we take up a little time in complaining of the shameful way that we are treated hon. members say, Prince Edward Island is taking up the whole of the time. I make allowance for the fact that we are some distance from the department; but I cannot make allowance, I will not make allowance, for the gross negligence that has characterised the conduct of the Government in the management of our piers for the past year or two.

Mr. WELSH. I observe that $6,000 is down in the Estimates for the repairs of wharves and piers in Prince Edward Island. I think it is very wrong that the sum should be so small; there should be a sum inserted sufficient to put all those piers in good order. I have now been in this House three Sessions. I did not complain much before, but I applied to the Minister privately telling him the condition of the wharves and piers, whereupon he promised they would be attended to and put in good order. It was not done last year. I applied to him again. He said he would place a larger sum in the Estimates and see that the work was done. There were $3,000 in the Supplementary Estimates last year to put them in proper repair. The money has been spent, I am informed, but the piers are in a worse state than ever, and not a hand was put to some of them. I suggested to the Minister that in the Estimates a sufficient sum should be voted to put them in a respectable condition, and for the credit of the Government and the Department over which the Minister presides, I would insist if possible that this should be done. He asserts that the wharves in Prince Edward Island are more exposed than those on the St. Lawrence, but it is not so. There are no piers and wharves under the control of his department so little exposed as the wharves and piers of the Island, and if common attention were paid to them they could have been put in repair for a much less sum than will have to be expended on them now. I intend as the Estimates proceed, to bring some other matters connected with the harbors and piers to the notice of the Government, and I will defer any further remarks until those items are reached.

Mr. PERRY. As this question of the piers has come up it is the proper time to have the matter discussed all round the board. No doubt the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has said very much to the purpose, and he administered the proper castigation to the Department of Public Works for their gross negligence to carry out their solemn promises. At the time of Confederation the Province was given the promise that the wharves and piers would be kept in proper repair. I have failed to find a single report, or a single line of a report, from any officer of the Government with respect to these piers; I have hunted through the library, but have found nothing. I do not know whether the Minister is aware that the Government own a wharf, which was taken four years ago from the Local Government, at the west point of the Island, and that has gone to grief. Do they mean not to rebuild it? They can build the Chignecto Ship Railway, which they are not bound to carry out under the terms of Confederation, but they cannot build a wharf at West Point. I suppose it will be kept over to be agitated about on the eve of another election when it comes around. The Government should know that they have a breakwater at Tignish, which cost $12,000 or $14,000. They ought to know, if they do not know, that it is in a very dangerous state and is liable to be carried away by the ice. They have another breaker at Miminegash which cost about $5,000. If they have an officer in charge of those public works he should have informed the Government that that breakwater also was on the eve of sliding away. They ought to know that their breakwater at Malpeque, in Prince County, requires a large amount to place it in proper repair. In spite of these facts, the hon. gentleman comes here and satisfies himself and thinks he has satisfied the House and the people of Canada, and more particularly the people of the Island, by telling them that he is going to repair all the piers and breakwaters with the big sum of $6,000. Let me tell the hon. gentleman and this House that the best evidence that the people feel the wrong perpetrated upon them, more particularly by the Public Works Department than by any other, is plainly proved and shown by the results of the last election; and no wonder the people should have no kindly feeling for the Government of Canada when they are used in that manner. The idea of voting $6,000 to repair about 30 wharves and breakwaters is absurd, especially when it is remembered that the Souris breakwater cost about $70,000. I observe there is a small amount specified for that; but there is no special amount for Tignish, for Miminegash and others. We have a right to expect a report from a Government officer with respect to the condition of these piers and wharves. If we apply for sums for public works, such as post offices, we are told that we have no influence, that we do not support the Government. I find there is behind the curtain some person, who is not able to secure a seat in this House, but who, nevertheless, possesses more influence than the whole six members from the Island. Is that a fair way to treat the people of the Island? It is the same in regard to the piers. If this person, not connected with Parliament, but who has shown himself to be a friend of the Government, says this pier must be repaired, I suppose it will be repaired, provided it is in the interest of some Tory who expects boodle out of the money to be expended. There were $6,000 voted last year, and the Minister said he would place in the Estimates a large sum. I defy anyone to show that one cent was expended on the Island by public tender or public contract. It was all handled by, and it all found its way into the pockets of Conservatives, friends of the Conservative party. I hope and trust an end will be put to this injustice, and that they will have some responsible officer who will make a yearly report with respect to the state of these public works, so that the representatives of the Island will be able to obtain all the information they require, in order to present in a proper way the requirements of their constituents before this House.

Mr. LOVITT. Before all the money goes to Prince Edward Island, I desire to call the Minister's attention to the condition of Port Maitland breakwater at Green Cove, respecting which I have had correspondence with the Minister for two years.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We have not got any money yet.

Mr. LOVITT. I have asked the Minister to place a sum in the Estimates for Port Maitland breakwater, and so far have not succeeded. It is the most important harbor on the coast, but on account of its bad condition the people of the village around it have almost all gone away. Vessels have to go ten miles down the coast to make a harbor. I have sent telegrams and letters, and have gone to the department myself on the matter, but without success. If Mr. Perley is responsible for the condition of these works, then the sooner he is removed the better. The department sent an engineer down there who spent $200 or $300 in visiting different parts of the coast, but nothing has been done. Port Maitland is really a harbor of refuge, and is deserving of the immediate attention of the department. The Minister has been very kind in regard to a good many matters, but I do not know how he is advised in regard to this breakwater. I do not desire to say that this is a political matter, but the breakwater is in a bad condition and should be immediately repaired.

Mr. COOK. We have the authority of the Minister of Public Works for the statement as to the manner in which Mr. PERRY.

the increase of salary to Chief Engineer Perley has been obtained. He may be a very valuable man and a good engineer. I have never heard otherwise. His salary last year was $3,200, and it is now proposed to raise it to $4,000. Now, Sir, I do not object so much to the increase as I do to the manner in which it was obtained. The Minister stated that this gentleman brought pressure upon the Government, that is that he said unless the Government would give him the $800 increase, he had an opportunity of obtaining a position in England at a salary of $5,000. If this is to be the rule of the Civil Service, and if the officers discover that the Government is so weak as to yield to their solicitations they will bring pressure of this kind, and the result will be disastrous. We already pay our civil servants a very large sum of money and I believe they should be paid liberally and fairly, but I wish to draw the Minister's attention to the fact that this system of increasing salaries on such grounds is a dangerous one. It is very unfortunate that the Minister should have made that statement on the floor of the House, because the civil servants of this country are a pretty intelligent lot of people. They read, and when they read the acknowledgment of the Minister that pressure was brought to bear upon him in a matter of this kind many of them will avail themselves of the opportunity, and we may have a repetition of this in every department of the service. I see that the salaries of several officers have been increased, but I hope that they did not bring the same pressure to bear upon the Minister. I suppose they did not, because the increase in each case is so small that out of his good heart he may have given it to them without pressure. It is very unfortunate that the statement of the Minister should go abroad that pressure was brought to bear upon him, by the fear that if he did not increase the salary of this particular officer he would leave the service of the Government and obtain a situation in Great Britain at a much larger salary. We have plenty gentlemen in this country who are able to fill the position as well as Mr. Perley, and probably the Minister would not have to wait very long to fill the office if it were vacant. I do not think he would have to go to the expense of even putting an advertisement in the newspaper. Probably he might get as good a man for the $3,000 or even less than that. I hope the Minister will put himself right on this question, because I think it would be unfortunate if the statement went to the country that he has been forced to increase this gentleman's salary to the extent of $800 a year.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There was no pressure brought to bear upon me by Mr. Perley. As I have said before, he is a very good officer, he has rendered very valuable services to the country, and is a most efficient chief of that branch of the department. I would certainly have asked Parliament last year to increase Mr. Perley's salary, but we could not do it at that period, and it was postponed to this Session. It was only incidentally that the reference was made to the position he could obtain in England. It was not until I said that I would try and have his salary increased to $4,000 that Mr. Perley showed me the letter in question, but there was no pressure or anything of the kind. I am sure he would never have showed me the letter had I not told him I would ask Parliament to increase his salary. Therefore, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cook) need not be alarmed that any pressure of that kind has been brought, or will be brought to bear on me. The other increases of salary in the department are purely and simply the $50 annual increases according to the statute.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There has been some discussion on the expenditure of this department, in reference to the proposed increase in the salaries of the officers who are specially in charge to assist the Minister in determining upon what public work it is necessary expenditure should take place. I might remind the Minister that two years ago I called his attention, by letter and petition, to the necessity of improving the turning ground at the town of Dresden. The hon. gentleman said that he would send an officer there to report upon the condition of the place, and I believe such an officer was there and that such a report has been made. The representations made to the hon. gentleman were that the banks were sliding into the river, and that the winding ground had seriously affected the banks, so that, if they were not protected, serious damage would be done to property on either side, and that in fact the owners of the property would be entitled to compensation at the hands of the Government. I called the hon. gentleman's attention to the subject last year in this House, as well as by letter, and the hon. gentleman promised that attention would be given to the matter immediately. I have been written to by the owners of the property at that point and they tell me that nothing has yet been done towards the improvement, and that serious injury has been caused to their property by the neglect of the Government to properly protect the river. The hon. gentleman is aware that the river was dredged and widened there so as to furnish a place for steamboats to turn about, and that this dredging, without any piling to protect the banks, has made it probable that unless something is done the property on each side of the river will be seriously affected, and that the cost to the Government will be very much greater because of this damage than it possibly could cost to take precautions.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think there is a report about that, but those reports are not to be taken up until we consider the Supplementary Estimates, which will be submitted to my colleagues and to Parliament afterwards.

Mr. LOVITT. Is it necessary that Mr. Perley should report in favor of a work before any action will be taken by the Government?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course I must have a report from the chief engineer, and he furnishes that on the data which he receives from his sub-engineer. He cannot go everywhere himself and he must entrust the examination to another who makes a report to him. After that, the chief engineer takes into consideration the data furnished him, and makes an estimate and lays it before the head of the department. All those matters are laid before Council and the result of the deliberations of Council is what we see in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. LOVITT. Well, for the last two years, since 1887, about 90 feet have been broken away from the middle of the wharf, and the waves of the Atlantic are driving through it. No business man would attempt to do anything like that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has a local engineer there, I believe?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. One for the three Provinces, Mr. Grey. I think his headquarters are at St. John.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the deputy head receive any additional allowance for any other service?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, that is the total amount.

Department of Railways and Canals..... .. $47,700

Mr. FOSTER. In this vote there are twelve statutory increases at $50 and one at $20, making $620. The decreases consist of the difference in the accountant's salary, $600, and a difference in the salary of a second class clerk, $300, making $900, showing a total decrease of $280.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the Chief Engineer continue to receive $2,000 for services in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. FOSTER. I think so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What service does he render for it as matters now stand? As I understand, the Government have ceased to have any connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. FOSTER. There are certain odds and ends which I think are not yet fully completed. There is an arbitration going on at the present time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But surely the Government do not propose to pay a gentleman in their employ a salary because he may be required to give evidence before an arbitration? That would hardly be ground for getting a salary.

Mr. FOSTER. When the item itself comes to be voted I will give the explanation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) May I ask whether it is the intention of the Government to continue the Department of Railways as a separate department in the future as in the past? I remember a few years ago, when this department was separated from the Department of Public Works, it was done on the ground that the Government were engaged in the construction of a large portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and this ground seemed to be satisfactory to the House. Now we have done constructing Government railways, I understand.

Mr. FOSTER. The Cape Breton Railway is being constructed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is partly constructed, and I think the Pictou Branch is finished, or nearly so. I have not heard that the Government contemplate any extension of Government roads. I would like to know whether the matter has been considered by the Government?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no present intention to alter the law in that regard.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No present intention or no intention at present?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no present intention and no intention at present.

Expenditure required in connection with the High Commissioner's office..... ..$14,253 37

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In connection with this, I think we must have some explanation. We were told a little while ago that the services of Mr. Chipman were not going to involve any additional charge. As appears by the Public Accounts, Mr. Chipman was employed in the office of the High Commissioner. Last year I see that the estimated charges for salaries in that office were $7,554, and this year they are estimated at $7,753, and I desire to know where the saving comes in, which we were told would be effected by placing Mr. Chipman in the Fisheries Department at a salary of $2,350, while in the office which he left the expenditure remains just the same. I would like the Minister of Finance to explain where the saving comes in.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry I have not the explanation here among my papers. I will have it this evening if possible.

North-West Mounted Police ..... .. $8,980 00

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When this item was up before, I alluded to the fact that in the public prints there appeared some rather serious charges about the establishment of a canteen at Regina, and its effects, and the item was allowed to stand until the First Minister came. I thought perhaps it would be in the public interest if some explanation were given of the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am very sorry I was absent at the time. I do not happen to have the papers at this moment. At eight o'clock I will have them here.

Customs Department.....$38,750

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I wish to throw out a suggestion with reference to the Trade and Navigation Returns. The Trade and Navigation Returns, unlike other departmental reports, which, though very valuable, are of special interest only to certain portions of the people, are of interest in all parts of the Dominion, and it has occurred to me that perhaps a more concise compilation might be made, apart from these returns, which might be more largely circulated among our people than the present issue of the Trade and Navigation Returns can be. There is a statistician, I think, who has compiled figures which are very valuable, outside the department, but whether it should be left to him or to some one in the department, I think it would be well that a compilation should be made of the imports and exports of the country, containing comparative tables—a compilation which would not give all the detailed information contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns, but would give sufficient to afford business men an idea of what the imports and exports are and the general run of trade. I am not prepared to say what it should contain or not, but merely throw out the suggestion, as the demand for the present returns is more than the supply can meet.

Mr. BOWELL. I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for the suggestion. It is one that has already occurred to me. In fact I have been discussing with those whose duty it is to prepare the tables as to whether a volume of about half the size of the one now printed could not be compiled—a volume which would give general information and not contain so many details. For instance, if the statements were confined exclusively to the Dominion and not embrace each Province separately, that would reduce the work by at least one-third and perhaps one half. But the question suggested itself to me, how far those who import, and particularly those who export, would be satisfied with returns containing information of that kind. We know that when a company desires to establish any particular industry, one of the first questions they ask is how much of that particular article is imported into the country; and then the next question is, into what portions of the country is it imported; having obtained this information they decide where they can best locate their particular industry. I would be glad indeed to carry out the hon. gentleman's suggestion if at all practical. However, it shall receive my most earnest consideration. I may say, however, for the information of the hon. gentleman that the same number of copies are printed now as have always been printed. I have found it difficult, however, to supply the great demand made from all parts of the country for copies of the report, and I have been obliged at times to refuse applications made by hon. gentlemen who desire a larger number than is usually given; but I have endeavored to supply all demands as far as possible.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am afraid from the remarks of the hon. gentleman that he thinks I suggested this as a substitute for the Trade and Navigation Returns. I did not mean that; I think it is absolutely necessary for the use of hon. members and the public that we should have Trade and Navigation Returns. What I proposed was, that a compilation might be made for general use, which would not entail a great expense, and would answer the purposes of many who just seek general information. In addition I might say that while the Trade and Navigation Returns are voluminous and bulky at present, improvements might still be made in that respect. In the matter of the iron and cottons, though there is a good deal of detail given, yet there are times when you cannot get just the information you want in reference to a particular item. It is absolutely necessary to retain the Trade and Navigation Returns, and to include in them even a little more detailed information. I did not want to imply that the hon. gentleman wanted to cut down the number, but there seems to have been an insufficient supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am very glad to hear that the hon. the Minister is willing to consider the matter. Like my hon. friend, I have been very frequently applied to for copies of the Trade and Navigation Returns. It is utterly impossible to supply the whole public who desire it with those very bulky and voluminous returns, except at great expense, but I think that for all practical purposes a very much condensed abstract—an abstract, very little more than such details as are given monthly, or it may be quarterly or half-yearly to the department, would answer the great majority of enquiries; and that I presume the Minister could supply in considerably increased quantities at a very moderate cost. If that was not found sufficient, it might be enlarged from time to time. But there is a great and growing interest shown to get the general returns of our trade, and I think those which the Minister receives himself for his own use would afford to the great bulk of the applicants all the information they desire, although, of course, for the details of that information, they must necessarily refer to the Trade and Navigation Returns.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I cannot agree with my hon. friend that this would be in the interest of economy, because in any case the Trade and Navigation Returns must be continued. I would suggest that, with the addition of a few pages to that blue-book, the object of my hon. friend might be attained. There are some very valuable abstracts given in the Trade and Navigation Returns, and if we had this comparative abstract made with previous years, say between 1888 and 1878, that would serve the purpose, and one or two pages would be sufficient. We have excellent comparative tables in that return on every other subject; but, when you want to refer to the comparative value of the products whether of the mine or the fisheries or other industries, that appears to be the only thing missing, as the return goes back only, I think, about three years in each volume.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman's suggestion is worthy of consideration.

Mr. CHARLTON. Might I ask the Minister what is the cost per copy of the Trade and Navigation Returns?

Mr. BOWELL. I cannot state that, because there is a staff of clerks employed in each branch, besides the cost of paper, printing, and so on.

Committee rose; and, it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

North-West Mounted Police ..... $8,860

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have read the remarks made by my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) the other night. I think the question to which he referred was the canteen. The canteen system is known to exist in all the military corps in the British service, and it is a great convenience for the soldier. The same system has been adopted at Regina. I think the regulations are guarded enough to prevent any abuse. The barracks of the police are about two miles and a half, I think, from the trading part of the town, and it is a great comfort to the soldier to be able to get his supplies at home.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose that in this canteen groceries and other matters of that kind are sold and other supplies, that it is not for the sale of liquor alone?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a general store for the convenience of the police.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly. The hon. gentleman having been the inhabitant of a garrison town for many years, knows that canteens are a great convenience to the soldiers. I will read the general regulations submitted to me and approved by myself on the 14th December last:

"1. The canteen at head quarters is for the exclusive use and convenience of members of the force, and for the ready supply to them of articles at reasonable prices, but it is to be clearly understood that no one will be in any way prevented from resorting to shops in the neighborhood.

"2. No one other than an officer, non-commissioned officer, constable or special constable of the force, will, under any circumstances whatever, be allowed to make a purchase of any sort in the canteen, or from the canteen stock.

"3. To aid the commissioner in the general management of the canteen, as well as to maintain a supervision of all matters appertaining thereto, a committee of officers and non-commissioned officers will be nominated by the commissioner, the senior officer of such committee acting in the capacity of president.

"4. The practice of placing the immediate management of the canteen under a non-commissioned officer of the force having proved unsatisfactory, a fit and proper person to act in the capacity of sutler may be selected by the commissioner.

"5. The amount to be paid by the sutler for the privileges awarded him will be a stated pro rata sum monthly for each member of the force, including commissioned officers and special constables, stationed at Regina. This amount so paid will be expended on the recreation room by the canteen committee, with the approval of the commissioner."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I suppose that, as in the British service, the profits go to the regiment?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The profits go to the regiment. This is expended in the recreation room, in the purchase of newspapers and things of that kind. The regulations continue as follows:—

"6. The books and invoices of the sutler are to be subject to inspection by the committee at any time.

"7. The sutler will be required to bind himself to stock the canteen with such articles as the committee may at any time direct. Such directions will be based upon carefully prepared estimates of the probable requirements.

"8. Lists of all articles and their prices will be prepared by the committee and posted in the canteen.

"9. Defaulters are not to be permitted to enter the canteen.

"10. Detailed instructions for the non-commissioned officers on canteen duty will be posted in the canteen.

These instructions are to be rigidly carried out, and are at all times to receive the supervision of the adjutant, of the orderly officer and of the regimental sergeant-major.

"11. The sutler is strictly to obey all orders and regulations which may be issued from time to time for the government of the canteen. In the event of its being proved to the satisfaction of the commissioner that he has been guilty of any irregularity, he will be liable to immediate dismissal.

"12. Should the sutler become incapacitated, or fail to supply the canteen in a satisfactory manner, or should it be considered advisable at any time to close the canteen, thirty days notice will be given him by the commissioner, and within six days after the expiration of such notice the sutler will remove his stock of goods from the canteen and will have no claim to compensation of any sort."

These are the regulations which are made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What descriptions of liquor, if any, are sold in the canteen?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Nothing but beer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We do not suppose that the hon. gentleman knows anything about 4 per cent. beer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I do not think it would suit me at all. At all events, beer, as I understand, is the only liquor sold. I may say that there is a petition from the trades in Regina, making complaint of the establishment of the sutler, who is a gentleman from Winnipeg. They complain that it is unjust to them. I will read their memorandum, which is most respectfully signed, addressed to myself:

"We your humble petitioners, being merchants in the town of Regina, beg leave to bring to your notice the great injustice we are subject to through having a large and complete stock of groceries and other goods opened out within the barracks square at the North-West Mounted Police post of this place. We consider that the opening of such an establishment is not necessary where the town is so adjacent, and our merchants carry full stocks, and competition is keen enough to keep goods at a fair price. We also labor under great disadvantages when it is considered that we have to pay taxes, rent, fuel, light, wages and other incidents as compared with the establishment of the barracks, which we are assured is furnished a building for its accommodation, apartments for the manager and assistant, fuel, light, free drayage by police teams to and from railway stations, of his goods, police teams at his service at all times, use of prisoners' labor when required, and best of all, accounts with the men all guaranteed."

That is quite a mistake, there is no guarantee. I positively refused to allow that provision to be made in the arrangement:

"All for the small sum of 40 cents per man per month. The right of the monopoly of the police trade at the post is bartered away to an individual who has no interest whatever in Regina or the Territories. We hereby proclaim our protest against this movement of your Government fostering a trade movement against individuals who are striving to build up this country, paying their full quota to sustain the Government. We cannot allow this opportunity to pass without calling your attention to a further grievance. We are also subject to having, in addition, opposition to our legitimate business callings, we are called upon to sustain our municipal government, while the Government own one-half of our town sites, the Canadian Pacific Railway one-quarter, and the North-West Land Company one-quarter, therefore, leaving the whole burden of the taxation upon the resident ratepayers, and we trust you will devise a speedy settlement of the Government interest in the town sites."

That is quite a different subject. I do not think it would answer any good purpose to read the reports, which dispute decidedly, in some respects, the accuracy of the paper that was read by the hon. gentleman opposite, because I have made up my mind on the whole that the game is not worth the candle. We shall close that arrangement with the present sutler, giving him the notice which we are allowed to give under those regulations, and allow the men to manage their own affairs by a committee of sergeants, and buy their own supplies, so as to avoid any appearance of unfairness towards the traders who are pushing their way in the North-West.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As to that question I have no opinion to offer. This may be strictly within the business of the department, and no doubt they consider it very proper. But the only thing that does occur to me is this: whether, after all, this particular office of the comptroller of the North-West Mounted Police had not better be stationed at Winnipeg instead of Ottawa. I presume that Mr. White must spend a very large portion of his time, if not two-thirds of it, in the North-West.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He makes two visits certainly in a year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under any circumstances it appears to me that for the purpose of closely inspecting and controlling these affairs, the public service would really be better managed if we were closer to the scene of operations. This force, as I understand, is scattered mainly west of Regina. There is a small detachment here and there in the present Province of Manitoba, but a great proportion of this force is very far away indeed. Looking at the enormous distance that intervenes, it would almost seem as if it were a waste of the capacity of the comptroller to keep him here, unless there are very strong reasons indeed to the contrary.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman mentioned that before, and I made some enquiry about it. In consequence of the great extent of that country, the distances are so great, that the comptroller would be practically as far away, as far absent from the scene, as he would be here in Ottawa. I believe after discussing the matter with those who ought to know, including the financial officers here, that it is better that the comptroller should be here. If the comptroller was stationed at Winnipeg, or Regina, or another place, there must still be a responsible officer here to deal with the innumerable accounts coming in from every station. He is always here in communication with the Department of Finance, and especially with the Auditor General. I fear if the comptroller went up there he would still have to have a deputy comptroller down here at Ottawa—I think so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The expense of that force per head is very great. It has been somewhat reduced since the old time in consequence of the comparative facility of obtaining forage; but it still ranges, if I am not misinformed, close on $500 per man. Now making all allowances possible for the expenses of keeping the men in proper condition, it does appear to me a very heavy expense. It is vastly in excess of the expense of the English cavalry soldier. I think that the English cavalry soldier costs about $450 per head,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now, we spend on this force—I see there is an attempt to cut it down—but judging from the actual accounts I see that we spend on this force of, say, 1,000 men, about $360,000, amounting to $360 per head on the average. I cannot but think that close inspection might enable the average expenditure to be considerably reduced.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Between the expenditure of a cavalry regiment stationed in England at any of their headquarters and our mounted police in the North-West there is no comparison. The cavalry regiment is in barracks; it does not move away except to go to the drill ground and to have perhaps some little excursions through the country to keep the horses and men in good health. This force has very hard work. Let hon. members only think for a moment that this whole extent of country, which is almost the size of Europe, has only 1,000 men. Besides their employment in watching the Indians on the reserves, and preserving peace between the red and white men, they are employed on a continuous system of patrol from one end of the country to the other, from the Rocky Mountains to the head of Lake Superior. Although the Dominion is not obliged to furnish a force of that kind for the Province of Manitoba, yet practically they are obliged to do so, because the Province has no force of its own and has not sufficient means to keep up a mounted police along the frontier. At the request of the Government of Manitoba there is a patrol along southern Manitoba to prevent smuggling, in the first instance, and, in the second place, to prevent horse and cattle stealing and raids of all kinds. That is not obligatory on the police according to law, but I think the committee will understand it is in the cause of good order and law observance that a portion of the force is used in Manitoba. Then they have to watch the whole line from the western boundary of Manitoba to the eastern boundary of British Columbia. They have stations along the whole line. Day and night the patrols are moving from station to station. They seize smuggled goods, as the reports will show, and as hon. gentlemen if they pay any attention to the subject will ascertain, and stop smuggling of all kinds. They seize any intoxicants that may be brought in. They are very successful in preventing the stealing of horses. They keep up a friendly relation with a similar force on the south side of the line, and there is an interchange not only of courtesies but of services; they help each other. On information coming from the

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

American side that a lot of horses have been stolen and brought into the Dominion by our Indians or by our horse traders, our police immediately use every exertion to find the animals and return them, and to punish the thieves. The American force on the south side of the line reciprocate in the same way. This system keeps the country in order and keeps up pleasant relations along the line between the populations on each side of it. Besides all that, the force has smaller or larger detachments, according to the size of the Indian reserves scattered all through that country, not only along the border and the foot of the Rocky Mountains, but also along the Saskatchewan, and in addition we were obliged last year to send a force and keep a force for a year in British Columbia. According to the Mounted Police Act, the Government of the Dominion, may, on the request of the Government of a Province, aid them with a body of police. Last year there were apprehensions of an Indian insurrection in the Kootenay District, and there was a representation from the Government of British Columbia, stating there was imminent danger of an Indian war. Those apprehensions proved to be, in a great degree, unfounded and the reports exaggerated; but still the statement was so positive that life and property were in danger, and they had no force in British Columbia to meet any Indian rising, that the responsibility of sending a force devolved upon us. That cost a great deal of money. It was successful, in the first place, in putting down any apprehensions, and, in the second place, in giving the people of British Columbia a very exalted opinion of the value of this force. I refer to these matters to show that the expense of a cavalry soldier in barracks at Canterbury, in England, cannot be compared in any way with the expense of a mounted policeman obliged to carry food for himself, and his animal, with him. These parties are frequently, if no railway is near, accompanied by waggons or carts or other means of transport for food for the force. This costs a great deal of money. I believe the expenditure, so far as I can learn, has been very carefully supervised by the comptroller, who, in my opinion, is a very good officer and a very economical officer. He sees there is no undue expenditure. I have given this explanation to show the difference between the expense of a cavalry regiment in England and this force, which is constantly moving through the North-West.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not at all disposed to underestimate the value of the force. I have always considered the force to be necessary; whether it is necessary to have so large a force is a question I am not going to raise. It may come up possibly in connection with the detailed Estimates further on. Nor would I have felt it my duty to have called attention to the matter, even to a very considerable increase, but the figure named is a large one.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is perhaps as well that the House and the country should obtain the detailed explanation which the hon. gentleman has given the committee. My point was simply this, whether—looking at the nature of the expenditure and the innumerable details, and the great importance it was for the comptroller to be in a position to keep an eye on those expenses—it would not be better to have his headquarters in the North-West?

Mr. WATSON. The First Minister has remarked that a considerable number of the police were maintained in Manitoba to maintain law and order there. The Province of Manitoba has a provincial police force.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say so; I said they were there to watch the frontier.

Mr. WATSON. Yes, and not to preserve order there. It is true there is a mounted police force along the frontier, but I understand their duties there are to assist the Customs authorities to prevent timber being stolen from Government lands, and not to maintain law and order in the Province of Manitoba.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If I understood the hon. Minister rightly, I think he said the petition of the memorialists was granted, and that a change would take place with respect to the complaint they had addressed to him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That there would be a change.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has that been communicated to them?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has not been communicated to them. It was a memorial or petition very recently received.

Department of Customs..... $35,650

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With respect to the item of Customs I understood that that item was allowed to stand over.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is quite correct and I intended, if there was no objection to the passage of this item, to suggest that the discussion which commenced the other night might more properly be continued under the item for that special service to which they objected. I do not object to take up the matter at any time, as I desire to refer to the remarks made by some of the gentlemen, more particularly to those which reflected on myself. It is more convenient to confine the discussion to the particular item which it is necessary to discuss.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It would, no doubt, expedite the criticism if we would confine ourselves more closely to the particular item. In looking over the details of the Customs Department inside service the Minister will observe that item 194 under the head of Customs is included in the salary of the Commissioner of Customs as Chairman of the Board. Would not that come under this discussion?

Mr. BOWELL. No, I do not think so.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is it not so much expense added to the department?

Mr. BOWELL. It is adding so much to the salary of the deputy head which has been paid him for a number of years out of the appropriation for the Board of Customs, and has always been voted in the same way as now.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am aware of that, but I thought that it might be discussed under this item.

Departmental Contingencies..... $192,250

Mr. McMULLEN. There are several items in connection with departmental contingencies which ought to receive the serious consideration of this committee. I notice that a considerable sum of money has been paid out in connection with the Post Office Department, for paying a number of clerks extra sums for computing interest. I do not understand why a clerk who is engaged in an office, and who is supposed to discharge the duties devolving upon him in that office, should be allowed an extra sum for the purpose of computing interest from year to year. I notice that this expenditure is increasing, and of course those clerks when once they get an opening for making extras and find that the House and Government are prepared to pass it, will try to increase their salaries by this means. I think that this is a very bad principle. I find that the average salary paid to the civil servant is $1,190 a year or nearly $100 a month. Their hours of work are not long; they are supposed to go to work at half past nine in the morning and leave at four in the afternoon, but if they devote half an hour, or an hour, in computing interest on deposits they make an extra charge for it. I do not think this is right. If a farmer hires a man for farm work and tells him to go into the potato patch or to weed his onions he will not pay him an extra sum for an hour's work of that kind, and I do not see why we should be called upon to sanction items of this kind every Session. When one civil servant gets an extra pay others will be inclined to claim it also, and the result is that the money voted for extra services has been something enormous. Last year, including some other items, it was in the neighborhood of $129,000. It is time that we should put a stop to this. We employ a man for a special department, and he is supposed to discharge the duties devolving upon him in connection with that department. He has no right to say what kind of work he shall do or what kind of work he shall not do, and it is for the head or the deputy head of the department to say that he shall perform all work that comes within the jurisdiction of that department without extra charge. I think that the initiating of this system was pernicious and that the perpetuation of it on our part is undoubtedly wrong. I desire to express plainly and frankly my opinions on this matter and to say that I believe the system should be stopped at once. Those men are well paid, as I said before, and there is no line of business in this country in which officials are so well paid as in the Civil Service. Take school teachers, or clerks or bookkeepers engaged in wholesale or retail houses, and you will find that, in the general salaries paid, there is no other class paid so well as civil servants. In the face of that fact, I cannot for my life understand how it is that they are permitted to initiate a system of getting extra allowances, which has been practised in every department for years, and the system is growing from year to year. I consider it the duty of the House, apart from political feelings altogether, a duty devolving upon one side as well as the other, to strongly protest against the continuation of a system that is undoubtedly leading us into financial recklessness, and into a system of expenditure that has already become burdensome and is going to be worse. I earnestly look forward to a change in the system altogether. My impression is that we shall have to put our civil servants upon a basis entirely beyond the control of the head of the department or the deputy head with regard to removal or otherwise. I think it would be an advantage if we had a Civil Service Board of inspection whose duty it would be to inspect the services performed by every civil servant in the Dominion, and if they found that he was not performing sufficient duty to warrant his continuation in office or sufficient work for the money he received, they should have power to dismiss him. I would leave in the hands of the Government of the day the power to appoint, but I contend that as long as we have the system we now have, it will continue to grow worse, and through political influence men will be installed in office who are unfitted for the duties and will be in the way of others. As a general rule, you find that when men are once installed in the Civil Service, they are never dismissed. That is a peculiarity of the service. You will find no business man in the country who always gets the man who suits him, whether it is a bookkeeper or a salesman or anything else; but you never hear of a dismissal from the Civil Service. After a man is appointed, he goes on from year to year, his salary is increased, and ultimately he is superannuated. I think the Government should put their foot down, and decide that when a man is in a department, he must perform all the labor devolving upon him, and receive no extra pay for extra work. As one man comes to know that some fellow servant has been allowed a charge of this kind, the evil grows until it becomes general. I hope this system will be so criticised and its evils pointed out, that the Government will take an immediate step to put a stop to it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I notice that there is a reduction this year, and I agree with the hon. gentleman who has spoken that some further savings might be effected. It would be almost impossible to go through the Auditor General's Report and point the items, consecutively, which to those who have not the incurring of the expenditure seem unreasonable; but the Ministers themselves, in looking through them, will see, as they have been able to effect considerable savings this year, amounting to some $7,000, in what directions they will be able to go on with the good work. There are some suggestive items here. There is one about which I would like to enquire of the Minister of Justice, not so much because of the money value in it, as from a little curiosity. I see that in that department a statuette of Sir John has been bought, and I wondered whether it was of the great original—but not the only Sir John—or of some other Sir John. Then I wondered why it was there, and the thought crossed my mind that as our esteemed Premier is charged with the duty of supervising closely the expenses in all the departments, finding himself, with the many duties that crowd upon him, unable to discharge them all, he hit upon the expedient of having a little statuette of himself put up in every department, which would serve to call to the remembrance of the officers that he was charged with that particular duty. Then, again, I thought it might perhaps have been placed there as an emblem of that principle of justice which is so dear to British hearts; but unfortunately that thought is marred in my mind. While I would like to give full credit to Sir John in my mind as being an emblem of justice, the gerrymander and one or two other acts crept into my mind, and I felt that that would hardly be an appropriate emblem in all respects. There are such things as human frailties, and I thought perhaps it would be better to stick to the even-handed scale as an emblem of justice. I thought, however, that I would just like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice whether the statuette was of the Sir John, or of a Sir John that has perhaps been called into existence at a later date.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask my hon. friend if he would not allow the statuette of Sir John to be voted without remark on condition that the original should disappear.

Mr. PATERSON. (Brant.) No, I would not; I do not think the hon. gentleman thinks I do. I would like ample time to be given for repentance of the gerrymander, and reparation for a great many other things. Oh, no; I would not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You want me to carry out the gerrymander of 1892, as I promised.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know whether the material of the statuette is brass or marble?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is ære perennius.

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), I may state that those extra amounts were allowed to clerks at certain periods, because in two of the departments, the Finance Department and the Post Office Department, quarterly and half-yearly there are special accounts and special large calculations of interest to be made up. This requires the clerks to be engaged sometimes to twelve or one o'clock at night. The question arose whether it would not be better to employ extra clerks for the purpose of doing that work, and adhere to the principle that clerks should not receive anything more than their salaries. That question has been thoroughly considered both in this country and in Great Britain. In England precisely the same system prevails, for the difficulty presented itself of getting clerks who would be equal to the technical requirements at those times. I agree with the hon. gentleman that it is objectionable that a clerk who is employed at a fixed salary should receive any other remuneration; but in those two departments particularly, it has been found impossible to do otherwise.

Mr. McMULLEN. Apply that principle to other lines of business. Take, for instance, bank clerks. It is well known that they have to make up a monthly statement at the end of every month. We know that they have to work from nine to ten o'clock, and sometimes midnight, in making up the monthly statements, and I would like to ask hon. gentlemen if the banking institutions pay their clerks extra money for that extra service. I say they do not. I would again refer hon. gentlemen to the wholesale trade of the country, of which we have representatives in this House. I would like to ask any wholesale man, if, when he takes stock and has to keep his men at work until midnight, he pays those men extra. I do not think so; he may give them a lunch or something of that kind, but it is not the rule to give extra pay for this extra time. I would refer hon. gentlemen to the retail trade, in which I have been 27 years, and I know that it is not the custom to allow clerks extra pay in that trade for extra work taking stock. That is not the custom in banking, in the retail trade, or in any other line of business, and I would like to know why we should make an exception in favor of the Civil Service. The heads of the different departments in that service should follow the same rule as is followed in every other line in this country.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Before we leave this item I would like to have more detailed information with regard to certain expenses which really seem to be far larger than they ought to be. In the first place, I think it is to be regretted exceedingly that contingencies are as large as they are. If we look over the various departments, we see that the contingencies amount to the enormous sum of $192,250. Although the amount appears to be less than it was last year, we cannot help regretting that it is not much less than what it is. We find that, although ample allowance was made for the departments generally, yet, they expended as regards the last item in contingencies the sum of about $20,000. Now, while I do not wish to be regarded as finding fault with contingencies expended which are absolutely necessary, yet I do feel that we should guard public expenditure just as closely as we would our own, as we would, if we were employes, our employer's expenditure. That being the case, we ought to have explanations given to us as to why certain items are larger than what we consider they should be. The other day I drew attention to the item of travelling expenses of one of the Ministers, which appears to me to be very large, too large to vote without our being given details. I refer to the travelling expenses of the Minister of Militia. You will find in the Auditor's Report that these amounted to $1,400 last year. While I raise no objection at all to the Minister's expenses being paid while travelling on Government work, yet to be asked to vote this money, without being given any vouchers, or explanations, or reasons to show that the money was expended in the service of the country, is, I think, going too far. While the Minister of Militia may have to travel a great deal, we find that the travelling expenses of other departments, in which one would naturally suppose there were as many duties to perform upon the road as the Minister of Militia has to perform, are much smaller than his. I find also that the Postmaster General has a very large item, over $1,000 for travelling expenses. I refer to the former Postmaster General, who was appointed Lieutenant Governor. What the items may be composed of we have no knowledge.

An hon. MEMBER. He may have gone south.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). My hon. friend behind me says he has gone south. I am afraid too many of the Ministers occasionally go south in the winter or to the seaside in the summer season, and very conveniently, perhaps, they may find that it is necessary to attend to some public duty during that time. If that be the case, they should explain it. They should be honest enough to say that on account of the arduous duties they are compelled to perform here during the winter they go to watering places during the summer. Whether that be so or not, we are entitled to an explanation as to the nature of these charges. The Government may say that this is a trifling matter, but the principle is equally as great in a small item as it is in a larger one, and if they by any means expend one cent of public money without justification they should be held as strictly responsible, and be called upon to give as full explanation to the House as if it were a large sum. During last Session when a discussion came up in reference to cab hire, a promise was made before the item finally passed that we should have full explanations and vouchers. Has any explanations been given to us? This year we find one department expending in cab hire, outside of travelling expenses, the sum of over $1,600. We find that another department, which, perhaps, has as much to do as this one where an expenditure of $1,600 is required for cab hire, expends only 50 cents for cab hire. Either the Minister of the Department of Customs must use his own money to pay his cab hire or travels on foot a great deal more than many other members of the Government do, or other members of the Government charge a great deal more than they ought. We should have some reason given for this expense. It is certainly too large an item to allow to pass unchallenged. It may be said that urgency often causes a Minister to order a cab hurriedly in order to transact public business. I should not find any fault with the cab hire being paid in that case, when it is in the interest of the country; but no Minister has any more right to employ a cab for running about the city of Ottawa, or any other place, at the public expense than any private individual. The money is not his, it belongs to the country, and we are here to protect the interests of the country against any encroachment on the part of the Government or any member of this House. That being the correct principle, I cannot for the life of me see how any member of the Government—I do not say they do so, but the items look very suspicious—can feel himself justified in using the public funds for his individual ease and comfort. He has no right to do so, and such a case is contrary to everything which is upright and honest. I hope that the Minister of Militia will be able to explain the large item of $1,600 for travelling expenses. I know he is a warlike individual, and that he may have many duties in connection with the position he occupies, and may have to travel from one end of the country to the other. I know that his labors are arduous, because persons who are engaged in military pursuits have a great deal to do which exhausts them. They have, for instance, to go to the seaside. I do not suppose that the Minister of Militia would charge to the public his expenses when he went to the seaside to regain his health, but I do expect that he and other Ministers will explain to the committee the great disparities which exist as to travelling expenses, cab hire and sundries in connection with their departments. It is the duty of the Government to explain these matters and not to allow it to go abroad that any wrong is being done. Individually, I have very little confidence in the Government. I believe they need watching, and with all the watching which we can give I do not think we will be able to do more than protect the interests of the country. I believe that not only is there a large amount of money expended in the various departments here which should not be expended, but there is an enormous amount of money squandered in the Government offices throughout the country. We ought to bring home these charges against the Government of the day, and it is our duty to challenge these items and ask for a full explanation.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I regret to say that, for the last two years, in consequence of my engagements in Ottawa, I have been unable to go to the seaside, but I hope next summer I shall be able to get away and enjoy the rest which I am perfectly satisfied my friends will consider I am entitled to. The question which the hon. gentleman has just brought before the House is one strictly within the limits of the Opposition. It is perfectly right that every item of expenditure should be challenged by the loyal Opposition of Her Majesty. The charges for travelling expenses this year are larger than they have been before, and I am asked to give an explanation, which I am perfectly prepared to give in the frankest possible manner to the House. I considered that it was my duty upon departmental business to go to British Columbia, and more than one-half of the expenditure which the hon. gentleman has challenged was incurred for the purpose of going to British Columbia, where I was detained for a fortnight, and where it was my duty as head of the Department of Militia to investigate important questions which called for the attention of the department.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) You did not want to go to the seaside after going to British Columbia.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I went to British Columbia in December, and the hon. gentleman who has the benefit of living on that lovely Island of Prince Edward knows that that is not the month which one usually selects for visiting the seaside. However, I went to British Columbia at a time when it was absolutely necessary for me to go as head of my department, and I think the duties I was called upon to fulfil were such as required the attention of the head of the department. Every account of my expenditure was submitted to the Auditor General, and not one was challenged. The hon. gentleman a couple of days ago congratulated me on saving $100 in the civil branch of my department. I am sorry that they did not consider that I am really deserving of the same congratulation now. I think the expenditure is as small as possible. It covers travelling expenses from Quebec to Montreal, and to several camps, and every item of the expenditure was made as small as it was possible to make it. However, next summer, when I go to the seaside, I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will see that when I do go for my own benefit, I pay my own expenses and do not charge them to the public.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I am sure that the members of this House must feel very thankful to the Minister of Militia and Defence for the very lucid explanation he has given of this item of expenditure. I see by the Auditor General's Report that the hon. gentleman expended $1,498.17 in travelling expenses. He has given us the voluntary explanation that more than half of that was expended in his trip to British Columbia. He says he was there two weeks. I do not know whether he travelled in the celebrated car "Jamaica," which is familiar to members of this House, and which has been occupied by men of more prominence than the Minister of Militia, but I cannot understand how in two weeks he could spend $750 in travelling to British Columbia. It certainly is not a very ordinary expenditure. I think that the expense, even if he paid his fare, would not be more than about $150 going there and coming back, leaving $600 to live on for two weeks. I do not know how sumptuous the fare of a Minister of the Crown may be, especially when he is on the Pacific coast in the winter time; but to any ordinary individual who is not accustomed to occupy such high and dignified positions of trust in the interest of the public at large, it does seem to me an enormous expense. He could not surely eat this amount while he was in British Columbia. He does not look as if he could have eaten $600 worth of food. He certainly took his own clothes with him, and he could not have invested very much in that line in British Columbia. What became of this $600 which he managed to squander while he was there, besides the amount to pay his fare, I do not understand. I do not think any gentleman in this House can accept the explanation he gives as satisfactory. He may consider it satisfactory himself, but I do not think he can get even one gentleman who sits on the Treasury benches with him to accept it as satisfactory. Now, in my opinion, the expense, according to the Minister's own showing, has been of the most extravagant kind. If the Minister of Militia requires to spend $750 to make a two weeks' trip to the Pacific coast, I fancy if he goes down to the seaboard on the Atlantic, and stays a few weeks to recuperate his health that he injures by attending to his arduous duties here, he would require to expend over a $1,000.

Mr. GILLMOR. He pays that himself.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Well, I am glad to hear it. At all events, I think it was an enormous expense for the Minister of Militia to make in two weeks. While I am on my feet I may mention that I find in the Auditor General's Report that no less than $33,858.26 were expended by the Ministers in travelling allowances, for the travelling of employes, cab hire in Ottawa, street car fares, &c., during the fiscal year. Now, as has been said by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wilson), this does seem to be a very large amount of money to expend. I will particularise another item, that is the travelling expenses of Sir Charles Tupper. I see last year that it cost this country $3,018.45 to pay Sir Charles Tupper's travelling expenses. Now, if he had travelled every week day in the year, he would, at that rate, have $10 per day to spend. Everybody knows that an ordinary man can travel for less money than $10 a day; but allowing him $10 a day he had to travel 302 days in order to spend that sum of money. Probably some of this money he expended while he was at Washington.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). No, $5,000 extra.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Well, that is worse than I thought it was. I would like to have some explanation in regard to this expenditure. He spent $3,018 in travelling expenses, and $5,000 besides when he was in Washington negotiating a treaty which has fallen through. Then there is another matter. I do not consider the Ministers are the only transgressors in this line, for I see that one gentleman who is in the service of the Government, and has been for some years, travelled no less than 261 days during last year. He is a great traveller; he received $1,773.70 as expenses for travelling. Well, that seems to be an extraordinary sum. That gentleman is Mr. J. G. Moylan, and he is Inspector of Penitentiaries. No doubt it was necessary for him to do a good deal of travelling, but there are only five penitentiaries in the Dominion of Canada, and he certainly did not require to spend $1,773.70 and to travel 261 days in order to inspect five penitentiaries in the Dominion of Canada. I cannot understand how he could have done it. I do not know for a certainty, but I believe that a very large sum of money is expended, not only by Ministers of the Crown, but by—I may just as well speak plainly—other public servants, by those in the departments, and not alone in the interest of the public service. I believe a large proportion of the traveling expenses are incurred by these gentlemen enjoying themselves at some summer resort, or in some way for their pleasure. I am satisfied that it is utterly impossible for this money which is expended by some of the deputy heads and some other gentlemen, amongst them Mr. Moylan, to be spent in a legitimate way. He could not possibly require to travel 261 days, or to be absent from the seat of Government 261 days, and to spend this large sum of money to inspect five penitentiaries in the Dominion of Canada. I think it is due to the people's representatives here, I think it is due not only to those who sit on this side of the House but to hon. gentlemen who support the Government, that some explanation should be made in regard to this enormous expenditure. Of course, we have been told in times past that it is a small matter for a member of Parliament to be cavilling about cab hire, and the travelling expenses of the Ministers of the Crown and others in connection with the Government. We are here not only to look after large sums but after small sums, and if extravagance is found in small matters we may expect it in large. Therefore I hope that some of the Ministers will rise and explain in some way more satisfactory that the Minister of Militia has done, how this money has been expended, and if there is an actual necessity for so large an expenditure every year for travelling expenses, not only of Ministers of the Crown, but of their deputy heads, and others in the service. I may say, however, that there is one man in the public service who deserves credit, and whom I want to except; there is one man, and that is the Minister of Customs. We never can find any fault with the Minister of Customs' account for travelling expenses. I believe he keeps strictly within the letter of the law at all times; I believe he manages his department in that regard just as economically as he would manage his own private affairs, and, therefore, I have great pleasure in complimenting my old friend the Minister of Customs, for the frugality he exhibits in this respect.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I would like to hear the Postmaster General explain the item of over $1,000 for travelling expenses of the late Postmaster General during last year. No doubt he will have several vouchers, and that he will be in a position to show us that every cent of it was legitimately spent in travelling. I do not know where he travelled. I know that he was appointed Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia and he left Ottawa. Very likely he had to travel down to the Province where he was going to assume his office. Certainly it is a very large item. I was not aware that the Postmaster General had to travel so much. Perhaps we shall see the present Postmaster General have an item of $1,000 for the same purpose, because I believe he will not travel unless it is necessary in the interests of the department. If, another year, we find that he has expended $1,000 for travelling we will think that the item is an honest and correct one. Perhaps the present Minister of Agriculture, the old Postmaster General, will be in a position to know how much ought to be expended during the year by a Postmaster General travelling around the country. Certainly we require some explanation from the Government with regard to these items. If they say, which it appears they will be compelled to say, that they cannot explain them, therefore they will keep as close as an oyster's mouth, I suppose we will be obliged to accept that as an explanation. My brave and gallant friend the Minister of War did himself an injustice in his explanation. If he expended in travelling $600 or $700 in two weeks, I hope he will not travel as many days as some of the officers do or the expense will amount to an enormous sum.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will try not to do so.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). He says he hopes he will find time from the services of the Government to visit the sea shore. Perhaps he went there last summer and enjoyed a recreation from his arduous duties. Perhaps you might as well call Rye Beach the seaside. That is a comfortable resort, a pleasant place, and you can pass a week there and be rather invigorated and made more comfortable for your duties after your return. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be able to explain whether he was performing some of his duties down there, and if a part of the items were incurred on that account. However, that may be we are entitled to some explanation at the hands of the Government. The First Minister should also explain the item under the head of Privy Council, the contingencies of which are very largely increased, unjustifiably so. It is only proper that he should, this Session, fulfil the promise he made last Session, but which he deferred until to-morrow, to give us details with regard to these expenditures. He might do so now. There is plenty of time and opportunity, and the explanations would come very conveniently. He appears to be good-natured and would give us a good-natured explanation. I hope the Minister will feel it to be due to himself and his colleagues that the explanation should be given. I guarantee that if we were able to show the same condition of things in the Department of Customs as we are able to do in other departments, that Minister would be only too ready to give ample explanations. Members cannot find a single item in the way of expenditure that that Minister is not able to justify, and that without any hesitation. That ought to be the case with every department of the Government, and we have an upright man in regard to departmental contingencies who is an example to the rest. Perhaps, however, hon. gentlemen will offer explanations, and I will wait for them, and I certainly hope the Postmaster General will be able to explain an item of a thousand dollars and over.

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to my hon. friend for West Elgin (Mr. Wilson), I may say that this expenditure of which he complains was made by my predecessor. I am informed that he went out to British Columbia, to the North-West, to Manitoba, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and travelled all round for the purpose of enquiring into the efficiency of the post-offices in those different parts. Particulars as to the time he was absent and the distance he travelled were sent in to the Auditor General, and I am sure that that gentleman has seen that the charges were not at all excessive. As to the other large charge of $1,000 that was made by the late comptroller in the post office: He was sent to England for the purpose of studying the money order system and the system generally carried on there and in France. He spent a long time abroad, and I am sure his charge is very moderate for the time he served the department there.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Did I understand the Minister of Militia to say that his accounts after his trip to British Columbia were submitted in detail to the Auditor General?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, all accounts were sent in, of course.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is it the custom that all accounts incurred by the Ministers are submitted in detail to the Auditor General?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mine are.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Then we will be able to arrive at the items in the Public Accounts Committee, if the accounts are in possession of the Auditor General in detail, and we shall only have to ask for the accounts to be brought down in order to have an opportunity of inspecting the items. It would be a good rule if all the members of the Government would follow the rule which the Minister of Militia says he practices. If I have done an injustice in the remarks I have made I shall be glad to take them back after I have scanned the items of the accounts, but not before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to call the attention of the First Minister, who I suppose is responsible for the Privy Council Department, to the very heavy expense that appears to have been incurred under that head. I find from the Auditor General's Report that no less than $15,380 were required to be expended in that department. I remember very well the expenditure in that office in 1877 and 1878, and it is worthy of the attention of the committee to compare the two expenditures. In 1877, the total expenditure for contingencies for the Queen's Privy Council in Canada amounted to $2,996 as against $15,880. A difference between $3,000 and $15,000 is hardly capable of being explained by any increase of work in that department that could have occurred. I could understand that there might be some increase on account of the fact of the First Minister being now President of the Council, and to a reasonable increase on that account I would not object. But the difference between $3,000 and $15,000 is altogether out of the question, unless there has been some very remarkable change, which has not yet come to our notice, as to the manner of doing business there. A brief explanation, I think, would be desirable.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad the hon. gentleman has called my attention to the matter, but I am unable to explain the difference now.

Mr. PERRY. I should like to obtain some further information in regard to the items of expenditure for the Lobster and Oyster Commission. I observe the following items: Edward Hackett, Chairman, July 4th to November 9th, 1887, 80 days, $800; A. Ogden, July 4th to November 9th, 1887, 114 days, $1,140; J. H. Duvar, Secretary, July 4th to November 9th, 1887, 129 days, $645; W. B. Deacon, July 4th to November 9th, 1887, 105 days, $504; J. H. Duvar, travel of Commissioners, $738.14; J. H. Duvar, telegrams, $75.48. I see again on the next page of the Auditor General's report an expenditure of $3,998. J. H. Duvar received $2,034; W. B. Deacon, $250; Edward Hackett, $450. I see here that there appear to have been no vouchers. It is almost surprising that a gentleman will get $10 a day for eighty days, and be paid a very large amount for expenses besides, and have no vouchers. I cannot understand that, and I am sure it is due to the House and due to the hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that a proper explanation should be given. I saw those gentlemen when they were down on the Lobster Commission. I cannot say that I saw them at work, but I suppose they did a little work for we had a small blue-book last year containing a report of the work they had done. They got the ideas of some gentlemen engaged in the lobster fisheries and put them in print. I remember the book right well; you could easily shove it in your pocket and the weight of it would not necessitate your having to take a cab. We had to pay them very well, however, for what they did, and I contend that it is not right to vote this money when no vouchers were forthcoming. It is not right that we should be in the dark on this matter and not know whether the country got value for its money or not.

Mr. COOK. Comparisons sometime are invidious and I am afraid my friend in alluding to the Minister of Customs has done an injustice to the Minister of Militia. Probably my friend the Minister of Customs travels on a railway pass and the Minister of Militia does not. I know that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) declared last year, that he was not one of those who travelled on a pass, and that statement was heralded from one newspaper in the County of Simcoe to another in his praise. Perhaps an explanation could be made in this way. It may be that my hon. friend the Minister of Militia was not treated so generously as the Minister of Customs by the railway authorities, and the consequence is my hon. friend is getting credit for something he does not deserve. He may be travelling on a pass whilst my friend the Minister of Militia has to pay his railway fares. I would like to have him make an explanation of this matter, because after all a man, whether he lives at home or abroad, has to eat. I do not believe the expenses of living would be so very much larger in his absence than if he were at home, and I do not suppose he would eat much more away than he would at home. I have no doubt that if my hon. friend would make an explanation he would put himself right with the country.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to ask an explanation about the subscription to newspapers in the different departments. It amounts to over $10,000 and I suppose that merely means subscription to the papers for the different departments, and that it does not include advertisements.

Sir RICHARD CARWRIGHT. There is a separate heading for advertisements.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes, there is a separate heading for that. It looks almost as if it would be impossible to make use of $10,000 worth of papers. One department has $884 for Canadian newspapers, besides some English and American. We will suppose they are daily papers and cost $7 or $8 a year, that would make over 100 papers there. It certainly gives one an idea of the task there is on a Minister's hands if he has to go through all those newspapers. I would like to know if any Minister could give the list of papers that he takes, and whether there is a general rule which guides them in subscribing to papers; whether they are taken altogether from one side of politics, or whether the organs of the Opposition party find entrance into the offices? I would like to ask if there is a rule that all leading papers, of whatever shade of politics, should be subscribed for in fair proportions. The Minister of Customs, who has been so complimented to-night, may explain that. In his department I see there are $537 worth of Canadian newspapers subscribed for; it is less than in other departments, but it seems impossible that so many papers could be hung around the rooms.

Mr. FOSTER. The papers are subscribed for by the different departments on the basis of their usefulness and necessity, and as a rule the best papers are selected. Naturally, I suppose, the best papers are found to be more largely on the side of politics—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That pays best.

Mr. FOSTER,—that supports the Government. Although it may seem useless upon first view, to have such a large number of papers in the departments, I may say that every department has to take a certain number of papers for its guidance and information. Take, for instance, the Department of Marine and Fisheries; a large number of papers are taken there and they are found valuable in discovering the number of wrecks, in keeping track of the shipping and the like of that. I found, when I was in that department, that a great deal of use was made of those papers and we were obliged to take them. In the Department of Finance there are a very large number of financial papers that have to be taken and are found useful, and so on through the other departments. I have no doubt myself that probably a less number of papers could be taken by each department and yet the work of the department would not materially suffer, and I think I may say that next year's account will show a very decided improvement in that respect. The accounts will show that papers on both sides of politics have been subscribed for. The leading papers on both sides of politics are taken by the different departments.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I can quite understand that it is necessary to have newspapers in the public interest. I was not disposed to complain of that, but I wanted to know what rule guided in their selection, and whether the different prints on both sides of the question were to be found in the ante-rooms for the convenience of parties who went there. There is one item on which I would like to have some information. I see that in the Department of Agriculture a sum of $20 was paid to the Holland Bros. for reporting lectures at Almonte. That seems to be an unusual item, and I would like to know what those lectures were.

Mr. FOSTER. I imagine those are lectures delivered by Prof. Saunders, who has made a practice of attending a number of agricultural meetings. Those lectures were published in the press, and afterwards in pamphlet form.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I do not think we have yet had that answer from the head of the Privy Council that we are entitled to. I do not wish to press this matter unduly, but when we take up the Auditor General's Report we find that in that department no less than $15,380.38 has been expended in that department during the year on contingencies. It is said that these accounts are sent to the Auditor General, who examines them and must be satisfied that they are correct, or he would not report upon them. Then there is an item here which, perhaps, the hon. First Minister will be able to explain, as the Auditor General's report does not explain it satisfactorily. We find charged here, travelling expenses of Sir John A. Macdonald, $364.59; John Dowdall, living expenses, $86.75; B. Chilton, ditto, $82; Joseph Pope, $371.90; John J. McGee, $162.30; James Foley, $11.75. Then comes cab hire at Ottawa—Sir John A. Macdonald, $734.50; Sir John A. Macdonald, from May to June, $214, a pretty good rate; lots of drives; he has been in a cab nearly all the time in May and June. Then we have cab hire of Ministers, $11.50, and persons not named in vouchers, $728.15. I would like to have an explanation of that; I think the First Minister might explain it. There are several other items which bring up these expenses for travelling expenses and cab hire to over $2,000. Now, we ought to have some explanation of these expenses. We shall be able, perhaps, to get some of the vouchers in the Public Accounts Committee, but we shall not be able to get the vouchers for these accounts for which no vouchers were presented. Perhaps the First Minister will present vouchers now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That I am not able to do. I am afraid the hon. gentleman will have to wait until the Committee on Public Accounts sends for the vouchers, or gets an explanation why there are no vouchers. I certainly do not come here charged with explanations or vouchers for the employment of every cabman. All I can say about that is that I cannot afford to keep a horse, I am too old to walk, and as long as I hold my position, I think the hon. gentleman will have to submit to my paying cab fare.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). That is a very strange doctrine that the First Minister offers to this House as an excuse, and to which the gentlemen behind him cry out "hear, hear." If we are not paying the First Minister the amount that he is entitled to and that his services to the country are worth, I think the only right and proper thing for him and his supporters to do is to come down here and say so, and not allow items to be charged to the country that he ought to pay out of his own pocket. I say the doctrine is a vicious one, and I am surprised to hear his supporters cheer it. I hope the doctrine offered by the First Minister is not endorsed by his colleagues in the Cabinet.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I do not think any member on this side of the House will find fault with any legitimate expense incurred by the First Minister or any other Minister of the Crown in the way of necessary travelling expenses. No hon. gentleman would complain that the Prime Minister, who is now advanced in years, should have a cab whenever he requires it. We do not find fault with that at all. So far as I am concerned, I do not find any fault. I think he is entitled, from the position he occupies, and from his age and services to the country, to have a cab when he requires it. But what we find fault with is that concealment has been attempted by some one, I do not know whom, to cover up these cab hire expenditures. Here we have a charge of $728.15 paid for cab hire by persons not named in vouchers, and last year we had similar charges. Now, just to give the House an idea of the difficulty we have in the Public Accounts Committee in getting at the details of such accounts, I may say that this matter was up in the committee last year. We got the vouchers down, and one voucher was certified as correct by Mr. Joseph Pope, who I believe is the private secretary of the First Minister, and it was paid. This voucher was for cab hire in Ottawa in December, 1886. That was about the time both parties were getting ready for the general elections. We find by this voucher that the sum of $28.51 was charged for cab hire by Mr. Riopel in the city of Ottawa, from the 11th to the 22nd of December. Well, I do not know how it was possible for the leader of the Government to be travelling in cabs in Ottawa and at the same time attending political gatherings all over the Province of Ontario making speeches for the benefit of his followers. The bill was made out for cab hire from the 11th to the 22nd of December. Now, the right hon. the First Minister was not in Ottawa at all during those days. He left Ottawa on the 11th of December; he was in Welland on the 12th and 13th, in St. Thomas on the 14th, at Alymer on the 15th, in Simcoe on the 16th, in Wingham on the 17th, in Chatham on the 18th, in Port Hope on the 19th, and in Toronto on the 20th, 21st and 22nd. It does appear to me that a man cannot be in two places at once.

Mr. CASBY. Unless he is the Premier.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is true that the First Minister is capable of doing many things that ordinary men cannot. The people in the United States say they only have one Barnum in that country. Well, we have only one Sir John in this country.

Mr. DENISON. We are ready to pay for him.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Judging from the way this account is made out, I should say this country, on a small scale at all events, is being humbugged by our Barnum Minister as much as the United States people are being humbugged by their Barnum. If the hon. the First Minister can be in two places at once, the people ought to know it. That this year there has been expended $728.15 for cab hire for persons not named in the vouchers is a matter that requires as much explanation as this account. Therefore I cordially agree with the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) that this requires some explanation, and I can see from the happy mood in which the First Minister appears to be that he is just in the vein to explain it. I would be glad, for my own satisfaction and that of the people, if he would be kind enough to rise in his place and tell us how it is that he can by any possibility be riding in a cab at Ottawa while travelling in the car "Jamaica" and making political speeches in Toronto, Welland and other places.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My memory cannot pretend now to inform the hon. gentleman how it happened that there was an account for cab hire in Ottawa when I was travelling in the west. I really cannot stretch my memory back so far. No doubt the hon. gentleman was on the Committee of Public Accounts then, and I dare say he informed himself about it, but what I would point out is this: that I think the country has made a very good bargain, because they only pay for the Ottawa cab hire when I might have charged all my travelling expenses in the car "Jamaica."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We are anxious to know if they were charged also. If the hon. gentleman is so communicative he might perhaps tell us that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They were not charged.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I cannot say I agree with the hon. gentleman that there should be no objection to cab hire for the First Minister simply because he is the First Minister. That is wholly a new doctrine. I always supposed there was a sessional allowance granted to every member of this House, granted to the Prime Minister as well as to others, and he may use a portion of that sessional allowance to pay for his cab hire precisely as he may use it for any other matter. If the House is of opinion that a different rule should be applied to the First Minister, the House ought to proceed regularly. There is no authority for the Premier, any more than for any other member of this House, to come to the House in a cab and charge the cab hire in the public accounts. He has no special position in that respect. My friend the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), is a member of this House and was at one time the Prime Minister. He had devolving upon him the important duties now devolving upon the First Minister. In consequence of his assiduous application to those duties, he is scarcely able to get to his seat in this House, yet I do not find that the right hon. gentleman has made any provision to bring my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) here in a cab. I do not think this matter should be treated as a jest. If the First Minister thinks he is entitled to charge his cab hire or any other portion of his expenses to the public, he should assume the responsibility of making a proposition of that sort. Now that has not been done, but what the right hon. gentleman has done is that which the law does not authorise. If he can point out in what way he is authorised to employ a cab of Mr. Buckley to bring him here at 3 o'clock and to take him away at 6 o'clock, and to return at 8 o'clock and to leave the House when it adjourns, and to charge the expense in public accounts, the hon. gentleman is just as well able to do so now as he would be before the Public Accounts Committee; but so far as I know, there is not any authority for that, and I supposed that the object of a sessional allowance was to enable the hon. gentleman to use it in that way if he thought proper. The hon. gentleman has no more right to charge his cab hire than any other hon. member, and if the House thinks differently it should provide by vote or increase the salary of the First Minister.

Mr. DENISON. He ought to be paid $25,000 a year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, the hon. gentleman may ask the Government to bring down a proposition of that sort. The hon. gentleman's Government is a courageous one, ready to do anything in the public interest. The hon. gentleman, I am sure, would not state what he stated here to night if he did not think it was in the public interest; but I suggest to the hon. gentleman the propriety of putting it in a formal resolution, so that he may do in a parliamentary way what he is now doing in an unparliamentary and illegal way. The hon. gentleman, as Prime Minister, is entitled to $1,000 a year more than any of his colleagues. I do not say that that is an improper provision. A Prime Minister may not be very liberally provided for when that is done, but, if my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie), when he was Prime Minister, had come down to the House and said: I am entitled to a thousand dollars more than any of my colleagues, there are duties devolving on me and there are expenses which I have to incur which are more than those of the ordinary Minister, and that a further charge for cab hire, to attend in my place in Parliament is not an unreasonable charge, would the hon. gentleman opposite have submitted to that? He would have said that the member for East York must formally propose that, and must come down to Parliament and ask for the appropriation, or must propose it by Bill, or at all events must propose it in some constitutional way. Now, the hon. gentleman says he is getting too old and is entitled to ride, and money was properly paid or not. It will be interesting to find out these things in the Public Accounts Committee. Although I am not a member of it myself, I have no doubt that somebody else will find out on whose account this $748 for persons not named in the vouchers, was spent. The cab hire in the other departments comes under the same heading. It is not proper that the head of the department should be able to run up bills against the Dominion at his own pleasure. My right hon. friend said we got off cheaply because we did not have to pay for his "Jamaica" trip. But we did have to pay for his cab hire while he was not here, and we paid $364 for himself, $371 for his secretary, and $462 for Mr. McGee, a total of $1,197 for travelling expenses paid to the three individuals, the other two being immediately under his management in that department. That is a very considerable sum, a sum that should not have been paid without vouchers, showing that these travelling expenses were incurred on journeys taken on public business. The Premier has no more right to take trips for his own pleasure at the expense of the country than I have. It should not be allowed any longer; this money should not be paid without positive proof that these trips were taken on public business, and that no more than the cost of the journeys is paid. When the hon. member for York, the late Premier, was in England on the occasion spoken of, after the public business was transacted he took a trip for his own pleasure up to Scotland, to the neighborhood where he was born, and after he had finished transacting public business not one cent more was charged to the public Treasury. I would like to know, if the same rule has been followed in regard to the travelling expenses found in the accounts of last year. We paid on account of the Minister of Militia, for travelling expenses for last year, the sum of $1,498, in round numbers $1,500, at the rate of $5 a day, for every working day in the year. Now I know, that he has been very active in getting about the country, but I do not suppose he has spent $5 a day in travelling every working day on public business alone. I do not suppose that the Canadian Pacific Railway, or the Grand Trunk Railway either, charge him the highest rates for passing over their lines. It is understood that Ministers get passes, and yet in face of that we have this bill, without any vouchers, without any statement whether he was at the seaside, at a watering place in the State of Maine, or on a fishing trip, or in the North-West inspecting the local volunteers, or where he had been; we have simply the lump sum of $1,498 for travelling expenses. Vouchers for this will be called for also, and the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of saying where he paid this large amount for travelling expenses on public business. The travelling expenses of the Marine Department amounted to $2,150. I shall not go any further with these departments. It will be better to take them up item by item in the Public Accounts Committee. But the point to be emphasised is that none of these expenses are regular, and they should not be paid out of the contingencies at all, which are really voted for carrying on the actual public business of the department and not for paying the personal expenses of the Ministers. If it is thought necessary, let a definite allowance be given to the Ministers for travelling expenses on public business, and let them keep within that sum, or pay the balance out of their own pockets.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I would like to be informed in regard to the expenditure incurred by the late Minister of Finance, Sir Charles Tupper, during the year. I find on page 113 E, in the Auditor General's Report, that for travelling and for living expenses at Washington he was allowed $5,378.85. In another place on page 55 C we find he was allowed $3,018.45, and on page 56 C he was allowed for cab hire in Ottawa, $228, making a total of $8,625.30 that was allowed, outside of his salary, of course, to Sir Charles Tupper for travelling expenses during the last fiscal year. Now, that must strike any gentleman, I do not care whether he sits on that side of the House or this, as something enormous, and requiring explanation. I think the country ought to know how this was incurred. I think the present Minister of Finance might give us some information with regard to that. I think he is in possession of information which he ought to give to the House. Besides, I find in the Auditor's Report that Sir J. S. D. Thompson was paid for travelling and living expenses at the same time the amount of $1,691.53. Then coming to the present Minister of Finance, I find that the Hon. George E. Foster only cost the country at Washington $800.

Mr. FOSTER. More economical.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Yes, he is a cold water man—at least he used to be, and I hope he is still. But certainly there is too big a difference between the charges of the present Finance Minister of $800 for living at Washington, and those of Sir Charles Tupper for $5,378.85. I would like the present Minister of Finance to give us some information. Did he not live in the same first-class style that Sir Charles Tupper did when he was in Washington? Or did he board at some second or third rate corner grocery, and allow Sir Charles Tupper to board at a first class hotel, where they charged him three or four hundred dollars a day. I do not think he kept up the dignity of his position as Minister of Marine and Fisheries when he allowed Sir Charles Tupper to live in such extravagance while he was living in such a quiet way. The hon. gentleman should explain how the expenditure was incurred and for what it was made.

Mr. FOSTER. I can explain with respect to the item which is charged against myself. It was for legitimate travelling expenses and living expenses. The difference between my own expenses and those of Sir John Thompson can be explained by the fact that Sir John Thompson was longer in Washington than I was. The difference between the expenses of Sir Charles Tupper and myself can easily be apprehended by hon. gentlemen, for Sir Charles Tupper was one of the Commissioners and occupied a position far different from any of the rest of us who were with him, and his expenses were necessarily greater than either Sir John Thompson or myself.

Mr. CASEY. He put on more style.

Mr. FOSTER. As he properly should do, as the representative of Canada, and an ambassador as it were from this country, who could not be expected to exercise the same prudence and economy as ourselves and others who did not occupy that position. Anyone can easily apprehend the difference, and that his position called for greater expenses.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The explanation is partially satisfactory, but I should like the Finance Minister to explain why, as seen on page 55 C, of the Auditor's General's Report, Sir Charles Tupper expended $3,118 on travelling expenses in addition to the Washington outlay. I should like some particulars in regard to that item.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the particulars at hand, but I know that Sir Charles Tupper during the year of his incumbency went to England and back, and you cannot travel there and back without expending considerable money. Besides that he did a great deal of travelling in Canada, but the largeness of the item is chiefly due to the causes I have mentioned. He was not in this country all the time. Besides, we must recollect that while Sir Charles Tupper's expenditure for travelling expenses seems large it is partly due to the fact of his having to go to England, and while there discharging the duties of High Commissioner for quite a time, during which period he was not drawing the salary of High Commissioner.

Mr. CASEY. It was made up in travelling expenses.

Mr. FOSTER. It was quite proper that his travelling expenses should be paid.

Mr. LISTER. During the time I have been in Ottawa I have observed that the Ministers are in the habit of walking to their departments and home again, and it seems extraordinary to find these enormous charges for cab hire. The amount charged to the First Minister is $734, or upwards of $2 a day for cab hire, and in addition for May and June there is $214, and for persons not named in vouchers $728. The amount altogether reaches about $1,700, or $5 a day for cab hire in Ottawa. The right hon. gentleman must remember that this money does not belong to him, but to the people; it belongs to me, and to every other inhabitant who pays taxes. It is not his to spend with such prodigality as it appears to have been spent in the past. It is time the country should understand how the money of the people has been expended. No one can possibly object to members of the Government expending all the money that is reasonably necessary for the carrying out of the administration of the affairs of the country, but when we find Ministers expending thousands of dollars every year for cab hire in Ottawa, many of whom are living within a stone's throw of the buildings, the matter requires some explanation. One cannot avoid the suspicion, which thrusts upon one, that the charges for cab hire are charges made for the purpose of covering up some other expenditure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, Oh. Shame.

Mr. LISTER. Who are the men for whom the c. b. hire has been paid? No one can complain that the First Minister, in view of his age, should engage cabs. I would not raise any objection about that, but the amount is so unreasonably large that one must feel that these cabs are not hired for the purposes of the First Minister, not for his own use only, but there must be others using liberally the cabs of Ottawa at the expense of the people. As regards the other Ministers, I see them walking from day to day to their departments and it is extraordinary under these circumstances that such large accounts should be sent in for cab hire. The committee are entitled to some explanation of these items. The travelling expenses are enormous. We all know that every member of the Government holds a pass over every railway in this country. How, therefore, do they spend the money? Is it for luxuries? They do not expend it for railway fare. The Minister of Militia expended $300 for travelling expenses. Did it cost him anything to go to British Columbia? Why, no; he would travel on a pass. He went, I believe, to the sea coast; and are these charges made for his summer trip? Do we not know that he has brigade majors and other officers all over the country to do inspection work, and these little excursions on the part of the Minister are really unnecessary in the interest of the people. If they were made they did not cost the amount charged by him, and the conviction is thrust upon us that these charges are made, not for actual travelling expenses of Ministers, but to cover up other charges. I feel justified in making this statement, because I feel that the expenditure cannot be explained in any other way. This matter must be brought before the country, and the people be led to understand how their money is being squandered by the Government. When Ministers are receiving enormous salaries and occupying positions to which any one can properly aspire, living in luxury while the majority of the people are struggling to obtain a bare living, the people have a right to know that their money is not being wasted in extravagance by Ministers who have their confidence. The Ministers owe it to themselves and to the country to show that every dollar they expend for travelling expenses has been properly expended. I think the Minister of Marine—I see nothing of that kind so far as he is concerned.

Mr. TUPPER. Next year.

Mr. LISTER. I hope not. The Minister is too young to want a cab; in the case of his father it was all right. The hon. gentleman stated to-day that, so far as the officers of his department were concerned, the utmost strictness was observed with regard to their accounts: that when one went travelling he was obliged to file a detailed statement showing every dollar expended. If that rule is a good one for the officers of the department, it is a good one to be observed by Ministers. They owe it to themselves and the people that no suspicions should be aroused. I repeat that when we find $1,500 or $1,700 entered in one year to a Minister for travelling expenses, it is a matter into which we should enquire, and satisfy ourselves beyond all question that it was honestly and properly expended.

Mr. CASEY. The charging of this $728 in a lump sum for cab hire for persons not named cannot be due to the smallness of the sum, for I find immediately following, a smaller sum of 75 cents given in detail as cab hire for Mr. St. Onge Chapleau, and also another charge of $1.25. It is remarkable how very minute the Public Accounts are in some respects and how very vague they are in others. Here is a charge of $728 in a lump sum for driving unknown persons around Ottawa, and a charge of 75 cents for driving Mr. Chapleau in a cab. There must be some reason other than the smallness of the amount for not mentioning the name of the persons. In regard to the expenses of the Minister of Militia, to which attention has been called, it would be very interesting for that hon. Minister, and the other Ministers as well, to state to the House distinctly and definitely whether they had travelled on passes or not. There is enough money voted here to pay their railway fares. Do they travel on passes while receiving this money for their railway fares, or do they not? It is asserted here that they do have passes and that they do travel on them, and it is generally believed they do, so that it would be both interesting and necessary for them to deny it if it is not the case. As my friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) says, it would save Ministers from a great deal of suspicion, and save the time of the House also if the statement of expenses were put in detail, in such shape that the Auditor General could vouch, from the papers laid before him, how the money was spent. If that was done, all this discussion would be at an end, and if there was any fault to be found it would be found with the Ministers for travelling too much, but there would be no suspicion that such money was not paid for legitimate travelling expenses. Such suspicions are inevitable under the present system. We know that Ministers do take pleasure trips, that they go down to the seaside, and that they stop at the Banff Hotel when they are not on business at all, and we naturally suspect that my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, or some of the others, have spent some of this money in pleasure trips. There is no way for them to get out of the suspicion unless they show what they pay for their railway fares and hotel bills. It may seem to them degrading to have to do what ordinary mortals do, but if they did it they would at all events save their reputation. I forgot to refer, when I spoke previously, to the large amount of $5,400 for extra clerks in the Privy Council. If there is enough work to require the services of those clerks, it would be much cheaper and much more seemly in every respect, to somewhat increase the permanent staff to do this work and not to leave the option to the Minister at the head of the department to employ as many extra clerks as he likes, without any of the safeguards which surround the clerks of the permanent service, and to pay them what he wishes without applying to Parliament for a vote. If the Minister had to ask for a vote for extra clerks, the number employed would be limited and kept within bounds.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Apart from the extreme unpleasantness of discussing personal matters of this kind, I say it is not creditable that this House should be compelled by the Government, on account of the manner in which they bring down the Estimates, to enter upon such considerations. We have Ministers of the Crown charged with having passes over railways, and of having, without a previous vote of Parliament, taken money from the public Treasury for fares they did not pay. It is a discreditable state of affairs that such a charge should be made on the floor of Parliament. Hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly my gallant friend from Toronto (Mr. Denison), who is such an Imperial Federationist, and who has such a desire to follow Imperial practices, and who wants to give a present of $25,000 to the First Minister right off—

Mr. DENISON. Not at present.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.),—that hon. gentleman is very anxious to follow the English system. In many cases I think he and others who think with him are right, but does the hon. gentleman imagine it would be possible in the English Parliament to have a discussion of this kind?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Does he think it would be possible to have a Minister of the Crown charged with spending money for travelling expenses which Parliament had not voted? Why, Sir, a Minister of the Crown in England so charged, unless he were able to disprove it, would have to give up his seat at once. I hold that the proper plan in this matter is to challenge the opinion of Parliament. Some hon. members think that there should be some kind of graduated scale of allowance, and that if a gentleman is old he is to be allowed cab hire, and if he is young he ought not to be allowed cab hire. That is perfect nonsense. We do not allow indemnities to Ministers on such grounds as these. If the Prime Minister and other members of the Cabinet think they are not paid sufficient for the duties they discharge, let them come before the House properly, as they do in other instances, and propose an increase of their allowance, but do not let us have money surreptitiously taken without any vote by the House. We have been discussing this matter long enough. Let us take the opinion of the House whether it should be allowed or not. If Parliament says it should, we will not discuss it and then let the Ministers say how much should be voted, but they have no right to take money from the public Treasury unless they have it sanctioned previously by the vote of Parliament. We do not altogether agree on this side of the House as to how much should be voted. I heard one or two gentlemen say that because the Prime Minister is aged and infirm and not so active as he used to be, that something should be allowed him. Let them come down and propose it and if Parliament chooses to approve of it our voices will be hushed and there is an end to this discussion. But, if this is not done you will have this unseemly discussion forced on the Opposition, and I say forced, because they would not discharge their duty unless they accepted the challenge, given them in the manner by which the Government bring down their Estimates here. I say that the proper course of the Government in this matter is to follow the course always adopted in England, and if they want money for the expenses of the Ministers let them propose it to Parliament, and if the money is not sufficient then they can come to Parliament again. I am entirely opposed to the principle of allowing any Minister in any department to put his hand in the public Treasury to any extent he likes. I see that the Minister of Customs—a gentleman who cannot be accused of being a young man, he is not an aged man certainly, but he is not young—has the enormous sum of 50 cents charged in his department for cab hire, while other Ministers have a thousand dollars, and eight hundred dollars, and fifteen hundred dollars, charged for the same purpose. They have no right to take that money, for it was not voted by Parliament for them, and now they refuse to rise up and justify it, or to give the House, which is now endorsing the payment, an account of how that expenditure was incurred. If a Minister of the Crown uses a thousand dollars in his expenses, a sense of duty ought to impel him to send a full and accurate account to the Auditor General and have it laid before Parliament. I am sure that no Minister would take money that he is unable to give an account of. This has been styled a trivial matter, and those gentlemen who propose $25,000 to be given to this man and that man, no doubt consider it trivial, but go to some parts of the Provinces—the sentiment was uttered before and sneered at—where a man finds it all he can do, by getting up early and late, taking rest and eating the bread of carefulness to put food in the mouths of his children and tell him that a matter of $8,840 for the travelling of Ministers, $15,347 for the travelling expenses of their staff and $4,799 for cab hire is a trivial matter, and I think the electors will open their eyes in astonishment. I am not standing here to contend that some of this cab hire and travelling expenses is not a necessary and justifiable expenditure. I dare say some of it is; but I want Parliament taken into the confidence of the Ministry in this matter of the expenditure of money the same as in other matters. Let them come down and say what they want to spend, what it is for, and take a vote; then those opposed to the vote can put themselves on record, and the Government can spend what is voted and no more. But the system adopted is discreditable in the extreme. We have unseemly discussions here, which are unworthy of this Parliament, and they will be continued as long as this abominable and unconstitutional system of withdrawing public moneys without a vote is continued.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman said the Ministry sat silent when there was a charge made that they charged against the country travelling expenses when they had passes. I do not understand that any hon. gentleman made that charge. It was left to the hon. gentleman out of his own imagination to coin it, and I say to him it is utterly false, utterly untrue; he had no right, no warrant to say so, and I am quite surprised that a gentleman holding his position in Parliament should state or suppose such a thing unless he had evidence of it. Then, as to the other statement that it is unconstitutional, what are we doing at this moment, Mr. Chairman? We are asking Parliament to vote for contingencies for each department for 1889-90, as last year we asked Parliament to vote for contingencies for 1888-89. We got those votes, and the hon. gentleman knows that under previous Governments, as well as under this Government, such expenditures made in the different departments were charged to the contingent account. The previous vote is taken by Parliament. It may be quite open to say that improper items have been charged against those contingencies; that may be a matter of fair discussion. But this Government and all Governments take an annual vote for contingencies, and against the sums of money so voted and appropriated these charges are made. It is quite open to the hon. gentleman to state that they are unreasonable or ought not fairly to be considered as contingencies, but it is wrong to say that the expenditures are unconstitutional.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I will not permit the hon. gentleman to make such a charge against me unanswered. I made no such statement as that which he has put in my mouth, and the hon. gentleman's ears must have been stuffed if he did not hear the charge that was made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Who made it?

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) It was stated by an hon. member in this debate that he understood that Ministers had passes on the railways.

Mr. FOSTER. But you stated more than that.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) And that they had charged travelling expenses, and he asked whether that was the fact. I stated that no Minister had risen to contradict that charge, and that it was discreditable that such a charge should be made and received in silence. I do not know whether it is true or not; that never entered my mind. I made no charge; I said it was made, and it was made in the last ten minutes. But the hon. gentleman is not going to escape from the point we make by drawing a red herring of that kind across the track. The question is whether these expenses should be submitted to Parliament, or whether they should be taken out of a general vote for contingencies. I argued that the unseemly discussions we have here from year to year is the most convincing evidence, indeed, that when Ministers want to expend money in cab hire and travelling expenses they ought to come and ask Parliament for a distinct vote for that purpose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will not allow the hon. gentleman to escape in that way. The hon. gentleman is ashamed of the charge, and he says he did not make it. But he did make the charge, and no other made the charge before him. An hon. gentleman said that he was surprised that the amount for travelling expenses was so large, as it was understood that Ministers had passes on railways, but no one dared to say that a man who had a pass on a railway took a journey and then charged for it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Did I say so?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, you did.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a most injurious charge.

Mr. CASEY. It is quite natural that the right hon. Premier should become a little wrathful under the circumstances, and that he should, as he always does when he gets angry, stand up and scold, and he is scolding now, according to his general practice; and it is natural under the circumstances that the hon. Minister of Finance should sympathise with him in his anger and in his scolding assertion that my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island made certain statements. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island did not make those statements, and Hansard to-morrow will show that he did not make the statements which the right hon. Premier said he did. I do not suppose that if the right hon. Premier was in his ordinary temper he would make such assertions as to what my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island said; but under the influence of his imperfect hearing and bad temper for the moment, he made a distinct misstatement of the remarks of my hon. friend. What my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island said was that it was scandalous that it should be charged across the floor of this House that Ministers having passes on the railways should charge for their travelling expenses as if they had paid their fare. He did not say that such was the case, but that it was scandalous that such a charge should be made without denial. Now, the making of the charge was what I said before my hon. friend got up. What I said was this, that it was generally understood that Ministers had passes, and that we found sums charged here for travelling expenses, and I wanted to find out whether a portion of these sums was for travelling expenses on railways over which Ministers had passes. I thought it was in order for Ministers to get up and deny that they had travelled on passes; but not one did so, and I do not think any of them will deny that they do travel on passes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

An hon. MEMBER. And most of their followers.

Mr. CASEY. Well, their followers do not charge the country for travelling expenses. Here the hon. Minister of Militia has charged nearly $1,500 for travelling expenses, and if he travels on a pass, I do not think he charges anything for his railway fare. I do not suppose he would, and this makes it more difficult to explain where this $1,500 has gone. The hon. First Minister makes a great point about this money having been voted by the House previously. When he says that all these sums were voted in contingencies last year he states the fact, the vicious fact, that an enormous sum is voted for contingencies and left to the heads of the different departments to be used by them as they see fit. That is just the thing we complain of, that this money is left to them to use as if it was pocket money, and not public money at all—to use it for cab hire, for their trips to Portland, their trips to Banff Hotel, their trips to British Columbia, to use for going fishing, so far as I know, to use for going to Montreal or Quebec where they have a little business. That is what is said to be the custom of Ministers in the summer; and if they do not explain these expenses, we must conclude that a great deal of this money has gone for those little trips. Now, let us come to the point, that this large sum should not be voted in this way. If the Government want a certain sum for cab hire, let them ask for a certain sum for cab hire; if they want a certain sum for towels, or for charwomen, let them ask for it; if they want a certain sum for subscriptions to newspapers, surely they can predict that beforehand, and it need not be a matter of contingencies. Let them treat each considerable item in this way, and they will reduce the amount, which is left to the irresponsible control of the Ministers, to one-third of the present sum. One must admit that there must be a certain amount of loose money left at the disposal of each department to provide for contingencies that may occur during the year, but the amount that need necessarily be left in that shape within the limits of these departmental blocks here, and in connection with the business transacted in these blocks—the amount necessary to be left for justifiable contingencies for that service need not be large at all. There are separate contingencies for the outside service of every department, but the amount of contingencies left at the disposal of the Minister in connection with Civil Government alone, for business transacted in these departmental blocks, need not amount to more than $50,000 a year, were it not for the fact that the Ministers like to have a little loose cash for disposal in this way. No one pretends that they put it in their pockets, but we would like to know what they do with it. There are many dark corners. It may be used sometimes as an electioneering fund, sometimes for personal amusement, sometimes for other purposes only hinted at vaguely in the accounts. The fact that Parliament has voted these sums does not do away with the vicious character of the whole system.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) had perfect right to say that there is a good deal in this matter which requires explanation. If any gentleman chooses to turn to the Auditor General's Report, under the heading B, page 12, he will see that the sum which was asked for contingencies in the Privy Council was $8,000, while the sum that was spent was $15,339, being an excess of $7,339 over the amount which Parliament had allowed to the service of that department. Now, I say that the simple fact of itself that over $7,000 were taken for the service of the Privy Council in the year 1888 more than Parliament had voted for it, disposes entirely of the pretension which the right hon. the First Minister advanced that he had acted within the limits of Parliamentary appropriation. Instead of keeping within those limits he doubled the amount,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say that. I said we had a vote for contingencies in each year, and this vote before Parliament now for next year is for contingencies, and that cab hire referred to has been charged against this.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Exactly; but my hon. friend was complaining that the public money was improperly used. I have just pointed out that the fact that on a vote of $8,000 for the right hon. the First Minister's own department, $15,339 was spent, does not look as if the First Minister was setting to his colleagues that example of rigid economy which I understood was to be enforced by his presence, if not in the flesh at any rate in brass or marble or other material, in the Department of Justice. A great deal of looseness has evidently occurred in the administration of these contingencies, and no doubt this department of Civil Government, taken all in all, is one of the most extravagant in the whole compass of all these expenditures coming under the head of Public Accounts. We are now spending $13,000, and a very large sum for superannuation allowance ought, in all conscience, to be added to that if we want to ascertain the larger amount of expenditure here in Ottawa. I say nothing whatever which has occurred in the past few years warrants the enormous increase in the number of officers and the total amount of expenditure, and I am bound to say that any hon. gentleman who chooses to compare our expenditure under these heads with the expenditure in England or the United States, on similar heads, will see that, in proportion to our population, we are drifting into the most improvident and extravagant habits. There is no doubt whatever that if, particularly in the early years of the American republic, the Americans had permitted anything like the same unbounded extravagance in the administration of their public funds to prevail—which is being permitted and encouraged, I am sorry to say, by many members of this House—instead of having, as they now have, succeeded in reducing their enormous war debt to an extremely small amount in proportion to the wealth and resources of their country, they would have found it impossible to make any saving whatever. I regret to have to say that, year after year, month after month, week after week, day after day, in spite of all the professions of economy made from time to time, this expense is creeping on, and not only is it creeping on in departments which may be controlled, but every year the fixed expenses are becoming much larger. That is going to be a source of difficulty in dealing with many of the problems which wait us, and this expenditure particularly being subject more than others to the control of this House, my hon. friends will be derelict to their duty if they did not call attention to the way it is carried on from year to year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The right hon. the First Minister informs us that all those charges complained of are proper charges for contingencies. Some of these charges no doubt are properly placed under that head, and were intended to be covered by that appropriation. Of course, the question of what ought to be contingent account and what ought to be specifically stated is a question to be determined by the experience of the Government. When the Government finds that a charge is annually recurring, where a series of years shows that that charge is made every year, it ought no longer to be included within contingencies but ought to be presented to the House by a specific vote, and it is an abuse of the contingency appropriation to propose a vote for contingencies in any matter that you know is going to recur every succeeding year, and the amount of which may be very fairly estimated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You cannot do that with travelling expenses.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That may be; but take, for instance, the subject of cab hire. The hon. gentleman knows right well that the charges made in this account are charges for administration. If a Minister of the Crown comes down here and asks for an appropriation for his department, that appropriation has nothing to do with his legislative functions. It is not to do his work as an administrator that he sits here. He comes to this House as a legislator, not as an administrator. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but he knows that the appropriation that is now under discussion is not properly chargeable against contingencies. Under any form, no matter how indefinite, while a Minister may charge his expenses in performing the duties of administration against his department, he cannot charge against the department any contingency or any expense which he incurs as a legislator coming to this House. If it is necessary that that should be paid, the hon. gentleman ought to ask for it as a specific appropriation. He says he is an aged member of this House, and cannot come here as a pedestrian, like some of the rest of us, or with the same facility as he once could. That may be perfectly true, and, if the hon. gentleman thinks that is not covered by the sessional allowance, he should come here and ask for a specific appropriation, and should not charge the expense of his coming here to legislate and to lead the House against one of the departments.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sure my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would not care to have a wrong impression go to the country. He intimated that the expense of Civil Government is growing from year to year, and shows no sign of reduction. If you take the amount to be voted this year and compare it with last year, you will find there is only an increase of $2,107. If you take the statutory increases in the salary of a number of clerks, amounting, I suppose, to 600 or 700, you will find that there has been a very considerable diminution in the amount to be voted for the other expenses. So the outlook is not quite so bad as we might judge from the general remark made in regard to it by my hon. friend from South Oxford. With reference to what the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said, the difficulty is apparent to anyone in regard to some of these expenses. If there is an expense which is well known and occurs from year to year, it can easily be voted. But in regard to ministerial expenses what can we here in February tell as to what may be necessary in the way of visiting in connection with one's departmental work during the ensuing year? We may think now that there is no necessity for making a visit to any portion of the Dominion, but it may be found in the course of the year that it is necessary for a Minister to go from one place to another, and visit what is under his department and give it his personal supervision, and it is impossible to know that beforehand. I do not see how that could be reduced to a fixed sum within which one could always keep. As to cab hire, the same remark applies. Some Ministers, being fallible mortals like the rest, get ill, and a cab is necessary, and it is impossible to fix any stated sum to be voted for that particular purpose. This has always been the course adopted. I think for the whole life of this Parliament these sums have been charged to contingencies and paid in exactly the same way, and, although my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) made a good ad captandum speech, to be used hereafter on the stump, I believe that the farmers, that the honest people, the hard working people of this country, are of quite a different opinion. I believe that they do not ask any Minister who does their work and does hard work—and we are not always living in luxury, and when the hon. gentleman occupies the position of a Minister to which he aspires, and rightly, he will find that it is not a life of luxury and idleness—the people do not ask men who devote their time to the public service to do their work and travel in their interest at their own expense. They are quite willing—and

I should not fear to meet the people of the country in any section on that point—that all the legitimate, fair expenses should be paid out of the revenues of the country. Speaking for myself and for my colleagues as well, I do not think there are unnecessary expenses undertaken in this matter. Our country is one of large extent. When a man travels, he may have a pass, but everyone who travels knows that the mere railway or steamboat fare is the smallest item in the expense. We have to eat, there are other necessary expenses which, unless a man takes a biscuit in his pocket and a bottle of water, may have to be incurred.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I am very much surprised at the explanation offered by the Finance Minister in reference to the expenditure in cab hire. He stated that we were all frail mortals, and liable to get sick, and it was therefore impossible to say how much ought to be appropriated for that purpose. Do I understand him to say that Ministers who are doing their duty here are sick so often that in some of the departments they require $300, $400, $600, $800 or even $1,600 for cab hire, that they are sick all the time? If it is right and proper to charge these enormous amounts for cab hire when the Ministers are sick, have they not just as good a right to charge the attendance of the physician? That is a very unreasonable explanation. It shows that hon. gentlemen cannot defend the item under discussion, on reasonable grounds, but have to offer an argument of that kind and expect the people of the country to pay respect and weight to such a statement. This is an unreasonable charge, and they have no means of defending it, and they offer these excuses in order to cover up a transaction that will not bear the light of day. I think some other system should be adopted.

Mr. CASEY. If the Finance Minister will pardon me, I think his remarks were somewhat ad captandum, too, as he charged upon the hon. member for Prince Edward Island. He said that the country does not expect Ministers here to do work for nothing. Certainly not. We pay them well for doing our work, and what we expect of them is that at least they shall keep an account of their expenses, as any other servant of the people, or as any servant of a private employer would do; that they shall tell us just what for those expenses are incurred. If the Finance Minister was at the head of a firm, and sent an emissary to British Columbia to do some business for him, he would expect to have a very detailed account of that man's expenses. Well, Sir, Ministers of the Crown are, as the very name indicates, servants of the Crown, which means in Canada, as it does in England, practically the servants of the people. They are our servants. We give them good salaries for the work they perform, and we expect an exact account of their expenses. We expect, in the first place, a reasonable estimate of what their contingent expenses are going to be, and an exact account of it afterwards, and we do not think they should be allowed to increase their expenses at their own will. It is impossible to calculate what contingencies will be required under each head, of course, but we could come much nearer to it than we do now. I would suggest to the Minister to take the amounts paid last year for telegrams, for instance, for extra clerks, for the Stationery Office, and the Queen's Printer's account, let him take such items as these, and ask a definite amount. For instance, the Queen's Printer's account was $50,000 odd, the Stationery Office account was $37,500. Surely some estimate of the amount of stationery required in the departments could be made? There is no reason why that should be put in the contingencies. A very near estimate can be given of the amount of stationery required. If it is too large, the balance can be kept till next year. You will have the advantage of knowing beforehand what you are paying the money for, instead of leaving it in a lump sum and letting the Government spend as much for stationery, as much for washer-women, as much for towels as they see fit. Coming down to the newspapers, the hon. gentleman says that he intends to reduce that item. That is a very reasonable thing to do. He could estimate now how much he intends to reduce it. Going over a list of the papers he could strike out those that he will not patronise. He could get this ready by day after to-morrow. As to cab hire, I will only say that, although an exact estimate cannot be made, the whole amount of cab hire would be comparatively a small sum to be left in contingencies. If the Minister will take this advice and make definite and separate estimates for such items as are now included under contingencies, as far as a reasonable estimate could be made, I think he will see that the total amount left to contingencies need be but small, and it would be even less than I said a little while ago—I believe it could be reduced to $25,000 or $30,000. Estimate as nearly as you can, and then leave a small margin for unforeseen occurrences, and you have contingencies under control. The Finance Minister will say that things have been managed in this way by Reform Governments. No doubt contingencies have been left in this loose way, although the amount was not so great. But the principle was bad then, and it is bad now, and it is time for this Government, who believe, no doubt, that they have the statesmanship of the country in their ranks, should execute a real reform by putting this large amount of money in a more definite shape. If they insist, after attention has been fully called to the matter, in using this amount as pocket money to be disbursed at their own pleasure, the country will become more and more suspicious of the way they are using it.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I wish to get some information from the Minister of Finance as to the mode in which the overplus of the specific amount voted by Parliament for each department is audited by the Auditor General. Is it through special warrant, or is it taken from the general vote en bloc by Parliament? For instance, I see on page 12 that the amount of the Privy Council Office is exceeded by $7,000, Secretary of State by $4,000, Militia, $4,500, Department of Agriculture, $7,000. Is that paid by specific warrant, or how is the Auditor General authorised to pay that amount out of appropriations?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a specific amount voted for contingencies for each department; there is also a general sum for general contingencies, and if one department exceeds that special amount voted to it for contingencies the excess is made up out of the vote for general contingencies. If that is exceeded, of course there is no other way to pay it except by special warrant.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did a special warrant issue in these cases?

Mr. FOSTER. If it was not used it would be put in the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I fancy it will be brought down in the Unprovided Items, and that my hon. friend is right, that, up to the present moment, there has been scarcely a proper justification of the expenditure, and no doubt it would have been more correct if a special warrant had issued. I did not observe any special warrant for this, though I will not take upon myself to say that none issued.

Committee rose and reported progress.

ADJOURNMENT—COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What course does the First Minister propose to adopt with respect to the debate that is to take place on Monday, supposing it is not closed on that evening? It is not a matter of particular convenience to us, but it will be for the general convenience to understand whether the First Minister intends to go on with the debate de die in diem, or to take up ordinary business on Tuesday, and after Tuesday what course he proposes to pursue?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it would be more convenient for the Government to take Tuesday as a Government day. The debate can proceed on Monday, and, if not concluded on Monday night, it can stand over till Wednesday. Wednesday and Thursday are not Government days but are at the disposal of the House, and the Government will assist to have these two days, if required, for the hon. gentleman's motion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It will have to be made a special order?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will be so understood. The hon. gentleman has given notice to that effect now.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11:30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 18th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORTS PRESENTED.

Report on Penitentiaries for the year ending 30th June 1888.—(Sir John Thompson.)

Report of the Commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police Force, 1888.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. LAURIER. I would move that Mr. Colter's name be added to the Committee on Railways and Canals and Telegraph Lines, and also to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. At the time the committees were struck Mr. Colter had been elected but he had not taken his seat.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly; that was arranged for. I would ask that the name of Mr. Davin be put on the Railways and Canals Committee.

Mr. LAURIER. Very well.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 38) to amend the Maritime Court Law of the Province of Ontario.—(Mr. Charlton.)

REPRESENTATION OF KING'S COUNTY, P.E.I.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to rise to a question of privilege, and I beg permission to make the following statement: I am credibly informed and verily believe that James Edwin Robertson, one of the members of this House for the electoral division of King's County, P.E.I., has within the past twelve months performed certain services for the Government of Canada, namely, that he has acted on several occasions as medical attendant on certain sick mariners at the outport of Montague, in the said county of Kings, in the said Province of Prince Edward Island, for which services I am informed the said James Edwin Robertson has been paid out of the public moneys of Canada. I beg, therefore, to move the following resolution:—

That George Taylor, a member of this House, having stated in his place that he is informed and verily believes that James Edwin Robertson, one of the members of this House, member for the electoral division of King's County, P.E.I., has within the past twelve months performed certain services for the Government of Canada, namely, that he has acted on several occasions as medical practitioner attending upon certain sick mariners at the outport of Montague, in the said county of King's, in the said Province of Prince Edward Island, for which services he is informed that the said James Edwin Robertson has been paid out of the public moneys of Canada; be it therefore ordered that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that the said committee be directed to enquire into the facts, search for precedences, and report the result of their enquiry to this House; and whether the said James Edwin Robertson has vacated his seat.

Mr. LAURIER. In a question of this kind it is a matter of courtesy and of justice, and of parliamentary practice also, that the member whose seat is impugned should have an opportunity to give to the House whatever explanation he may have to give. I beg to move, therefore, that the debate may be now adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with my hon. friend, but perhaps that is not the best way of doing it. I think the best plan would be that it should stand as a notice on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. LAURIER. Very well.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Let it be understood that this is to be a matter of privilege, and when it is put on the Notice Paper it can be taken up at any time; of course giving due notice to the hon. gentleman whose seat is affected by it.

OTTAWA AND MONTREAL BOOM CO.

Mr. TISDALE (for Mr. GIROUARD) moved second reading of Bill (No. 23) to incorporate the Ottawa and Montreal Boom Co.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before that motion is carried, I think we ought to have the mover of the Bill present to give some explanations. As I stated the other day, when the Bill was read the first time, I believe it is a Bill embodying the same principle as that of the Bill which was before the House last year, but is much more likely to affect the navigation of the Ottawa River. I do not know that I am specially interested in the matter except as a public man, but I think the Bill is one of such an important character that the House should have the fullest explanations before adopting it. As it is contended when a Bill goes to a committee, that the principle of the Bill is sustained by the House, I do not think we ought to pass a Bill like this, about the principle of which there is any doubt, without the fullest explanation and discussion; and this is a Bill of such importance, giving this company, as I understand it, control of the navigation of the Ottawa River, and the right to expropriate property for the purpose of constructing booms, that we should have the fullest explanations before we recognise its principle.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The promoter of the Bill the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), had a conversation with me about this Bill. I told him I thought the Bill exactly of such a nature as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has said, and I told him that so far as I was concerned, it could not have my assent. But he assured me that the Bill was quite different, that its object was purely and simply for allowing the construction of one boom somewhere on the river. I said that, under those circumstances, I would not object to the Bill going on, because we could take it up in the Railway Committee, and look into it there as thoroughly as we do into other measures; but I warned him, that, if the Bill was intended to give away all the rights to the navigation of the river, from the Chaudière Falls down to Montreal, I could not support it.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is what I understand to be the meaning of the Bill.

Mr. BRYSON. I had intended to say a word or two on the principle of this Bill, but the promoter of the Bill not being here, I decided to wait until it should come before the Committee on Railways and Canals, when it would be fully discussed on its merits. To my mind it is a very serious Bill, and one which this House should hesitate about adopting. This company are asking for incorporation to control one of the most important stretches of the Ottawa River, and before the House adopts the principle of the Bill, there ought to be some discussion on it. I regret exceedingly that the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill is not in the House, for I understand that there is one clause particularly that asks for control of both sides of the river. If the company propose to boom both sides of the river, and also to construct a boom across the river, it will certainly impede the navigation of the river, and almost entirely obstruct it. I, therefore, reserve any further comments until the Bill comes before the committee.

Mr. TISDALE. My object in moving the second reading was this: Any Bill of which no hon. member is prepared to move the six months hoist should, it seems to me, go to the committee. I do not understand that the House assents to the principle of the Bill in carrying the second reading, but only decides to send the Bill to the Railway Committee, to let that committee adopt it or not as they see fit; and since no hon. gentleman is ready to move the six months hoist, any discussion on the Bill would be much more convenient in the Railway Committee than in the House. I think the action of the Railway Committee is always such as to justify me in saying that any Bill which is not in the public interest does not get through that committee. There is no work before the Railway Committee and I thought we should get some of these Bills before it. I think the Bill had better go and be disposed of there instead of hanging up here.

Mr. SPOULE. I would like to say one word in answer to what the hon. gentleman has said, as his remarks might be misleading. As I understand, the effect of the second reading is to either adopt or reject the principle of a Bill, and that is the proper stage to discuss the principle of the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that in adopting the second reading of a Bill, as regards public measures, we adopt the principle. It has always been the practice quo ad private Bills, which are to be looked after by committees specially appointed to examine them, that the discussion on the principle comes up after all the details are reported by the committee, and then, on the report of the Railway Committee, the principle is discussed in the House and finally settled. Of course, if a measure is obviously, on its face, so objectionable that it ought not to go to any committee, the general principle of the Bill should be discussed on the second reading; but unless there is some very obvious objection, it is greatly to the advancement of public business that private Bills should be sent to the various committees to be dealt with, and then, on the reports of the committees, comes up the great question, whether the Bill should become law or not.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me this is the very objection taken by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), namely: That the Bill should not be considered now unless there be a very full explanation from the mover, because it is objectionable in principle.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Mr. MITCHELL. The right hon. the First Minister has very properly drawn the distinction between the course to be pursued with regard to ordinary private Bills and those which appear to contain a vicious principle. If my hon. friend has read this Bill, he would no doubt draw the conclusion that if it is not a public Bill in the sense to which he refers, it is quasi public. It is a Bill which asks for the control of the River Ottawa from the Chaudière Falls to the Island of Montreal, and I contend that a Bill of so much importance, giving control over the most important tributary of the St. Lawrence, ought not to be dealt with in this summary manner. If it goes to the country that a Bill of this kind is before the House, and no explanation is given of its character, people will remain in ignorance concerning it; but if the mover will give the House those explanations which are necessary, then the people will understand its nature, and be enabled to see the force of objections which may be made by hon. members of this House, who see difficulties, from a public standpoint, in the way of at all passing this measure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. After that statement, I must ask my hon. friend to allow the Bill to stand over.

Mr. TISDALE. I have no objection.

Motion for second reading allowed to stand.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 19) to incorporate the Assiniboia, Edmonton and Unjiga Railway Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Bill (No. 20) to incorporate "The Hawkesbury Lumber Company."—(Mr. Labrosse.)

Bill (No. 21) respecting the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to "The New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway Company."—(Mr. Wood, Westmoreland.)

Bill (No. 22) to incorporate the Assets and Debenture Company of Canada.—(Mr. Edgar.)

Bill (No. 24) to incorporate "The Dominion Life Assurance Company."—(Mr. Trow.)

Bill (No. 25) An Act to amend the Act incorporating "The Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company of Canada."—(Mr. Cockburn.)

Bill (No. 31) An Act to incorporate the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 35) An Act respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland.)

JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF JOLIETTE.

Mr. THÉRIEN asked, Whether the Government have appointed a Judge for the District of Joliette, in the place of the late Hon. Mr. Justice Globensky; and if not, whether they intend to make the said appointment soon?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. A judge has not been appointed yet, but it is the intention to appoint one soon.

POPULATION OF THE PROVINCES.

Sir RICHARD CARTRIGHT asked, in estimating the population of the Dominion at 4,946,497, what number is assigned to each Province respectively?

Mr. CARLING. The number assigned to the Province of Ontario is 2,154,786; that to Quebec, 1,479,036; Nova Scotia, 483,217; New Brunswick, 345,292; Manitoba, 132,624; British Columbia, 131,366; Prince Edward Island, 120,176; the Territories, 100,000, making the total 4,946,497.

MR. CHARLES LEDUC.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Is Charles Leduc, of Hull, in the employ of the Government in any capacity? If so, in what capacity; in what department; when was he employed, and what salary does he receive?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Leduc is in the employment of the Government, in my department. He is paymaster and translator on the Ottawa Works, and he receives $100 a month.

MILITIA EXPENDITURE.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin) asked, What amount has been expended in paying for repairs and other works at the Quebec Citadel since the first day of June, 1887? What amount was voted by Parliament for such works since the date mentioned? What amount has been expended upon barracks for "C" Battery, British Columbia? Is it true that the money appropriated by Parliament to provide barracks for "C" Battery has been expended upon the Quebec Citadel? If so, how much?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The amount expended for repairs and for other works on the Quebec Citadel since the 1st June, 1887, up to the 30th June, 1888, was $7,232.70. The vote for construction and repairs was $75,000, and no particular amount was voted for the special work at the citadel of Quebec, the vote having been granted for the general requirements of the service. The estimates for the repairs at the citadel for that period amounted to $13,080, and the amount expended, as already stated, was $7,232.70. The amount voted for the barracks in British Columbia for 1887-8 was $14,000; there was expended up to the 30th June, 1888, $8,945.75, leaving a balance on the 30th June, 1888, of $5,054.25. No part of the money voted for the barracks in British Columbia has been applied for any other purpose than that for which it was granted by Parliament.

FISHING ON THE RIVER MATANE.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked, Whether the Government has received any communication as to the right of the Federal Government to lease or license the River Matane for fishing purposes? Does the Government intend to renew the license this year?

Mr. TUPPER. The Government has received a communication as to the right of the Federal Government to lease or license the River Matane for fishing purposes. The river is now under lease for a period of nine years from January, 1887.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FISHERIES.

Mr. PERRY asked, Have the Government appointed an Assistant Fishery Commissioner for Prince Edward Island? If so, who is he? What is the date of the appointment, and the amount of his salary?

Mr. TUPPER. The Government has not appointed an Assistant Fishery Commissioner for Prince Edward Island, but during the past season, owing to the increased vigilance which was rendered necessary by the regulations in reference to the lobster fisheries, Mr. Edward Hackett was appointed a fishery officer for Prince Edward Island, for which the department have paid him $200.

MOUNT STEWART, P.E.I., WHARF.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked, Has the Government received any petition or application from the Government of Prince Edward Island asking for the construction of a pier or wharf at or near Mount Stewart, P.E.I.? Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the construction of such pier?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Two petitions have been received asking for the construction of a wharf at or near Mount Stewart, but the Government, as yet, have taken no action on those petitions.

MR. JOHN A. GROSSE.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin) asked, Is John A. Grosse still in the employ of the Customs Department? If not, when did he resign, and what were his position and duties while so employed?

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. John A. Grosse is still in the employment of the Customs Department, but has signified his intention to resign. His duties, while in the Customs Department, have been upon the special agents' staff, whose duty it is to look after smugglers.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE GRAND RIVER, HALDIMAND COUNTY.

Mr. COLTER asked, Is it the intention of the Government to proceed at once with the construction of a bridge across the Grand River, at the village of York, in the county of Haldimand, for which work an appropriation of $10,000 was made in the Supplementary Estimates of last year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter is now receiving the attention of the Government.

CRIMINAL LAWS FOR JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

Mr. BERNIER (Translation) asked, Whether the Government have furnished to justices of the peace appointed within the past two years by the Provincial Governments copies of the compilation of criminal laws, and if not, is it their intention so to do?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. From the information that reaches me from the Secretary of State's Department, all the justices of the peace duly qualified have been supplied with a copy of the compilation of criminal laws.

REGULATIONS AND ORDERS OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. DESSAINT (Translation) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to have the Regulations and Orders of the Militia, 1887, translated and supplied to the French Canadian officers of the several militia corps?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is the intention of the Government to have the Regulations of the Militia translated and supplied to the French members of the corps.

MANUFACTURE OF CIGARS.

Mr. LÉPINE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to reduce from $75 to $6 the license fees for the manufacture of cigars?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The advisability of substituting for the present a fee proportionate to the capacity of each manufacturing establishment is under the consideration of the Government.

PRINTING THE BUDGET SPEECH IN FRENCH.

Mr. BERGERON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to have the "Budget Speech" printed in French this year?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the intention of the Government to have the Budget Speech printed in French this year, following the usual practice, and in the usual proportion.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES WITH FOREIGN STATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved :

1. That it has become a matter of extreme importance to the well-being of the people of this Dominion that the Government and Parliament of Canada should acquire the power of negotiating commercial treaties with foreign States.

2. That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she will empower Her Representative, the Governor General of Canada, acting by and with the advice of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, to enter, by an agent or representative of Canada, into direct communication with any foreign State for the purpose of negotiating commercial arrangements tending to the advantage of Canada, subject to the prior consent or subsequent approval of the Parliament of Canada, signified by Act.

He said: It is now nearly seven years since the proposition which forms the subject-matter of this motion was brought to the attention of the then Parliament of Canada by my hon. friend, the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). In that interval many things have occurred, all strongly tending, in my opinion, to justify the wisdom and foresight displayed by that hon. gentleman in calling the attention of Parliament in the strongest manner to the very great importance of obtaining those rights and privileges which this motion desires to secure for the people of Canada. Sir, in that interval many important events have occurred; much which, when my hon. friend moved his motion, was only conjecture, is now a certainty. Many things that might be considered at that time as hypotheses, are now in the region of demonstrable and ascertained fact; many of the excuses and objections which were then taken are now seen to be unfounded or, to say the least, very greatly exaggerated. It is not probable that more than a comparatively small number of the hon. gentlemen who were then present are still in this House, and I would strongly advise all those who do not recollect distinctly the discussion which then took place, to refresh their memories by examining the interesting debate which occurred on that occasion. If they will do so, if they will take the trouble to peruse the arguments on the one side and the assertions on the other, and if they will then examine a short summary of the historical events which have since occurred, they might almost imagine, recalling what occurred then and comparing it with the facts which we now know to have taken place, that they were perusing a judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on some point in dispute between the right hon. Premier of this Dominion and the Attorney General of Ontario. I doubt whether there ever was an occasion in which the facts, as we now know them, could more completely justify and vindicate the course pursued by the then Opposition, than what occurred on that occasion. I admit that there is one very important difference between the circumstances to which I allude and the result of the refusal to obtain for us the rights and privileges we then demanded. In the disputes which have taken place between the Premier of this Dominion and the Premier of the Province of Ontario and the Premiers of some of the other Provinces, at any rate the injury done to the general interests of Canada was, comparatively speaking, trifling. But this is not a question of interference with ordinary provincial rights; this is not a question of locking up territories of more or less magnitude from profitable settlement; this is not a question of withdrawing from the control of a Province, a larger or a smaller sum to be distributed among the followers of the right hon. gentleman. On this occasion the course pursued by him, the course in which he was sustained by his followers, was one which I am of opinion was in a high degree calculated to stunt and paralyse the growth of this whole Dominion. Sir, we have seen in consequence, largely, of that refusal, the loss of a great opportunity, as I believe, of conferring a great benefit upon the people of this country, and through them, in all probability, of greatly improving the relations which subsist between the two great countries with which, though in diverse ways, they are closely allied. I say that opportunity has been lost. I say more, that the sentiments and the doctrines then avowed, then avowed in particular by the right hon. leader of the Government, were calculated in no small degree to discourage particularly those of the younger of our population who had just and high aspirations for the future of this country. Sir, when men are told officially by a person occupying the position of Premier, that in an attempt to obtain for us the rights which so clearly, I think, belong to us, rights which are necessary to a proper development of our resources, when they are told, as were told on that occasion, by the man in highest authority in Canada, supported by a majority in Parliament at that time, that this resolution which, I may say, embraced precisely what the present resolution does—that this resolution to obtain the power for Canada to negotiate commercial treaties was :

"A boastful assertion of our coming strength, discounting our future, containing an ill-concealed wish that this should be a stepping-stone to something further, that in some way our independence should increase and our dependence and support decrease, and that we should as soon as convenient be cast on our own resources. This, Sir, would be an injury, a ruin, a destruction to Canada."

Sir, I cannot but regret that such language should have been uttered under any circumstances by a man who occupied the position of Premier of this Dominion. It is probably needless for me to say that I differ toto cælo not only with the expressions used, but with all that is contained and implied in that passage which I have read from the speech of the right hon. gentleman on that occasion. I think that such sentiments are degrading and debilitating to the country, that they are calculated to lower us in our own eyes and in the eyes of other nations, and I hope that this will prove to have been the last occasion on which any man holding such a high position or holding any position of importance in Canada will commit himself to such sentiments as these; and I hope that all the more because I remember on that occasion that some members who in former times and up to that date had always been prominent supporters of the right hon. gentleman were found by voice and vote recording their entire disapprobation of the sentiments which he then expressed. It is desirable before I go further that I should allude to the objections which have been taken, and which perhaps may be taken again to the proposition contained in this motion. The objections at the time were chiefly two. One class, who hardly ventured to say that the demand in itself was an improper one, thought that although there was a good deal to be said in the abstract for the right of Canada to make her own bargains with foreign powers, to negotiate, at all events, her own commercial treaties, still that it was premature for us, for various reasons, to which I will allude hereafter, at that particular moment to prefer that demand. There were others, of whom the First Minister was the leader, who declared bluntly and boldly that it was not at all desirable to obtain such powers, that we were better off acting through other parties, acting under the protection and through the agency of the Imperial authorities, that it was not desirable that Canada should have agents of her own or that Canada should speak for herself or make bargains for herself. Now, as I have said, since that particular period circumstances have developed in a very remarkable way. We have had very ample proof, as I shall presently show the House, that Canada does need the power to negotiate her own commercial treaties, and, what is necessarily involved in that, that Canada does require in certain cases, at all events, the right to appoint and to maintain agents of her own, responsible to her Parliament and responsible to her people, who will know better than those of any other country can do what are the real wants of the people of Canada, and who would keep our Government informed of the feelings of other nations, with which it is very important they should be well acquainted. The result of the refusal to acquiesce in my hon. friend's proposition were twofold: first, a great chance of vastly improving the position of the people of Canada was lost for the time being, and, in the next place, a great and needless peril was incurred, one of which might have been obtained and the other have been averted had that motion prevailed, had steps at that time been taken to obtain for the people of Canada what I, in common with my friends behind me, believe it is our clear right and our clear duty to obtain for her. But a very short time elapsed after the rejection of the motion to which I have alluded before we had the amplest possible proof in the conduct of the preliminary negotiations which preceded the very important question of the fisheries, that we were justified in making the demand we then made. I venture to say that the whole course of the negotiations from the first to the last, down to this present hour, rightly understood, is one long vindication of Mr. Blake's wisdom and foresight. In those negotiations nothing has been more clear than the lack of power to negotiate and the want of a resident Canadian agent representing us at Washington have been most painfully felt. Had we possessed that power, had we had the right to appoint our own agent, and had he done his duty, as no doubt he would have done, it is utterly impossible that the Government of Canada would have been ignorant to such an extent as they were as to what were the feelings aroused in the United States; had the Government been wisely advised on that question, had we had an agent in Washington to keep them acquainted with the state of affairs on the other side of the line, we would have been saved a very great deal of idle bluster and have been spared much subsequent humiliation. I take the ground at once that in North American affairs more particularly, in all that relates to the affairs of Canada on this continent, with all due respect I say that no English statesman will do. An English ambassador to the Government at Washington has a great deal else to attend to than the interests and rights of Canada alone. It is so of necessity, and I do not blame him therefor; they are controlled by other considerations when it is to the interest of Canada that our agent should have nothing else to do but attend to our affairs. More than that I say, what is known to every member here, what is known to every man of common sense in Canada, that it is utterly impossible that an English ambassador, notwithstanding the fact that he may have enjoyed many years of experience, can possibly know as well as one appointed by ourselves either the wants and necessities of the people of Canada, or the particular feelings and prejudices which actuate the people of the United States. Sir, I may have a little more to say on this subject, but I now simply point to it as a manifest fact known to everybody. I say it cannot be otherwise. It is quite impossible that an average English employé, coming perhaps from a very distant country, coming from an employment not in the slightest degree calculated to fit him for appreciating and understanding the exceedingly difficult position in which an English ambassador will find himself in Washington—it is morally impossible that our interests can safely be entrusted in such hands. Sir, it is no idle phrase, but it is the expression of a fundamental truth when we speak of the two worlds, when we declare this is the new world and the continent of Europe the old world. I say that everything that has occurred, notably certain incidents that have occurred very recently, goes to prove, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that Canada is no longer safe in entrusting her interests to an English ambassador or any English embassy, no matter how well-intentioned they may be, no matter how earnest may be their desire to do all they can do—and I do not in the slightest degree deny that they do desire to do all they can—to promote the interests of this Dominion. Now, Sir, let me call the attention of this House to the position in which we found ourselves placed in the early part of the spring of 1887; and I desire to do that the more, and I desire to emphasise that, because I am perfectly certain that but few of the members of this House, and still fewer of the people of this country, at all comprehend the very perilous position into which Canada had drifted in the early part of 1887. What was that position? We found ourselves face to face with a non-intercourse Bill, supported almost unanimously by the entire Congress of the United States, by the entire press of the United States, and by sixty millions of people in a state of irritation and exasperation. We found that no public man in the United States was willing to entertain a proposition for our benefit, until, at any rate, we had entirely ceased from the treatment of their fishermen of which they complained. We found, Sir, that this non-intercourse Bill was of such a character, that it menaced us with commercial war, a thing divided by a very narrow barrier from actual war, and I need not say war of that character would be almost a crime against humanity, and calculated in the highest degree to injure the interests of civilisation. Now, Sir, I ask the hon. gentlemen opposite, I ask the Prime Minister, and I ask his colleagues, do they venture to dispute that this is a true statement of the state of affairs in the spring of 1887? Sir, I pause for a reply.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Go on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I pause for a reply.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You will get a reply by-and-by.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I can well understand the difficulty which the hon. gentleman labors under. Probably the hon. gentlemen's memory is better than I may have given him credit for; probably the First Minister is aware that the language which I have used, yes, the very words which I have used, is not the language used by me, is not the language used by my friend from Quebec (Mr. Laurier), and is not the language used by my friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake), but they are the exact, the identical words which were used by a man who of all others had best right to speak for hon. gentlemen opposite; it was the language used by their High Commissioner in esse, by their late plenipotentiary, by their colleague the then Finance Minister, when that hon. gentleman came down to us to plead that we should not oppose the sanctioning of the Fishery Bill. I wish, Sir, that not only the hon. gentleman opposite but that others outside this House should know, that in making those statements I have but copied literally and exactly the language used by that gentleman. I shall not hesitate to call the attention of the House, and as far as I can the attention of the country, to the manner in which Sir Charles Tupper described our position in April, 1887. Quoth that hon. gentleman when advocating the Fishery Bill:

"Yesterday we stood face to face with the non-intercourse Bill sustained by the united action of the Senate and House of Representatives, sustained by almost the whole press, Republican and Democratic, of the United States, sustained with a few exceptions by a prejudiced, irritated and exasperated people of sixty millions lying along our borders."

Sir, those are tolerably strong expressions, but the hon. gentleman goes on to say:

"They said," referring to the arguments used by the Commissioners on the other side,

"that such was the hostility of public men in regard to Canada, and the treatment by Canada of their fishermen, that if to-morrow any relaxation of the tariff of the United States was made by an Act of Congress it would contain a clause excepting Canada from its operations, so' as to deny us its advantage."

And further on I find that our plenipotentiary, Sir Charles Tupper goes on to tell us :

"We stood face to face with a Bill providing for non-intercourse between the United States and Canada. I need not tell you that that Bill meant commercial war, that it meant not only the ordinary suspension of friendly feeling and intercourse between the two countries, but that it involved much more than that. If that Bill had been brought into operation by the proclamation of the President of the United States, I have no hesitation in saying that we stood in the relation to that great country of commercial war, and the line is very narrow which separates a commercial war between the two countries from an actual war."

What such a war would be I quote the hon. gentleman again; he declares :

"That I consider that such would be the greatest misfortune that could happen to the civilised world—a collision between the two great English-speaking nations."

The hon. gentleman goes on to point out—although he says this in cautious and diplomatic language as becomes a High Commissioner—that he felt bound to take a vastly broader view of the situation than his hon. colleagues the Minister of Marine or the Minister of Justice, whom he almost intimates, I am afraid, took a very narrow and pedantic view of the real relations between the two countries at that moment. This House cannot be ignorant of what occurred on that occasion, this House cannot be ignorant of how in April, 1887, Sir Charles Tupper in red-hot haste made his way down to Washington, and how he interviewed the American Government; nor can they be ignorant that he returned with a clear conviction on his mind, at any rate, of the very perilous character of the situation into which we had drifted, and that forthwith, upon that hon. gentleman's return, a complete and total change came over the whole policy of the Administration. Now, Sir, it is not my purpose at present to discuss how far the policy they adopted in 1886 was or was not a wise and prudent policy. But one thing is most manifest; that be that policy good, or be that policy bad, the moment that Sir Charles Tupper had come face to face with the American authorities, the moment that he had ascertained the perilous position in which we stood, that instant the policy of the Government was totally reversed. Did we hear of one solitary single seizure of American fishermen's boats during the whole year 1887? (I say nothing of 1888 because at that time the modus vivendi, I believe, was in full operation) but during the whole of 1887, according to President Cleveland, if I remember his message aright, the American Government had nothing to complain of, and the American fishermen had nothing to complain of. Why was that? Are we to suppose that the conduct of the American fishermen in 1887 differed materially from the conduct of the American fishermen in 1886? No. I have not the slightest doubt that the American fishermen deported themselves in 1887 precisely as they did in 1886, but the Government discreetly, if not valiantly, had seen occasion (and for that I am not disposed to blame them)—had seen occasion to alter their whole policy, and from the day that Sir Charles Tupper returned from Washington not one word of complaint is breathed against us by the American people, because the whole policy of the Canadian Government appeared to have undergone an alteration from that moment. Now, Mr. Speaker, the position that I take is this. It is quite clear that when Sir Charles Tupper went down to Washington he had but a very imperfect appreciation of the situation. It is quite clear the Government had but a very imperfect appreciation of the situation. No doubt it is impossible it should be otherwise. The British embassy had kept them advised to the best of their power; but it is perfectly clear, and it was admitted in substance by Sir Charles Tupper himself, that until the time he went down to Washington, he was quite unaware of the real position of things. Sir, I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite, and I wish to ask this House, how was it, by what interposition was it, that Sir Charles Tupper and the Government were suddenly and unexpectedly awakened to a sense of the danger of the situation into which they had drifted? Sir, it was not through the British ambassador or the British embassy, but, as Sir Charles Tupper himself admitted, mainly through the interposition of a Canadian resident in the United States, who by good fortune happened to be better aware than the Government here or the British representative at Washington, of the state of feeling in the United States, and the real peril we were running. Sir, whatever may be said as to the schemes that gentleman recommends, no man who looks at the situation, no man who reads the statement of Sir Charles Tupper can deny, that Mr. Erastus Wiman, for it is to him I refer, rendered a great and important service to the people of Canada on that occasion.

Mr. DAVIES. That is, if we believe the High Commissioner.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If we take the High Commissioner's statement. And, Sir, if we do not take the High Commissioner's statement, if we are to suppose that those gentlemen had deliberately dragged us into such a position as the High Commissioner states, what are we to think; what are we to think, if, with full knowledge, obtained from the British embassy or anywhere else, they had brought us into such a position that we were separated by only a thin partition from actual war? Now, in connection with that, I may refer to the present position in which we find ourselves. Sir, I do not pretend to approve of the manner in which the late British ambassador was treated by the American Government. It is quite true that he displayed great indiscretion; it is quite true that he fell into a most patent and palpable trap; it is quite true that he did serious injury to President Cleveland in the late campaign; and I think I may add that it is quite true that President Cleveland did serious injury to himself in the minds of many people in the United States by the mode in which he retaliated. But, Sir, what position, again I ask, does Canada find herself in? At a critical period in our history, when it is a matter of grave importance to us that our Government should be kept well advised as to what is likely to be the intention of the incoming Administration at Washington, we find, by reason of a personal difference between Her Majesty's representative on the one hand and the American authorities on the other, that diplomatic relations have been for several months practically suspended between the two countries. Now, Sir, I say it is high time that this kind of thing should be amended. I say, we need, and those two facts I have stated show that we need, and that the time has come for supplying that need—we need to have agents or representatives of our own at such a point at any rate as Washington, not to speak of other places with which we have important relations. That is becoming a necessity to us in the most ordinary times. Such is the magnitude of the interests between Canada and the United States that if there be one point on the earth's surface where it is important to Canada to have an agent who shall keep our Government well advised, who shall be responsible to the Government and people of Canada, who shall take his orders from us, and who shall know that it is his business to look after the interests of Canada and nothing else, it is there; more particularly because at this present moment there is a very dangerous issue unsettled in the Fisheries question. Then there is a great question raised which is likely, very largely, indeed, to affect the relations between this country and the United States; and I say, Sir, that this double power, the power to negotiate without reference to a distant power, the power to appoint an agent of our own, is becoming hourly and daily, more and more essential to the good government and development of Canada. Sir, in my opinion, we have lost a great deal by our inaction in this matter, and we stand to lose a great deal more. Looking at the correspondence which passed between Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Bayard, looking to the language President Cleveland used in December, 1886, even at the very moment when he was warning our Government of the risks they would run if they persisted in the policy they had adopted in the early part of that year, it is quite clear that a considerable number of American statesmen were not indisposed to treat with us, if we were disposed to treat with them on fair and reasonable terms. One of the consequences which I deplore from the refusal to satisfy what was then a felt want, one of the consequences that will follow if the present Parliament is ill-advised enough to take no steps in that direction, is this: that such a refusal undoubtedly tends to degrade and dispirit our people—that it is undoubtedly a thing which lowers us in our own eyes and in the eyes of our neighbors. When it is clear, as it is on every page of these voluminous fishery reports which have been brought down, that we can take no action on our own part at all, that we must go from post to pillar, that we must refer our communications to the Foreign Office or the Colonial Office, as the case may be, who must send them to the British ambassador at Washington, to be by him transmitted to the American Government, whose answer travels, by the same circumlocution back to Canada, after months have elapsed, I say the time has come when the position of things should be handled boldly. I say, though I do not in the least dispute the good intentions of the British ambassador, that very often he is perfectly useless to us, and under certain circumstances his advocacy may be downright injurious to our case. Our business is not his business, at any rate is not his sole business, or that to which he is bound or disposed to pay the most regard; and the circumstances are such that even if the British embassy desired most earnestly to consult the good of Canada and the good of Canada alone, they do not and cannot possess the requisite knowledge and information to put our case one-half as well as Ministers of our own Privy Council or agents appointed by ourselves. Now, Sir, let us see what would be the result of manfully pressing this claim of ours. Not the least valuable result would be that it would give us a clear understanding of the position we occupy. I, for my part, do not in the slightest degree believe that, if this proposal were properly placed before the British Government, the British Government would refuse to consider it in a favorable light. We have no ground for supposing such a thing. On the contrary, the whole course and current of their dealings with us goes to show that the British Government are perfectly willing to listen to any reasonable proposition on our part. If they should intimate to us that it is a power they could not grant, then it will be time, but not till then, to consider our position. For myself, I have to say this: I cannot at all agree with the First Minister or with his following in supposing that we are to consider our present position a finality. I say that, naturally and inevitably, this, which is, at the best, but a tadpole sort of existence, must come to a termination. I say that the question is in the minds of those who care for the future of Canada, is rather whether this form of existence has not lasted too long already. I say that the true end of Confederation, in the mind of every true Canadian, in the mind of every man who is honest in his convictions, is to pave the way for fuller rights and powers and for a fuller manhood than we now possess. What were the excuses to which we have been treated heretofore? These hon. gentlemen told us, when we made this proposition before—some of them, at any rate—that although in the abstract they did not object to this, yet that we were too hasty, that we had not succeeded at the time in incorporating British North America into one grand whole, and, that, even when we had incorporated it, we had not perfected the material bond so as to enable us to look upon that incorporation as a reality. Well, these pleas, at any rate, are now at an end. We may have proceeded too hastily in our work, we may have been not altogether wise and discreet in the measures we have adopted, but, at any rate, the thing is done—it is done after one fashion or the other, and we are now responsible for the good government and management of the whole Dominion of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific; and, being so responsible, I say that the time has come for taking the next step, and that this step—the right to make our own treaties, the right in certain cases to appoint our own agents—is the proper, necessary, and inevitable one from which no man who desires to see Canada develop itself as much as she can with her resources develop herself, will ask to recede. Why, at this moment, and the right hon. the First Minister knows it well—and I presume his followers know it well—we are responsible for the good government of that immense area. We cannot look for help in defending that, at any rate, for any material or substantial help. If Canada is to be defended, she must be defended by Canadian arms and Canadian hearts, and she need not and ought not to look for any other assistance to do it. The right hon. gentleman has assented to that position, and the inevitable consequence is this, that if we are responsible, as I say we are, for the defence and good management of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we should have full power to make commercial treaties, to appoint agents, and to advise and instruct our Government when and how this best can be brought about. I can see no reason for supposing that the British Government, when this necessity is fairly put before them, would raise any objection to granting us those powers. What, after all, do we ask for? We ask that Her Majesty the Queen of Canada, acting by and through the Parliament and Privy Council of Canada, should use her prerogative to appoint agents, as she most undoubtedly has the power to do, to deal with foreign States on our behalf. Why, Sir, the right hon. the First Minister, if his followers do not, must know quite well that powers greater than those, that powers, not of making commercial treaties alone, but of peace and war, were ceded to an ordinary trading company, in the person of the Honorable the East India Company which, for years and years, and I believe the thing was acknowledged by English courts, used to make commercial treaties, aye, and used to make war and depose princes and annex territories, almost as large as North America, at their own sole will and pleasure; nor were they ever called upon by the British Government to account for their exercise of those powers. I do not think this is a case in which precedents will avail us much. I do not think, for my part, that any position at all analogous to ours is to be found in the known world, or has ever existed for the matter of that; but as I am aware that some of these hon. gentlemen are exceedingly anxious that every step we take should be fortified by precedent, I will just briefly read to them, as embodying to a considerable extent my view, at any rate, of the position of the people and Parliament of Canada, some remarks which I notice were made not long ago in another place by an eminent judge, now a senator, appointed by the First Minister himself. Speaking of the position of Canada that hon. gentleman used these words:

“We Canadians are part of the Empire in confederation, under a common sovereign, yet with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. We Canadians have the making, moulding and developing of the law, the recognition, or rejection of principles which shall prevail in our community, and to us it belongs exclusively to enact and declare, as a Parliament, in all concerns the welfare and good government of Canada.”

And such powers, as I assert in this motion, do most undoubtedly concern the welfare and good government of Canada. Now, I say this House, if it has any function, is here for the purpose of trying to build up a nation at the earliest possible moment. That is what we are here for; and if we do not recognise that, I say that we are false to our principles and traitors to the people of Canada who sent us here. I will go further, and say if that is not the object of sending us here, if that was not the object of Confederation, we would have been better off as we were. I say we have been wasting time and energy to exceedingly little purpose. I know much of the difficulty which undoubtedly attends the good government of Canada is due to the uncertainty of our position in many ways. I know that has an influence in two ways to our detriment. I know that that uncertainty, that lack of such powers as we now desire to obtain, is one cause why many of the best immigrants who come to the New World pass us by; I know that is one of the causes why we are unable to retain a great many of the best of those who come to us; aye, Sir, and why a great many of the best of our young and enterprising men are found leaving us from day to day. Our present status as a dependency—say what you like of it—is but a low one. It is not a status of full manhood, of full freedom and capacity to deal with our own interests. This is felt, and felt strongly, by others than ourselves. This is a sentiment which is not in the slightest degree confined, I am happy to say, to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. But the other day, although I cannot say that I agreed with that gentleman on all points, I had an opportunity of perusing a speech made by no less a person than the president of the Imperial Confederation League, a distinguished member of this House. And it may be interesting to hon. gentlemen opposite to know what such a gentleman, who, if my memory serves me right, has been declared to supply the missing brains of a large number of others in that league—it may be interesting to these gentlemen to know what that hon. gentleman stated as to our present position: "Do you know," quoth Mr. President, "that Canadians are not yet free. Wars may take place, and treaties dealing with Canadian interests may be made without the Canadian people having the right to utter a single word regarding them. I desire to have the full rights of a British subject, and for that reason think that Canadians should be admitted to the Imperial Parliament." I do not agree with that gentleman on all points, but he has stated the exact and literal truth in what he said as to the present incomplete status of the people of Canada, which he desired to amend in one way and which I desire to amend in another. But I am willing to believe that the objects of both of us are alike, to raise ourselves from the present low plane of political existence, to one higher and more worthy of the people to whom we belong, and, I will add, to the people from whom we sprung. The Government have made, I admit, an attempt—a feeble attempt—to meet this want. I refer to their action in the appointment of a High Commissioner who, in some mysterious way, was to fulfil all the functions, all the duties, all the responsibilities which we would rather devolve on persons appointed by us to deal directly with the Governments with whom we come in contact. I have nothing to say against the abilities of the gentleman who first filled, or the gentleman who at present fills that office. I dare say they did, on the whole, all that it was possible for them to do. My objection is different. My objection is that they are in the wrong place, after all said and done, and that they are obliged to act in the wrong way. It will not do, at any rate, it will not do any longer, for the people of Canada to speak through the mouths of persons who are not responsible to them and are not appointed by them. Our commissioner has, of necessity, in his dealings with foreign governments, in his dealings with foreign authorities, to act through and under the orders, to a very great extent, of the British Foreign Office and of the British ambassadors; nor can it be otherwise so long as the present state of affairs lasts. I do not for one moment desire to disguise from the House that my main aim in bringing forward this motion is to aid and assist in carrying out the policy which I advocated a year ago on the floor of this House. I tell the hon. gentleman that I hold it of supreme importance that we should have a perfectly free hand in dealing with the people of the United States. I say that is of the vastest importance not merely to Canada, but to England and to the Empire at large. I am not going to inflict—it is not necessary to my present purpose—any long array of statistics on the House, and yet I cannot forbear calling attention for a few brief moments to certain most remarkable facts which are revealed to us in the volume of Trade and Navigation which was laid on the Table a few weeks ago. Sir, it is clear that, with the exception of England and her Colonies, our commerce with the United States is of incalculably more value to the people of Canada than our commerce with all the rest of the world—ten times over. How stands the case? We find that, last year, the total volume of our trade was $193,000,000. Of that the United States alone took $91,000,000 export and import. Our trade with nearly every other country in the world, not excepting Great Britain, declined considerably. Our trade with the United States alone showed an increase of $9,000,000 on a trade of $91,000,000. If we look to the exports of our own produce, the case becomes stronger still. We find that we exported of the produce of the people of Canada—our own articles of produce—$78,297,000 worth. Deducting the amount exported to Great Britain and her Colonies, which was $37,000,000, the balance remaining was $41,297,000, and of that the United States alone took from us $37,323,161; so that, excepting Great Britain and her Colonies, our trade with the United States is nine times as great as our total trade with all the rest of the world put together. And the increase in the amount of products which they took from us in that one year alone amounted to the total volume of our trade with all the rest of the world except Great Britain and her Colonies. Why, we find that in articles of the mine they took $3,341,000; in fisheries, $3,128,000; in the articles from the forest, $10,622,000; in agricultural products, $10,300,000; in manufactures, $1,632,000; and in miscellaneous, $701,000; so that, out of our five principal articles of export, the United States were beyond comparison our best customers for the articles of the mine, for the fisheries, for the produce of our forests and our agricultural products. They were the best customers we had, and the only customers we had in whose case there was a large and manifest increase. Now, in dealing with other countries, I am quite willing to admit that it is of less moment to us to be kept advised of the temper and possibly of the prejudices of the people with whom we have to deal; but I say that, in dealing with the United States, we have had the clearest possible evidence which any man can conceive that, in the first place, we run great risks unless we are kept well advised as to all that happens in that great country, and in the next place, that we cannot at all depend upon our present sources of information to give us any accurate advice as to what the Americans may be feeling or as to what they may be intending to do as far as we are concerned. Therefore I say it is indispensable that we should be well advised as to the progress of events, that it is indispensable that we should be able to seize the best moment for negotiating with them, that it has become clear that it will not do that we should be compelled, when the favorable moment occurs, to make a reference to a distant power 3,000 miles away, and above all that it is for the manifest interest of the two countries—for the manifest interest of Great Britain no less than ourselves—that there should be free and frequent intercourse between the men who are charged with the government of Canada and the men who are charged with the government of the United States. I repeat that that is best for us and that it is best for England too. I think now hon. gentlemen opposite will understand, if they ever had any doubt about it, that there is no wavering in the policy adopted by this side of the House. We are prepared to carry out the propositions which we heretofore propounded to the House, and we are not disposed to shrink from the natural results of those propositions. We say that these are our clear right. We say that, though there might have been before a sort of lame excuse for regarding our proposal as a sort of abstract proposition, because, as was then alleged, forsooth, we were in the midst of a fiscal experiment, because we were cherishing some dreams, many of which have, as we know to our cost, proved utterly futile, yet now we have the absolute need of the power which we demand. More than that, I assert that the effect of perpetual pupilage to which hon. gentlemen would condemn us lowers us not only in our own eyes but in the eyes of our neighbors, and that it is partially responsible for the political debasement that very many of us have regretted to see creeping over this country for some years past. Now, I know that there are hon. gentlemen here who, whenever a question of this kind comes up, affect to think that it is necessary for them to consider how it will harmonise with the policy of the parent state. Sir, I have to say this, in the first place, England is very well able to take care of herself. English statesmen are in the habit of considering measures in the English Parliament according as they will or will not promote the interests of England, and I say that it is the duty of Canada's representatives, and of Canadian statesmen, first and mainly to consider what is for the interest of Canada. But I am quite willing to admit that although there is a good deal of hypocrisy about all this professed desire to do nothing which can clash with the interests of England, particularly when I see this desire expressed by men who have not scrupled to adopt a policy in utter contradiction to the avowed policy of Great Britain, a policy which is continually reducing the volume of our trade with Great Britain, a policy which is enlarging, in spite of all obstacles, our trade with the United States, although I know that much of the language used has no honest foundation at all, I am quite willing to admit that there are a considerable number among us who do honestly desire in promoting the welfare of Canada, to promote the welfare of England also; and to these men on both sides of the House, I say that I believe it will be found, I am pretty certain that it will be admitted by all the more advanced English statesmen, at any rate, that the true policy for England to adopt is, under existing circumstances, to devolve upon Canada the direct control of North American affairs. I say that this is really very much more dignified and very much safer, too. Under existing circumstances the fact of Canada having to approach the authorities of the United States, not speaking for herself, but speaking through the mouth of the British ambassador, is very little more than just a temptation to the baser sort of American politicians to hurt us for the sake of affronting England. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), were he free to speak, could give the House some valuable evidence on that point. I know that we could obtain redress for any grievance of which we would have to complain quite as readily through our own agent as if we spoke through the mouth of an English Minister at Washington. Now, Sir, it is no business of mine to criticise the conduct of the English Government, but I will say this: that the mere fact, that to day, under the circumstances with which we are familiar, knowing as the English Government do, knowing as we all do, the enormous importance, in every point of view, that Great Britain and the United States should be in thorough accord, it is a tolerable evidence, although a secondary evidence, of the truth of many things that I have said here to-day, that, whereas, it is manifest that there is no post whatever in the English diplomatic service which calls for higher abilities, which needs a higher class of men, than the post of British Minister at Washington; yet to this day, I believe, according to the technical rules of English diplomacy, the British Minister at Washington fills but a third-rate, or, at best, but a second rate position in the English diplomatic corps. I think I am correct in saying that he is inferior, even to an official, comparatively, of such minor importance as the British ambassador at Madrid. I know that there may be considerations of petty technical etiquette which have brought this thing about; but I say that it is hardly satisfactory to us, nor do I believe that it ought to be quite satisfactory to the English Government that this should be the case. We have seen to our cost that it is imperatively necessary for England, if England wants to promote good will between herself and the United States, that she should be represented at Washington, not by men of inferior grade, or, it may be, of inferior capacity, but by the best and most distinguished men which England can produce. Now, Sir, I desire briefly to summarise the results at which we have arrived. In the first place, I lay down as a self-evident proposition, what I think hon. gentlemen on the other side are hardly in a position to contradict, that our position, to all intents and purposes, is without precedent or parallel. We here, the Parliament and the Government of Canada, are responsible in the highest sense for the good government of nearly half a continent. Although similar obligations and responsibilities may be, and in some circumstances have been, imposed on other communities situated like ourselves, there is this most material difference, that we alone are side by side, for more than 3,000 miles, with a frontier interlaced and interwoven in every conceivable way with one of the greatest powers now existing in the world, if not, potentially considered, the every greatest. Sir, under these circumstances where do we find ourselves? We find ourselves with power to do almost any amount of mischief, with power, as Sir Charles Tupper showed clearly enough, to embroil the two Governments, but practically helpless for any good or useful purpose. I say the time has come when that situation, which was long felt to be inexpedient, is fast becoming intolerable; I say that indirectly it is responsible, in no inconsiderable degree, for the exodus of a very considerable proportion of the best of our population, that it is responsible, also, to some extent, for the inferior quality and quantity, perhaps not so much of the immigrants who come here, as of the immigrants who, having come here, and understanding the position, elect to remain with us. I say that the knowledge that we occupy a comparatively low political position goes a long way to account for the lack of a wholesome public spirit, and for the failure to weld our Provinces into one compact whole. Now, for all this I say the natural and appropriate remedies are such as we point out. I do not say that this resolution, if it carries, will effect all that we desire, but I do say that power such as we ask, to manage our own affairs, power to act independently, particularly if we use it as we ought to use it, to come to a better understanding and better terms with the United States, particularly if we use it, as we ought to use it, to foster friendly relations between the United States and the mother country, would, to a very large extent, contribute to do away with the evils to which I have alluded. More than that—and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to contradict it—I say that Canadians are best able to deal with Canadian interests, and that more especially in all North American affairs, Canadians possess naturally and instinctively the knowledge which can only be obtained in the case of English officials by long and protracted experience in American affairs. And I say, what is patent to all, that we have a thousandfold more interest in maintaining good and friendly relations with the United States in particular than it is possible for any English officials to possess. Now, Sir, to all this, what sort of reply are we likely to get? If I am to judge from some of the statements I have seen in the press which is subsidised by, and which supports hon. gentlemen opposite, I am sorry to say that many men appear to think that it is fitting for Canadians to crawl rather than to stand upright. Why, we are told by some of these men: Suppose the British Government do not like your proposal, suppose the British Government were to threaten to let you go, what would become of you, what would you do, where would you go, where would you be? All I have to say is this, that if this sort of cowardly utterance is to be the outcome of twenty-one years of Confederation, our time, as I said before, has been worse than wasted. I say for my part: out on such dastards! Is it true that Canada is inhabited by five millions of cowards? Sometimes, looking at the outrages to which our people have stooped to submit, I almost fear such is the case, although I cannot bring myself to believe that when the facts are known and the case is fairly presented to them they will be found for one moment to entertain the cowardly plea set out in their behalf. I ask, for what purpose does this House of Commons sit here? Is it to discuss and to promote measures calculated to advance the welfare of the people of Canada, or is the highest aspiration of the majority of this House to play the part of jackal to the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Manufacturers Association? We are told that this is a great step onward, and therefore we must be cautious; that great consequences may be involved, that we do not know what is likely to come out of taking any such position as this. Well, I admit it is a great step onward, and a great step in the right direction too. I admit that grave consequences are involved or may be involved in it, and I say it is high time these consequences should be considered and these issues, whatever they may be, should be faced. But, Mr. Speaker, I deny emphatically that these parties have the slightest right whatever to assume, as they do assume, that the British Government or the British people, provided always the case be fairly and honestly stated to them, will have any objection to the proposition which I now submit, just as I deny, and deny most emphatically, that any man here or elsewhere has the right to assume that if fairly and honorably treated the Government and people of the United States would be found unfriendly to the Government and people of Canada. If, as has been alleged, that be the case, if the Government and people of the United States are today actuated by unfriendly and hostile feelings to the people of Canada, then I say it is not the fault of the people of Canada, but it is very largely the fault of the policy of the present Government. Sir, we see it constantly alleged that the United States will not treat with us. This is false. We know perfectly well that the highest authorities in the United States held out the olive branch to these gentlemen nearly two years ago. We know how that proposition was received, that the door was shut in those men's faces. We know that after that, although they were cautious in word, our Government showed, and showed, I am sorry to say, only too clearly, they were not actuated by feelings of genuine and sincere friendship towards the people of the United States. Must I recall to the House the scene which took place here about a year ago, when hon. gentlemen opposite rose in their places to refuse to implement their own statutory offer to the people of the United States, and when they were taken by the throat by the High Commissioner, the then Finance Minister, and compelled ignominiously to recede from the position which they had declared that no man but a traitor could recede from? Have we not seen, to the disgrace of Canada be it said, that the privilege of sending free fruit from the United States, to this Dominion was attempted to be withdrawn by a petty tax on the packages in which that fruit came into this country? Have we not seen lately, only the other day, contrary to the advice of every man competent to speak on the subject, those hon. gentlemen deliberately challenging the United States by the needless and foolish imposition of an extra duty on exported logs? The fact is this: first, they do their best by small, petty indignities to disgust and irritate the Government of the United States, and then they plead that the United States will not make a bargain with them. I will tell the hon. gentlemen when they may with some degree of propriety say that the United States will not make a bargain with the people of Canada. When Canada possesses a capable and upright Ministry, when that Ministry has succeeded in proving to the people of the United States, and to the Government of the United States, that they are actuated by feelings of sincere friendship and a desire to be good neighbors, when Canada has obtained the right to make her own bargains with that country and other countries, when Canada has a right to appoint her own agents, when she has felt her way, as in a matter of such importance she should feel her way, and proceeded cautiously, and when under these circumstances the people of Canada have offered fair and reasonable terms to the people of the United States, then, if that offer were refused, we would be justified in saying to our people that a very good opportunity had been lost some time ago by the folly and obstinacy of the Government of Canada, and that we must wait for some favorable opportunity, until the mischievous impression produced by the foolish conduct of the Government has had time to subside. But, as the matter stands, we cannot say that the people of the United States are not disposed to make a bargain with us. Why, all these conditions I have mentioned are absent. Canada has not a capable and upright Ministry, Canada has not through its Ministers showed herself sincerely desirous of cultivating neighborly relations with the United States, Canada has not the power to make her own commercial treaties, Canada has not the power to appoint her own agents, Canada has not offered fair and reasonable terms, in trade matters at all events, to the United States.

Sir JOHN A MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, Canada has not: and until these things are done it is utterly preposterous on our part to argue for one moment that the United States would refuse fair and reasonable terms offered at the proper moment in the proper spirit. I have deliberately omitted not a little bearing specially on our position as regards the United States which perhaps might have strengthened my argument in some respects, and I have omitted it, not because I am in the slightest degree afraid to speak what I believe to be the truth on these points, but because I am willing to deal with this subject generally in the broadest possible aspect. This House has now an opportunity to show of what metal it is composed; this House has the opportunity to show whether it desires to assist the just and righteous aspirations of Canadians for a large measure of power in their own affairs, or whether, so far as it can do, it is disposed to remain in a state of political childhood. No little depends, I admit, on the answer this House may give, and still more depends on the answer the people of Canada may choose to give to the proposition we now submit. I do not at all desire to conceal from you, Mr. Speaker, or this House, that there are many things of importance involved in this proposition. I have no doubt in my own mind there are questions of great gravity now engaging the attention of the public, and more particularly of the younger portion of the community. Men are beginning to ask themselves on all hands whether this Confederation is to be a political cul de sac, or whether it is to be, what the hon. gentleman says that it never should be, a stepping-stone to a higher form of political existence. Sir, they are asking this, further: if we are to remain forever in a state of dependency, whether Confederation was worth all or half the sacrifices we made to obtain it? Sir; for our part we neither fear to state the problem, nor do we fear to work out the solution. I believe that if the people of Canada do possess the spirit which befits them, if they possess the spirit of freemen, if they are worthy of their ancestry, they will welcome such a task instead of shrinking from it. I repeat again that if they do not possess such a spirit, if we find that they shrink from such a task, then, in my judgment, the twenty-five years that have been spent in attempting to work out Confederation have been worse than wasted. We have gone back and not forward in that case in the matter of political education. I, for my part, hope for better things. I believe that all the people of Canada require is to have those facts fully and fairly presented to them. All they require is to be made aware of what is wanted, of the opportunities that have been lost, of the perils that have been incurred, and of the real character of the proposition which we submit. Sir, when that is done, when the people do know that all we ask and all we demand is simply permission to manage our own affairs, to appoint our own agents to deal with other nations as we see fit, to make the best terms we can with our neighbors across the line, and with any nation willing to enter into similar relations with us, then Sir, I believe that with scarce a dissentient voice on the part, at any rate, of all those who desire to see Canada become what Canada ought to be, they will agree with the motion which I have now the honor to move in this House.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, whatever may be said of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition in this House as to the rightness of their principles and the practicability of their methods, I think it will never be alleged against them that they lack variety or that they are wanting in versatility of movement. My hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) who has just taken his seat started out by saying that much had occurred since 1882, and in that sentiment I entirely agree with him. Much has occurred since 1882; but to the student of the political history of Canada in after days, there will be nothing more amusing, if not more interesting, than the strange variations which the party known as the Liberal party in Canada has undertaken since 1882 and carried out up to the present time. Sir, in 1882 we found that party solidly planted with both feet upon the solid basis of free trade. They would make no compromise with the enemy. Protection even to a limited extent was a crime and a blunder, vicious in its conception, and it could not help being terribly injurious in its result. If they had to fight the question in Canada for that year or more years, no matter how long, they would take their stand upon the eternal principles of right and justice, so far as it affected trade, and they would stick to the freest possible trade in this country, and the quickest possible taking-off of the trammels of protection. Time went on and something occurred. The elections of 1887 were near at hand, and just a little while, only a little while, before the time when the people should be called upon to poll their votes, that party, which planted itself on the bed-rock of the principles of free trade through their leader of that time (not their leader of to-day), who spoke for his party, and who spoke after consultation with my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Sir Richard Cartwright), declared that so far as he and his party were concerned those who believed in and those who profited by protection in this country had nothing to fear if they should return his party to power; they had nothing to fear, because as the people had once, twice, yea, on many occasions in bye-elections outside of the general elections, declared that they required a policy of protection, protection was therefore a fixed fact in this country that neither he nor his party would be found attempting to disturb it. Well, Sir, the elections of 1887 passed, and the people did not listen to the voice of the charmer though he charmed ever so wisely. The result of that election brought about a very sudden change. Then it was no longer free trade to be fought out to the end, then it was no longer protection to be upheld as they asserted it would be if they came into power; but, inside of a month or two, after the people had spoken at the polls many of the foremost men of the party, and of the foremost papers of the party, were found in full cry in this country in favor of commercial union, or a customs union, by which to hand over the tariff and fiscal regulations of this country, inevitably and certainly, into the hands of the people of a foreign country, to hand over the fiscal government of a population of five millions to the power of a people of sixty millions. It was not long before a cry arose, a voice as out of the wilderness, in the person of my hon. friend who sits for South Ontario (Mr. Edgar), who declared that it would not be right to take the Customs houses away. The party heard the cry, and the party leaders brought their followers into line, and the party papers followed suit, and inside of six or eight months commercial union was thrown to the dogs, and a brand new policy of unrestricted reciprocity was formulated before the people, and formulated last Session in this House. Upon that the leaders of the party, and the papers representing the party, declared that they would fight out this battle if it took, not one, but many, many summers, and they would never lay down their arms until they were successful. Well, Sir, we come to the present time, and something else has occurred. The policy of unrestricted reciprocity, in its own manly dress, in its own form, apparent and real to the people, has been laid aside,—

Several hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. FOSTER—and from a musty shelf has been taken down this skeleton which, for nineteen years, has slept upon that shelf with only an hour or two of vigorous shaking in 1882, administered in a vain attempt to arouse it to a vigorous life. They have now laid aside their policy of unrestricted reciprocity, or, if they have not done it, they have not the manliness to stand to their colors. My hon. friend thought we were surely not five millions of dastards and cowards. May be we are not five millions of dastards and cowards, but, as I live, I think there may be some of that class when a party which declares for a principle, and which declares that it shall fight for that principle to the bitter end, for some reason or other, lays it aside, or, if they do not lay it aside, cover it up with a mask and refuse to go to the country on a manly, open, plain, honest statement of their position. But one thing that occurs, occurs in only one way. Just so surely as the old worshipper in Palestine turned his face towards Jerusalem when he worshipped, just so surely as the old Mussulman had his journeys pointed towards Mecca, just so, whatever changes, whatever modes, forms or fashions of political garments these gentlemen don or take off, they always turn in the end towards the United States of America. Sir, the resolution of to-day is different from the resolution of 1882 and from the resolution of 1870, in this particular, and I invite the attention of the House to it. In 1870 the gentlemen who supported Mr. Huntington's resolution supported a resolution which declared that it was best that this power should be obtained, that it would be well to have a customs union with the United States, or a continental union, but which also declared for the integrity and permanency of the Empire, when it said that the supreme power, which alone has the right to make treaties and to ratify them, should be consulted and should have the ratifiction of the result of the negotiations, whatever they were. In 1832, in that ponderous resolution which was sprung upon the House by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), that condition was not to be found; but he did have the grace to include the British possessions with foreign states. But in this resolution the bridges have all been burnt. Not only have the Imperial power and the Imperial interest been unrecognised, but it is no longer thought worth while by my doughty and gallant friend on the other side of the House to take account of the British possessions. Now, he asks solely and wholly that we should have the right to negotiate treaties with foreign states, and with foreign states alone; and when he comes down to the gist of his argument, he has mentioned no foreign state, not by principality, no power, outside of the United States of America; and he has declared fully and finally, so that we can no longer doubt it, that what he wants is unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and that the only way in which he hopes now to get it is, not by an open, honest and manly assertion of his principles, but by first obtaining this power from the British Government to place our relations with the mother country on a different basis, and in the future, somehow or other, to get at the object which, in an unguarded moment, he said he had in view, by a roundabout way, through powers which he hopes to obtain. My hon. friend in his resolution states that it is of extreme importance to the well-being of the people of Canada that this power should be claimed and granted and exercised freely. If it is of extreme importance, of such extreme importance that the status quo is to be changed, it devolved upon the hon. gentleman to give us sufficient reasons for the changing of the position which we now occupy towards the mother country. It was not simply his place to notice some objections which could be made against it, but, in the very spirit of his own resolution, it was his place to show that it was of such extreme importance to the well-being of this country as to justify a movement in such a direction. I leave to the House and the country to say whether my hon. friend has advanced positions, brought arguments, and used proofs sufficient to establish that position. Now, Sir, we may ask ourselves, in the first place, whether within the last few years there has developed any crisis of sufficient importance to make it the first object of this country to change the relation in which we have hitherto stood to the mother country, and to embark upon this new, untried and unknown way. And, first, with reference to the well-being of Canada: Has anything occurred in the internal history of Canada, in its material progress or otherwise, which makes it a point of the utmost importance that a change in the status quo should be brought about? I think not. I think the Dominion of Canada during these last years has made within its own borders great progress; I was almost saying unexampled progress, and I do not think I should have been wrong if I had stated so. I know that my hon. friend who leads the Opposition took occasion to teach the people of Ontario during the recess, that since 1867 there had not been one single iota of progress made in this Confederation. But, Sir, I dissent from that. From 1867 to the present time, I say Canada's progress has been large, has been important, has been almost unexampled in the history of the world. What, Sir, has she done? Out of the disconnected parts and Provinces which made up this vast territory, she has built up a consolidated whole, a union of sentiment and of peoples which is rapidly throwing off the old garments of narrowness, sectionalism and provincialism, and putting on the new garments of a life which is instinct with hope and promise. In that time she has widened and broadened the facilities of commerce; she has deepened her navigable streams and built her large canals, until to-day we are in sight of an uninterrupted and splendid line of water communication which shall reach from Quebec to the farthest ends of the great lakes, and be solely and entirely within British jurisdiction and within Canadian right. In that time she has extended her railway system to a very large extent, until to-day, from one part of our country to the other, and extending through its different sections, our railway system is developing and making great this country to an extent unrivalled by most countries in the world. Sir, she has established in that time her industrial position. Her factories have been founded; her industrial establishments, of various kinds, have been maintained, and every Canadian feels a thrill of pride when he considers that whereas twenty years ago the quantity of articles manufactured in this country was small indeed, and but little diversified, to-day there is scarcely an article that is needed for the comfort of the home and the life of the people which Canadians do not make, and make well, which they do not make with profit to themselves and employment to the people. In that time Canada has developed her natural resources until her coal production has risen from a few hundred thousand tons to 2,333,000. To-day Canada is exploring her immense natural resources and developing them with ardour, skill and energy, and is reaching out for larger, longer and swifter lines of communication to the great East and to the great West as well. In all this progress, has any threatening crisis been developed? Has any indication of danger been apparent, showing that there is something radically wrong, that that something has reference to the position we occupy with regard to treaty negotiations, and that a change must be made in this respect for the well being of the people? I think not. Take the moral, the intellectual, the social history of this people, and their progress has been onward and upward. Take the position of Canada in the old country, consider her position among the nations of the earth,—her credit has increased, her position has become magnified, and Canada to-day stands as the first colony of the British Empire. She occupies a proud position amongst the countries of the world, and is looked forward to as the future home of hundreds of thousands of the best people in the best countries of the world. I doubt if in the mind of one person out of every hundred thousand of the people in this country, uninfluenced by political necessity, as have toiled in the school, in the pulpit, in the field, in the forest, in the merchants' places of business,—there is the faintest glimmering of an idea that there is something radically wrong which is paralysing all our efforts, and that that something is, that we cannot send a lone Canadian agent trudging over to the capitals of Spain, France or other European countries, privileged by the British Empire to go alone and unattended to negotiate commercial treaties. The idea is not one that has sprung out of the necessities of the case; it is not one that has sprung spontaneously out of the position we occupy; but it is an idea that has been forced into sudden growth by the political exigencies of the party opposite, and if it were not for those political exigencies, it would not be before this House and the country to-day. But it may be that the conduct of the mother country towards Canada, with regard to her relations with other countries, has been so tyrannical, negligent, culpable, and illiberal, that it has become absolutely necessary for us now to have the right to negotiate our own commercial treaties. Is that the fact? I venture the assertion that it is not, and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to show from history, during the last twenty or thirty years, that the policy of Great Britain toward this colony, and I may say towards all her colonies, has not been one of increasing liberality, instead of illiberality. I challenge them to show that it has not been one in which she has deferred every year, more and more, to the wishes and interests of her colonies, in which her Government and her statesmen have not been more and more anxious to find out the needs and the interests of the people of these great colonies, which form so important and so vital a part of the British Empire. Take, for instance, the negotiations which lead to better trade relations between the colonies and other countries. If you go back as far as 1865, when commissioners were sent from this country to Brazil and Guiana and the West India Islands, in order to make a report upon better trade relations between this country and them, you will find that the Government of Great Britain approved of the project, and heartily seconded it, stating, however, that these commissioners should not assume an independent position, but should act as gatherers of information to be submitted to the British Ministers at these different places—that the British Government should act, and that the result of the negotiations should be ratified by the British Parliament. Coming down later than that, we find an increasing liberality in these matters, until we come to our position as it exists to-day, when Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner in London, was not only allowed, as representing Canada, to take part in the negotiations for a treaty at Madrid with Spain and the Spanish West Indies, but was nominated as a co-plenipotentiary with the British Minister at Madrid, and was expressly given the authority to conduct the negotiations after he had been introduced by the British ambassador resident at Madrid. In former times, Great Britain often discriminated against her colonies in her treaties. Afterwards she formed treaties with foreign nations, giving the most favorite nation clauses which had their effect upon the colonies, without the consent of the colonies. Then she went one step further, and made no treaties with foreign states in which there was not a clause by which it was allowed the colonies, if they had been included, to take means to be relieved from the treaty on making representations within a certain time; and to-day, she has gone one step further, and, in the inception of treaties, advises with the Government of Canada, and asks its views with reference to the proposals for the treaty. She not only does not now wait till the treaty is made, but actually asks the co-operation of this colony of Canada before the treaty is begun, and is willing to associate a representative of Canada with her own at the negotiations, and to make that representative a co-plenipotentiary and give him the conduct of the negotiations, so far as Canada is concerned. Therefore I say, with regard to this making of treaties and with regard to the negotiations upon which the treaties are ultimately based, the policy of Great Britain has been one of continued liberality and not one of illiberality, until to-day we have every thing that we would have under the motion of my hon. friend if it were carried out, plus the prestige of Great Britain, the experience of Great Britain, the moral force of Great Britain and the army and the navy of Great Britain as well. Therefore I say there is nothing in the conduct of the Home Government, as it has been developed within the last ten years, whatever else has occurred since 1882, to make it of moment or of extreme importance to the people of this country that they should have the power to negotiate their treaties at first hand, to be ratified simply and solely by their own Parliament.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House separated for recess, I was trying to show, with reference to the motion of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that in the first place there had been a sudden and sharp change in the face presented by hon. gentlemen opposite upon the issue which last year they had declared to be of vital interest to the country, and to the continued advocacy of which they had pledged themselves until what they contended for should triumph. I think I showed that the resolution before the House signifies not merely what is expressed by its wording, a sincere desire to obtain the power for Canada of negotiating her own commercial treaties, but that underlying it is, by the admission of my hon. friend from South Oxford in reality the propaganda which was urged in the country and in the House for the last year or more; and I think it is apparent to the House, as it will be to the country, that there is an attempt made to gain by taking up a different line of canvass and a different line of action, and to enlist sympathies for it which could not have been enlisted for the propaganda of last year, to obtain if possible this one end as a means to another end. I think I did not go beyond the record in saying that that was liable to the imputation of not being an open, an honest and a manly way of prosecuting a canvass and of carrying out a principle before the people of this country. I stated also—as the House well knows—that the first half of the resolution of my hon. friend starts out with this premise, that it is of the utmost importance to the well-being of Canada that thus and so should take place, and I think I showed to the satisfaction of reasonable men that, within the last eight years, and certainly within the last two or three years, no sudden development of note, no impending or threatening crisis had made itself known in the country which could justify the assertion contained in this resolution, that it was of the utmost importance to the well-being of Canada that Canada should have the power conferred upon her of negotiating independently her commercial treaties; and that, if any such thing had happened, if any such crisis had developed, it certainly had not been shown in the remarks of my hon. friend who moved the resolution. I then stated, that, taking the material history of Canada for the last 21 years, taking her intellectual history, her social history, her moral history, hers had been a record of great progress, of progress almost unexampled, and that, in briefly reviewing that progress and that history, it could not be contended that in Canada there had developed an urgent need for a change of policy in this respect. I then stated that, even though the material, the social and the intellectual progress of Canada internally had been marked and steady in that time, it might be that the course of the home Government, by its illiberality, by its culpable neglect of our interests, by its desire to exclude from a front rank of importance and a front rank of consideration, questions which were intimately connected with the prosperity and progress of Canada, had made it necessary that we should have larger powers than we now have; and I endeavored to show to the House, very cursorily it is true, that, in the matter of interference with or the allowing of Canada's fiscal enactments, in the matter of the negotiation of treaties and the ratification of treaties, not only was it not true that the course of action of the Government of Great Britain had been increasingly illiberal, had been ungenerous, had been indicative of neglect, but that the exact contrary was established by the short historical review I gave, that her conduct had been increasingly liberal and increasingly generous, and that, as the years passed by, she has shown a larger interest, a deeper sympathy, and a greater care for the interests of her colonies, Canada included; and so great an interest and so deep a sympathy as to make the bonds which bind her colonies to herself stronger than before, and to give little, nay, to give not the slightest shadow of foundation for the claim that on that account we should cut loose from the status we have now, and cut asunder almost the only bonds now remaining which bind us to the Empire, and should start out on a course which, by the statement of my hon. friend, and by the logic of events which must necessarily ensue, must land us further and further away from the unity of the Empire and bring us nearer and nearer to that absorption which may be our fate when situated alongside countries greater and more powerful than ourselves. As to our fiscal legislation I may say a word or two more. Time was when every Bill relating to customs or to tariff passed by the colonies was reserved for assent, and did not become law until it had been subjected to examination and review by the home authorities. That time has passed, and gradually little by little, year after year, in the progress of relations and in the course of history, greater and greater concessions in this respect had been given, until to-day it may be stated, and truthfully stated, that Canada is absolutely independent with reference to her legislation, whether it regards her own internal trade or her trade with foreign countries, and the only point in which—and I shall develop this a little more later—the only point in which there is a possible danger ahead of the disturbance of the relations between Canada and Great Britain, and between the colonies and Great Britain, is if, in the course of commercial negotiations and commercial legislation, a state of things should be brought about in which the people of Great Britain, and in other parts of the Empire belonging to her, should be placed in an unjust position by Canada's legislation, should be discriminated against in favor of foreign countries, so that the bond which binds us one to the other and to the mother land, should in that way, by friction and by a clashing of interests, become greatly weakened. Then, Sir, with reference to the negotiations for treaties. If you will allow me I will, a little more in detail, make good the assertion I made before the House rose, and that is this, that the conduct of Great Britain, the course of the Government of the mother country towards her colonies, has been increasingly liberal with reference to the negotiation of treaties. I mentioned that in 1865, when commissioners were sent from this country to Brazil, Guiana and the West Indies, in order to negotiate for better trade relations, they received the hearty approval, the hearty commendation of the home Government; but that at that time she impressed upon them that they were not to assume an independent position, that they were not to conclude any negotiations which would cause a differentiation of duties as against the mother country or other parts of the British Empire, that they were to inform the British Minister at the different places that they visited, and that all results would have to be ratified, after examination, by the home Government. Sir, as years have passed and Canada's relations have been extended to different countries, we find that her course of action has been increasingly liberal. In 1865, or, to go back further, we may say that from 1848, all through the long course of the negotiations which resulted at last in the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, and resulted later in the Washington Treaty of 1871, Great Britain behaved with the utmost liberality, with the utmost goodwill, towards Canada in all her efforts to conclude and maintain a reciprocity treaty between this country and United States, not only giving her influence in the negotiations, not only asking the advice of the Canadian Government, but going so far as to associate representatives of the Canadian Government with her own Minister at Washington, and in every way attempting to forward the commercial interest of this country as connected with the country lying to the south of us. In 1871, when the question had so far progressed in the negotiations with the United States that they were ready to sit down and canvass the conditions and terms of a treaty, Great Britain, being mindful of the interests of Canada, asking the opinion of the Canadian Government, feeling that it was a question in which Canada was very seriously and very intimately involved, placed on that commission, with co-equal powers, the man from Canada who, of all others, had the widest and the best possible knowledge of Canadian interests. Sir John A. Macdonald sat with those plenipotentiaries in Washington, the trusted plenipotentiary of Her Majesty's Government, in constant communication with the Government of Canada, and exercising his influence and his great knowledge for the benefit of Canadian interests. Sir, in 1874, when the Government of Mr. Mackenzie tried again to obtain reciprocity of arrangements between the United States and this country, and I thought that the time was opportune and favorable, and asked that negotiations might be undertaken, the British Government empowered them to send, and recognised him as an agent of this Government, and associated him with the British Minister at Washington. The Hon. George Brown, who went there and negotiated directly, was successful in obtaining the draft of a treaty, but which, on coming before the Senate of the United States, failed of obtaining the ratification of that body; in fact, this treaty which was directly negotiated by a representative of Canada, was not only not taken up, but was treated with contempt by the Senate, which has the ratification of treaties with foreign powers. Then in 1878 and 1879, when the Government of Canada thought that arrangements might possibly be made for increased trade with the Spanish West Indies, Spain, and with France, and that direct negotiations would be beneficial to that end, the British Government heartily and willingly assented to the appointment of a plenipotentiary from this country, and Sir Alexander Gall visited London, visited Madrid, and visited Paris, and although his efforts were unsuccessful, we still had the benefit of his direct negotiation, and I suppose that not even hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will always contend that in every case a failure is the result of inefficiency of method. In 1883, Sir Charles Tupper was appointed as ambassador-plenipotentiary to Spain, and he was appointed not only as an agent, not only as co-plenipotentiary with Sir Robert Morier at the Court of Spain, but it was expressly stated in the despatch which I will read :

“ That if the Spanish Government are favorably disposed, full power for these negotiations will be given to Sir Robert Morier and Sir Charles Tupper. Naturally the negotiations would probably be conducted by Sir Charles Tupper, but the convention, if concluded, must be signed by both plenipotentiaries and then entered into between Her Majesty and the King of Spain; that the subject be the regulating of Canadian trade with the Spanish territories specified in the convention.”

In 1888, when the negotiations had progressed so far with the United States of America as to get the assent of their Administration to the appointment of commissioners to sit down with plenipotentiaries from Great Britain, and try and adjust the difficulties on the fishery question, Great Britain, looking at the interests of Canada, and anxious, as ever, that the interests of all her colonies should be subserved, took Sir Charles Tupper, the Canadian High Commissioner and the choice of the Canadian Government, and made him co-plenipotentiary with the other commissioners that were appointed, and he was accorded the support, and the sympathy, and the backing of the Home Government; and I assert, and I think that it cannot be held to the contrary, that there could be no fuller powers, that there could be no fuller methods of negotiation placed in the hands of Canada than were given in 1888, when Sir Charles Tupper, as representative of Canada, and two Ministers of the Crown of Canada, associated with him in the matter of advice and aid, sat there week after week, canvassing these questions and looking out for, and subserving the interests of Canada, as far as that draft treaty went. And to-day Sir Charles Tupper holds an authorisation from Lord Salisbury appointing him as co-plenipotentiary with Sir Clare Forde, to negotiate a treaty at the Court of Spain under much the same terms and conditions which were accorded to him in 1883. Sir, there is no necessity of further carrying out this line of argument; I cite these facts to show that every practical benefit that could be got from sending a man directly from this Government to the Government of any foreign power, is obtained under such liberal regulations as these, under such liberal propositions as these; and added to that comes the experience, added to that comes the diplomatic skill, added to that comes the standing, added to that comes the advice, and behind all, the power and the influence of Great Britain. Then, Sir, with regard to the matter of treaty ratification. I think with equal emphasis one may state that the conduct of Great Britain has been increasingly liberal, and is now as generous as we can ask it to be. I pointed out before recess that in former times Great Britain would conclude treaties even discriminating against the colonies. I pointed out that not a great many years ago she would form treaties with foreign powers giving them by the most-favored-nation clause a hold upon the commerce of her colonies without asking the assent of her colonies or communicating with them; but that course of action has been gradually modified, until to-day, as I stated before the recess, if a treaty is to be negotiated between Great Britain and a foreign power in which it is possible that Canadian interests may be at all involved, not only does she not conclude the treaty without communicating with Canada, but she sends first a formal official communication to the Government of Canada intimating that she is about to enter into negotiations for a treaty with such and such a power, and asking Canada for her views, and if she wishes to be included in the treaty which is about to be made. In proof of this I hold in my hand a despatch dated Downing Street, 20th August, 1881, which reads:

"DOWNING STREET, 20th August, 1881.

"SIR,—I have the honor to submit to you a copy of a letter from the Foreign Office, stating that negotiations will probably be opened shortly with the Egyptian Government, for the conclusion of a commercial treaty with Egypt; and I have to request that you will inform me, at your earliest convenience, whether there are any matters in respect of which your Government would desire to make any special proposals.

"The colonial article referred to in the enclosed letter is the clause now adopted, excepting the colony under your Government and others of the more important colonies from the operation of the treaty, but providing that its stipulations may be applied to any such colonies on notice to that effect being given within one year from the date of the exchange of the ratification of the treaty.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your most obedient humble servant,

"KIMBERLEY.

"The Officer administering the Government of Canada."

That, Sir, shows, I think, the liberal breadth of treatment which is all that is necessary, and which is all and more, with the attendant circumstances of which I have spoken, than this colony would obtain under the proposition of my hon. friend. My conclusion, therefore, is that there is no impending crisis proved from a review of the history of Canada's internal progress, and that, on the other hand, we may say with equal force, there is no important crisis to-day pending because of illiberal conduct on the part of the British Government with respect to her colonies in this matter of the negotiation of treaties. But, Sir, my hon. friend showed the weakness of his position and its one-sidedness when he came to prop it up by the only attempt at an alleged instance of necessity which he cited, and that was the case of the United States. I showed before that there is no mention made of British possessions in his resolution; and the House knows, without my proceeding to speak further of it, that in the whole course of his argument he seemed to be anxious only to do this: to gain unrestricted trade relations with the United States, and the resolution is drawn in the light of the relations which exist or which he wishes to exist between us and the country to the south of us. My hon. friend has stated that if there had been a resident Canadian Minister at Washington during the last two years, it would have averted all humiliation and all bluster, and all the trouble which has ensued. That is a very strong assertion; it does not lie within the power of any man, to say that that would have been so. It is a thing which it is impossible to know, but it is just the kind of proof that my hon. friend is in the habit of giving this House. It is: what I say, and what I think, and what my opinion is. But Canada is not going to take her one foot off from the solid rock upon which it stands to-day, of a solid relation, and of a satisfactory relation, to put it down upon an unknown something, at the assertion of, or on the basis of the assertion of my hon. friend. Now, let us examine that strong assertion, that if a Canadian sent from this country had been at Washington during those two years, all this trouble would not have occurred. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the dissatisfaction with the Treaty of Washington commenced to take root immediately the award was made and a large sum of money had to be paid to Canada, a sum of money which the United States thought was inordinate and not justly her debt, and which she ought not to have been called upon to pay? Would the fact that a resident Canadian Minister had been in Washington during those two years have allayed all that discontent or have prevented that discontent from arising in the first instance? Does not my hon. friend know that sectional fishing interests were a large factor in fomenting that discontent and bringing to bear the strong influence that was brought to bear from the New England States towards the abrogation and dissolution of that treaty? Does he think the mere fact of a Canadian living at Washington and representing this Government would have had the effect of soothing these sections, of calming all the discontent of that class of people engaged in the propaganda in which they were engaged and for their own purposes, a purpose proper enough from their point of view? Does not the hon. gentleman know that in 1883 at the very first available moment that notice could be given that the Treaty of Washington would be abrogated at the end of two years, that notice was unanimously given by resolution of Congress, and there was not the voice of any public man raised against the notice being given, which it was known would abrogate that treaty. The hon. gentleman knows too that when President Arthur sent his message of 1883, in which he called the attention of Congress to the fact that the treaty was soon to expire, and that if it was to be replaced by something which would keep the relations of the two peoples well together, it was time to be thinking about it. My hon. friend knows that the Senate of the United States and the Congress of the United States treated it as the idle wind, and by no resolution and by no enactment endeavored to second the intimation of the President. But if we had only had a British-Canadian Minister in Washington, living there and partaking of the hospitality of the good people there, all this would not have happened; the Senate and Congress would have been soothed and everything would have been made plain and satisfactory. Does not my hon. friend know that President Cleveland, in 1886, recommended that, as a way of settling these unsettled relations, a commission should be appointed to sit in conjunction with a British commission to take up the whole matter, and he recommended that in a direct message to Congress? Does not the hon. gentleman know that the Committee of Foreign Relations unanimously authorized Mr. Fry to report against that in the Senate, that he did report a resolution against it, and that that resolution was carried by a majority of thirty-five to ten? But the hon. gentleman seems to think that if we had had a Canadian resident at Washington the Senate would have been mollified, Mr. Fry's tongue would have cloven to the roof of his mouth and there would have been no resolution against the proposal to appoint a commission. Will my hon. friend say, and will hon. gentlemen say, that our contention as to the terms of the Treaty of 1818 was a wrong contention? The hon. gentleman put a question to this side of the House in the course of his speech and he paused for a reply, in the real style of Artemus Ward who used to pause for his replies. He did not get his reply and I suppose if I was to ask a question of that side of the House and pause for a reply I would be in the same predicament. I ask the question now. Was Canada's contention on the Treaty of 1818 right or not? Was it the legal construction or not?

Did we stand by what the instrument gave us or did we go beyond it? All you have to do is to interrogate the history of diplomacy for the last fifty or sixty years, and the history of the diplomatic correspondence of the last three years, and the opinions of the highest law officers and statesmen in Great Britain, and you will find that they say, and say it rightly, that there can be no two opinions as to the solidity of the grounds that Canada takes in her contention as to the Treaty of 1818.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you want a reply?

Mr. FOSTER. Don't bother me.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is all right, but you can have it.

Mr. FOSTER. You are too good-natured to interrupt. Is it to be contended that if we had a Canadian representative resident in the city of Washington, that it would have changed Canada's contention with regard to the legal construction of that treaty, and that we would not have contended for our rights and not stood up for what the document of 1818 gave us? It cannot be contended that that would have taken place in the event of our having a Canadian representative in the city of Washington. And it was just because we stood by these contentions that the trouble arose. But the policy which was pursued by this Government was stated to have been at fault, and my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) declared categorically, with that power of sharp and well defined assertion which he eminently possesses, that the policy of Canada changed in 1887; that it was vicious before 1887 and that as a consequence of information received which was not accessible to this country until Sir Charles Tupper had gone to the city of Washington, the Government made a change in its policy and so made it possible for the President of the United States to say that in 1887 no cause of complaint was found by his Government against the action of the Canadian authorities. I am here to state and to state it emphatically, just as emphatically as my hon. friend made his statement, that no change took place in the policy or in the practical carrying out of that policy by this Government as between the years 1886 and 1887. In the spring of 1887, instructions were issued which slightly modified the instructions of the preceding years in two particulars. One was that in order to facilitate the operations of the fishermen, the Customs Department placed sub-collectors of Customs at certain points so as to make the reporting, the clearing and the entering of vessels a matter of less trouble; and that the captains of our cruisers were allowed to enter and clear vessels as well. There was no other change in the policy either theoretically or practically and the difference between the two years is to be found in this and in this alone; that the American fishermen came down to our banks and to our shores in 1886, without a fair and just knowledge of what their rights were, that it took them the year 1886 to find out just about what the law was and that in 1887 they obeyed the law and there was no trouble. It is amusing to think that this Government possessed no sufficient information of the sentiment of the people, of the sentiment of public men, and of the sentiment of the Government of the United States. Had we not every reason to know what their sentiment was? We had oceans of diplomatic correspondence in which the exact position of the administration of the United States was placed before us. We had resolutions of Congress and of the Senate to show the opinion with respect to this matter; we were in touch with the public opinion of the country as shown through the newspapers with reference to this whole question. Our supply of information here at Ottawa was just as broad, just as generous, and just as reliable as if we had had a dozen men residing in the city of Washington all that time. My hon. friend gives one of the best refutations of his own argument when he stated that when Sir Charles Tupper went there he found the entire press, and the entire Congress, and the entire sixty millions of people dead against the contentions advanced by the five millions of people of Canada. If that were the case it shows that there was something deeper at work, and something so deep that it could not be cured by the mere fact of having at the city of Washington a resident Minister from the Government of this country. Then Sir, to crown his argument as to why it is of supreme importance that we should take this grave step he says, that the British Minister is liable to get into a tiff with the authorities of the country, that an interregnum occurs and in the meantime there will be no representative to rely upon. I suppose he will not contend that a Canadian Minister would not be liable to make a mistake, and that a Canadian Minister might have a tiff or a row and might in that way have to withdraw, but the point I wish to draw his attention to is this, that whether we have a Minister there or not the British Government will also have a Minister there and that we are just as liable to any such difficulty with our representative there as we are now without a representative from Canada. If you will allow my own opinion, and I believe it is the opinion of men who have thoroughly studied this question, it is that if there was anything which kept our rights and privileges for us it was the fact that Great Britain was a party to that Treaty of 1818, that the whole course of her diplomacy was in favor of the justice of our contentions, that the whole forces of her army and navy were behind the sacred character of the treaty to which she put her hand in 1818. If you had swept away that power from us and placed Canada in the position my hon. friend wants to place it in, alone and defenceless in a contention with sixty million of people under the circumstances I believe thoroughly that the last position of this country in the contention, under such circumstances would have been worse by far than the first.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask one question? He has all this high-falluting to himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will sit down and I will wait my turn.

Mr. FOSTER. You look too good-natured to interrupt.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thought after all that high-falluting that you would like me to puncture the bladder with one question.

Mr. FOSTER. Let the bladder float as long as you can; it might throw its matter over on you. My hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) came then to another point. He said that Great Britain could not object to this principle, he did not believe that Great Britain would object, and at last he almost positively asserted that Great Britain would not object. My hon. friend will probably allow that this supposition is in a doubtful category. Is there anything to guide us as to whether she would object or not? She has been kind, she has been liberal, she has been generous in her treatment of her colonies in all matters of negotiations of treaties and the like, but, Sir, I think there is enough on the records to show that there is a limit beyond which it is not possible to go without seriously endangering the present relations which subsist between Great Britain and her colonies. I find, Sir, that in 1850, and from that time forward, the British Government has been jealous of any interference with the equal rights of trade of her own people and of the colonies dependent upon her. As early as 1850, when an Act was passed to promote the entry into old Canada of the products of British North America, although it was not in the end disallowed, yet the objection was brought that it to a certain extent discriminated against products of like nature from Great Britain and other dependencies of Great Britain. However, with that generous feeling for colonies which are scattered around a common centre, and which she hoped would ultimately become one country, she did not press the objection, and the Act was not disallowed. Coming again to 1860, when it was proposed to extend the existing arrangements and allow reciprocity in all home and foreign manufactures, and to assimilate the tariffs of the British North American Provinces, the British Government again remonstrated on the score of differential duties; but for the same reason as she allowed the others, under the peculiar circumstances and with the aim she had in view of the union of all these Provinces, the Bill was not disallowed; and on the 15th of February, 1861, the Duke of Newcastle waived all objection to it on behalf of the Government of Great Britain. In 1867 the Dominion Customs Act embodied a clause which was wider in its scope, which had not only to do with foreign imports from provinces not belonging to Canada, but from the United States, and the British Government took very strongly the ground that there was a danger to be apprehended in this, that it would give to the products of a foreign country certain privileges which would not be given to like products of Great Britain and other possessions of Great Britain; but in view of her long historical course with reference to the reciprocal relations between this country and the United States, she waived the objection; and also largely because the class of products spoken of were raw materials which did not greatly affect the commerce of Great Britain or other countries of Europe. In 1865, as I mentioned before the House separated for dinner, when the commissioners went to visit Brazil, Guiana and the West Indies, a condition similar to that was laid down. But in 1870 the question was raised in the Australian colonies by a Bill which was passed in one of their Legislatures, and by a demand from most of the Governments of the colonies, based upon negotiations which took place with reference to that Bill, that the colonies of Australasia should be allowed to treat with foreign countries, to make commercial treaties with them, even though they should be to the detriment of and should discriminate against Great Britain or other British possessions; and it is with reference to that Bill that I wish to read, if the House will allow me, the words of Lord Kimberley, as voicing the opinion of the British Government in that respect; voicing it very kindly and in a tentative way, but in such a way as made the Australian colonies think of the step they proposed to take before the step was taken.

Mr. MITCHELL. One of the most weak-kneed Ministers we ever had.

Mr. FOSTER. That is an opinion of my hon. friend.

Mr. MITCHELL. Given from an official experience.

Mr. FOSTER. On the 13th of July, 1871, in a despatch to the Australian colonies, there occurs these words:

"But a proposition that in one part of the Empire, commercial privileges should be granted to the inhabitants of certain other parts of the Empire, to the exclusion and prejudice of the rest of Her Majesty's subjects, is an altogether different question, and I would earnestly request your Government to consider what effect it may have upon the relations between the colonies and this country.

"Her Majesty's subjects throughout the Empire, and nowhere more than in Australasia, have manifested, on various occasions of late, their strong desire that the connection between the colonies and this country should be maintained and strengthened, but it can hardly be doubted that the imposition of differential duties upon British produce and manufactures must have a tendency to weaken that connection, and to impair the friendly feeling on both sides, which I am confident your Government, as much as Her Majesty's Government, desire to preserve,"

On 19th April, 1872, there occurs in another despatch these words:

"But although for these reasons Her Majesty's Government might not feel justified in refusing to allow the colonists to adopt the policy which they think best for their own interests, they desire to point out that, in order to meet the views of the Colonial Governments as expressed in the papers now before me, it would be necessary not only to repeal so much of the 'Australian Colonies Government Act,' 13 and 14 Vic., cap. 59, as prevents the imposition of differential duties, but to exempt the colonies in question from the operation of any future commercial treaties, which may be concluded by this country, containing stipulations against such duties, leaving them at liberty, subject to the obligations of existing treaties to make such arrangements, as they may think fit, for reciprocity with each other, or with foreign nations; and before so serious a step is taken, they would ask the colonists gravely to consider the probable effects of a measure which might tend, materially, to affect the relations of the colonies to this country and to the rest of the Empire. In the meantime they have thought it right not to proceed in this matter until the Australian Governments concerned have had an opportunity of communicating any further observations which they may desire to make in explanation of their views."

And, Sir, in the same year, in the Legislature of Victoria, a resolution was introduced affirming the position of things as they were, and that it was for the best interest not only of the Empire but of the colonies themselves that the supreme power of treaty-making should remain where it was; and that loyal and patriotic, and I believe, wise resolution, passed by the Victoria Legislature without a division, the mass of opinion in that Legislature being emphatically against the change that had been urged, and in favor of keeping the status quo. So much for the possible difficulties that may arise; for, Mr. Speaker, there can be only one object in having an independent negotiation of treaties by Canada direct, and that object is this, that we shall be led, and shall follow out, on the line of our own selfish interest without any regard to the interests of Great Britain or the rest of the Empire. My hon. friend admitted as much. He said that if there was a question as to whether a treaty which was for our benefit would be prejudicial to England, England was quite able to take care of herself, and she might be left to take care of herself. If then, we obtain power, and a negotiator is appointed, he has a right to negotiate a treaty in the interests of Canada, and against the interests of Great Britain or the other parts of the Empire. That gradually leads to a clash and a disturbance of relations; and that is the question, I believe, which has been pointed out in Lord Kimberly's despatch. That is the point, and if it is well taken, then before we assume such a position, we should think well of the possible effect, the probable effect too, which would grow out of a state of things predicated upon powers given to us such as are asked. But my hon. friend says: If she did object, what then? My hon. friend seemed to have a cast of countenance at that moment, far more cheerful than at any previous moment of the debate. When he rose to his full height, and said: "What then?" he seemed to feel within him a satisfaction that the possible "then" would be a clash in the relations between Canada and Great Britain, which would be followed by Canada declaring: We care not to stay with you, unless we get just what we think is for our interests, and by Great Britain declaring to this colony: Go; and then would come that independence, which is but slightly veiled under the motion of my hon. friend, that national future which we are here to found at the very earliest moment, and this would lead us into separation from Great Britain and place us alongside of a military and naval power against which we in our weakness could never hope to raise an adequate barrier, leaving us in a state of weakness and diffidence which would have one of two results, either to make this country lose heart and become discouraged or make it weak and liable to give way to the demands of and become absorbed by a greater power. However, if England did object, my hon. friend was certain we could no longer remain tadpoles. The tadpole existence of the present could not remain. We were here to build up a fuller nationality and that at the earliest moment. If we did not, we were traitors to Canada. Our present status was low, it could not be borne by honest and high-minded men, and he cited my hon. friend, who sits beside me, who is the President of the Imperial League for Canada, I believe—

Mr. MITCHELL. What is that?

Mr. FOSTER,—as being of one mind with him in believing that the status of Canada was not satisfactory, and in demanding that it should be changed.

Mr. MITCHELL. He differs with you.

Mr. FOSTER. But my hon. friend said though they may have the same opinion with reference to the status of this country, they do not agree in the aims by which that status shall be changed. If I understand the position of my hon. friend to my right (Mr. McCarthy), he hopes for no change of status which does not maintain the unity of the Empire, the integrity of all its parts, and if my hon. friend's words are to be taken as true, he means that the status shall be changed by a method which shall not maintain the unity of the Empire and the integrity of all its parts. There is more method in the madness of my hon. friend than we sometimes may think. I have noticed for a number of years that it is a set method with my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to weaken in this country the old belief that Great Britain has a friendly feeling towards her colonies, and especially to Canada, a feeling so great as to impel her to give us the support of her military or naval force, if necessary; and that in audience after audience in various parts of this country he seeks to create the impression, and to a certain extent he does create it, that Great Britain cares nothing for us, that she will never spend a copper in our defence, that if we are to be defended, as he stated this afternoon, we must do it ourselves, and need not look to the mother country. There is method in that madness. If there is one way of alienating the people's minds from the position as it is at present, and getting them to look towards some other position, it is to weaken their faith in the bond that binds them to the old country, it is to weaken the impression that they are an integral part of that country, to be defended, if need be, by the force and power of the mother country. I do not believe in that doctrine. Within the last fifteen years the sentiment of Great Britain has changed, within these last years it is changing marvellously with reference to the relations and the interests which should subsist between the central power and her colonies; and if to-day there is any strong opinion amongst the statesmen of both parties in Great Britain, which overshadow every other, I believe it is the opinion that the stability of the Empire and its greatness and place among the nations is intimately bound up with the unity which exists between the central power and all the outlying portions of the Empire, and that the power and strength of the Empire is to be wielded, if necessary, towards conserving the interests and the status of every part of our outlying dependencies. In 1865, we had the statement of the British Government, about the time when we were negotiating with reference to the fortifications and defences of Canada, that the British Government would consider it their duty to put forth all their power and force for the defence of Canada, if needed. Everything which has taken place from that time to this goes to show that the bond has not weakened, but has rather strengthened. Now, if the House will bear with me for a moment more—

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, for an hour.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad to see my hon. friend likes the doctrine I preach and wishes more of it. I want to enquire in the next place what would be the advantages of the system proposed over our present system. Let us see if we can bring this question down to a practical test? At the present time what have we? Let us suppose that Canada wants to negotiate for improved trade relations with any country. Take for instance, Spain. What have we now? We have a resident at the Court of Spain, a British Minister of high class, a diplomat, one who has studied the country, one who has studied its statesmen, one who has studied its wants and capabilities, one who has the political, social and diplomatic entrée into the government circles and all that is implied in that—we have him there, with the prestige of the British Empire at his back, placed at the disposal of this country to negotiate, in concert with our representative, and to present our claims with reference to trade negotiations. What takes place? From the very first, there is a conference between Great Britain and Canada. The British Minister and the Canadian Ambassador agree together, they consult together, and the product of their endeavors, the result of their negotiations, is a substantial agreement, under the advice of their respective Governments, and when that draft is ratified, when it is signed by these two plenipotentiaries, it is as sure of absolute ratification as it can possibly be, for it has been the concurrent work of the representatives of both Governments that are concerned. I say that is the position at present, and it is a very strong position. What would be the position otherwise? A gentleman would be sent from Canada to conduct an independent negotiation unknown to the country, unused to its ways, without the strong and powerful backing which is given by a national status, who would just at the moment be thrown into a diplomatic society to which he has been unaccustomed, and of which he has no story and thorough knowledge, and he would be at a disadvantage in every respect as compared with the advantage which would accrue in the state of things existing at present. Being an independent negotiator, there would not be the steady concurrence between the representative of the British Government and our own representative, and, if they disagreed, and if, as the result of the negotiation, an instrument was concluded so far as the draft was concerned, it would not be the concurrent work of two governments and that foreign government would not have any guarantee at all that it would be ratified, because the power to ratify it in the end would be the Government and power of Great Britain, and not the Government of Canada. So that we should lose, it seems to me, in that respect, all that at present we gain from the experience, the training and the prestige which is given by the fact that the Minister of Great Britain has concurrent action in these negotiations, and is there to aid and help in conducting the negotiations for this country. There is another question which comes up in reference to this. How are we to enforce treaties? My hon. friend on the other side says we do not need any naval or military power to enforce treaties, that a treaty subsists because of the mutual advantage to the two parties, and that that is a force stronger than navies and armies. To that contention which is urged on the other side, and urged in good faith, it is only necessary to make one observation in answer. There is a mutual advantage which subsists between two men in this country of Canada who make a contract one with the other, and yet there is no contract made in that way which is allowed to depend for its fulfilment solely on that ground. The force of law is there to see that it is carried out. The whole force of magistracy, and the judiciary, and the constabulary, and the military, if necessary, is there to see that what has been agreed upon as a matter of good faith shall be carried out as it was agreed, and without the destruction of its original provisions. Going further than that, do we expect, if that is the case with individuals, that, at this time, when nations are armed to the teeth, when the competition between them for places of advantage, for territories where vantage ground will be given them, is keen, and the rush for dominion is keen and strong, Canada would have the same probability of having treaty relations that were formed with her and another power fairly carried out and fairly lived up to if she had not some adequate power to enforce the treaty? Sir, it is of essential importance that, in order to the carrying out of treaties which might result between this country and another country, we should have the power to enforce those treaties; and, unless we have the power to enforce those treaties, the treaties might not be worth the paper they were written upon. Then, what will take place? Place this country in an independent position, let it make a treaty and be responsible for carrying out that treaty with a power of immensely greater importance and strength, and the selfish interests which crop up, which inevitably crop up, and which will crop up between nations as between individuals until the millennium comes, will cause an infraction of that treaty. What then can Canada do? There is only one thing. She must either give way, lose national spirit, become dispirited, and give into the demands of the stronger, or she must stand by her rights with her men, she must have her army, she must have her navy, and she must be able to assert on open sea or on open land that which is the word of the document, that which is the condition of the treaty. It is of the utmost necessity, it seems to me, that the power should be behind the treaty. To-day we have that power—the power of Great Britain, the greatest military and naval power in the world. I think, if this measure was carried out, it would lead inevitably and directly to discontent and disagreement. The very fact that a colony has independent power to negotiate will cause a negotiation of articles in commercial treaties which will clash with the interests of other parts of the Empire, and with the interests of Great Britain. If they are denied us, there will be dissatisfaction here. If they are given to us, though they may be unjust to Great Britain or to the other colonies, there will be dissatisfaction there; and this discontent and dissatisfaction will increase and grow, and will have the inevitable result of making a breach and severing the good relations which at present exist and bringing about what I myself should deplore and which nine-tenths of the people of this country would deplore, the separation of this country from the motherland and the disintegration of the Empire of which we form a part. Then, this larger question is involved. My hon. friend may say, one thing at a time, let us get this first, and not bother our heads about the future. But, as everything which exists comes out of the lap of the past and goes forward to the future, I say that we cannot as statesmen, as public men, as thinking men, alter the status which exists to-day or make a single movement towards altering it without carefully considering what will be the other step which will have to follow this first step. If we gained the right to negotiate commercial treaties, I believe it would be against the best interests of this country, that it would lead to disagreement, and to the making and widening of a breach in our relations with the mother country. If we gained that, every other colony might demand it as well, and you would have the seed of separation sown amongst the different parts of the British Empire which would not conduce to their unity, but would lead to their disintegration and disunion. I believe that the true commercial relations of this country are bound up in the maintenance of the Empire. That Empire stretches over the whole globe. It comprises people of all classes and races. It has every kind of climate and every variety of production. It has everything within its own borders which is necessary to the cultivation of trade, of the richness and extent of which we can barely form a conception. I believe that in a merely selfish trade interest, it is our best position to hold to the unity and integrity of all parts of this Empire, because of the great resources of trade, of profitable trade, which they present to one another as well as to the outside world. Holding these opinions, and believing as I do in this regard, I have no hesitation in saying that I will vote against the motion of my hon. friend, believing, when I do it, that I am doing what is best for this country, what is best for the Empire at large, what is best for the civilisation and progress of the future; and more, Sir, what is in consonance with the best heart and the best mind of the best Canadian people.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Amidst the almost universal applause which greeted the hon. Minister of Finance on that side of the House when he resumed his seat, it occurred to me that from two parts of the House, from two seats occupied by his colleagues, there was an ominous silence. Sir, when I heard him decrying the power and the prestige of Canada, and telling the House that if we did have conferred upon us the privilege of making treaties, it would be a barren privilege only, because we had no power, either at sea or at land, to enforce these treaties, I noticed that the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Militia looked very glum. Sir, is it possible that these gentlemen who for years have been devoting their energies and their abilities to developing a great naval and military force in this country, are to be told by one of their colleagues in this Parliament that the whole thing is a farce, that the great militia batteries, "A," "B," and "C," and perhaps down to the end of the alphabet, with all the millions of money that we have expended and are expending in developing a military spirit and a military force—that all this is a farce; that the cruisers the hon. Minister of Marine has armed with great guns at the prow, cruising along the waters of our coast, that all these are play toys? Why, Sir, I am astonished at the Minister of Finance. I thought, from reading his remarks made here a few years ago, when he talked as Minister of Marine about defending our fisheries, that he was going to put a force there that would teach the Yankees to observe treaties; he was going to show them that we were a great nation, that we had the ability and the power to compel them to observe just what provisions we pleased in our waters and in our harbors. When the hon. gentleman commenced his speech he was not satisfied with discussing the important proposition involved in my hon. friend's resolution, but he found it necessary to travel out of his course in order to have the stereotyped fling at the Reform party. He told us that the Reform party had no policy—one thing to-day, another thing to-morrow, and the next day they changed that again. In 1882, he said, they were a free trade party, and in 1887 their leader came out and avowed himself a protectionist. Sir, there never was a more unfair, unjust, or ungenerous statement made by any hon. gentleman in this House as to the policy of his political opponents. In 1882 the Liberal party, professing as they always did profess, and do profess, free trade principles, proclaimed that they were prepared to carry those principles into effect, so far as circumstances would warrant them. In 1882 they proclaimed themselves in favor of a revenue tariff, and that policy they had carried out when they enjoyed the reins of power from 1873 to 1878. But in 1887, when the leader of the Liberal party made his celebrated speech upon which the hon. gentleman commented, what did he say? Did he say that he had changed his principles and become a protectionist as the Minister of Finance stated here to-day? Not at all. He stated that he adhered to and still believed in the same trade principles he always held, but he was manly enough and honest enough to tell the country that such had been the extravagance, such had been the corruption which had marked the administration of the affairs of this country for the previous years, such had been the extent to which our public debt had rolled up, such were the fixed charges that this country was compelled from year to year to pay, that it would not be fair or just to tell the electors that it was then possible to reduce the taxation to an extent that they would have reduced it if the Reform party had been elected to power four years previously. That was the sum and substance of the Hon. Mr. Blake's Malvern speech, and that was the honest truth. The hon. gentleman and his friends are not always accustomed to tell the electors what the honest truth is, and I have no doubt it surprised him to find that the leader of the Liberal party had not only the courage of his convictions, but the courage to tell the people that the time had not come, owing to the extravagance of the Government, when the country could carry these convictions fairly out. Sir, he tells us that this party adopted first the principle of commercial union. That is merely a freak of his own imagination. The Reform party, as a party, never adopted the policy of commercial union, and the hon. gentleman when he stated that here to-day, must have known that he was misleading the House. The policy of commercial union was advocated by individuals here and there, and by newspapers here and there, throughout the country, but it never was proclaimed by the Liberal party as one of the planks of their platform. Sir, the first time absolute free trade was proclaimed with the United States, it was formulated by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and known as the policy of unrestricted reciprocity. That was the policy of the Reform party, and that, without diminution of one hair, is the policy of the Reform party to-day, that is the policy of the party in this House; and I tell my hon. friend, if he comes to-morrow to test the opinion of the electors, it is upon that platform that we are prepared to face him and that we are prepared to win. Any moment that the leader of the Government chooses to face the electors we are ready to meet him on that question. But, Sir, I was relieved to some extent from answering the hon. gentleman on this point, because after he had enlisted the plaudits of all his friends here by telling them that the Reform party had gone back upon their trade principles, he turned around and in stentorian tones announced "What is the policy of that party to-day, as announced by hon. gentlemen opposite? Unrestricted reciprocity." He, Sir, in ten minutes from having made his first declaration, contradicted and answered himself. Now, the hon. gentleman says truly that there were involved in this resolution very important principles, and that the onus lay upon those who proposed them to show to the House that circumstances had arisen that justified such a large advance in our colonial history. Well, Sir, I thought that my hon. friend who occupied the time of the House for an hour and a half this afternoon, did, in a most able and conclusive manner, prove to the House the existence of those circumstances which he calls for. If there is one remark which I would like to make concerning the speech of my hon. friend who has just sat down it is this, that he took precious good care to avoid just those parts of my hon. friend's speech, and those facts which my hon. friend cited in support of his resolution. He spoke of the marvelous development of this country, socially, politically, morally, and every way else. Well, Sir, there is no man in this House or out of it who has a stronger belief in the undeveloped resources of this country than I have. I believe we cannot use language too strong to depict what this country is capable of becoming; but I also believe at the same time, so far from having developed these resources as you would have done if you had adopted a fair and generous policy for the last ten years, you have done all in your power, by restrictions upon trade and by your fiscal legislation, to dwarf, and suppress, and keep dormant those undeveloped resources. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows himself that he drew rather a strong bow when he spoke about our wonderful advances in trade and commerce. He knows that from 1873 to this day, so far from the aggregate of our trade having increased, it has largely diminished.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman knows that the aggregate of our trade in 1873 was $217,000,000, and last year it had fallen to $193,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Much greater than it was in 1877.

Mr. DAVIES. Although there have been fluctuations since, the hon. gentleman knows that our aggregate trade has largely diminished since the year I have spoken of. The hon. gentleman cannot go through the Maritime Provinces from which he comes without seeing that the condition of trade in the principal cities there is such that they have no reason for congratulation. Does St. John, or Halifax, or Fredericton, Pictou, or Charlottetown, or any of the Maritime Province cities, afford evidence of the progress to which he has referred? Not at all. But the contrary is the case, and this is due I believe almost entirely to the false policy adopted by the Government. But supposing all the hon. gentleman has said were true, supposing the towns of Canada had developed morally, socially, politically and in every other way in the measure and degree he states to-night, what does it prove? Does it prove that we should remain quiescent and not progress in our political development? Does it prove that the rights and privileges we possessed years ago, before our prosperity was equal to the present, would be sufficient to meet our requirements with our present development? The argument is directly against the hon. gentleman. We are in a constant state of evolution and development. Not many years ago these were mere Crown colonies, governed from Downing-street through family "compacts." Does the hon. gentleman imagine that the privileges we possessed then would satisfy us to-day? He knows that such is not the case. It is well known that as we progressed we gained responsible government, and we gained it through the Liberal party, and we obtained it moreover in spite of the prophecies and predictions similar to those in which the hon. gentleman has indulged to-night: the Empire was going to be disintegrated, our connection with it was going to cease, as soon as we obtained responsible government we were going to be gobbled up by the United States! These are old, stale and refuted arguments which have no force. They are old women's tales, as an hon. friend reminds me. We have heard them over and over again, and whenever proposals are made by the Liberal party with a view to extending our rights, we hear the same stale argument; we are going to cease connection with Great Britain and be swallowed up by the United States. We have, however, arrived at a stage in our history when we are not afraid of the future, and not afraid of what the future will bring. We are prepared to legislate for Canada as she is, to leave it to our children to legislate for Canada as she will be in coming years. If our development leads us on to Imperial Federation, if it leads us on to complete independence, if it leads us on to annexation with the United States, that is a question which the men of that day will determine and not us. We are here to legislate for Canada as she is, for the people as they are in their best interests and according to our best judgment, and it is not for us to discount the future or to predict what the future will be a quarter of a century hence. The Finance Minister has told us that Canada is the first colony of the Empire. So she is; and what does that prove? Is that any reason why there should be a withholding of the rights that belong to the first colony? I rather fancy that if the first colony has outgrown its swaddling clothes and become a full man, it ought to be clothed with the habiliments of a man. We ought to assume the responsibility which the importance of our position has thrown upon us. That is what we ask in the measure involved in the resolution before the House. We have gone on developing our political system year after year. After we had united in one confederacy, we found Great Britain was disposed more and more to yield those rights, without which we cannot properly discharge our duties. The hon. gentleman truly has said that, a few years ago, the last remnant of the power of control, I may say, which Great Britain exercised over the commercial policy of Canada was withdrawn. The Royal instructions which authorised the Governor General to withhold his assent from any Bill discriminating against Great Britain were altered, and that clause was withdrawn. To-day, Canada stands in the position that she is complete master of her commercial policy. She can make what laws she likes, in her own interests. She has acted in harmony with that view, and, at the instigation of the Tory party, she has done so in the most selfish manner imaginable. When the Government came down, in 1878, with their policy known as the National Policy, what did they do?

Mr. HESSON. Sought to build up the country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) At whose expense? What was the policy they proclaimed, rightly or wrongly? It was Canada for the Canadians. They said, we are going to legislate for the people of Canada and for Canadian interests. It matters not on whose toes we tread. Some said at that time: You are going to discriminate against Great Britain, you are going to legislate in favor of Canadian products and against the products of the mother country. The answer that rang out in the leading organs of the party, and which was repeated on every platform, was: So much the worse for Great Britain. Those gentlemen said: It may be true that we are legislating against Great Britain, but this country has reached that stage when it must look out for itself; England was looking out for herself and all her commercial policy was directed to the promotion of her own trade and commerce, and we must do the same. That was the policy hon. gentlemen opposite advocated, and Great Britain conceded to us complete control of our commercial policy, and the right to discriminate against Great Britain or any other country. So, to-day, we are complete masters, so far as legislation is concerned, of the situation. That being so, what does this resolution involve? Does it involve anything treasonable? No. It involves a proposition which is the entire complement of the other. We now possess the power by legislation to control our commercial policy as we please, and we now ask that the power we have shall not be a power merely in name but one in reality, and having that power we shall have the means conceded to carry it into effect. That is what is asked by this resolution. We can legislate in any manner we please on questions of tariff, and we ask now the power to appoint agents at foreign courts so that we may negotiate our own commercial treaties. If that is the case, the hon. gentleman is bound to show that, involved in that proposition and underlying it, there was something dangerous to the existence of the state and inimical to the best interests of the people; and he has failed to show this in his speech against the motion. The hon. Minister complained that the resolution did not go as far as previous resolutions which have been moved in this House. It goes as far as it is necessary to go. It is quite unnecessary to insert in the resolution the words "the other colonies of the British Empire," because that involved other considerations and a great many other questions might be raised. We wished merely to test the opinion of the House and the country upon the broad general proposition, and it is no use in shirking or denying the fact that the resolution, while mentioning foreign countries, specially and particularly relates to the nation with which we conduct nine-tenths of our business outside of Great Britain, viz., the United States. We have as neighbors, as rivals and as customers 60,000,000 people. Our lumbering interests, fishing interests, farming interests, railway interests are all interwoven and bound up with that country. Their well-being means our well-being. Our social interests are wound up with theirs. You cannot go from Ontario to Prince Edward Island and enter any family without finding that a large number of their relatives and friends are across the line. Our social interests are, therefore, bound up with theirs and our commercial interests are in the same position; and this being so, we shall have more business with them in the future than with any other part of the world. The question presents itself how can we promote these relations with the United States? Now, Sir, we have had delicate fishery questions arising between Canada and the United States for the past few years. We have common fishing grounds, and, as was natural, complications arose between the American fishermen and our fishermen as to their respective rights in our waters. We have the anomaly that while those difficulties were intensifying year by year until they brought us, as was said to the verge of war, yet while we were within two or three days journey of the capital of the United States, under our present system which the Minister of Finance commends and insists shall remain, it took us eight months to communicate between Washington and Ottawa. Why, any practical business man must see that this is an obsolete system and that it belongs to a by-gone age. A merchant in Ottawa can communicate with a merchant in Washington and get his answer in a week, but if Mr. Bayard wanted to lay a complaint before the Canadian Government as to the action of the Canadian Custom house officers or the Canadian fishery officers towards the American fishermen it took him just eight months to do it. Is that reasonable? In 1885 there was no trouble, because our waters were thrown open to the American fishermen, pending the possible solution of the question in an amicable way. In the beginning of 1886 before the trouble arose Secretary Bayard sent a most important communication to the Canadian Government. He had to send it to the British Minister at Washington, the British Minister had to send it to the Foreign Secretary at home, the Foreign Secretary had to send it to the Secretary for the Colonies, the Secretary for the Colonies had to send it to Lord Lansdowne the Governor General, and Lord Lansdowne had to lay it before his Cabinet. After all this circumlocution an answer went back in the same round-about way. The Governor General had to send it to the Secretary of State for the Colonies in England, that Secretary of State sent it to the Foreign Secretary, the Foreign Secretary sent it to the British Minister at Washington, and the British Minister sent it to Mr. Bayard. What was the result of all this? The result was that a communication which Mr. Bayard addressed to the Government of this country on the 28th of May, 1886, which should have been answered under any circumstances within a month, and before the fishing season commenced,—and which if the answer had been dictated by men having the best interests of the country at heart might have averted all the differences which subsequently ensued,—was not answered in Washington until the following January, six or eight months after. In the meantime the fishing season was over and all the complications had arisen. Bitter animosities which it will take years to eradicate were engendered during that fishing season, and those difficulties were intensified. Secretary Bayard in a communication which he made on 8th February to Mr. Phelps, remarked: "It may be noted that the reply to my note of the 28th May, 1886, is dated on the 28th February, giving some eight months for the completion of the circuit of correspondence." We are dealing here with facts as they are, and not with facts as we would like them to be, I ask any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who has given any consideration at all to the complications which have arisen and must continue to arise from this fishery question, whether the state of facts, as I have depicted them, where it takes eight months for an answer to a note sent from Washington is what they believe is proper? The hon. gentleman told us that we had pretty much all we wanted under the present system. He told us that in 1871 the Canadian Minister was associated with the British Minister in the negotiation of the Washington Treaty. He told us that in 1874 the late Hon. George Brown was associated with the British Minister in the treaty of that year, and he told us also that which was not an historical fact, that that treaty having been agreed on was treated with contempt by the United States Senate. A gentleman occupying the responsible position of Minister of Finance in this House and in this country, ought to measure his words more carefully when he speaks of the action of a body like the Senate of the United States. The statement he made is not historically true; that treaty did not come before the Senate until it was too late for them to take it under consideration, and I have the best means of knowing from conversations with some of the Senators who were Senators at the time and who are Senators yet, that there is no doubt if that treaty had come before the Senate earlier, it would have received the Senate's assent. That, Sir, is the fact. The policy which we propose in the resolution here to-night, is not a new policy for the Liberal party. Before those gentlemen, who occupy the Treasury benches, got this country into the terrible state it is in now, and which was depicted by Sir Charles Tupper last year, before they irritated and annoyed and brought us into a state of commercial war with sixty millions of people, what did this Reform party do? We submitted a proposition in 1884 for the settlement of this very question. We submitted a proposition that the Government of the day should send negotiators to Washington to try and settle the differences between the two countries arising out of the abrogation of the fishery clauses of the Washington Treaty. We told those gentlemen what would take place when those fishery clauses expired. We knew from past experience that if the fishermen of the United States came to our waters and came in contact with our men and if we attempted to enforce the Treaty of 1818 against them, as we had enforced it in 1871 and 1875, the result would be to bring about a state of things that would end in the disruption of the friendly ties existing between the two countries, and we told the Government that. We went further, and declared as part of our policy in 1884, that in the negotiations which we advised should take place, Canada should be represented by a nominee of her own. That was our policy in 1884; but that was laughed at and sneered at by hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. What was their answer to this? They said: "Oh, we the great Canadian people are not going to humiliate ourselves by suing for terms or negotiating with our neighbors to the south. We will stand on our dignity and we will make them come and bow the knee to us." In 1885 we repeated our request, we warned those gentlemen what the result would be, and we told them that the door was not even then closed against amicable arrangements. We told them that even then, if they would send a representative to Washington clothed with proper powers, and a Canadian, as he ought to be, intimately acquainted with the question, the result probably would be that some settlement would be agreed upon between the two nations; but they would not do this. They were then so full of this idea of Canada's greatness and power, they were so full of military ardor that they determined to put on cruisers and at all hazards maintain the strict letter of the Treaty of 1818. The Government refused our advice then and in 1886 they carried out for the only year in the history of their political career their policy in its integrity. What was the result of this their policy being carried out? They seized over 68 American vessels and out of this number only 6 or 8 were seized for transshipping fish. They seized American vessels in every harbor and port on the most trivial excuses, they treated them with alleged inhumanity and acted then towards them in such a manner that the fishermen spread abroad through the United States the bitterest possible feeling against Canada. In the spring of 1887 the Government were again warned by a mutual independent friend that matters had reached such a crisis that if they went on with their work another year it meant war. They sent Sir Charles Tupper in hot haste to Washington and Sir Charles Tupper had consultation there with the Hon. Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State. He learned, as he told us afterwards, that the policy of the Canadian Government had been a false one, that we had been running in the wrong track, that we had been brought face to face with sixty millions of irritated people, and unless we were prepared to take the consequences of commercial war, we must back down from the position we had taken. Sir, we were told more than that. Mr. Secretary Bayard told Sir Charles that not only must our policy be changed, but the method of carrying on intercourse between the two nations was so cumbrous that it must be changed also. I am reading now from the confidential letter Mr. Bayard addressed to Sir Charles Tupper on 31st May. After speaking of the commercial relations, he says:

"It is evident that the commercial intercourse between the inhabitants of Canada and those of the United States has grown into too vast proportions to be exposed much longer to this wordy triangular duel, and more direct and responsible methods should be resorted to."

Sir, that was the opinion of the Secretary of State of the United States. Sir Charles Tupper, the leading man in the Government of the day, the man who put the Government where they are, the man who led them while he sat in his seat and made them change their policy and bite the dust, reciprocated the sentiments of Mr. Bayard, told him it was so, acknowledged that he could not defend the policy of his subordinates, and said he believed the time had come when the policy inaugurated by the Government should cease, and a policy of peace and reconciliation should be introduced. Well, Sir Charles Tupper returned to Ottawa, and what did he do? Was the policy of 1886 duplicated again? Why, the hon. Minister of Finance says he made no change in his policy. How dare he stand up in this House in the presence of those who know to the contrary? I tell him he never dared to seize an American vessel in 1887. He went through the farce of having his cruisers cruise along the coast, but he took good care that American vessels were not interfered with either in the harbors or out of the harbors. As 1887 went by without a seizure and without trouble, the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries backed down from the policy he had adopted and the captains of cruisers and the collectors of customs took good care not to repeat the fire-eating policy of the previous year. We know that the leading power in the Administration did not approve of that policy. We know that the man second in command, the most powerful in their Government, stood here and asked the House to excuse the youth and inexperience of the hon. Minister of Finance who was then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, saying that he for one would not be prepared to endorse or support the extreme contentions that hon. gentleman had put forward, but telling us that they were young in diplomacy and that some allowance should be made for them. What did Sir Charles Tupper say with reference to the policy which the Minister of Justice had so strongly endorsed, which the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries had inaugurated, and which he is standing here alone today to endorse and approve of? He said:

"I need not inform the House that in diplomatic intercourse it is customary, it is right for the representatives of a Government to state the strongest and most advanced ground that they possibly can sustain in relation to every question, and I would not like, I confess, to be tried before the House by the ground taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries."

He threw these young gentlemen over; he told them they had gone too far; he told them, young men, you do not know where your policy is leading to, and I, standing here as Finance Minister of this country, tell you I will not endorse it or permit it; and from the time that word was spoken, the hon. gentleman changed his policy and never interfered with an American ship or an American sailor. What further did Sir Charles Tupper say? He wanted to let them down easy. They did their duty in taking the course they did while they were playing at diplomatic correspondence; but, he said, when it comes to business, practical business, their contention will not stand for a moment. I will give you his own words:

"When it comes to a question of conference, to a question of international discussion for the purpose of ascertaining whether between the extreme contention on the one side and the extreme contention on the other, any standing ground may be found on which the two parties may meet and settle a dispute of great international difficulty by mutual concession, the case is entirely altered, and the responsibility resting upon the plenipotentiaries of any country would be very great if they refused to consider fair and reasonable concessions on the one side and to meet them by fair and reasonable concessions on the other. So that I have no hesitation in saying that, dealing with this great question in that spirit, dealing with a question that is of vital importance to the British Empire, of vital importance to the Government of Great Britain, who were constantly threatened with embarrassment and serious difficulties and collisions with the great country to the south of us, a question too of great magnitude to the United States of America, a question of still greater magnitude, in my judgment, to the people of Canada, one on which we had more at stake and more to lose in a great struggle of that kind than either of the great countries to which I have referred—I say, looking at the question in that broad and national spirit, looking at it with a desire to remove the possibility of what I consider would be the greatest misfortune that could happen to the civilised world, a collision between the two great English-speaking nations, looking at it from that broad standpoint, it would have been criminal on my part and on the part of those who represented Her Majesty's Government and the interests of the people of Canada if they had by making fair and reasonable concessions, not endeavored, to find a common ground that would present a solution of those important and serious questions."

Sir, he said in other words that if he had maintained the high and untenable contentions of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries of that day, he would have been a criminal in the eye of his country; and he refused to entertain them, and entered on this treaty with Mr. Bayard. Sir, the hon. gentleman wanted facts. I ask him just to look at that one fact alone, that this country by his incapacity was brought to the verge of war with a neighbor, and the triangular duel under the present system of diplomatic correspondence had been carried on for some time and had not settled the difficulty. Sir Charles Tupper went down to Washington; he had a few days' conference with Mr. Bayard; and within one week they agreed upon a modus vivendi. What does that show? It shows that difficulties between nations can be settled in the same common sense way as difficulties between individuals, by conference, by friendly communications, and not by employing a third party three thousand miles away, through whom your correspondence must be sent. Now, the hon. gentleman asked us: What facts can you bring forward to justify this proposition of yours? Well, Sir, we need not do anything more than cite in support of our position the statements made by his own colleague, the late Finance Minister. What position were we in? If we were to state it in our own language, we would be told that we were exaggerating. Let me read you the condition of affairs as they existed in 1887, as described by Sir Charles Tupper himself:

"I have told you that we stood face to face with an enactment which had been on the Statute-book by a unanimous vote of Congress, ratified by the President, providing for non-intercourse between the United States and Canada, I need not tell you that that Bill meant commercial war, that it meant not only the ordinary suspension of friendly feeling and intercourse between two countries, but that it involved much more than that. If that Bill had been brought into operation by the proclamation of the President of the United States, I have no hesitation in saying that we stood in the relation to that great country of commercial war, and the line is very narrow which separates a commercial war between two countries from an actual war. No man who knows anything of the intimate commercial relations which exist between Canada and the United States could contemplate such an Act going into operation without feeling that it would tear up from the foundation those intimate social and commercial relations which exist between these two countries, which, in friendly commercial rivalry, are making rapid progress which has attracted the attention of the civilised world."

Sir, does the hon. gentleman want stronger proof than that, that we have been brought to the verge of commercial war, which the hon. the Finance Minister stated was the next thing to actual war, and which between the two great English speaking nations, was the greatest curse that could be inflicted upon mankind. What brought us to that? It was the policy of the existing Government, and the clumsy method which existed of carrying on diplomatic correspondence between the two countries; and I have no hesitation in expressing my belief that if we had had our representative at Washington who would have kept this country informed of the actual state of the case and of the actual feeling that prevailed in the United States, there would not have been found in Canada any body of men so mad as to have driven affairs to the point that the then Government brought them to in 1886. They would have been told, in 1886, by their agent in Washington, what they were told by their special agent, Sir Charles Tupper, in 1887; they would have been told that their policy was inimical to the best interests of Canada, that it had driven 60,000,000 of its people into a state of irritation against Canada, that commercial war was impending, and that unless Canada retraced her policy, the greatest evil that could happen to civilised mankind would happen to us. Now, what does the hon. gentleman say? He says: You ought to be satisfied, because practically you get pretty nearly all that you are asking for. But we do not. I have already pointed out that the resolution before the House contemplates our obtaining power to make our own commercial treaties. Involved in that would be the necessity of our appointing agents at the capitals where we would make commercial treaties. At Washington, for instance, we would have an accredited agent, whose duty and business it would be to keep the Government of this country informed of the state of political feeling in Congress and among the people of that country, so that we would be able to legislate with full knowledge of the facts, and not, as we have been hitherto legislating, in ignorance of the true state of affairs. It is not very long since we had the privilege conferred upon our Canadian representative of co-operating with the English plenipotentiaries in the negotiating of treaties. Canada has suffered in the past extremely from not being represented at the making of treaties affecting her interests. Those conversant with history know what an immense slice of territory was taken from us owing to the ignorance and supineness of Mr. Baring in the negotiation of the Ashburnham Treaty. By that treaty a large portion of Canada, including some of what are now the finest seaports in the United States, were given away to the Americans by the British plenipotentiary. We lost that through the ignorance and imbecility of the English plenipotentiary. Had Canada's interest been properly represented then, had the policy we advocate now been then in vogue, Canada would not have been deprived of her territory and her interests would have been saved. When Mr. Baring, on reaching home, learned the great crime he had committed against Canadian interests, history records that he wept. "He gave to memory all he had—a tear." His weeping, however, did not recoup Canada for the loss of her territory, the loss of which we to-day mourn. But we are told that we have waterways extending from the Atlantic and away back through our country, during the summer, to the centre prairies, and that we are independent of the country to the south of us altogether, and that we must have all our commerce carried on through our own territory; and the hon. gentleman gave us a history of the immense commerce that flows through our canals and lakes. But how long is it since that same hon. gentleman and his friends advocated that we should subsidise a railway to be built through American territory in order that we might reach the sea quicker than we can do by our present routes? Have they forgotten that they subsidised a line to carry Canadian products through American territory? I am not going to detain the House at great length on this question. I think the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution gave, in the strongest way, the reasons in support of his motion, and I am not going to repeat, if I can avoid it, any of the arguments he used. The hon. the Finance Minister has said that the Treaty of 1818 was made by Great Britain, and that the whole course of her policy since then has been in accordance with the policy adopted by Canada in 1886. Has the hon. gentleman ever taken the trouble to read the history of this question? Does he know that the statement he made is at direct variance with all the facts? Does he not know that the policy of Great Britain was in direct opposition to the policy attempted to be carried out by him in 1886, and in the carrying out of which he so signally failed. If he will go back to 1871, he will find Lord Kimberley laying down the policy of the English Government, with reference to the Treaty of 1818—not the policy which our Government attempted to carry out in 1886, but a policy more consonant with the general policy of the Empire. Lord Kimberley said in that despatch which he wrote in 1871:

"The exclusion of American fishermen from resorting to Canadian ports, except for the purposes of shelter and of repairing damages therein, purchasing wood and obtaining water, might be warranted by the letter of the Treaty of 1818, and by the terms of the Imperial Act of 1859, Geo. III, chap. 28, but Her Majesty's Government feel bound to state that it seems to them an extreme measure inconsistent with the general policy of the Empire, and say they are disposed to concede this point to the United States Government under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent smuggling and to guard against any substantial invasion of the exclusive rights of fishing which may be reserved to British subjects."

Here the policy laid down by Lord Kimberley is in direct opposition to the one the hon. gentleman adopted, and yet the hon. gentleman has the hardihood to stand up and tell us that in carrying out the policy of 1886, he was merely carrying out the general policy of Great Britain from 1818, which he gave us to understand she was ready to support with her guns and men-of-war. Such is not the fact. Lord Kimberley said he was in favor of maintaining intact our territorial rights and preventing any substantial invasion of our exclusive rights to fish, and I have yet to learn that the American Government's contention in that respect was to break the Treaty of 1818. It is not; but on the other point which led to all the trouble, the exclusion of American fishermen from our harbors, the compelling of American vessels to enter at a custom house every time they came to port, the policy of harassing them in every conceivable form, the policy of refusing them even the common rights of humanity—in that policy the English Government, I am proud to say, never was in unison with ours, and that policy was condemned in the most vigorous and strong language by Lord Kimberley in the despatch I have just read. The hon. gentleman talks about our adopting a policy which would be unfriendly to Great Britain. I want to ask him whether it is a friendly act towards Great Britain so to conduct our negotiations and our commerce with the United States as to bring the people of that great country into the state of mind in which they were in 1886 and 1887? Is it friendship to England to bring her to the verge of war with sixty millions of people? Is it friendship to England which adopts a policy leading to the passage of a Non-Inter-course Bill by the Congress of the United States, which only awaits the proclamation of the President to bring it into force against this country? The man who is truly friendly to Great Britain is the man who cultivates friendship between the United States and this country. The closer the ties that bind us socially, commercially and in every other way, the better it is for us, the better it is for Great Britain, and the more it is in the interests of civilisation. There could not be a greater curse to mankind, there could not be a greater evil to Great Britain, than a war between her and the United States of America. She has her enemies at home. She has her enemies in Russia. She has her possible enemies in France and in other countries, who are watching for an opportunity to take her at a disadvantage. Her friends are here; her friends should be here; her friends will be here. The English-speaking races of America will be England's friends in the time of her trial if this country so conducts her relations with the United States as to cultivate friendly, and kindly, and amicable feelings with that great country, and not irritated, and harsh, and unfriendly feelings. That man is not only the true friend of Canada but the true friend of the Empire and the true friend of British connection who takes care that the relations between Canada and the States shall be of the most cordial and kindly nature. The hon. the Minister of Finance talked as if there was no use in having treaties at all, because, according to his contention, treaties cannot be enforced except at the point of the sword. The hon. gentleman cannot have read history aright. According to his view, what has been the use of the time, and the energy, and the ability which have been expended by the smaller principalities and states and kingdoms of Europe in making treaties with the larger powers? Denmark, Switzerland, Belgium, the Argentine Republic, all these have their treaties with greater powers. They do not pretend to support them by the extent of their armaments. They could not do it, as we know. There is a higher power which supports those treaties. Take the treaties between the greater powers themselves and you find that if one of them objects to a provision, it soon finds means to denounce the treaty. Take the treaty in reference to the Black Sea. So long as it suited Russia to observe that treaty she observed it, and when she saw fit to change it she insisted upon having it changed to meet the circumstances of the day. I am not afraid, if we made a treaty with the United States of America, that it would not be carried out in good faith. No one doubts that it would be carried out in good faith.

Mr. HESSON. They have broken it before.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When have they done so with us? The hon. gentleman knows that we tried to carry out a policy which his own leader condemned as inhuman, and in that matter certainly we were to blame more than the United States. If we had a treaty with the United States, I have no doubt that they would carry it out in a manly way. I know I am talking to some hon. gentlemen who have no faith in the United States of America, but I am glad to know that they are few in number, and that that great country is looked upon with respect and held in honor, by the great majority of the people in this country.

Mr. HESSON. How about the Fishery Treaty?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have already told you something about that, and I think we have no reason to be proud of the circumstances connected with that.

Mr. HESSON. How about the lobster cans?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think it becomes Canada, with her duty upon peach baskets, to talk about the lobster cans. It does not become a Dominion that was mean and contemptible enough to put on the discriminatory duties in reference to the Welland Canal tolls to talk about honor and good faith. In my opinion the honor and good faith of Canada have been tarnished by the present Government in both those respects. I believe that in some respects the United States have acted meanly towards Canada, and notably in that matter of cans, though that was not a matter of treaty, but if they did, they had their match, and more than their match, in the present Government. If they found a depth of meanness, you found a lower depth, and you have tarnished the good name of Canada and made it stink in the nostrils of the people of the United States. If we look at the bickerings which take place between Canada and the United States year after year in reference to such matters as the taxes upon tins, and the taxes upon peach baskets, and the rebate of duties granted on the Welland Canal, and if we look at the consequences of these things and see that to-day we have not escaped from the perils of these consequences, it behoves us to pause and not, as the Minister of Finance has done, to endorse the existing condition of the relations between the two countries. To-day we stand face to face with a claim for $25,000 to $30,000 for the illegal seizure of the vessel Bridgewater in the port of Shelburne; we stand face to face with large claims for the infraction of the Treaty of 1818, and the illegal treatment of the American fishermen; we stand face to face with a Non-Intercourse Bill, which has been passed by Congress, and which is only awaiting the proclamation of the President to bring it into force; we stand face to face with a Bill which was introduced in Congress the other day, the effect of which, if it were carried, would be seriously to injure this Dominion. Gentlemen who come from the Maritime Provinces know well that, if the Non-Intercourse Bill were brought into force, it would be the greatest calamity that could happen to the people of those Provinces. It would mean ruin, or next to ruin, to many people there and to many industries there. It would be a terrible blow to the commerce of the United States, it is true, but that is no compensation to us. Their commerce, which extends all along the 3,000 miles of co-terminous frontier, would be seriously injured, but is that any consolation to us when our business would be damaged tenfold as much? It is not to the interest of this country that a state of feeling of this kind, rendering such proceedings as this possible or probable, should be kept up between these two countries. It is neither in the interest of this country nor in that of Great Britain. The motion of my hon. friend has been dictated by a serious consideration of facts as they are. He has had the manliness and the courage to express his view as to whether we are drifting. Hon. gentlemen opposite may indulge in their jingo policy. They may boast that they are going again to put their cruisers on the water, and to intensify that feeling which Sir Charles Tupper said they had brought about two years ago; but that is not a policy in the interests of Great Britain, it is not a policy in the interests of Canada, and it is not, I believe, a policy which the electorate will endorse. Since the great policy of unrestricted trade with the States has been started, the people have risen from one end of Canada to the other.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, and hundreds and hundreds of electors who voted for the Conservative party before will in the future sustain that policy. We accept the challenge which the hon. gentleman throws down. We pit Free Trade with the United States against the National Policy. The National Policy is ruining the Maritime Provinces, and I believe it is ruining other parts of the country. We are prepared to go before the country with a policy of unrestricted trade against their National Policy of restricted trade, and we believe that the majority of the people will endorse our view, and the sooner the contest is brought on the better for us. Sir, we have discussed in every newspaper in the Dominion, in every gathering in the Dominion, the political status of Canada to-day. The warmest friends of the leader of the Government, and his strongest supporters, are telling him that they are dissatisfied with the state of matters to-day. Some of them want Imperial Federation. They are like children crying for the moon. Sir, there is a great deal in the idea of Imperial Federation which commends itself to my mind, a great deal that I am in hearty sympathy with; but I look upon it as an impracticable idea. It only can be carried out when you can get the English people to alter their fiscal policy and to levy discriminating duties on the food of the people of that country; and you have yet to point to me a statesman of even second-rate standing in England who has adopted or dared to advocate the adoption of that policy. It never can be adopted by Great Britain, and until it has adopted it Imperial Federation will only remain an idea floating in the mind. I am not myself in favor of it, although, as I say, there is a great deal in it that I sympathise with; I am not in favor, either, of annexation. I am in favor of Canada as she is, and I am also in favor of Canada, now that she has reached her present stage of national manhood, being given the rights and privileges which belong to a full grown man. We have the liberty to arrange our commercial policy by legislation as we please; we want, as the complement of that, liberty to negotiate our commercial treaties. One is the complement of the other, and they are both closely allied. They are both necessary for the attainment of the one great object; Canadian prosperity—both necessary for the development of Canada's great resources; both necessary to enable us to grow as we would grow if the shackles which these hon. gentlemen have imposed upon our industries were taken off; both necessary to enable us to obtain freer trade relations with our neighbors to the south. I myself have no reasonable doubt that if we had that great boon conceded to us, together with our right to legislate as we please in commercial matters, with a party in power in sympathy with the movement, that two years would not roll over our heads before we would obtain reciprocal free trade with the United States. Sir, hon. gentlemen can carry out their policy. What are they going to do now? What are they going to do the coming Session? They cannot remain as they are; they have got to discover some other modus vivendi; the existing relations between the two countries are strained, they are strained, Sir, to the verge of breaking. There may be some younger men in their ranks, fire-eaters, who are willing to shoulder the responsibility of non-intercourse with the United States, to talk about "the flag" and that kind of thing; but the maturer minds among them see the danger, the maturer minds among them know that they have got to do as they did in 1837; they have got to come down from their high horse, they have got to speak with a subdued voice, they have got to negotiate as reasonable men with their neighbors to the south, and in order to negotiate as reasonable men, they ought to have, and should have, a duly accredited agent there, keeping them acquainted with the facts as they exist, with the trend of public opinion, with the wishes of the people of the United States, which, I believe, all tend towards closer connection with the Dominion of Canada.

Bill (No. 39) respecting the Hamilton Central Railway Company.—(Mr. McKay.)

BILLS OF EXCHANGE, ETC.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 5) relating to bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes. He said: I explained the object of this Bill so fully, in introducing it to the House, that I presume it will be unnecessary that I should speak at any length now as to the changes it will make. My explanation will be found on page 16 of Hansard. The Bill is undoubtedly one of considerable importance, although the changes it makes are not very sweeping or radical. It aims at a consolidation or codification of the laws relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes in the different Provinces of Canada, with the view of assimilating as far as possible the laws relating to these subjects in the several Provinces. I have taken steps to have the Bill, since it was introduced, circulated as widely as possible among those persons carrying on business in Canada who are likely to be most interested in the subject, and among banks, boards of trade and chambers of commerce in the different localities. Suggestions have been and are still being made as to amendments which it may be proper to make when we go into committee on the Bill. I move the second reading now, but wish to explain that it is not my intention to move the Bill into committee until ample time has been given to hear from the classes in different portions of the Dominion whom it more particularly affects.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am very glad to hear that the hon. the Minister of Justice does not at present intend to press this Bill further than the second reading. It is in itself a very important Bill. It attempts to consolidate the laws relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes. I notice, in looking over a portion of the Bill, for I have not had the opportunity yet of going over the whole of it, that if it were carried in its present form it would make radical changes in the law in a good many particulars. I dare say, if I had the opportunity of going through the whole Bill, I would find other changes than those which have occurred to me, and I hope the hon. gentleman will not press the Bill for some time, if at all this Session. If we are to codify the laws—and I admit it is important that we should do so if it can be done successfully—with regard to bills of exchange and promissory notes, we ought to take care not to alter the law in any particular in which it is not deliberately intended to be altered; and I am quite sure the Bill as it stands would produce alterations other than those the hon. gentleman contemplates.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if it is his intention to codify, if not this Session, at any Session, the commercial laws of the Dominion?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not my intention to make any effort of that kind this Session. I have not formed any definite design in that respect.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman propose to send this Bill to a special committee—the Committee of Banking and Commerce—which in some pects would be a good body to discuss it? Or does he propose to refer it simply to the general Committee of the House?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Committee of the Whole House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course it can be discussed there, but I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that, as far as the convenience of discussion goes, and the convenience of allowing bankers and all others interested to be heard, that it should be referred to the Committee of Banking and Commerce. On one or two occasions we have dealt with Bills of a somewhat similar character in that fashion; and although I am aware that the province of a special committee is more particularly to deal with private Bills than measures introduced by the Government, still it might be better for all parties concerned that bankers and merchants, who are more particularly interested in this Bill, should be allowed to appear and be heard before a committee, which cannot be done if the Bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There are no doubt advantages in the course recommended by the hon. gentleman. Still that matter has had my attention, and I think it will be better to refer the Bill to a Committee of the Whole House, and then, if any special reasons arise, it may be referred to a special committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SPEEDY TRIAL OF INDICTABLE OFFENCES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 17) to make further provision respecting the speedy trial of certain indictable offences. He said: The object of this Bill is to make the provisions of law with reference to speedy trials applicable to all parts of Canada. I shall have to move two or three amendments, not of very great importance, but inasmuch as the Bill is a re-enactment of the law with regard to speedy trials, I will avail myself of the opportunity of the Bill being before the Committee of the Whole House to suggest these amendments.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I would ask the hon. gentleman to consider the propriety of extending the provisions of this measure to several misdemeanors which are not at present susceptible of that kind of trial. I do not know how it would work in the other Provinces of the Dominion, but I know that in Quebec it would reduce immensely the cost of the administration of criminal justice.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand the hon. gentleman intends to extend this to the County Courts of Prince Edward Island? The word "Judge" in each Province of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, means any Judge of a County Court, according to the Bill. But in Prince Edward Island, County Court Judges have no power to deal with criminal cases. They have no criminal jurisdiction, so that it would be impossible to apply this measure to them. It may, or may not, be advisable to give criminal jurisdiction to the County Courts, but at present they have no such jurisdiction.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Neither have the County Court Judges in Nova Scotia, but I have had negotiations with the Provincial Government of Nova Scotia, and any legislation necessary there to implement the legislation here will be adopted. I intend having the same course pursued with regard to Prince Edward Island, if it can be done. The Provincial Government of Nova Scotia are entirely willing, in fact are desirous, to see this Act passed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman intend referring this Bill to a special committee, or to the Committee of the Whole House?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. To the Committee of the Whole House.

MASTERS' AND MATES' CERTIFICATES.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 26) to amend the Act respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships. He said: I stated, on the introduction of the Bill, the object we had in view. That was, to extend the provisions in regard to the coasting trade, which now include the ports of the United States and ports in Newfoundland, so as to include ports in the West India Islands, and the ports of St. Pierre and Miquelon. The object of the Bill is to make to some extent more uniform the regulations in regard to the coasting trade, because vessels which can go to the ports of the United States and of Newfoundland, under the present Statute, have on many occasions to pass those ports to which this Bill extends the coasting regulations. There seems to be no reason why a master having a coasting certificate should not have the same right to clear in the ports in the West Indies, and in St. Pierre and Miquelon, as he has in the ports of the long coast of the United States, in the southern portion of which he is close to the West Indies, and in the ports of Newfoundland. I have been spoken to by several hon. gentlemen in regard to some amendments looking to the extension of the Bill still further, and, therefore, I propose only to move the second reading now so as to give hon. gentlemen the opportunity of giving due notice of amendments they desire to make, and to enable those who are interested in the coasting trade to see how far it is safe for us to go in that direction. I may point out that the Act referring to the certificates of masters and mates engaged in the coasting trade is more stringent in Canada than in any country in the world. In England, they have not gone as far as we have done in this direction, the great object there being apparently to safeguard particularly those ships which are engaged in the seagoing or foreign trade, and the home trade passenger ships. For these reasons, I will only ask to-day that the Bill should be read the second time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 27) to amend the Weights and Measures Act. He said: The only change is as to the mode of marking the capacity of barrels. At present the marking has to be made on the stave where the bung is. That is very inconvenient. Where there are many tiers of barrels, that is the part of the barrel which is not visible, and, when barrels are rolled around, it is difficult to see the marking on that part of the barrel. It is now proposed to provide that the marks shall be on the end of the barrel, and also that they may be made by painting as well as by burning or cutting into the wood.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the meaning of the exception?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That refers to a different class of barrels and casks containing spirits. There is a regulation in regard to the marking or branding of those casks, and they are marked or branded by regulation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) On the end or on the stave?

Mr. COSTIGAN. On the end.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If they are marked on the end by regulation in the way in which the Minister proposes that other casks shall be marked, I do not see the reason for the exception.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Estimated expense required in connection with the High Commissioner's Office..... $7,753 37

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Finance will remember that, when this item was up before, I desired to obtain from him information as to how a saving was effected by the appointment of Mr. Chipman in the office of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The hon. gentleman will remember that we were told that that appointment involved no additional tax at all on the people of this country. But I observe here that the salary for the High Commissioner's Office in which Mr. Chipman was, is given at $7,753 as against, apparently, $7,500 asked the year before. It appears to me extremely difficult to see where the saving comes in.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend is about right; the saving is not very large, I find, so far as the salaries in the High Commissioner's Office are concerned. There is, however, a saving, I suppose, of a certain amount which has been effected in the transfer of Mr. Reynolds to that office, a clerk having been appointed in his place at a smaller salary, saving, I think, nearly $400. Although that does not appear in the item of salaries in the High Commissioner's Office, it is yet that much saved to the service, Mr. Reynolds having been a clerk in the Lands Department of the North-West.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not exactly see that. Of course $400 is a very small sum compared with the increase of $2,300 in the other. But I observe that for the present year the salaries are only $7,500. The Minister now asks for $7,753, an increase of over $200 over the current year's salaries.

Mr. FOSTER. That is made up partly of statutory increases.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Still, it does not appear that there is any saving at all, except the $400 to which he alludes.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I do not think there is.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The statement made to the committee was explicit, that the transfer imposed no additional tax on the people. It appears now that, according to the statement made by the Minister of Finance, that transfer involves an additional charge to the people of this country of $2,350, less $400, as I understand the Minister, a charge, in other words, of $1,950 additional, whereas we were told, in discussing the item, that the transfer imposed no tax on the people of this country. It appears to me that there is a discrepancy between the Minister and his colleague on this point.

Mr. TUPPER. Not at all. The hon. gentleman who last spoke does not seem to understand the explanation, and speaks of the difference of $400 in the salary as against a salary of $2,000. The Minister of Finance explained to the hon. gentleman that these two officers exchanged places, and that they were receiving, one a salary of $2,350 and the other some $400 less. They were both in the service, they both received those salaries, and, as I stated to the committee once or twice before, an officer receiving a lesser salary than Mr. Chipman takes his place in London, and Mr. Chipman comes across to a position here. I think that bears out what I said, that it was an exchange of one officer for another, the officer taking Mr. Chipman's place receiving less now than he did before, and Mr. Chipman receiving no more in consequence of the change.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is all very plausible, but there is just this little point that my hon. and juvenile friend, the Minister of Finance, fails to put before the House. He says that the gentleman was taken from the Department of the Interior; presumably he was not wanted in the Interior. I presume the place has not been filled in the Interior.

Mr. FOSTER. His place was filled.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then, where is the saving? You take a man and put another man in his place in the Interior; you transfer a gentleman in the Interior to London, and you bring a London man at over $200 additional into the Fisheries Department, which is distinctly an addition to Fisheries Department. Then, where is the saving? There is one additional man employed in the department of my hon. friend. I do not think that my hon. friend is treating this House fairly in not putting the thing fairly before the House. Why not come out at once, if an officer is required in that department, and say, we want an additional man, and we have taken him, and we have endeavored to take him in such a way that the increase would not be any more than we could help.

Mr. CASEY. I do not quite understand the basis on which Mr. Chipman was paid last year. I find that he received, as assistant secretary in the Immigration Office, London, $2,250; he received for services in the Colonial Exhibition, $1,000; he also received, as private secretary to the Minister of Finance, $537. I fail to see how he could be performing the duties of assistant secretary in the Immigration Office in London and also acting in connection with the Colonial Exhibition, and at the same time performing his duties as the private secretary of the Minister of Finance. I see that Mr. Chipman received last year $3,867.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who is the officer who takes Mr. Chipman's place, and how has a saving been effected?

Mr. FOSTER. I gave that statement before, but I will give it again. Mr. Chipman was clerk in the High Commissioner's Office in London, receiving last year a salary of $2,250. If he had not been changed, of course he would have remained there and received that amount, plus the annual increase. Having been transferred to a department here, that placed no additional burden upon the public service. Then, in the place of Mr. Chipman, a Mr. Reynolds was transferred from the Interior Department.

Mr. MITCHELL. What did he get?

Mr. FOSTER. His salary for the current year was $1,450. He would have received that salary if he had remained here. So there is no increase, so far as that goes. Into Mr. Reynolds' vacant position a man was promoted, an officer in the service, at a salary of $100 less.

Mr. MITCHELL. How much?

Mr. FOSTER. $1,000. In his place Mr. Sutherland came in, a new appointment, at a salary, I am told, of $800. So, taking the matter all through, there is a considerable saving; there can be no increase, so far as I can see.

Mr. MITCHELL. By the hon. gentleman's own statement there is a new man put into the Department of the Interior. They take a man at $1,000 from the Department of the Interior and send him to England. Mr. Chipman, at a salary of $2,250, is brought out to the Marine Department, and they put in the place of the man removed from the Interior, a new man at $800 a year. If that is not an increase of one officer and an increase of $800 to the expense of the country, I do not understand it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The point is this: We were told, when objecting to the increase in the Marine and Fisheries Department, that no real addition was made to the burdens of the people. It now appears from the statement of the Minister of Finance that there was an increase to the public burdens and to the expense of the Fisheries Department, of the entire salary of Mr. Chipman, less $400, which was saved by these transfers. So there is an actual increase of $1,900. The words used by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries were explicit: "The transfer imposed no additional burden on the people of the country." It now appears that the transfer did impose an additional tax on the people, namely, the whole amount of Mr. Chipman's salary, less the savings which the Minister referred to, so that the addition was $2,250 less $400. That I understand to be the state of the case, as the Minister of Finance has explained it. There is an increase in the Minister of Marine's Department, and we are voting as much, or a little more than usual, to the High Commissioner's Office; so it is perfectly clear that there is an increase of $1,950 in the total charges.

Mr. TUPPER. I think it only proper that I should set myself right as to one point. I quite admit there is a new feature introduced into this case. It certainly was not known to me, the last time the committee sat, that another officer had entered the service in connection with the transfer of the officer to the London office. I confined my argument entirely to the facts with which I was familiar, and those were, that Mr. Chipman had been transferred to the Marine Department, that his place had been filled by an officer already in the service, who was paid a much less salary than that received by Mr. Chipman. But I think hon. gentlemen will bear me out in this, that no real increase has been shown even yet.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. I think, at all events, that is a fair view. I say that no real increase has been shown in connection with this even yet, for those two officers, who are doing the work done outside the Marine Department, together do not receive the salary Mr. Chipman received. But I want to know if hon. members are not familiar with the custom and practice which prevailed under both Governments by which I would have had the right, when called to the department, to take in a new man from outside of the Civil Service altogether, and place him in the service and employ him as my private secretary. I do not think this claim I make on behalf of the position I at present hold is an extraordinary claim. I say the House has never demurred to that practice hitherto.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is Mr. Chipman in that position?

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman does not follow the discussion. Mr. Chipman was not taken from outside the service. I had a right, from the practice which has never been challenged, and which has been followed by members of both Governments, to choose as my private secretary the man I wished particularly to act in that capacity, and I had the right to go outside of the service and obtain the services of any gentleman I preferred. Instead of doing that, which would have added to the expense somewhat, I took an officer who was already in the service. Moreover, I did not add one dollar to the salary he received last year, and his place was taken by an officer who was receiving a still smaller salary and who was already in the service. Then it appears that the place of this officer was filled by a lower paid officer whose services were needed. I did not confine, however, the justification for this transfer or my selection to the points just mentioned to the committee. I claim that there is work for this officer in the department, that he is needed, and that the department has not too many officers. I am not going over the whole ground, but I desire to call the attention of hon. members to that feature of the case. I have made good, I think, the claim that the work of the department has enormously increased of late, and requires for its performance a stronger staff than has hitherto obtained. So my justification was not the one to which allusion was made; but I again say I was not personally aware of the fact that this low paid officer had been taken from outside the service into the Interior Department in connection with the transfer of Mr. Reynolds to London.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has admitted that he was wrong in the statement he made the other day, in saying that a saving would be effected by the transfer of Mr. Chipman from London here.

Mr. TUPPER. I did not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TUPPER. I will not allow the hon. gentleman to put words in my mouth that I did not utter. I hope the hon. gentleman will have the courtesy to allow me to make a correction. What I stated was, and I state it again, not that a saving had been effected, but that an officer paid a much larger salary had been exchanged for an officer paid a less salary, both of them being in the service, and that no additional burden was placed on the public revenue in consequence of that transfer. I corrected that statement, to-day, somewhat by saying I was not aware a third officer had been called into the service.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then the hon. gentleman admits that he was wrong in the statement made that no extra charge was placed on the public by reason of these changes. So the hon. gentleman has practically admitted the statement I made. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should have risen in his place and, in face of the facts and of his own admission, have stated that I did not correctly make a statement. He has endeavored to cloud the question up with a lot of matter that has nothing to do with it. What have we to do with the practice of bringing in an outside man as private secretary to a new Minister? It has nothing whatever to do with this transaction, and he merely brings it forward to cloud up the matter, and to show that he might bring that man in but he did not do it. He goes to London and brings a gentleman out as private secretary, at a salary of $2,250, which is a thing unheard of.

Mr. CASEY. And $600 extra.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know about the $600 extra, and I will leave that to you to explain. It is a thing unheard of, to take a gentleman at such a salary as private secretary to a Minister, and more especially so if he gets that $600 extra. My hon. friend still persists in saying that there is no extra expense to the country arising out of those changes in connection with that department. I do not place much importance on this thing, but I want to tell my hon. friend that he had better not try to bulldoze this House and to bulldoze individuals in this House. We have experience of his respected father's efforts in that way and of his great success in bulldozing, but while we might stand it from a man of great ability and long experience like Sir Charles Tupper, we can scarcely stand it from a man of the hon. Minister's youth and inexperience. I ask the hon. gentleman to be a little more careful and precise in the future when he makes those statements to the House, and particularly, when he is corrected, not to tell a gentleman that he is misrepresenting him. The facts of the case are these: Mr. Chipman had $2,250 a year, and he was transferred from London, and that expense was added to the Marine and Fisheries Department. Can anybody deny that? A man in a minor position at $800 or $1,000 a year is sent to London and a new addition to the staff of the country is put in the place of the man in the Interior Department who succeeded to Mr. Chipman's position in London. It is as clear as the nose on your face that an additional expense is created, even assuming that Mr. Chipman's salary is the same as it was before the man transferred to London had his salary increased. Will my hon. friend, in the face of these facts, say that no additional expense has been placed on the country?

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell) who has just sat down has disposed of the facts as to the extra cost entailed. It seems perfectly clear that even although the changes from London to Ottawa and from Ottawa to London may not involve in themselves any extra expense, the other changes that are made necessary, involving the taking of a new man into the department here, have added very considerably to the cost. The question is not so much whether those changes were made, but as to the statement made by the Minister when his attention was called to the matter. The hon. the Minister stated positively that no extra expense had been incurred, and he tells us now that he made that statement without full knowledge of the facts, and that he only spoke of things within his own personal knowledge. It is to be expected that as yet there are a great many things in his department that do not come to his knowledge, but until the time that he obtains that complete knowledge of his department, which he will no doubt eventually have, he should hesitate to make such a positive statement to this House. I understand from his remarks that Mr. Chipman is to be his private secretary, and he told us that he could have taken another man as secretary from outside the service who would be allowed $600. Had he done so that would not have added to the cost at all. There is an allowance of $600 to each department for a private secretary, and the Minister was saving nothing whatever by taking a man from inside the service. I understand that Mr. Chipman will get this $600 as private secretary.

Mr. TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. Then, he will get altogether a salary of $2,850 a year?

Mr. TUPPER. He got that last year and he gets the same this year.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister said the department was undermanned and that he needed to get another man. He, however, takes Mr. Chipman in as his private secretary, and if Mr. Chipman is acting as such, he cannot add any strength to the general staff of the department. Any trusted shorthand writer could act as private secretary as well, but here the Minister brings in a man of high rank in the service and puts him into the office of private secretary, so that his services rendered to the department generally cannot amount to much, and he cannot assist the department to get away with the enormous amount of work which the Minister says has to be done there. I asked about a quarter of an hour ago, how did Mr. Chipman last year manage to discharge his duties as assistant secretary to the Immigration Office, for which he was paid $2,250, while at the same time he was paid $1,000 in connection with the Colonial Exhibition, and $537 out of the $600 voted for the whole year for his services as private secretary during part of the year? It is quite impossible he could do all those things in the same year, and I want an explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. The answer to that is this: With reference to the $1,000, it was for services rendered the year before, which were paid for this year, so that falls out.

Mr. CASEY. No, it does not. How did he manage to discharge those duties the year before? It comes to the same thing.

Mr. FOSTER. He was secretary to Sir Charles Tupper, Minister of Finance, and he received $537 as secretary. While Sir Charles was Minister of Finance he also supervised and carried on a good deal of the work of the High

Mr. MITCHELL,

Commissioner's Office at home, and Mr. Chipman was here and was of essential service to Sir Charles Tupper in that particular.

Mr. CASEY. That is exactly the point. Mr. Chipman was out here acting as private secretary to Sir Charles Tupper when he was Minister of Finance, and at the same time he was being paid as assistant secretary to the Immigration Office in London, when he was not there at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all; the work of the Colonial Exhibition was over then.

Mr. CASEY. I am not talking about the Colonial Exhibition.

Mr. FOSTER. What are you talking about then?

Mr. CASEY. I am talking about the item I mentioned. The Minister told us that Mr. Chipman accompanied Sir Charles Tupper to this country when he was Minister of Finance, and that he was paid $537 as secretary to Sir Charles Tupper, while at the same time he was drawing a salary as assistant secretary to the Immigration Office in London, England, and he was not there at all.

Mr. FOSTER. I explained that. Although Sir Charles Tupper was here as Minister of Finance he was part of the year in London, and while here and while in London he supervised the work of the High Commissioner there, for which no extra salary was given him. Mr. Chipman did the work under Sir Charles Tupper both here and in London.

Mr. CASEY. I am not speaking of Sir Charles Tupper's pay; I am speaking of Mr. Chipman.

Mr. FOSTER. He did the work while he was here.

Mr. CASEY. How could he do the work of the department in England when he was in Ottawa? The whole amount of it is that he was receiving two salaries for performing one duty. He was paid $2,250 a year for performing duties in England when he was not in the country at all. That is a most scandalous state of affairs. The Minister says that the services in connection with the Colonial Exhibition were rendered the year before, but were not paid till this year. That does not alter the question at all. When a man is paid $2,250 a year, I do not think he ought to have time enough to spare to enable him to render services to the Government worth another $1,000. I think that this is one of the greatest abuses under which our executive Government labors; this hiring of men who have already large salaries, and giving them large bonuses for other services which they render during the time that they are already paid for by the Government. It is a rotten principle, and it is time that public attention was more markedly called to it. Again, I want to attack the whole system of these allowances for private secretaries. Instead of engaging a secretary for $600, as might in most cases be done to begin with, the Minister of the department either appoints someone who is already receiving a high salary, as my young friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has done, or else, after appointing a man private secretary, he gets him appointed as a first class or second class clerk, and he draws two salaries for doing only one kind of work. The whole system requires to be changed. We want to know what we are paying for a private secretary; and to appoint a man as private secretary while he is a first class or second class clerk is a fraud on the revenue.

Mr. MULLOCK. I do not quite understand the nature of Mr. Chipman's present duty; will the hon. Minister explain it? What is he engaged at? Is he private secretary, or is he private secretary and first class clerk, or what does he do?

Mr. TUPPER. I am sorry the hon. gentleman was not present when the vote for Mr. Chipman was passed, when this question was raised, and when twenty different members put the same case in twenty different ways. I have explained the matter until I am tired doing so, and I think the House has reason to complain of the time taken up by the matter.

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps the electors will complain.

Mr. TUPPER. Mr. Chipman is receiving the same salary this year that he received last year, and the electors will find fault, I think, with hon. gentlemen opposite for not being more vigilant last Session when they voted these amounts to Mr. Chipman, the principle of voting which they are now for the first time questioning. Mr. Chipman is occupying the position of a chief clerk in the Department of Marine, and, as I have stated before, he is receiving, in addition to his salary as chief clerk, an allowance of $600 for acting as private secretary.

Mr. MULOCK. Then I understand that you are paying Mr. Chipman about $2,200 a year for work which used to be done for $1,450, and that you are sending Mr. Reynolds to Britain to fill the place formerly occupied by him. And then, as another act of favoritism, for it is nothing more than that, Mr. Chipman has come out here and has been promoted over his predecessor in office, and is to have rolled up into one the salaries which two men formerly drew, making his salary $2,950; and that is the first administrative step of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He is extremely glib in giving his replies to questions which are asked here in the interest of the country. I have asked for information, as I had a right to do. Perhaps I ought to have been here before, but it is not, or ought not to be, too late to prevent leakage. Whatever explanations the Minister makes, it is quite clear that all these charges involve extra cost. He has a new appointment at $800, a promotion of another officer, and Mr. Reynolds, I suppose, will have an increase in the Supplementary Estimates; and then there is the favorite from Halifax put in to draw three men's salaries to do one man's work, to please the Minister of Marine. It is rather an expensive beginning with the young gentleman. I submit this is a pure job, and ought not to be sanctioned by Parliament.

Mr. TUPPER. Well, the purity of the job will, perhaps, recommend it to the consideration of those who understand it. The hon. gentleman should not be surprised to find that when an officer vacates an office, his successor goes into that office at a considerably reduced salary. If that does surprise him, he will find that the Civil Service is simply full of that kind of surprises. It is the invariable rule. It is very improper to place a man in an office made vacant by the death or removal of a civil servant, at the same salary as his predecessor received, even though he does the same duties; and instead of there being this favoritism, or this nasty phase of the question in connection with my department or any other, I may tell the hon. gentleman—because it may possibly soothe his feelings, and calm his mind—that Mr. Chipman, instead of receiving such an immense amount of favors, is receiving the salary which he received last year; and the man would be very unreasonable in the Marine Department who would complain of Mr. Chipman's being removed to a sphere in which he works side by side with him, when he receives no increase of salary. No injury to any man in the Marine Department is done by Mr. Chipman earning his salary at Ottawa instead of in London. These are the facts, and I fail to see the utility of the frequent suggestions of jobbery and favoritism, and the many insinuations that have been thrown across the House in connection with this appointment.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have just got from the Auditor General's Report a statement of the amounts drawn last year by Mr. Chipman. As assistant secretary in the Immigration Office in London, he drew $2,250; for services in connection with the Colonial Exhibition, he drew $1,000, and travelling expenses, $537; in all, $3,787. Now, I think, if the hon. Minister of Marine, when he rises to respond to questions put to him from this side of the House, would endeavor to treat members with a little more of that courtesy which is becoming to a man of his years, and not indulge in sarcasm, we should get on very much better than we do. The appointment of this man, Mr. Chipman, we have a perfect right to criticise. It is quite clear that a salary has been paid in excess of what is necessary, and that he has been placed in a position where he is drawing two salaries, and another man has been sent to take his place across the Atlantic. The whole thing has been done evidently for the purpose of favoring Mr. Chipman. He must be a pet of the Minister of Marine, or of some other man in the Government, when he is placed in a position to draw more than one salary. In looking over the Auditor General's Report we find that many are drawing extra allowances of this kind, and if the Government are determined to continue this practice we are determined to expose it, and to protest against a system that is most objectionable. The Civil Service has been led to the idea that they should not be content with one salary, but should have more than one. It is a growing evil in all the departments, and every man in the service is waking up to the fact that it is his own fault if he does not get something in addition to the salary he receives. I think it is time a stop should be put to this system, and that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should endeavor to correct the flagrant error he has committed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think the Minister of Finance has correctly appreciated the point that was taken by one of my hon. friends here as to the employment of Mr. Chipman in connection with the Colonial Exhibition. I think it is a most objectionable practice. Mr. Chipman was employed at a salary of $2,250, to discharge the duties of secretary to the Immigration Department in London, and he received a further sum of $1,000 for doing something, in 1886, in connection with the Colonial Exhibition. No man can properly fill two totally distinct offices. If he did his duty as assistant secretary, it required all his time; and this practice of giving civil servants extra salaries, of which this is a most conspicuous case, is one of the most flagrant abuses that can crop out in the Civil Service. We find whole pages of names of men who for some reason receive double salaries. Mr. Chipman is not the sole offender; there is that to be said for him; he is only one among eighty or ninety in a similar position. Now, I tell the hon. Minister of Finance, who I dare say desires honestly to enforce economy in all departments of the Civil Service, that there is no bank or mercantile establishment in this country in which men who are called from one piece of work and put at another are allowed to draw two distinct salaries. The process is growing up into an extreme abuse in our service, and it is high time that it should be checked. So far as regards the remarks made by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in reply to my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), the whole of this discussion arose from the Minister having made an incorrect statement to the House, as to the result of placing Mr. Chipman in his office. He stated expressly, in so many words, that it would entail no additional tax on the ratepayers, and it turns out, from the statement of the Minister of Fisheries, that it involves a considerable addition, and the hon. the Minister now admits he was mistaken. Under such circumstances, he has not the right to object to my hon. friend calling his attention to the fact that he was mistaken.

Mr. TUPPER. Nor do I. I only object to the hon. gentleman repeating arguments which have been all gone over before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will learn that in carrying the Estimates through Supply, he must answer the questions put to him, or very little progress will be made.

Mr. TUPPER. I answered them several times.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But not satisfactorily. The Minister of Fisheries must appreciate and understand that. My point is that this is a very gross abuse, which it is high time should be checked. It may be occasionally necessary to give a man additional work to do. It may have been that Mr. Chipman did his work particularly well in connection with the Colonial Exhibition, or whatever it was. I do not object to his being withdrawn from his proper work and employed to do other work, but what I do object to—and this is the first time it has come to our notice in the Auditor General's Report—is that a man should be paid two salaries. He could not have earned the two, because if he had been discharging his duties in the one capacity he could not perform them in the other.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree with many of the remarks that have been made by my hon. friend. I am sure none of us wish that a wrong impression should go to the country. I do not think it is quite fair to state that the evil of paying double salaries is on the increase. On the contrary, it is on the decrease. Very great care is taken in all the departments that civil servants shall not be paid for extra services and extra time. It is said there are a large number so paid, but if we take up the list, we will find that the parties are almost entirely outside of Ottawa. For instance, very often a collector of customs issues bounty checks, for which he is allowed a small amount as a fee, and he appears as receiving double pay. Then lightkeepers are also signal station keepers, or may be paid for copying work for the Meteorological Department. They receive a small amount for that extra service, and in that way the whole service is much more economically conducted than it could be by appointing independent officers. Then the collectors of customs are at times given charge of the savings banks, by which means we avoid employing two different men, but the collector appears as receiving double pay. In the departments at Ottawa, outside of payments for the calculation of savings banks' interest, and for bounty work in the Fishery Department, there is very little extra pay given. I think, therefore, that the system, instead of being on the increase, is on the decrease. With reference to what was said about Mr. Chipman, his payment for services at the Colonial Exhibition is a matter which occurred some time ago, and was, I suppose, fully discussed when the item was before the House last year. That exhibition entailed a great amount of labor on the High Commissioner's Office, and I believe Mr. Chipman rendered important services and worked very hard, and it was thought only right by Sir Charles Tupper that he should receive some acknowledgment. As to his being secretary of the Immigration Department, the High Commissioner's Office is not simply an immigration office, and it is on that account we have this year brought these salaries under the head of Civil Government. Mr. Chipman was secretary in the office, and during the years Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Finance, he also, both here and in London, supervised and carried on to a large extent the work of that office. He did not only do the work of private secretary to the Finance Minister, but also the work of secretary connected with the High Commissioner's Office, which was under Sir Charles' supervision here. With reference to private secretaries, I think the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) was a little unreasonable in his statements. A private secretary is not in the possession of a sinecure. Any person who has had practical experience will know that. He must be a trusted man, one who will be the confidant of the Minister; he has a great deal to do, not only with the Minister's private work but with departmental work as well, and he works, not merely eight hours per day, but as long as the Minister has work for him to do. It is perfectly absurd to think you can get a man to do that for $600, and the practice has been, under other Governments as well as this, that the Minister shall have the choice of his confidential clerk or secretary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But not to appoint a gentleman of high grade in his department.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a little out of the regular rule, but still it is not quite right to say that an inferior class of men can do that work, or that a man could be got to do it for simply the sum of $600. I simply make these remarks as modifying, I think, the rather inordinate criticism of some of my hon. friends on that side.

Mr. COOK. There is an old saying that there is no harm in a wrong act if it never comes to light. That is, if you make a false statement, and it is never proved to be false, there is no harm done. Therefore, I suppose the statement made by my hon. friend the Minister, if it had not been discovered, would have gone to the country as all right and proper. I think the castigation which my hon. friend the Minister of Marine has received is not exactly fair. The Minister of Finance is an older man and has had longer experience, and has been doing a moral work for a number of years. He has been an advocate of the great temperance cause for a number of years, and that is a moral question.

Mr. BOWELL. It has not made much impression on you.

Mr. COOK. If he does an immoral act, I do not think his young friend should be castigated for it. I am sure the gentleman who has been spoken of now is a valuable public servant. Mr. Chipman has been in the Tupper family for a number of years, and Sir Charles Tupper, knowing his value, and knowing that his son was going to occupy a very prominent position, naturally thought he would endeavor to send him out one of the best private secretaries he could find, that he would send him out such a man particularly as was referred to by the Minister of Finance just now, when he said it was very important to have a good man of that kind as private secretary, because a good deal of the departmental work must be performed by him; that is, I suppose, that he performs the work and the Minister gets the credit of it. Therefore, it is easily understood why this man Chipman was sent out by Sir Charles Tupper, because he knew he was going to assist in the departmental work of the Marine and Fisheries Department. Therefore, taking it all in all, I think the Minister should not have received the castigation he has on the ground of immorality, but that the castigation should have been directed to the one who first made the statement. The other Minister, being the younger man, could not but pick up the statement of his father in politics, and he may not have been aware himself of the fact. I protest against statements of this kind being made by the moral portion of the Ministry. If the statement had been made by some who do not climb the moral ladder, and do not get to the top rung, I would not have thought so much of it, but I am surprised when it came from the Minister of Finance, who always perches on the top rung of that moral ladder. It is not the first time the hon. gentleman has been caught this Session in committing acts of this kind. Only a few days ago the hon. gentleman was caught in the same trap, and he might have said, I beg your pardon, I was—ah, ah, ah—I did not quite understand, I was mistaken. That is the apology which is made for a direct violation of the truth.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. From the explanation which the Minister of Finance has given as to Mr. Chipman's salary, it is clear that he is paid for his duties as private secretary to the Minister of Marine, and not as a first class clerk.

It is clear that he is paid $2,800 for discharging his duties as private secretary. The Finance Minister tells us that the duties of a private secretary to a Minister are very important. Well, if they are of such importance as to require the payment of $2,800, it is the duty of the Government to submit that amount in the Estimates for the payment of a private secretary, and not to ask for $600 for that purpose and then give him an additional salary of $2,200 for discharging duties which the Finance Minister has stated cannot be discharged by Mr. Chipman or any other private secretary because the duties of private secretary are so great as to require all his time. Would it not be far better if it appeared in our Public Accounts, or in the Auditor General's Report, that these two salaries were not paid? If it is necessary to have a man of such ability as Mr. Chipman is described to be, to discharge the duties of private secretary for the Minister of Marine, why should the two salaries be put in the accounts? The Minister says that it is the desire of the Government to avoid paying officers two salaries. Well, here is an opportunity to carry out that desire. I say that this man Chipman receives a salary for being private secretary to the Minister of Marine, and therefore the vote should be $2,800 to pay for a private secretary to the Minister of Marine, and not $600 for a private secretary and the balance for a first class clerk.

Mr. TUPPER. That, of course, is a fair question for discussion; but, in reference to taking high class clerks as private secretaries, I think there is a precedent. Mr. Buckingham, who was the private secretary to the Premier in Mr. Mackenzie's Government, was a first class clerk when the Premier desired to make him a private secretary.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Mr. TUPPER. And, further, that high class clerk, while drawing his salary as private secretary, was promoted and was made a Deputy Minister in another department.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He was not a first class clerk when he was appointed secretary.

Mr. TUPPER. What class was he? My information—and I got it from the books—is that he was a first class clerk. He was promoted, however, while acting in the capacity of private secretary, to the higher position to which I have alluded.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is altogether mistaken.

Mr. TUPPER. I am corrected in this: He was made a first class clerk while he was private secretary, and he was further promoted when he was private secretary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He was promoted, I think, from a second class clerk and private secretary to the position from which the hon. gentleman's chief dismissed him, that is the position of Deputy Minister of the Interior. The hon. gentleman has assumed what was not the practice in former times, and what I trust is not the practice in most of the departments at the present time, that is, when $600 is voted for a private secretary, or for a clerk who is made a private secretary, that the whole of that sum must necessarily be devoted to the payment of that private secretary. I think that has not been the rule, I am sure it was not the rule formerly, and I suppose it is not the rule now in all the departments of the public service. The hon. gentleman, in making a chief clerk a private secretary, has adopted a practice that is almost if not altogether without precedent. Certainly, the practice usually is to take some intelligent and well-informed man, a good shorthand writer, one in whom the Minister has confidence, and appoint him to some position in the public service, if he is not already there, as a third or second class clerk, and then supplement his salary with the $600 voted for a private secretary. But when the hon. gentleman takes an officer who is already high in the public service, he is taking a party who is supposed, in point of rank and the importance of his service, to stand above that of private secretary, and if he makes such an officer a private secretary, he certainly ought not to supplement his salary by the vote of $600. If the hon. gentleman chooses to take Mr. Chipman as a chief clerk in the public service, and use him as private secretary, Mr. Chipman on no public ground whatever is entitled to $600 as private secretary. He is entitled to the maximum sum of the class to which he belongs, but beyond that, he is not entitled to receive anything from the public Treasury. Now, the hon. gentleman will see, I think, as the vote stands for private secretary, that in every instance he is not to receive more than $600. It is not an appropriation absolutely made to the private secretary, it is an appropriation placed under the control of the Minister, so that he may supplement his private secretary's salary, if it is not already adequate, by the addition of a sum not to exceed $600. He may vote one hundred, two hundred, three hundred, four hundred, five hundred, or the whole six hundred; but when the hon. gentleman takes one of the highest officers that he can find in this department, and uses that public officer as his private secretary, then that officer ought to be content with the sum which he receives and not supplement his salary by $600 more. Now, the hon. gentleman is in this position: he is giving to his private secretary a salary $600 higher than that of a chief clerk. That, I think, is clearly a misuse of the sum placed at the disposal of the Minister. If he chooses to employ an officer occupying so high a position in the public service, that officer certainly has nothing added to his duties or his responsibilities by being made private secretary of the Minister; he is occupying, or is performing, in point of rank, a service that is regarded in the public service as inferior to that which appertains to his office; and being less in point of responsibility—because no active intelligence is required on his part, he is merely required to be an expert shorthand writer and a good scribe—and when the hon. gentleman takes such an officer and makes him a private secretary, he has no right whatever to add to the salary which pertains to his public office the sum of $600, or any portion of it.

Mr. FOSTER. We have had this pretty well ventilated, and I would suggest now that we take a vote upon it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before the vote is taken I wish to call the attention of the House to a statement which the Minister of Finance made a few moments ago. He stated that this custom of granting double pay to servants in the departments was not increasing, that it was on the decrease. I have before me the Auditor General's Report of last year, in which I find that there were 396 persons who were granted double pay for their services, that is, received pay for more than one office, last year; but I find this year that there are 484 such persons. Now, it is singular that statement after statement, made by hon. gentlemen opposite, are disproved by the Opposition, after enquiry. The Minister of Marine has clearly made an error in stating that a saving had been effected with regard to Mr. Chipman. The Minister of Finance comes to his relief, and makes the statement that the practice of giving double pay to officers is a good deal on the decrease; but, when we compare last year's figures with this year's figures, we find that the number has increased from 396 to 484. Now, with regard to Mr. Chipman's appointment as private secretary for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, possibly it was thought desirable that a man of his extended experience should occupy the position of private secretary to the juvenile Minister, and so the change is made that he may fulfil the duty of dry nurse in the meantime until the juvenile Minister has reached the period in his history when he is able to discharge all the duties himself. Well, if it is considered necessary on that ground, we had better let the item pass; but it does appear singular that the Government should have pursued the course they have taken, and brought this man over from the city of London, where he was filling a position, and installing him in another position here, giving him double pay, and then increase the service by the appointment of a new man; and, in the face of all these facts, for the Minister to tell the House that a saving has been accomplished by the changes is certainly very strange. There is another matter I wish to bring to the attention of the House. Last year, when we were discussing the duties of High Commissioner, there was an extended discussion on the fact that the High Commissioner was then performing the duties of Finance Minister while he was supposed to be performing the duties of High Commissioner in London, thus virtually filling two positions. The First Minister—who I am sorry is not present—got up and stated to the House that such was not the fact, that we were finding fault with a man who occupied the distinguished and lucrative position of High Commissioner in London, and who, resigning that position, as it were, came to Canada and accepted a salary of $7,000 in place of $10,000. I will read what the First Minister said in regard to this matter:

"But there is one thing that is most extraordinary, and it is this, the utter reluctance of hon. gentlemen opposite, the party of reform, to consent to an economy or any saving of any kind. My hon. friend enjoys the high, honorable, and useful position of High Commissioner, at a salary of $10,000 a year, besides the allowances which some hon. gentlemen have cavilled at so much from time to time. But because he undertook to perform efficiently the duties of High Commissioner, while at the same time he acted as Finance Minister, saving the whole of the $10,000 to the country, and performing the duties of both offices for $7,000, the hon. gentleman says at once that this is an abuse that an hon. gentleman should consent to work for $7,000 when he might have drawn the whole $10,000."

Now, Sir, what do we find? In looking over the Auditor General's Report I find that Sir Charles Tupper, whether he was High Commissioner or whether he was Finance Minister, has drawn no less than $18,694. Last year he drew for salaries alone, $13,845 81. When he was here as Finance Minister no doubt he was sent to Washington as plenipotentiary, and while there he drew as salary for services, $5,378, while at the same time he was drawing his salary as Finance Minister at the rate of $7,000 per year. Then again, during a portion of the year he drew part of his salary as High Commissioner and almost the entire items of the office for contingencies. Altogether he drew $18,694. That is a pretty good sum for one man to draw, in the face of the statement of the First Minister that Sir Charles Tupper had most willingly and magnanimously resigned the distinguished position he occupied in London and thrown away $10,000 a year, and come out here through pure patriotism and was now serving his country at the rate of $7,000. But we find in the Auditor General's Report, on picking out the different items, that he got $18,694 in place of $7,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I think an explanation is probably needed on the top of the address to which we have just listened, and the explanation is this: The First Minister's statement, I think, was correct, and has been carried out. When Sir Charles Tupper was Finance Minister he did not draw a cent as High Commissioner. That would be impossible.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the hon. gentleman state the time at which Sir Charles Tupper ceased to be High Commissioner, and drew his salary as Finance Minister? The items are so mixed up it is difficult to make them out.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to finish my explanations, I think this can be done without further details. It is certain that Sir Charles Tupper did not, while drawing salary as Finance Minister, between the date of his appointment as Finance Minister and the date of his resignation, draw salary as High Commissioner. The Auditor General would not allow him to draw two salaries; there is no doubt about that. There is not an hon. gentleman here who believes such could be the case. As to the contingencies of the High Commissioner's Office, it must be remembered that the office went on, and the contingencies had to be paid in the usual way. With regard to what was spent at Washington, while Sir Charles Tupper was acting as one of the Fishery Commissioners, that is a matter we have already discussed in this House. It was not payment for services, it was not a voted salary, it was simply for expenses incurred, as must be incurred by anyone occupying a representative position, such as his was. If the hon. gentleman will read the debates in the English House of Commons over similar expenses incurred by Mr. Chamberlain, as one of the High Commissioners, he will find the expenses were very much larger than this amount, and also that when Mr. Labouchere, acting in the role of the hon. gentleman from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), attacked that item, Mr. Gladstone rose and defended it very strongly, on the ground that a representative occupying such a position had duties to perform which necessitated certain expenses. So it is not quite true to say that the First Minister was wrong in his assertion that no amounts would be paid for salary as High Commissioner during the period in question.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. McMULLEN. I beg to correct the hon. gentleman. If he will look over the Auditor General's Report he will find an item of $5,378.85 for services, and also an item for travelling and expenses as plenipotentiary to Washington, $3,118.45. The last item covers travelling and other expenses.

Mr. FOSTER. What I said is true all the same.

Mr. McMULLEN. No; he was drawing his salary as Finance Minister of this country, and he was drawing double pay for the two offices. That is quite clear.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. ELLIS. I should like to ask if Canada paid any portion of the expenses of the commission?

Mr. FOSTER. It paid the proportion of the expenses incurred by her own commissioner and her own aides, and nothing else.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I should be sorry to enter into any discussion as to the amount expended by Sir Charles Tupper when occupying such a responsible position. I do not question the amount. I assume the expenses would be in some degree measurable by the position held. It is not a question in regard to which I will cavil; nor do I understand that my hon. friend cavils about it. The point I understand him to take is that $5,378 were paid as salary.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood my hon. friend to make that out from the Auditor General's Report. My hon. friend does not raise any question about the $3,000. We should like to know what that amount of $5,000 odd was for.

Mr. FOSTER. It was not paid as salary. I do not know how it is entered in the Auditor General's Report, but it was for expenses incurred in connection with the commission.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose the $5,000 to which my hon. friend referred, covered travelling expenses to Washington and expenses while there, and the $3,000 are other travelling expenses incurred by the late Finance Minister. That, I think, is the state of the case.

Mr. FOSTER. He went to London.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He certainly did not spend much of his time here.

Mr. FOSTER. The item of $5,378 was for travelling and living expenses in connection with the commission. The other $3,000 was for travelling expenses incurred by him as Finance Minister while here and for his visit to England.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was the House in Cromwell Road maintained intact during the time the hon. gentleman was Finance Minister here, because it looks like it?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot say.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It did not matter to him, because this country paid his income tax; but I do not know where his residence was, Ottawa or London. I think a jury would have fixed it at London.

Board of Examiners, Civil Service Act..... $4,000

Mr. FOSTER. This shows a reduction, owing to the fact that by law we shall have but one primary and qualifying examination per year, and it is proposed that not only shall we have a reduction in the contingencies, but also a reduction in the salaries of the board of examiners.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At the present moment, considering, as I understand, that several thousand men have passed the examination and qualified, whom it is not intended to appoint, the Minister might save this item altogether. It appears to me that the holding of examinations of candidates for the Civil Service, under existing conditions, when there are already thousands of these lads scattered over the country at present qualified, is making a farce of the whole thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What is the item of reduction?

Mr. FOSTER. The reduction on the vote is $2,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE. How is it distributed; how is the reduction made out?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a reduction of $2,000, but the regulations with regard to the salaries of the examiners has not yet been decided upon.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will an examination be held this year?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; there will be one per year, as was the case last year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many names are on the list as having passed the Civil Service examination and as eligible for appointment?

Mr. FOSTER. That would be difficult to state, if you took eligibility for appointment to mean possibility of appointment. Of course, a great many of those who passed and did not get positions in the Civil Service made places for themselves elsewhere and are not at the call of the Government, even supposing places were found for them. There is always that fact to be taken into account. You cannot, therefore, say that the total number of young men who passed are now in a position to enter the Civil Service, because a large number have gone into other employments. These are the figures of those who passed the examination: 1885, 878; 1886, 830; 1887, 936; 1888, about 510.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would be about 2,500?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, about 3,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And with that number on the lists, making every allowance for those who go to other pursuits, the hon. gentleman proposes to continue the system and to add another 2,800. Does he really believe that there is any benefit to the young men themselves or to the country in this?

Mr. FOSTER. We have a Civil Service system, and by law the mode of entrance into that service is by passing a certain examination. That ought to be open to the young men of this country next year as well as to the young men of past years.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Once in three years would be quite frequent enough.

Mr. FOSTER. You will see that the Government, with the sanction of Parliament, has reduced it one-half; that, I think, is satisfactory for a first step.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You have not told us yet how you will effect any reduction, whether you are to follow the same principle of examinations, whether you are to cut down the pay of the examiners, or how it is to be done.

Mr. FOSTER. I have stated to the House that we held but one examination last year, and that is fixed by law. We hold one preliminary and qualifying examination each year. We hold the same promotion examinations that we previously did; both the general promotion examination and the excise promotion examination.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). At how many places are the examinations held?

Mr. FOSTER. In fifteen different localities. I presuppose that there will be a reduction of the contingencies, a reduction to a certain extent in the pay of special examiners, and as I said before, it is proposed to make a reduction in the salaries of the examiners.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Will the Minister tell us how many of those who passed the examinations during the year mentioned received appointments?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Can the Minister tell us if it is sometimes the practice of the Government to appoint officers to positions in the departments who have not passed these examinations?

Mr. FOSTER. Officers are not appointed to a position in the Government who have not passed the examination otherwise than is provided in the law. Men of special technical qualifications are allowed, under the Civil Service Act, to be appointed without examination.

Country Savings Banks..... $15,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In connection with this, I may call to the attention of the Minister of Finance, and also to the attention of the House, that his predecessor intimated—if my memory serves me tolerably distinctly—that it was the intention of the Government to reduce the rate of interest, at any rate, on all deposits of a very moderate sum, in the savings banks. Apparently, the policy announced by that gentleman has not been carried out. I would like to have from the Minister of Finance a statement as to what the Government proposes to do in that regard.

Mr. FOSTER. I was not aware that it was stated that the Government proposed to reduce the interest. I know they took power last year by the Act to reduce it. I cannot say that their intention to do so was stated in the House; in fact my memory would serve me in a different direction, that it was not stated in the House that it was the intention of the Government to reduce it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will look up that point, but I had some considerable discussion with the Minister of Finance on the subject, and I certainly understood him, and so did other gentlemen on this side, that he had made up his mind to reduce the rate of interest to the same rates paid by banks in this country. I think that he referred to the larger class of deposits, and my impression is that as to the smaller class he did not very much pledge himself or pledge the Government, but as to the larger class of deposits he did; that is a point that we can easily verify by the records. No doubt the number of deposits are large, and a very large percentage of the deposits are held in quite considerable sums, as was shown by the returns brought down here. They vary, no doubt, in the post office savings banks somewhat, from the amounts in the Government savings banks, to which I am now referring. It was of the larger deposits, I fancy, to which the Minister of Finance spoke, and I should like to know whether the Government—supposing that my recollection proves correct—hold themselves in any way bound by what their former Minister of Finance stated, or whether they have altered their opinion on this subject, or whether the intention of the Government is now to maintain the full rate, particularly on sums not in excess, let us say, of three or four hundred dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a little difficult to discuss that question unless we knew what did take place in the House. Suppose my hon. friend allows that question to remain over until concurrence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As the hon. gentleman's recollection differs from mine, we can discuss this question by assent, and of itself when some other item is disposed of. That will be a better course, because putting those things off to concurrence, and looking at the manner in which concurrence has been conducted recently, I must give the hon. Minister notice that I will have to object. In the old time when concurrence used to occupy several days, that might have been done with propriety, but of later years, concurrence, I am sorry to say, has been rushed through in a few hours, and perhaps both sides of the House are to be blamed for that. It is quite clear we cannot hold over matters until concurrence, under such circumstances.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to discuss this when we are on some similar item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We had better arrange to discuss this point specially after another item has been passed.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman explain how this reduction of $1,500 was effected?

Mr. FOSTER. The saving has been effected by the gradual carrying out of the policy announced to the House with reference to the Government savings banks, that is, that when an opportunity arises on the resignation, decease or dismissal of a savings bank keeper, that the savings bank deposits should be transferred to the post office savings bank department, and put under one management, thus effecting considerable saving. The saving here of $1,500 is due to the fact that during the past year seven banks have been transferred from the list of Government savings banks and placed under the management of the Post Office Department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the Minister state how it is that the office of assistant receiver general at Halifax costs nearly double that at Montreal?

Mr. FOSTER. We have a special arrangement in Montreal by which the work is done for a lump sum, and this arrangement, I think, has existed for some time. A very large business is done at Halifax, and in Halifax the business is not done in a Dominion building, but we have to hire offices for the purpose, whereas in St. John and in Toronto the business is done in Government buildings.

Brokerage and commission on sinking fund of 1874, 1875, 1876, 1878 and 1879..... $5,453 24

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many years has this arrangement to run?

Mr. FOSTER. I think until 1892. It is an arrangement which is binding on us until that time. At the end of that time, I see no reason why a different arrangement cannot be made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon. gentleman quite sure of his date?

Mr. FOSTER. January 1, 1882, to January 1, 1892, terminable on one year's notice from either side.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In connection with that matter, can the hon. gentleman state what arrangement exactly has been made with respect to the sinking fund and the five per cents which were converted into fours some time ago? There was a dispute as to whether the sinking fund could be at once reduced or not, and I have not yet heard what conclusion the Government came to on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. That matter, I think, has been already brought up, and I think the answer was that some negotiations were going on. These negotiations have been concluded, and it was found it was not possible to apply the sinking fund to the diminution of the total debt, but that it was not in the nature of a new loan, being simply a conversion, and the sinking fund liability remains intact. That is how we are advised by judicial authority on the matter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose, in that case, the hon. gentleman can have no objection to bringing down the correspondence and the opinions. The matter is one of some considerable moment. Is that the opinion of our Minister of Justice or one obtained from English authorities?

Mr. FOSTER. We obtained an opinion from our own Minister of Justice, and I think we had opinions as well from English authorities.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. the Minister of Justice recollect the details of the matter?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I could not remember them very distinctly, but I think the opinion was based principally on the representations made in the circular, and the circular represented that the sinking fund would remain in connection with the new loan.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Shall I move for the papers?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I will bring down all the information I can.

Dominion Loan of Canada reduced..... $4,145 61

Mr. FOSTER. That is in the department where the notes, after having been sent in, are recounted, resorted and destroyed, and where the new notes are signed, and I have been enabled to make that reduction without any harm being done to the public service. The reduced staff is owing to a change which has been made in the mode of operation. The Deputy Minister, when in London, and also when in Washington last year, studied the methods in vogue in the two countries, and it is by means of the improvements introduced, which do not necessitate so much work, but at the same time ensure equal safety, that I have been enabled to make this large reduction.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I might mention that there is considerable difficulty in obtaining decent specimens of ones and twos in many quarters. They are often very dirty and tattered, and it is high time they should be replaced.

Mr. FOSTER. They will soon be replaced. The new ones are under way now.

Mr. COOK. Do the Government propose to issue any other notes of a different denomination from what is issued at the present time?

Mr. FOSTER. There is no change contemplated.

Printing Dominion Notes ..... $43,000

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). How is it there is such a large increase, $3,000, in printing?

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will look at the amounts expended in previous years, he will find that we have always voted too small an amount. I am not quite sure whether this will cover the expense, but I thought it was better to put in what I supposed would cover the expense than to put in a lesser amount for the sake of showing more saving here. Our printing is done under contract, and the terms are explicit.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Were there any tenders besides those of the contractors?

Mr. FOSTER. The tenders upon which the present contract is based were issued some two or three years ago. I think there were other tenderers besides the successful ones. The present holder of the contract is Mr. Burland, and it is one of the conditions of his contract that he shall remove his establishment to Ottawa. He will be here and his work in operation by the first of May, and a better supervision, of course, can be then had over the work.

Miscellaneous Expenditure, including N.W.T. .... $20,000

Mr. MITCHELL. What is that for?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will find the details on page C 67 of the Auditor General's Report. It is principally for disbursements connected with the administration of justice in the North-West Territories.

Senior Messenger of the Supreme Court of Canada... $500

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is this the librarian?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He is included in the contingencies, and is paid under an Order in Council. I remember that the hon. gentleman called my attention to his salary last Session. Some additional duties have been imposed on him since by regulation, in the way of keeping the library open for additional hours.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He is entitled to an extra allowance?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What increase is proposed to be given him?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I can hardly say, because I have not mentioned the matter to my colleagues.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to add my own views to those expressed by hon. friends to my left. Having due regard to the onerous and delicate duties performed by this gentleman, duties which require special knowledge, I think he is entitled to a reasonable increase.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Mr. Ternent's time is entirely devoted to the library.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the hon. the Minister of Justice think that three messengers are absolutely necessary for the Supreme Court?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am informed they are, and I do believe they are, because they are not only attendants for the judges, but likewise for the officers of the court and for members of the bar during the sitting of the court.

Clerk, Exchequer Court of Canada ..... $1,100

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Why this increase?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The vote for clerical services in the Exchequer Court last Session was taken in a tentative way. The court had been only a very short time established, and we were not aware what volume of business would have to be done and what staff would be required. After communicating with the judge and the registrar, I took a vote of $800. No appointment has been made under that because it was found that the staff that would be required would be a second and third class clerk. It was necessary to have a gentleman possessing legal qualifications to be the first clerk of the registrar, more especially as the registrar's duties called him away from the capital frequently. It is desirable the person to take his place should have professional training. Under these circumstances, I agree there should be a second class clerk, and it is necessary to have a third class clerk for purely clerical work. I do not think the staff can be reduced properly below that. The volume of business is considerable indeed, and is increasing, and I therefore ask for a vote of $1,100 for a second class clerk and $600 for a third class clerk.

Printing, Binding and Distributing the Supreme Court Reports..... $2,000

Mr. MITCHELL. Where is the printing done?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is done at our own printing establishment here.

Mr. AMYOT. Do the Government intend diminishing the price of the report?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The price of the report will be reduced, I think, in a very short time. I am asking for an increase in the vote for the purchase of books for the Supreme Court library, for the reason that the library has become defective in its complement of American law reports. I believe the amount required will be about $3,000, and I proposed to ask for $1,000 each year, for three years, for that purpose.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I hope something will be done to give better accommodation to the Supreme Court library. At present the books are scattered round, and some are in the judge's retiring room, to which we can get sometimes, but I think that some further provision should be made for that library.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand the Minister of Justice to say that this $1,000 is for the purchase of American law books?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. American law reports.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is astonishing to me, that gentlemen who have shown such antagonism to the Americans in regard to an exchange in trade, should ask for an appropriation in order to get American law reports. That is a most marvellous proposal.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It shows a desire to investigate both sides of the question.

Mr. MITCHELL. You may desire to investigate, but it seems to me that you always give a pronounced opinion against the Americans beforehand.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before this item is entirely disposed of, I desire to say, from a layman's point of view, and from a public point of view, that I think it is very desirable that the Government of the country should find some more suitable accommodation for the Supreme Court. It appears to me, coming to the Capital, and seeing all these magnificent buildings, where all the other departments are so handsomely and properly housed, that it is not creditable to the Government, or to the country, or to the Capital, or to the legal profession, that the Supreme Court, the highest court in the Dominion, should have to put up with such miserable accommodation as it has. I speak only from a public point of view, and I think the Government and this Parliament should take the question into consideration whether more proper accommodation should not be given which would be suitable to the dignity and convenience of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What are the items with reference to the salary of the registrar and marshal of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Quebec? What obligation are we under to pay for that?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We are under no obligation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why should that not be paid in Halifax and other ports?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think that will have to be done.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). This is a legacy from the Imperial régime.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In case this is extended, does the hon. gentleman propose to provide for the payment of the officials in the Vice-Admiralty Court on the lakes?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not know that. The amount of business done there is pretty well compensated, I think, by the fees, and the hon. gentleman will see that the salaries are provided for the judges, and in the Province of Quebec for the registrar and the marshal, while in the lower Provinces, the marshal and registrar are paid only by fees. I have lately had a return of the business done at the different places and the amount of fees received by the different officers, and I may have to call the attention of the House to that subject hereafter. I may mention, however, that the judge in the Province of Quebec receives no fees, whereas in the other Provinces the judges' salaries are considerably supplemented by fees.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That might be a reason for legislation and for adopting a rule for all these courts. They all stand on the same footing and are under the same control, and I do not know of any reason why the litigants should pay fees in one Province that they would not be called to pay elsewhere, that what is paid by the litigants in one Province should be paid out of the public Treasury in another. It seems to me that there should be a uniform rule adopted.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Have any further steps been taken to extend the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty court?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think there should be uniformity in this matter, but we have been expecting from year to year Imperial legislation on the subject, but we have received no further assurance since I last spoke on the subject. We had the assurance that legislation would take place, but no satisfactory result has been reached.

Mr. MULLOCK. Is it the intention of the Minister of Justice to make any suggestion this year as to the salaries of the judges in the Province of Ontario?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I should prefer to answer that question a little later.

Mr. MULLOCK. I do not want to precipitate any expression of opinion from the Minister of Justice, but the matter was before the House last year, and the Minister of Justice introduced a Bill dealing with the question, but that was withdrawn. While I do not wish to precipitate any expression of opinion on his part now, I think it is due to the country that he should, during this Session, deal with the matter, not merely by expressing an opinion at a later stage, but by acting upon any view he may entertain in regard to the matter. There is a very decided opinion, and a very strong opinion, entertained amongst the bar of Ontario in regard to the salaries of the Superior Court judges, and I do not think the Government will be unduly embarrassed in this House—at least I trust not—in dealing with that matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. I observe, and it is a subject which has been brought up many times since Confederation, that, in the smaller Provinces, such as Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, the salaries of the judges are much smaller than they are in Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. DAVIES, (P.E.I.)

Those judges have just as important duties to perform, and probably as many cases come before them as come before the judges in the larger Provinces, because where there are more cases there are more judges. I do not see the justice of giving our judges $4,000 and the other judges $5,000 and $6,000, and I think the Minister of Justice should take this matter up and should remedy what I have always considered to be a very great injustice.

Mr. MULLOCK. Another matter to which I intended to call the Minister's attention is the position of the junior judge of the county of York. He is compelled to reside in the city of Toronto, and he is dealt with, so far as his salary is concerned, in the same way as any county court judge who lives in a much less expensive place. I think the duties of the junior judge of the county court of the county of York are, at all events, as onerous as those of any judge in the service of the country; and on his behalf I would ask the Government to see whether they cannot put him on a much better footing—in fact, I think it will be necessary for the Government, at an early day, to consider whether it will not be proper to appoint an additional judge in the county of York, having duties that will require his continuous attendance in the city of Toronto. At present you are applying to the junior judge of the county of York those regulations that are strictly only applicable to a judge who has to go on circuit in country districts, whereas, the judge of the county of York has to discharge duties rural as well as urban; he has to act as judge for the city of Toronto, having a population of now nearly 200,000, and in addition—

Mr. MITCHELL. Don't stretch.

Mr. MULLOCK. Well, 175,000 inside the city—I said nearly 200,000. Then, if we count the suburbs with the population of the city, there is not much short of a quarter of a million of people in the judicial district of the county of York; and you have but two judges for that whole population, namely, the judge proper, and his junior. I need hardly mention to this House, who are so familiar with the facts, that the judicial duties connected with the metropolis of Ontario are extremely onerous, on account of the large amount of business done there, and it is quite absurd, it is an actual injustice, to expect the junior judge of the county of York to discharge those duties efficiently, with what slight assistance he can have from the senior judge, who, of course, does all he can—yet two are, in my judgment, unable to keep up with the work properly. Then it is manifestly unfair to require the junior judge to reside in the city of Toronto and discharge those duties and receive but $2,000 a year, not nearly as much as the Minister of Marine proposes to give to his private secretary.

Mr. COOK. Whilst I have a great respect for the opinion of my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), and whilst I have great respect for the bar of this country, who want an increase in the judges' salaries, I must say that the bar of this country does not pay all the taxes. There are some other people in this country who require to be consulted besides the bar. The lawyers do not pay all the taxes. I do not know that the people of this country are unanimous in favor of increasing the salaries of the judges; a great many people are of the opinion that they are pretty well paid already—$5,000 and $6,000 a year is a pretty fair salary to live upon. With all due deference to the hon. member for North York and his opinion, and the opinion of the bar, I must express the opinion that a large number of the taxpayers of this country are not in favor of increasing the judges' salaries.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Is it the intention of the Government to provide for the salary of an additional judge for the Supreme Court of the Province of Quebec, the office for which has been created?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am making some enquiries on that subject now, and will be able to give the hon. gentleman an answer in two or three days.

Committee rose, it being Six o'clock, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Salaries and contingent expenses of the Senate ..... $30,638

Mr. FOSTER. The same as last year, with an increase of $100.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the cause of the increase? We find, from year to year, that there are increases taking place in connection with the expenses of the Senate. From looking over the Auditor General's Report, and some bills in connection with items at one time or another supplied them, my impression is that, from year to year, they have increased, and purchases are made without any reason whatever. We are quite willing, of course, that the old senators should enjoy the dignity of their position, but at the same time it is desirable that we should lend that criticism to these items that they deserve at our hands. Now, for the last number of years I think the House is quite aware that, regardless of expense, a great many things have been added to the Senate in the way of items. I have had a look over the accounts myself, and in a great many things I think they have supplied themselves regardless of cost. Of course, whatever is considered necessary for their own convenience and comfort it is our duty to pass, but I think that these items should receive, at our hands, careful criticism, and that at least we should intimate to them courteously that we are not disposed to allow items to be passed, of the necessity for which we have no evidence whatever, without giving them that criticism that they deserve.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman perceives that the increase is very small, only $100 on the whole estimate. That increase was, I believe, given to an attendant in the reading room. There has been no increase in the officers or in the sessional messengers. The estimate is practically the same as that of last year.

Mr. MILLS. Is that officer to whom the increase was given still in the employ of the House, or was he a retired officer?

Mr. FOSTER. I think he is one of the attendants in the reading room.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that last year we had tradesmen's accounts, $3,459.73, and unforeseen charges, $2,968.75. These are two very large items. What are they supposed to cover?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think anything could be more explicit than the list given in the Auditor General's Report. Every item is there set out, and the items have passed the Auditor General's scrutiny. As the hon. gentleman will see on reading over the items, they explain themselves. They include trunks for stationery, the same as members of the House of Commons' trunks, paper holders, ink bottles, knives, and spoons and other articles necessary for the restaurant, and so on.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see there is an item for Brussels carpet, 550 yards, $619.13. Undoubtedly where that carpet was put down something was taken up; what was done with that? We know that the carpets are not used till they are worn out. I fancy they are used for a while and then taken away or sold. What was done with the carpet which was replaced by the 590 yards?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot tell, but I will make careful enquiry about that.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it right to have information on that point.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly; I will get the information.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is a matter that deserves our consideration. We are here for this purpose and we have a right to discuss these items.

Mr. DAVIN. Last year I entertained the hope that the Minister of Justice would have succeeded in securing for the judges in the North-West and Manitoba an increase of salary, and indeed for the judges all over the country. It is but right that those hon. gentlemen who do not take the view adopted by the hon. gentleman who spoke just before recess, should show that there are members in this House who do not take the narrow and short-sighted view respecting the remuneration of judges that seems to prevail among some hon. gentlemen. I will deal with the judges in the North-West. I say that $4,000 a year for a judge, for a man capable of adjudicating in criminal and civil matters, for a man whose education represents a large amount of capital, and who must be a man of learning and of distinguished ability—I say that, with the high rate of living that prevails there, $4,000 is a contemptible salary, and a judge cannot keep up his position and live on it. I should like to remark that I think our senior judge, Mr. Justice Richardson, who really performs the duties of a chief justice, should be in the position of chief justice, and when the additional salaries are given to judges, he should obtain extra pay and should occupy the position of chief justice in the same way as we have chief justices in the various Provinces. The idea which seems to prevail amongst some hon. members, that a more crude state of things will satisfy the North-West than will satisfy any of the Provinces, would be entirely removed if they were to visit the North-West.

Mr. MULOCK. We do not have to go there for it.

Mr. DAVIN. I am much obliged to you. Those hon. gentlemen would find that the people of the North-West were just as highly civilised, and were as much advanced in the arts of life, as the people of any part of the country. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook), who spoke this afternoon, uttered sentiments that I heard members of our own party utter, but not publicly, last year. Those hon. gentlemen rise and say: $5,000 a year seems good pay for a judge,—and their memory probably reverts to their book-keeper or to some man engaged in their employ not requiring the same class of mind, not requiring the same training or the same learning, and they think that if their book-keeper can live on $2,000, $3,000 or $4,000 a year, why should not a judge be able to do so? Those hon. gentlemen have almost a resentment in their minds the moment it is proposed to add to the salaries of the judges. I say it is short-sighted on their part, because they themselves may go into court, especially a rich man like the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook), and $20,000, $30,000 or $50,000 of his money or property may depend upon the result of the trial of the case. If you lower the salaries, what do you do? You lower the class of men who go on the bench. And, at the present moment, I may tell you this, that I notice, and it was the subject of remark among leading men in Toronto when I was living there, that our best and ablest men did not wish to go on the bench. Why should they, when they make $15,000, $16,000, $13,000 or $10,000 a year in their profession. The dignity of being a judge is a very fine thing, but dignity cannot be kept up without the sinews of war any more than any other position can be maintained, and if you place men in positions of dignity and give them miserable salaries not sufficient to enable them to keep up their position, you lower and humiliate them. Suppose it comes to be the rule that only an inferior class go on the bench, what would be the result? You will have men by-and-bye, as surely as I am addressing this committee, who can be approached. Up to the present moment the character of our bench in Ontario, and in every part of this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, stands as high as the bench in England, and there has not for many years been an aspersion upon the honor of the ermine; but if, while the incomes of merchants and contractors and men in every walk of life are increasing, you keep down the incomes of the judges who carry out the law, the men who, as Burke said, speaking of the bar, had had more to do with the advance and progress of government than any other class of men, if you lower their salaries and keep them down, the result will be that you will have a pettifogging class among your lawyers and an inferior class of men on your bench, and some day or other they may be approached. If that time should ever come, what will happen? Will you have justice? Will you have the same confidence in going before your courts which you have now, will you be certain, as you are certain now, that the man who presides in your courts will hold with unwavering hand the balance of justice? No. We shall be in something the same position as the people of the United States, where they elect their judges and where judgment is decided sometimes before the judge goes on the bench. Now, Sir, referring more particularly to the North-West, let me call your attention to the fact that the judges in other parts of the country have a larger salary, while in the North-West the expenses of living are greater. What I should like to see would be a general measure raising the salary of the judges all over the country. I should like to see this House rise above that petty, green-grocer spirit of discussion that I am sorry to see sometimes prevails here. When I see my friend the member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) shedding deciduous tears over a taken up carpet I admire him just as I admire the Egyptians we read about, who used to shed penitential tears over the smell of a deified onion. That was a long time ago, Sir, and I think that my friend is in a backward state when he sighs and almost sheds tears over that decapitated carpet. I should like to see this House raise itself above that miserable and narrow spirit that sometimes cries out when the salaries of judges are mentioned. Let us decide to pay the men properly who shed lustre upon the country, in whose hands our lives and property are placed, who have the greatest possible influence on opinion by virtue of the high office which they hold. No man of reflection can doubt that judges have the greatest possible influence on the progress of the country, or that they have the greatest possible influence upon a healthy public opinion in the country such as we should not have if we had judges morally weak, judges not sound in learning, and judges not capable as we have them to-day. I may say that I should like very much to see the salaries of men occupying other important positions in the service of the country raised, but I will not go into that now. I think the amount of pay to the Ministers of the Crown is simply ludicrous, it is so small.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is more than some of them are worth.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know anything about that, but I think it is too small, however. I am mainly interested now about the salaries of the judges, and I hope that if the Minister of Justice cannot see his way to bringing down a general measure such as was contemplated last year, that we shall have in the Supplementary Estimates an item giving the judges of the North-West $5,000 a year.

Mr. MITCHELL. What about the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes; in the Maritime Provinces also. I hope we shall have the judges of the North-West receiving $5,000 a year, and Chief Justice Richardson $6,000 a year. I do not see why, in the Maritime Provinces and the North-West, judges who are equally learned, who have the same great interests vested in their office, should be placed in an inferior position as regards salary to other judges.

Mr. AMYOT. It is, perhaps, well that we should know in discussing this question what are the salaries of judges in some other countries, and I think that would be a very good argument in favor of increasing the salary of our judges, and would form a very good precedent for us here. In England the Lord Chancellor has got a salary, not of $6,000, but of $50,000 a year, and we must not pretend that because we live in a colony our intelligence and our knowledge of law is not as high as in England. When our judges have all their time employed in the administration of justice, I do not see why we should not pay them equally well as they are paid elsewhere. I have heard it said that in commercial pursuits men are not paid so highly as our judges, but we must remember that in commerce men sometimes make $50,000 or $100,000 a year, and if you take the stock of intelligence possessed by business men you will not find that it is very much higher than that of an ordinary judge. We do not grudge commercial men their successes, but we think that judges should be recompensed because of their position, their ability, and the knowledge and experience of some thirty years which they bring to the bench. We must remember that great expenses are incurred by judges in studying at a college or university, and that the judge sacrifices everything in this world for the administration of justice. We find that in England the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary have $30,000 a year each, the members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $25,000 a year each, Court of Appeal—Master of the Rolls, $30,000; judges, $25,000. Court of Chancery—Lord High Chancellor, $50,000; five judges, $25,000 each. Court of Queen's Bench—Chief Justice, $40,000; fourteen judges, $25,000 each. Admiralty Court—President, $25,000; judges, $25,000 each. Court of Arches—$25,000 salary for the judge. County Court Judges from $7,500 to $9,000 each, and the Recorder of London, $17,500 a year. It may be said that this is for England, that it is the mother country and that their blood is purer, and the judges there are worth more, but let us take the salaries of judges of poor Ireland. In the Court of Appeal—three judges have $20,000 each. Court of Chancery—Lord High Chancellor, $40,000 a year. Master of the Rolls, $20,000; Vice Chancellor, $20,000. Court of Queen's Bench—Chief Justice, $25,000, and six judges at $19,000 a year each. Court of Exchequer—Chief Justice, $23,000 a year, and two judges at $19,000. Divorce Court—salary of judge, $19,000. Admiralty Court—salary of judge, $6,000. Bankruptcy Court—two judges at $10,000 each. The Land Commissioner's Court Chief Justice, $19,000 a year, two Commissioners at $15,000 a year each, and a third Commissioner at a salary of $10,000. It must further be remembered that those judges live cheaper in England than they can here. In Scotland the salaries of the judges are as follows:—High Court of Session—Presiding Judge, $25,000; three judges, $18,000 each. Second Division—Chief Justice, $25,000; three judges at $18,000 each. The Outer-house Court—five judges, $18,000 a year each. I suppose I will be answered that those high salaries prevail in Great Britain, but let us take the salaries paid to judges in other colonies with a very much smaller population than we have in Canada, and we will find that they are paid far higher than our Canadian judges. In Australia, New South Wales—population, December, 1886, 1,001,966—Judge in Chief, $17,500 a year; five Puisne Judges at $13,000 a year each. Victoria population upon the 30th June, 1887, 1,019,106—salary of Chief Justice, $17,500; five Puisne Judges, $15,000 each; Judge in Equity, $5,500; Bankruptcy Judge, $7,500. In South Australia—population in 1886, 1,342,614—a very much smaller population than Canada—the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court gets $12,500, and three Puisne

Judges, $10,000 each; three District Judges, $8,500 each. West Australia—principal city, Perth, with a population of 10,000—Chief Justice, $5,000; Puisne Judge, $3,500. New Zealand—population in March, 1886, 578,482—Chief Justice, $8,500; four Puisne Judges, $7,500 each. Tasmania—population on 31st December, 1886, 137,211—Chief Justice, $7,500; Puisne Judge, $6,000. Fiji Islands—population in 1884, 3,613 Europeans, 121,000 natives—Chief Justice, $7,500, with $1,500 bonus. Jamaica—population in 1881, 580,000—Chief Justice, $10,000; First Puisne Judge, $6,500; Second Puisne Judge, $5,000. Trinidad—population in 1881, 153,028—Chief Justice, $9,000; two Puisne Judges, $5,000 each. Windward Islands—population, 119,546—Chief Justice, $7,500; two Puisne Judges at $5,000 and $4,000. Barbadoes—population, 171,860—Chief Justice, $7,500. Coming to the British possessions in South America, British Guiana had a population in December, 1886, of 274,311—Chief Justice, $2,500; two Puisne Judges, $7,500 each. British Honduras—population in 1881, 27,452—Chief Justice, $5,000. I might go on and speak of the British possessions in Africa. Cape Colony—population in 1885, 1,250,000—Chief Justice, $10,000; two Puisne Judges, $7,500 each; the presiding Judge of the E. D. Court, $8,750; the presiding judge of the High Court, $10,000; two Puisne Judges, $8,750 each, and two other judges, $7,500 each. Natal—population in 1884, 424,495, of which 35,000 are Europeans—Chief Justice, $7,500; two Puisne Judges, $5,000 each; judge of the Native Court, $4,000. Sierra Leone—population in 1881, 60,546, including 163 white residents—Chief Justice, $6,000. Gold Coast—Chief Justice, $7,500; Puisne Judge, $5,000. These figures show that among all the colonies, Canada is the one in which the judges are the most poorly paid, and I think I will not be contradicted when I say that our judiciary is one of the finest in the world. From the Supreme Court down to the most humble court we have selected the most intelligent, honest and learned lawyers who have consented to go on the bench. We must not forget that the liberty and the security of the subject are entirely in the hands of the magistrates of our courts. If a merchant collects his dues, it is because of the respect which the courts command by their honesty and integrity; if property is secure, if we walk safely in the streets, if women are respected, if general order prevails in society, if the people are happy in fact, the reason is to be found in the good organisation of justice, and the character of the magistrates presiding in our courts is the very essence of that organisation. There is one thing, however, which I would like to see disappear entirely from our judiciary, that is, the hope of promotion. I know of one instance—I will not give the name—of a judge, in the hope of promotion to another court with an increase of $1,000 a year in salary, committing the greatest possible injustice, and showing himself blind to the interest he had in hand. I would like the judges to be so well paid that when they go on the bench they forget the rest; they are above all suspicion and entirely independent, and living exclusively within the walls of that sanctuary of the law. Now, some gentlemen find the salary of $4,000 or $6,000 extravagant. Do they forget that the judge to whom they apply for justice has bought and has in his house many law volumes, reports of all kinds, a library worth, perhaps, $30,000, $40,000 or $50,000 worth? Do they forget that he cannot speculate in stock or in timber, or engage in any commerce whatever? Do they forget that his whole family depends upon his small salary? If a judge confines himself to that hard labor, and consents to spend the whole of his life in the service of the bench, we must be grateful to him; we should remove from him all temptation to venality, and place him in a position where he will have nothing in view but the honest administration of justice to his fellow countrymen. The liberty, the morality, the security of the people, are in the hands of the judges.

I think they are not sufficiently paid, and those who respect their country and understand its true interests will not begrudge a few thousand dollars to have a good set of independent judges.

Mr. COOK. As I have been referred to by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I would just make a few remarks. The hon. gentleman has made an allusion to the judges of the land in the most uncomplimentary terms. The most unkindly out which the judges have ever had in this country, to my mind, has been administered by the two gentlemen who have just spoken. The gentlemen say that the judges are not well paid. Now, I will appeal to the Minister of Justice whether when a vacancy occurs he finds any difficulty in filling the place. The hon. member for Assiniboia stated that as a lawyer the judge would earn from $10,000 to $25,000 a year. I would like to bring to the notice of the Minister of Justice and this House the amount of money that can be made by a lawyer in his capacity as a lawyer. If that is the case, it strikes me that he is levying too extensively upon the suitors. If the law of the country was so amended that the taxes upon his legal account should be reduced to minimum or maximum—if you like to put it that way—it should come within the radius of a reasonable salary for the year. But if a man can make at his profession $25,000 or $30,000 a year, I contend there is something wrong in the system. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) said they were all educated and able men. I believe the bar and the bench of Ontario are all capable, educated men, honest and above reproach, but the hon. gentleman says that unless we increase the salaries there will be a tendency, probably, for these men to do something wrong. I would impute no such motives to any of the judges of Ontario. I do not know anything about the judges of the North-West, concerning whom the hon. gentleman appears to know most.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order. I did not say that any of the existing judges could be approached. I said that if this thing went on, you would have men going on to the bench who might be approached. I was looking forward to the future.

Mr. COOK. We are legislating for the present. We are paying salaries to men who are keeping the position at the present time; and let posterity take care of itself. My hon. friend, with his exalted, his overpowering eloquence, his great educational attainments, of course, looks forward probably to the future; but let my hon. friend remember that he is not one of the greatest tax-payers of the country. Look at the Estimates. Here we have $36,000,000 to be voted under the Estimates before us, and then we have the Supplementary Estimates to come down, which will likely add to that about $2,000,000 more, making $38,000,000 altogether. Then there are the other statutory expenses we have to meet. Then we have the expenses on land in the North-West, which hon. gentlemen opposite, in their mode of book-keeping, transfer to capital account. Then we have the magnificent management of the Intercolonial, by which $500,000 of money of the country is expended yearly on a road which is not of great utility. With reference to the judges, I am not aware that they have petitioned the House for an increase of salary, or that they are clamoring for more salary. It is generally conceded that the judges are pretty well paid.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. COOK. I know that they live in pretty good style, at all events the judges in Ontario. But they have something more to look forward to. After serving a term of office, I think, in the neighborhood of fifteen years, they are entitled to be superannuated with a two-thirds allowance. But my hon. friend speaks here about the education of the judges. There are plenty of men who are educated as highly as the judges on the bench now, and there are many lawyers in this country willing and able to occupy these positions, provided that the gentlemen who are on the bench now, feel inclined to retire. The hon. gentleman speaks as if there was nothing else necessary to make a judge but education. I think it requires a little common sense as well. Sometimes you will find educated cranks—men who have more education than they have common sense. It would be out of place for me to attribute anything of that sort to my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), but I have often heard it said that is he an educated crank. Now, I wish to say that the large expenditure the taxpayers of this country have to meet, not the lawyers only, nor the judges, nor the members of Parliament, nor the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that have to meet this large expenditure, it is the people throughout the country, the farming community more particularly; and I would like to ask the farming community, the tax-paying community, whether they wish that the salaries of these men should be increased. I have no hesitation in rising and objecting to an increase of salary to the judges. Some people may say we have no right to discuss the question of the judges of the land. Why, who makes the judges but Parliament? Who should be the master of judges but Parliament? Who makes Parliament but the people, and who are the masters of the whole situation? It is the people, and should they be taxed simply because it happens to originate in the cranium of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that the salaries of the judges of the land should be increased? The thing is outrageous. I am sure the intelligent taxpayers of this country will not agree with my hon. friend who would like to be a Minister, and expects some time or other to occupy a seat on the Treasury benches, and who therefore would like to have their salaries increased. I believe he cannot be a judge, because he is not a lawyer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes he is.

Mr. COOK. Well, that alters the case. He is making two or three places for himself. If he does not happen to be made a judge, why, he may yet be made a Minister, and in either case he favors an increase of salary. I am afraid the hon. gentleman will remain in support of his family. You know that an Irishman is allowed to speak twice, and if he makes a slip of the tongue he is allowed to correct himself. I refer to my hon. friend as a man of family. Well, I believe, he has not any that he pays taxes for. I understand he is not a man of family at all, and therefore I stand corrected. It was not a question to him of the taxes for his family which he would have to pay. But I say the taxpayers of this country will not consent without protest to an increase of this kind. At all events, as a representative of the people in one constituency, I will always raise my voice in defence of the taxpayers against any measure to increase their burthens.

Mr. DAVIN. As my hon. friend says that an Irishman is allowed to speak twice, probably you will allow me, Sir, to say a few words in reply. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook), in a speech characterised by the best possible taste, told the House that I was an educated crank. I am very glad that is the case, because it will bring my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Cook) and myself shoulder to shoulder; we shall make a good team; and the only difference between us is this, that while I am an educated crank he is an uneducated crank. That, of course, gives him a great advantage over me, because it is well known that education while it sharpens some of our faculties, does undoubtedly take off to some extent the exuberance of our natural faculties, and my hon. friend, if he had been an educated crank, never could have given us the apotheosised ignorance, the exuberant non-sensical flamboyant display of nature in its most charming phase such as we had a moment ago. The hon. gentleman first said I was a man of family. Well, he made a great mistake there. He is a man of family, and I look forward with joy, and pride, and hope to the future—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentlemen are too previous. Not in regard to myself or in regard to anything that relates to me, but for Canada, because I know this, that, my hon. friend being a man of family, the beautiful qualities he has just displayed will be manifested to a remote posterity, and when we have passed away, ages hence, another Cook may arise and, so to speak, fry himself as we have seen my hon. friend do here this evening. I will pass now from the hon. gentleman and will say this in regard to the subject, that nothing which he has said has changed my mind on this matter. In fact, he has displayed the quality that I say we should stamp out here, a sort of resentment against giving a just remuneration to the judges, a sort of resentment against education, and I hope that those members of this House who do not happen to be lawyers or who do not belong to a learned profession, but who have had the advantages of a good education here in Canada, will show that this House is capable of giving an opinion worthy of a great Parliament on a question like this, and that we will not trouble ourselves with rigmarolism such as we have just listened to from my hon. friend.

Mr. COOK. Since hearing the speech of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I will take back what I said, as to his being an educated crank. Still, he assured the House that he was educated, and in that capacity he reminds me very much of some educated men, who are like cultivated land—the more they are cultivated the poorer they become. I have another thing to say about my hon. friend, which I hope will not ruffle his good hair in reference to a matter pertaining solely to himself. If he did go on the Treasury benches, if he had been called to the Ministry, he would, of course, have made a little more than he is making, but I see that he is doing for $4,000 for his Regina paper. That is a very good reason for his supporting the Government, and for his getting up and denouncing everything the Opposition may say in reference to the expenditure, and for his standing by the Government in their wanton extravagance.

Mr. LARIVIERE. I did not expect that the first time I would speak in this House would be to urge any increase of expenditure in this Dominion, but in this case I regret to say that there is such a discrimination in the salaries of the judges that I cannot but protest against it. It is all very well for those hon. members representing the Province of Ontario, where the judges are paid much more than in the other Provinces, besides receiving large perquisites, to say they do not want any increase in that direction, but in the other Provinces where the judges are not so well paid, where they do not get, by way of incidentals, any increase of salary, with a salary from 25 to 30 per cent. less than that of those of Manitoba for example, I believe the actual system is unfair. Because judges are in such a good position that the representatives of their Provinces are prevented from asking an increase of their salary, it does not follow that the representatives of smaller Provinces should not ask that their judges should be put on the same footing as those of the larger Provinces. There cannot be two opinions on this question. If we want to attain a higher standard in the selection of our judges, we must give them such salaries as will induce the proper men to ascend the bench. Now, we see that young lawyers in the prime of life are getting more fees from their clients than the salary they would receive if they accepted a position on the bench, and, therefore, when they are asked to accept the honor of being appointed judges, they decline. It is only after having practiced for a number of years that they will accept that position, simply for the honor of the position, and they do so at such a stage of life that they are almost disabled and have to be superannuated in a very short time. I believe that the Dominion at large is losing, from the fact that these judges are appointed when they are too old to be efficient in the service they are called upon to perform. Let us pay our judges for the position they hold. I protest in the name of the Province of Manitoba that the poor pittance which is given to our judges is not in proportion to the high position they hold. We have not two or three courts in that Province, with judges appointed for each of them. We have only one, the Court of Queen's Bench, and our judges have to sit in our three large judicial districts, on all cases, both criminal and civil, and therefore they have to do in our Province twice and three times the work of the judges in the other Provinces, who are merely confined to a single court. And in our Province, where living is perhaps more expensive than it is in Ontario, it is unfair that our judges should be so poorly paid.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I believe the item was passed, and there is no item for judges' salaries.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is a subject that I have frequently brought before the House on former occasions. I have never felt otherwise than that the judges of the smaller Provinces have been unfairly dealt with in the arrangement of salaries at the organisation of Confederation. That has been continued for upwards of twenty years. I have repeatedly brought this matter before the House, and I feel that the time has now arrived when, either the salaries of the judges of the larger Provinces should be lowered to those of the smaller ones, or the smaller ones should be increased to those of the higher. In order to test the opinion of the House, I will move this amendment—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would suggest to the hon. gentlemen that we pass the present vote, because it does not include any amount whatever for judges' salaries; and I have promised the hon. member for North York to speak to this subject later in the session, so there will be ample opportunity of discussing it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will just read to the Chairman the amendment I proposed to offer, and then I will withdraw it, if my hon. friend desires it. I think this is a matter upon which such a gross injustice has been perpetrated upon the judges of the smaller Provinces that it ought to have been remedied before. This is my amendment:

That the Committee do not pass upon item 26 until provision be made to include therein such sums as will place the salaries of the judges of the North-West Territories and the Maritime Provinces upon the same footing as those of similar Courts in Ontario.

Dominion Police. .... $19,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why do you call for $1,400 more?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The new building which will be ready in early summer will require three additional policemen.

Kingston Penitentiary..... $121,128 58

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The increases in the salaries are altogether statutory, under the Act of 1887; they amount to the sum of $1,440. The retiring gratuities are as before; officers' uniforms, a slight increase. The increase in the cost of maintenance is estimated for on three grounds. In the first place, the rations have been increased. The rations given at Kingston are not yet up to the regulation allowance, but they have been considerably increased during the last year. The report of the warden states that the rations have been found insufficient, and have been increased. In the next place, new clothing has been required for the convicts; and furthermore, a slight advance in the prices of some supplies, has been estimated for, making the estimated increase for maintenance, $2,595.54.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is the clothing made in the penitentiary?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has the number of inmates increased?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not materially.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How is the material for clothing purchased?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Altogether by contract.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice the expenses in connection with this penitentiary are increasing every year, and it has now reached the highest figure that it ever reached yet, per capita. I notice that it cost per head, for each convict in 1878-79, 56 cts.; in 1867, 51 cts.; in 1885-86, 49 cts.; in 1884-85, 53 cts. I notice from the Auditor General's account that there are 553 inmates in this penitentiary, and it costs us a little over $4 a day to keep these people. I would like the Minister of Justice to explain the item for the tailor instructor, William Gemmill, who is paid for five months' services $199.98. I notice the same gentleman is paid a gratuity allowance of $1,272.65. I would like to know on what basis the gratuity allowances are made to people occupying his position.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Penitentiary Act he will find that all officers or persons who are not eligible for superannuation, are entitled to retiring gratuities. When they have reached that period of life when they are unfit for service any longer, or when they have been injured in the service, they are allowed retiring gratuities, which are fixed according to a scale laid down in the Act. In the case of Wm. Gemmill, the Order in Council under which a retiring allowance was made to him, was dated November 22, 1887. It reads thus:

"That on account of age and failing health, vouched for by medical testimony, Wm. Gemmill, tailor and trade instructor of the Kingston Penitentiary, having been retired from the service, be granted a gratuity $1,272 65, being half a month's pay for each year of service up to five years, and a month's pay for each year of service in excess of five years; said amount to be charged against the retiring allowances for Kingston Penitentiary."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. Minister says the material for the clothing was provided for by contract—were tenders asked for?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Although the Minister has explained that they made a larger allowance for rations on the report of the warden, I think that is hardly sufficient to warrant us to grant this increased amount. If we turn to the Auditor General's Report we find that the same number of inmates has been maintained there for even a less amount than what was appropriated for that purpose last year. That being the case and the cost of living at the present time not being higher, there must be some other explanation than that given by the Minister. While I am perfectly willing that every due allowance should be made to the inmates there, and that any reasonable amount should be granted to the officers, yet I feel that year after year the expenditure of these institutions is increasing, and unless we guard and protect the public interests more than we have done in the past we may expect these increases to continue until they become a great burden to the Dominion. The Auditor General's Report shows that of the appropriation of $118,000 last year, only $112,470 60 has been expended. That being the amount necessary for the efficient service of the penitentiaries during that year, it seems to me that the increased amount asked is unnecessary, that when they were able to limit the expense to the amount I have stated during that period the committee should not now be asked to make an enormous increase and advance the amount to $131,138.58. The Minister should give some further explanation of the matter than simply the warden's statements. We all know that the officers in charge are liable to recommend large expenses to suit their convenience and the convenience of the subordinates, and the Government should certainly have some other means of ascertaining the requirements of these institutions other than the warden's statements. We know they are prone to extravagance and to expend money when it is unnecessary, and the Government being the guardians of the public purse it is their duty to see that they obtain all information necessary to securing a proper idea of the necessity of the amount to be appropriated for these institutions. I hope the Government will place themselves in a position to be able to come down more definitely with their estimates, and in view of the fact that the expense last year was confined to $112,000, the Government should not require at the present time the enormous increase they are at present asking.

Mr. CASEY. I should like to obtain from the Minister of Justice some information with regard to what I consider the most important subject connected with the penitentiaries, namely, the question of the industries carried on in those places of punishment. There are industries carried on in Kingston, St. Vincent de Paul, at Dorchester and elsewhere, but I find a great difference in the results of those industries. At Kingston 580 convicts produced $1,645 worth of goods as the result of their labor during the year; at St. Vincent de Paul 325 convicts produced products of the value of $1,621; at Dorchester 175 convicts produced goods to the value of $3,756, and in the Manitoba Penitentiary 100 convicts produced products of the value of over $1,900. This shows that in Kingston there was the least percentage of receipts from the industries of convicts, although they had the larger number of convicts and probably the best trained staff to employ them. The question of prison labor is admittedly a very difficult one, and a great many of our laboring class object to allowing convicts to do any remunerative labor whatever, but I think in view of the large amounts spent on our penitentiaries we have a right to expect that convicts will be made to do something to maintain themselves and relieve the country to some extent of the cost of their maintenance. The penitentiary is not purely a punitive institution, or it should not be so at all events, whether it is so or not. The object of penitentiary management should be to reform the convict to this extent that when he is discharged, as he must be at the end of his term, he should cease to be a dangerous character to the community, and should be capable of earning his living and be willing to do so. Every convict during the term of his confinement should be trained in some employment so that after he leaves the penitentiary he would be able to earn a livelihood, and the country would thus be saved from the great danger, which is increasing every year, of so many convicts being turned out of the penitentiaries in no better shape than when they entered them, on the average. The objection to convict labor hitherto has been this, that convicts were made to labor in penitentiaries and the product of their labor was sold at lower rates than the products of free labor could be sold at. If this rule were instituted, that the products of penitentiary labor were not to be sold at lower rates than the average rates paid for the products of free labor, the objection to this class of work would cease or almost cease. I do not see that the working classes could then complain of being undersold. If those convicts were not in the penitentiary, they would be working at some trade or industry and would therefore be competing with the working classes of the Dominion at large. If this plan were carried out, I do not see that the working classes could complain, and I do not think they would do so. On the other hand, by the wholesome training of the convicts to some employment, they would be, first, turned out better men than when they entered, and, second, a very large part of the cost of the penitentiaries would be paid. It is absurd that 580 convicts could not earn in a year more than $1,655 or about $3 per head per annum. It is an absurd amount for them to earn. I believe that while a man is undergoing a sentence in the penitentiary his time belongs to the country, and that it is perfectly legitimate and proper to make him earn his keep while he is in prison and save that amount to the public revenue.

Mr. MULLOCK. If a convict cannot do that they ought to turn him out

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend suggests that if a convict cannot earn his keep he should be turned out, but possibly they may find some more efficient method of inducing the convict to work than that. I believe that a convict would rather work than be idle. Any hon. gentleman may ask himself if such misfortune should happen to him as to be confined in a penitentiary, whether he would rather sit down idle in his cell or work. I believe a convict would prefer work to idleness; he would be the better for working and money would be saved to the country as well. I wish to ask the Minister of Justice if he has maturely considered this question of employing convict labor and whether he has considered schemes for making prisoners work profitably to the country, without interfering unduly with the trade of free laborers and whether, if he has not, he is favorable to the plan. I cannot speak of the present time, but the Minister is no doubt aware that at the Auburn State Prison in the State of New York the prisoners used to work.

Mr. SCRIVER. They are not employed now and a very bad state of things prevails there.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend tells me that the convicts are not employed there now; but I know that a few years ago the prisoners in the Auburn State Prison—corresponding to our penitentiaries—were employed, that they paid very nearly the whole cost of the penitentiary, and I believe in some years earned a surplus. I have seen it so stated in American newspapers, and they ought to be an authority on the subject. At the present time they have ceased this work out of consideration to the clamor raised by free workingmen, and a very bad state of things prevails as must be the case where any large number of men are kept idle, meditating on their past misdeeds and laying plans for future depredations on the public when they get out. I consider that this question of convict labor is very important both for the sake of the convicts themselves, the sake of the taxpayer, who has to foot the bill for the maintenance of those convicts, and for the sake of the public in general who are exposed to danger from those convicts when they are turned out at the end of their term. I hope the hon. Minister has given his attention to the subject, for I am quite certain that he has the will and the intention to do what is right, and I am perfectly satisfied that he has the ability to carry out any such project successfully.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The subject has occupied my attention, but I am glad to be able to say that the question has not yet reached the magnitude of a problem of any considerable importance, for reasons which I will presently state to the hon. gentleman. In the first place, I would explain to him that the receipts which are entered in the Estimates as derived from the industries of the penitentiaries, do not by any means indicate the results of the labor of the convicts. Those are merely the receipts which are paid into the Receiver General from sales made at the penitentiaries, and no sales are made from the workshops of the penitentiaries excepting to the officers or in connection with some little work done for them at the institution. The hon. gentleman will see that the sum which he mentions for Kingston, $1,645, includes $571 of gate money.

Mr. CASEY. What is that?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is the entrance fee charged to visitors. The cash proceeds therefore of labor from Kingston and most of the other penitentiaries are very small indeed, resulting from the rule that articles are not made for sale. The case of Dorchester Penitentiary is an exception to that, and it arises from these circumstances: When the establishment was created at Dorchester the penitentiaries of St. John and Halifax were amalgamated. In both of these institutions they had a considerable quantity of machinery for the manufacture of woodenware, and the machinery which was used in those penitentiaries was put into the Dorchester establishment and has been kept in operation ever since. They turn out buckets, pails and wares of that description there, which are put on the market under the restriction which the hon. gentleman mentions. We do not undersell in any way the other dealers in such goods, and that is the only class of goods that we manufacture for sale as anything like a business in any of the penitentiaries. As regards the way in which the prisoners are employed I will explain that the matter has not reached the proportion of a formidable problem for these reasons: In nearly every penitentiary in Canada, we have buildings to be completed in order to finish the original structures, and these additions are necessary now in order to make the establishment at all fully equipped. Kingston might have been expected to be an exception to that, because it is an old institution, is thoroughly walled, and is a very substantial structure indeed, but this state of things exists at Kingston. For a number of years previous to 18 months ago, one of the largest buildings was occupied by a contractor who had machinery carrying on the operation of making locks. He had convict labor employed under contract with the Government, and his employment extended to between 80 and 90 men. Under the provisions of the Penitentiary Act passed six or seven years ago it became unlawful when his contract expired to renew it, and in consequence of that his contract fell through at the date when it lapsed by its own terms. It is true that we had thrown upon our hands the labor of these 80 or 90 men, but we formed a plan to utilise the large workshops, no longer necessary for machinery of that character. Under the provision of the law which made the labor of convicts no longer open to contract, we formed the plan of turning that workshop into a penal establishment and erecting in it cells, for prisoners of a more aggravated type; prisoners who require to be secluded and to have a larger cell in order that the work may be given them in their cells. Ever since that time a large force of convicts has been employed. As the hon. gentleman is probably aware, we have a valuable quarry on the grounds at Kingston Penitentiary and a considerable force is kept there quarrying; there is also a large force cutting the stone to build the cells of the new penal establishment; a large force is also employed on the farm both in actual farm work and in fencing and things of that kind, and others are also employed in the workshops. The information that I have, from the reports of the officers and from my own observations in visiting the establishment, is that there is no idleness in the prison whatever, nor any necessity for a single man or woman who is able to work being idle for want of work. Almost the same state of thing exists in other penitentiaries, except that the facilities for finding work are greater, in consequence of the establishment being incomplete. At St. Vincent de Paul we have a great deal of work now going forward. We have from the quarries a large quantity of stone for the completion of the new wing, but even under those circumstances I propose not to go on with that to any considerable extent this year, because we have more pressing wants there. We want to erect a boundary wall and other works of that kind which will require all the labor we can get from the able-bodied convicts. In Dorchester we find the same state of things exists but on a smaller scale, excepting where the convicts are employed in the workshops and on the machinery I mentioned a few moments ago. In British Columbia, the convicts are employed in a larger proportion at farm work than in other penitentiaries, and, excepting within the last few years, there have been very few attempts, no complete attempts at all, to carry on trade teachings at that institution. Two or three trade instructors have now been appointed, and the workshops are being organised there on the same principle as in Kingston and other establishments.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad to hear that the hon. gentleman has given his attention to the question, but I think there is yet very decided room for further improvement. I do not see why it is impossible to make these prisoners, over and above the necessary building and repairs of the penitentiaries, earn a very large proportion of the cost of their maintenance, if not the whole of it; and I think it can be done without injustice to the laboring classes, and with great relief to the taxpayers. The total sum expended for penitentiaries is very considerable, over $353,000; and when we have many hundreds of convicts not earning on the average more than a few dollars per head while in the penitentiaries, I think the Minister will find it to be his duty to look into the matter and see whether more could not be done. He says a great deal is done in the way of completing and making additions to the different penitentiaries. I cannot quite understand that from the Estimates.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I may explain that hitherto a vote has been taken by the Minister of Public Works for works of that kind, and convicts have been employed in connection with them. I think, however, that the work can be wholly carried on under the trained inspectors we have now, and I intend by-and-by to ask for votes for this services, instead of in connection with the Public Works Department.

Mr. CASEY. I notice that a very small expenditure on capital account is asked for at Kingston, and nowhere else—$373.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It has not been customary to charge the construction of buildings in connection with penitentiaries to capital account. The practice is rather anomalous, I am aware, but the work has hitherto been done by the convicts, and capital account really represents very little more than repairs to fences and property of that description.

Mr. CASEY. The item of working expenses has not been explained.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Working expenses include heating, light, maintenance of buildings such as can be done by convicts, machinery, armory, kitchen, stationery, the farm and stables.

Mr. CASEY. It is a very large item, and I think it ought to be put more in detail in future estimates. It amounts to over $20,000 at Kingston, and to proportionate sums in all the other penitentiaries. But coming back to the question of labor, I have no doubt the hon. Minister is familiar with the system practiced in Ireland, where after a certain period of solitary confinement and meagre diet, the prisoners are gradually trained to behave themselves, and after that they are given a certain amount of liberty, taken out in camps to work in quarries and upon farms at some distance even from the penitentiary. The system has been found to work admirably; the men have earned their keep and have been better for doing so. The hon. Minister says the question is not of very great importance yet; but, when he counts the number of men in the different penitentiaries, he must see that it is a very serious one. There are 580 at Kingston, 325 at St. Vincent de Paul, 175 at Dorchester, 100 at Manitoba and 115 at British Columbia, over 1,000 in all, earning very little towards their own keep. I think it will be quite possible to establish a system under which they could be put at profitable manual labor, which would do the men good in body and mind, and relieve the taxpayers. I do hope the hon. Minister will take the matter into his consideration, and, without regard to any prejudices, try to devise some system for employing these convicts, and I have no doubt if he gives his attention to it he can do it. If he could not devise a scheme of his own, there are plenty of schemes in existence elsewhere which he could copy. I think it is a very serious question indeed, and one better deserving his attention than many others about which he will no doubt be worried a great deal during the next year.

Mr. ELLIS. If Manitoba has anything to complain of with regard to the judges, it certainly equalises itself with regard to the penitentiaries; for not only is the salary of the warden of that penitentiary out of all proportion with the work he has to do, compared with the salaries and work of the wardens in the other penitentiaries, but the whole cost of that penitentiary is far out of proportion to the cost of the penitentiaries in the other Provinces. The mere item of maintenance alone costs $120 a head in Manitoba against $55 in Dorchester, $70 in Kingston, $90 in St. Vincent de Paul and about the same in British Columbia. If you take the whole charge per head, you will find that it is about $210 in Kingston, $250 in St. Vincent de Paul, the same in Dorchester, $400 in British Columbia, and $500 in Manitoba. Certainly that part of the expense might be looked into a little more sharply than it has been. Another discrepancy appears in the pay of the chaplains. In Dorchester the chaplain gets $600, and in Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul they get $1,200 each. I do not say that one gets too much, but if the chaplain at the Kingston penitentiary is properly paid, the others are insufficiently paid.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would just say a word with regard to the Kingston Penitentiary, as we have not yet reached the Manitoba Penitentiary. I heartily endorse the remarks made by hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Casey) with regard to utilising the labor of the convicts. Many hon. members must have noticed in the public press that very often when the inmates are let out, they are very apt to commit some fresh crime in order to get back to the penitentiary to put in there perhaps the balance of their days. They have evidently such an easy time there, and are so well fed and clothed, that they do not at all fear returning. If they were worked so that they would have to make a living, I have not the slightest doubt that a great many people would be deterred from committing crimes that take them into those places. But the fact is that when a man comes out, he has a very pressing recollection that he was fed and clothed, and had nothing to do while there. The result is that after putting in 10 or 15 years in the penitentiary, he will prefer to perpetrate crime at the risk of being sent back there, rather than work, because when a man has been a great many years idle, the probability is that he will try by some means to secure a living the balance of his life without doing anything. We ought to make the penitentiary a terror to evil-doers instead of making it, as it is now, a retreat for them. I can well remember when in the Kingston penitentiary a large amount of prison labor was done, when boots and shoes were manufactured there to a very large extent, and some of the best wearing boots that could be had were made by the convicts. Of course, influences were brought to bear by Trades' Unions and others on the Government, which resulted in putting a stop to convict manufacture of that description. Well, it is not in the interests of the people that we should listen to those remonstrances and keep a thousand men comfortably housed and clothed for nothing. If a different system were adopted, the number found in these institutions would become decreased instead of increasing annually as it does now. Criminals would be led to understand that if they commit a crime they would be liable to be treated with stern justice and suffer a penalty in proportion to their misdeeds. I hope the Minister of Justice will take this matter into consideration.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The subject is important, and I do not wish to be understood as underrating its importance. What I meant was that, in all probability, for about a year to come, all the labor we can avail ourselves of in Kingston will be usefully employed in fitting up a building. When that is done, it will be necessary to take some measures to provide actual work and remunerative work for the convicts.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice in the Kingston Penitentiary we have expended $1,024 on tobacco, 2,561 pounds. How has that been distributed? Is a prisoner permitted to have tobacco when he wants to smoke?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Tobacco is given in sparing quantities, and only to those who, when they entered the prison, were addicted to its use. It is not given to young convicts, and is withheld in all cases where there is any breach of discipline, or want of activity in the work. The practice has been for many years to make an allowance to convicts, who are well behaved and industrious, and have been addicted to its use, and I have not felt myself called upon to restrict the number.

Mr. CASEY. I cannot say that I have very much to charge against giving a moderate allowance of tobacco to those who have been addicted to its use. Its deprivation would be a torture which I do not think we have the right to inflict on prisoners; but the main point is not that they should be very grudgingly treated in the way of diet, but that, while being reasonably well fed, they should be made to really earn what they eat. It would be quite possible to arrange some plan by which no convict would get more to eat than he earned in a day's work. Let him earn his three meals a day or go without a part of them. Allusion has been made to Trades' Unions objecting to convicts being employed on remunerative labor. No doubt, if the old plan of selling penitentiary-made goods cheaper than other goods were carried out, they would have reason to complain because there would be undue competition, but I think if the prison goods were sold at the ordinary prices of similar goods made outside, the Trades' Unions would have no reason to complain. And, if they did complain their complaints should not weigh against the interests of the greater mass of taxpayers.

Mr. TROW. I would not think it would be proper or right to inflict upon criminals in the penitentiary any such hardship as my hon. friend professes, namely, that those who do not work should not eat. I am afraid my hon. friend would fast sometimes himself if such a rule were applied. With reference to Manitoba Penitentiary particularly, there is a very large garden there of inexhaustible fertility. I notice that the managers purchased lately a potato digger for $25, yet at the same time purchased their potatoes, vegetables, &c. I am sure the parties incarcerated there are capable of raising, at all events, all the vegetables consumed in the penitentiary. It is essential that criminals should work, and they have lands of such fertility that there would be no difficulty whatever in supplying all their wants in the Manitoba Penitentiary. I notice a very large item for fodder for horses, while there is no better hay land to be found than around that penitentiary, and the hay can be purchased there for $3 at least a ton put up by their own people. I would ask the hon. the Minister, also, why there is such a discrepancy between the price of beef and the price of mutton, the one being six and a half cents and the other fifteen cents a pound?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to answer when we come to the vote for Manitoba.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I think the prisoners in our penitentiary are treated far too well, especially in the Kingston Penitentiary. When we send criminals to the penitentiary they ought to be well cared for, but I notice in many of the courts of Ontario that prisoners, when being sentenced, prefer to have one year added to their term in order that they may be sent to Kingston rather than remain at Toronto. That seems to me rather a strange fact. A man is up for sentence. He can get off with two years in the Central Prison, but he prefers three years in the Kingston Penitentiary. It seems to me that that is an indication that the prisoners in Kingston are treated far better than they deserve, and I know that that is an evil which exists in most of our prisons throughout the country. In Hamilton, for instance, there are many men who prefer being in gaol to being at large, and I think it would be a good plan to adopt some more severe measures with those criminals who are sent to the penitentiaries. Then, as to the expenditure for tobacco, it is not pretended that tobacco is essential to the life of man. On the contrary, it is known that it is injurious to the system, and I think the Government would perform a good act if they were to deprive these men of tobacco and reform them in that respect. If they were kept for three or four years without tobacco, they might be entirely weaned from the use of it, and everyone knows that tobacco is not good for the human system. I agree with my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that the tobacco ration should be withdrawn, and that the prisoners do not deserve any such consideration.

Mr. GILLMOR. I do not agree with my friends in their mode of reforming prisoners. I do not believe that punishment, and starvation, and torture, and deprivation are calculated to make men better. I have no doubt that due regard is paid in the penitentiaries to the morals of the inmates. My friends seem to intimate that men desire to go to the penitentiaries. They must be very degraded indeed if such is the case, but I do not think that holds good to any extent whatever. It is a great punishment for a man to be deprived of his liberty, and I do not think many men desire to return to the penitentiary, no matter how easily or how kindly they may have been treated there. I think it is well to keep them employed, and I understood from the statement of the Minister of Justice that they are all employed, if not in manufacturing goods for the market, in labor for the institution. I am sure my friends are quite as humane as I am, but I dissent from the mode they advocate for the reformation of these unfortunates in the penitentiaries. There may be some very hardened cases who like solitary confinement and who would rather have that than labor for their living, but I believe there is not one man in five hundred who does not prefer his liberty and prefer to get his living outside to being confined in gaol. I do not think this mode of reforming criminals suggested by my friends is correct at all. As to the use of tobacco, I do not use tobacco myself, but I would not be disposed to deprive those who do, and I think the public can afford to indulge those poor unfortunates in a smoke if they desire to have it. The question of their morals, however, is very important, and I understand there are clergymen there as salaried officials to attend to their spiritual wants. I think some plan might be adopted whereby their morals might be improved by other means than the infliction of punishment. If my friends are correct there ought to be a treadmill there, something to torture the inmates. I do not think so myself. I think the great method of reformation is the exercise of kindness, not indulgence, and I believe that kind treatment will do more than anything else to reform a criminal.

Mr. CASEY. I agree so much in sentiment with my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Gillmor) that I am sorry he should have misunderstood what we have been stating. For my part, I have not been advocating a plan to make the convicts work as a means of punishment, but as a means of reformation. I think it is much more wholesome, and for that matter much more pleasant, to make a man work than to confine him in a solitary cell. I believe that any one who had the choice would prefer to work rather than to be shut up by himself to brood over his past crimes and to plan new ones. I advocate giving convicts sufficient food and sufficient work at the same time. The Minister says the convicts are largely employed at present in completing repairs and so on. I hope he will be able later on to mention how much has been saved in this respect; but, from the returns brought down, I cannot think that these men have been fully employed, and I think there is room for the Minister to exercise his ingenuity in providing for their profitable employment. It is not proper, of course, to make the penitentiary a place of pleasant retirement for two or three years. A friend of mine has called my attention to the fact that, in the charitable institutions in Toronto, they used to give a bed and breakfast to tramps free, but now the tramps are called upon to cut from a quarter to half a cord of wood each, according to the accommodation they get; and my hon. friend, who is thoroughly informed in regard to the subject, says that there have not been a quarter of the number of tramps applying for relief at these charitable institutions, since that plan was adopted that there were before; which, he says, proves that tramps and criminals do not like to work, and that work is a deterrent from crime. He makes a further suggestion, which the Minister of Justice might take into consideration, that the amount of money earned by prisoners might not, perhaps, be put into the general revenue of the Dominion, but might be used to relieve the families of convicts who have families who are left in distress by these men being left in prison. Imprisonment is often more a punishment for the families of convicts than for the convicts themselves who are sentenced. The man may be the father of a family of small children who are unable to support themselves, and, if he is sent to the penitentiary, the family are left either entirely dependent upon their own exertions or on the charity of their neighbors. I think it is an admirable idea that some of the money which the convict earns should be used to support his family outside of the penitentiary. It has been suggested to me since I spoke last, and I throw it out for the consideration of the Minister.

Mr. KIRK. I would ask the Minister to explain how it is that the cost of these convicts is so much greater in Manitoba and British Columbia than it is in Kingston? I see that in Kingston the cost per convict was $203.38, while in Manitoba it was $707.51, and in British Columbia, $475.53. The daily cost in 1887-98 was 56 cts. in Kingston, and $1.93 in Manitoba. That is enough to maintain them at a pretty good hotel. I notice, too, that the cost of maintenance in the Manitoba institution is increasing from year to year. In 1884-85, it was $1.31; in 1885-86, $1.40; 1886-87, $1.53; and last year, $1.93. I have no doubt that the Minister will be able to give a satisfactory explanation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I presume the figures which the hon. gentleman is quoting are the calculations of per capita cost for all prison purposes.

Mr. KIRK. Yes, as found on page 95 C, of the Auditor General's Report.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That included the cost of salaries as well as the cost on maintenance, and the hon. gentleman will, of course, understand that the whole cost per capita, taking into consideration all classes of expenditure, ought to be very much less in an institution with a large population than with a small one. For instance, there is but one warden in either, and the salary of the warden, $3,200, distributed per capita over a prison population of 500, is necessarily very much less than if distributed over 80 or 90, as in smaller penitentiaries. Another circumstance to be considered is the cost of provisions in the different places, which varies. Some kinds of provisions are much cheaper at Kingston than in Manitoba or British Columbia. We have also to give higher salaries in Manitoba and British Columbia than in Kingston, and that was remarkably the case until late years, when there does not seem to be as great a difference. The figures, however, as given in the Auditor General's Report, although accurate in the way they are made up, are not altogether reliable, for this reason: they are based on the whole expenditure for the year, and the expenditure for the year includes many things which have not been used during the year. Sometimes, for instance, considerable portions of stock are kept over for next year.

Mr. KIRK. It does not include the cost of building, however.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No. The most satisfactory way to compare the per capita cost of convicts in each prison, I presume, would be to take the rations for each prison, because it is by the rations that the maintenance is fairly tested. If we take Kingston, the rations for last year cost $20,346.20, and therefore the Auditor General has estimated—I forget the exact amount which he has estimated—but that amount includes $359.93 of stock for rations on hand at the end of the fiscal year; at St. Vincent de Paul the expenditure was $14,504.26 for rations; there were $ .634 on hand at the end of the fiscal year, but the Auditor General's calculation is based on the whole expenditure. At Dorchester $4,450.64 were expended for rations, and they had $733.48 on hand. In Manitoba $4,424.88 were expended, and $299.89 were on hand; in British Columbia $3,825.28 were expended and we had $97.91 on hand. Therefore the per capita cost for rations was, in Kingston, $36.14; St. Vincent de Paul, $48.38; Dorchester, $23.49; Manitoba, $52.72; British Columbia, $50.37.

Mr. MULOCK. Before you pass this item, I take the liberty of calling the attention of the Minister of Justice to the case of a convict named Kyle, in the Kingston Penitentiary, who was convicted of forgery in the city of Toronto a few years ago, and who is still undergoing sentence. He was convicted under very peculiar circumstances, and whilst I do not wish for a moment to question the accuracy of the judge's opinion otherwise, of course, he would not have delivered the sentence he did—yet, speaking for myself, and, I think, for a good many others who gave a great deal of attention to the case when it was before the public, that there is a very great doubt in the minds of many people as to the moral guilt of the prisoner. The case is one of a peculiar kind, and I may mention one circumstance alone that, I think, ought to weigh with the Minister of Justice and the Government in dealing with this case. He was tried at the Assize Court, and some points were reserved. He was allowed out upon bail. The case was argued in term, and judgment delivered against him, he still being out on bail. He appeared when called upon to receive his sentence, having been at liberty until the moment when he came up to receive the sentence of the law. At the time of the sentence, I remember having conversed with a large assembly of gentlemen in the city of Toronto, who were in every respect a representative body, representing the profession and the class of gentlemen assembled here to-day; and the general opinion of the assemblage was that he was not morally guilty, and the hope was expressed that the court would so view the case. The court did not so view the case. I, of course, am free to admit that the presiding judge is in the best possible position to advise the Government in the premises; but even judges may make mistakes, and, perhaps, after a jury has rendered a verdict, the presiding judge may not feel free to assume otherwise than that the verdict is correct, and leave it as a matter of executive clemency to determine what shall be done. In that way it may happen that a prisoner may receive a more severe sentence than, perhaps, the circumstances justify, or, perhaps, than the judge himself would have imposed were he the judge of the facts as well as having to carry out the imposition of the sentence. I venture to express the opinion in this particular case that the sentence was more severe than it would have been had the judge been the judge of the facts instead of there having been a jury to advise him. Therefore, speaking for myself, I take this opportunity to bring his case before the attention of the Government. I am perfectly satisfied that the suggestion, although coming from the quarter that it does, will not in any way prejudice the case of the prisoner. I have spoken of him as I would of any other person, and have no reason, except as having observed what has occurred, to have an opinion on the subject. As a mere observer and a citizen of Toronto, having no acquaintance with the prisoner one way or the other, but taking an interest in the case as it went along, and forming an opinion on it, I have ventured to express this opinion on the floor of Parliament.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will give all proper attention to the case which the hon. gentleman has mentioned. It was before me some months ago, but I forget the circumstances connected with it, and it has been brought to my notice lately by a very large petition from Toronto presented by one of the members for that city; but I have not yet examined it or had any report on it.

Mr. MULOCK. I was not aware of any movement in the matter.

Manitoba Penitentiary.....$60,526

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am sorry to see an increase in this item. It appears to me that after all that was said last year and after the facts then disclosed, vigorous exertions should have been used to cut down the expenses on that penitentiary. About $500 per head are demanded for each one of the 100 convicts, which is two and a-half times the charge in Kingston and most of the other penitentiaries. In looking over the Auditor General's Report I see that the charges, making all reasonable allowance for the difference in climate, appear to be very greatly in excess for the Manitoba Penitentiary. I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to this fact: In Dorchester Penitentiary, with 175 prisoners, the sum total demanded for meat, for instance, is about $1,200, and the price of meat does not differ materially from the price of meat in Manitoba. In Manitoba, on the other hand, the price demanded is very nearly $2,200, and the quantity apparently is at least double, if not treble, that required per head for the convicts in Dorchester Penitentiary; and so on. Looking through various items, I see a very considerable number of charges that require an explanation which is not offered in the Auditor General's Report. I see some very curious minor items, which the hon. Minister can explain at his leisure. For instance, I notice Persian caps—two caps, $24. Perhaps they were for the use of the warden or the principal officers, but $12 per cap is rather an expensive charge for ordinary headgear. I notice curious entries here and there, such as this:—Army and Navy List for library, 16 copies, $34.65. These are small items perhaps, but they are items showing very considerable carelessness in the expense. In regard to the supply of meat, I do not understand how 175 convicts in Dorchester can be well fed and receive sufficient rations for $1,200, while 100 convicts in the Manitoba Penitentiary require $2,200 to supply meat, and apparently twice or three times the quantity is required in Manitoba as compared with Dorchester.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to an entry in the Auditor General's Report on page 89 C, in which he refers to the accounts for light and fuel for the warden's house, which are not properly chargeable against the appropriation for Manitoba Penitentiary, and which amount he has transferred to the account of S. L. Bedson, pending the action of Parliament. I see on page 92 C of the report there is some correspondence with respect to this matter. The Auditor General in a letter says:

"By an amendment to the Penitentiary Act, that portion of section 27 which empowered the Governor in Council to make allowances of 'light and fuel' to penitentiary officials has been eliminated, and under section 8 of said amendment, it is expressly stated that free quarters, uniforms, and the privilege under certain conditions to use convict labor shall be the only perquisites that may be allowed to such officials."

I presume the matter is still unsettled by the Government, or the Auditor would not have made this remark in connection with this matter. Perhaps the Minister will explain the condition of matters to-day.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As regards the Persian lamb caps, they are part of the uniform which is allowed under the penitentiary regulations adopted by Order in Council for the staff officers, not for all the guards, but for the warden, the deputy warden, the surgeon and the steward. In regard to the matter of meat and rations of that kind to which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) called my attention on concurrence last Session, I find, on looking into the matter, this to be the fact, which to some extent explains the apparently large quantity of meat that has been supplied to Manitoba Penitentiary as compared with the number of convicts. Of the meat which has been purchased for the penitentiary and which appears in the Auditor General's Report as supplied under contract, 6,624 lbs. have been furnished to officers of the penitentiary at contract price and have been paid for by them, the cost being $434.46, and this sum has been paid in to the Receiver General, but does not appear as a deduction from the meat supplied to the penitentiary itself, so that accounts to a large extent for the large quantity of meat supplied there. As regards the items for fuel and light to which attention has been called, as explained by the Auditor General, that matter awaits the attention of Parliament, and the attention of the House will be called to it later on. The account arose under these circumstances: For many years past, in accordance with the practice which prevailed in the prisons of other countries, I think in almost all other countries, perquisites were allowed to the officers. They were allowed not only free house and free grounds and certain convict labor for their grounds, but also fuel and light and the keep of a certain number of animals, a horse and cow and so on. Under the Act of 1887 these allowances were cut off, and an attempt made to commute those perquisites in the case of officers engaged in the penitentiaries, it being, however, provided by the Act that the provision of the Act should not apply to existing officers. An amount was fixed by the Department as compensation, and Parliament was asked to vote a sum to compensate the officers for such perquisites. In the case of the warden of the Manitoba Penitentiary, $100 was the sum allowed as compensation for the deprivation of fuel, light, rations and matters of that kind which were cut off under the provisions of that Act. It transpired, as indeed we had reason to expect it would, that in some cases our estimate of the amount which should be allowed for commutation was inadequate, and from time to time since we have been obliged to ask Parliament, in the case of several officers, for small sums of money to be added to their salaries to make up the deficiency in the commutation. In this case it is claimed that the commutation was not fairly computed in the case of the warden at Manitoba. He has claimed from the first that the allowance of $400 made to him was entirely inadequate to cover the perquisites taken away from him by the Act of 1887. Just about that time he had been provided with a very large house situated in a very exposed place, and requiring a great deal of fuel as well as a great expenditure for light. He has claimed that the allowance did not cover anything like the value of the fuel necessary to heat those premises, to say nothing of the other perquisites which he thought he should be allowed for; and I had to take notice of this claim, considering the size of the premises which he had to occupy as warden, and considering the requirements of the regulations as regards lights having to be kept up all the time in case of an emergency. I had to remember this fact, that the salary allowed the warden was not adequate to his keeping up these premises, and in fact the warden asked me that he should be allowed to vacate them if I would not allow what he thought to be a fair basis of commutation for his privileges. He applied for permission to vacate the house and to live in his office, and a room or two in the penitentiary building. If I had acceded to that I would have been denying him the investigation into his claim which he thought he was entitled to; I would likewise have incurred the risk of detriment to the premises which in a climate like that would deteriorate very quickly if unheated and not kept in order. Under those circumstances I asked the Auditor General, under the promise that I would bring the matter to the notice of Parliament, to transfer the charges to the account of Mr. Bedson and we have it in our power now to deduct that amount from his salary if Parliament should be unwilling to consider the claims which he has for the fuel and light that was furnished. I do not want, however, to be understood as committing myself at the present moment to a recommendation that Parliament should do so. I have promised the Auditor General that this matter would be brought to the notice of Parliament, and it either will be brought or the money will be paid.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It must have been a mistake then for the Government to erect such extensive premises for the warden of that penitentiary.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not say that. I do not undertake to criticise what has been done in the past in that particular; all I say is, it was inconsistent with the scheme we adopted in 1887 of striking off all those perquisites. I may say in the same connection that the warden of Kingston claims that his perquisites were not sufficiently commuted. But I do not think that he has made out a case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What allowance was made him?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. $400, I think.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite plain to any person going over the different items in connection with the Manitoba Penitentiary, that it is conducted on a very extravagant basis. No person can possibly examine into some of the items, without coming to the conclusion that the man in charge of that penitentiary is totally unfit, in the country's interest, to conduct its affairs. When you come to look over the different items of the expenditure and to find the extravagance that is to be seen in every column, you must come to the conclusion that there really must be something very wrong. In the penitentiaries of British Columbia and Manitoba there are about an equal number of convicts. In British Columbia there are 74, and only 70 in Manitoba. We find that in Manitoba it costs $707 a head to maintain the convicts, while in British Columbia it costs only $475.53 a head, and surely the cost of living is much less in Manitoba than it is in British Columbia. It is quite clear that there is something radically wrong in connection with the management of the Manitoba Penitentiary. I am not prepared to say that the Minister of Justice is entirely responsible for the condition of things as we find them, for they possibly may have been in this state when he came into office, but I do say that some decided action should be taken in regard to reducing the several items of expenditure in this particular institution. We find that 15 cents a pound is paid for mutton, and for beef 6 cents per pound, which is ridiculous. Then again we also have four overcoats, $48.50, and four capes, $115. I would like to know what kind of capes these are; they must be a very expensive kind of article to cost $115. Then, again, we have an item for a silk gown which cost $48. I ask, in the name of common sense, what is the meaning of getting a silk gown for a penitentiary?

An hon. MEMBER. It is for the chaplain.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is very strange that the country should be called upon to pay $48 for a silk gown for the chaplain of a penitentiary. There are some other items which are also open to strong objections. I shall not touch on the item for medicine, but shall leave that to some of the hon. gentlemen who are medical men. I see we have liquor this year and that is not quite so much as last year, as it is only three gallons and three bottles of whiskey. Again we find an item: "Post mortem examination on the bay horse, John Notman, $20." Just imagine this expenditure! $20 for a post mortem examination on a horse! I suppose the horse died, but what was the use of getting a veterinary surgeon to make a post mortem examination to see what the horse died of? It is quite clear from those items that from the manner in which the gentleman in charge of that institution conducts the business, the sooner he is removed the better it will be in the interest of the country. He commenced on an extravagant scale and he persists in that extravagant scale, and seems bound to keep it up notwithstanding the reduction made two years ago. I see there is still a disputed item of some $450 which the warden of that penitentiary claims should be allowed him for fuel. I believe there should be some investigation by an independent person into the affairs of this institution; I believe this person should go there under direction of Parliament and make a searching investigation into the manner in which all matters connected with that penitentiary are conducted, and that he should report to this House in order to place the people's representatives in possession of the entire facts. It is quite clear that something is wrong when we have to pay $707 a year per head for the keep of the convicts of that penitentiary. There is no penitentiary in this Dominion where the expenses come to anything like that amount, and there must be something abominably wrong in connection with the whole institution. We cannot afford to keep an institution of that kind, in the abominably extravagant condition in which it is conducted, as is disclosed by the facts laid before us in the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I see that in the Kingston Penitentiary, where the daily average of convicts was 553, the expenditure for drugs and medicine amounted to $371.41.

Mr. McMULLEN.

In Manitoba, where the daily average number of convicts was only seventy, the drugs and medicine cost $611.99. It strikes me that there must be something wrong about this expenditure. Surely, it did not take double the amount of money to provide drugs and medicine for seventy convicts in Manitoba, that it did for 553 convicts in Kingston. I fancy, that if an examination was made into the details of this account, it would be found that it was not altogether drugs and medicine that comprised that amount.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Champagne.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Well, it may have been commoner than champagne, but I fancy that liquor of some sort is included in this item.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not one cent's worth.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Well, certainly the Manitoba climate cannot be what it is claimed to be all over the Dominion, one of the healthiest in the Dominion, if it costs that much more for drugs and medicine there than at Kingston. I do not know whether I would be in order just now to ask the Minister for an answer to the question I put the other night about the travelling expenses of the inspector, Mr. Moylan. I see he travelled 261 days and was paid $1,773 70 for travelling expenses in addition to his salary. I cannot see why it should take 261 days to inspect five penitentiaries.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. With regard to the travelling expenses of the inspector, the explanation is very simple. I rose the other night to explain, but somebody intercepted me, and afterwards the enquiry was not renewed, and I thought the hon. gentleman would bring it up later. The hon. gentleman's comment was, that it was unreasonable to suppose that he could be travelling so many days. The number of days he refers to are not the days of travel, but the days of necessary absence from Ottawa, and under the terms of his appointment he receives his moving expenses and a living allowance during the time he is necessarily absent. The duties which he has to discharge at Ottawa are simply advising the department, and it is not advisable that he should spend a great portion of his time here. His principal duties consist in going from one penitentiary to another; and, in many cases, it is necessary that he should remain at a penitentiary for a considerable time, sometimes superintending works which are going on, sometimes making investigations and receiving complaints from officers and convicts. He is bound to inform himself upon the working of every branch of these institutions, so that he shall be directly responsible if any mismanagement occurs which it would be in the power of the department here to check; and it is on that account that for more than two-thirds of the time he is necessarily absent from Ottawa. As regards the item for drugs, hospital supplies, &c, I may say to the hon. gentleman that if he really has a suspicion that this expense was for any other purpose than medicine and drugs, I hope he will cause the fullest investigation to be made, and there is nothing that I can do to assist him that I will not cheerfully do, and if one cent of it was for what the hon. member for Bothwell suggested—champagne or intoxicating liquor of any kind—the officer who is responsible shall be no longer in the public service if it be possible for me to put him out of it. All I can say is that every item of that charge is open to the fullest enquiry, and there is no wish on my part or on the part of any of my officers to screen it from public investigation. I have time and again explained, in connection with the accounts of this penitentiary, that we are exceptionally situated as regards the hospital there. We have a class of people there not found in any other part of Canada; I mean the Indians and people very little removed from Indians. It is true that a considerable portion of our prison population in British Columbia consists of Indians, but they are a different class, much more hardy and do not suffer from confinement so much. At the present time we have, and I think during almost the whole of last year we have had, eighteen Indians in the Manitoba penitentiary, and everyone of those is a constant inmate of the hospital, and would not be in existence if he were not treated medically, and maintained on entirely different fare from that given to the other prisoners. This entails an outlay of this kind. I may say that within the last year we have opened a new hospital, which was inspected by the hon. Minister of Public Works, and we have had to furnish it throughout with drugs and medical appliances of every kind. I make an extract from the warden's report:

"In reference to the purchase of drugs, &c., for hospital, as well as in every other department, every precaution has been taken to economise. The gross amount expended for drugs was, for the year 1887-88, $485.59. Of this amount, there remained as stock on hand, on 30th June, $37 85, leaving the net expenditure $447.74 for the year.

"This apparently large expenditure is caused, to a very great extent, by our having to re-furnish the new hospital, in the matter of equipment, convalescent rooms, kitchen furniture, dispensing and officers' rooms. When this unlooked-for expense is considered, the actual cost of hospital is comparatively small."

As regards what has been said about the general management of the prison and something being fearfully wrong and improper, I want to be perfectly candid with the committee. I want to avow it here, as I have done in the department and amongst the officers themselves, that I think the Manitoba Penitentiary is managed extravagantly. I have done what I could during the last year to curtail the expenditure, and I think in many directions my efforts have been successful. I have now enquiries on foot, and shall be able perhaps to give to the committee at a later stage reasons why the per capita cost of maintenance is much greater there than elsewhere. It is true some expenses incurred in the past can by strict watchfulness and economy be curtailed; but I do not think that in the management of that prison there is any greater fault than the want of economy, and I am convinced that as regards management and discipline, it is a model institution.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to one item in which he will see a most extraordinary difference. We all know that the Manitoba climate is a cold climate, and a reasonable additional expenditure cannot be grudged on that account. I observe that the expenditure there reaches $165 per year per convict for fuel, as against $7.29 in Dorchester.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In Dorchester we are practically without any expenditure for fuel as it is got off our own land.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At Kingston, $19 is the expenditure, and at St. Vincent de Paul, $22. Even allowing for the great difference in number and in climate, $165 in Manitoba seems an extravagant amount. How can people keep themselves alive there, if the cost for each individual is to amount to $165 for fuel?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That statement is not quite correct. I explained to the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) that the Auditor General bases his calculation on the expenditure at the end of the year. In Manitoba, there was left on hand on 30th June, 1888, 1,248 cords of poplar wood, $4,180; 30 tons of soft coal, $320; and 60 cords of other wood, $300, so that we had a stock on hand, at the end of the fiscal year, worth $4,700.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much at the commencement?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Very little. It was explained by the warden that an opportunity presented itself of getting exceptional advantage for laying in fuel, and he availed himself of it to that extent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad to hear that, because if there is a reduction of $4,000, it is of great importance.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Has the hon. gentleman any check in the case of an officer like Mr. Moylan, on the account he renders for travelling and living expenses? Supposing Mr. Moylan goes to British Columbia to inspect a prison there, and stays over at Banff Park on his return, is there any way in which his time can be checked. Does the head of the penitentiary visited report to the Government the number of days Mr. Moylan spent in inspecting it?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Every time Mr. Moylan visits, a penitentiary, he has a minute book there in which he records any act of any importance which he does during the day. He enters in it when he arrives, when he departs, and what his work was. Those minutes are accessible at any time. They are not habitually sent to the department, but are sent whenever asked for, and, generally speaking, he makes a second report, which he has in his own department, and lays before me when there is anything important in it to attract my attention to.

Mr. MULOCK. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman when he says that, as a matter of comparison at least, the management of Manitoba Penitentiary appears to be very extravagant. In corroboration of that view, let me call his attention to an item, small in itself, but which confirms his view. Take telegrams. Looking at page 89, we find that Kingston Penitentiary has an account for telegrams of $26.45; St. Vincent de Paul, $17.85; Dorchester, $51.29; British Columbia, $149.28; Manitoba, $325.42.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is one of the items I had in view when I made the admission I did a few moments ago. I represented to the warden that I thought that item could be very considerably curtailed, and that too much of the correspondence of the penitentiary was carried on by telegram.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am pleased to hear the hon. gentleman say he thinks the penitentiary has been extravagantly managed, and that he feels it to be his duty to endeavor to reduce the expense. Of course, the penitentiary in which each convict is represented as eating over 300 pounds of beef in a year shows extravagant management, and when you add to that the mutton and other meat consumed in the penitentiary, it will certainly appear to be a large quantity for each convict. One wonders, when they have such an excellent appetite, that there should be any expenditure in medicine at all. One would conclude that the institution ought rather to be managed on the plan of Dotheboys Hall, where some were given treacle and brimstone with great effect. I must say I have not as much confidence in the warden of this penitentiary as the hon. Minister has. I may say publicly what I said to some of his predecessors who held the position the hon. gentleman now holds, that it seems to me the institution requires a very strict inspection, more careful than it has hitherto received. I remember that, before the Government of which I was a member went out of office, we had called to our attention that this same warden had offered to give a contract to certain parties to supply the penitentiary with everything required if they would pay him a commission of 10 per cent. I mentioned that to one of the predecessors of the hon. gentleman in office, as I thought it was my duty to bring it under his attention in order that he might investigate that which we had not the opportunity of investigating before retiring. I do not know what the Government has done, but I am satisfied that if the management of that institution were thoroughly investigated the Government would not retain the present warden. He may have a good many estimable qualities that make him treat with consideration visitors to that country, but I am certain that his retention in his present position is not in the public interest. I have had mentioned to me, on several occasions, matters I would not repeat here, but would have no objection repeating to the hon. Minister. It has always seemed to me the inspector could hardly have been very diligent in the discharge of his duties, or long ago the warden would have been removed. I do not think that extravagance alone is sufficient to account for the large expenditure in the institution. When the whole matter is thoroughly investigated the hon. gentleman will find that this item for medicine is not, perhaps, exactly as it has been represented to him. It seems to me that the institution ought to be thoroughly examined into from some independent source, and I am satisfied that if the hon. gentleman who is now in charge of the Department of Justice will make that investigation, or cause it to be made, this item of expenditure for the penitentiary in Manitoba will be very materially reduced.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the price which has been paid for flour. I notice that in Manitoba the flour was bought for $4 a barrel, in British Columbia for $5.50 a barrel, in St. Vincent de Paul for $5.95 a barrel, while in Dorchester it only cost $5.20. I suppose that all these supplies are purchased by tender and that this account is for the year ending the 30th June, 1888. I have no hesitation in saying that $5.95 a barrel for flour is altogether beyond what it was worth. We all know that flour during that year was very low, and I know myself it was delivered in Halifax at $5 a barrel, and in Quebec and similar points as low as $4.75 a barrel. Would the Minister say when this contract was made?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The contracts are made from year to year, and cover a year's supply. They are made from the 1st July to the 30th June. They are made by tender.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then this would be made on the 1st July, 1887, and would expire on the 30th June, 1888?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That makes the case even worse, because in July, 1887, we had as low prices for flour as have been current for many years, and why this large amount of $5.95 should have been paid in that year I cannot understand. There are 706 barrels paid for at $5.95. I have no hesitation in saying that the flour could have been purchased for $1 or $1.25 less.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot refer to dates such as June or July. We take our contract for a year's supply, and the prices are based on the probable prices for the whole year, and not for any particular month. The tenders are called for in the most public way, and the contract is awarded to the lowest tenderer. If the hon. gentleman wants to see the papers, I will bring them down.

Mr. MULOCK. I think they should be brought down.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). As to the item which I see here for drugs, I would like to know if those are also supplied by tender, whether the Minister adopts the same principle in regard to the hospital branch as he does in regard to the other branches. It appears to me that the expenditure of $611 for drugs for an average of some 71 inmates of the institution, even though there are fourteen Indians there, and they take a much larger quantity of medicine than other people, is a very large charge. I do not charge the warden with appropriating any portion of that fund for any other purposes than drugs, but, if we look over the items in the Auditor's Report, we find some very extraordinary charges. Besides expending $611.99 for drugs and medicine, we find another item of $43.32 for vessels to hold medicine. Then if you go further back, you will find 6,½ dozens of bottles. It is very difficult to say what these may be for unless they are the ordinary prescription bottles to put the medicine in. Then it is difficult to say what the other vessels for medicines are. It may be to furnish the hospital with bottles to place upon the shelf. These may be said to be small items which should not be discussed before the House, but, if the Minister is really desirous to ascertain whether that institution could be operated with a great deal less expense than it has been for a number of years, he should institute a proper investigation, and send his inspector or some one else there to detect where the leakage is. It is an evident waste of money, and whether Mr. Bedson is a good or bad warden, whether he does or does not entertain the people who go up there and treat them hospitably, that is nothing to his credit, because I should judge, from the amounts which are placed in the Public Accounts, that all that is at the public expense. I think it is high time that some careful oversight of these institutions should be made so that we may curtail expenses, and, if we find that the expenses are very much larger than they ought to be, and, as the Minister has stated, larger than he believed they ought to be, then it is his duty and the duty of the Government at once to place some other man in charge of that institution, and see if it cannot be conducted at less expense. You leave a man there whom you would not leave in your own business if you found he was running it more expensively than you thought he ought to run it. Is there not anyone in Manitoba or in the Dominion who could take the place of that warden and perform the services required? You could then ascertain whether the institution could be conducted with less expense than it is now or not. The Government is to blame, because they ought to have the courage of their convictions as they have been expressed by the Minister of Justice. They should remove this man and put another in his place, and the sooner they do that the more satisfaction it will give not only to the House, but also to the country, which must feel that these expenditures are unjustifiable on the part of this individual.

Mr. SPOULE. I think the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) is scarcely fair in his criticism, or at least he forgets the fact that this is the commencement of furnishing an establishment which means a considerable expense. For instance, the item that he mentioned, $40 for bottles in which to keep these drugs, is not, in my opinion, a very large item, if he bought, as I presume he did, those ordinary labelled glass bottles and jars, and other vessels for the purpose of keeping these medicines properly for a long time, and all the other equipments usually found either in a drug store or in a doctor's office, where they are to be kept for a length of time. I think the item is not a large one at all. This is the first furnishing of the establishment, and it would be impossible to distribute the charge equally over several years, or it would be unfair to consider a charge that was made in the commencement as a fair charge that might be expected to be made every year. It is an exceptional one. Then, again, as to the drugs that are used. There is a great difference in the class of diseases found in one part of the country from those found in another part, and a great difference in the expensiveness of the drugs used for these various kinds of diseases. But outside of that, no doctor, I think, could better understand that fact than the hon. member for East Elgin, who must be acquainted with the medicines required to be kept for any length of time; but no one can judge the future so well as to be able to furnish a stated supply such as would be needed for any given number of months or years. Undoubtedly, also, part of this charge represents a stock on hand to be used in the future, although it appears in the item for this year, and that ought, perhaps, to be distributed over a number of years. Besides the supply needed to commence operations is entirely different from that which would be required to keep it up from year to year.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think the hon. gentleman from Grey (Mr. Sproule) is laboring under a mistake, or he has forgotten the items for these charges in years gone by. He will find that even $611, which is in the Auditor's accounts this year, is not as large as in previous years. What has become of the drugs that he says that he had on hand? He could make a close estimate in view of the diseases that were prevailing, of the quantity he would likely require. What did he do with the drugs he had on hand before? My hon. friend completely ignores the charges. If it was this year only that these charges were made for fitting up the hospital, then we could understand it; but what became of the supplies and requisites that existed before? We find every year the same large charges for this institution, and therefore the excuse offered does not hold. The hon. gentleman forgets the amounts that had been charged before, he tries to explain them away, but no reasonable person can accept his explanation. Then as to the diseases existing in this locality. I am not aware that the people are so prone to disease—they are generally looked upon as reasonably healthy people, and to say that the Indians require a larger amount of drugs and medicines than white people, is a reason that I cannot accept. I cannot understand what diseases were prevailing there that required such an expense for medicine as is represented here. For 71 individuals in the institution, a small number of these being sick, to expend upon drugs alone $611 seems to me unreasonable, and I do not think that the hon. member for Grey or any other medical man in the House can explain away that item, or can believe that this institution needed that sum to expend in drugs or medicine annually.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to make one suggestion to the hon. Minister. It is very desirable that, in the Auditor General's Report, if there be such very large alterations or modifications to be made as he now states in the case of fuel, for instance, amounting to nearly $5,000, in the interest of his own department, and to prevent unnecessary discussion, a note should always be appended in such cases, pointing out that instead of $10,000 being required for fuel, only $5,200 worth has been consumed, $4,700 being on hand. I do not know where he got the figures, I suppose they were supplied by his department, but they were not exhibited in the Auditor General's Report to the members of this House, and the attention of the Auditor General should be called to the fact that the large apparent expenditure to which he alluded was not quite a correct statement of the case. I am glad to hear the Minister state that he is convinced that there is a great deal of extravagance in this institution. I would call his attention to one item under the head of library. There is a very extraordinary charge for 16 copies of the Army and Navy List, amounting to $34. Now it is a matter of interest to the white portion, at any rate, of the prisoners, that their library should have some few reasonably entertaining works in it which are of considerable value in improving the people's minds, if they are open to improvement at all; but a charge of $34 for copies of the Army and Navy List does appear to me most preposterous—unless the Minister of Militia designs to turn these into scouts, or otherwise utilise them for the service of the Militia Department.

Mr. TROW. I may say that I am acquainted with the warden of the Manitoba Penitentiary, although not from having been incarcerated there; and I consider him an efficient officer, thoroughly acquainted with his duties, keeping the place scrupulously clean, and having everything under his supervision. At the same time, I always considered him a very extravagant man. I was there when that building was put up—his private residence—and thought it was in an out-of-way place, unnecessary and uncalled for. The addition was built expressly for his convenience, while he had every accommodation that a warden, and those under his charge, could desire. I would ask the Minister if the Government have participated in any of the proceeds from the sale of this large herd of buffalo that was sold recently, and had been kept on Government property, provided for from Government lands, and sold, probably, for enormous sums of money, quite recently to some American. I would like to know if there was any allowance made by the warden of the penitentiary to the Government, for the care and aid that had been given to these animals, food for which had been supplied from Government lands. There must have been a little fortune realised from the sale of these buffalo, and I would like to know if the Government participated in any of the profits of that sale.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Government have nothing to do with the buffalo, and have not participated in any of the profits, nor have they borne any portion of the expenses of keeping them and increasing them.

Mr. MULOCK. Did you get any allowance for the keeping?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; they were not kept on our lands, nor were they fed with our products. Mr. Bedson owns a tract of land near the penitentiary grounds, on which he kept them. The grounds which belong to the penitentiary and on which fodder can be procured, he has to account for every year, and he has to account for the produce every year. I forgot, when I was up before, to explain to the hon. member for South Oxford about the Army and Navy List. The library, for which these books were supplied, is an exceptional provision for Manitoba, under these circumstances: It is not a library for the prisoners at all; but, as he knows, the prison is on a reserve a long distance from any settlement, and it has within its borders the residences of all the officers, or nearly all. Our design is to make it the residence of all the officers. There is a small allowance for a library. It is a place of resort for the guards and keepers, and we have found it beneficial as affording them a place for agreeable and innocent recreation, and we have found it worth while to allow them the use of papers and magazines. A number of the officers, guards and keepers are ex-army men, and they have asked to be allowed to have the Army and Navy List. The 16 copies are not 16 copies of the same list, but they are the serial numbers of the Army List. I understand it is published monthly and these are 16 of the monthly parts. In answer to the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) the drugs are not supplied by contract. The explanation which the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) gave is perfectly correct, and the outlay which was provided for in the expenditure of last year was largely caused by fitting up a hospital with those appliances. The hon. gentleman's answer is that the charges have been still greater than in former years. Admitting that, the hon. gentleman does not give us credit for any economy whatever, and for the fact that we got along with a smaller expenditure for drugs and still fitted up the new establishment. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I think, was not in the House when I made my explanation of a circumstance that would have relieved his apprehension that the feeding of the convicts was likely to cause a surfeit. I explained to the committee at an earlier stage that nearly 6,700 pounds of that meat which appears in the Auditor General's Report to have been furnished to the prison, was supplied to the officers and paid for by them, the amount being paid into the Receiver General's hands and not going immediately to the penitentiary account.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How many officers are there?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will see the list in my report.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perhaps the officers may be doing as badly as the convicts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will give them the right even in Manitoba to have wives and children, and they feed their wives and children on beef too. As regards the explanation which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said should have been embodied in the Auditor General's Report, I may state that, without an explanation of the statement, the Auditor General's statement is quite misleading, and no doubt from his zeal to lay proper accounts before this House he will avail himself of the opportunity, which my department will willingly furnish him, to state the stock in hand at the close of the fiscal year. If the Auditor General does not feel that that comes within the scope of his duties—and I have no control over him—I have arranged with my officials that there shall be an addendum to my report showing these details.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister expressed surprise that so much firewood was on hand, and I, therefore, assume he was not a party to the original purchase. I observe that Manitoba Penitentiary purchased 7,500 cords of firewood. Was that purchase made by tender, and, if so, was it previously authorised by the department? I observe that a reaper and binder were purchased for $220. Was that one machine or two machines?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. One machine.

Mr. MULOCK. In what year was it purchased?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. During 1887-88.

Mr. MULOCK. I should like the Minister to lay the voucher for that purchase on the Table, and also the tender for the firewood. I also observe that there were purchased three horses at a cost of $700, or an average cost of $233. Had the warden authority to purchase horses without the department's sanction?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps the hon. Minister will lay the vouchers on the Table?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The warden is not at liberty to make any such purchase without referring the matter to the department first. After enquiring as to the requisition consent was given that the warden should make the purchase. He was not limited as to the price, because it was impossible to tell the prices at which horses could be obtained there. I made enquiry in Winnipeg, when I was there some time ago, as to the reason for the prices that were paid. I was not only satisfied that we got ample value for the price, but I saw persons who made purchases from the same lot of horses which came in the same car and they gave equal prices for them, and they being perfectly credible persons assured me that it was a good purchase.

Mr. MULOCK. Horses in the same car are not always of the same value.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am aware of that.

British Columbia Penitentiary.....$44,391

Mr. TROW. I observe an item: buggy, $270, horse $365. This item of $635 is a most extraordinary figure to pay for a horse and buggy in British Columbia. It might probably be paid by some wealthy man in Victoria, but for penitentiary purposes it seems extraordinary.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The buggy was purchased in Kingston and is for the use of the warden and the penitentiary.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

tiary service. Such a buggy is allowed in all the Government penitentiaries.

Mr. KIRK. It must have been a buggy of better quality than those sent down to Prince Edward Island last year, and referred to by the hon. member for Leeds. Those could not have been worth $250 each, or there would not have been much chance for selling them down there. I notice one or two other extraordinary items. There are 74 convicts in the institution, and I observe 164 hats were purchased for them last year, some of the hats costing $4 each, and straw hats $1.50. Surely it was an extraordinary quality of hat that cost the latter sum. I notice further that eggs cost 50 cents per dozen. This is an extraordinary price.

Committee rose and reported progress.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to enquire of the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Customs when it would be convenient to have the Public Accounts Committee meet. I do not see the chairman here and he has been absent for some days. It is important that various papers, and so forth, should be brought down at a reasonable time. It would be late to send notices out now for tomorrow, but if it suits the convenience of the Government I think the committee ought to sit on Thursday.

Mr. FOSTER. The committee has met and organised, I believe.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is all it has done.

Mr. BOWELL. I expect the chairman down. We intended to have a meeting on Thursday, but it was found that the room would be occupied and the committee has been called for Friday, the earliest time we could get the room for that purpose.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11:30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 20th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 49) respecting the Alberta and Athabasca Railway Company.—(Mr. Davis, Alberta.)

Bill (No. 50) to amend the Act incorporating the London Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Marshall.)

Bill (No. 51) respecting the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Bryson.)

Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Lac Seul Railway Company.—(Mr. Daly.)

COMMITTEE ON FRAUDULENT PRACTICES.

Mr. BROWN moved that five members constitute a quorum of the special committee appointed to enquire into fraudulent practices. He said: Though the members of the committee are very attentive to their duties, it happens occasionally that at the commencement of the sittings a sufficient number is not present, and it was thought better to reduce the number constituting a quorum, so that the work might not be delayed.

Mr. MULOCK. How many members are on that committee?

Mr. BROWN. Fifteen.

Mr. MULOCK. And it is proposed to limit the quorum to five. I do not think we can assent to that motion. The hon. gentleman has selected, I presume, fifteen members best qualified to deal with this important question, and yet not more than five can be found to give their attention to it. He will surely not make such a reflection on the other ten.

Mr. McMULLEN. A number of the members on that committee are on other important committees, and I quite endorse the action of the chairman in asking that the quorum be reduced to five. In that case a sufficient number to make a majority of the committee could attend, and the members could also attend to the other important committees at the same time.

Motion agreed to.

PROTECTION OF LABORERS.

Mr. PURCELL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 53) to make provision for the protection of persons employed by contractors engaged in the construction of railways under Acts passed by the Parliament of Canada. He said: The object of this Bill is to prevent workmen employed in railway construction from being defrauded. Many instances have occurred on the Intercolonial road and others in which the men who built these roads were cheated out of their wages, and it is high time something should be done to protect them. They ought to be given a lien on the charter. I know I shall be attacked in reference to this, but some provision should be made, when the charters are granted, to protect these men and prevent their being deprived of their pay. There is not an hon. gentleman in this House who knows more in regard to that matter than I do, and have for many years. It may be said that, in Government contracts, there is a proviso which protects these men. That is true, but it is never put in force. I have seen many cases in which these men have had $15 or $25 or $50 coming to them, but they would have to remain there after the sub-contractor had left, or it might be the third or fourth contractor, and then they might get $5 for their claim, and the man who paid the $5 might never get it back. These men were cheated out of their pay, while political influence was brought to bear so that these contractors should not be obliged to pay. It might take two years to do that, and what was the laboring man going to do in the meantime? He might have $30 coming to him, and he would sell that out for $5, and probably the man who paid the $5 never got it back. This Bill does not interfere with the Local Governments. It is strictly a Dominion Act. I say that these men should get their pay, and that something should be done in the way of legislation to ensure their receiving payment for the work they do. It has been suggested by the best authorities that this Bill might be referred to a committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the explanations of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Purcell), and I am pleased to see that a man who was himself a workingman, and has risen from that position to a state of comparative affluence, has the courage to come here and to ask the House to protect the workmen from the iniquities of the capitalists, who get their share of the public moneys of the country, and the bonuses voted by Parliament. They come here and get a charter, and they make a raid on the public treasury for money to build their road, because they may happen to be on the Government side of the House. Then they sublet their contracts, and these sub-contractors employ the men, and it often happens—as it did in a notorious case last summer —that the men do not get their pay. I trust that the representative of the laboring interest, the gentleman who has been returned here as the special representative of the laboring interest, will give the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Purcell) every support that he can in reference to this measure, which will secure to the workmen the proper security for the payment of the wages which they have honestly and hardily earned.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SAFETY OF SHIPS.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 54) to amend the Act respecting the safety of ships. He said: This Bill is largely founded upon the Bill which was introduced by my predecessor in office last Session, the chief difference being that this Bill does not contain those provisions which were in the former Bill regarding the detention of ships at the different ports. In this Bill, it is proposed to make the law more stringent in regard to the sending of unseaworthy ships to sea. The object of the Bill is, therefore, to make the present statute more closely resemble the provisions of the English Act from which that was taken. The provisions of this Bill in regard to the safety of ships is modelled more closely on the English Act, especially in regard to the amendments to the Merchant Shipping Act of 1876 and 1880. There is also taken from the Bill of last Session, which was not proceeded with, the provision of the English Act preventing the shifting of grain cargoes. There are one or two other provisions of minor importance.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MR. RUFUS STEPHENSON.

Mr. BRIEN asked, Whether Mr. Rufus Stephenson, late Inspector of Colonisation Societies, has been employed by the Government in any capacity since the 30th June last? If so, what were his duties? What was his salary? How much has he received, either as salary or travelling expenses, between the 30th June, 1883, and 1st day of February, 1889?

Mr. DEWDNEY. In November last Mr. Stephenson was asked to undertake the inspection of several colonies. The "Commercial," situated near Kinbrae; the "London Artisans" Colony, near Moosomin; and the Primitive Methodists, if time would permit of his visiting the latter. He was subsequently asked to inspect the "Church" Colony, near Churchbridge station, on the line of the Manitoba and North-Western Railway. We have reports from him on all except the Methodist Colony. He is to be paid $10 a day and travelling expenses. He has not received any salary between the above dates. $500 was advanced to him on account of travelling expenses.

SAWDUST IN THE OTTAWA RIVER.

Mr. COOK asked, Has the Government rescinded the Order in Council permitting the owners of lumber mills to throw sawdust and other refuse into the Ottawa River at the Chaudière Falls, and will such mill owners be permitted to throw sawdust and other refuse into the said river in future?

Mr. TUPPER. No Order in Council exists, permitting the owners of lumber mills to throw sawdust and other refuse as the hon. gentleman expresses it, into the Ottawa River at the Chaudière Falls. A proclamation was issued, based upon an Order in Council of the 17th April, 1885, exempting that part of the Ottawa River lying between the Chaudière Falls and McKay's Bay, from the operation of the "Act for the better protection of Navigable Streams and Rivers," so far as regards sawdust only. The Government is at present awaiting the receipt of a report upon this whole subject, before deciding as to the future action to be taken in regard to it.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, an amendment to the Controverted Elections Act, providing that the period allowed for contesting an election shall date from the day of the election or from some other uniform date for all the electoral districts?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not the intention of the Government to introduce such a measure this Session.

HENRY SMITH, CHATHAM, ONT.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether Henry Smith, of Chatham, Ont., has been in the employ of the Government, in any capacity, since the 30th June last? If so, in what capacity has he been employed, and what salary has been promised him; how much has been paid him for salary, and also travelling expenses, or for any other purpose from the said 30th day of June last to the 1st of February instant?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He has not been in the employ of the Government since 30th June last.

LIGHTHOUSE IN THE RIVER ST. CLAIR.

Mr. MONCRIEFF asked, Is it the intention of the Government to erect one or more lighthouses on or near Stag Island, in the River St Clair?

Mr. TUPPER. It is the intention of the Government to erect range lights in the village of Corunna, opposite Stag Island, to guide vessels clear of the shoals at the head of Stag Island, on the Corunna side, and those running off from the point above Corunna.

BONDING FOREIGN FISH.

Mr. EISENHAUER asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make any change in the present system of bonding foreign fish? Has the Department of Customs received any petitions asking for a change in connection with the system of bonding foreign fish?

Mr. BOWELL. The Government is considering the question of changing the system of bonding foreign fish, which has prevailed since Confederation. Petitions of that character, which have been referred to, have been received.

IMPORTATION OF FRUITS AND SEEDS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BOYLE asked, 1. What is the value of our entire importations, from the United States, of green fruits, seeds, trees and other articles placed on the free list by an Order in Council dated 4th April, 1888, from such date until 1st January, 1889? 2. What amount of revenue would have been collected upon such importations if they had not been placed upon the free list? 3. What is the value of such importations from the United States for the corresponding period of the previous year, that is to say, from 4th April, 1887, to 1st January, 1888? 4. What is the value of our exports to the United States of these articles from 4th April, 1888, until 1st January, 1889, and what did they consist of?

Mr. BOWELL. 1. The value of our entire importations from the United States of green fruits, seeds, trees, and articles placed on the free list by Order in Council of the 4th April, 1888, from that date to 1st January, 1889, is $831,399. 2. The amount of revenue which would have been collected upon such importations if they had not been placed upon the free list, is $219,636. 3. The value of such importations from the United States for the corresponding period of the previous year, that is to say, from the 4th April, 1887, to the 1st January, 1888, was $493,153. 4. The value of our exports to the United States of those articles, from 4th April, 1888, until 1st January, 1889, is $1,486,022, of which apples amounted to the sum of $1,315,452; berries, $80,000; seeds, &c., $50,000; leaving $40,570 for the smaller fruits.

Mr. TUPPER,

JOHN COSGROVE, BUCKINGHAM, QUE.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin) asked, Whether John Cosgrove, of Buckingham, P.Q., is still filling the office of Inspector of Weights and Measures, or any other position in the public service? If so, what is his salary, and when was he appointed? Are the Government aware that the aforesaid John Cosgrove was, not long ago, indicted before the Superior Court, at Aylmer, on a charge of obtaining money under false pretences? Are the Government aware that the said Cosgrove pleaded guilty to the indictment and suffered a term of imprisonment? Have the Government been informed that the said John Cosgrove has had his commission as a Justice of the Peace cancelled by the Provincial Government? If said Cosgrove is in the employ of the Government, is it the intention of the Government to retain him in his position?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. Mr. Cosgrove, of Buckingham, P.Q., is still filling the office of Assistant Inspector of Weights and Measures, not that of Inspector. 2. He was appointed February 6, 1886, at the minimum salary of $500; it is now $600. 3. The Government have no official information on these points. 4. A letter published by Judge Wurtele in the Week, of Toronto, in July last, relieves Mr. Cosgrove from the slightest suspicion of fraud or dishonesty. 5. The Government have no official information on this point. 6. Mr. Cosgrove will doubtless be continued in office so long as he continues to discharge his duty faithfully and willingly, as he has done since his appointment.

SALMON RIVERS OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

Mr. RINFRET, for Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec), asked, 1. Whether the Government is aware, that in consequence of the use of nets in the estuaries of the salmon rivers of the Province of Quebec, that fish must soon disappear from those rivers? 2. What are the rivers whose estuaries are now under lease, to whom do the leases belong, and when do they expire? 3. Is it the intention of the Government to renew the said leases when they expire; and would it not be better, in the interest of the public, to prohibit salmon fishing in the said estuaries for a few years?

Mr. TUPPER. The Government are not aware of the use of nets to an unreasonable extent in the estuaries of the salmon rivers of the Province of Quebec, and that in consequence of their use fish must soon disappear from those rivers. There is but one lease existing for any of the estuaries of the salmon rivers in the Province of Quebec, and that is the Matane River, which lease is held by Sir Alexander Galt for fly-fishing. This lease will expire in 1895. In regard to the last portion of the question, I may say that the Government have not decided formally as to any action they may take in regard to the estuaries' fishing in the future. Any action, however, in that direction will be taken with due regard to the salmon fisheries.

ATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. RINFRET, for Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec), asked, 1. Whether a contract has been entered into with a view to securing for Canada a line of rapid steamers to carry the mails by way of the St. Lawrence across the Atlantic ocean? 2. If so, with whom has such contract been made, for how many years, and for what annual subsidy? 3. When will the service commence, and what are to be the tonnage and speed of the steamers to be employed? 4. If no such contract has been made, is it their intention to award such contract, and when?

Mr. FOSTER. No contract has been entered into with a view to securing for Canada a line of rapid steamers to carry the mails, by way of the St. Lawrence, across the Atlantic ocean. The Government are now engaged in negotiations with that end in view.

OTTAWA EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron) asked, How much has the barn built at the experimental farm at Ottawa cost? Have any other outbuildings been put up? If any, at what cost? The number of residences built at the Ottawa experimental farm, and the cost of each?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must ask the hon. gentleman to be kind enough to give notice of a motion covering the question, because the answer will be too long. If, however, the hon. gentleman will make the motion later on in the Session, it will, of course, be adopted by the Government, and the papers will be brought down immediately.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I desire that the question be changed to a notice of motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Make the motion now, without notice.

POST OFFICES.

Mr. BURDETT moved for:

Return showing the name of each post office built or under construction in Canada since the 31st December, 1878; the revenue and expenditure for salaries, forward and other allowances for rent, fuel and light of each office, for the year prior to the commencement of work on the respective offices; also showing the population of the place at which an office has been or is being built at the time the work was ordered to be done, and the cost of each office built, as well as the probable cost of those constructed.

He said: My object in asking for the papers called for in the motion is to see if I can ascertain from them the principles upon which the Government act in constructing the public buildings in the various constituencies in Canada. I have taken some little trouble to look over the blue-books, to see if I can ascertain what principle or rule the Government follow in building post offices at different places in the Dominion. I have been unable to deduce any general rule, or any general principle, upon which to form an opinion, and I think, therefore, it is necessary to bring down the papers, in order that we may, if possible, draw from them some definite conclusion in regard to this matter. I naturally assumed that public buildings would be constructed in the public interest, and as the public required them, and according to the population and revenue obtained at the respective places. Such, I find from my observations and enquiries, has not been the case. Possibly there is an explanation to give as to why this has been so, why places with less population and with less revenue than others have received large expenditures and valuable public buildings, while others possessing stronger reasons for having new public buildings have not received any consideration in that respect. I will call attention to a few instances that have come under my notice, in looking into this matter. I find that at Cayuga (in the county of Haldimand, a county of which hon. gentlemen have probably heard incidentally) a post office was built. The whole revenue is $776.07. The salary received there by the postmaster is $400, and allowances, $50. That I may assume to be a basis upon which the Government act in constructing public buildings. I believe the population of Cayuga to be about 800, but on that point I am open to correction. I assume that may be taken as a basis in ascertaining the principle and rule that is applied to other places. At Ayimer, where, I believe, a public building has been constructed, the post office income is $1,345.70; salary of the postmaster, $450, and allowances, $168. At Montague Bridge, P.E.I.—for I desire to spread this statement over the different Provinces to ascertain whether the same rule applies to all—the income is $682.65, the salary $280, and $100 allowances. At Georgetown, P.E.I. the income is $657.93, the salary $400 and the allowances $140, and in St. Jérôme, P.Q., the income is $1,248.36, salary $450 and allowances $180. I have not been able to ascertain accurately the population of those places last year, but they are no larger than the places which I now intend to bring before the notice of the Government in connection with the papers I am asking for. There are two places in the riding which I have the honor to represent, and there are also two places in the riding which my hon. friend the Minister of Customs represents, which are entitled to public buildings. In the village of Tweed the income for five quarters was $1,329.75, the salary of the postmaster $375, and the allowances $25. In Madoc, in North Hastings, the income was $2,218.44, the salary $630 and the allowances $180. In the village of Stirling, also in North Hastings, the income was $1,521.59, the salary $420, and the allowances $72. In Deseronto, another town in the riding which I have the honor to represent, the income was $3,864.74, the salary $900, and the allowances $140. The population of Tweed is about 800, of Madoc 2,000, of Stirling 1,000, and of Deseronto 3,500. I would like to know why these places have not been favored with public buildings, when the other places I have mentioned have received that consideration and recognition at the hands of the Government? I would like to know also, if I can find out, what peculiar claims these places have or had upon the Government, that are not possessed by the places to which I have referred? I hope and I believe that when this matter is brought to the attention of the Government they will decide to treat all alike, and if they can show any reason why those places should be treated better by getting public buildings than other places in Hastings, equally, if not better entitled to them, I would be glad to know. I may be mistaken slightly in the statistics I have given. The general figures I believe to be correct, as I have extracted them from the documents that have been returned to Parliament. We all like to see the county and the vicinity in which we live making reasonable progress, and it is an indication of the progress of the place, as well as an incentive to the people who live there, to push forward private enterprises, if they see the public are taking an interest in them. The erection of public buildings in any town or village gives, in my judgment, a great impetus to the enterprise of the people, and to the progress of the place. It certainly causes a large expenditure of money, and I think that all places in Canada should be treated alike by the Government. I do not propose to ask for extravagant expenditures in those places, nor that a large and magnificent building should be erected in each, but I hold that they should have public buildings in proportion to their size and importance, and sufficient for the accommodation of the public. I may add, in regard to Deseronto—without disparaging other places—that I do not know of any other place in the Dominion of Canada that has made, or that continues to make more material progress, or which is building up faster in proportion to its population. It is now an incorporated town; one of the greatest lumbering enterprises of the Dominion is situated there, and this establishment is carried on with the utmost skill and the greatest possible success, I am happy to say.

Railways have been built there which, to some extent, have been aided by the Government, and in addition to the prosperity indicated by the figures I have given, I may add that the revenue derived from customs in Deseronto alone is $10,870. This is a strong additional reason why the claims of this place should be considered. I do not wish to be considered a fault finder, and my object is only to call the attention of the Government to these facts and to the advantages that have been given to other places not so well entitled to them when we consider the population and the income derived from the places I have mentioned. I wish to ascertain why we did not receive the same favors at the hands of the Government that other towns and other villages with less population, with less income and with less revenue from the customs have received, I have no doubt that when the Government ascertain these facts they will at once proceed to construct public buildings in the places I have mentioned. It may be said that some of the places to which I refer are county towns, but I find that towns and villages other than county towns have had public buildings erected for their benefit. Ingersoll and Clinton, for instance, and Montague Bridge, are not county towns. Without wearying the House with a discussion on this subject, I ask the Government to consider this matter and to put me in possession of the reasons why the wants of the people have not been supplied, and to inform me how soon the claims of the people will be met. I fully agree that the Government, in building up this country, ought to give public buildings to places entitled to them by reason of their population and the revenue they contribute to the public funds. I hope and trust that the Government will take this matter into consideration and give us public buildings at the places I have mentioned.

Mr. COOK. I notice by the Estimates this year that no appropriation is made for the post office in the town of Orillia. Some years ago, when the "Jamaica" car was travelling through the country, carrying the gentlemen who are sitting on the Treasury benches to-day—

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Where is Orillia?

Mr. COOK. You will find out before I get through. You will make the discovery if you do not understand the geography of the country any better. But, of course, we understand that you are a lower Province man, and if you pay a little attention you will learn that Orillia is a town of 6,000 inhabitants which sends an intelligent representative to Parliament. You ought to know something about it. When the hon. the First Minister had the honor of visiting that town—and I consider it an honor—he took the opportunity of visiting its public buildings. The post office there is owned by a private gentleman. The Premier was kind enough to state that it was not sufficiently large for the town, that the town had to lease such accommodation, that it was necessary they should have a Government building for themselves, and that he would look into the matter, and would attend to the constructing of a post office building at that point. This was just before the election; it was an ante-election pledge. After the election the hon. gentleman forgot all about his promise, and the town council of Orillia, last year, passed a resolution appointing a deputation to visit the Government for the purpose of ascertaining whether they would not carry out their promise and put a sum in the Estimates for a post office. The gentleman appointed was my political opponent, Mr. Quinn. The council paid his expenses to come here to see whether the Government would accede to the request of the town. On his return he stated that he had the promise of the Government that the building should be constructed, and that a sum should be put in the Estimates for that purpose. But, up to this time, we have seen no indication of any intention on the part of the Government to carry out the pledge made by the Premier to the town in the first place, and afterwards by the Minister of

Mr. BURDETT.

Public Works to the deputation that waited upon him. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works particularly to this matter, because I believe he is a pretty fair man (although in mighty bad company), and wishes to do what is right, and would not intentionally deceive the gentleman who waited upon him. I wish to call his attention to the fact that that gentleman went back and stated to the town council in session that the Minister had absolutely promised that a sum of money should be put in the Estimates for the purpose of constructing that post office. That pledge, if made, has not been carried out, and I am anxious that my hon. friend should give me the reason. Orillia is a beautiful town of about 6,000 inhabitants, is splendidly lighted by electricity, and has waterworks and all the modern conveniences of a town of 20,000 inhabitants. That town deserves a public building. The Local Government have established some buildings in the neighborhood; they have an asylum for idiots, the only one of the kind in the Dominion, and I regret to say that it had to be enlarged.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Somebody has escaped.

Mr. COOK. Yes, some Tories have escaped. But, with all seriousness, I think the Government should attend to this matter. I really think it is a reflection on the Government that a town of the size and intelligence of the beautiful town of Orillia should be without a public building for a post office, when they spend $8,000 or $10,000 in erecting a post office at Cayuga for 800 people. Now, I am sure that the Minister of Public Works will take this matter into his very serious consideration, and will not allow one of his political friends to be duped in this way. I have no doubt he made the pledge, because I do not think the gentleman who waited upon him would utter an untruth, and I trust that when the Supplementary Estimates come down they will show that the town of Orillia has not been overlooked.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad this matter has been brought up. In fact, I have myself a notice on the paper further down calculated to bring up the same discussion, but including buildings intended for the use of the Customs Department. It seems to be the proper thing in this discussion to point out how one's own locality is ill-treated in respect of the erection of these buildings, and I wish to say that there is a town in my own constituency very much better entitled to a post office than some which have been favored, and it has not one; I refer to the town of Ridgeway, a place of some thousands of population, I do not remember the exact figure, but, at all events, a much larger place than Cayuga or Amherstburg, and about the size of Stratroy, all of which have been favored. There is no doubt that if the Government enter upon a general system of erecting public buildings in small towns and villages, they ought to carry it out on the same lines everywhere, and erect public buildings in other places of equal importance to those which have them. I do not think much of the system myself; I do not think such small places as those that have been mentioned are entitled to public buildings; but when the Government have gone so far as to put a public building in a town like Cayuga, with only 800 population, they are stultifying themselves, and showing the reason that expenditure was incurred if they do not equally favor other places of equal size and importance. Now, I do not suppose that the Government are ready to admit that they erected that post office at Cayuga for the sole purpose of securing the election of Dr. Montague, especially since they did not succeed in securing his election; but they must either admit that or give similar favors to other towns. As my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Burdett) has pointed out, the construction of a post office in a town benefits the neighborhood, not only by the expenditure of the money which the building costs, but by giving the place a certain degree of importance, and inducing people to go there to live and do business; so that it is doing a distinct favor to a place to put a public building there, and this favor should be granted equally, or else the intention to use the money voted for public buildings as a bribery fund must be frankly and fully admitted. The Government have only two alternatives. They must continue to construct public buildings in insignificant towns, in ridings represented by supporters of theirs, or where they hope to get supporters, and neglect large and important towns in Reform constituencies. They may continue to do that and admit by such continuance the reason of their conduct, or they may carry out the plan that they have entered upon of establishing a public building in every town and village equal in size and importance to those which have been already so favored. They must do one thing or the other; and unless they give public buildings to all other places of equal importance, they will have to confess the corrupt intent they had when they built post offices in such places as Cayuga. Not only is Cayuga a small place, but the revenue derived from the post office there is insignificant, the population being £00 people, and the revenue $776.07. That is the revenue of a post office which has cost over $ 0,000. In the town of Amherstburg, another place that has been favored with public buildings, the post office revenue was $1,836. Amherstburg is a place of some notability, of course, but a place that has outlived its growth, that, as we would say in the west, has gone to seed, not increasing in population and wealth, and all sorts of business leaving it for the town of Windsor. Yet the Government have built this post office in the town of Amherstburg, for whatever purposes they had in their mind; I will not go further imputing motives than I have already gone. While these insignificant places have obtained post offices, the large and prosperous town of Bridgetown in my constituency, where last year there was a post office revenue of $3,465—a revenue twice as large as that of Amherstburg and five times that of Cayuga—has been left without any such convenience. It is a neighborhood, as shown by the postal revenue, through which a great deal of postal matter passes, and where a great deal of postal accommodation is required. When my own motion comes up, I intend to show also that it deserves and requires additional accommodation for the office of the collector of customs, and that the two offices might very well be combined in one building, as has been done at St. Thomas and other places, and I intend to urge upon the Government the necessity and the propriety of doing justice to that town. I shall reserve any reference to the customs revenue and the customs building until I reach my own motion.

Mr. LISTER. Three years ago I moved for a return showing the post offices constructed by the Government since Confederation, the cost of each post office, the benefits derived from it, and the expenditure. I found, on looking over that return, that, so far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, the Government have constructed post offices and other public buildings in the most insignificant portions of those Provinces. I find that in the town from which the hon. the Minister of Finance comes, a post office was constructed shortly before the elections, although the town has but 300 or 400 inhabitants; and you cannot go over the list of towns in the other Provinces, notably the Province of Ontario, and notably in the places where post offices and other public buildings have been constructed or where it is proposed to erect public buildings, without being forced to the conclusion that the Government, no matter how honest they may profess to be, are guided by the intention of buying, so far as they can, the constituencies in which those buildings were constructed. The hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Burdett), if he lived in the west, we would call a little fresh, because, knowing the Government as well as he does, he must know that he cannot get a post office in Deseronto, unless he turns round and supports the Government. He may console himself, however, with the fact that at the next election this side will have changed places with the other, and then we will have justice done to the town whose case the hon. gentleman has so ably put. There is Strathroy, an enterprising town of between 3,000 and 4,000 inhabitants. Previous to the last elections it was felt that Mr. Cameron ought to be defeated in that constituency, and the Government brought down, with lavish liberality, a vote for the construction of public buildings in the town of Strathroy; but I have yet to learn that that building has been constructed, or that the Government have even purchased the land on which to construct it. It seems that vote is intended to play Jack in the coming elections, as well as it did in the past. The same remark applies to West Middlesex (Mr. Roome). If the hon. member for that constituency can fool the people of West Middlesex in the way he has deceived them already, the electors of that county are more foolish than I give them credit for being. In Haldimand, which has so honorably returned its present member, which has resisted the blandishments of the Government, which has thrown back in their teeth the bribes they were offering to the people—the county in which, of all others, Tory money was spent with a lavish hand,—in that county we find, for the avowed purpose of purchasing the constituency, the Government erected a post office in the town of Cayuga. I do not object to that at all; if the people can get it, well and good; but it was built with the object of purchasing that constituency. When you come to consider the fact that the town has only 800 inhabitants, that its total revenue is but $776, and its total expenditure for postmasters and other expenses $490, leaving $200 net revenue, and when you consider the fact that the Government has expended $20,000 for the purpose of erecting a public building in that constituency, how can anyone believe that expenditure was not made for the purpose of bribing its independent electorate. Why was a post office promised to be built in Strathroy? Would the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Roome) be here today were it not for that post office? He would not, and he will not be here at the next election, although he is a very decent man. He will be defeated. Then we find in Goderich, forming part of a constituency that was gerrymandered by the Government, a constituency for which, in spite of their gerrymandering, Mr. Cameron was elected; but just before the last elections the Government said: We will give Goderich a post office, and that will fix the thing all right. The Government promised Goderich a post office; they put a vote in the Estimates for that purpose; but I have yet to learn that a single brick has been put in the building, or that the excavation has been made, or the land purchased. Evidently the Government are going to make that card play also at the next election, but I tell them, although I do not profess to be a prophet, that at the next election Mr. Porter will be defeated in spite of the post office. If the Government are honest, why do they not go on and build those post offices?

Mr. HESSON. We have them.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman has a post office, and several sons in the public service, and he is well provided for. They have all their noses in the public crib, and, no doubt, draw all they can. My hon. friend is a good Conservative for revenue purposes. If the Government is honest in these votes for public buildings, why does not the Minister of Public Works go on with them? Everybody says he is an honest man; he looks honest. He is a man who looks as if he had an easy conscience. He is a good, strong, well-preserved man, and I believe he wants to do whatever is right, but there are other influences at work that will not permit him to do what is right. There are other influences bearing on this which will not permit him to do what is right. If he wants to show the people that this is not a political election dodge, he ought to go to work and build these post offices. I suppose it is useless to talk very much about this matter, because it is evident what the intention of the Government is. There is no doubt a class of towns where these public buildings are necessary, where large revenues are collected from the customs house, the post office and other sources, and where these buildings ought to be erected, and where it would be true economy to erect them; and, if the Government would lay down the proposition that, so long as the revenue is sufficient to carry on these works, they would go on gradually and erect these public buildings in the places where they ought to be, fixing the limit of population or the limit of revenue which would entitle these places to have these buildings, they would do well; but, instead of that, it appears that the Government are absolutely regardless of these two important facts, and it seems that the only consideration they will take into account is as to whether the particular place which is to get a building will return a supporter of the Government by that means or not. You have given Strathroy a post office, and upon what principle? The total revenue was $4,970, and the population was 3,000 odd. You have given Goderich a public building, upon what principle? Its population was between 4,000 and 5,000, and its revenue about $5,000. If they are entitled to public buildings, how can you ignore the claims of Sarnia, with a population of nearly 7,000, and a post office revenue of $8,817, besides being one of the ports of the Dominion which returned the largest amount of revenue from customs; a point where the mails are made up for the North-West; a point for the exchange of mails; and yet the Government feel it is consistent with that sense of propriety which actuates those hon. gentlemen that they can give public buildings to the smaller places throughout the country and ignore the larger places from which the revenue is returned. They build post offices and erect other buildings in places where the receipts can barely pay the expenses of the office, not taking into account the interest on the investment. Let the Government do what is right. Better late than never. Let the Government say that no town shall have a public building in the shape of a post office or a custom house unless it has a population of 10,000 or 5,000, or unless its receipts are $10,000, $15,000, or $20,000; but let the Government stop this system, which is calculated, whether it is intended or not, to debauch the electorate of this country. It is in the interests of Canada and of the people of Canada that this system should be stopped. Let the whole matter be judged on its merits, and let the towns and cities whose revenue or whose population does not entitle them to these buildings be dealt with without reference to the gentlemen who happen to represent them. I do not charge the Government with not putting up these buildings because the places concerned are not represented by those who support them, but I say that the Government is open to that charge, because it is only on the verge of an election that we find these large amounts voted for such purposes. We find that promises are made to the people at that time which are not carried out and which never will be carried out. I hope my hon. friend will get his post office, but I object to the Government dangling it before the eyes of the electors until the next election. If he has any influence with the Government, he should work it up at once. Where the vote has been made, I think it is the duty of the Government to go on with the construction of the public building, and a rule should be laid down, where certain towns have a population or a revenue of a certain amount, that they should have public buildings, and that these public buildings should be erected so far as the public revenue will permit.

Mr. LISTER.

Mr. ROOME. The hon. gentleman has made assertions about Strathroy which are not true. He has stated that Strathroy has only 3,000 inhabitants. He knows that is not true. He knows that is false.

Mr. LISTER. I did not say so.

Mr. ROOME. The population of Strathroy is from 4,000 to 5,000. The hon. gentleman accused me of having been elected on the strength of the promise that that post office would be built. That is also false.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. ROOME. At the time I was selected as the candidate, there was no question of a post office being built. I succeeded in the election, but the hon. gentleman says I have no influence in the county.

Mr. LISTER. I did not say so.

Mr. ROOME. Perhaps I have no influence in the county. Unfortunately, I was unseated, and I went back for re-election, and I was re-elected by an increased majority; there was a majority for me outside of the town of Strathroy, and, therefore, the promise to build a post office in that town, if it had been made, could not have carried my election. I was first elected before anyone thought of a post office being built there, and I was elected, in the second place, by a majority outside of the town of Strathroy. A short time ago, when the question of a duty on coal oil came up, the hon. gentleman came out as a protectionist, because he knew that his chances of election were less than mine, and his majority has been coming down every year. I believe that my chances of re-election are as good if not better than his. He says that we are holding this over the voters in West Middlesex in view of another election. That is not so. I have had some difficulty in getting a suitable site for the post office. That difficulty has now been overcome, and I have no doubt that the Minister of Public Works will erect a building which will be an ornament to the beautiful little town which we have in West Middlesex. I advocated the building of that post office because I thought it was right. I think it is the duty of the Government to erect public buildings in all the towns, whether in Middlesex or elsewhere, where the sum paid by the people towards the support of the Government is sufficient to pay the interest on the money required to provide the public buildings. With reference to the town of Sarnia, I have no objection to the Government building a post office there. Probably, after the next general election, my hon. friend will have a supporter from that county who will push his claims for that town, and the present member will be left at home.

Mr. PORTER. I am not at all concerned to defend the policy of the Government in reference to the erection of public buildings in the Dominion of Canada; the gentlemen on the Government benches are well qualified to defend themselves from any attack made upon them in that respect. I only rise to correct a misstatement of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister). That gentleman was pleased to say that before the last election a post office was promised to the town of Goderich. I beg to assure that gentleman there was nothing of the sort. I can assure him that with reference to the erection of that building the gentlemen who asked for it and pressed the claims of that town upon the Government, were not personally concerned in it at all, they were not allied with my own party, and have never been at any time suspected of leaning towards the Conservative party; but they presented the claims of the town of Goderich so strongly and so forcibly before the Minister of Public Works, that he was obliged to admit that a public building in that town was necessary. When we know that the town of Goderich is a county town, beautifully situated on the shores of Lake Huron, containing customs offices and inland revenue offices, and when we know that the Government have no public building in that town in which to carry on that work, I think we need not be at all surprised, nor need to attribute unworthy or improper motives to the Government because they made an appropriation for a building in that town. The town of Goderich itself, as the hon. gentleman has stated, gives a revenue of over $5,000 a year; its population is nearly 5,000; it has not only a post office doing a very large business, but it is a distributing office, and I believe 14 offices are served from that town. So I think that it will be admitted at once that the Government have not at all overstepped the bounds of moderation or discretion in granting a post office to the town of Goderich. I have just another word to say. When the hon. gentleman talks of my re-election, he talks of something that he knows nothing about; and in taking that position and in making that announcement, he shows very clearly the nature of a character that the poet Moore once described—he is both “angur and bore.”

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I had very little sympathy with the accusation made on this side of the House, that the Government were erecting public buildings through the country purely for political reasons; but I am hardly convinced by the arguments of their supporters in defending them from such accusation. My hon. friend from Huron says that, after a statement was submitted to the Minister of Public Works showing the importance of the town of Goderich and the amount of receipts from the post office and customs, the Minister admitted that it was desirable that a public building should be erected in that town. I quite agree with him. I know the importance of the town, and I think that a town like Goderich or Strathroy, represented by my hon. friend for Middlesex, ought to have public buildings. But I believe that there should be some principle guiding the Government in the erection of public buildings throughout the country. I think the town of Woodstock, in the county which I have the honor to represent, is certainly entitled to consideration, if the statement be true that the Government, in the erection of public buildings, are guided by the amount of receipts that the people contribute to the Treasury. I desire to take this opportunity of pointing out to the Government that there is no other town in the Dominion of Canada which has a claim upon them for the erection of a public building equal to that of the town of Woodstock. I would also remark that if public buildings were only erected for political purposes it would be a waste of money to erect them in the county I represent, because it would make no difference to the people, politically, if the Government were to erect six public buildings in that county. Now, Sir, I do not complain of the Government having erected public buildings in the smaller towns referred to by other speakers, but I do claim that the town of Woodstock contributes a larger amount of revenue to the public Treasury than any of these towns that have been mentioned. Take, for instance, St. Catharines, Stratford, St. Thomas, and other places which have large and creditable public buildings; the town of Woodstock contributes a larger amount of revenue than any of these places. Now, Sir, if these places, on submitting their case to the Minister of Public Works, can convince him that they are entitled to some consideration, I think he cannot refuse the claims of Woodstock, when I point out to him the figures showing the importance of that town. The revenue from the post office in the town of Woodstock last year was $13,760, more than was received from Stratford, St. Catharines or St. Thomas. The total revenue received from customs at Woodstock last year was $66,000. I was pleased with the remarks of my hon. friend from Huron, when he said that the principle to be followed in the erection of public buildings should be the amount of revenue that would pay interest upon the money expended. In the case of Woodstock I can make a much stronger claim than that. The revenue for a single year would not only pay the interest, but it would more than pay the whole amount required for erecting the public buildings which are really necessary for the purposes of the Government in that town. I think it is certainly strange that a large and prosperous commercial and manufacturing town like Woodstock receives no consideration from the Government in regard to the erection of public buildings, and I take this opportunity of placing these facts before the House and the Government. I desire to know whether such a principle as has been referred to is followed by them in the erection of public buildings? If the revenues received from customs and post offices are the guide in this matter, then the members of this House and the country will be able to judge of the claims of Woodstock; and if, as in the case stated by the hon. member for Huron, the Government can be convinced by representations, then I think Woodstock stands some chance, because I see that the municipal council and the board of trade of that important manufacturing and commercial centre of western Ontario, have been taking the matter up, and intend to memorialise the Government and lay the figures before them.

Mr. HESSON. I am quite in accord with the tone of the remarks of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). I live in an adjoining municipality, and I know he has simply stated what is the absolute fact with respect to the growth of the town, and although it is true that it has not always been represented by a supporter of the Government, my hon. friend has made such appeal to the Minister and to the Government that it cannot be fairly overlooked in the event of the Government carrying out the policy, they some time ago adopted, of erecting public buildings in important and growing towns. With regard to the city I represent, it is true we have a public building there, and I think we obtained it none too soon. We have the very best evidence of that in the fact of the very extraordinary growth of the city, a growth not only in population and in wealth, but also in revenue. The hon. gentleman spoke of revenue not being properly the basis on which the Government undertook these works. Well, it may not be the whole basis; it may be possible that the influence of gentlemen surrounding them and the pressure brought to bear on them have some effect in many of the cases, but, nevertheless, so far as the revenue collected in Stratford is concerned, they have ample justification in the fact that the receipts have largely increased since the accommodation was afforded there. Something like $120,000 is collected in the Government building, which has been found to be of prime importance for the post office, for the post office inspector of the division, and for other public purposes. I can say for Woodstock, that I quite fall in with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, because he has made them, as he always makes them, in the most kindly, straightforward and impartial manner; but I cannot, I am sorry to say, speak in the same terms of the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), who spoke in the most unfriendly and unkind manner, and who most improperly and indecently dragged in extraneous matter which has nothing to do with the question before the House. I happened, as is my custom, to throw a little remark across the House and I happened to raise my head, and he thereupon referred to me as having two sons in the public service. I am not ashamed that I have two sons in the public service earning honestly their pay; they are a credit to me and perform useful service to the Government. I am satisfied that the officers who report upon their duties are able to report well in regard to them, and they are very inefficiently paid for the services they render. But the hon. gentleman is very uncourteous and very uncouth in making such a remark, and it is simply on a piece with the hon. gentleman's usual character in this House. He attacks the Government and makes insinuations regarding their motives such as should not be uttered by honest and respectable men. I dare say that he knows what the action of his party will be if they attain seats on this side of the House; indeed, I understood him to say that they would know how to manage these things when they came into power. The hon. gentleman is probably the last who should rise in this House and pose as one of the purest and most conscientious of men, because we have not forgotten the position he took in a matter in which he was interested, when the question of the duty on oil was under consideration. He then found it necessary to make a strong speech against the policy of his own party, and take a position which accorded with his own selfish interests and his own selfish views.

Mr. LISTER I did nothing of the kind.

Mr. HESSON. If the hon. gentleman were courteous to the members of the Government, and members of the House, he would succeed, not only in obtaining as much fair play as other hon. gentlemen, but in securing the respect and kindly feeling of all hon. members as well. I do not wish that hon. gentleman to suppose for one moment that I would be ungenerous enough to say that his town was not entitled to a post office. I have another, and a very large and prosperous town in my own county, for which the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) made a claim some little time ago, that is, the town of Listowel. I feel that towns of that size and prosperity should be recognised in this progressive day. If the Government have money at their disposal, they should, in all cases where the public interests demand, erect public buildings; but the hon. gentleman will not accomplish much for his county while he is so uncourteous to the Government, and hurls most uncourteous remarks against members on this side of the House and leaders of the Government. That is not the way he is going to succeed; at all events, he will not get the support of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to aid him in accomplishing what he wants in that direction. On the other hand, the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) spoke in such a kind and sympathetic way as to entitle him to the full confidence of the House, and in pressing his request, he did so, not in an unkind manner, but rather as a matter of fair play on the part of the Government, and he hoped that they would consider these questions outside of political influences. That hon. gentleman had the decency to put the matter in that way, but the member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) took just the other course, and brought forward all sorts of illustrations, and imputed all sorts of reasons for the Government's action.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says he has two sons in the public service and he is not ashamed of them, in fact he is proud of them, and he says they are discharging their duties well in the public interest and are doing essentially a public service. If the hon. gentleman entertains that feeling with respect to the matter, I do not see why he should be so indignant with the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) for mentioning it. Why, if the hon. gentleman's mention of the matter of these two sons being in the public service was a discourteous and unfriendly and an offensive act, surely the hon. gentleman's real feeling with regard to the matter could hardly be what he has expressed. Why, many of us would never have known the fact.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman imported it into the debate.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) The hon. gentleman himself imported it into the debate.

Mr. HESSON.

Mr. HESSON. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman rather offensively interrupted my hon. friend when he was speaking, and my hon. friend answered that interruption. Now, the hon. gentleman who has told us he has two sons in the public service, declares it was offensive on the part of my hon. friend to give him an opportunity of mentioning this fact for the gratification of the House. Except for this opportunity offered to the hon. gentleman to inform the House in regard to this matter, many of us might have remained ignorant in regard to it. We might never have known what important services these young gentlemen perform in the interest of the country, and how much obligation we are under to him and them for their services, if the hon. gentleman had not given the House the information he has furnished. That being the case, I do not think the hon. gentleman has anything of which to complain. On the contrary, he should be highly pleased with the opportunity my hon. friend gave him to make the statement. I do not take altogether the view of this public building matter which has been expressed by the hon. gentleman. I say the conduct of the Government has been so uniformly one way, there has been such an absence of all exceptions from that uniform action of the Government, as to leave no doubt in the minds of hon. members as to the policy they pursue and the motives which have led to that policy. We were informed by the Minister of Customs, last year, that the Government were building post offices and erecting other buildings with a view to strengthening the hands of their friends in constituencies that return members to support them. That was the declaration made by the Minister of Customs last year, and the hon. gentleman undertook to justify it by stating that it was the universal practice of every Government. I think that was a mistake, and I do not think there was any foundation for that statement. I think, when we look at what was done by the predecessors of the Government in office, we will find that no such rule was adopted, but that the rule which my hon. friends on the other side have said, to-day, would be a good rule, was followed—that of erecting public buildings in the larger centres of the population when the revenue derived from the post office or other sources justified such an expenditure. That was the rule which was adopted and invariably pursued by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), when he was at the head of public affairs in this country. When we look at the expenditure of public moneys on these different public buildings, we will see that there is no regard paid to any such rule by the present Administration. We find the Minister of Public Works engaged in the erection of public buildings in places where the revenue will not pay the interest upon the cost of the work. There are numerous instances of that sort which were considered here last year, and one case where, I think, if I remember rightly, in the constituency of the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster) important public buildings were erected in a place where the revenue was less than $500 and where the population was less than 1,000. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), who has spoke on that side, and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Porter), have said that it was right and proper that the Government should be informed with regard to these matters. Does any one for a moment suppose that the Minister of Public Works or any of his colleagues are ignorant with regard to the population of the town of Woodstock, of the amount of revenue derived from the post office of that town, or of the amount of moneys that are being collected in the form of excise and customs duties in that town? Does any one suppose that any member of the Government does not know what has been the revenue from Ingersoll and from Wallaceburg and other places in the western portion of this Province. Is it necessary that a deputation should come from those localities to wait upon the Minister to give him that information which he can find in the blue-books of the department over which he presides, or in the blue-books of the departments of his colleagues. There can be no doubt with regard to the matter. The hon. gentleman is not ignorant, for if he were he would be totally unfit to occupy the position which he holds. But he prostitutes the public position which he holds to the promotion of the interests of his party. The proper rule to adopt is to look at the population and then to look at the revenues derived from the place, and see whether the revenues warranted such an expenditure, before the public buildings are erected. The rule should be uniform. This House itself should lay down the rule by which the action of the Government shall be regulated and by which that action should be restrained, but, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows right well that we have expenditure of public moneys in cases which are notoriously insignificant, and we have important places where those public buildings are really requisite, left without them. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Roome) stated to the House that the question of a post office at Strathroy was not discussed at the last general election, and, if I understood him rightly, that it was not discussed even at the bye-election held since. Surely the hon. gentleman cannot have visited Strathroy, and he cannot have known what was said and done there. Does the hon. gentleman not know that at the last general election at the town of Strathroy the question of the post office was discussed, and does he not know that a majority of something like fifty was changed into a minority for the Opposition candidate, in consequence of the promise and expectation of a post office being erected there. If he does not know that, I will venture to say that he is almost the only elector in that constituency who has not such information. The hon. gentleman says he was not elected by the vote in Strathroy, but, Sir, he was preserved from defeat by Strathroy. The hon. gentleman knows that if the vote of Strathroy had been at the last election what it was in the election in which he was defeated he would not have been here. The hon. gentleman knows that in the election before the last that he had a majority outside of Strathroy, but he was defeated because the town of Strathroy went against him. Now the town of Strathroy went in his favor, and what worked this revolution? Was it the National Policy, which had been discussed over and over again for years and years, or was it that the hon. gentleman had become a citizen of Strathroy, for he still resides at Newbury?

Mr. LISTER. He promised to become a citizen.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think that promise exercised very much influence, because, although some parties would be anxious to secure so popular a gentleman as the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Roome) in Strathroy, after all, I do not think it governed their political action very much. The promise of the post office was a wholly different thing; it converted a majority of Reform votes into a majority of supporters of my hon. friend, and he is here to-day in consequence of these great expectations that were excited. How long that may be kept alive by the promise of the post office, I cannot say. I know there was a great deal of difficulty about the site, and that not all the supporters of the Government quite agreed as to where that post office should be erected. The hon. gentleman has told us that he (not the Minister), but "he" had a good deal of difficulty in determining where the post office should be located. I suppose he has determined that now. I suppose the Minister of Public Works has delegated to him that important duty, and that he accepts the conclusion at which my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Roome) has arrived. All this goes to show how much the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are abusing their public position. Those gentlemen are the trustees of the public at large, the moneys which they control are the moneys of the people; they are not the moneys of the Conservative party; they are not the moneys of the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches. No. These gentlemen are trustees for the public, and they do not discharge that trust properly when they undertake to punish a part of the public for returning members who are not supporters of the Administration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We never do that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says they never do that, but the Minister of Customs, last year, said they did.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You misunderstood him.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not misunderstand him at all, and if the right hon. gentleman has any doubt about the accuracy of my statement, I shall send to the library for Hansard and read the statement made by his colleague. How is it there is no post office in the town of Woodstock? How is it there is none in the town of Ingersoll?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a good time coming.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How is it there is nothing done in the town of Peterboro'? How is it that there has been nothing done in the town of Sarnia? How is it that there has been nothing done in the town of Wallaceburg? There are other places which I might name, but I need not go over the whole list, because if I did I might as well send for the directory. I only mention those places which have during the past ten years returned opponents of the Administration. There is not a place which has returned a supporter of the Administration, unless it has an overwhelming majority of Government supporters, that has not had a public building erected out of the public moneys of Canada.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Perth, Smith's Falls, Carleton Place.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is the hon. gentleman complaining?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). No, I am just mentioning those places which have not post offices.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, the hon. gentleman knows that is a county which you could not drive away from the support of the Administration. I said, any place of which there was any doubt. Why, Sir, there could be no doubt as to those places; the hon. gentleman could not be here if there was any doubt. Then, I might name the county of Carleton as a constituency devoted to the hon. Prime Minister. But look at any one of those constituencies which have returned opponents of the Administration. Has the hon. gentleman laid down a rule that when the postal or customs revenue exceeds a certain amount, he shall erect a public building there? No, Sir, there has been no such rule to direct his conduct, and the Administration have taken possession of the public treasury, and have used the public moneys to promote their party interests. I say there has been a gross abuse of the powers the hon. gentlemen possessed. They have had committed to them an important public trust, and they have violated that trust in every particular. They have disregarded the public interest, and have looked solely to the interest of their party; and it is because they have done that, that we find a large portion of the public money used in the erection of buildings which are altogether unnecessary, and the erection of which has not been justified by the public necessities or by the amount of revenue collected.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I wish to say a few words before this motion is carried. I find in the last annual report of the Minister of Public Works an item of $53.75 for repairs to the post office at Lunenburg last year, and I rather think that it must be a mistake, because the hon. Minister well knows that there is no post office there. A site was purchased there two years ago, but no public building was erected upon it, and it is still lying idle, and is really of considerable disadvantage to the town. If the Government had not purchased that site, it probably would be very soon now offered for public sale, because its owner has since died, and there would be competition for its purchase. It is in the centre of the town, and stores or other buildings would be erected upon it if the lots could be obtained by persons desiring them; but it is lying idle and paying no taxes. Now, I think the Government have admitted the necessity of a public building in the town of Lunenburg by purchasing a site, and therefore I think it is quite unnecessary for me to say anything to show the importance of the place or the necessity of such a building. Whether the Government purchased the site only for political purposes, as some of my friends on this side of the House say was their object, I do not know. If they did, their action did not take very well; and if they are now punishing the people of Lunenburg for not returning their man, that will not take either. The people of Lunenburg are not made of that kind of stuff. But, apart from that, I wish to urge the necessity of this building being erected. The customs business, the postal business, and other public business is being attended to in Lunenburg in private buildings; but the Government must be thoroughly convinced of the great progress and increase of business that have taken place in that town, and I would therefore urge that they make provision for this building in the Supplementary Estimates which have yet to be brought down.

Mr. SPROULE. I think, whatever the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) gets credit for, it cannot reasonably be for his constituency. The first portion of his speech was taken up with abuse of the Government for putting up public buildings in constituencies where some influence might be exercised over the electors to induce them to return Government supporters to this House; another portion was taken up in the endeavor to prove that buildings were put up only in constituencies which returned supporters of the Government; and in the last portion the hon. gentleman was blaming the Government for not erecting buildings in constituencies represented by opponents. If the first part of his speech is right, the last part is wrong. If the Government are to be condemned for putting up buildings in constituencies which had not hitherto returned supporters, why condemn them for putting up buildings in constituencies which had sent supporters? The hon. gentleman asks, can you name a town which returned a supporter of the Government where these public buildings have not been put up? I can name the town of Owen Sound, the town of Meaford in East Grey, and the town of Collingwood.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Who represented Owen Sound in the last Parliament?

Mr. SPROULE. It was represented by a supporter of the Government.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; Mr. Allan was not a supporter of the Government.

Mr. SPROULE. An opponent of the Government. Well, if the intention of the Government, in erecting buildings, has been to induce the electors to change their views and vote for the Government, you would naturally expect to find the Government building a post office there; but they did not do so, although that is a town which to-day has over 8,000 population. Then, I may take the town of Collingwood, and the same argument would apply with equal force there. But I think the hon. gentleman is wrong. It is not the size of the town or its population which determines the erection of a building, but whether the Government have suitable provision for carrying on the business in that town, without too great an expense to the country. In some of those towns there are private buildings available at low rents, and that makes it possible for the Government to use those buildings and not incur the expense of erecting new buildings for the purpose. But in other towns where leased buildings are not available, and where the insecurity is such that other buildings are necessary, then the Government are compelled to incur these expenses. I think that is one of the principles which govern them in erecting these buildings. But I arose more particularly to draw the attention of the House to the fact that if the arguments in the first part of the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell were correct, the arguments in the last part were wrong, and if the arguments in the last part were correct, then the arguments in the first part were wrong, because the two parts are diametrically opposed to each other, and cannot be reconciled by any fair principle of reasoning.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to draw the attention of the House to a place where the receipts of the post office were only $1,269.76. That place is St. Jérôme, in Terrebonne, the constituency of the hon. the Secretary of State. Now, I suppose there is no place in this Dominion where there is less reason for erecting a public building, but simply because the Secretary of State wanted to do a kindness to his own constituency, he secured the ear of the Minister of Public Works, and the erection of a post office was proceeded with in that village, where there was nothing at all to warrant the expenditure of money for that purpose. The Government were only paying an annual rent of $60 for the use of a building. The salary of the postmaster was $480; and yet in a miserable, insignificant place such as that, simply because it is in the constituency of the Secretary of State, the Government have granted money to construct a post office which will cost the country $20,000; and this despite the fact that there are over 100 places throughout the Dominion with more than double the receipts which have no post offices. I must say I am rather surprised that hon. gentlemen who support the Government are willing to swallow such doses as this, and which was nothing but a barefaced political job. I quite agree with the remarks that have fallen from a number of hon. gentlemen with regard to the necessity of laying down a rule by which the erection of public buildings in the different trade centres throughout the Dominion should be followed. My impression is that once a place grows to the extent of having a population of 4,000 or 5,000 or 3,000 and an annual revenue exceeding a fixed sum, the Government should be called upon and be by law obliged to erect a public building for the purposes of a post office in that place, but so long as the Government are permitted to act as they have acted in the past, so long will their course be dictated by political patronage, without regard to the wants and the means of the constituencies. I am rather surprised that the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule) should have sat quietly in his seat when this motion for the erection of a post office in St. Jérôme was proposed, in view of the fact that in his constituency there are two enterprising towns, the towns of Meaford and Collingwood, each with a postal revenue of $6,000 or $7,000 a year, which have no such public buildings. I am surprised that while these towns were passed over, he should have sanctioned, without protest, the expenditure of money for a post office in the small village of St. Jérôme. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) made some remarks with regard to my mentioning the town of Listowel. Well, that is a very prosperous trade centre. The post office receipts there last year were nearly $4,000, and I cannot understand why my hon. friend should have silently sanctioned a grant for the building of a post office in St. Jérôme, with its miserable annual receipts of $1,269, when he knew there was a town in his own riding with annual receipts of $4,000, which was better entitled to a post office. Hon. gentlemen opposite are evidently quite prepared to keep their mouths forever closed at the bidding of their leaders, but when they can present an argument likely to answer a political purpose they are all ready to speak.

Mr. SPROULE. So far as my knowledge goes, the inferences that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) draws from the fact that I sat quietly in my seat are entirely wrong. I have taken some little trouble to look into the matter, and the conclusion I come to is this: Good, suitable buildings were available in all these places at a small cost. The rent paid for them would not meet the interest on the outlay which would have to be incurred in erecting buildings. Therefore I thought the Government acted wisely in using these buildings, when they could get suitable ones without any trouble, and for a smaller rental than the interest would come to on the cost of erecting new post offices and custom houses.

Mr. WATSON. I have no doubt the hon. the Minister of Public Works is making notes of all the custom houses and post offices that are required throughout the Dominion, and the chances are that in a short time all towns with fair receipts from post offices will be provided with suitable and handsome buildings. I happen to have a town of considerable importance in my constituency, the town of Portage la Prairie, the people of which have applied to the Government for a post office, and have offered a free site on which to erect it. Portage la Prairie has a revenue exceeded by few towns in Ontario, the receipts being something in the neighborhood of $5,000. It is the terminus of the Manitoba and North-West Railway, and a building erected there for the purposes of a custom house and post office would be a very great convenience. At present the custom house is situated in one end of the freight shed of the Canadian Pacific Railway, at a considerable distance from the post office, which occasions considerable inconvenience to people who receive parcels from the United States through the customs. I would urge upon the hon. the Minister of Public Works to make a note of that particular town, and when he has a little surplus, supply us with the building of which we are greatly in need.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am very much pleased that hon. gentlemen opposite have given the Government, and myself in particular, so much valuable information about the different towns in their respective counties. I will certainly treasure up this information, and I hope some day to be in a position to do the needful. But hon. gentlemen know perfectly well that everything cannot be done in a day. London was not built in a day, and all these public buildings cannot be erected in one day or year. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook) drew my special attention to the town of Orillia, and stated that a deputation from that town had visited me and that I had received it very well. That is perfectly true, and also that I had promised to submit the matter to my colleagues in order that the item might be put in the Estimates. Well, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to pay me some compliments for which I am very thankful; but, on the other hand, I must say that I fulfilled my promise to the letter. I laid the matter before my colleagues, as I do every year, all the requisitions for public buildings or other works. All these matters were submitted to the Council, including the petition of the town of Orillia; but I am sorry to say that when the Estimates came before the Council a great many items were not to be found, and the grant to Orillia was one of the missing. So far as I am concerned, I did what I could, but I am responsible with my colleagues for the circumstance that Orillia did not come out. I hope that something more will be done some day to meet the wishes of hon. gentlemen all round. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) was kind enough to allude to the different items put in the Estimates during the last two years for public buildings, and he expressed the wish that we should go on with these buildings, but he was not sure that his wish would be fulfilled. The intention of the Government is to expend such a portion of the votes passed by Parliament as may be required as we go on year after year, but sometimes we may find that the revenues of the country are not so abundant as to warrant the expenditure of these sums, and therefore we delay somewhat the expenditure of that money. Nevertheless, my intention, with the consent of my colleagues, is that we should proceed with the erection of these buildings as fast as possible. Hon. gentlemen have spoken of different buildings in different towns, and have stated that some of these towns had a larger population, or a larger revenue from the post office, than others where buildings had been erected. That is perfectly possible, and I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen gave proper figures; but they must see that we have not only to look to the revenue from post office or from customs, or to the population of a town, but that we have also to see whether a town, though there may not yet be a public building erected there, has sufficient accommodation which may be used for a year or two, or three, or four, or five years more, because that accommodation is sufficient for the time being. I admit that in some cases it is not so, and I have no doubt that, the attention of the Government having been called to a number of these towns by hon. members on both sides of the House, these cases will be considered by the Government and will not fail to receive their best decision. On the other hand, there are some cases where contracts have been made with the postmaster, and sometimes he has erected a building of his own for which we pay rent. It would be very cruel to him to destroy the prospects which he had in view when he erected the building. However, hon. gentlemen may be assured that all these matters will not be lost sight of. There may be rules to be followed, but it is very difficult to say that if you have a population of so much or a revenue of so much, you must have a public building. Hon. gentlemen will see that in many cases that rule would not work properly in the interests of the Dominion. I will not review all the remarks of hon. gentlemen, but I will ask the mover of this motion to amend it by substituting for the words 31st December, 1878, the words 1st July, 1874. With that amendment, I have no objection to the adoption of the motion.

Mr. TROW. I have been somewhat encouraged by the statements of the hon. the Minister of Public Works. It was not my intention to rise on this occasion, but the encouragement I have received from the statement of the Minister, that he will take all these applications into consideration and will erect these buildings in different places, leaves me no excuse to give a silent vote. There is evidently a system of log-rolling adopted in this matter by members on both sides of the House. My extreme modesty has kept me back from asking any special favors from any Government, even when the Mackenzie Government was in power, and no hon. gentleman on the other side or on this side can say that I ever asked for any special favor. However, there is a little town in my riding which is called St. Mary's. It is beautifully located. The Minister of Agriculture knows the situation well. The material for the construction of public buildings there is unsurpassed. We are prepared to give a magnificent site, and furnish the stone, and do all we can in order to have a post office in that town. I think we are entitled to it. Our revenue from the post office is on the verge of $5,000, but this matter has never been brought to the attention of the Government or talked of. I have not brought it up myself before, but I hope the Minister, after the con-session he has made, will not forget the important town of St. Mary's.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Perhaps the Minister will have the returns from Confederation. That would be valuable, from a historical point of view.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have no objection to make the date the 1st July, 1867.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

NORTH-WEST REBELLION—9TH BATTALION.

Mr. AMYOT. I beg the indulgence of the House for the remarks I may make in introducing the motion of which I have given notice. My object is to put before the House and the country the full history of the events which took place in the campaign in the North-West, concerning more particularly the west wing of the army, comprising the 9th Battalion, the 65th, and one regiment from Winnipeg. I want the official documents to be laid before the public, so that everybody will have his just share, either of praise or of blame. It has been asserted that the services of the 9th Battalion were not asked, and that I alone had offered his services to go to the North-West. Under ordinary circumstances I could see no harm on the part of a soldier, or an officer, offering his services to his country, but in the peculiar circumstances under which the rebellion broke out, I think it was not to be presumed, it would be almost extraordinary if I had offered my services to go and fight in the North-West. Well, I have with me a document, of which I am sure the Government somewhere have a copy, which proves that I did not offer my services. I could not refuse to go, being a soldier, and war having begun, I could not refuse my services. I could have remained here in the House, entrenching myself behind my parliamentary privileges; but that course would not have been worthy of the position I occupy in the battalion. You remember, Mr. Speaker, the excitement that prevailed all over the country on receiving the news from the North-West, the massacre of white men there, and the great fear that prevailed of a general destruction of our fellow-countrymen in the North-West. Then my officers assembled at Quebec and wired to me in the following terms :

"To Col. AMYOT.

"Officers of the 9th assembled here, request me to enquire from you if there is any probability of being called out.

"T. ROY,

"Lt.-Col. Commanding."

Well, I crossed the floor and showed the telegram to the Minister of Militia. He then told me that he wanted some French battalions to join the army, as he desired to prove that our French nationality, forming a part of the Dominion of Canada, was to be found, in the moment of danger, beside the rest of the population; he wanted to prove that the French element were as loyal and patriotic as the rest of the Canadian people, and he told me that it was most probable that he would call upon us, and that we should keep ourselves ready. I immediately wired to my senior major, Lt.-Col. Roy :

"To Lt.-Col. T. ROY.

"Probably called out. Do you prefer called now, to be in readiness, or only on the eve of starting?"

"G. AMYOT."

Then, the next day I left Ottawa, having received orders to go to the front, and, arriving at Quebec, I ascertained a fact to which I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia. I found that the battalion had none of the equipments which were necessary in order to go to the front—no boots, no stockings, no camp kettles, in fact, none of those things necessary for a soldier. I must say that the department, in view of the absence of these requisites, did its very best to secure them. Telegrams were exchanged between Col. Panet, Col. Roy and myself. The following telegram was sent :

"OTTAWA, 31st March, 1885.

"To Lt.-Col. THOS. ROY.

"Yes, purchase boots for battalion at $2 50. Have accounts sent to me.

"C. E. PANET."

Then, on the same day to myself :

"OTTAWA, 1st April, 1885.

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT.

"Purchase boots for battalion at $2.50. Credit sent to-day to Lampson to pay them, and also pay of battalion for one week in advance. Get your pay-sheets ready.

"C. E. PANET."

I may say at once that Mr. Panet is the Deputy Minister of Militia who, during the whole campaign, had done his utmost to assist the force. His activity was indefatigable. He is an old and experienced officer, and a great credit to the Canadian Militia. Then the following telegrams were exchanged :

"OTTAWA, 1st April, 1885.

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT, Quebec,

"Orders have been sent to Duchesnay to give you all you want. If anything more wanted apply through him and notify me if any delay.

"C. E. PANET."

"OTTAWA, 1st April, 1885.

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT,

"Have telegraphed to buy your boots. Duchesnay has been directed to see that you get articles required.

"C. E. PANET."

"OTTAWA, 1st April, 1885.

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT, Quebec.

"Let me know when you will be ready to start. I am anxious that you should be ahead of Montreal regiment. Answer.

"A. P. CARON."

"OTTAWA, 2nd April, 1885.

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT,

"Do not delay for supplies. Whatever is deficient will be forwarded to you.

"A. P. CARON."

You must remember, Mr. Speaker, that we had been ordered out, I think, on the 31st March, and this was the 2nd April. Then :

"OTTAWA, 2nd April, 1885.

"To Col. AMYOT,

"Revolvers are not furnished by Government. You should hurry to leave. Trains are all right.

"A. P. CARON."

"OTTAWA, 2nd April, 1885.

"To Col. AMYOT, Quebec.

Delois going with you as Surgeon, he is authorized to purchase what is required to fill medicine chest. Instruments will be forwarded from here. I am anxious that you should show how rapidly a Quebec regiment can move. Hurry up.

"A. P. CARON."

Then we left on the 2nd April, having been ordered out on the 31st March.

"OTTAWA, 3rd April, 1885.

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT,

On coming train, Calumet. Will have trousers and everything you asked for ready at station for you.

"C. E. PANET."

Mr. Speaker, here is : first, the proof that we did not offer our services, but that we were called out, and we did not refuse them; secondly, it appears by these telegrams, that the troops were not yet provided with the necessary outfit, and I think that the Minister of Militia will benefit by that experience, and will see that for the future the troops are provided with what they need when they start for the front. The medicine chest we could only obtain when at Calgary. We managed, though, to procure here and there what we needed, but that is not the way that things should be managed in the regular service. I do not attach any blame to the Minister for that; he followed the custom prevailing for many years in Canada. But we should benefit by the experience, and in case of emergency, the troops should not be found in such a state again. On the 3rd of April, I received a telegram from the Minister of Militia, in the following terms. It was in French, and I translate it:

"I congratulate you upon the quickness with which you and your battalion have answered to the call, and prepared your departure for the North-West.

"A. P. CARON."

Then on the 9th of April I received another telegram from the Deputy Minister of Militia, in the following terms:

"OTTAWA, 9th April, 1885.

"Lt.-Col. AMYOT,

"Minister and I am glad to hear you have done so well. News from west better. General telegraphs everything going on well.

"C. E. PANET."

I will not speak here of the journey from Ottawa, I may say from Carleton Place, to Winnipeg; at least I will not go into details, but I think I may affirm that every man of the battalion proved himself most worthy of his corps, and endured all the hardships and miseries with the greatest patience, and proved himself an honor to the force. When we arrived at Calgary I received the following telegram:—

"WINNIPEG, 12th April, 1885.

"Colonel AMYOT,

On special.

The General orders all troops to remain here awaiting orders. You will go into camp.

"W. H. JACKSON, Lt.-Col."

I immediately answered by telegram:

"Telegram received. We are proceeding."

On arriving at Winnipeg, we went into camp. I must say that the location selected was not an exceedingly good one; on the contrary, it was in a swamp, and my soldiers literally had to sleep in the water.

RETURN ORDERED.

Return showing the cost of the barn built at the Experimental Farm, Ottawa; whether any other buildings have been put up; if any, at what cost; the number of residences built at the Ottawa Experimental Farm, and the cost of each.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ALBERTA RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Shanly.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 16,

Mr. TROW. I think there should be running powers over this line given to other companies. This company, under this Bill, will have a monopoly of the whole coal business of the country, and for coal which costs them about $1 per ton at the mine, they charge, when laid down in Calgary, $3 per ton, while it could not have cost the company $3. I repeat that other companies should have running powers over the line, and that we should not allow this great monopoly to make such exorbitant charges to the people of the country who require the coal. I should like to have some explanation on this point, and should like to hear from the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill, whether he is prepared to allow some amendment to be incorporated in the Bill, by which other railway companies would have running powers over the line, in order to prevent those exorbitant charges to be made for coal, which is absolutely necessary to the people there, as there is no timber available.

Mr. SHANLY. I never heard any accusation of extravagant charges being made by the company. The line belongs to this coal mining company, and they will be simply running over their own line. They do not connect with Calgary by their own line, at all events.

Mr. TROW. You are obtaining a connection with Montana, and you want to unite with the Canadian Pacific at Dunmore.

Mr. SHANLY. We are asking power to go to the frontier in order to secure the southern market.

Mr. TROW. Is it reasonable that coal produced at the mouth of the mine, and costing there probably something less than $1 a ton, should be charged $3.50 per ton after it has been carried a few miles to Calgary?

Mr. SHANLY. It is 200 miles to Calgary, not a few miles from the mine, and I believe the coal costs a good deal more than $1 at the mine's mouth. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken when he states—wherever he got his information he certainly got it incorrectly—that it costs only $1 a ton at the mouth of the mine.

Mr. TROW. No matter what it costs, the company carry similar coal 700 miles to Winnipeg and sell it at the same price as when they carry it 200 miles. They have a monopoly of the whole coal business of that country.

Mr. SHANLY. An hon. gentleman who knows the North-West well informs me that it is 300 miles from Dunmore to Calgary. So that it is nearly 500 miles from the mine to Calgary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perhaps the hon. gentleman would consent to amend the Bill by providing that the charges should not be more than a fixed maximum price per ton per mile.

Mr. SHANLY. The Government have the power to fix those charges. An application could be made to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to fix rates. If the tariff was extravagant the appeal would lie.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The tariff is to be fixed by the Governor in Council. I understand that the line is to be operated by the company which owns the mines. If that be the case, there is no reason why a foreign company should have the right to run over the railway. These matters are all regulated by the provisions of the Railway Act, which enables us to regulate the tariff of rates.

Mr. BARRON. I think to compel people to go to the Government for relief against overcharges is not a satisfactory remedy.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is not the position exactly; they have no right to enforce a tariff, or to reform one, without coming to the Railway Committee first.

Mr. BARRON. If the Railway Committee settle the charges, all I can say is that in the neighborhood in which I live they must fix very high charges, because there is great complaint in my part of the country that the railways charge excessive amounts to individuals. Those individuals, one by one, cannot complain to the Government. It is too much trouble and too much expense on any one person, and I think that there should be some special clause in this Act providing against a monopoly such as my hon. friend behind me seems to think exists.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I have had an opportunity of visiting the coal mines of the Alberta Coal Mining Company, and of passing over the railway they have built from Dunmore to Lethbridge. Any gentleman who has visited that locality and has given attention to the large amount of money that that company has expended in the construction of that road, which runs through a country that is almost totally uninhabited, and which has no trade except what is derived from the carriage of coal, any one who looks at the large amount of capital that has been expended in developing the coal mines at Lethbridge, and who has knowledge of all the circumstances in connection with the opening of those coal mines and the difficulties the gentlemen engaged in that enterprise have had to encounter, would not deny them the privilege of obtaining a larger market such as they are likely to get under the operation of this Bill now before the committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And of the desirability of extending our business relations with the United States.

Mr. SHANLY. Quite true.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Quite true.

Mr. SHANLY. I would say that the great effect of this road has been to destroy the coal monopoly in Winnipeg and all along the line. It has not only done that, but it has gone a long way towards solving the problem of settling the North-West. It supplies fuel all along the Canadian Pacific Railway, and is held, and properly held by the settlers in the North-West, to be the greatest boon that could be possibly conferred upon them. We should remember that this boon is conferred upon the people there by gentlemen who found their own capital, who asked no assistance whatever from us, and who are doing their own work.

Mr. EDGAR. When this Bill came before the Railway Committee I thought it was the best solution for the evils existing in the North-West when the monopoly clauses were in force there. This railway is one of the first fruits of the removal of the monopoly clauses, and of allowing the North-West to make connection with the other side of the line. In that respect I think it is a great boon to the country and that it will enable the people of that whole section to have the closest commercial relations that the law will allow with the United States. I congratulate the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that they have so warmly supported this measure. In some respects it would be better if, perhaps, we could arrange that other railways which might hereafter exist should have running powers over this road, but I think that is a small matter compared with the great triumph the people of the North-West have achieved in being able to connect with the American railway system and to develop their country as this Bill will allow them to do.

Mr. TISDALE. I am surprised that there should be any objection at all from gentlemen on the opposite side of the House to a Bill like this, especially when we heard it stated in the Railway Committee that men had the capital ready to build it in that unsettled region. Let me tell them that in the Territories of Montana and Wyoming, the authorities, instead of trying to tie up railways and restrict them, actually go the length of giving them powers to make additional charges over the regular railway charges in the United States. Those Territories give the railway companies power to charge five cents a mile, as compared with two or three cents a mile, which is the highest charge allowed in some of the States for passengers, and they have also adopted the idea that the railways in these comparatively unsettled Territories should have additional facilities and powers in regulating their freight traffic. If there was ever a case in which a railway should be encouraged by this Parliament, this is one. At present we have no railroads to develop the traffic in that district, and there is only one railroad in the whole section—the Canadian Pacific Railway. Here is a project by gentlemen who have actually the capital themselves to carry it through. They have a market in Montana, where the people want the coal; and I guarantee that in Montana Territory they would be given the power to charge six cents a mile if they wanted it, and to charge anything they could get upon freight.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew).

There are few people in that district at present, and how are the railways to live except by the freight traffic? I only wonder that the company succeeded in raising the capital. It is all very well in this part of the country, or in the older States of the Union, or the older Provinces here, to restrict the railroads, for there is no doubt that they need watching; but surely up there where there are no railroads, and where gentlemen have been found with capital to build this line, and have also found the people of Montana ready to take the products of the coal mines, they should have all the fair encouragement possible from this Parliament. This Bill was thoroughly discussed in the Railway Committee yesterday morning, and there was no objection whatever to it. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) went thoroughly into the details, and we all agreed, under the special circumstances of the case, and the fact that it was going to open up a coal trade and to develop the coal mines, that the object of the Bill should be encouraged. As some gentlemen remarked it will have the effect of counteracting any monopoly in coal—if there is a monopoly—in the North-West. If you hamper that bill you may destroy the project altogether. You know the difficulty of getting capitalists in the old country to take up a project like this—for we have to go to the old country to get our capital—and we know how jealous they are of restrictions of that sort. If you cripple this enterprise you will probably cause the abandoning of it altogether. This is an exceptional case, and if there ever was an instance in which a railroad should go untrammelled of restrictions it is the present one. For my part I can say that, even if the company asked extra powers of charging, I would support it under the circumstances. This line is opening up a traffic between the great Territories of the United States and our North-West. They need the products that we have, and we need some of theirs. Surely the gentlemen who oppose have not fully considered the circumstances surrounding it, and if they had heard the explanations we had in the Railway Committee yesterday they would not take such a course. I hope there will be no further objection raised to an enterprise of this character.

Mr. TROW. I think this company has been very well encouraged already. The fact of the matter is that Sir A. T. Galt and his servants were paid by this House for the explorations of these coal lands, and this in the first place was quite improper. It would be further improper for us to allow this company to block up that entire territory. Can any one of the gentlemen who support this Bill tell me the extent of territory they control under their charter? They have the whole district from Medicine Hat to the boundary, and under this Bill they can block out every other enterprise. All we ask is that running powers should be given to other companies to carry the coal from their mines. They can mine their own coal and get the profit of the proceeds, but let other companies have the privilege, if they have the enterprise, to carry coal to Winnipeg, and the poor settlers all along the road for a thousand miles can be supplied at a reasonable rate. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) stating that the matter was thoroughly discussed in the Railway Committee, because it was not. As a member of that committee I can say that there are half a dozen professional men on the front benches of the Railway Committee who always have a monopoly of the discussion. In every Bill of that kind that comes before the committee a half dozen men on the front benches seem to wish to monopolise the whole discussion and if any one on the back benches says a word they apparently resent it. I tell you there has been not a free discussion on this Bill in the Railway Committee.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think that the object the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) has in view is already guarded. I understand that this railway will con-next with the Canadian Pacific Railway about 100 miles from Calgary, and the hon. gentleman's object is undoubtedly to prevent excessive rates being charged for the delivery of coal from the mines at points along the Canadian Pacific Railway. He desires to attain that object by providing for running powers over this railway. There is, as he well knows, no railway in competition with it now; there is no railway company in existence which can desire to run over its lines; and the hon. gentleman seeks to prevent a monopoly for all time to come in the way of running powers. He will see, if he turns to the Railway Act of last Session, that all those subjects are dealt with by that Act in such a way that this Bill, without any provision at all on the subject, is made subject to the jurisdiction of the Railway Committee in respect to those matters. First, tolls and rates for the transportation of passengers and freight; next, the adjustment of such tolls and rates between companies; next, running powers or haulage; and then traffic arrangements. The object of the Railway Act of last Session was to prevent the necessity of incorporating such provisions in every Bill brought forward.

Mr. TROW. If the General Railway Act protects the public from imposition, I am perfectly satisfied; but I think the Government should enforce that Act and not allow this company to take 100 per cent. profit from the inhabitants of Calgary for carrying coal over their line.

Mr. SHANLY. I am surprised that the hon. member for South Perth, who has been so much in the North-West, and understands its geography as well, perhaps, as any member in this House and better than most of us, should not know that this Lethbridge Coal Mine Company does not deliver coal in Calgary or in Winnipeg. It has only a short road connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and cannot control the freight charges to Calgary or Winnipeg. The Bill merely asks power for the existing company to extend its line to go to the United States frontier, to connect with roads in Montana, and to do to the south what hitherto it has been doing to the north, sending coal to its junction with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The company asks to be allowed to expend their own money in supplying the country with coal, and if there is any grievance as to freights, you must, as the hon. Minister of Justice has said, fall back on the Railway Act or attack the larger corporations, and not try to prevent this short branch line from extending its business and expending its own money in its efforts to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I sympathise very much with the views of the hon. member for South Perth, and I agree with the general principle he has laid down, that whenever this House gives a charter to any corporation, it should provide that the public interests shall be properly served and protected. My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, has stated that this is provided for in the General Railway Act passed last Session. If that is so, that obviates the difficulty; but this House has a perfect right, in granting a charter—because in doing so it is granting privileges—and has a perfect right to dictate what those privileges shall be, and under what conditions they shall be granted. Therefore, the hon. member for South Perth is perfectly right in calling attention to the interests of the people of the North-West in connection with their supply of coal. But I must say, that I think this is a Bill which we ought to pass. These people have gone into that country and spent their money, and no doubt when they went there it was a speculation that might turn out profitably or not, as the country might settle up and the mines develop, or might not, to their satisfaction. We have already granted a charter authorising this company to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway; and while I agree with my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Shanly), that they cannot control in their entirety the rates to Calgary or Winnipeg, they have certainly the power to control them to a certain extent. But we have granted a charter to this corporation, and they are now asking simply authority to extend their line to the boundary so as to open up a new market to the south; and I do not think we should stand in the way of that enterprise, however desirable it is to protect the public interest, and I agree that we should always do so. But we have to take into account the character and remoteness and every circumstance surrounding the enterprise, and we should deal with it in such a way as will enable the company to carry out an enterprise which to say the least of it many of us thought of a very doubtful character a few years ago. Therefore, however much I sympathise with the hon. member for Perth, I think this House ought to pass the Bill.

Mr. TROW. I have no objection to its passing with certain restrictions. The hon. member for South Grenville says that this road will carry no coal to Calgary or Winnipeg; but the company makes a bargain with John Brown, of Winnipeg, or John Smith, of Calgary, and in making their contracts they make a profit on the carriage of the coal.

Mr. SHANLY. Does my hon. friend hold that it is wrong to make a profit?

Mr. TROW. Not 100 per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. There is another important element in granting this charter which should not be lost sight of. The present railway which, as I understand, is about 100 miles long, is a narrow gauge railway, so that the cars of the Canadian Pacific Railway cannot run over it. This necessitates a transshipment of every ton of coal brought to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The present Bill contemplates the widening of that gauge so as to enable the cars of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any railway, to go to the mines and take the coal from there direct. We know the disadvantage of narrow gauge railways, and if there were no other consideration than that, I think hon. members would see the necessity of passing this Bill, because it will bring about a reduction in the cost of coal from $1 to 50 cents per ton. In addition to that, I understand that these gentlemen have already contracted for the sale of a very large quantity of coal south of the boundary line; and since that railway has been completed they can take the coal south of the line, where there is a market ready for it, and obtain speedy returns. They have shown a great deal of enterprise in originating that project, and are showing additional courage and enterprise to-day in widening the gauge of that 100 miles of road, and making it the standard road that all others can run over.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. It seems to me there is a difficulty lying far back, and one that will render virtually useless any condition this House may impose in the railway charter. If I understand the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) correctly, he stated at the outset that every foot of coal lands in that locality belonged to this railway company who is asking for a charter under this Bill. In the name of common sense, I would ask what is the use of giving any other railway company running powers into that territory when there is not a single pound of coal which they can get hold of. Any condition of that kind which we can impose will not affect the price of coal one single iota. The one hope which the people of Calgary, and the other places mentioned have of a reduction in the price of coal, lies in the opening up of competing coal mines in other quarters. I agree with the hon. member for Northumberland that this company has a monopoly of that territory with which we cannot interfere. They have shown great pluck and perseverance in opening up the railway to their mines, and have now a prospect of a market to the other side, and the least this House can do is to give them an extension of their charter.

Mr. DALY. Coming from the Province of Manitoba, I may be permitted to say something in reference to this question, although I do so with considerable hesitation, as, I understand, from previous discussions, that there are hon. gentlemen from the other Provinces here who know more about our affairs than we do ourselves. The most important feature in connection with this Bill is this, that the present gauge of the railway is a narrow gauge, and owing to the fact that some two years ago there were very severe snow storms between Lethbridge and Dunmore, the company were not able to fulfil their contracts in Manitoba to supply the towns there with coal. Therefore, in order to keep up the supply, they had to build large sheds at Dunmore on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in consequence of this fact and of the line being a narrow gauge one, the people of Manitoba are to-day paying 50 cents to $1 per ton more than they would if the line were a broad gauge road. I hope sincerely therefore that no party effort will be put forward to defeat this measure. I did not hear the whole of the speech of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow). I understand that what he wants is to give the people, who are getting the coal out of the mines, as cheap rates as possible. In Manitoba almost the only bituminous coal used there is the coal from the mine commonly known as the Galt mine, and we are paying for this coal 50 cents to $1 per ton more than we would if the road were a broad instead of a narrow gauge one. I trust, therefore, that this bill will be allowed to pass, in order that a reduction in the price of coal may be obtained.

Committee rose and reported.

Mr. SPEAKER. When shall this Bill be read the third time?

Mr. MITCHELL. We have got into the practice the last two or three Sessions of giving second and third readings of Bills on the same day, and it is only fair we should now begin by adhering to the Rule the House has adopted of not reading a Bill the second and the third time on the same day.

Mr. SPROULE When a Bill is reported without any amendment, it may be read the third time immediately after the second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER. Third reading to-morrow.

KOOTENAY AND ATHABASCA RAILWAY CO.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 15) respecting the Kootenay and Athabasca Railway Company.— (Mr. Mara.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. EDGAR. Before the first clause is adopted, I think an amendment should be inserted. The Committee will observe that by the first clause the railway company charter is absolutely repealed, and then the Bill goes on to create a new company under the same name. Well, we have never, that I can recollect in railway legislation, annihilated one corporation and created another in its place without carrying forward to the new corporation the liabilities of the old one. I am sure that the hon. the Minister of Justice will recognise that this is invariably the custom, and I think we should put in a section at the end of clause one to that effect.

Mr. MARA. When I tell the hon. gentleman there are no liabilities, the House will agree it is not necessary such a clause should be inserted.

Mr. EDGAR. The very fact that the hon. gentleman says there are no liabilities shows the amendment cannot do any harm to the new company, and the Minister of Justice must admit that it would be establishing a very dangerous precedent to allow legislation of this kind to pass without amendment. I move in amendment to this clause that the following words be added:—

Provided that all the liabilities of the company incorporated by the Act hereby repealed shall become the liabilities of the company hereby incorporated, and any action pending against the company repealed may be continued against the company hereby incorporated.

Mr. MARA. The hon. gentleman is quite right when he states that when there is no liability, the clause suggested can do no harm. In one sense it cannot. It can do no harm in the Dominion of Canada. But this company is not in the position of the former one, its bonds have not been floated, and you are asking us to insert a clause which will create doubt and suspicion as to its standing. Even if there were any doubt of the statement I have made, and I have made it on the assurances given me by the company, the last Act will convince the House that the former company had no right to incur corporate debts or liabilities. The Act now being repealed gave the company no such power. You will find by clause 22 that the Act could not come into force until proclaimed by the Governor in Council. But the Governor never by Order in Council brought the Act into force, and therefore it is merely waste paper. There are really no corporate liabilities, and when the hon. gentleman sees that, I think he will withdraw his motion.

Mr. EDGAR. If the company never had a corporate existence, and if the hon. the Minister of Justice will vouch for that, the circumstances will be quite different. But if the company had any corporate existence at all, and we never heard before it had not, then undoubtedly it should have a protecting clause of this kind in.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is no doubt but that what the hon. gentleman has just said is perfectly true. This House ought not to pass a Bill such as this, where there is a possibility of liabilities having existed. I can quite see, from what the hon. gentleman who is promoting this Bill states, that, if this House can be assured that there are no corporate liabilities, it will facilitate their financial transactions. If they have any such liabilities, that will cause difficulties at the outset, and that should be provided for in such a way that the legislation should not be of a hasty character, and should not do a positive injustice.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I quite agree with the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Edgar) that no charter should be repealed without ample provision being made for carrying forward the existing liabilities of the company. I find, however, that this Act simply enabled the Governor in Council to give the charter to the company by proclamation, and, unless that proclamation was made, the charter had no effect. They now propose to repeal that Act, and give the company a parliamentary charter.

Mr. EDGAR. Does the Minister of Justice think it is clear that the charter is a dead letter, that the original company have no power to incur liabilities?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, they never had a charter at all. The Act says that it shall not come into force until it is proclaimed by the Governor in Council.

Mr. BARRON. I would suggest to the Minister of Justice that, though the Act was never proclaimed by the Governor in Council, the promoters might have incurred liabilities. Though they could not in their corporate condition admit any claim, they might have incurred claims as promoters.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not as a company.

Mr. MITCHELL. Are the present corporators the same as the original promoters?

Mr. MARA. All but two,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The company never having had any existence, it could not have any liabilities, and we have no system in this country by which a company can be made responsible for the liabilities incurred by the promoters.

Amendment withdrawn.

Committee rose and reported.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 30) respecting the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec.—(Mr. Denison.)

Bill (No. 32) to incorporate the Victoria, Saanich and New Westminster Railway Company.—(Mr. Prior.)

Bill (No. 34) to incorporate the Canadian General Trusts Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

CENTRAL COUNTIES RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. EDWARDS moved second reading of Bill (No. 33) to amend the Act to incorporate the Prescott County Railway Company, and to change the name of the Company to the Central Counties Railway Company.

Mr. SPROULE. That Bill is only printed in one language.

Mr. MITCHELL. You have allowed two other Bills to go through which are only printed in one language.

Mr. SPROULE. Those were printed in English, and we could read them, but this is printed in French, and we cannot read it.

Mr. BERGIN. I object to this Bill being read until it is printed in both languages.

MASSAWIPPI JUNCTION RAILWAY.

Mr. COLBY moved second reading of Bill (No. 37) to amend the Act incorporating the Massawippi Junction Railway Company.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). There is a very serious objection to this Bill, and I doubt whether it is in the jurisdiction of this House. The railway in question was incorporated originally by a Bill passed by the Legislature of Quebec, and the line in question is entirely within the limits of the Province of Quebec. It is true that at the frontier the line is connected with the Pasumpsic River Railway, but the line itself is entirely within the Province of Quebec. The hon. member will recollect that the old charter was granted by the Legislature of Quebec somewhere about 1869-70, and I do not see how this Parliament can amend that Act.

Mr. COLBY. The hon. member is quite in error with regard to the incorporation of this railway. It was incorporated either two or three years ago by the Dominion of Canada, and was declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. He must be thinking of some other road of a similar name.

Mr. LANGELIER. The name is exactly similar to the name of a railway which was incorporated in 1869-70 by the Legislature of Quebec. I am positive of that; it will be found on the statutes of Quebec.

Mr. COLBY. The hon. member is equally in error in that particular. The name is not identical. The former name was the Massawippi Valley Railway; this is a road to connect with the Massawippi Valley Railway, and it is called the Massawippi Junction Railway.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not admit, nor do I think there is any decision to warrant, the conclusion that because this Parliament declares a railway to be for the general advantage of Canada, therefore it is exclusively within the jurisdiction of this House. I do not think that it requires a great deal of consideration of section 92 of the British North America Act to see that our right to legislate upon the subject of railways arises simply from our declaration that they are for the general advantage of Canada. That sub-section must be read to mean that the public works that are undertaken to be constructed under it are of the same class and character as those in the two preceding sub-sections. Now, it requires very little consideration of the two previous sub-sections to see that we have no right to undertake to incorporate a railway or any other public work, or undertake to control it, unless it extends beyond the limits of the Province, or is in some way necessary to carry on the trade or commerce of Canada with a foreign country. Sub-sections a and b show that it is only works of this sort that are supposed to be dealt with; then under sub-section c it is declared that although the work may be wholly situated within the Province, it may nevertheless be a work for the general advantage of Canada. Certainly a canal connecting Lake Ontario with Lake Huron would be a work of that character; it would be wholly situated within the Province of Ontario, nevertheless it would establish a continuous line of navigation extending beyond the limits of the Province, and so a railway, although wholly situated within a Province, may be a connecting link which, when completed, will make a public work extending beyond the limits of the Province, and which, though a portion of it was constructed, would yet come within sub-sections a or b. I understand that at the time the British North America Act was under consideration, this sub-section was suggested by the proposal to construct a canal to connect the Bay of Fundy with the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It was said that such a work would be beyond the financial power of the Province of Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, and that it would be a work wholly within the limits of a Province, and for the construction of which no provision would be made at the expense of the Dominion, and then sub-section c was inserted for the purpose of covering a provision exactly of that sort. Now, I am of opinion that the legislation that we have had in this direction has been usurped legislation, that we have gone upon wrong lines ever since 1883, when, by a general measure, we undertook to declare that almost every railway that was constructed, or that by any possibility could be constructed within the Dominion of Canada, was for the general advantage of Canada. Because we have made that declaration we assume that it settles the question, that we have no right to enquire into the reasonableness of the proposition. I am of opinion, speaking as a member of this House, that this is an erroneous interpretation of the Act, and that we are simply creating difficulties for the future by undertaking to legislate on a series of measures which are properly within the purview of a Province. It does seem to me that what has been said by the hon. gentleman who is promoting this Bill, shows that it ought to be relegated to the Province.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would suggest that the Bill be read the second time and referred to a committee, on the understanding that the usual rule shall prevail, that the House is not at all committed to the Bill by that course. It does not appear on the face of the Bill that it is beyond our powers. It is a Bill to amend a statute of this Parliament. I understand there exists a fact which would remove the hon. gentleman's objection entirely, namely, that the Bill proposes to confer upon this company power to connect it with a foreign company.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. BROWN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 3) to make further provision for the prevention of cruelty to animals, and to amend chapter 172 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intituled "An Act respecting cruelty to animals." He said: When I introduced this Bill I gave a brief explanation of it, and promised to enlarge on the second reading, which I now do. The Bill is to make such further provision for the prevention of cruelty to animals, as is not already provided for by law. The greatest care has been taken in the preparation of this Bill. I desire to offer an explanation which will perhaps relieve the minds of some hon. members of a misapprehension. The Bill which was first introduced last Session, and which was prepared under the sanction and the assistance of the various humane societies in Canada contained clauses that were supposed to be covered by the existing laws. These were eliminated and the Bill reprinted, and it is on the reprinted Bill that I shall now address the House. Some hon. gentlemen have been forming their opinions in relation to this Bill with reference to certain clauses in the first Bill introduced, such as clipping horses and docking their tails; such clauses, however, are not in the present Bill. The main object of the present measure is to prevent trap shooting of pigeons and small birds, cock-fighting, dog fighting and baiting or anything of that debasing character, and to punish not only, as the old law provided, the man who kept a cocking main, but also all and sundry who shall be gathered at that cock fight or dog-fight and be parties to the disgraceful proceedings, and not allow them to go scott free while punishing the man only who owned the cocking main. The object is to punish all and sundry who are connected with so called sport. The object of the Bill, as I have said, is simply to enlarge the power to punish those who are guilty of cruelty to dumb animals. The measure, I beg leave to say, is of great public concern. Petitions in its favor have been sent by the humane societies of Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto and Hamilton, representing many thousands of good and kind hearted people, men and women, in all those large cities, and I have to-day received a telegram from Hamilton stating that a very large petition is on its way to this House in favor of the passage of this Bill. I believe every true hearted sportsman in Canada will support this Bill. I know some objections will be pressed against this measure by one or two hon. gentlemen, and which objections emanating from some of the gun clubs of Canada; but I venture the assertion that if the members of gun clubs individually were consulted they would say that the object of these trap shooting tournaments could be attained as well by shooting at clay pigeons. The idea of calling such a meeting a tournament is a misapplication of the word. We were taught that in a tournament a man met another man worthy of his steel, but in these debasing sports a man stands within comparatively a short distance of a defenceless bird let out of a trap, and shoots it in the most cruel manner. I venture to say that not an hon. gentleman, not even those who will oppose this Bill, would take his child to witness one of these shooting matches and think that by doing so he was educating his child to give encouragement to a manly sport. He knows it would have a bad influence, and he would take care not to take his child there. Not many years have elapsed, sixty I think, since humane societies were first established in England and they have since spread all over the country. The object of such a society is to protect those who cannot protect themselves. A dumb animal is as sensitive to pain as any hon. gentleman here, and every dumb animal is sensitive to fear just as man is, and as these animals tend to make our lives happy so we as humane people should do all we can to treat them with humanity? The St. Hubert's Gun Club in Ottawa is perhaps the most important and influential club in Canada, and is composed of men with as much humanity as any body of men in this country. I venture to make this assertion, and if I am wrong, I challenge contradiction, that if the members of that club were asked the object they had in view in holding their sports, they would say it was for the purposes of marksmanship, and very few of those gentlemen would fail to declare that they could obtain the same sport from shooting at clay pigeons as in shooting at live birds, that the sport was as good or even better; and that they are perfectly willing to support a measure of this kind and obtain all the practice they want at shooting clay pigeons, which are now provided and made in this vicinity. I have a higher authority still. One of the best authorities on this continent is Captain Bogardus, and he says:

"I have had as much experience as any man of my age at game and pigeons, perhaps as much as any man living, and I know by my own shooting that when a man, shooting according to my rules at balls thrown from my traps, can break two-thirds of the latter, he can shoot birds in the field whether he has been accustomed to shoot on the wing or not. I know several gentlemen who have been following my instructions in glass ball shooting and have become real crack shots. They say they have learned more last summer about shooting on the wing than they ever knew before."

That is the opinion of the highest authority in the United States. I have here the evidence taken before a committee in Massachusetts, and it is scarcely necessary to read it to this House to show that the trap shooting of pigeons and small birds is cruel and barbarous, not consistent with the genius of the times, and that all over the world it is being discountenanced. The Queen, who lives in the hearts of her people, has discountenanced trap shooting in the most determined manner. She has not only discountenanced it, but she has refused invitations on behalf of any of the royal family to be present at the great shooting matches in England, and the Princess of Wales has also discountenanced the practice and will not attend any of such meetings. Let me read to the House a statement to show the position which Her Majesty the Queen has taken. Her Majesty in an address in July, 1887, on the anniversary of the Royal Humane Society of which she is not only the patron but of which she has been a generous and influential member for over 20 years, uttered these memorable words, words which should be written in letters of gold and should be taught in every school in the land. She said:

"No civilisation is complete which does not include the dumb and defenceless of God's creatures within the sphere of charity and mercy."

These are the words of the Queen of Great Britain, and I am sure there is not a mother there or here who does not entertain the sentiment so uttered, and who does not believe that the worst training their children could receive would be to take them to those cruel sports of which I am now speaking. I know that a majority of the hon. gentlemen of this House have a sympathy with this measure and I am satisfied that when it comes to receive the vote of this Parliament—if it should come to a vote—that it will receive a generous support. I do not propose to come before this House without data, and substantial facts in support of the Bill. I hold in my hand letters from men who before the clay pigeon was introduced were members of organisations and clubs where the live birds were shot, but now when a more humane method—and a method which can give them all the opportunities they require for marksmanship, is provided, they declare that the true sportsman, who is a humane man, gives a chance to the bird and the animal in the open field and is not like the man who seeks to box poor defenceless birds and shoot them from a trap. Those birds are sometimes brought from great distances and during the journey they are often cruelly treated. The poor innocent creatures are then let out from the traps and shot down. Those true sportsmen, in letters which I will read to you now, state that they have abandoned their connection with clubs which refused to adopt the clay pigeon and who continue to shoot at live birds. Here is a letter which I will read from a man who from his remarks is a true sportsman :

" OTTAWA, 27th March, 1888.

" MY DEAR SIR,—Having quite accidentally heard that you were decidedly against the very barbarous pastime of trap shooting of land pigeons, I venture to express my views as a sportsman, and I sincerely hope that the time is not far distant when shooting pigeons from a trap will be classed as an act of cruelty and be punished severely. No matter what place the match takes place in, it disgraces it and the people who take part in the game. In the first place the birds are kept in a small box, crowded and suffocating and are often kept there for days; they are then taken from their prison and placed in the trap, and when released are often so weak from their cruel imprisonment that they can hardly leave the trap, and when not killed outright go off with small pellets of shot driven home nearly to the vitals, sometimes minus both legs and have to keep on the wing until completely tired out, they fall on the snow a quivering, fluttering, bleeding, mild-eyed specimen of God's handiwork. The often urged excuse that it gives the sportsman good practice, enabling him to kill game birds more accurately, is false. As if a sportsman accustoms himself to pigeon shooting, it spoils him for duck and snipe shooting as their flight is so dissimilar, besides the new flying targets are now considered by all true sportsmen to be much better objects to shoot at for practice, as they go quicker, and they, of course, compel the gunner to take a more rapid aim.

" The targets I have referred to are clay pigeons, Peoria black birds and glass balls. I have shot a great many matches at pigeons, I am ashamed to say, but thank Providence I have killed my last tame pigeon, as I do certainly consider it a most disgraceful thing for any sportsman to do. Since giving up pigeon shooting I have shot a good many matches at artificial flying targets, and I find them a great deal better practice than live pigeons, sparrows or snowbirds. I sincerely hope that the to me dear old name of sportsman, will soon fall from the shoulders of these live bird shooters and be replaced by the much more suitable one of sports, as I claim the butchery of any tame animal or bird as far beneath the aim of a true sportsman.

" Believe me, sincerely yours,

" GEO. B. McDERMOT,

" Fishery Overseer and Indian Agent,

" Port Perry, Ont.

" ADAM BROWN, Esq., M. P.,

" House of Commons, Ottawa."

This gentleman refers to butchery as beneath the aim of a true sportsman. Let me read to you the evidence of Mr. Matthews, of Winthrop, Mass., in his testimony given before the House of Representatives :

" One morning, after a pigeon-shoot, I found three pigeons on the coving of my stable, right on the eaves. During the next night they died and dropped down. I examined them. One had a leg broken and had two shots through the body. Another had a leg broken and had one eye put out. After one of their shoots, four birds came to my place in just the same way. I live a mile away, in an air-line, from the shooting grounds.

" When the Winthrop Club was started I was one of the members, and belonged to it three years. I got sick of it and left it. Then, about one bird out of eight would get away.

" Q. You said you got sick of it?

" A. Yes, sir.

" Q. On what account?

" A. Well, because I did not like the treatment of the birds. I thought it was not right.

" Q. From your experience, during three years, what is your opinion about the humanity of the thing?

" A. I think it is cruel.

" Q. In what particular point does the cruelty consist?

" A. In the first place, of their catching these birds with the snares, and of boxing them, and keeping them the way they are kept for three or four days. I think there is cruelty in taking and confining any animal in a spot, and for a man to take a loaded gun, and stand and pull away a trap for the bird to come out, and then shoot at him where he cannot have any chance to help himself. But if a man is out after wild game, then the bird has got a chance to take care of himself.

" Q. Is this pigeon shooting cruel above the shooting of wild game?

" A. It is; because the bird is caged and housed. He is convicted to be shot, the same as a man is convicted to be put upon the gallows to be hung. He does not have a chance to take care of himself.

" This practice of pigeon shooting has a bad influence on boys. Where boys are offered fifteen or twenty cents apiece for birds, if you have some very nice pigeons on your place you will find the boys snaring them to get this fifteen cents."

I hold in my possession letters from different parts of the country to show that independent of the cruelty of the practice, it has made many a thief of young boys, who steal the pigeons and sell them for the shooting matches. Sometimes pigeons very valuable to the pigeon fancier are stolen and sold for ten or fifteen cents, as the case may be. Tempting those boys to commit a robbery and to enter on a life of crime is an evil which we, as legislators for our country, should endeavor to stop. Before the last pigeon match near the city of Hamilton, not a long time ago, a lady living in Hamilton writes to inform me that a number of boys were in the habit of going around and snaring pigeons and selling them to those who were engaged in the shooting matches, I will read you an extract from a letter from Mr. Caston, of Toronto, who says :

" Among other arguments against it is one you appear to have overlooked, is that the amount of juvenile stealing that it causes and this is a feature that deserves the most serious consideration. Dozens of gentlemen have had to give up keeping pigeons for the simple reason that they are cleared out time and again by boys who would be afraid to take anything else. The police don't take much notice of bird stealing and they find a ready sale at the sporting saloons and no question asked. I have found fancy pigeons at these places by the dozen bought for twenty-five cents a pair, worth from five to ten dollars. So long as they can fly they do for the traps and start thieves on their course of crime.

Trap shooting has not a single redeeming feature about it. They will tell you that they kill the birds; nothing of the sort. In many cases they cripple them and they fall out of bounds and linger for a day or so. Other times boys will chase the poor fluttering things pelting them with stones. Then there is all sorts of tricking to make them lively, such of putting out their eyes."

It has occurred, and occurred frequently, that in those trap-shooting matches the eyes of the pigeons have been put out to effect the purpose of those engaged in the sport. The St. Hubert Gun Club of this city practices largely with the clay pigeons. They have experience of both methods of shooting and they prefer clay pigeon shooting to butchering the live birds. I have a letter from a gentleman in Boston who took a deep interest in the passage of the Massachusetts law. He says :

" It passed the House of Representatives by a large majority, and the Senate by a vote of about two to one. In its favor I carried to the Legislature the petition of about four hundred clergymen of all denominations, and various others. I think it has never been violated but once. In that case by my orders the parties were promptly arrested, convicted and heavily fined."

The law in the State of Massachusetts, which passed the legislature by a vote of two to one, reads as follows :

" Any person who shall keep or use any live pigeon, fowl, or other bird for the purpose of a target, or to be shot at, either for amusement or as a test of skill in marksmanship; and any person who shall shoot at any bird as aforesaid, or be a party to any such shooting of any fowl or bird; and any person who shall rent any building, shed, room, yard field or premises, or shall knowingly suffer or permit the use of any building, shed, room, yard, field or premises, for the purpose of shooting any fowl or bird as aforesaid, shall be punished by fine not exceeding fifty dollars, or by imprisonment in gaol not exceeding thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Nothing herein contained shall apply to the shooting of any wild game in its wild state."

This law has been productive of an immense deal of good in that state. In quoting to you the public opinion in respect to this barbarous practice, I have mentioned the name of our beloved Queen, who has supported every movement tending to put down such practices. Let me quote to you the action taken by the Archbishop of Canterbury when the Bill was before the British Parliament as reported by the Times :

" Pigeon shooting, Lord Aberdare says, is a brutalising practice, and we entirely agree with him. The performers and their irregular outside scouts may be already brutalised. It is likely enough that they are, and that for them to engage in pigeon shooting is simply to act after their kind. But as the Archbishop of Canterbury says, each fresh performance of the sort makes them worse than they were before, and more and more indifferent to the suffering which it delights them to witness or to inflict. The matter is one on which the public conscience becomes more and more sensitive."

By the highest as well as the humblest in England, where this sport has had its full swing, the most marked condemnation is now given to it. The societies which have been formed for the prevention of cruelty to animals do not seek to persecute any one. They admire true sport, and the true sportsman is humane to the lower animals; but the man who strives to take the life of an animal in any other way is not a true sportsman. Wherever these societies have been formed in this country and in England, they warn those who have been doing wrong before they seek to convict them. In the city of Hamilton our inspector, when he discovers any cruelty to an animal, warns the person guilty of that cruelty, and if the act is again committed the guilty person is summoned and brought before the magistrate, and if a conviction is obtained he is fined. There can be no doubt of this, and every hon. gentleman in this House will admit it, that the merciful man is merciful to his beast. Is there a man here who will stand by and see any one act cruelly to a horse? A horse is as sensitive as any one of us, and you can get more out of him by kindness than by cruelty. There is no doubt that the sentiment pervading every breast and every heart is that justice shall be done to the dumb animals. No man would take a child to see a pigeon shooting, a dog fight, a cock fight, or any of those brutal exhibitions which are mis-called sports. No man who has any regard for the education of his child would take him to witness any such exhibition. There is nothing in this Bill that will not bear the light of day. I challenge any man to find a word in it which does not receive his conscientious sanction.

Mr. LISTER. It provides for over driving a hen.

Mr. BROWN. It is only an old woman who would make that objection. As I have said, the sentiment in the motherland is strongly in favor of this movement, so strongly that it is being carried into the schools. Young societies have been formed, and kindness to animals has been made a subject of education. In London a children's society has been formed, and in order to attract children, it is very appropriately named "The Dickey-bird Society"; 37,000 children have joined it, and its sole object is to educate children from their earliest days to be kind to birds and beasts of all kinds. It is as easy to teach a child to be merciful to a dumb animal as it is to teach it anything, and I am satisfied that the societies formed in England will be of great good to that country. Now, I have stated in a very few words the object of the Bill, and there are many arguments I could advance in support of it. Some of the greatest men of our day have sanctioned the principle of kindness to animals. There is a story told of that eminent man, President Lincoln, that when he was on a very important mission through the country, he ordered the driver to stop; he got out of the vehicle, went to the hedge at the side of the road, and there found a little fluttering bird which had dropped out of its nest, and he picked it up and put it in its nest again. When he came back to the carriage his friend asked him: "Why did you pay such attention to a little thing like that?" "All that I can say for a reason, is that it makes me feel better." Every man who does a kind act is made to feel better. To come back again to the question of shooting matches, I desire to make a quotation and the words are those of perhaps one of the most eminent men that ever adorned the roll of Scotland's great men, Dr. Chalmers. He said, in speaking of the suffering of animals and the cruelty of man:

"These sufferings are really felt. The beasts of the field are so constructed as to give forth all the natural expression of it. These poor animals just look and tremble and give forth the very indications of suffering that we do; theirs is the distinct cry of pain. Theirs is the unequivocal physiognomy of pain. They put on the same aspect of terror on the demonstration of the menaced blow. They exhibit the same distortions of agony after the infliction of it. The bruise, or the burn, or the fracture, or the deep incision, or the fierce encounter with one of equal or superior strength just affects them similarly to ourselves. Their blood circulates as ours, they sicken, they grow feeble with age and finally they die just as we do. The brute animals have all the same sensations of pain as human beings and consequently endure as much pain when their body is hurt; but in their case the cruelty of torment is greater, because they have no mind to bear them up against their sufferings."

Men and women of Canada in every part of the country are sustaining with their sympathy this attempt to cover ground that was not covered when the present law for the prevention of cruelty to animals was passed. In the estimation of those who framed that measure, everything was apparently provided for, but in the pursuit of cruel sports some were discovered not provided for. I ask every hon. gentleman to read over this Bill by which I desire to provide what is not already provided for, and I contend there is not a clause in it which will not commend itself to every good, kind-hearted man in the land. It is not sufficient to punish the owner of the house where a cock fight takes place, or to punish the man in whose yard a dog fight has taken place, but we should punish the whole crew and everyone connected with the disgraceful proceeding if they can be caught. These are matters provided for in this Bill, which I am sure will meet with the best consideration of the House. I may be asked, well, what is the harm in shooting a pigeon? I answer, None whatever. Give the bird fairplay. But do not coop it up in a trap, confine it in a cowardly way, and then shoot at it when it has no chance to escape. An animal of any description is as sensible to fear as man. I would like to ask any hon. gentleman what he thinks about that so-called sport of fastening a turkey to a barrel, then tying its legs together, and then peppering away at it when it has no chance to escape. The sport I have mentioned is nothing but wanton cruelty, and I seek to put a stop to wanton cruelty because it is demoralising. There is such a thing as a suffering that has to be endured, but that suffering is of a character which is right and proper. All I ask of this House is that they will give their support to a measure for the prevention of cruelty to animals, and by this Bill I am merely seeking to cover ground not already covered. I am satisfied that from one end of the country to the other there will be rejoicing should this measure, which is calculated to advance the interests of humanity and give a lesson to the rising generation, be passed and a stop put forever to all the brutalising and debasing so called amusements we have described in the way of trap-shooting and cock-fighting.

Mr. TISDALE. I beg to move that the Bill intituled: "An Act to make further provision to prevent cruelty to animals, and to amend chap. 172 of the Revised Statutes of Canada" be not now read the second time, but be read this day six months. In making that motion, I desire to say, that I am not one of those who are in favor of cruelty to animals. I desire to say that, within proper bounds, I am a supporter and believer in the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, but I must decidedly object to other people laying down principles, and then trying to clothe with other names things that do not come under those names. That is substantially the reason why I move this resolution. A great many mischievous principles are introduced in this Bill, and attempts are made to put those who believe in calling things their right names in a false position. The speech of the hon. gentleman must satisfy many here that I am not unfairly stating the case. If we could find by the hon. gentleman's Bill what he aims at, I should be very glad, because in his speech he has told us things that are very different from the Bill. He said that his Bill was for the prevention of cruelty to animals in matters not provided for. Then he said further it was to prevent cock-fighting and dog-fighting and things of that kind; but in the new part of the Bill there is not a word concerning those subjects. The hon. gentleman read a number of letters and quotations about cruelty to animals. There is not an hon. gentleman in this House who is in favor of cruelty to animals, but what I want to find out is what he wishes to provide for in his Bill, for in reading it I do not find anything that will prevent the cruelty he objects to. I venture to assert one or two propositions in connection with this measure. It either provides nothing material but what the law already covers, or these new features that are in it are injurious and mischievous, except the one with regard to shooting pigeons out of traps. If that is true, and I will satisfy you it is, why, if the hon. gentleman wants to abolish pigeon shooting out of traps, does he not bring in a Bill to that effect, so that we may know where it stands? When those whom he represents venture to say that killing a bird or pigeon with a gun is cruel, or when the hon. gentleman ventures to say so, we will know what we have to meet. Possibly the hon. gentleman is a vegetarian. The society is an excellent society, but there are many principles which are excellent in themselves which may lead to very mischievous consequences, and in legislation particularly we cannot afford to have our time taken up unless in regard to something which is material. The hon. gentleman's remarks taught us what will be the effect if we allow this sort of Bills to pass. He admitted that he had a Bill in reference to the clipping of horses and other matters, but he said that had been carefully considered, and those provisions had been eliminated. I object to be called a man cruel to animals because a set of men, undoubtedly with good hearts, but often with a great deal of ignorance in regard to the treatment of animals, set themselves up as humanitarians, and make everyone else out to be the contrary. If we pass this Bill now, we will have a Bill next Session to stop the clipping of horses. Dr. Hodgins says that a horse died in Boston within three years after being clipped. That statement is made in one of the articles of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Here is what an experienced man says upon that?

"This kind-hearted man must talk of what he knows, and he knows much of many things, but there is no need to say that on the subject of 'horse' he is not well informed, for Mr. Adam Brown, and all of us must have seen horses that have survived clipping for three, thirteen or even twenty-three years."

I mention that because the hon. gentleman admitted that that was what they were after, although they had eliminated it. Anyone who understands a horse or a dog or any other animal will use his experience and knowledge he has taught him. Men who have used and men who understand animals, and particularly sportsmen who are proper sportsmen, will do more, and will do it with more injury to themselves for animals, and will take more care of them, and will suffer for them more than these gentlemen who try to handle animals without knowledge. Evidently the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill has not mastered the law on the subject, because, if he had, he would not have made all the statements he has made. The first clause is simply an extended interpretation of the present law for the prevention of cruelty to animals. The first three sub-sections of section 2 are precisely the words of the present law, and are put in apparently in order to enlarge the appearance of the Bill. Then the hon. gentleman puts in other clauses which I think are very objectionable. I will read the clauses so that the House may see the effect:

"Everyone who wantonly, cruelly or unnecessarily beats, binds, ill-treats, abuses, overdrives or tortures any cattle, poultry, dog, domestic animal or bird; or while driving any cattle or other animal is, by negligence or ill-usage in the driving thereof, the means whereby any mischief, damage or injury is done by any such cattle or other animal; or in any manner encourages, aids or assists at the fighting or baiting of any bull, bear, badger, dog, cock or other kind of animal, whether of domestic or wild nature—"

That is the present law. The following are new clauses:—

"or having the charge or custody of any animal, unnecessarily fails to provide the same with proper food, drink, shelter and protection from the weather; or being the owner, driver or person having the charge or custody of any animal, wantonly and unnecessarily leaves disabled or abandons such animal; or wantonly and unnecessarily carries or causes to be carried, in or upon any vehicle, or otherwise, any animal in a cruel or inhuman manner."

I object to the whole of those clauses for two reasons. In the first place, it would be almost impossible, particularly in view of the subsequent sections of this Act, for any owner of animals to take them to market or to use them in any way without being at the mercy of any passer-by to say whether they are cruelly used or not. Any one who has studied animals in the kennel or in the field or in the stable knows better than these men who are endeavoring, I was going to say in this mawkish sentimental way, to interfere with practical men. I say that farmers and sportsmen, gentlemen and poor men have never been cruel in handling these animals. It is uncalled for in regard to the members of this House or the people of this country for that society to attempt to pass any such law as that. But there is another clause in the present law which this Bill would seriously interfere with. There is a stringent clause in reference to the transportation of animals by railways and ships, and this Bill would interfere with that to such an extent that we would have to reconsider the whole provision. I skip the main provision of the hon. gentleman's Bill in reference to pigeon shooting for the present, but I find this clause in his Bill:

"Any person may interfere to prevent the perpetration of any act of cruelty done in his presence to any animal, and any person who interferes with or obstructs or resists any person so engaged shall, on summary conviction, be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labor, or to both."

The present law is that any owner or peace officer, where any person commits an act of cruelty to animals, may take the offender before a justice of the peace without a warrant. That is a very strong provision and surely that is as far as anyone should desire to go. The hon. gentleman, however, has put in a clause here at the instigation of those people which would establish what I call club law. Suppose I am driving a horse along the street, and am chastising him, and my hon. friend, who is boiling over with indignation at the cruelty practised to animals, takes me by the neck and insists upon my going to the station. If I resist, he may take a club, and, if anyone comes to assist me, he would, according to this, be equally guilty with me. Surely we have not come to that stage in this country that such a provision as that is necessary. Surely it is enough to provide that a man may arrest another without a warrant. Surely these gentlemen mistake the temper of the members of this House, they mistake the temper of the people of this country when they come and ask to have such a law passed. I never shot a bird out of a trap and probably never will; but I do object to men coming, under the guise of preventing cruelty, and saying that a man who does so commits a crime. The Almighty made the beasts to be eaten—certain of them—and the man who cruelly kills one, unless he is a mischievous animal, I am the first to condemn; but when we kill them in the most expert way possible, some one comes and tries to prevent it. The next clause reads:

"Any person may lawfully destroy or cause to be destroyed any animal found to be abandoned, or not properly cared for, when, in the judgment of two justices of the peace, called by him to view the same in his presence, it appears to be injured, disabled or diseased past recovery."

We never heard of a single case in this country where an animal was not destroyed if it was suffering; although there may be occasional cases. Here a man is allowed to destroy the animal when a couple of justices decide that he may. I tell you that when you get so much law on so many points, you get into a dangerous place, where freedom is worse, almost, than no law at all. Now let us look at the other clause, and I think it is one which calls for the close scrutiny of the Minister of Justice. I will read the main clause:

"Every person who keeps or uses any live animal or bird for the purpose of being used as a target, or to be shot at, either for amusement or as a test of skill in marksmanship or for any like purpose—or shoots at such animal or bird—or is present as a party, umpire or judge at any such shooting at any animal or bird—or keeps, or knowingly rents any building, shed, room, yard, field or premises, or knowingly permits the use of any building, shed, room, yard, field or premises, for the purpose of shooting at any animal or bird as aforesaid; shall, on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labor, or to both."

Now, if the hon. gentleman would look at the Consolidated Statutes of Ontario, and from their being in the Consolidated Statutes of Ontario without any disallowance I take it for granted that all the other Provinces have the same rights, and if they have those rights we, of course, do not want to interfere with them, unless we are called upon to do so. In that Act there is a stronger provision for these tender hearted gentlemen in regard to birds that are not food. I am very glad that there is such a law. I will read extracts from it:

"Nothing in this Act contained shall be held to affect the Act for the protection of game and fur-bearing animals, or to apply to any imported cage birds or other domesticated bird or birds, generally known as cage birds, or to any bird or birds commonly known as poultry."

Game birds and domestic birds are excepted. Then the second section:

"It shall not be lawful to shoot, destroy, wound or injure, or to attempt to shoot, destroy, kill, wound or injure any bird whatsoever, save and except eagles, falcons, owls, wild pigeons, black birds, king fishers, crows, jays, English sparrows, and the birds specially mentioned in the Act for the protection of game and fur-bearing animals."

There is a further clause that you shall not destroy the eggs of birds or interfere with their nests; so no bird can be put in a trap, as my hon. friend wants the law to be, nor can it be even shot at; therefore no law at all is necessary except to come down to the one thing, one bare thing, to abolish pigeon shooting out of traps, which these gentlemen have not the straightforwardness to come into the House and ask for. Now, let us see where this statute comes from. That statute that I have just read comes from the State of Rhode Island. If it is a good law I do not object to that; but I would say that of all the States in the Union Rhode Island is the most notorious for passing laws and not obeying them; so the place that it comes from is not a guarantee that they are very serious about it there. The hon. gentleman has improved his Act since last Session. Last Session he had a clause which imposed a penalty of $25; this year the smaller act has got to bear the larger penalty, now it is $50 and three months imprisonment, if the justice sees fit. The hon. member quoted from letters, and I will read one from Mr. Patteson, of Toronto, Postmaster there, a well known authority on animals and birds of all sorts. He says:

"Mr. Brown is bringing in a Bill. But is he not being made an unsuspecting agent for the spurious sensibility of certain officious humanitarians, who, under cover of preventing cruelty to animals, are merely arrogating to themselves a monopoly in bowels of compassion? Gallant and sensitive men are being led by professional exaggerators to believe that there is a vast amount of preventible cruelty going on which it is their duty to stop, and to a society for its prevention such men are easily led to give their names and influence. So far, so good. But agitators are apt to run their fads into the ground. For the life of me I can see no practical reason for ceasing to shoot pigeons from a trap. The Legislature that is now called upon to protect pigeons from the ruthless slaughter of gun clubs is the same body, or akin to the same body, that protects game during many months of the year from destruction, in order that sportsmen may have game to kill, hit or miss, during the other months. Quail and partridges make excellent pie, so also do pigeons. They are all born to be killed for food, and shooting them from a trap is no more cruel than shooting them from any other rise. Indeed, there is far greater chance for the wounded pigeon to be put out of its misery than for the wounded game bird. Moreover, shooting is an art that Canadians will be the better for learning, and Mr. Brown will excuse me for telling him that clay pigeons are as miserable a substitute for blue rocks as a rocking horse would be for a spirited hunter to pupils in another department of sport."

In regard to the cruelty to animals, he says:

"I have devoted my life to animals, finding them far more grateful for kindness than bipeds, and never treacherous where uniformly well treated."

He says again:

"Put a plate of meat and bones on the floor. Bite the tail ends off three six-weeks-old puppies, and I'll bet a dollar all three make for the plate and begin wrangling without giving a thought to their latter ends."

Now one quotation more:

"The Toronto Humane Society are trying, among other things, to stop shooting sparrows. Practical men—farmers, gardeners and others—are seeking means of getting rid of them, finding them to be a destructive pest. In my opinion, gun clubs and shooters are doing good work in the interests of the country by making use of sparrows, by supplying one means of thinning out birds that are rapidly becoming an intolerable nuisance. It is reasonable to suppose that if the Toronto Humane Society existed in New South Wales and New Zealand they would oppose the destruction of rabbits, although the Governments there offer £35,000 to anyone who will invent an effective means of exterminating them."

"In regard to pigeon-shooting, there has been in your columns a very sensible letter from Mr. T. O. Patteson. I would like to add on this subject that the sale of pigeons for trap-shooting affords a considerable amount of money to a great many people, which could not be obtained in any other way. It would not pay to keep pigeons for all they are worth as poultry. Then, as pigeons increase rapidly and are largely free commoners, taking possession of barns, lofts, church spires and such places, and feeding in the grain fields whenever they can, they would in a few years, if not kept down by trap-shooting, become a very serious annoyance both in town and country."

"I hope the well-meant but ill-advised aims of the Toronto society will meet the fate they deserve. If the society would confine itself to legitimate objects they would have enough to do, and a far larger share of public support."

Now the hon. gentleman went to England for authority. I will go there for one moment, and let us see what they did there. Precisely the same sort of a Bill came up there as we have here, a Bill under the auspices of a similar excellent society. I will read you one or two extracts from the debate in the House of Lords, because the speakers express their sentiments much better than I can express mine upon the same subject. The hon. gentleman read from Lord Aberdare. I will read from the Earl Fortescue:

"He never remembered a more remarkable speech made by an ex-Cabinet Minister—indeed an ex-Home Secretary—than the one which had just been delivered."

That is rather a long extract to read now. Here is another one to the same effect. The Earl of Redesdale said:

"He should oppose the Bill upon the ground that it came before the House asking for something under false pretences. He denied altogether that his noble friend (Lord Balfour) had shown there was necessarily any cruelty in pigeon shooting. He contended that there was no cruelty in shooting at a bird for the purpose of killing it, and that the noble lord had failed to show that there was necessarily more cruelty in letting a bird out of a trap and shooting at it, than there was in partridge or pheasant shooting."

"What was cruelty? The noble lord had not ventured to determine the question in this matter. Was it shooting at birds with intent to kill? If this was the meaning of the word, then everyone practices it who went into a turnip field to shoot partridges or into a cover to shoot pheasants."

I understood the hon. mover to say that it was not the shooting that was cruel, but it was the confinement in the traps. If that is true, the same may be said of market women who take domestic fowls to market. They put them in coops and keep them all day without food, and then if they sell them they wring their necks. If the hon. gentleman had ever seen them wring their necks he would bring in a Bill to prevent market women doing so, and we would have to eat our chickens alive. Another matter that struck me in connection with the hon. gentleman's argument and one which afforded me amusement was that there are sometimes thefts of pigeons by boys. If this is an argument then we must go without anything which may be stolen, because somebody might steal it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This would be crushing an infant industry.

Mr. TISDALE. This is the balance of the Earl of Redesdale's remarks in the House of Lords:

"The noble lord said the Bill was for the purpose of putting down pigeon shooting. Then, why was it not so called? He (the Earl of Redesdale) would tell their lordships why it was not, and that was because the noble lord had not the courage to call it so, and also because he knew very well that he would be much more likely to get support from their lordships for the measure by calling it 'Cruelty to Animals Act Amendment Act.' The Bill, however, had nothing whatever to do with cruelty to animals. It was somewhat remarkable that it should have taken thirty or forty years to find out that pigeon shooting was cruelty. If the noble lord, or the society he represented, required further powers to detect cruelty if it was perpetrated, let a Bill be introduced for the purpose. Such a measure, however, should be called by its proper name, as he (the Earl of Redesdale) objected altogether to a Bill being called by a name which could not properly belong to it. There was nothing objectionable in a man showing his skill in the use of a gun or any other instrument, and the shooting at a bird with intent to kill it was as necessary to test skill in the use of a fowling piece as was shooting at a target with a rifle or long bow. There was a class of persons in this country who objected to all kind of field sports, and who regarded hunting or shooting of any kind as cruelty. He (the Earl of Redesdale) called shooting sport, and legitimate sport. He thought there was no ground for the Bill, and therefore he moved its rejection."

The Bill was rejected in that year, 1884, by 78 to 30. So the highest legislative body in England, by a vote equal to almost three to one, rejected the Bill. I will tell the hon. gentleman what they did, and I am perfectly willing to do and anxious to do it if the hon. gentleman will show any cruelty is practiced. If he will show that the birds are badly used while they are taken to the place to be shot, that their eyes are put out, as he has alleged, then this House should do, as the English House has done, pass a very severe measure to punish that offence, and the very members who rejected the Bill under its false name passed a measure to punish anyone who used birds cruelly in taking them to shooting places, or while there, or in handling them at the trap. That is a proper thing to do. Some gentlemen, however, want to stop shooting because they consider it is a kind of sport, and they object to that entirely. If my hon. friend will bring in such a Bill as I have indicated, I will be one of the first to support it; but I do not believe in legislation such as is now proposed, because if it is adopted we shall have Bills of this character introduced year after year until by-and-by they will seek to prevent our killing mosquitoes, which if they are in large bands make loud music and are very troublesome when you are trout-fishing. Hon. gentlemen might as well declare that it is cruel to destroy life of any kind. I do not understand the hon. gentleman to take that position, but he appears to maintain that a man who shoots an animal for food is cruel, and I know no death that is more merciful.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to say a few words only with regard to this matter. I understood the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) to assert that most of the provisions of the Bill are already contained substantially in our laws. He seemed to advance the opinion that the chief feature of the Bill, the only feature of the Bill in fact not already embodied in our law, is that with respect to the shooting of pigeons, holding pigeons in traps and shooting them. It is a question upon which members may differ as to whether this brutal, debasing sport is one that should be encouraged or one that should be condemned. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) has held it to be a very humane and proper sport. My opinion is essentially different. It is exactly the opposite of that, and the Bill, if it has no other provision that is new, except the one in regard to trap shooting, is one that commends itself to my judgment and will receive my support. It may be true, as the hon. gentleman has asserted, that the penalties are too severe. The Bill is open to the consideration of the House, and may receive such amendments as the House may deem proper to adopt. If the penalties are too severe, they may be lessened; if there is any portion of the Bill or any characteristic of the Bill that does not commend itself to the judgment of the House, let the House in Committee change the features of the Bill, but the essential feature of this Bill, the feature to which the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) has raised objection, is one that commends the Bill to my support and is that portion which provides that trapshooting shall be rendered illegal. The clause reads as follows:—

"Keeps or uses any live animal or bird for the purpose of being used as a target, or to be shot at, either for amusement or as a test of skill in marksmanship, or for any like purpose,—or shoots at such animal or bird,—or is present as a party, umpire or judge at any such shooting at any animal or bird,—or keeps, or knowingly rents any building, shed, room, yard, field or premises, or knowingly permits the use of any building, shed, room, yard, field or premises, for the purpose of shooting at any animal or bird as aforesaid."

The question resolves itself exactly into this position: shall we approve of this cruel, brutal sport of taking birds and pigeons and confining them in traps and throwing them up for men to shoot, without the birds having any opportunity to escape, a sport which I hold is low and debasing in its tendency and which is condemned by the better sentiment of this country, by all humane societies and by all humane men and women. It would be a disgrace to this House to reject this Bill, to carry a motion for a six months hoist upon the essential feature of the Bill, which is the feature the hon. gentleman has challenged. I will support the Bill with the understanding that it be referred to a Committee, and that such provisions as may not be approved will be altered or modified.

Mr. CASEY. I find myself compelled to oppose the second reading of the Bill, not at all on account of the provisions against cruelty to animals contained in it, but on account of certain other provisions which I consider form part of the Bill, the provision as to convictions, and so on. Taking the Bill as a whole, I consider its principle is of a nature contrary to public justice in the country. Although I am as much interested in preventing cruelty to animals as the promoter of the Bill, I cannot vote for the second reading without committing myself to the principle of certain clauses to which I object. For this reason I shall vote against the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. LISTER. So far as the Bill is concerned I think that portion relating to trap shooting should be adopted and passed into law, but so far as the rest of the Bill is concerned I think it is imperfectly and inartistically drawn. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he drew it, because he seems to have devoted himself very much to the investigation of the laws in England and in this country, and to draw the conclusion that this Bill, as proposed, covers all the cases. I have said the Bill is inartistically drawn, and I will call attention to a few of the provisions to satisfy hon. members as to that point. For that reason and as a supporter of my hon. friend's resolution, I would advise him to drop this Bill and to introduce a new measure, taking the time between this and the next session to consider all the provisions that ought to be enacted in a Bill of this kind. I need only call the attention of this House to one or two sections of this measure to show how imperfect it is. My hon. friend provides by this Bill that if anyone—shall be punished. Now, an old woman driving her geese home at night might be prosecuted under the provisions of this Act by some neighbor who thought she was driving them too fast. Imagine my hon. friend driving home one of his chickens, and that one of his friends, who might be politically opposed to him, should consider that he had committed a violation of this Act and prosecute him. One can imagine the hon. gentleman in the police court at Hamilton answering a charge of this kind, after the speech he has made here to-night. Let me call the attention of the House to subsection b. Why, short-tailed dogs are a thing of the past. Anybody that bites or cuts off a dog's tail is liable to be prosecuted now.

"Wantonly, cruelly or unnecessarily beats, binds, ill-treats, abuses, overdrives or tortures any cattle, poultry, dog, domestic animal or bird"—

Mr. LANDERKIN. What about sheep?

Mr. LISTER. We know the farmers of the country have to cut sheep's tails, and for very good reasons, and if the farmers are doing anything of this kind they are liable to punishment under the provisions of this Act. My hon. friend must remember that if we want good meat we must have steers in the country, and what is to become of us if an Act of this kind passes into law?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LISTER. I am sure that my hon. friend has never considered those grave questions. I fear that there are great difficulties in the way of this Bill, and that it would be unsafe for the people whom we represent in this House to make them liable to any such pains and penalties as are provided in this Act. If those provisions pass into law my hon. friend will be looked upon as a monster and a terror by the community at large, and surely after the speech we have heard no such character ought to be attached to him. We need only look at his face to see that he is bubbling all over with good nature. Another provision of the Bill, says:

"Shall, on summary conviction, before two justices of the peace, be liable to a penalty not exceeding $50, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labor, or to both."

There is no such thing provided for as calling in a veterinary surgeon. If two magistrates think my animal should be destroyed all they have to do is to make an order for its destruction and I have no redress. Surely the hon. gentleman does not mean to put such power as that into the hands of two magistrates. Suppose I was driving with the hon. gentleman and that my horse should become fractious and I should use a whip that he thinks is too heavy, or that I should strike the horse a little too hard, I would be liable to be punished under the provisions of that Act.

An hon. MEMBER. And fined $50 and imprisoned.

Mr. LISTER. Yes, fined fifty dollars and three months imprisonment at hard labor. We know there is hardly any hard labor now, because my hon. friend the Minister of Justice tells us that hard labor is pretty near over and that the prisoners only have to break stones.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And they get tobacco.

Mr. LISTER. In view of these facts I would ask my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Brown) in all seriousness to withdraw this Act. Did you draw this Bill out yourself?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Address the Chair.

Mr. LISTER. I would ask the hon. gentleman Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman drew out this Bill himself. I see that he shakes his head as if to mean yes.

Mr. BROWN. Who shook his head? Was it I?

Mr. LISTER. I understood that you nodded your head in assent.

Mr. BROWN. Oh no, I will give no answer to that.

Mr. LISTER. Then it was not the hon. gentleman who drew out the Act, and I would advise that it should be taken back to the gentleman who drew it out to have those objectionable clauses expunged. Let the hon. gentleman stick to his Act as far as the birds are concerned, although in this there are great difficulties. An old woman, for instance who takes her chicken to market in a cage is likely to be fined for having it boxed up. For several reasons I should like to support this Act but I am afraid I will have to vote against it in its present form.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not presume that the hon. gentleman is in jest, although he has that appearance. The hon. gentleman has said that for the reasons he expressed he was afraid he could not support the Bill and I shall attempt to remove the objections he has advanced, with confidence that he is serious and wishes to support the principle of the Bill. The hon. gentleman finds fault with the Bill because it goes too far in punishing anyone who—

Mr. LISTER.

"Wantonly, cruelly or unnecessarily beats, binds, ill-treats, abuses, overdrives or tortures any cattle, poultry, dog, domestic animal or bird."

The hon. gentleman has depicted the misfortune that might happen to an old woman driving home her geese, and who might come under the provision of the Bill of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown). Let me remove that difficulty from that hon. gentleman's path by reminding him that these are exactly the words of the present law and that the hon. gentleman from Hamilton in all these clauses of the Bill has simply taken almost word for word the language of chapter 173 of the Revised Statutes. The old woman driving home her geese will be subject to no greater pains or penalties than she is subject to under the present law. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) wishes to add some sub-sections by way of introducing new principles into the law of cruelty to animals, and for convenience in drafting he has pursued the course of re-enacting the present law and inserting his new sub-sections so that the changes which he proposes in the Act will be seen at a glance and without the necessity of comparing two statutes. It may be that the hon. gentleman has departed in two or three particulars from the strict language of the Act concerning cruelty to animals, but so far as I have examined the Bill, I find that he is re-enacting the same law with the addition of two provisions: first of all, that it is expedient to make a penal offence of using live animals as a target. That is the first principle as I take it of the hon. gentleman's Bill. In this country when we have already gone so far as to make penal the offence of even over-driving an animal, of beating or binding him, is it not consistent legislation to say that we shall also go so far as to say that that animal which we have protected from beating and overwork shall not be shot at as a living target? That is the first principle of the Bill. The second principle of the Bill is that any person who witnesses any act of cruelty like this may interfere. The hon. gentleman who spoke so well in opposition to the Bill, said that under its provisions any person might interfere with a person doing as he liked with his own property. At present if a person sees an act of cruelty done in his presence he has not the right to interfere; he has not the protection of this Bill to interfere and the person who stops him from interfering is not subject to the penalties provided under this Bill. My hon. friend behind me asks, who is to decide whether it is an act of cruelty done in his presence. Precisely the same authority as decides all questions as to cruelty under the present law. If an animal is being beaten, unduly bound, overdriven or tortured, it is the police authorities who have the administration of the whole law upon this matter; and, subject to the adjudication of that authority, my hon. friend simply proposes to add to the law, that if a private person sees an animal improperly or cruelly maltreated they may interfere without subjecting themselves to damages, or to be turned off the premises as interfering in matters beyond their business. The hon. gentleman who spoke last, likewise referred to the last sub-section, and said that under it any one might step in and lawfully destroy his property. That is not so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I said on the order of two magistrates.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not even on the order of two magistrates, unless the animal is one which has been abandoned or is not properly cared for. It is by no means an uncommon circumstance for an animal which has reached that age when it is worthless, to be turned out into the roads or commons to die or to be killed as the case may be; and in the present law there is nothing to enable any person to take that animal and put an end to its suffering. What my hon. friend proposes is a speedy way of doing so. First of all, the animal having been abandoned, two justices of the peace are to be called in to decide whether its existence shall be put an end to.

Mr. MILLS. (Bothwell). I would like to ask whether under section 4, a party who fails to furnish proper protection to an animal might not have that animal destroyed?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think he would not. We are, however, dealing with the second reading of this Bill now. I am not discussing the question whether the clauses are too strict or not. I am merely endeavoring to show that some of the objections raised against it are equally applicable to the existing law; and that in asking the House to decide on the principle of this Bill, the introducer is calling our attention to these simple features—the using of living animals as a target, and the propriety of establishing the principle that any private individual may interfere to prevent cruelty, and that an animal which has been abandoned or is useless may be put an end to. But as regards the objection that the Act may be abused and an animal may be treated as abandoned if it is not properly housed, I must remind the hon. gentleman that the present law, and every law of every kind to prevent immorality or cruelty is subject to a like objection. It is impossible to enact a statute to put down any kind of vice or cruelty that does not contain provisions which may be carried to an extreme extent by fanatical or injudicious people; notwithstanding which, we find that these statutes are useful for the purpose of protecting innocent people and animals from abuse. In practice such statutes are not really abused, because they are administered by people of ordinary common sense in the country who understand pretty well how their provisions are intended to work, and how they can be made of benefit to the public without being made instruments of evil.

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not intend to speak on this subject further than to say that I will support the Bill; and in this connection I desire to refer to a practical illustration which I had a short time ago of the necessity for the provision contained in the last clause. About two months ago a horse in the neighborhood in which I live was wandering about in the fields. After the snow came, the animal could obtain nothing upon which to live. I had it brought into a yard and fed. I then applied to the Ottawa Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals to ascertain if there was any legal way by which an abandoned animal might be killed. I received an answer that there was no such provision. Now, the last clause of this Bill seems to make provision for a case of this kind, and I am very glad to see it. I also approve of the Bill on general principles.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Tisdale).

Mr. TROW. According to the Rules of the House I understand that any hon. gentleman who leaves his seat loses his vote. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) has left his seat, and his vote should be struck off.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am not aware that such a rule exists.

Mr. CASEY. Oh, Mr. Speaker, it has always been the rule that an hon. member leaving his seat before the result of the division is declared loses his vote. It has been decided more than once in my experience in Parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS. If he leaves the Chamber, not his seat.

Mr. SPEAKER. I declare the amendment passed in the negative.

Mr. TISDALE. I rise to a question of Order. I think at all events Mr. Brown is killed on the wing.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. BOWELL moved the adjournment of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 21st February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL DEBATES.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved:

That this House do now concur in the First Report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of the House during the present Session.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 55) respecting Rules of Court in relation to Criminal matters.—(Sir John Thompson.)

FREE LIST EXTENSION (COMBINATIONS) BILL.

Mr. EDGAR moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 56) to provide for placing on the free list articles of merchandise the production of which may be controlled by trusts or combinations. He said: I hope that there exists in this House, because I am sure that there exists in the country, an earnest desire to attack and destroy the evils which are arising to the community at large from combinations to raise prices, whether those combinations are to restrict the production of certain articles, or are of other descriptions. The object of all these combinations is, of course, to prevent fair and open competition in the Canadian market, and, in order to prevent competition in the Canadian market, it is, I think, certainly in nine cases out of ten, essential that the combines should have the control of the Canadian markets, and, in order to have control of the Canadian markets, they must shut out competition from abroad, from England or from foreign countries, in those particular articles in respect to which the combination has been formed. It is perfectly clear to my mind that, in order to prevent this monopoly and to give the competition which the combines seek to prevent, we must throw open the barrier which prevents competition from abroad, and must take off import duties which prevent that competition in those articles. That is the object of the Bill which I am introducing. I propose that, whenever an import duty is imposed by law on any commodities which are manufactured in Canada to an amount exceeding $200,000, and over 80 per cent. of the aggregate value of the amount manufactured or produced in Canada shall be manufactured or produced by persons in a combine, then, in that case, these articles shall be admitted into Canada free of duty. In order to determine whether any particular articles are the subject of a combine, the Bill proposes that it shall be the duty of the Treasury Board, when information is received by the Minister of Finance of the existence of such agreement, to make an investigation into it, and it provides that the Treasury Board shall have the same powers to enforce the attendance of witnesses as a Court of Record has in civil cases. It is then provided that, if upon such investigation, it shall appear that the commodity is the subject of a combine, the Governor General shall, by proclamation, order such merchandise to be imported into Canada free of import duty. It is, however, provided that, whenever such combination in respect of these articles shall cease, then, upon the report of the Treasury Board to that effect, the Governor shall give notice by proclamation, and then the original duty upon those articles shall come into force again. The committee which was appointed last Session, and presented its report, certainly only touched upon the fringe of this question of combinations. I suppose they were prevented by the limited time at their disposal, from going into a great many of the combinations which are known to exist in the country. But enough was shown by that report, which I have considered very attentively, to convince that committee that there were evils existing here which required legislative remedy, and the chairman of that committee has already introduced into this House, a Bill providing what he considers appropriate remedies to overcome that evil. His Bill introduces pains and penalties. I do not propose in this Bill, to make offences criminal, but, as the combinations are formed to extort money out of the community, I propose to apply a financial remedy, and to prevent their being able to extort that money any longer. I am not prepared to say that there are not some articles produced in this country which may be the subject of combines, and which are not affected by our tariff. There are a few of such, undoubtedly. Monopolies may exist from other causes than a high tariff, but very few do exist in this country, and therefore, so far as my Bill will not cover cases of that kind, and, perhaps, even in reference to those cases which the Bill will cover, it is proper to introduce stringent legislation in the direction proposed by the chairman of the committee of last Session. I, for one, will do everything in my power to assist in perfecting that measure, and I depend upon the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) to assist me in perfecting this measure. There must be a great many members of this House who have an honest belief that the high protective tariff does not rob the people, but I think those members will not go so far as to say that combinations do not rob the people, and I think they will see that it is in their interests to support the proposition I make in order to avoid the evils which are arising in the way I have described.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not object to the introduction of the Bill, but, notwithstanding the explanation of the hon. gentleman, we would like to see the Bill itself before pronouncing on its merits. I would warn the hon. gentleman, however, that perhaps he may find that, this being a matter of trade, it should be introduced by resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

EXTENSION OF CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY TO QUEBEC.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec) asked, 1. The total amount paid on the sum of $1,500,000 voted in 1885 by the Dominion Parliament for the extension to Quebec of the Canadian Pacific Railway. 2. To whom were the several payments made on account of the said sum? 3. For what object were such payments made, and what has been obtained in return therefor?

Mr. FOSTER. 1. The total amount paid is $1,500,000. 2. $970,000 to the Bank of Montreal for bonds of the North Shore Railway Company, purchased at 87½, now held by the Government, and $530,000 to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. 3. The object for which these payments were made was the object as set forth in the Act 48-49 Vic., cap. 58.

COMMUNICATION ON THE NORTHERN AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, What steps, if any, the Government have taken to establish communication between Indiantown and the Blackville station of the Northern and North-Western Railway, over the railway subsidised by the Government, and for months completed, but which up to this time has not been utilised?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The section of road between Indiantown and Blackville was built by the Northern and Western Railway Company under a Dominion grant subsidy of $3,200 per mile, and is owned by them. The president of the Northern and Western Railway is perfectly aware that the Intercolonial Railway are perfectly ready to receive from and deliver to them freight and passengers at Indiantown, the terminus of the Indiantown branch of the Intercolonial Railway.

A. R. McDONALD, SUPERINTENDENT ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. CHOQUETTE) asked, Whether the Government, or the Minister of Railways, has received any petition, letter or document, signed by the train hands on the Intercolonial, asking that Mr. A. R. McDonald, superintendent of that section of the Intercolonial lying between Quebec and St. Flavie, be also appointed superintendent over that section between St. Flavie and Campbellton? If such is the case, when was it forwarded? By how many employes was this petition or letter signed?

What answer did the Government make to it, and does it intend to grant the prayer of the said petition?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Minister of Railways has received petition signed by the train hands on the Intercolonial Railway asking that Mr. A. R. McDonald's district be extended from St. Flavie to Campbellton. It was forwarded on the 5th May, 1887. It was signed by 1,722 employes, many of whom have never had any connection whatever with the operation of the section between St. Flavie and Campbellton. The matter was investigated, and the facts placed before the Minister, who decided that no change was necessary, and no answer was made to the petition.

MAIL CARRIER AT BRUSSELS, ONT.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked, 1. Who has the contract for carrying the mails from the post office to the railway station in the village of Brussels, county of Huron? 2. The name of each contractor, if there is more than one? 3. In whose favor are the Government cheques made out, and by whom endorsed? 4. What salary is paid the contractor, or contractors, for the work?

Mr. HAGGART. The firm that has the contract for carrying the mails from the post office to the railway station in the village of Brussels, county of Huron, is R. & S. Beaty. 2. The names of the parties to the firm are Robert and Samuel Beaty. 3. The Government cheques are made out in favor of R. & S. Beaty. I cannot tell who endorses them, as the cheques are at present in the hands of the Auditor General. 4. There is no salary paid to the contractor. The contract price for carrying the mail is $150.

LIQUOR LICENSES IN THE ROCKY MOUNTAIN PARK.

Mr. HOLTON asked, Is the Government aware whether any license or licenses have been issued for the sale of intoxicating liquors within the limits of the Rocky Mountain Park? If so, under what authority and by virtue of what statute were such license or licenses issued?

Mr. DEWDNEY. On the 12th of July of this year, the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories reported to the Department of the Interior that he had issued a license to the Canadian Pacific Railway, at Banff, for the sale of liquors. It is presumed that this permit was issued under authority of section 92, cap. 50, of the Revised Statutes of Canada.

PRIVILEGE—RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. TROW. Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to bring before your notice and that of the House a little episode that occurred last evening when the vote was being recorded on the Bill of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown).

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it a question of privilege?

Mr. TROW. It is a question of privilege. That hon. gentleman, when the vote was recorded, was so elated with his apparent success, that he acted as on the wing. He moved to and fro in this Chamber. My object, Mr. Speaker, in drawing your attention to the matter at the present moment, is to offer a few remarks with regard to your ruling. We have always been under the impression that it is necessary that members should be silent while the votes are being recorded. I know that the First Minister is invariably so exact in his calculations that, in order to ascertain whether all his followers have recorded their votes, he jots down a record of the vote as it is taken. I have noticed that is his invariable rule. I have sometimes attempted to adopt that course on account of the position I hold in my party, but in consequence of the noise frequently made by hon. members, in consequence of an hon. gentleman moving from his seat, I sometimes find myself almost unable to do so, and the hue and cry of hon. members is sufficient to disturb the whole House. I merely bring this matter to your notice, Mr. Speaker, in order that proceedings of that nature may be stopped. I was fully under the impression that any hon. gentleman who moved from his seat after the "yeas" and "nays" had been asked for and the order been given to call in the members and until the vote was finally declared, lost his vote. In 1881, I challenged the vote of an hon. member who sat in the rear of this House, and who at the time was standing off the platform. The next day he brought up the question and sought to have his vote recorded. The Speaker of that day, Mr. Speaker Blanchet, struck the vote off the division list. The next day he appealed to the Speaker, and the Speaker's ruling was as follows:—

"Putting the question is from the time I ask the House yea or nay till the time I declare the motion carried or lost. The name of the hon. member was recorded, but he went out of the House, according to his own statement, before the question was finally declared. The members will recognize the wisdom of that rule; and in fact it would be impossible to receive the vote if every hon. gentleman was allowed to leave his seat, for in this country the vote is taken by what we call assis et lebe, by which every member must be in his seat when the vote is taken. If every hon. member were allowed to leave his seat, a great confusion would be created, and it would be impossible to correctly register the names of the members. In this case I am very sorry that I cannot comply with the request of the hon. member for Vancouver. I am bound to comply with the Rules of the House."

I can also quote a better authority than Mr. Speaker Blanchet, an authority whose work is considered, not only in this House, but at Washington and in England, the best authority on record—Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure. On page 388 the author says:

"Members should not leave their seats before the question is finally declared. In 1881 a member's vote was struck off on account of his leaving his place before the question was so declared."

I move, therefore, that the vote of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) be erased from the record, in compliance with the rules, and as an example to hon. gentlemen to remain in their seats till the vote is recorded.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will be safe to leave the case in the hands of Mr. Speaker without any discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The decision given by Mr. Blanchet could not apply to the present case. Rule 17, quoted in that decision, reads as follows:—

"When the Speaker is putting a question, no member shall walk out of or across the House, or make any noise or disturbance; and when a member is speaking, no member shall interrupt him, except to order, nor pass between him and the Chair; and no member may pass between the Chair and table, nor between the Chair and the mace, when the mace has been taken off the table by the Sergeant."

This rule is enacted simply for the preservation of decorum and order in the House. Hon. members will notice that there is no penalty attached to a violation of this rule. All I could do in the event of a member infringing it would be to call him to order, and if he continued to disturb the House, I could name him and then it would rest with the House to deal with him according to the gravity of the offence. In order to deprive a member of his right to vote there must be a clear disposition of the law, and certainly I would not undertake to reject the vote of a member on that rule. I, therefore, consider that my decision of last night was correct, and I declare the present motion of the hon. member for South Perth out of order.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose the First Minister remembers the vote referred to by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), when Mr. Banister went out of the House on all fours. He had left his seat, and on leaving his seat he went outside of the jurisdiction of the Speaker altogether.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think, now that the attention of hon. members has been called to this matter, and the necessity for maintaining decorum, and for members remaining in their seats until the votes are recorded has been enforced, I hope my hon. friend will not press his motion, as it might break the heart of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown), but will withdraw it.

Mr. TROW. I withdraw the motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is out of order ; there is nothing to withdraw.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Minister of Railways and Canals.—
(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

WRECKING LAWS.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved second reading of Bill (No. 2) to permit foreign vessels to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill I hope it will receive a little more favorable consideration from the House than it met with last year. This is a subject which, I think, demands and requires at the hands of hon. members very careful consideration. This Bill affects a large number of people, a large monied interest, and it is also a Bill which is of a quasi-international character and is one founded on humanity, and for all these reasons it requires and receives careful consideration. The object of the Bill is to permit foreign vessels to enter Canadian waters and assist vessels wrecked, stranded or in distress, and to bring in wrecking apparatus for the purpose of assisting them. The Bill is called for owing to the fact that there stands upon the statute-book of the United States a Bill passed by Congress eleven years ago, which was re-enacted last year in slightly different terms, but to the same effect, granting similar privileges to Canadian vessels in American waters, but it is not to come into force until a proclamation has been issued by the President of the United States when he is satisfied that the Canadian Government have granted similar privileges to American vessels in Canadian waters. Owing to the fact that the House last year saw fit in its wisdom to reject the Bill I had the honor to have in charge, the President of the United States in his annual message to Congress, referred to the fact, and stated:

"It is much to be desired that some agreement should be reached with Her Majesty's Government by which the damages to life and property on the great lakes may be alleviated, by removing or humanely regulating the obstacles to reciprocal assistance to wrecked or stranded vessels. The Act of 19th June, 1878, which offers to Canadian vessels free access to our inland waters in aid of wrecked or disabled vessels, has not yet become effective through concurrent action by Canada."

That at once draws attention to the fact that if this subject is considered worthy of a reference by the chief magistrate of the great Republic lying alongside of us, it is some reflection on this House that we have not given it such consideration, nor met the efforts of the President of the United States in his efforts to settle this matter. I hold that this House and this Government should give this matter every attention, and I believe that this Bill which I have brought in will satisfy the wants of the case. I believe further, that it is in the interests of Canada that this Bill should become law. In 1876 a regulation was issued by the then Minister of Customs, Mr. Burpee, to the effect that foreign vessels have no right to come into Canadian waters to render assistance to Canadian vessels, and the whole difficulty and objection is founded upon that regulation issued by Mr. Burpee. After this date a long correspondence took place between the two Governments, and a great many cases were alluded to where it was found that property had been lost owing to the fact that the nearest and most available tugs could not render assistance, because they belong to a different nationality to the country in whose waters the wreck was. It is contended that no serious case of this kind has ever been brought to the attention of the Minister of Customs, without his giving permission to American vessels to come to the aid of vessels stranded in Canadian waters, whereas the American Government refused to allow Canadian vessels to go to the assistance of vessels in American waters. That is just the case that I wish to make out, and it is a strong argument in favor of this Bill. Our wreckers say that assistance has been obtained from American tugs, because of statements made to Ottawa, and that permission has been given for United States tugs to come to Canadian waters. We have before us, in a letter, which I believe has been sent to every member of this House, facts detailing the circumstances of a case in which this permission was given, last year, to the detriment of Canadian wreckers. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) referred, last Session, to certain cases where refusals had been given by the American Government to allow Canadian vessels to go to the assistance of vessels in American waters. I then told him that this was perfectly true, but that in all cases where wrecks had taken place in Canadian waters, permission had been given to the American vessels to come in here. This permission is against the interests of our wreckers, who have invested their money in valuable plant and machinery, but it is in accordance with the kind and humane heart of the Minister of Customs. We find that, last year, when a vessel was stranded in a harbor on Lake Huron—a safe, land-locked harbor, where no immediate danger was apprehended—after the vessel had fallen into the hands of the insurance companies, who were negotiating with the owner of pumps and wrecking apparatus in Canada to go to her assistance, an instance of this kind occurred. The insurance company had almost made the bargain with a Canadian wrecker, but they telegraphed here to the Minister of Customs for permission to get in a foreign wrecking apparatus from Sault Ste. Marie, and he answered: "Yes, you can get one pump in, if there is no pump available in Canada." The insurance company at once told this Canadian with whom they had been making the bargain: "We don't want you, we are going to get a pump and tugs from Sault Ste. Marie." This Canadian wrecker communicated with the Minister of Customs and told him that the permission to bring in this pump was given under false pretences, that wrecking apparatus was available in Canada, and he asked that the tug, when brought to Canadian waters, should be seized. No attention, however, was paid to his telegram. That American wrecking apparatus came to this Canadian harbor, raised the vessel, and took the job and the profits out of the hands of the Canadian wreckers.

Mr. CHARLTON. Where was this vessel?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. At Tober Murray harbor. I will read the following in relation to the circumstances from the letter of Mr. Wm. Leslie:—

"On that date, Oct. 5, I wired your department at Ottawa, as follows:—'Why grant permit for American wreckers to go to Isaac May, sank in Tober Murray harbor, when our plant under offer for same job. Answer.' To which I received the following reply:—'No permission given but for use of one pump, provided none could be obtained in Canada."

(Signed) "J. JOHNSON."

"I then wired your department, saying that as the Andrew J. Smith had then come in to do the job under misrepresentation, I hoped that your department would instruct your officers at Collingwood and Owen Sound to seize the tug and outfit when they came in with the May and hold them pending enquiry, and I also wrote you on the same subject, but have not since been favored with a reply, and nothing was done in the matter."

This letter is from a gentleman who has invested $30,000, during the past few years, in furnishing a complete wrecking apparatus and outfit for work upon the great inland waters. It is a proud thing for Canadians to know that this wrecking apparatus is the most perfect on the whole chain of inland lakes; its pumping capacity is greater than any to be found on the American side, and the whole apparatus is more valuable, more complete and can do more work than any American plant. The gentlemen who own this apparatus, as well as others engaged in the same business, are now pressing that this Bill should become law.

Mr. CHARLTON. Where are they located?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. They are located along the chain of lakes. They are going to have their headquarters at Kingston and Windsor and the wrecking plant will be on the upper lakes.

Mr. CHARLTON. They are not there now?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. They were at Windsor or Sarnia last year, because they could not get a job, owing to the fact that these American wreckers were allowed to come into Canadian waters. I know that the Americans guard their privileges in this respect, and until we accept their offer of reciprocity in the matter, I think they are quite right. They say: We have on our statute-book an offer that if you will give us reciprocity on this matter, we will give you the right to come into our waters, but until that is done, you cannot do any work in American waters. There is another large firm owning pumps and wrecking apparatus, composed of Captain Donnelly and son, and the Calvin Company, who have an interest in this matter. All these wreckers are in favor of the passing of this Bill. They are not afraid to compete with the Americans in any waters. But more than that, Sir, I do not think there are more than one or two who claim that they own wrecking apparatus, and who have any objection to the passage of this Bill. The tugs and apparatus are generally most inferior. What other classes are in favor of this Bill? The wholeshipping interest of the entire chain of inland lakes. I venture to say, that the owner of every ship or vessel on those lakes is in favor of it. I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. A. M. Smith, of Toronto, who has a very large interest in our inland shipping, in which he says:

"The provisions of this measure are in the interests of the general community, inasmuch as they must tend to lessening the loss of property by disasters on the lakes, by enabling vessels in distress to avail themselves of the most readily obtained and most efficient appliances for assisting them. In many cases that have come within my own personal experience thousands of dollars' worth of property has been imperilled, and frequently totally lost, by delays due to the absence of such international privileges. Canadian vessel owners, underwriters, and wrecking men, except, perhaps, some with very inferior appliances, will all, I am sure, regard the passage of this Bill as a boon, and I trust that it may meet with acceptance on both sides of the House."

The Canadian Marine Association, at its meeting in Toronto, where was represented every shipping interest in the Canadian inland waters, passed the following resolution:—

"Resolved, that it is advisable that this association take action with reference to assisting in bringing before the Government the necessity of allowing the Bill for reciprocity in wrecking, which will again be brought before the Dominion House by the Hon. George Kirkpatrick, and that any deputation which may go from this association to Ottawa shall press upon the Government the necessity of this matter, and that the boards of trade of Toronto, Hamilton and Kingston be asked to cooperate."

The boards of trade of Toronto, Hamilton and Kingston all petitioned in favor of this Bill last year. The board of trade of Montreal did not consider it specifically, because it was not brought before them at the time of their meeting, but the most influential men of Montreal also petitioned in favor of it. Here is a letter which has been put into my hand, from Mr. Milloy, manager of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, in which he says of this Bill:

"I think it is a good thing. The reason that the Spartan was taken to Detroit—this steamer was wrecked on some of the upper lakes a few years ago—was that she was in charge of American tugs, and they could not go to a Canadian port with her, otherwise they would be seized. If we had a law like that proposed by Mr. Kirkpatrick, she would have been repaired in Canada, and the duty on the repairs coming into Canada would have been saved. I hope the Bill will carry."

So we lost the job of repairing that vessel for the want of a law of this kind; and if such a law is desired by shipowners and wreckers, why should we not grant it? The answer made heretofore and in correspondence with Washington has been that we are giving away more than we receive, that the greater number of these wrecks occur in Canadian waters, and, therefore, the Americans want to get into our waters without giving anything in return; and it is said that if they also give us the right of towage and coasting, we will consider the matter. With regard to the first proposition, I say it is not true that the greater number of those wrecks occur in Canadian waters. That may have been the case twenty years ago, when small sailing vessels were generally employed on the inland lakes, and the winds may have blown them on to the Canadian shores. But now, when large steam vessels are engaged in the carrying trade, they do not come so frequently into Canadian waters, and the losses occur principally in American waters. I hold in my hand a return of wrecks in inland waters for the year 1887—I have not the return for 1888—and this return shows that out of 73 total wrecks which occurred in 1887, only 11 were in Canadian waters, and out of 100 partial wrecks, only 12 were in Canadian waters.

Mr. FOSTER. The whole lake line?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes, from Lake Michigan down to the River St. Lawrence. That shows that owing to the change in the class of vessels now navigating the inland waters, the wrecks that occur are chiefly in American waters, and therefore, if reciprocity in wrecking is granted, the chief gainers will be Canadians. Now, when we consider the great amount of tonnage on those waters, and the great value which this advantage would give to our wreckers, I think this Parliament should, without hesitation, give it to them. But it is contended that we can secure some other advantage if we hold out a little longer. I do not believe that is possible. The Congress of the United States have offered us, in the cause of humanity and progress, reciprocity in wrecking; and if we say that we will not accept that unless they also give us reciprocity in the coasting trade and in towage, we may lose the reciprocity offered to us. What does reciprocity in the coasting trade amount to? There is no comparison. We have about 150,000 tons of tonnage in the inland waters registered for Canada. I have no return of the exact amount registered on the American side, but it goes up among the millions of tons, and last year there were built 88 new vessels on the American side with a total tonnage of 108,525 tons, three-fourths of the whole of our tonnage registered in inland waters. It will be seen from these figures that the two interests cannot be compared, but are as a mountain to a mole-hill. It is impossible for us to expect that the Americans will give us reciprocity in the coasting trade merely because we hold off from accepting their offer of reciprocity in wrecking. Now, we have another Bill before this House, proposed by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson). It is apparently a very fair Bill, providing for reciprocity in wreckage, towage and the coasting trade; but the shipping men throughout Canada know very well that that is perfectly futile and absurd; as one of the correspondents says, we have not the ghost of a chance of getting reciprocity in the coasting trade. Then, why hold out the delusive hope of getting it by passing such a Bill? It is only keeping the promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope. We might say, in the words of Macbeth:

"And be these juggling fiends no more believed,
That palter to us in a double sense;
That keep the word of promise to our ear
And break it to our hope?"—

The hon. gentleman, seeing that there is a great cry for the acceptance of this question from the whole country, has brought down a Bill which purports to give it, but the effect of which really will be to prevent us having reciprocity in wrecking. I hope the Government will not support that Bill and its principle as opposed to the offer which is now open to it. Not only are the shipping men in favor of the Bill of which I have the honor to move the second reading, but all the underwriters and insurance companies, and the people interested in marine trade are in favor of it. That being the case, why should we not adopt it? Last year, the Government in their wisdom, because the United States offered us reciprocity in trees and fruits, accepted at once that offer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not at once.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Well, two days afterwards. That being the case, why should they defer accepting the present one? Then an offer of reciprocity was accepted against the protests of the fruitmen and the nurseymen of Canada, but now we have an offer, the acceptance of which is advocated by every person interested in the business. I am not going into all the cases that were alluded to last year. I submit that this Bill ought, on every principle, to be adopted. It is a measure in the interests of the marine trade, it is a Bill called for by international courtesy, it is a Bill which rests on the broad ground of humanity, and which on that ground alone, if on no other, should be accepted. If the House will pass the second reading, it would be well that the Bill should be referred to a select committee; and I think a committee might be named which would consider this Bill and also consider, if necessary, the principle of the Bill proposed by my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Patterson), so that the latter, if it has any merit, might be incorporated in the measure before you; but we should not allow the question of reciprocity in wrecking to be coupled, as my hon. friend has coupled it, with the question of tolls and navigation laws. Should the House pass the second reading, I intend proposing that the Bill be referred to a select committee composed of Messrs. Cockburn, Bergeron, Diekey, Edgar, Charlton, Labelle, Langelier (Quebec), Masson, Holton, Mulock, Shanly, Patterson (Essex), Weldon (St. John), Weldon (Albert), and the mover.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I do not call your attention, Sir, to the irregular proceeding of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) in discussing in advance a Bill which is not before the House—

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It is before the House.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex)—but I will place myself in order by moving, in amendment, that Bills Nos. 2 and 7 be now read the second time and referred to a select committee composed of Messrs. Bowell, Tupper, Kirkpatrick, Ferguson (Welland), Boyle, Charlton, Préfontaine, and the mover. I think I am consulting the best interests of the country in placing some members of the Administration upon the committee, as it is a matter, after all, in which the Government of the day should have a decided policy. My hon. friend, in dealing with the question, has appealed to this House on the plea of international courtesy and humanity. I do not think, after our recent experience of the treatment we have received from our American cousins, that the plea of international courtesy should have very great weight with us to-day. As to the plea of humanity, I think I satisfied my hon. friend last year that in that plea he was quite mistaken. I supposed then that his generous heart had clouded his better judgment, but I am afraid I cannot give him that credit to-day, for I must say that to-day, for want of a better argument he is making use of the ad captandum cry, in trying to make us believe that the question of humanity is involved in this business matter. Many of those who, in good faith, support the hon. gentleman in this matter, are under the impression that the Canadian Government are acting harshly towards American vessels in distress; and they believe that the object of my hon. friend's Bill is to enable wrecking companies to assist vessels in distress. Nothing of the kind is the case. When may a vessel be said to be in distress? A steamer, when it springs a leak, or when its machinery is damaged, and a sailing vessel, when it springs a leak, or loses its sails or spars, or its rudder or sailing gear is damaged, and there is no law, human or divine, to prevent any vessel of any nationality aiding such a vessel in distress in Canadian waters. The only occasion when American wrecking tugs or tugs of any description, with their appliances, are prevented from interfering in Canadian waters, is when the vessel they wish to rescue is an absolute wreck, when it is beached or stranded, and in that case, owing to the action of the American Government in 1876, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Mackenzie), when he was head of the Administration, with that sturdy manliness which characterised him, had an Order in Council passed retaliating on the Americans. He acted in favor of Canadian wrecking men and Canadian labor, and it was in harmony with the whole spirit of the National Policy that this existing system should be maintained, unless we could get substantial concessions in return for what we might give. Now, the Bill I have introduced does propose that substantial concessions should be obtained from our American neighbors. The vessel men of the United States are eager in seeking a concession which will be granted by the Bill of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), and I leave it to the common sense of hon. members of this House, whether we ever heard of our American friends being anxious to have concessions which do not yield them a material advantage. My hon. friend, when he speaks of his measure as being to the advantage of Canadian wrecking tugs, is altogether in error. He is altogether in error in supposing that the majority of wrecks occur in American waters. I admit that the majority of wrecks do occur in American waters in the case of Lake Michigan, but my hon. friend is not as well up in geography as he is in humanity. There is a corner of Lake Ontario, where, owing to the conformation of the coast, the majority of the wrecks occur in American waters, and my hon. friend's constituent in whose interest he is introducing this Bill is desirous of having access with his valuable wrecking plant to Collin's Bay and the wrecking waters of that portion of the lake. But my hon. friend is in error in supposing that in Lake Erie and River and Lake St. Clair, the majority of wrecks are in American waters. If the policy of my hon. friend be adopted, we may as well give up attempting to maintain the National Policy at all, because we would be giving away absolutely to our American neighbors those valuable concessions which might possibly bring about in the near future a reciprocity treaty on an extended scale. But if we give them everything they desire, everything they demand, there will be nothing left for us to exchange with them on any future occasion when we desire to bring about a reciprocity treaty on a larger scale; and therefore I think this Bill should not become law, but that the Bill which I introduced should find favor with the House and with the Administration, because, should that Bill be accepted, it will bring about a complete system of reciprocity in our inland marine navigation. We would be able to get some advantage if our Canadian tugs had the privilege of towing American vessels in American waters. There has been no case pointed out by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), and I defy any member of this House to point out a case where an American vessel has ever been interfered with in coming to the aid of a vessel in distress or where a wrecked vessel, although not in danger, has been refused the use of American tugs and appliances when Canadian tugs were not available. The whole argument on the ground of humanity is erroneous and false;

There is no question of humanity involved in it, but it is simply a question of business. If it is desired to encourage American labor and American tugs at the expense of Canadian labor and Canadian tugs, then the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac should become law; but there is not an argument that he has put forward which cannot be applied to the abrogation of the Treaty of 1818, and I do not see how the hon. gentleman can consistently support the present Administration, can support the National Policy, and can support the course of the Government towards the Americans on all other grounds, and yet take the ground he does in this Bill which is now before the House. To show the effect of carrying out the existing law, I may say that a Detroit wrecking firm have bought property in Amherstburg, and are establishing themselves there in order to do wrecking in Canadian waters. That is fair, if they use Canadian vessels, employ Canadian labor and start from Canadian ports; but we are not willing that they should bring in their seamen and their tugs from American ports to oust our Canadian seamen from their legitimate avocation. I quite favor sending this measure, in conjunction with the Bill which I have introduced, to a committee. I desire nothing but an intelligent and well-informed consideration of the question. I should be glad that the House would agree to its going to an unprejudiced committee which may give to this House a full, fair and unbiassed report, so that you may be guided to an intelligent decision, not to a decision wrung from you by appeals to your sympathies and sentiments, but a decision based upon business principles and upon the facts laid before you, because I suppose a committee of this kind is intended to take evidence and to ascertain accurately the views of all those who are interested in the matter. I move that these Bills be read the second time, and referred to a select committee composed of the Hon. Mr. Bowell, Hon. Mr. Tupper, Messrs. Kirkpatrick, Ferguson (Welland), Boyle, Charlton, Lister, Préfontaine and the mover.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think this motion is in order. The question now is whether the Bill should be now read the second time. It is not a question of whether it should be sent to a committee or not. Furthermore, the question cannot be to read another Bill which is on the Order paper, and which will come up in its place, but we cannot displace the orders on the paper. Every item is to be taken up in its turn, one after the other, except by unanimous consent. I suggest that the Bill be read now, and that, when the other Bill comes up, it might be referred to the same committee, and the committee on this Bill might be altered or amended.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think, after the statement of my hon. friend who promotes this Bill (Mr. Kirkpatrick) there will be no difficulty. Of course, my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Patterson) has been a little too previous, to use the common phrase, in moving, as he has done, in reference to his own Bill, but my hon. friend from Frontenac has stated his wish that the two Bills should go to a select committee. I think so, too. The subject was discussed before, and Parliament came to a decision upon it. Of course it is a very serious thing for Parliament to change its policy, but, after the elegant speech of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), which has, no doubt, impressed every member of the House, if hon. members are convinced that they should change their opinion, they will do so. I think the matter is of sufficient importance that the whole question should go to a select committee, in order that gentlemen who understand the subject, gentlemen from different parts of Canada, and especially from different parts of our inland waters, should consider the whole subject. I understand that to be the proposition of my hon. friend, but I suppose that each of my hon. friends has his own favorites for the committee, and I would suggest that the two gentlemen should sit together and agree on a committee to which the two Bills should be referred.

Mr. PLATT. How would it do for the Government to take up the question?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We cannot prevent the hon. gentleman moving for the second reading of his Bill. The Government may be very powerful, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Platt) may have great confidence in the Government, but I think my hon. friend has a right to press his Bill to a second reading.

Mr. LABELLE. I have been connected with navigation for a number of years, and I have studied the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), and, though it is not an elaborate Bill, it is a very good one. The American Government are not as bad as some members appear to think. For years I have been at the head of a navigation company, and we have had very satisfactory dealings with them. The letter which was read from Mr. Milloy I suggested to the hon. member for Frontenac to get, because Mr. Milloy was in charge of that end of our line. If we had had wrecking reciprocity with the Americans, they would have taken our boat, the Spartan, which was wrecked, to the Canadian side, and, instead of paying $26,000 to the Americans for labor and material in repairing her, we would have paid it to Canadians. I think it is a protection for us to have reciprocity in wrecking between the two nations. There is another thing, Mr. Speaker. In England the Royal Humane Society give rewards for saving the lives of sailors and other people; but in this country one would think that, so far from giving rewards for saving life, we wish to prevent them from saving the lives of our shipwrecked sailors. Certainly it is time that this honorable House should accord to other nations the privilege of rendering assistance to our shipwrecked sailors. Suppose that one of our steamers was wrecked, as in the case mentioned, and that the only vessel in sight was an American vessel, at present she could not offer her services, because, however desirous she might be of saving life, she would have to save her property at the same time, whereas if she could save the lives of these people, their property would not be in danger of being seized. There is a humane element in this question which ought also to be taken into consideration. In regard to the coasting trade I must say that the Americans have always been very liberal with our company. We have had boats that have been stopping at American ports, one after another, and the Americans have never placed any obstacle in our way, and have given us every facility to go from one port to another. Therefore, I think it would be good policy to look at the question on a higher ground, and that our Government should accord them the privilege of coming into our waters to assist wrecked vessels. Certainly, if the Americans would not do the same towards us, I would not advise the course I do, but the Americans have passed a similar law which will go into force as soon as our Government do the same; therefore I think that we ought to pass the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac.

Mr. COCKBURN. In regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson), it is strange that he should have thought it necessary to digress from the point in issue and appeal to the National Policy against this Bill. I am myself an ardent supporter of that policy, but I do not wish to see it used to give refuge to every measure that may be brought before this House. The subject of this Bill ought to be debated on its own merits; and I do not think that the arguments adduced by the hon. member are such as to carry conviction to the minds, either of those who are disposed to look at the matter simply as one of trade, or to take a higher view of it and look upon it in the light of humanity. He has talked to us about international courtesy and international humanity. It ill becomes us, I think, to take such a ground, when for years the United States have offered us this international courtesy and it is we who have refused it. I do not think that this House, after the humanitarian vote we gave last night for the protection of the sparrows and the pigeons, is prepared to turn around now and not show the same humanity to our fellow-creatures. It is all very well to tell me that the vessel must be actually wrecked, or actually beached, or actually stranded, before this law comes into operation. Surely it must be necessary on many an occasion, that a vessel should be relieved as soon as possible from the perilous position in which it stands at the time, for the saving of an hour, or a day, may mean the saving of the cargo, and may be the saving of the lives of those on board. With reference to the desire to hold back this act of humanity, on the plea that by-and-by we shall be able to obtain some advantages in the coasting trade, I think we must consider that we have to deal with people who are not going to be blinded in that way. We have got little to offer—little in itself, considering that in one year the tonnage built by the Americans on the lakes was stated by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) to be equal to the whole Canadian tonnage on those lakes.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. No, about three-fourths.

Mr. COCKBURN. Well, such is the proportion. Our chances, even on the low basis of making money by the salvage, must be greater in saving American vessels than could be the chances of American vessels in saving Canadian vessels. If we look at it from the money point of view, I think it is our interest to pass this Bill. But I desire to look at it from a higher point of view; and when I look at the words of this Bill it does seem to me strange that in the latter part of the nineteenth century, and before an intelligent audience, we should require permission to bring in an Act to permit foreign vessels to aid our own that are wrecked or disabled. I think the feeling of humanity itself ought to be sufficient to make us cry out for the passage of such a Bill. I have myself, on one occasion, been in a wrecked or a disabled position—I do not mean politically, I mean on shipboard—and I should have thought little indeed of any man who, before coming to my aid, or before rescuing the cargo, was to consider the question whether I belonged to his own nationality, or whether there was any Act to disable him from performing an act of humanity. I trust, therefore, that the facts adduced will be considered by this House sufficient to lead it to pass this Bill, and to wipe from our legislation this blot upon our humanity in the way we treat wrecked vessels.

Mr. WALDIE. I have great pleasure in supporting the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), from a business point of view. In my past experience it has been my misfortune to have a vessel wrecked. The wreck occurred at Rondeau, during a great gale, and there were three other vessels either wrecked or ashore at Long Point at the same time; and to say that we are to be prevented from employing any tug, no matter what its nationality may be, to save our property or to save lives jeopardised, is to say something unreasonable, and to adopt a principle which I do not think this House will adopt. It has been urged that we should reject this Bill in order that we may get a more extensive reciprocity from the United States with regard to marine property; but seeing that the United States have extended their proposition so as to permit wrecking to be reciprocal, let us accept what they have proposed, especially as it is entirely in our own interest. It is a fact that our Government has been exceedingly liberal and have never refused permission to secure the services of an American tug for a wrecked vessel; but the owners of these wrecked vessels have to pay more for the use of that tug than they would if this Bill was passed, because there is a hesitancy on the part of the owners of a wrecking tug and the owners of wrecking appurtenances, to come into our waters, for fear of violating our law and rendering themselves subject to seizure. It is also my conviction that we should pass this Bill as a humanitarian measure, if for no other reason; but there are also financial advantages which will accrue to the owners of our own marine property. In view of all these considerations, I trust this Bill will pass the House.

Mr. MASSON. As representing a riding containing the port which has, I believe, the heaviest tonnage of any port in Ontario, I do not think it would be right for me to allow this discussion to end without saying a few words in behalf of the interests at that port. As has been stated by the mover of the Bill, the shipping men are unanimously in favor of the Bill. Not only vessel owners, but their employes on vessels, the mariners, are all in favor of it, and the insurance companies, I am informed and believe, are also all in its favor. It is, then, not a question so much of humanity as a question of our own business interests. I quite agree with the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) when he says that the Americans would not offer us reciprocity or exchange of privileges unless they expected to obtain a benefit. They do expect to get a benefit in one way, and we may get a benefit in the same way or in some other way. They expect to get a benefit on account of their large shipping interests on the northern lakes—Superior, Michigan, Huron and Georgian Bay—and the advantage, in case any of their vessels are wrecked, of being able to go to the nearest point and there obtain assistance. I know of cases where an American vessel has gone ashore in Lake George, where the channel is narrow, and where it is a dredged channel part of the way, and on a passing vessel throwing a line, and pulling the craft off, the vessel rendering such assistance was seized immediately, for entering an American port. As a matter of international courtesy, therefore, I do not think we owe the Americans anything. It is purely not as a matter of humanity, because I think the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) met that point, by stating that relief had never been refused where life was in danger, but as a matter of business I consider it, because in cases where vessels were stranded, or went on the rocks, the delay of one hour, or one day, may mean a loss, not only of the cargo, but of the vessel, and, unfortunately, perhaps of life. When this subject came before the House last Session, I took the opportunity of corresponding with all the ship-owners interested in it in my port, and I received from them an unanimous request to give the Bill all possible assistance. As to the other point, that if we refuse this offer it may be used as a lever to secure something further, I think with my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Patterson), that equal towing and coasting rights would certainly be a benefit to us if we could obtain them, but I agree with hon. members that it is impossible to obtain them. The Americans will not grant them; and when we have an offer which the Americans suppose will be a benefit to them, if accepted, we have to consider whether it would not be a benefit to ourselves. I believe it would be of very great benefit to our shippers, our vessel owners and insurance companies. The sooner a vessel stranded on the rocks is assisted, especially on the northern lakes, where the storms are not only frequent but very sudden, the better it is for all parties concerned, and for that reason, independent of any question of international courtesy, and independent of the question of reciprocity or no reciprocity, I think it is desirable to secure any privileges we can get, and reciprocity in wrecking I think would be an advantage to our shippers, to our vessel owners, and to our insurance companies.

Mr. LISTER. As representing a county largely interested in the lake shipping, I have a word or two to say in support of the measure introduced by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). I think I may say that there is not a master or shipper in Canada engaged in the carrying trade who is not in favor of the measure introduced by that hon. gentleman. The Bill proposed by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) we should all be glad to accept if we could get what he asks, but when we remember the statistics furnished by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), we must perceive the utter impossibility of hoping that the United States will grant us equal privileges in the coasting trade. When we remember how utterly insignificant our shipping interests are, compared with theirs, we must be convinced that for the States to give us equal rights in coasting would be injurious to their trade, while at the same time it would stimulate to a very large extent our shipbuilding industry and would be advantageous to us in that regard. It is, I believe, impossible to obtain such privileges, and under these circumstances it is the duty of Parliament, before navigation opens, to pass an Act whereby the vessels of either country, if placed in danger, would be able to get assistance at the nearest possible point. The First Minister has suggested that this matter be referred to a special committee. I think I voice the sentiment of almost everyone when I say that there appears to be no diversity of opinion upon this subject; in fact, there is a consensus of opinion in favor of the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). In my judgment no committee is necessary in this case. I hold that it is the duty of Parliament to pass the measure just as it is. If it is thought that we could obtain coasting rights under the Bill of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson), something might be done in that direction, but my own view is that it is impossible to get those coasting privileges, and therefore we owe it to ourselves and to the country to pass the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). It is quite possible that some people engaged in the wrecking business may object to this Bill, but I have received the circular referred to by the hon. mover, and it appears that the author of the circular declares he is in a position to compete with United States wrecking companies, and asks to be permitted to compete with them. Under these circumstances, and as there is no interest opposed to granting reciprocity in wrecking, I should not be discharging my duties to my constituents did I not raise my voice in favor of the Bill now under consideration.

Mr. EDGAR. Those who recollect the debate on this question last Session, will distinctly remember that the then Minister of Finance, Sir Charles Tupper, only objected to this Bill so far as to ask a postponement for last Session. He most distinctly said the Bill had a great deal of merit in it, but he asked the House to postpone the Bill—for what purpose? In order to give the Government an opportunity to ascertain whether or not they could obtain reciprocity in coasting privileges from the American Government. This Government have had twelve months to make that inquiry. It is perfectly clear now that there is no answer, from the Government's standpoint of last Session, to the plea for the passage of this Bill, unless the Government can say to-day that they have ascertained from the American Government that there is a probability of getting those coasting privileges, because, if they have either taken any steps to ascertain the fact, nor arrived at any result from their negotiations, then there is no possible reason why this Bill should not pass this Session, even from their point of view. I am strengthened, too, in my opinion that the Government will favor this Bill this Session, since the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) has become a member of the Administration, because last Session he stated distinctly that he was in favor of this Bill, and said it was true reciprocity. Reference has been made, perhaps a little irregularly, to the Bill that comes shortly after this Bill on the Order paper, the Bill of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson). What necessity there is for that Bill I cannot understand. The hon. member proposes that instead of accepting the offer of the Americans for reciprocal wrecking, we should make a proposal to them for reciprocal coasting privileges. Why, we have made that proposal to the Americans. For nineteen years the proposal which the hon. gentleman asks us to make has been on the statutes of this country. So, why do we want to re-enact it? Does not the hon. gentleman know that nineteen years ago we made this proposition, and it was enacted and appears in our Revised Statutes? It is in the Act respecting the coasting trade of Canada; section five says:

"The Governor in Council may, from time to time, declare that the foregoing provisions of this Act shall not apply to the ships or vessels of any foreign country in which our ships are admitted to the coasting trade of such country."

During those nineteen years that have elapsed, the First Minister has been in power for fourteen years, and he has not been able to induce the Americans to accept that offer, and I do not see any reason why we can expect to induce them to accept that offer by passing another Act, as is proposed. I really do not see that a select committee should be asked to enquire into that matter, for I think the House is prepared to put through this Session the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick).

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am afraid there is no use in my attempting to agree to a committee with my hon. friend for Essex (Mr. Patterson). If we waited until that is done we would have to wait until the end of the Session. Therefore, I move:

That Bill No. 2, intitled: "An Act to admit foreign vessels to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters," be referred to a select committee composed of Messrs. Cockburn, Bergeron, Dickey, Edgar, Langelier (Quebec), Charlton, Labelle, Masson, Mulock, Shanly, Patterson (Essex), Weldon (St. John), Weldon (Albert), Holton, and the mover.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I beg to move, as an amendment:

That said Bill be referred to a select committee composed of Hon. Mr. Bowell, Hon. Mr. Tupper, Hon. Mr. Kirkpatrick, Messrs. Ferguson (Welland), Boyle, Charlton, Lister, Préfontaine, and the mover.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think that amendment can be put. If my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) will not agree to meet my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Patterson), and settle on a committee, it shows he is afraid of his Bill.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Not at all, I am not afraid of it. I am only afraid we will not agree.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, you will not agree to the Bill. I think that my hon. friend had better not press his amendment.

Mr. CASEY. After the points raised by my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Edgar), I do not see that there is any necessity for the Bill going to a special committee, unless the Government are positively determined that it should. The House has unanimously decided on the principle of the Bill, and my friend from Ontario (Mr. Edgar) has pointed out that all that can be gained from the Bill of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson) is already in the statutes. By adopting the principle of this Bill, the House has declared that it does not intend to bind up the question of wrecking along with that of coasting and towage. Having taken such action, and being practically unanimous on the principle of the Bill, I do not see why the House should refer it to a special committee.

Mr. LISTER. Persons will have to be subpoenaed before this committee at the expense of the country, and we will be put to an expense of one or two thousand dollars to take evidence on a matter which we all know about already. There is no person in this country, except he is the owner of a wrecking rig, who is opposed to this Bill. It will take many hundreds of dollars to bring witnesses here, and the result will be merely telling us what we all know already. Why not let the Bill go through the committee of the House now and pass it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) are disparaging to the committee named by my hon. friend. There are some names on that committee that may be taken as a guarantee that there will be no expense.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There is no power to call for persons, and you cannot go to any expense in that direction.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, that is so.

Mr. CASEY. What is the committee for, then?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Just to consider the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). If my hon. friend would let the matter stand until to-morrow—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I wish to have members on the committee who are interested in the question because of the localities they represent. I do not wish the question to be settled from a party view as to who should be a member of the committee. I think that the Bill I have introduced is in the interest of the country, and I conscientiously believe that the effect of the Bill of the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), if it becomes law, will be to drive our Canadian wreckers out of business altogether, and that our Canadian sailors will have to seek employment on American vessels. It will not only affect the wrecking vessels, but the whole inland fleet. If we are going to have reciprocity at all I desire that we should have reciprocity as a whole, because the exception of coasting and towing would make a large difference. It is well, if this proposition is to be renewed, that the towing and coasting questions should be combined with the wrecking question. If the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) will consent, I think that we can come to an amicable arrangement as to the formation of the committee, but I believe that we should appoint members from localities affected by the Bill, and who will be able to bring valuable information to the House on the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Let the hon. gentleman withdraw the amendment.

Amendment withdrawn, and Bill referred to Select Committee.

RECIPROCITY IN WRECKING, TOWING AND COASTING.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex) moved second reading of Bill (No. 7) to admit vessels registered in the United States of America to wrecking, towing and coasting privileges in Canadian waters.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think that we should pass this Bill through a second reading, because by so doing we would endorse the principle that we are not to have reciprocity in wrecking until we have reciprocity in towing and coasting as well, which would mean that, for the present at all events, we could not have reciprocity in wrecking, to obtain which we have just passed a Bill through its second reading. Everybody knows that at present it would be quite impossible to obtain the extended reciprocity the hon. gentlemen's Bill proposes. I must compliment him, by-the-by, on the extreme liberality of his views in the matter of reciprocity. He expressed wonder that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) should support the Government when he advocated reciprocity in wrecking, although he himself advocates reciprocity, not only in wrecking, but in towing and coasting. I think his position is the more anomalous of the two, if there is anything anomalous in either. But I think the reciprocity which the hon. member for Essex desires can only be obtained as part of a far larger scheme of unlimited reciprocity or commercial union, or something of that sort. The hon. member said that we should not give this reciprocity in wrecking unless we got something substantial in return. That is the position I take. We know that we are getting something substantial in return, because as soon as our Bill becomes law, reciprocity in wrecking will be an accomplished fact; but by adopting his Bill we should be getting not only nothing substantial, but nothing at all, because matters would be left exactly as they are, and I think it is the sense of the House that matters should not remain as they are. I, therefore, oppose this Bill, and hope the House will not agree to the second reading.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). I differ from my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey). I think the House should allow this Bill to be read the second time. I am in favor of the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac, and I am also in favor of this Bill, and I think it would be well to pass both. If we can get reciprocity in wrecking, there is no doubt it is a good thing; but if we can also get reciprocity in towing and coasting, that is still better. I differ from hon. gentlemen who say that it is impossible to get reciprocity in towing and coasting. I believe it is possible to get it. It is true the coasting trade of the United States is very much larger than ours; but it is also true that they have very many more coasters, and it would be very convenient to them if the coasting trade of both countries were thrown open. Therefore I hope the House will allow this Bill to be read the second time.

Mr. LISTER. Since I have had the honor of a seat in this House I have heard hon. members talk over and over again about the principles of Bills; I have heard people talk seriously about the principle of a Bill, as though if you departed in the slightest to the right or the left and violated what they called the principle of a Bill, you would commit a grievous sin. I do not think the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Casey) is called upon to pass any strictures upon the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson). If we can get what this Bill provides for, we shall get something that will be worth thousands of dollars to the people of this country. If we cannot get that, then we should get what the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) desires to obtain by his Bill. And so far as these Bills are concerned, dealing with the same question to a certain extent, but one going a step farther than the other, I think it is proper to refer them both to the same committee. I do not see any sacrifice or violation of principle by what is proposed to be done. If I could be at all satisfied that what the hon. member for North Essex asks could be accomplished, I would gladly aid him in every possible way. But I am afraid that nothing of the kind can be accomplished, because the Americans appreciate too highly what they have now to yield what we want. The measure we are obtaining by the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac is a valuable one, which ought to have been on our Statute-book years ago, although it cannot be said that the want of it has been any very serious loss, for the hon. Minister of Customs, humanitarian as he is, has always done what was necessary to allow aid to be given to disabled vessels.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) is the best way to settle the discussion on these Bills. I think the House is in favor of the principles of both Bills. One does not go as far as the other. The contention is that, on the one hand, we ought not to make the attempt to get what it appears possible for us to get without, at the same time, getting all that is asked for by the Bill of my hon. friend beside me. I would suggest that my hon. friend should allow his Bill to go before that committee, and I have confidence enough in that committee to feel that the Bill would be fairly considered there on its merits, and that if we cannot get all that my hon. friend asks for, it is possible we may get much more than the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) asks for.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the principle of the Bill now before the House. I would merely say, without entering upon a full discussion of the Bill, that, so far as the records of the two countries are concerned with regard to wrecking, that of the Canadian Government stands in a much better position than that of the American Government. The Canadian Government has uniformly been liberal in its treatment of the subject. Numerous instances have occurred where they have permitted American wrecking plant to enter our waters, and I doubt whether one solitary instance has occurred of the Americans having returned that courtesy. In the speech I made last winter on this subject, I referred to a case of great hardship, the wreck of the Algoma, when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had their own plant at Port Arthur, within 50 miles of the scene of the wreck, which they were not allowed to use for the relief of their own vessel, but were compelled to send to Port Huron, 600 miles away, in order to get wrecking plant. While the humanity cry may have a great deal of effect, it is impossible to show any single instance in which human life has been imperilled through the Canadian Government refusing assistance. If any charge lies against the Canadian Government, it is that they have been too liberal, and have not protected the interests of their own citizens in this matter. Without going further into a discussion of the question, I wish to say that I consider it highly desirable that both of those Bills should be referred to a special committee, and there is a middle course between the two measures which might perhaps be adopted with advantage. The Bill of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) proposes entire reciprocity in the coasting trade. It is possible that could not be secured, but a compromise might be effected by which we would propose to the American Government, if we gave them reciprocity in wrecking they should give reciprocity also in towing to the tugs of the two nationalities. I believe that is an offer that would likely be accepted, and which would be attended with advantage of some value to us, while if we adopt the measure proposed by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), we will be giving valuable concessions without any consideration whatever. I would like to see these two Bills referred, not to a committee selected by either of these two gentlemen, but to one selected impartially, that is, a committee composed of parties not interested in the one Bill or the other. If the Government would name a committee to which these two Bills would be referred, that would be a proper course to adopt. The question is one of international import in which great interests are involved, which require careful consideration, and it is the duty of the Government to protect the interests of its citizens and see that no injustice is done in this matter.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Notwithstanding what has been said by some hon. gentlemen with regard to the question of principle, it does seem to me these two Bills are very different in their terms; and if we support the principles of the one, we cannot support the principle of the other without stultifying ourselves. The hon. member for North Essex proposes that we should adopt a Bill relating to wrecking and to coasting privileges in Canadian waters. The hon. gentleman's Bill must be taken as a whole, it deals with those subjects together. If the principle of the hon. member's Bill is adopted, then we reject the principle laid down in the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). The hon. gentleman is on that committee. There is nothing contained in his Bill that he cannot have incorporated in the Bill before the committee, if he has sufficient influence in the committee, without his own Bill being referred to it, as well as with its being referred to it. The hon. gentleman, by acting on that committee, if he finds the Bill reported by the committee as unsatisfactory, may proceed with his own measure, or he may secure the rejection of the other upon the third reading. How is this House, if it supports the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), going to declare that the Bill of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson) shall have effect, as soon as, and remain in force as long as, like privileges of wrecking, towing and coasting are conceded to the United States? Does this House, after declaring itself in favor of the principle of the Bill of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson), propose that we shall not have freedom in the relieving of wrecked vessels upon the lakes, simply because the Americans will not allow us to share in the coasting trade along the Atlantic? That is the principle of the hon. gentleman's Bill; that is the provision he asks this House to support. The House has already, this afternoon, asserted an entirely different proposition. These two propositions cannot stand together. If the House supports the proposition of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson), it, in fact, resiles from the position it took in supporting the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). It seems to me that it is of great consequence to those who have property in ships, and to those who sail in and are employed in those ships, that they should have that property rescued and their lives protected as far as possible, no matter whether property is rescued or whether life is protected by a Canadian or an American vessel. It is true that the Government may, in any case of great distress, grant permission to an American towing vessel to come to the rescue of a stranded ship, but before communication with the Government can be had, the vessel may go to pieces and every person on board may be lost. That is the position, and it does seem to me a monstrous thing that we should undertake to jeopardise the lives of those who are employed on board those ships and the property that is invested in them, merely in the interest of those who have towing vessels on this side of the line. That is the proposition of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson). He says to the Americans: If you will not grant reciprocity—and the Americans have, so far as relieving wrecks is concerned, offered reciprocity—if you will not grant reciprocity in all these things, in the coasting trade and the relieving of ships in distress, we will not grant reciprocity in any of them. That is the proposition contained in this Bill, and against that proposition we have already pronounced in support of the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). The hon. First Minister shakes his head, but I maintain that is a clear proposition. In supporting the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) we have agreed that we will permit wrecking vessels to engage in wrecking on our coast, no matter whether the Americans agree to reciprocity in the coasting trade or not. There is no condition relating to the coasting trade attached to the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac. It is an inseparable portion of the proposition that we ask to make law in the Bill of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson). It is a principle of the Bill which is the gist of the whole Bill; and it is that which distinguishes his Bill from that of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). If he thinks that the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) is wrong in laying down too liberal a proposition, in granting terms which are too liberal, he will undertake to change it, and we will have an altered Bill, a Bill altered in principle, when it comes back to this House, and, if we choose to resile from the position we have taken to day, we may vote for a Bill essentially different in principle from the Bill which has now been read a second time. But the hon. gentleman says, I have here a Bill which I ask you to read a second time, and I ask you to read a second time a Bill which affirms a principle essentially different from the principle you affirmed a few minutes ago. A few years ago, we had a proposition made in this House that the rate of interest on money should be unlimited. We had another proposition a few minutes later that the rate of interest on money should be 8 per cent., and your predecessor in the Chair, Mr. Speaker, declared that the second Bill was out of order as being inconsistent in principle with the Bill which had been voted for a little while before. Now we are asked by some hon. gentlemen to read a second time a measure which, if we adopt it, will be wholly at variance with the one we have just adopted. I ask hon. gentlemen if it would be possible for these two measures, as they are now in this collection of Bills before us, to be adopted by this House? Could they be read the third time and sent to the Senate and read there three times, and ratified by His Excellency the Governor General? Certainly, the Bill that stood first in point of time would be in part repealed by the other measure. If these two measures cannot stand as they are here before us, then it is clear that the principle of the one is inconsistent with that of the other, and what we are asked now to do is to stultify the vote we gave half an hour ago.

Mr. McCARTHY. I was about to suggest that perhaps the better way would be to adjourn this debate. I agree with a great deal which has fallen from the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Mills). It appears to me that, if the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) is on the committee, as he is, he can possibly satisfy the committee that his Bill should become law, and the committee may make its provisions a part of the Bill of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). If he cannot satisfy the committee in that respect, there will be an opportunity later, if the debate stands adjourned, for my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Patterson) to move this Bill and to have it dealt with by the House. I must say that my own view is entirely in favor of the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac. It appears to me that the way in which we should look at this question is in our own interest, and in our own interest alone. It appears to me that it is in our own interest to conserve the interests of the vessel owners, and those who are interested in our marine, rather than the small or comparatively small number of those who are interested in wrecking. It is not because the United States has offered to us the privilege of reciprocity in wrecking that I would adopt such a measure, but it is because, upon the whole, as it appears to me, regard being had to all that we have heard and to all that we hear from those who are largely interested in marine matters, that the interest of this country would be better served if we permitted wrecking or the sending of our vessels by those who are prepared to undertake that business, although to that extent, and to that extent only, it may interfere with those who are specially interested in that industry in this country. I move that the debate be adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no doubt that that motion should be put, if my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Patterson) agrees to it; but I understand that the argument of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is that the two Bills are inconsistent in principle, that we cannot read the two together, that they are so utterly inconsistent that, having passed the second reading of one Bill and admitted the principle of it, we cannot pass this Bill; and yet the hon. gentleman says that the committee can report the Essex Bill instead of the Frontenac Bill. It is utterly inconsistent that the committee appointed to carry out the principle of the Frontenac Bill should rub that out altogether, and yet that the House cannot now entertain the Bill of my hon. friend from Essex. I do not see how the argument will hang together. I am very unwilling to agree to the restrictive doctrine of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to the extent to which he carries it, that the second reading of a Bill commits the House to the principle so far that you cannot pass any other Bill on the same subject if it goes further, if it adopts other clauses and makes other provisions. All we have done in passing the second reading of the Bill of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), is to say that we agree to the principle that foreign vessels should not be allowed to aid vessels which are wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters. My hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Patterson) proposes a Bill on the same principle, but he wishes to go a little further, and the clauses of his Bill are, in principle, the same as the Bill of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). The fourth clause of the Bill provides that:
Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

"This Act shall take effect as soon as, and remain in force so long as, the like privileges of wrecking, towing and coasting in United States waters are extended to Canadian vessels by the Government of the United States."
