"But we should have done it because we have it as a policy and a settled conviction that no foreign power, under any name or flag, shall ever divide this Continent with us, or build itself up either to our worriment or our peril. By right of deeds done and blood shed, of money spent and progress made; by the rights of trials numberless bravely borne, of sacrifices beyond count freely offered upon the altar of our national faith, and, as we believe, on the altar of God, we do solemnly hold, that we have a right to live and grow, unchecked, unhindered, unimperturbed by any other flag or power on the whole Continent from gulf to gulf, and ocean to ocean, will, must, shall, in the fulness of time, and we hope by the law of benevolent attractions, come under the banner of the Republic, of which to be a citizen we hold, is better boon than to be a King."

"I do not see, therefore, how we can, with due regard to our own ultimate and highest interest, and to our own conviction as Americans, assist Canada to commercial, military and political greatness, by any reciprocal mercantile arrangement under the name of Reciprocity or any other name, while she remains foreign to us in fact, and hostile perhaps in policy and spirit."

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman said that he does not believe that annexation would follow commercial union; he said that United States people are not in favor of annexation. I ask him not to attend to the sentiments of newspapers who may be guided by party interests, but to listen to the sentiments of a man well known to be clever, a man outside of the political field altogether, and who, I think, voices the public sentiment in the United States, at least as it appears to me, and as, I think, it appears to every impartial man in the Dominion of Canada. There is but one end, there is but one object in view among the people of the United States, and that is the absorption of Canada by the Republic, no matter how they may talk around the question, or what they may say of Commercial Union or Unrestricted Reciprocity, or whatever you may call it. I am convinced, and I think every impartial Canadian is convinced that there is but this one idea, and that is, as Mr. Murray says, that there shall be but one flag from the Gulf of Mexico to the Arctic Ocean. If my hon. friends on the other side of the House will take the trouble to read this pamphlet, they will see that that is the tendency of the arguments adduced by Mr. Murray, and he only summarises those which leading men have used on platforms in the United States. Sir, the hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), as I have said, I believe to be honest and candid, but I cannot give him credit for acute perception. Going on from the question of commercial union, he spoke of the exports and imports of Canada, and the trade between this country and the United States and Great Britain. Well, he does not expect me, of course, to follow those figures, or to refute them; it is not necessary. Let me ask him, what objection does he make to our selling horses and cattle to the people of the United States? Has he any fault to find with us for doing so? If the people of the United States did not want our horses and cattle, would they come and buy them? If they think they can do better here than to buy at home, they will come here; but if they think they can do better at home, they go to Michigan, or Dakota, or elsewhere. It is a mere matter of business, and what argument, I ask the hon. gentleman, can be found upon the fact we can sell a large number of horses and cattle to the United States? It is a matter of business. They want them, and they come for them; if they did not want them, they would not come for them. Does the hon. gentleman think that the Americans come over here and buy our goods for charity's sake? Do they come and give us $200 or $250 for a horse just because they have an affection for us? No, Sir; it is because they want the horses, and if they did not want them they would not buy them. The hon. gentleman went on to enumerate other articles of the farmers' produce. I will not detain the House long with that matter, because it would sound more like a lecture upon a practical agriculture than a political discussion. He mentioned, for instance, hay. Well, as a practical farmer, such as the hon. gentleman is, I would put the question to him: Does he think it is good policy to sell hay, even though you may have a good market for it? I have lived with farmers all my life, and I never met an intelligent farmer who believed it to be good policy, either to sell his hay or his coarse grains. I think years ago there was an organisation in the Province of Ontario named the Grange Order. The hon. gentleman has heard of that Order, no doubt, I was individually connected with it myself, and was very anxious for its success, because I believed many of its objects were good. And the hon. gentleman will remember that one of the principles laid down was, that it was better to sell less by the bushel and more by the hoof. If our policy in any way tended to discourage the sale of hay and coarse grains, if we could fatten stock and sell them rather than sell hay and grain in a raw state, the tariff would be of good service to agriculture. Not only so, but there are hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House who have stated clearly and distinctly their belief that the farmer is better remunerated if he uses his hay and grain to fatten cattle rather than to sell those products to the Americans. Hon. gentlemen opposite have characterised those manufacturers who thrive under the National Policy as vipers, anacondas, snakes, and everything else that is ugly and bad. While the hon. gentleman (Mr. Armstrong) expressed want of sympathy with manufacturers, he was yet kind enough to inform the House that he has great confidence in Canadian ability, nerve and vim. He, as a Canadian, believes that the people of this country can compete with any men in the world, and that they are not inferior to any. I am very proud to say that no one has yet been so unpatriotic as to state the reverse. But this is not a question of men. The hon. gentleman is well aware that the question of manufactures is not merely a question of men. It is now, in this advanced state of modern civilisation, more a question of capital. But the hon. gentleman should reflect how it came about that the United States, to which he wishes to annex us, adopted a protective policy to encourage manufactures. Was it because the Americans were inferior to the British, because they considered that a workingman, a mechanic, in the United States was inferior in ability, physical or mental, to the workingman of England, France or Germany? No, but it was for another reason altogether different, which the hon. gentleman knows quite well. If we protect our manufactures and give them that measure of safeguard which we believe is necessary for our manufacturing development, it is not because we believe they are inferior as men, but it is because we believe that the commercial conditions render it imperatively necessary that we should throw a wall around them to protect and sustain them until a certain period has been reached. The hon. gentleman, as a good Canadian, dilated at length on, and said he was proud of, the natural resources of our country. He pointed to the mineral wealth, to the lumbering wealth, and to the wealth we see all around us. Of these resources we have enough for ourselves, and enough for nearly all the world besides, and of that we are proud. It is our inheritance, and I think it should be our endeavor to maintain it as our inheritance. What would be the result if the scheme which that hon. gentleman, and hon. gentlemen opposite advocate, were adopted? It would be simply this, that under commercial union the raw material would be taken from this country, and manufactured in the United States, and the manufactured articles would be sent back here. They tell us that is all nonsense; if you had commercial union with the United States your country would flourish, manufactures would spring up here; you would have a larger market; your population would increase in every town and city, and your rural population would increase; we need fear nothing from commercial union, so far as our manufactures are concerned. Allow me to say that commercial union between the States and Canada would be altogether different from commercial union as it exists between New York and Pennsylvania. New York and Pennsylvania are commercially united, but they are also politically united. If a resident in New York State has $500,000 which he wishes to invest in manufactures, he can invest it in Pennsylvania with every confidence, and under regular conditions the investment would increase, for it is made not in a foreign country. But in the case of an American with $500,000, what is there to induce him to invest his capital in manufacturing establishments in Canada? Nothing whatever, for he would be investing it in a foreign country. The investment might be ruined by tariff changes, and even if we made a treaty for ten, twelve, fifteen years, it would not be sufficient to induce men to advance large sums in establishing manufacturing industries here. The only course that would be adopted is obvious. The Americans would take the raw material and manufacture it in the United States and send the manufactured products back here. Of course they would be quite safe under such an arrangement. In the event of the arrangement being broken their trade would be hampered for a time, but they would not lose much money. So the analogy of commercial union as between New York and Pennsylvania does not apply to commercial union as between Canada and the United States. Then the hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) touched on the iron industry and waxed very indignant that such industry had not flourished immediately after the introduction of the measure which was brought in two or three years ago. He said that the tariff was largely increased, that we were promised blast furnaces here and there, that the manufactures of iron would be largely increased in our country. The hon. gentleman, I presume, knows very well the nurture and increase of an industry of this nature cannot be effected in a day or a year. He knows that taking all the iron producing countries of the world, they all attained to eminence in production only under a protective tariff, and not only so, but only after a series of years of protection. The business men of those countries did not rise and charge the Government with being incapable because when they planted the seeds they did not immediately grow and develop. No, they waited patiently. They sowed the seed and years after they got the ripened ears. I have, perhaps, directed the attention of the House at a sufficient length to the remarks of the hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), and I will now proceed to consider some of the arguments advanced in this House why this Parliament should adopt commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. The great inducement held out to us, of course, is material prosperity, the great argument adduced is that if we adopted this change it would tend to the prosperity of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have employed every means in their power, every means that ambition could suggest or ingenuity devise to persuade, the people to withdraw their confidence from the leader of the Government and those who support him. They have used every means to excite discontent among the people, but no method is more to be deprecated than that which they persistently employed, in endeavoring to persuade not only our own people, but the world outside that Canada is in a ruinous and depressed condition and fast crumbling to pieces. With front unabashed they declare that great distress prevails in our borders; they say we are burdened with a weight of taxation that is hampering all our energies and enterprise, they lament the decrease in the value of land, they say there is a huge debt hanging around our neck like a millstone which is dragging us down to the depths of national despair. Sir, almost with joy they shout, that our people are fleeing, and have fled, from our country as from a plague-stricken city, on account of the provoking tyranny of an obstinate, of a wicked and an ignorant oligarchy. Sir, they not only tell us that, but they say that millions of money are every year extracted from the pockets of poor men, clothed in rags and on the verge of starvation, and iniquitously handed over to swell the bloated wealth of that abomination of abominations, that anathema maranatha, the manufacturer. Not only that, but they tell us that the trade of our country has not increased as rapidly as it ought to have done, or as rapidly as it could have done, under a system far different; and, Sir, they recall with a sigh of tender regret, the good old days when men, strong, self-respecting workmen, were forced to be idle, were looking for work but could not obtain it, and were condemned to dine on the smell of the soup kitchen. In the foreground of this dark and melancholy picture, there is one figure which they persist in keeping there, and that is the Canadian farmer. The Canadian farmer they bespatter with compliments which no one can regard as sincere, and they beslobber him with a fulsome flattery that is perfectly disgusting from its obvious selfishness. In one breath they tell us that the Canadian farmer is quite able to take care of himself (and in that opinion I very heartily agree), while a moment later they bewail his unhappy condition as being ground down under the iron heel of a fiscal despotism. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), a year ago, declared that the condition of the farmer in Canada was perfectly deplorable; burden upon burden was being heaped upon him, and he was being subjected more and more to the keen competition of the markets which he had hitherto controlled. In fact, so dreadfully wretched was his condition that the hon. gentleman was forced to exclaim that the Canadian farmer "exists" but does not "live." Sir, the summing up of this hon. gentleman, after a survey of the material condition of Canada, was simply this: that ninety-nine one-hundredths of the people of Canada were born to toil, and moil, and starve, and suffer, and die—not a very bright picture, indeed. Sir, I have given you a short outline of the condition which those gentlemen wish us to believe the country is in. I shall leave it now, for I am sure every one knows that a walk through a graveyard is not conducive to bright or cheerful thoughts, and every man is thankful and happy to be awakened from a nightmare. Before I turn from it to something that is more welcome to our ears and more encouraging to our hearts, I wish to make a brief observation. It requires no great ability to snarl at our present state or to belittle our present good and to fill the future with evil forebodings. Fault finding is within the reach of the humblest intellect, because, Sir, such is the nature of all human affairs that pessimistic criticism is always possible, for as no nation or no individual is perfectly wise, so no nation and no individual is perfectly happy, and we will always find something in our condition as citizens or as private individuals of which we may with apparent reasonableness justly complain. But, Sir, I tell those hon. gentlemen opposite that he who distorts a truth, or exaggerates a misfortune for selfish motives or ambitious ends, is guilty of a grave wrong against his country. For the purpose of showing that the state of our country is not so dreary, so melancholy or so sad, as they would represent it to be, I shall take the opportunity of troubling the House with a few figures. I know that the mention of figures to hon. gentlemen is not very agreeable, for we all know how very unpleasant it is to listen to a long string of figures which some, perhaps, can scarcely grasp, but notwithstanding it is sometimes necessary to use figures in order to make clearer the point that you are arguing. I think, Sir, it may be laid down as an axiom of political economy that a nation that is saving money and laying by money year after year, must be in a commercially sound and healthy condition. Now, if I can show that the people of Canada have for years past been laying money by, I think that these imputations of poverty and groans of distress which the hon. gentleman made with reference to our country, will not be substantiated. From the Public Accounts, I learn that we began Confederation with a balance in Dominion saving banks to the credit of the four old Provinces amounting to $1,994,565.22. On 1st July, 1872, this sum, with the help of Manitoba, which had lately been constituted a Province, and British Columbia admitted to the Confederation during the previous year amounted to $10,221,393.48, of which $1,749,835.35 were in cash deposits. On 1st July, 1877, with Prince Edward Island admitted in 1873, the sum to the credit of the various Provinces was $14,898,010.37, of which sum $7,090,729.04 were cash deposits. On 1st July, 1882, the balance in deposits was $36,575,010.69, of which sum $13,893,065.13 were in cash deposits. On the 1st July, 1887, the total amount due to the thrifty people of this Dominion was $53,892,122.25, of which sum they had deposited during the last twelve months, $11,480,859.02. In these figures which I have quoted, I have exhibited to this House the simplest and perhaps the most accurate barometrical test which it is possible to present of a nation's prosperity. Its accuracy consists in this: that it is far wider and more exact than individual experience could possibly be; and its accuracy may be depended upon, because neither political passions nor party prejudice has a place in the showing. Nor can it be said that our people have been saving money at the expense of their credit, because, if we again turn to the statistics, we find that in the five years from 1873 to 1878, inclusive, on every $100 of notes and other debts due by our people in the chartered banks of Canada we paid an average of $96.48½; in the five years from 1878 to 1882, inclusive, we paid $96.34, not quite as much as in the preceding period; but in the five years from 1882 to 1887 we paid $97.66. In other words, our ability to pay this class of indebtedness fell short of complete liquidation in the first quinquennial period by 3.51½ per cent.; in the second period by 3.66 per cent.; and in the last period by only 2.34 per cent. I think this statement shows very conclusively that, during the last five years at least, the people have been saving money despite all that hon. gentlemen opposite have to say of their poverty and distress. It is almost impossible to believe that people who are so distressed as these hon. gentlemen represent us to be could by any possibility manage to pay so much of their lawful debts; but it may be gratifying to hon. gentlemen opposite to learn that during the period which is marked by their incumbency of office, our inability to discharge debts of the kind mentioned was at the highest point, namely, 4.59 per cent. And, Sir, that our people are living in comfort may be inferred from the sums expended by them upon luxuries and the elegant refinements of life. For instance, in the year 1868, they spent upon imported silks, satins and velvets, upon jewellery and other costly trinkets in gold and silver, and upon musical instruments, $1,689,626; in 1873 they spent $3,790,664; in 1878, under the reign of hon. gentlemen opposite, they spent only $2,313,227; in 1883 the sum had again risen to $3,397,624; and in 1888 it amounted to $4,343,848. Now, Sir, it is impossible to believe that a people of between four and five millions in a distressed and starving condition could expend such large sums of money upon articles which are not necessary for their existence, and we must conclude that the representations of ruin and decay which have been made in this House are untrue and entirely without foundation. Again, Sir, the average yearly amount involved in business failures from 1873 to 1879, a period in which a revenue tariff was in force, was $17,887,000, whereas the yearly average from 1880 to 1888, inclusive, was $11,582,313, or $6,304,687 less than during the former period, showing that the business of the country during the last eight years was in a much more healthy condition than during the preceding period. Sir, this part of my argument is not intentionally devoted to a defence of the National Policy, but to every Canadian who desires to know the true state of the trade and business of the country, I submit that these figures are very pertinent indeed. These hon. gentlemen also complained that the trade of this country has not increased as rapidly as it should have done or as it would have done, had they, I presume, been in office. Now, Sir, to the state of the trade of the country I wish to call your attention for a short time. Looking at the figures given in the Trade and Navigation Returns, it is quite evident that from Confederation up to a certain period our trade advanced but very slightly. In fact, it seemed as if it were about to be very seriously impaired; but, Sir, I am happy to say that, later in our history, this fear proved to be altogether groundless. I have divided our history into three periods of trade. I think the principle of comparing the exports and imports of one year with those of another is scarcely the proper way in which to obtain a correct idea of the business of the country. The first period I have taken extends from 1865 to 1874. In that period the Provinces of Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and British Columbia were brought into the Confederation. The trade for these years shows a total annual average of $172,834,414, and for the second period, from 1875 to 1879, inclusive, the yearly average was $175,239,776, which is, perhaps, no greater than the first period would have been had the Provinces of Prince Edward Island and British Columbia been included. The third period, extended from 1880 to 1888, exhibits such a marked increase in the value of trade that it cannot fail to arrest the attention. Whilst in the first days of Confederation our trade had scarcely increased by a single dollar, at the close of 1879 the average annual value of the trade was $28,000,000. I ask hon. gentlemen if this is not creditable to Canada? I ask them if it looks like ruin and decay, and if it is a sufficient reason why they should clothe themselves with sackcloth and ashes, rend their garments, tear their hair, and cry out with bitter lamentations that Canada is going to the dogs? No, it is rather cause for rejoicing and congratulation, and ought to convince the incredulous, and confirm the doubting, that Canada has nothing to fear from the peaceful rivalry and competition of friendly powers, but that the only thing which can injure her growth and prosperity is treason and cowardice at home. This statement cannot be weakened either by referring to the decline of prices, because the decline which took place in 1873 has continued down to the present time in a great many articles. I think I have adduced sufficient statistics, varied and adequate, to prove that the gloomy view which these hon. gentlemen take of our condition is not sustained by facts. Before I leave this subject it will be necessary to speak of the effect of the National Policy upon this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not only described our country as in a pitiable condition, and our people as very much depressed, but they have also found a cause for it, and that cause is the National Policy. I do not intend to enter upon the arguments attacking or defending that policy, because it would certainly be a very bold, I should say a reckless man, who would attempt to weary the House with arguing on a subject that has been debated by the keenest intellects in the Dominion. But while hon. gentlemen opposite are pleased to attribute all the evils of this country to the National Policy, which they consider to be the poisoned source of all our woe, I would ask them for a moment to consider that, perhaps, those who have opposed this policy from theoretical views or from lessons learned from political economists, might be inclined, perhaps, to pause when I observe that neither free trade nor protection is, in my opinion, an essential of exchange, but that they are simply conditions of trade, and before we condemn the fiscal policy of Canada, we should study very carefully the two different fiscal systems of the great English-speaking peoples and the greatest trading commercial nations in the world. If we do that, we will be less inclined to blame the National Policy for any of the effects which we consider are not satisfactory in our country. Under a system of free trade, as well as under protection, there would be found large commercial development and a sound financial condition, and I may also say that under either system will be found these signs and indications which show an awakening in commercial and mechanical enterprises, and under neither system will we find that the adoption or the modification of either has been either able to banish from the toiling masses of the poor the morbid song of oppressed poverty and the touching refrain that we hear from those who through improvidence are unable to look after themselves. Before leaving this subject I wish very briefly to allude to the effect of the National Policy on the agriculturists of this country. We are often told that the National Policy has had a most injurious effect upon the interests of the farmer, and in this respect I am not at all inclined to agree with hon. gentlemen opposite. When this policy was discussed, it is alleged by hon. gentlemen opposite that certain promises were made to this country; and they have repeated in this House time and again that it was promised the National Policy would bring higher prices for farmers' produce. In fact, the right hon. the First Minister has been charged, time and again, with having made this promise. Now, I consider that is a wilful misrepresentation of the facts. It is a wilful misrepresentation both of the spirit and the letter of all the arguments that we ever heard on this subject. All that was said in defence of the National Policy was simply that since the people of the United States would not admit our produce to their markets upon the same terms as we admitted theirs to ours, and since their farmers were driving our own farmers out of the country, and obliging them to sell their produce in a foreign land, then we would take a leaf from their book and protect ourselves, and whatever advantage was to be obtained by having a home market for the farmers, we would have. That was all that was ever said. Now, the question to be asked and answered in this House is not, Has the National Policy made prices higher or lower, because no one ever contended that it could have such an effect, but the question is, Has the National Policy kept the Canadian market for the Canadian farmer? If it has, then I contend that all the objections that these hon. gentlemen on the opposite benches make to the National Policy, in regard to its influence on the farming community, are perfectly groundless, and that they have no foundation whatever in fact. I shall now proceed to show you from the few statistics I have here that this contention has been fulfilled, and that the Canadian market has been kept for the Canadian farmer. In the eight years preceding the adoption of the National Policy, $103,330,226 worth of wheat flour and other breadstuffs was imported for home consumption into Canada. In the eight years succeeding the National Policy, only $25,459,165 worth has been imported. That is to say, that our farmers have sold of their own products, in their own markets, nearly $78,000,000 worth, or nearly $10,000,000 a year, more than in the eight years prior to the introduction of the National Policy. Does not that show, and prove as clearly as figures can prove, that the National Policy has kept the Canadian market for the Canadian farmer. Let me put it in another way. Of the $128,000,000 of breadstuffs imported for home consumption for the sixteen years from 1872 to 1887 inclusive, 80 per cent. were obtained before 1875, and only 20 per cent. since that year. In the presence of these facts, I ask how hon. gentlemen can say that, in these articles at least, the National Policy has not kept the Canadian market for the Canadian farmer. This policy has also contributed largely to the advantage of the farmer in other respects in his occupation. There is no question that, in regard to the dairy interests and the cattle exportation business, which are now forming the main interests of many farmers in this country, the National Policy has had a beneficial effect. But it is said that, even if the farmers are receiving a little more for their stock and their dairy produce, if the National Policy has benefited them in that way, they are being charged more than their fair share of the burdens of the country. That I also deny. I contend that such is the condition of the Canadian farmer that, supplying as he does so many of these articles for his own consumption, so many of the commodities which he uses himself, he is effectually and safely guarded against any excessive imposts. The farmer of this country is able and willing to pay his fair share of the amount required to provide for the good government of the country, and he is not flattered by hon. gentlemen who represent him as a pauper or as an overburdened drudge. Something has been said in relation to the fall of the prices of farm produce. The hon. the Finance Minister alluded to that subject in his Budget speech. I will for a short time examine that matter a little further, and show how it is, apart altogether from any fiscal policy, that the prices of agricultural products of every kind, not only in Canada, but the world over, have fallen. When hon. gentlemen are discussing the low prices of produce here and the low receipts which farmers get for what they raise, they should be honest. They should not say that it is the National Policy that causes the fall in prices. Let them point out any article of the farmers' produce which they can say would have been higher in price if the tariff were abolished. Can they mention a single article that would be one cent higher if the National Policy were abolished to-morrow? Not one. Then, if the protective tariff does not of itself lower the price of these articles, why should they charge it and make it blameable for all the evils which affect the Canadian farmer? In the year 1873, a noticeable downward tendency of prices began in very many articles, not only in Canada, but all over the world, and, as Canada is a country which still exports largely of agricultural products, and these have been affected by this decline, I shall endeavor to show, as clearly as I am able, how this downward tendency has affected the produce of farmers. In 1882 we exported a certain quantity of wheat, for which we received a certain sum of money. In 1887 we exported 41.9 per cent. more wheat, and received 3.6 per cent. less money. In other words, in 1882 we sold 100 bushels of wheat, for which we got $127, and in 1887 we sold 141.9 bushels of wheat, for which we got only $122 50, the price falling in that time 40 cents per bushel. Do the hon. gentlemen mean to say that the National Policy was responsible for that, or that free trade would have been responsible for it? There are causes all over the world which result in this downward tendency, but what the

National Policy has done is to allow our farmers to stand more firmly against that decline than the farmers of any other country in the world. Their own energy and courage, combined with the National Policy, have enabled them to stand more steadily than almost any farmers in the world. Of flour we exported in 1887, 4.5 per cent. more than in 1882, and we received 19½ per cent. less money; that is, for every 100 barrels of flour in 1882 we got $579, and for every 100 barrels sent out in 1887 we got only $446. We will take also cheese, another very important article in our agricultural industry; in fact, it is the mainstay of many farmers in the western section of the Province of Ontario. Of cheese, in 1887, we exported more than in 1882, by 42.04, for which we received 26.03 more money; that is, for every hundred pounds of cheese exported in 1882, we got $10.80; for every hundred pounds exported in 1887, we only got $9.60. Numerous other articles might be taken to show how this fall of prices has affected the value of the agricultural products of Canada, how the volume has undoubtedly increased, and the value has diminished. But, Sir, the National Policy is not responsible for that. Now, these hon. gentlemen have found the causes of the ills, which, they say, affect Canada, but they propose no remedy. Well, suppose that all the evil things which they have declared to exist, do really exist, then we will enquire of them, What remedy do you propose? What have you to offer instead of the National Policy that will better promote the national sentiment, the national prosperity, the national progress, the national life? Have you a policy of your own, which you, as Canadians, can formulate and devise and maintain, that the ever changing, every varying conditions of Canadian life demand? No, Sir, they have not. They have nothing to offer as a remedy for this alleged pitiful and mournful condition of our country. They have nothing to hold out to us except the pity of a foreign nation which has never been remarkable for its generosity, but always remembered its own self-interest. Sir, a broad line of distinction is very marked between the two great parties that divide the political sentiment of this country. For the alleged distress and depression of trade, the gentlemen have nothing to offer except that which they may obtain from another country, they have nothing to present by which this distress and depression may be removed. Twelve years ago, when this distress and depression were real and undeniable, did the Conservative party appeal to a foreign power? No; they only appealed to the intelligence and the enterprise of Canadians, and Canadians only. The hon. member for South Oxford the other evening, while speaking of the policy of this nature which the people of Canada had adopted, declared that the Government were knaves and their followers were fools. Sir, the instincts of human nature suspects a man who expresses a supercilious contempt for his neighbor's virtue or his neighbor's wisdom. I will not call the hon. gentleman a fool, I will not call him a knave, but the people of this country, by their acts, very shrewdly suspect that he is a nauseous compound of both. Sir, I ask you, which is the more dignified course to pursue: appeal to a foreign nation, or appeal to your own nation? I ask, which is the more likely to be conducive to our welfare, which is the more in harmony with the spirit of a people, which is the more conducive to the promotion and preservation of our self-respect, of our rights and liberties? Sir, which is the more likely to be effectual? Unrestricted Reciprocity, which these hon. gentlemen, by the aid of their good friends on the other side of the border, hope to persuade the people of Canada to adopt, is a dream which no one seems precisely to understand, or, if they do, they are afraid to express it. If by Unrestricted Reciprocity, as we sometimes are led to believe, is meant a treaty, an arrangement, a scheme, a bargain, with the people of the United States upon the line of the Treaty of 1854, narrowed in some places, widened in others, but which will enable us to keep full control of our tariff with the different nations of the world, why, then, that is the policy of the Conservative party, that is no new policy, and the word "unrestricted" is quite superfluous. But if, by Unrestricted Reciprocity is meant Commercial Union, which the hon. member for South Middlesex undoubtedly adopts and defends, then I say that any scheme by which that may be brought about, any arrangement by which commercial union between Canada and the United States may be consummated, is not a treaty of trade and commerce, it is the political surrender of a nation. Commercial union, let hon. gentlemen say what they please, let them define it as they like, only means one thing, and that is for all practical purposes we shall become an integral portion of the United States, that we shall not only become, but be, a portion of that country; that we shall be regarded and treated as such by other nations, England included. Now, I consider that to adopt this scheme would be to do that which no free people will willingly do. We are told that unrestricted reciprocity would not necessarily lead to annexation. Suppose it did not; it is undoubtedly true that we would be one in thirteen of a body to regulate our tariff. Now, Sir, I say that no free people can give up the right to tax themselves. If we do so, we abdicate at least one of the attributes of a free and sovereign people which we now possess. But, Sir, not only do we give up the right to tax ourselves, but we are compelled to tax ourselves as we do not please, because there can be no help for it but that we must have recourse to direct taxation, and that system is not palatable to the people of this country. No doubt, in the brief history of Canada there have been things which we could wish had been otherwise; there is no question that the future of our country is in our own hands, and there can be no question, I think, that the people of Canada are of the opinion, and have made up their minds, that they will go their own way in the path of progress and development, irrespective of all the blandishments of power or wealth. For my part I believe it to be unmanly to seek to cast our burdens upon others, I think it is cowardly. Besides, Sir, why should Canadians shrink from the future? It is true that we may have regrets, but why should we have fears? Sir, the 21 years of our short life is but as a day's march in the long road that leads to national prosperity and national splendor. If Canadians are only true to themselves and true to their country, I believe they may await with firmest confidence and highest hope whatever fate the rolling years shall bring.

Mr. McMULLEN. We have listened for some time to the eloquent address given by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Porter). I am not going to attempt, at this late hour, to follow his remarks, but I prefer to leave them in charge of some hon. member who will follow in the discussion in coming days. We are engaged in a very important discussion: the trade policy of this country is always a very important question, as it is to every nation, and it should receive at the hands of the representatives their careful and serious attention. We have involved in this question also the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), with respect to our trade relations with the United States. But before proceeding to take up these two questions and discuss them, I will make some reference to remarks dropped by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. White) delivered a speech last night to which I listened with great pleasure, and I suppose that from his own standpoint it was a fair exposition of the position of hon. gentlemen opposite. He referred to the speech delivered by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and he stated that it would have been better if it had been delivered on the floor of Congress.

Mr. PORTER.

I have had the pleasure of listening to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) for a great many years, and as the representative of a constituency he is an ornament and a decided advantage to this House, and his views and opinions expressed on public questions have met with general respect wherever they have been delivered. It, therefore, ill becomes any member to characterise his able and very valuable effort last night in relation to the trade question of this country by saying that that speech should have been delivered on the floor of Congress. Another question always raised, or a port into which hon. gentlemen always betake themselves when cornered on the question of trade relations, is that we are disloyal, that we wish to hand over the country, body and bones, to the United States, that we are seeking a connection with the United States, which eventually will result in complete political union. It is very surprising how hon. gentlemen opposite can at the same time blow hot and cold. On the introduction of the National Policy in 1878 the Finance Minister stated, not only in this House but in this country, that the object of that policy was to secure trade relations of an advantageous character with the United States, that he wanted either reciprocity of trade or reciprocity of tariff, and he declared when we entered upon our National Policy, our protective tariff, that a very short time would elapse until we would obtain from the United States the trade relations we require. Hon. gentlemen opposite placed upon the statute-book of the country a statute declaring that when the United States were prepared to enter into trade relations with us in certain named products of our country and their country, the Government were prepared to meet them. I should like to know if, at this period of our history, it is considered to be disloyal to advocate unrestricted reciprocity, whether it was disloyal in 1878 for the leader of the Government to place this statute on the statute-book. It is standing there still, it has never been repealed. It is a standing offer, not on our part, but on their part. It is an absurd idea to so characterise our efforts to secure from the Americans more extended trade relations than we at present enjoy, when hon. gentlemen opposite have passed a statutory enactment declaring they were ready to accept improved trade relations with the United States. This question of disloyalty should be dispensed with without further consideration. Another question referred to by the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) was, that the price of lands in the United States had receded very much. I am glad to find that hon. gentlemen opposite, although it has been hard work to bring them to it, are beginning to admit that the prices of lands have fallen in Canada. The farmers, I am satisfied, would not very much longer put up with the persistent statement that real estate is holding its own. Now hon. gentlemen opposite find it necessary to admit that it is not. The hon. member for Renfrew went on to state that in New York State real estate had fallen in price very much. The difference between our position and that of New York State is this: We quite admit that the prices of real estate there may have shrunk, the reason for which is that many of their people have gone west and taken up new sections; but in our country it is quite different, for when our people emigrate they go in a large measure to the Western States instead of going to our own North-West. We admit that a good many have gone to our North-West, but the fact is that in the Western and North Western States to-day there may be found large numbers of Canadians. We deplore that fact, we would prefer to have our people in our own country, but the unfortunate fact remains that they are not here. In the United States Americans do not leave their country and come here, whereas there has been a steady stream of emigration from our country which has gone to fill up and develop the Western States. I repeat that we deplore that. We say that a policy which continues such a state of things is a bad policy. The hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White), also drew attention to the fact that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated some years ago that he was in favor of protection, and he quoted some extracts from a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman in 1876. There are, however, very few great public men who have never changed their minds. Mr. Gladstone has done so on several occasions, as have other prominent men. But if hon. gentlemen opposite want to know a change, I would ask them to remember that the leader of the Government and Sir Charles Tupper were free traders up to a very short time before the introduction of the National Policy. The late Minister of Finance had on his desk a speech prepared to deliver on the broad question of free trade before the hon. member for Oxford came down with his Budget speech. He was a free trader up to that time, and then he became a protectionist. So if the Minister of Fisheries were present, I would ask him to put down the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), as a protectionist in 1876 and the leader of the Government as a free trader in 1876, and deducting one from the other he would perhaps be better able to tell us the result than he was yesterday. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Porter), stated that yesterday the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had unhorsed his opponent. I watched the delivery of that speech and the hon. gentleman's style and gesture, and I must say that it was more characteristic of a horse jockey than of a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. HESSON. What kind of a jockey are you?

Mr. McMULLEN. I was rather surprised at the statement the hon. gentleman made in regard to the reduction in the prices of land. He said they had reduced 100 per cent. The next time the hon. gentleman undertakes to deal with a matter of that kind in this House, it would be well if he had a blackboard introduced here, so that he could set down the figures, and make the deductions, to show how he comes to a conclusion of deducting 100 per cent. from the value of lands, and let us see what is left. I can only say, from the manner in which he delivered his speech, that he showed considerable ignorance of public questions, and his ignorance was only equalled by his audacity in the manner of his delivery. The hon. gentleman said he could dispose of a great many of the statements that the hon. member for South Oxford had made, and he went on in his own style to dispose of them, but instead of disposing of them he actually confirmed those statements, and especially so by his admission that there was a decrease in the value of lands. I would draw the attention of the House briefly to the cost that this country incurs by having in our midst the family of the Tappers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think there is anything wrong in letting the country know this. I drew the attention of the House, a short time ago, to the amount that had been received by the High Commissioner last year. I will now give the amount that has been received by the several members of the family this year, and I may remark that it is rather singular that a young man who is virtually but a youth, should be admitted to the Cabinet over the heads of older, and graver, and devoted followers of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government, but still it is a fact.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am speaking to the question, and I am not wandering from it. We are dealing with the financial position of the country, and this matter bears directly on it. The year before last, the senior Tupper, the Hon. Sir Charles, drew $14,500. Last year, he has drawn altogether, as I have shown from the public records in the evidence I presented to the committee, $18,694;

then, again, we have a notable relative to that particular family who occupies the position of Commandant General, Mr. Cameron, who, I think, was once sent to the North-West on a celebrated occasion. He went there, but we cannot say of him, as was said of a noted general, that he went, and saw, and conquered, for he went, and saw, and ran away, but did not conquer. However, he is drawing a salary as Commandant General of $4,000 a year. We have the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who has lately been installed in his position, and he is drawing $8,000 a year. We have also a person who has been brought to this country for the purpose of discharging the duties of secretary to that hon. Minister, or rather, as I have already said, performing the duty of a wet nurse to the hon. gentleman so as to enable him to discharge the duties of his office until such times as he comes to the years of maturity, when he will be able to carry them on himself—we have this secretary brought from London at a salary of $2,800 a year. Looking over the items of law expenses last year, I find that we paid to a person named Wallace Graham, of Halifax, $7,365 for law costs, and I understand that this man is a partner of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. This all put together nets up to the sum of $40,459 that the family have drawn from Canada last year. The hon. gentleman told us in his opening speech that the country was prosperous. No doubt it is. As far as the Tupper family is concerned, they are prospering. Talk about the country being in financial embarrassment. It would be absurd to expect them to talk in that way, for as long as they can maintain this condition of things and draw from the public Treasury the enormous amount they draw, they will always be willing to stand up for its prosperity and devote their eloquence to the continuance in power of the Government which enables them to draw at the public expense $3,372 per month for their particular family. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was taken to task because he stated that some of the public accounts were cooked. Any person who will carefully look into the manner in which the accounts in the Auditor General's Report are put together, must come to the conclusion that the accounts were cooked, and abominably cooked, for a purpose. Take, for instance, the accounts of the Intercolonial Railway for last year, and you find in the neighborhood of $28,000 charged for heating and lighting cars. I would like to know what that has got to do with capital account. We find the sum of $38,000 charged for snow fences and snow sheds, and I would like to know what that also has got to do with capital account, unless those items are put in for the purpose of trying to keep out of the general expenditure amounts that should be charged to annual expenditure, and in order to try and show the country that the Intercolonial Railway is in a better condition than it really is. The Intercolonial Railway was looked upon as a necessity of Confederation and the people supported it in order to have an outlet to the seaboard without being compelled to go through the United States. Since the hon. gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches got into power, they have, unfortunately for the country, built branches and have added to the capital account in connection with that railway, until to-day we have something like $57,700,000 sunk in that road, and upon this money the people of the country have to pay an annual interest. The road is now handled in the interests of the coal miners and for political purposes, and is not paying its own expenses. You will not find in the history of Canada anything of this kind in connection with any other line. It was said the other night by the Minister of Finance that when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) had charge of the road that it did not pay running expenses then, but there is not a railway in this country that has in its inception paid running expenses. If you take the history of the Grand Trunk Railway, you will find that it took many years to accumulate a traffic in order to make the road lucrative. It was the same with the Great Western and the same with the Northern. It took them some time to get traffic before they began to pay, and if the Intercolonial Railway had been managed properly and due regard for economy had been practised by hon. gentlemen opposite the Intercolonial Railway would be paying running expenses to-day. In place of doing that it is a drag upon the resources of the people of the country. The hon. gentleman also said that the North-West would fill up and that we could not deny that there had been an increase in the population. That is very true, but if it had not been for the maladministration of gentlemen opposite the North-West would have filled up much more rapidly. If the Government had handled the land and railway matters in a manner so as to secure the confidence of the outside public that country would have a million inhabitants to-day instead of about a quarter of a million. Very many more settlers would be there. Their land policy was objectionable. They allowed their friends to form all sorts of colonisation companies, and in many other ways to get hold of land in that country; and the public got disgusted, and the result is that we have not as many people in that country to-day as we ought to have. The hon. gentleman also spoke with regard to Mr. Mowat and Mr. Ross having made some speeches upon the progress of this country. Well, we are glad to say that our country has progressed and made some advancement, but that advancement has been made in spite of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and not because of it, because their policy has been against the best interests of the country instead of being in favor of them. He also told us that it was too late to discuss the question of free trade and protection. I believe it is. It is getting late in the day to discuss that question, and the reason is simply that hon. gentlemen opposite have within the last ten years added so enormously to the debt of this country that the necessary drain upon the people's resources to meet the annual demands in the way of interest is enormous. That drain has been seriously increased until we are now placed in this position, that were we offered free trade by the United States to-morrow, as was clearly shown by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) our revenue would suffer, and we would require in some way to provide for sums that we might possibly lose by an arrangement of that kind. The hon. gentleman also stated that we cannot help the manufacturers of the country without helping the farmers. Well, it is rather amusing to hear hon. gentlemen opposite make such statements as that. It is well known that the manufacturers of this country, particularly the manufacturers of agricultural implements, have a decided advantage over the farmers of this Dominion, and in many ways the farmers are seriously suffering. Take, for instance, the article of binders. We know perfectly well that they have been turned out of the shops in the last season at a cost of a little less than $80, while they are sold to the farmers at $150. What is the reason of that? Simply because you cannot import them from the United States, and pay the enormous duty and the freight. The manufacturers in this country are so well aware of what it costs to bring agricultural implements from the other side that they put the price up to the outside figure at which they can be laid down. The same is the case in a great many other things. Now, I would draw attention for a moment to the losses we have sustained for a year or two in connection with the operation of the Intercolonial Railway. The loss in 1888 was $363,043.16, and in 1887 the loss was $232,105.75. That clearly shows that, instead of the loss annually getting less, it is annually getting more; and hon. gentlemen charged to capital account this year, including the items I have referred to, $742,385.38. Now, I was rather amused with the statement of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that we would yet succeed in making a treaty with the United States. He said there was a prospect now, that Mr. Harrison had come into power, of making a treaty of that kind. Well, Sir, I have no faith in the gentlemen who are so blindly and determinedly devoted to the National Policy ever making a treaty of extended trade relations with the United States, unless they are forced and driven to it by the people of this country. I am thoroughly convinced that the First Minister is able to turn a corner of that kind if he found it necessary in order to retain office; but I am satisfied that it will require very strong pressure and close watching on the part of the people of this country to obtain extended trade relations with the United States under the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite. The manufacturers of this country, it is well known, have contributed very largely to some things that were of vital necessity to the political existence of these gentlemen. We have all heard how they were invited, shortly before the elections, to provide the sinews of war for the Government which had given them the advantages they enjoy; and the probability is that as long as the First Minister can hold power under the condition of things as they are, he will do so; but the moment that his grasp on the country appears to become weak, and the people begin to realize that they are being duped and humbugged, I have not the slightest doubt that the corner may be turned and unrestricted reciprocity adopted. With regard to the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance, I listened with a good deal of attention to the statements he made. He followed very closely in the line of his predecessors, especially on the question of averages. Sir Leonard Tilley, who was his predecessor, some years ago, also paid a great deal of attention to averages. He said that the taxes of 1884 were $4.82½ a head, from 1874 to 1879 $4.88 a head; and from 1879 to 1883 $4.81 a head. The present Finance Minister gave our taxation in 1888 as $4.54 a head, but latterly, when he came to count up our total taxes, he admitted that the rate was $5.66 a head. As I said, he followed very closely the course which had been adopted by his predecessor. We heard, however, a speech from the hon. gentleman in 1883. At that time he undertook to address the House in the interest of then Finance Minister. He told us that we had reached a point in our history when we could boast of the proud fact that we had exported more than we had imported, that the tide had turned, that the balance of trade was in our favor, and that now we were on the high road to prosperity. It happened that in the year 1880 we exported a few million dollars more than we imported. Well, we have heard nothing about the balance of trade from that day till now. Every Finance Minister who gets up to make his budget speech very cautiously avoids making any reference to the balance of trade. Now, I have the figures showing our exports and imports, and I will read them:—

Year.	Imports.	Exports.
1881.....	$105,330,840	$ 89,290,823
1882.....	119,419,500	102,139,203
1883.....	132,254,022	98,089,804
1884.....	116,397,643	91,406,498
1885.....	108,941,486	89,238,361
1886.....	104,484,561	85,251,314
1887.....	112,892,236	89,515,811
1888.....	110,894,630	90,203,000
Total.....	$910,554,918	$744,134,814

Showing a balance of trade against us in those eight years of \$166,420,104. We have heard nothing more with regard to the balance of trade since 1880, when we exported a little more than we imported. The Finance Minister talked about the wise and vigorous policy which the Government had adopted. I cannot say much for the wisdom of their policy, but it has certainly been a vigorous one in the way of extracting out of the pockets of the consumer a very large amount annually. Sir Leonard Tilley boasted of having some twenty millions of dollars of surplus in the first four years of the National Policy, but when we take into consideration not only the surplus he had but also the amount of money extracted by the increased cost of everything manufactured here and consumed by the people, you can easily realise how vigorous the policy of the Government has been in extracting from the people a very large amount. Another thing to which the hon. gentleman referred was our debt. On 30th January, 1889, he said that it was \$236,650,000, but he forgot on that occasion to give us the benefit of the manner in which the prophecies of previous Finance Ministers had been fulfilled with regard to reducing our debt. His predecessor, in presenting his financial statement the previous year, said that he had been able just by a stroke of the pen to reduce the debt of the country \$53,000,000. He stated this reduction had been effected by a simple operation in interest. The Finance Minister has forgotten that move on the part of his predecessor, and we are disappointed this year that the announcement has not been made of a further reduction of \$53,000,000. The hon. gentleman also stated that the interest per capita has been only increased 14 cents. I cannot understand how an hon. gentleman occupying the position he does would dare make that statement. I cannot tell where he got his figures—certainly not from our blue-books. I defy him to show by any calculation of the figures taken from the blue-books that such is the result. Take the interest paid in 1878. We find that we paid \$6,513,314, which, taking the population then at 4,000,000, would give \$1.63 per head. Take the interest in 1888, \$9,823,313, and it would give for 5,000,000 of a population \$1.96 per head. So that that would mean 33 cents per head increase instead of 14. Now, either the Auditor General is falsifying the facts or the Minister of Finance is falsifying the facts, and I leave those two gentlemen to settle that question between them, contenting myself with saying that we have had a good deal of experience with the Auditor General and find him generally correct. The hon. gentleman also gave his figures with regard to the increased revenue, and the surplus we may expect in coming years. He told us that, after providing for all indebtedness, he expects to have a surplus next year of \$2,000,000. Well, if there is one thing in the world hon. gentlemen opposite do well, it is dealing out encouraging prophetic utterances. We have had any number of prophecies from them with regard to what is going to happen. We know that when the hon. the First Minister came to this House and asked for an additional sum with which to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, he brought to us, in apparent earnestness, a statement as to what we might expect in the North-West from the revenue to be derived from the sale of land and other resources. He said that by 1890 we would have \$71,000,000 revenue. We know how far we are to-day from realising that sum; we know that instead of the North-West giving us any revenue, there has been a positive loss this year of over \$150,000. Sir Leonard Tilley also gave a statement as to what we might look for in 1890. He told us that by 1890 he expected we would have in the pockets of the country a surplus in cash of \$53,000,000. That is a prophecy which bears no evidence of being fulfilled. We had another prophetic utterance of a different kind. The hon. the Finance Minister of the year before last gave us an idea of what we might expect out of the North-West when he asked the House to pass a resolution for the loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway. You take, he said, one hundred thousand farmers, place them upon sections of land in the North-West, calculate each farmer cultivates 320 acres, which he sows with wheat, and admitting it will only yield 20 bushels to the acre, and it is more likely to yield 40,—taking the product of that tract of land, the North-West will have to send to the outside world 640,000,000 bushels of wheat in a few years. But a very small percentage of that prediction has been realised so far, and by the light of the non-fulfilment of past predictions we may conclude that, with regard to the surplus promised by the Finance Minister, that prediction will not be realised. The hon. gentleman, in answer to some remarks of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) regarding the Maritime Provinces, said that my hon. friend had belittled and insulted the Maritime Provinces. Well, I listened carefully to his remarks and did not hear a single word disparaging these Provinces. I consider that they, as well as ourselves, have suffered at the hands of the present Government. They have been compelled to pay a great deal more for what they have to consume by the National Policy, but hon. gentlemen opposite, in order if possible to keep them in line, are good at making promises, any number of which have been made. They have promised increased railway accommodation, and in some cases have kept that promise. The Intercolonial Railway has been extended to meet the views of gentlemen down there. I believe the Maritime Provinces came into Confederation, although opposed to it in the first place, and they begin to realise now that, as they are in, they must make the best fight they can and get all they possibly can in the scramble for the division of the plunder among the several Provinces. Another question touched upon was the question of sugar. The hon. gentleman said sugar was a little higher in Canada than what it was in the United States. Well, at present, sugar in the United States, under the influence of a combine, has been raised  $2\frac{1}{2}$  cents a lb. above what it would be if there was no combine, and in the face of this extensive combine he had to admit that in Canada we paid a little more for sugar than did the people of the United States. It is at the present moment about \$10 a barrel higher in the United States than it would be but for the combines. Another question I want to refer to, which was alluded to by the Minister of Finance, is the duty upon iron. In 1887 pig iron was imported at a duty of \$2 a ton. In 1887 the Finance Minister raised the duty to \$4 a ton, besides \$1 bounty. In 1885 we imported 43,759 tons of pig iron; in 1886, 47,360 tons; in 1887, 48,250 tons; and in 1888, 49,434 tons. We produced in Canada, in 1887, 24,829 tons, and the party who produced it admitted that he employed 250 hands in the production. In 1888 the amount produced was 33,314 tons. Admitting that it required 250 hands to produce the 24,000 tons in 1887, it would require 330 hands to produce the 33,000 tons in 1888. The duty and bounty in 1887 amounted to \$124,135. Take the 250 hands whom this party employed at \$400 a year wages, and that would give \$100,000. Deduct that from the bounty and duty, and the producer has \$24,135 left after paying his wages, and he has his pig iron for nothing. In 1888, for the production of 33,314 tons, 330 men, as I have said, would be required, and their wages, at the same rate, would amount to \$132,000. The duty and bounty on the amount of iron produced would be \$66,570. Take the wages from that and you find an amount left of \$34,570, after all the wages are paid, and they have all the pig iron they produce for nothing. I think that shows most conclusively that the way in which the duties are placed on pig iron is a gross fraud on the consumers. Who are the consumers of iron? Are they the lawyers? Are they the politicians? Are they those who sit in comfortable offices and use simply the pen with which they write? No, the consumers of iron are the farmers. When the farmers hitch up their plough, they are using iron. When they hitch up their carriage, they are using iron. When they use a harrow, they are using iron. To-day, pig iron is worth \$10 a ton, and we are paying a bounty of \$5, so it is 50 per cent. which the people are charged on pig iron. I do not know in what way that is helping the farmer by the operation of such a duty as that, though the Finance Minister said that helping the manufacturer was helping the farmer. The Finance Minister also spoke in regard to binding the Provinces together. I was rather amused at some of his remarks with regard to the efforts which the Government had made in that direction. We know what has been the result in Manitoba. We know that, since Confederation, we have had two wars in that country, which have been the result of neglect and mismanagement. Experience has taught us that, had the Government discharged their duty to that country, we would not have had the difficulty we have had there, which has resulted in an increase to our debt of \$8,000,000, because the Government did not attend to the demands of the unfortunate half breeds at the time and so saved the country from getting into a trouble of that kind. Then again, the hon. gentleman made some reference to the amount of taxes which the farmers paid. The Finance Minister said—and it was only a repetition of a portion of his speech in a previous year—that the farmer grows wool on his own sheep, that he clips the wool with his own shears, that he takes the wool to the little mill which is driven by the rivulet at the foot of his own farm, that he takes it back and his industrious wife spins the yarn, that he takes it to the weaver and has the yarn woven, and that then he has it made into clothes for his own wearing; and he wanted to know what duty the farmer paid on all that. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman if our farmers are to wear nothing but what they produce and make themselves. You would fancy, to hear the hon. gentleman speak, that a farmer's wife should not wear a bonnet of a decent kind or any other article of ornament. She should go to church, according to the hon. gentleman, with a cotton handkerchief on her head. A farmer's wife ought not to have any style. But what do we find is the fact in regard to what farmers have to pay. When the farmer sits down to breakfast, he has to pay 15 per cent. on the delf he uses. When he goes to put the harness on his horse, it costs him 35 per cent. If he has any proper trimmings on that harness, they will cost him over 100 per cent. He has to pay over 50 per cent. on the iron which is used in the various articles which he uses. He pays a very large sum for binding twine. We know the effort that was made to have an increase in the duty upon binding twine, but the Government were ashamed to consent to it. The farmers had been suffering for some time from the monopoly which certain people had in regard to binding twine. But the hon. gentleman would not allow a farmer's wife to wear a decent bonnet, or a decently trimmed dress, or mantle, because, if she were to do so, she would have to pay a duty of 35 per cent. The Finance Minister complimented the Government on having a surplus, and stated that we were to have no more debt at the end of three years than we have now; and still the country is to go on prospering. It is singular that, though for ten years we have been borrowing and spending over \$10,000,000 a year, we have the unfortunate condition of things that exist to-day. We have to admit that the country to-day is not in a flourishing condition. If we enquire from manufacturers and others, they will admit that things are not in as satisfactory a condition as they should be. If we appeal to the farmers one by one, they will say that their financial condition is not as good as it was some years ago. There is another evidence that it is not as good. I ask the hon. gentleman to look at the records. There are more mortgages recorded against farmers in the last two or three years than there were for years before. There are also large amounts on chattel mortgages recorded, and that is a still stronger illustration of the crippled position of the farmers of this country. In the face of that, for the hon. gentleman to say that the country is in a healthy condition, is aside from the truth. No one can maintain such a proposition who makes careful enquiry into the condition of the people of the country. If the Government had taken the money they borrowed, and had placed it in the banks of this country, so as to allow them to discount for a less price than they do now, the farmers might have got money cheaper than they can; but probably it was to enable the banks here to keep up the rate of interest that they sent the money to New York where they only get 1½ per cent., while the banks here were paying 3½ per cent. If there is any reason why interest in this country has been kept up, it is because the Government have been competing with the farmers in borrowing money. Through the Post Office Savings Bank, and the Dominion Savings Banks in the Maritime Provinces, they have a large amount of money borrowed. It costs 4 per cent. interest and 1 per cent. to handle the money borrowed in this way, and if that money, in place of being borrowed by the Government, had been placed at interest among the people, the probabilities are that the farmers to-day would be able to borrow money at 4 or 5 per cent. in place of having to pay 6 per cent. on mortgaged real estate. We know that in Australia they borrow money at 4½ per cent. on good farm securities, in the State of New York you can do that, and even for less. I would like to know why we are not able to do this in the Province of Ontario where they have land security as good as you will get in any part of the British Empire. Simply because the Government are competitors with the farmers that have to borrow money and pay large rate of interest, and that is the way the rate is kept up. Now, I would say that the exports and the imports of a country are the only true way of judging of its prosperity. I contend that we must treat a country the same as we treat an individual. When we find that a man buys annually more than he is selling, we must come to either one of two conclusions, that he is buying beyond his means and borrowing to pay, or else that he has resources to draw upon without selling. I contend that when we are annually running into debt and adding to our responsibility by 10,000,000 and 12,000,000 a year, with the balance of trade annually against us, I say that is clear evidence that the country is not in that prosperous condition it ought to be. We know that it was said at the introduction of the National Policy that we were to have a home market for almost everything that we produced. There was to be a home market for the farmer, and I can well remember, on a previous occasion when the Finance Minister was delivering a speech on that question, he said that a home market would undoubtedly be provided for the farmer. He said: For instance, take a farmer that lives within two or three miles of a factory, and has chickens to sell; these he carries to the factory and is able to sell them to the operatives. And the hon. gentleman went on to show what an advantage it would be to the country to have these factories rising up all over the country where the farmers could sell commodities of that kind. Well, Sir, that was rather a ridiculous illustration to be put forth by a man in his position. We find that the highest sum that we have reached for our exports of manufactured goods under the National Policy was only \$3,577,000 in 1884. From 1876 to 1878 the average exports of manufactured goods amounted to \$4,500,000; but since the National Policy came into force in 1879, our exports of manufactured goods has decreased, for last year it dropped to \$2,700,000. Now, take for instance the amount of export of articles produced by the farmer. In 1887 the export of animals and their produce was \$24,247,000; in 1888, \$24,719,297. Then take agricultural products. In 1887 the exports amounted to \$18,836,000; in 1888, to \$15,436,000. This shows clearly that it is the agriculturists after all who bring the money into the country. When we consider that the manufacturers have only exported not quite 3,000,000 annually, while the farmers have exported 36,000,000 to 40,000,000 annually, it is clear that they are the men who bring the money into the country, and in place of legislating in their favor, in their struggling efforts with financial difficulties, we are legislating against them. The Finance Minister said that the spirit of foreign trade is developing in this country. I think it is time that the hon. gentleman should realise that point, it is full time that his followers should also realise it, because in my opinion, if they do not act upon it, the people of this country will teach them a lesson as soon as they have an opportunity. People are beginning to realise that they have got to have more extended markets than they have at the present moment. The fact is that the farmers are beginning to realise that unless they can get the American market open to them to a greater degree than they have at present, their condition will not improve very rapidly. We know well that the farmers of this country pay about three millions annually for the privilege of selling the commodities that they have to dispose of to the United States. The hon. gentleman opposite spoke to-night in regard to horses. He said if the Americans come and purchase our horses, it is because they want them, and they have to pay the duty. But when they come over to buy a horse to take across, they know how much duty they will have to pay, and of course they deduct that sum from the price they pay for the horse. The result is that the Canadian farmer gets only the price of the horse, less the duty that the purchaser has to pay. We know perfectly well that the American market is the only market we have for horses; we also know that it is the only market that we have for lambs. We sent 365,000 lambs to the United States last year, and notwithstanding that it is our best market for lambs, every farmer in this country has got to pay 60 cents a head upon his lambs to meet the duty. We know perfectly well that when a buyer comes into the farmer's yard to buy his lambs he pays him a price less the duty and profits that he expects to get for them on the other side. The result is that he pays the farmer the duty less for his lambs. Our people are beginning to realise that fact, and I think that hon. gentlemen opposite will have great difficulty in showing the farmer that if the duty was taken off his lambs he would not get an additional price. I think the farmers are beginning to realise that if any change in the policy on the country can be made that will relieve him of that taxation, the sooner that change is made the better. Now the Finance Minister drew our attention to the fact that we are developing a trade with China and Japan. I turned up the Trade and Navigation returns to see the extent of that trade, and I found that it had reached last year the magnificent sum of \$56,000. Now there is another point to which I wish to draw the attention of the House. Take two colonies in Australia, Victoria, a protectionist colony, and New South Wales, a free trade colony. These two colonies are side by side, they have the same climate, the same laws, the same relations to the parent state, and in every way they are in the same circumstances. In 1866 Victoria had a population of 636,982; New South Wales, a free trade colony, had a population of 431,412. In 1886 the population of Victoria had run up to 1,033,052, while that of New South Wales had run up to 1,036,762. The population of the free trade colony had increased at the rate of 139 per cent., while the population of the protectionist colony had increased at the rate of 62 per cent. Then, again, compare the increase between 1871 and 1881. Between 1871 and 1881 Victoria lost a population equal to her immigration, 53,000, and 15,000 of natural increase, while New South Wales showed a gain of 37,216 males between twenty-five and forty-five, Victoria losing 35,916 males between the same ages. In 1872 Victoria was ahead 52,136; in 1881 she was behind 16,494. From 1866 to 1885 the revenue of Victoria rose from £3,079,160 to £6,290,361, an increase of 105 per cent. The revenue of New South Wales in the same period rose from £2,012,079 to £7,584,593 in 1885, or an increase of 275 per cent. The total insolvents from 1868 to 1885 numbered in Victoria 13,001 with liabilities of £5,266,890, and in New South Wales 11,552 with liabilities of £4,486,558. Take imports and exports. In Victoria in three years, 1869 to 1871, the average imports and exports reached £26,399,614 or £3,090,293 in excess of New South Wales. In New South Wales in 1883, 1884 and 1885 the average trade was £40,610,536 or £6,280,146 in excess of Victoria. In 1866 the tonnage inward and outward of New South Wales exceeded Victoria by 189,015. In 1885 the difference was 862,919 tons. In manufactures we have the following statistics:—Victoria, in 1886, had 2,813 factories, employing 41,542 males and 7,755 females, a total of 49,297. New South Wales had 3,612 establishments, employing 42,280 males and 3,494 females, total 45,783. Victoria, in 1877, had 510 new establishments. New South Wales had since that year 1,256 new establishments. Value of plant in Victoria, £1,643,893; in New South Wales, £5,801,757. In the former 20,160 horse power, in the latter 25,192. Victoria had letters, received and posted: 1866, 8,631,133; 1885, 36,061,880, or an increase of 318 per cent. New South Wales had letters, received and posted: in 1866, 6,678,371; 1885, 39,351,200, or 491 per cent. Property assessed in Victoria, £116,283,570; New South Wales, £197,028,429; giving in the former a per capita amount of £198, in the latter £241. The Minister of Finance made a comparison between this country and Australia, and it is surprising that an hon. gentleman should present statements that will not bear criticism. If the hon. gentleman will examine the statistics of Australia he will find that all the railway indebtedness is assumed by the colony and is a national debt. In our country it is not so, but if you add to our national debt the debts of our railways the amount will be much beyond the per capita indebtedness of Australia. I will now give some idea of what advantages the National Policy has given to the farmer. He has been taxed on his fertilisers. It was stated that this was done in order to protect him against buying spurious fertilisers. He is taxed on his exportation of logs which is understood to be done in order to prevent his giving away his property to the Yankees. His mower, reaper, and binder are taxed, lest he should be induced to purchase American machinery and be called on to pay more than it is worth. The iron he uses is taxed in order to keep out a spurious article; and, no doubt, it is stated that the article he can obtain here is better than what he can obtain elsewhere. His salt is taxed lest he should obtain a poor article elsewhere. In all these ways the farmer is taxed under the National Policy. Now, the only way by which we can aid the farmers is, by giving them more extended markets than they enjoy at present. Parliament can do nothing that would tend more to that end than to give them free and unrestricted access to the American markets. The tendency of the National Policy has been to increase the cost of everything consumed by the farmer and to reduce the prices realised by him for his products. He has now begun to realise that the National Policy has nothing for him; and that, notwithstanding statements made with respect to the home market, it means nothing to him. He realises that the National Policy cannot increase the price of barley or of wheat. In order to give millers an opportunity of bringing in the wheat they require, they were permitted the privilege of bringing it in in bond and grinding it for re-shipment. That could be no great advantage to the farmer. There is another point which the hon. gentleman would do well to note. The farmers are beginning to realise that there has to be some change made. In their Farmers' Institutes they have been discussing this question of unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union, and permit me to say to hon. gentlemen opposite that 40 out of 60 of the Farmers' Institutes in the Province of Ontario have endorsed unrestricted reciprocity. That is a pretty good evidence that you will have very great difficulty in persuading them, in view of the restricted condition of the market, that it is not the best thing they could have under present circumstances. The best evidence we can give for the necessity of asking for unrestricted reciprocity is the fact that, year after year, our trade with the United States is growing, and it is becoming more evident every year that the United States is the most convenient and best market we have for those commodities which we have to sell. When we consider that we have to send to the United States some forty or forty-five per cent. of our entire trade we must realise that it is time that we should seriously consider the advantage of removing the barriers that stand in the way of our having free trade with that country. Last year we exported to the United States to the value of \$39,470,000, and to England \$41,084,845, which clearly shows that the Americans are a very desirable class of people to have free and unrestricted access to. The past history of our country has shown this. From the year 1854 to 1866 we had a state of things in this country that was a decided advantage to the farmers of this country, and I am sure that there are many farmers in Canada to-day who look back with an anxious desire to the return of the good times that existed between those dates. I hope we shall be able to secure that condition of things for them before many years are over.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Before many Sessions.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot see why England could very well object to our getting unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and I do not see why she should have any reasonable ground for so doing. She surely will not object to our trading with those people, when she does ten times the trade with them that we do. She does about $600,000,000 worth of trade with the United States every year. I am surprised to hear hon. gentlemen opposite say that it is disloyal for us to trade with the United States, when England herself trades with them so largely. They have been talking with regard to Imperial Federation, and I will make a few remarks on that after a little while. It is said the United States is not our natural market, and I understand that hon. gentlemen opposite are now making efforts to secure trade with other parts of the world for us. I will be glad for the sake of the poor farmers of the country, if the Government can secure better markets, but I think it is wise and prudent for us to look nearer home for a market before we go further away, if we can get at our own doors, on moderate terms, the advantages that we are so badly in need of. I think it is stupid and insane for us in the embarrassed condition of our public treasury to subsidise a line of steamers to run in all directions around the world looking for trade. Our annual expenditure now amounts to a very large sum and I think it would be prudent that we should call a halt and look nearer home to get the cheapest, the most convenient and the best market we can. I find last year we exported to the United States $15,000,000 of commodities, and in looking over the United States imports I find they purchased $60,000,000 of the very things we are in a position to supply them with. We only exported 25 per cent. of what they consumed, and I think that it was a very clear indication that they want to deal with us. Take the city of New York for instance, as well as other cities of easy access to Canada, and we know they are large consumers of the stuff we have got to sell. The city of New York consumes 2,000,000 lambs annually and 250,000 calves, and those we cannot send across the Atlantic. If we had unrestricted reciprocity we could easily send those and other things to a splendid market in the State of New York, the wealth of which we know is three times as much as the entire Dominion of Canada. The enormous productive power of the United States is a marvel to everybody who comes to investigate and realise it. Some idea of the extent and progress of the manufactures of that country was given to us by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) last night—

Mr. HESSON. What has made it so?

Mr. McMULLEN. I will tell you in a minute if the hon. gentleman will permit me to proceed. The United States in 1887 manufactured to the extent of $1,050,000,000 worth and England manufactured $770,000,000 worth. The assessed value of the United States in 1887 was $58,000,000,000, and the entire assessed value of Great Britain was $48,000,000,000, so the United States is undoubtedly one of the greatest nations on the face of the earth and its markets are lying at our doors. If they are willing to give us those markets we would be fools not to accept those privileges. It is said that we should not go down on our knees to beg unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union from the States. There is no necessity for doing that. Is it by going on our knees and begging from them that they passed the resolution offering us commercial union the other day? Who was there to go on his knees for that resolution? I wish now to show that the United States is the largest manufacturing nation in the world. In the year 1880 they manufactured $5,369,000,000 of articles, while in Great Britain they manufactured $4,092,000,000, or the United States manufactured $1,277,000,000 worth more than Great Britain itself. They have more railway mileage than any other nation in the world and a greater mileage than all Europe put together. That is a pretty strong evidence that they must be a progressive nation and a desirable people to trade with. I believe it would be judicious and prudent on the part of our Government if they were prepared to meet the United States Government fairly, and I am sure that we would easily secure those advantages which we are so badly in need of. I have no confidence whatever that the Government of to-day will adopt that course. I believe they will do as the hon. member for South Oxford stated the other night—they will badger and annoy the American Government in every way they possibly can by taking advantages of every possible petty difficulty in order to prevent the friendly feelings that would otherwise grow up between the two nations, such petty annoyances as the fruit basket tax of one cent a basket. Now, Sir, in regard to the question of Imperial Federation notwithstanding all the eloquence hon. gentlemen opposite and others in England have expended in favor of the project, my impression is that England has spent so much money to secure the trade relations throughout the world which she has at present, that she will never shut her doors against foreign trade with the view of increasing her own colonial trade. The fact is that we do not deserve any consideration of that kind at England's hands, because we have ourselves adopted a policy that tended to shut her goods out of our country. We have tried our own National Policy for ten years, and now when we go to England and ask for Imperial Federation, she will say: Gentlemen, you have adopted a policy of your own, you have shut us out of your territory, and now, when you find that your policy is not as advantageous as you expected it would be, and you have not the markets you require, you come to ask us to adopt a different policy from that which we have been pursuing for many years. England has opened up a trade with India, which is undoubtedly a lucrative one, and she has been compelled by the Governments of her own Colonies to take that course. Wheat is, to-day, carried from the very centre of India to Liverpool at a lower rate than it can be carried from Montreal to Liverpool. It is carried from the centre of India to Liverpool at 13 cents a bushel, and from Bombay to Liverpool at only 6½ cents a bushel, while the cost of carrying it from Montreal to Liverpool is nearly double that amount. The reason of that is that the trade between Great Britain and Bombay has grown to such enormous proportions that the traffic both ways cheapens the carriage of wheat from India to Liverpool. There are many reasons why I do not think there is the slightest hope of England ever consenting to Imperial Federation. Her foreign trade has grown to enormous proportions. But it is rather singular that hon. gentlemen opposite, notwithstanding that they appear to be absolutely devoted to the interests of the manufacturing concerns of this country, are willing to sacrifice them to get Imperial Federation. We know perfectly well that, under that system, our manufacturers would be subjected to a greater reduction in the prices of their goods than they would under unrestricted reciprocity with the United States; we know that Imperial Federation would tend very greatly to wipe out our manufacturing industries; and yet the hon. gentleman for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is willing to sacrifice all the interests of our manufacturers for Imperial Federation—but he would not be willing to permit them to run the risk of a slight reduction in the price of the goods in order to secure unrestricted reciprocity, and give the farmers of the country the relief they need. Now, Sir, the course we have been adopting as a people for years has been a most insane and imprudent course. We have been increasing our debt enormously, we have been adding to our annual expense and drawing upon the resources of the people to such an extent as to cripple them financially; and to-day the country is in a most unfortunate condition, owing to the financial profligacy that has characterised the acts of the Government now in office. We have all sorts of expenses in all directions. I will give you just one or two items to show the recklessness which has characterised them. Take, for instance, the expenses for repairing Rideau Hall, which during the past few years have been as follows:—

1880.....	69,791 91
1881.....	24,851 60
1882.....	32,904 52
1883.....	39,787 86
1884.....	44,657 31
1885.....	39,791 45
1886.....	35,215 40
1887.....	38,260 71

$419,164 79

We have spent, squandered, lavished, thrown away, this amount of money on repairs alone to that building. Then, take the matter of Government contingencies, and you find the same condition of things:

Year.	Amount voted.	Amount expended in excess of amount voted.
1879.....	$ 177,202 00	$ 16,202 00
1880.....	165,764 00	24,014 00
1881.....	153,400 00	6,843 00
1882.....	162,061 00	20,811 00
1883.....	184,429 00	42,141 00
1884.....	191,332 00	25,172 00
1885.....	204,755 00	22,157 00
1886.....	217,657 00	31,337 00
1887.....	213,807 00	19,395 00

In these years the entire sum spent for contingencies in excess of the sum voted amounts to $238,291.98. This shows the direction in which our affairs are drifting. Now, I say, it is time that we should call a halt in our public expenditure. Every item of expenditure of this sort should be cut off, and the Government should bring the expenditure down to a point that would enable us to treat with the Americans if they were disposed to treat with us, without suffering any embarrassment; and we can do it if the Government choose to do it. But we have been educated in a very bad groove, and I am afraid that if the Government of this country remains in the hands of the hon. gentlemen who now control it, we need hardly expect that they will adopt a system of economy. A very prominent gentleman who held the office of Finance Minister in the Government declared that we would at any time rather defend an increase of $1,000 than attempt to defend a reduction of $100, and that is the policy hon. gentlemen opposite have pursued for years. I referred a short time ago to the enormous sum drawn by one family, and if we went over the catalogue of their relations, their cousins and their aunts, and found what they all got, we would begin to realise that it is no wonder that the expenditure of this country has run up to the figure at which it stands at this moment. I say that the duty of every representative in this country is to set his face determinedly in opposition to the continuance of the present system, and endeavor to reduce it to something reasonable in the interests of the people, so as to secure for those who are now struggling with difficulties, particularly the farming classes, the advantages they require, and which they will insist upon having when they get the opportunity at the polls.

PRAYERS.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. HAGGART moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 100) to amend an Act respecting the Civil Service. He said: The first object of the Bill is to reduce the salaries paid to the gentlemen who examine candidates for Civil Service employment. The next object is to include in those exempt from the operations of the Civil Service Act, post office inspectors. The third object is to allow the Government to pay accountants in the Inland Revenue Department, whose salaries were limited from $600 to $1,400, up to $1,600, and that special clerks whose salaries now range from $1,400 to $1,600, may be paid as high as $1,800. Another object is to allow the Government to pay railway mail clerks mileage. Under the old Bill, the chief railway mail clerks were not allowed mileage while travelling on the road the same as other clerks. The last object is to amend the Act in order to make it agree with the Estimates, by allowing postmasters in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa, to receive the salaries provided in the Estimates.

Mr. MULOCK. Why exempt post office inspectors from examination?

Mr. HAGGART. All our inspectors are exempted. The object of the Act was to allow post office inspectors, also, to be exempted, and they would have been if a semi-colon had not been inserted instead of a comma.

Mr. BLAKE. This is a Bill to remove the dot?

Mr. FISHER. Is it allowable to appoint persons outside the service as inspectors?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, it is under the old Act.

Mr. MULOCK. This is not in order to meet a particular want?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know that the Government have any want in contemplation, either particular or general.

Mr. MULOCK. How is it the necessity of the change is only discovered now?

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps the Act has had a more effective looking after lately.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 101) to amend the Copyright Act. He said: This Bill proposes to make as a condition for obtaining copyright in Canada, that there should be publication or republication in Canada within three months after the first publication elsewhere. The three months may be extended by the Minister of Agriculture for a longer period, provided proof is adduced that satisfactory progress has been made in re-publishing in Canada. It is likewise proposed that if any person entitled to copyright under the Act fails to take advantage of its provisions, the Minister of Agriculture may give a license to any other person to re-publish, on such person filing with him an agreement and security to pay a royalty of ten per cent. on the retail price of every book sold under the license. It is intended the royalty shall be collected under regulations made by the Governor in Council. And after the passing of this Bill the importation into Canada of foreign reprints of works, of which the copyright is secured in Great Britain and has been registered in Canada, shall be prohibited.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THREATS, INTIMIDATIONS AND OTHER OFFENCES.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 102) to amend chapter 173 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, respecting threats, intimidations, and other offences. He said: The object of the Bill is to make clear the meaning of the Act. I intend that the Act shall not apply to those who merely refuse to work with or for an employer who is objectionable, or a workman who is objectionable, to the members of the union to which they belong. I think the intention of the Act was that such persons should not be held responsible for conspiracy, but as they have, in certain cases, been prosecuted and found guilty, I deem it desirable that they should be clearly exempted from the operation of the Act. Section 13 of the Act, sub-sec. 2, provides:

"No prosecution shall be maintainable against any person for conspiracy to do any act, or to cause any act to be done, for the purposes of a trade combination, unless such act is an offence punishable by statute."

I propose to introduce the words, "refuses to work with or for any employer or workman." The balance of the clause is as it is in the statute at present. It has been found that the Act, as it exists at the present time, has resulted in members of a labor combination, who passed a resolution that they objected to work with or for an objectionable man, being brought up before a court, and tried, and convicted. The case went to the Quarter Sessions, but the Judge refused to quash the conviction, and when it was appealed from the Quarter Sessions to a Superior Court, the Superior Court held that the judgment was a correct one, and should be confirmed. If that is the correct interpretation of the law, I think it is unfair to these persons. I believe they have a perfect right, under the statute as it exists, to manage the affairs of their organisation as they think fit, according to law, if they do not interfere with the rights or liberty of other individuals, and I think it cannot be held that they are so interfering when they refuse to be employed by or with anyone who is obnoxious to the association. I hope the Minister will see that this should be provided for, because it is only fair, it is all they ask, and it is all they will be contented with.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MONTREAL HARBOR COMMISSIONER'S ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON (for Mr. TUPPER) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 103) further to amend the Act respecting the Trinity House and Harbor Commissioners of Montreal. He said: The Act proposed to be amended makes it obligatory for the Harbor Commissioners to maintain buoys. Under this Bill, it will be optional to do so under the supervision of the Governor General.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Bill (No. 104) to amend the Fisheries Act.—(Mr. Dickey.)

ENQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. PERRY. Before the Orders of the Day are called. There were certain returns ordered by the House on my motion—one from the Department of Public Works, and the other from the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The House ought to have these returns before it considers the subject-matter in Committee of Supply. If the Government have not help enough to enable these returns to be made in time, I know of lots of men who are looking for employment day after day, and why do not the Government, in the name of common sense, employ them? I tell my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that these returns will be of no service to me, or to my constituents, or to the public, if they are brought down after prorogation.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to send me across the House a statement of what these returns are.

JESUITS' ESTATES ACT.

Mr. BARRON. I desire to ask the Government if they will not consent to bring down the papers which I asked for, a day or two ago, relating to the allowance of the Jesuits Bill? I have a motion on the paper, but it is not likely that it will be reached before the debate takes place on the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), which I understand is likely to come on this week or next. I think it is important, for an intelligent discussion of that subject, to have the papers referred to before us when that motion comes up. I, therefore, ask the Government if they will bring down the papers in time for that discussion?

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 77) to further amend the Act incorporating the London and Canadian Loan and Agency Co. (Limited).

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 73) to incorporate the North-Western Junction and Lake of the Woods Railway Company.—(Mr. LaRivière.)

Bill (No. 80) to incorporate the Dominion Mineral Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 81) to incorporate the Canadian Superphosphate Company.—(Mr. Colby.)

Bill (No. 96) to incorporate the Prince Edward Island and Continental Railway and Ferry Company.—(Mr. Landry.)

NORTH-WEST LAND SCRIP.

Mr. MULOCK asked, What is the total amount of North-West land scrip (colonisation, volunteer, half-breed, police, and other kinds, if any) now outstanding?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The approximate amount of scrip now outstanding is in the neighborhood of $700,000.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM, OTTAWA.

Mr. TROW (for Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT) asked, What amount has been expended on the Experimental Farm at Ottawa, from the 1st July, 1888, to the 1st February, 1889?

Mr. CARLING. The sum of $44,888.12 was expended by the Department of Public Works on buildings, and $25,793.55 by the Department of Agriculture—$11,600 on capital account, and $14,193 on maintenance account; in all, $70,681.67.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CLAIMS AGAINST CANADA.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has the Government of Prince Edward Island given up all future claims against the Government of Canada for non-fulfilment of the terms of Confederation, or otherwise, for the subsidy of $70,000 a year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I really cannot say.

ST. ANNE DE CHICOUTIMI WHARF.

Mr. COUTURE (translation) asked, At whose request was the construction of the wharf of St. Anne de Chicoutimi decided upon? What is the amount voted for that purpose, the name of the engineer who conducted the work, the number of days he resided at Chicoutimi, the amount of his travelling and other expenses? From whom did G. A. Gagné receive orders to employ only his political friends? By whose orders has he refused to employ any persons except his political friends? By whose orders did he refuse to receive material required for the construction of the said wharf from persons other than his political friends? Did Civil Engineer Blais hire a steamboat for the journey from Chicoutimi to Tadoussac, and how much did he pay therefor? Is it the intention of the Government to continue the work on the wharf of St. Anne de Chicoutimi in the same manner? If so, why?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first enquiry of the hon. member, that is to say: At whose request was the construction of the wharf of St. Anne de Chicoutimi decided upon? I must state that it was at the request of the parson of the inhabitants of the parish and of Mr. J. A. Gagné, his predecessor in Parliament. To the second enquiry: What is the amount voted for that purpose, &c.? The amount voted last year was $1,000 which, added to that of $2,100 previously expended, forms a total amount of $3,100. The work was under the superintendence of Mr. J. C. Blais, of the Department of Public Works; he conducted, besides, the works on the Saguenay, at Chicoutimi, St. Alphonse, Lake St. John and Tadoussac. His travelling and other expenses amounted to $160.40. In answer to the third enquiry, I must state that no such orders were given to Mr. Gagné. To the fourth enquiry, which reads as follows:—By whose orders has he refused to employ any persons except his political friends? I may state in answer that the Department of Public Works is not aware that there were any persons employed other than political friends of Mr. Gagné. On the contrary there were many others employed. To the next enquiry: Did Engineer Blais hire a steamboat, &c., my answer is: He did not. To the last enquiry, I answer: Yes.

THEFT OF REGISTERED LETTERS.

Mr. TAYLOR asked, Is it the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates, a sufficient sum to pay to Samuel Boddy and J. F. Gordon, both of the village of Farmersville, in the county of Leeds, for loss sustained by them in having two registered letters containing $40 which were mailed at said village of Farmersville, addressed to the Ottawa Post Office, traced to the said Ottawa Post Office, and stolen therefrom?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government have not yet come to a conclusion in the matter.

BEER IN THE NORTH WEST.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether the Government is aware that four per cent. beer is now freely imported into the North-West Territories, and that the Department of Inland Revenue refuses the local brewers malt to make four per cent. beer; and if so, whether it is the intention of the Government to do away with this glaring injustice?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I understand that four per cent. beer is being imported into the North-West Territories. The Department of Inland Revenue refuses local brewers malt because there are no licensed brewers in the Territory. I am not aware of the intention of the Government with reference to the matter.

THE BALLOT IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. EDGAR) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to introduce legislation during the present Session to provide for the holding of elections in the North-West Territories by ballot?

Mr. DEWDNEY. It is the intention of the Government to introduce the ballot.

PUBLIC EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. DOYON (Translation.) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to compel persons holding, at one and the same time, office under the Dominion Government and under the Provincial Governments, to make choice of one or the other?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, I must state that the Government have not yet considered that matter.

MR. JUSTICE JAMES.

Mr. MACDONALD (Victoria) asked, Has Mr. Justice James, of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, obtained leave of absence? Is he ill or unable to attend to judicial work? If not, has he, since vacation (the 15th September last), sat with the Court hearing arguments, or tried or heard actions at Nisi Prius or equitable actions, or gone on circuit, or sat at the regular Chambers at Halifax, or transacted any business except at his residence in Dartmouth, and that of an irregular character and in relation to uncontested business? If he has done so, to what extent has he performed the duties of his office?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Justice James obtained leave of absence last year for a short time, but he has not now any leave of absence. The learned Judge, having, I suppose, been advised by the reports of our proceedings of the question on the paper, telegraphed me the 9th inst., in these words:—

"In reference to Mr. John A. Macdonald's question on Monday next, I have to inform you that I obtained leave of absence for two months, a year ago, in order to seek a southern climate. I did not ask to renew it. I have been since then suffering from a wasting, and sooner or later, a fatal disease. I am, and have been, prohibited by my physicians, from attending to any severe or continuous labor. I have been quite unable to take my place on the bench with my brethren. I have, however, been engaged with Supreme Court business, such as I have been able to perform continually, I may say daily, up to this day. I have held several lengthy and important arguments, and a large number of chambers applications, mostly at my own residence. The certificate of my physicians, Doctors Parker and Cunningham, is in your office accompanying my application for leave of absence last winter. I am not as well, by a good deal, as I was at that time, and my medical advisers continue their inhibition as to labor. I don't consider it necessary for me to ask for leave of absence under the circumstances, as if I should ask for it, I presume it will be granted as of course."

I had telegraphed the learned judge what the nature of the question was, and he telegraphed me again a more specific reply, as follows:—

"My telegram of this morning anticipates yours of this evening since received, and gives most of the information asked for. I must, in courtesy to you, add replies to your questions. I will answer them in detail. I am a confirmed invalid, almost confined to my house. I am unable to attend at the court house as one of the court. My physicians positively forbid it. I have, during the summer and autumn and until the last month, heard arguments and delivered judgments in contested causes of importance. I filed a judgment in an equity cause last week, and have others under consideration. I was unable to take my circuit last summer or in the autumn, but no inconvenience resulted. I have done a great deal of uncontested business at my residence; I suppose hundreds of cases. I felt bound to do all in my power, and it has been a relief to the bar. I have also attended to the divorce business. As for doing business at home of an irregular character, I am not aware of having done any business of an irregular character, and what I did was from a sense of duty and in a regular manner; at least I have heard no protest or complaints. It is quite possible that my health may improve with the advancing season. If it does the public will get the benefit and I will be most happy."

I telegraphed the Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, and he replied as follows:—

"I regret that the health of the Judge in Equity had not permitted him to be present at any argument in banco since January, 1888, nor has he heard any cause at nisi prius, nor any equity cause, to my knowledge, since 27th April, 1888. Judge James was unable to take his regular circuit in the spring of 1888, nor could he take the criminal trials in October, 1888. He held the regular chambers in September and October last, and I understand he has been hearing chamber motions at his chambers at Dartmouth, and that he has for some time past declined to hear any contested matters."

I have also an intimation from the council of the Nova Scotia Bar Society wishing to inform me, before I should answer the question, that a remonstrance from them, complaining of the judge's inability to perform judicial duties and long-continued absence, is on its way.

Mr. JONES. Might I ask if the report is correct that Judge McDonald has obtained twelve months' leave of absence?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The learned judge has obtained leave of absence, but not for twelve months; I forget whether it is for three months or six months—not longer than six months.

RAILWAY BRIDGE ACROSS ST. JOHN RIVER.

Mr. ELLIS asked, What was the cost of the iron railway bridge across the St. John River at Fredericton? What amount of money was advanced by the Government in aid of the construction of said bridge, under the Act 50 and 51 Victoria, chapter 26? Was any money advanced or subsidy paid by the Government in aid of the road to connect the bridge with the New Brunswick Railway? Was any money advanced or paid in aid of the bridge or connecting road beyond the amount allowed by the Act? Has any interest been paid on any of the advances made by the Government in aid of the bridge or the connecting road?

Mr. FOSTER. The answer to the first section of the question is, $386,378.22; to the second section, $297,000; to the third section, yes; to the fourth section, no; to the fifth section, no.

JESUITS' ESTATES BILL.

Mr. BARRON. I think the Government should be sufficiently courteous to me to answer yes or no to the question I submitted a few moments ago. My motion on the paper is this:

"Return for copy of the Bill, 51-52 Victoria, chapter 13, Quebec, intitled: 'An Act respecting the settlement of the Jesuit' Estate'; for copies of the report made on the 16th January last, or any other date, to His Excellency the Governor General upon the said Act; and of all Orders in Council, reports, opinions or other papers showing the consideration and conclusion arrived at by the Government in regard to the said Act; and of all correspondence in relation to the said Act had between the Government and the Government of the Province of Quebec, or any other person or persons whomsoever, as well as of all petitions or written representations made to the Government for or against the said Act becoming law, and showing at what date the said Bill was received by the Government and approved of by them."

When that motion was reached, a few days ago, I happened to be out of the Chamber. On my return, I immediately proceeded to ask that I might move the motion. I did not intend to speak at that time, because I did not think it necessary, as the hon. gentleman for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) had given notice of his intention to move a motion on the subject. It is highly important, when the discussion arises on that motion, that the papers should be in possession of the House. I was in order, a few moments ago, in bringing this matter forward, and I should have an answer, yes or no, to my question.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There was no intention of being discourteous to the hon. gentleman; but I expected the First Minister would be here, and I desired to speak to him on the subject. I will communicate with my colleague in regard to the hon. gentleman's request; but, as the hon. gentleman's motion is on the Order Paper, if we begin and take a motion out of its place, other members will ask that the same be done in regard to their motions. The other day we went through the Order Paper, and, according to my recollection, the hon. gentleman was not in his place at the time the motion was reached, and he therefore had no opportunity of saying what he wished in regard to it. Unopposed motions were allowed to pass, and then we came back to the Notice Paper, and we are there again. At all events I will mention the matter to my colleagues.

Mr. LAURIER. I hope, after conference with his colleagues, the Minister of Public Works will be prepared to lay these papers at an early date before the House, without waiting for the motion to be passed in its regular course. No doubt there is a motion on the paper, but it may not be reached for some time, and it will strike everyone as proper that all the papers on this important subject should be before the House before the motion of which the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has given notice comes to be discussed. Under these circumstances the Government will, no doubt, see the propriety of not waiting until the motion of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barron) is carried in a formal way, but they will take steps to have the papers brought down without delay.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will mention the matter to my colleagues.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CHARLTON moved:

1. That the practice in the House of Commons of Canada of remaining in session past the hour of midnight is injurious to the health of the members of the House and is utterly unnecessary in the public interest; that it is calculated to prevent, rather than to promote, the due and careful consideration of public questions, and is more liable to be used as the means of forcing through legislation without due consideration, than as the means of securing full discussion and deliberate action.

2. That in future, and from the date of the passage of these resolutions, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair at the hour of twelve o'clock, midnight, with the same rigid adherence to the rule as is at present observed in leaving the chair at six o'clock, p.m., declaring, as he leaves the chair, the day and hour to which the House stands adjourned.

He said: It is hardly necessary, Mr. Speaker, to enter into any argument as to the desirability of adjourning the House at midnight. Most of the members of this House are gentlemen of regular habits.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. At home they are in the habit of going to bed at seasonable hours, but when they come to Ottawa a complete revolution in their habits takes place which is detrimental to the health of the members of this House. I think, Sir, on the score alone of the requirements of our health, that the request to adjourn at midnight should be granted by the leaders of the Government. It is unquestionable that the mortality of the members of the House has increased to a considerable extent by the unnatural hours we keep, for when we remain here after midnight we are not only trenching on the hours of morning, but we are sitting in a Chamber the atmosphere of which is vitiated owing to its bad ventilation, and the physical consequences to us are of a very serious character. Those consequences are visited not only on the members of the House, but on the members of the Press gallery, upon civil employes engaged about the House, and upon the pages. I claim that the pretension that it is necessary to sit after midnight to facilitate business is not well founded. If we protract the sittings until an early hour in the morning the result is lassitude the next day, and a correspondingly smaller amount of business is transacted. I am convinced that the result of adjourning at midnight will be that, in the end, business will be transacted more expeditiously and more satisfactorily than if we continue those late sittings. The custom of all the legislatures in the United States is to adjourn at six o'clock, I know that in Congress they meet at twelve in the day and adjourn at six, and only on very rare occasions do they sit after that hour, and we know that they get through an enormous amount of business in Congress. The Imperial Parliament has adopted substantially the rule that I now ask this House to adopt in reference to this matter. I find in the Standing Orders of the Imperial Parliament the following Rules adopted on February 24th, 1888:—

1. RULE REGULATING THE USUAL SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

"1. (24th February, 1888.)

"That, unless the House otherwise order, the House shall meet every Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, at Three of the clock, p.m., and shall, unless previously adjourned, sit till One of the clock, a.m., when the Speaker shall adjourn the House without question put, unless a Bill originating in Committee of Ways and Means, or unless Proceedings made in pursuance of any Act of Parliament or Standing Order, or otherwise exempted as hereafter provided from the operation of this Standing Order, be then under consideration.

"That at midnight on Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays and Fridays, except as aforesaid, and at half-past Five of the clock on Wednesdays, the proceedings of any business then under consideration shall be interrupted; and, if the House be in Committee, the Chairman shall leave the Chair and make his report to the House, and if a motion has been proposed for the adjournment of the House, or of the Debate or in Committee, that the Chairman do report Progress, or do leave the Chair, every such dilatory motion shall lapse without question put, and the business then under consideration, and any business subsequently appointed, shall be appointed for the next day on which the House shall sit, unless the Speaker ascertains by the preponderance of voices that a majority of the House desires that such business should be deferred until a later day.

"2. (5th August, 1883.)

"That the House do meet every Wednesday at Twelve o'clock at noon for Private Business, Petitions, Orders of the Day, and Notices of Motions, and do continue to sit until Six o'clock, unless previously adjourned.

"3. That when such business has been disposed of, or at Six o'clock precisely, notwithstanding their may be business under discussion, Mr. Speaker do adjourn the House without putting any question."

This, Mr. Speaker, is the rule in the House of Commons in England, to adjourn at six o'clock on Wednesdays, and midnight on other days, unless under certain circumstances, when it sits until one o'clock, a.m., and provision is made for suspending those Rules. I think, Sir, we might safely and properly adopt the rule of adjourning at midnight every day, instead of making an exception of adjourning at six o'clock on Wednesdays. I believe that if the rule that I now propose to the House were adopted, our business would be transacted with as great promptitude, as great facility, and, on the whole, in a better manner than if we indulge in those protracted sittings in the morning, on account of which members are scarcely fit for the performance of their duty the next day; for they certainly cannot come to work the following day in a condition, either mentally or physically, that they ought to be in.

Mr. MITCHELL. I second the motion as a matter of courtesy to my hon. friend, as I am almost always ready to second any motion he suggests. I do it also for the purpose of having a free discussion on this matter, for I have really not made up my mind as to whether it is desirable to adopt it or not, but I shall be glad to hear the reasons pro and con. I explain this now, because it might be thought afterwards that I had tied myself to the principle of the motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad my hon. friend has not tied himself to the principle of this motion, because I have some hope of having the hon. gentleman vote against the resolution, or, at all events, that he will not press his vote in favor of it. My hon. friend who moved this resolution evidently does not think he is coming on this side of the House very soon. I am quite satisfied that when the time comes when there shall be a change of Government, and that hon. gentleman shall be sitting on one of the front benches on this side of the House, as a practical parliamentarian, the first thing he will do will be to move the repeal of this resolution should it be adopted by the House now, because it really puts the control of the business before the House in the hands of the Opposition. They could talk everything out until twelve o'clock, and throw any measure over de die in diem. I do not suggest that such a course would be taken by hon. gentlemen opposite; but when a change takes place, and they come to sit on this side of the House, the other party may be very factious. I know that at the time we sat on the left, occasionally my good friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) told us we were factious. We disputed it, but still he said so, and we know what weight his opinion and his expression had in this country. I will remind my hon. friend of a conversation I had with him once, when I was very candid, as is my habit, when in the Opposition. I said I did not agree with some of our friends who wished to adjourn at twelve o'clock, as my experience was that the most important Government measures are always carried after one; and my good friend said, "Well, I will remember your advice;" and I think he carried it out practically on more than one occasion during five years. The hon. gentleman who moved the motion quoted the Standing Orders in England and the Standing Orders in the United States. Now, you know that in the United States Congress practically very few questions of importance arise. What questions do arise there are of great importance, but they are few in number, because the greater portion of the legislation governing life and property, and all that constitutes civilisation, are in the hands of the State Legislatures; and so the Congress can easily have that rule. Then it sits in the morning, because it has not the immense amount of committee work that is thrown upon this House owing to the larger and more multifarious duties and responsibilities that devolve upon the Parliament of Canada. The hon. gentleman also quoted the Standing Rules in England. Now, in the first place, in England, they do not make long speeches as we do here. Here, in Canada, we have got into the habit of delivering essays and lectures. Well, those essays and lectures we can all find in books, and it is merely lecture and water that we get, as a rule, in long speeches. In England a twenty-minute speech is considered a very long speech, and there are few men other than the Ministers and the leading men of the Opposition who take up more than that length of time, for they would not be listened to by the practical English mind; the impatience of the members puts down anything like long speeches. Then, again, you must remember that in England against an obstructive Opposition they have got the safeguard of the closure. At any time, when they think that a debate is protracted improperly, and not with a view of a genuine discussion of the subject, but with a view of throwing it over, the Ministry of the day have the power of moving closure, and, if they have a sufficient majority, that closure is granted. Now, I should be very sorry to see closure introduced into this country. It might at some time be necessary, but I have not yet seen the necessity, even in the long discussions which took place on the Franchise Bill, of that practice being adopted.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It should be applied to the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, the House did close upon it at the end, and closed upon it in a manner highly satisfactory to myself. I think that, really, it would not be well to have a cast-iron rule of this kind. My hon. friend, being the chief exponent of the views of those who sit on the left of the Speaker, like myself, who am considered the chief exponent of the views of the members on this side, has considerable power accorded to him by his supporters; but neither of us is a despot, and a single member, or two or three members, might join together if they chose, and in spite of the strong persuasions of my hon. friend and myself, they might persist in keeping up the discussion until the time came for an adjournment to another day. There is no necessity for this new rule, certainly in the experience of this Parliament. We have never had any difficulty. We have always tried on this side to meet the views of hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to discussions, and I must say that my hon. friend who now leads the Opposition, when we had a little quiet pourparler behind your Chair, Mr. Speaker, has always acceded to what he considered would be conducive to good feeling on both sides, and has not obstructed the public business. We have had no difficulty, and I do not apprehend any; but I must, on the part of the Government, resist the possibility of our being in a position to be made powerless at twelve o'clock.

Mr. LAURIER. I think it is quite proper that this subject should be brought before the House. Speaking for myself personally, however, I would not be disposed at present, at all events, to agree to the principle laid down in the motion in the hands of the Speaker. I do not know what the views of my hon. friend are with regard to the future standing of parties in this country; but if he believes that the Opposition are not likely to be at some future or proximate day on the other side of the House, I do not at all agree with him. I see evidences, not a few, that quite a change has taken place in public opinion. I see signs of denial on the opposite side of the House. I only hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will remain in their present frame of mind, and will not be alive to the many evidences which are apparent, not only in the Province from which I come, but in the other Provinces of the Confederation, of a change in public opinion. Entertaining those views and feeling pretty sure that at no distant day we shall be on the other side of the House, I realise from experience as well as from what the Premier says, that there is a great advantage to the Government in having the present system continued. I think it is also sometimes of advantage to the Opposition. But, though technically it may be better that the present system should be continued, I should hope that some understanding should be come to by both sides of the House, that the House should adjourn at a reasonable hour, say twelve o'clock, unless engaged upon some important question that might suffer if put off to another day. But apart from these exceptional circumstances, I think there should be some unwritten understanding of that kind. The British Constitution, if we might refer to it on a question like this, is full of unwritten understandings, and they are always acted upon; and if there were such an understanding as I suggest, I think it would be conducive to the health of members and to the expediting of business.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is one thing which I think the right hon. gentleman opposite forgot when he was speaking of the difficulties the Government was under if the members of the Opposition chose to talk out a subject. The right hon. gentleman adopted a method the other night of closing off a debate in a summary manner, by not allowing any of his followers to speak. I thought it was a judicious way of adopting closure. When I seconded the motion I did so as an act of courtesy to my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton), who generally asks me to second any motion of his, and I always do so, no matter what it is, but I did not bind myself at all to support my hon. friend unless after the matter is discussed it approves itself to my judgment. I must say that the views expressed by the leader of the Opposition agree with those of the leader of the Third party. I do not think it would be judicious or wise to adopt this motion, and I think the arguments of the right hon. the First Minister have a great deal in them. It is true that sometimes the right hon. gentleman may insist on continuing votes in Supply when the House is tired out, but there are two or three ways of killing that kind of thing. I think the suggestions of the hon. leader of the Opposition are sound, and that an understanding should be had, so that the health of hon. members on both sides should not be injured. There is a strong desire expressed to have adjournments at midnight, and the Government ought to meet hon. gentlemen on this side if possible.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would only say that the unwritten arrangement has been carried out during this Session, and I think the best way of continuing to carry it out would be to have a friendly conference between the leaders of the Opposition, the Government and the Third Party, when some conclusion will, no doubt, be arrived at. I must candidly tell you, that I have a personal reason for desiring to carry out the proposition of my hon. friend. At my age, after 12 o'clock, I would rather be in bed than in my place in the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There are other considerations beside those mentioned by the First Minister. It seems to me, we could facilitate the business of the Session a good deal, if the measures the Government intend to bring forward were submitted to us at an earlier period, so that we would be prepared to discuss them before any action is taken beyond the first reading is had upon them. It is quite true that when the Government introduce their measures at a late period of the Session, late sittings are of very considerable consequence. I think that the conduct of the Government in this particular, is altogether different from that of the Government in the Imperial Parliament. For the past half century, English Administrations have, during the first three weeks of the Session, submitted all the important measures. That has not been the rule here. The long sittings we had on the Franchise Bill were had upon a measure which was read the second time during the eleventh week of the Session. It seems to me that we might meet earlier than three o'clock, especially in the earlier part of the Session. I think it would meet the convenience of the House and of the Government if we would meet at two o'clock instead of three. That would give us four hours session before six, and we might then have a shorter session after eight. When hon. gentlemen propose to sit from eight to twelve, they propose to make that period of the day, when members are most wearied, longer than the period before six o'clock. That would seem to be reversing the natural order of things. To give six hours of constant attention to the work of the House, besides the time given to committees and private correspondence, is imposing a great deal of work upon hon. gentlemen. Now, I think, if we had a shorter session in the way I have indicated, there could be no doubt whatever that hon. gentlemen would come here better prepared to discharge the duties that devolve upon them. As things are, the great majority of members have no opportunity of reading the Bills on which they are called to act until the second reading. If these Bills were better considered before the second reading, there would be very much less time spent in their discussion. There is another thing which I think the First Minister has overlooked. He knows very well that if we had the business brought before us at an earlier period of the Session, the impatience of the House would prevent those very long speeches of which he complains. The speaking would be more business-like and pertinent to the question. There can be very little doubt of that, and the extension of the sittings to two or three o'clock in the morning has a tendency to produce that very condition of things of which the hon. gentleman complains, and impedes the progress of public business.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a good deal in what the hon. gentleman has said. We, however, have been attempting in our humble way to expedite business. On the eighth day after the House met, we were ready to go into the Estimates, and immediately afterwards we introduced a number of Bills. We are trying really to expedite business as much as possible. After what has been said, I think it would not be a bad plan if, early in the Session, immediately after the Speech from the Throne is answered, and no great eruption takes place, we should have a committee to consider the Rules of the House. It would be strictly a parliamentary committee, and not a party one. When the hon. member for the West Durham (Mr. Blake) was on this side, we had a committee to revise the Rules, which, I think, was productive of much good. I think the time has come for a similar committee, which could go into all the subjects mentioned by hon. gentlemen.

Mr. LAURIER. No doubt that is a very good suggestion, and I am very glad to hear it from the First Minister, and still more to hear that he will go into all the matters suggested by my hon. friend behind me, including that referring to the late stage at which the Government measures are brought down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will put ourselves on trial.

Mr. CHARLTON. After the expression of opinion from the leader of the Government and leader of this side of the House—

Mr. MITCHELL. And the Third Party.

Mr. CHARLTON—and the Third party as well, it will be unnecessary for me to press the resolution, as I am content with the implied understanding between the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, that, except under exceptional circumstances, we will adjourn at 12 o'clock. I, therefore, withdraw the resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

SHORT LINE RAILWAY—OXFORD TO NEW GLASGOW, N.S.

Mr. KIRK asked, What is the total length of the "Short Line" Railway from Oxford to New Glasgow, N.S.? What amount of money has been paid on account of this railway up to 1st January, 1889?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Oxford Junction of the Intercolonial Railway to junction with Intercolonial Railway near Picton: length—main line, 67 miles, Pughwash Branch, 5 miles, total, 72 miles; expenditure up to 31st January—paid old claim, Short Line Company, $149,233.09; for construction and equipment, $1,001,179.20; total, $1,150,412.29.

ST. ROCH DES AULNETS WHARF.

Mr. CASGRAIN (translation) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, reports, &c., which passed between the Department of Public Works and the late Charles Francis Roy, surveyor, and parties interested in the municipality of the said locality, respecting the wharf at St. Roch des Aulnets, in the County of L'Islet.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Government on the importance for them of assisting the municipality of St. Roch des Aulnets in the work of repairing a certain wharf opposite the lower crossing. The wharf was built by the municipality and, owing to accidents that happened, is in need of urgent repairs. It being available to the Government, who uses it for the purpose of loading and unloading everything they may require for the lightship of the lower crossing, I think it is as useful to the Government as to the municipality itself. Formerly the Government ordered a survey of the locality. I had been informed that Surveyor Roy had been ordered to report on the repairs to be made to the wharf, I heard since that Mr. Roy made no report, but merely made soundings and certain preliminary works. Nevertheless, there passed a correspondence between the municipality and the Government respecting the wharf referred to, and I think there were even petitions from the inhabitants of the locality asking for assistance. Since the Government uses the wharf, which, to a certain extent, is indispensable to them, in so far as it is a landing place for the crew of the ferry boat, I think it is but just that they should share in its maintenance, and I merely ask that they contribute to the repair it presently needs. Under these circumstances, I think my motion ought to be granted. With the permission of the House, I ask that I may be allowed to amend it by striking out the name of Mr. Roy and inserting the following words: "and parties interested in the municipality of the said locality."

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) I would suggest to the hon. member to leave his motion as it is and add after the word "surveyor" the words he has just read.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) I do not object.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) The hon. member is mistaken in respect to the correspondence between the Department and Mr. Roy. It is true there was no correspondence, but there was a report made by Mr. Roy, and that is why I suggested to him not to strike out that part of his motion.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) Perhaps the hon. gentleman could tell me whether he can do anything for that wharf during this Session?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must previously consider the matter.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

WESTERN NOVA SCOTIA RAILWAYS.

Mr. BORDEN moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Windsor and Annapolis and Western Counties Railway Companies relating to the consolidation, under Government control, of the railways of western Nova Scotia, together with copies of resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Halifax, and the Fruit Growers' Association of Nova Scotia, referring to the same subject.

He said: I gave notice of this motion in order to bring to the attention of the Government the unsatisfactory condition of the railways in the western part of Nova Scotia, between the city of Halifax and the town of Yarmouth. When I tell the House that the whole five western counties and the city of Halifax are affected by the condition of these roads, and that those counties and that city have together a population of about 150,000 people, I think the House will agree with me that it is a question of sufficient importance to be brought up here. The city of Halifax is connected with Yarmouth by three distinct lines of railway—first, the Intercolonial Railway, extending from Halifax to the junction, a distance of 15 miles; then the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, from the junction, including the Windsor Branch Railway, to the town of Annapolis; then we come to a gap which is known as the "missing link," where there is at present no railway communication between Annapolis, the terminus of the Windsor and Annapolis, and the town of Digby, the terminus of the Western Counties Railway. Then from Digby to Yarmouth, 67 miles, there is the Western Counties Railway. The length of the Windsor and Annapolis and the Windsor Branch together is 106 miles, and the length of the gap over which no road is now constructed, between Annapolis and Digby, is 18 miles. Thus we see that the railways in western Nova Scotia are under three distinct managements, and apparently hostile managements. First, there is the Intercolonial Railway, and, although the Windsor and Annapolis Railway has an arrangement by which it is allowed to run its trains from the Windsor Junction into Halifax, it is a fact, nevertheless, that the full and free use of the terminal facilities of the Intercolonial Railway at Halifax are denied to the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Co. That matter was brought before this House during last Session and the Session before, and the Government have been asked to take steps to rectify the great injustice which is being done to the people of western Nova Scotia, in denying them the facilities which are granted to the eastern portion of the Province in regard to the terminus at Halifax. What is the position in regard to the use of that terminus at Halifax? A few years ago the Intercolonial Railway was extended into the city of Halifax to what is known as the "deep water" terminus. The Intercolonial Railway cars are allowed to go into that terminus on a charge of $1 a car, while the cars from western Nova Scotia, over the Windsor and Annapolis are denied that privilege unless they pay a charge of $2.50. The answer given by the Government, when this matter was brought up, was: that there was no room even for the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway, and, therefore, cars coming from the west should not be allowed to participate in those facilities. I pointed out to the Government at the time when that reason was given that it was not a sufficient reason, because it did not explain why $2.50 were charged for cars coming in from the west and only $1 for those from the east. If there is no room for the traffic coming from western Nova Scotia, the Government should say so, and should not allow any cars to come in at all; but in fact they discriminate against the western trade by charging $2.50 a car, when they only charge $1 on precisely the same car from the east. This matter has been discussed a great many times by the Chamber of Commerce, and many other bodies in Nova Scotia who are interested in the commerce of that Province. I find that no later than March 6th—last week—the following report was made to the Chamber of Commerce in Halifax:—

"The Intercolonial management still refuses to carry Windsor and Annapolis freight past the old Richmond depot. All efforts to this end made by the chamber have so far resulted in failure. This favor is one so easily and cheaply granted that it is difficult to realise any solid reason whatever for withholding it. Can it be that this is another instance of the obstinacy of some official on the line? The Fruit Growers' Association have, with others, a common interest in this quarter, and it might be well, in conjunction with that body, to lay the plain facts once more before the Ministers at Ottawa."

So much for the terminal facilities at Halifax. It will be very clear to hon. members that over so short a line of railway as that between Halifax and Yarmouth, the management by two distinct companies, with a gap of eighteen miles of road not constructed, must result in very serious inconvenience and cost to the trade of that part of the Province. The facts are that freight rates over the Windsor and Annapolis and over the Western Counties, are altogether out of proportion to the freights over the road in the eastern part of Nova Scotia, and the people of the west feel that they are at a great disadvantage as compared with their friends and neighbors in the east. In order to show what the public opinion really is on this subject in the western part of the Province, I will read, with the permission of the House, an extract from the Bridgetown Monitor, a paper published in the county of Annapolis, which says:

"The difference in the rates upon the Intercolonial and the W. and A. R. is very marked. In fact it costs almost as much to bring freight from Windsor Junction to Bridgetown, as it does from Montreal to Windsor Junction. Now the W. and A. R. Co. say that it does not pay them to handle freight for less than their usual rates; it, therefore, only remains, in order that justice may be done, for the Dominion Government to buy the private roads at a fair valuation, complete the 'missing link,' and run the whole as Government property. A very large portion of the trade that rightfully belongs to our own Province is now diverted, and goes to St. John. Halifax merchants say they cannot pretend to do any extensive trade, after leaving Windsor, with towns along the valley, owing to freight rates."

A correspondent of the Halifax Herald makes the statement, that it costs three times as much to get a package of freight from Truro to Yarmouth, as it costs to get the same package from Montreal to Truro. The distance between Montreal and Truro is nearly four times greater than the distance between Truro and Yarmouth. Now, I propose to read a discussion which took place in the Halifax Chamber of Commerce, in January last, in regard to this subject:

"THE 'MISSING LINK.'"

"Edward Stairs speaks of the movement which had been recently started in St. John to form a company to carry on steam communication with bay ports. Halifax cannot trade with these bay ports to any extent because of the 'missing link' between Annapolis and Digby. To do business with ports in St. Mary's Bay and Digby it is necessary to send goods by the Intercolonial to St. John and ship them to their destination by water, and our merchants must place the goods at the same price as the St. John merchants do, notwithstanding their handicap in the shipment thereof. If the gap were built a trade could be opened up with that part of the Province by the merchants of Halifax. It was time the matter was pressed to completion, and he, therefore, offered the following resolution:—

"That this chamber, recognising the inconvenience to passenger travel and the great disadvantage the trade of Halifax and the western part of the Province is under through the non-completion of the railway system between Halifax and Yarmouth, do bring to the notice of the Government the advisability and great necessity of having that portion of the railroad between Annapolis and Digby (commonly known as the 'gap') completed at as early a date as possible; and that the committee on internal trade be instructed to deal with the matter.

"President Silver said it was certainly discreditable to the powers that be—whether the Government of Canada or the Government of Nova Scotia were to blame—that this gap of 19 miles should in great part destroy the usefulness of these two great lines of railway—the Intercolonial and Windsor and Annapolis.

"W. H. Harrington seconded the resolution.

"Conversational remarks followed by Mr. Kenny and others.

"Michael Dwyer said the system of traffic between Halifax and Annapolis was somewhat discreditable. There was discrimination, and the whole matter of the line and system of conveyance of goods from Halifax to the end of the proposed line needed looking into. We had been dealing with it for years, and Mr. Dwyer advocated the appointment of a committee to go into the whole subject and discover why there was discrimination against Halifax.

"Robert Pickford said there were two or three conflicting interests. The Windsor and Annapolis run their road to make the most money possible, and it is not to the advantage of this road to have the gap built. The Windsor and Annapolis have no terminal facilities at Halifax; their terminus is at Richmond. He was not advocating their claims, but they were used unfairly. They made a contract with the Government for terminal facilities. At this time both the Windsor and Annapolis and Intercolonial Railways had their terminus at Richmond, and when the Intercolonial terminus was brought into the city the Windsor and Annapolis were compelled to remain at Richmond. The Intercolonial Railway want $2.50 for every Windsor and Annapolis car brought into the city, so the latter road runs its traffic to suit itself and Halifax suffers."

I thought it proper to read this in order to support my case with the best evidence I could bring of the state of public opinion in Nova Scotia. I will further read a resolution passed by the Fruit Growers' Association, a large and influential association in the Province. The resolution was passed in January last:

"The following resolution, moved by W. H. Blanchard, seconded by B. W. Starr, after some discussion, passed unanimously:—

"Whereas, it is claimed by the manager of the W. & A. R. that this road must be run on commercial principles, and that the tariff rates are as favorable upon this road as upon any company road in this Dominion.

"Whereas, this tariff is unjust to us and places the agriculturists of these western counties at a great disadvantage as compared with residents on the Intercolonial Railway.

"Therefore, resolved, that in the opinion of this association the Dominion Government should be strongly urged to consolidate the western roads of this Province and control them, in order that we may be placed in fair competition with the patrons of the Intercolonial Railway."

Now, Sir, the question arises: Is there any way of remedying this evil? The people of the west are looking towards the eastern part of Nova Scotia, and they see what has been done there under the very same circumstances. In 1884 this House, upon the recommendation of Sir Charles Tupper, then Minister of Railways, passed a resolution authorising the Government to take over the roads of eastern Nova Scotia, that is, the road between Truro and Pictou, which had been given to any company that would construct a road to the Strait of Canso, and the road so constructed, which road was known as the Eastern Extension. I have here the speech made on that occasion by Sir Charles Tupper, and I am sure I cannot present the case for western Nova Scotia any better than by reading the statements made by him on that occasion for the Eastern Extension; and I believe that every word that the hon. gentleman spoke applies with equal force to our condition as to that which he was then advocating:

"The House is familiar with the difficulties that arose between the contractors and the Government of Nova Scotia; and also with the facts of the transfer of the Pictou Branch. That was finally settled here, I think, by an Act of 1879, which provided that the branch would be handed over when the contractors had completed the line. That line has been practically completed from Glasgow to Pictou, and the question came up as to its transfer. The Government acquired the right to the Pictou Branch. Negotiation ensued between the Government of Nova Scotia and the Government here in regard to that question; and looking at the difficulties that the Government of Nova Scotia would encounter in operating a comparative short line of railway, looking to the increase of the expenditure that would be involved, looking to the necessities that would arise of increasing the rates upon these roads, and looking to the dislocation of trade that was likely to result from the severance of the branch from Truro to Pictou, from the Intercolonial Railway system, it was finally agreed between the present Government of Nova Scotia and this Government, that we should practically take the position of the Government of Nova Scotia and pay the amount of money they were obliged to pay to the contractors for the Eastern Extension, and that, subject to the sanction of the Legislature of Nova Scotia and this Parliament, this Government should retain the branch from Truro to Pictou, and should acquire the Eastern Extension Railway from New Glasgow to the Gut of Canso. I may say that, although in that particular, I believe I entertain a different view from that of a large proportion of the party with which I am connected in the Province of Nova Scotia—I refer to that in connection with the administration of local affairs—I am of opinion that the arrangement that has been arrived at is in the interests of the counties through which this portion of railway runs. I believe this policy is also in the interest of the Province of Nova Scotia as well as of the Dominion of Canada. I believe it will not involve any additional expenditure on the part of the Government of this country. The portion of the I. C. R. between Truro and Pictou, is the only portion that pays a considerable amount of net profit over and above the expenses of operation; and I think the result of this transaction will be that we shall stand in quite as good a financial position at the end of the year as we should if we had lost the Pictou Branch. Regarding, also, the interests of the various industries of Nova Scotia, especially the connection between the coal mining counties of Nova Scotia and the harbor and city of Halifax, I think it will be found that the policy propounded in this resolution is a policy not only in the interest of Nova Scotia, but in the interest of Canada. Under these circumstances, I do not think it is necessary to discuss this question at any length, because I believe the policy which the Government have adopted will meet with the cordial approval of both sides of the House."

There was not a single argument used by the hon. gentleman on that occasion which cannot be used with equal force with respect to the condition of affairs which I have been pointing out as now existing on the Windsor Branch and Western Railways. There is the double management, involving, in my judgment, an increased expenditure, there is the dislocation of trade, and all the other difficulties pointed out by Sir Charles Tupper at the time this resolution was passed; and I maintain there is not a single argument brought forward in favor of the extension of the Intercolonial Railway east which is not equally applicable to the extension west. There is no reason why the people of the western counties of Nova Scotia should not receive from this Government and this Parliament every advantage which the people in the eastern portion of the Province enjoy. It may be said: Why cannot some arrangement be made for the amalgamation of these companies? That has been attempted. No one knows better than the Minister of Justice, who at one time held a prominent position in the Government of Nova Scotia, the strenuous efforts made by the Legislature and Government of Nova Scotia to amalgamate these companies and secure continuous railway communication between Halifax and Yarmouth in the west. I do not think it is possible to bring about this amalgamation or consolidation by means of either one of these companies, and I have no doubt the only recourse we have is to look to this Parliament and to this Government, and we do so, as I have already stated, feeling that we are only asking what has already been granted to the people of eastern Nova Scotia. It was pointed out in that speech that the road between Truro and Pictou was a paying road. Even in that respect the analogy holds good, because the road known as the Windsor Branch, between Windsor Junction and Windsor in the west, is known to be a paying road, and I have no doubt it is quite as good a paying road as that to which Sir Charles Tupper referred. If that argument is good in regard to the east, it is equally forcible with regard to the west. The Windsor and Annapolis Railway, as shown by the annual report of the company—the last one I have is for 1887—makes a remarkably good showing, and it appears that that railway is one of the best paying roads in the Dominion, paying its interest on all the different securities and carrying enough forward to have paid a dividend even upon the ordinary shares. It is well known, and members of the Government from the Province of Nova Scotia will agree with me, that there is an enormous traffic developing in the west, particularly from the growth of the apple trade; and I may inform the House that whereas ten years ago the Windsor and Annapolis Branch only carried 10,000 barrels annually, during last year it shipped between 100,000 and 200,000 barrels. There is practically no limit to the extent to which the traffic may increase. With respect to this point, I may be allowed to read an extract from the report of the chief engineer of Nova Scotia railways upon the railways in that Province as to the manner in which those roads are paying. He says:

"It did not require much prescience in the forecast of railway operations to lead one to expect a larger annual traffic return from 1887 than was experienced for any one of the five previous years, because we know that our railway traffic has not reached its proper limit, and must necessarily increase, yet with the western counties lying still undiminished, with this probably nineteen miles of buffer separating its connections with the outer railway world, no one anticipated that the railways, disconnected as they are, would, at the close of the year, exhibit an improvement in gross traffic returns to the extent of 11 per cent. This recent, suddenly increased activity, as will be seen by the next following comparative statement of annual traffics, is largely due to two principal causes: First, increase in the passenger traffic, and, secondly, the carriage of internal productions, of which the movement of coal had been a prominent feature. There is no movement of freight or through traffic from abroad over the Western Counties' line. This hiatus or gap precludes such possibility. Out of $16,566, the increase in receipts of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, $13,588 of it is due to passenger transport alone, and out of an increase of $6,417, earnings of the western counties, $5,553 is due to the same resource. These items make up 83.3 per cent. of the bulk of the improvement realised, and are no doubt attributable to commercial animation, the growing attractions of our climate for visitors during the sultry season, and the successful efforts of the Hon. Lorán E. Baker in establishing the new popular steamship route between Yarmouth and Boston, and the one most conducive to Nova Scotia railway interests."

From this report it will be seen that there was an increased profit of 11 per cent. on the earnings of the road during 1887, and the bulk of that was from passenger traffic, because, owing to the missing link between Annapolis and Digby and the high rates charged for freight traffic, there was not the freight carried that could be carried under management such as that on the Intercolonial Railway. With respect to the gap between Annapolis and Digby, it is well known that, in 1873, this House passed a resolution unanimously, giving authority to the Government to hand over the Windsor Branch—from Windsor Junction to Windsor—to any company that would construct a railway from Annapolis to Yarmouth. Later on the Act of 1874 was passed, carrying into effect the arrangements which had been based on that resolution. Again and again, as we all know, legislation has been passed by this House with respect to this road. What we supposed would be a great inducement to a company to build that road proved to be quite the opposite, owing to the fact that an arrangement had been made by this Government with the Windsor and Annapolis Railway to give that railway the use of the Windsor Branch, and it was therefore worse than useless in the way of assisting the Western Counties Company to build their road. It is perfectly clear that the Western Counties have a claim on Parliament and on the Government for assistance in the completion of their road. It is clear, when we notice the agreement made in January, 1887, between the Minister of Justice and the Western Counties Railway to give to that company $500,000 upon consideration that the company would give up their petition of right against the Government on account of their losses in regard to the Windsor Branch, that the Western Counties—it has even been admitted by the Government—has a moral and a legal claim upon this country for the construction of the missing link. But I desire to point out to the Government, if they entertain at all the idea of taking over those western roads, they should certainly do that before constructing the road between Annapolis and Digby, because the very moment they do that they add enormously to the value of all the roads which would be connected by the construction of that road. Consequently, in the public interest, it would be the duty of the Government, before constructing that missing link, to take over the roads between Halifax and Yarmouth. I have ventured to draw certain conclusions from those facts which I have very imperfectly endeavored to present to the House and the Government. They are :

"1st. The present unsatisfactory condition of the railway traffic of western Nova Scotia, seriously injures the trade of that section, and of the city of Halifax as well.

"2nd. When a similar state of things existed in eastern Nova Scotia, with respect to the Intercolonial, the branch between Truro and Pictou and the Eastern Extension, the Dominion Government promptly applied to Parliament for power to take over the two latter roads, and make them part of the Intercolonial system, which was unanimously granted.

"3rd. The Windsor Branch, and the Windsor and Annapolis are paying roads, and it is expected that the whole line between Halifax and Yarmouth, including the western counties, will be a paying one immediately upon the completion of the gap between Annapolis and Digby, and therefore the acquisition of these roads, instead of involving a loss, will prove to be a source of revenue to the country.

"4th. The Government of Canada, in view of its transactions with the Western Counties Railway Company, in respect of the Windsor Branch, is under obligation to complete the gap of 18 or 19 miles between Annapolis and Digby.

"5th. But the railways which would thus be connected, viz., the Windsor and Annapolis and the Western Counties, should be, together with the Windsor Branch, first taken over by the Dominion Government, and made a part of the Intercolonial system."

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden), in bringing this motion before the House has explained the matter so fully that it requires very little to add upon the subject. I must further express my very strong conviction that the view which the hon. member has presented to this House is one that ought to command the assent and early attention of the Government. The principle laid down by the hon. gentleman was, in the first place, that a system had been adopted in the Province of Nova Scotia with reference to the construction of railways in the east which, in all fairness, should be applied to the construction or consolidation of railways in the western portion of the Province. The hon. member referred to the action of the Government when they purchased the Eastern Extension line, running from Pictou to the Straits of Canso, and assuming at the same time the ownership of the Pictou Branch, so called. He might have gone further in his remarks by directing the attention of the House to the fact that since that time the Government have further adopted the principle of extending, under very heavy expenditure, the Intercolonial system in the east, in the Island of Cape Breton. Last year this House was called upon to vote a very large amount for the completion of that road to Cape Breton, and this year we are called upon to supplement that appropriation by another amount. Therefore, the principle of extending the Intercolonial Railway system has already been accepted by the Government, and my hon. friend is only asking the Government to apply that principle to the western part of Nova Scotia which they have applied to the eastern part of the Province; so that, I presume, the Government can make no reasonable objection, particularly in the circumstances in which that part of the Province is placed. The hon. gentleman pointed out very correctly that, worked at present as three systems, the Intercolonial Railway, the Windsor and Annapolis Railway and the Western Counties Railway, it was natural that the usefulness of those roads, generally, should be very much hampered, because hon. gentlemen know that when the traffic has to be exchanged from one road to another, and when there is an absence of a common agreement between those roads, the public are not served with the same convenience that they are when the railways are all run as parts of one system. The object of the hon. gentleman, then, is to induce the Government to obtain control of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, to put in the gap between Digby and Annapolis, and to obtain control of the Western Counties Railway as well. Now, it would appear that the hon. gentleman has presented to the House very good grounds why the Government should be willing to accept that responsibility on a financial basis. We have shown to the House that the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, though handicapped as they have been for the want of through communication with other lines to the west, have been able to pay a very fair interest on their bonds during the last two or three years. He might also have pointed out to the House, but that, perhaps, his modesty prevented him doing so, that the Windsor and Annapolis Railway ran through the garden of Nova Scotia, a part of the county which the hon. gentleman so ably represents in this House; and I venture to say that in this Dominion there cannot be found finer agricultural districts, with more productive soil, and more prosperous communities, than those through which this road runs from Windsor to Annapolis. Therefore, the future of this railway is highly encouraging. It is developing its usefulness constantly by the enterprises to which it is giving use, and by the immense quantities of freight which it carries, which, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, has so largely increased within a short time; and if the efforts of the farmers of that district are successful, as I have no doubt they will be, it is not unreasonable to expect that within the next twenty years there will be a million barrels of apples exported over that road. Looking to the connection with Yarmouth, I think the Government would be justified on that ground alone of assuming this responsibility. Then, the Western Counties Railway has been very successful, considering its isolated position. When we consider that it has no connection with the Windsor and

Annapolis Railway, and only runs as far as Digby, the fact that its traffic receipts, both for freight and passengers, have been increasing, is a very encouraging sign of its usefulness, and I have no doubt that if the gap between Digby and Annapolis were built, the earnings of those roads put together would be very largely increased. That gap has been one of the difficulties which have stood in the way of this through route, and I am afraid that the Government have not been altogether blameless in the matter. Several attempts have been made, as was intimated by the hon. member, to consolidate the roads in Nova Scotia, one during the time my hon. friend the Minister of Justice was a member of the Provincial Government. That effort failed. A subsequent effort was made by the present Administration, and I am led to believe that if the Government of the Dominion had been willing to give the same consideration to the application of the contractors under the present Local Government, that is to say, if they had been willing to carry out the offers they made to the syndicate during the reign of my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, and had extended that agreement to the late contractor under the present Administration, those roads would be in a fair way to consolidation at the present moment. But, for some reason or other, that consent was withheld, and the agreement under the present Administration fell through. Then, pending these negotiations Mr. Plunkett came forward with an offer to build the road. We remember that a Bill for that purpose was presented to this House. We remember that an agreement was submitted to the House by the late Minister of Finance. It is true it was submitted in a minute of Council at a very critical time, preceding by a few days a general election. We are also aware that Mr. Plunkett failed in his efforts to raise money in England, as was announced by the Minister of Finance last year, and he was unable to carry out his agreement, very much to my regret, and very much, I believe, to the regret of the people of Nova Scotia. During the discussion which took place last year in this House, I took the opportunity of enquiring of the Minister of Finance what course the Government intended to pursue in the event of Mr. Plunkett not succeeding in his financial negotiations in London, and it is this point to which I desire to draw the attention of the House. I said to the hon. Minister of Finance:

"I would also like to ask in what position the negotiations are in reference to the Western Counties Railway, as to filling up the gap between Annapolis and Digby. Perhaps the Minister might tell the House at what time the operations there will be commenced.

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I regret to say that the information has been somewhat unsatisfactory with reference to the arrangements that Mr. Plunkett was making in England within the last few days. A hitch has occurred. I was informed by Messrs. Baring that the matter had been arranged and that a very powerful syndicate had engaged to underwrite the bonds, that the money was all forthcoming, and that the matter was settled. But some legal question has arisen between Mr. Plunkett and the parties with whom he was making the arrangement, so that I believe the matter is not at this moment in so secure a position as I was led to understand by a communication from the Messrs. Baring a short time ago.

"Mr. JONES (Halifax). I am very sorry to hear that any hitch has occurred; but, in the event of satisfactory arrangements being concluded, is the hon. gentleman in a position to say what course the Government will pursue with respect to undertaking that work? The Minister of Railways informed us last Session that in the event of negotiations failing with private parties, the Government would immediately proceed to undertake the work themselves. A considerable time has now elapsed. We supposed, from the information we had of Mr. Plunkett's negotiations, that he would be able to carry through this consolidation scheme, and I regret very much that there has been any failure in that respect. But if such should unfortunately prove to be the case, and he should not succeed, will the Government then undertake the work?"

This was the promise made by Sir Charles Tupper last year. Well, another year has passed by; another season has been lost. The hon. the Minister of Finance was aware, a month after he made these observations, that Mr. Plunkett had failed, that he could not secure the money he desired, and, therefore, it was the Minister's duty, having given that pledge to Parliament, or it was the duty of the Government of which he was then such a prominent member, to have immediately commenced the work of completing that gap. Had that been done, no doubt things would have been today in a more satisfactory condition. The general consolidation, which my hon. friend from King's, N.S. (Mr. Borden) is aiming at, and which is so desirable, would have been thereby secured, because hon. gentlemen are aware that the public cannot be so cheaply accommodated by a private road as by a Government road.

Mr. BLAKE. Why not?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). My hon. friend knows from his own experience that a Government road is run on a different basis and for different objects and considerations. While we do not expect to make money out of a Government road, private individuals are always looking for a very large return, and that is the reason the Government, with larger resources, should be able to work a road on more economical terms than others. Therefore, if the Government had carried out their pledge to have undertaken this work, one difficulty would have been partly removed; but I am sorry to say that up to the present time there appears to be no sign of the Government moving in that direction. I hope they are not going to leave the matter over for another general election. They made use of it in a Dominion election and in a local election, by sending people there a short time to survey, so as to convey the impression that the work was to be undertaken. I think it is now about time, if the Government are going to undertake it at all, that the announcement should be made, and I hope there will be no further delay on that point. Another great object in the consolidation of these roads is what was pointed out in the House last year when this subject was up for discussion. When the agreement was made between the Government and Windsor and Annapolis Road, in 1873 or 1874, there was a clause in the agreement which read thus:

"That those who have the right to so much of the Nova Scotia Railway, with the branches, appurtenances, buildings and conveniences thereto belonging, or attached, as lies between the terminus at Halifax and the Windsor Junction, both inclusive, together with any extension to Halifax hereafter to be made."

At the time that that agreement was made the terminus was at Richmond, about three miles from the city, and the Windsor and Annapolis used that terminus in common with the Intercolonial. Since that time, under the administration of the hon. member for York (Mr. Mackenzie), the road was brought further into the city about one and a half miles, and the Windsor and Annapolis people have always claimed, and claimed justifiably, that they had the right to use that road for all purposes. It is true that right had been allowed to us for passenger purposes, but that is a very small portion of its usefulness, so far as the usefulness of a railway is concerned. Its greatest usefulness is in the transport of freight, and when the cars come down to Richmond, if you require to bring them down to the deep-water terminus, about one and a half miles further down, instead of being hauled down there, as I contend the Government are bound to do under this agreement, the company are charged $2.50 for each car moved, and all the general traffic of the Western Counties Road is now loaded and discharged at Richmond, a distance of three miles from the city. This is practically one of the great difficulties in the way of extending the usefulness and the value of the Windsor and Annapolis Road, because hon. gentlemen who are familiar with that subject are well aware that having to haul heavy articles of freight about three miles, at a very considerable expense, adds very much to the general expenses of traffic. As my hon. friend has pointed out, the want of general railway arrangements with the Intercolonial and with this point makes the expense so heavy of transporting goods to the western part of Nova Scotia, that it is found cheaper to send them by the Intercolonial to St. John, and then by water across the bay, rather than send them by our own road. The object we are aiming at will never be properly acquired until that road is under one management, until the Windsor and Annapolis have the right to use all portions of the Intercolonial Railway facilities in the city of Halifax at the depot or deep water terminus, and any extensions that have been or may be hereafter made. They are entitled to that, under their agreement, and I think the Government have not the right on their side in refusing the Windsor and Annapolis Company the use of the extensions in the city of Halifax. I hope that when the Government come to consider the whole question, when they come to consider that they are advancing half a million of money to connect those two roads, the value of which will be largely increased by the action of the Government itself, they will deal with the question of consolidation promptly before they put in the gap, for, whatever the value of these roads may be at present, they will be very considerably increased when they are united by the gap it is proposed to complete. Under these circumstances, I think the Government are bound to take one step or the other. I think they are bound to adopt the suggestion embodied in this motion at once, or if they have made up their minds not to grant the western part of Nova Scotia the advantages which they have already granted to the east, then the only thing to be done, is to put in the gap with as little delay as possible, and see that the Windsor and Annapolis have terminal facilities under all circumstances. If this be not all we have a right to expect, it will be some improvement on the present arrangements.

Mr. KENNY. I agree with my hon. friend from King's that it is eminently desirable that the roads in western Nova Scotia should be consolidated. I noticed, when my hon. colleague was urging the Government of the day to spend more money in developing the railway system in Nova Scotia, that a smile stole imperceptibly over the placid features of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as they remembered that only a few nights ago the echoes of this House were awakened by the fierce, the almost ferocious onslaught on the Government for its expenditures on the Intercolonial and other railways in which that Province and people are interested. The Intercolonial, as hon. gentlemen know, is essential to our national existence. I will say further, that it has been of more advantage to the millers and manufacturers of the west than it has been to the people of the Maritime Provinces. Yet, when an hon. gentleman, occupying the position which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) occupies in this House, assails the Government for its administration of the Intercolonial, our national highway, what chance is there for the people of Nova Scotia to secure any further public funds for the development of their railway system? I agree with my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden) that the management of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway is eminently injurious to the trade of Nova Scotia, and that it is most desirable that the roads from Halifax to Yarmouth in western Nova Scotia should be amalgamated. If the Government can assist that in any way, it will be their duty to do so. My hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden), and my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), have both referred to the efforts made to attain that very desirable end. I was, to a slight extent, identified with one of those efforts. In company with Mr. Baker, of Yarmouth, and Mr. Lovell, and my deceased friend, Mr. Duffus, I identified myself with the first of those projects, having satisfied myself that, if carried out, it would be eminently in the interest of Nova Scotia. That project failed. I do not mean to say that it had all the inherent merits which deserved success. I never enquired very particularly into the commercial or financial aspect of it. I was satisfied that if it could be done it would be a benefit to Nova Scotia, and I was prepared to do what I could to facilitate it; but hon. gentlemen know that whilst the promoter of that measure was in London a change took place in the Government of Nova Scotia, and the new Local Government sent the Honorable Mr. Vail to London, as the result of whose mission the project miscarried. Now, I do not mean to say that that was solely due to Mr. Vail's mission, or that the Government of the country had any such intention when they sent him there, but I do say that one result of Mr. Vail's mission was, at all events, that this measure was miscarried. So much for the two projects started for the amalgamation of these roads. I should very much like to see the gap completed at as early a day as possible. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones) has reminded us of the two discussions on this subject which have taken place in this House, during the two past Sessions of Parliament. I was not present during the last discussion, but I remember on the first occasion, when the hon. the Minister of Railways was in his place, my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden) called his attention specially to the inconvenience which the people in western Nova Scotia, and also the merchants in Halifax, suffered from the large expense which had been incurred for taking the cars into the city of Halifax from the existing terminus at Richmond. The Minister of Railways then told us in reply that one reason for that was that he had not sufficient accommodation for his own freight, either at North street, or at the Deep Water terminus. If there was not sufficient room two years ago, I am afraid there is very much less room to day. It may surprise hon. gentlemen to hear, but it is a fact, that the trade of Halifax and the trade of the Intercolonial Railway is increasing, and I hold in my hand a return showing the inward and outward cars to and from Halifax during the months from 1st November up to the date of my departure from Halifax, and these show a steady increase in the number of cars coming full into Halifax and the number of cars going full out of Halifax. That is, notwithstanding the fact that the Canadian Government has subsidised mail steamers, and that we are paying out of our Canadian Treasury to build up mail lines, which absolutely discriminate in their freight rates against our ports and in favor of the United States ports. They transfer a large amount of freight to Portland, which, I think, ought more properly to be landed in a Canadian port; and I hope that, in any renewal of our transatlantic mail subsidies, we will take care that the terminal ports shall be within our own territory. Still, notwithstanding all that, the traffic on the Intercolonial Railway has increased. Now, instead of calling upon the Government to spend a large amount of money in the erection of stores and warehouses, I think I can make a suggestion which will meet the views of my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden), and accomplish the common object we have in view. It is within the recollection of hon. gentlemen that a sum has been voted to extend the Intercolonial Railway along the wharves of Halifax. If the Minister of Railways would use a portion of that amount in getting a right of way through some of the smaller properties whose proprietors might not be prepared to give it, I believe we could extend the railway to the wharves, where ample storage accommodation would be provided without the Dominion Government having to expend any money for the erection of stores either at North-street or Richmond. I think that is well worth the attention of the Government. This is a very important matter to us, though it may seem to be a trifle to hon. gentlemen living in the more populous portions of the Dominion; and, as my hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), has said, I believe we may look for a large development of the freight trade of Nova Scotia. I remember hearing questioned the statements of an hon. gentleman, not now a member of this House, respecting the millions of bushels of grain to be shipped from the North-West. I do not intend to discuss those figures now, but my hon. friend has estimated the quantity of apples to be shipped from Halifax at one million barrels. I hope that is true, though his figures are large, and I hope the Government will in every way utilise the Intercolonial Railway to develop this large traffic.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I consider this a very important subject, more particularly for Nova Scotia, and I think it is not altogether unimportant for Canada, for I regard Nova Scotia as being, as it were, the wharf of the railways of Canada, and as the wharf of the railways of Canada, it must of necessity be looked after perhaps a little more particularly than the main line of those railways. I agree very substantially with the remarks that have been made by gentlemen on the other side of the House. I believe, very thoroughly, that these railways should receive not only the due consideration, but the substantial consideration of the Government of the day, and I believe they are receiving that substantial consideration. It might appear to some, on seeing this motion on the paper, and listening to the remarks of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden), and the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), that this is the first time these things were ever mooted, or that it is the first time the building up of the gap from Digby to Annapolis, or the taking over of the line from Halifax to Yarmouth to make it a part of the Intercolonial Railway, was ever suggested. This has been on the carpet for some time, and it is not true, as the Halifax Chronicle stated two or three days ago, that they were the pioneers in this movement. I have had the honor myself of addressing letters to the Railway Department with reference to this very matter, urging upon them the necessity of looking after the western portion of that Canadian wharf; and I am fully satisfied that the Government of the day are taking all these matters into their consideration and are going to do what is just to western Nova Scotia. There is a great tangle in railway matters, as I understand it, in western Nova Scotia; and, although the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has placed the blame upon the Dominion Government, I say the blame does not rest upon the Dominion Government, but rather upon the local Grit Government in Nova Scotia for that tangle. The whole of the subsidy which was granted to the Western Counties Railway was allowed by the local Grit Government to be expended between Digby and Yarmouth, with scarcely a single dollar expended between Annapolis and Digby. Now they come here and blame the Dominion Government for not doing what they allege they should do for western Nova Scotia. I must confess that I congratulate the hon. member for King's, N. S. (Mr. Borden), and the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) on their conversion. I am proud to know that at last they have opened their eyes, and now they acknowledge that western Nova Scotia is not a place where blue ruin exists, but that it is a place capable of development, that it is actually developing, and that the farmers and the people generally in western Nova Scotia are not crying out in despair, and are not wallowing in blue ruin, as one would infer from reading the speeches that were made on the other side of the House last Session, in favor of unrestricted reciprocity. It is one thing to speak upon the question of unrestricted reciprocity, it is another thing to come into the House and ask the Government to grant railway subsidies, or to take over a railway. I am also pleased to know that now they have no thought whatever of the debt of the Dominion when they ask the Dominion Government to take over the road from Halifax to Yarmouth. I suppose they have forgotten the campaign that they carried on in the county of King's and the county of Halifax, during the last election, when they held up the Dominion debt and made it appear as great as possible. Now, however, they lose sight of it altogether when they come into the House and ask the Government to take over a road that will cost quite a number of dollars, and will, perhaps, increase the debt of the Dominion. However, I do not think, myself, that it will increase the debt of the Dominion very much, even if these roads are taken over, or that it will increase it at all, eventually, because I believe that every dollar that is expended in western Nova Scotia the Dominion will recoup four-fold in the future. I believe there is a great future for western Nova Scotia. Hon. gentlemen must not think that because I am speaking entirely of western Nova Scotia I have not in my mind's eye the whole of the Dominion of Canada, for the building up of the western part of Nova Scotia, the building up of the Province, is the building up of Canada, is the development of Canada. I believe there is a great future in store for western Nova Scotia. We have in the King's and the Annapolis valley, one of the finest valleys in the world. I say unhesitatingly, we can whip the world on apples. There are no other apples in the world that can compete in the London market with the apples that are raised in this valley, nor can any other apples retain their price so well upon that market. We not only have steamers plying from Halifax to London carrying apples, but we also have vessels under private venture engaged in the same occupation from Annapolis to London. The raising of apples is a gold mine in itself. I do not think that the senior member for Halifax exaggerated very much when he said that in the near future there will be a million barrels of apples going from that valley. That may be, because the possibilities of that valley are hardly yet realised. I can take the hon. members of this House through a hundred miles of continuous apple blossoms in June and that you cannot do anywhere else in the world. Then only one-third of the valley is cultivated, only about one third is under fruit cultivation. But we have not only a gold mine there in the apples, we have actual gold mines lying between Liverpool and Annapolis that are just coming into notice. In looking over the statistics published by the Local Government lately, I took the trouble to cull out the different items that have been paid for prospecting licenses in the small district around Whiteburn and Malaga, and hon. members will be somewhat surprised to learn that the sum of $3,500 has been paid out in one year for these prospecting licenses alone. Now, when I consider the smallness of the district occupied between Liverpool and Annapolis, I think that is a very large amount of money, and it shows that the attention of the outside world is being called to these gold mines between Liverpool and Annapolis. This is for only two mines. I have taken the trouble to go over the royalties for these two mines, and I find that they actually paid into the Treasury of Nova Scotia the sum of $2,000 in the year 1883. These gold mines only need the usual railway encouragement of government to develop them and bring them prominently before the outside world. We have steam communication between Annapolis and St. John, which is one of the termini of the Short Line Railway. There is a daily communication, I am happy to say, being brought into existence by the present Dominion Government, between St. John and Annapolis, that makes a direct line from Montreal to Halifax. The shortest line that can possibly be run between Montreal and Halifax is by the way of St. John and Annapolis, via the daily boat that the Government is assisting to be placed on that route. We have also running from Annapolis a bi-weekly boat to Digby and Boston, and there is also a bi-weekly boat running from Yarmouth to Boston and a daily boat from Annapolis to Digby, showing that the people are ready and willing to invest their money in the development of that portion of the Dominion. I strongly urge upon the present Dominion Government to take over the road between Halifax and Yarmouth and make it a part of the Intercolonial Railway system. I think that is the proper thing for them to do; it would be a paying investment in the near future, if they should undertake it; and I believe that instead of increasing the deficit that is from year to year appearing upon our Intercolonial Railway Public Accounts, it would help materially in making a surplus upon that railway. I know perfectly well that the Government have this matter under control, that they have it under their consideration, and that practical steps are being now taken, I am credibly informed, to complete the missing link between Digby and Annapolis.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). When is it to be commenced? You seem to know.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I am not the mouthpiece of the Government on that point. I presume if that question was put on the Order paper in proper form, it would elicit from the Minister of Railways an answer that would cause satisfaction to this House. I am quite satisfied to leave that matter in the hands of the present Administration, knowing that as their policy is one of progress and tends to develop every part of Canada, they will not leave western Nova Scotia neglected.

After Recess.

Mr. JONES (Digby). When the House rose at six o'clock we were discussing the necessity for completing the missing link in the western counties, and I feel I would not be doing my duty to my constituents as a representative of the county which is more particularly interested than any other in the whole Dominion, if I did not unite with the rest of the members from Nova Scotia in urging the completion of that link at as early a date as possible. And while speaking on this question, I am happy to say that for once at least I can agree with the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) in nearly all his remarks, and also with the observations of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden). This missing link, as it is called, has had rather a chequered career, and among all the different schemes which have been started for its completion, the one considered most likely to succeed, and that upon which the people of Nova Scotia mainly built their hopes, was that generally known as the Plunkett scheme, and until the close of last Session, we in the western counties, and in fact the people of the whole Dominion, were almost certain that the link would have been put in before this time. Unfortunately, that scheme failed as so many others have done. Notwithstanding that the trade had largely increased on the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, and also on the Western Counties Railway, still for one cause or another that road remains unfinished. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) made one remark in which he is a little astray. He said nothing had been done towards the completion of the road since last Session. Last autumn I visited Ottawa, and called upon the Minister of Railways and urged him to have a survey made of the line between Digby and Annapolis. It has since then been made, and I believe the plans are about ready. In order to show how the traffic has increased on the Western Counties Railway, I may mention that the traffic, passenger and freight, is probably three times as large now as it was four years ago. This is principally due to the fact that a very fast steamship has been placed on the route between Yarmouth and Boston, and another is running between Digby and

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis).

Boston; a great many Americans have come there, and that fact has increased the traffic of the road. It has also been largely increased by the freight that has passed over it. Of course, in discussing this question, it is not intended that hon. members shall occupy the attention of the House for any considerable time; it is a question of most special interest to Nova Scotia, although the completion of the road would undoubtedly benefit the whole Dominion. I trust the Government will see their way clear to complete that branch at as early a day as possible. The time has certainly arrived when we need its completion, and I only voice the sentiment of the people of the whole of Nova Scotia when I say we trust that that branch will be completed before the next two years have passed away. With these remarks, I consider I have done what my constituents would expect, irrespective of party, and what the whole of Nova Scotia would desire to see done, each member rise and state his views in regard to the question which has long been a burning one in that Province.

Gen. LAURIE. I feel the question that has been raised by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden) refers more especially to railways actually working and to counties that now have railways. But the mere fact of this discussion having taken a somewhat broader range, of having eventually led to a reference to the proposition made for dealing with the whole of Nova Scotia and making one railway for the western counties and opening up the broad principle of furnishing railway facilities, leads me to point out the peculiar position of the county I have the honor to represent. I cannot say, as some hon. gentlemen who have preceded me have done, that my county can produce an enormous quantity of agricultural produce for shipment to the other side of the Atlantic. I cannot refer to hundreds of miles of apple blossoms, but I can refer to what is of greater advantage to the Dominion, that is, the fish caught off our coasts. I can conceive it is of quite as great importance to the Dominion when I point out that the statistics of the year before last show that no less than $750,000 in value of fish were caught as the product of the labor of the hard-worked toilers of the sea of Shelburne county. They have as much right to be considered as others. Their desire is to market their produce, not on the other side of the Atlantic, but among our own people, if possible; they desire to build up interprovincial trade. When I look at the Trade Returns, I observe that the Province of Quebec imported of fresh fish from the United States no less than 2,500,000 lbs. in 1887, and I presume the quantity is increasing. Quebec paid a duty on that fish. The consumers of Ontario also purchased a large quantity, on which they paid duty. That fish is caught off the coast in my county, mostly by my constituents, and it is hard that, while they catch those fish, they are unable to place them directly in the markets of our own people. Had we the means of railway communication to do that, the fishermen would not find it necessary to ship to Boston, where the fish are sold in open market, and are purchased for shipment to Montreal and large towns in Quebec and the eastern part of Ontario. We require railway communication, and we require it badly. The feeling of our people is very strong on the subject. I have lately received resolutions passed at a crowded meeting in Shelburne county, and while I will not read the whole of the resolutions, I will read the main portion, in order to show that our people are in earnest in this matter. After giving the reasons, the resolution proceeds to say:

"Resolved, that the Dominion Government be asked to grant a subsidy to aid in affording railway facilities to this county, one of the oldest settled counties in Nova Scotia and which has hitherto so thoroughly been left out in the cold, and that the representative of Shelburne county in the Dominion Parliament be requested to urge upon the Government the needs and the necessities of this county, and to insist that the said subsidy be granted without delay."

I can assure this House that the people of my county are in earnest, and will feel that until their interests are considered, as have been the interests of the inhabitants of the other portions of Nova Scotia, they will not consider they are obtaining that measure of justice to which they are entitled.

Mr. FREEMAN. As this is a little discussion in the interests of the Nova Scotia Railways, I will take the opportunity to say a few words, as I am deeply interested in railways for the western counties. I was very much pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden), and also those of the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). As I listened to them I remembered very distinctly the utterances of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) last year, when the subject of commercial union with the United States was brought up. I remember when that hon. gentleman was undertaking to show us in what way the $7,500,000 would be provided, of which we would be short in the event of commercial union taking place; he very distinctly told us savings were to be made on railway subsidies. He said: We will shut off that iniquitous bribe, the railway subsidy, we will cut off the whole thing and give no more subsidies to railways. I remember that when his resolution came to a vote in this House that two hon. gentlemen—the member for King's (Mr. Borden) and the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones)—voted for his resolution. They declared that they were with him on the subject of cutting away subsidies for railways, and that the Government should not increase the debt by granting any more subsidies, whether in Nova Scotia or anywhere else.

Mr. BORDEN. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell me to what resolution he refers?

Mr. FREEMAN. I will explain. And when this afternoon I heard them urging on the Government their duty with regard to granting additional subsidies to and building this link, and amalgamating the lines of railways from Halifax to Yarmouth, I said: "These men have become converted; what in the world has come over them." I was delighted, and I was pleased to see those hon. members favor this project. The hon. member (Mr. Borden) does not properly understand me, I am sure, because if he did he would not object to what I say.

Mr. BORDEN. I do not object. I want to know what resolution you refer to.

Mr. FREEMAN. I refer to the principle of granting subsidies to railways. It just struck me that possibly those gentlemen might change their minds again before the House meets next Session, but I hope they will not. I hope they will not come up here next year and condemn the Government for assisting the railways in the western counties of Nova Scotia. If they do so, however, I will help them a little bit. I will help them to get out of the difficulty if they have not cut the bridge behind them. They will say this, that the Government had already decided to build the link and it did not help them in any way, or that the Government were actually at work in building the link in the railway. That is the way to get out of it. It may be the case that they will condemn the Government for giving us this railway, but I will not suggest any wrong motives to these hon. gentlemen, and I am sure they would not listen to me if I did. But, Sir, what I desire to see built is this railway, this missing link. There is one thing I do not desire—I do not desire that the Government shall spend any more money in any way whatever on the railways of Nova Scotia until they do justice to the county which I have the honor to represent. Some of the gentlemen who have spoken on this motion have been advocating the expenditure of money in the way that will bring grist to their own mills. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has been talking about his city. He wants some more money expended in Halifax, as though Halifax were the first consideration of this Government, and, indeed, I consider that Halifax is the pet city of this Government. But what about the poor counties of Queen's and Shelburne. For the last 20 years we have been contributing to building railways in Nova Scotia, and yet, we have not one mile of railway in either of these counties. I regret exceedingly to see that the Government have found it necessary to fall in with the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, and that they have taken away the subsidy for a steamer that ran along the southern shore of Nova Scotia. I do hope, however, that the Government, before the end of the Session, will reconsider that action and that we shall have in the Supplementary Estimates a vote for a subsidy for this steamer. One of my hon. friends here from Nova Scotia, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has told about the million barrels of apples that we shall have from the Annapolis Valley, I believe he is quite within bound in his estimate; but let me inform the House that we have lands in Queen's County that are equally as fertile as the lands in the Annapolis Valley. We have lands there that astonished the Hon. Mr. McLellan, late Minister of Finance, when he came there to pay us a visit and looked around at our beautiful valleys covered with verdure and ready to yield almost any amount of produce. But, Sir, there is no use in our cultivating those lands for we have no railways and no outlet for the produce. Our own local Governments have proved traitor to us. They have made us promises, and promises, and promises, but they never fulfilled their promises. A short time ago, when Sir Charles Tupper announced that liberal policy in the House of Commons to assist the counties in Nova Scotia in building railways, why, Sir, there were hundreds of people in my county who threw up their hats for joy and they have never seen them since. I am proud to say, Sir, that I am here, in the House of Commons, for the express purpose of getting a subsidy for a railway in my county, and I am satisfied that this Government will never allow me to go back to my county and to have to say that they failed us in this the hour of our need. I am sure that before the Session of Parliament ends that we shall have a subsidy of $3,200 a mile for our railways. I think, perhaps, that I have said enough on this subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. FREEMAN. I would just say this, Sir, that instead of encouraging this offer which the United States senators were proposing to make to the House of Commons to give them a trip through the United States in order to show them the glory of that country—I would make this proposal to the Government: That before this Session closes, if they give us a good subsidy for our railway in Queen's County, I believe that if we do not give a pleasure trip to all the members of the House of Commons over that road, we will at least give one to every member of the Government, and we will show them our noble land, show them the many opportunities for industries we have in Queen's County, and we will show them too, Sir, our more than noble women who grace our beautiful county.

Mr. PUTNAM. Mr. Speaker, after all the arguments we have listened to to-day with respect to our Nova Scotia railways I feel that there is little more to be said. I must say, however, that I most heartily endorse the arguments which have been made before the House in favor of this motion by the member for King's (Mr. Borden), the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), and the other members who have spoken in favor of the acquisition by the Government and the consolidation of the railways in the western part of the Province of Nova Scotia. At present the railways in this portion of the Province are disjointed and disconnected; they have different tariffs and as far as the Windsor and Annapolis Railway is concerned they are very extravagant. It would be a great boon to that part of the Province of Nova Scotia if the Government were to acquire and to consolidate and operate these railways. Reference has also been made to the syndicate of 1882. That syndicate, I believe, was a bond fide affair. The Hon. Mr. Creelman, of Nova Scotia, was in London carrying out the details of that scheme, but unfortunately, about that time, a change of Government occurred in Nova Scotia and that hon. gentleman was recalled. Mr. Vail was sent to London in his stead, and, I believe, in common with most of the people of Nova Scotia, that this gentleman succeeded in killing the whole scheme. This was unfortunate; because, I believe, it was the best piece of railway legislation we ever had in the Province of Nova Scotia. If the Government can see its way clear to take over these railways, in the western part of the Province there is another piece of railway which I think would receive a great impetus in such a case. There is a proposed line of railway through the County of Hants and known as the Hants Central Railway, which was embodied in the Plunkett scheme of 1882, and which was, of course, killed with the rest of that project. If the Government would acquire possession of those western railways, I have not the least doubt that they would construct this line through the County of Hants. If they did so it would shorten the distance between eastern and western Nova Scotia some forty miles.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Would that make you solid?

Mr. PUTNAM. Yes; that would make us solid. It is the missing link in our railway communication and it would open up a splendid agricultural district, possessing valuable mines and minerals which, are now undeveloped because of the need of a railway. I consider it would be a very great boon, indeed, to the County of Hants if the Government would carry out this scheme, and I hope that they will see their way clear to do so, as has been proposed by the hon. member for King's.

Mr. LOVITT. The resolution of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden) has called forth an expression of opinion from members from all the western counties, and, I suppose, I should have a word to say upon it. It appears to me that the subject is drifting very near to party lines, but I do not think it is necessary to go anywhere near party lines in discussing this question. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) spoke of the mismanagement of the Western Counties Railway, and I quite agree with him that there was considerable mismanagement; but I would like him to mention any railway that has ever been built that is not mismanaged. I think the first act of mismanagement was in not commencing to build the road from Annapolis, the hon. gentleman's own town; and I have no doubt that if it had been commenced there, the railway would not have stopped 18 miles short of Yarmouth. I do not understand that the Government is to blame for that. The Government made a bargain with the company to raise money to complete all of these railway schemes, but reserved to itself the right to use the money deposited in its hands for the purpose of finishing the link between Annapolis and Digby, provided the company fulfilled its agreement. The company has not fulfilled its agreement, and the Government, so far as I understand, is going to use the money to build the link, and no one is more pleased at that than I am. With regard to the consolidation of the railways, I cordially agree with everything that has been said as to the desirability of that, with the exception of the remark made by the hon. member for King's, that the Government should not commence to build the link until it makes arrangements for completing the consolidation. I entirely disagree with the hon. gentleman in that, and I hope the Government will not be influenced by what he said in that respect. I am aware that work has been going on upon this link; surveys have been made; and, so far as I understand, the Government intend to go forward with the work at once, and I shall be pleased to assist them in any way in my power. The hon. member for Queen's objected to the federal subsidy to the steamer being withdrawn, and I heartily agree with him on that question, and I hope his remarks will induce the Government to place the subsidy in the Estimates again. I do not know that I have any more to say on this subject.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The present motion is only for the papers to be brought down, and of course there cannot be the slightest objection to its passing. I am only sorry, on this as on other occasions of a like kind, that my colleague, the hon. Minister of Railways, is unable to be present and to give to the members who have discussed the question this afternoon, and who naturally feel a strong interest in it, any information as to what the correspondence itself details. The hon. gentleman who made the motion, and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) who supported it immediately afterwards, were good enough to make some reference to efforts which I had made in another place to remove or lessen some of the difficulties in connection with the railway system in Nova Scotia. They were right in crediting me with having taken some interest, and in possessing still as strong an interest as I ever did, in the welfare of western Nova Scotia in connection with its railway enterprises. We had to meet, in 1879, a somewhat peculiar state of affairs as regards the railway system of both eastern and western Nova Scotia. In consequence of the great efforts which had been put forth by the Provincial Government to carry on railway extension both east and west, the resources of the Provincial Government for those purposes had been practically exhausted. The Western Railway was left unfinished between Digby and Yarmouth, and the Eastern Railway had been practically abandoned for upwards of a year. We were fortunate enough, in the management of affairs in connection with the Local Administration, to make what we considered a satisfactory arrangement in regard to the eastern railways by which they were extricated from the difficulties in which we found them, and pushed on rapidly to completion. Immediately after that we addressed ourselves to the completion of the western line between Digby and Yarmouth, and were enabled also to make an arrangement by which that road was put in running order. But there were still two serious difficulties to be faced as hon. gentlemen representing western Nova Scotia fully understand. There was, in the first place, a gap between Digby and Annapolis, of about 20 miles, as expensive a piece of road almost as could be found anywhere in Canada, with practically nothing done upon it; and we had the disjointed system of three managements between Halifax and the western terminus at Yarmouth. Besides that, there were difficulties growing out of the arrangements made with the Government in 1873, and the Government that succeeded it in 1874, in connection with the Western Counties Railway. I will not detain the House this evening by repeating the details, which the House has probably heard before, in connection with the difficulties that arose and the efforts made to remove them from time to time. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), in addressing the House this afternoon, was somewhat mistaken in two or three particulars in regard to the present position of the undertaking. He stated that the Government were not altogether blameless, and he specified the points in which he thought they were worthy of censure. In the first place, he thought they were worthy of censure because they had not, after the failure of the Plunkett scheme in 1882, adopted the scheme which was subsidised by the present Local Government, known as the Joint Stock scheme. I think in that the hon. gentleman was mistaken. The Dominion Government are not worthy of censure for not having concurred in that arrangement. It seemed to me, to my colleagues, and I think to a great many people in the Province, that it was not so advantageous a scheme as that which preceded it, or so advantageous a scheme as might be adopted with the assistance of the Dominion Government. Besides we were not altogether free to enter into that arrangement. One of its conditions, besides many other conditions which appeared burdensome to the Province itself, was that the Windsor Branch should be transferred to the new company, and we were not in a position to make that transfer, because, under the legislation of 1874, the Western Counties Railway Company had still a claim upon it; they had the reversion of the title and they had an Exchequer Court suit pending against us for damages for the non-delivery of the road. Under these circumstances we were unable to enter into the scheme the Local Government had put forward and the scheme subsequently adopted by this House in 1887 was substituted for it. The hon. member for Halifax was not quite correct in stating that the Order in Council to give that scheme effect was made only a few days before the election. It is true, the contract bears date a short time before the dissolution of the House. That, however, was the fault of the company in delaying the completion of its arrangements and getting the contract prepared. The Order in Council which was the basis of that contract and of the whole scheme had been adopted months before, but necessarily could not be put into the form of a contract until all the other arrangements of the company were completed, and until the company were able to give assurances that they were entering into an arrangement which they had a fair prospect of carrying out. But it is said that the Government were derelict in this respect, that the Minister of Finance last year had assured the House that the work of filling in the gap between Digby and Annapolis would be immediately proceeded with, and the hon. member for Halifax said that, the money being voted, it was the duty of the Government to have proceeded immediately with the construction of that work. In making that criticism, I think the hon. gentleman forgot for the moment the provisions of the contract itself. It was necessary, of course, that a reasonable time should be provided in the contract for the completion of the work. The contract had been entered into in January, 1887, and the time for the completion of the work did not expire until about the 1st of September last, so that notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's impression that we had the money voted and were, therefore, in duty bound to carry on the work by constructing the missing 20 miles, we were bound by the terms of the contract to wait until the month of September last before we could be in a position to spend a single dollar of money on the line. When the time had elapsed, the Minister of Railways requested me to prepare, and I did prepare, notices informing the company and Mr. Plunkett, who was likewise a party to the agreement, that their rights under the contract had expired, and that the Government would no longer negotiate with them on the basis of that contract, but held itself free to avail itself of the powers mentioned in the contract to build the 20 miles, and to expend the appropriation which Parliament had made for that purpose. I have no doubt that the understanding which was arrived at when that contract was laid before the House, and when the assurances which were given by the Minister of Finance last Session, will be fully and literally carried out. The Government were unable to do it last autumn, because the time of the company did not expire until early in September, and we felt that it was necessary to make exact surveys of the whole line and make the necessary communications with all those who were parties to the contract and whose rights require to be terminated. I understand that the result of those surveys—the preparation of the necessary plans and reports—has only been completed within a few days, and the Government is now at liberty to proceed with the work at an early day, without any fear of reproach for being in default in this matter up to the present time. As regards the consolidation of the western railway system, it is, as the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) has said, no new scheme at all. It has been urged upon the attention of the present Government, from time to time, by correspondence, as well as by personal interviews and solicitations of members who were interested in the completion and perfection of the western system; but although it would give us very great pleasure, if the requirements of other sections of the country would permit, to make the appropriation necessary for the acquisition of these lines of railway, when I tell the House that the last proposal made in connection with that subject, called for the expenditure of something like $8,000,000, the House will understand that it is altogether too great an undertaking for us to propose in anticipation of the completion of the 20 miles which have so long remained unfinished from year to year, and which the Government are pledged to Parliament and by the contract, and took power under the contract, to build. I think, therefore, it will hardly be expected, as was intimated by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) that we ought to consider the propriety of undertaking the work of acquiring the western railway system before the completion of the 20 miles, which have been so long wanted. There is this to be borne in mind, that the acquisition of the Western Counties property, which was a part of the scheme of 1882 and a part of the subsequent scheme of the Provincial Government, was a task much more easily effected by the provincial arrangement than by any arrangement that could be made by the Government of Canada. There exists on the Statute-book, in connection with the origin of those works, powers of acquisition by arbitration and valuation on behalf of the Local Government, whereas the acquisition by the Federal Government would require a purchase by arrangement between the Government and the companies, and one that, perhaps, would call for an expenditure at present of a very much larger sum of money than the actual value would be estimated at by those who would be called upon to make a valuation. I do not for a moment, in saying this, mean to reflect on anything that has been said with regard to the capabilities of the section of country in question. On the contrary, to be truthful, I would have to go beyond the expressions which have been used by gentlemen representing that section in stating the facts as regards the fertility of that part of the Province, and the deserts it has for every kind of encouragement we can give for the expansion of its trade; but, as I said before, in dealing with a scheme like that involving the expenditure of millions of dollars, we have to consider the wants of other sections of the country as well, and it is more than advisable we should do the work which lies immediately at our hands—the completion of the 20 miles, which have so long been undertaken, and which the House was assured would be completed as rapidly as possible.

Mr. BORDEN. I am very glad indeed, my motion has had the effect of calling forth such a general expression of opinion from the whole western part of Nova Scotia, and also of bringing out the policy of the Government in regard to this important question. I am sorry, indeed, to learn from the hon. Minister that he does not intend to undertake the consolidation of the western roads as part of the Intercolonial Railway. He stated that the expenditure was altogether too great, that it would involve an expenditure of money of something like $8,000,000. Well, I think it was unfortunate that he should have mentioned a sum at all, in view of the fact that if those roads are ever acquired, the cost of acquiring them will be a matter for reference to arbitration; and it is unfortunate that a gentleman occupying the position the hon. gentleman does, should give even an approximate value in advance. But I would refer the hon. gentleman to the estimate made by the leader of the Government of which he was a member, and who brought forward a scheme known as the syndicate scheme.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think the hon. gentleman heard me correctly or he would not answer me as he is doing. What I said was that the last proposal to the Government on the subject looked for an expenditure of $8,000,000 for that undertaking. I was contrasting that with the power of expropriation possessed by the Provincial Government.

Mr. BORDEN. I understood the hon. gentleman to say it would involve a cost of $8,000,000 to acquire those roads, and I wish to remind him that the leader of the Government of which he was a member estimated, under the syndicate scheme, the cost of acquiring the Windsor and Annapolis Railroad at about $2,000,000 and the Western Counties Railway much less. Now, it is a fact that the Government practically owns the Windsor Branch, and that they are bound morally, and, I think, legally, to construct the missing link, and, according to the arrangement which the hon. gentleman himself has made with the Western Counties Railway, the Windsor Branch, 32 miles of railway equipped in first class condition, is to be handed back to the Government on the payment of $500,000. Assuming that the completion of that link will cost some $700,000, upon the completion of that link the Government gets back the Windsor Branch, so that it is simply a question of what the expropriation of the Windsor and Annapolis and the Western Counties Railway will cost. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that the link is to be constructed by the Government, as government work, no matter what it may cost. With regard to the point I made, that the railways should be taken over before the completion of the "link," and from which the hon. member for Yarmouth dissented, I can sympathise with the view taken by the hon. gentleman. He is anxious to have that built at once, and he is afraid that, if the Government wait for the acquisition of the roads, the missing link, so-called, may not be constructed; but I desire again to press upon the Government the extreme importance of hesitating before going any further without carefully examining into the question of the acquisition of these western roads. I hesitated to-day to state fully the strong position I entertained—believing it was not wise to state it in view of the possibility, and what I hope is the probability, that the Government will take a favorable view of the acquiring of the western roads—as to what those roads are worth. I believe there is an enormously strong case to be made in regard to that, and, instead of the Government acting as the hon. junior member for Halifax and I think the hon. member for Annapolis said, to the debt of the country, stating that it was an extraordinary proposition to come from this side of the House, I believe such a course would convert the deficit of the Intercolonial Railway into a profit; I believe that within twenty years at the most, perhaps within ten years after the roads were taken over, the whole complexion of the accounts of the Intercolonial Railway would be changed. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) was the only hon. gentleman who seemed to be rather in a bad temper in discussing this question, and I could not understand that, because he told us that we must not suppose for a moment that this question had never been brought up before, because he had written letters and a great deal had been done by him and his friends towards bringing about this desirable end of consolidating the western railways. I think the hon. gentleman should be thankful to me for having been the means of bringing this out, so that his constituents may know—what I am sure they never did before—that he had been exerting himself in their interests. I propose to put him under a still greater obligation to me in this matter by inserting the following words in my resolution after the words "Nova Scotia" in the last line:—

And of all letters addressed to the Government by any member of this House or any person referring to the same subject.

I am sure the hon. gentleman will be very glad that I should make that proposal, and I have no doubt that the House, in his interest, not in mine, will consent to have those words put in.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I am quite willing that the words should be added.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman referring to the syndicate scheme of the Local Government of Nova Scotia, went out of his way to say that no doubt I had made a stump speech condemning that scheme.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Plenty of them.

Mr. BORDEN. If I did make a stump speech in reference to that syndicate scheme, I have not had the bad taste to bring it up here and repeat it, as the hon. gentleman did his speech, and I think with the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jones) that it is a pity that the temper of the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) should have been displayed in this House. I thought this was a question which could stand on its own merits, and my only view in bringing it up was to ameliorate, if possible, the condition of the people of western Nova Scotia in regard to it.

Motion agreed to.

JONES' CREEK, LEEDS, ONTARIO.

Mr. TAYLOR moved for:

Return of copies of all petitions presented to the Government by the residents of the Township of the Front of Young, County of Leeds, Ont., praying that Jones' Creek in said Township be declared a non-navigable stream, and to allow the Municipal Council to build a low solid bridge across said stream. Also copies of the report of the Engineer on the same.

He said: I make this motion for the purpose of drawing the attention of the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Justice in particular, as well as the other members of the Government, to a substantial grievance which exists in one township in the county I represent. Some thirty years ago, what is known as Jones' Creek was a small stream flowing over Jones' Falls and on five miles into the River St. Lawrence. At that time it was navigable for vessels of five or six feet draught, but of late years it has become filled with débris, so that it is now only navigable for small pleasure boats. The municipal council of the Front of Young wish to place a solid bridge across, which will cost only a few hundred dollars, but, owing to this being a navigable stream, persons owning land at Jones' Falls object to the bridge being put across the stream. I already presented a petition on that subject to the Minister of Public Works, and he sent an engineer out to report upon it. I believe the report has been made, but I have not seen it, and I understand that legislation is necessary before a solid bridge can be built across the stream. That legislation may possibly be necessary in the shape of a Private Bill, and that, of course, means money. The western side of that stream has of late become settled by farmers for a distance of five or six miles, but, to drive to their market town, Brockville, they have to drive seven or eight miles around, which would be saved to them if they had a solid bridge or a bridge of any kind. I want some scheme to be adopted by which the township may be permitted to build a solid bridge across this stream, which is not navigable for any vessel of size or any sailing craft, and that without the expense for a Private Bill or for building a swing bridge. I bring the matter before the Government in the hope that some plan may be devised by which the grievance—and it is a substantial grievance—may be removed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. JAMIESON moved for :

Statement or Return of the Government in answer to the request of the Home Government for information as to the working of "The Canada Temperance Act" in the several Provinces of the Dominion.

He said: I have no desire to make a speech in moving this resolution. I understand a return of this kind has been made by this Government at the request of the Home Government, and many enquiries have been made by parties interested in the working of the Canada Temperance Act, for copies of this return, if they could possibly be obtained. I think it is highly desirable that it should be printed and, if necessary, distributed, for the information of those who may desire to see it.

Motion agreed to.

SHORT LINE RAILWAY.

Mr. KENNY moved for :

Copies of the agreement of 14th December, 1885, between the Dominion Government and the International Railway Company, for the construction of a line of railway from the south bank of the St. Lawrence River, at or near Caughnawaga, to Harbor of St. Andrews, St. John and Halifax, via Sherbrooke, Moosehead Lake, Mattawamkeag, Harvey, Fredericton, and through Township of Salisbury to Moncton. Also, for copies of any and all changes that may have been made in said agreement, and of the Orders in Council relating thereto. Also, for copies of any and all transfers or assignments of said agreement or contract, and of all Orders in Council relating thereto.

He said: The object of my motion is to call the attention of Parliament and the country to the very unsatisfactory condition of the Short Line Railway. In doing so I desire, first, to call the attention of the House to the agreement which was entered into for the construction of that road. It bears date December, 1885, and is an agreement between the International Railway Company and the Government of Canada, and provides for subsidies for the construction of a line of railway from the south bank of the St. Lawrence River, at or near Caughnawaga, to the Harbor of St. Andrews, St. John and Halifax, via Sherbrooke, Moosehead Lake, Mattawamkeag, Harvey, Fredericton, and through the Township of Salisbury to Moncton. I will not weary the House with reading this agreement, but with your permission I will put it into the hands of the Hansard reporter. Merely, en passant, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the 8th clause, which reads :

"That the Company shall commence the works embraced in this agreement within six months of the date thereof, and shall complete the whole of said works on or before the first day of July, 1889, time being declared to be material, and of the essence of this agreement."

At page 47 of the Annual Report of the Minister of Railways and Canals a synopsis of the whole transaction will be found, and a reference is there made to the provision :

"For the construction of a line of railway connecting Montreal with the harbors of St. John and Halifax by the shortest and best practicable route, after the report of competent engineers, a subsidy not exceeding $170,000 per annum, for fifteen years, or a guarantee of a like sum for a like period as interest on bonds of the company undertaking the work, per year for fifteen years, $170,000."

"In 1885 it was amended by providing for a line of railway from the south bank of the St. Lawrence River opposite or near Montreal to the harbors of St. Andrews, St. John and Halifax, via Sherbrooke, Moosehead Lake, Mattawamkeag, Harvey, Fredericton and Salisbury."

And the subsidy was increased to $250,000 for 20 years. The report then recites :

"An application having been made for the said subsidies by the International Railway Company, and they having agreed to conform to the necessary conditions and requirements, and having evidenced their ability to construct and operate the road, entry into contract with them was authorised by an Order in Council of the 19th November, 1885, and such contract was executed on the 14th of December, 1885, they undertaking to complete a line from a point on the south bank of the St. Lawrence at or near Caughnawaga, about nine miles above Montreal, to connect with the Intercolonial Railway at Moncton by the 1st of July, 1889."

Subsequently, I find that the International Railway Company disposed of their interests in this contract to the Atlantic and North-Western Railway Company, and that company was accepted as contractor by an Order in Council dated 13th November, 1886, the arrangement made thereunder bearing date 6th December, 1886. The total subsidies payable amounted to $250,000 a year for a term of twenty years, and it subsequently—

"Became necessary so to apportion this amount as to secure the building of the links to connect with the roads already in existence in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia leading to harbors named."

The sum of $71,000 was appropriated for the section from the River St. Lawrence to Lennoxville, the sum of $115,500 was appropriated to that portion of the road between Moose River and Mattawamkeag and for the portion thence to Fredericton and Moncton, the remaining distances by the Intercolonial Railway, $63,400. I find further the charter of the Atlantic and North-Western, and then by an indenture dated 6th December, 1886, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have obtained a lease in perpetuity of the lines and interests of the Atlantic and North-Western Railway Company. So, Sir, the contractors are the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and from the first it was understood that the road would be built by that company. Now, when I tell the House that although this contract will expire on the 1st of July next, and that on that portion of the road which passes through the Atlantic Provinces, on that section of the line from Harvey and Fredericton to Moncton, absolutely nothing has been done, that there has been no location and no survey, hon. gentlemen will recognise how the essence of that contract—time—has been adhered to. The non-fulfilment of this contract, or even delay in its fulfilment, is a palpable injustice to the Maritime Provinces, and I contend is a wrong to all Canada. I am so much impressed with the importance of the matter that I take this most formal manner to bring it before the notice of the House, and I have not done so until I have tried in vain to ascertain from the contractors, by repeated applications, when they proposed commencing work on that section which passes through the Maritime Provinces, and when they expect to have it finished. But as my efforts to obtain that information were fruitless, I find it becomes my duty to draw the attention of Parliament to it. We are not here to discuss the merits of the Short Line Railway. That was disposed of in 1885 by this Parliament. We are not here to discuss whether it is advisable in the public interest or not, but it is my duty to call the attention to the breach of this contract and to contend that it shall be carried out in its entirety. This is an arrangement in regard to which the present Minister of Public Works in his place in Parliament applied the most emphatic language; it is an arrangement to which the faith of Parliament is pledged; and I say that an arrangement to which such emphatic language has been applied by the Minister of Public Works, speaking in his place in Parliament for the Government, is an arrangement which Parliament should not allow to be slighted. If contracts entered into as deliberately as this was are allowed to be ignored or even slighted endless confusion must ensue. To-day it happens that the Maritime Provinces are sufferers by this breach of contract, to-morrow it may be some other portion of the Dominion, and I regret to say that the impression prevails in the Maritime Provinces that their interests in this matter have been ignored in a way that would not have occurred if the road had passed through a more central or more populous part of the Dominion. We feel keenly in this matter, inasmuch as we had to contribute our quota to the very large expenditure incidental to and necessary to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we made that contribution recognising that it was a great national work; and, having submitted gracefully to that large expenditure, we consider we have not only been unfairly treated by this great company but we have been shabbily treated. This is a matter which to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company may appear very insignificant, but it is a matter which concerns us very much indeed in Maritime Provinces, and I appeal with confidence to the Government to see that the wrong perpetrated shall be righted. The contractors, as I have said, are the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I profess the greatest admiration for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and to the splendid manner in which they built their wonderful road from Montreal to Vancouver. In point of time and excellence of workmanship it has never been surpassed, and in my opinion there is no single act since Confederation which has done so much to raise the status of Canada before the world as the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It has not only raised us in the estimation of foreign nations, but, what has been of equal advantage, it has given our people a spirit of self-confidence which they never possessed before, and the fact that the road has been managed under the direction of Canadians has added to our national prestige. I contend that the gentlemen connected with the road deserve well of Canada. It is to me a subject of very great regret to refer in the way in which I have been obliged to refer to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, a company which deserves so well of this country; and it is to be regretted that a company which has built so many thousands of miles of railway so satisfactorily should now hesitate or demur in regard to building some 100 miles of road, and thereby weaken their hold upon the sympathy of the people. I have referred before to the very large expenditure necessarily involved in the construction of that road. When the Canadian Pacific Railway was approaching completion at Montreal it was recognised as the great national highway, and that it would not be complete until it had access to the winter ports of Canada; and the Government of the day recognising this, and recognising that it was only a matter of justice to the Maritime Provinces that the road should be extended to their harbors, took the matter in hand. I find that the attention of Parliament was first called to it by Sir Charles Tupper in April, 1884, this being the first notice I can find of it in Hansard. He expressed himself thus:

"Then a very strong feeling has grown up in the Maritime Provinces, and not only in the Maritime Provinces but throughout Canada, because, I believe, that from British Columbia down through the North-West Territories, through the Province of Ontario, and in the Province of Quebec, there has been a strong and general sentiment that this great inter-oceanic line of the Canadian Pacific Railway would be incomplete if we were obliged to have our Atlantic terminus in a foreign country. I believe that sentiment is not at all confined to the Province of Nova Scotia, or Prince Edward Island, or the Province of New Brunswick, but I believe it has taken just as deep a hold of the minds of our friends in the other Provinces almost as it has in the Maritime Provinces. Although every effort has been made to render the operation of the Intercolonial Railway as successful as possible, although more has been accomplished in the development of the country, in the development of the trade and business of the country through the agency of the Intercolonial Railway than any person on either side of this House a few years ago supposed to be possible, still we have found we were too heavily handicapped by the distance, and that we could not—reluctantly as we were driven to the conclusion, we have been driven to the conclusion, by the force of circumstances and by the practical results, that it is impossible for the ports of St. John and Halifax to compete with the nearer ports of Portland and Boston, in the United States. Under these circumstances, the attention of the Government has been drawn, as I have said on one or two occasions before in this House, to the best means by which we ought to secure a realisation of that which we all desire, the Atlantic terminus being in Canadian territory as well as the Pacific terminus, and thus be placed in a position to fairly compete for the great transcontinental trade and traffic that we all know must flow over that line. Although that may involve the necessity of passing for a certain portion of that line through a foreign country, we believe that even that is a comparatively insignificant point compared with the great importance of having the ocean ports both on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts within the borders of our own country, and using the trade and business of that great railway to build up great ports and points of communication for the traffic of the eastern and western world, for the purpose of practically extending the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal, its present terminus, to St. Andrew's, St. John, Halifax and Sydney."

Again, in the course of the same speech, the hon. gentleman made the following reference to that work:

"In fact, I believe that, within a very brief period—I have stated four years as the term in these resolutions—this line of communication will be perfected, and we will have the satisfaction of finding that we have the complete realisation of our hopes and expectations in reference to the transcontinental traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway down to our ports. The House is aware that I have on former occasions discussed the propriety of this Government giving subsidies to local lines of railway. The questions with which I have been dealing up to this point, of course, have a broad and national consideration. They are founded upon a policy that is recognised and has been recognised from the first as the first duty we owed to our country, and that is to obtain by the construction of a national line of railway the closest possible intercommunication between one section of our country and another. The great disadvantage under which Canada has labored, if it may be regarded as a disadvantage, was the remoteness of important sections of our common country from one another, and we have all regarded it as a first duty we owed to the country to endeavor to remove and obviate that as far as possible by diminishing the distance between all the important points of communication in the several sections of our country, thus bringing them as closely as we could together. Not only commercially but socially, the greatest possible advantage may be fairly expected from shortening the distance of intercommunication between the great commercial centres of the country and the outlying portions of it.

I know that the reading of these extracts is very tedious to the House, but I am desirous of placing before Parliament what were the intentions of the Minister and what were the intentions of the Government when this matter was introduced. It was evidently not their intention that this road should end at Mattawamkeag. It was not their intention that Boston or Portland should be used as the terminus of this great railway. Sir Charles Tupper spoke not only with the prestige of a Minister of the Crown, but he spoke with an intimate personal knowledge of the whole transaction and his views are entitled to every consideration. I am much surprised, Sir, considering that the views of that hon. gentleman on this point were known to the directors and managers of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that they did not receive more consideration at their hands. There is no uncertain sound about Sir Charles Tupper's utterances on this matter. Looking at the history of this transaction, I find that the chief engineer of railways, in his report dated 3rd of April, 1884, refers to the construction of the road from Montreal to Moncton, and not to Mattawamkeag. He makes the following report, which with your permission, Mr. Chairman, I will hand to the Hansard reporter. It is quite evident from this that the chief engineer never contemplated that the road would end at Mattawamkeag. I know from my personal knowledge—and gentlemen who are now in the House are fully aware of it—that this matter received particular attention from the members in this House from the Maritime Provinces, and I find that those gentlemen addressed a memorial to the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, then Minister of Railways in Canada, dated Ottawa the 6th February, 1884. As the memorial is very short I will read it:

"To the Hon. Sir CHARLES TUPPER, O.B., K.C.M.G., Minister of Railways and Canals.

"The memorial of the undersigned members of the House of Commons for the Dominion of Canada humbly represents:

"That it is a matter not only of importance to the Dominion, but of justice to the Eastern Maritime Provinces, that the shortest and most advantageous railway connection should be established between the present eastern terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Montreal and the seaports of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and your memorialists believing that such route is the one projected by way of the South-Eastern Railway line from Montreal to Sherbrooke, and thence by the International and Short Line Railways, connecting at Fredericton, and the Intercolonial, respectively request you to recommend to the Government the granting of such aid to said railways as will secure the speedy construction and equipment of that line. And as in duty bound your memorialists will ever pray, &c., &c.

"OTTAWA, 6th February, 1884."

This shows, Sir, what were the intentions of these gentlemen who carried on a long correspondence with the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as regards the route to be followed by that road. I believe that during the recess between the Sessions of 1884 and 1885 my friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), my friend from York (Mr. Temple), my friend from Kent (Mr. Landry), and the then representatives of Halifax (Messrs. Daly and Stairs) prosecuted their correspondence and negotiations with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and that effect was given to this in the following Session of Parliament, when this resolution was proposed. It was moved on 15th June, 1885, and formed part of the railway resolutions:

"Also for a line of railway connecting Montreal with the harbors of St. John and Halifax, via Sherbrooke, Moosehead, Lake Mattawamkeag, Harvey, Fredericton and Salisbury, a subsidy not exceeding $80,000 per annum for twenty years, forgoing in the whole, together with the subsidy authorised by the Act 47 Vic., cap. 8, a subsidy not exceeding $250,000 per annum, the whole of which shall be paid in aid of the construction of such line for a period of twenty years, or a guarantee of a like sum for a like period as interest on the bonds of the company undertaking the work.

This resolution, as will be noticed, endorses the views expressed in the memorial. Subsequently the matter was moved in committee by the present hon. Minister of Public Works, and any hon. gentleman who takes interest in this matter, and who refers to Hansard, at page 2574, 1st July, 1885, will find that the Minister of Public Works gave us a very exhaustive explanation of the reasons which induced the Government to select the route which they then recommended to Parliament. The Minister goes on to say:

"I have only to see which of these lines is the shortest, which is the best, and which we should adopt, in order to carry out the policy of Parliament and this Government, of connecting the Canadian Pacific Railway at Montreal with the harbors of the lower Provinces by the shortest route. The result of that examination is, that the Government have come to the conclusion to recommend that this line, the Mattawamkeag route, be adopted as the shortest and the best line."

Again the hon. Minister says:

"This vote is a heavy one, no doubt, but it is a vote which, after all, will give good return to the country, it will secure our connection between the Atlantic and the Pacific by the shortest route possible under the circumstances. Of course, if we do not build this direct line we would have to see our trade go from Montreal to Portland. Then all the advantages of the terminus of such a great railway in winter would be to the benefit of the United States. We do not wish that. In the same way that we have taken care that our railway shall not be tapped in British Columbia for the benefit of the United States of America, our enterprising neighbors, who have their own rival railway, the Northern Pacific, so we thought that we should not allow them to benefit at the Atlantic end of the railway; or, after all the sacrifices we have had to make, to obtain the terminus at Portland or elsewhere in the United States. We thought the railway should end on our own territory on the Atlantic shores, so as to give us the benefit of the cargoes which are to be sent abroad and the return cargoes which would secure to us the benefit of that foreign trade. Under these circumstances, we expect that Parliament will not refuse to make this sacrifice again in order to complete this system. After the large sacrifices the country has made for the opening of the North-West by the Canadian Pacific Railway, though this vote of $90,000 a year for twenty years is considerable, nevertheless we think it is not such as to warrant a refusal on the part of Parliament. Parliament would wish to complete its work by linking the two oceans by its railway route, and therefore we believe that the vote which we are asking will be cheerfully granted by Parliament."

And again the Minister says:

"The Government will have to make an arrangement with the company undertaking this work, and will take such means as will secure the completion of the line and its working from end to end. I said the other day that we would take special care in the arrangements with the company that the portion of the line to Salisbury would be completed as well as the other portion. It covers the whole ground."

It will be noticed, Sir, that the reason given by the hon. the Minister for the selection of this route was because it was the shortest line to the harbors of the Maritime Provinces and that the Government policy was based on this. I find that the gentlemen who then represented Halifax in Parliament (Messrs. Daly and Stairs) and who had taken a very great interest in this discussion also addressed the House. Mr. Stairs spoke as follows:—

"Mr. STAIRS. This question is so important to the Maritime Provinces that I must ask permission to point out some of the reasons which induce me to support the line which has been chosen by the Government. . . . I think the chief engineer estimated the distance from Fredericton to Salisbury at 95 miles, and the distance as given by the Minister, I understood, was the distance which was necessary to reach St. John. But of course it is necessary to reach Halifax, which requires about 113 miles. But the whole length which it will be necessary to construct to reach the ports in Nova Scotia will be something like 300 miles.

"There is another important matter that should be considered. It is that the resolutions are to provide for one complete line to Salisbury, from the south shore of the St. Lawrence. It is absolutely necessary that it should be one line, not a line worked or operated by different companies and under different control. The Government have entered into a contract to give the people of the lower Provinces this one line to Salisbury, Nova Scotia, and connections with St. John and St. Andrews, and possibly, at some future day, with Louisburg. If that is the case, it would be wise for the Government to consider the advisability of providing, at some future stage, that a condition should be imposed upon the company which makes the contract for the construction of the line, that it should be completed and a junction effected with the Intercolonial, and that it should not be permitted to stop at any intermediate points. This is of vast importance to the lower Provinces, and I trust when the Bill is introduced such a condition will be inserted. . . . There is another most important point in connection with the interest of the Maritime Provinces, and it is that the line from Montreal to Salisbury shall be under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I will read letters which have been received from the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which will throw some light upon this point, and will answer, to a certain extent, some of the objections urged to these resolutions by the hon. member for West Durham."

The letter referred to by Mr. Stairs, from Mr. Stephen the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, dated 25th February, 1885, and addressed to Mr. Daly, the former member for Halifax, was as follows:—

"I am in receipt of the letter of the 24th instant, signed by yourself and Messrs. Wood and Stairs, upon the subject of the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Maritime Provinces, so as to connect it with the ports of St. Andrews, St. John, Halifax and Louisburg.

"With reference to the matter of the location of such extension as you refer to, I beg to say that my opinion remains unchanged by the various surveys that have been made. On the contrary, my previous opinion has been confirmed, and I am fully satisfied that the best line would be a long running line as directly as possible from Montreal via Sherbrooke, Moosehead and Fredericton to Moncton, utilising existing lines as far as practicable. I may further say that if the Government should decide adequately to subsidise such line, it could, in my opinion, be completed within two years from the date of the contract.

"I estimate that a first-class road, thoroughly equipped, would involve a capital cost of $12,500,000. While I am not now in a position to commit my colleagues to an actual offer to undertake the work, I feel safe in saying that with a subsidy of $300,000 a year for 20 years the Atlantic and North-Western Railway Company would be willing to enter into a contract with the Government to make the direct connection, as above stated. Speaking for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, I may say that, in my opinion, if such a railway were built, the latter company would undertake to lease and operate it, provided suitable provision were made for the carrying of freight over the Intercolonial Railway from Moncton to Halifax.

"I may add that Moncton would be the proper point to connect the Louisburg Railway with the Canadian Pacific Railway."

In addition, there is another letter from Mr. Stephen, of a later date. It is dated 16th June, 1885, and is as follows:—

"Replying to your letter of the 16th June on the subject of the proposed short line between Montreal and the sea-ports of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, I have to say that the route indicated therein is, in the light of our present knowledge, the best that has been proposed, and this route is preferred by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to any other that has been suggested.

"I will say, further, that it is the desire of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to take up this scheme as a natural and necessary supplement to the Canadian Pacific Railway as it now exists."

"The company will be ready without loss of time to enter into negotiations with the Government for carrying out this project, as soon as the necessary legislation is obtained."

Mr. Stairs goes on:

"I think, in view of those two letters, there is a possibility, almost a certainty, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company being able to secure this line and work it to the Maritime Provinces. One of the reasons why I am supporting the present line is, because we have a better chance, in fact, the only chance, of securing their assistance in this work if we adopt it. * * * In view of the expenditure that has taken place in the North-West and in building the Canadian Pacific Railway, the people of the Maritime Provinces have a right to ask for a sufficient subsidy to enable the Canadian Pacific Railway to own that road."

I have read this speech of Mr. Stairs, who devoted a great deal of time, as hon. gentlemen who are listening to me know, to the consideration of the question, and his views are an important addition to its discussion. The letters of Mr. Stephen, then president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, are interesting to me in view of certain references which were made to some remarks of mine recently by a very high authority on Canadian Pacific Railway matters. It will be noticed that Mr. Stephen in the course of his correspondence expresses the opinion that the road could be and would be built within two years from the date of signing the contract. The contract was signed in December, 1886. Now, it appears that while this matter was under discussion in the House, there were some misgivings in the minds of some hon. gentlemen as to the very portion of the road on which no work has been done. By some very curious coincidence or by some remarkable fatality, misgivings were expressed in Parliament in reference to the construction of that very portion of the road to which I am now calling attention; and, Sir, these expressions of anxiety were met by the following statement from the hon. Minister of Public Works (see page 3258, Hansard, July 10, 1885):—

"I am sure the hon. gentleman will be pleased to hear the declaration which the Government makes through me, that in the arrangements to be made with the company to build the railway, and to take advantage of this vote of money, of $250,000 during 20 years, the Government will take care to secure the completion of the railway, not only to Mattawamkeag, but also to Salisbury, and if that is not secured, there will be no subsidy given. We must act in good faith; the faith of Parliament is pledged, and we must take care that that money is employed as Parliament wishes."

It will be noticed the hon. Minister of Public Works is most emphatic in his language. He then spoke with a perfect knowledge of the intentions of the Government, and he also had just heard read the letters of the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway, announcing that the line selected was the one the Canadian Pacific desired, and that work would be completed within two years from the signing of the contract. The Minister of Public Works was then quite warranted in speaking emphatically as he did. But these positive statements did not appear to satisfy my hon. friend the member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), who felt called upon, when the Bill was under consideration, to propose an amendment submitting that the work should be commenced, and prosecuted at both ends simultaneously. That amendment was met by the following statement from the Minister of Public Works:—

"I do not think that this is an amendment which should be made, as if it were carried instead of helping the enterprise it would throw obstacles in its way. Other hon. gentlemen may come forward and ask that work on other portions of the line shall be prosecuted simultaneously. That is not done anywhere; we see no such provision in any charter; no road is undertaken in that way. After the explanations I gave just now, that the contract which the Government will have to make, will be made in such a way as to secure the completion of the line, taking care that the heaviest portions of the line may not be left to be built, and paid with an amount only equal to the easiest portions of the line, but that the different portions may be paid according to the character of the work to be performed—under these circumstances I hope the hon. gentleman will not persist in his motion. If he does, of course, I must ask hon. gentlemen supporting this Bill to vote against the amendment."

The hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) did proceed with his motion; the House was divided, and the amendment was carried.

Mr. KENNY.

ment, on this positive statement from the Minister of Public Works, was lost. Now, a very high authority on Canadian Pacific Railway matters has stated that in some remarks I made in the Chamber of Commerce at Halifax, I drew an unfair inference from some remarks of his and of Sir George Stephen. I can only say in reply, and I think hon. gentlemen who take an interest in the question will bear me out, that it is no incorrect inference to say that when the Canadian Pacific Railway signed that contract it was never intended or supposed that the road should end at Mattawamkeag. I may be told that the contract has not actually expired, and will not expire until the 1st of July next; but hon. gentlemen know it is physically impossible to complete that road by 1st of July next, and that therefore there must be a default in this contract. It is no "incorrect inference," at all events after reading the letters we have heard read and which were written by the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to say that at that time it was never supposed that the road would not be completed by the 1st of July, 1889. Otherwise, the hon. the Minister of Public Works would not have expressed himself as positively as he did, nor could it have been supposed that the road was to end at Mattawamkeag. Therefore, whatever change has come over the spirit of the dream of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, must have come subsequent to the date of this correspondence. Parliament then voted the money in accordance with the Bill which provided for the extension of the road to Mattawamkeag, and I do not believe that Parliament voted that money for a road that was to end there. It was purposely stated that the intention of the Government and Parliament was that we were to have a road which would carry the trade of the Canadian Pacific Railway down to our Atlantic ports, that the money was voted for the whole road, and that to take a portion of the money and only build a portion of the road would be violating the intentions of Parliament. I find that the 8th clause of this agreement specially stipulates time to be essential and to be the essence of the agreement. Now, it would be simply trifling with the House to say that, under any construction that can be put upon this document, the contractors would be warranted in throwing up the work at Mattawamkeag. The conditions of that contract, I contend, should in the public interest be adhered to strictly, and that no matter how influential a contractor may be, when a contract is entered into so deliberately as this was—because this was a matter of arrangement between the Government and this company intended to do simple justice to the Lower Provinces—a contract entered into under these circumstances should be strictly adhered to, and any deviation or delay in its fulfilment is a positive injustice to the people of the Atlantic Provinces. This matter has attracted a good deal of attention in the Maritime Provinces, so much so that public meetings have been held and resolutions passed which have found their way to Parliament. I attended, as a member of the Chamber of Commerce, one of these meetings called to consider this question among others, and I was called upon by the president to express my views. I am reported in the newspapers as having expressed myself to this effect:

"The next we heard of the matter was a few months later, the summer or autumn of '86, when Sir George Stephen and Mr. Van Horne visited Halifax. On that occasion they were called upon by the representative of the Herald, and they consented to be interviewed; and, among other things, they said that the construction of the road would be almost immediately commenced, at both ends simultaneously, and that within eighteen months the Hong Kong fast mail train would be running from Halifax to Montreal in 18 hours. Mr. Kenny added that he had not seen the paper lately, but that was his recollection of the interview."

Well, I was then speaking of what I had read in 1886, and this meeting was in 1889, but what I had read in 1886 had been such pleasant reading to me that it impressed itself vividly upon my mind. My attention was called, a few days afterwards, to the following article, which appears in the Montreal Gazette, 11th January, 1889. It seems that the ubiquitous reporter had taken the trouble to carry to Mr. Van Horne a report of my statement at Halifax, and this gave rise to the following article:—

"A Gazette reporter called upon Mr. W. C. Van Horne, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, yesterday afternoon, with reference to the meeting of the Halifax Chamber of Commerce, at which the Canadian Pacific Railway was denounced as having broken faith in regard to the short line to be constructed between Harvey and Moncton. Mr. Van Horne said it seemed to him that the people of Halifax were showing a little undue haste in accusing the Canadian Pacific Railway of not living up to its promises. It was hardly two weeks since the first section of the short line between Montreal and Mattawamkeag was completed. Mr. Kenny's inference of what Sir George Stephen and he had stated at Halifax was not correct. They did say that it was the intention of the company to commence work at both ends in order at completion to connect with the railway system of the Maritime Provinces at the earliest possible date, and they did commence the work in eastern Maine almost as soon as it was commenced in the vicinity of Montreal. They never thought of doing any work on the Moncton section until the line was completed between Montreal and Mattawamkeag, and they never promised to do so."

Well, I certainly had no intention of misquoting these gentlemen, and, recognising how easy it is to make a mistake when one is speaking solely from memory, I referred to what had appeared in reference to the matter in the public press, and I found in the Halifax Morning Herald of the 23rd June, 1886, the following:—

"A Herald reporter called on Sir George Stephen and Mr. Van Horne, yesterday, and was accorded an interview.

"What progress is being made with the Short Line to Montreal? Was asked of Sir George.

"He replied: The line from Montreal to the Maine boundary will be in operation by the first of December (1886). Our own engineers have examined the surveys and are now making the final location of the line across the State of Maine. We expect to let the contracts in a few weeks; work will commence at both ends, and we will have the whole road from Montreal to Moncton in running order by the fall of 1887.

"What time will you make between Halifax and Montreal over the Short Line when completed?

"We intend to run through fast express and mail trains in connection with the Hong Kong line in fifteen hours.

"The Hong Kong line?

"Yes. That is not an idle phrase but a perfectly true forecast of what is going to be. Why, the Canada Pacific will only be completed when Hong Kong is the Eastern and Liverpool the Western terminus. And Halifax can do a great deal towards speeding the accomplishment of that scheme."

As I said before, I regret exceedingly if my understanding of what those gentlemen said on that occasion was not correct, but really with the language now before me, with those very emphatic words of the senior officers, the president and the vice president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who told us that work was to commence at both ends, and that the whole line would be finished in the fall of 1887, I can only say that if I drew an incorrect inference of their views and of what they intended, I regret it exceedingly. Very great importance was attached to the visit of those gentlemen on that occasion, and still more importance was attached to their utterances. Their visit was a source of pleasure, and I hope they will come again and stay long, but still it would have been more pleasant for me to have heard the whistle of the Hong Kong mail express, as promised; but we did not hear it in 1887, and we have not heard it in 1888, and I am afraid we shall not hear it in 1889. However, we in the Maritime Provinces are a people of great faith, and we have heard that faith may move mountains, and we hope that it may move the Canadian Pacific Railway Company so that, up and down the hills of Nova Scotia and through the county of my hon. friend from Westmoreland, and through the lands of Albert and Sunbury and Queen's, and over that magnificent structure, that lasting monument of the zeal and energy of my hon. friend from York, the bridge at Fredericton, we shall hear the whistle of the Hong Kong express there even yet. The delay in this matter is to us in the Maritime Provinces incomprehensible. We know that a company that has done so much in the way of railway building and railway equipment and railway management as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has done could easily build, if it were so disposed, 113 miles of railway; and that very much aggravates the offence, because we know that the president has told us he could have built that road by the end of 1887, and here it is 1889, and not a blow has been struck in that portion of the road which passes through the Atlantic Provinces. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company adheres to its agreement as long as it is passing through the Province of Quebec, or even through the foreign State of Maine, but, as soon as it puts its foot in the Atlantic Provinces, the first time it is called upon to spend a dollar in the Atlantic Provinces, it breaks its agreement, and I say that is a palpable injustice to those people. The delay is incomprehensible, because it cannot be for financial reasons. I say that because it was only in January last that the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company issued an address which I read with a great deal of pleasure, which was copied into all the newspapers of Canada, and I think was also copied into the English press, announcing the position which his company occupied financially and otherwise; and, as he declared himself, it occupied a strong position. Well, the company which occupied such a strong position, as I believe that company does, need not be disturbed about the building of 113 miles of railway. Considering the amount of money that the people of the Maritime Provinces have contributed to the treasury of that company, it is not too much to ask them to carry out their contract as to the construction of that 113 miles. It is therefore not a matter of finance, and I say that again, because the manner in which the bonds of that road were issued proved it. I call the attention of the House to the fact that, for convenience in carrying out the contract, the subsidy was divided into three parts, and I find that the bonds have only been issued in the two sections which terminate at Mattawamkeag, and that the bonds have not been issued on the sections from Harvey to Fredericton and thence to Moncton. Now, Mr. Speaker, I remember very well that when these bonds were issued it was proclaimed that they had been placed on most advantageous terms, on terms more advantageous than any similar bonds had ever been floated before. Well, Sir in an ordinary commercial transaction, if a man gets all that he asks for an article, or more than he demanded, his usual habit is to dispose of all that he has for sale; and if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as I must suppose, at that time fully intended to carry out the contract, why did they not issue all the bonds? Hon. gentlemen who are familiar with financial operations in London know that it is easier to float a large amount where you have perfect security to offer than to float a small amount, and as the terms of placing that amount were so favorable, I think it is exceedingly to be regretted that all the bonds were not placed at that one time. I hope it does not mean: no bonds, no road. I mentioned before that we are not here to discuss the merits or the demerits of the Short Line Railway. It has been contended that the economy of distance was not as great as was first supposed; but there can be no material change, there has been no upheaval of nature since the contract was entered into; the distance is just the same, no more and no less than it was when the contract was entered into, so I do not think that would be accepted by this Parliament or by the Government of the day as a valid excuse for not adhering to this contract. It is more desirable in the public interests and in the interests of the people of the Maritime Provinces to-day than it was when the contract was entered into. When it is completed to Fredericton at that point it will intersect a new line of railway from Fredericton and Woodstock, thence to Edmundston, and then to Rivière du Loup; and that is an inducement with the people of the Maritime Provinces to press for the construction of the railway. I referred to the fact that this question had excited great attention in the Maritime Provinces, and that public meetings had been held. Many hon. gentlemen now listening to me and members of the Cabinet are aware that the chief magistrates of Fredericton, Moncton and Halifax made a pilgrimage up here in a most inclement season of the year to interview the Government and place before them the importance which their people attached to the early completion of this contract. I am glad to say that when these gentlemen returned they came back with heads erect and hearts elated, and satisfied with the assurance which had been given them that the contract would be carried out. So far as I am personally concerned I believe in the very positive assurances that were given in Parliament by the Ministers of the day, and it is for that reason that I have quoted the remarks of the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper and the Hon. Sir Hector Langevin, who were leading Parliament in these debates. I have quoted them, first of all, to show what the intentions of the Government were in bringing this matter to the notice of Parliament, and what Parliament intended when it adopted the suggestion. Therefore, in my own mind, I am quite satisfied that the road will be built. But I go one step further than that, and I say the contract should be carried out, that the road should be built by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that it was intended from the first to be one continuous line from ocean to ocean, that it was not to end at Mattawamkeag or any intermediate point, that it should be built, as I say, under the original contract, which ought now to be carried out. Now, Sir, I do not wish to conceal from the House or from the Government that, in the Maritime Provinces, we feel keenly the manner in which we have been treated in this matter. I have said before that we submitted as gracefully as people could be expected to submit to the very large expenditure incidental to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We viewed it on broad national grounds. I say we feel it keenly, and the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House feel it particularly so, because, I may say, that we risked our political existence at the last general election in defending that very policy which brought this Canadian Pacific Railway into existence. One of the greatest charges made against the Government of to-day, and one that we had to meet at every meeting, in every canvass, was the enormous expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We defended it on broad, national grounds, and having done so, it does seem unfair to us that the very first time this company, which has received such enormous sums of money from the Treasury of Canada, is called upon to spend its first dollar in the Maritime Provinces, is the first time it breaks faith with the people of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, I made the statement that as yet there is no default. I admit that, and if the Minister of Justice were to tell me that there were no default I should be obliged to admit that there is no legal default; but I say it is absolutely impossible for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to carry out its contract as it should. Not only that, but I regret to say—and I have endeavored to inform myself on the point—that I can see no disposition on the part of the contractors to carry out their contract. I should not have brought up this question here if I could have secured from the company a reply to the very simple question: When do you propose commencing work on this section of the road, and when do you expect to have it finished? But as I could not secure an answer to plain and repeated questions of that kind, I felt it my duty in this House, formally to call the attention of Parliament to the case, relying, as I said before, on the Government of the day to see that justice is done to the Maritime Provinces in this matter. I know that the Canadian Pacific Railway have done marvels, that their work has never been suppressed, and although I have animadverted in this matter upon the conduct of that company, I consider, nevertheless, that it is a company which has strong claims upon Canada, which has done much to develop Canada, which has done much to make Canada known and make her respected abroad. Consequently it is a subject of extreme regret for me to be obliged to refer in the way I have done to the conduct of that company, when it is called upon to break ground and build its first line of railway in New Brunswick. Now, Sir, I know that the Canadian Pacific Railway has done wonders, I know they can do everything but impossibilities, and I know that the completion of that contract is an impossibility, but I feel it my duty to lay this statement of the matter before the House in order that justice might be done to the people of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. LAURIER. I rise to a point of order. I did not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman while he was speaking. The hon. gentleman has stated that a document which he did not read he would put in and hand to the reporter. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is not aware that we have hitherto objected to this practice. We have allowed it only in some cases, such for example as the financial statement, when the Minister of Finance, after having given a synopsis of statements, hands them to the reporters; but in all other cases we have always objected to such a practice being followed, and I think we should adhere to this rule. If we allowed this practice of handing in documents to be followed, it may lead to the introduction of the American practice here.

Mr. KENNY. The document to which I referred is a lengthy and uninteresting agreement dated 14th December, 1875. I only read one clause of it, and rather than inflict its reading on the House, I now propose to withdraw it. I have no desire to transgress any rules or regulations of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I understand that that is one of the papers for which the hon. gentleman moved. Then it will appear in the return. I quite agree with my hon. friend opposite that we should not allow the American practice of handing in speeches or parts of speeches. As my hon. friend has said, it might be allowed and has been allowed, to the Finance Minister in his Budget speech to hand in a paper of figures which he has fully discussed and explained to the House.

Mr. ELLIS. As I assume the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) is very likely to rise after the junior member, I will take this opportunity to offer a few remarks. If the hon. member succeeded in conveying any impression to the House it was a very wrong impression. He appeared to convey the idea that the ports of Portland and Boston possess advantages by reason of the fact that this railway now has reached Mattawamkeag, which they will not possess when the whole road is completed. The relation, as respects the ports of Portland and Boston, will not be altered when the railway is finished to Halifax; the position as regards that matter will be precisely the same. So the hon. gentleman's statement on that point goes for nothing. Nor is the impression which the hon. gentleman conveyed with respect to the Maritime Provinces wholly a correct one. The railway is now finished, as I understand it, from the foot of Moosehead Lake to Mattawamkeag. It is in a position, as soon as the snow disappears, to be operated as far as St. John and St. Andrews. So, at least two of the maritime ports contemplated in the original scheme will be reached. No doubt there has been delay, but the circumstances in which the company was placed have been peculiar. When the company sent surveyors over the route across the State of Maine from the foot of Moosehead Lake to Mattawamkeag, or at all events to Greenville, and after the surveyors had made their report and the work and actually begun on the road, they discovered that it was a much more difficult work than the company had previously supposed, that it was so to such an extent that the contractors were at one time on the point of throwing up the work altogether. However, a new arrangement had to be made with them which involved the expenditure of a large sum of money, much larger than was at first contemplated, and the work has also occupied a much longer time. The whole resources of the company had been put forth to complete this very difficult work across the State of Maine. In consequence of the reported delay, I last fall sent a man over the whole route to obtain an idea as to the progress of the work. He had some little knowledge of railway work, and further he met all the sectional and divisional engineers, and the impression left on his mind, beyond doubt, was that it was a very difficult work. This would account for much of the delay that has taken place with respect to the opening of the road to Mattawamkeag. When it reaches Mattawamkeag it will have struck that portion of the road common to the entire road through Harvey, whether the portion from Harvey to Moncton is built or not. When that part of the road is open the Maritime Provinces will have been reached. Further, when the road is completed from Harvey to Moncton seventeen miles only will have been saved. The distance from Harvey to Halifax will be only about seventeen miles shorter than the existing road from Harvey to Halifax over the New Brunswick Railway and the Intercolonial Railway, therefore no great interest can suffer by reason of the fact that the company have not built at a cost of some millions a road that will only save seventeen miles. All the advantages which Halifax possesses, and no doubt they are very great, as an Atlantic seaport, will still accrue, and I can imagine, therefore, that the case is not nearly so bad as the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) has endeavored to make out. Further, I have great doubt with respect to the earnestness of the Halifax members, although no doubt the senior member (Mr. Jones) will rise and back up the junior member (Mr. Kenny) to the best of his ability. But when the resolution was offered by my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) to which the junior member for Halifax has referred, the Halifax members did not vote for it. The hon. gentleman proposed that the work should be commenced at both ends of the line at the same time, and the members for Halifax, and also the member for Westmorland (Mr. Wood) voted that such was not necessary. I also think it was not necessary, and if I had had a seat in the House at the time I should have voted with these hon. gentlemen. I do not desire to detain the House further than to state that on the 1st July, and perhaps earlier, the road now contemplated will be opened to the Maritime ports so far as St. John and St. Andrews are concerned, and the road will be open to Halifax by the New Brunswick and Intercolonial roads; and when finally completed, as first contemplated, there will only be a saving of one hour in time.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The subject brought before the House by my colleague is one in which the people of the Maritime Provinces, as he has justly observed, take very considerable interest, and, perhaps, nowhere is more interest manifested than in the city of Halifax. The hon. gentleman has furnished the House with very lengthy and exhaustive quotations from the speeches of hon. gentlemen who were in the House when this resolution was proposed guaranteeing the subsidy to the Short Line Railway. But it appears to me that the difficulty was at the very inception, that the appropriation of money was for a purpose entirely unwarranted and uncalled for. It was granted at that time under circumstances which left an impression abroad, I do not say on what it may be founded, that there was an hon. gentleman, in very near contact with the Government, who was very directly concerned in this appropriation, and that to the circumstance of that hon. gentleman holding a very important position, a position very near to the Government, was due the fact that this money had been voted at all. I think the country generally, at the time this money was voted, looked upon the appropriation with great suspicion. They looked upon it with suspicion on account of the circumstances to which I have referred, and outside Parliament they very generally condemned that appropriation on the ground that it was unnecessary, because when the road was built it was going to establish a rival line to our own Intercolonial Railway line. It was also said when this money was first granted that the saving of distance to Halifax would be in the neighborhood of 130 miles. That was to be the saving in distance as stated by the Government organs and stated in Parliament, when this road was completed to Halifax by the way of Harvey, Fredericton and Moncton. Now, we find from the statement of the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Ellis), which corroborates a statement I had heard on a previous occasion from a very authentic source, that the whole amount of distance to be saved when this road was completed was only 17 miles. It would therefore appear that if at the commencement it had been known that the saving would have only been 17 miles I think that hon. gentlemen in this House would naturally have hesitated before they would have committed the country to such a heavy expenditure for such a small saving of a distance. The expenditure was proceeded with and the Government of the day and the members for Halifax and from the Maritime Provinces supporting the Government at that time, refused to recognize the representations made to them by the Chamber of Commerce of Halifax on this very subject. My hon. colleague (Mr. Kenny) will remember that when the discussion took place in Parliament large meetings were held there, and the then mayor, a leading supporter of my hon. friend, took a very strong position on that point and remonstrances were sent to the Government and to the gentleman who represented Halifax County in that Parliament. It was pointed out to them at that time just what has resulted to-day. The people pointed out that so far as any advantage to the city of Halifax was concerned it was a misappropriation of the revenues of the country and my hon. friend will remember the emphatic telegram which came from Messrs. Daly and Stairs on that occasion after full consultation with the Canadian Pacific Railway people. They told us that we had the assurance of the Canadian Pacific Railway that this line would be built, that it was the best way to build it, that so much distance was going to be saved by the route, that they knew better than we did and they held "we are determined to have our way," and they had it. When this matter was brought before Parliament there was naturally a great deal of uncertainty with reference to the route, because, as my hon. friend has explained to the House, no instrumental survey had been made up to that time and it was merely an estimate of the distance to be saved that was given, so far as they could make that estimate without much accuracy. A great deal of discussion took place in this House which found voice in an amendment moved by Mr. Lesage:

"That the said subsidy be given to the company which will build a line which will be found to be the shortest and most practical after a complete instrumental survey of all the lines which may pretend to obtain this result."

That was a very natural amendment, and I think it was in the interests of the country that the money should not be specially granted to one company who were unprepared to say that they had obtained a correct survey, and that they were about building it over the shortest route. So determined were the Government and so subservient were their followers on that occasion, including the members for Halifax, I am sorry to say, that they voted down this amendment, and it was, of course, lost. That was, of course, a declaration that they were going to vote this money to the Canadian Pacific Railway. My hon. colleague has referred to the amendment which was subsequently moved by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk). It was as follows :

"That the said resolution be referred back to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of amending section 24 providing that the work on the sections of the line between Harvey, Fredericton and Salisbury shall be begun and prosecuted simultaneously with the work on the portion of the line west of the boundary between New Brunswick and Maine."

It would seem that my hon. friend, with a prescience that does great credit to his judgment, anticipated just what has taken place. He was not satisfied with the declaration of the Minister of Public Works, which has been quoted by my friend, because he went on to point out what was a very singular circumstance, and which has escaped the notice of my hon. friend. He went on to say :

"When these resolutions were first introduced into this House, there was no mention made of the section of road to which my motion refers; there was no reference made to the line to Harvey, Fredericton and Salisbury; evidently it was an afterthought that it should be included at all. The road, when built to Mattawamkeag, will have a connection with Salisbury; and we have no pledge from the Government that this section of the line will be built at all. The Minister of Public Works, in his speech the other day, pledged the Government to secure the building of the road from Mattawamkeag to Salisbury. When the road is built to Mattawamkeag we have connection, but the Short Line is not complete unless it is built to Harvey, Fredericton and Salisbury. Unless this section is built, the road will be of no earthly benefit to the Province of Nova Scotia or to the city of Halifax. It may be built; but what we want is that, since the Government and Parliament have declared that it shall be built by this company, we want to take care that it shall be built as soon as possible. Therefore, I cannot, at the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, withdraw my motion, and I shall have to ask the House to divide on it."

There were some gentlemen who seemed to have more faith in the Government and in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company than my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk); and Mr. Daly, who was one of the representatives of Halifax on that occasion, remarked :

"This Bill, we believe, and the measures the Government will take under it, will tend to accomplish an object the people of Nova Scotia have had at heart for a very long time, that is, that while Canada has been taxing itself, and Nova Scotia as part of Canada has been bearing its proportion of the taxation, for the development of the great west, we in the east wish to participate in the benefits which that great development is likely to produce. We believe a direct connection of the Canadian Pacific Railway system with the city of Halifax will be of great advantage to the whole Province and to that port particularly, and we believe that object can be accomplished by the measure now proposed. To hamper that measure with embarrassing details would, we think, prevent our accomplishing that object. The company will be obliged to seek in the markets of the world the necessary assistance to extend this railway from Montreal to Halifax; and to impose upon that company the necessity of commencing the work on each particular section of the line simultaneously, would, we think, involve the company in embarrassments which this Legislature should not impose upon them."

The member for Halifax of that day was very careful not to embarrass the company because he seems to be fully persuaded in his own mind that the company were going to carry out the resolution. If he had been so satisfied on that point I cannot see why he should have objected to the amendment of the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) which only went so far as to give effect to the very sentiments which the hon. gentleman pretended to be so thoroughly interested in. Doubtless they were led astray somewhat by the emphatic declarations of the hon. the Minister of Public Works. Now, if there is an hon. gentleman in this House who is usually very careful of his statements on public matters, I will do the Minister of Public Works the credit to say that it is he, and it is very seldom we can catch the hon. gentleman in a statement with which we can refer to afterwards as not being fulfilled as we can do to-night. Referring to this very subject the Minister of Public Works said, as has been quoted by my hon. colleague :

"I am sure the hon. gentleman will be pleased to hear the declaration which the Government makes through me, that in the arrangements to be made with the company to build the railway, and to take advantage of this vote of money, of $250,000 during 20 years, the Government will take care to secure the completion of the railway, not only to Mattawamkeag, but also to Salisbury, and if that is not secured, there will be no subsidy given. We must act in good faith; the faith of Parliament is pledged, and we must take care that that money is employed as Parliament wishes."

Now, Sir, it is worthy of remark that the hon. gentleman says that if the completion of the road from Mattawamkeag to Moncton is not secured, no subsidy will be given. Well, what position are the Government in to-night with regard to that matter? Have they not been paying that subsidy all along? Have they not been aware that the road was being constructed to Mattawamkeag, and has not the Minister of Public Works been paying out the money in direct violation of this solemn statement which he made to Parliament, and which carried weight with the members of this House? It seemed to have sufficient weight with the gentleman who then represented Halifax in this House and with other hon. gentlemen from Nova Scotia, to induce them to vote down the resolution of my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk); and I think the hon. Minister of Public Works owes it to this House and the country now to explain the position which he and the Government occupy, and under what circumstances they have been induced or seduced to pay the public money away for the construction of a line in a foreign country, in direct violation of the solemn terms and conditions with which this grant was obtained from Parliament. It is all very well for my hon. colleagues to place the responsibility of this matter on the shoulders of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I do not for one moment pretend to say that that company are not to blame. They certainly are to blame, but their masters, the Government of this country, have to take the responsibility of permitting them to go on year after year, and of paying out to them the subsidies on the work as it progressed through American territory, and not taking care to see that the conditions under which this money was granted by Parliament were complied with. We have no return, but it will be interesting to see what money has been paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Now, in 1887 we had a very interesting meeting at the Drill Shed in Halifax, at which we were favored with the company of the late hon. Minister of Finance, and it was one of his boasts on that occasion what he had done—the bold act, he said, of coming to Parliament and asking for $250,000 a year for twenty years to build this line; and he said, bold as it was Parliament had sufficient confidence in him to grant the money, and the work is going to be carried out, and is now under way, and will be completed in good time. In view of the predictions made by that hon. gentleman at that time, it is interesting to notice the position in which the enterprise is to-day. It must, no doubt, be very unpleasant to my hon. colleague to stand up here and denounce the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and inferentially, of course, the Government, when he had before him the statements made by the late hon. Minister of Finance with regard to this work at a time when his prognostication as to the business it was going to bring to Halifax, had a considerable influence on the minds of certain gentlemen in that city. Sir Charles Tupper said on that occasion :

"When I stated last night that the last act I did before leaving London was to sign, as joint trustee with Lord Revelstoke and Lord Wolverton, the bonds for the construction of this line of railway (the Short Line) by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and that it is now in their hands; when I told him (Mr. Jones) that he felt that it was a death knell ringing in his ears. He felt that with the gigantic work in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, knowing their enormous resources and knowing that the moment they had expended their money in the construction of this short line of railway, and carried out the magnificent project of having running to Halifax as fast a line of steamers as crosses the ocean from England to New York, that this harbor must become the entrepot of the traffic and commerce between Europe and the East."

The old story—

"He knew that this would become a great transcontinental highway and that we would not only bring over it the traffic from Europe to Japan and China, but that we should be able to compete with Boston,

Portland or New York with regard to traffic and travel to the cities of New York and Chicago and the Western States.

After indulging in this glorious prediction of what Halifax was going to be if the Government were sustained, and the Short Line, which is yet unfinished, was completed, the hon. gentleman went on to say :

" I have already told you that this gigantic Pacific Railway Company, with between 4,000 and 5,000 miles of constructed railway now in operation, with an army of 25,000 men in their employ, and expending money to an extent that is calculated to sustain and develop a country of itself, if we had to rest upon it almost alone. When that company have declared by the most solemn, important and business-like act that it is possible for them to do—by putting their hand and seal to a contract binding them to build not only the short line of railway that comes to St. John, but also the short line of railway that passes St. John by coming from Fredericton to Moncton, because that is in the bond, and that is the work with which they are immediately to grapple."

Now, Sir, these were election promises, made during a time of political excitement when my hon. colleague and I stood on the platform expounding opposite views. My hon. friend, with that sanguine disposition with regard to the fulfilment of those promises and intentions of the Government of which he is such a strong supporter, no doubt expatiated on all those glorious prospects from one end of the country to the other at the time. Well, Sir, we had to point out the position in which this very work stood at that time. We had before us the evidence that the work was going on in a foreign country, that the money of Canada was being drawn day by day for the construction of that railway, and that not a blow was being struck to bring it to Halifax. Sir, I hold that the Government of this country are justly censurable for the present condition of things. If they had dealt earnestly and energetically with this matter at the time, they could have compelled the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to go on with that part of the road just as well as with the other. The money was in their own hands; they are not obliged to part with it; they could have said and they should have said to the Canadian Pacific Railway: Go on with the Short Line to Moncton simultaneously with the other portion. But no; after having called upon their supporters here to vote down the amendment of my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), after having, through the Minister of Public Works, solemnly and emphatically declared that the money should not be drawn, they went on from time to time and allowed this departure from the intention of Parliament for which to-day the country holds them responsible. I do not pretend to justify the Canadian Pacific Railway in any respect. It was a part of a contract they should have carried out in good faith, and if they had, my hon. colleague and myself would not have been compelled to denounce them here; but the difference between my hon. colleague and myself is that he wishes to put the entire responsibility on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to deal very lightly with the Government who control the Canadian Pacific Railway, while I hold that the Government are responsible and that the whole transaction is one not creditable to the Government. We shall look with a great deal of interest at the course the Government will take in the future with regard to the company. It is quite true the time has not yet elapsed, but it is utterly impossible for the road to be completed according to the terms of the contract. The road is built to St. John, and our brethren there have the advantage of a considerably short line to Montreal. I am very glad of any advantage which accrues to St. John, and they certainly have the advantage over us in some respects, with regard to shorter distances to the sea. Whether this will enable them to become the winter port of the Dominion with regard to certain shipments remains to be seen. I am willing to admit that in that respect they have gained, and it will be a great source of dissatisfaction for the people of Halifax and all along the line when they find that the saving in distance, which was first estimated at 120 miles, has now dwindled down to the miserable figure of 17 miles. There is not an hon. gentleman in this House who would have voted to support the Bill could he have foreseen this. The Government must have been deceived, and willingly deceived, perhaps, by one who, as has been observed, had a very near and personal interest in carrying out this arrangement; but the Government are much to blame for placing this expenditure in the hands of a company, leaving them to take their own route, and voting down a proposition made by my hon. friend. If my hon. friend's motion had been carried, other contractors would have entered the field and we would have known whether there were any physical difficulties in the way. As far as we are concerned, it is eminently unsatisfactory, looking at the distance to be saved and the large amount added to the burdens of the taxpayers, but such as it is the people desire to have it. They desire to have it, because it was part of the original contract and they expect the Government to compel the company to carry it out without delay. The Government may be sure of one thing, and that is that they cannot escape their responsibility, and that the country will look to them for the fulfilment of the contract. The people have nothing to do with the Canadian Pacific Railway. They stand simply in the light of contractors for public works, and if the Government advances a sum of money to contractors for public works more than they are entitled to, the Government are justly censurable. I cannot say that they have advanced more money on this road than the circumstances would warrant, but if the Canadian Pacific Railway have an amount at their credit for the construction of the remaining distance, there is less reason than there has yet been why they should not go on and finish it. The Government should take up this matter at once and compel the Canadian Pacific Railway to take some action. We heard lately, as my colleague has mentioned, that a deputation came from Halifax, Moncton and St. John to confer with the Government, and they met the First Minister and went back about as wise as they came. The First Minister told them he had no doubt it would be finished in good time, but he did not say when, or whether the Government were going to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway to finish. Without such an assurance by the Government, without such explanations from the Minister of Public Works with regard to his promise, and without the full understanding that the Government will hold the Canadian Pacific Railway to the terms of the contract, the country will not be satisfied at all.

Mr. TEMPLE. My hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) has given thorough expression of my opinions on the subject, so I shall not weary this House by repeating them. I simply rise now to draw attention to the statement made by the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). He was of opinion that the saving at one time, which was to be 126 miles, has dwindled down to the miserable sum of 17 miles. This information he took from the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon). Hon. gentlemen opposite are just like parrots; what one says the other repeats. I do not know how they can make 126 miles out of 113. The hon. gentleman has made a mistake somewhere. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) makes the statement that it is only 17 miles shorter by Harvey, Fredericton and Salisbury. That is the St. John version of it, which we all understand very well. The distance that has been saved has been 30 miles at the very least. That, however, makes no difference with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is a contract, and all we ask is that the Canadian Pacific Railway people should carry it out, which I have no doubt they will do. I merely rose to correct the statement of the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and set him right upon the point.

Motion agreed to,

LIQUOR PERMITS IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. JAMIESON moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories, together with any papers, reports and documents in reference to the issue of permits or licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors, beer or other intoxicants in public houses or otherwise in the North-West Territories; also, copies of all regulations, documents or other proceedings issued or adopted by the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories, under which licenses or permits for the sale of beer or other intoxicants in public houses have been granted in the said Territories.

He said: In submitting this resolution to the House, I desire to call attention to the condition of things in the North-West Territories, which has been brought to the attention of the public through the press and otherwise, and in a very few words to refer to the legislation which has taken place in reference to the liquor traffic in the North-West Territories. It will be recollected by the older members of this House that, in 1873, Sir Charles Tupper, then Minister of Customs, introduced into the House a Bill for the purpose of regulating the Customs duties in the North-West. That Bill, which afterwards became law, being assented to on the 23rd May, 1873, contained a most important provision in reference to the traffic in intoxicating liquors in the Territories. I will read a part of the second sub-section of section 1 of that Act, which was considered at the time a sort of departure from the recognised state of things in this Dominion, and I understand was regarded as an experiment. It provides as follows:—

"Spirits or strong waters, or spirituous liquors of any kind are hereby prohibited to be imported into any part of the North-West Territories, under the like penalty and forfeiture as are provided by the Customs laws of Canada with respect to articles the importation whereof is prohibited; nor shall any such spirits or strong waters or spirituous liquors of any kind be manufactured or made in the said North-West Territories or brought into the same from any Province of Canada except by special permission of the Lieutenant Governor of the said Territories."

It goes on further to provide penalties for any breach of this law. I recollect at the time that this law was passed that there was a good deal of congratulation indulged in, in reference to the fact that, in a certain portion, at all events, of this Dominion, we had secured a prohibitory liquor law. I recollect subsequently, and since I have had a seat in this House, Sir Charles Tupper congratulating the House and the country upon the fact, and taking to himself credit for having been instrumental in introducing and aiding in the passage of that law. Afterwards, those who are conversant with the legislation of the country will be aware that it became a part of the constitution of the North-West Territories under the Act passed by the Government led by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie). On the revision of the Statutes of Canada made in 1886, it continued to be a part of the Act in reference to the North-West Territories. Section 92 of that Statute reads as follows:—

"No intoxicating liquor or intoxicant shall be manufactured, compounded or made in the Territories except by special permission of the Governor in Council; nor shall any intoxicating liquor or intoxicant be imported or brought into the Territories from any Province of Canada or elsewhere, or be sold, exchanged, traded or bartered, or had in possession therein, except by special permission, in writing, of the Lieutenant Governor. Intoxicating liquors or intoxicants imported or brought from any place out of Canada into the Territories, by special permission in writing of the Lieutenant Governor, shall be subject to the customs and excise laws of Canada."

Section 93 provides that:

"The Lieutenant Governor shall make an annual return, up to the 31st day of December in each year, of the number of such permissions so given by him and the quantity and nature of the intoxicating liquors and intoxicants in each case, to the Minister of the Interior, who shall lay the same before Parliament."

Now, in the administration of the Government in the North-West Territories, from 1873 until the middle of the year 1888, a certain construction was placed upon that statute.

Mr. TEMPLE.

So far as I can ascertain it was never dreamed by anybody that general licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors should be granted under the provision of that law; in fact the construction which was placed upon that statute during all this time was that in every case of the importation or sale of intoxicating liquors in the North-West Territory, a special permit should be received from the Lieutenant Governor. It is well understood that during the term of office of the present Minister of the Interior, that was the construction which was placed upon that statute, and in my judgment that was the only reasonable construction which could be placed upon it. However, after the present Lieutenant Governor assumed the duties of his office in the Territories he placed a different construction upon the statute altogether; after the lapse of some fifteen years we have a new interpretation given to it. I am informed, on the very best authority, indeed, I do not think that it is questioned by anybody in the Dominion, that licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors have been granted under the hand of the Lieutenant Governor in the Territory, in my judgment, in violation of not only the letter, but of the spirit of this statute. Now, Sir, it may be regarded in some quarters as a very slight matter, but I consider it as a very serious matter, that a statute, which is part of the constitution of a large section of this Dominion, should be violated with impunity in the manner in which we are led to believe it has been violated in the administration of the affairs of the North West. Of course, I know that it is contended that under the present system there is less consumption of intoxicating liquors than there was under the former administration of this law. Whether that is the case or not, it is not my intention to discuss; however, so far as I can learn, such is not the case. I have learned from the very best authority that the consumption of intoxicating liquors under the present administration of the law in the North-West, is much greater than it was under the former administration; not only that, but I am informed on the very best authority that under cover of these 4 per cent. licenses which have been issued by the Lieutenant Governor, the very strongest kinds of liquor are being sold in the North West. No longer ago than to-day I was informed by gentlemen who are at present visiting Ottawa, that the state of things in several of the larger towns in the North-West Territories is far from what it should be in reference to this traffic; that the crime of drunkenness is increasing at a very alarming rate. Now, if such be the case, I think it is high time that this House should enquire into that state of things, and ascertain whether, in the issuing of these licenses, and the manner in which they have been issued, the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories has been acting within the statute law of the country, or has been acting in the violation thereof. Now, let us look for a moment at the wording of this statute. It provides that no intoxicating liquors shall be imported into the North-West Territories, "nor shall any liquors be sold, exchanged, traded or bartered therein, except by special permission in writing of the Lieutenant Governor." Now, can it be reasonably contended under the reading of this statute, that the Lieutenant Governor has power to issue a general license? In my judgment such a contention is a most unreasonable one, and is not warranted by the language of the statute at all. Why, Sir, such a construction of this statute would be clothing the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories with a power which is not possessed by the Lieutenant Governors of the older Provinces of this Dominion, and I do not think that it was the intention of Parliament that such should be the case. I have to say further, that if the Lieutenant Governor has the power of controlling the whole liquor traffic in the whole North-West, and to grant licenses to whomsoever he pleases, to reject the application of whomsoever he pleases, all I can say is that if he has only granted permits for the sale of 4 per cent. beer, I am very much astonished at his moderation. But, Sir, I contend that not only under the strict letter of the statute, but by the spirit of the statute, he has no such power, he is not clothed with any such power as to be able to grant a general license to men holding public houses for the sale of liquor in the North-West Territories. If we look at the 93rd section of this Act, this construction of the statute law will seem the more reasonable and proper one. The Lieutenant Governor, we are told, is required to make a return up to the 31st December in each year, of the number of permissions so given, and the quantity and nature of the intoxicating liquor given. This shows conclusively that these permits are to be special and not general permits, because there is to be a return in each case of the nature and quantity of the liquor sold. Consequently it could never be contended that under the construction of this statute, general licenses or permits for the sale of liquor were contemplated. Now, Sir, I do not desire to take up too much time in discussing this question, because I want to hear other members of this House say something upon the matter also. Let me add, however, that I look upon this action of the Lieutenant Governor as a very dangerous precedent. If we are going to have a license system in the North-West, by all means let us have it in a legal and constitutional manner, and not in the manner in which I have indicated, and which is brought about by a breach of the statute law of this Dominion. I am informed that both parties in the North-West Territories, both those in favor of the prohibition of the liquor traffic and those who are opposed to it, are in favor of a popular vote being taken in the Territories for the purpose of deciding the question. That is a very reasonable proposition, and in my judgment I see no reason why the wishes of the people of the North-West Territories should not be carried out in this respect in regard to the traffic.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You voted against such a proposition.

Mr. JAMIESON. We are informed that the Lieutenant Governor has assumed power and authority to issue licenses even without the consent of the people's representatives, and in my judgment in the very teeth of the statute law of this Dominion. I trust this motion will be adopted, and we shall have a return of all the regulations and correspondence respecting this question. I say further that if the responsibility rests upon the shoulders of the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories, I, for one, will condemn his conduct as most reprehensible and as deserving the censure of this House; and further, that if the construction of the statute or the instructions received by him came from another source, I have no hesitation in saying that that source whatever it may be, should receive the censure of this House.

Mr. FISHER. I am rather surprised, I confess, that although five or six members of the Government are present in the House, none of them have taken upon themselves to offer some explanation in regard to the serious facts which the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) has laid before the House. I regret the First Minister is not present to give that explanation, but we have present the Minister of the Interior, who for a long time had the management of liquor laws in the North-West, and I confess I am surprised that he should not have chosen to give an explanation of this most extraordinary series of actions in the North-West. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) placed this motion on the notice paper largely in consequence of a resolution passed by the Council of the Dominion Alliance, who assembled in Ottawa during the early part of the Session. I may say that in that Council a resolution was proposed and adopted condemning the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West in no measured terms for his action respecting liquor licenses in the North-West Territories. The Legislative Committee of the Alliance, however, were not instructed to lay it before Parliament, but their action was left to their discretion. It was thought desirable to first move for the papers. I regret extremely that this motion had not been introduced earlier, not that the fault rests with any one, because the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) was anxious to have it adopted as soon as possible. But it has come up at such a late period of the Session that I fear the papers will not be laid before the House before the close of the Session, and consequently we will not have an opportunity of proceeding upon the official record. It is partly for that reason I had hoped the Government would have given some explanation in regard to this matter. But I do not think we need wait for those papers, because we have not only in the public press but from people of the North-West quite sufficient data to enable us to judge as to what has occurred. Not only is this an offence against the temperance sentiment, but it is a grave offence against constitutional government in the North-West in regard to the issuing of licenses there by the Lieutenant Governor. I am not sufficiently versed in the law to say positively or to give an opinion that would be worth anything upon the strictly legal aspect of this question, or to be able to take up the statute and give a legal opinion upon its exact wording; but I venture to say that until last year no one had any thought, any expectation or idea that a definite system of licensing could be allowed under the prohibition section of the North-West Territories Act. We know that under the late administration of the North-West Territories a great number of permits were issued. We had a return of them for one year, and it appeared a great many had been issued; but at no time that I am aware of did the Lieutenant Governor undertake to issue licenses to sell liquor there. What occurred last season? We find that the new Lieutenant Governor as soon as he took his oath of office issued licenses. I say deliberately licenses, not permits, in the sense that permits were issued before, but licenses were issued on the Lieutenant Governor's own account; and, so far as we know, without any sanction by the representatives of the people, he undertook to introduce into the North-West Territories practically an elaborate license law. In all portions of the Dominion the Provincial Legislatures have the right to deal with the licensing of the sale of liquor in the various Provinces. The Dominion Parliament has not the right and although they attempted to exercise it, the attempt was a failure. Every one held that as regards the North-West we had a clear law, that prohibition was the law there. What is the heading of the section to which I allude in the North-West Territories Act? "It is prohibition of intoxicants." No one can pretend to say that under the section prohibiting intoxicants that a license law can be introduced. But the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories is not to-day issuing permits as before, but he is issuing licenses for the sale of liquor; they are licenses, just as licenses are issued in other Provinces, upon certain terms which are laid down. They are not given to individuals to enable them to bring in liquor for their own use, but they are permits given to individuals, on certain terms and conditions clearly prescribed by the Lieutenant Governor as to how they shall sell, when they shall sell, and to whom they shall sell. What are those conditions? I take a summary of them from the Regina Leader of 24th July last, as follows:—

"Permits to sell 4 per cent. beer, containing only 4 per cent. alcohol, only issued to hotel keepers who have accommodation for 12 persons and 5 horses. Not to be sold on Sundays, except at meals. Not to be sold to any person under 14 years of age, nor to dissolute persons. Total quantity of liquor, under permit, to be brought into Territories at one time, and to be inspected and passed by police. License only issued on recommendation of representative of the district in which licensee resides. Fee to be paid."

If this is not introduction of license law into the North-West, I don't know what is. If in regard to these matters, which are under the control of Parliament, the Lieutenant Governor, on his own responsibility, without the endorsement or the authority of any representative of the people of that country, should thus deliberately undertake to introduce a totally new system into those Territories, without authority from the people of the country, he commits a grave violation of the spirit of the constitution. Suppose, Sir, in any other part of this country the Lieutenant Governors were to introduce any such changes or innovations into the laws of the territories which are under their control, would not the people of this country rise in arms against such an invasion of their prerogatives and their rights? I say it on the floor of Parliament that this action should be censured and should be criticised, and that it should be defended if it can; and, Sir, the persons who should defend this action, if it is defensible, are the Government of the day. What are the facts of the case in regard to this? I have spoken hitherto entirely and solely of the Lieutenant Governor of the North West Territories, and I have laid the responsibility upon him. The Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories is a servant of the Government here, he is their nominee, and he is responsible to them, and we find that under the North-West Act:

"The Lieutenant Governor shall be appointed by an instrument under the Great Seal of the Dominion of Canada and shall hold office during pleasure."

And the second clause of the same section says:

"The Lieutenant Governor shall administer the Government under instructions from time to time given him by the Governor in Council or by the Secretary of State of Canada."

In other words, this gentleman is not an irresponsible individual. He is responsible to the Government here and the gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches here are responsible for his acts, because he is obliged to act under their instructions and by their directions, and if he does what is wrong he is liable to censure by the Government. If the Government do not choose to censure him, I say it is necessary that this House should censure the Government. The Government may say that they have not been responsible for this and that they knew nothing of it. They have not deigned however to tell us why this occurred or under whose authority it occurred. I find in the public press last summer that there was a visit of Lieutenant Governor Royal to the eastern Provinces, immediately after his accession to his present position. What was said then? I find that the Ottawa Journal of 28th July says:

"Governor Royal of the North-West Territories, is in town; his business is to interview the Government regarding the question of granting permits for the sale of beer. He is here to make arrangements for regulations governing importation of such beer."

I may be told that this is not an official utterance, and I know that it is simply an interview between a Journal reporter and Lieutenant Governor Royal. Governor Royal explains what was his business here in Ottawa and what he was trying to do. Until the Government show that they have not been consulted in this way, until they show that they have not been instrumental in the issuing of these licenses, and until they show that they do not intend to sustain this action I contend that they are responsible for the action of their servant. The Ottawa Journal of 30th July says:

"Mr. Royal had consultation with Messrs. Costigan and Miall and as a result arrangements will be made to inspect all liquor passing through Winnipeg destined for the Territories, and to place an excise stamp upon it."

Now we find that one of the departments of the present Government is counteracting and making regulations to facilitate and carry out the arrangements which Lieutenant Governor Royal has the responsibility of inaugurating.

Mr. FISHER.

The fact of the matter is that the Ottawa Government control and rule the North-West. Last year they chose to introduce and have passed an Act in this House giving the North-West a new Legislative Council, and that Council was to have a voice in the ruling and regulating of the affairs of the North-West. The result was that last summer there was held an election in the North-West Territories, and again I can quote from the Regina Leader to show that at that election every individual who was elected to that Assembly pledged himself to his electors to have no change made in regard to the selling of liquor in the North-West until there had been a vote of the people of the North-West upon it. When the Legislature met there was a good deal of discussion in regard to this very question of liquor dealing in the North-West, and the result was that a motion was passed in that Assembly, by a majority of 14 to 6, which said that a vote ought to be held as to the question of liquor selling in the North-West. I say that the people of the North-West desired, that before any change should be made in the then existing laws, that they should have a voice in the matter, and we who are advocates of prohibition, and we who in this House have passed a local option law, certainly must believe and contend that those people have a right to decide for themselves as to whether there shall be liquor sold in their midst or not. Without any reference to the representatives of the North-West the Lieutenant Governor has chosen to introduce a license law and to make a license law on his own responsibility. This should be condemned. There is another point to which I wish to allude before sitting down. Beside this 4 per cent. beer licence there was issued in the North-West a licence for the sale of wine and beer at the Banff Hotel. A few days ago there was a question asked of the Government as to under whose authority this licence was issued and the answer of the Minister of the Interior was a reference to this North-West Territories Act. But I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the Rocky Mountain Park Act, in which I think he will find that everything regulating trade and traffic of this description in the Rocky Mountain Park is taken out of the North-West Territories and out of the power of the Governor of the North-West Territories and put into his hands. The hon. Minister shakes his head, but I find in section 2 of that Act:

"In said park the land is hereby reserved and set apart as a public park and pleasure ground for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of Canada subject to the provisions of this Act and to the regulations hereby mentioned and shall be known as the Rocky Mountain Park Act."

It goes on to say:

"The park shall be under the control and management of the Minister of the Interior, and the Governor in Council (not the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories) may make regulations for the following purposes."

Among these purposes under sub-section e of that same section is "Trade and traffic of every description." Now, Sir, I do not think the Minister of the Interior will pretend to say that liquor selling is not trade and traffic, or that there is any special provision in that Act which exempts liquor selling out of the other trades and traffic which may be carried on in that Rocky Mountain Park. I believe, and I am sure, that the Minister of the Interior is responsible for the trade and traffic that are carried on in that park. The Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories has no right to control traffic of any kind whatever, and consequently the Government here, and not the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories, is responsible for the issuing of that license in the Rocky Mountain Park. I only say this to show where I believe the responsibility rests, and I say it because of my surprise to find four or five Ministers sitting in their seats without their attempting to justify the action of themselves and their servants in the North-West Territories during last summer, I think, Sir, that when the people of the North-West Territories have themselves an opportunity of deciding on the question as to whether liquor should be sold in their midst or not, it will then be for us in the Eastern Provinces to say nothing on the matter; but until that time comes, I think it is our duty, as members of this House, who sit here discussing affairs under the control of this Parliament, to look into this matter, and try to find out under what authority, and at whose authorisation these things have occurred, and lay the blame where it belongs, if there be blame, and see what justification there is, if there be justification. I trust that before this motion is passed we may have some word from some of the Ministers, so that we may ascertain the facts before the papers come down, which, I fear, will not be before the end of the Session.

Mr. DEWDNEY. There is no objection to the papers being brought down, and I may tell the hon. gentleman, that since the motion has been on the paper, I have taken the opportunity to see what papers there were on the subject, and I can assure him that they can all be copied in half an hour, so that they can be brought down to-morrow, when the hon. gentleman can ascertain the facts.

Mr. LAURIER. I submit that the answer of the hon. Minister is not at all satisfactory. It is complete, so far as words go, but surely when such a charge is made as that made by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), that the Lieutenant Governor of the Territories is not merely granting licenses, but has actually introduced a license law, and is distributing licenses right and left, and deciding where and to whom they shall be granted, surely we should have a statement from the Government as to whether this charge is true or not; and surely it is no answer to say that the papers can be copied in half an hour and will be laid before the House. We have a right to know whether the charge made by the hon. member for Lanark is true or not. Is it true that Lieutenant Governor Royal has not only issued licenses, but has actually made a law of his own, to suit his own convenience? It does not do for the Government to answer that they do not know, or to wash their hands of the matter. If they are not prepared to say to-day whether this charge is true or not true, there is but one conclusion that every member of the House can come to, whether he sits on this side or on that side, and that is, that the charges are true, and that the law is violated in the Territories with the knowledge and connivance of the Government.

Mr. KIRK. This motion should not be allowed to pass without some member of the Government making some explanation with regard to it. It has been perfectly understood, ever since the North-West Act was passed, that we had a prohibitory liquor law in the North-West Territories, and so far as the hon. Minister of the Interior is concerned, when he was Governor of the Territories he carried out the law strictly. But it seems that the present Lieutenant Governor has undertaken to issue licenses contrary to the spirit of the law, contrary to that which everybody in this Dominion believed to be the law. He not only issues licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors, but he actually goes so far as to perform the functions of a legislature by making regulations for hotels to which he gives the right to sell liquor. Now, surely that is a violation of the law. We know that the late Minister of Finance, Sir Charles Tupper, has taken credit to himself as being instrumental in placing on the Statute-book the first prohibitory liquor law enacted in this Dominion, that which is now the law of the North-West Territories. We know also that Sir Adams Archibald, when he was running an election recently in Colchester, took credit to himself as being the first Lieutenant Governor to carry such a law into effect, and he claimed the votes of the temperance people of Colchester on that account.

Yet we find that we have no prohibitory law there at all, but, on the contrary, the most lax license law to be found anywhere in the Dominion; and to-night we have Ministers sitting here in silence hearing one of their own supporters, the hon. member for Lanark, charge that this law is violated, and insinuate that it is violated with the connivance of the Government. Now, I think the Government should not allow this resolution to pass without saying something to satisfy this House that the Lieutenant Governor, if he is violating the law, is doing so without their knowledge or instructions. But I believe he is not violating it without instructions. I believe the Government have given him instructions to issue those licenses. An officer of the Government to take upon himself to do such an important act without the authority of the Government! I do not believe Lieutenant Governor Royal does it. Therefore, I charge the Government with having instructed him, and call upon them to deny the charge.

Mr. DAVIN. Before this motion is carried I should like to make some remarks, because it illustrates the anomalous state of things which exists in the Territories. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman who made the motion, nor with the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), that Governor Royal is violating the law, and I think the hon. and learned gentleman who leads the Opposition, when he reads the clause of the Act, will agree with me. I am not now saying whether or not he is violating the spirit of the policy that was understood to obtain in the Territories; I am simply dealing with the question whether or not he exceeds the power given to him by the statute. The law is this:

"No intoxicating liquor or intoxicant shall be manufactured, compounded or made in the Territories, except by special permission of the Governor in Council; nor shall any intoxicating liquor or intoxicant be imported or brought into the Territories from any Province of Canada, or elsewhere, or be sold, exchanged, traded or bartered, or had in possession therein, except by special permission, in writing, of the Lieutenant Governor."

Therefore, that clause gives the Lieutenant Governor the power of granting special permission in writing to sell intoxicants. Very rarely have I used a permit, unless when I had friends visiting me whom I wished to entertain, and I do not suppose I had, during the six or seven years I have lived there, five permits. I have recommended scores of people for permits, but I have always considered the whole system a bad one.

Mr. LAURIER. The permit to get liquor and the license to sell liquor are two different things. The one is covered by the section; the other is not.

Mr. DAVIN. The clause reads "or elsewhere or be sold except by permission in writing of the Lieutenant Governor."

Mr. LAURIER. A special permission for each selling, but not a general permission to sell.

Mr. DAVIN. It was sold in the Territories before Lieutenant Governor Royal went there. Permission was given by my hon. friend, who is Minister of the Interior, for the Canadian Pacific Railway to sell on their cars, and nobody ever objected to this as against the law. I do not consider that Lieutenant Governor Royal has at all exceeded the power given him under the Act. The question as to the policy is another matter, and it is one which may fairly be discussed. But I would point out this anomaly: Beer of four per cent. strength is admitted into the Territories, yet our people are not allowed to manufacture it. We did not complain, so long as it was excluded, that our people were not allowed to manufacture malt beer, but it is not to be borne that it can be imported and yet that our people are not to be allowed to manufacture it. At Moose Jaw and at Medicine Hat, there are men who invested $5,000 to $10,000 in this business, and who have been ruined, not by design on the part of the Lieutenant Gov-error, but because of this interpretation of the Act. At Medicine Hat a man was manufacturing beer. His plant was seized by Mr. Barrett, the agent of the Inland Revenue Department. He was brought before a magistrate and fined $300 for making beer, while a hotel keeper was selling the same beer across the counter a short distance away. This is an anomalous state of things which cannot be allowed to continue. Here you have an Act which you say is a prohibitory Act, yet a Mr. Buchanan imports a lot of beer and imports it on a permit, got by whom?—by the man who above all others is charged with carrying out the Prohibitory Act—by the Commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police! The permit is in his name, and was given on his advice; and Commissioner Herchmer was charged before the judge in Regina for having liquor unlawfully in his possession:

"This case was heard on Friday, the 22nd inst. before Mr. Justice Richardson. For the prosecution, Messrs. Johnstone and Secord; for the defendant, Mr. Haultain. Witnesses called for the prosecution were Col. W. Herchmer, Supt. Gagnon, Capt. Constantine and Corporal Horne, of the Police force, F. Wall, of the Canteen, J. C. Pope, Chas. Wilson and W. C. Fowler.

"It was shown that about the 30th of January a car load, consigned as beer, was seized at Broadview, amongst it 1,000 gallons consigned to W. F. Buchanan, and a telegram was sent to the Barracks on the morning of the 31st, and a permit (produced) obtained on the written application of Commissioner Herchmer, left for that purpose before he went to Ottawa. This permit was accompanied to Broadview by an officer of the Police, and the supposed beer (the 1,000 gallons) released.

"It was acknowledged from the witness-box that some liquor was spilled about that time, "not any of the 1,000 gallons."

"The beer reached Regina consigned "W. F. Buchanan, advise Col. Herchmer." Delivery at the Canteen of fifty barrels of four per cent. beer on February 2nd was proved by the Canteen manager.

"The defence called no witnesses, resting their case on the missing link between the defendant and the beer."

As a fact, it would be most instructive, as emphasising the anomalous state of things that exists in these Territories, to have the judgment in this case, because I believe what the judge held was that the beer was actually the property of the Crown and therefore could not be confiscated. This illustrates the anomalous state of things, as nothing else can, which exists in the Territories, and it will probably sharpen the wits of hon. gentlemen on both sides when other questions come up which I cannot now touch on without being irrelevant, and when my hon. friends from Saskatchewan or Alberta may seek to show you that there are other anomalies existing there in which you do not take as deep an interest as you do in this. I have always held that the proper thing to have done under that Act was to carry out prohibition, but you see that the Act contemplates that the Lieutenant Governor will give permission. That was the weak point of the Act. It was a weak point that the Act did not define to what extent this permission should be given. The most difficult task the hon. the Minister of Interior had to do was to issue permits, and I will bear my testimony that he refused permits over and over again, at the risk of his popularity, because he could not conscientiously give them to the men who applied for them. But it was most ludicrous. A permit was first given for medical purposes, and everybody wanted a gallon or two for medical purposes. Then the wording was changed for domestic purposes, and to those gentlemen who hold strong opinion on this subject with regard to prohibition, I want to point out that, notwithstanding that permits were issued, notwithstanding we had a most efficient body of police enforcing the Act, liquor was brought in contraband wholesale. Liquor was brought in contraband; and there is one town in which the police were never able to enforce the Act at all—the town of Calgary. In that town there is more of the western spirit, as it is understood in the United States, than in any other town in the Dominion. It was imported wholesale, but especially into that town where, as I said, there was more of that kind of freedom, if I may use the mild term—

Mr. DAVIN,

Mr. LAURIER. License, not freedom.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, license is the better word. I remember once hearing Prévôt Paradol speaking in English in London, and I have often observed that one will use with more precision a language which is not his own native language than another, and, therefore, I sometimes feel how nicely and admirably the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) selects the words of that tongue which I speak myself a little off-hand and somewhat imperfectly. Well, as I was saying, the liquor was brought in wholesale. I was in one of the towns in which that took place. I said to one of my friends: "You tell me liquor is sold here?" He said: "Yes, it is sold in this place, and in that place, and those who are known, and are known not to be detectives and not to be standing in with the police, can get it." I said: "How can they get it in?" He said: "Oh, they bring it in from Montana, they bury it and then some fine moonlight night they go out with a buckboard and bring it in." That shows how prohibition would work in the Territories. If it had been sought to thoroughly carry it out, we could have decided the question as to whether it was possible to work a prohibitory liquor law. I do not think myself it could have worked very well. As to the permits which have been given, I do not think that they have greatly helped the matter, one way or the other, and I must say that, as to what is called "Royal's 4 per cent. beer," I do not think the effects have been so serious as my hon. friend who introduced this question has stated. I think before that system was introduced, there was just as much surreptitious selling of liquor as there is to-day, and I do not think there is a larger sale of strong intoxicants since the 4 per cent. beer has been introduced than there was before, but, of course, I am not in a position to speak as to that.

Mr. JAMIESON. I am informed there is more sold in your own town.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I have not noticed it. There are some of my friends who are in the town at present, and they have not informed me in regard to it, but things may have changed since I left. Perhaps the absence of my example may have injured the morality of the town. I rose merely because I wished to make these few desultory remarks. Of course, what I say on the subject is said by a man who has been observing the matter as it has taken place, and I do not think it would have been right for me to allow the question to go by without making these remarks, because it is calculated to illustrate a circle of questions which belong to the Territories. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) spoke of the vote. There is no doubt that there is a strong desire all over the North-West Territories to have a vote taken on this subject in order to see whether the people there wish to have prohibition or not. What they say is: Give us a chance, and if the teetotalers vote in favor of prohibition we will have to be content, and the teetotalers say the same thing on the other side. The members of the Assembly were, as my hon. friend expressed it, pledged at one time to this course, but, now, the members of the Assembly have sent a memorial to the Government of Canada upon it, and I was glad to hear one remark of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) when he used a word which is not often used in this House, a word which is often used in Great Britain, a word which goes to the very basis of parliamentary institutions, and that is the word "control." The first idea of Parliament in England was that of controlling the affairs of the country, and controlling the action of the Executive. It is our business here to control everything, to sift everything, to test everything, and, if this is a matter which should be enquired into, it is a very proper matter for the hon. gentlemen to move in and for us to discuss. I, therefore, say to this Parliament that the representatives in that Assembly of the North-West, elected almost by manhood suffrage, for constituencies which exclude no part of the Territories, as some parts were excluded before, have themselves expressed the opinion and the strong desire of the people that the opinion of the people should be taken on this subject by plebiscite, as we understand, or that power should be given to them to deal with the question themselves. If that power is given to them, it should be on the condition that they would not act on the power until they should have gone before their constituents and consulted them upon it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not know that I would have risen at all in reference to this matter if my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) had not said that the late Minister of Finance had taken to himself the credit for having dealt with this question. If my hon. friend looks at the Statutes of 1874, he will see that chapter 7 deals with this subject, and that Act was put on the Statute book by the Mackenzie Administration. If he compares that Act with the law as it now stands, he will see that the provisions then made were much more stringent than those in force at present, and that they leave no room to doubt the intention of Parliament at that time. The hon. gentleman who has introduced the motion to the House has informed the House as to the propriety of leaving this question to the people of the North-West Territories, and my hon. friend from the North-West who has just taken his seat has spoken in the same line; but a few evenings ago both the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) and the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) had an opportunity to leave this question to be decided upon by the whole of the people of the Dominion, and neither of them voted for that course. Both of them seem to think that it is more fitting that the people of the North-West should choose for themselves in that matter than that the whole people of the Dominion of Canada should. I do not agree with those hon. gentlemen. It is rather singular, and I think they would have some difficulty in satisfying the House and the country that what was a proper course to adopt in regard to the North-West Territories in this particular, was an improper course to adopt with regard to the Dominion at large.

Mr. DAVIN. If I may correct my hon. friend, I would say this, that in stating what the Legislative Assembly did, I did not say that I approved of the plebiscite; I approved of giving them the power of dealing with the question, and then letting them go to their constituents.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not going to argue the question with the hon. gentleman as to the best mode of taking the opinion of the country upon a question of this sort. This House has expressed its opinion in favor of the abstract proposition of temperance, it gives as a reason for not adopting that opinion which it has expressed that the law would be inoperative if the public opinion of the country did not sustain it after it was upon the Statute-book. That, being the case, it seems to me that the question of prohibition is taken out of the class of questions of mere policy in dealing with this subject, and is left to rest upon the moral support of the country at large. When Parliament proposed to refer a question of this sort to the country in order that the people may have an opportunity of saying whether it shall come into operation or not, Parliament has already pronounced its opinion upon the question and approved of it. It says that while we approve of this course being adopted, we at the same time admit that the law would be inoperative, unless public opinion sustained it; and a vote is wanted not for the purpose of deciding as to whether the principle is sound in itself, but whether it is expedient, and whether it would, if adopted, be sustained by the country at large. For that purpose it seems to me that a plebiscite is a more direct and a more efficient mode of ascertaining the opinion of the nation than the indirect and remote method of a general appeal to the country through a representative assembly. But I rose more particularly for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the original provisions of law, and as to the policy adopted. That policy has been well understood; it was to prohibit the sale of intoxicants in the North-West Territories as a beverage, it was to prevent their use by the community. It was well known that we had a large Indian population there, who would become a dangerous population if the free use of intoxicants were permitted amongst them; and in order to give security to the white population, and to encourage the colonisation and settlement of that country, it was believed to be in the public interest that the exclusion of intoxicants as a beverage should be the policy of the country in that territory. That policy was not only acquiesced in but it was approved by both sides of the House, and hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, then sitting on this side, sanctioned that policy, and they have never yet intimated that they proposed to alter it, or to depart from it in any particular. Although the statement is less clearly drawn and the principle is less clearly expressed in the law as it now stands, it seems to me that it will admit of but one construction, and that is that there was to be no licenses for the sale of intoxicants in the North-West Territories. There were to be permits given to persons who were thus enabled to bring it in for special purposes, medicinal and manufacturing purposes, and when it was brought in they were not at liberty to sell it except to those persons and in the way authorised. The Lieutenant Governor was not authorised to permit the manufacture of intoxicants in that territory, that was left to the Governor General in Council. That being the case, the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories has undertaken to establish a license system there, I do not care how strict that system may be, he is adopting a policy at variance with the spirit and intention of the law, and one for which not only he but the Government here are responsible. He is the officer of this Government, he is subject to the policy of Parliament expressed in this Act. He is in the same sense an officer of this Government that His Excellency is, who, besides being Governor General, is an Imperial officer; and if he violates the law, if he acts upon any principle contrary to the policy and the spirit of the law, he is responsible for his conduct, and the Administration here as well as the officer himself are responsible. Well, Sir, it is rather surprising to observe the present conduct of the hon. Minister who now has resting upon him the important and responsible duties of the Department of Finance, who was at one time the apostle of temperance beyond almost any other hon. gentleman who sat in Parliament, who several years ago declared that the country was ripe for prohibitory legislation; he was not prepared to sustain a government that did not support the principle of prohibition, he regarded it as one absolutely necessary for the moral advancement and the moral elevation of the people of this country. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman has entirely fallen from that high position; he no longer occupies the high moral ground that he did before he became a member of the Administration. The hon. gentleman a few years ago, before he entered the Government, would not for a moment sustain a proposition which declared that the public opinion of this country was not ripe for prohibition; he would hardly have voted down the proposition to appeal to the country to ascertain what the public opinion was upon this particular question. . . But the hon. gentleman has not only done those things that he ought not to have done; but he has also become a party to the opening of the North-West to the sale of intoxicants as a beverage, a condition of things that did not exist before he became a member of the Administration. Now, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman, since he has had light, ought to have explained to the House how it was that he has arrived at the conclusion that the views which he formerly entertained, were erroneous; how he has reached the conclusion that the North-West may be safely opened to the sale of intoxicants; how it is that those who were not permitted to import, are now authorised to import, that those who were not permitted to sell, are now authorised to sell? Then let me say, Mr. Speaker, further, that I do not think that the Minister of the Interior can escape responsibility in the way that he has suggested, with regard to the sale of intoxicants within the Banff Park. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman's predecessor told this House that the object of this Rocky Mountain Act was to take that territory out of the control of the Government of the North-West Territories and to put it under the control of the Government here. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Act he will see the second section says: "The said tract of land is hereby reserved and set apart as a public park," &c. Then in sub-section e of section 4, we find these words: "The park shall be under the control and management of the Minister of Interior and the Governor in Council, who may make regulations for the following purposes: Trade, traffic of every description." Does the hon. gentleman propose to submit to Council regulations for "trade and traffic of every description"? The trade and traffic in intoxicants is not a traffic of every description, but of one description. It is one embraced in the general proposition "every description," and if the Governor in Council and the Minister of the Interior can make regulations for trade and traffic of every description, there is no description of trade and traffic that remains to be regulated by the Lieutenant Governor of the Territories.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Would he not have power to issue any permit?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think not. This power was given to him for a purpose, and he must exercise it in accordance with the policy of the law. He exercises that power under the direction of the Government whose officer he is and to whom he is responsible, just as the Government is responsible to Parliament, if he neglects his duty or adopts a policy contrary to law. It is, therefore, inconsistent that, so far as Banff Park is concerned, any portion of that power should remain with the Lieutenant Governor. The Governor in Council regulates trade and traffic of every description. If they do, they can say that the sale of intoxicants shall there be prohibited. If they are prohibited, what becomes of the power of the Lieutenant Governor to grant permits? Surely they can say the Lieutenant Governor shall not grant permits in that territory. They regulate trade and traffic of every description, and in doing so they exclude every power whatever remaining to the Lieutenant Governor. I think what the mover of the resolution and the seconder of the resolution have stated is perfectly correct, and that the Government are highly censurable for the course which they have permitted their officer to take in the North-West Territory. Every Lieutenant Governor in the Territories is subject to instructions. The business of the Government is to issue to him instructions. They are to state upon what terms and conditions those powers with which he is entrusted shall be exercised, and he is as much subject to control and instructions as the Governor of any British Colony is subject to the instructions given to him with his commission, and further as to how his powers have to be exercised by him.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman has failed to point out in what particular the law of 1874 was more restrictive than the law now on the Consolidated Statutes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman will read sub-section 2, chapter 7, 37 Victoria, I think he will find out.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. gentleman will read, and it would have been fair to the House if he had read that subsection, he would have found out that the power to enforce either the sale or manufacture could be exercised by special permission of the Lieutenant-Governor, and under the present law it states that that can only be done by Order in Council, and the permission to sell be given by the Lieutenant Governor. So, really, the Lieutenant Governor under the law placed on the Statute-book, when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was a member of the Government, was given much greater power than he now possesses under the Consolidated Statutes.

Mr. LAURIER. You gave more limited powers, but you allowed the evasion of them.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman has made a statement that is not warranted by the facts. He has made a statement which I am quite sure, if he knew the facts, he would not have made.

Mr. LAURIER. Give us the facts.

Mr. BOWELL. When a gentleman makes a charge against another he has to prove it.

Mr. KIRK. What the Minister rose to correct was the statement that Sir Charles Tupper claimed to be the author of that law.

Mr. BOWELL. He said a great deal more than that.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Statutes of 1874 were simply an amendment of 1873. If the hon. gentleman will look at chapter 39, section 13, he will find that all the provisions which are embodied in the Statute of 1874 extended to Manitoba and the North-West, and the Act of 1874 simply continued those powers.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12:25 a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 12th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORTS—PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That as the time for the reception of reports from Committees on Private Bills will expire on Thursday next, 14th inst., the same be extended until Thursday, 28th inst., in accordance with the recommendation contained in the sixth report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 105) further to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act. He said: The object of this Bill is, in the first place, to make provision for the class of cases in which a judge who has been appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada has been interested in a cause, to the extent of having heard it in the court below, and the Bill provides that, in that case, four judges of the Supreme Court may constitute a quorum. There is also a provision enabling an appeal to be taken for assessment purposes from the Province of British Columbia, when the appeal involves a sum which the House will fix.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COOK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 106) to amend the Civil Service Act. He said: This Bill is a very simple and a very short one. It provides that Canadians shall have the preference for appointments in the Civil Service; that foreigners, or even those from the British Islands, shall not be placed at an advantage over Canadians, that is, native-born Canadians, who we claim have the right to the first place in the Civil Service of this country. At all events, the Bill provides that a man shall be a resident of the country for five years before he can enter the Civil Service. In introducing this Bill, I am only carrying out the principle adopted by this Government in 1878, when they declared their policy to be "Canada for the Canadians," but I regret to say that, in this particular, they have not followed the dictates of their consciences, or of their utterances. I am now proposing to put this on a footing which will not allow them to have the option.

Mr. BERGIN. Is there any chance for an Irishman under this Bill?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has no Irishmen in his constituency.

Mr. COOK. I have plenty of them, and they all vote for me.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They will not after this Bill is proposed.

Mr. BERGIN. After this, no Irish need apply.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster: That Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). Since I have had the privilege of a seat in this House, which is now for the seventh Session, strange to say I have always found that for one or two weeks of the Session the House has been transformed into something akin to an Irish wake. You will all know what that means, when I tell you that the chief mourners and the professional mourners vie with each other as to the volubility and dolefulness of their lamentations. Judging the hon. member who spoke the other night from this standard, I would say he is entitled to promotion, which would bring him down from his present seat, and place him beside the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House appear to have usurped the office of the traditional Banshee, whose privilege it was to sit upon the curbstones of the house and torment and alarm the inhabitants within, by his wails and cries of lamentation, prognosticating all kinds of mischief and all kinds of alarm. Now, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen have gone on year after year, since I have had a seat in this House, and during all this time I have looked up and down this country from one end to the other, I have searched the public records, and I am unable to find a corpse which called for these lamentations; nay, Mr. Speaker, I have not even found a sick patient. I have found some whom these hon. gentlemen have, by their persuasive eloquence in this House, almost convinced that they were commercially ill, but when I applied the unerring test of illness or health, I have found at all times that no disease was existing within their system. Now, this being the case, and hon. gentlemen, by the elections of 1882, and by the elections of 1887, having been told in the most unmistakable way that there was no commercial sickness in this country, I think it is high time that they should give up these lamentations, that they should give up this wailing, that they should give up this bemoaning the condition of their country, and join with us in praises and laudations of this land of our birth, or of our adoption. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) told us that had the colonies of British North America been sufficiently associated with the other colonies in 1774-5-6, they would, in all probability, have been a part of the great American Republic to-day. I can tell the hon. gentleman that had we then had a voice in what took place at that time, there would have been no separation from the British Empire by the colonies of those days. I can tell the hon. gentleman that it was but by a very small majority that the colonies of New England at that time separated from the British Empire, and the voice of this little and insignificant land, as he chooses to call it, would have decided the question the other way. I think, Sir, it is a pity, from this view of the case, that we had not a voice at that time in deciding the action of the colonies; it is a pity for the Americans, too, because had they not separated from England at that time, they would to-day have been rejoicing in the glorious traditions of the history of that great Empire, the greatest the world has yet seen, or, perhaps, ever will see. Now, Sir, the hon. member for North Norfolk must give us credit, at all events, for being a most magnanimous people. I have been at elections and attended election meetings on the other side of the border. I have the privilege of living on the border, and, Sir, no man in the United States, free as they choose to call it, would dare to make the utterances against his country that the hon. member for North Norfolk has made. They would give him about five minutes to pack his grip-sack and emigrate. Now, Sir, that hon. gentleman says that they have pinned unrestricted reciprocity to the masthead, and they are going to stick to it. Let me give him the opinion of a man who has been, and is now, very high in the counsels of their party, a man whose political opinion, from the Reform standpoint at least, is not only worthy of notice, but is worthy of a great deal of credence, and worthy of much attention. I will read the opinions of this gentleman who inspired, if he did not write, this article, on the 31st of January last, in the Galt Reformer, in the town of Galt, that place of active business, that place of Scotch loyalty, in the centre of the county of Waterloo, and I read it as a warning for the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Livingston) to trim his sails that they may not be shattered at the next election. It says, after quoting the Globe, denying that the hon. leader of the Opposition had abandoned the policy of "Unrestricted Reciprocity:"

"But we do hesitate to say that a large section of the Liberal party would have been glad to learn that it was true. * * * It surely must be apparent to every clear-sighted Reformer, that 'Unrestricted Reciprocity,' apart from its merits or demerits, is quite impracticable, at least at present. * * * We have long felt and now consider it our duty to say it, that for the Liberal party to go on crying for what the Americans bluntly and sometimes insultingly tell us they won't grant, appears to us a weak political position, at variance with the natural spirit of our people, and certain to land us in a false and unpopular position. * * * As a Liberal journal we regard it as our duty to state frankly that public opinion, as we find it, regards Unrestricted Reciprocity as impracticable, * * * and the sooner our party leaders recognise the fact, the sooner will they be able to enlist popular sympathy in the overturn of Tory misgovernment."

Now, Sir, that is the opinion of one of the most prominent Reformers in this country, a man who never yet, on any question, has wavered in his allegiance to his party. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this clearly shows that, in the estimation of the thinking men of this country, the Liberal party are now further away from their duty to their country than they have ever been before in its history. Now, Sir, I desire to deal with some figures given by the hon. member for North Norfolk. Hon. gentlemen opposite spend the whole year ransacking blue-books, for the purpose of gathering up something to throw in the teeth of this House, in the teeth of the people, derogatory to their country; so it is difficult for us to ransack the blue-books and journals for the purpose of correcting their figures, and I may here say, that in nearly every instance the figures are not given as they ought to be given, truthfully and candidly to the House and the country. Now, I make a quotation from the speech of the hon. gentleman, where he says that Canada produced in 1881, $309,676,000 worth of goods; the United States, in 1880, produced $5,369,000,000 worth of goods. Other industries—and this is what I desire the House to remember, because this speech will go to the people of this country, it will go to the people of the

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland).

United States, and to the people of England. And let me say here, that I think it is a pity, and something that ought to be corrected by our Government, that the telegraph lines of this country are owned and controlled by a gentleman who propagates these seditious words to the people of this country, and to the people of the world. This gentleman is Mr. Wiman—I mention his name, and perhaps the word seditious is too strong, but you can use a milder term—he sends these words and the speeches throughout the length and breadth of America, I am told, free of charge; and the contradictions that are made from year to year by us on this side of the House, have to be paid for, and if they are sent, are sent in a garbled condition. Other industries in the United States, according to Mulhall, amount to £2,281,000,000 sterling. I have Mulhall, and I will show that that amount is the whole trade and wealth of the United States; it includes manufactures, transportation, commerce and agriculture, everything in fact, and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) gave it as a little side issue. I desire to give the facts from Mulhall, the very authority from which the hon. gentleman derived his information, and I think I will show to the House that the hon. gentleman, by a slip of the tongue, or from a desire to misrepresent this country, made an error, and certainly did misrepresent it. Mulhall distinctly states that the figures expressed in million pounds, are showing the aggregate business of the United States to be £2,281,000,000; agriculture, £604,000,000; manufactures, £1,112,000,000; commerce, £313,000,000; and transportation, £252,000,000; which gives a gross aggregate of £2,281,000,000; which the hon. gentleman gave as a little side show on the part of the United States. The hon. gentleman gave the House also, and I will take the hon. gentleman's own figures, although I believe accurate statements would show differently—and unfortunately for this country we have not a bureau of statistics from which we can obtain statistics—as the annual operations of Canada, £167,000,000. I desire the House to pay attention to these figures, because it is desirable that they should be correct. The hon. gentleman desires to show that the United States has advanced and progressed at an inordinate rate as compared with Canada. I take the hon. gentleman's own figures, £2,281,000,000 as the aggregate output of the United States for 1881, and £167,000,000 as the aggregate output of Canada. When you take those together you multiply £167,000,000 by 13½, and you obtain a sum equal to the aggregate output of the United States. Do hon. gentlemen not see that the population of the United States being twelve times as great as this country, the amount of business done by them is only thirteen and a half times more than ours, according to their own showing? I leave that fact in the hands of the House, simply stating that, in my opinion, it is a good showing. Leaving that point, which I think will be satisfactory to every lover of this country, at all events, I will go on a little further. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated that the United States had doubled its business, wealth and population in 25 years. The figures which he quoted with respect to Canada, £167,000,000, were those of the condition of the country when we had enjoyed only one year of the National Policy, while the United States had enjoyed thirteen years of its protective policy. But if the hon. gentleman will allow us to continue, if he will cease decrying this country, we will, in the space of 25 years, I undertake to say, under the National Policy, double our population, and double our resources, and double our output. But it is difficult to do so, because we have enemies to contend with in this country who are not found in the United States; we have enemies within the country, while they have only enemies without, and one enemy within the ranks is worse for the country than a thousand enemies without. I dealt with the whole question of our markets very fully last year, and I showed that Buffalo is no market for Canadians; that Rochester is no market for Canadians, for it is supplied by the Genesee valley; that Albany, situated at the outlet of the Erie Canal, where everything can be sent from Chicago and the west at lower prices than they can be sent from Ontario, is no market for Canadians; that Detroit is no market, flooded as it is with the products of Michigan. How can Cleveland be a market for Canada, when the city is flooded with overflowing exports from the west? How can Chicago, which has been mentioned by the hon. gentleman, be a market for Canadians? It cannot, and this must be evident to every honorable man in this House or out of it, both in this country and in the United States. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) referred to the reduced price of farm lands in New York State, and apologised for it and gave reasons therefor. Would he spend as much time and exercise as much talent in explaining a similar point in regard to Canada? Would the hon. gentleman come to the rescue and endeavor to prove that the farm lands of Canada had fallen in price for good and substantial reasons? No, he would not do it. We do not object to hon. gentlemen opposite crying for unrestricted reciprocity, if they will do it fairly; but when they decry this country we are bound to object, not only on the floor of this House, but throughout the country. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Chaulion) had changed his mind since 1876, and that was a sign of greatness. I wish the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) would give us that sign just now. I propose to show to this House that the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite is based entirely upon false premises. The premises upon which they based their argument is that we are in a destitute condition and gradually and rapidly growing worse, that no country has prospered but the United States, and for that reason we should become a part of the United States. I propose to show that we have kept pace with the United States, and this notwithstanding the cries that have been raised with respect to the exodus. In doing so I will use figures and statistics that can be obtained by any hon. gentleman. The following figures show these facts:—

Prince Edward Island.....	94,021	108,891	15½ per cent.
Nova Scotia .....	387,800	440,572	13 "
New Brunswick.....	285,594	321,233	12 "
Maritime Provinces.....	767,415	870,696	13 "
State of Maine.....	1870. 626,915	1880. 648,936	Increase. 3 per cent.
Quebec.....	1871. 1,191,516	1881. 1,359,027	14 per cent.
Vermont and New Hampshire..	1870. 648,881	1880. 679,277	4 per cent.
New England States.....	1870. 3,487,924	1880. 4,010,529	14½ per cent.
Quebec and Maritime Provinces	1871. 1,958,931	1881. 2,229,723	14 per cent.
State of New York.....	1870. 4,382,759	1880. 5,082,871	15 per cent.
Ontario.....	1871. 1,620,851	1881. 1,923,228	18½ per cent.
Manitoba.....	1871. 18,995	1881. 65,954	247 per cent.
Minnesota .....	1870. 439,708	1880. 780,773	77½ per cent.

I am unable to make comparisons with respect to the North-West, because nearly all the population of the North-West Territories have gone in there within the last three, four or five years since the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I undertake to say that the North-West Territories have grown space with any territory there is to the south of them. I will now compare the increase of Toronto and a few other cities, with that of cities in the United States. From 1871 to 1881, Toronto increased 54 per cent., from 1870 to 1880, Rochester increased 43 per cent.; Buffalo 31 per cent., Detroit 46 per cent. During the last eight years Toronto has increased 92 per cent.; Chicago, from 1870 to 1880, increased 68 per cent., Boston has increased 44 per cent., and Montreal 31 per cent. Montreal in the last eight years has increased 62 per cent; Ottawa, from 1881 to 1886, increased 35½ per cent., London increased 32 per cent., Hamilton increased 16½ per cent., and the town of Galt increased 80 per cent. within 7 years. I would take the population of Quebec from so far back as 1812 and show that from that period to 1880, the Province has kept pace in every particular with the United States.

The population of the Province of Quebec in 1812 was.....	225,000
do do Ontario in 1812 was.....	75,000
Total in 1812.....	300,000
Population of Quebec, 1880, was.....	1,359,027
do Ontario, 1880, was.....	1,913,228
Total.....	3,272,255
(Almost 11 fold.)

I shall give figures to prove still further that Canada is progressing and prospering, and that it is progressing and prospering at a ratio that is not exceeded even by the land to the south of us. The hon. the Minister of Finance dealt somewhat with this the other night, but I wish to cull out a few statistics and give them in a concise form to the House.

The amount of life insurance in Canada—and Mulhall says that there is no truer test of the prosperity of a people than the amount of life insurance they take, and there is no higher authority than Mulhall—

The amount of life insurance at risk in Canada, 1880, was... $ 90,280,293 do do do 1887, was... 191,679,852
(Increase, 112 per cent.)

Now, if life insurance is a true and proper test of the progress, prosperity and advancement of a country, what better increase does one want than 112 per cent. in the space of 7 years. The number of tons of freight handled by Canadian roads increased from 9,938,000 in 1880, to 16,000,000 tons in 1887, or an increase of 67 per cent. in 7 years. The number of passengers carried on Canadian rail ways increased from 6,000,000 in 1880, to 10,000,000 in 1887, an increase of 63 per cent. in 7 years. What further evidence do you want of the progress of this country, and what more rapid progress does any candid man ask for than an increase of 60 to 112 per cent. in the short space of 7 years. I propose to show you that the United States is not the only country that was prosperous during the last few years, and in fact that they have scarcely kept pace with other nations in the march of progress. The United States have fallen far short in many essential elements of progress and prosperity. They have hoarded up their means, they have put the money in their coffers at Washington; and by doing this they have failed, as I said before, in some of the most important and essential elements of national greatness and national prosperity. I will prove this from Mulhall's "Progress of the World," and I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will examine this work. At pages 45 and 46, under the head of "Commerce and Shipping," we find in 1830 the United Kingdom has £88,000,000 sterling, and in 1878, £601,000,000, or, in 50 years the increase was seven-fold. The British Colonies have increased in commerce and shipping fourteen and a half fold; France has increased nine-fold, Germany eight-fold, and the great land of promise, the United States, only six and a half fold. Why, Sir, the United States have increased at only one-half the rate that Canada and the other British Colonies have increased. Now, Sir, I will take the figures further and continue to compare the rate of increase in other countries. Russia has increased five and a half fold in 50 years; Austria, thirteen-fold; South America, seven-fold; Italy, nine-fold; Scandinavia, eight-fold; Turkey, in the east, six-fold; Spain and Portugal, three and a half fold, and the Low Countries, nine-fold; so that of the important countries, in commerce and shipping, there are nine that have a greater ratio of increase than the United States, and only three countries lower than the United States; yet hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the great prosperity of that country.

Countries.	1830.	1878.	Increase.

At page 50, in Mulhall's "Progress of the World," we find between 1868 and 1879 that the shipping and tonnage of the following countries have increased at this rate:

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland)

British Empire.....	27 per cent.
United States.....	4 "
Scandinavia.....	50 "
Italy.....	58 "
Germany.....	14 "
Spain.....	85 "
France.....	1 "

And the United States stand at the bottom of the list, except France. It is easy for those people to have hundreds of millions of dollars in their coffers, while other nations are laying out their surplus in productive commerce and shipping.

Mr. KIRK. How much has Canada increased in shipping?

An hon. MEMBER. Read it up for yourself.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). If the hon. gentleman will seek a little information he will change from that side of the House in less than five minutes, if he is candid, and he will be over here sitting beside me supporting the Government, whose policy has tended to the progress and prosperity of the country. I want to give, also, to the House, the percentage of the aggregate industries.

Mr. KIRK. What about the shipping of Canada?

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). If you are uncomfortable, Sir, you will be more so before I am through; I would advise you to get your seat cooled off a little. Now, I want to show the aggregate annual value of the different industries. Hon. gentlemen opposite jeer and sneer at manufacturers. The only people who have their particular protection are the farmers. Well, Sir, I represent a farming constituency, and they might bring the whole host of them to be candidates against me, and they could not elect one of them. I am essentially a farmers' representative, but I recognise that it is just as important to the farmer to have a market, as it is to raise his grain. But hon. gentlemen opposite scoff at every industry but that of farming. Now, I want to show you the value of agricultural industries in comparison with the value of manufacturing and other industries. We will take first the United States, and I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite will accept that country's condition as a most unerring guide to their conclusions on all matters of this kind;—I am taking the year 1881:

	U. S. Value.	Canada Value.
Agriculture.....	$2,935,000,000	$323,000,000
Manufactures.....	5,404,000,000	$318,600,000
Add Raw Material.....		153,300,000
		469,900,000

You will also find by these figures that the product of agriculture in Canada amounts to one-ninth of that of the United States, while their population is twelve times greater than ours. Now, that is an important fact. We find that manufactures in the United States are only thirteen times greater than they are in Canada, after enjoying a Protective Policy for thirteen years, while we enjoyed it only one year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Enjoyed?

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). Yes, enjoyed; and I can tell the hon. gentleman that the country to which he points, and upon which his own thoughts are expended, has grown to greatness under a protective policy. Now, the value of the aggregate annual industries of the world amounts to $50,456,000,000, which is made up as follows:—

Agriculture.....	$18,135,000,000
Manufactures.....	18,604,000,000
Commerce.....	11,644,000,000
Transport.....	4,072,000,000

We find that manufactures stand at the head of the list; and still these hon. gentlemen ridicule manufacturers, and call them all kinds of nasty names. Now, Sir, the percentage of agriculture to the gross industry in different countries is as follows:—

Russia.....	54 per cent.
Spain.....	47 "
Austria.....	46 "
Italy.....	42 "
Australia.....	36 "
Germany.....	34 "
Canada.....	34 "
France.....	33 "
United States.....	26 "
United Kingdom.....	14 "

From this we see that the higher the condition of civilisation, prosperity and progress, the lower is the percentage of agriculture. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House talk about our national debt. I want to show you, as the hon. Minister of Finance pointed out the other night, that our national debt has been brought about by expenditures upon productive public works in this country. I want to show you that the United States, with all its prosperity, its greatness and its population, has expended very little upon productive public works, while we have spent a great deal. By the American Almanac—that red book which, I have no doubt, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has in his desk—you will find that the United States, from the year 1779 to the year 1879, or one century, have expended the following sums on public works :

Railways.....	$ 84,627,181
Rivers and Harbors.....	66,209,118
Canals.....	9,197,473
Public Buildings.....	115,364,928
Total.....	$275,398,700

Equal to $5.50 per head of the population of 1880. Now, the expenditure of Canada on public works in 20 years, since Confederation, has been as follows :—

Railways.....	$97,056,433
Canals.....	29,876,800
Public Buildings.....	10,418,390
Public Works.....	11,547,019
Total.....	$148,898,622

Add expenditure prior to Confederation :

Railways and Canals.....	$52,944,175
Public Works.....	10,690,917
Total.....	$212,533,714

Equal to $42.50 per head of a population of 5,000,000, as against $5.50 per head in the United States. These public works have given employment to our people, and the money is in the country, and has been spent here. The digging out of the Welland Canal in the earlier days of this country furnished ready money to the immigrant who came to this country; and the building of all these canals and railways, the opening up and developing of this country, has been productive, is productive, and will be more productive in the future. Now, with regard to the United States as a market, I want to show you what is a most remarkable fact, that if the United States furnished an advantageous market to the people of this country from 1854 to 1866, that advantage has disappeared, and I will show you why. The reason is that the producing power of the people of the United States has increased at a greater and more rapid ratio than has their consuming power. The consuming power of the United States, as indicated by the increase of its population from 1860 to 1880, has only increased 56 per cent., while its producing power has increased, in wheat 333 per cent., in corn 450 per cent., in bacon and hams 443 per cent., in cheese 333 per cent., and in wood and manufactures of wood 65 per cent. So that, if that country was of any value to us as a market during the twelve years of reciprocity, that value has disappeared by reason of the fact that their producing power has increased so enormously over their consuming power. Now, Sir, let us see what the imports and exports of the United States were in 1887:—I take the figures from the report of the Ontario Bureau of Statistics. I do not vouch for their correctness, beyond that I think hon. gentlemen opposite will take them as being correct. In 1887, the exports of Canada to the United States, and of the United States to Canada, stood as follows :—

	Canada Exports to U. S.	U. S. Exports to Canada.
Mines.....	$ 3,085,431	$ 4,460,260
Fisheries.....	2,717,509	156,909
Animals and their Produce.....	7,291,369	7,071,498
Agricultural Products.....	7,969,716	12,342,800
Manufactures.....	1,285,584	7,159,115
The Forest.....	$22,349,600	$31,180,682
	8,545,306	1,070,589
	$30,895,006	$32,250,771

With the forest included we furnish the United States with a market for $1,355,765 more than they furnish us. Leaving the products of the forest out, we find that we furnish the United States with a market for $8,830,982 more than they furnish us; but still these people say we must seek a market in the United States. I propose to deal with the question of reciprocity from 1854 to 1866. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says the reciprocity treaty was unfair to the Americans, and that we can never expect to get another treaty like it. Now, I want, from an authority they will not question, to convince those hon. gentlemen of the contrary. I intend to quote the late Hon. George Brown, who was as strong an opponent of the right hon. the First Minister as any member in this House can ever expect to be, but though an opponent in politics of the right hon. gentleman, the hon. George Brown was loyal and patriotic to his country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He is dead now.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). When the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is dead, I do not think any hon. gentleman will be found to use similar language with regard to him. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the whole Reciprocity Treaty was unfavorable to the United States and favorable to Canada, and I will just weary the House with a quotation which will show the opinion of the late Hon. George Brown on that subject. You will find it in the proposed treaty which he offered in 1874 :

“An impartial examination of the commercial relations between the British North America Provinces and the United States for the past fifty years cannot fail to establish beyond all doubt that the traffic between them has been valuable to both countries, but that the United States has from first to last reaped the largest advantage from it.”

That is from the mouth of the Hon. George Brown, and I will just give you some of the figures :

From 1821 to 1832 the United States exported to the British North America Provinces—
Domestic products.....	$30,997,417

Foreign do.....	22,020,254

From Canada to the United States..... $71,092,514

Let us see what the late Hon. George Brown said still further:

"To obtain a just appreciation of the value of the traffic between the two countries during the operation of the treaty, it is necessary to keep in mind that the civil war in the States in the last four years of the treaty's existence enhanced the value of commodities, and so deranged the industrial interests of the Republic as to give the Provinces a temporary advantage in the traffic, forbidding any fair deduction from it as to the ordinary course of trade in times of peace."

This is in answer to the hon. gentlemen who say we got higher prices. I denied that and proved last Session that we did not. I took the four years when the world was at peace, when prices were not enhanced by domestic or foreign wars: I took 1858, 1859, 1860 and 1861 as a period of four years, during the existence of the treaty, and 1863, 1869, 1870 and 1871 as a period of four years during the non-existence of the treaty, and I shall show the House that the people of Canada realised larger prices for agricultural products during the latter period than during the former. The late Mr. Brown indicates here most clearly that we derived a temporary advantage because of the four years' war. Again Mr. Brown said:

"And notwithstanding the anomalous character of the circumstances arising from the existence of the civil war during so considerable a portion of the treaty's existence by which the imports from the Provinces were greatly increased in volume and value, and the exports to the Provinces as naturally reduced in quantity, the balance of trade during the existence of the treaty was largely in favor of the United States."

During the existence of the treaty, the British North America Provinces purchased from the United States $346,180,264, and the United States purchased from us only $325,726,520, leaving a balance in favor of the United States of $20,454,246. The total export of the United States from 1854 to 1863, during the existence of the treaty, was $4,000,000,000. Of this England and her possessions took $2,769,974,538, or nearly 70 per cent. of the whole. In those days England and her colonies were the great market for the people of the United States, and today England and her colonies are equally the great market for the Americans. The prices in Liverpool and London control and are the true barometer of prices, and the United States have to seek a market in England and on the continent just as we have. Talk about our getting a market there. I would ask any hon. gentleman what is the use of going to a farmer who has 400 bushels of wheat in his granary, to sell him 5 bushels more? He would tell us: I have more wheat than I know what to do with. I must find a market for my wheat, and if I buy from you, you must take enough off the price to enable me to export it. That is the exact position of the United States market. They boast of their manufactures. That very boast ought to show these hon. gentlemen that they have not a market and never can have a market for the products of Canada. During this period, Canada took more from the United States than any country in the world except France; and leaving out France, Spain and Germany, Canada took more than all the rest of the world. I will go on to show the character of the commodities taken by us from the United States during the existence of the treaty:

Animals and their product.....	$ 35,433,213
Breadstuffs.....	112,058,473
Other farm products.....	3,242,982
Timber.....	8,511,488
Manufactures.....	88,649,855
Miscellaneous.....	24,044,977
<hr/>
Home productions.....	$271,940,988
Foreign commodities.....	62,379,718
Grand total taken by us.....	$334,320,706

I want to read you again, something more that the Hon. George Brown said, in reference to this treaty:

"Did nothing more, therefore, than the volume of traffic between the two countries, and the comparative contribution of each country to it, enter into the question of relative advantages derived from the treaty by each, no doubt could exist as to the United States having reaped much greater profit from the Treaty of 1854, than the Provinces. But there is another very important branch of the account. The transportation traffic sent to and brought from foreign countries by the Provinces in bond, over the railways and canals, and in the ocean ships and steamers trading from United States ports, raise to an importance, secondary only to the traffic in domestic productions, and must have drawn very large gains into the coffers of the Republic."

The Hon. George Brown further says:

"Nor was it merely the vast interchange of commodities, and the great carrying trade in bond, that the United States reaped their golden annual harvest from the Treaty of 1854.

Mark how strongly he puts it—"Their golden annual harvest from the Treaty of 1854." He goes on:

"It must not be forgotten, that the Canadian canals and River St. Lawrence were thrown open to the ships and commerce of the United States, on the same footing as to the Canadian people who had spent large sums upon them, at tolls so low as not to defray the cost of attendance and maintenance. The sole return made for this concession was the permission to navigate Lake Michigan and the promise of the United States Government to urge upon the State Authorities of the Republic to extend to us the same free use of the American canals as we had extended to them—and this promise never bore fruit."

They never kept faith with the people of this country in regard to that promise, and they did not keep faith with them in the last treaty they made. We will see what the Hon. George Brown said in regard to the repeal of that treaty, and I think that is a complete answer to the hon. gentleman. He said:

"Immediately on the repeal of the treaty, the United States imposed a heavy Customs duty on nearly all the articles imported from Canada. The Canadian Tariff was still unchanged, and a large preponderance of the exports from the United States into the Dominion are still admitted free of duty. The use of the Canadian canals and the St. Lawrence still continued, and the shore fisheries of the St. Lawrence thrown open upon payment of a small license fee."

Still, hon. gentlemen say we have dealt too harshly with, and have tried to irritate the American people. I say that, instead of the hon. gentleman having acted simply as he has done, he should have cancelled every privilege which was given to the United States, but, in order to allow them to come to their senses, those privileges were continued until 1874. The Hon. George Brown was in Washington at that time, and so little attention did the American Government pay to his mission that they did not even bring it before the Council of their nation. Mr. Brown says:

"The abrogation of the treaty led to Confederation. Gave a new and vigorous impetus to the building of railways, enlarging the canals, and to seek trade with foreign countries. These (he says) were attended with remarkable success. Only seven fiscal years have passed since the repeal of the treaty, but already the loss inflicted by it has been more than made up, and excellent outlets in new directions opened for Canadian commerce, with an increasing annual proportion of the vast carrying trade formerly done for the Provinces by the railways, canals and steamships of the Republic transferred to Canadian hands."

This is the voice of the late Hon. George Brown in 1874, when all these things were fresh in his mind, and when he gave a candid and honest expression of opinion. I do not desire to detain the House any longer. I have already exceeded the proportions of the speech I intended to make to the House, but I may say, coming from a border county as I do, knowing the American people well, knowing their institutions well, I could not sit idly by and see that country lauded to the skies and the country of my birth derogated from in every particular. When I cross the Niagara River, people on the other side often quote to me speeches which have been made on the floor of Parliament here, saying, "You must be poor, destitute, and in want; though I do not see very many signs of that about you; that must be the case in the back country, though you keep up appearances on the frontier." I protest against such speeches being made in this House. One word as to the question of taxation. I happen to be a director of the Suspension Bridge, crossing the river at Niagara. Half of that bridge is in the State of New York, and half in Canada. I find that, in 1888, we paid state and municipal taxation on that bridge in New York amounting to $4,200, while we paid in Canada $2,100. That is a criterion of the difference between the taxation in Canada and in the State of New York. If hon. gentlemen will examine the matter, they will find that what I said last Session is true, that, if we submitted to the same rate of taxation as the people of the United States do, we would pay off that little debt of ours in a very short time. In 1886, the State of New York raised for State purposes $9,512,813, on a population of five million people, which would be equal to about $1.70 a head. Hon. gentlemen will find that the taxation in that country for municipal purposes, to keep up roads, bridges and other things of that kind, is not less than our total taxation for all we need in this country. For foreign goods, our people need not pay any taxes at all, and, as a matter of fact, very few of the working people of this country buy these foreign goods, so that all the taxes they pay are practically the municipal taxes for keeping up their sidewalks, their roads, their bridges, and so on. The amount they pay in the State of New York for municipal purposes alone is about equal to the whole taxation of the people of Canada. Then, if the tariff is taken as a rate of taxation—and I deny that it is—I want to show that the tariff of the United States is proportionately much higher. Nearly everyone here knows what it is, and especially those who live near the frontier. You will find Mr. Wm. L. Scott, in the House of Representatives, stating that the rate of taxation on the average of the whole dutiable goods in the United States was 65.88 per cent. of the people. Mr. Scott and Mr. Mills endeavored to reduce the average taxation to 48.30 per cent., but they did not succeed. The people of the United States knew well enough what that meant, and did not permit it. If you were to throw in the free goods, you will find that the taxation of the people of the United States, if it be taxation at all, amounts to 54.16 per cent., which is double the taxation of the people of Canada. If the workingman of Canada wants to buy an imported article, he has to pay for it, but the workingman in the United States has to pay at least twice the amount paid by the workingman in Canada. Then he has to pay the State tax. We, in Canada, furnish to the Provinces about sufficient money every year to run the machinery of their Governments, we furnish them about 80 cents per head; while the people of the United States are taxed directly, as they are in the State of New York, for State purposes. There is no man in this House or out of it who admires or respects more than I do, everything that is good in the American people, and in their institutions, and there is a great deal that is good among them. But I am not blind to their faults, I know right well that they have many faults, and amongst them is their utter disregard and disrespect for everything that is not American. They have no respect for any nation or people under the sun that is not American. Well, Mr. Speaker, this is good in a sense, and I wish the people of Canada, as a whole, had some of that spirit in them to day, for then Canada would prosper and progress more than it does. The reason the United States have progressed in the degree represented by hon. gentlemen, is that they are a loyal and a patriotic people. Let any gentleman on the floor of Congress, in the United States, get up and speak disparagingly of his country, and he would not be there five minutes; he would be put out. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will just say this much more, that we have committed to our charge a vast heritage, such a heritage as was never before given into the charge of five millions of people. We have a grand future before us. Our possibilities are great. If we would only join hands and work together to promote the best interests of this country, I would undertake to say that within the lifetime of those who are now of middle age, we would have a country unsurpassed on the face of the globe, not in population, perhaps, but certainly in resources, certainly in grandeur, and certainly in wealth.

Mr. COLTER. In a great deal that has been said on the other side of the House we have heard the charges made that we who occupy seats on this side of the House are greatly given to disparaging our country. That seems to be their main cry, but that is not the position which we assume at all. We feel that we have a grand country, we feel that we have grand opportunities before us, and when we undertake to condemn a system of government which we believe is inimical to the best interests of the country, then we are showing true patriotism and true loyalty to our country. When we review the late political history of Canada and see what great pretensions and what great promises have been made by those who occupy the Treasury benches, and compare them with the actual results, we can charge these hon. gentleman with having been untrue to the trust which the people have reposed in them. Now, they told us in 1878 that they were going to do great things for this country: they told us that they were going to give our farmers a home market for their wool, for their wheat, and for their barley; they told us that instead of having to send these commodities, which the farmers produce, to the other side of the Atlantic, and to pay freight on them, we would have a market for them all at home; we would export nothing but the manufactured products, and we would not import any manufactures whatever. They said, Why, we are importing more than we are exporting, the balance of trade is against us, a country that imports more than it exports must necessarily be growing poorer; and they said, We will adopt a policy which will bring about a glorious reform. Well, they were put in power, and since then we have found that in 1879 the balance of trade was against us. They said, Wait till the National Policy has an opportunity to show what is really in it. We came to the year 1880, and then there was a slight balance of trade in our favor, and they said, See what the great National Policy has done for us, see what great benefit it has conferred upon us; and they claimed the credit for all these things. But afterwards when they found the balance of trade going continuously against us, when they found it last year practically the same as it was in 1878, do we hear anything from them about the balance in trade? They either undertook to do what they were unable to accomplish, and they certainly professed to be able to do impossibilities, or else the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches have not been exerting themselves up to their full capacity. In either view of the case, the people have the right to charge them with being unfaithful to the trust imposed upon them, and with having deceived the people who placed them in power. We were told further that not only would we not export our raw material, but that we would export our manufactured products, and we would keep our young men at home, and we were told what great profits we would have in consequence of the export of these manufactured products. I remember hearing a very eloquent gentleman speak on that occasion when he declaimed in dulcet tones of the great benefits that were to accrue to this country. Why, he said, take a ton of ore in the raw state, and it is worth practically nothing, but convert that into watch springs, and it is worth thousands of dollars. He told us that we were going to do a great deal in this respect, we were going to manufacture at home all the products that we required for our own consumption. But we said, This is going to ruin British manufactures; they cannot export anything to us; it will injure them. What was the reply that was made? "So much the worse for British connection." But when we propose to enter into reciprocal trade with the United States, when English manufactures cannot be any worse off than they were under the policy entered into in 1878, hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that we are very disloyal. They told us, You will have manufactures at your doors, you will not have to go abroad to buy any manufactured articles, you will buy them at home, and when you buy them at home you will not have to export those things which you produce upon your farms, and in consequence of that you will get liberal prices at home. But they have falsified those promises as well. Although manufactures have been encouraged for the last ten years, what do we find? We find that the export of manufactured articles last year—and that was much higher than the average for the last ten years—was only $4,161,282; and we find that in 1878, when these gentlemen came into power, our exports amounted to $4,127,755. They told us, You will not have to send your agricultural produce away, you will not have to send your animals and their product away, in order to find a market. You were to provide that market for him under the operation of the National Policy; but when the National Policy came into operation we were obliged to export more than ever. We find that the people of Canada have been submitting to most grievous taxation during the last ten years, and yet the export of manufactured articles has remained stationary or fallen during that period. There is one point to which I wish to call the attention of the House, and it is this, that during the last few years there has been what has been termed an appreciation of money, in other words the prices of almost all commodities have fallen. Agricultural products have fallen, and we would naturally expect that the prices of other articles would fall similarly. It has been shown that the Government have been unable to prevent a decline in the price of agricultural products; or, if they have been able to prevent it, why have they not prevented it during the last ten years? But when we come to consider that the farmer has to expend a great portion of his product in purchasing other commodities, it becomes apparent that the protection system enhances the prices of the articles he has to purchase, and in that way it causes the farmer much injury. The articles which the farmer has to buy have not fallen correspondingly in price, due to the tariff which has been levied against the farmers and against the great mass of consumers, but in favor of certain of the manufacturers. I was surprised at the statement made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me, who stated that the farmers need not pay any taxes whatever; that the farmers could eat with their fingers, and need not, therefore, pay taxes on knives and forks; that the farmers could raise and weave their wool, and so they need not pay taxes, but wear homespun, if they wished to avoid taxation. What I say is this, that the farmers occupy a position in this country inferior to no other class; and when the hon. gentleman attempts to presume on their supposed ignorance, he will find himself very much mistaken. The farmers know they have rights, and they will maintain those rights when the proper time and the proper occasion comes. I remember, during some of my campaigns—and I have had as many in my constituency as most people during the last three or four years—when I spoke in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, some of my opponents said: It is all right, our party is in favor of it. I am sorry for the sake of the farmers that they have been grossly deceived with respect to the National Policy; but the farmers are now determined to free themselves from some of the burdens that have been imposed upon them, for they feel they are taxed for the benefit of the favored few. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) has said they could avoid taxation, that they need not pay any duty on sugar if they did not desire to do so, that they need not use it unless they choose. The hon. gentleman is in favor of keeping sugar for the favored few, just as the Government keeps the sugar plums for the favored few. We will consider for a moment this question of sugar, and we can bring it down to something like a reasonable basis. We find, according to the testimony given by Mr. Drummond before the Depression Committee in 1876, that 375 or 400 men can manufacture 100 tons of refined sugar per day, or, taking 300 working days in the year, 60,000,000 pounds per annum, or 180,000,000 pounds by 1,200 men. That quantity would perhaps equal the total consumption of sugar in Canada. That manufacture would, apparently, give employment to 1,200 men, and one would naturally consider it to be a good thing. If we come to compare this with the Trade and Navigation Returns, we find that in 1881, 723 people were employed in our sugar refineries, and that the value of the product was $962,000, capital invested $2,150,000, total wages $363,000, average per man $502. That appears to be a large average, and I doubt whether that average sum has been paid to the employes in our sugar refineries. Let us now consider what the sugar refiners have obtained from the people, from the consumers of sugar in this country. During last year there were entered for consumption 201,891,000 pounds of sugar. Taking the amount of the refined at 90 per cent. of this, there would be 181,655,829 pounds. The Trade and Navigation Returns show there was a duty paid on that sugar of $3,433,334, the duty per 100 pounds being $1.89. That was the amount paid on sugar refined in Canada during 1888. The Trade and Navigation Returns show there were imported direct of sugar over fourteen Dutch standard last year, 1,874,283 pounds, the duty on which was $60,898, duty per 100 pounds $3.25. In other words, the people were paying $3.25 of duty, while $1.89 only was going into the Dominion Treasury. The people of Canada were taxed, not only to pay into the Dominion Treasury $1.89 on every 100 pounds of sugar they used, but they were also taxed to put into the pockets of the sugar refiners $1 for every hundred pounds they manufacture. So we have a double system of taxation, a system which realises a very large revenue indeed. Suppose the tax is only one cent per pound, no less than $1,816,558 are obtained for the benefit of the sugar refiners. If we were to divide that sum by the total number of hands employed, we would find that not only did the people of this country, by reason of the taxation which was placed upon them in this way, pay the entire amount which is paid to the employes in our sugar refineries, but they paid more than double that sum every year. This seems to be an extravagant statement, but it is a statement borne out very completely and fully by the official statistics. We pay over $1,800,000 per annum, according to the official returns. And yet hon. gentlemen, forsooth, say to the farmers, You need not pay any taxes, for you need not use sugar at all. Not only has sugar become, to a certain extent, a luxury, but it has become quite an important article of commerce. An hon. gentleman, the other day, stated that in the district from which he came you could go through a hundred miles of apple blossoms. The district I represent can show double that extent of country, even five times that extent of country well adapted to fruit growing. We have great advantages in the Niagara peninsula, and when we possess those advantages it is only natural that our people should engage in raising fruit, in canning and preserving fruits and in manufacturing jams. And we find in regard to sugar, which is a raw material, that in order to manufacture jams for export they have to pay a tribute of $1.89 into the Dominion Treasury and pay a tribute of $1 per hundred pounds to the sugar refiners of Canada. The sugar tax presses very heavily on the great mass of the community; it is an evil that should be remedied and should be terminated in a very short time. Take cotton; it is said by hon. gentlemen opposite that the farmers need not pay any tax on cotton. We will suppose a merchant is engaged in the drygoods business for instance, and he imports cottons from the United States or from England. He is met at the custom house and has to pay a duty of 30 per cent. The cottons cost him $1,300, and he sells them at 20 per cent. profit, and there is not only 20 per cent. in the original cost, but 20 per cent. on the duty besides, and this would bring the cost up to $1,560. When the retailer gets them he charges 20 per cent., and when the consumer has got those cottons, and pays for them, he pays $1,872, but that is not all lost, for $300 of that is in the Treasury, and part of the rest of that is taken up in the nature of profits. But, if we simmer it down, we find that the consumer pays $434 in order to get $300 into the Treasury. Suppose he chooses not to import these cottons, suppose he makes up his mind to patronise our cotton manufacturers in Canada, he has to go through about the same formality. The cotton manufacturer in Canada charges him just the price it will cost him to import this cotton, and when the consumer comes to pay for those cottons, although they are made in Canada, he has to pay $400 at least. You may call that $400 taxation, you may call it a bonus, or you may call it a fine if you please, but the consumer has to pay $400 in order that he may put a bonus of $300 into the pocket of the Canadian manufacturer. They tell us that our cotton manufacturers are not making so much money after all. Why are they not? They get this bonus out of us, and if they do not make that much money, then there is some mismanagement, and the consumer ought not be made atone for their mismanagement. The same might be said with reference to our woollen industries, and with reference to a large number of our industries in Canada. Whether the article is home manufactured, or imported from abroad, it is taxed, and the only difference is that if it is home manufactured the tax goes into the pockets of the favored few. We have in this way the system of the present Government in full force, and it is not increasing the wealth of the country, but simply diverting money from the pockets of one class into the pockets of another class in the community. This policy is not increasing the general wealth at all, and, as I have already stated, it is simply diverting the money from the pockets of the men who deserve it into the pockets of many men who do not deserve it. The people of Canada now feel, and they feel very generally, that the time has come when an end should be put to this condition of things. Our friends on the other side of the House well know this, and, therefore, they try to raise certain prejudices in the minds of the people. They say to us, "Do you want us to be subservient to the United States? Do you want us to back down in our proposals? Do you want us to levy a certain duty one day and to be afraid to levy it the next day?" We have had a good deal of that kind of thing from the Government lately, and indeed too much of it during the last few weeks, and they do not seem to want any more of it. It is no doubt very uncomfortable for them to have to take this humiliating position, and they think that we on this side of the House ought to feel uncomfortable in the same way, although they cannot make the charge truthfully against the party on this side of the House, yet they fall into this position, with reference to the taxation on small fruits and their proposed taxation on trees. They do not seem to be able to propose any taxation without considering from day to day how the people on the other side of the line will take it, and if the Americans protest against it our Government back down and eat humble pie in the mildest way possible. I imagine they ought to be getting well used to this kind of thing now. They say to us on this side of the House, "You want us to cringe to the United States." We never asked them to cringe to the United States. We never wanted them to make any proposals that were not just and reasonable; we wanted them to take a manly stand, and if they had persisted in doing this, and not persisted in following their taunting and tantalising policy, there would not be so much humiliation for them. I say that the United States has pursued a tantalising policy too, and I hold that the policy of the two Governments which has existed during the last two years is unworthy the Governments of christian peoples. We, on this side of the House, propose simply to go and tell the people of the United States, "If you are willing to trade with us on fair and equal terms, we are willing to trade with you likewise, on the same terms; we do not propose to interfere with your internal legislation, and we do not propose to allow you to interfere with our internal legislation." The farmers of Canada know very well all the benefits that can be derived, and are likely to be derived, from this reciprocity treaty, and the Government and its supporters might talk till doomsday to any constituency of farmers, telling them that reciprocity would not benefit them; they might quote all the statistics in the library of the House of Commons to them, but still the farmers will not believe them. The people of the country know from past experience that reciprocity is beneficial to them, and that if it were in force now, it would be a great benefit to them also. A short time ago I was talking to a successful farmer in my constituency who is accustomed to keep accounts, and he knew very well the experience he had under the old Reciprocity Treaty. He told me, and I believe he can verify his statement from the crops he has raised during the last few years, that if we had reciprocity with the United States the net profits on his farming would be $100 a year more than they are now. He said further, that all his neighbors would derive a like advantage if they had free access to the markets of the United States. Yet we have been told by the member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson), that we do not want to send our produce there. Why, you cannot go to the station of any railway leading into Buffalo without seeing every day cars of cattle leaving Canada for Buffalo, and they are going there because there is no market for them elsewhere. Shipments are made every day of cattle and sheep and produce grown in Canada to the United States, because they have no other markets. In the Niagara peninsula we find ourselves wedged in as it were between the United States to the east and the United States to the west; we have important lines of railway running down and conveying produce from the Western States through to Buffalo, and through to New York, and through to Europe. We are on that main line of communication and every one of us feel that it would be very beneficial indeed if we had free access to the markets of the United States. But while this resolution, which I support, proposes to give us free access to these markets, it proposes something better still,—it proposes to relieve us to a large extent from the tyranny that has been imposed upon us by a few monopolists in the Dominion. Take, for instance, these sugar men about whom I spoke a short time ago. It is not reasonable to suppose that they would willingly relax the hold which they seem to have on the present Government, and the hold which they seem to have on the country, of levying over a million dollars every year, by means of their tariff arrangements, out of the great mass of the people of Canada.

Mr. HAGGART. Hear, hear.

Mr. COLTER. It is not reasonable to suppose that they would relax their hold. The hon. gentleman says, "hear, hear." It is very comfortable for him to say "hear hear;" it is very nice to be backed by such men at election times; they fill a very nice gap; and when the hon. gentleman opposite finds that to be the case, he can easily say to these men who profit by this policy, "What is your faith worth? Let us see by your works how much you are interested in this policy?"

Mr. SPROULE. What about the sugar trusts in the United States that are said to be taking $25,000,000 a year?

Mr. COLTER. Now, we say that our people wish to be free from this tyranny. They can go to the city of Buffalo and buy better sugar at six cents a pound than they can buy in Canada at eight or nine cents a pound, and we want an opportunity of doing that. The sugar men in the United States are subsidised heavily enough, everybody knows. Further, we can go into Buffalo and buy at eight cents per wine gallon, better coal oil than we can buy at home at 25 cents per Imperial gallon. These are two of the articles of which the farmers and all the consumers of this country have to make very large purchases; and when we find that we have to pay 30 per cent. on our cottons and our woollens, and that everything else we use is taxed to an enormous extent, we wish to be free to some extent from this tyranny, and have an opportunity to buy our goods more cheaply than we can now buy them. As I said before, this resolution proposes to give us a double benefit; it will secure better prices for what we have to sell, and it will enable us to obtain the necessary commodities of life at much lower prices than we obtain them at now; and when such is one of the recommendations of that policy, we feel that we must press for it on every and any available occasion. I am not prepared to agree with gentlemen on the other side of the House when they state that we are doing everything we can to decry the country. We are not. We want to see our people, who are a noble, an industrious, thrifty and economical people, in a position to enjoy the just rewards of their industry, and that is all we ask. We have a fertile soil; we have a vigorous climate, capable of producing vigorous men; and we want free scope for the energies of those men. When our sons have gone to the other side of the line, have they, in the competition, come off the worse? They have not. They have held up their end well, and have attained some of the highest positions, both in the legislative halls and in business circles in that country; and if those who have gone have been able to do that, why cannot we do it also? We are made of the same stuff as they are, and why should we be afraid of suffering from closer contact with our neighbors? We have in Canada some of the finest water powers on the face of the globe; we have as great a stretch of fertile soil as can be found anywhere; we have immense mineral wealth and natural resources of every kind; and all we ask is that the Government will give free scope to the people, in order that they may be free to develop their resources, and not be hampered by the restrictions imposed upon them every year, or every few years, in the attempt to bolster up some concern which is about to fail through mismanagement of some kind. We now find hon. gentlemen opposite admitting the breakdown of their policy.

Mr. HESSON. No.

Mr. COLTER. Why, what does the hon. Minister of Finance say? He says the Government are going to subsidise steamers to South America. For what purpose? In order that we may get a market for our manufactures and other surplus products. The N. P. was to give us a market at our doors, but these steamers are to be subsidised in order to obtain markets for us in South America. What is the good of paying these long freights and granting these subsidies? We have a better market at our own doors without any subsidies, and a market which we can get without demeaning ourselves in any way. Now, I believe the United States has prospered, and, notwithstanding a great deal that has been said, it has prospered, not in consequence of its protective tariff, but in spite of it. The United States affords an illustration, not of a high protective policy, but of a great free trade policy. Take, for instance, the State of New York, which has a larger population than the whole of this Dominion. It has free trade with over 50,000,000 of people at its very doors, and that trade is beneficial to the State of New York, and the trade of the State of New York is beneficial to the rest of the United States as well. In the same way, if we had free trade with the United States, that trade would be beneficial to us, and our trade, at the same time, would be beneficial to them. The benefit being a mutual benefit, there is no reason why the adoption of this policy should be attended to the slightest extent with dishonor. Now, when I hear so much about the old flag by our friends on the other side of the House, I am at a loss to ascertain what their object is. They must feel that they are driven into a corner in some way, when it is necessary to resort to that cry so often. They remind me of a story I heard a short time ago. Out in the Western States, before they had any regular clergymen, they sometimes used to bury their dead without any religious ceremony, but instead there was some orator appointed for the occasion, whose duty it was to dilate upon the virtues of the deceased, and to portray the great and good things he had done for mankind and the community, and perhaps more particularly for the United States. On one of these occasions, the orator found himself somewhat puzzled, because the record of the man who had died was not just as good as it should have been. He paused for some time, and at last he said, "What though our deceased friend robbed the First National Bank, what though he made desolate the homes of widows and orphans, there is one thing at least that can be said of him, his heart always beat warm for his country." And when I find our friends on the other side of the House confronted with their professions of loyalty, and unable to make good the promises they made in connection with those professions; when I find them in 1878, in order to obtain office, saying that the expenditure of this country was extravagant when it was $23,500,000, and that $22,500,000 was adequate to run this country; when I find them, after getting into power, increasing that expenditure to $37,000,000; when I find them complaining of the national debt under the Mackenzie Administration, and when they get into power increasing that debt enormously and oppressively; when they have not fulfilled any of their promises, when they have failed utterly to do all these things they agreed to do, and when they have to admit this, they think to atone for their omissions by waving the old flag gloriously, and by saying, We will always hurrah for old England.

Mr. LANDRY. I will not omit to congratulate the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat upon the eloquence he has displayed in his maiden speech. I have listened to him with a great deal of attention, but I have failed to discover, with all his eloquence and all the vehemence which he put into his utterances, any argument that had not been advanced before by hon. gentlemen on the other side to convince us why these resolutions should be adopted. The hon. gentleman has referred to one or two subjects to which, I think, had he been in this House a little longer, he would have refrained from referring. He recalled one or two subjects which, if he had consulted his friends, he would not have brought to our attention. He spoke of broken promises. He took us back to 1878, and told us that the Government at that time had made numerous promises which they had not fulfilled. He told us they had promised many things, some of which he enumerated, but more of which he gave us simply to understand by inference, and that they had not accomplished any of them. I think that the hon. gentleman, if he had been in the House and had heard the discussions which have taken place in these precincts, and the numerous prophecies of evil which hon. gentlemen opposite have made, would have hesitated before speaking of unfulfilled prophecies, because he would have known that if hon. gentlemen on this side have made any prophecies, their prophecies were not those of despair but of encouragement, and therefore if some of their prophecies did fall somewhat short of fulfilment, yet the Government had the courage of their convictions, and having made prophecies in the best of faith for the benefit of the people and in the direction of progress, they put forth every effort to carry them to completion. But contrast our predictions with the prophecies made on the other side,—always prophecies of desolation, prophecies that this country would have, sooner or later, to succumb to the weight with which it was burdened with by the actions of the Government; prophecies always made in the one key, the key of despair. I need not go over those prophecies, but I may remind you, Sir, that there was not one undertaking entered into by the Government of the present party in power, from Confederation to the present time—there was not one undertaking entered into with a view to the future prosperity of the country, out of which hon. gentlemen opposite did not prophesy that nothing could come but blue ruin and desolation. Leaving aside the smaller undertakings and dealing with the larger ones, those which had some influence on the future of the country, I say there was not one concerning which hon. gentlemen opposite did not predict ruin and desolation. On the other hand, the hon. gentlemen on this side who proposed those undertakings had the courage of their convictions. When they believed that something was good in the interests of the country, they had the courage to undertake to carry it out, and they encountered not only the natural difficulties of those large undertakings, but also the difficulties thrown in their way by hon. gentlemen opposite who were continually making their ill-omened predictions. Had the hon. gentleman who has just spoken compared the prophecies of his friends with the prophecies on this side of the House, he would have hesitated making the remarks he did. Why, Sir, when it was proposed to acquire for this great Dominion, Manitoba and the North-West Territories, what was said by hon. gentlemen opposite? We all remember the description they then gave of the country acquired; we all remember how useless they said its acquisition would be; we all remember the evils they predicted which would result from the acquisition of those large territories. At that time they told us that these territories were nothing but the home of the bear and the wolf, that they were not worth acquiring, that they were not worth the cent and a half an acre paid for them to the Hudson Bay Company; and yet, a few years afterwards, when it was proposed to give these very lands for the construction of a railway, and when hon. gentlemen opposite felt called upon to put a value on them, they valued those same lands which they had said previously were not worth a cent and a half an acre, at \$4, \$5 and \$6 an acre. In the same manner they greeted the undertaking to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. We all remember the prophecies they made regarding that road and the obstacles they threw in the way of its completion. We all remember that when, in 1884, it was proposed to come to the aid of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company by a loan, they prophesied that loan would never be returned, and we all know how, in point of fact, that loan was returned before the time specified in the contract. I say, therefore, that my hon. friend could not have considered these things very seriously, or he would never have turned the attention of the people to the prophecies made by both parties. The hon. gentleman has told us that our prophecies of 1873 have not been fulfilled because our people do not to-day enjoy a home market. But is it not proved to be a fact that we have a larger home market to-day than we had in 1873? Have we not had extensive manufactories established in the country since then? and have these manufactories provided us with a very large quantity of the products we consume in the country? It is well for hon. gentlemen opposite to make assertions, but it would be better if they would bring proof and show that we have not within ourselves a very large market indeed for the products of the people. My hon. friend has told us that the farmers are not to be imposed upon. Well, he gave the answer to that almost immediately, when in the next breath he told us that they had been imposed upon because they had believed in what had been preached to them by the Liberal party throughout the country. I suppose he meant that they were no longer to be imposed upon as they had been in the past in this respect. My hon. friend referred also to the manufacture of sugar in this country in order to convince the people that our people did not benefit by that industry, and that the benefit was reaped only by a few who had money invested in it. Why, I remember, only a few years ago, during the first year or two after the National Policy had been inaugurated, if there was one argument made stronger than another by hon. gentlemen opposite, it was that the men who had been induced to put their money into these manufacturing industries by the promises made by the Liberal-Conservative Government had been deceived, and that their investments would not turn out profitable. True, what they had prophesied in the beginning was that this policy would create monopolists, and put into the pockets of the rich, who invested in these enterprises, the money of the people who could ill afford to pay it, but in a year or two they changed entirely their line of argument, and they endeavored to show that their prophecies of ill had been realised, because a great many of these manufacturers were not successful. Now, however, they tell us that the manufactories are making immense profits. I am not going to dispute that. I believe that in the last year or two, those engaged in the manufacture of sugar have made large profits, but I think I am safe in affirming, that up to a year or two ago, their investments were not profitable, although there was a very large output of sugar by which our people benefitted through its manufacture in our own Dominion, and the labor it thereby gave to our own people. As my hon. friend was speaking, my mind reverted to a manufacturing centre with which I am better acquainted than with other places in other parts of the Dominion where sugar is manufactured. I refer to Moncton, N.B. I would draw the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that in Moncton, in 1873, at the inauguration of the National Policy, the amount of duties paid only reached \$19,455.00. In 1888, the amount that was collected in Custom duties in the town of Moncton was \$403,277, while, in 1878, the amount collected was only \$19,455. My hon. friends will say that this shows that the National Policy has imposed larger taxes on the people of this country, but I say that that statement cannot hold good from the point of view which I want to make clear. In 1888, and the years immediately preceding it, the price of sugar was very much lower in the Maritime Provinces than it had been before 1878. You may argue as to the amount of duty which is paid, and may try to convince the people that it is coming out of their pockets, and that they should replace this Government by another, under the belief that they would pay less taxation, but you will not convince the people of that so long as you have so positive a fact before them as that they get their sugar at lower prices than they did before the inauguration of the National Policy. Further, these people know that the \$403,000 paid for Customs in the town of Moncton meant the circulation of a large amount of money not only in that town, but in the surrounding districts, giving employment to a large number of people. Therefore, with all these advantages coming to our people, it would be hard to convince them that the result would be to their detriment. My hon. friend opposite has told us a story which rejoiced the hearts of his friends on that side of the House, of a man for whom he was called on to preach his funeral sermon could find nothing good to say, as he had been a very bad man, except that his heart beat warm for his country. When all the good qualities which characterise hon. gentlemen opposite have left them, when they have gone elsewhere, would that we could add, after all they have done injurious to their country, after all that may be condemned by the people of this country, would that we could say that their hearts beat warm for their country. I fear very much that, if anyone is called upon to speak over their political remains, the lines, instead of being "their hearts beat warm for their country," would be "I have nothing of that kind to say, but I have come here to apologise." I will not undertake to follow the hon. gentleman through the figures he has used, because it is impossible to follow a speech of that kind of an hour's duration and pick up the figures as they are presented. I will not say that he misrepresented anything by the figures he gave, but, when he said we could get sugar for 6 cents in New York or in Buffalo for which we had to pay 8 cents or  $8\frac{1}{2}$  cents here, I think he was mistaken. I do not know where he got his figures, but I think the prices are not less than 7 or 8 cents a pound for sugar, or practically the prices we have to pay here. For a few moments, I will give some attention to the remarks of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I do not desire him to think that too much attention is given to him, but in regard to his speech, for myself, I believe that in many respects it had a great deal of merit, and showed a great deal of research, and that it was placed before the House very well and deserves notice because of the high position the hon. gentleman occupies in this House. Possessing all these merits, I think it is all the more reasonable that his speech should not be forgotten, and therefore he will excuse my referring to some remarks which he made the other evening. I pass over very hurriedly some of the complaints he made against the Government of the country. When he spoke of the majority, he said majorities were not always right, but I believe in this country the majority is the test by which we find whether hon. gentlemen are right or not. That is the way in which the people are governed; that is the way by which in this House public affairs are governed; and, that being the only test we have, it is quite unnecessary to show that it is the proper test. He spoke of the Gerrymander Act and of the Franchise Act. It is not my intention to refer to either of those Acts here except to say that, in the Province of New Brunswick, at all events, the effect of what is called the Gerrymander Act, if it had any effect at all, was in favor of hon. gentlemen opposite. A great deal has been said in regard to the Province of Ontario, but, as regards New Brunswick, that sympathy was created wrongly, I believe, for the gentlemen on the Opposition side. If any advantage was derived in the Province of New Brunswick, it was derived by hon. gentlemen opposite. As to the Franchise Act, I also believe that hon. gentlemen opposite profited more largely than did hon. gentlemen on this side. I must, however, refer more at large to a complaint made by the hon. gentleman, and often made by hon. gentlemen opposite, in this House and in the country, in reference to the exodus. I am not prepared to say that the exodus for the last six, or eight, or ten years has not been considerable and deplorable, but, if there is a party in this Dominion more responsible than another for that state of affairs, it is the party on the opposite side of the House, which is very much more responsible than the Government of the day and their supporters for that exodus. While it may be a great comfort to gentlemen living in the United States who desire to represent the condition of this country as one of despair, to have the assurance of an hon. gentleman in the high position which the hon. member for North Norfolk occupies to that effect, yet it must result to our detriment. I say that his speech alone is sufficient to show that he and his friends are largely responsible for that exodus, and I will refer to some of his remarks in order to prove that, if the hon. gentleman is to be believed by the people of this country—and we must take it for granted that his statements are read by the people, when they are so elaborately got up and so well delivered—the inevitable result will be to drive the people from this country and send them to the United States of America. My only hope is that with the speech of the hon. gentleman that may go to the country, may also go the eloquent refutation that has been given by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have preceded me. Let them both go together, and I am not afraid of the result; but if his speech goes alone I am compelled to believe that if there has been an exodus, it will be greater still after what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The public money pays for the Budget Speech.

Mr. LANDRY. We will not discuss the means by which these speeches go to the country; but I have no doubt that by some means the speech of the hon. gentleman will reach the people of this country, numerous and extensively. I have no doubt that it has been already sent as campaign literature, and will be sent more extensively for the purpose of educating the people of this country in their views. Let me try to show to the people of this country, or to those who may do me the honor of reading my observations, how pernicious are the sentiments which are contained in the speech of the hon. gentleman for North Norfolk. He says:

"In the case of war with the United States, England would be utterly unable to place an armed force upon the frontier between these two countries adequate to the defence of Canada."

Sir, what sort of a declaration is that to go to our people? Who would take the hon. gentleman as a guide, who would take him as one to whom they would look for information, whose opinion they would take upon the question as to whether this country was worth living in, or as to whether we should leave this country and go to another more prosperous, where the people find more sunshine and more happiness and contentment? The hon. gentleman tells us that we are only 4,000,000 of people, and we cannot defend ourselves against 60,000,000 in case of war; and if we cannot do it, neither is England able to do it, our mother country, upon whom we have depended, the mother country upon whom we do depend, in case anything of this kind should ever occur. The hon. gentleman says, seeing that we are in this position, what should we do? We must throw ourselves immediately into the arms of this great nation alongside of us. But that is not all, for he goes on to say:

"The United States, with no greater exertion than was put forth in the rebellion of 1861 to 1864, could place in the field an army of 3,000,000 men, and it is folly to talk of England being able to cope with such a force, in British North America, so far from her base of operations. It is true that, so far as land operations are concerned, England would be unable to afford to us adequate assistance and protection."

Now, Sir, I am not disposed to believe that myself, and I hope that the people will not believe it; yet there are hon. gentlemen who are making use of that argument. Why do they preach that to the people of this country? Although I do not believe that the hon. gentleman desires to produce that effect, yet I say his speech can have no other effect than to make the people of this country dissatisfied with the country they live in, and make them hurry to leave our shores for the purpose of emigrating to that great and better land which he has so much lauded. Now let us go a little further. He says in another place:

"Why, what is the condition of the farmer in this country to-day?"

Here I want you to bear in mind that this speech will be sent to the farmers of this country; and we all remember the story that was told of the prisoner who had heard the eloquent harangue made on his behalf by his counsel, who wanted to prove that he was not guilty. The prisoner knew that he was guilty, and he told his counsel, after hearing his eloquent plea, "You have convinced me that I am not guilty." And when the farmers of this country will read the eloquent speech of the hon. gentleman, endeavoring to convince them that they are living in a forsaken country, that it is not good enough for them, they may be led to believe, and to say: "After all we are not so fortunate; we are not so happy as we thought we were; we will emigrate to some other land." He then goes on to say:

"What is the condition of the farmer of this country to-day? Living, Sir, in a country which is the dearest in the world to purchase in, which is the cheapest in the world to sell in."

Well, Sir, if this country is the dearest in the world to purchase in, where can you find a stronger argument to make a man believe that this is not a good country, and that he had better try and seek another, which will not be the "dearest country in the world to purchase in, and the cheapest to sell in."

"So far as the products of his labor are concerned, selling the products of the soil for very much less than they were sold for during the régime of my hon. friend at my right, struggling with difficulties created by this very party who taxes everything that he produces, and reduces the purchasing power of the natural customer to whom he sells his productions, and not only increases the cost of what he purchases, but diminishes the price of what he sells."

Here is something else that is going to be sent to the people of this country for them to think over:

"The circumstances of the case were entirely different, and they took different ways, and the result of those experiments we may see to-day in the one case in the creation of a great nation—"

He was speaking of the colonies that separated from the mother country more than a hundred years ago, and he was comparing their condition with the condition of the people of this Dominion:

"—with its own history, with its own national life and with the world looking to it as one of the great powers of the earth, while in the other case we see as the result of the experiment the creation of a great colony without a history of its own, challenging the attention of the world, and shining, not in its own light, but in the borrowed light of another luminary."

Then a little further:

"The American States have prospered and grown rapidly, and a condition of things more favorable to their growth could not have been desired."

Well, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite find fault with us because we call that disloyalty. I cannot find any other term for it, although I do not wish to use that term in an offensive way, but how else can we qualify it? We see that hon. gentlemen opposite, and all their friends, in the speeches they make in this House and in the country, and in their press, direct all their efforts to running down the Dominion of Canada, leading the people to believe that this is a country unfit to live in, that we are burdened with taxation, while they picture in glowing colors the condition of the people of the United States. Sir, can we come to any other conclusion but that there is disloyalty in language and efforts such as these, even if the language was true, which, however, fortunately for ourselves, in my opinion, is not correct. Now we go a little further in this speech, and we find some other assertions that are even stronger than those I have cited:

"Take these four geographical groups of the Dominion—the Maritime Provinces, the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario, the Province of Manitoba and the Territories of the North-West, and British Columbia—nature has decreed that each one of the four shall trade more naturally and on more advantageous terms with the country to the south of the line than with any other geographical group in the Dominion."

There again he is grouping the Provinces separately, telling the people of each one of them, Your best market is not with your own neighbors, your best market is not with your own fellow-citizens, with those living under the same flag and the same constitution; the proper thing to do is for these groups to abandon each other, for the Maritime Provinces to abandon the Province of Quebec, and for the Province of Quebec to abandon the Province of Ontario, and Ontario to abandon the rest of the Dominion, and your best way is to throw yourselves into the arms of another nationality. In this way hon. gentlemen hope to convince some of us that our natural markets are with another country and with another people. A little further he says:

"We have perhaps a million of immigrants who have gone there instead of coming to this country, and that is a mighty force which is drawing these two countries more and more together, and is impressing on the mind of both countries the desirability of free commercial intercourse and the absurdity of maintaining the condition of things which now exist."

And again:

"I turn to the United States and find the increase in that country in the decade commencing one year earlier and ending one year earlier was 30·8, as against 18 in Canada. That is not satisfactory. Here we have a difference in the increase of population of the two countries of more than 11 per cent. against ourselves, and there is no reason for it."

Sir, the same observations that I have been making elsewhere, apply also to this quotation. I will not make any more quotations from the hon. gentleman's speech, although I had marked here some eight or ten of the same nature, everyone of which go to disparage the condition of the people of Canada, and speaking in very eulogistic terms of the people of the United States. I repeat again what I believe to be true, that the figures which the hon. gentleman used were not always accurate; but even if they were accurate, if he had been a true Canadian at heart, he would not have been the first to have brought them before the Parliament of Canada. Why, the hon. gentleman found fault with us because we tried to expose not only the fallacy but the injurious effect of those speeches on our own people, and he declared that he might as well charge upon a physician responsibility for the disease because he had given an accurate diagnosis of the case and when the treatment he had recommended had not been adopted. In my opinion the cases are not at all similar. I believe no wise and true physician would preach despair and brood over death to his patient; and if he were a prudent physician he would be careful to avoid making his patient dissatisfied with his condition. A physician would be blameworthy who although he might have a suspicion as to the true condition of his patient, constantly pointed out to him that under different circumstances he would have been in a better condition, when those circumstances would have driven him from his own home. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) referred to other matters, which I shall take the liberty of discussing for a few moments. He stated that no attempt had been made to secure reciprocity, and that the conduct of the Government had been exasperating to the United States. I need not cite any authorities to show that the assertion that the Government had made no attempt to secure reciprocity with the United States is devoid of truth, or rather is not stating the case quite accurately. I affirm that the authorities go to show that the Government by speech and by advances have gone as far as it was possible for them to go in an honorable way to meet the people of the United States with a view to obtaining a reciprocity treaty on a fair and equitable basis. I would ask the hon. gentleman whose fault was it if the Reciprocity Treaty was abrogated? Was it the fault of Canada? No; it was the United States which abrogated that treaty. If they were of the opinion that Canada was receiving greater advantages from the operation of the treaty, there was no reason why the treaty should have been abrogated, and the people of the United States, if they had wished to continue reciprocity, might have asked that amendments be made to the treaty as it then existed and have pointed out the manner in which it bore heavily on their people. But instead of doing so they abrogated the treaty. After the abrogation of that treaty, what do we find? The people of Canada, in order to show their good feeling towards the United States—and I commend this to hon. gentlemen opposite who say the conduct of the Government has been exasperating to the United States—gave a direct contradiction to the assertion that they no longer wished reciprocity. They allowed the United States to continue to enjoy many of the advantages they possessed under the Reciprocity Treaty, whereas the United States, when they put an end to reciprocity, did not allow the people of the Canadian Provinces to enjoy any, or at all events very few, of the privileges they possessed under the Reciprocity Treaty. With the permission of the House, I will cite an authority which cannot be disputed—a report made by a gentleman two years after the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty. This report must be held to be authentic because the United States have made the views expressed therein part of their record. What does the writer say? He said, in speaking of the privileges the United States had been enjoying of the use of the St. Lawrence under the treaty :

“No arrangements or understanding have been entered into since the abrogation of the treaty, between the United States and the Government of Great Britain or of Canada, with reference to these subjects. But the Canadian Government have seen fit to permit the arrangement practically to continue in force, so far as our citizens are concerned, in the hope, as they avow, that some understanding will shortly be entered into for liberalising trade between the two countries, and they desire in the meantime, to do nothing which might bear an unfriendly interpretation.”

Could we have anything stronger? This is a report prepared at the request of Congress, for the purpose of ascertaining the exact state of affairs; and the writer, in so many words, tells us the nature of the privilege extended to the United States, after the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty. Is that evidence, that even at that time, the Government of the country were doing anything to exasperate the American people? It gives a direct contradiction to that assertion, at all events at that period. The writer goes on to say further :

“There is really no regulation or Order in Council upon the subject of the St. Lawrence. Since the termination of the treaty, American vessels desiring to pass either to or from the ocean through the St. Lawrence have asked permission in each case of the Canadian Government and it has in no instance as yet been refused. But the informal manner in which this permission has been given and the absence of any general regulation upon the subject, evidently shows that the Government does not desire to have the special permits regarded as precedents or as in any manner committing the Government in its treatment of the question hereafter should no general arrangement be entered into with the United States.”

A little further on the writer proceeds to show the great importance of this privilege to the United States. He says :

“It is not exaggerating its consequence to assume that even a war for the possession of the right to the natural outlet to our great lakes and the fertile teeming territory they drain would be less costly to us in its consequences than the loss which the closing of that outlet to our products would entail.”

I am inclined to think he exaggerated the value of it, but he estimated the privileges so highly that he said that it would be even less costly to go to war for the retention of that right than to surrender it.

“And yet notwithstanding the gravity of this question and the extent of the interests involved, our citizens enjoy the privilege at this moment solely through the liberality of the Canadian Government, without any understanding whatever of an official or even unofficial character, and without the right to enter a complaint if the permission to use that river was refused.”

We would have the right to refuse an extension of that privilege, but Great Britain representing the different Canadian Governments, extended that privilege to the Americans. On this point I desire to read one more extract to illustrate the point still further, and in order to show that the conduct of our people before Confederation has not been to exasperate the United States, but has been liberal to a great degree. In order to make this more intelligent I would premise by saying that the reason given for the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty was because, immediately after the civil war, it became necessary for the United States Government to levy higher taxation than otherwise would have been required, and under the changed condition of affairs they could not do that with the Reciprocity Treaty in force. The writer said :

“So reasonable was this argument felt to be that the representatives of the several Provinces, placed on record their acquiescence in its justice. A delegation, comprising members of the Government of the then Provinces of Canada, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, visited Washington, and on the 2nd February, 1866, submitted the following memorandum, acknowledging the changed condition of the country, the propriety of establishing duties on articles heretofore embraced in the free list of the Reciprocity Treaty, equivalent to the internal taxation existing in the United States, and general propositions for the rearrangement of trade relations between this country and the Provinces they represented.”

The memorandum was a strong evidence, in my opinion, of a desire on the part of those people representing New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, that some arrangement should be arrived at with the United States. If there was anybody at fault at that time, it was the United States, who did not make any effort to meet our people half way. This memorandum goes on to say, then :

The trade between the United States and the British Provinces should, it is believed, under ordinary circumstances, be free in reference to their natural productions, but as internal taxes exceptionally exist in the United States, it is now proposed that the articles embraced in the free list of the Reciprocity Treaty should continue to be exchanged, subject only to such duties as may be equivalent to that internal taxation. It is suggested that both parties may add certain articles to those now in the said list.”

I will not read the memorandum in full because it is too long; but I have read this much in order to emphasise the fact that step by step the people of this country, whether they represent Nova Scotia or whether they represent New Brunswick, or the two Canadas before Confederation, showed to the United States their strong desire to live on friendly relations with them, and their ardent wish to meet them half way in the direction of arranging the tariff that might exist between the people of the two countries. Every step taken by the people of Canada in this direction, since the abrogation of the Treaty in 1866, was always thrown aside by the people of the United States, and very often it was rejected, if not in an offensive way, in a way calculated to make more difficult the conciliation between the two peoples.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. LANDRY. Mr. Speaker, before returning to the subject with which I was endeavoring to deal before the House separated I wish for one moment to refer to a statement made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Colter.) He told us before dinner that in Buffalo (I do not know that he gave us the date, but very recently indeed) sugar was selling at 6 cents per pound, while we had to pay 8 or 9 cents per pound for it in Canada. I ventured to assert without having looked up the quotations myself that the hon. gentleman must have been mistaken in the figures he then used, or that he had a defective memory if he depended on his memory for the figures. The quotations have been handed to me since and I find that on the 8th of the present month, according to the quotations, sugar sold at 7 cents per pound in the United States, and in Montreal yesterday, only a few days afterwards, sugar was sold at exactly the same price. If hon. gentlemen will come before this House and solemnly affirm in a way that their speeches may go to the country, and in a matter like this, not important in itself, but with the intention of having the effect of showing that we live in a country which is dearer to living in than the United States—if they make such mistakes as this what can we expect of their other statements where they cannot be immediately contradicted. I have no doubt that in the article of oil referred to by the hon. gentleman, if I had time to look up the prices of that commodity, I would find that his figures are quite as inaccurate as those he gave us in regard to sugar. Returning to the subject that I was dealing with before six o'clock, I was trying to contradict the statement often reiterated in this House that the conduct of the Canadian people was exasperating to the people of the United States and that the conduct of the Canadian people as represented by their Government since the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty had not been inviting to the United States to either renew that treaty, or to enter into a new treaty with a view of our having wider commercial relations with them. I was endeavoring to show that the conduct of our people as represented by our Governments before Confederation, and by the Dominion Government since Confederation, has always been in the direction of conciliation instead of exasperating the people of the United States, and that it has been rather inviting to the United States to enter into commercial relations with us so far as that be beneficial to Canada. I will not say that we wished those relations to the same extent that some hon. gentlemen desire on the other side of the House, because I do not think that would be beneficial to us, but we desired them to the extent the people of this country believed it was beneficial to them. No opportunity has been lost to try and further that end with the people of the United States, and almost invariably we have been met with a denial or a refusal to treat. A great deal was said by an hon. gentleman the other evening in order to try and show that under the Reciprocity Treaty the Dominion of Canada had made very rapid and very extensive progress; very much greater progress than we have since made and for that purpose the hon. gentleman cited a great many figures and made a great many assertions. I am not going to go through the figures he gave to this House, but from the study I have given the subject I will venture to assert, and it is at any rate the conclusion at which I have arrived, that the prosperity the people of Canada enjoyed during the period of the Reciprocity Treaty was not due entirely to the fact of our having that Reciprocity Treaty with the States. There were many other causes that tended to enlarge our trade with the United States at that time. We must remember that during that period came the civil war in the United States, and we must remember that the Crimean War had something to do with giving larger markets and higher prices for the produce of the people of this country. But even making the admission to some extent, that our commerce with the United States sprang up very rapidly from the time this treaty was entered into, yet I say that in my opinion the hon. gentleman who quoted figures here the other night did not represent the case exactly as it was. I think that in his eagerness to try to show or to exaggerate the position that Canada had assumed in from 1854 to 1866; that with the idea of exaggerating that in the eyes of the people of this country and in order to give them a desire to return to the same thing again, that he did not quote a sufficient quantity of figures—although he cited a very large quantity—to show the exact state of affairs. I hope you will permit me to deal with figures for a very few moments for the purpose only of illustrating what I mean. The hon. gentleman told us that in 1854 our exports to the United States were $10,473,000. I do not find from the figures that I have been able to hunt up that his figures are exactly correct, but still I will not dispute them, and I will take it for granted that in 1854 our exports to the United States were $10,473,000. He tells us that in one year, 1855, our exports amounted to $19,316,000. Now, Sir, the best information I can obtain is that instead of being that amount in 1885, they had risen to only $15,136,734.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman quoting from Johnson's Statistics?

Mr. LANDRY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think he will find that the figures were not made up for the fiscal year, but for the calendar year ending with December, and that is how the discrepancy occurs.

Mr. LANDRY. If that is the case, even then the hon. gentleman failed, I think, to show that the exports to the United States between 1854 and 1866 went on steadily and largely increasing. He simply showed that from 1854 to 1855 they made a rapid stride, and then again from 1855 to 1866 there had been a very large increase, but he omitted to show how uncertain and fluctuating were the exports during the twelve years. Though up to $15,136,734 in 1885, yet, four years afterwards the amount had not gone up to more than $16,000,000. In 1859 it had only reached a little above $19,000,000 and in 1861 it was $19,800,000. So you see, Mr. Speaker, that we did not at that time make such rapid strides as the hon. gentleman indicated. It is true that in the last year of the Reciprocity Treaty there was a very large increase indeed. There were many reasons contributing to that circumstance. One great fact, which, I think to a large extent influenced trade in that year was the notice which had been given to bring the treaty to an end, which, no doubt, induced our people to send to the United States all they could in the last year of the treaty and thus swell the amount to unusual dimensions. Therefore, it is unfair to cite that year for the purposes of comparison, to show the progress the country made. It is true, the difference in the amount of our trade has not been, perhaps, so great between a single year and the next, but it will be found that since then we have made considerable strides in the direction of increasing our trade with the United States every year. I do not think there is any exception in any year, if I can trust the tables from which I have quoted, and I do not think their accuracy has been denied by anyone. But more than that, we find, by a very good authority, the authority from which I quoted a little while ago, that the prices obtained by the people of Canada during the time the Reciprocity Treaty was in force were not equal to the prices obtained by them after that treaty was abrogated. If that be the case, what deductions do we derive? If there be any argument in what the hon. gentlemen say, that to have the market of the United States opened to us would be beneficial to our farmers, they must mean that our farmers would get greater prices for their productions. If it can be proved that they got as large prices after the abrogation of the treaty, it seems to me that argument falls to the ground. Quoting again from the report of George W. Brega, made at the request of Congress, I believe, we find that he gives tables containing many figures which I will not cite; and then he says:

"An examination of these tables shows the remarkable fact that large as were the sales of produce by Canada to the United States, under the free admission to our market; yet the prices obtained in Canada, after the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty, for such articles was, in almost every instance, higher than when it was in operation. It cannot be denied—granting the correctness of the figures given above, which are from official sources—that whatever amount of this produce was purchased for consumption in the United States since March, 1866, was purchased at as high prices in the Canadian markets as before the abrogation of the treaty; and that the American consumer was compelled to pay the American duty in addition."

If it be the case, that the prices paid for these goods which were purchased by the Americans within our own territory were higher than the prices obtained before the abrogation of the treaty, then I say that no great damage was done to our people by its abrogation. But there is another consideration which it seems to me must weigh heavily in the minds of our people in considering this matter, namely, that transportation facilities are very much greater to-day than they were at that period. It must also be borne in mind that a great deal that was purchased by the United States from us at that time was re-exported by them across the Atlantic. If that be the case, who made the profits on those goods? It was no doubt the middleman in the United States who purchased from us. It may have been that it was inevitable to our people to export their products in that way; it may have been more profitable for them to do so than to export them direct; no doubt it was, or they would not have done it. But since then the means of communication have become more easy, and our people have taken advantage of them, and instead of selling their products to the United States for the purpose of being transhipped to European markets, they can to-day export directly from Canada to Europe. On reading the beautiful lecture delivered by Mr. Murray in the city of Boston, which was spoken of in this House a day or two ago, I was struck with the similarity between the argument used by that gentleman and that of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). It appeared to me that the hon. gentleman had taken up that document, and followed almost exactly the lines taken by Mr. Murray. Of course, the two gentlemen did not appear to have the same object in view, and did not profess to have the same object in view. Mr. Murray said to his audience and to the world, because he published his lecture and sent it broadcast throughout the world, and particularly throughout Canada, that he prepared his statements not for the purpose of advocating unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, but for the purpose of inducing the people of Canada to become united with the United States. From this point of view it was a patriotic lecture; but can we say the same thing of hon. gentlemen who take up that discourse as a model, and preach the same lines to the Canadian Parliament and the Canadian people, though professing at the same time that the object is not to get them to join the Union, but to secure reciprocity with the people of the United States. Well, Sir, when Mr. Murray commenced his speech to an American audience, the first thing he did was to ask for a map; and my hon. friend here was so strongly impressed with his ideas that he did not want to begin his speech without first having a map also; because if he had only a map hung on the walls of this Parliament, to illustrate to the minds of the members the argument he wished to make, that our geographical situation was such that whether we would or not we had to throw ourselves into the arms of the American people, his argument would have been made stronger. Well, listen to Mr. Murray for a few moments, and see what his ideas are. He says:

"Now look at the map. Wipe out that fool's line drawn by two foreign nations, who had no right to make a line of division here save that of conquest."

That is the argument used by my hon. friend. We had that fool's line, which is an imaginary line, and should be obliterated. We ought not to have that line to separate us commercially, or in any way, from the American people. If we have too strong attachment to our land to wipe it out completely, we should obliterate it so far as it refers to our commercial relations with the American people. This gentleman goes on to say:

"Being alien to the soil which is to us fatherland, and drawn, too, when on them and us had not yet dawned the vision of an empire, besides which the Persian and the Roman world, when it stood at its widest, is but a unit by which to multiply our measurement. Look at the rivers. See how they run. Note how they tie north and south together like threads into whose golden strands new strength is spun continually."

We must all admire that language; but yet while it may be becoming in an American citizen to point out to his people that this line must be an imaginary line, that these large rivers—and he referred particularly to the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi—were rivers that should connect us with them as one people; I say that while we may admire such language in him, we cannot admire it in a gentleman representing a Canadian constituency, and representing, as I have no doubt the hon. gentleman does, a very loyal people. The hon. gentleman told us that our natural markets are not among ourselves, but among the people of the United States. Well, I would ask, who at present is closing the door? Who is putting restrictions upon this natural market? It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to find fault because the door is closed, and there are restrictions between us and the United States, commercially speaking, but who is it that imposes these restrictions and closes the door? Why, if we were to judge by the hon. gentleman's speech, we would be disposed to believe that the Canadians are the ones who put up the barriers that are so injurious to our trade and commerce. Well, I need not remind you, Sir, that if there be restrictions, they have been imposed in the first instance by the Americans, and that they have never shown, from the time they first imposed their barrier of a high tariff, any disposition to remove that barrier, but, on the contrary, have shown every disposition to strengthen it. Even the last presidential election was run upon this line, and the voice of the people of the United States pronounced largely in favor at any rate of not lowering in any degree the barriers but of leaving them as they are. Yet the people of this Dominion are found fault with by hon. gentlemen opposite because of these barriers. I say we have had nothing to do with them. True, we were forced in 1878-79, in self-defence, to establish the National Policy, but when that policy was established, the tariff imposed was very much lower indeed than that of the United States, so that if we put up any barriers they were much less difficult to get over than those put up by the United States. Therefore, when it is proclaimed that these restrictions should be swept away, the electors of the Dominion, as sensible people, will ask the question, if it is necessary to put these things aside, and if that would benefit us, let us find out who is to blame for their being there, and whether of our own motion we can sweep them away, or whether it requires two to make a bargain. If they come to the conclusion that we cannot do this alone, that it is not becoming to go down on our knees and ask for it, and by proclaiming in Canada that the removal of these restrictions is our only salvation, the only thing that can save us from ruin—if they come, as sensible people to this conclusion, they are not likely to throw the blame on the Canadian Government for the existing barriers. They will conclude that the United States must themselves remove the barriers existing between us and them. The hon. gentleman may say that the United States Government have shown a disposition to do so. I will come to that in a few moments. But before dealing with this disposition, as shown by the famous Hitt resolution, I want to cite another extract or two from Mr. Murray to show that, while he followed the same line of argument used by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), his meaning was unmistakable. He said:

"For Canada there are but three possible futures, —"

According to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), there is only one, and even that is not very certain, unrestricted reciprocity, and he has not pointed out in which way we are going to get this unrestricted policy at all. His great remedy is to try to get reciprocity, to try to open up negotiations with the United States in order to get it.

—"one is to remain as she is, an outlying English colony, —" appears to me that is—according to the line of the speech of the hon. member for North-Norfolk (Mr. Charlton)

—a colony left to itself, not to be helped by England in case of trouble—

—“hampered in growth, hectoring in spirit,”

Again the very words of the hon. gentleman—

—“pinned continually to the edge of peril from Imperial entanglements, drained of her population by the great attraction to the south of her—”

And no man spoke more warmly of the great attraction to the south, than did the hon. gentleman——“drained of her population by the great attraction to the south of her, with which, while she remains a colony, she can never successfully compete;—”

Well, Mr. Murray has gone to the extent of saying, and I admire his candor because he is speaking for another people, that we can never compete with the United States while we remain a colony. I do not know whether our hon. friends opposite will admit that or not, but they profess to say we may compete if we can only obtain unrestricted reciprocity.

—“oppressed with the burden of a debt, which, from the peculiar construction of the federative agreement, and the equally peculiar habits of her politicians, she can neither easily carry or put a stop to its further increase;—”

This language is exactly on a parallel with the arguments used by hon. gentlemen opposite——“remain subject to unfortunate conditions and ever opposed to the pressures of an uncertain, if not a perilous future; or she can, impelled by the necessity of bettering her condition, seek and obtain release, as she probably could from Imperial connection, and out of the chrysalis of colonialism burst into the winged embodiment of independency. This possibility has its attractions to all generous minds. The birth of a new nationality, if it be a happy one, coming in the fulness of time, and having adequate heroic causes for its parentage, is a result upon which the good wishes of mankind are sure to be showered; and such a birth, so caused in the case of Canada, would be hailed as an event of prime magnitude by all members of the English speaking race.

I will show you in a few moments how it will be held by all members of the English speaking race. I will show you this by the language of the hon. member himself:

“If Canada should become a republic, the natural instincts of all Americans would prompt them to give her a noble and generous recognition. Regarded only from a sentimental point of view, we should all contemplate her nationalisation with pride and satisfaction. She would surely receive from us all both official and sympathetic recognition, but I fail to see how beyond the point of personal good will, she could receive from us of the republic either the practical assistance she needs or the commercial connection on which, and on which alone, she can safely base her future industrial expansion.”

They would not give us very much assistance and help because it is not that they desire—

“For we of the republic believe in the Monroe doctrine, not only as applied to our sea line, and the parts of the Continent to the south of us, but we believe in it with equal sincerity, and earnestness as applied to the great division of the Continent to the north of us as well.

I will give you that part which shows exactly the encouragement which will be given, taking Mr. Murray as an authority, in all the positions which he says are open to us. After having gone over and shown the three different positions we may assume as a people, he says:

“But one thing Canadians must understand, and it would be unwise and unfair for us to conceal it from them, and that one thing is this, that this Republic will never see a great power built up on this continent either on the north or on the south of us, under either French or English flags, and take no action to prevent it.”

See where all the goodwill has gone to. They are willing to see us grow, but they will not permit us to grow under an independent flag—

“Least of all shall we ever assist them to become numerous, rich and powerful with that end on their part in view.”

And yet, the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will point out to us that this resolution presented by Mr. Hitt and adopted by the House of Representatives is an indication that they are going to assist us to become rich, and powerful, and numerous, and to extend our commerce and to become a rival to them; but these words do not seem to verify that view:

“Least of all shall we ever assist them to become numerous, rich and powerful.”

And, therefore, if the people of the United States have invited us to take a certain course of action, it is not to make us numerous, rich or powerful, but rather because they do not believe it will result in making us numerous, rich or powerful, but will rather have the opposite effect—

“We invite them cordially to share with us the destiny of the continent,—”

Not unrestricted reciprocity, observe—

—“to share with us its greatness and its glory, as, historically, they have a right to do, and should be proud of doing; but, if they foolishly decline our invitation, and undertake to rival us and imperil us by an alien development, then must they look for no help from us, for we shall certainly not help them at all, and we shall as certainly oppose their progress to the fullest extent of our power. And this we shall do in the interest of liberty and of mankind, for he must be a fool who thinks that two great rival powers can exist side by side in peace upon this continent.”

I hope that this is not a feeling shared in by the majority of the people of the United States. I hope that they, in common with the majority of people of Canada, believe that it is possible for two great rival powers—if by rival powers you understand simply those who are living under different flags—can live side by side peacefully, progressively, becoming richer and more prosperous. I cited those extracts to show and to insist upon the idea that, if that voices the sentiment of the people of the United States, they are not disposed—not because of any hatred to us, but from a feeling of patriotism to their own country, and because they believe it would be of advantage to them to have us united with them—to see us become rich or prosperous unless we do so under those relations with them to which reference is made. Let us see for a moment, speaking for the people of the Maritime Provinces more particularly, whether the people of those Provinces can be deluded by the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite that the change which they advocate will so very much benefit their trade and commerce. Let us take for example the States in the American Union which would more properly correspond in their geographical position with the Maritime Provinces. Let us take the New England States, and I will use a few figures to show that the people of the Maritime Provinces have made greater progress than the people of Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Vermont, the New England States which are contiguous to us. Surely those hon. gentlemen who have used these arguments to-day, and before, will not say that these four States have not had the full advantage of this free trade of which they spoke this afternoon, that they have not had the trade with these sixty millions of people, that they have not had the full benefit of having wiped away what they choose to call the imaginary line of customs boundaries. In 1870 Maine had a population of 626,915, and ten years after, in 1880, it had a population of 648,936. I invite particular attention of hon. gentlemen who have been impressed with the great importance of the United States enjoying all the privileges of a market of sixty millions of people and of the constitution which they possess, to the fact that during those ten years the State of Maine, which is the nearest to the Province of New Brunswick, only increased by 3.5 per cent., while New Brunswick during the same period—that is from 1871 to 1881—increased 12.4 per cent. Yet we were hampered during that time with all the great evils which have been dilated upon by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Then, Massachusetts, including the large city of Boston, it is true made more progress than we did, but, taking the large city of Boston out, they made less progress than we did. In New Hampshire during those ten years there was an increase of only 9 per cent., and in Vermont an increase of not 1 per cent.; while

Prince Edward Island increased by a little over 15 per cent., Nova Scotia by more than 13 per cent., New Brunswick by more than 12 per cent., and Quebec by 14 per cent.—those being the four Provinces bordering on the New England States. How do we account for that? If those hon. gentlemen wish to convince the people of the Maritime Provinces and the people of the Province of Quebec by their arguments, they must first show us how it is that these people, being nearer to these States of the Union than the other Provinces, have prospered more rapidly than they have. This also shows that, while great complaints are being made that the exodus has assumed alarming proportions in the Maritime Provinces, reason must be given for the small increase of population in the four States of which I have spoken, or rather for the decrease in their population. It must be a decrease, because I know that a large proportion of the exodus from the Province of New Brunswick settled in those very States which have not increased altogether more than I have stated, which shows conclusively that the exodus from those States must have been immensely larger than that from the Maritime Provinces. It may be true that the exodus from those States was to some portion of their own domain, but the fact remains that those States did not make more progress than I have pointed out. I have spoken of them separately, but, grouping the four States together, and grouping the four Provinces together, we find that in twenty years, from 1860 to 1880, the percentage of increase in the population of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island was 25·6 per cent., while the increase of the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and Massachusetts was only 24·4 per cent.; and that notwithstanding that they had all the advantages which could be derived from this spirit of activity and enterprise, this judicious and wise expenditure of money, and this great market of 60,000,000 people in the United States to which hon. gentlemen have referred. With all these great advantages I say, Sir, if you give us no more advantages than they had we cannot expect our progress to be greater than the progress of those States; on the other hand they must limit those advantages to a greater extent than they would to their own people.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What period was that in?

Mr. LANDRY. The last was between 1860 and 1880.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That was the period of free trade in this country.

Mr. LANDRY. I have cited the figures also from 1870 to 1880 after the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where did the hon. gentleman get the statistics to 1880 concerning the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. LANDRY. To 1881. I have taken them from the latest figures given. I have told the hon. gentleman that the figures I took for the Maritime Provinces were from 1871 to 1881, and those that I took from those States were from 1870 to 1880.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We only had protection two years during that period.

Mr. LANDRY. But the American Union had protection for a longer time, and they had the same home market. My hon. friend can try and demonstrate that, if he wishes, by and by, but I do not think he will be able to do it to the satisfaction of people who look into both sides of the question. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will cite one or two sentiments as samples of what has been going the rounds of the press of the American Union during the last few years, in regard to Canada. Not very long ago the New York Tribune had the following:—

"If commercial union is so urgent a necessity for Canada that annexation will inevitably ensue if the tariff barriers are not thrown down why should the favor be granted for which the Provinces are clamoring? Why should a future annexation movement be obstructed by premature concession of commercial privileges."

Now, Sir, there would be the same thing again, in my opinion, if we were to approach the United States unduly. If they made a bargain with us at all, it appears to me they could not lose sight of that grand policy that they have always in view, namely: Will this tend to advance the idea we have in view, of getting the Canadian people to sue for union with us. Another citation is from the New York Sun:

"Canada must come into the Union or starve out in the cold."

The Philadelphia American says:

"The days of the Dominion are numbered."

I think that will be sufficient for the present to show the tone of some of the important newspapers in the United States who represent public opinion. When we find papers of so much influence asserting these things, where do they get them? I venture to say they have not sent emissaries to Canada for the purpose of finding out the feelings of our people as to whether we "must go into the Union or starve out in the cold"; I venture to say they have not sent men of independent minds for the purpose of studying the history of Canada, its resources, its capabilities, its finances, its debt, and the progress this country has made since Confederation, for the purpose of forming an unbiased opinion on the question. Sir, these newspapers have taken their inspiration from the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite. They have cited the statements made upon the platform and in the press of this country, all crying down the Dominion of Canada as a country to live in, statements made, not with a view, perhaps, of hurting the country, but with a view of hurting the Government. Well Sir, I am not the only one who condemn such language of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I will read to you the opinion of a good Liberal journal, printed in New Brunswick, the St. John Telegraph:

"These absurd impressions are gathered from the little annexationist clique in Canada, whose feeble attempt to belittle and disparage this country fall upon willing ears on the other side of the line."

That is what I have said, and the St. John Telegraph, that has been for years fighting the battles of the Reform party, has come to the same conclusion. It goes on to say:

"But why should Canada starve? We have the great wheat fields of Ontario and Manitoba, the vast herd-producing plains of the North-West, and the fertile valleys, uplands and marshes of the Maritime Provinces, which are capable of furnishing bread to a population equal to that of the Republic. Or why should we be cold with our illimitable forests to furnish fuel, and with the great coal fields of Nova Scotia, the North-West and British Columbia?"

It appears to me that if hon. gentlemen opposite will not take those sentiments from us because we are too ready to cry up the old flag, and to raise the cry of loyalty, I think they will accept the opinions of one of the ablest of their own organs, as to the impression which their speeches are making upon the American people. Then it says further:

"Nor are we hungering for the Republican system of Government. We could have had it long ago had we so chosen. But a hundred and ten years ago we rejected it. Ninety years ago we again, in the most solemn manner affirmed our choice of a monarchical constitution. And to-day we are neither hungering nor striving for Washington rule. The Dominion will not fall to pieces yet a while, and the stability of the Republic has no guarantee of perpetuity. It has stood a hundred years, so have our St. John charter and our provincial institutions. In all that time our coast has not been blockaded, and we have been quite able to repel such feeble attempts at invasion as have fallen to our lot. Our history is so far clean of slavery records, Mason and Slidell surrenders, and the assassination of presidents. We are not striving for the honor of adding such incidents to our national annals. In fact Canada is in no sense a starving country, and the sooner our neighbors realise the fact the earlier we shall be able to congratulate them on their returning common sense."

Now, Sir, I myself, perhaps, would not be prepared to use such strong language as has been used by this journal, although there may be a great deal of truth in it. I will merely remark, not that the sooner our neighbors realise these facts that are related here, the better, but the sooner the whole people of this Dominion realise these facts, and to such an extent that they will reach their representatives also to realise these facts, and to express them, both in the House of Commons and on the hustings, the better it will be for the people of this wide Dominion. Sir, when we speak of the people of Canada being on the brink of starvation, it seems to me that we do not take into account the immense progress that has been made by this Dominion since Confederation, or even the immense progress that was made before Confederation, but particularly since. We need not speak of it in this House; there is not an hon. gentleman who if he will sit down and look into the matter carefully will not admit that the progress of the Dominion since Confederation has been far beyond the expectation of even the fathers of Confederation when they pictured out in glowing terms what our future would be. I have no doubt that our progress is marked by almost every event that has taken place as it has been marked by public works. But our people alone do not recognise the great progress we have been making; it has been appreciated, I will not say to its full extent, but it has been appreciated and is being appreciated by the mother land much more so than formerly, and by foreign nations besides. Take the United States themselves: Within the last three or four years the American people have appreciated, even more than one half of Opposition friends, the greatness of this country and the vast progress we have made. It is highly flattering to us, notwithstanding the disparaging terms used in some of their journals, and sometimes on the public platform, that so powerful a country as the United States should utilise our politics to the extent they do, even in running their presidential election. It is gratifying to us that they use this country so largely in the discussion of their public affairs, and they do this because we have forced them to the conclusion, not that we are menacing them as a rival power on their borders, but we are menacing them in a friendly manner in the way of commercial extension and general prosperity. I was surprised to hear the other day an expression used by an hon. gentleman opposite when he was trying to make a point—I do not know against whom he was trying to make a point—who said we loved Canada better than England, and the expression was cheered to the echo by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. It struck me at the time to ask why should that expression be so cheered. There has been no reason to force us to make a choice between our love for Canada and our love for the old country. Nothing has as yet been done by the mother country or by ourselves to force the choice as to which we like best. I have no doubt that should the time ever come that England would force upon us the choice, it would be time enough for us to make the choice. But the time was not so very long ago when the thirteen American colonies severed their allegiance from England, and when hundreds and thousands of people left that country for the purpose of coming under the flag of England. They did not proclaim, we love the thirteen colonies better than England, but they proclaimed they loved England better than their homes, heritage, everything, and therefore, loving England, better, they left their lands and emigrated to a country where they could still be under the old flag. I believe the descendants of these people were proud of their ancestors who left the United States and came to the Maritime Provinces, and at a recent anniversary of that occasion they were proud to have the most eloquent orators to dilate on the subject and to excite enthusiasm and patriotism in the hearts of the people assembled to hear them, and to take great credit for having shown so much loyalty and patriotism. I do not think we are called upon to declare that we like Canada better than we like England. If to-day we were driven to the choice; if the same thing was to happen, that unfortunately Canada was to sever her allegiance with England, we would find a large number of people of this Dominion who would do the same as the loyalists did and refuse to declare that they loved Canada better than England and would leave Canada, and if they could find a country that afforded as much promise as this country did at the time the loyalists came over and joined it, they would go there to be again under the old flag. Believing that, I do not hesitate to say that I do not think we are called upon to make expression of our choice in Parliament. Why, I see among those who joined in the applause representatives of the very constituencies where speakers dilated on the glories of the loyalist anniversary of the landing of the Loyalists in this country, and it appeared to me to be a direct contradiction of the sentiment that has been expressed by the most eloquent men that could be obtained for that anniversary. One hon. gentleman, during this discussion, said that what they were asking was in the interests of the farmers. In this House the farmer occupies a very large place indeed in the hearts of the representatives, and he has occupied a very large place in everything that influences the welfare of the Dominion and he occupies a very prominent place when a member has to go back to his constituents to seek re-election, and of course we are all desirous to have them at our backs. But when we hear hon. gentlemen proposing unlimited reciprocity as in the interests of the farmers and of this country, I ask the farmers, before they decide in regard to the subject, to look calmly into the question and not be led away with the idea that because they are in a bad position and suffering under the heavy burdens of taxation, and the allegation is made that money is being taken out of their pocket for the purpose of putting it into the pockets of rich monopolists, but look deeply into this question and see how their condition would be improved by having the American market open to them and our market open to the Americans. We remember how it was established at the time the National Policy was inaugurated, and how the farmers took hold of the point, that our market had become a slaughter market for the Americans; and if it was established then, we need only repeat that the same condition of things would recur and that our markets would again become a slaughter market for the Americans, and in return our farmers would not obtain the extended market to which hon. gentlemen opposite have alluded. I do not like to weary the House with figures, and I do not trouble the House often, but before concluding I desire to adduce a few statistics with respect to the construction of railways in the Dominion. The time of the House and the Committees is more largely taken up with considering the subject of railway construction and with granting charters to railway companies than almost anything else. In 1868 we had only 2,523 miles of railway in the country. In 1887 it had risen to 12,292. Surely that afforded proof of the great progress that had been made. The population per mile of railway in different countries is as follows:—Great Britain 1,930, Germany 2,065, France 2,110, Italy 5,000, Belgium 2,102, Holland 3,400, Russia 5,965, Canada 495. It is true that the United States is equally advantageously situated, for the number there is 417. The number of passengers carried in Canada for 1875 was 5,190,416; in 1887, 10,685,508. Tons carried, 1876, 6,331,759; 1887, 16,367,987 tons. The earnings in 1876 were nineteen millions and some hundred thousand dollars, while in 1887 the earnings were thirty-eight millions or nearly thirty-nine millions of dollars. These figures alone show the great progress that has been made in railway development. I need not quote any more figures to prove the great progress made by railways in this country, for all I have to do is to ask the people of the Maritime Provinces—I have not the same knowledge of the progress made in the other Provinces, so far as railways are concerned—and the people of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia can tell us of the progress that has been made in railways among them. Outside of the fact that we have the Intercolonial Railway from one end to the other of the Province of New Brunswick, and nearly from one end to the other of the Province of Nova Scotia, although not to such an extent as in New Brunswick, there is not a county through which the Intercolonial Railway passes, but has one or more branches of railways through that county to the seaboard. Take Restigouche and you find a branch from the Intercolonial Railway to the seaboard; in Northumberland you find as many as three railways; in Gloucester you find some 60 miles of railway to the seaboard; in Kent you find two branch railways, and in Westmorland you find another branch. All through the Province of New Brunswick you find these branches and this railway development. And these things have happened since when? Since relatively a very recent period; and all these things have happened how? By the aid of this Dominion to a very large extent, and by the aid of local subsidies. By the enterprise of the people of this Dominion, headed by the Government of the people of this country. What do we want with these railways if it is not to provide for the rapid growth of our industries and for the purpose of transferring either our manufactured goods or the products of our soil. Having dwelt upon that I will ask this House to consider for a moment—but possibly I am asking them too much as they have probably considered it before, and they may think me presumptuous for asking them now—but at any rate I will ask the people of this country to consider for a moment what is the resolution that has been presented to us by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Let me ask the indulgence of the House to read this resolution over once more:

"That in the present condition of affairs, and in view of the recent action of the House of Representatives of the United States, it is expedient that steps should be taken to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be affected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith."

Now, Sir, the conclusion of this is that it is expedient for us to take steps to negotiate for the purpose of ascertaining on what conditions we can secure full and unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. What are the reasons given for this resolution by the hon. gentleman who has no doubt made a study of the subject and whose large intelligence and wide knowledge of public affairs would have given him full authority to draw out a resolution of this kind even without any effort further than to draw from his own resources and his own experience. He says "in the present condition of affairs," but has he pointed out why, "in the present condition of affairs," this is necessary, unless it is the condition I have been trying to combat and which has been advanced by the gentlemen on the other side of the House, namely, the present bad condition of affairs as they say. There could be no other reason for it. But we are not in a bad condition of affairs, we are not in a position that it is incumbent upon us to look for any particular remedy to get out of the position in which we are. I say that our position to-day is sufficiently good, I say that our position to-day is sufficiently promising, I say that our position is sufficiently secure and that it is not necessary for us to look about everywhere for the purpose of getting some remedy from the evils under which we are said by hon. gentlemen opposite to be suffering. We are not suffering under any evils that we are not competent within ourselves to remedy, and we are not suffering from any grievance that this Parliament cannot remedy. Why, Sir, where are the grievances and where are the complaints made to the House of Commons? Where are the petitions; the usual mode of transferring to this House of Commons the grievances and the evils under which the people suffer. There are none. It is true we have the voice of some of the representatives in this House, but they represent a minority of the people, and in my opinion in the utterances which they give vent to into this House, they represent but a small minority of the people who voted for them. What strikes me very forcibly in this resolution is that the hon. gentleman gives as a reason why we should have recourse to this "the recent action of the House of Representatives." Have hon. gentlemen noted what that recent action of the House of Representatives is when they tell us that it is incumbent upon us immediately to ask the American people to give us unrestricted reciprocity? Is it because within the last few days, the United States have emphatically and in a way which is the most solemn and binding upon the people, by the voice of their representatives in Congress, said that they do not want to give unrestricted reciprocity to us? They have said they want to give us something else which hon. gentlemen opposite had nursed for a while but which they rejected as something they did not want. Hon. gentlemen opposite take the ground because the people of the United States have offered us something we do not want, that it is the proper time to go to them and ask them for that which they refuse to give us. It appears to me that if there was an inopportune time for this, it is the present time. If it is desirable that we should get this Reciprocity Treaty, the proper time for us to go is when these gentlemen instead of having offered us unrestricted reciprocity have their minds bent on giving us commercial union which the people of this country have repudiated and which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House after having nursed threw to one side like a soiled glove. If we did want unrestricted reciprocity it would be for us to wait until the anxiety of the American people had passed away to give us this commercial union. I will read, not for the benefit of this House who know it already, but because I desire it to go with the observations I have made, the joint resolution introduced by Mr. Hitt in the House of Representatives. It is:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever it shall be duly certified to the President of the United States that the Government of the Dominion of Canada has declared a desire to establish commercial union with the United States, having a uniform revenue system, like internal taxes to be collected, and like import duties to be imposed on articles brought into either country from other nations, with no duties upon trade between the United States and Canada, he shall appoint three commissioners to meet those who may be likewise designated to represent the Government of Canada, to prepare a plan for the assimilation of the import duties and internal revenue taxes of the two countries, and an equitable division of receipts, in a commercial union; and said Commissioners shall report to the President, who shall lay the report before Congress."

Now, Sir, it appears to me from this that the most inopportune time we could select even if we desired to have unrestricted reciprocity, is the present time. When the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was presented in this House I had not read the resolution introduced by Mr. Hitt in the House of Representatives, but I fancied that there must have been something in it on the line of the resolution we are now discussing. My surprise was great when I found that Mr. Hitt's resolution was exactly the opposite to this and that it offered us, what, as I have already stated, has been rejected by hon. gentlemen opposite. My greatest surprise however was when I discovered by whom this resolution was introduced to this House. I thought I remembered when the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution was with his party in power in this country. I remember that in speaking of the desirability of obtaining with the United States a more extended trade relation, that hon. gentleman had enunciated the sentiment that in order to get that, we should not say we were anxious to get it. I had heard of a speech he delivered in Prince Edward Island in which he said the way we would be least likely to achieve what we desired was to show ourselves too anxious for it; and believing that he was sincere when he uttered those sentiments, and that his obj<sup>ct</sup> to-day was what it was then, I was surprised that the hon. gentleman should have been first to show his anxiety by moving the resolution which he has done in the House and which he is making exertions to get his friends to support. Now, sir, I am done. I would simply repeat what I have said, that looking at our condition to-day as a representative of one of the most important constituencies in this Dominion, I cannot myself come to the conclusion that our position is such that we require to look for any great remedy to relieve us from the evils under which we are suffering. I do not believe we are suffering under such great evils. I think they are greatly magnified by hon. gentlemen opposite for the purpose of creating in the minds of the people of this country some discontent in order that they may benefit from it when the time comes for making a choice between the two parties. But we have this great satisfaction, that though these are the same arguments which they have used in the last six or seven years, and that this is the same tune that has been harped upon before the people of this country, we know that every instance in which the people have been appealed to when their verdict would have determined the position of parties in this House, they have always been in favor of the wise policy that has been pursued by the present Parliament, and not the policy advocated by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. PERRY. At this advanced stage of the debate on this very important question, I do not intend to trouble the House with very lengthy remarks. There is one thing certain, I do not intend to travel over England, France and Australia, nor over Germany, Russia or Austria; I will try to hold myself within this great Dominion of ours. I must say that the debate on both sides of the House has been very moderate, very instructive, and much to the point. However, I was surprised to hear the remarks made by the last hon. gentleman who has spoken (Mr. Landry). I thought that hon. gentleman represented a large number of farmers, fishermen and laborers, but he has certainly not to my mind made such a speech as would warrant me in coming to the conclusion that he is representing either the farmers or the fishermen of New Brunswick, and much less those of Prince Edward I-land, where I come from. The hon. gentleman is a very fluent speaker, and no doubt he has spoken very nicely and with satisfaction to himself and his friends; but, Sir, in all his ingenuity and narrowness, he has endeavored to run down the great nation across the line, to show that the Dominion ought to have no trade with the United States, but that we are able to rely upon our own resources without bidding the time of day to the people of the United States. Sir, he would lead the people of Canada to believe that we have no right to cross the line or to associate with the American people. I am sorry he did not give this salutary advice before the Government spent a million of the money of the taxpayers of Canada to build railways in the United States. The hon. gentleman told us of the great progress the Dominion has made under the maladministration of the present Government. Well, all I have to say is that the greatest progress the Dominion of Canada has made in the last ten years has been in rolling up a large national debt; she has progressed well in that respect, but not otherwise. One would think from the speech delivered by my hon. friend that his own constituents had no market at all to find in the United States. We might suppose that they could sell all their potatoes, all their eggs, all their oats, if they have any, all their hay, and all their fresh salmon, their smelts, their trout, their oysters, their lobsters, and every article they have to sell, to Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia; and when millions are paid out to encourage a line of steamers to run from Vancouver and China and elsewhere,

I suppose he expects that those articles will find their way to those countries. Well, Sir, it will be amusing to the House and a piece of information to the hon. gentleman's constituents, to be told that the people he represents have no other market in the world outside of what they find in the United States. I will read from a paper whose statements I believe the hon. gentleman dare not question. It is published at Shediac, and is called the Moniteur Acadien. I believe my hon. friend is the father of that paper, and is ready to swear to almost every word it contains. Now, what does it say? We find that last year, from the port of Shediac, not very far from where my hon. friend lives, they have shipped to England not one cent's worth of farm produce, not one cent's worth of hay, not one cent's worth of potatoes, not one cent's worth of lobsters, mackerel, or fish of any kind, or fish oil. I find that they shipped to Bermuda $5,979 worth, and to French St. Peters $600 worth; and a little further on I find that the hard-working, honest people of that county, those poor people who are over-burdened with taxes, who my hon. friend says pay no taxes, have had to ship and sell to that nasty country last year, to that country with whom we ought to have no dealing, to that country which is composed of very ugly people, who should be kept altogether outside of our trade, 12,682 bushels of potatoes, 111,142 dozens of eggs, 201,575 lbs. of smelt, 16,320 lbs. of fresh salmon, 18,864 lbs. of lobsters and 13,994 lbs. of mackerel, besides sundries, in all $37,688 worth. Now these are all the exports from the port of Shediac for the last year, as accounted for in this document; and in this document England and all the other parts of the world. France, Italy, Germany, Spain and all the rest, did not buy one cent's worth from the hon. gentleman's constituents, but the whole of their exports went to the United States. Still the hon. gentleman is prepared to shut that market out altogether. He says we have no right to go on our knees and ask the American people to negotiate unrestricted reciprocity with us. Well, who are going on their knees? Why, the present Government in 1879 went on their knees; and worse than that, if they prayed on their knees they prayed like a parcel of hypocrites, because they did not mean to carry out what they had made the law of the land. The leader of the Government had caused a law to be passed which provided that as soon as the United States would allow certain articles, the natural products of Canada, into the United States free of duty, we would allow corresponding articles from the United States into Canada free of duty. Well, last year, I remember quite well when this House was in Session, the Government got a little rap over the knuckles by the American Government, and under pressure allowed certain articles of natural products of the United States free of duty into Canada in response to a similar action on the part of the United States with regard to our products. But, no sooner did our Government take that course than a horde of these fruitgrowers from Ontario—no doubt, all Tories—came down, and asked the Government to re-impose the duty on American fruit. The Government replied: No, we cannot do that, but we will impose a duty on the baskets; and from that day out they were known in Prince Edward Island as the Government of the Peach Basket Policy. As I said a moment ago, I do not believe that my hon. friend has made his speech for the farmers of New Brunswick. He has not made his speech for the farmers of Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island, but he has made a speech no doubt to suit himself and the Government, and in all probability, if all were known, that hon. gentleman expects very soon to get clear of politics. At all events, he is not farming, I believe. The question of reciprocity is no new question in Prince Edward Island. In 1854 Prince Edward Island was a separate colony, and in that year we obtained the great boon of free trade with the United States. That treaty was abrogated by the Americans in 1866. It may be asked, why did they abrogate it? If you take up the statistics you will find that during the existence of that treaty, our exports to the United States were five hundred per cent. greater than our imports from them, and the Americans, who are an astute people, having access to our Trade and Navigation Returns, and finding out that the balance of trade was so much against them, no doubt decided to abrogate the treaty, and they may have been also impelled to some extent to do this by the feeling of hostility which grew out of the conduct and sympathy of the Canadian people during the American war. The year after the Reciprocity Treaty between Prince Edward Island and the United States was abrogated, I find that Sir Robert Hodgson, who was then administering the Government of Prince Edward Island, said in a speech at the opening of Parliament:

"Since the close of your last Session a visit was paid to the colony by a committee of the Congress of the United States. The object of their mission was to obtain information in connection with the subject of reciprocal trade between this island and the United States. A report of members of the Executive Council in relation to this matter, addressed to His Honor the Lieutenant Governor, will be laid before you, together with communications on the same subject which have passed between the Local Government and Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies."

This shows plainly that the people of Prince Edward Island were then quite alive to the great boon which they had enjoyed commercially under the Reciprocity Treaty with the United States. Well, a committee of three gentlemen was sent to Prince Edward Island by Congress to offer free trade. The offer was made, based upon the same principle as that on which the Treaty of 1854 was based, and that offer was approved of by all the members of the Executive Council of Prince Edward Island. It was approved of by Joseph Hensley, who was then Premier, Robert P. Haythorne, now one of the Senators here, W. W. Lord, George W. Howland, another Senator—and I hope he is still of the same mind—H. J. Calbeck, Alexander Laird and A. A. McDonald. These offers were endorsed and accepted by the people of Prince Edward Island, through the members of their Executive Council. I want to show the House that during the year 1887, the most of our exports of certain articles, such as horses, sheep, cattle, poultry, eggs, hides, coal, gypsum, wool, barley, went to the United States; and if the United States market had been closed against the farmers of the Dominion, as far as these articles are concerned, I would like to know where else they would have sold them. I find here that during the year 1887 we sent altogether from Canada 18,777 horses, and to the United States of that number we exported 18,225 horses, or very nearly the whole amount. Of sheep we exported altogether 443,000 head, of which the Americans took 363,000. Of cattle we exported 116,000 head, and of that quantity 45,000 head went to the States. Of poultry we exported $107,000 worth, of which $99,000 worth went to the United States. Of eggs we exported $1,825,000 worth, the whole of which went to the United States. Of hides we exported altogether $693,000 worth, and $413,000 worth went to the United States. Of coal we exported 527,000 tons, of which 494,000 tons went to the United States. Of gypsum we exported 140,000 tons, the whole of which the United States took. Of wool we exported 1,416,000 lbs., and of that quantity 1,300,000 lbs. went to the United States. Of barley we exported 456,000 bushels, the whole of which went to the United States. Now, if the advice of my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Landry) had been adopted by the people of Canada, they would have closed the market for all these articles I have mentioned, the most of which were exported to the United States. There are a great many other articles which are not mentioned in this; for instance, the article of mackerel. We know very well that the Atlantic Provinces export large quantities of mackerel, and to what market should they go? I would ask my hon.

friend from Kent (Mr. Landry) that question. They must sell them in the United States market. I know a dealer in Tignish where I live, who sent several barrels to Ottawa, to see how they would go, in order to get rid of this obnoxious specific duty of $2 a barrel. He kept them here in this city for two months, and in that time, how many mackerel do you think he had sold? He had sold the large quantity of ten mackerel, and he had to cooper his barrels again and send them to Chicago, and pay the $2 a barrel duty, and sell them there in the American market. My hon. friend wants to close up this market. He says we have no need of the American market, because we can have an inter-provincial trade. I will show you what is the benefit of the inter-provincial trade which the Government created of late years. They have endeavored to force a trade from Nova Scotia up here to these Provinces in coal. What is the result? They are carrying coal from Spring Hill in Nova Scotia to Quebec at the rate of $22 per carload on the Intercolonial Railway, and they are charging $20 for a carload of lumber from Bathurst to St. John. The distance from Spring Hill to Quebec is about 600 miles, and the distance from Bathurst to St. John is 214 miles. My hon. friend the member for Kent (Mr. Landry) allows his constituents to be robbed by the Intercolonial Railway charging two-thirds more for freight than the people of Nova Scotia are charged for coal from Spring Hill to Quebec. The members for Gloucester and for Restigouche have not raised their voice against this wrong any more than the member for Kent, and they have chosen to bolster up a set of petty industries in the lower part of Nova Scotia, while their own Province was being unfairly dealt with. If the same policy was carried but all through, instead of the charge on lumber being $20 per carload from Bathurst to St. John, it should be only $6.20. That part of Nova Scotia has to be well looked after. The Counties of Cumberland, Pictou and Colchester cannot be neglected. They must be looked after very closely. In 1890, we will have to pay our share of the $5,000,000 required for that great scheme, the Chignecto Railway, which is shortly to be built, and the Government did not blush to vote that money, though, when they were bound to carry out the terms of Union with Prince Edward Island, they did not think fit to do so, because Prince Edward Island did not choose to send members to support the present Government. In Sir John Macdonald's letter, which was written just previous to the election, he said that the plans and specifications were very easy to get for the subway, and that, when those plans were got, he hoped the work would be carried out.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was before the general election?

Mr. PERRY. Yes; just before the general election. Then, Sir Charles Tupper said he spoke very plainly on the platform on the day of the election—this was in a letter addressed to Mr. Ferguson, the candidate of the Government, in order to strengthen his influence. We find, also, that a report of the engineers has been published, stating that the subway is practicable, and that it can be built, but still the money is not voted. I have looked over the Estimates carefully, and I do not see one cent voted to show that the Government are going to carry out their pledge in building the subway or any other way. That is the manner in which Prince Edward Island is to be treated. We will go a little further and see the articles which are shipped to the United States from Canada and the duty which is paid on them. I want this House to understand that, although we have been told several times that the exporters of produce to the United States do not pay the duty, they really do, and this will prove it. In 1887 9,137,717 bushels of barley were sent to the United States, which paid a duty of 10 cents a bushel, or $913,771. In that year the American people produced in their own country 60,000,000 bushels of barley. Therefore, the 9,000,000 bushels against the 60,000,000 could not command the price, and consequently the exporter or grower of that barley in Canada had to pay the duty. Again, in beans, we shipped that year 197,764 bushels at 10 cents duty, and paid $20,660. Of peas, we shipped 405,353 bushels at 20 cents, upon which we paid $66,268. Of wheat, we exported 341,503 bushels at 20 cents a bushel, and the duty paid was $60,300; but the United States produced that year 459,000,000 bushels of wheat, and, therefore, our few bushels of wheat could not command the price. Of potatoes, we shipped 1,276,809 bushels at 15 cents duty, and paid $191,521. The American people grew in that year 169,453,539 bushels of potatoes. Therefore, our potatoes did not regulate the market in the United States. Of hay, we exported 69,450 tons at $2 a ton duty, and $138,900 was paid that year. Of horses, we exported 18,255, at 20 per cent., the duty paid being $112,867; but the price of those horses could not be regulated by our export, because the United States that year had of their own horses 10,357,488. Yet my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Landry) says the American people are a poor people, that they are not a progressive people, that they are not a go-ahead people, that their population is diminishing. If that is so, how is it that, while we are trying to make a country of Canada, we have a population of less than five millions, while they have a population of sixty-five millions, and, when you compare their products with ours, you must conclude that they are a great and a growing people. Of cattle in the same year we exported to the United States 45,765 head at 20 per cent., and we paid duty on them to the amount of $177,551. The United States turned out in that year 35,192,074. Of sheep we sent to the States 363,046 at 20 per cent., upon which we paid $194,896 duty. But the American people raised that year 35,192,074 head of sheep. Now of wool. We were told the other day by some hon. gentlemen that we would find a home consumption for our wool. The contrary is true, because in that year we sent there 1,297,867 pounds at 10 cents per pound, on which we paid in duty $129,796. During the year we paid in the vicinity of two million dollars into the American treasury on these few articles I have named. My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Landry) is quite willing to allow the United States to bleed our farmers in this way, he does not care so long as they vote right. But I cannot see it in that light, and I think his constituents cannot see it in the same light either. I do not mean to say that the people of Canada cannot live without the United States. I am one who believes that the Dominion of Canada can live without the United States; but I say that if you remove the barriers, if you tear down the Chinese wall which the present Government has built between the two countries and give us unrestricted reciprocity with the American people, we would be 30 per cent., yes, 40 per cent. better off than we are now. People may say that the day will not come. Hon. gentlemen opposite may try to frighten the people and try to make them believe that Imperial Federation is better. But they might as well try to stop the tide from rising with a pitchfork as to try to stop the day coming when we are going to have unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I think I can safely make these statements. I think that day will soon arrive, although not while the present Government are in power, because their policy is one of "to-morrow," and that is the way all the time. It is a policy of protection, in fact it is almost a policy of prohibition. Fancy the idea of having this Chinese wall between the great city of Boston and the great city of Montreal. What would American people think if there were a barrier between the great city of New York and the great city of Chicago? Fancy a Chinese wall between Massachusetts and Illinois—how would the people live?

Yet it would be much handier for the people of Montreal to reach Boston than for the people of New York to reach Chicago; and I say it is just as unreasonable to raise a Chinese wall between these two countries and expect them to prosper, as to expect these two states of the Union to prosper with a Chinese wall between them. The hon. member for Kent also stated—and I thought it a very queer assertion—that we would have better prices without reciprocity with the Americans than we would have with it. I do not see how he expected gentlemen on this side of the House to swallow that statement. He says that under unrestricted reciprocity the farmers of Canada could not expect to get as good prices as they have without it. Sir, I think I have shown by the figures I have quoted that such is not the case. When you consider the amount of duty being paid, when you take 15 cents a bushel on potatoes, 10 cents on barley, 10 cents on beans, 10 cents on peas, 20 per cent. on horses, 20 per cent. on sheep, $2 per barrel on mackerel, will that hon. gentleman stand up and tell me that he believes the statement that he has made? Sir, that statement was made, like a great many other statements which my hon. friend made, without thinking of what he was saying. It is impossible. When these barriers are taken down a man will export his horses to the United States at a price 20 per cent. better than he can do now, he will export his mackerel at $2 a barrel better than now, he will export his cattle 20 per cent. better than now. The Minister of Finance stated the other night that the farmers paid duty. He gave us a great piece of information, indeed, he told us that we paid no taxes. He told us that he himself did not use tobacco, that he did not drink whiskey and the poor farmers, he thought, might do the same, and, therefore, they would not pay taxes. Does he mean that the farmer, in order to pay no tax, shall build their houses with logs, as they did fifty or sixty years ago, with an old chimney place in the corner and a bar of iron across the chimney upon which to hang a kettle to boil the potatoes in, and I suppose they would not have a goose to cook very often if my hon. friend could have his way. Sir, my hon. friend is altogether wrong. Why, he contradicted every word which the hon. member for Kent has uttered to-night. He said that the country was prosperous, that the country was going ahead. Sir, if we are to go back to the years 1784 or 1834 to get an idea of our prosperity, then we have not progressed, we have retrograded. Does my hon. friend mean to say that the farmers are not supposed to build a comfortable house? Does he mean to say that the farmer would use no nails in building that house? Does he mean to say that the farmer will not have to pay a heavy duty on the two-pronged fork, on the three-pronged fork, on the four-pronged fork, on the shovel, on the spade, on the hoe, on the axe, on the horse shoe, on the horse nails, on the iron that mounts the truck waggon or the buggy, that mounts the plough, the mowing machine, the reaping machine, the horse rake, the harrow and everything else? Why, Sir, I would not be done until to-morrow morning if I were to repeat all the articles upon which the poor farmer has to pay this tax, which has been imposed upon him by the present Government. I find that last year we have imported $227,618 worth of flannel, upon which we paid $61,137 duty. Does my hon. friend mean to say that the farmers of Canada have used none of that flannel? We have imported $483,320 worth of shirts, upon which we have paid $126,632 in duty. Does my hon. friend mean to say that the poor farmers have not used any of these shirts? We imported in clothing $1,095,374 worth, upon which we paid $273,846 duty. Does my hon. friend mean to say that the poor farmer, the poor fisherman, the poor laborer, the artisan, the miner, have used none of these clothes? With what did he clothe himself, I would like to know? Has he gone naked? Of hats and caps there were imported last year $1,291,627 worth, upon which a duty was paid of $322,907. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the farmers, artisans and fishermen should go without hats and caps? I suppose they should wear straw caubeens. We imported 4,862,042 pounds of sugar on which a duty was paid of no less than $3,167,528. Is that not paying a duty with a vengeance? It is about 75 per cent. duty paid by the poor farmers, artisans, miners and fishermen. There is a large quantity of molasses used in the lower Provinces. The hon. gentleman forgot to state the high duty paid on the article; but I suppose the fishermen in his county do not use any molasses or the fishermen in Nova Scotia; but hon. gentleman opposite will be able to give them plenty of molasses on the eve of an election in order to soothe them, and I have no doubt the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) is an expert in offering molasses. We find that fish hooks, the materials to make the "jiggers" used to catch mackerel, fishermen's waterproof boots, the knife used to cut the bait, the twine entering into the nets and seines, the nails entering into the boats, the canvas that goes to make the sails, the rope that rigs the boat, and the iron that enters into the anchor and cable, all these articles are very heavily taxed. And yet the Minister of Finance tells us that these poor people are paying no taxes. I am afraid the hon. gentleman himself is paying no taxes; I believe he is not; in fact I believe he is more of a drag on the people than the amount of money involved. When I allude to that, I refer to the amount of his cab hire, which I say it is disgraceful for any country to allow. I find we imported last year $164,000 worth of Bibles, upon which we paid $3,211 duty. I suppose the Minister of Finance thinks the farmers do not read, but they will read his speech, and I hope when the next election comes they will read him out of the House. Of carpets there were imported $1,181,387 value, on which a duty was paid of $330,000. Are not poor people to be allowed the privilege of having a carpet on their floors or are they to have bare floors all the time? It appears to be the idea of hon. gentlemen opposite that poor people should not improve, but it is not my idea. I should like to see these poor people go ahead, I should like to see the farmers prosperous and independent; and while I am proud that there are a great many independent farmers in this country, I hold that there would be 50 per cent. more if they were not brought down by this miserable, narrow-hearted policy of the present Government, by which they keep up this Chinese wall between this country and the United States. The Government appear to think that the country can be made prosperous by opening communication with China and Japan, South America and other distant points when we have a market at our own doors, and all we have to do to obtain it is to take down the barriers. I endorse every line in the resolution introduced by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and it will be endorsed by the people I have the honor to represent and by the great majority of the people of the lower Provinces; and I state in my place in Parliament that any representative who speaks otherwise stultifies himself and misrepresents the interests of these people. What was the reason that Prince Edward Island in 1837 returned a solid phalanx of six members against the Government, not to support the Government as was asked by the late Minister of Finance? It was the miserable narrow-hearted policy of the present Government, and it was because unrestricted reciprocity was brought before the people and because they had had an experience from 1854 to 1866 of the Reciprocity Treaty with the United States. I believe at this time that if Prince Edward Island were a separate colony from the Dominion, less than three months would suffice to negotiate a commercial treaty between the United States and the island. I do not intend to detain the House longer, but let me repeat that the day is not far distant, in fact in my opinion it is at hand, when we are going to have a change of Government, and the people know that the sooner we have it the better. I have already stated that the members representing Restigouche, Gloucester and Kent have no right to sit here and allow the Government which they support to charge their constituents for carrying their lumber from Bathurst to St. John 200 per cent. more than is charged for carrying coal from Spring Hill to Quebec. They have a right to raise their voices against that injustice, and if they fail to do so I raise my voice on their behalf. I say the Government are doing wrong in this matter, and they should cease for their own sake, and I would warn them now to cease, because I believe no Conservative candidate will be returned at the next election unless these great wrongs are redressed. I hope if I have not convinced and converted hon. gentlemen opposite, I have pleased my constituents; I have spoken in their interests and also in the interests of the people of the County of Kent. I should not wonder if I were invited to run for election in that county.

Mr. LANDRY. I would sooner you would not come.

Mr. PERRY. The change might be a very good one. The rumor has gone abroad that the elections may take place next summer, but I do not think we will have any election so soon, for the Government are afraid to face the country, but if they are prepared I am prepared. I believe that the Government will die a natural death, and then if they die a natural death they can blame no one for murder.

Mr. DALY. I will not attempt, in the few remarks I am about to make, to offer any reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, as I will leave that to some hon. gentleman coming from the lower Provinces who is more conversant with the state of affairs in that part of the Dominion than I am. I simply rise for the purpose of endeavoring to set before this House, and before the people of this country some facts which I think will show that we have made some progress in this Canada of ours, and particularly in the North-West. We have had this discussion going on here for several days and several nights and no person from the great North-West or from Manitoba has had an opportunity of saying anything on the subject. I thought it would not be well to allow the opportunity to go by without endeavoring in some manner to refute the statements made on the floor of this House, that Canada has made no progress during the last ten years, or since the introduction of the National Policy. It has been a favorite theme with the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to endeavor to show that the policy of this Government in connection with the administration of lands in the North-West Territories and Manitoba, as well as their policy generally, has not been beneficial to that part of the country. I will endeavor to show from some statistics that that country is in a prosperous condition, and that it has prospered immensely since 1881 when the Canadian Pacific Railway was commenced. There is nothing which will tell the progress of Manitoba so well as the census returns of 1881 and 1886, and they record marvellous advances during the period intervening between these years. In 1881 there were only 2,384,337 acres occupied and of this 250,416 acres were cultivated and 230,264 acres under crop. In five years the acres occupied had increased to 4,171,000, the number of acres cultivated was 751,571 and there were 591,995 acres under crop showing an increase of over 79 per cent., 300 per cent. and 257 per cent. respectively. In 1881 we had a crop amounting to 1,033,623 bushels. In 1886 there were 6,711,186 bushels, and in 1887 there were 14,000,000 bushels; an average of 30 bushels to the acre, a yield unprecedented in the history of the world, a yield sufficiently large to supply all the wants of the Province, and to leave a surplus of 12,000,000 bushels for export. The comparison of the yield of grain in

Dakota, that land of promise which hon. gentlemen opposite are so liable to hold up to the people of this country as being the place where our dissatisfied farmers should go—the comparison of the yield of wheat between Manitoba and Dakota, which is looked upon as the banner wheat producing territory of the States, is as follows:—Dakota, when it had a population of 135,000, produced a total wheat crop of 2,830,259 bushels; while Manitoba with a population of 110,000—25,000 less than Dakota—produced more than five times that quantity. The contrast is still more striking when it is learned that 90 per cent. of the population in Dakota are said to be rural, and only 72 per cent. in Manitoba. In this same year the population of Dakota produced only 2,217,000 bushels of oats, 2,270,000 bushels of barley, and 664,000 bushels of potatoes, while Manitoba with a smaller population and a smaller percentage of farmers raised 2,500,000 bushels of potatoes, 2,000,000 bushels of barley and 7,000,000 bushels of oats. I think that those figures go to show that we have made some progress in the Province of Manitoba. I will go further now and compare the yield per acre in Manitoba with the United States and from which comparison the superiority of the soil of the former Province is manifest. In 1880, the average yield per acre in the States was 13.1; in 1881, 10.1; 1882, 13.6; 1883, 11.6; 1884, 13; 1885, 10.4. In the latter year the average yield per acre in the following States was:—Oregon, 15.9; Dakota, 12.8; Wisconsin, 11.5; Iowa and Nebraska, 11.3; Minnesota, 11.1; Indiana and Kansas, 10.6; Ohio, 10.2; California, 9.4; Illinois, 8.5; Missouri, 7.4; while in Manitoba the average was 18.4, much larger than the average of any of the other States. In 1887 when Dakota average had increased to 16 bushels per acre Manitoba had increased to 32 bushels per acre. In 1887 Manitoba raised more wheat than all the following States in the Union in the previous year, combined:—Massachusetts, Connecticut, Wyoming, Nevada, New Hampshire, Mississippi, Arizona, Vermont, Maine, New Mexico, South Carolina, Idaho, Delaware, Montana, Alabama, Utah, Georgia, Arkansas. In 1887 Manitoba raised more wheat than any of the thirty following States:—Massachusetts, Connecticut, Wyoming, Nevada, New Hampshire, Mississippi, Arizona, Vermont, Maine, New Mexico, South Carolina, Idaho, Delaware, Montana, Alabama, Utah, Georgia, Arkansas, New Jersey, Colorado, West Virginia, North Carolina, Texas, Virginia, Maryland, Washington Territory, Tennessee, New York, Oregon and Kentucky. I may say that in 1887 the total yield of Manitoba was 14,000,000 bushels, and in that same year the city of Brandon from which I come, marketed 1,500,000 bushels, that is the little city of Brandon eight years old marketed as much in 1887 as was raised in the whole of the territory of Montana. During that year the greatest yield of any of the States outside of Dakota was in Kentucky which raised 12,405,000 bushels and in the same year Manitoba raised 14,000,000 bushels. In the report of the Winnipeg Board of Trade respecting the disposal of the crop of 1887 it was shown that there were 432,000 acres under crop as per the report received from the Department of Agriculture. In September the board, assuming that the average yield would be 28 bushels to the acre, estimated the total crop at 12,000,000, but within a month after they decided that the crop actually reached 14,000,000 bushels. This was accounted for as follows:—Exported to Eastern Canada and Europe 8,500,000 bushels; converted into flour in Manitoba 2,600,000 bushels; used as seed for 520,000 acres, 1,100,000 bushels; in the hands of millers and shippers and of farmers for close marketing, 1,200,000, making a total of 13,400,000; and to this may be added wheat used as feed on farms sufficient to make up the 14,000,000 bushels. Now, Sir, leaving that phase of the question we come to this fact that the census of Manitoba, taken in 1886, shows that 16,000 farmers were in Manitoba that year, and it may be accepted as a fact that these farmers raised the crop of 14,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1887, having an average each of 875 bushels. With a wheat crop of 14,000,000 bushels grown on 432,000 acres, the average yield per acre was 32.4 bushels. In the year 1887, the value of our exports from Manitoba was as follows:—

Wheat.....	$4,675,000
Flour and bran.....	1,250,000
Flax, and its products.....	120,000
Barley.....	140,000
Oats and oatmeal.....	280,000
Dairy products, eggs, potatoes, vegetables, wool, hides, fish, &c.....	600,000
Total.....	$7,065,000

I may state that the value of furs is not included, is not in this statement. Now, Mr. Bell, the indefatigable secretary of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, in reference to that great crop of wheat which Manitoba produced in 1887, prepared some statistics to illustrate the extent of that crop, which I will give to the House. He says:

“The estimate is made on the basis of last year's (1887) wheat crop, which was 14,000 bushels. A few years ago, when Red River carts were the only mode of conveyance, an average load was estimated at between 800 and 900 pounds. If we were dependent on this conveyance to-day, it would take 1,000,000 carts to carry out the crop of wheat. They would extend in a straight line 5,000,000 yards, or 2,841 miles, which is practically the distance of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Vancouver to Montreal. The wheat crop would make 550,000,000 pounds of flour, and would weigh about 840,000,000 pounds. Transporting it in carloads of 650 bushels, weighing 39,000 pounds each, it would require 21,533 cars, making up a train 798,906 feet, 265,635 yards, or 151 miles in length, or it would load 466 vessels with 30,000 bushels each. Supposing a farmer's sleigh or waggon load to be one and a-half tons, it would require 233,333 waggons to carry the wheat. Supposing the average distance of the farmers from market to be eight miles, in going and coming, to deliver the wheat of the Province, our farmers would travel 3,733,328 miles. This wheat would feed, according to the adopted amount laid down per head of population, 2,800,000 people for one year, and would feed the present population of Manitoba for 21½ years. It would seed 7,000,000 acres at two bushels to the acre, or 10,907 square miles. It would seed a mile in depth along the Grand Trunk Railway from Toronto to Montreal 33 times over, or a strip two-thirds of a mile wide around the world, in this latitude. The acreage under wheat last year (1887) in Manitoba, equals a strip of land two miles wide, extending from Toronto to Montreal.”

Now, Sir, I think if the hon. gentleman who spoke on this question can digest these figures and the illustrations given by Mr. Bell, they will come to the conclusion that we have made some progress in the Province of Manitoba. They referred to the wheat crop of only one year, to-day we have a larger acreage by 25 per cent. under crop than we had then, and I am perfectly satisfied that it is only a matter of time when we shall double the output of wheat made in 1887. Now, Sir, we have in Winnipeg, as the United States consul the Hon. G. W. Taylor. He has been there a number of years, and he makes annual reports to Washington. In his report of 1887, we find some very interesting figures. The declared exports from the Winnipeg Consulate for 1887 were $448,353 to the United States, against $232,109 in 1885; to Great Britain, $632,058 against $395,232—the falling off being in furs, to Eastern Canada (estimated) $6,000,000, against $1,500,000 two years previous. The trade with British Columbia rose from almost nothing to an aggregate of $250,000, chiefly shipments of flour, oats, barley and dairy products, with an importation of lumber and fish valued at $50,000. There is an evidence of the increase of our inter-provincial trade. Consular records at Winnipeg exhibit an exportation of fish—the catch of Lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba—amounting to 1,488,330 lbs., in 1887, with invoice value of $61,359. These shipments were made to Buffalo, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Omaha, Kansas City and Chicago. The supplies of wheat of 1887 are placed at 10,000,000 bushels, valued at $5,200,000, against 4,530,000, valued at $2,778,000 in 1885; 2,200,000 in 1884; 1,000,000 in 1883; and 500,000 in 1882. Speaking of the yield in 1887, the Consul says:

"Such a harvest, particularly of wheat, is without precedent in the annals of American agriculture."

Now, we find a general statement in the consular report of the trade of Manitoba with Eastern Canada, the United States, Great Britain and British Columbia, as follows:—

Countries.	Imports.	Exports.	Total.
Eastern Canada.....	$5,450,280	$8,000,000	$13,450,280
United States.....	2,735,140	540,793	3,275,933
Great Britain.....	841,751	650,043	1,491,794
British Columbia.....	50,000	250,000	300,000

Our total imports in 1887 were $9,152,843, our total exports $7,492,371, making our total trade $16,650,214. This shows a vast increase over the trade of 1886, which totalled $12,118,492—the imports being $7,820,959 and the exports $4,297,523; and over that of 1885 when the imports were $10,983,713 and the exports only $2,627,341 and the increase is still more emphasised when compared with the trade of 1872, amounting to a pastry $1,208,361, of which all but $85,541 were imports, or with that of 1873 when the imports only amounted to $918,336 and the exports to $246,783—a total of $1,165,319. The development of the inter provincial trade is most marked, increasing from $7,824,566 in 1886 to $11,750,280 last year, an increase of almost $4,000,000. Now, to show the very large progress that has been made in Manitoba, I might point out that the best evidence of the progress of our country is to be found in its educational facilities. We find that we had in Manitoba in 1871, 16 Protestant schools and 17 Roman Catholic schools; in 1881 we had 128 Protestant schools and 17 Roman Catholic schools; in 1887 we had 522 Protestant schools and 78 Roman Catholic schools; and out of 529 teachers employed in the Protestant schools of Manitoba 310 received instruction at the Provincial Normal School. We have high schools at Winnipeg, Brandon and Portage la Prairie. We have the Manitoba University, which is denominational; St. Boniface College, representing the Roman Catholic population; St. John's College representing the Church of England, the Wesleyan College representing the Wesleyan Methodists; and Manitoba College representing the Presbyterians. With regard to the progress made in our railways, in 1877 there was not a mile of railway completed in the Province of Manitoba, and to-day we have 1,135 miles of railway in the Province, of which the Canadian Pacific Railway has on its main line 315 miles, the balance being made up of branches. The Manitoba and North-Western 217 miles; the Red River Valley 67 miles, and the Hudson Bay 40 miles. Now, I could not give better evidence of the fact that we have a large and increasing trade in the Lower Provinces than to show the trade in the city of Brandon. I heard the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) say the other night that our farmers had not any market for their horses. Well, I would tell that hon. gentleman that in 1888, we received in the city of Brandon alone 85 carloads of horses from the East, and taking an average of 18 to the car, that would give 1,530 horses; and we received during that year 24 carloads from the West. Now this is but one point in the Province of Manitoba. If we received 85 carloads of horses at Brandon, no doubt Winnipeg received as much, and Portage la Prairie and other places received their due proportion. Since the 1st of January, 1889, up to to-day, we have received from Ontario 22 carloads of horses. To give you an idea of the progress our farmers are making, we find that wheat is selling at Brandon, at $1.05 cents a bushel; oats, 24 cents a bushel; barley, 28 cents a bushel; eggs, 20 to 25 cents a dozen; butter, 20 cents a lb.; pork, $7 a 100 lbs; beef, $1.25 per 100 lbs.; hay, $6 a ton; mutton, $5 per cwt.; and other articles in proportion. As a further evidence of the progress we are making in the way of immigration, I may read for the benefit of hon. gentlemen who are decrying our country the report of the Emigration Agent, at Brandon, Mr. Bennett. He says:

"The increase of immigrants to this district has been 27 per cent. over that of 1887.

"The arrivals from Great Britain increased every year since this agency opened. The class of immigrants, with very few exceptions, were excellent. There were a large proportion of the farming class, and better provided with letters of credit, and Bank of England notes, than came under my observation any previous year. Several have taken homesteads, some have purchased improved farms, others have bought railway land, while one has invested £5,000 in real estate, and has in reserve an equal amount for investment when favorable opportunity offers.

"The immigration from the Eastern Provinces was also very great, nearly all of whom were in good circumstances, bringing their stock and effects with them, and through the medium of their friends had farms purchased, to which they moved at once.

If you will read that report and the other reports of immigration agents in Manitoba and the North-West Territories you must come to the conclusion that our population is largely increasing, that we are building up the country, and that our resources are daily becoming greater. Things with us are in a much better condition than they are in Dakota, which hon. gentlemen opposite are so eager to quote as being a paradise of prosperity. To show you how much better off we are than the people in Dakota, I will read you a letter from Mr. L. A. Hamilton, a gentleman well known in Winnipeg. He says:

"One dollar and three cents a bushel was the ruling price for wheat at Gretna, Manitoba, on the 2nd inst. Only 96 cents a bushel was offered at Neche, Dakota, on the same day. These stations are only two miles apart. It is, therefore, seen that the Manitoba farmer received 7 cents a bushel more for his wheat than his Dakota neighbor. Ontario farmers intending to move to the North-West should carefully consider these facts before selecting Dakota in preference to Manitoba. I think to politicians another lesson is also suggested by this comparison.

"L. A. HAMILTON."

I would impress upon hon. gentlemen opposite this comparison, which shows that wheat is selling at $1.03 cents in Gretna while it is selling at 7 cents less two miles distant on the American side. The best evidence we can give of the condition of the unfortunate people in Dakota, for I say they are unfortunate, despite the statement of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) the other night, when he said that from Brussels, sixty families had gone to the United States. I hope they have not gone to the Territory of Dakota, because any gentleman who has read the papers during the last three or four months must have noticed the terrible distress that is reported to exist among the people there. Every day men from Dakota are coming into our section, and they say the reason more people do not leave is that they have not money enough to move. I hold in my hand a letter published in the Winnipeg Call from Mr. Martin, and without having seen this man that wrote this letter, I am perfectly satisfied he is a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite. He says:

"I have been a resident of Dakota for six years, and as that is the place to which so many Canadians are alleged to have gone to better their condition, I feel anxious to give my experience in that land of hot winds, drought and hail. In the spring of 1883 a party of us settled in Brown and McPherson counties. It must be remembered that Brown is rated as one of the best counties in the Territory. The wheat of that year did not yield more than five bushels per acre, oats not more than twenty. In '84 we were more fortunate than any of the neighboring counties. We had sixteen bushels of wheat and twenty-five bushels of oats per acre. In '85 a few got as high as twenty-one bushels of wheat and thirty of oats, but hundreds did not get more than half that amount. In '86 we got from three to seven bushels of wheat and ten to fifteen of oats. In '87 from fifteen to twenty-five of oats. In the past harvest ('88), wheat ran from three to ten bushels, oats from eleven to twenty-four, while hundreds of thousands of acres, south and west of us, were never cut at all. In regard to barley, it did not yield any better than wheat or oats. I sowed barley four seasons, and three seasons out of the four I did not get ten bushels per acre. I have been over a large portion of Manitoba during the past summer and this fall, and found farmers in every district ready to testify to the growing of one hundred bushels of oats, forty and some fifty of wheat, and fifty to seventy of barley. Now, I wish to say right here that there is no use of any paper of Toronto or any other place denying the above figures, for we can bring the proof from any part of this Province that they are correct. Of course some parts are badly frozen this year, but, in this, the worst year that Manitoba has seen, there is a better crop of oats and barley than I ever saw in Dakota, and, as a rule, the farmers are not at all discouraged, mostly all having something left from last year's bountiful harvest. Nearly all that I have talked with are out of debt, or nearly so, and not as the Oak Lake writer says, waiting for a chance to sell, but say they are here to stay. My nearest neighbor says that he spent his last 25 cents for bread on his way from Portage here. Now he has 800 acres of land, 5 horses, 15 head of cattle, a comfortable house, in which is a good organ, rides out in a covered buggy, and owes no man a dollar. Many others that I have met get here with scarcely a dollar and to-day are in good circumstances, while in Dakota nine out of every ten settlers cannot show value for half the amount they took there. Here we get good lumber—"

And this is something I want to impress on hon. gentlemen opposite.

"—for $15 per 1,000 feet, there the price is from $25 to $30. Here the settler has but to go to the timber lands and cut his fuel; there he must buy coal, or follow up the cattle for cow drips, which nearly all have to do. Should a settler here want to borrow money it can be had at eight per cent. per annum; there he must pay three per cent. per month, and give the best of security for it at that. That may appear a big story but thousands of settlers are paying that rate of interest, and have everything in the line of stock and implements mortgaged for all they can get upon them. For example, should a settler want to get credit at a store for six months' goods he must give a mortgage upon his crops or stock as security, and hundreds of settlers, not being able to meet those payments on account of failure of their crops, are destitute, and have nothing left to face winter with, and they cannot go to the bush, as the settler in Manitoba can, to get fuel, but must buy coal or suffer as only those that have had to live upon those bleak prairies without good fuel can describe. I have helped some of my neighbors to do their threshing here, and was surprised to see oats turn out fifty bushels per acre in this the worst year they have ever seen in this part. Taxes do not amount to more than one-third the amount here that they do in Dakota. Some townships there pay as high as thirty mills on the dollar school tax, and with that amount only get three to four months' school. Now, I would advise every Canadian in search of a home to come and see Manitoba for himself, and see if he cannot do better than this Oak Lake writer, who must have put in five years of hard labor to get sixty acres under cultivation, which is about two months' work.

"G. W. MARTIN."

That letter is signed by G. W. Martin, a man who wasted six years of his life in Dakota, and who told a friend of mine that he thanked God he had enough money left to bring him back to Canadian soil again; and yet Dakota is the country which the hon. gentleman the other night held up as the country to which every Canadian should go. We cannot deduce any other conclusion from the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) because he made out that the United States, of which Dakota is a part, is a better country than Canada. I showed the other night that the land laws in that country are not as liberal as ours, though the hon. gentleman has made the contrary statement for four or five years past. I ask any hon. gentleman to go to the Library and take the land laws of the United States and examine them, and I guarantee that he will find that those laws are not as liberal as ours. I have shown by the letter I have read that their taxation is larger than ours, and that they cannot raise produce as well as we can in Manitoba; but, notwithstanding these facts, which must be as much within the knowledge of the hon. gentleman as they are within mine, they have the hardihood to stand up here year after year and make these statements. I will give you some further evidence on this subject. I see the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), smiling. I will give him a dose by and by, but I will give the House a few facts now in regard to this matter. David Caffery, Brandon Post Office, Township 12, Range 18, has 2,000 bushels of No. 1 hard on hand, after paying everything; Geo. Halse, Brandon Post Office, south-east  $\frac{1}{4}$  of Township 30, Range 9, Section 18, west, had about 1,700 bushels of wheat, and has about 1,000 bushels after paying all; Geo. Roddick, W. H. Danbar and G. Roddick, jun., Brandon Hills Post Office, Township 18, Range 3, Section 18, and other lands, have not sold yet; they have nearly 16,000 bushels on hand amongst them, half of which will pay all liabilities; D. W. Shaw, Brandon Post Office, west  $\frac{1}{2}$  of Section 10, Township 10, Range 19, had about 1,800 bushels which will net \$1,000, last year; Allan Young, Griswold Post Office, Township 10, Range 22, Section 23, netted \$2,700, after paying everything, last year; Jas. McFarlane, Chater Post Office, Township 11, Range 18, will net \$1,000; Percy Selwyn, Rounthwaite Post Office, Section 1, Township 8, Range 18, will net \$1,500; Samuel Hannah, Griswold Post Office, Township 10, Range 22, Section 23, sold \$5,500 worth of wheat, and has 1,500 bushels on hand and 2,000 bushels of oats, and will net over \$3,000; Jas. Young, Griswold Post Office, Township 10, Range 22, Section 23, sold \$3,400 worth of wheat, has 2,000 bushels of oats in hand, and will net \$2,000; R. bt. Hall, Griswold Post Office, Section 18, Township 10, Range 22, will net \$2,000; W. J. Good, Griswold Post Office, Township 10, Range 22, Section 18, will net \$2,000; Geo. Stewart, Stratherne Post Office, Township 8, Range 17, Section 16, had 1,000 bushels of wheat, and will net over \$1,000; Wm. Dorsey, Stratherne Post Office, Township 8, Range 8, Section 17, will net \$1,200; Jas. McFadden, Stratherne Post Office, Township 8, Range 17, Section 4, had over 7,000 bushels of wheat, and about 3,000 bushels of barley, and will clear over \$2,000. I could give you many other incidents of the prosperity of the men in the neighborhood of Brandon, and, from my own personal knowledge of the men whose names I have given, I know that most of them went to Manitoba without a dollar. They came from Nova Scotia, from New Brunswick, from Ontario and from Quebec, and, when hon. gentlemen opposite state that the farmers of Ontario cannot make a livelihood to-day, let them send them up to the Province of Manitoba. Take the case of the Rev. George Roddick, who came from Pictou, Nova Scotia, and crossed the Assiniboine in 1880, scarcely nine years ago, and yet to-day he has 10,000 bushels of wheat, worth ten thousand good Canadian dollars. In face of these facts which I have given to the House, in order to show that, if in other Provinces the farmers are not prosperous, they can come to our great land of promise, hon. gentlemen will continue to make the same statements. It is true that we have had drawbacks, but notwithstanding those drawbacks, notwithstanding the bad seasons we have had, here is the record of one year in regard to these men whose names I have mentioned, and I do not think there can be any better argument than this to prove that we have a great and glorious country, and that all we have to do is to be true to ourselves and then we need no nearer or closer relations with the United States of America. I do not suppose that there is any hon. gentleman on this side who does not desire trade relations with them, but it ill-becomes anyone to stand up in this House and, because an irresponsible representative in the House at Washington proposes a resolution in favor of commercial union—not in favor of unrestricted reciprocity—to ask us to vote for the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), because, if you read that resolution you will see that the desire is expressed to establish commercial union with us if we desire to establish it with the United States, and the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford says that we will act in view of the recent action of the House of Representatives at Washington. That resolution was passed in the dying days of the Cleveland Administration, it did not reach the Senate of the United States or the President, and yet, in view of those facts, we are asked to vote that we are in favor of such a scheme. When the proper time comes, when the people of the United States, through their representatives in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, approach our Government in a proper way, that, in my opinion, will be the proper time to consider this question; but no evidence has been produced to show that we are not open to negotiation. Evidence has been given to show that time after time we have shown our friendship to our American cousins, and have been ready to meet them half-way. We have no necessity to go down on our marrow-bones to them. The fact is, that it was not until the Canadian Pacific Railway had bound this great country of ours together and developed our magnificent resources that the people on the other side thought we were worth any consideration, and now it appears to be possible that there is a conspiracy on the part of men like Mr. Wiman and Mr. Butterworth and Mr. Hitt, and their friends on this side of the line, to get hold of the vast country which we have developed by our own resources. Does anyone suppose that we cannot develop our own country ourselves? The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), said in his speech that for twenty-five years the people of the United States had this great Chinese wall that the last speaker spoke of, about them. We have not had it ten years yet, and I venture to say that when we have had it for twenty-five years we will be able to present just as good a case as the hon. member for North Norfolk, the advocate of the United States, has presented in favor of that country. I was amused at the remarks of the hon. gentleman who last spoke (Mr. Perry), who is evidently not a free trader. He was not for unrestricted reciprocity, he was not for commercial union, because he wants to have unrestricted reciprocity with a country that has a much larger tariff than we have now. Sir, if hon. gentlemen opposite think that they are going to hoodwink the electors of this country, they are very much mistaken. They went to the electors in 1882 and 1887 upon a similar cry, and that cry was met in the same way that it will be met in 1891, and that is that the right hon. gentleman who leads the House will come back here with the same majority that he has to-day. Now, in regard to inter-provincial trade: I stated a short time ago that I would give the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Perry) some facts. I was rather enlightened this afternoon to hear that the people in that portion of the Dominion were able to ride out in buggies. I thought, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman who last spoke, that they were so poverty stricken that they could not even ride in a waggon; but I am informed by hon. gentlemen in this House that Mr. McLeod, of Summerside, whom, no doubt, the hon. gentleman knows, has recently ordered \$25,000 worth of top buggies for Summerside, and he ordered them from a Gananoque manufacturer. Now, if these people are in the condition described by the hon. gentlemen opposite, how is it that they have money put by with which they can pay for these buggies? To give you a further idea of this inter-provincial trade, I find that carloads of waggons, containing 600 in each, were ordered from Fredericton, New Brunswick, the other day. The waggons were all put up in sections. They are worth \$75 each, which amounts to \$45,000, and these for that one city alone. We find also that Mr. Fairchild, of Winnipeg, one of the smallest dealers in Manitoba in agricultural implements, ordered recently 250 buckboards, worth \$30 a piece, and 1,000 buggies worth \$75 apiece. These are little instances of the inter-provincial trade that is springing up between the different Provinces. These facts that I have given show that that trade is increasing in Manitoba at a great ratio. I have spoken of the resources of Manitoba. We have a Province to the west of us that is not very often heard of in this House, that is the great Province of British Columbia, and I think, under the circumstances, that it would not be out of place for me to refer to the progress that Province has made during the past few years. Let me read from the eloquent words of Lord Dufferin, who said, speaking of British Columbia:

"Canada would indeed be dead to the most self-evident considerations of self-interest, and to the first instincts of national pride, if she did not regard with satisfaction her connection with a Province so richly endowed by nature, inhabited by a community so replete with British loyalty and pluck, while it afforded her the means of extending her confines and the outlets of her commerce to the wide Pacific and the countries beyond."

Now I find that according to statistics for the years 1858 to 1886 the gold mines of that Province yielded $50,289,417, that the salmon industry, having thirty canneries, employing 5,000 hands, annually packed an average of 200,000 cases, at $5 a case. The Skidegate Oil Company extract oil from the livers of dog-fish to the extent of about $400,000 annually, yielding 40,000 gallons. From 1860 to 1870 only 320,000 tons of coal were shipped from Nanaimo to San Francisco. Rich magnetic iron ore is found on Texada Island, only twenty miles distant from Nanaimo and Wellington collieries. In 1887 the coal output from the Province of British Columbia was 410,573 tons, and we find that San Francisco alone took 335,864 tons. The output of the Dunsmuir mine was 242,723 tons, valued at $4 a ton at the pit's mouth, equal to $966,892 and employing 915 men. The Vancouver output was 187,850 tons, valued at $537,300, employing 615 men. The East Wellington Company had an output of 30,000 tons. Taking these figures altogether it shows an output in that year of $1,624,192 worth of coal. On Vancouver Island are to be found splendid locations for hundreds of families, and the opening of the railway reserve will supply hundreds more. It is estimated that there are 389,000 acres of arable land on the island, of which 300,000 are well suited for agriculture, the greater portion, however, being densely timbered. The New Westminster District is not exceeded in fertility by any tract of land on the coast. The productiveness of the delta lands is marvellous. Statistics carefully prepared give the return per acre, at 75 bushels of oats: hay, 3½ tons; barley, 40 bushels; turnips, 40 to 50 tons; potatoes, 30 tons. Roots and vegetables attain an enormous size, and the yield to the acre is very prolific. In this district there is a quarter of a million of acres of prairie. Dr. Dawson, an authority unquestioned, estimates the whole area of agricultural lands east of Fraser River, in the southern portion of the Province, at 1,000 square miles, which may be easily utilised:

"In the Spallumcheen, Salmon, Okanagan, Kootenay and Columbia regions there are thousands upon thousands of acres of arable land yet to be claimed."

Again Dr. Dawson says:

"There is a large agricultural section, an extensive area of low land, lying west of Fraser River, and chiefly north of the fifty-first parallel, which I estimate at 1,230 square miles."

Of it he says:

"The soil is almost uniformly good; but, being to a great extent covered with trees, it cannot be utilised so readily for agricultural purposes, and it lies, besides, off the route of the railways, and is not likely to be opened up for some time. Still, it is a country which I have every reason to believe will be occupied eventually by an agricultural population."

Now, we find from these facts that I have given you that the trade of British Columbia has largely increased. Both British Columbia and Manitoba enjoy a very large trade. I regret that I have not the figures here to show the trade of the North-West Territories, but taking the returns of Manitoba and British Columbia together they are evidence, to every fair minded man in this House, that our great Western Provinces are in a very prosperous condition. I am satisfied that when this question is fully discussed before the people of Manitoba and the western portions of this Dominion in general, you will find from their attitude upon the subject, that they are just as loyal to the Crown of Great Britain as are the people of the Eastern Provinces, and they will give no uncertain sound in relation to this question. I cannot understand for one moment how anyone who was born in Canada, as I have been, can have any misgivings as to the future of this country. We have Prince Edward Island on the east with its large agricultural resources, with its large fishing industries, then we have New Brunswick with its great timber resources, Nova Scotia with its fisheries and mines, Quebec with its minerals underlying almost the whole surface of that great Province, Ontario of equally large wealth to any one of the United States. We have between here and Port Arthur timber and mineral wealth equal to any to be found on the continent. From Port Arthur to Manitoba there is one long stretch which the traveller expects to be a barren waste, yet underlying the surface of rock we find vast deposits of silver and gold, and at the Lake of the Woods, through the instrumentality of the Canadian Pacific Railway, there has been opened one of the largest water powers in the world, and there is running at that point one of the largest mills in Canada. On the great prairies of Manitoba and the North-West we raised, in 1887, 14,000,000 bushels of wheat. If we raised that quantity in 1887, how many bushels will we raise in 1897? These are facts which require careful consideration. If our population does not increase in the same ratio as that of Dakota, our resources have developed in a greater ratio. Those hon. members of this House who have not been through the Province of Manitoba I invite to come. If you do not believe the facts I have given, come to our Province in August and see thousands upon thousands of acres of golden grain ready for the sickle; and more than that, nearly every acre of grain is cut with Canadian machines. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) referred to the fact that the farmers of Manitoba were down-trodden and were oppressed, and because of the National Policy they were paying so much for their machinery. As the effect of the National Policy, what do we find? In 1882 binders were sold at $3.5 each and today binders of the latest pattern and best make can be purchased for $180 cash. That is the effect of having protection. If we had not that protection, American machines would have ruled in the North-West, and where would have been the factories in the east? As I was saying, in Manitoba and the North-West we have fields of golden grain; and as you go west to Alberta you find there the greatest ranching country in the world and the finest grasses found in any of the western territories. Travelling through the grand and magnificent stretch of scenery in the Rocky Mountains and the Cascades you reach British Columbia, the riches of which I have already pointed out; and taking the chain of Provinces together, I say it is a Dominion of which we must be proud. I feel proud of it, as we must all feel proud of it, and I not only feel proud of it, but I feel proud of our British connection, and we must all hope and trust that not only ourselves but our descendants may enjoy the freedom and the prosperity which we now enjoy under the grand old flag that has braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have listened with much pleasure to the address which has been delivered by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Daly). With the great portion of his address I entirely agree. He has spoken with regard to the fertility of the soil of the North-West, of its immense resources, the rich mines, the great fertility of the soil, and the increase that has taken place in that country during the last three years. I am very glad to know that, after Canada has spent hundreds of millions of dollars in developing the resources of the North-West, the time has now arrived when we may look for a slight return for the large expense incurred. I noticed, however, that the tone of hon. gentleman opposite has changed very materially during the last few years. It was not always as hopeful as it is at present. The hon. gentleman opposite did not speak of the great development that was taking place in this country; this has only taken place lately, only since they have obtained a Local Reform Government that had the backbone to stand up for the rights of the Province, and demand that fair play should be meted out to it. And what was the result of the Province assuming that attitude? The long continued series of disallowance of charters passed by the Local Government for years and years intended to develop and open up that great country ceased, and the very moment the Local Reform Government took the matter in hand and determined that they would not allow those proceedings to continue, the Province obtained relief. That was one of the main causes of the prosperity in the North-West, and I do not think there is a single hon. gentleman in this House who will not be glad to hear that our great and fertile possessions in the North-West, of which we all feel proud, are increasing in wealth and prosperity. While this is the case, the whole of the hon. gentleman's argument is foreign to the point under discussion. What has that to do with the question of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States? The hon. gentleman has read extracts from statements by farmers all over the North-West Territories, stating how many bushels of wheat they raised and how many bushels of turnips they raised, and all such stuff as you could get in any ten cent almanac. If you take any of the thousand immigration pamphlets distributed gratis in every part of the country you can obtain nine-tenths of the hon. gentleman's speech, and I do not see that it has anything to do with this all-important question we are discussing. Although the North-West may have increased to a wonderful extent and although it may continue to increase, no man would say that if the people of that country had access to markets which extend for 3,000 miles along their border and if trade could ebb and flow between the United States and the North-West, the prosperity of that portion of our country would not be increased. The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House (Mr. Daly) mentioned the large exports of coal from British Columbia, and he stated that 410,000 tons were shipped from the mines of British Columbia, and that the greatest portion went to San Francisco. Does the hon. gentleman know that on every single ton of coal that enters San Francisco there is a duty paid of 75 cents per ton; and will the hon. gentleman say that if that duty were removed and the coal admitted free the miners of British Columbia would not receive so much more for their coal. The production of coal in the United States in 1880 was 7,480,000 tons, and that quantity has largely increased since that time. Accordingly, the 410,000 tons we exported to the United States from British Columbia formed only a drop in the bucket and had no effect whatever in establishing prices. It is as plain as a ray of light that, if the duty on this coal were removed, the miners of British Columbia, and those of all sections of the Dominion from which coal is exported, would receive so much more pay. This is a great and important question, it is one of the most important questions that has ever come before this Parliament, and I therefore think that in discussing it we should consider it not as Reformers or Conservatives, but as Canadians. We should ask ourselves this question: Will it be for the prosperity of Canada that we should adopt unrestricted reciprocity? If it will build up this country, if it will make the people of this country more prosperous or more contented, then by all means we should adopt it; but if on the other hand it does not fulfil these requirements then we should reject it. I have listened quite attentively to the arguments brought forward against our adopting this resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and I have not heard one single argument that I consider was worth anything in rebutting the arguments advanced on this side in favor of adopting this policy. If we look at the enormous quantity of goods that we sell to the United States annually, and the kind and quality of those goods, it can be readily seen that if the duties were removed the producers in this country would realise a very much larger amount than they now secure. If we take the products of the mines, fisheries, forests, animals, agricultural products, manufactures, and miscellaneous articles, we find that we exported to the States last year no less than $37,333,161 worth, while to Great Britain our whole exports of those articles last year was only $33,648,200 worth. Thus, while we have to pay a very large duty to get our goods into the United States and while in England they go in free and without having to pay any duty, these figures prove that in spite of all these barriers we export to the United States of those products nearly four million dollars worth more than we do to Great Britain. This proves that the markets of the United States are our natural and best markets for these products, and I think it could be easily shown that if it were not for the duty we have to pay, and if it were not for the obstruction thrown in the way of the trade between this country and the United States that our exports to that country would be largely increased. I will treat the matter first from an agricultural standpoint, because I think that the agriculturists of this country on account of their greater number as compared with any other class, the great excess of capital they have invested in their farms and farming lands, and the greater number of men they employ, are entitled to the first consideration of this Parliament. I believe that any line of policy which will benefit the farmers will be for the interest of the people to adopt. If we consider the product of the farm we find that nearly everything exported is sent to the markets of the United States. Of barley alone there were nearly 10,000,000 bushels exported to the States last year, and only 1,687 bushels to England, showing clearly that the United States market is the only market for that great produce which the farmers raise so extensively. Upon that barley we had to pay a duty of $936,000 to get it into the States. I say that we had to pay the duty, because if it had not been for that ten cents a bushel our farmers would have got for their barley that $936,000 above the price which they did receive. The United States last year consumed about 65,000,000 bushels of barley, so that you can readily see that the quantity that we exported to the United States bears such a small proportion to the quantity consumed, that it could have had no effect in determining the value there at all. We also exported horses largely to the United States, and the hon. gentleman who preceded me spoke about the great trade in horses between Ontario and the North-West. There is no doubt there is a large trade between the Provinces, but we must look for a foreign trade, because we have a large number of horses which must be sent somewhere else. Last year 19,925 horses, valued at $2,400,000, were exported to the United States, and upon those horses we had to pay a duty of no less than $480,000. The same argument will apply to our paying the duty in this case as applied to barley. In the United States it was estimated last year that the Americans had 13,000,000 horses and if you take the average life of a horse at 13 years you will find that it requires an annual supply of 1,000,000 horses a year to keep up the supply in the United States. What signifies the little less than 20,000 horses that we exported there; it is as if we only sent one single horse to the United States, and it has no marked effect on the supply, and would not alter the price. Hay is a product in which the farmers in the western part of Canada are much interested in, and last year we exported 84,000 tons of hay upon which there was a duty of $170,000. There again the duty came out of the pockets of the farmers of this Dominion, because in the United States they consume 196,000,000 tons of hay every year, and the quantity we exported could make no appreciable difference in the price. We sent 10,000,000 lbs. of wool to the States last year, on which we paid a duty of nearly $96,000; of horned cattle we sent 40,000 to the United States and we paid a duty of $139,000; we sent a little over 1,000,000 sheep to the United States, upon which we paid $71,000, and I maintain that all this money paid in duty came out of the pockets of our farmers. So much for this question from the farmers' standpoint. I think that it can be readily seen from the statistics I have given and which have to some extent been given by the gentleman who preceded me, that there can be no doubt that if the farmers of the country had free access to the markets of the United States for all those articles which they export there so largely, they would have just so much more for them as the duty paid for getting them in there amount to. We might take up many other lines of our exports and the same rule would apply for all. I find that we exported $3,000,000 worth of fish to the United States last year and we paid on that fish no less than $524,000 duty. Will any man say that if that duty of 20 per cent. was taken off the fish going into the United States, our fishermen all over the Maritime Provinces and Newfoundland would not benefit largely by a policy which will admit their fish into the United States free of duty. The annual production of fish in the United States is so much larger than what we export there, that the same argument would apply, and the quantity we might send would not reduce the price one iota, but every dollar of it would go into the pockets of the fishermen of this country. Then, this policy would largely increase the prosperity of the miners of this country, and develop to a wonderful extent the mineral resources of this Dominion. When Sir Charles Tupper made his Budget speech two years ago, when he introduced the tariff on iron, he spoke in eloquent terms of the great mineral wealth of this Dominion—of the illimitable mines of phosphates, and of coal, and iron ore from which the very best quality of iron could be produced. He stated that we had in Nova Scotia what was not possessed by any other country in the world—almost illimitable mines of coal and iron and all the necessary materials for producing the very finest grades of iron, lying right alongside of one another; and they were on the line of railways which connect with every portion of this vast Dominion, and near the sea coast where they could have access to all parts of the world. Yet, strange to say, although we have all these resources and facilities, what has been the result of the imposition of those iron duties? They have not developed the iron mines of this country. The Londonderry Iron and Steel Works, although they were started a few years ago under the most favorable auspices, and although their coal and iron were carried over the Intercolonial Railway at a dead loss to the people of this Dominion, yet with all those advantages they have failed over and over again. Thousands and millions of dollars of capital have been sunk in those works, until the introduction of the heavy iron duties imposed two years ago, and the infusion of more capital into the concern, I believe, have enabled it to carry on its work; but for many long years it has been a dismal failure. The reason is simply this, and it must be apparent to any hon. gentleman in this House, that the company have not got a market for their goods. They have all the facilities and all the advantages that any company ought to have, and they ought to do an immense trade and send their goods all over the world; and if this measure of unrestricted reciprocity were brought about, it would be one of the greatest blessings to the miners of Nova Scotia which possibly could be brought about. Why, Sir, the exports of our mines last year amounted to $3,341,000, consisting largely of coal, iron and copper. Of coal, we exported 427,000 tons to the United States, paying a duty of $318,000. It is strange that while we export to the United States no less than 427,000 tons of coal, principally from British Columbia, we are at the same time importing a much greater amount from the United States. Now, if unrestricted reciprocity were introduced, a great development in the mines of this country would immediately take place. Notwithstanding our vast deposits of iron and copper ore all through the Lake Superior region, we find that while there is great activity in the development of the mines on the south side of the lake, on the north side I am sorry to say there is idleness and desolation. The reason of this is plain, because it will not pay to invest millions of dollars to develop those mines, to construct lines of railway and smelting works, so long as there is not a market to which the product can be sent. But once you break down the wall, and open the markets of Boston, New York, and all the great centres in the Eastern States, a great development would immediately take place. Then, so far as our lumbermen are concerned, I think it would be of great advantage to them if the duty on lumber were removed. Now, Sir, I find that of the products of the forest we sold last year to the United States $10,622,000 worth, and only $8,932,000 worth to England. This shows again that the best market for the lumber of this country is in the United States. Our lumber export consists principally of planks, boards, joists, hardwood lumber, deals, and various other kinds. Our exports of planks, boards and joists were 508,304,100 feet, on which we paid a duty of $1,016,608. Will any man say that if this duty were removed, if the walls were thrown down, the lumbermen of this country would not get that much more for their lumber? And you must remember this fact, that of the products of the forests there is only a small proportion that can be exported to the United States. It does not pay to pay a duty of $2 a thousand on second-class lumber; consequently it has to be sacrificed, and it is only the best cuts which it will pay to send to the United States at all. Now, if this duty were removed and the market made free, the whole product would go, and the value of our vast resources of timber would be greatly enhanced. Now, I think it must be apparent to any one that the farmers, the miners, the fishermen and the lumbermen would be largely benefited by the adoption of this policy. But there is another class that we have to consider, that is the manufacturers of this Dominion. It has been stated by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that the adoption of this policy would simply wipe out our manufacturing industries—that our manufacturers would have to go to the wall. Well, I would be very sorry indeed to support a measure that would wipe out the manufacturing industries of this country. I am glad to know that we have manufacturing industries which are a great advantage to the country; they are developing its resources, and they are building up and making this the great nation which we all desire to see. But instead of this policy being injurious to the manufacturers of this country, I claim it would be greatly to their advantage. Why, the milling industry of this Dominion, which is by far perhaps the largest and most important in the Dominion to-day, an industry that employs a capital of about $20,000,000 and gives employment in various ways to millers and packers, bakers and coopers all over the land to the amount of nearly 8,000 or 9,000 men, would receive such an impetus by the adoption of this policy, that before very long their prosperity and number would be greatly increased, and we would actually supply the Eastern and New England States with all the flour they want. Let me say one word as to the policy of the Government with regard to the milling industry. This Government has acted in a most shameful way towards the millers. Anybody can start any kind of manufactory in this Dominion; he may start making mosquito nets or fly traps, or any little thing of that sort, and down comes the Government and gives him from 35 to 40 per cent. protection. But here is a great industry, the very backbone of the Dominion, and how does the Government treat it? The Government do not even put the millers on a plane with the American miller. They do not treat them as they do the cotton and woollen and other manufacturers. The moment the cotton manufacturer engages in business he is allowed his raw material in free, and has a protection of 35 to 50 per cent. on his manufactured goods. The woollen manufacturer and other manufacturers are protected in a similar way, but the milling industry is actually discriminated against in favor of the millers of the United States. There is 22 cents a barrel more duty on the raw material than on the manufactured goods, and although this anomaly has been pointed out over and over again, although hon. gentlemen on both sides say it is wrong and should be remedied, and although I have heard members of the Government admit it was wrong, yet no steps are taken to remedy it, and the wrong consequently remains unredressed. Let us take up another branch of manufacturing industry. Take our cotton manufacturers. Is there any possible reason why the cotton manufacturers of this country should not be able to compete with those of the United States or elsewhere? They have all the skilled labor they want, they have the best machinery they require, they have all the facilities for carrying on their business economically and successfully, and why should they not be able to compete with the Americans? Take the cotton mills of Cornwall or Dundas? They have the best of water power, every facility in the way of shipping, all the skilled labor they require, and the very best machinery. They can get their raw cotton from the south at about the same figure, or even cheaper than the cotton manufacturers of the United States can, and why should they not be able to compete with the latter? They can, but here is the trouble: On account of our limited market, on account of our being only 5,000,000 people all told in this Dominion, these manufacturers must take up several different lines, while in the United States the manufacturers can confine their efforts to one article. The Americans take up one, or at the most two specialties, and devote all their energies, and time, and attention to those, and consequently they can reduce the cost down to the lowest possible figure. They have 60,000,000 of people to sell to; but what would become of the manufacturer in this country if he took up one specialty only, when he has but 5,000,000 people to sell to? He is forced to take up a good many different lines. A gentleman who is largely engaged in manufacturing paper told me that his firm had to take up 16 or 20 different lines, but that if unrestricted reciprocity were introduced, they would at once devote all their time and attention to one or two specialties, and by that means be able to reduce the cost down to the lowest possible figure, and compete successfully with the manufacturers in the United States. The moment this measure would be brought about, our manufacturers, having this wide and extended market to cater for, would be at once able to devote their attention to one or two specialties and compete with the manufacturers in the United States. All we want is fair field and no favor. I might apply the same remarks to our woollen manufacturers. I see no possible reason why they should not be able to compete with those of the United States, and I believe they would be able if they were only allowed free access to the American market. Take another trade which would be largely developed by the introduction of unrestricted reciprocity—the trade of sashes and doors, and woodwork of every kind. That trade would be considerably benefited. Mention has been made in reference to waggons and buggies going to the North-West. I happen to know something about this trade. I know that in the town of Chatham, Kent County, we have one of the largest, perhaps the largest, manufactories in Canada. They are making there one of the very best waggons made in this Dominion and one of the cheapest. They have all the facilities for carrying on an extensive trade. They have the very best machinery, the very best and cheapest skilled labor, and, I believe, are able to turn out waggons as cheaply as they can possibly be turned out. But the factory, with all these advantages, is only running not over six months probably in the year. The rest of the year the mechanics are discharged, and have to find work wherever they can. I claim that as soon as these walls are thrown down and unrestricted reciprocity introduced, not only this waggon factory but every waggon factory in Canada would be running full time, and instead of turning out, as they do in Chatham, 3,000 waggons, they would turn out probably 10,000 waggons before two years have passed. There is in the State of New York, within a stone's throw of the factory, more people than we have in the whole Dominion, and almost within stone's throw of the factory is the line of railway which permeates all parts of the country. Our Chatham manufacturers could lay down their waggons in New York, and sell them below the price they are sold for there. I believe they have sent one or two carloads of waggons to the State of Maine and paid the duty on them. A gentleman who has the contract to build the Short Line—I do not know but what it was the Short Line we have heard so much about—had a contract there, and found he could buy the waggons or the carts in the town of Chatham, and take them there more cheaply than they could be got there. I believe that, the moment the wall was thrown down, our waggons and our buggies will have an increased sale, and the factories would employ many more men than they are employing to-day. There is an objection which has been taken to this resolution, and I think it is the only tenable objection which has been taken to it, but I do not think, when you examine it, that it amounts to very much. It has been represented that, if this resolution were adopted, we would lose a large amount of revenue—I think some $7,000,000—on imports from the United States, and therefore we would have to resort to direct taxation. Any person who considers this question for a moment need have no fear on that account. If you put an Act upon the Statute-book which will increase the prosperity of the people of the Dominion, which will put more money into their pockets by millions of dollars, you need not be alarmed about a few million dollars of revenue. I believe, you will get more revenue than will be required, and anyone who looks at the enormous increases that have taken place in the expenditure of the Government of this country in the last few years, must be struck with alarm at the rapidly increasing expenditures which are thrown on the people of this Dominion. I will give a few items. The interest on our public debt in 1877-78 only amounted to $7,048,883, but it increased in ten years by $2,774,000. Then, the Administration of Justice, which in 1877-78 cost only $564,000, last year cost no less than $678,000, or an increase of $113,000 in ten years. In this connection, let me say that I am sorry to see the resolution which the Minister of Justice has placed upon the Order Paper. I see that, by that resolution, he proposes to add $2,000,000 to the debt of this country. He proposes to add $71,000 a year for all time to come to the expenses of the Administration of Justice. A more iniquitous, a more diabolical measure, I believe, was never introduced into this House. Not a single argument can be advanced in its favor. The hon. gentleman proposes to increase the salaries of the judges, to add $1,000 a year to the salaries of men who are getting $5,000 and $6,000 a year, besides an allowance of $1,000 and $1,500 a year for travelling and other expenses. It is a perfect shame for the Government to bring down a measure to saddle $71,000 a year more on the people of this country; and that amount is to go into the pockets of men who are now getting large salaries. A salary of $5,000 or $6,000 is a large amount. I have heard men in this House abuse the Government because the civil servants are getting, some of them, salaries of $2,500 and 3,000 a year, and yet they propose to give the judges $1,000 more than they are getting; whereas the civil servants give value for their money, they work all the day during every day of the year, they are doing their duty, and they do it honestly and fairly; but I do not believe that one of the judges in this country is overworked, not one of them does as much in a month as an ordinary man does in a week. Take the salaries of our bankers and our business men throughout the country, and you will find that there is no comparison between their salaries and the salaries of the judges. I say it is a perfect shame that the Government should come down and propose to saddle upon the country the additional charge of $71,000 for the increase in the salaries of judges. What will be the effect of this? Next year you will have an application from the County Court Judges asking why they should not have another $1,000 as well as the Superior Court Judges. The Government of the day, having established the precedent and laid down the principle, cannot go back upon it, and probably the expenses of the country will be increased enormously next year by increasing the salaries of the County Court Judges. I hope the Government will carefully consider this matter, and that before the Bill is carried an earnest protest will be entered—at all events from this side of the House—against the proposition. There are a few other items to which I desire to refer in which the expenses of this country have increased enormously during the past few years. In 1877-78, immigration cost $154,351; last year that ran up to $244,789, an increase of over $90,000 in ten years. What was the result? I need not go over the figures, because they have been stated here so often; but if you look at the result in the North-West and all that we have spent, the millions of dollars that have been spent for immigration to the North-West, the census returns show that a large proportion of the immigrants who were said to be settled in the North-West must have gone to another country. I think the policy of the Government in spending $240,000 or more in promoting immigration should be put a stop to. I do not believe in taking the money of the people of this Dominion, the mechanics and the artisans of this Dominion, and using it to bring out competitors with them in the labor market of this country; and, if anything in the expenditure of the Government should be cut down altogether, it is this abominable system of immigration. I do not think the money is spent as it ought to be at all or in the public service. Then, there is another item which has largely increased, and that is the item of Militia and Defence. In 1877-78, that cost us $618,000; last year it ran up to $1,273,000; that is an increase in ten years of more than 100 per cent., or of $655,000. I do not believe that all this money is necessary in order to carry on that department. I believe, without bringing any charges, and it is not my duty to bring any abusive charges against any particular department, that the policy is wrong, and that there is no need to spend so much. Then, take the Mounted Police in the North-West, which in 1877-78 cost $334,000, and last year cost $862,000, an increase of $528,000 in ten years. Civil Government: 1877-78 cost $823,369; 1887-88, $1,258,618; increase in ten years, $435,249. Fisheries: 1877-78 cost $93,262; 1887-88, $416,182; increase, $322,920. Indians: 1877-78, cost $421,503; 1887-88, $1,000,802; increase, $579,299. Legislation: 1877-78 cost $618,035; 1887-88, $807,424; increase, $189,389. Miscellaneous: 1877-78 cost $81,167; 1887-88, $464,448; increase, $383,281. Total expenditure, for all purposes: 1877-78, $23,503,158; 1887-88, $36,718,494; increase, $13,215,336. Let me say a word about superannuation. Superannuation cost us in 1877-78, $106,000, last year it cost us $212,000, doubling in the last ten years. Now, I think this is a system that ought to be put a stop to. I think the time has come when this Parliament should put its foot down upon this system of superannuating officials. If our officials are not getting salaries enough to enable them to keep themselves, support their families, and lay by something for old age, then, I say give them an increase of salary. But this system of taking money out of the pockets of the people to provide for retired officers is entirely wrong. When this system was first brought into force it was supposed and also proposed that the receipts from the Civil Service would be able to meet the requirements of this fund, but from year to year the expenses have increased and the receipts have not increased in proportion. Then again, if this system as it was at first inaugurated, and if it was carried out as it was intended, to provide for men who had grown old in the public service who become disabled in serving their country and allowing them to make some provision for their old age, it would not be so bad; but when we know that men in the prime of life, active, stirring, enterprising men, are quietly superannuated, and needy supporters of the Government are placed in their situations, I say that the system is one that cannot be defended on any ground. Let me give you one instance that occurs to me just now. Mr. Alexander McNab, who was Superintendent of Government Railways in Prince Edward Island, a man receiving a salary of $3,400 a year, only forty-five years of age, a young man in the prime of life, a man who for many long years was able to perform all the duties devolving upon him, his position was required by a needy supporter of the Government he was superannuated, he went to Chicago and obtained a lucrative position there, and he is drawing, and will continue to draw for the rest of his days, no less than $1,700 out of the pockets of the people of this Dominion. Now, this system is wrong, and, as I said before, if these men do not get enough, let us increase their salaries. Now, Sir, let me say, in conclusion, that I believe that this policy of unrestricted reciprocity, if it can be obtained, will confer the greatest possible benefits upon the people of this Dominion, that it will build up the various industries of the farmers, the fishermen and the lumbermen in this country, and believing all this, I shall give it my hearty support. I believe that if the Government of the day were prompt and would take this matter up in earnest, as they ought to take it up, in the interests of the people of this Dominion, I think there never was a time in the history of this country more opportune for doing so than the present. We were told last year that we could not get it any way, and what was the use in trying? Well, Sir, you never will get it unless you try; and the fact that the American Congress have passed that resolution that has been mentioned, shows clearly to my mind, at all events, that they are ready to negotiate in this matter. They have taken the first step towards a conference, they have held out the olive branch to us, and in the interests of Canada we ought to meet them in the same spirit. There surely can be no objection to that, there can be no possible objection to passing the resolution that is proposed, and conferring with the people of the United States; we are not bound to accept what they propose, we need not accept anything unless it suits the interests of the people of this Dominion, unless it will make our people more prosperous, content and happy. What possible objection can there be in meeting them half way, to conferring with them and asking them upon what terms they propose to meet us? Believing, as I do, that this measure is one that ought to be adopted, that it is the bounden duty of the Government, now above all other times, to meet the American people upon even terms, and confer with them, I shall support this measure. Sir, with unrestricted reciprocity nailed to the mast, I look forward in the near future and see this Canada of ours making vast strides forward, to see the vast prairies of the North-West, the hills and valleys of the East filled with an intelligent and progressive people, one in sympathy and action, the inheritors and possessors of the same institutions, the noblest, the freest and the brightest development of mankind.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 13th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 107) respecting the Wood Mountain and Qu'Appelle Railway Company.—(Mr. Macdowall.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 108) to amend the Act relating to the House of Commons. He said: The object of the Bill is to provide for the manner in which cheques shall be drawn for the amounts which are placed to the credit of the Internal Commissioners.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 109) to amend the law respecting the Exchequer Court. He said: The object of the Bill is to make further provision in reference to enquiries made by the court, and to regulate the rule-making power of the Exchequer Court.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENTAL REORGANISATION.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 110) to repeal the following Acts:—

An Act respecting the Department of Trade and Commerce, 50-51 Victoria, chapter 10;

An Act respecting the Department of Customs and the Department of Inland Revenue, 50-51 Victoria, chapter 11; and

An Act to make provision for the appointment of a Solicitor General, 50-51 Victoria, chapter 14; and for other purposes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Explain.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister of Justice asks me to explain. I think he was a member of the House when these Acts were placed upon the Statute-book. Some of us on this side objected to them at that time, and they have now been on the Statute-book for nearly two years, and no action has been taken by the Government in relation to them. The Government said it was important that these departments of the public service should be reorganised, that some of them should be made less important than they are now, and they stated that it was necessary that another law officer should be appointed. We were assured that the Minister of Justice and Attorney General was not equal to the discharge of the duties that pertained to the law department of the Administration. Now, the hon. gentleman has been two years since that period in charge of that department, and the Government, who are responsible for introducing these measures into the House and carrying them through Parliament, has taken no action upon them. Nothing has been done to put these measures into operation. It was said also at the time that it was very desirable to introduce the system of Under Secretaries that existed in England. But there was not the remotest resemblance between these measures and the organisation of the departments in England. We all know that in the Executive Government in England each department has a subordinate as well as a chief, who has a seat in one or the other Houses of Parliament, and every department of Government is represented in both Houses. But there was nothing approaching to that system in the policy of these measures; the Government, so far as the two Houses are concerned, would stand exactly in the same position in which they are to-day. It is true that, either for the purpose of getting rid of a colleague, or for some other purpose, the hon. gentleman proposed to abolish the Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue as they now exist, and to make these two Ministers subordinate officers in a Department of Trade and Commerce. Well, Sir, I have no objection to the appointment of a Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think it is very well that such an officer should exist, and it seems to me that the natural and appropriate thing to do is to make the Minister of Customs a Minister of Trade and Commerce. There will be no additional charge upon the public if such a policy is adopted, and it is consistent with the line of duties that that Minister has now to discharge. It is perfectly clear that it was for party convenience that these measures were put upon the Statute-book. The hon. gentleman who is at the head of the Government has never found the party exigencies, up to this moment, to compel him to advise His Excellency to bring these measures into operation, and so they have remained a dead letter upon the Statute-book. I have heard the hon. gentleman, several times since I have been in Parliament, say that it was better that a measure should not exist at all than that it should remain inoperative upon the Statute-book. These measures have been upon the Statute-book for two years, they are still inoperative, and certainly it looks very much like an attempt on the part of the Minister of the Interior for the time being, to make Parliament a mere register of the wishes of the Administration. Here we have three departments that the Government have proposed to alter or to amend, and to have new officers appointed, and they take that power on the ground that it was urgent in the public interest that changes should be made. It will be two years on the 23rd June next since these measures became law, and no action has yet been taken. Those of us who thought that the proposed changes were not in the public interest, have had our views vindicated by the conduct of the Administration since. Surely if the hon. gentleman believed it necessary, as his supporters, at all events, believed, that the Department of Justice should be strengthened in the way he proposed, it was as proper to appoint that officer the moment that the power was obtained creating the office of Solicitor General as it would be at this moment. The fact that the hon. gentleman has got on without this subordinate officer, for two years since the measure was passed, is an evidence that that officer was not required, and that the hon. gentleman who is now the Minister of Justice and Attorney General, is adequate to the discharge of the duties of legal adviser of the Administration. The hon. gentleman also said at that time that it was very important that offices of a subordinate degree should be created for the purpose of introducing new and inexperienced men of talent into the Administration, and to give them a sort of training as apprentices before they attempted to perform the duties of the more important offices which other of his colleagues are called upon to fill. Well, I pointed out at the time, and I have seen no reason to change my opinion, that while a system like that might work very well in England where society is segregated into orders, and where the sons of noble men are introduced at an early period of life into Parliament, and put in possession of office with a view to giving them the experience and training that is supposed necessary to qualify them for public life, such a policy and such a course are altogether unsuited to the democratic character of this country. The hon. gentleman has sitting around him able men who have never been in office at all, and who certainly could not, without a serious loss, abandon their private business to accept any such office as that which he proposed to create; and it does seem to me that the fact that these three measures to which I have referred have been upon the Statute-book for nearly two years, and that no action has taken place, shows that there was no necessity for them, and that they ought to be repealed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I do not think I can be induced to enter into a discussion of this nature on the first reading of the Bill, with all due respect to the hon. gentleman. I have not seen it yet, but when the Bill is printed and stands for its second reading, we will be ready to discuss the matter with my hon. friend.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SESSIONAL INDEMNITY.

Mr. SKINNER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 111) to amend chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intitled: "An Act respecting the Senate and the House of Commons." He said: The effect of the Bill, if passed into law, would be to allow members to be absent from the House for not more than 30 days during the Session, without any deduction being made for the sessional allowance.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HORSE ISLAND, GEORGIAN BAY.

Mr. LISTER, in the absence of Mr. BARRON, asked, Has the Government sold Fitzwilliam or Horse Island in Georgian Bay? If so, when, and to whom? What was the extent of the island in area and pine timber at time of sale? What was the price paid for the island? Under what authority or right did the Government of Canada claim the right to sell the island?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Fitzwilliam or Horse Island was sold to Joseph Cozins on the 1st June, 1882, for $2,000, on the approval of Mr. Phipps, the Government agent, made in February, 1882. The area of the island is about 12,000 acres; the quantity of pine, large and small, estimated at 500,000 ft. board measure. The lumber sold at $500. The Government had the right to sell the island under the Manitoulin Treaty of 1862.

ST. BEATRIX, JOLIETTE, POST OFFICE.

Mr. NEVEU asked, Whether the Government intend to grant the request of Mr. H. Ladouceur, and others, asking that the post office of St. Beatrix, in the county of Joliette, be transferred from its present location to the house of Hormidas Ladouceur, the latter being more central?

Mr. HAGGART. The application made on 1st March inst. was sent to the Post Office Inspector for enquiry and report.

SEED WHEAT, MANITOBA.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE asked, Whether the Government are willing to accept from those settlers in Manitoba who are still owing for seed wheat, &c., advanced to them in 1876, the payment of the amount due by them, without interest, and upon such payment, to discharge the mortgages held against their respective real estate?

Mr. CARLING. This question is now receiving the attention of the Government.

LITTLE DOVER POST OFFICE.

Mr. KIRK asked, Is it the intention of the Government to establish a post office at Little Dover, in the county of Guysboro', and connect it by a weekly mail service with Canso, as petitioned for?

Mr. HAGGART. The application has been referred to the Post Office Inspector at Halifax for inquiry and report.

OYSTER PONDS' POSTMASTERSHIP.

Mr. KIRK asked, Is it the intention of the Government to appoint Mr. Mark Hadley to the vacant postmastership of Oyster Ponds, in the county of Guysboro', as petitioned for?

Mr. HAGGART. The question of making an appointment to the postmastership of Oyster Ponds is under the consideration of the Government.

LUNENBURG POST OFFICE.

Mr. EISENHAEUER asked, Whether any repairs were done to the post office at Lunenburg during the year 1888; if so, what did they consist of, what was the cost, who did the work, what was the amount paid, and to whom paid?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no post office building at Lunenburg, as the hon. gentleman knows. The Government purchased a site in May, 1887, and on 31st September, 1887, $53.27, for legal expenses in connection with the purchase of the site, was paid to Mr. Wallace Graham.

SAWDUST IN CANADIAN RIVERS.

Mr. EISENHAEUER asked, Were any fines imposed during the years 1887 and 1888 for violation of the law prohibiting the throwing of sawdust into the rivers of the Dominion; if so, what are the names and residences of the parties so fined, the amount of each fine, and whether all or any of such fines have been paid, and dates of payment?

Mr. TUPPER. There were fines imposed by the Government in 1887-88 for violation of the law in regard to throwing sawdust in the rivers of the Dominion. In regard to the latter part of the hon. gentleman's question, as an answer would involve considerable research, I would ask the hon. gentleman to give notice of motion in the regular way, and then the information will be brought down in a return.

OVERFLOW OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL (translation) asked: Whether it is the intention of the Government to submit to Parliament, during this Session, such measures as will prevent the destruction caused by the periodical overflow of the St. Lawrence at Montreal, and in the surrounding counties?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, I may state that it is not the intention of the Government.

ST. BARTHELEMY STATION POST OFFICE.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to accede to the request of the inhabitants of the parish of St. Barthelemy, county of Berthier, and to establish a post office at or near to St. Barthelemy Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway; and if so, when?

Mr. HAGGART. It is not at present the intention of the Government to establish a post office at St. Barthelemy Station.

ST. CLAIR RAPIDS.

Mr. LISTER asked, Has the work of dredging on the St. Clair Rapids, at Point Edward, been completed? If not, is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the work during the coming season.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The work of deepening the St. Clair Rapids at Point Edward has not been completed. To complete it would cost $10,000 additional. The Government have not yet decided what they will do in regard to the work during the coming season.

CARRIAGE OF CANADIAN FREIGHT.

On the Order, for Select Committee to enquire into and report upon the amount of tonnage and kind of freight, during the year 1887, going to or from Canada, and passing through the United States in bond, its destination and place of shipment, both as to exports and imports, and what changes or improvements are necessary to be made to make it advantageous to shippers and importers to have such freight carried by lines of transit wholly through Canadian territory and received at or shipped from Canadian ports.—(Mr. Ives.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Stand.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think this motion should either be dropped or proceeded with. It has been on the paper six weeks, and that is a long time for it to remain without being proceeded with.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Ives has been away a good deal, for reasons which no doubt the hon. gentleman knows.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think he will continue to be away when the motion is likely to be reached.

Mr. CASEY. The understanding is that motions are not allowed to stand, unless at the request of the Government and for reasons of state. Unless the Government ask particularly to have this motion stand, and give some reasons for their request, we must insist upon the motion being dropped. Mr. Ives has been here to-day, and he should not have left the Chamber. This is a very important matter, and it is not fair to other hon. members that the motion should remain on the paper and have precedence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will do no harm to any member, and the Government asks that it be allowed to stand.

MANUFACTURERS' INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. LISTER moved for:

Correspondence between the Manufacturers' Insurance Company and the Superintendent of Insurance respecting the list of stockholders of said company furnished by the said company in accordance with the statute in that behalf.

He said: It requires no excuse for any member of this House to bring a matter before the attention of the House so deeply affecting the interests of the general public of this Dominion, as a question affecting the life insurance companies of Canada. I am induced to bring this matter before the House on account of what, to my mind, seems to be great irregularities on the part of the officers of that company in making returns to the Government, as the law requires. I know nothing of the financial position of the company, nor do I care particularly anything about that, but what concerns this House and the country is, that a law passed by Parliament as a protection to policy-holders in the life insurance companies of this country should be observed by the officers of the companies, in order that the policy-holders should have the fullest possible protection. When I state that, at the end of 1887, as shown by the last return I have been able to obtain, the total amount of life insurance in the Dominion amounted to $191,694,000, and to-day is probably over $200,000,000, hon. gentlemen will understand how important the question is. The Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company is a company incorporated by this Parliament. It is a Canadian company, and under the statute in force in Canada relating to this and other companies, the law requires that a return should be made by the president, vice-president, manager or secretary-treasurer, giving a list of the stockholders, the amount of stock subscribed, and the amount paid upon that stock. Section 19, chapter 124 of the Revised Statutes of Canada says :

"The president, vice-president, or managing-director, and the secretary or manager of every Canadian company licensed under this Act, shall prepare annually, under their own oath, and cause to be deposited in the Department of Finance, a statement of the condition of affairs of such company at the usual balancing day of the company, in the preceding year, which statement shall exhibit the assets and liability of the company, and its income and expenditure during the previous year, and such other information as is deemed necessary by the Minister."

And schedule "A" of that Act requires that a return shall be made, and that—

"That return shall contain the names of the shareholders and the amount paid by the shareholders on account of their stock, and shall be under the oath of the officers of the company."

Now, Sir, as I said, the Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company, incorporated by the laws of this country, has made returns to the Superintendent of Insurance, setting forth that certain gentlemen were, at the date of that return, stockholders in this insurance company, and that certain other gentlemen were holding other offices. We find that in the prospectus of this company, issued when they started business, that the actuary of the company is Professor Loudon, professor of mathematics at the Toronto University. I understand that Professor Loudon has no information that he was ever appointed to that important office by the company. I find, Sir, further, that the Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company issued a small pamphlet giving the names of the officers and the heads of this company, and I find that Sir Alexander Campbell, K.C.M.G., Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, is named as vice-president of this company, and that the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald is the president of the company. I find that in an application for a policy in that company it is endorsed with the name of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, G.C.B., as president, and Sir Alexander Campbell, Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, is put down as vice-president. I find furthermore that in the Canadian Sportsman of date February 1st, 1889, the advertisement of the company sets forth that Sir Alexander Campbell is vice-president of the company, and looking over the returns up to date, which I have mentioned, I find that Sir Alexander Campbell's name appears upon the last sworn return made by the officers as a stockholder, and as having paid $2,000 on account of the $10,000 stock which he owns; that is, 20 per cent. on his total stock. Now, Sir, I find that on the 24th day of September last past, a letter appeared in the Toronto World of that date, to this effect:

"Editor World.

"With reference to the paragraph in your paper of this day's date, about the Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company, I am requested by Sir Alexander Campbell to say that he is not, and never was, connected with this company, either as vice-president or otherwise, and that the use made by his name in this respect was altogether a mistake. May I ask the favor of your publishing this correction?"

"JAMES MACLENNAN.

"TORONTO, September 22nd, 1888."

I stated, when I brought this matter to the attention of the House, that I knew nothing about the Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company, so far as its business is concerned, but it has been brought to my attention that the returns made by the company are not true returns, if we are to believe the letter of Mr. James Maclellan, the solicitor of the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. If it is true that the manager, or secretary, or president, or other officer of this company has made a return to this Government falsely stating that a gentleman occupying a prominent official position in this country is a stockholder in this company, when in fact he is not a stockholder, then to a certain extent a fraud has been committed on the country and it becomes the duty of the Government to investigate the matter. It is not for me to complain or to say anything about the First Minister of the Government occupying a position as president of a commercial institution, further than this, that when we remember that the official whose duty it is to investigate and watch, in the interests of the public, the working of those insurance companies is a servant of the Government of the day, controlled by the First Minister, and we can readily understand how it might be possible that something more than errors might creep into the matter of the administration so far as he is concerned, of the insurance companies of the country. It is to my mind a dangerous precedent that the First Minister of the Government of this country should allow his name to be used by any commercial corporation. Having brought the matter before the attention of Parliament, I have discharged what I conceive to be a duty. If it is true that such is the case, if it is true that false returns have been made to the Government, then, I apprehend it is the duty of the Government to investigate these returns, and to see how far the matter has gone.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sure the House must be obliged to the hon. gentleman, as I am, for bringing up this matter. The hon. gentleman is quite correct in stating that supervision should be taken with respect to all companies of this kind who come forward to claim the confidence of the people of the country. I will not enter into a discussion as to whether I, as a member of the Government, have committed any impropriety in becoming a director, or even president, of a commercial company. I have done so, and am quite willing to bear the responsibility of that fact. All I can say is that the Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company has got a proprietary and a board of direction for wealth, respectability and standing not second to those of any company in Canada; and in saying that I do not include myself. My standing is political, not financial; but I speak with respect to the board as a whole, and any hon. gentleman from Toronto who takes the trouble to look over the list of directors will see what a respectable and wealthy body they are. The particulars of the alleged irregularities I cannot speak to. I was not aware, indeed, what the object of the hon. gentleman was in moving for these papers. The papers will be brought down at once, and it will then be seen whether there are any irregularities which will at all affect the standing of the Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company. At present the company holds a very high position, and is doing a very large and very profitable business; and unless hon. gentlemen see some flagrant irregularities in their system, I hope, when my hon. friend opposite takes my place, I may find another sphere of usefulness as president of the Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company.

Mr. CASEY. The right hon. gentleman has, no doubt, the right to take advantage of my hon. friend's motion for the purpose of saying a good word for his company, and testifying to the wealth and respectability of the officials and the directorate generally. But my hon. friend's complaint is just this: that the published statements as to who were officials and stockholders in this company, are contradicted in one very important instance, that of the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, by that hon. gentleman's solicitor, who says he is not connected with the company. I think my hon. friend is justified in making this enquiry, and pointing out that the Government should look sharply after this company, to see that it makes no false representations as to who are officials and stockholders.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely the hon. First Minister must consider the statement made by my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) as a very serious one, that in sending in a return a deliberate false return was made, and that my hon. friend's statement was, prima facie, confirmed by a published letter from Mr. Maclellan, acting as solicitor for Sir Alexander Campbell. That, it seems to me, would come within the region of the grossest fraud, and I would have expected the hon. First Minister to say that, whether these papers were brought down or not, he would cause the Superintendent of Insurance, who is appointed specially for that purpose, to investigate the correctness of such a statement. If I understand aright the letter read by the hon. member for Lambton, it stated most explicitly that Sir Alexander Campbell never was connected with this company as vice-president or otherwise. That, I presume, must be interpreted to mean that he had never subscribed stock and had never paid the $2,000 which appears credited to him. Now, for a company to send in a deliberate statement of that kind, if it is not true, is a fraud, and a very serious fraud. The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that his directorate is a good one, and that the names of the men who appear in the list of stockholders may be very good; I dare say that is the case; but does he not see that the country at large depends very considerably upon the published list of stockholders as an index of the respectability of a company? And if it be true, in so prominent a case as this, that men's names have been put down without their consent, and large sums reported to have been paid by them, that amounts to a very gross offence indeed on the part of the officers of the company. I do not for one moment suppose that the hon. gentleman was in any way privy to such a thing as that; I would not imagine that; it would have been the act of a born idiot, which the hon. gentleman most assuredly is not; but if the statement is at all correct, somebody has committed what I think the hon. Minister himself would designate, as I do, a gross fraud, which should be investigated by the proper officer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that if any improprieties—fraud is a very strong word—have been committed by the officers of this company, the Superintendent of Insurance should investigate it. Some of the facts the hon. gentleman has mentioned have reached my ears for the first time. With respect to Sir Alexander Campbell, I had heard—though I never knew of that letter before—that there was a misapprehension in his case. What extent it was, or how it happened, I cannot now say. Therefore, I will reserve anything I have to say until the papers are brought down. I have not seen the papers myself; they will be brought down at once, and I, on behalf of the company, will have an immediate investigation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. LISTER. The last return, in the sessional papers of 1888, page 385, states:

"Sir Alexander Campbell, Toronto, $10,000; amount paid up, $2,000."

Motion agreed to.

TENDERS FOR CANAL WORKS.

Mr. CASEY moved for:

Return showing—

1. Statement of cases in which all or any of the tenders called for and received for any work in connection with canals, within five years, were rejected on the report of the Chief Engineer of Canals, giving names of tenderers and gross amount of each tender; with copies of all such reports of the Chief Engineer, giving reasons for such rejection, and noting the cases in which new tenders were called for.

2. In cases where new tenders were called for, a statement of names of tenderers and gross amount of each tender, noting which tender was accepted, and giving copies of any reports or other reasons for the rejection of lower tenders, if any.

3. Statement of cases in which claims for extras have arisen under any contract entered into in pursuance of any such accepted tender, and have been referred to the sole arbitration of the Chief Engineer of Canals, showing amounts paid to claimants under his award, and a detailed statement of costs paid by the Government, or other parties to the suit, in connection with the arbitration in each case, and to whom paid.

He said: My reasons for moving this resolution are very simple. I understand, and I think it is pretty well known, that in more than one case in which tenders have been called for for public works, the engineer has reported that these tenders were below the figure at which the work could reasonably be expected to be executed, and for that reason all the tenders have been thrown out, and in some cases new tenders have been called for, and the work has been gone on with under one of those new tenders. In every case the new tenders, so far as I know, have been considerably in excess of the former ones. When the first tenders were stated to be too low, the contractors would naturally tender at higher prices, and in cases arising under contracts of all sorts in the department to which my motion has reference, any claims for extras have been referred to the sole arbitration of the chief engineer of the department, and he has received, I am informed, very large sums as arbitrator in these cases; having been sometimes paid by the Government and sometimes by other parties to the suit, according to the way in which it turned out. As a rule, I suppose, if the Government lost the case, they would have to pay the costs, and if the contractors lost it, they would have to pay the costs. I do not know what the rule has been, or who has paid these costs, but, at all events, it is quite certain that the chief engineer of this department has received very large sums, over and above his salary, for arbitrating in these matters—sums amounting to thousands of dollars a year. I cannot give the exact amounts, because I do not find them in the Public Accounts, and I do not know of any way of finding out how much he has been paid by the contractors, who may have had to pay the costs of the suits, and consequently have had to pay the arbitrator. I think the whole system is a very rotten one. The principle of throwing out tenders because they are all too low, is a bad one. If a man puts in a tender, and puts in sufficient security to satisfy the Government, he is responsible and liable for any damages that may accrue from his not carrying out the work; and the Government ought to accept his tender, even though the engineer says it is too low. Instead of that, it has been the custom to throw out at times whole batches of tenders, on the ground that they were not sufficiently high, and to call for new tenders, and then let the work at increased figures. Then, despite that, there are claims for extras, which are referred to the sole arbitration of the engineer in chief, Mr. Page, who, after sitting some days or weeks in determining the matter, has been paid either by the Government or the contractors. The system offers a premium to the engineer. I do not say that the gentleman in charge of that position is liable to corrupt influences, but this system offers a premium to whoever may be engineer of the department to see that extras are claimed, and an arbitration had, so that he may have a nice little job that will give him $2,000 or $3,000 in addition to his salary. It has been for some time the theory of the Administration here that a civil servant who is paid a yearly salary is paid for his whole time and has no right to any extra pay for anything he may do for the Government during that time. In spite of this theory, however, we find civil servants constantly down in the Public Accounts for large amounts in addition to their salaries, and the case I have in hand is one of them. Mr. Page has been paid large sums for extra work as arbitrator and in other capacities, and my object in moving this resolution is to find out how much he has been receiving, from whom and for what purpose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. How far back do you wish to go?

Mr. CASEY. Say ten years.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You will not get it this session.

Mr. CASEY. I want to get the information this Session, and if the hon. gentleman will say what period of years will be covered this Session I will ask for that period.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know that I am obliged to furnish information to my hon. friend to prepare his motion. He has to make his own motion.

Mr. CASEY. I am asking the hon. gentleman how many years would probably be covered by a return which could be brought down this Session?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I really cannot tell. I do not know the number of tenders, or the number of objections or acceptances.

Mr. CASEY. Well, I will say five years.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman asks for the tenders, rejected on report of the Chief Engineer of Railways and Canals. It does not at all follow that the report of the chief engineer has been accepted. The tenders may have been rejected contrary to his report.

Mr. CASEY. I do not ask for them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman then proceeds to ask for the reasons for such rejection. I do not think we can bring that down, and my hon. friend will see the reason. The publishing of the reasons which are contained in a confidential report from the engineer, may grievously affect the character and standing of men who would not like to have these things published, and my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), when a member of the Government, must have seen a good many of these reports. The chief engineer might, in a report, feel bound to say that the tenderer was an unsatisfactory contractor, that he had failed in previous work, that he was unfit to prosecute the work successfully, or that he was financially weak, or he might bring charges more grave against him. These reports set forth candidly to the Government the reason why a party should not be employed. The hon. gentleman will understand that it is a matter of no consequence, so long as we get a good man for the work, who is appointed, and we must trust our officer to a very considerable extent as to what report he shall make. You will never get a full report on those matters, if it is to be understood that the reports are to be published. If the hon. gentleman knows of any case in which undue favoritism has been exercised, in which a respectable and capable contractor has been thrown over for favoritism, or any other cause, that would be a good ground to pass a motion, but a general motion to bring down reports on all the contracts within five years which the officers of the Government, in the conscientious performance of their duties, have made unfavorable to individuals, is asking a great deal. And it may be deeply injurious to the party whose tender has been rejected. However, we will bring down all the cases in which tenders have been rejected for the five years, and we must judge, in the interest of individuals, as well as in the interest of the public, whether we shall show the reasons for which those tenders had been rejected. I know, as a matter of experience, that men who have tendered, and whose tenders have been rejected, do not like to have reports made as to the reasons why they were rejected. They may have tendered at absurd prices, and there is no use in showing up these tenderers, unless it is in the public interest. The general return will certainly be brought down, but I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that the objection I take to the form of his motion is well founded.

Mr. MITCHELL. The right hon. gentleman has referred to me as to my experience in the Privy Council, and I think there is a great deal in what he has stated. I think, where the reports refer to the character of the contractors, it would not be just to have them laid before the public, and it might do those contractors an injury to do so. But the Government can discriminate between such cases as that, and the information which my hon. friend is asking for. A system has grown up of late years, under which very important contracts, involving hundreds of thousands of dollars, have first been rejected, and then the claims have been left to the decision of an officer of the Government to make the arbitrament between the Government and the contractor. I think it is wrong in the public interest to place in the power of one individual the decision of claims involving hundreds of thousands of dollars, especially when that individual is a paid officer of the Administration. The right hon. gentleman has recently established a Court of Claims, and I believe that the proper way to settle claims between contractors and the Government, or claims for any public service rendered to the Government, would be to refer them to that Court of Claims, established as it has been for, I think, over two years or thereabouts. It is time to put a stop to references of extras and claims on contracts to an officer of the Government, no matter how much confidence the Government may have in him. It is even unfair to the officer himself to place him in such a position where he may be tempted to sacrifice the public interest for personal gain. I do not for a moment say that this has been done, but I think it is unwise and unfair to allow these references which have taken place to be made to a paid officer of the Government, and that has been done to an enormous extent in the last few years. Now the Court of Claims is established, and if it is not the policy of the Government to refer all these matters to that court, the Court of Claims is of no use and should be abolished; but I think that all claims for extras or other matters in connection with public contracts should be dealt with by that court in public, and should not be left to the decision of an officer of the Government in his own private office. I am sure the right hon. gentleman will see the force of what I say. I make no reflection upon anybody. I do not say that any wrong has been done in the past, but it has often struck me, when I have seen the large amount awarded to contractors for extras, that this placed too much power in the hands of an officer of the Government, and put before him a temptation which ought not to be placed before him, and I think the whole system should be put a stop to.

Mr. CASEY. I am very glad to hear what has fallen from my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), with which I perfectly agree. I desire to remove a misapprehension from the mind of the leader of the House. I am not so anxious to get at the personal reasons for the refusal of particular tenders, as I am to get at the reason for the rejection of tenders in a batch, on the ground that they were too low, and that the work could not be executed for the figure named. I do not admit the contention of the right hon. gentleman, that the reasons given by the Chief Engineer of Canals to the Government for rejecting particular tenders are private. I think the House is entitled to know for what reason any tender was rejected. I am not asking for that now, but I think we have a right to ask it, and to know whatever can be known in regard to any expenditure of public money. However, if it will relieve the hon. gentleman's scruples in this matter, I will be content to have a return in the cases where tenders have been rejected on the ground of being too low, and, if he desires it, I will amend the motion in that sense.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to it.

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps the motion may be left as it is, and after the hon. gentleman's remarks, and after what I have said, he may exercise his own responsibility as to what he brings down. What I want, particularly, is the reason for the rejection of tenders in a batch, on the ground that they were too low.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may be permitted to say a word in reference to what my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has stated in regard to the reference of these matters to a Government officer. That reference has always been made at the suggestion of the other party, and not at the suggestion of the Government. It occurs very frequently that, when there is a disputed account, as for instance a canal case, reference is made, say, to Mr. Page. He makes his report on the claim of the contractor, and the Government say to the contractor: Well, under this report, we cannot grant you the amount of your claim, but, if you are not satisfied with our offer, you must go to the Court of Exchequer. Well, the party says: This causes delay and expense, and I will leave it to your own officer to go into the evidence. It is like two men quarelling about a matter, and they are satisfied to leave the question to the judgment of one of them or someone else. I mentioned Mr. Page's name because the hon. gentleman knows him, and we have always found that there is no danger in trusting to the award of that officer. If it is to be understood that, in every case where there is a difference of opinion between the department and the individual, it is to go to the Court of Exchequer, there is an end of it; but, in that case, the parties will be put to a very considerable expense and delay. As I have already stated, that it happens occasionally, where a contractor—knowing the fairness, the honesty and the uprightness of men like Mr. Page, or Mr. Schreiber, or Mr. Trudeau, in the different departments—says: Very well, I will leave it to your own officer; I know that if he goes into it, he will do justice. Hitherto, we have been in the habit of accepting that offer, because it shows that the contractor was confident in the justice of his claim. If, however, it is the general sense that we are to make no such reference, that it must go to the court, I do not think that the contractors, as a body, would like that change.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has just now made an illustration in applying this theory, and I may just as well follow him by putting another. He says that it is always at the instance of the contractors that reference is made to their own officer, and he has quoted Mr. Page and Mr. Schreiber. Now, as far as Mr. Page is concerned, and Mr. Schreiber, too, I believe they fairly enjoy the confidence of the community. We will take, for instance, Mr. Page, who has dealings to an enormous extent with the public contractors of this country in the construction of canals, railways and other public works. We know that when a contractor finishes work, or during the progress of the work, he gets advances upon it. When his work is completed he sends in his claim to Mr. Page, who either accepts, or rejects, or reduces that claim, and Mr. Page reports, acting on his final conviction upon the matter, that that man's claim, less $100,000, for instance, should be allowed, or that his claim, less $50,000, should be allowed. The contractor refuses to take it, and he goes to the Government and says: I will refer the matter to the arbitrament of your chief officer, Mr. Page. Why, Sir, Mr. Page has already arbitrated upon that matter in the interests of the Government and the public, and he has decided that the claim should be paid less a certain sum. Now, we all know how susceptible men are to a variety of influences—I do not mean monetary influences—I mean a variety of other influences, and I think it would be much safer, in the interests of the public, if it were understood that where a chief engineer like Mr. Page, on the one hand, or Mr. Schreiber on the other, or any other of the deputy heads of the several departments which are contract departments, that once they make a report upon the matter, the Government must either act upon the report or let the party go to the Court of Claims, which the hon. gentleman has established for the purpose of settling such matters. The hon. gentleman says that it may put the contractors to inconvenience. My opinion of the contractors of this country is that they can stand a good deal of inconvenience, they are quite willing to take the chances of some inconvenience, and I think it will be much safer if their claims are re-examined in open court, Mr. Page or Mr. Schreiber giving their testimony under oath. In that case the public interest would be much better protected, than by having their claims again referred to these men who have reported in favor of a reduced amount. When the engineers have reported reducing the claims by $100,000 or $50,000, and the contractors are not satisfied, I think the public will be much better satisfied if, in the future, these claims are referred to the court specially established for settling them.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the illustration furnished by the First Minister hardly applies in this case. He says it is a case of one of the contracting parties putting himself in the hands of the other. That is the argument which the First Minister offers in defence of this system. Now, there is quite a difference between one of the parties, and an agent of one of the parties. In the case of any question arising, we can hardly consider that every departmental officer is the paymaster. In addition to what has fallen from my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), I venture this, as my opinion, as to what is sound and proper. All public works ought to be done under contract, and if it happen that there are extras not contemplated by the contract, but are the outcome of the contract, those extras ought themselves to be especially referred to the Court of Claims. The extras are what the contractors are after, that is where the money is made. We do not need to look for a better illustration of that than at a couple of affairs that have come before this House within the last few years. Take the case of Section B, where the extras amounted to $400,000; take the Onderdonk case, where an award, after an arbitration, was made for $75,000, and it was not enough to satisfy the Administration of the day, and they had it increased, at their own motion, to $200,000. Now, if the Government can cause an increase like that to be made by their arbitrators, what influence have they over a person who is in their employment, who is dismissable at their will? Where public tenders are invited, and a contract entered into by the Government as the result of public tenders, then there must be no difficulty in ascertaining the debt by the country to the contractor. But anything else that grows out of that contract, where the cost is not ascertainable by the express language of the contract, is a matter, I think, that should be investigated under the safeguard of a judicial tribunal like the Court of Claims. I think, having regard to the facts and the history of the country, and our experience for the last few years, the criticism of the hon. member for Northumberland was far too mild.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE CORNWALL CANAL.

Mr. BERGIN moved for:

Copies of reports, plans and surveys of the then proposed Cornwall Canal by J. B. Mills and Benjamin Wright, Esq's, Civil Engineers, and by Capt. P. Cole, Royal Engineers, in the years 1832, 1833 and 1834; also for survey and report of Colin Carman, Esq., O.E., of a proposed change of location of Cornwall Canal, from Sand Bridge through Hooples' Creek to Archibald's Point, with plans, profile and estimates.

He said: I make this motion for the purpose of bringing before the House and the country the present state of the Cornwall Canal, and the plans proposed for its improvement by the Chief Engineer of Canals. I am aware, that in introducing this motion and in taking the course I propose to take, I am assuming a large responsibility, and that in taking exception to the plans proposed by the chief engineer, I am called upon to substantiate by the records the statements which I propose to make. It will be fresh in your recollection, Sir, and in the recollection of every member of this House, that a serious break took place in the Cornwall Canal, in the month of October last, near the village of Moulinette. This, Sir, was not the first or only break that has taken place in the Cornwall Canal since it was opened nearly half a century ago. To explain the matter to the House and to the country in a manner that will be satisfactory to them, I shall be obliged to quote largely from the records to show that at no time, since the construction of the canal until to-day, has it been safe for the purposes of navigation. We all know that any serious breach in the Cornwall Canal must be attended with the most disastrous results to the commerce of this country. The last break which occurred, it has been estimated, cost not less than five millions of dollars to this country, and for that reason I feel that it is my duty to bring before Parliament the present state of the canal, the plans which are proposed by the chief engineer, the contracts which have been let, and the alternative nature of the plans which are now before the Government for the prevention of any further such accidents to this canal. No change of location, no plan for the strengthening of the banks, which does not put beyond peradventure any further breach of this kind, is one that can be accepted by the people of this country. The Boards of Trade, the Mariners' Association, the ship-owners, all view with alarm the present proposed plan of improvement, and they are all anxious that the attention of the Government shall be closely directed to the present contracts. The works proposed are, unfortunately, under contract, and it may be objected that, being under contract, we ought to allow the contracts to be carried out. But I, for one, hold—and I am not alone, for the most practical men in this country, and men of high scientific attainments, are of the opinion that the plans are not satisfactory—that they are not plans which will make the Cornwall Canal secure, that they are not plans which will prevent any further interruption to commerce. It must not for a moment be supposed that, in the criticism I am about to make, I am in any way censuring the Government of the country. The Government acts upon the report of its chief engineer, a man of high attainments, of long experience, who for more than a quarter of a century has been advising all the Governments that have held power in this country, and he has held that confidence up to the present. I do not impute to that gentleman any ulterior designs in the plans which he has proposed, but I do say, from all I have been able to learn, from the enquiries I have made, from what has been said to me by practical men and by scientific men, that his plans are not at all what they ought to be. This leads me to say this: that as the plan which he proposes to follow now is the plan which was adopted at the time of the construction of the canal, commenced in 1834, I am bound to show some reason why that location was adopted, and why the plan to which we seek to revert was not then carried into effect. Professional jealousy was the cause of the abandonment of the first survey and the selection of the second location. Professional jealousy, the same monster, rears its head to-day, and it is for this reason that the Chief Engineer of Canals refuses to listen to the propositions made by other engineers and practical men. Let me read to the House an extract from the address made by Mr. Samuel Keefer, at the meeting of the Canadian Society of Civil Engineers, at Montreal, a few weeks since. He said:

"It has been suggested that some reference should be made to the first construction of the Cornwall Canal, the enlargement of which is now in progress, especially to that portion of it between Moulinette and Mille Roches, where the breaches have occurred, and it is my intention to do so, not in this address but in a paper specially prepared with illustrations, to be read at one of the regular meetings of the society. Having spent nearly six years of my younger days as assistant engineer, under I. B. Mills and Colonel Phillpotts resident engineers in its construction, I may claim the privilege of contributing the facts in relation to the formation of the banks that have come under my own observation.

"This much, however, may be said here.

"The canal and its banks were constructed of ample dimensions. The canal was 100 feet at bottom and 10 feet deep. The embankment was raised to fourteen feet above canal bottom, and made twelve feet wide at top with slopes on either side of two to one.

Mr. BERGIN.

"That portion of the canal embankment on the upper-reach, which for upwards of a mile in length, from Moulinette to Mille Roches, holds the water in the canal at a level of about twenty feet above the branch of the St. Lawrence, which runs alongside, is in fact founded upon the treacherous clay bottom in which were found springs of water, and in part in side-cutting permeated by streaks of sand. The embankment over this ground was formed with extra care, the earth being laid on in courses with carts, and where the outer slope ran out into the river it was protected by boulder stones along its outer edge. Where springs were found under the seat of the embankment they were led out to the river's edge by French drains, and where the streaks of sand were encountered in the side-cutting they were cut off by puddle trenches, six feet deep or more, and the bottom and side bank lined with puddle three feet thick from the puddle trench to high-water mark. This mode of protection was not continuous over the whole line, but was confined to such parts of the bank only as appeared to require it.

"Since the opening of the canal, there have been several breaches in this bank, the last and worst of all was the breach of last fall, which inflicted such serious damage upon the trade of the St. Lawrence last year."

It will be evident from that statement that the greatest care and prudence should be exercised before the Government undertake to carry out the work under the plans proposed by Mr. Page. The fullest evidence should be presented by him to the Government to show that a different condition of the banks can be brought about by the proposed plans, and a different condition of the foundations. I may say that in 1826 a survey, with a view to the construction of a canal from the Long Sault to Cornwall, was made by Mr. Clewes, a very eminent man, who had devoted the greater portion of his life to the study of the rise and fall of the waters of the great lakes, and to the condition of the St. Lawrence. That gentleman published a great number of pamphlets in connection with the subject, and he attained so high a reputation that he was called upon to make this survey and report to the Parliament of Upper Canada. In 1830, four years after, Mr. Barrett, also an eminent engineer, and with whom I had many conversations on this subject in my younger days when he was employed on the Lachine Canal, also made a report, and it was confidently expected by everyone that when the construction of the canal was undertaken, although it was of larger dimensions than the canal on which Mr. Clewes was asked to report, and Mr. Barrett also, the plan suggested by Mr. Clewes would have been adopted. Unfortunately, the commissioners appointed by the Parliament of Upper Canada to construct the Cornwall Canal did not feel they could employ Mr. Clewes or act entirely upon his judgment, or on that of Mr. Barrett. Those engineers were Canadians, and the commissioners sent one of their number to the United States to employ American engineers, not that they had any desire to throw any doubt whatever on the scientific attainments of Mr. Clewes and Mr. Barrett, but because they believed American engineers would have had more practical experience in the construction of canals. The result was not at all what we could have wished, as I shall show by the records which I shall read presently. They obtained the services of Mr. Mills and of Judge Wright, who was at that time Chief Engineer of the Erie Canal. Those gentlemen, on their arrival in this country, entered upon an investigation of the works that were proposed. They felt, coming as they did from the United States, that it was necessary to their professional reputation to show that the Canadian gentlemen, who were employed to make the surveys and report upon them and locate the canal, did not possess skill and scientific attainments equal to their own and were not as capable of suggesting a canal route and a cheap and proper mode of construction, and as a consequence they reported a different plan. I quote from Mr. Mill's report. He says:

"It is well known to the members of the board that two separate and distinct surveys had been made over the same ground in general, and for the same object, upon a smaller scale—one by Mr. Clewes, in 1826, the other by Mr. Barrett, in 1830. As neither of these plans contemplated a canal of more than 8 feet depth of water, and only 60 feet width on the bottom, and locks of 40 feet in width and 132 feet in length; they did not conform in capacity in any respect to the terms of the Act under which this examination was directed to be made, and were of little use to me in the duties assigned."

Mr. Mills then made an estimate of his plan, as well as an estimate of the plan of Mr. Clewes. The plan of Mr. Clewes, I may mention, was to cut through Archibald's Point about a mile and a quarter further west than the present entrance to the canal, go through Hooples' Creek to a deep ravine and low ground which runs from the head of the Long Sault to Brownell's Bay, now called Sand Bridge, and at Brownell's Bay, or near the head of Sheik's Island, to construct a short dam, the river there being at summer level only about 150 feet from the present canal bank to the head of the island, and never at any time having more than two feet of water. That is called a branch of the river, but it is really not that. Oftentimes during the summer one can walk almost dryshod from the main shore to the head of Sheik's Island. He contemplated also placing a large dam at the foot of the island. This would have given us an inland canal with natural banks that could never break away; but Mr. Mills, in making his report, condemned that plan, as I shall show you presently, because he said it would cost thirty thousand pounds sterling more than the plan which he proposed, and which was to build along the bank of the river and not to have an inland canal. Further on, I will show you from the report that Mr. Mills was obliged to shift his banks over and over again; that he was obliged to shift his centre line fifty feet into the bank, and, finding that the bank was constantly slipping into the river as fast as constructed, so bad was the foundation, and in order to keep it from further danger, he was again obliged to shift his centre line twenty feet further. He then got into a bank of hard pan and boulders, which cost a large amount of money, and, although the bank is to-day within the natural bank, yet the foundation is the same bad, unsubstantial foundation tapped by quicksand and by running water that it was fifty years ago, and it is not in any better condition to-day to build a bank upon than it was then. The very fact of this bank breaking away last fall, as it was always predicted that it would break away, and as Mr. Mills himself, after two years of construction had been gone on with, admitted it would break away, shows that it is time we should direct the attention of the Government (whose attention was never directed to it before) and the attention of the Chief Engineer of Canals, to the actual state of the facts. Mr. Mills, in making his estimate, says this:

"Thence to Archibald's Point, distance  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles, the natural channel of the river presents no impediments to the navigation of steamboats of the class contemplated to be used; in truth, this is the most placid part of the stream from Prescott to Cornwall. I come now, Sir, to the point, Archibald's, where it has been proposed to leave the river, in order to pass the Long Sault. As the Canadian channel of this rapid does not afford a safe or convenient passage, even for descending boats, it becomes necessary to construct a canal to accommodate both ascending and descending trade. Therefore my calculations from said point to Cornwall, are based upon a canal of 100 feet width at bottom, and banks sloping according to a base of 2 feet to 1 foot vertical. From this point to Cornwall,  $11\frac{1}{2}$  miles, several plans have been suggested and considered, only two of which have been deemed worthy of particular examination. Mr. Clewes proposed cutting across said point and passing up the valley of Hooples' Creek,  $\frac{3}{4}$  mile; thence following a depression of the country, and dropping into the stream at Brownell's Bay. See plan No. 1 of this work. This plan I have examined, and have prepared minute calculations of its cost.

"The other plan examined, is to follow the river and its shore to the same point. I will now, Sir, compare these two routes or plans, to their union at Brownell's Bay. The route by Hooples' Creek, is three miles and 72 chains, in the course of which there occurs 1,461,000 yards excavation.

"The river route follows the natural channel of the river, which affords a good and easy navigation one and a quarter miles further down; thence I make a canal on the bank of the river to the said bay, distance two miles and 44 chains."

The point I wish to make with regard to this proposal and this report of Mr. Mills is, that his estimate of the number of yards of excavation was made for a channel 10 feet deep, and that, singular to say, the estimate which is made to-day for a channel 16 feet deep, through precisely the same ground calls but for one hundred or two hundred thousand yards more. The inference is plain that Mr. Mills purposely over-estimated the expenditure upon that proposed plan, in order that his plan might be adopted. Here is what he says:

"You will perceive Sir, by the above comparison, that there is little difference in distance (counting the distance on the river from said point to the commencement of the river work  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile), but that there is  $1\frac{1}{4}$  mile less distance to be improved, therefore less distance to keep in repair, and also that there is \$122,618.89 in favor of the river route."

I have shown you, Sir, the reason why Mr. Mills adopted that plan, and I propose to show you how, as the construction went on, every day developed the inaccuracies and the utter want of safety in that plan as proposed. The commissioners appointed by the Parliament of Upper Canada were not satisfied with the plan proposed by Mr. Mills, nor were they satisfied with his estimates or his location, and they asked His Excellency, Sir John Colborne, to lend them the assistance of Captain Cole, then at the head of the Royal Engineers in this country, and they consulted also Mr. Fleming, an engineer of repute, and Mr. Thompson, and asked them to report upon the plan of Mr. Mills, and particularly to report on the Hooples' Creek and Brownell's Bay route, that the utmost caution and circumspection should be observed before deciding upon the route. I propose to read to you, Sir, what Captain Cole said—and there can be no higher authority—upon that portion of the work which the present Chief Engineer of Canals to-day pooh-poohs:

"In altering their plan to meet the wishes of the country, Judge Wright and Mr. Mills stated that they were aware of the greater cost of No. 1 (the inland route), but preferred the latter as a more perfect work. The latter gentleman thought the saving might be £30,000. I imagine that this will be found under the mark, but nothing certain can be given until a survey of the points to be improved has been made. The first and principal feature of the natural course about to be adopted, is the damming below Brownell's Bay. Having given the subject such consideration as imperfect accounts of the localities, and Mr. Ridout's map of Canada, enabled me to give, before I visited the spot, I concluded that we might construct these works advantageously, and I found the reality greatly surpassing my expectations. If an embankment be thrown across the passage above Brownell's Bay to Sheik's Island, the water lot may be finished without pumping, and the dams below constructed without the usual expense of an artificial waste weir, or the shifting of a temporary one in the dam itself as the work progressed. The water being thrown around the outer channel by this embankment, no difficulties remained to contend with. This bank, I advise, should be permanent, with a masonry waste weir of sufficient dimensions to feed the locks and mills, with a spur or jetty thrown forwards (as at present from the wooden lock) to catch the upper level of rapid as it passes at right angles across the mouth of the passage. This difference of level is about two feet. The extra expense of making this work permanent would scarcely exceed that of a temporary coffer-dam, independent of the masonry cheeks of the sluice-way—and a guard of three or four feet against the spring floods would be much less costly than the same guard placed on the dam and lock at Moulinette. The advantage would be acquired of relieving the works below at any time, in case of leak in the dam or locks, which may be required in spite of all previous care of the engineers, from the carelessness of the contractor, or from some defect in the lock itself which would require remedy; much, it is true, may be done by previous care in the foundation of dams, and the examination of the rock under them and the locks—all apparent fissures being filled with cement and covered with a little masonry. The advantage, also, will be given by the bank above, of letting in water by degrees and watching the effect produced, so that all defects may be remedied before the navigation opens. The backing might also be allowed some time to consolidate before the water is let in. This work I call embankment because it does not raise the level of the water, but merely retains it at the level required. All these details, and many more, will better be known to the resident engineer. I will merely state, that the masonry of dams should be arched key work, well wedged up; this saves extra masonry, and if well performed, there is no use in mortar or cement being added, but broken stones and shingle should in either case be placed about 4 feet thick on the back of masonry to prevent the passage of the gravel and clay of the slope above. The water should not run over, for several reasons, and a guard of 2 feet will be ample against the wash of the surface water. All these arrangements were concurred in by the engineer, and from hence downwards, no discrepancy of opinion appeared; all details being left to the judgment of the resident engineer, including the formation of sluices at each dam."

Now, one would suppose, as Capt. Cole evidently supposed, that this proposition of his would have been carried out; but it was not. Mr. Geddes, who was also consulted by the engineers, speaks of this plan, too. He says:

"The lower level leaves the upper, by locking down 17 feet to the surface of Brownell's Bay: said bay being raised  $5\frac{1}{2}$  feet by a dam at Mille Roches, holding up the water 13 feet above its present surface at that place, thus producing a depth of 10 feet water through the bay.

"The artificial lake thus produced, would afford a fine piece of navigation for three miles, but destroy the valuable water power of MoulINETTE, and what is more serious, produce, in the canal line to be carried from Mille Roches onward in much of the distance for the first three-quarters of a mile, cutting 17 feet deeper than by pursuing the upper level, beyond which there is 9 feet between the two levels.

"Few localities equal this in the facility of making said dam, or founding a water lock, at the head of Brownell's Bay: a low embankment shuts all the water from the north side at Sheik's Island, leaving dry land to build the water lock on at the head of Brownell's Bay, and the dam at Mille Roches. This embankment at the head of Sheik's Island, Mr. Mills values at but $450; a canal from the head of Brownell's Bay to Mille Roches he estimates at $103,980.

"The value of three miles of an artificial lake, instead of a canal, would be the set-off against some excess of expense which probably will be incurred by following the lower level."

Mr. Fleming also reported in the same way. He says:

"On considering the first of these, namely, an entire canal, as now laid down by the engineers mentioned, it appears to me to have been adopted under the impression of avoiding apprehended hazard from ice to any works which might be placed in the river between Brownell's Bay and Mille Roches, for, on the left bank of this branch of the river, the canal route is necessarily very circuitous, and would be expensive to construct from the steepness and the brokenness of the ground, whereon much deep side-cutting with heavy embankments must be made towards the river, for the level of the base of the canal must be from 13 to 23 feet above the surface of the river, which, in consideration of the magnitude of the canal proposed, becomes the more hazardous in point of stability by being thus supported by new embankments. At the upper side of Mille Roches village, the same route leaves the bank of the river and proceeds about one mile further on the same level to the first lock. On the last part the cutting is very deep, and through a soil of a quality, as indicated by several places here, much disposed to slip, and which may require, I would fear, somewhat more than the estimated expense, although this might be sufficient to accomplish the same quantity of excavation of better ground. The continuation of this route to its debouche into the St. Lawrence presents nothing remarkable but the deterioration of the lands and the town of Cornwall, which it passes through.

"Such being the features of this proposed route of an entire canal, I regard that part of it which extends from Brownell's Bay to Mille Roches as unnecessary and expensive, and which, in my opinion, should be entirely superseded, by adopting the river here in its stead, which brings me to consider the second route mentioned above.

"It now will appear on this route, there would be a great saving in expense by the mere construction of the dam proposed at Mille Roches, instead of forming a canal along the bank of the magnitude proposed. As additional to this dam is only required a stop gate in the entrance here of the canal. It would also be advisable to throw a dam of small height across the stream at a point above the position of the lock at Brownell's Bay, by which the waters from the Long Sault may be always regulated or occasionally absolutely stopped. The means of doing the latter would afford the dam at Mille Roches to be built on almost a dry foundation, and also the same for the locks at Brownell's Bay, which also would allow to remove any shallowness or impediments of the channel. Pools or buoys may be afterwards placed to direct the course of deep water.

"As the proposed part of this new route, on the canal, is not yet surveyed, the expense of it must remain undetermined. Until this is done, however, it is clear this proposed alteration of route, from Brownell's Bay, would afford a much better steamboat navigation than an entire canal, and which would be, evidently, many thousand pounds less expensive; also, if well constructed in the dams and locks, the whole would require little annual repairs; besides, this reach upon the river would afford a safe protection for vessels to lay up in the winter months, for the dam here would form a barrier against all movements which might hereafter happen from obstruction of the ice below, and with a very ordinary dam above the works at Brownell's Bay, there could be no danger apprehended on this side, while this last dam would regulate the supply of water as required for this grand basin, as well as for mill purposes, which then might be properly afforded from the dam at Mille Roches.

"Thus far I would decidedly recommend these alterations as superior, both in respect of utility in navigation and towards reducing the whole expense to that of an entire route, as proposed by Messrs. Wright and Mills."

Mr. Mills made a second report, in which he partially admitted all the objections which were made by the other engineers to be correct. He said:

"As such operations in large streams ever leave marks of their effects, I presume they were to be found along the banks of the river. Accordingly I observed such effects as the tearing up, breaking and scarifying of trees, and concluded that the accounts might be half true, and if so, there was good reason for keeping as clear of exposure as possible in the construction of the works in contemplation. Floods, though free from ice, when they deluge a line of canal with earthen banks, ever cause great derangement and expense of repairs, and it is generally considered by men conversant with matters of the kind in question that such works ought not to be exposed to the danger and hazard of inunation. Thus I view the subject, Sir, and accordingly, I acted as in the course of the past year, I am not aware of any important change in the laws of nature or in the consequences of their operations, I am to presume that the danger of exposing works of the kind in question is as great to-day as it was one year ago—therefore I have not seen any reasons for taking a different view of the said plans and locations."

And yet, admitting the danger that would certainly follow from inundation and from the rapid rush of water at particular seasons, he nevertheless persisted in following out the original plan and location; and when I come to read to you, as I shall after a little while, the report of Mr. Page, Chief Engineer of Canals, made the other day, you will find he attributes the destruction of this bank to the causes laid down by Mr. Mills in this report. He refers again to what evidently was a painful subject to him, Clewes' and Barrett's plan. He, somehow or other, was unable to rid himself of that, and on every occasion in which he got into difficulty, he endeavored to convince himself against his better judgment that the plans he had rejected in the first instance were the plans he ought to have followed. He says, although there was no necessity for him to refer to any other plans at that time:

"I wish briefly to refer to three plans that have been considered and, I believe, abandoned:

"1. The one proposed involving a dam of the St. Lawrence at Point Maligne, near Cornwall. This plan, I believe, is abandoned, not, however, because of its impracticability, but rather from its inexpediency, all things considered.

"2. Passing Long Sault by the original route—then dropping into Brownell's Bay, raised five or six feet by a dam at Mille Roches—thence passing the original line nearly, and reduced seventeen feet to Cornwall, I have made an estimate of the expense of this plan of improvement and find it costs about £4,000 more than the plan recommended to your board last year."

And with him £4,000 extra expenditure was not for a moment to be considered in connection with the safety of the canal, and the disastrous results that might at any time ensue, interrupting navigation and greatly injuring commerce.

"4th Plan. Drop into Brownell's Bay, raised five or six feet by a dam at MoulINETTE. At MoulINETTE drop into a pond made by a dam at Mille Roches. At Mille Roches drop into the river at the foot of the fall at this place; and then pursuing the river to French's Rift, through which cut, and drop into the river below it; thence following the river to Point Maligne, through which cut, and drop into the Cornwall Bay, where terminates the improvement. This plan, you may know, is not altogether new. At least it is as old as the spring of 1833, most of which was proposed to me by several persons at that time, and all of which has been more or less considered by me in the course of my surveys in reference to this improvement. However, it does not receive from me so much serious consideration, for the reasons which I have above stated. I believe this plan is thought well of by at least two of the gentlemen who have recently visited the ground. I am very decided in the opinion that it is the best plan, if the original one is to be departed from, and the levels reduced—therefore I determined to furnish the board with an estimate of the expense of it at this time. In the interval of the departure of the gentlemen who have visited us and the meeting of the Board of Commissioners there was not time for a minute survey with direct reference to this improvement."

Here we have an admission from the man on whose advice the canal was located, that the plan of Mr. Clewes was the best and proper plan, and we have the admission, a little further on, that because of a comparatively trifling expense of $102,182, which the construction of a canal that would be safe for all time would cost, he abandoned the old and stuck to his own plan, which he admitted was not the good or the proper plan. In considering his plans I have brought you as far as MoulINETTE and Mille Roches, for by that time he had realised that he had made a tremendous engineering blunder; and after a large sum of money had been expended he abandoned his proposed plan of a river canal from French's Rift to Cornwall, and insisted upon the construction of that portion of the canal by the inland route. Fortunate it was for Canada that he had the good sense to abandon even that much of his proposed or river canal. Those who knew Mr. Mills, those who have any knowledge of the public works that he constructed, will tell you that he had a weakness for following the sinuosities of the river and building all his improvements upon its banks or as near to the banks as possible, his desire being to show that by superior engineering skill he could overcome natural difficulties in a way they could be overcome by no other engineer; and owing to the overweening self-conceit of this engineer, the commerce of the country has been imperilled and actually stopped more than once, with the disastrous result which we all know followed the break in October last. In the subsequent report, Mr. Mills made the usual statement which he made every year during the progress of the construction of the canal:

"Although I have no doubt of the safety or permanence of the work."

Now, why should he, above all men, refer to the safety or the permanence of the work, if he did not feel in his heart of hearts that the work was not safe or permanent, and it could never be made so on the plan he had laid down. His consulting engineer, Mr. Wright, also had the same bogey before him at all times, and he too felt called upon, because of the reports which were made to the commissioners by the assistant engineer every month, to insist upon the safety and the solidity of the work. Speaking of that section of the canal, notwithstanding what the Chief Engineer of Canals may say, and notwithstanding what those who are wedded to his opinions may say—for I have heard one or two engineers say that they think that portion of the canal from the guard lock to Brownell's Bay may be safe—notwithstanding what they say, I shall be able to show from the reports that that portion of the bank is built upon a bad foundation, that it was improperly constructed at the beginning, and is to-day in a most unsatisfactory condition, and at any day may be swept into the river. This is what is said about section No. 1:

"From the first, and throughout the whole course of my duties in the service of your board, economy, permanency, and despatch, so far as they are relatively consistent, have been grand objects to which my attention has been directed; and in any proposition relative to construction, wherein plans are projected or changed, the above considerations have been in view, and they were in full view, when I proposed said piers on section No. 1. The following is simply the circumstance in which the suggestion originated: In prosecuting the work along a section of the upper part of this contract, I observed that an important portion of the earth thrown into the river was taken away by the current, which is made serious by a shoal putting out from the opposite shore, which has formed the channel bold on the north shore for about 2,000 feet. It became an object with me to counteract this current and throw it from the shore, by which I would not only save all the material carried out by forming a permanent protection against the abrasion and action of the river, but would be enabled to carry the bank farther into the river even than the original plan contemplated, thereby reducing the amount of excavation to an extent that the cost of the piers, even at double the estimate, would be much more than compensated, and the work finally more secure. That this would be the result I have no doubt."

But the result did not prove to be so. Notwithstanding that he had no doubt in regard to it, in the course of a few months, he was obliged to remove his centre line 50 feet into the bank, which was composed of boulders and hardpan; and, two years after, he was obliged to move it 20 feet further into the shore in order to save his bank. There can be no doubt that Mr. Wright, the consulting engineer, was thoroughly aware of the dangerous state of the bank, and of the effect which the ice and a rapid current, in case of flood, would produce. I need only refer to his report to the commissioners in June, 1835, after the bank had been carried away by the force of the river. On the 1st November, 1836, at the close of the season's work, Mr. Jones, the commissioner, who reported that Mr. Harvie's section No. 1—the most dangerous section, as I contend, now—had to be changed because of the slipping away of the banks, the quicksands, and the shifting sands, through which the water permeated from the river into the works, recommended puddle banks. Not only did the water permeate from the canal when there was water enough in it, but it oozed through between the natural bank and the artificial bank from the river, and thousands and thousands of dollars were thrown away in the attempt to make that a safe bank, which never ought to have been constructed there at all. Col. Philpotts, who was appointed after the failure of Mr. Mills to satisfy the commissioners that he could construct it in an efficient manner and make it permanent, undertook to perform the work by puddling. I have it on the testimony of men who were connected with the construction of that canal, men who are living to-day and know of what they speak, that the puddle was made of the poorest material, that Col. Philpotts was not able to get the proper sort of clay to make the puddle, and that the puddle was put on the top of quicksands which should have been removed before the puddle was employed. Col. Philpotts, in all his reports, was obliged to say that the condition of the ground upon which the banks were raised was bad; he was obliged to say that there were hidden springs in the bottom of the canal which permeated through the work, and that there were quicksands there, but he hoped to save the work by the measures he was taking and by the puddling with which he was endeavoring to stop the leaks. Now, I come to the report of Mr. Page upon the proposed work, the only one which he has made since 1874, and I propose to deal with that report in the plainest possible terms, because I think we cannot put too clearly or too forcibly before the Government and the country the weakness of the present banks of the Cornwall Canal, and their insecurity. What this country demands is not a cheap work or a work of questionable safety, but a work that shall be perfectly safe and afford perfect security, a canal that will last during all time, and I maintain that this canal can be so constructed and can be made safe for all time at an expenditure no larger, if not less, than is now proposed by the Chief Engineer of Railways and Canals. I have Mr. Page's report, which was laid on the Table the other day, in regard to a portion of this work, in regard to the dams which were approved by Capt. Cole in the year 1835, and also approved by Mr. Geddes, Mr. Thompson and other engineers, and, a few weeks since, revived by Mr. Keefer. But, before touching on that report, I propose to read a portion of a letter without which that report would never have been made, and the Government would never have been advised as to the insecurity of the canal. It is a letter, written by Mr. Samuel Keefer, who was engaged as assistant engineer in the construction of the canal, a man whose reputation as an engineer stands second to none, a man whose ability cannot be placed below that of even the chief engineer himself. This letter was addressed to the Minister of Railways, who very properly submitted it to the chief engineer. In that letter he says:

"In these troublous times, I can well understand how the great affairs of State demand your most earnest attention, and for fear of inopportune intrusion, I have hitherto refrained from reminding you of a matter of detail which just now is giving no little trouble and anxiety to those engaged in commerce; but I feel that I must discharge my Canadian conscience of its duty by reminding you of my views for the enlargement of the Cornwall Canal, as set forth in my letter addressed to you on the 17th February, 1885. My main object in suggesting the plan I did was to provide against disaster of the kind under which the navigation is now stopped by the breach near Mille Roches. I am informed it is the intention of your department to enlarge the upper reach of the old canal, in situ, following its sinuosities over the same treacherous ground. If such plan is persisted in, I think you may look for more serious breaches and stoppages after the enlargement than have happened before it, for the reasons I have pointed out, and, if the volume of trade by the St. Lawrence overreaches the magnitude expected, every stoppage of the traffic must be felt with tenfold severity."

Now, the plan that Mr. Keefer proposed to the Government in that letter in the month of October last, is the same plan which I brought before the Government about ten years ago. I laid the matter personally before the present Prime Minister and Sir Charles Tupper, who was then Minister of Railways and Canals, and he ordered a survey to be made; but, although that survey was made, and an estimate was made of the cost, just about the time Sir Charles Tupper resigned his position as chief of that department, no report was made by the chief engineer to the Government, so as to enable them to act intelligently upon it. He contented himself with verbally saying to Sir Charles Tupper's successor, that the plan was a ridiculous one, and would not give a greater head of water. We did not ask for it in order to get a greater head of water, but because it would enable a larger volume of water to be brought into the canal for the purposes of manufacture and navigation. If that plan had been acted upon, it does not require that a man should be a sage to be able to inform this House that no such accident as that which happened the other day, could possibly have happened to the canal. I shall deal now with Mr. Page's objection to the plan proposed of an inland canal from the head of the canal to Mille Roches. In his report dated the 27th of February last, he says :

"When the work of enlarging and deepening it was placed under contract, provision was made that the widening might be done on either side that would be most likely to improve the line, that is to say, that although the widening was intended to be done principally on the north side of the present channel, it was thought that some salient or prominent points could, with advantage to the general line, be in part removed. The material excavated in widening and deepening the prism, was, of course, to be placed on the south or river side of those places where the banks of the canal are close to the margin of the river."

Here the Chief Engineer of Canals admits that he proposed tampering with the north side of the bank of the canal, to remove portions of it, and throw it over to the south side with a view of deepening the canal, yet, in the next paragraph he is obliged to admit that it would not be safe or prudent for him to do it, but that he must take the north side of the canal on the shore line. Speaking of the break, he says :

"The casualty above mentioned, and the information subsequently obtained, have, however, shown that it would be injudicious to cut into the north or canal side of the south or river bank, consequently the widening must be done wholly on the north or landward side, and the line of the south bank allowed to remain undisturbed, and the slope on the canal side continued down to the new bottom line at the same angle as at present."

And yet, Sir, it seems to me a curious sort of mental obliquity on the part of the Chief Engineer of Canals who could recommend that the north portion of the south bank should be taken away, and almost in the next paragraph admit that if he did so the bank would be destroyed, and recommending that the enlargement must be made from the north side. It is quite evident that he knew himself that the proposal he made, that the contract he let, was upon false premises, and could not be safely carried out. He says :

"This conclusion has been arrived at by ascertaining from some of the old contracts how the banks of the St. Lawrence Canals were intended to be formed, and it is unlikely that they would be made much different from the manner therein described, which is as follows:—All the best earth for making tight banks must be placed in the front or middle part of the same, that of inferior quality in rear. In forming the bank, the earth, if carried by carts, must be laid in courses not exceeding 12 inches, and all the best material must be placed in the front or middle of the bank. The information received from various reliable sources leads to the impression that certain precautionary measures were adopted in preparing the seats for some of the banks; all of them were, however, no doubt formed as above stated."

Now, the chief engineer is incorrect. That bank of which I have spoken, from the present guard-lock called now the head of the canal to Brownell's Bay, was constructed, not with carts, the greater portion of it, but with hand barrows. The earth was deposited transversely to the bank by the laborers, and so soon as the bank had risen to a height over which they could no longer dump the earth from the barrows, they laid down inch boards across the bank, and the boards were laid down so that the barrows might not sink into the soft clay, and that the men might be enabled to wheel their loads easily. What was the result? Every three feet of bank formed a sluice-way? The result of the construction was, when they abandoned the barrows, and the boards were split and of no further use, they were allowed to remain there, and to-day this part of the bank of the Cornwall Canal and during all these years, has been tapped by the sluice-ways which act as channels for the water, Mr. BERGIN.

sucking it in and sucking it out, to the destruction of the bank. This is not a matter of which the chief engineer can be ignorant, because I have it from the superintendent of the canal on more than one occasion, that in repairing the banks they have come upon portions of the old boards and planks, and although there was better material on the face of the bank, the part of the bank which was constructed with carts was constructed of good and durable material. The core of the bank, which ought to have been made of the best material, and the southern portion of the bank, that which is along the river, was made of the poorest material, anything that they could get; but they put on the inside, to keep the water in the canal, a face of 8 feet of the best material they could get, and that they made with carts and laid longitudinally. It is now a little more than half a century ago since the Cornwall Canal was constructed. During a great many years that sound, good face which was put on with carts saved the rotten outer banks of the canal, and prevented their being carried away; but after half a century, the wind, the sleet, the snow, the agitation of the banks of the canal by vessels going through, and by the natural wear and tear, this eight feet of good bank has been obliterated, and there is not to-day six inches of good face on the whole length of that canal from the head of the Sault to Mille Roches. And we are asked, Sir, to admit that a sound, and safe, and proper bank could be made by taking the soft material from the bottom of this canal by dredges and lifting it with derricks and throwing it over to the outside of the river; and we are told that any plan that we shall adopt in opposition to this, will cost a very much larger sum of money. Before I get through I shall be able to show you that the estimates prepared by the chief engineer, that the contracts which he has entered into, formed but a small portion of the expense that will be necessary for the safety of the canal under the plan that he proposes, and I shall show it from his own reports. He says :

"For two miles along the bank of the Sault Rapids, the soil is of strong clay and gravel, with stone and boulders imbedded in it, and is admirably adapted for making a strong and permanent embankment between the canal and the swift current of the river, the outer edge of which is well protected by the boulder stones taken out of the excavation of the canal."

This, he said, is Mr. Keefer's opinion. Mr. Keefer was not employed on that portion of the canal, and he spoke from memory, but Mr. Keefer now here said that the foundation upon which that bank was built was a safe and a proper foundation. On the contrary, we have the evidence of Col. Philpotts, of Mr. Mills, and of Mr. Wright, that this section No. 1 was the most difficult of the canal, because of its shifting sands, its hidden springs, and the quicksands. He objects to the plans which are proposed for dams across the head and foot of the canal, and says :

"It is not stated whether it is contemplated to place the dams at the narrowest part of the 'Sny' and use the present towing path with a bridge over each of the openings of the channel; or to place the dams obliquely, and in a position that would make them correspond as nearly as possible with the line of those parts of the island and canal bank with which they connect."

Well, Sir, I would have supposed that, after the long experience of the Chief Engineer of Canals, he would not at this time of day, tell us that it was necessary to have a towpath by which to tow the immense vessels we are going to have through 14 feet of water, so soon as this work is built, by horses along the bank. He must know that the day for towing vessels by horses in a 14-foot channel, is past; he must know that the plan which was proposed by these eminent engineers years ago, is a plan which most effectually forbade anything like a tow path, and, therefore, the objection which he makes on that score, is one which ought not to be entertained for a moment.

"The shore along the north side of Sheik's Island has a very tortuous and irregular outline, so that to make anything like a suitable towing path along it would be attended with a vast deal of uncertainty besides expense; still were this not done in the case of making the "Sny" the navigable channel, a swing bridge would be required for canal purposes over each of the openings made in the bank, instead of one swing bridge for public travel across the canal at Moulinette."

I do not remember when I have read anything more disingenuous. If the dams are built, and in wording this paragraph he presupposes they are built, no bridge is necessary. Anyone who may desire to visit that island, the inhabitants of the island, coming to the main shore, would cross upon the tops of the dams from either end, and no bridge would be required, and the fine road along the island would be used by them. Probably the best road in the township of Cornwall is that on the north shore of Sheik's Island, and no bridge whatever would be necessary. In that connection let me say, that the plan Mr. Page sends down in connection with these proposed dams is a plan more misleading than calculated to give reliable information to the Government, to members of the House and the country. He lays down water lines as if that island were flooded. It is true that in one or two places where the banks are shelving, the water may come up on the shore a little distance, but a small bank of not over three feet high in any place, and not extending an entire length of more than 200 or 300 feet, would prevent one drop of water at the highest known flood injuring any portion of the island. The chief engineer proceeds:

"Having already stated how it is proposed to enlarge and deepen the present canal and the manner in which the material excavated is intended to be disposed of, namely, to strengthen the weakest and least secure parts of the present banks or those parts of them that are closest to the margin of the river, the aggregate extent of which, there is good reason to believe, is less than one-third of the whole distance, or less than three times the length of the two dams that would be required to connect Sheik's Island with the banks of the canal."

Well, Mr. Page, the chief engineer, when he penned that paragraph, must have reckoned on an entire want of knowledge by the Government, owing to his having concealed from them the true state of affairs, and he must have reckoned on their lack of knowledge in regard to the condition of the banks when he said that three times the length of the dams is the whole distance. Why, the length of the bank that is unsound, and which he cannot make safe by the plan he proposes, is between four and five miles, and the length of the dams which we ask him to construct so as to give us a free inland canal, safe at all times and which will furnish water for navigation and for manufacturing purposes, is as follows: One of about 300 feet and another of 600 feet, or altogether 900 feet, as against the distance of five miles. And we must not forget that the construction of those two dams would give us an inland lake over 15,000 feet long, with a depth at the head of not less than 18 feet and at the foot of 43 feet, an average depth of 34 feet and 1,200 feet wide. Is that not a desirable object to be attained, although Mr. Page says it would be six miles away from the foot of the Cornwall Canal. That is true; but the construction of that dam would give an unlimited water power in the village of Old Mill Roches. It would furnish power for many manufacturing establishments and would give employment to many thousands of hands, whereas to-day very frequently the mills in Cornwall are stopped for lack of water in the canal. Speaking of the water in the canal, let me point out to the Government the dangers of the tortuous entry to that canal. There could be nothing worse. Vessels frequently go against the piers and their cargoes are injured or lost. And we are to be told by the chief engineer of this country that we must construct the canal where defective, and that we must retain the same unsafe and unsatisfactory entrance? Let me call the attention of the Government to the change it is proposed to make in the construction of the canal. We say, and we say it advisedly, and I shall be able to prove it if the best engineering talent is consulted, that Lock 19 should not be put under contract at all, but the head of the canal should be placed at Lock 20 instead of at the head of the Long Sault. Instead of taking vessels through lock after lock and consuming, as they do, from ten to twelve hours in passing from the head to the foot of the canal, by the plan proposed, which will make the canal safe, and so that it can never break away, we shall reduce the time consumed in passing from ten to twelve hours down to four to six hours. Is not this an important matter to be considered in the interests of the trade and commerce and navigation of this country, that we should not only minimise the expenses of transport, but we should also economise time, and by doing this necessarily lessen the charges attendant upon a great length of time being consumed in making the passage through a given portion of the canal. On this ground alone I think we are justified in calling the attention of the Government, and asking them to take some other advice in addition to that which they now possess. I want further to call attention to the disingenuous manner in which the chief engineer speaks of the construction of the dam. He says:

"Those who have given careful attention to such matters and are free to deal with the question on its merits,—"

I scarcely understand that phrase. My opinion is that every man in this country is free to deal with this question on its merits.—

"—will scarcely fail to observe that dams of such a height, made otherwise of moderate dimensions in the ordinary way, of the class of materials of which some of the banks are represented to consist, would not be likely to receive a favorable impression of their security."

Why should they be constructed in that way? Why should they be made of the material of which some of the banks are represented to consist? Why should they not be made of good material and be properly made? How, then, can he presume to condemn a work because of his own proposed construction of it in any but a proper and satisfactory manner?

"In fact they might reasonably be led to the conclusion that the adoption of the proposed means to meet uncertain risks might result in others quite as perplexing, if not even of a still more formidable kind, unless precautions were taken other than usual for even banks of the height required."

That would certainly be the case; and it would be his duty to see that they were properly constructed of good material and placed beyond a chance of breaking away. He, further, says:

"At places where the present banks are close to the margin of the river and the water alongside more than five feet in depth, a rough class of narrow crib-work will be placed to keep the bridge material in position until it is consolidated. The whole of the banks are afterwards to be well protected by a facing of stone."

It is said of a lady's letter that the gist is nearly always in the postscript. So it is in this document. We have before us his estimate of the cost of the construction of the works which he has proposed, but we have not before us the estimate of the cost of the stonework which he proposes to employ for the purpose of strengthening the banks made of the slush and soft material which he intends to throw over them. Practical men, who have been engaged in such work, and who have completed them and who know their cost, say that the strengthening of the bank with that crib-work and rough stone, as he calls it afterwards, would cost far more than the present work under contract. And Mr. Page himself admits that there is something wrong about his plans, because he says:

"It is, no doubt, true that placing the dredge material on the outer side is not the position where it would be most serviceable to banks of the description these are represented to be; still, the material will have a sectional area and extent, and be of a nature that, when fully consolidated, it would almost, if not altogether, retain the water in the canal were the old banks opposite the respective places where it is used removed altogether."

We desire to wholly retain the water; and this recalls to my memory the reports of Mr. Mills and Mr. Wright. Almost in identical words with theirs, he says:

"Of the feasibility, efficiency and safety of enlarging the present canal in the manner described in the specification on which the work is let, the slightest doubt is not entertained by me; but as regards forming the 'Sny' or north branch of the river into a navigable channel by means of dams at both ends of Sheik's Island, it must be confessed that my perception is quite as obtuse as was that of the late John B. Mills, who, it appears, failed to see the importance of it."

Now, Mr. Speaker, although he sees "the feasibility, efficiency and safety" of enlarging the canal in the way which he proposes, yet in another place he admits that the material is bad, and he proposes a plan by which, in raising the soft material and mixing it up in boxes and dredges, he hopes that at sometime or other it will become solid. He says that the plan proposed was objected to by Mr. Mills, and he adds, as regards forming the "Sny" or north branch of the river into a navigable channel by means of dams, that "his perception is quite as obtuse as that of the late John B. Mills, who, it appears, failed to see the importance of it." Would it be believed that Mr. John B. Mills did not fail to see the importance of it; will it be believed that Mr. John B. Mills recognised the importance of it, and that he was so fully alive to it, that, when leaving the canal, to the chief commissioners, he reported as follows. He was called upon to report as to the two plans: the Hooples' Creek plan, which I brought before the Government 10 years ago, as my right hon. friend at the head of the Government will remember, and his own plan along the river. Here are his words:

"It is a favorable feature of the river plan, that for so great a part of the distance you occupy the river, consequently that you have so much less canal in danger of derangement and requiring repair. The works in contemplation will certainly be safer at either extremes of the height of the floods than at any point between (considering the location as it respects the line the same); consequently, if the works are not quite up, then the nearer they are to the point of the water subsided the more safe they are. Upon the inland route you will observe that your works are not only up, but out of the way of danger from ice and flood. By these remarks, I wish not to disguise the fact, that there may be accidents and that there is danger of breaches and interruptions in the use of similar works, whatever be their situation and whatever be your forecast and precaution; but in the case before you, the probabilities of interruptions, derangements and expense of repairs in the one, hardly deserve to be named when considering the other.

"The river plan appears favorable, when considering the first expenditure."

And mark what he says:

"But before you pronounce it the economical, the judicious, and altogether the best plan to be pursued, you must consider what it accomplishes and what you have got for your money. In the first place, you have got an imperfect improvement, and one which does not secure the ends contemplated; secondly, the works and construction of the improvement, the business, the commercial operations of the whole country are jeopardized upon an unexpected and oft-occurring casualty, which may be avoided for the sum of £25,000 or £30,000; thirdly, in case of repairs being necessary they must be done at greater expense, and the same advantage cannot be taken of the season for repairs. These are matters which are perfectly within the comprehension of your board, and I hope they will receive the consideration which they deserve."

If a more emphatic or a more positive contradiction could be given to the report of Mr. Page by Mr. Mills, to whom he appeals, I should like to hear of it.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 44) to incorporate the Canada Congregational Foreign Missionary Society.—(Mr. Holton.)

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, KINGSTON.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 46) to amend the Act respecting Queen's College at Kingston.

Mr. BERGIN.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this Bill was referred to the Private Bills Committee, with the understanding that the House was not committed to its principle, to ascertain whether this Parliament had jurisdiction over the subject-matter with which the Bill deals. The committee, I understand, have reported the Bill back to this House without expressing any opinion on that question, leaving the responsibility of deciding it with the House itself. Now, I think it is pretty clear that this House has not jurisdiction over this subject, and if it has not, it would only be misleading the trustees of Queen's College to undertake to legislate on the subject at all. When we look at the provisions of the British North America Act, section 93, we find it there provided that the Local Legislatures of the different Provinces shall have exclusive control over the subject of education, subject to certain provisions, which are inserted, with a view to the protection of the various schools which have been established in the interest of the different religious denominations in the different Provinces. We have not the power to legislate on these subjects, but we may prevent the Provinces legislating in a way adverse to the interests of those on whose behalf those educational institutions have been established. I understand that the reason the authorities of Queen's College come here, is that they suppose, from the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Dobie vs. the Temporalities Board, that this Parliament alone has jurisdiction over the subject. On looking at this decision, I do not think that it has any immediate bearing upon this case. It dealt with a subject wholly different from that of Queen's College at Kingston. In that decision, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held that the Local Legislatures could not repeal or deal with the subject; and they did so on the ground that the interests sought to be affected were interests not exclusively confined to any one Province. The court says that although the Temporalities Board might have a forensic domicile in one Province, yet the actual domicile was not confined to one Province; that they find its properties are not under the exclusive control of the Legislature of any one Province; that one Province of Canada had as much right to legislate on the subject as another, and that by separate and distinct legislation in each particular Province the subject could not be effectively dealt with. And the board laid down this rule:

"The Quebec Act of 1775 does not deal directly with property or contracts affecting property, but with the civil rights of a corporation and of individuals present or future, for whose benefit the corporation was created and exists. If these rights and interests were capable of division according to the local position in Ontario and Quebec respectively, the Legislature of each Province would have power to deal with them so far as situate within the limits of its authority. If by a single Act of the Dominion Parliament, there had been constituted two separate corporations for the purpose of working, one a mine within the Province of Upper Canada, and the other a mine within the Province of Lower Canada, the Legislature of the Province of Quebec would clearly have had the authority to repeal the Act so far as it related to the latter mine and the corporation by which it is worked."

Then the board further says that:

"In every case where an Act is applicable to the two Provinces of Quebec and Ontario can now be validly repealed by one of them, the result must be to leave the Act in full vigor in the other. But in the present case, the legislation of Quebec must necessarily affect the rights and status of the corporation as previously existing in Ontario, as well as the rights and interests of individuals incorporators in that Province."

So that the rule laid down by the Board of the Privy Council was that where a corporation has not its actual domicile exclusively within one Province, and where it had interests that were under the jurisdiction and control of the legislature in another Province, and it had been incorporated before the Union, neither Act could deal effectively with it, and it would be the duty of those who sought amendment or change to come to this Legislature, which alone could afford effective relief or legislate effectively in the case. But that is not the position of this corporation at all. This is a corporation created by Royal charter. It deals with the subject of education, which is within the exclusive control of the Provinces, and we find, by looking at that royal charter, that it is there stated to be a corporation within the Province of Upper Canada. The charter reads:

"Whereas the establishment of a college within the Province of Upper Canada in North America in connection with the Church of Scotland—"

And so on. It is a corporation within the Province of Upper Canada; it has its actual domicile there, not merely a forensic domicile; and it cannot have its domicile anywhere else, because I find by a further provision in this Royal charter this paragraph, referring to the edifices that are to be erected for the use of the institution:

"Provided always, that such edifice or edifices shall not be more than three miles distant from St. Andrews in the town of Kingston, in the Province of Upper Canada."

So that the corporation is one having its domicile in Upper Canada exclusively. It is within the control of the Legislature of Upper Canada, and it has no interest or rights situated within any other Province. It is true that the Presbyterian Church, under whose control the management of this institution is, in a certain sense, placed, may have trustees appointed in other Provinces of the Dominion; but that is true of any corporation. Why, a corporation created by this Parliament may be composed altogether of foreigners. It is not necessary that any one of the incorporators should be a British subject or a resident of this country. We can incorporate it if we have the necessary jurisdiction. But this corporation, while the trustees may be residents of other Provinces and other portions of the Dominion, is situated within the Province of Ontario. Now let me suppose that the Province may think it necessary, in the public interest and in the interest of education, to exercise efficient control over the educational curriculum—it may be that the matriculation examination is not sufficiently strict, it may be that the course of study is not sufficiently comprehensive—the Provincial Legislature may say on what terms and conditions the power of granting degrees shall be continued to be held—it may legislate so as to bring this institution and others of a like character in line with the general educational policy of the country; but in order to do so, it must exercise control over this institution. Every one will admit that if this corporation was coming here seeking incorporation at our hands for the first time, it would be quite impossible for us to legislate on the subject. According to the provision of the British North America Act, not simply elementary education, but the whole subject of education is under the control of the different Provinces. There are certain rights with regard to education, as it existed at the time of Confederation, which are protected by giving this Government supervision over the Acts of the legislature, so as to see that the rights which were granted at the time that the constitution was adopted are not encroached upon or interfered with. But that is the extent of our authority. It does not go beyond that, and if any institution sought incorporation here for the first time, for the purpose of carrying on education, every one will admit that the subject matter is not within our control. We would say: You must go to the Local Legislature and seek for that legislation which you deem necessary in order to establish the institution you seek to erect. Unless it can be shown that this corporation has not its domicile exclusively within the Province of Ontario, it is perfectly clear we have no authority here to legislate upon the subject at all. There is the provision in the royal charter that it is an educational establishment to be established in Upper Canada, and there is the further provision that none of its educational buildings or works shall be carried on at a distance greater than three miles from the Church of St. Andrews, in the City of Kingston, and it is as exclusively within the control of the Provincial Legislature and as completely outside of the principles laid down by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Dobie against the Temporalities Board, as any case can well be. In that case the court said:

"The domicile of the corporation is merely forensic and cannot alter its statutory incorporation as a board in and for the Province of Upper and Lower Canada."

But this has not merely a forensic domicile within the Province of Upper Canada. It is altogether within the Province of Upper Canada. The whole institution is within that Province, and the fact that the Board of Trustees, in whole or in part, may be taken from the other Provinces has nothing to do with the question of jurisdiction. Everyone knows that the Legislature of Ontario or the Legislature of the other Provinces might create a corporation, everyone of those members might come from outside of the Province in order to carry on business within the provinces and so might this Parliament. Therefore, we have to look at the objects and the purposes for which the charter of incorporation was granted, and we find that those purposes were exclusively within the Province of Ontario. That being the case, however necessary such a measure may be, however proper its provisions may be in themselves, this is not the proper Legislature in which to seek these amendments to the charter.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The objection which the hon. member (Mr. Mills, Bothwell) takes to the jurisdiction of this House in dealing with the matter embraced in this Bill, is, at first sight, perhaps, not to be wondered at, when we consider that the trustees, the governing body of Queen's College, at first held the same opinion as the hon. gentleman does. When the Presbyterian Churches of the whole of Canada were about to unite, in 1874, Queen's College, being then a college in connection with the old Presbyterian Church of Canada, made application to the Provincial Legislature of Ontario for an Act empowering them to hold the same relation to the new Presbyterian Church of Canada as they did to the old Presbyterian Church of Scotland in Canada; and, under that Act, they continued to govern the college for five or six years. During those years, as many hon. gentlemen will remember, the suit of Dobie versus The Temporalities Board of the Church of Scotland was taken to the Privy Council, and there it was decided that the Act of the Local Legislature in regard to the Temporalities Board was invalid; and, in order to legalise those proceedings, they had to come to this Legislature. Some clergymen of the Presbyterian Church immediately filed a bill in chancery to restrain the Board of Trustees of Queen's College from dealing with the funds under the Act of the Province of Ontario, on the ground that it was ultra vires. The governing body of Queen's College took advice on that matter, and they were told that there were grave doubts as to that Act, in consequence of the decision of the Privy Council. In consequence of that decision, and of the litigation which was brought against them, they came to this Legislature, and in 1882 they obtained an Act which passed, after discussion in the Committee, after a division in the Private Bills Committee, on the question of jurisdiction, and under that Act they have been governing the institution ever since. Now, it is desired, and it is necessary, to get some changes made in that Act, and I submit that the trustees have no other place to go to for those amendments than this Legislature. Surely they cannot be sent to a Provincial Legislature to amend an Act of this Parliament. It is here they must come. You cannot state that this Parliament can never touch this law, because there are some doubts as to the jurisdiction of this House, or of the Provincial Legislature. The Act is upon our Statute book, and if the authorities of Queen's College choose to come here to obtain the amendments, let them take the responsibility. I hold, however, that this is the proper place for them to come to. Queen's College was chartered by Royal Charter in 1841. It obtained its charter under one of the ancient prerogatives of the Crown, from the Queen herself, and the charter was granted to the corporators named, and to "all and every such other person and persons as now is or are, or shall or may at any time or times hereafter be ministers of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, or members of the said Presbyterian Church in such connection, and in full communion with the said Presbyterian Church." Observe that this is not the Presbyterians in the Province of Upper Canada, or the Presbyterians in the city of Kingston, but every member of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in communion with the Church of Scotland throughout the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada. These are the incorporators; these are the people who form that corporation. They were in the Province of Lower Canada as well as in the Province of Upper Canada. I submit that the Legislature of Ontario has no power to dissolve that corporation, and the Legislature of Quebec has no power to dissolve that corporation. That is clearly laid down in the decision of the Privy Council in Dobie vs. The Temporalities Board. They are dealing with a similar case, where the Legislature of Quebec endeavored to deal with the Temporalities Board. That Board was composed of members of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, but the judges held that:

"The Quebec Act deals directly with the constitution and privileges of a corporation created by an Act of the Province of Canada, and having its corporate existence and corporate rights in the Province of Ontario as well as in the Province of Quebec. The professed object of the Act and the effect of its provisions is not to impose conditions on the dealings of the corporation with its funds within the Province of Quebec, but to destroy, in the first place, the old corporation and create a new one, and, in the second place, to alter materially the class of persons interested in the funds of the corporation."

There is just the point. What authority has the Legislature of Ontario to alter the class of persons interested in the funds of this corporation? Here is a corporation applying to both the Provinces, having funds scattered over both, authorised to hold meetings in either of those Provinces and compelled to advertise the meetings of trustees in both the Provinces, and to address notices to the trustees in both those Provinces. What authority has the Legislature of one of those Provinces to alter materially the class of persons interested in the funds of the corporation? That is the case in regard to Queen's College. Then the Judicial Committee says:

"According to the principles established by the judgment of this Board in the cases already referred to, the first step to be taken, with a view to test the validity of an Act of the Provincial Legislature, is to consider whether the subject-matter of the Act falls within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in section 92. If it does not, then the Act is of no validity. If it does, then these further questions may arise, viz., whether, notwithstanding that it is so, the subject of the Act does not also fall within one of the enumerated classes of subjects in section 91, and whether the power of the Provincial Legislature is or is not thereby overborne."

And again the Judicial Committee says:

"If the Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec were allowed jointly to abolish the Board of 1858, which is one corporation in and for both Provinces, they could only create in its room two corporations, one of which would exist in and for Ontario and be a foreigner in Quebec, and the other of which would be foreign to Ontario but a domestic institution in Quebec."

These incorporators are members of the Presbyterian Church in Canada which extends over both the old Provinces. They have joined with the other Presbyterian bodies all through this Dominion of Canada. They came to this Legislature in 1882 to ask that all these members of the new Presbyterian Church in Canada should be substituted for the old incorporators, who were simply the Presbyterian Church in the old Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada. It being, then, a fact that every member of the Presbyterian Church throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, is one of the incorporators of this college. I hold that this is the proper place for them to come to get an Act relating to it. But the hon. gentleman says that it comes within clause 93 of the British North America Act, which says that in and for each Province the Provincial Legislatures shall have exclusive jurisdiction in regard to matters of education. Now I submit, with all confidence, that the meaning of that clause is the public system of education. It does not mean that it shall have jurisdiction over a corporation which has education for its object. You might as well say that if all the publishers in Halifax, St. John, Montreal and Toronto were to join together and form one corporation for the purpose of publishing educational works and to seek a Dominion charter, this Legislature would have no jurisdiction, because the object of the corporation related to matters of education. I submit that is not the meaning of the word "education" in this clause, it is simply the system of education. The hon. gentleman says that the Provincial Legislature may change the curriculum. It may do so, and the college authorities will then have to get into accord with whatever system the Local Legislature may adopt. But the Local Legislature cannot go beyond that, it cannot change the incorporators, it cannot abolish the corporation, it cannot confiscate its funds, or deal with any of those funds which are situated in another Province. Another reason for coming to this Legislature is that this college may hold property in all the Provinces. The incorporators of this college are situated in every Province in this Dominion, and there are persons who, by will and otherwise, may become benefactors of the college, it may become possessed of property in all the Provinces, and the college desires the right to hold this property. The hon. gentleman said that they might change the subject of education or the curriculum. We have an instance in which a Province may legislate in regard to business carried on by a corporation, and that corporation has to conform to it, I allude to the question of insurance companies. The hon. gentleman will remember that there are companies incorporated here to carry on business over the Dominion, yet they must conform to local laws in regard to policies, to the conditions under which their policies are underwritten. That is a very similar case, in which the object of the corporation is to do insurance business, and it has to conform to the local laws in regard to the condition under which their policies are underwritten. Just so, the object of this corporation may be to impart education, and in regard to the curriculum or any other matter touching the system of education, it may have to conform to the local laws. There is another argument which has been mentioned to me, and there is something in it. This charter is granted by virtue of the Queen's prerogative, and the hon. member who has raised this question of jurisdiction is well aware, as a constitutional lawyer, that none of the Queen's prerogatives can be altered, or amended, or affected, except with the Queen's consent. Now, the Provincial Legislatures have no authority to affect, alter, or to modify, any of the Queen's prerogatives, because she is not a party to the legislation. In the Province of New Brunswick that principle is recognised, because there the Queen is not, even by name, a party to the legislation; she is not mentioned in the Acts of the Legislature. The judges of the Supreme Court, Judges Taschereau, Gwynne and Henry, have all laid down in the case of Lenoir vs. Ritchie, that the Queen is not a party to the legislation of the Local Legislature; it is the Lieutenant Governor who legislates there, he represents the royal authority, and therefore those Legislatures cannot do away with, or modify, or affect any of the Queen's prerogatives; therefore they could not amend, or alter a charter granted by virtue of the Queen's prerogative. I do not think it is necessary to go further into this argument, because the fact remains that this is a corporation, not for Provincial purposes, but for Dominion purposes; it is a corporation existing in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec; it is a corporation which has been already dealt with by this Legislature, and the only way that we can get that Act amended is by another Act of this Legislature. On this account I appeal confidently to this House and ask them to pass this Bill, and if any hon. gentleman have doubts, let them institute the proceedings and the governing body of Queen's College would be very glad to test the question in any court.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has spoken about the Queen's prerogative not being subject to local legislation. I entirely disagree with him on that point. I think that the Local Legislature, within its peculiar jurisdiction, is supreme, and has as much right to interfere with and alter a charter within the Province, as this Dominion Parliament can have in regard to matters within its jurisdiction. My hon. friend has referred to the legislation of New Brunswick since Confederation, and he says that Her Majesty's name is omitted in such legislation. To my recollection, and I am pretty positive, even before Confederation, the Queen's name was never used in the legislation of New Brunswick. But it seems to me that that question cannot apply to this case. Now, Mr. Speaker, with all my anxiety to carry out the views of Queen's College, the question that has been raised here is a very important constitutional one. When the Act of 1882 was before this House I believe there was a discussion in the Committee of Private Bills, but in this House the Bill passed the various stages without discussion and the question was not brought up. Now, I think there was a broad distinction between the case of Dobie and the Temporalities Board and this case. In the case of Dobie there was an interference by the Legislature of Quebec with an Act of the Province of Canada. The Act of the Legislature interfered with the property not only of a corporation created by the Legislature of Canada, but of a corporation created in the Province of Ontario as well as the Province of Quebec. Therefore the Privy Council held that the Legislature of Quebec had no authority to interfere with a corporation which had its existence under a statute of Canada. A corporation having its corporate existence and rights in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec could not be interfered with by the legislation of a particular Province, neither the Legislature of Ontario nor the Legislature of Quebec could interfere with that corporation. We find that the Temporalities Act, 22 Victoria, chapter 66, provided that while the funds were for the purpose of the sustenance of the ministers and missionaries of the church, they were also to be applied towards the construction and maintenance of churches and manses in connection with said church, throughout Canada; so that in reality the legislation of Quebec, by the Act which they attempted to pass, was declared ultra vires by the Privy Council, as an attempt to interfere with the matters in the Province of Ontario as well as in the Province of Quebec. There is a distinction between this case and the present position of Queen's College. The charter was granted in Upper Canada at a time shortly after the union of the two Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada. The college as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), had a domicile conferred on it by that charter, and if so it is a corporation exclusively within the Province of Ontario. It has been said that the corporation might wish to acquire property in another Province. I do not see that even if it is within the jurisdiction of Ontario, that will prevent it holding property in another Province. It has been decided that if a corporation in Ontario held property in Quebec it was subject to the jurisdiction of the Legislature of Quebec for the purpose of taxing that property, but beyond that no power existed against the corporation. So that even although this corporation might be exclusively within the jurisdiction of Ontario, it would not prevent it holding property in another Province. In this Dominion there are other corporations which have royal charters. The college where I was educated holds a royal charter, and is probably the oldest in the Dominion, King's College, Windsor, Nova Scotia. Could this Dominion Parliament set to work and interfere with that charter? So in regard to the University of Fredericton. I cannot speak with respect to the University of Toronto; but if the proposition laid down by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) is correct, the Dominion Parliament can interfere with these three universities, and to carry out the principle it will be necessary to practically take those universities which are within the jurisdiction of the Provinces and which were created by royal charter and place them under the jurisdiction of this Parliament. I fail to see that this can legally be done, although I confess the question is surrounded by difficulty, but at the same time I must say, after giving the subject a good deal of attention, there is great force in the argument of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in this case. So far as this college is concerned, and notwithstanding the fact that we passed in 1882 an Act which so far has not been called in question before any legal tribunal, this question having now come fairly before the House we are bound to consider whether it is one on which we can legislate. In my opinion the principles laid down by the Privy Council in the case of Dobie versus The Temporalities Fund are not applicable to the case of this college. The Privy Council in that case were dealing with a matter which existed in the old Provinces, and it was sought to repeal an Act of Canada comprising Ontario and Quebec. In this case we are only interfering with rights created in Ontario and with a subject that falls within the jurisdiction of that Province. With respect to the 93rd section, the hon. gentleman admits that so far as regards the system of education and the curriculum is concerned that subject falls within the local jurisdiction. The hon. gentleman admits that principle, but he says in regard to Queen's College that the internal corporation and arrangements may be within the province of the Dominion Parliament. Then every high school may be placed in the same category; but if the subject of education has been entrusted to the Provincial Legislatures, surely all incidents must have been given to them. My feeling would be to support this Act and to assent to the proposed legislation, but I feel bound to express my views on the subject, which I admit to be surrounded with difficulty, but it seems to me after hearing the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that my views are in accordance with those expressed by that hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am afraid that in the short time remaining for the disposal of Private Bills it may be almost impossible, if the objections are insisted on, to close the discussion. If hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken intend to insist on those objections it is not worth while, I confess, to proceed; but, perhaps, they have merely spoken for the purpose of asserting their view of the jurisdiction of this Parliament and they will permit the Bill to pass. If the Bill is to be opposed I shall offer a few observations in regard to it. There has been much argument offered on both sides in which I cannot concur, but the strong point in favor of the passing of this Bill, if it is a Bill which commends itself to the House on its merits, is this: that this Parliament in 1832 asserted its jurisdiction and passed an Act by which it arranged the organisation of this college. I must assume that in passing that Act it made provisions and regulations which were unwise or inconvenient in their operation, and the promoters who submitted to that Act in 1882, come now to the same body and ask for the removal of those unwise or inconvenient restraints. I think the House under such circumstances ought not to decline jurisdiction, especially in regard to a Private Bill. If this were a Bil.

affecting, to any considerable extent, public interests, it could, perhaps, be urged with a good deal of force that we should not affect the rights of the public by legislating in a doubtful case of jurisdiction; but this is an application by a private party, whose application will fail in effect, even though we should pass the Bill, if it be decided that the matter is beyond our control; but, having taken the control in 1882, having passed a statute—and it must be admitted that it would be a very dangerous and bold measure for any Provincial Legislature to amend the Act of this Parliament—I think this Parliament should not stultify itself now by saying: “We adopted in 1882 and imposed on you restraints which were improper, and we now decline to exercise our power or authority over our own statute.” It seems to me this is not a statute, as it was contended by the hon. member for Bo. hwell (Mr. Mills), in relation to the subject of education. I agree with the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), that the Provincial Legislature, notwithstanding our Act of 1882, and notwithstanding that we may pass this Bill to-night, has such ample power over education, that, in dealing with the subject of education, it may prevent this college teaching in Ontario; but it does not by any means follow that because the Provincial Legislature has control over education, or control over civil rights, or control over contracts, this Parliament may not have power to create a body for the purpose of carrying on education in more than one of the Provinces, as it may in relation to insurance, as has been decided, which is no more a matter within our control than is the subject of education. When we look at the charter under which the college was constituted, we find it was not, as was intimated, a charter of a provincial character, but a royal charter having distinct relation to the whole Province of Canada. The Province of Canada subsequently became divided, and the question is what Legislature is competent to repeal or amend its provisions, since the division of the Province of Canada into the two Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. How far the case is analogous to that of Dobie vs. The Temporalities Fund is to a great extent a question of fact, and I am not in possession of the facts stated in the discussion, and I was not on the Committee so as to be able to see how far the facts are within that case, but it is clearly a matter which may be within our authority under the rule laid down by the Privy Council, and it would be distinctly so, I humbly submit, if this corporation were created by royal charter, which was equivalent to a statute of the old Province of Canada for purposes which extended to the whole Province of Canada. It has property in the two Provinces of Ontario and Quebec which it is necessary to administer under the authority of a new statute. As I said before I do not pretend to be so intimately acquainted with the facts as to be able to discuss that; I merely make this argument for the purpose of expressing my views, that it is not a statute dealing with the subject-matter of education; it professes to deal with a corporation established for the purpose of carrying on its operations in two of the Provinces of Canada. It has been treated by this Parliament as such and this Parliament has imposed restraints upon it as such, and I think it is only reasonable and fair that we should give the legislation which is necessary to remove restraints which we ourselves have imposed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). If this were an ordinary statute of a private nature which did not involve the acceptance of a principle on the part of this House, it might perhaps be possible that the House would take the position the hon. Minister asks us to take. But as my friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon) has shown, if we once assert the right to deal with this college we may be asked perhaps to-morrow or the day after, to assert a similar right with regard to other colleges such as Windsor, N.S., or the other college he has named. I may say that the balance of the argument appears to me to be very strongly against our having the power to pass this statute. The hon. Minister who has just sat down says it appears to him to be a very strong point that we did in 1882 exercise the power to pass a statute amending this charter. It has been already pointed out that that Act went through this House sub silentio. Our power to pass it was not criticised or called into question at the time, and it seems to me loose argument to advance, that if we have been wrong once we are to perpetuate that wrong year after year. If we have usurped jurisdiction one year, this House should not be called upon to follow up that usurpation. The hon. gentleman says, that this House having passed the Act and attempted to exercise jurisdiction it would be a very strong action on the part of the Local Legislature to attempt to repeal it. The hon. gentleman will see at once, that if we passed that Act without having jurisdiction to pass it, it requires no Act of the Local Legislature to repeal, but the statute itself is void, so that it stands not upon the question as to whether an attempt is made by the Local Legislature to repeal it, but on the point whether or not we had power to pass it. The question comes up whether or not the charter which it is now sought to amend was an incorporation for old Canada, or simply for the Province of Ontario. It strikes me that the hon. Minister is hardly correct in assuming that it is a corporation having its existence and rights in both Provinces. It is expressly laid down in the preamble to the charter that it is to be a college within the Province of Upper Canada. The preamble says:

“Whereas the establishment of a college in the Province of Upper Canada, in British North America, in connection with the Church of Scotland.”

And further on it states:

“It shall be known in deed and law by the name and style of the Queen’s College at Kingston.”

And again in the charter it provides:

“We further will that the trustees and their successors shall have sufficient power and authority to erect an edifice or edifices for the uses of the college, provided always that such edifice or edifices shall be not more than three miles distant from St. Andrews’ Church, in the town of Kingston, in the Province of Upper Canada.

So that the whole object and purview of the royal charter would appear to have been a statute of incorporation in the Province of Upper Canada. If that is the case, it appears to me to be almost conclusive against our right to legislate upon it. The case which the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) cites in support of his argument appeared to me from the very first, to be dead against him. That was a decision upon an Act of the Quebec Legislature. That Act of the Quebec Legislature attempted to interfere with, and in fact, to destroy a corporation which had been created by the Province of Old Canada. A corporation was created by the Province of Old Canada, having its rights and existence in both of the Provinces, therefore, neither the Province of Ontario nor the Province of Quebec could attempt to alter that charter, for it was not within their powers. The power to alter any Act of the old Province of Canada, as I understand that decision, was limited simply to the direct powers of legislation which each Province had on the same subject. They decided in that case that this corporation having its corporate existence and rights in both Provinces could not be repealed or modified by the resolution of either Province, and, therefore, the only place they could come to was the general Parliament of Canada. The balance of arguments seem to be strongly in favor of the position that the charter we seek to amend is that of a corporation not having its rights and existence in both Provinces, but in the Province of Upper Canada, now Ontario, alone. If that is so, it seems to me that the Province of Ontario alone can legislate upon it. I think it would be a dangerous usurpation on our part, if we come to the conclusion that we have no jurisdiction here, to exercise jurisdiction simply because we made a mistake in the same direction some years ago when the attention of the House was not called to it.

Mr. CASEY. I have to again protest against the jurisdiction of this House in dealing with this matter. As my friend who has just sat down has pointed out, if we deal with the affairs of Queen's College, Kingston, we have a right to deal with the affairs of Victoria College or of University College, Toronto, or any of the Catholic colleges in this city, or in Toronto, or in the Province of Quebec. I want to call the attention of the House to the importance of the question, and especially I want to call the attention of my friends who represent ridings in the Province of Quebec. If we have a right to deal with this matter, we have also a right to deal with the funds and with the administration of every Catholic college of the Province of Quebec. I say, therefore, that we have to look at what we are doing and to understand our position. I think the constitutional question has been fully discussed, and that it has been demonstrated to this House that we have no jurisdiction. Do our friends in Quebec want to have their colleges put under the jurisdiction of this Parliament?

Mr. BERGERON. No.

Mr. CASEY. I think they do not. As a Methodist and a Protestant, I do not want to have the Methodist College in the Province of Ontario put under the jurisdiction of this House. For these reasons, pertaining entirely to the jurisdiction of this House, and without the least criticism of the changes proposed to be made in the constitution of Queen's College, I am opposed to this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill considered in Committee and reported.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved the third reading of the Bill.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. BROWN moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 3) to make further provision as to the prevention of cruelty to animals. He said: In moving, Mr. Speaker, that you do leave the Chair, I desire to emphasise the statement I made before the House on a late occasion, that understanding that certain hon. gentlemen have some objections to some of the latter clauses of this Bill, I propose in committee to make such modifications as I am sure will satisfy the House.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee)

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman who moved this Bill into Committee just now, declined, in all the discussions which have taken place upon the Bill, to withdraw or amend any of the clauses. As I understand the Bill, there is only one important clause in it, about which there is any particular question; the whole Bill, as was conceded in a previous discussion, depends upon that clause. At this stage of the matter, I do not propose to detain the Committee by any discussion. I move, seconded by Mr. Taylor, that the Committee do now rise.

Motion agreed to: yeas, 67; nays, 60.

WRECKING IN CANADIAN WATERS.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 2), an Act to permit foreign vessels to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. When this Bill was before the Committee, we placed before the Committee the Bill which had been introduced in the House of Representatives at Washington last year, upon which a joint report had been passed and which, it was supposed, had become law. The committee were of opinion that it would be proper and right to adopt exactly the offer of the United States Government in this matter, and we adopted the form of the offer of reciprocity in wrecking which had been made by the Government of the United States. On that understanding I was ordered to report the Bill, in conformity with the one we understood had been passed at Washington. Subsequently I held communication with some authorities at Washington and have been officially informed that the joint resolution in wrecking last year failed to pass, the reason being, I suppose, that the Bill which was introduced here last Session, after passing a certain stage, had been thrown out and therefore the Americans would not proceed further with their measure. That leaves the law at Washington exactly as it was in 1878, and that is the offer which has been several years before us. This being the case, I now ask the Committee to change my Bill so that it will read exactly in accordance with that offer. The Bill now before you is a little larger and wider in scope, but by changing a few words it will meet the case as it stands, and be exactly in the same terms as the offer of the United States. The following is the law in the United States:—

"That Canadian vessels of all descriptions may render aid or assistance to Canadian or other vessels wrecked or disabled in the waters of the United States contiguous to the Dominion of Canada, and it is provided that this Act shall not take effect until proclamation by the President declaring that the privilege of aiding American or other vessels wrecked or disabled in American waters contiguous to the United States, has been extended by the Government of the Dominion of Canada, and declaring this Act to be in force. And providing further that this Act shall cease to be in force from and after the date of the proclamation by the President to the effect that said reciprocal privilege has been withdrawn or revoked by the said Government of the Dominion of Canada."

That is the law in the United States. Now, I propose to make our law an exact acceptance of that.

Mr. MITCHELL. You are in favor of reciprocity, then?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes; the Bill will read:

"United States vessels of all descriptions may render aid or assistance to United States or other vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters contiguous to the United States."

Then the 2nd clause which extends it to the waters of the Welland Canal and the Sault Ste. Marie Canal will be struck out as that was the provision made in Washington last year which is not law. That was the most material change. The third clause will provide:

"This Act shall come into force from and after the date to be named by proclamation of the Governor General, which proclamation may be issued when the Governor in Council is assured that the privileges of aiding Canadian or other vessels in United States waters contiguous to the Dominion of Canada will be extended to Canadian vessels of all descriptions."

The subsequent sub-section is left as it is.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Would it not be as well to strike out the words "contiguous to the United States?" They might lead to some misapprehension at times. As the Bill is intended to apply generally wherever assistance is required I do not see the object of keeping in these words.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I think it is better to take the words exactly of the American Bill and leave it to the Department of Customs to make regulations for the working of the Act. I think that by joint communication, regulations will be established which will enable the Act to be worked satisfactorily.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There is something in that, but at the same time it leaves the subject open to question, and in the event of the services of an American tug being available in our waters on the maritime coast, that would hardly be covered perhaps by the words in this section. I do not see the object of keeping them in since the view is to render perfect freedom to the two countries in that respect.

Mr. KENNY. I differ with the hon. gentleman. I think it is eminently desirable we should leave the wording of the Act as it is. As I understand the Act it will not apply to the waters of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no question in the wording of the Act as suggested by the hon. member for Halifax. As I understand the Bill, it will not apply to the Maritime Provinces as it does to the inland waters. If you do that you will have no reciprocity, because that is the point the Americans refuse in connection with their refusal to extend the coasting trade to both countries. If I were to express my individual feeling I would have no objection to that but it is alleged that the feeling of the House and the country is to accept the Bill as passed by the Congress of the United States and place the United States in the exact position in which they propose to place Canada, but not beyond that.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I am glad to see the Minister of Customs takes a different view to my colleague, and also to notice that the mover of this Bill considers that the object he has in view to allow foreign vessels to be used in our maritime waters to be reached by the clause as it now stands. The hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill, in reply to my remarks, said that was his intention. If the hon. the Minister of Customs sees no objection on the part of the Government, I do not see the use of keeping in a phrase which may be liable to misconstruction.

Mr. MITCHELL. There cannot be a doubt about the effect of this Bill. My hon. friend's objection, it appears to me, is quite unnecessary, because it does not apply. We give permission to American vessels to relieve vessels in distress in proximity to the coasts of Canada, and that will not only apply to the upper lakes but both waters of the St. Lawrence. It will apply not only both upper lakes and to the waters of the St. Lawrence, but to the whole coasts of Canada.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). My colleague says not.

Mr. MITCHELL. Your colleague is not always correct, as I think you will admit, and, if you had been on the other side, you would probably have been found advocating what he is advocating now. That is the experience of this House in regard to the senior member and the junior member for Halifax. However, a higher authority than the senior or junior member for Halifax, the Minister of Customs, has stated what interpretation his department will place on this Bill, and therefore there cannot be a doubt about it. I did not, however, rise for the purpose of stating what I have stated, but I desired to say that I was delighted to hear one statement which was made by the Minister of Customs, who, no doubt, speaks as the representative of the Government of which he is a member. He says that he proposes to give the Americans just that amount of reciprocity which they give us. That is a sound policy, to have reciprocal trade and reciprocal relations and reciprocal legislation, where we can arrange it. I hope the hon. gentleman will sustain that policy, not only during this Legislature, but if, unfortunately for the country, he and his Government should be maintained in power for another term, and not only in regard to such reciprocity as is referred to in this Bill, but wherever freedom of intercourse between our country and the United States is demanded; that he will be prepared in all cases to give the Americans all the reciprocal legislation which they give us, and that our policy in that regard may be based upon the reciprocal legislation passed on the other side.

Mr. CHARLTON. I presume, from the feeling that evidently exists in the country, that a somewhat different course will be taken in this House on this occasion from what was taken a year ago, but I desire to call the attention of the House to certain facts connected with this question. This offer of reciprocity in wrecking, which comes from the United States, is a reversal of the policy adopted by that country in 1874, when they enacted the very regulations about which they now complain. The action of the American Government in that regard compelled the Government of Canada to take the course which they did.

Mr. MITCHELL. They have come to a better state of mind.

Mr. CHARLTON. They may have come to a better state of mind, but at that time the American Government refused to accept our offer of reciprocity in coasting, which is contained in 33 Victoria, chapter 14, section 2. They wished to secure from us an advantage which we enjoyed in that matter, without giving a proper return, and that forced upon us the course which the Canadian Government took. I am quite willing and quite ready to accord to the American people any fair measure of reciprocity, but I advocate it so far only as reciprocity will be conducive to our interests as well as to theirs. The reciprocity which gives away any advantage which we enjoy without our getting anything in return is one which I do not advocate, and shall not support. When the American Government took the course to which I refer, it led to the formation of Tug Associations in Canada. There was a tug company formed, of which the hon. gentleman who was formerly the member for Monck was a member. It was an efficient tug company which was formed at Windsor, and that has been succeeded by other tug companies and by wrecking companies. These companies have been formed in consequence of the action of the American Government, and I contend that the amount which has been invested in that interest in this country is deserving of some consideration at the hands of this House, and that any measure which will sacrifice those interests for the benefit of a foreign interest is neither reciprocity nor a measure which should commend itself to our consideration. While I am willing to abate very much of the ground which was taken last year, and to accept a slight modification of the American offer, yet I do think that the American offer should be modified, as I will shortly show. The view of the Government in 1879 is shown by the remarks made by the right hon. gentleman who leads the House in the debate which took place on the motion for papers in regard to the seizure of the Sarah E. Bryant, which came to the relief of a vessel which was wrecked on the coast of Lake Erie. A charge was made that the Canadian Government had refused to allow aid and assistance to be given to that vessel from a foreign country, and had left people to perish on the wreck. The humanity cry was raised. The fact was that the Canadian tug Jessie had taken the passengers off before the American vessel came, and the latter came afterwards to wreck the vessel. She was seized under the law at that time, and was prevented from carrying out her plan. In the discussion, Sir John Macdonald said:

"The hon. gentleman correctly describes the position. It had been found that, with a larger capital engaged in wrecking, all the work was done by Americans. Preference was always given, it was found, to American vessels, and Canadian vessels were charged exorbitant prices. In self-defence, a Canadian tug company was got up, to give our wreckers a chance in the business, the profits of which would be considerable, as the largest number of wrecks took place on our coast. As soon as the owners of tug boats in the United States found this out, this measure was introduced in Congress. It was a sham reciprocity, which would not have been proposed had it not been for this order by the late Government. The order was quite explicit enough. A wrecked vessel was still afloat, and, by the maritime law, all vessels could go to its rescue and claim salvage, but a vessel once fairly ashore stood in quite a different position. It was especially necessary along our line of water that our Customs should not be interfered with. A vessel might be of small value and have a most valuable cargo, and she could be wrecked and the goods smuggled into our country. This order was made to prevent anything of that kind. When the papers came down, the matter could be discussed at greater length."

Now, in regard to the conduct of the Canadian Government in reference to wrecks, with regard to permits which have been granted to American tugs to engage in the relief of American vessels, it can be shown that the conduct of the Canadian Government has been in all cases humane and liberal, and that in no instance has the American Government granted a permit to a Canadian vessel to assist another Canadian vessel in American waters. I have here a short list of permits granted to American vessels to assist other American vessels in Canadian waters, when there was no question whatever of the saving of life. On 22nd May, 1883, the schooner Ellsworth, ashore near Sarnia, was permitted to use American tugs. On 12th September, 1883, the schooner Winslow, ashore near Point Edward, was permitted to use American tugs. On 18th October, 1883, the International Wrecking Company were permitted to use American tugs at Southampton. On 13th November, 1883, the International Wrecking Company were permitted to use the American tugs Balize and Smith, wrecking at Southampton. On 22nd November, 1883, the schooner Carter, ashore near Kincardine, was permitted to use American tugs. On 7th May, 1884, the American tug Smith, with wrecking outfit, was permitted to work at the wreck of the steamer Manitoba at Southampton, and the schooner Carter at Kincardine. On 9th April, 1885, permission was given to an American scow, with wrecking outfit, to raise the tug Heron, sunk in the Georgian Bay. On 18th March, 1885, permission was given to one J. Donnelly to use American tools, &c., in relieving the propeller Owen Sound, above Sault Ste. Marie, in Canadian waters. On 30th May, 1885, permission was given to J. Donnelly to use United States tugs to relieve the City of Owen Sound, above Sault Ste. Marie. On 10th October, 1885, permission was given to the steam barge J. H. Fairwell to relieve the schooner Godfrey, ashore at Stag Island. Here are numerous cases where the Canadian Government has permitted the use of American wrecking plant in cases where there was no imminent danger of loss of life or property, because these vessels were stranded in places where wrecking operations had to be undertaken for their relief. Now, neither the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) nor any other member of this House can point to one instance where the American Government has acted with equal liberality towards ourselves. In the case of the wreck of the Algoma in Lake Superior the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were not allowed to use their own plant in relieving the vessel, and they were compelled to send from that point to Port Huron, 600 miles away, for wrecking apparatus; so that the contrast between the conduct of the two Governments is very greatly to the credit and favor of the Canadian Government. But the position of the matter, as I have said, is one in which I suppose a modification of our law will have to be made, and I shall propose a very slight modification in this Bill. We are so situated that no wreck can be relieved on the American coast of the great lakes without the tug, if it is a Canadian tug, being engaged in coasting, because there is not a single dry dock from Buffalo westward to the head of Lake Superior, on the Canadian side, except on the Georgian Bay at Owen Sound and Collingwood. There are two dry docks at Buffalo, two or three in Cleveland, one in Toledo, two in Detroit, and two in Bay City, but on the whole stretch of that coast there is not a dry dock on the Canadian side except the two mentioned, which are far from the great route of commerce on the lakes. If a Canadian tug relieves an American vessel on the American shore she must necessarily engage in towing and in coasting in order to deliver that vessel to a dry dock; she has got to tow her to an American port to deliver her to an American dry dock, and in doing that she is contravening the American navigation laws. Now, I think, from the evidence I have of the advantages the American marine is likely to secure from this concession, that they will make other slight concessions in this matter. It must be borne in mind that the majority of the wrecks, except those on Lake Michigan, are upon the Canadian coast; it must also be borne in mind that the insurance companies, with the exception of the Western of Canada, are all in the United States. I presume three-fourths, perhaps nine-tenths of the risks are written by American insurance companies. Now, whenever a vessel is wrecked the insurance company having a risk upon that vessel, makes arrangements for her wrecking, and in all cases where that company is an American one, the American wrecking company will get the job.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Not necessarily.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; by arrangement between these companies and the officers of wrecking associations, the job is given to an American company; and in this case you are simply giving away all the business that we might secure for our own companies, and allowing it to go into the hands of American companies. Now, I say that this is not reciprocity, this is surrendering an advantage which we possess, and an advantage which was thrust upon us by their own act, it is surrendering this advantage without a quid pro quo, and I am going to propose a most moderate amendment to this Bill of my hon. friend from Frontenac. I do not propose to take the position that we shall insist upon our offer of reciprocity in coasting, but I propose that we shall make to the Americans an offer of a modified character, an offer eminently fair, eminently liberal, one that, if they are actuated by a spirit of fair play, will be accepted by them. I propose, in addition to the reciprocity in wrecking privileges that tugs, and other vessels but tugs, as these are the vessels engaged in wrecking, shall be allowed to tow vessels and rafts from port to port in the coast of either country and in the waters of either country contiguous to the waters of the other country. If they will give us that slight concession I for one would be willing to drop the present arrangement and make this new offer for the sake of amity and peace and good will. I propose this in the belief that it will be accepted by the American Government, and that it will mitigate somewhat the unpleasant consequences to ourselves of the passage of this Bill, and the surrender of the advantages that we possess under present arrangements. I propose that section 1 of this Bill read as follows:—

"United States vessels and wrecking appurtenances may render aid and assistance to United States or other vessels, wrecked, or disabled, or in distress in Canadian waters contiguous to the United States."

Adding these words:

"And United States tugs may tow vessels and rafts from one Canadian port to another in Canadian waters contiguous to the United States."

And I propose the following amendment to the third section:

"When the privilege of towing vessels and rafts from one United States port to another, in waters contiguous to Canada, is accorded to Canadian tugs."

That is simply extending the provisions of this reciprocity offer so far as embraced in the operations of the Bill for aiding vessels and rafts by the tugs of either nation. This amendment would obviate all difficulty as to coasting with wrecks from one port to another, and would give to us, perhaps, some light advantage in return for the advantages that we surrender. I think it would make the Bill more satisfactory to the navigation interests in this country, and without this small concession that we ask, being granted to us, I do not think that we ought to entertain the amendment proposed in the Bill. I advance this proposition, having some knowledge of the vessel interests, and knowing that if we accept the American offer, having ourselves first made that offer of entire reciprocity in coasting, we simply allow them to select from that broad offer the one particular item in which they will secure a great advantage and leave us with the husk while they take the kernel; and I think that we had better get a little of the meat ourselves. I believe it will be granted to us. I make this amendment aside from any political bias or standpoint whatever. It is a matter in which we should consult the interests of lake marine, in which we should consult the rights of men who have invested a large amount of capital. At all events, we should try to get this concession, we should make the offer, and if the offer is refused by the American Government, then we can come next year to the point of considering whether we will surrender the whole thing or not. I make this motion seconded by Mr. Lister, who also is thoroughly conversant with the lake marine of our coast, and knows that this small concession is one that we ought to ask.

Mr. KENNY. I was rather surprised at the remark which fell from my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), if I understood him aright, when he said that he supposed that my objection to this measure originated in the fact that my colleague was in favor of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is what I said.

Mr. KENNY. Well, I think it is a most unfair criticism. My hostility to this Bill, if it is applied to the Maritime Provinces, is based entirely upon the argument advanced by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He says that he would be in favor of it if it was fair and reciprocal. Now, I contend that the action of such a Bill as this in the Maritime Provinces would not be reciprocal, inasmuch as all the benefits of it would accrue to the American wrecking companies. It so happens that we have, on the seaboard of the Atlantic Provinces, individuals who are prepared to carry on this wrecking business, and who are equipped with all the necessary plant. My hon. friend knows that this wrecking business is very largely controlled by the Americans. I am speaking of the Atlantic waters—and that any of these vessels that would meet with accidents on our coasts would be insured in the American companies, and that these underwriters, both of hulls and of cargoes, would put the business in the hands of their own wrecking companies, to the exclusion of ours, and we would never get a chance of working in the same way on the American coast. Hence my objection to the measure; but I am very glad to hear that it will not apply to the Atlantic coast. I make this explanation because it is due to myself.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will take the last statement made by the hon. gentleman first. I understood the statement of the Minister of Customs to be that the measure would apply to all the coasts of Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will take the last statement made by the hon. gentleman first. I understood the statement of the Minister of Customs to be that the measure would apply to all the coasts of Canada.

Mr. BOWELL. Quite the contrary.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Only to inland waters.

Mr. MITCHELL. If it is to apply only to inland waters, the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) is right in what he understood the Minister of Customs to say, but I understood him to say that it would apply to all the coasts of Canada. At any rate, I do not understand why it should not apply to the Atlantic coast. I do not see why a principle that is applied on the inland waters of the great lakes should not apply to the harbors, shores and coasts of the Maritime Provinces. If wrecks occur there, as they very frequently do, the people of the Maritime Provinces should have the privilege of obtaining the assistance of the most effective wrecking craft. The hon. gentleman said that the American wrecking systems are more efficient.

Mr. KENNY. I say they are more immediately under the control of American underwriters.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not see why the people, who will have to pay the money if the vessels are lost, should not have the privilege of obtaining the best wrecking craft, especially when the principle of reciprocity is adopted on the lakes. With respect to the personal matter to which the hon. gentleman has referred, the remark was made in a jocular sense. The hon. gentleman knows I respect him too much to say anything that would reflect on his consistency; but I appeal to this House, also in a jocular sense but with a good deal of reality about it, as to whether our experience of the senior and the junior members for Halifax, both of whom so ably and so persistently represent their respective parties and express the views of their parties, is not such that we have the assurance that when one of those members rises in his place and says something in black the other will immediately afterwards rise and say that it is not black, or at all events not quite black but some other color. While I said that in a jocular sense I repeat it now, for it is a matter remarked by everybody. No matter whether the junior member rises and makes a statement regarding United States craft, the senior member will rise—

Mr. JONES (Halifax). No.

Mr. MITCHELL—and controvert it. At all events, that is our impression.

Mr. KENNY. The junior must always follow the senior.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. MITCHELL. My impression is that these hon. gentlemen never agree, and I have never known them to vote on the same side. As a matter of curiosity, I should like to see them vote together on one side on the question now before the House.

Mr. LABELLE. I am very sorry to differ from the opinions expressed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I thought that hon. gentleman was in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, and, being in favor of the adoption of that principle, I naturally imagined that a little concession made by the United States towards Canada would be grasped at by him as well as by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. But they have not done so. This reminds me of the circumstance, that, when I came forward as a parliamentary candidate, my father told me there were two kinds of patriotism in the House: one was the old time patriotism, where you work with a view to promote the interests of the country and its people, and the other kind of patriotism was that in which individual interests were promoted. I do not desire to reflect on any hon. member of this House, but I may remark that I am in favor of the old time patriotism of working for our country and for our people. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said they had the permission of the Canadian Government and the American Government with respect to the tugs, so that they might assist each other; but I would ask if the captain of a vessel in a hurricane could wait until he had obtained permission from the Minister of Customs to enter Canadian waters. I will give an illustration of what I said the other day, when I was unable to complete the particulars. In 1844 the steamer Spartan went ashore during the night on Cariboo Island, in Lake Superior. The next morning the captain obtained the services of a tug—he did not wait to see if it was a Canadian tug or an American tug, but he took the first that arrived. This was an American tug, and she saved the passengers and rescued the vessel. She brought the Spartan to Sault Ste. Marie, passed through the canal, and when they had arrived at the foot of the Sault Rapids, the captain of the Spartan asked the captain of the tug to be taken to Owen Sound on the Canadian side. The captain replied: No, I dare not take you there, because my tug would be seized; I cannot and I will not do it. Accordingly the captain could not do otherwise than abide by the decision of the captain of the American tug. Then instead of going by Georgian Bay, a distance of 100 miles, and reaching Owen Sound by the inshore route, the vessel had to pass through Lake Huron, a distance of 250 miles, where, of course, they were exposed to the risk of a gale coming up and endangering the safety of the steamer. Fortunately we did not lose the vessel, but we had to pay $26,000 to the Americans for repairs, whereas that amount would otherwise have gone into Canadian hands and assisted to pay Canadian workmen; and, in addition, when the vessel was brought to Canada the Customs authorities charged us for the new material put into the vessel. Under these circumstances the House should pass the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac, (Mr. Kirkpatrick) without any amendment, because all amendments are in the direction of killing the Bill. There is another side to the question, and that is the humane side. The Royal Humane Society of England bestows a premium on any one who saves the life of a human being. In this country we are proposing to give a premium for quite the contrary, and even if it is only from a humane spirit, hon. gentlemen who are opposing the Bill should certainly change their minds and vote in favor of it.

Mr. MULOCK. It must be satisfactory to members of the Committee to observe the educational effect of the discussion of this question within the last twelve months. This I understand from the mover of the Bill is substantially the same measure that was voted on in Parliament in April, 1888.

An hon. MEMBER. It was not understood.

Mr. MULOCK. That goes to show how discussion informs us, liberalises us, and makes us equal to the occasion. Twelve months ago or less the Government and all its forces were arrayed against this measure for certain reasons. On that occasion the then Finance Minister, Sir Charles Tupper, briefly led the opposition to the measure, but the great opponent on that occasion was the Minister of Customs, and I am glad to see that with advancing years and increasing wisdom, he is able, at all events, to the extent of saving a human being's life, of indulging in a little reciprocal spirit such as has been very properly referred to by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Labelle). But I should like to ask the Minister, who will no doubt announce on this occasion the policy of the Government, whether the statements he made to the House last Session, and on the strength of which he succeeded in defeating this measure for the time being; and in setting back this great forward movement for twelve months—I would like to ask the Minister of Customs if he goes back on all the utterances he made to the House on that occasion and if he will tell us that he was wrong in his arguments then, or if he still maintains some of them, which does he maintain and which has he rejected? He told the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) last year that that hon. gentleman seemed to be very much interested in this Bill from a local standpoint and that although the member for Frontenac had proved that the Bill was most necessary in the eastern part of Lake Ontario, still the Minister of Customs informed the House that this Bill was not required in the west. The hon. Minister sitting here to-night and controlling the legislation will of course be able to explain to us wherein the changed circumstances have occurred which will justify him in telling the House now that the assurances he gave us a year ago do not exist to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL. You should not press him too hard.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, I want to be satisfied on the point for the sake of the great industries that the Minister was protecting a year ago, and I think it is right that the House should be assured that these dangers do not longer exist. For example, in reply to the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) the Minister of Customs said last Session:

"My hon. friend from Frontenac says it is in our interest. It may be in the interests of the particular locality in which he lives, but it is not so in the west."

I would ask the Minister of Customs whether it is now in the interests of the west, and, if so, I am sure the House will have no difficulty, so far as that objection is concerned, in supporting the Bill. He will tell us, of course, what change of circumstances happened that make this Bill now in the interest to the west.

Mr. BOWELL. Do you promise to do that on all occasions if I change my mind and give you the reasons?

Mr. MULOCK. No doubt a conscientious man like the Minister of Customs—

Mr. BOWELL. You are not answering the question.

Mr. MULOCK. When I am on the Treasury benches I will account for my policy, but I am now asking you for yours. When the time comes that I am a responsible Minister it will be for me to say what I am to do. We are now discussing the interests of the country, as well as the great principle of which the Minister of Customs is the guardian. I presume that the Minister is supporting this measure now and he will tell us, of course, why he has got a change of heart, or why this change has come over the spirit of his dreams.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a change of conduct.

Mr. MULOCK. Whatever it may be we do not find him to-night on the warpath against this Bill as he was a year ago. I presume his change of action is taken with due regard to the interests of the country. If those arguments he advanced to us last Session were a good reason for his voting against the measure I presume he can tell us how to proceed safely on this occasion. Speaking of this international civility as proposed last Session the Minister said:

"Such liberality has not been extended by the American Government to Canadian tug owners or to Canadian wreckers and I see good reasons for adopting the suggestion made by the Minister of Finance that we should not give this privilege without some return, particularly in a case of this kind where it is in our interest, where as I believe it to be in the interest of the American shipowners as well, that we should have freest possible intercourse in coasting trade in inland waters at least, and if it is possible, on the sea coast."

Speaking of the consequences of the adoption of this Bill the Minister of Customs goes on to say:

"Now if we adopt the reciprocity as suggested by the Bill before the House, they [referring to the Americans] will have achieved all that they want and all that they ask, together with the destruction of our wrecking industry, and most certainly refusal will follow in respect to reciprocity in the coasting trade of this country."

A year ago the Minister of Customs stated that if we entered into reciprocal wrecking relations with the States it would result in the total destruction of the wrecking property of the people of Canada. Is he now going to vote for the destruction of the wrecking property of our people? If not; when the Minister of Customs is able to bring his massive mind from the consideration of peach baskets and other important state affairs to the minor interests of saving human life, I would ask him whether any change has taken place so that to-day reciprocity in wrecking will not do what he said it would do a year ago—destroy the wrecking appliances of the people of Canada. Again the Minister of Customs said:

"I believe it to be in the interests of the wrecking industry, in the interests of this country and in the interests of the coasting trade that we should hold the position we are in at the present time."

He goes on in his speech to say that so important is it to the people of Canada that we should get the coasting trade that he does not think that we should concede this one point that is now asked for unless we get the coasting trade secure, and he argues in his speech that to enter into reciprocal wrecking relations would for all time prevent us securing what he conceived to be of vast importance to the people of Canada, viz., reciprocity in coasting. This is a speech that had a great deal of influence with this House a year ago, and it is due to us now that the Minister of Customs should take us into his confidence and assure us that those great interests that were in danger a year ago when we threatened to pass this Bill, will not be endangered if we pass it to-day. I suppose a great many who took his word last Session, will take him at his word, or by his silence, this Session and vote as he directs them to vote. But there are some who are not in his confidence and do not receive those bits of information in whispered words which he imparts, and they would like to be told in an open way across the floor of this House whether the interests of the country are safe to-day if we pass this Bill. I pause for a reply.

Mr. WALDIE. I said a few words on the introduction of this Bill and I wish to state, now, that I think the House ought to consider the measure from the point of view of its necessity to the parties whose property is in danger, the owners of the stranded vessels, and not from the interests of the tug owners pure and simple. From the list of cases quoted by the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) wherein the Minister of Customs permitted the employment of American tugs, it is quite evident that the property of the people of Canada was very frequently in danger and could only be rescued by the employment of those tugs.

Mr. MULOCK.

The very fact that there is such a list of cases in which the Minister of Customs had to intervene and set the law aside is the best proof we can have of the necessity of this measure in the interests of the vessel owners. I deprecate the discussion of the broader principles of reciprocity in connection with this Bill, for I am most anxious that this Bill should pass on its own merits alone. This Bill has the element of humanity in its favor which separates it from general questions of trade, and I think it has also important advantages to the wrecking industries of this country. It is said that insurance companies will control the wrecking if this Bill should pass. My experience is that although the vessel is insured, its owner controls the employment of the wrecking tug, and will employ that tug which will save his property in the most economical and speedy way, and that he will have it conveyed to the port where repairs can be made most cheaply. He will not cause a Canadian bottom to be conveyed to an American port for repairs when he knows that on its return to Canadian waters he will have to pay a duty on it, but he will cause the distressed property to be conveyed to our own ports for repairs, giving employment to Canadian labor. I do think that any amendment to the Bill as it is now before the Committee would have the effect of entirely destroying it. As we have an offer on the part of the American Government of reciprocity in this matter, and as it is in the interest of our inland marine that that offer should be accepted, I trust that the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac will pass just as he has introduced it.

Mr. CURRAN. Last year, when this measure was before the House, I had the honor of making some observations based upon the information which had been furnished me by some leading men in Canada who were interested in the business affected by this legislation. I then spoke in favor of the Bill; but as the Minister of Finance appealed to the House, asking us to suspend our judgment for a certain time, I supported his view by my vote, hoping that by this Session we should have had the concessions made to us that were deemed to be of importance, in order that justice might be done to Canadian interests in the matter of wrecking. The last speaker has deprecated the introduction of the general reciprocity question into this discussion. I think he has done very wisely on behalf of the hon. gentleman who has proposed the amendment, which, as he says, if carried, would have the effect of killing the Bill altogether, inasmuch as it would make it absolutely inoperative. The hon. gentleman has stated to us, and I agree with him entirely, that no member of this House can point out any liberality on the part of the United States Government similar to that which has been extended by this Government. I believe it will be admitted by every candid member of this House and by every candid man in the country, that there has been no liberality on the part of the United States towards Canada. Whenever they can crush us, they do so; whenever they can put us in a corner, or by any action on their part can cripple us in any way, they are perfectly willing to do it for purposes which are manifest.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Where is the evidence of that?

Mr. CURRAN. One evidence is in the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. CURRAN. Hon. gentlemen say "Oh, oh!" It is hardly the time to go into the discussion of that subject now, but I think I shall be borne out by the country when I say that wherever it has been possible to interfere with Canadian interests and prevent Canadian prosperity and progress they have sought to do it. I have the evidence, which I may take occasion to lay before the House on another occasion, that there have not been wanting public speakers in Congress and the Senate, in the press and on the platform, to declare that Canada shall get nothing unless she joins the United States, and throws in her fortunes with that country. But that statement I have been drawn into by my hon. friend, who cannot very well tolerate the truth; it aggravates him so much that he must interrupt on all occasions. But this discussion, and the speech which has been made by my hon. friend who has proposed the amendment, simply exemplify the old adage, that it makes all the difference in the world whose ox is gored. Under the legislation of the United States, which, he has pointed out, forced the Canadian Government into the position it has occupied for some time, a wrecking interest grew up in this country, and I think the hon. gentleman stated that he himself has invested money in that interest—

Mr. JONES (Halifax). No.

Mr. CURRAN—or is closely connected with people who have invested money in that interest. Now, he tells us, and he tells us truly, that we should consult the interests of those who have invested their money in wrecking. Well, just as the action of the United States Government forced the Canadian Government to adopt the course they did and to put on the Statute-book the law at present in force, so the action of the United States Government forced us to adopt the National Policy, which has caused millions and millions of dollars to be invested in the industries of this country; and yet the hon. gentleman who says that we should look to the money interest of the few who have invested their money in this wrecking business, is prepared, at one fell swoop, to wipe out the manufacturing industries in which capital has been invested on the pledge of this Government, sanctioned by the people at several general elections. I sympathise heartily with those who have invested their money in this wrecking industry; but we have the statements of a host of gentlemen who have overwhelmingly larger interests than those centered in the wrecking business, and they appeal and have appealed again and again to this Parliament, to pass the legislation which has been brought in by my hon. friend at my right. Under these circumstances, with the light that has been cast on the subject, I say we cannot do otherwise than pass the Bill as it has been proposed to the House, because the amendment suggested by the hon. member for North Norfolk, although we should all like to see it carried into effect if we could secure the concurrence of the United States therein, cannot accomplish anything; and it is the interest of the country that this legislation should go into force at once. We shall be thrown back for years if we do not adopt the measure now proposed, and I am against the amendment simply because it will make our proceedings inoperative and kill the Bill.

Mr. EDGAR. It is always interesting to hear an hon. member explaining to this House how he came to speak one way on a measure and vote another way, and I am sure the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) has done his best to make that clear to the Committee to-night. But how much more interesting would it be if we could only induce the hon. Minister of Customs to get up to-night and explain to us how he came to change not only his speech but his vote as well. I rejoice that he has done so; I do not object to any gentleman changing his views; there is always time to repent; and I hope the hon. Minister has shown us that on the larger question of reciprocity of which this is only a part, but a material part, he will be prepared to change his mind also. But since last Session we remember he has received a new colleague into the Cabinet. When the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) was not in his place last Session, this Bill was moved by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), who on that occasion said that it was true reciprocity. That hon. member has been taken into the Government, and of course on so important a question as that the Postmaster General must have made it a condition with the Minister of Customs that he would swallow his words and follow him on this question. With reference to the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), I am sure that we all desire to see the towing of vessels and rafts from one port in the United States to another permitted to Canadian vessels, but I would ask the hon. gentleman to bring that up as a substantive Bill on a future occasion and I will support it. The hon. gentleman is too old a parliamentarian not to know perfectly well that if his proposed amendment be added to the Bill, it will utterly destroy the whole value of the Bill. The Americans have, since 1878, made a simple offer to us on this subject of wrecking. We would like them undoubtedly to go further and include coasting privileges and the privileges of towing vessels and rafts, but they have not done so. I would say, therefore, let us take what they give, and if we can get the other let us take that too hereafter. I am sure that is the sense of the House. The House almost unanimously, a few weeks ago, carried the second reading of this Bill on that principle, and I hope, therefore, the House has not changed its mind on that point.

Mr. DAWSON. This a question which affects the shipping at large as much as it does wrecking interests, and I think we should consider its effect on our shipping generally. The constituency I have the honor to represent covers the greater part of those inland waters, and many hard cases have occurred, some of which have been referred to here to-night. On some occasions vessels have gone to the relief of strange ships in Canadian waters, and afterwards been seized and kept in custody until fines were paid or until they were relieved, and in order that there may be freedom in this matter, in order that United States tugs may be free to come to the relief of Canadian vessels and Canadian tugs equally free to go to the relief of American vessels, in either Canadian or American waters, I think the Bill ought to be supported. My constituency lies along the shores of the great lakes, the shores of Lakes Huron and Superior, and the people are largely engaged in shipping. I have had many letters, since this subject came before the House, from owners of vessels and others engaged in navigating the lakes, all recommending me to support this Bill. I quite agree with hon. members that to adopt the amendment of my hon. friend from North Norfolk would be to kill the Bill. Desirable as general reciprocity in the coasting trade and in other respects would be, the Americans will not grant it, and the simple fact of adding that amendment to the Bill would be to render it inoperative. Therefore I shall support the Bill in its present form and oppose the amendment of my hon. friend.

Mr. COOK. When this Bill was before the House last Session, I supported it, and made a few remarks in its favor. I am glad to see there is not a dissenting voice on the subject to-day. I do not rise to deal specially with the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), but to refer to the amendment made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) which amendment I consider to be a perfectly fair proposition. No one in Canada knows better than the hon. the Minister of Customs the necessity for this amendment, because applications have been made to him frequently to allow American tugs to tow rafts into Canadian waters. We have to tow a large quantity of logs from the north shore of Georgian Bay, and our tugs are insufficient for the large rafts that are brought from there. Frequently, therefore, the Minister of Customs has been applied to for permits to allow American tugs to tow these rafts. I have no doubt that the Americans will accede to the proposition of my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I believe that in the interest of their tugs and in the interest of wrecking companies, they will at once accept it, and have, therefore, much pleasure in supporting his amendment.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Judging from the discussion one would suppose that the only waters of the Dominion are the lakes, and that there was no such place as the Atlantic Ocean. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) said that this Bill would apply to the waters of the Maritime Provinces, and with the second clause eliminated, there would be no doubt on that point, but if the second clause remains the wording should be such as to leave the section clearly applicable to Canadian waters on the Atlantic coast. As far as the principle of the Bill is concerned, I have been always in favor of it. American vessels have always been ready to render assistance to ours, and more particularly American revenue cutters. They have never hesitated as to the nationality of a vessel, but rendered vessels in distress every assistance they could gratuitously. That was until lately the principal object for which they were put at the American light stations, but in consequence of the way in which we deal with American vessels in distress, the American revenue cutters instead of being on the look-out to aid our vessels when they require it, are on the watch to see that on entering American harbors for refuge, they do not violate the Customs Act.

Mr. JONES (Halifax.) In dealing with a matter of this importance, it is of great advantage to have a thorough understanding as to the application of any measure concerning it. Reading the clause to which I refer, and seeing it is only applicable to waters contiguous to the United States, I was naturally led to the conclusion that it was intended for the inland waters, and not for the Atlantic coast of the Maritime Provinces. It appears to me that this is a question too large to be dealt with in the small way in which it is proposed to be dealt with by some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the subject. I was glad to learn from the observations of the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill, that he had accepted the view which I propounded, that the Bill would apply to the Maritime Provinces, and I certainly understood the Minister of Customs to give his approbation to that view of the case, though he has since stated that he was misunderstood. I think that question should be understood now, so that no future misunderstanding will take place. My hon. colleague (Mr. Kenny) took exception to my view as to the application of this Bill to the Maritime Provinces, and it was natural that he should do so, because, since he has been in this House, he has always been opposed to anything and everything in the way of reciprocity with the United States, and has not seen his way clear up to this time—though his political digestion is known to be very good—to come down to the view which appears to be entertained by the Minister of Customs and those who are supporting the Bill. I think, however, even that hon. gentleman will admit that it would be no disadvantage to the people of the Maritime Provinces to have in case of need the services of American tugs if they were required. My hon. colleague stated that there were wrecking companies in the Maritime Provinces which could attend to all that business. In the brief time which has been at my disposal, I have thought of the wrecking companies which exist in Nova Scotia, and, leaving out one or two tugs in Halifax which go out to assist vessels when they are required, I am not aware of any wrecking company, properly so-called, in the Maritime Provinces to-day. My hon. friend to my right (Mr. Weldon) says there are none in New Brunswick, and the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Lovitt) says there are none in Yarmouth, so it is plain that there is no company equipped as a wrecking company in the Maritime Provinces. Therefore, if on the extensive coasts of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick a vessel requires the assistance of a wrecking company to save it or the property which it is carrying, by which a large amount could be saved to the underwriters or to the owners of that property, it would be very hard if those people could not have the benefit of employing American tugs. As it stands now, I am not aware of any wrecking company in Nova Scotia. I think this should be made clear and should not be left liable to any doubt in the future, or to the interpretation of the department. We are dealing with a question of so much importance that people who are called upon to act suddenly, as these emergencies arise, will have to act on the interpretation of the Statute before them. If they have to wait to communicate with the department in order to find what is their construction of the Act, and whether an American tug may be employed on the Atlantic or in the Bay of Fundy, a very serious loss of property may take place during the interval. It is only for that purpose that I was anxious that all expressions calculated to leave any doubt as to the application of this Bill should be eliminated from it before it passed its final stage, and I again call the attention of the Minister of Customs and the promoter of the Bill to the fact that it would be in the interest of the public at large if it were understood that the measure is to apply to the whole Dominion, or if these gentlemen are legislating only for these small Canadian lakes—that is, small in comparison with our great waters below. If they do not intend us to have any part or parcel in this measure, let them say so; but if the Bill is intended to apply, as I understand, to the Atlantic sea coast and the Bay of Fundy, under circumstances that may arise there, it should be so stated.

Mr. BOWELL. I intended to rise before, because I was somewhat surprised at the remarks made by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), when he rose and said that he was glad to find that I differed from his colleague from that city. Evidently, I did not make myself understood, because not only that hon. member but also the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) misunderstood my remark. I confess that I am surprised at what some hon. gentlemen have said as to the opinion I expressed in reference to this Bill. My recollection is tolerably good on ordinary occasions, and I have no recollection of expressing any particular opinion either in favor of the Bill or in opposition to it. What I rose to point out was that the Bill passed by the American Congress did not, as I understood it, apply to the Maritime Provinces, as far as the sea-coast is concerned. I think, on looking at it, it might apply to the Bay of Fundy which is in a somewhat different position from the Atlantic coast. However, that measure is rather difficult to understand. That is the only expression of opinion which I recollect giving. The Bill passed by the American Congress reads as follows:—

“That Canadian vessels of all descriptions may render aid and assistance to Canadian or other vessels wrecked or disabled in the waters of the United States contiguous to the Dominion of Canada.”

That is the whole Bill. Whether that applies to the sea coast or only to the inland waters of Canada is a matter which I must leave to the lawyers and those who are better able to decide it than I am. It then goes on:

“This Act shall take force by proclamation of the United States so soon as the Canadian Government will grant like privileges to those which are contained in this Bill.”

The member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) proposed to go a good deal further and to give greater concessions than are contained in this Bill. However, after consultation with the Committee which was appointed to consider it, he has consented to adopt the American Bill verbatim, simply changing the name of the United States to that of Canada, and Canada to that of the United States. That is the proposition now before the Committee. If anyone will take the little Bill of the United States and read it, in coming to a conclusion he will find some difficulty as to what it really means, and particularly in regard to the practical operation of the measure if it becomes law. There is not a word in that Bill which would allow a tug to tow a wrecked vessel after it had rendered assistance to it. If the American Government should enforce the coasting law, which gives the right only to their own vessels to tow in their own waters, and should say that the privilege of towing is not conceded in this proposition of reciprocity, then, as I pointed out to my hon. friend, the Canadian Government ought to be in a position to deny that right to American vessels. If the right to tow, after rendering assistance to a vessel, was denied by the American Government, then the Bill is utterly useless; and, if it were passed at all, it would leave us practically in the same position. We ought to be in precisely the same position as they are. But if, after raising a wrecked vessel or rendering assistance to a vessel in distress, they refuse to allow them to tug it or tow it in their waters, then we ought to be precisely in the same position. Now, I have heard a good deal said on the humanitarian side of this question. My hon. friend from Richelieu (Mr. Labelle) pointed out a case in which an American tug owner refused to tow his boat into Owen Sound. Any one who will read the orders and instructions which have been issued by the Customs Department since 1878, will know that no refusal, either direct or indirect, has ever been made to an American tug or any American vessel to render assistance when there was any immediate prospect of the loss of property or the loss of life; and why this tug owner should have refused, under the circumstances, to tow this vessel into Owen Sound, I cannot understand, unless it was for the purpose of taking it into their own waters, by which their tugs and their mechanics would receive whatever benefits would be derived from repairing the vessels or in order to put the profits into the pockets of the tug owners and the underwriters who might have an interest in the vessel or in the profits arising from repairs. There has been, I repeat, no instructions given which were not of a more liberal character than were the orders issued by circular, when I think my hon. friend had the pleasure, or had the honor, of being Minister of Militia in the Government which issued it. That circular was much more stringent in its character than the orders and circulars which have been issued since the time my hon. friend was in the Government, which was in 1876 or 1877, or if he was not in the Government, he was one of its most ardent supporters, and I suppose he supported that measure as well. Now, in reference to tugging, hon. gentlemen who have read this correspondence have seen that the principle now embodied in the amendment made by the hon. member for North Norfolk, was contained in the first despatch that I drafted on this subject, in 1879. In that dispatch the Canadian Government proposed to the American Government to grant the fullest privileges, not only in wrecking but in coasting laws, and those who are acquainted with the subject know that there is a law upon our Statute-book which gives the Governor in Council power at any time to give to any country in the world the coasting privileges of the Dominion of Canada, so soon as they open their ports to us. The amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk being exactly in the line that the Canadian Government have proposed to the American Government over and over again, I shall feel myself, in duty bound, as an individual, to support it. I am not speaking on behalf of the Government, I am speaking for myself, as I am not aware that the Government has had any policy on this Bill, consequently, to be consistent with the position that I have taken in reference to this matter in the correspondence that has taken place between Canada and the United States, I shall vote for that proposition. If this wrecking is of so great an advantage to the American tug owners, to American wrecking companies and to American shipping interests, surely they should grant that which is absolutely necessary in order to make their Bill worth one cent. I admit that the feeling of this House and the feeling in the country has changed to a certain extent upon this question, but if we are to have a Bill at all, let us have one which will be of some value. Therefore there is no reason why the proposition of the hon. member for North Norfolk which is of a still wider character, should not also be added.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Would it not be better, under the circumstances, to make a Bill that would suit the people of Canada, and leave it inoperative until the Americans reciprocate?

Mr. BOWELL. I am very glad, for once, that I am in accord with the hon. member. That is just such a Bill as I would like to see placed upon the Statute-book. I would like to see the proposition adopted because it is one that I previously made, and it should be added to this Bill. I should also like to see the proposition of the hon. gentleman for North Norfolk added to the Bill. Then, if it will confer the advantage which has been pointed out to the shipping interests of both countries, surely from a humanitarian standpoint, or from any other standpoint the Americans ought to accept it. The hon. member for Northumberland was a little facetious about my views on the reciprocity question. I can tell him that not only myself individually, but this Government, have always been in favor of fair reciprocal trade relations with the United States; but we do not propose to accept anything that they may offer which is to their immediate advantage, unless we are to have something in return. Those are my ideas of reciprocity.

Mr. MITCHELL. Nor concede anything?

Mr. BOWELL. Nor concede one single  iota. That is just precisely what I mean, and when they offer us something, I think the Government of this country will do what they have always been prepared to do in the past, and that is to accept anything that is fair and reasonable. I am not going to discuss the question of unrestricted reciprocity, by which our free trade friends hope to have a much higher tariff than they have at present, and which the leader of the Government has expressed his wish to have. I will discuss that question probably before this debate is over.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I desire to say a few words with reference to a question of much interest to the counties along the Bay of Fundy in regard to the meaning of the words in the second section of the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac. They are an exact reproduction, mutatis mutandis of the words of the American Bill. That Bill says:

"Canadian vessels of all descriptions may render aid or assistance to Canadian or other vessels that are disabled in the waters of the United States contiguous to the Dominion of Canada."

These words are reproduced, with the necessary changes, in this Bill now before the Committee.

"United States vessels of all descriptions may render aid or assistance to United States or other vessels wrecked or disabled in the waters of Canada contiguous to the United States."

The geographical position is this: The character of the waters was settled, with a degree of certainty, 45 years ago, as was brought out in the debates of last Session, in reference to a fishery seizure which occurred in the year 1843. The United States and Great Britain referred the question of the territorial character of the waters of the Bay of Fundy to a mixed commission. Mr. Bates was the umpire of that commission, which decided that the Bay of Fundy was a part of the high seas, that it was not a British bay.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not a part of the high seas?

Mr. WELDON (Albert). They decided that it was not a British bay. They defined the headlands of the Bay of Fundy very clearly. There is one on the Nova Scotian coast, there is one on the coast of Maine, a few miles west of the mouth of the St. Croix River. Therefore, the waters of the Bay of Fundy are of this character; they are high seas, with the exception of a three mile belt along the New Brunswick shore and along the Nova Scotian shore. There is a triangular piece along the Bay of Fundy, with one apex of the triangle at the mouth of the St. Croix River, with another on the Bay of Fundy, and a third west of the State of Maine. The triangular piece at the mouth of the Bay of Fundy is clearly either high seas or United States water. The north shore of the Bay of Fundy is divided between the two nations; that portion within the three mile limit which washes the State of Maine belongs to the United States, that portion washing New Brunswick belongs to Canada, and the middle of the bay is the high sea. Take the wording of the Act:

"United States vessels and wrecking appurtenances may render aid and assistance to vessels and property wrecked, disabled or in distress in Canadian waters contiguous to the United States."

It is reasonably clear that of the three-mile belt of the bay, the portion washing New Brunswick will be held to be within the operation of this Act, as being Canadian waters contiguous to the United States. It is also reasonably clear that the three-mile belt along the Nova Scotia shore is not within the scope of the Bill, although they are Canadian waters, because they are not contiguous to the United States. If that is a sound argument, and I believe it is a reasonable contention, then the Counties of Albert, St. John, Charlotte and part of Westmoreland will be very materially affected by the Bill; and, speaking from a very imperfect knowledge of the case, my sympathies are in favor of the Bill, for it is in the interests not only of humanity but of our shipping, that our vessels in distress should have the opportunity of obtaining the assistance of American wrecking craft.

Mr. MITCHELL. I fail to understand what the proposition of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) has to do with the question of the Wrecking Bill. He has evidently misstated the position of the Bay of Fundy in relation to the relative rights of the American people and the British people in that bay. The hon. gentleman has not correctly understood, I think, the decision given in the case of the schooner George Washington, which was seized about the time he named. She was seized by British cruisers for fishing within a British bay. But the point upon which the vessel was released was not because it was not in British waters, but because it was not clearly proved that she was within British waters, because we failed to be able to prove that she was within a line drawn from headland to headland, both of which were British territory. If it could have been proved that she had been within that line, the whole of the bay would have been declared to be British waters and would not have been given away to the Americans. That was a most unfortunate decision, and the effect to this country of the British not being able to show clearly that that vessel was within British waters was that the Americans shortly afterwards claimed admission to all our bays. The immediate effect of the decision was that the weak-kneed Administration of that day in England, of which Lord Aberdeen was the head, declared that the whole Bay of Fundy was to be considered as common waters. Another effect of that decision was this: that as the seizure was not shown to be within British headlands on both sides it was not held to be in British territory, but from the point of St. Croix River, where American territory ceased, British territory began across to a point on the Nova Scotia coast and all to the north-east—this was not held to be common territory.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). That was not the decision.
Mr. WELDON (Albert).

Mr. MITCHELL. It was the decision of the court at that time.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). No.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the consequence was, that the British Government, anxious to maintain peace with the United States, and ready to give up all the wife's relations so long as it did not come home to themselves, surrendered the principle of the exclusive right to the Bay of Fundy, the result being that the Americans set up a claim to every bay on our coasts. That was the effect of that decision, and the reason why it was arrived at was, not that the vessel had not been seized within the line from headland to headland, but that this had not been proved. I will now come to the point to which the Minister of Customs has alluded. I thought I was right some time ago when I was contradicted by the mover of the Bill and the Minister of Customs, who stated that the Bill did not apply to the Maritime Provinces. It certainly applies to the western portion of the Maritime Provinces. The American Bill refers to Canadian vessels rendering assistance to vessels and property wrecked, disabled or in distress in American waters contiguous to the Dominion of Canada. We alter that by saying Canadian waters contiguous to the United States. That would certainly mean the whole of the south-western portion of New Brunswick, because it is contiguous to the United States. I venture to tell the mover of the Bill that if it is passed in its present form, it will give the Maritime Provinces equal rights and privileges with those sought to be given in regard to the inland waters of the St. Lawrence, and we certainly would be entitled under this Bill to have the south-western portion of New Brunswick considered as contiguous to the United States and be entitled to the privileges of this Bill. The Minister of Customs has referred to the principle of reciprocity, and he has chosen to remark on what I said a short time ago in regard to it. With respect to trade relations there is no doubt a great difference, but with respect to legislative reciprocity, which is the subject under discussion, there is very little difference between the hon. gentleman and myself. I would give the United States no privilege they would not immediately concede to us, and I would, as a matter of precaution, provide that the privileges accorded by this Bill should not go into effect until similar privileges were accorded to us by the United States.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That is in the Bill now.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is a condition that I would impose. No doubt I disagree with the Minister of Customs on principles of trade, for I doubt if the hon. gentleman would go as far as I would go in order to enter into reciprocal relations with the United States in a matter of trade. But with respect to legislation we do not differ one iota. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he favored power being given to the Government only to put this Bill into operation when the United States have put into operation a similar measure. The other point mentioned by the hon. gentleman was stated by him to be a very imaginary one, and I certainly admit it is not one of a very comprehensive character. He is in favor, when a vessel is in distress or wrecked, of the principle that she should be taken into a port either in the United States or in Canada. What is meant by these words:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States that Canadian vessels of all descriptions may render aid or assistance to Canadian or other vessels wreck or disabled in the waters of the United States contiguous to the Dominion of Canada."

What I understand by that is this, that if a vessel in Lake Huron is in distress and requires aid, either an American or Canadian tug can go to its assistance. That if an American tug comes alongside of her and gives her relief and takes her in tow, she could take her to a port in the United States or in Canada, as the master of that vessel may demand. About that there cannot be a question. You have got to put a broad and generous construction on an Act of this kind, and no court in the United States or in Canada either would venture to condemn a tug, because after rendering a vessel assistance she did not leave her to the mercy of the waves. It is a duty, and it is a humanitarian principle, that when you do relieve a vessel you should also take her to a place of safety and no court in any country would declare otherwise. I quite agree with my hon. friend to my left, as also with the hon. Minister of Customs who has endorsed the statements he made, that if we can get the amendments proposed by the hon. gentleman added to this Bill with safety, and without endangering the object we all have in view of getting this reciprocity in wrecking, I would vote for it at once. What I fear is that on account of—I will not say hostility—but knowing the suspicions that have been created in the United States since the war, knowing that they look with suspicion on everything that we do, it will be difficult to get that. I do not agree with the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) that the Americans wished to crush out Canada, and I feel it is due to the people of the United States to resent the statement made by the member for Montreal Centre. I say that so far from a hostile feeling existing in the United States towards Canada or Canadians, I believe the most friendly feelings exist and the desire for extending our friendly feelings and reciprocal trade relations is quite as much in the United States as it is in Canada. I believe it is not politic to make such statements as the member for Montreal Centre has made in relation to the feelings of the people of the United States. I believe that the evidence we had recently in Congress of the adoption of Mr. Hitt's resolution for commercial union almost unanimously, is an assurance of this friendly feeling. I may say that commercial union is not exactly reciprocal free trade, although it is very nearly akin to it, but reciprocity does not require that we should increase our duty to the same standard as that of the Americans. I believe that the hon. gentleman opposite fails to see the difference between the two, but there is a difference and a considerable difference although they are approximate and akin one to the other. Does it follow that because we may choose to adopt reciprocal relations with the United States that it necessarily means a uniform tariff? Not at all. That point I explained the other day, but I feel bound to refer to it again, owing to a remark made by the hon. gentleman. We may make our tariff as high as the United States, which it nearly is now, and the United States may make theirs much higher than ours, but the difference between commercial union and reciprocal free trade is this: that under commercial union the tariff will be a common one, under reciprocal free trade the tariff might be one thing on one side of the line and another thing on the other. Under commercial union, the Customs lines might be done away with in everything except for statistical purposes, but under reciprocal free trade the Customs offices would still be required to be maintained along the border, and that is the great distinction between the two. Under unrestricted reciprocity we would make our own tariff and they would make theirs, but it would involve the maintenance of Customs offices along the border to insure that no foreign goods would be imported and passed from one country to another as products of the United States or of Canada. That is the distinction. I have never been a commercial union man; not because I believe it would not be beneficial as well to Canada as the United States, but because I have seen the impossibility of carrying it out or of accomplishing it. It would mean that the American Congress or Senate would regulate the tariff of Canada, and that I know we would never consent to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hon. gentlemen say "hear hear." I say it is one of the things I have always contended that it is impossible to carry commercial union in the present temper of the people of Canada or of the people of the United States; not that I believe it would be injurious to us, but that I believe it is foreign to the sentiments and desires of our people that we should have our tariff laws controlled by any other country. On the other hand, reciprocal free trade is nearly akin to commercial union, but it provides that each country should make its own tariff and arrange by negotiations to have the tariff as nearly alike as would meet the wishes of the two peoples, although not necessarily uniform tariffs. The only objection against that is the fact that we would still have to maintain our Customs offices along the border and which it might be necessary to maintain for statistical purposes under any circumstances. Every one with the true interests of this country at heart demands that the Government should in the interests of this country take early steps to reopen negotiations with the United States with a view of bringing about reciprocal trade relation between the two countries. Is there any man amongst us who supposes that from 1854 to 1866, during the continuation of the first Reciprocity Treaty, that the greatest benefits did not accrue to both countries? Every one admits that. The statistics of our country show it, and gentlemen on both sides of the House have brought forward figures to prove that reciprocity was beneficial both to Canada and the United States. Does it follow that because reciprocity was advantageous then, it should not be advantageous now? On the contrary, I believe that if reciprocal arrangements were made our trade would immensely increase, and the farmers of our country, by having access to the markets of the United States, would derive greater advantages than they do to-day.

Mr. MASSON. No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman says "no." What are the millers hanging about the corridors for now? What was the big delegation down here a short time ago for, but to get a dollar a barrel tax on the flour of the people? As some of them told me it would be granted, but the Government dare not put it on because the people of the Maritime Provinces would not stand it. I see my hon. friend from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) sitting on the Government benches; he would not like the Government to put a dollar a barrel duty on flour and have to face his people and attempt to justify it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MITCHELL. They say "oh." I met one of the millers yesterday or the day before, and he complained to me very much of the injustice that was done to the millers of the country, and said there should be some remedy. I was in accord with him entirely, and I said "there ought to be a remedy for it, and I am prepared to help you in that remedy." He was delighted to hear it, and then he proposed that a duty of a dollar a barrel should be put on flour. But I said: "That is not my remedy at all. Take the duty off wheat and flour, let the people have free bread and let there be no discrimination in favor of millers any more than there is in favor of the farmers of the country." That is the policy I would advocate. I only mention this because I felt it necessary, after the remarks of my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) and the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Customs. I wanted to let him see how near we are in accord in many things.

Mr. BOWELL. Except unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does not the hon. gentleman want any kind of reciprocity?

Mr. BOWELL. That is not what I said.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the question, does he want any kind of reciprocity? If he does not want it unrestricted, what does he want? Let him answer the question. I will answer it for him. He and his Government are sustained by the combines and the protected manufacturers of the country.

Mr. MASSON. And the farmers.

Mr. MITCHELL. No, Sir, not by the farmers; and they will find it out in the next election. The hon. gentleman following up the argument of my hon. friend here (Mr. Charlton), contended that vested interests were involved in this question, and that we should not legislate in any way to affect them. Sir, I do not believe in these vested interests. Every man who puts his money into any enterprise in this country has to do so taking the chance of legislation being changed.

An hon. MEMBER. Will you apply that to the brewers?

Mr. MITCHELL. I apply it to everything, I am with you there. I would simply, in conclusion, say, that I think the hon. Minister of Customs need not have any doubt of the power, under the Bill, of a tug to take a vessel either to the ports of Canada or the ports of the United States.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) was entirely wrong when he undertook to correct me as to what was decided in 1843 by the commission in reference to the territorial jurisdiction of the Bay of Fundy. I will read the decision of the umpire, Mr. Joshua Bates, as to the matter in controversy. I affirmed that the decision of the commission was that the Bay of Fundy was not a British Bay.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Within the meaning of the treaty.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you allow me to state what I did say? I did not say that they did not declare that it was not a British bay. I said that they were unable to prove that the vessel was seized within a line drawn between two points of British territory, and they were unable to decide whether it was seized within British territory or not.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). That was not the point the hon. gentleman made. The point was as to whether the Bay of Fundy was British territorial water or part of the high seas. I affirmed that Mr. Bates declared that the Bay of Fundy was not a British bay, and the hon. gentleman said I was mistaken. I will read the decision of the umpire:

"The Bay of Fundy is from 65 to 75 miles wide, and 130 to 140 miles long; it has several bays on its coast; thus the word 'bay,' as applied to this great body of water, has the same meaning as that applied to the Bay of Biscay, the Bay of Bengal, over which no nation can have the right to assume sovereignty. One of the headlands of the Bay of Fundy is in the United States, and ships bound to Passamaquoddy must sail through a large space of it. The Islands of Grand Manan (British) and the Little Manan (American) are situated nearly on a line from headland to headland. These islands, as represented in all geographies, are situated in the Atlantic Ocean. The conclusion is therefore in my mind irresistible, that the Bay of Fundy is not a British bay, nor a bay within the meaning of the word as used in the Treaties of 1783 and 1818."

That is precisely what I affirmed in the first place. Therefore, speaking of the construction to be placed upon the very ambiguous and uncertain words of the American statute, I ventured in a guarded way to suggest what was the most reasonable meaning of those words. Whatever their statute means, ours has a correlative meaning, and on the assumption that the waters washing the shores of the County of Albert will be within the jurisdiction of the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac, I desire to support it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Committee what I did say. That decision arose out of the seizure of an American vessel called the Washington. She was seized at a point so near the line between the St. Croix River and the southernmost point of Nova Scotia, that it was uncertain whether she was seized within the line of British territory or outside. Now, the decision of Mr. Bates, to which I did not allude, but to which the hon. gentleman alluded, referred, not to the Bay of Fundy as a whole, but to that particular portion of it; and in consequence of the British Government being unable to say that that vessel was seized within a line drawn between two points within British territory, the claim had to be abandoned. The commission of which Mr. Bates was a member was not appointed to defend the limits of the bays, but to settle the point whether the schooner George Washington was seized within the limits of the Bay of Fundy or not, and he decided that she was not.

Mr. MASSON. I do not think the question of reciprocity of trade has anything to do with reciprocity in wrecking. So far as reciprocity of trade is concerned, I am opposed to it, because I believe reciprocity of trade would be a disadvantage to Canadians, especially to farmers, and especially to the farmers of Ontario. I think I have on previous occasions advanced very good reasons—reasons that have never been answered—to show that, so far as the farmers are concerned, reciprocity of trade means a direct loss on their products, especially on the three principal kinds of grain they produce, wheat, oats and peas, as well as on pork and other things. I do not think that has anything to do with this question. I am opposed to general reciprocity, because I believe it would be to the disadvantage of Canada; but reciprocity in wrecking would be to the advantage of both Canada and the United States. The two cases are entirely different. Reciprocity in wrecking, if the interests of the wreckers alone were regarded, would be to the disadvantage of Canadian wreckers; and I can quite understand that Americans, with their superior wrecking plant, would be able to compete successfully in many cases against Canadian wreckers. But I do not consider that of any importance in this connection. This measure is to the advantage of the ship-owners and the men engaged in traffic in our inland lakes, for the simple reason that the sooner help can be got to a disabled vessel, the better it is for the owners of that vessel, and for the people whose cargo it carries. As to the amendment proposing to add reciprocity in towing, I object to that being made part of this Bill, for the reason that I believe the Americans, being so jealous of their towing, and having advanced more than we have in wrecking, would object to that. But I think it is fairly within the power of the two Governments, when issuing the proclamations provided for by the respective measures, to say that when a disabled vessel can be taken into the ports of either country. The courts of either country would say that a vessel rendering assistance to another would have the right to take it in; but if there be any doubt, it is in the power of the Government, before issuing their respective proclamations, to make that a special arrangement. For that reason I would support the Bill as amended in Committee, and will oppose the amendment proposed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton).

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am very sorry I cannot ask the supporters of this Bill to accept the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I am sorry because I would like to see reciprocity in towage and in the coasting trade, but I cannot agree that reciprocity in these should be tacked on to this Bill, and that this Bill shall not come into force unless such reciprocity is granted. I agree with the hon. the Minister of Customs that if we are going to accept the offer of the Americans at all, we must accept it in the shape in which it has been on their Statute-books for the last eleven years. It has often been cast up against Canadians by the Americans, in all their despatches during those years, that we have sinned against the common cause of humanity in not accepting their offer; and now if we say we will accept it provided they will give us the towage of rafts from port to port, which is a matter not connected with wrecking, the result will be that things will remain as they are at present. There are two kinds of towage. There is the towage spoken of by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule)—that is when rendering assistance to vessels in distress. That towage unquestionably will be permitted under this Bill, but the other towage—the towage of rafts and of vessels from port to port—is a totally different matter. We may bring in a different Bill with regard to that, or ask the Government to enter into negotiations with the American Government with the view of obtaining reciprocity in that as well as in the coasting trade, and I hope that next Session the Government will be able to bring down a measure dealing with this question. But if the amendment proposed be accepted, it will tie up this Bill, and the reciprocity I ask for will not be able to come into force until next year, because the President of the United States can only bring the American measure into force when similar rights are given to the United States; and if we give them similar rights only on condition that they give us reciprocity in towage, the President will not be able to issue his proclamation. Therefore, this Bill which I propose and which the country is in favor of, which every gentleman who has spoken here has spoken in favor of, will be rendered inoperative. I would therefore ask hon. gentlemen who have promised assistance to this Bill to vote down the amendment and vote for the Bill as it stands.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would ask the House to consider the moderate nature of my proposition. I simply ask that we should propose to the American Government that the offer they have made to the Canadian Government shall be slightly extended, and be put in a shape which will give to us some slight return for the advantage they ask us to confer upon them.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Does the hon. gentleman not know that Congress is not sitting and will not be in session until next December, and, therefore, cannot amend their offer until next December?

Mr. CHARLTON. But are we to throw away the advantage we possess, are we to surrender anything we possess because our proposition cannot be acted on instantly? Not an hon. gentleman who has spoken in this House has taken the ground that the amendment in itself is one that would not be satisfactory to us and desirable to obtain. Not one has declared that if we can get this concession from the Americans—not the right of coasting but of towing vessels and rafts, reciprocal rights on the part of tugs only in the waters contiguous to the territories of either country—it would not be a desirable thing to get. Now, it is said by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) and by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Edgar) and by other gentlemen: Why not pass this Bill and then introduce a Bill asking for the privileges you have embodied in your amendment? But that would be giving away everything we have to offer in consideration for this concession; it would be giving away all the hand we hold, and then we could only ask the Americans that restitution, when we have nothing to offer in return, which I propose shall be made a condition of this Bill. I do not believe the assertion that we will not get anything is well founded. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has said that we have had thrown up to us by the Americans, as something discreditable to ourselves, the fact that we have failed to accept their offer from year to year. Well, suppose we throw up to the Americans, as something discreditable to them, that they have failed from year to year to accept our offer of reciprocity in coasting, an offer more reasonable than the other, an offer wider in its scope and better calculated to confer benefits on both countries. We have had this broad offer of coasting and reciprocity on our Statute-books since 1877, and the Americans select out of the incidents of coasting the one particular thing that will be of exclusive advantage to themselves, and they propose to give us reciprocity in that one item, in which we shall make nothing and lose all, and in none of the others. I hold this is a concession we ought not to make. I believe if we make this simple, moderate proposition that we will accept the American Bill, with the slightly varied condition that they will make some compensation to us for that which we undoubtedly surrender and lose in this matter, by giving to the few tugs we have in the inland waters reciprocity in towage—and they have a greater number of tugs than we, and I am not sure that their position would not be more improved than ours—I believe if we make this a condition of the acceptance of their offer, we will get it. But if we make this offer without making this condition, we will afterwards get nothing at all. For that reason I hold that if this thing is desirable and reasonable—and it is reasonable and moderate—we should make it a condition of the offer. We should say to them: Your offer is not entirely satisfactory, but if you will vary it slightly and put it in a shape more reasonable and satisfactory to us, if you will extend its conditions and embrace simply the towing of vessels and rafts by the tugs of the two nationalities, then we will close the arrangement. I will not say that should the Americans decline the proposition, I would not go for my hon. friend's Bill; I presume I would. But under the circumstances I will not support that Bill because I want to get better terms, and if we support it as it is, we lose every chance for getting better terms. For that reason I oppose the Bill, and ask the House to support my amendment. The hon. Minister of Customs says this is an amendment right in the line of what the Government has offered. It is, but it falls very far short of the terms the Government did offer and insist upon. It is an amendment in the line of reciprocity in coasting, but it only takes one of the smallest parts of coasting, and asks for reciprocity in that. I think the proposition is a moderate one. We have surrendered nine-tenths of what we asked last year, and I think if we make that a condition we will get it, while I know that if we do not make it a condition we will neither get that nor anything else.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the fact that I represent a constituency that is bordering on the Georgian Bay, where such an important trade is being built up latterly, is a sufficient reason why I should express my opinion in reference to this Bill without any unseemly interruptions. From all the sources of information at our command, in my part of the country at least, the consensus of opinion is that this Bill should become law. We have that not only from the shippers themselves, but from the shipowners, and from the only important wrecking company in my part of the country, the McCarthy Wrecking Company. We have also had an expression of opinion from the Boards of Trade in the Dominion, or especially in the Province of Ontario, and the object they all seem to have in view is to have some Bill passed which will allow these reciprocal conditions to be brought into operation immediately. The effect of this Bill, as it is proposed to be amended, will allow it to come into force immediately. I do not think the amendments of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) have been pressed upon him by the McCarthy company, but that company have asked that some Bill should be passed to give the advantages of the reciprocal wrecking privileges which are proposed in this Bill; and, as the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) says, if the Bill is not passed as it is now, we may at some indefinite time in the future, receive the advantages which we should receive now; but, if it is allowed to pass, and thereby give the country the immediate advantages of it, we may consider at a later date the amendments proposed by the hon. member for North Norfolk. I say that, in view of all the requests which have been made, and especially from our part of the country, in favor of having this measure become law immediately, the Bill should be adopted as it has been proposed by the hon. member for Frontenac.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In reference to the amendments which have been proposed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) I may say that I see no objection to the amendments if they did not affect the rest of the Bill, but I do not see any reason why the Bill as it originally stood should not go into effect and allow the further propositions to be made to operate at a later date. We should not say we will take nothing unless we can get everything, and that is the proposition. Let us have reciprocity, as far as the Bill goes, and we can make a further offer afterwards. I see no objection to that, but I do see serious objection to our saying that we will not take what we can get because we cannot get all we think desirable. There are other interests than those of the owners of tugs to be considered. There are the interests of the owners of vessels and of the mariners who are employed on vessels, and they are paramount. I think, both on the ground of humanity and on that of property, if the hon. gentleman desires to propose his amendments without affecting the provisions of the Bill as it stands, there is no objection, but to say that these are to be added to the Bill and that we are to take nothing until we can get everything would be very objectionable.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not inclined to propose the amendments after we have surrendered the only chance we have to get them adopted.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). If the House is going to adopt the principle of the Bill, it would be well to remove all ambiguity from it, and I think the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is really an essential part of the scheme of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), because the law of the United States does not give power to tow in American waters, and the Bill which we are discussing to-night does not give the Americans power to tow in Canadian waters. If we desire to put into effect really useful legislation which shall be beneficial to wrecked vessels and to the shipping interest of both countries, the suggestion of the hon. member for North Norfolk should be adopted. Otherwise, the Bill will be ambiguous in its terms and will give rise to litigation between the owners of vessels and tug owners.

Mr. HESSON. It is not often that I am able to agree with my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), but on this occasion I am in full accord with him. I do not think we should give away the rights and privileges which we pride ourselves on possessing without some consideration, and I shall support the amendment of the hon. gentleman with all my influence and with my vote.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 21; nays, 67.

Bill reported.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved the consideration of the amendments.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think a Bill that has elicited so much discussion, ought to be printed before we go on with it.

Mr. BOWELL. The Bill has been materially changed since it was introduced, and it is also changed from what it was when it came from the Committee. I would suggest that it be reprinted so that the House may understand what they are doing.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. We should consider the amendments now and then let the Bill stand for the third reading.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It would be better if the hon. gentleman would allow the Bill to stand over. Many changes have been made to the Bill, and the Committee just now was not very full.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I submit that the proper course is to consider the amendments now and then let the motion for the third reading stand.

Mr. CHARLTON. I did not understand the Bill thoroughly myself, and I would like to see it in print.

Mr. MITCHELL. The amendments should be taken into consideration, but not the third reading.

Motion agreed to, and amendments read the first and second time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12:05 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 14th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MESSAGE TO THE SENATE.

Mr. RYKERT moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate asking that their Honors will be pleased to grant leave to the Hon. W.E. Sanford, a member of the Senate, to attend the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts of the House of Commons, to give evidence in the enquiry respecting the supply of militia clothing.

Motion agreed to.

TITLE AND MORTGAGE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Sir DONALD A. SMITH moved:

That that part of the twelfth report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders which refers to the preliminary petition of J. J. Curran, Esq., praying to be permitted to lay before the House a petition for an Act of incorporation under the name of the Title and Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada, be referred back to the said Committee for further consideration.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman explain the object of this motion?

Sir DONALD A. SMITH. The reason the petition was not presented earlier is that the gentleman principally interested in it was confined to bed through illness, and was not able to attend to it; but every necessary information will be given to the committee if the House will permit that part of the report to be referred back.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 112) respecting the wires of telephone, telegraph and electric light companies.—(Mr. Perley.)

NEW LONDON BREAKWATER AND HARBOR.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to repair and improve the New London breakwater during the coming summer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have enquired from my chief engineer with regard to this question, and his answer is as follows:—The department is not aware, from the report of any of its officers, that repairs or improvements are required on the breakwater at New London.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to send the steam dredge to dredge the channel of New London harbor during the coming summer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am afraid the engagements made for the steam dredge, next season, will make it very difficult for the department to send it to New London.

PIER AT CHINA POINT.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to rebuild or repair the pier at China Point, Prince Edward Island, during the coming summer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must ask the hon. gentleman to be kind enough to wait until the Supplementary Estimates come down. Perhaps he may then have an answer.

PINETTE AND WOOD ISLAND HARBOR.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have surveys held on the harbor of Pinette and Wood Island during the coming summer; and if so, in what month?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the intention of the Government to make surveys at Pinette and Wood Island, and, as recommended by the chief engineer of the Maritime Provinces, they will be proceeded with at once, to take advantage of the ice for soundings and borings.

HICKEY WHARF.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have the pier called "Hickey Wharf" put in a good state of repair during the coming summer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The authority has already been given for that work.

MOUNT STEWART PIER.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to build a pier at or near Mount Stewart, Prince Edward Island, as prayed for by the inhabitants of that section?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter is under the consideration of the Government.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. HAGGART moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to-morrow, to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Act to provide that the salary of the Clerk of the Board of Civil Service Examiners shall be a sum not exceeding $700 per annum, and the annual remuneration of each Examiner a sum not exceeding $400; that Post Office Inspectors may be appointed without examination; that in the Inland Revenue Service the annual salaries of Clerks (Accountants) shall be from $600 to $1,400, and of special class Excisemen who are chief officers in charge of distilleries, $1,400 to $1,600; that in the Postal Service the annual salaries of Railway Mail Clerks shall be the same for night as for day service, and that each Railway Mail Clerk may be paid a mileage rate of half a cent for day service and of one cent for night service; that in city post offices where the annual revenue exceeds $250,000, the Postmaster may be paid an annual salary not exceeding $4,000; if revenue is from $200,000 to $250,000, a salary not exceeding $3,750; if revenue is from $150,000 to $200,000, a salary not exceeding $3,500; if revenue is from $100,000 to $150,000, a salary not exceeding $3,250, and if the revenue is from $80,000 to $100,000, a salary not exceeding $2,800.

RETURNS.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to draw the attention of the Government to the condition of the returns ordered so far this Session. I observe there have been three returns presented to-day, and before they had been laid on the Table, only fifteen had been brought down out of fifty ordered by the House. I desire to use a return ordered with respect to the money expended on the streets of Ottawa. It was ordered seventeen or eighteen days ago, and I wish the Minister of Public Works would have it brought down early. I should also like to obtain the return ordered for copies of tenders for the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. I call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the fact that in the Public Accounts Committee to-day there was a matter brought up with respect to A. W. Webster, an immigration agent under the control of the hon. gentleman's department. Accounts were ordered to be brought before the Public Accounts Committee, and I understand a return in connection with them is in the hands either of the Secretary of State or the Minister of Agriculture. The Auditor General drew my attention to the impossibility of complying with the resolution of the Public Accounts Committee in regard to the papers, because they were in the hands of one of those departments. As we cannot proceed until this return is presented to the House, I hope the Minister of Agriculture will note the fact and have it presented at once, in order that the matter may be taken up before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. CARLING. I will make a note of it, and see that it has attention.

Mr. WELSH. I call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to a notice of motion I placed on the paper on the 14th of February, for a return. As we are approaching that item very slowly, I wish the Minister would order the paper for the return to be prepared. If not, I shall have to imagine all sorts of things.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster: That Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair, and the House go into Committee of Supply; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. WOOD (Westmorland). Mr. Speaker, I recognise, at this stage of the debate, the difficulty of adducing anything that would be new in its character, or of special interest to the House. We must always expect in these discussions, that hon. members are allowed a great deal of latitude. The debate on the present occasion has taken a very wide range, and I think, already, there has been introduced into it almost every conceivable subject-matter which bears either directly or indirectly on the question under consideration. Indeed, Sir, the great variety of the subjects treated of, and the arguments presented, is rather bewildering than otherwise. I could not help, when we were listening to the eloquent address of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Colter), the very interesting address of the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Perry), being induced to follow those hon. gentlemen in their flights of fancy, but we were afterwards brought back by the relevant remarks of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Laundry), to have our attention called to the fact that we were discussing the resolution introduced by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and that the subject of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States was the subject which was engaging the attention of this assembly at the present time. I must admit, at the outset, that I do not propose to follow the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me over all the ground they have travelled; I do not undertake to enter upon all the subjects that have been discussed, nor do I intend to supply new material that has not been introduced into the debate. I shall devote the time I occupy in drawing the attention of the House to what I regard as the principal and most important arguments that have been advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite, in support of the resolution we are considering, and give what I consider to be the answers to those arguments. In the first place, Sir, the arguments which have been addressed to the House, and which have been more persisted in by hon. gentlemen opposite than any other, are arguments based on the prosperity of Canada, and the benefit which the people of Canada derived from trade with the United States during the existence of the Reciprocity Treaty from 1854 to 1866. Hon. gentlemen have given us statistics to show the growth of the trade between Canada and the United States during that period, and upon that they have based their estimate of the advantages that would accrue to the country if we had unrestricted reciprocity at the present time. The force of these arguments is entirely destroyed by reference to two important facts. The first is that during the existence of that treaty, from 1861 to 1866 the people of the United States were engaged in a civil war, and that hundreds, and thousands, and millions from the productive classes in that country were called away from their ordinary avocations, and compelled to do duty on the field of battle. In consequence, the productive power of the nation was seriously impaired, and the result of that state of things was that the demand for all the principal articles that we produce, and which we are in a position to export to the United States, exceeded the supply; prices, in consequence, were enormously enhanced, and what proved to be to the American people a great national calamity, proved to the people of this country a great source of advantage and profit. The second important fact is this: since the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty in 1866 the United States have made wonderful progress and advancement. The development of their agricultural interests has been especially large, the extension of their railway system and the settlement of their agricultural districts in the west have largely increased the productive powers of the nation, and they are able to-day not only to supply their own markets with all the descriptions of agricultural produce which they require, but they have a surplus to export to other countries. Now, Sir, it must be evident to everyone that arguments based on the condition of things for some years previous to 1866 are entirely inapplicable to the condition of the case to-day. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) made an estimate that if the Reciprocity Treaty had continued in force up to this time the trade of Canada with the United States would have reached, I believe he said $150,000,000 annually. That estimate, Mr. Speaker, would have been far more accurate if he had based it on the continuance of the civil war rather than upon the continuance of the Reciprocity Treaty. The hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Perry) expressed an earnest desire to restore to the farmers of that Island and to the farmers of the Maritime Provinces generally, the prosperity which they enjoyed under the existence of the Reciprocity Treaty from 1854 to 1866. That hon. gentleman would gain his object much more effectually if he could succeed in inciting another civil war in the United States, rather than by devoting his energies to securing another reciprocity treaty, and, in my humble judgment, I may say that I think he would have about as good prospects of success in the one direction as in the other. It must be evident to any one who seriously considers all the features of this case, that any arguments based on the condition of things in 1866, when the demand for our products in the United States exceeded the supply, and the seller fixed the price, are entirely inapplicable to the condition of things at the present time, when the supply exceeds the demand, and the buyer fixes the price. Any arguments, therefore, based on that condition of things, are entirely misleading, and have little bearing upon the question we are now considering. Then, Sir, there was another class of arguments addressed to the House, based upon the prosperity of the United States. Almost every gentleman who has addressed the House from that side, has called our attention to the wonderful growth and prosperity of that great country in the past. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) elaborated that idea and this argument more fully, I believe, than any other gentleman who has yet addressed the House. That hon. gentleman furnished us with a great mass of statistics relative to the growth and progress of our neighbors across the line. He pointed out to us the remarkable growth and prosperity of that country, and he traced its history from 1776 to the present time. I, for one, and I believe also that the majority of the members of this House feel under a debt of gratitude to that hon. gentleman for the valuable information which his speech contained, and I am sure that we all admired the eloquent manner in which it was delivered to this House; but while these statistics may be valuable for many important purposes, yet, so far as proving that unrestricted reciprocity would be advantageous to the people of Canada to-day, they are, in my opinion, entirely valueless. I will give my reasons why. When the hon. gentleman points to the growth and prosperity of the United States in the past, and presents that to us as the measure of the prosperity which the Dominion would have enjoyed as a part of that great republic, or if she had free trade with that great republic, he proceeds upon the supposition that the advantages of that free trade would have been equally distributed between the two countries. Now, Sir, that is a false assumption. That is an assumption which the history of the United States itself proves to be entirely unwarranted. If that assumption were correct it would follow, for the same reason, that the different States of the Union, the different sections of that great republic, would have shared equally in the past in the generally prosperity of the country. But, Sir, has that been the case? Has Maine prospered as the neighboring State of Massachusetts has prospered? Has Massachusetts grown in population and wealth equally with the State of New York? Have the New England States had the same progress and prosperity, and the same growth in population and in wealth, as the States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Ohio, and Indiana? Have the States of Virginia and Georgia and the Carolinas had as large a share in the general prosperity of the republic as the States of New York and Pennsylvania? Why, Sir, if there is one feature that to-day is conspicuous in the United States, it is the great disparity that exists between the growth and prosperity and the present condition of the different sections of that great Republic. Let me, for the information of the House, read a few statistics on that point. I find, by turning to the United States census for 1880, that the increase in the value of real and personal property in thirty years, from 1850 to 1880, in the State of Maine, scarcely reached $400,000,000, in the State of Massachusetts over $2,200,000,000, and in the State of New York over $7,500,000,000. I might continue these comparisons much further, as I have them here, but I do not wish to weary the House; and I will simply call attention to two other facts gathered from the census of 1880. The value of property in the two States of New York and Pennsylvania exceeded the value of property in all the other States east of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, including nineteen States of the Union. West of the Ohio River, the increase in the value of property in the three States of Ohio, Illinois and Indiana, was 150 per cent. greater than it was in Wisconsin, Minnesota and Iowa. If the hon. gentleman had desired to ascertain what would have been the position of the Provinces of Canada to-day if they had been a portion of the American Republic from 1776 to the present time, instead of furnishing general statistics regarding the growth of the whole nation, he should have examined into the condition of those States of the Union and those sections of the Republic which most nearly correspond with the Provinces of the Dominion, in climate, natural resources, geographical position, and other respects. If he had desired to ascertain whether the Provinces of Canada would have been more prosperous to-day than they are if they had been a portion of the American Republic, he should have compared their progress and development with the progress of the states immediately adjoining them. He should have compared Maine with New Brunswick, the Maritime Provinces with the New England States, Quebec with the States adjoining, and Ontario with the great State of New York. That was the comparison made the other evening by the hon. member for Welland, and that is the only true method of comparison, if we wish to arrive at sound conclusions on this subject. Now, Sir, what did that comparison show? I do not wish to repeat the figures which that hon. gentleman presented to the House, although I have them here; I will merely refer to some of the results. In regard to population, the increase in the three States of Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont during thirty years, was a little over 9 per cent., and in ten years it was only 4 per cent.; while in the three Maritime Provinces the increase of population in the same periods was 60 per cent. and 13 per cent. respectively. From 1870 to 1880 the increase in the States of New Hampshire and Vermont, which lie contiguous to the Province of Quebec, was a little over 4 per cent., while the increase in the population of Quebec was over 14 per cent. Then, if we go west and compare Ontario with New York, we find that the increase of population in ten years in the great empire state of New York, including as it does the great commercial metropolis of the nation, was only a little over 15 per cent., while in Ontario, from 1871 to 1881, the increase exceeded 18 per cent. Now, let me just call the attention of the House for a moment or two to a comparison of the agricultural development in the Maritime Provinces and in the states adjoining. I find that in the four States of Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont and New Hampshire the increase in the quantity of improved agricultural lands in twenty years was 1,200,000 acres, or 11½ per cent.; during the same time, in the four Provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Quebec, the increase in the quantity of improved agricultural lands was 3,000,000 acres, or 43 per cent. During the same period, in the four states referred to, the number of horses and cattle actually decreased by 300,000, while in the four Provinces referred to the number of horses and cattle increased by 765,000. During the same period the quantity of grain and potatoes raised in the four states referred to decreased 3,500,000 bushels, while in the four Provinces it increased 16,300,000 bushels. Then, if we go further west, I find by the State Report of the State of New York, this extraordinary statement, that in 1887, three-fourths of the farms of that state were under mortgage, and that one in every twenty of the farmers, representing in all 75,000 farmers of that state, were hopelessly in debt. I find by the same report that from 1870 to 1880 there was a decrease in the value of lands in the State of New York of $216,000,000, and that decrease has continued. By the report of the Province of Ontario, I find that in four years, from 1882 to 1886, the increase in the value of farm lands in that Province was $66,750,000. Then, from 1870 to 1880 the increase in the seven principal crops in the Province of Ontario was 66 per cent., while the increase in the same crops in the State of New York was only 16 per cent. I will only trouble the House by a reference to one other matter in this connection, that is, a comparison of the distribution of the commerce of the two countries. In the Dominion of Canada we find that in the past the commerce of our principal seaports has gradually increased. This is the case with St. John, Halifax and all the other seaports of the Maritime Provinces. It is also the case with Quebec and Montreal, the great seaports on the River St. Lawrence. Now, Sir, what is the condition of the commerce of the United States to-day? The great city of New York has had remarkable growth. That city to-day controls 65 per cent of the entire import and export trade of the country between the Province of New Brunswick and Mexico; the cities of Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia and New Orleans control 25 per cent., and of the remaining 10 per cent., the principal part is distributed among the seaports of the southern states such as Galveston, Mobile, Pensacola, Charleston, and Savannah. But when we come to the seaports of the northern states, we find that their commerce is practically annihilated. New York, Boston, and Baltimore to-day practically control the entire import and export trade of the eastern, central and western states of the Union. Now, is there any possible reason, if this Dominion had been a part of the American Republic from 1776 to the present time, that can be assigned why New York or Boston would not have controlled the trade of Ontario in the same way that they control the trade of every state west of the Ohio River or Lake Michigan? I ask hon. gentlemen if there is any possible reason why the commerce of the ports of Quebec and Montreal, standing on the great St. Lawrence River, should have gradually increased, so that to-day their commerce is represented by upwards of 1,100,000 tons of shipping which entered and departed from those ports during the last year, while the commerce of New Orleans, at the mouth of the Mississippi, is gradually being reduced, so that it is represented to-day by a tonnage of not more than half the commerce of the cities to which I have referred, and that it is actually less by something like 100,000 tons of shipping than it was thirty years ago. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen, also, to consider whether under those circumstances, that the commerce of St. John during ten years would show an increase of 25 per cent. in the tonnage of vessels from foreign ports entering and departing from that port, or that the commerce of Halifax would have increased 50 per cent. during the same period, while the commerce of Bangor, Bath, Salem, Lynn and New Haven, and almost every other port on the north Atlantic coast, is a matter, to-day, of history only. There is only one exception, and that is the city of Portland, which retains some commercial importance from the fact that it is the outlet for a considerable portion of the products of this Dominion. I would ask hon. gentlemen also to consider whether any reason can be assigned, if this country had been a part of the American Republic from 1776 to the present, why New Brunswick should present, to-day, a more rapid growth in population and agricultural development than the adjoining State of Maine, or whether there is any reason why the comparison between the Maritime Provinces and the New England States should be so favorable to the former, or why Quebec should compare favorably with the states adjoining, and Ontario with the great State of New York? Why, to suppose that this condition of things would exist, if this country had belonged to the United States, is not only contrary to reason and common sense, but such a supposition is positively contradicted by the historical facts to which I have referred; and hon. gentlemen cannot, to-day, furnish one good reason or one sound argument, and they cannot find one, among all the masses of statistics which have been presented to this House to support the contention that the Provinces of this Dominion would enjoy greater prosperity at present as a portion of the American

Republic than they do as a portion of the British Empire. The history of the United States proves conclusively that the effect of free commercial intercourse between adjoining states and adjoining countries is not to distribute equally among them all the advantages of that free trade. It proves conclusively that all do not participate equally in the growth and prosperity of the whole—but just the reverse. It proves that the favored portions of the country grow at the expense of the less favored. It proves that the strong absorbs the weak, that the result of extending free trade over a large area is to create great centres of manufacturing industry, that these centres of manufacturing industry grow and prosper with the growth of the nation, while the weaker interests languish and die. So far as the commerce of the country is concerned, the effect of extending this free trade principle is to develop the commerce of those parts which are most favorably situated in regard to geographical position or which have other advantages. It places them in a position to control a large part of the commerce of the country, so that they gradually concentrate within themselves the business enterprise and the capital of the nation, with the result that they gradually, from time to time, absorb the entire commercial interests of the country. Now, there is one other lesson which Canadians should learn from the facts to which I have referred, and that is that the Provinces of this Dominion, if they had been a part of the American Republic from 1776 to the present, would have, from their geographical position, enjoyed the least share of the benefits of free commercial intercourse between the two countries, and the result would have been, instead of occupying the proud position which they do to-day, instead of, by their remarkable growth and progress and prosperity during the last few years, attracting the attention and commanding the admiration of the civilised world to-day, they would have been a mere insignificant fringe on the outskirts of that great Republic, without a history and without a name; and that is the position to which they will be rapidly reduced if this policy is adopted at the present time. There is another class of arguments used by hon. gentlemen opposite, based upon the growth and development and prosperity of the United States. Hon. gentlemen point to that prosperity. They tell us it is largely due to the fact that these states have enjoyed free and unrestricted commercial intercourse with each other, and that if they have prospered under those circumstances, Canada would have prospered under like circumstances. As the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) put it, that if unrestricted reciprocity was good for 40 states or commonwealths, it was better still for 47. That is the free trade argument pure and simple; that is the argument which might be used by its advocates in its most innocent and harmless form. The answer to that argument is this. It is of the very highest importance that the same people, living under the same government, in which they are all represented, subject to the same laws, in the making of which they all have a voice, should for various reasons enjoy the freest social and commercial intercourse; but it does not follow by any means that a different people, living under a different form of government, subject to different laws, existing under conditions entirely different in respect of climate, geographical position, natural resources, and in other respects, would enjoy the same benefit from free trade. The history of the world proves the very contrary. We have examples in history of countries which have prospered under the free trade policy, and of countries which have prospered under the protective policy. The relative advantages which every country must derive from the adoption of either policy must be governed in each individual case by the circumstances to which I have referred—by the geographical position, by the natural resources, by the facilities

they possess for carrying on manufacturing industries, by the relative advancement of their people in industrial and manufacturing pursuits. The hon. gentleman omits entirely from his argument all these considerations, which are essential and vital in order to enable us to reach sound conclusions upon this subject. The arguments, therefore, which have been addressed to the House from the other side upon this line are entirely misleading and of no value in relation to the subject which we are considering. Then, I will call the attention of the House to another feature of the arguments which have been presented for our consideration, and that is that every argument which has been advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite in favor of this policy of unrestricted reciprocity might have been used with equal force and with equal propriety if they had been advocating commercial union or annexation. I may refer to this subject later, but, before I leave the point I have just been discussing, allow me to add this further observation, that the history of the United States has, for the people of this country, some important and instructive lessons. Of the New England States, those which have grown most rapidly in population, in wealth, and in material prosperity, have been the State of Massachusetts, the State of Rhode Island, and the State of Connecticut. In the west, the states which have made the same relative progress have been those of Illinois, Ohio, Wisconsin, Indiana, and the other agricultural states adjoining them. The causes for this are obvious. The protective policy which was adopted by the Government of the United States, built up and placed on a permanent foundation the manufacturing industries of the eastern states to which I have referred. They became great centres of manufacturing industry. They attracted within their borders wealth, capital, skill, and a large laboring population, and they have grown and prospered with the growth of the nation. The extension of the railways of the United States westward, opening up, as they did, a rich and fertile land west of Ohio and of Lake Michigan, induced a large amount of emigration to take place in that direction. The superior agricultural facilities, and the superior quality of land offered there, attracted thousands and tens of thousands of people to enter upon those lands from foreign countries and also from the older states of the Union. Now, what has been the experience in the United States in that respect, is our experience to-day. The same causes which produced those results there are producing similar results at this time in our own country. The policy of protection which was introduced in 1879 has been stimulating the manufacturers of the older Provinces, and it is known to everyone that the cities and towns of those Provinces have, since that time, grown rapidly in population and in wealth. The extension of our railway system westward, opening up, as it has, the fertile lands of the North-West, and rendering them available for settlement, is rapidly filling up that country with an industrious and thrifty population. We have been repeatedly told in this House that in some portions of Ontario and in the Maritime Provinces, the population is decreasing. It would be unreasonable to imagine that it could be otherwise, that in the poorer agricultural districts of the older Provinces at the present time the growth of population should be anything but slow. It is possible that it may be stationary. But I venture to predict that, when the census of 1891 is taken, it will show an increase in the population and wealth of Canada which hon. gentlemen will seek in vain to find a parallel for in the United States or any other country on the face of the globe. Other arguments which have been advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite have been based upon the increase of the debt of the country, and upon the present financial condition of the country. Had I spoken earlier in this debate, I would have referred at greater length to this feature of the subject, but now I must pass it over with a few general remarks. The general line of argument followed by hon. gentlemen opposite, I think, may be fairly and briefly stated as follows. The debt of the country has rapidly increased. It was $76,000,000 at the time of Confederation. Ten years after it was $140,000,000. Ten years later on it was $234,500,000. The per capita tax in 1867 was $22.47; in 1878 it was $34.41, and in 1888 it was $47. Hon. gentlemen proceed to argue that this state of things is sufficient to excite alarm in the minds of the people in this country, and that we have good grounds for apprehending that a crisis is approaching; that, unless some radical change takes place in the policy of the country, such as that which is now proposed, disaster must be inevitable. In answer to that argument, let me simply point out to the House this fact. Neither the gross amount of the debt, nor the per capita amount of the debt, nor the increase of the debt within a given time, is sufficient of itself to determine the relative financial condition of this country at different periods of our history. There are other conditions which are not only important, but are absolutely necessary to be considered, in order to enable us to reach a sound conclusion. These are the purposes for which the money is borrowed, the manner in which it is expended, and the results of that expenditure. The city of Ottawa to-day has, I believe, a debt of between $2,500,000 and $3,000,000. The old city of Bytown, a quarter of a century ago, was, I assume, comparatively free from debt. Yet no one will argue from that that Ottawa to-day is in a worse financial position or is nearer a position of embarrassment than Bytown was a quarter of a century ago. The financial position must be judged, not by the increase of the debt, but by the relation of the debt to the wealth of the city, and the financial position of Canada to-day or at any previous period must be ascertained, not by the amount of the debt, or by the increase of the debt, but by the relation of the debt to the wealth of the country at the different periods which are compared. Everyone knows that the debt of Canada has rapidly increased, but the result of the large expenditures which have been made, and for which that debt has been incurred, has been to increase the wealth of the country in a far more rapid ratio, and the financial condition is, therefore, materially improved. I entertain, in regard to the debt, the same opinion which I believe is entertained by a majority of the members of this House, and a majority of the people of this country. The debt is large, it has rapidly increased, but that was necessary under the peculiar circumstances in which the country was placed. It was necessary in the earlier years of our history as a united people, to make large expenditures, to incur large liabilities, in order to bind together the different sections of the country, to provide for the development of our resources, and to insure our rapid growth in population and in wealth. The results to-day fully justify the policy that was pursued. I can understand how hon. gentlemen years ago might honestly oppose that policy; I can understand how, at the inception of the great undertakings in which we have been engaged, hon. gentlemen might question the practicability, or the utility, or the ultimate success, of these great undertakings; I can understand how, in view of the enormous expenditure involved, financial disaster might be feared; but, Sir, I am utterly at loss to know to-day how, in view of the remarkable results that have followed, how, in view of the remarkable growth, progress and prosperity of this country, how, in view of the indications of accumulating wealth which we see on every side, there can be any two opinions in this country in regard to the wisdom of the policy that has been pursued, how any one can question the practical advantage and the utility of the expenditures which have been made, or can have any doubts or fears in regard to the present position or future prospects of Canada. Why, Sir, I think the statements which were made the other day by the hon. Minister of Finance should be satisfactory both to this House and to the country. I think we should congratulate that hon. gentleman, not only upon the very clear, and forcible, and eloquent language in which that statement was presented, but the very remarkable exhibit he was able to make of the growth and development of the country. The progress of this country since Confederation has been such that it should excite feelings of gratitude and pride in the breast of every patriotic Canadian. I believe, Sir, the House will also agree with me, that there is nothing in the amount of our debt at the present time, or in the taxation which the people of this country are called upon to bear, which demands a radical change in the policy of the present Administration. I think, too, that the House will agree with me that there is nothing in the wonderful growth and prosperity of our great American neighbors, that is sufficient to excite within us feelings of envy, or jealousy, or discontent; much more, that there is nothing in all the arguments which have been addressed to the House by hon. gentlemen opposite to call for a change of Government, which, after all, I believe, is the change which hon. gentlemen most earnestly desire. What would be the effect of a change of Government upon the country it is difficult to conjecture, for the reason that such grave doubts exist at the present time in regard to the policy that would be pursued if those hon. gentlemen were returned to power. I think we may fairly conclude, from the speeches which have been delivered in this House by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that he is a firm believer in free trade principles. Those who have listened to him during the last two Sessions can have no doubt that he is a warm advocate of free trade with the United States; and from the position which that hon. gentleman occupies in this House, and in the party to which he belongs, he is entitled to be regarded as a very high authority in regard to the fiscal policy of the party. But, Sir, if that is the fiscal policy of the party to-day, it is directly opposed to the policy of the party only two years ago. The leader of the Opposition at that time announced to the people of Canada that if the Liberal party were returned to power, there would be no radical change in the fiscal policy of the country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I say yes. That hon. gentleman said that the necessities of the country were such that a high rate of taxation must be maintained, that those who had invested their capital in manufacturing industries, in industries which owed their existence to the National Policy, in industries which could only be successfully carried on by the maintenance of that policy, had nothing to fear from a return of the Liberal party to power in this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to tell to-day, if a change of Government should take place, which of these opposing policies would prevail. It is quite as possible that, if a new leader arose, a new policy would be propounded. However, Sir, I will not weary the House with speculations on this point, but I shall pass it by with this additional observation. Whatever might be the effect of a change of Government upon the country at large, I think we are justified in believing that its effect would be beneficial upon the Liberal party generally, and especially upon the views and the opinions of their leaders. We all know that the same persons, under different circumstances, often take very different views of the same subject. As an illustration, a person who has gone successfully down one of our toboggan slides, has a better idea of the sport than the person who is standing shivering in the cold, waiting for his turn. As another illustration, the merchant who has carried on his business successfully, who enjoys the public's favor and a large share of the public patronage, has usually a better idea of the community in which he lives than his unsuccessful rival. This, we must admit, is a weakness of our human nature, and I feel inclined to believe that it is a weakness from which hon. gentlemen opposite are not entirely free; and I believe that this largely accounts for the extraordinary expressions of views and opinions which we have heard from that side of the House, and the wonderful changes of policy which have taken place during the last few years. Hon. gentlemen have been so long in the atmosphere of opposition waiting for their turn, that their views upon great questions of public policy seem to be thrown into hopeless confusion. While we cannot conjecture what benefit would result to the country generally by a change of Government, I think we are justified in hoping that a change of Government would at least restore greater harmony in the views and opinions of their leaders. Now, Sir, of all the different policies which have been proposed, perhaps the policy that we are considering at the present time is, in many respects, the most extraordinary. This policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States was first brought prominently to the attention of this House and the country when the hon. gentleman opposite introduced his resolution a year ago. It was pointed out at that time by those who addressed the House on this side, that that policy would not only be disadvantageous to this country generally, but that it was entirely impracticable. I think anyone who considers the results of the discussions since must conclude that that opinion has been since confirmed. Since that policy was proposed last year, this subject has been discussed in the press and on the platform, from one end of this country to the other, and the result of that discussion to-day is that, outside of the party which sit in this House, outside of the very strongest of their supporters in the country, outside of that portion of the press which is devoted to their interests, there is no important class of our people, there are no important personages among our public men, who are supporting this policy. Mr. Erastus Wiman and Professor Goldwin Smith, who laid the foundation of the platform on which the Liberal party stand to-day, are advocates either of commercial union or of annexation. If we cross the line the result of the discussion there has been even more remarkable. Anyone who follows the current of public opinion as expressed in the press of that country will find there is a portion of the people who advocate annexation, and there is another portion who advocate commercial union. If we take the utterances of the public men belonging to both political parties, we find the same result. This policy of unrestricted reciprocity appears to be entirely ignored. It has not received, so far as I am aware, the slightest consideration across the line. It is true that, a year ago, a Bill was introduced in Congress embodying this principle. What was its fate? It was withdrawn before it had even passed its initial stage in its progress through the House, and a Bill was substituted embodying the principle of commercial union. The resolution which passed the House only a few days ago embodied the principle of commercial union. I have the resolution in my desk and I intended to read it to the House, but I believe it was read yesterday, and I shall have to refer hon. gentlemen to Hansard. But if hon. gentlemen will follow to-day not only the discussion in the public press of the country, but if they will follow and examine the opinions expressed by the leading public men of the country upon every platform where this question has been referred to, they will find that the people of the neighboring republic either advocate annexation, or if they advocate commercial union, they advocate it as a necessary initial step to the accomplishment of the other end. What object do hon. gentlemen have in advocating this policy of unrestricted reciprocity in this country? It is, no doubt, true that there may be some persons in Canada who, from the peculiarity of the locality in which they reside, or from the business in which they are engaged, would be benefited by unrestricted reciprocity with the United States; and hon. gentlemen hope to gain the political support of that class among our people, and, at the same time, to conceal from the great masses of our people the inevitable result to which this policy, if it could be adopted, must inevitably lead. They advocate this policy, this impracticable policy of unrestricted reciprocity, utterly regardless of the fact that it must, if adopted, lead eventually to the annexation of this country to the United States. I wish to offer a few observations in regard to another line of policy which has been advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite during the present Session. Hon. gentlemen have been advocating a policy of conciliation, they have been asking the Government to conciliate the Government and people of the United States, they have taken the unwise and, in my humble judgment, the unpatriotic course of denouncing the Government of this country for firmly maintaining our rights upon the fisheries question. They have characterised the treatment of American fishermen by the Dominion Government as harsh and cruel. They have told us that the interpretation which we put upon the Treaty of 1813 is too rigid, is too strict, is too much in the interests of Canada, and too unfavorable to the interests of the neighboring republic. The absurdity of this contention, the inconsistent position which hon. gentlemen occupy on this subject, was fully exposed the other day by the Minister of Justice, and yet we find hon. gentlemen opposite unanimously supporting a resolution, introduced by the leader of the Opposition party, asking the Government of the day to extend to American fishermen, for another year, the modus vivendi provided for in connection with the late treaty. For what purpose? To reconcile or to conciliate the people of the United States. Why, is there any hon. gentleman in this House who knows so little of business transactions as to suppose that the Government, or the people of the United States, can be conciliated by any such policy as that? Is there anyone here so ignorant of the principles on which commercial arrangements are negotiated as to suppose, for one moment, that friendship in trade can be purchased by voluntary concession of undoubted right? Such a policy inevitably defeats the very object had in view, and if that policy was followed in this instance, if it had any influence whatever, its effect would be rather to retard and embarrass than to promote the settlement of the fisheries question. Then we have been told that we cannot afford to be unfriendly with the people of the United States, that it is of paramount importance, not only to this country but to Great Britain, that friendly relations should be maintained, and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) went so far as to say that in the event of invasion we would be unable to defend ourselves although we were aided by all the military and naval forces of the British Empire. I do not profess to be a very high authority on military matters, I am not sure the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is a better authority than I am; but I venture to express this opinion that, if I know anything whatever of the character of the Canadian people, they will not propose to surrender themselves to the great republic before an invasion is even threatened; and, unless I mistake them entirely, they will not surrender their heritage under any circumstances without a struggle. I believe in this case we can successfully maintain the rights for which we are now contending. Those rights have been secured to us by treaty, they have been maintained by Great Britain, on our behalf, for upwards of seventy years, they have been recognised in every possible way, they have been acknowledged in the most public and positive manner by the chief executive of the American nation within the last twelve months. Under these circumstances, I believe we can maintain these rights. I feel more. I feel that, with such a cause, with a cause the equity and justice of which is unquestioned, we rely not merely on our own numerical strength, we rely not alone on the power and prestige of Great Britain, but, unless we have lost all confidence in the civilisation of the nineteenth century, we can rely upon the support of the civilised world, and I think I may surely add, we can rely on the honest sentiment of the people of the United States themselves to support us in this contention. I referred in the outset of my remarks to the condition in which Canada would have been placed to-day if she had been from 1776—as it was suggested she might have been—a portion of the American Republic. Let me very briefly refer to some of the results which would follow if this free trade principle were adopted now. The result of adopting free trade with the United States would, in the first instance, utterly annihilate all those manufacturing industries which have been brought into existence by the National Policy, and which depend for their continued prosperity upon the maintenance of that policy. In addition to that, the adoption of free trade with the United States would utterly destroy the foreign trade of this country. That, Sir, has been fully established by the history of the past. Hon. gentlemen tell us that if the barriers to trade were thrown down, the trade between this country and the United States would be enormously increased. I have no doubt there would be an increase, but that increase would be gained at the sacrifice of our trade with every other country in the world. We would be compelled to buy in the United States the manufactured goods which we consume, and we would soon be compelled to rely upon them for a market for our own products. The imports of this country and the exports of this country would be diverted from Canadian to American channels, and the business enterprise and energy of our great commercial cities would be transferred to New York and Boston and the other commercial centres across the line. But, Sir, there are still other dangers to be apprehended. We are, during this present Session, considering legislation regarding Trade Combinations. The people of this country recognise the possible disastrous results which might follow to the masses of the people if monopolies were allowed to assume large proportions within our borders. I believe, Sir, that this Parliament now and always will be ready to adopt any legislation which may be necessary to prevent the growth of this evil, but shall we at the same time expose the people of this country to a similar and a greater danger from abroad? While we protect our people from our own merchants and our own manufacturers, shall we expose them to the greater and the stronger combinations that exist across the line? Every person knows that there is no country in the world to-day where combinations of capital exist on a more extended scale, or with more perfect organisation, and with more extended and dangerous powers, than they do in the United States at the present time. In this country we have a power to-day which entirely protects us from this danger. In Canada to-day we are able to prevent any combination of foreign capitalists, however powerful, from entering this country to control our markets, to destroy our industry, or to demoralise our trade. That power is the power which this Parliament possesses to form our own fiscal policy and to make our own tariff. Deprive us of that power and we are helpless. Adopt this free trade policy and you open this whole country as one rich harvest field for American speculation, you open the storehouses which nature has filled with wealth for our use and for our benefit, to be plundered by any combination of foreign capitalists that may choose to enter them. Our fields, our forests, our mines, and our fisheries would be robbed of their wealth and for what—to build up the industries of a foreign nation, to enrich their capitalists and to provide food and employment for their people. Why, Sir, if there is one thing which the people of Canada should learn from the history of the past, it is to maintain unimpaired the commercial independence which we enjoy to-day. Hon. gentlemen opposite have referred to the effects of retaliations. We all recognise and fully recognise, the disastrous consequence that would result to this country if that policy were adopted. I, for one, Sir, do not believe that that policy will be adopted. I cannot believe that the American people, without provocation, and without any good reason for their act, will adopt a policy which would be disastrous not only to this country, but to themselves. But, Sir, if they do adopt that policy, I am glad to know that the people of Canada are in a better position to-day to accept that policy than at any previous period in the history of the country. While we recognise these disastrous effects, while we recognise the fact that retaliation might impede, for a time, our prosperity, yet we know that such a policy could not long prevent our growth and future development. I would say in addition, that in my opinion we had far better suffer all the disastrous consequences of retaliation or non-intercourse, rather than surrender for one moment the absolute control of our own affairs which we enjoy at the present time. The United States in the past always have legislated in their own interests, entirely regardless of the interests of this country, and it is folly to suppose that they would do otherwise in the future. It was the Government of the United States, and not the Government of Canada, that erected that tariff wall which now obstructs our trade, and which hon. gentlemen opposite are so anxious to remove. They framed that tariff in their own interests, to protect their own merchants and their own manufacturers, to give their own people the control of their own markets, and at the same time to place them in the position that they could control the markets of this country by making Canada a slaughter market for their wares. That policy succeeded until it was checked by our tariff policy of 1879. Every time the door for reciprocity has been opened between the two countries since then, it has been opened at our request, and every time it has been closed it has been closed by the American people in their own interests and against our wishes. The Treaty of 1888, which was acknowledged on all sides to be a fair and honorable settlement of the negotiations then pending, was rejected by the Senate of the United States, not because there was anything unjust in the least of its provisions, but because the exigencies of the dominant political party on the eve of a presidential election rendered it expedient to do so. With these facts fresh in our minds, I believe the people of Canada will hesitate long before they will adopt a policy which will place the framing of our tariff in the hands of a foreign legislature, and before they will place themselves in a position at the very mercy of a power that will not hesitate to sacrifice any or all of the important interest of this country, if even the exigencies of a political contest render it expedient to do so. The Dominion of Canada has within itself all the elements necessary to insure its future growth and greatness. We have natural resources of great variety, fertility and extent; we have a superabundance of food and fuel; we have a great variety of raw material, and we have natural facilities for carrying on successfully a large number of manufacturing industries. If we desire to develop the resources which we possess in such a manner that they will contribute most largely to our own benefit and advantage; if we wish to protect the varied interests of this country so that they will insure its most rapid growth in population and in wealth; if we wish to create in this country an internal trade vast in its volume, full of life and ceaseless activity; we can only do so by retaining the power we possess to-day to frame our own tariffs and make our own customs laws. The Dominion of Canada has also many advantages for the development of a foreign trade. We all admit that if we had free access to the American markets, we would derive some advantages from those markets; but at best those advantages would be but local in their character and limited in their extent. We must look in entirely different directions for the greater, more important, and more profitable development of our commercial interests. There are great continents across the sea, to the south of us, to the west of us, to the east of us, the products of which our people are importing and consuming very largely every year; products which they require to use as food, as clothing, or as raw material for manufacturing purposes; products which are at the present time entering into daily and common use among the masses of our people, contributing to their comfort or their pleasure. Those same continents offer an unlimited market for the surplus of all, or almost all, of our natural and manufactured products. We desire to extend our trade in those directions. The people of this country, a large portion of them, naturally incline to commercial pursuits. Canada's foreign trade to-day is double that of the United States in proportion to population. We are seeking to extend it still more. We are devising means at this very time to establish direct steam communication with the countries to which I have referred; and we are devising means to render the exchange of our commodities as direct, easy and inexpensive as possible, in order that our own people may derive all the advantages possible to be derived from that exchange. All our efforts in this direction must be utterly futile, utterly useless, unless we retain unimpaired the power we possess to-day to frame our own fiscal policy and impose our own duties. And, Sir, in connection with our commercial interests let me call the attention of the House to the importance of maintaining our present friendly relations with Great Britain. We must not undervalue the importance of the British markets to us. It is the natural market of very many of our products. We export largely to that market to-day, and we must become still more dependent upon it in the future. We must remember, too, that Great Britain gives us the freedom of her market, and asks for no equivalent in return. We must also bear in mind that the people of this country go to Great Britain for aid in all their important public and private undertakings; that, by contributions from her treasury and guarantees of credit, Great Britain has lent us material aid in the past in some of the most important undertakings in which we have been engaged; that she has only recently granted us subsidies which have enabled us to establish steamship lines on the Pacific Ocean; that we must continue to look to her for her aid and friendly co-operation if we hope to make this country the highway between Great Britain and the East. Great Britain has always aided us, and is ready still to listen to any proposal for aid in the development of our common commercial interests. I trust that the people of this country will never undervalue the advantages they derive from their present position as a portion of the British Empire; I trust that they will never fail to appreciate the value of the great national resources we possess, and that they will always fully recognize the importance of retaining the power within ourselves to develop them for our own profit and our advantage; I trust that they will always maintain those important safeguards which are necessary for the proper protection of our great agricultural, manufacturing and commercial interests; above all, Sir, I trust that the people of this country will never barter away at any price the political or the commercial freedom which they enjoy to-day, or surrender to any foreign people, however friendly, the power which this Parliament alone possesses to frame our own fiscal policy, to make our own tariffs, and to change them from time to time as the necessity of this growing country may demand—a power, Sir, upon the maintenance and proper exercise of which the whole future destiny of Canada depends.

Mr. BECHARD. Mr. Speaker, the policy involved in the proposition contained in the amendment laid before the Mr. Wood (Westmoreland).

House by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) meets my hearty concurrence; and I consider that I would not be serving the interests of my constituency, which is composed almost exclusively of farmers, and generally of that class to which I belong, should I be hostile or even indifferent to the adoption of that policy. The farmers of Canada, Sir, have not lost remembrance of the great advantages and comfortable circumstances which resulted to them from the operation of the old Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. They deeply regretted the abrogation of that treaty, and its renewal has been ever since the constant object of their aspirations. I am sure, Sir, that the farmers of this country will receive with but little sympathy the warning given to them the other day by the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry), who, with burning love gushing from his heart for the farmers, advised them not to be led away by the belief that the American market could be of any great advantage to them for the sale of their produce. The farmers are not blind, Sir. They know their own interests, and they understand what is doing them good. I am sure that they would rather be persuaded by facts of daily occurrence under their eyes than by speeches such as those delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite, in their attempts to veil those facts and the commercial movement to which they belong. The hon. member for Kent, N.B., told us that the Treaty of 1854 was beneficial only during the time of the American war. Well, Sir, if such is the case, I would like to know what reason has induced the Canadian Government to make several attempts for its renewal. I would not invite my hon. friend to go to the Province of Quebec and give the farmers there the same advice which he gave the other day to the farmers of the Dominion, for he would soon find out that he was losing his time, as they would, in their turn, advise him to spare his eloquence for more glorious occasions. It is my honest conviction that free trade with the United States is one of the principal channels through which this country could reach rapid and full development of its natural wealth and its material resources. This does not mean that, deprived of that trade, this country cannot prosper, but I maintain that trade being an essential element of prosperity, the more extensive and easy it is the more beneficial ought to be the result. The opinion that free trade with the United States would strongly contribute to stimulate the prosperity of this country is not groundless, it is not a caprice, it is not a dream of the imagination, but it is based upon the history of our trade with that country since 1854. In 1853, the year immediately preceding the treaty, the volume of our trade with the United States amounted, in round numbers, to about $23,000,000; in 1854, the first year of the treaty, it amounted to $33,000,000, and in 1866, the last year of the treaty, the volume of our trade with the United States had reached the considerable amount of $84,000,000. It is only fair to admit that that year, being the last of the existence of the treaty, people on both sides of the line forced their imports, particularly the people on the other side of the frontier. They imported that year to an extent which was abnormal, and which would not likely have occurred under ordinary circumstances. The treaty was abrogated, and that abrogation seriously affected our trade with the United States, and it could not develop in the same ratio, in the same ascending progression, as if the treaty had been maintained. However, it is in vain that men will erect artificial obstacles to obstruct its operation. The law of nature will triumph and have its course; and we find that, from 1870 to 1871, the volume of our trade with the United States reached the value of $59,998,029, and from 1871 to 1872, it reached the value of $66,114,785. In 1873, its value was $39,808,204, and in 1874 that trade had reached the value of $90,524,000—in spite of the heavy restrictions impeding it on the other side of the frontier. In 1874, we touched a period of great commercial depression from which this country suffered severely, as well as the United States and England, and our trade with the United States gradually decreased every year until it fell as low as $63,696,857 in 1880. But, in 1883, that trade increased again to the considerable amount of $97,701,056, and this notwithstanding the fact that at that time that trade was impeded by a double wall of restrictions, after the adoption of our present tariff. From 1884 that trade being subject to the ordinary fluctuations which occur in the course of business, decreased gradually until it went down to $81,436,808, but in 1886 it increased again, and, during 1888, reached the sum of $91,053,913; so that this trade with the United States, last year, was nearly 50 per cent. of our trade with the whole world. Let me call the attention of the House to a comparative statement of our exports to England and the United States in 1888:

	To Great Britain.	To the United States.
Produce of the Mines.....	$ 478,260	$ 3,341,308
Products of the Fisheries.....	1,514,901	3,123,853
Products of the Forest.....	8,932,177	10,622,338
Animals and their products.....	16,571,072	7,545,743
Agricultural products.....	4,392,640	10,306,278
Manufactures.....	1,732,874	1,632,025
Miscellaneous.....	66,340	701,616
Total.....	$33,648,284	$37,323,161

Or a difference in favor of the United States of $3,674,877. Such is the comparative statement of our exports of goods produced in Canada to England where those goods are received duty free, and of the same goods to the United States, where they are met at the frontier with severe restrictions in the form of Customs duties. Now, how is it with regard to our imports? Last year we imported from Great Britain for home consumption the value of $39,298,721, while from the United States for the same purpose we imported $48,481,848, or $9,183,127 more from the United States than from Great Britain. These facts are eloquent, they are ascertained from statistics which are taken from official reports placed in our hands by the Government of this country, and they constitute, in my humble judgment, a most convincing piece of evidence that natural law is more powerful than all means invented by men to prevent its legitimate results. In presence of these facts, I say that it is in the power of no mortal man to say to-day what the expansion of our trade with the United States would be if those obnoxious restrictions which are impeding it were removed. There is on this vast globe no country where all classes of the community are enjoying so plentifully the blessings of material prosperity as the United States. They have within their own limits all the necessary elements which concur to bring about the development of that unrivalled prosperity. They cover an immense area of territory possessing all varieties of soil, all conditions of climate, all sorts of natural productions and natural wealth, and these rich and powerful sources of wealth are acted upon by an immense capital, by a people of sixty millions of souls, and by a mercantile spirit and business genius which is surpassed nowhere. The result of the cooperation of these powerful elements is a wonderful prosperity and an internal trade which is simply enormous, amounting yearly to the sum of more than $32,000,000,000, as stated the other day by my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), whose statement is based on the official report of Mr. Switzler, the chief of the Bureau of Statistics in Washington. Let our farmers and our laborers, let our merchants and our manufacturers, let all the classes of our people secure, by way of unrestricted reciprocity, a full share in that marvellous trade, and before ten years have elapsed, the face of our country will have changed, and you will see living and flourishing here in Canada under our own political institutions, the happiest and most contented people in the world. But I am forgetting that hon. gentlemen opposite are opposed to reciprocity. I do not wish to misrepresent them. I know that during last Session, whilst they took a most decidedly hostile attitude to unrestricted reciprocity, they said they would be favorable to a certain measure of reciprocity restricted to the interchange of farm products. It is clear that they take the same hostile position in regard to unrestricted reciprocity, but it is not quite so clear to me that they assume the same favorable position with regard to reciprocity in farmer's produce. However, I think I must take it for granted that they are favorable to such limited reciprocity, otherwise, hostile as they are to unrestricted reciprocity, what meaning could be given to the language of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who said the other day that they hope to secure a fair, liberal treaty with the United States. They hope to secure a fair, liberal treaty with the United States, but restricted to the interchange of natural and farm products. Repeated attempts have been made by the Canadian Government to obtain such a treaty, and all these attempts were unsuccessful. The American authorities would not even consent to open negotiations on that narrow and restricted basis. After the experience we have acquired in this respect, when a man comes and tells me he is in favor of reciprocity, but only as far as the interests of farmers are concerned, he gives me a right to tell him that practically he is in favor of no reciprocity at all. Be that as it may, it is to be noticed that, whilst hon. gentlemen opposite profess to be in favor of reciprocity as far as the interests of the farmers are concerned, they take great care at the same time in their speeches to depreciate the American market. The other evening the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) cited figures to show that the price of oats in Buffalo is to-day lower than it is in Toronto. He referred also to the fact that the United States possess a very large surplus of farm produce, which must find its way into foreign markets, and that, therefore, the market of the United States could not be of any advantage to the farmers of Canada. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) and the hon. member for Kent, N. B. (Mr. Landry), spoke in the same manner. Well, Sir, those hon. members must have forgotten that we send to the American market a considerable quantity of farm produce for which there exists no other market. I find, in looking over the official reports, that during the year 1883 we exported altogether 20,397 horses, and of that number 19,925 went to the United States. The whole exports of our horned cattle amounted to 100,747, of that number 40,047 went to the United States. Our whole export of sheep was 395,074, of that number 353,999 went to the United States. Our whole export of poultry yielded $127,043, of that sum $122,222 were paid by the United States. Our whole exports in eggs amounted to 14,170,859 dozen, of that quantity we sent to the United States 14,147,739 doz. Our whole exports of barley amounted to 9,370,158 bushels, of that quantity 9,360,521 bushels went to the United States. Our whole export of wool was 954,975 lbs., of that quantity 954,189 lbs went to the United States. Our exports in hay amounted to more than 93,000 tons, of that quantity more than 84,000 tons went to the United States. Sir, this article of hay has become a very important article of export for a large portion of the farmers of the Province of Quebec. Our farmers raise a great deal of hay, which they prefer to sell than to give it to cattle. Hay is a crop which requires but very little labor, and consequently but very little expense, and when our farmers find that they can raise an average of at least one ton of hay to the acre, they find it more profitable to sell it than feed it to cattle. But that is not all. During last year our whole export, under the head of animals and their produce, and agricultural products, amounted in value to $40,155,657, and of that sum we exported to the United States to the value of $17,902,021; or, in other words, whilst our whole exports under these two heads amounted, in round numbers, to $40,000,000, the value of our exports under the same heads to the United States, was about $18,000,000, or very nearly 50 per cent. of the whole export. Now, Sir, in presence of these facts, I ask how can any one be justified in saying that the American market is of no great advantage to the farmers of Canada? On the contrary, it is clear to everybody who wishes to keep his eyes open, that it is one of our best markets, and that it would be greatly more advantageous to our farmers if the restrictions were removed which are now impeding it, or if the doors of that market were freely opened to them. At all events, it is refreshing to hear hon. gentlemen opposite profess to be favorable to reciprocity so far as the interests of the farmers are concerned, for it is an admission on their part that reciprocity with the United States would be much better for the farmers than the National Policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite speak in laudatory terms of the National Policy, of its beneficial results to the country, of the great good that it has accomplished for the farmers. They may say what they please, but their laudations will not alter the fact that while the fishermen and farmers of the Maritime Provinces and Quebec pay Customs duties upon breadstuffs which they must import, the National Policy is powerless to raise the price of those articles of which they have a surplus in the home market, for the prices of those products which constitute that surplus, and which must find their way to foreign countries, depend entirely upon the prices at which those articles are sold in foreign markets. None of us, I suppose, have forgotten that during the electoral campaign in 1878 the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the Government, proclaimed from every hustings that he wanted the adoption of a protective tariff in order to obtain reciprocity with the United States. Well, Sir, circumstances seem to be favorable to give him and hon. gentlemen opposite an opportunity to realise their expectations. The recent vote of Congress on this subject appears to open the door to them. It is true that the action of Congress implies a larger measure of reciprocity than probably would be appreciated by hon. gentlemen opposite, but, at all events, it involves the general principle of free trade between the two countries, and gives those hon. gentlemen an opportunity to redeem the pledges they made to the people in 1878. But I must confess that if the Liberal party were in power, I would have greater hope of successful negotiations being carried out with the American people. The Liberal party advocate unrestricted reciprocity, a policy which seems to-day to be more in harmony with the views of American statesmen on this subject, while hon. gentlemen opposite are favorable, and I might say reluctantly favorable, if I can judge from their speeches of to-day, only to a restrictive policy something like that involved in the Treaty of 1854, which the American authorities repeatedly refused to renew. Those hon. gentlemen profess, it is true, great sympathy with the farming class of this country, and that sympathy seems to be so developed, that it could not induce those hon. gentlemen to sacrifice the interests of the manufacturing classes to the interests of the farmers; such was their language last year, such is their language to-day, or at least its meaning. I do not believe, Sir, that unrestricted reciprocity would have the effect of favoring one class of the community at the expense of another; but I say here, as one of the representatives in this House of the farming class, that if on any occasion we were placed in the unfortunate position of being compelled to serve the interests of one class at the expense of another, I would unhesitatingly serve at first the interests of the farming class, as composing the most important class of the people, and as being the backbone of this country. But I know of but one policy that serves the interests of one class at the expense of another class, the interests of the manufacturers at the expense of the interests of the farmers, and that policy is the so-called protection National Policy of to-day. Sir, a curious fact to be noticed in connection with this subject, and which has a bearing in favor of the position of the friends of unrestricted reciprocity in this country is, that you find on the other side of the frontier line men who are hostile to this policy on precisely the same grounds as is assumed by hon. gentlemen opposite. I remember after the Treaty of 1874 had been negotiated between Hon. George Brown, on behalf of the Canadian Government, and the American authorities, that treaty which provided, not only for the interchange of natural products, but also of different classes of manufactured goods, was denounced in some places in the United States. Several meetings took place in the border states, and the speakers there denounced the treaty, asserting that if it were adopted it would have the effect of creating in Canada on their border a great manufacturing country against which the manufacturing power of the United States could never compete. What were the reasons that inspired those views? No doubt it was the fact that we in this country are advantageously situated for successful manufacturing, and it was doubtless the knowledge of that fact that induced such remarkable men as Senators Edmunds and Morrill of Vermont to be hostile to the recent vote of Congress on the ground that the adoption of such a policy would bring ruin to American manufacturers. Those men know the superiority of our natural advantages, they know that improved machinery can be obtained in Canada as well as in the United States, and what they fear above all is the cheap labor in this country. But permit me to say that, on this point I think, their fears are exaggerated, for under unrestricted reciprocity the Canadian and American markets having become one and the same market, the prices of goods being the same in New York, Toronto and Montreal, it is obvious that in a very short time the price of labor would also be equalised. I know that a considerable number of our manufacturers are opposed to the adoption of this policy, particularly those who, under the protective policy of 1878, have been able to secure profits of 50 per cent. It cannot be expected that they would be willing to accept a policy which might compel them to be satisfied with profits of 25 per cent. or perhaps 20 per cent. But there are those among our manufacturers who are in favor of unrestricted reciprocity. Those, who, in order to give stability to their establishments have taken care to equalise all conditions of manufacturing between themselves and all competitors. A few days ago I had the pleasure of meeting one of our most successful manufacturers, and he told me he was thoroughly in favor of unrestricted reciprocity. What he wanted was the large market of the United States, he stated that from time to time he was obliged, in order to prevent losing money, to cease manufacturing for a short time, because in his line of goods the market became flooded. "Give us the markets of the United States," he said, "and I fear no competition from American manufacturers." Sir, there is in this country an evil which all men and all political parties deplore—the exodus. Our people are leaving the country, and the National Policy certainly has not responded to the expectations and promises of its promoters and friends in this respect. The other day the hon. member for Kent, N. B. (Mr. Landry), admitted that for the last ten years our people had continued leaving the country, and, if I understood him rightly, he charged the Liberal party with the responsibility for the exodus. Surely the hon. gentleman must only have intended to be jocular, for he ought to know and understand that the Liberal party, having been in Opposition for the last ten years, cannot be held responsible for the legislation and the administration of public affairs in this country during that period. But I will charge no political party with being responsible for the exodus, and

I think the proper remedy has not yet been applied. Our people emigrate, and where do they go? Do they go to England, to France, or Germany? Do they go to the West Indies, to South America, to those countries with which the hon. the Minister of Finance expects to negotiate commercial relations, although to great cost. No, Sir; they go to the most prosperous country in the world, and which is our nearest neighbor—they go to the United States. Give us unrestricted reciprocity, let us have free trade between Canada and the United States, and you will see American capital flowing into this country, contributing to develop our great natural resources, and to stimulate the prosperity of our country. After a few years, our people finding here what they find on the other side of the line, finding in this country the same prosperity which they find in the United States, will have no reason to go to these States. They will remain at home, and you will have succeeded in checking emigration as much as it can be done. Hon. gentlemen opposite have another reason for opposing unrestricted reciprocity, and that reason seems to be paramount to all others. They say that that policy would lead this country to annexation, but I confess that I cannot understand how annexation should inevitably be the result of free trade between Canada and the United States. Is it true, and are we to believe, that because the American Government collects a duty on our goods when they cross the American frontier, and because the Canadian Government collects also a duty upon American goods coming into this country, that this is a protection to us against annexation? Are we to believe that the Customs officers on both sides of the frontier are really the guardians of our political independence from the United States? There was a time when an annexation feeling and an annexation movement existed in Canada. That movement did not originate in political motives or political aspirations, but it was based upon economical reasons. That movement became so important, headed as it was by men of high standing in the country, that the then Canadian Government thought it proper to punish as much as they could the leaders of that movement in every locality. But, Sir, no sooner had the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 been negotiated, no sooner had the beneficial results of that treaty been felt by our population, than that annexation feeling vanished away and we heard no more of it. Well, if such a narrow and restricted measure of reciprocity as the Treaty of 1854 had the effect, not only of not leading this country to annexation, but even to annihilate the previously existing annexation sentiment, are we not logically led to the conclusion that the broader measure of reciprocity, which we now seek to obtain, would work still more powerfully against the springing up of any such feeling? By removing all economical reasons which could possibly give rise to any temptation for annexation feeling, unrestricted reciprocity, instead of leading us to such a result, would prevent it, and it would give us in this country all the advantages of annexation without its inconveniences. Hon. gentlemen opposite have again raised the old cry of loyalty, and we heard the member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) tell us the other night that unrestricted reciprocity would very likely compel us to raise our tariff, that such a course would be unjust to England, and that as loyal subjects we should not do anything which would in any way impair our relations with England. There was a time when those hon. gentlemen were not quite so exuberant in their loyalty to England as they are to-day. I remember in 1878 that while they were advocating the adoption of a high tariff in this House, being told that such a high tariff would work harshly on England, they made an answer, emphasising their loyalty in a peculiar way. "So much the worse for England." I do not believe that unrestricted reciprocity would in any way impair our trade with England; but should it be so, I would say, following the example of hon. gentlemen opposite. "While we look to Old England as a mother, yet she is only our second mother, for Canada is the first." In conclusion I say, let the Canadian people give the Liberal party a lease of power, and before the space of two years has elapsed you will see existing between Canada and the United States the most friendly feeling and the best commercial relations which can possibly exist for the promotion of the interests, the prosperity and the welfare of both countries.

Mr. GIGAULT. In the course of his speech, the member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) has been praising the great progress made by the United States. I admire, with him, the great wealth of our neighbors; with him I admire their extensive home markets and their populous and prosperous cities, but what I admire most, is the cause of that prosperity; and that cause, Mr. Speaker, is chiefly the protective tariff. That cause I wish should continue to exist in Canada, and continue to produce here the same magnificent results which the member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), so much admires in the American Union. We must be convinced that our neighbors seek commercial union with Canada because it is in their own interest. They do so, because they know that our industries in Canada are nascent, and could be easily destroyed by the competition which would come from the American manufacturers. Do they seek free trade with England? Do they seek free trade with countries where the industries are on solid basis? No, they do not. They know that free trade with England would be a national suicide for them, and the American people, being alive to their interests, wishing to preserve their industries, wishing to maintain their country as prosperous as it is now, do not wish free trade with a country which could crush out their industries. We should imitate the American people; like them, we should be alive to our interests, and we should be convinced that we cannot compete with the American manufacturers who have been protected for so many years by a high protective tariff. The Opposition, from 1874 to 1878, always said that a tariff of 17½ per cent. was sufficient to protect our manufacturers; and to-day they want to do away even with such a revenue tariff, that is to say, to have no tariff at all to protect our industries. The hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) has spoken a great deal of the advantages which would result to the farmers from unrestricted reciprocity. He quoted some figures as to our exports of agricultural products to the United States and to England; but what do those figures prove? They prove that England is our chief and natural market for the sale of our agricultural products. Last year we exported, of animals and agricultural products, to Great Britain, more than $20,000,000, while we exported to the United States only $17,000,000. We must look for a market in countries where we can find consumers of the articles we produce, and not producers of similar articles. The price of every article is determined by the law of supply and demand, and consequently we cannot expect to sell agricultural products at a high price in the United States, where the supply of agricultural products is greater than the demand. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States of last year, the total exports of the agricultural products of the United States were $500,000,000. Of barley, corn, oats, wheat, and wheat flour, they exported $127,000,000. How, then, can we contend that the United States is the natural market for our agricultural products? Of dairy products, the United States exported $10,000,000, of living animals, $12,090,000, and of apples, more than $2,000,000. Our manufacturers, also, would find in the United States, not consumers of their products, but some strong and powerful competitors. The American manufacturers exported, of cotton goods, more than $13,000,000, of leather and manufactures of leather, more than $9,000,000, and the total exports of the domestic manufactures of the United States exceeded $130,000,000. We are, of course, and the Conservative party has always been, in favor of reciprocity limited to agricultural products; but what would be the consequence of unrestricted reciprocity? I remember that, last year, the hon. member for Iberville said that he would never accept unrestricted reciprocity if it were going to bring direct taxation. This year, he could not have listened with pleasure to the speeches made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), because both of those hon. members spoke in favor of an income tax, and so of direct taxation. There are a great many disagreeable things to which the hon. member for Iberville will have to submit if he favors unrestricted reciprocity. He will have, certainly, to submit to direct taxation, or to the income tax, as the hon. member from North Norfolk and the hon. member for South Oxford said.

Mr. CHARLTON. I did not say so.

Mr. GIGAULT. Did the hon. gentleman not speak in favor of an income tax? He spoke in a way to make that tax as popular as possible, arguing that it was not an objectionable tax. But there is another thing to which the hon. member for Iberville could not have listened with pleasure, that is, the doing away of provincial subsidies, which was advocated by the hon. member for South Oxford. The Liberals met in Quebec and had a conference, which we call the Quebec Conference, and what did they ask? They asked for an increase of provincial subsidies; and here, what is said by one of the chief men of the Liberal party? It is that we should do away with provincial subsidies. That hon. member is logical to a certain extent, because with unrestricted reciprocity we should have to curtail expenses; we would have also to resort to direct taxation, to support not only the Federal Government, but also the Provincial Governments. That would be the inevitable consequence, and the hon. member for South Oxford wants that.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. GIGAULT. Before recess I was stating that the Liberals did not agree on the question of provincial subsidies. At the Quebec Conference they claimed increased provincial subsidies, while here one of them argues that we should do away with such subsidies. If we are to be friends of provincial rights, we must give to the Provincial Legislatures the means of self-support, and if we compel the people of Canada to resort to direct taxation, to support not only the Federal but also the Provincial Governments, we will certainly make the Provincial Legislatures very unpopular. When the people are heavily burdened with taxation, they may seek for diminution of the expense; they may seek for legislative union, and in my mind legislative union is very far from being recommendable. If there is a Province which should be opposed to it, it is certainly the Province of Quebec. The hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) contended that the National Policy has not benefitted Canada. In my opinion, quite the contrary is the case. Every class has been benefitted by the National Policy: the farmer, the mechanic, the manufacturer, and the capitalist. The producers of wheat, oats and coarse grains have been protected, and the manufacturers have been largely protected by the National Policy. But not only have those classes of people benefitted, but the whole community as well has benefitted. It is that policy which has replenished the public Treasury; it is that policy which has increased considerably our revenue; it is that policy which has enabled the Federal Government to make the most useful public improvements which have given a great impulse to our trade and our agriculture. It is the revenue created by that policy which has enabled the Federal Government to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is the admiration of the whole world, and which gives so much importance to our country. In presence of these results, how can we say that the National Policy has not benefitted Canada? We must not speak only of the advantages which would result from unrestricted reciprocity, we must speak also of the disadvantages which would follow its adoption, and the disadvantages, in my opinion, greatly outweigh the advantages. We have collected since 1879 over $3,434,000 upon animals and meats imported from the United States. If we had unrestricted reciprocity, we would have to lose that revenue; and not only that, but the American producers would become stronger competitors of the Canadian farmers, and oblige them to sell their meats at much lower prices than they do now. The duty collected on grain of all kinds since 1879 has been more than $3,000,000, and all these sums of money would not have been collected. Not only has the National Policy created a larger revenue for the Canadian Government, but it has also greatly improved the Canadian market for Canadian farmers. In 1878 we imported barley, oats, Indian corn and wheat to the extent of more than 15,000,000 bushels of which we re-exported 8,469,475 bushels, so that we imported for home consumption in 1878 more than 7,000,000 bushels of those kinds of grain. And what was the amount of those imports last year? We imported last year for home consumption wheat, barley, oats and Indian corn to the extent only of 2,348,000 bushels, so that the supply of American grain in the Canadian market, compared to that of 1878, has been less by more than 4,000,000 bushels, and the supply of American grain having been less, the demand for Canadian grain must have been greater. If we believe in the principle that the price of agricultural products is governed by the law of supply and demand, the prices of Canadian products must also have been improved. That policy, in increasing the number of our manufactures, has not only rendered our home market much better, but it has also exempted the Canadian people from most obnoxious taxes—from taxes which would not benefit anybody, neither the producer nor the consumer. We have been enabled to remove the stamp duty on promissory notes, the duty on teas and coffees, the duties upon articles we do not produce, and the production of which, consequently, does not benefit anybody in Canada; and what would we have to do if we abolished our National Policy? If we destroy we must build in the place of what we destroy; and what would be the consequence of free trade? It would be most certainly direct taxation and the imposition of most obnoxious taxes. In my opinion the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) has not answered many of the objections which have been raised against the scheme proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). One of these objections is that unrestricted reciprocity cannot be carried out. The free traders contend that with unrestricted reciprocity the Canadians would continue to maintain control of their own fiscal policy. How can that be? How can we adopt a policy by which the Canadians will be able to have a lower tariff than the Americans? If we adopted a lower tariff all the goods imported from Great Britain would come through Canadian ports, and certainly the Americans would not submit to that. On the other hand, if the Americans had a lower tariff, all the goods imported from Great Britain would come through New York and Boston, and thus the cities of Montreal and Quebec and all our large cities would lose all the foreign trade which would come through the American channels. Shall we submit to that? The free traders themselves say they do not wish to see such a result. Then, how can they say that unrestricted reciprocity is practicable? In my mind, we are wasting time in discussing such a scheme, because it is a scheme which certainly cannot be carried out. If there is to be a scheme to alter trade relations with the United States, it must be commercial union or reciprocity limited to agricultural products. The Opposition say they will not adopt commercial union. Then, if unrestricted reciprocity cannot be realised and commercial union cannot be accepted by this country, why should they speak of schemes which can never be accepted either by the Canadian people or the American people? The hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) has not stated what source of revenue he will create to make up the loss we would suffer by the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity. Last year, we collected more than $7,000,000 on goods imported from the United States. By unrestricted reciprocity, if it be practicable, we will lose that amount of revenue, and we must, therefore, have some other source to make up for that loss. If we go before the people and tell them that it is true that we will lose $7,000,000 by free trade with the United States, we must at the same time state to them how we will replace that source of revenue. The hon. member for Iberville did not say what he would propose, and the Liberals generally do not say what they would do, except the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who spoke of the income tax, of direct taxation, and of doing away with provincial subsidies in order to enable the Government of the country to submit to the diminution of revenue which would result. The member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) says he would not submit to direct taxation. Then, to what conclusion can we come? What can be done with these schemes? I do not see how the Liberals or the friends of unrestricted reciprocity can answer the objections which have been made against their scheme. The member for Iberville has spoken of emigration. He said: Look at the numbers who are leaving Canada; and he added: Where are they going? Are they going to England? No; but they are going to the United States. What does that prove? It is the most conclusive proof that a protective tariff is a good thing, since our emigrants do not go to a free trade country like England, but to a country like the United States, where they have had a high protective tariff for many years.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Why do they not go to France?

Mr. GIGAUT. How is it, then, that the protective tariff is so bad when it makes the United States so prosperous that Canadians are going there in order to earn their living? I am not going to speak for a long time. The objections which have been raised against the scheme of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) have been argued much more ably by other members than I can argue them; but, before I close, I must allude to another remark made by the member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard). He says that the opponents of unrestricted reciprocity speak too often of loyalty to England. It is a duty to be loyal to our country and to legitimately constituted authority, and, as long as we are treated fairly and justly, as we are by England, we should be loyal to England, not only through a sense of duty, but also through a sense of gratitude, because we are enjoying under our present Constitution the greatest civil and religious liberty. We have the freest institutions of which any country can boast. Another hon. member of this House made an allusion to the Canadians of French descent, and said that they should desire closer relations with the United States because they have a large number of their countrymen in the American Union. The French Canadians should not envy the position of their countrymen in the United States. They do not enjoy the same liberties there that we do here. They have no separate schools, while we have our separate schools and educate our children as we wish. Here the liberties and the rights which are dearest to the Canadians of French descent have been secured to us by treaties and by the Constitution. We can speak our own language and exercise our own religion with the greatest liberty. What is the political condition of the Frenchmen in the United States? In Louisiana, which was mentioned by an hon. member, they cannot speak their own language in their Local Legislature. As to education, the American authorities do not hesitate to interfere with the management of the independent schools established by the French Canadians, as we have recently seen at Haverhill, in the State of Connecticut. For the sake of the small advantages which would result from unrestricted reciprocity, we will not submit to the much greater disadvantages which would result from such a scheme, and I believe the majority of the people will continue to favor a policy which has replenished our Treasury and has enabled the Government to make most useful public improvements. I hope we shall be able to make this a prosperous country, and that we will do that by ourselves and without the aid of our neighbors.

Mr. AMYOT. I must congratulate my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) on the tone of his remarks, in which he has shown his sound way of judging events, though I cannot approve of everything he has said. I will not begin by answering his remarks. I suppose, at this stage of the discussion, there is very little new to be said. In fact, the question has been treated from many points of view. A great deal has been said affirming and denying the prosperity of the country, its present development, its future expansion. Comparisons have been drawn between Canada and the other colonies, between Canada and the States, and other countries. We might go on in that strain for months and months, and I do not see that we would be much better off, because it is impossible to compare one country with another without taking into consideration the surroundings, the population, the resources, the special aptitudes of the population, the facilities for living, and other matters. In one place free trade will suit; in another protection will be required. A high tariff will enhance the interests of one country, while a low tariff will enrich another. Everything has to be judged from surrounding circumstances. For my part I do not deny, I even freely admit, that we have progressed considerably in Canada. We have immensely extended the limits of our territory, we have built railways, telegraphs and canals, and bridged rivers, and increased our inland communication by water and by land. Our manufactures have sprung up in great numbers, and are daily increasing. But the question is: Can we do better, can we go faster in the way of progress and development of all kinds? Could we better utilise our great resources and the vigor of our hardy population? To say, Mr. Speaker, that "everything is for the best, in the best of worlds," in this country, is to contradict facts of daily occurrence. Let us, for example, consider the numerous petitions and depositions sent to this Parliament, asking for changes in the tariff. The difficulty is to find out who, among our producers and manufacturers, does not complain. Changes in the tariff have been asked for the following items, among others:—

"Pork, woollen goods, pig iron, scrap iron, steel and iron entering into the construction of ships, rope for ships, steel used in the manufacture of shovels, tinware, white lead, cloth used in window blinds, rennet extract, jute yarns, twine, non-elastic web, glazed glass, cotton and woollen plushes, whips, thread used in manufacturing whips, trimmings used in the manufacture of pocket-books, boots and shoemaking, Smyrna rugs, collie dogs, rubber clothing, haircloth, black-strap, blacking, saws, mining machinery, copper industry, logs, pianos, stereotype plates, clock movements, straw and felt hats, fertilisers, flour, fruit, seeds and nursery stock, vegetables, lard, foreign magazines, prayer book, &c."

I might go on with that list for a long time. So there must be something wrong somewhere, and we must ask ourselves: Where is the wrong, and what is the remedy? Why do the manufacturers require increased protection on the articles they produce? For the simple reason that the market at their disposal is too limited. After a few years, even a few months, of existence, the market of Canada is filled up with their manufactured goods; the market is inundated and virtually sales have ceased. Consequently the manufacturers require a larger profit on each article so as to compensate for the small amount of sales. Give them a larger market, and then large sales will make up for small profits. I admit that we should protect ourselves, we should protect the manufacturers, but protection becomes abnormal, unfair and unjust when it is carried to prohibition. It is unfair to force the consumer to buy from Canadian manufacturers and to pay double for the same articles than he would have to pay if he bought them from another country. Let the manufacturers be protected so as to enjoy the Canadian market in preference to the manufacturers from abroad, well and good. The whole country is interested in that, so that the workman may be well employed, well paid and be a good customer for the articles of the farm. But if you grant an exaggerated protection you become unjust towards the consumer at large, and you bring about a state of things which must issue in sufferings and disturbances. Our population is not sufficiently numerous to maintain and support the many manufactures of all kinds that we have. Taking into account our producing power, that fact seems to be undeniable. The remedy lies in finding a new and more extended market. The Toronto Board of Trade, a body composed of eminent merchants from many parts of the country, has lately memorialised this House in that sense. As this petition is concise and to the point, I may be permitted to read an extract from it:

"Your memorialists are most deeply concerned in the import and export trade of the Dominion of Canada and the development thereof, and believe that very promising openings exist in Barbadoes, Jamaica, British Guiana, Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Ayres.

"The cardinal points being the dissimilarity of productions, and that each requires the surplus of the other, suggests at once a probable trade of equal bulk both ways.

"For imports, there may be named rice, cocoa, coffee, hides, wool, sugar, molasses, rum, coconuts, oranges, bananas, and other tropical fruits and vegetables, spices, medical barks, roots, and seeds, lime juice, with cabinet and dyewoods.

"As exports, we have agricultural implements, biscuits, boots and shoes, butter, carriages, cottons, fish, dried, smoked and pickled, fish oil and seal oil, flour, grain, lard, plaster of Paris, staves, hoops, lumber, laths, shingles, doors, window frames, box shooks, square timber, machinery, musical instruments, sewing machines, tweeds and knitted woollen goods.

"To gather all information, statistics, and a more or less complete directory of importers and exporters, appears the first step, and it is respectfully submitted that this work, being directly in the public advantage, should be taken up by the Commissioners appointed by the Government.

"All modern experience teaching that trade follows the routes that offer regular and speedy postal and freight facilities, it is respectfully suggested that a subvention be granted to a line of steamers, sufficient as to time and amount to bridge over the period required to build up a self-sustaining service between Canadian ports and those herein named, or such of them as may seem to the Government most desirable."

Mr. Speaker, this memorial has been sent in by so important a body as the Toronto Board of Trade. Why, if we are so prosperous here, if the manufacturers are so prosperous, if the farmers are so rich, if everything pays so well in this country, why do they come to this Government and ask us to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars, even millions, to find a new market. We will see later on that this is not the only body asking for some changes in our system. For my part I admit the soundness of that document, and I would be glad to see the Government doing its best to comply with the wishes of the Toronto Board of Trade. I believe that every step taken to open new markets for Canada should be approved, no matter with what country, even including France with those countries named. But, Mr. Speaker, where is our natural market if not with our neighbors, numbering 60,000,000, and who will soon be 100,000,000—our neighbors immediately adjoining us for an extent of 2,000 miles, with whom we daily communicate by rail, steamer and telegraph, from whom we are only separated ated by an imaginary line, and who have just declared that they desire to trade with us? I am not going into the details of the mutual advantages that would flow from such commercial intercourse, nor try to show how our agricultural interests, our mines, our fisheries, our forests, our manufactures of all kinds, our shipbuilding, and commerce at large, would be benefited by it. Each hon. member is convinced on that point. The Government themselves have declared that they would favor a good treaty; such also seems to be the opinion throughout the country. The same influential body I have mentioned, adopted the following resolution on the 17th of June, 1887:—

"Resolved, that this Board desires to place on record its conviction that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse between our country and the United States, compatible with our relations to Great Britain, is desirable."

I am afraid I will scandalise the hon. member for Rouville, (Mr. Gigault) by stating that the Board of Trade of Toronto has adopted this resolution:

"Resolved, that this Board desires to place on record its conviction that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse between our own country and the United States, compatible with our relations to Great Britain, is desirable; that this board will gladly do everything in its power to bring about the consummation of such a result; that in its estimation no treaty which ignored any of the interests of our country, or which gave undue prominence to any one to the neglect or to injury of any other, is one that could be entertained.

"That in our agricultural, our mineral, our manufacturing and our diversified mercantile interests, in our fisheries, our forests and other products, we possess in a rare and in an extraordinary degree all the elements which go to make people great, prosperous and self-reliant.

"That these are fitting inducements to any nation to render reciprocity with Canada a thing to be desired, and such as should secure for us a reciprocal treaty with the United States of the broadest and most generous character, which, while fully recognising these conditions, would contain guarantees which would prove of mutual and abiding advantage to both nations, but that this Board cannot entertain any proposal which would place Great Britain at any disadvantage as compared with the United States, or which would tend in any measure, however small, to weaken the bonds which bind Canada to the Empire."

The Central Farmers' Institute on 28th April, 1887, passed a resolution in the following terms:—

"That in the opinion of this Institute the removal of all restrictions of trade between the United States and Canada is desirable, either by reciprocity or otherwise, as may be agreed upon by the Governments of the respective countries, and that the officers of the Executive Committee are hereby authorised to take such action as they may think proper to urge this resolution upon the Government.

"That in the event of a fair measure of reciprocity being unattainable, this Institute memorialise the Dominion Government to suggest to the Government of Great Britain the expediency of entering into commercial union with her colonies in regard to food supply, and impose a protective tariff against all foreign countries."

I might quote similar resolutions adopted by the Boards of Trade of Montreal and St. John and many organisations in the different commercial centres. But, as I have said, I do not want to enter into the details of the question; all I want to say for my part is that I have adopted these views. I sincerely believe that reciprocity with the United States would materially advance the interests of both countries. The increase of our trade with the United States, in spite of the tariff, is a very forcible argument on this point. Hon. members have been speaking on a vast variety of topics in regard to matters of commerce, and some of them seem to have forgotten a little the question before the House. Now, what does the motion ask? It asks simply this: that we should ascertain on what terms the United States are ready to trade with us. Annexation, loss of our identity as a people, have nothing to do with the question. We have had a Reciprocity Treaty already. Have we been less loyal to England and to ourselves in consequence? Is it being loyal to England to seek to make of us commercial slaves, to prevent our commercial development, even to annex us politically to England? Those who thus act will be the first traitors to England. They will bring into this country wild excitement, and will introduce a state of things for which they alone will be responsible. They may cause, perhaps, political annexation to the United States, if ever it should come—I say it may be brought about by those who abuse our loyalty to England. Let us remain a colony, as we are, loyal and true to England, but loyal and true to ourselves first. It was said: Canada for the Canadians. Well, let it be so, but let it be really so. Let us encourage and develop all our natural resources, our farming, manufacturing, fishing and all our industries; but the best way we can adopt to develop them is by procuring extensive markets for the sale of their products so as to compensate for the weakness of our consuming power. Our producing power is immense, but our consuming power is very limited. There is the discrepancy. We must endeavor to equalise both. We must find markets sufficient for our immense natural resources. Sir, I regret that the motion assumes the character of one of want of confidence, because I know it will prevent many hon. members from supporting it. For my part, the meaning I desire to attach to my vote is this: First, I believe we are acting rightly in protecting ourselves as the United States are protecting themselves against us; second, we must continue to protect ourselves so long as the United States continue to protect themselves against us; third, free trade or reciprocity with the United States will be a better state of things for us and we should do our best to attain it. Free trade with the United States does not mean free trade with the world; it means a kind of partnership with the United States containing 60,000,000 of people to protect the whole of us against the rest of the world. That is what is meant by free trade with the United States; it is protection enlarged in fact. I believe Canada should emphatically declare that we are ready to respond to the invitation of the United States, and ascertain, if we may, the terms that would be acceptable to both countries for free and mutual intercourse. The United States are our natural markets by their situation, by their easy access, by the number of our relatives and friends in that country. Our trade with them is increasing in spite of the protective tariff; it is a natural one, not a precarious one as is the case with trade with Europe. In case England became involved in war with some European country, would not our commerce with Europe be terminated? We would then be happy to be able to trade with the United States and the rest of this continent. Again, a commercial treaty would bring smuggling to an end. We have in fact all to gain by it, and we may honorably declare ourselves ready to make a treaty, as the United States, by inviting us as they have done, have made our dignity safe. Such a treaty would not diminish our commercial intercourse with the rest of the world, for by increasing the prosperity of this country, it would certainly increase our purchasing power. I have said the United States have invited us to negotiate with them, and it is desirable to know on what terms they have done so. The resolution adopted has been quoted, but I do not believe the report of the committee has been quoted, and it is important that it should be laid before this honorable House:

“Our commercial relations with Canada have recently awakened a deeper interest and received a more thorough discussion than ever before, on both sides of the border. The tendency of public opinion is plainly towards the enlargement of trade between the two countries. In Canada the movement has advanced from what was a few years ago an effort for partial reciprocity to a wide expression in favor of unrestricted intercourse and commercial union. The evidence of this fact is abundant.

“The Right Honorable Joseph Chamberlain, High Commissioner from Her Majesty's Government, is reported to have recently stated in a speech:

“The arrangement between the colonies and Great Britain is essentially a temporary one. It cannot remain as it is. * * * Already you have in Canada, the greatest of all the colonies, an agitation for what is called commercial union with the United States. Commercial union with the United States means unrestricted trade between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, and a protective tariff against the mother country. If Canada desires that, Canada can have it.”

“And speaking of the relation of Canada to the United States and Great Britain on a subsequent occasion, the right honorable gentleman further said that:

“Commercial union with the United States meant that Canada was to give preference to every article of manufacture from the United States over manufactures from Great Britain. If the people of Canada desired an arrangement of that kind he did not doubt that they would be able to secure it.”

“Within a few weeks a conference was held at Quebec of the Prime Ministers of all the Provinces constituting the Dominion of Canada, and after a very full exchange of views these representatives of the Executive powers of all portions of the Dominion unanimously adopted the following declaration:—

“This conference, comprising all political parties, is of the opinion that a fair measure, provided under proper conditions, for unrestricted trade relations between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, would be of advantage to all the Provinces of the Dominion, and would in connection with an adjustment of the fishery dispute, tend to happily settle the grave difficulties which have from time to time arisen between Great Britain and the United States.”

Can it be said that Mr. Chamberlain is a traitor to England, that he is not faithful and loyal to the British flag? He says if Canada desires free trade with the United States it can have it. The report goes on to say:

“The chambers of commerce and boards of trade of the leading cities of Canada, and more than fifty farmers' institutes and conventions, have adopted resolutions declaring in favor of commercial union or unrestricted trade between the two countries.

“The answer made by their opponents and those most closely attached to English trade and English rule has been that the United States has given no indication that it would receive or even consider any proposal, however friendly in spirit or however favorable to us in its terms it might be.

“The joint resolution now submitted does not contemplate any action on our part at present; but whenever the Dominion of Canada shall have declared a desire for commercial union, with a common tariff, like internal revenue taxes, like duties on articles imported into either country from abroad, and no duties on trade between the United States and Canada, then the President is authorized to appoint three commissioners to meet those who may be designated to represent Canada, in order to prepare a plan for commercial union, by assimilating the tariffs and internal revenue taxes of the two countries, now not very widely different, and an equitable method of dividing the receipts, which they shall report to the President, who shall lay it before Congress. The whole subject of our relations with Canada is kept under the control of Congress.

“It is not deemed necessary to here discuss the great merits of commercial union or the details of arrangement that will be necessary. Your committee believe that the power herein conferred upon the President can do no harm, that it will be wisely used, and will lead to beneficial results, promoting the independence, prosperity and peace of two great peoples.

“The committee, therefore, recommend the adoption of the joint resolution.”

He says that the answer to this was that the States would not hear such a proposition in any way, and they want to prove now that the States are ready to communicate with us in the matter. Some speakers have said that there are no petitions before this House asking for unrestricted reciprocity, but we must remember that petitions are usually sent here in favor of particular and special interests and never in favor of a general policy. In such a case no one has charge of going around to obtain signatures. When the principle of protection was discussed in this House before, 1878 I do not believe that there were any petitions sent to this House from any part of Canada in favor of protection. In favor of unrestricted reciprocity we have the expression of opinion of the boards of trade I spoke of a while ago, the resolutions passed by the societies I have mentioned, articles in the public press every day, and more than that we have the expression of opinion of members of this House representing about one-half of the country. If we had the expression of the opinion of Canada, taken as a whole and by plebiscite, and not taken by counties as subdivided or manipulated by the Government, I think that I would not be far from the mark in saying that at least half of the population of the country would be found in favor of unrestricted reciprocity. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said to us that some newspapers in the States have stated that reciprocity would lead to annexation, or the loss of our independence, and they argue from this that we are traitors to England. Every one knows that we have no control over the writers in these papers and that there are cranks and visionary men to be found everywhere. At all events, by adopting this resolution and meeting the States in a friendly spirit the negotiations would not tie our hands and would not prevent us from refusing to accept any proposal that would be derogatory to our honor, our independence, or our interests at large. It is all very well to say we would lose the right of managing our own business. Will you tell me how many in this country manage "our own business." Is the farmer working from morning to night on his farm managing "our own business;" is the man in the woods cutting timber to enrich the merchant managing the business of the country? Is the poor merchant in the city managing the business of this country? How many are there managing the business of this country. I understand that the Government does, and that it is supported by a very honorable majority no doubt, but among that majority do we not find some who have a special interest in supporting those who manage the affairs of the country? I do not care who manages the affairs of the country, but I want to have the affairs of the country managed so that the farmer who has something to sell, and the manufacturer and the merchant who have goods to sell, will have some one to sell them to who will pay for them. I want the affairs of the country managed in such a way so that the people will be rich and prosperous, and be it Peter, Paul or James, or any one else who is at the head of the Government, what I want is a good and wise policy which will make our people prosperous and contented. According to some of our members the mere fact of saying that we are not prepared for a war with the States, and that we need some change of policy in this country, is to become a traitor to the British and to the Dominion flags. They think that we should always cry out and represent ourselves as strong, rich and independent. That may take with enthusiastic or blind people, but it will not take with practical and experienced men. We all know how many soldiers there are in Canada, for it is published every year in that blue-book called the Return of the Minister of Militia; we know the amount of rifles and guns, and even the number of cartridges in this country, and we know that we have a frontier of three thousand miles to protect. We know the amount of iron-clads in this country, too, and, without being traitors to the flag, I think we may say that those announcements will not induce the United States to undertake a war against us. I venture to say, at the risk of being accused of depreciating my country, that our military force has never been looked upon as sufficient by itself to prevent or carry on a war abroad. If we do not have a war with the States it is because the States do not want to war with us. They are too sensible a people for that, they are attending to the development and advancement of their own country, and they would find no interest in making war on Canada. I admit that their frontiers would be as much exposed as ours in the case of war, and that if we are unjustly attacked every Canadian able to carry a rifle would be ready to man our borders to protect his home and defend his country. Where the States would suffer most in case of war with England, and what is the best argument against a war, is that their cities and towns on the Atlantic seaboard are exposed and would be ruined by the British ships. But with the States it is not a question of war, for their common sense tells them that they would have no interest in fighting Canada. When I hear hon. members say that we are traitors, because we state that there are only 36,000 soldiers here, I think these gentlemen must not understand what is the position of men who have been elected by a majority of their constituency. My hon. friend for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) says that the States are prosperous because they are protected. I do not deny that, but under unrestricted reciprocity we would remain protected as we are now, and we would associate with the States to protect ourselves against the rest of the world. It would be protection enlarged. The same principle that made them rich would make us rich, and instead of having five millions of people as consumers, we would at once have sixty millions, and in a very short time, a population of one hundred millions to buy our products. My hon. friend says, that in the States the supply is greater than the demand. Well, I wish he would come to some of the counties between Montreal and Quebec; he would see large quantities of hay, potatoes, eggs, poultry, and various other farm products sent to the States continually; and if he went to the north shore of the St. Lawrence, he would see the same thing. But the hon. gentleman says that he would favor reciprocity limited to agricultural products. Why? Is it because that would be a benefit to the farmers? I presume so. I suppose he favors it, not for the benefit of the manufacturers or the merchants; it must be for the benefit of the farmers. Well, does he know that free trade or general reciprocity with the States, would include reciprocity in farm products; and if reciprocity in farm products would be good for the farmers, the hon. gentleman would, to-day, declare by his vote, that he would sacrifice the farmers for the manufacturers; he would sacrifice the many for the few; he would sacrifice all the farmers of this country for a few thousands—no, a few hundreds—of manufacturers; because, do not count as manufacturers, or as deriving any benefit from the tariff, the poor men who work from six o'clock in the morning till six o'clock in the evening, to enrich the manufacturer who employs them. And by sacrificing the farmers, what does he do? He chases them from the farm, and sends them to work for the manufacturers, either in Canada or in the States, to lose their health, their patriotism, and that honor which characterises those who live on the farm. That is what the hon. gentleman does; he cannot get out of that; and those who will oppose, perhaps successfully, free trade with the States, will have to answer for it. They sacrifice all the working classes of this country to enrich a few. My hon. friend is too respected, too intelligent, too good a speaker, too honorable to want subscriptions at election times; but there are some who will vote against reciprocity in order to obtain those subscriptions at election times. My hon. friend is not the only one who has declared that he would favor reciprocity for the farmers. In 1879, when protection was proposed in this country, it was declared that we were aiming at reciprocity; later on an offer from us was laid down in the law, and has remained in our statutes since. It is the expressed and avowed opinion of our honorable opponents. They admitted then, and they still admit, that reciprocity would benefit the farmers of Canada; and to-day they say, in spite of that, we will not have it—why? The only possible reason to my mind is that some of the manufacturers would suffer. Well, that reason even is not a good one. My hon. friend from the County of Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) the other day stated that some Americans had erected in Canada a manufactory of fertilisers, and they could now compete in the States. I asked some manufacturers of shoes in Quebec what they would think of reciprocity with the States, and they told me they were perfectly able to compete with any manufacturer in the States. I have seen in the press reports from hundreds of manufacturers who said they were ready to compete with the States, and I believe that this country is in a fit state to compete not only in the States, but in any other country, with all the manufacturers who use the raw material which we produce. Perhaps some manufacturers upheld by artificial means would suffer, like three that fell in the county of my hon. friend, because there was no market for them; but for one hundred that fell there would be one thousand started up. Now, free trade with the United States is admitted by the Government to be a good thing so far as the farmers are concerned; and yet to-day they refuse to accept the offer of the States. They cannot refuse to comply with the motion before the House without laying down this broad and false principle: that we must protect a hundred manufacturers at the expense of millions of farmers, and millions of people composing the working classes of Canada. I say, Mr. Speaker, that we, in Canada, must find markets of some kind. We have natural resources in unlimited quantities, but we have no market. We are right to turn towards the other colonies, towards South America, towards Spain; we are wrong to exclude France; we are right to try to find markets everywhere; but we should, at the same time, try to have opened to us the most natural market possible, a market near us, with which we have so many ties, with which we daily communicate; and if we refuse that, we shall be responsible, perhaps, for a state of things which may prove disastrous in many respects for this country. But the motion says only this: that we should endeavor to ascertain on what terms the States are ready to trade with us. My hon. friend says we should not comply with the offer of the States, because we have been so well treated by our mother country—England. I wonder where! Is it when England has taken away from us by the Ashburton Treaty that territory which to-day we miss so much, that territory which, perhaps, makes it necessary for us to-day to search for new markets? Is it when England excludes us from her treaties with other countries? Let the hon. gentleman quote to me one single treaty by which England has taken the least care of Canada. He will not find one. It is all very well to say that we enjoy our laws and our liberties, that we speak French when we want to. Well, let us go to the States. I have seen thousands and thousands of my fellow-countrymen there. They had, last summer, a splendid demonstration, with an immense procession, in a Protestant city, and what did I see? On the day of their celebration all the factories and shops were closed. It was a day of general rejoicing. The great mass of the American people lined the streets and saluted with acclamations the procession wherever it passed; and there I saw a population of French Canadians satisfied with their position. They had gathered from every part of the States, and many of them told me they were happy, that they were making money, that they were respected. True it is they know how to make themselves respected. They work and are honest, and God has given them as much intelligence at least as the rest of the people of this world. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that if Canada was not under the British flag we would not be free, but would be slaves? Does he mean to say that the people of Canada are so bad that without the protection of the British flag, the French Canadians would have no status on this continent? Does he think that the hatred which is being engendered concerning the Jesuit question, and the French schools in Ontario, represents really the sentiment of the people? Is he prepared to state that this country is not peopled by a population who are all on a footing of equality before the law, and that French Canadians are more exposed to be oppressed in this country than they would be elsewhere? I deny that. On the contrary I have confidence in the people of Canada, and we are ready as the French element of the Canadian nation, to march shoulder to shoulder with the other elements and to give equal justice to everybody. I do not believe that we owe everything to England. I admit that England has done good towards us. That is put down in the treaty, but were the conditions of the treaty inserted solely for the benefit of the 60,000 Canadians of French descent, who were then in Canada? I do not think so. It was a long treaty, and many things were written and signed in it, but it was not the love of England for us that caused to be inserted in that treaty the condition that we would enjoy equal liberties with other nationalities. No; that condition was inserted in the interests both of England and France. It was those interests that dictated it, and we have to thank God for having prepared events in such a way that the treaty was drawn up as it was. Some fanatics may be ready now to do away with that treaty, but their efforts will be futile, and will only result in their being laughed at by the people at large.

Mr. HESSON. You will soon lose that privilege if you get commercial union or reciprocity.

Mr. AMYOT. I am happy to see an hon. gentleman here so ready to defend our interests, and I will tell the people in my county that we have in this House a gentleman who has our interests so much at heart that he wants to prevent our farmers selling our products to the Americans. I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the House, but simply to lay before the House in a few words the position I take on this resolution. I have followed with interest and admiration this discussion; I have come to the conclusion that this motion is an expression of a principle which must be sanctioned by everyone who has at heart the interests of the Dominion.

Mr. SPROULE. In rising to continue the debate upon this most important subject, I do not propose to weary the House with any lengthened statistics or collations of figures, because I think we have been treated to such ad libitum. I think that the facts have been established, and that information has been produced to prove the happy and prosperous condition of Canada and the advantage of our condition compared with that of other countries. I believe that has been shown in a way that defies successful contradiction. At the outset, I must congratulate the hon. the Minister of Finance upon the able, clear, concise, and logical statement he has been enabled to give to this House and the country. I must congratulate the Government for having so conducted our affairs that the Minister of Finance was in a position to present the statement he did only a few days ago. It was his duty; and it will be my duty, for a short time, to call the attention of the House to the condition of this country. If we consider its condition compared with that of other countries, if we consider the condition of our people in the various lines of life in which they are engaged with that of the populations of other countries, taking into account the expenditure of Canada since Confederation, and the rapidity with which we have built our railways since Confederation, the number of our canals which we have completed, the importance of the public works which we have erected, the increase in our number of post offices, the increase in the large, extensive and important products of the farm, the increase in the amount of goods that are manufactured for the consumption of people at home and abroad, and in the products of the forests and the mines, and in all the various lines that represent the industrial wealth of our country, we can come to but one conclusion, and that is that Canada has been a great success during the last twenty years. If we view our country from its financial standpoint, if we consider the amount of money deposited in its banks since Confederation, we must admit that Confederation has been a great success. If we look at that barometer, which is above all others, the best by which to estimate the condition of the people and their trade, the circulation of money, and take into account the extension of that, we can come to but one conclusion, and that is that Confederation has been a great success. In 1878, only 10 years ago, we had bank notes circulating in Canada to the extent of $21,466,641, Dominion notes $3,235,000, in all $24,692,173. How is it to-day? Instead of $24,000,000 we have a circulation of $41,763,000. Now, every hon. gentleman possessing the intelligence which members of Parliament must possess, will understand that the trade of a country requires a certain amount of money to carry it on, and in proportion as that trade expands so does its currency. The amount of money that is necessary to carry on the trade of a country is just in proportion to its wealth and trade. Viewing it from that standpoint, we must candidly confess that Canada has been a very great success. If we look at the condition of our people, not only in the large cities and towns, but in the agricultural portions as well, if we go into their palatial residences, in our cities, and into their magnificently adorned churches, their extensive and magnificent hotels, and if we enter into the private relations of life, we will find there the evidences of comfort, peace, enjoyment and intelligence. Have we the indications of want here that are to be found in other countries? Have we here millions crying for bread to allay the hunger of the starving, as they have in European countries? Have we petitions from our cities and other parts of the country asking the Government to come to the aid of those poor and destitute people who are unable to provide for themselves the necessaries and comforts of life? It is not now as it was in 1878, when we had the House of Commons almost besieged by those unfortunate and destitute people in such large numbers, but we have not the evidences of want to-day nor the appeals to the Government for redress that we had then. Have we petitions from the people showing that any important change is necessary either in our fiscal policy, our commercial policy, or any other policy, which is under the control of the Government, and which is essentially necessary in the interests of the country? I say we have not; but I consider, in going over these lines, that no unprejudiced man can avoid candidly admitting, as the Rev. Principal Grant said, when he came back from his trip almost round the world, that, comparing Canada and the wealth, and intelligence, and industrial pursuits of our people with those of any other country, everything that went to make peace, prosperity and plenty would compare very favorably in Canada with any other country in the world. That gentleman said he had passed over five oceans and touched at seven continents, and yet he found that Canada was the flower of all the countries he had seen. He said it would be a fortunate thing for Canada if a few first class funerals were to take out the croakers from amongst us. What are we promised by this resolution if it should be passed? We are promised by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that we shall have the good times which Canada enjoyed during the existence of the old Reciprocity Treaty with the United States. He did not tell us the reasons for those good times which the people of Canada then enjoyed. He says, speaking of those days:

"These are the days the farmers look back to as the bright days in the history of their country, these are the days they desire to see come again, and these are the days they are going to vote to have come again. These are the days that my hon. friend's resolution promises shall come to them again, and they will try that resolution, at all events, before they are convinced that they cannot have them again."

I need not ask the attention of hon. gentlemen in this House, many of whom are older than I am, to the condition of Canada at the time of that Reciprocity Treaty. I need not ask them what produced the condition of affairs which we enjoyed in this country at that time. It was not the Reciprocity Treaty alone, though, no doubt, it was an element, to a limited extent, in producing that prosperity, but it was more largely due to circumstances which were outside the control of our country. It was due to the Russian War, and afterwards to the American War, which lasted from 1862 to April, 1865. It was due to the fact that hundreds of thousands of the agriculturists and manufacturers of the United States were taken away from their legitimate pursuits to defend the Union, and the farmers of Canada were called upon to supply the wants of that people which could not be supplied by their own farmers. Thus, we had high prices, prices which ruled far above the normal prices. I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to a comparison between the prices which existed then and those which exist now, in order to show the utter impossibility, if this resolution passed ten times over, and the result was to bring about free trade or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States to-morrow, to bring back that state of things. At that time, wheat was worth $1.66 a bushel, or, taking the average price of wheat for the twelve years during which that treaty was in force, it was $1.36 per bushel. Corn averaged 77 cents a bushel, wheat flour $7.12 a barrel. During the four years from 1884 to 1887, the average price of wheat was only 92 cents a bushel, instead of $1.36, which is a great difference. Corn, which brought 77 cents a bushel during the twelve years from 1854 to 1866, was only worth 53 cents a bushel during the four years from 1884 to 1887. Flour, which was worth an average of $7.12 a barrel in the twelve years, only brought an average of $4.92 in the last four years—very little over half the amount. If our condition was measured by the trade carried on with that country, and it was all done by means of these commodities, the House will see the fallacy of the argument of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that this resolution, if carried, would bring back those days. It could not do so, because the prices have been going down steadily for years past. During the twelve years to which I have referred, bacon and hams were worth 11 cents a pound, and during the last four years only 8 cents. Lard was worth in the first period 12 cents a pound, and only 7 cents in the last. Pork, salted, was worth 9 cents, and now only 6 cents. Beef, salted, was worth 8 cents then and only 6 cents now. Butter brought a price during the twelve years of 21 cents a pound on the average, and during the last four years an average of only 16 cents. Cheese which was worth 11 cents during the first period was only worth 9 cents during the second period. I give these figures to show the fallacy of the arguments brought forward by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) when he endeavors to convince the House that, if unrestricted reciprocity were brought about by the adoption of the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) it would bring back the prosperous days of the Reciprocity Treaty. I do not wonder at the hon. gentleman's statement, because, if there is any hon. gentleman in this country who is to be stamped with inconsistency, it is that hon. gentleman. In 1876, he is a protectionist, and says that every young country needs protection for its manufactures as a child needs the protection of its parents until it can protect itself. He says that the history of every country shows the necessity of protecting the manufacturing interests, where the wealth of the country is not sufficient to enable those engaged in manufactures to compete with old countries who possess both unlimited wealth and skilled labor. But, in 1879, he turns round and says that the great panacea for all these evils is free trade throughout the world. There is no one in this House who is so stamped with inconsistency as the hon. gentleman. It cannot be that the additional light which he has got on the subject since has changed his mind. We would be glad to suppose that he changed it from honest convictions. If he was consistently carrying out the new convictions, the new ideas which he had imbibed since then, and we find him proclaiming, as he did only the other day: "The proper principle is the greatest good to the greatest number;" and saying, "when I compare the agriculturists and laborers of this country with the manufacturers, I find that the latter are few in number, and I am justified even in the destruction of their lines, provided I do good to the larger number." But when the same hon. member comes to reciprocity in wrecking, he tells the House that an investment in that line should be recognised by this House, that vested rights ought to be protected, and that we should not allow them to come in direct competition with the United States wreckers, who can overpower us by virtue of more extensive plant, by virtue of greater means. Now, it is very strange that one principle is propounded to suit one case, and not in the other. The hon. gentleman has staked his reputation upon the very point he has proposed on these trade questions, for every time he is endeavoring to convince the House that the ground he occupied at various times was the only correct ground in all these principles; yet, before two years have passed he has convicted himself by moving on to some other point. Now I can only say that in my opinion his arguments, although they were very clearly presented, although they were apparently logical, possessed, as he is, of a great and cultivated mind, and an extensive experience—he always presents arguments to the House and to the country that may be acceptable—nevertheless, I say, that the force of those arguments is very materially destroyed by reason of the inconsistency displayed by the hon. gentleman during the last few years. When the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was talking about the exodus from the country and an objection was made to his statement, he replied by asking: "What has the National Policy done for the people of this country? Are the people not destitute, are they not in want? If not, why do they leave the country?" The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) answered across the floor of the House that the farmers were doing well in this country. The retort came back from the hon. member for South Oxford: "In your little village of Brussels I can point out to you no less than 70 men that have left the country and I can give you their names and addresses in the United States. I happen to know something about that neighborhood, because I represented it once, and had some relations with the people." Well, I can only say that I do not wonder they left, because I suppose they were susceptible to the influence of great teachers like the hon. member for South Oxford, and the hon. member for North Norfolk, who for years have been dinging into their ears stories about the elysian fields that lie beyond the border, the great, wide and enterprising country, with boundless fields for enterprise, far in advance of what we have in Canada. I say I do not wonder that many of these men left home for the United States, if they placed any credence in the statements that were made to them, or if they had any respect for the intelligence of the hon. member for South Oxford, who has been dinging these things into their ears for the last ten years, and the only wonder is that more of them did not leave. Now, I may ask, if this resolution is carried, what would it do for the country? How would it affect us? In the first place, it would compel us to abandon our rights and hand them over to foreigners. Why, do I say that it would compel us to abandon our rights? Because, every public man of any standing, either in the United States or Canada, who has spoken upon this subject, has almost invariably admitted that it was utterly impossible to negotiate these trade relations with the United States without Canada abandoning her rights. Here is what the Philadelphia Record says on that point:

"No scheme which would give to Canada an equal voice in the determination of federal taxation could be considered. She would have to accept the position of a State in the Union, with only such power in the determination of the tax rate as her comparative population would entitle her to. How this could be effected without representation in Congress is a matter hard to determine."

Or, in other words, that whereas the United States are composed of sixty millions and Canada is composed of five millions, we would have one representative for every twelve of theirs. Would that not be abandoning our rights? The Reform party have always been noted in Canada for fighting against the control of Downing Street over our affairs here; they have always held that the influence that England exerted over us, even down to the present day, has been prejudicial, and now they demand the right to make our own treaties. They say that England has no right to have any control over us whatever, and yet, Sir, it is strange to find that these same gentlemen are willing not only to delegate the right to make our own treaties, but the right to control our own trade affairs to the United States, a country that has no direct interest in us whatever, as England has, because we are part and parcel of England; but the only interest that the United States can have in us must be antagonistic to our own interests. Sir, we are a young country, and we shall necessarily be compelled to go on, year after year, increasing our expenses for the purpose of developing this country. The United States are an old country; they have accomplished that long ago, for they have built their railways, their canals, their telegraph lines and their public buildings, and to-day the problem they have is to know how to spend the surplus money they have collected. Now, if we entered into this arrangement we should find, inside of a year or two, that we wanted more money, and to get more money we would be compelled to levy a higher rate of taxation upon the goods coming into the country. But the Americans do not want any more protection; they would not consent to it. Where, then, could we get the money? There is only one source from which we could obtain it, and that is by direct taxation upon the people of this country. The hon. member for South Oxford falls in with that view; it is the darling theory of his life. He is a free trader; he admires the principle upon which money is raised from the poor people of England, as superior to the principle upon which we raise money from the people here. He would welcome that system of direct taxation, because it is in harmony with his free trade views, and because it would be carrying out what he has always said was the correct principle. But would the people of Canada think so? I can assure the hon. gentleman and I can assure this country that whenever the time comes that the Government is compelled to raise money from direct taxation, then, if not before, the people would realise the great evil that had been brought upon them by Reform legislators in this country. They would feel it then, from the poorest man who works in a ditch to the most bloated millionaire that we hear so much about, who has been made rich by the tariff; then they would understand the force of the shock with direct taxation staring them in the face, if ever this policy was brought about. In the natural course of our development we shall require more money, but we would not be allowed to increase the tariff. If there was any conflict between the interests of Canada and those of the United States, if we required to change our tariff, and the United States found the tariff high enough, then 12 against one would always control the tariff and we would be practically helpless and would be obliged to submit to them. Then there is another point. Suppose we entered into this arrangement, it would be for a definite period, and afterwards found that it did not work to our satisfaction, and we desired to drop out of it, then, I say, a financial crisis would come upon this country; we would be almost ruined, and we would have to organise our country anew; we would have to start where we started 20 years ago; we would have to travel over the history of the past and plant ourselves back in the scale of progression, not only 20 years, but, I believe, 40 years. I believe that if this scheme was carried out it would prove an element destructive to the interests of the agriculturists. Why? Because the United States are competitors with us in every line. Their country lies alongside of ours for a distance of three or four thousand miles; their country is, much of it, warmer than ours, and their grain comes in earlier, their roots and their vegetables are ready for the market before ours, and they are thrown into our market at the very time when they bring the highest price, and would therefore compete the most successfully with the produce of the farmers of this country, and in this way our agriculturist would suffer. And in every line in which they are engaged they must suffer if this resolution passes, and if the Dominion Government enters into such negotiations as the hon. mover of this resolution proposes. But in what other way would it affect the farmers? It would destroy our cattle trade, because the United States stands to-day as a scheduled country in Europe, and American cattle are slaughtered at the point of landing, while such is not the case with our cattle; and our farmers know well that this is a very important privilege, of which they are at present receiving the benefit. Shippers of cattle know well that this is very important in the interests of our stock raisers, and they are satisfied that if we had free trade with the United States we would be deprived of this privilege, and a severe loss would accrue to our agriculturists. What more? It would destroy our butter trade and our trade in cheese. The United States to-day are making a spurious article of cheese which the manufacturers can sell at 5 cents per pound with a profit, while our farmers say they cannot make cheese profitably at less than 9 cents per pound. If we had free trade with the United States, what might we expect in this regard? The reputation of our cheese would decline in the European market, until it would only bring the same price as the American cheese brings to the American manufacturers. Not only so, but American cheese would be sent across here by millions of pounds to compete with our cheese and to the destruction of our trade. In every one of these lines our farmers would be great losers by unrestricted reciprocity. Again, unrestricted reciprocity would destroy the manufactures of this country. Some hon. gentlemen have said that all our manufacturers want is a wider market. All manufacturers who have given any attention to this question express but one opinion on the subject, and that is, that the manufacturers of the United States in a few months would be found in Canada from Montreal to Sarnia provided we had unrestricted reciprocity. The Cleveland Leader, a very well informed paper, says:

"We would swamp their (Canadian) markets with manufactured goods, and wipe out their manufactures in many branches at one stroke. To save these industries they have adopted a protective tariff against even the mother country, Great Britain, which is their greatest source of revenue. The idea that they will give us better than they do Great Britain would be foolish to entertain. Great Britain would not tolerate any such invidious distinction."

There is but one desire expressed by the manufacturers of the Western States and that is to get into our country to compete with our manufacturers, for they are satisfied that in a very short time they would have full control of the Canadian market and their goods would be sold in every retail store between Montreal and Victoria within a few months if there was unrestricted reciprocity in operation. But hon. gentlemen opposite could not object to that, because they hold that manufacturers are of no benefit to the people, that the principle of protection is a wrong one, that the protected interests of the country have never been recognised by the great mass of the people. I will call the attention of the House to one fact connected with the principle of protection, which will no doubt satisfy hon. members that the people generally consider there is some virtue in protection. Why do we find villages and towns offering bonuses to manufactures, provided they will establish a factory which will employ a certain number of men? This has been carried on to such an extent as to have compelled the Provincial Legislature to pass a law to prohibit it. If no virtue accrued, if there was no benefit obtained from the increased consumption of goods from a larger number of hands being employed and an increased consumption of farm products, why should they make those offers? To my mind it is only protection in another form, in the form of a bonus, which Reformers and Conservatives join in advocating, recognising thereby the importance and correctness of the protective principle. But if you say anything about this matter politically, the Reformer stops at once and says he is a free trader. The truth is he is a free trader when you say anything about the protective tariff, but not when you ask him to assist in giving a bonus. Then he is as anxious as is his political opponent to assist in carrying a bonus, for he recognises the value of obtaining an increased number of inhabitants in a manufacturing town, knowing that they will prove consumers of farm produce as well as of general goods. I, therefore, ask what advantage would unrestricted reciprocity accomplish for us if we obtained it? I have endeavored to show that it would give foreigners control of our own affairs; and next I proceeded to show that it would virtually accomplish the separation of Canada from the mother country. Why do I make that statement? I say so because in watching the press of the country, I have failed to find a single announcement from any person of note in England or Europe, or the announcement of the opinion of any public man of importance, who has not stated unmistakably that if Canada inaugurated such a policy and discriminated, as this resolution proposes, against the mother country, it would thereby break the last tie that binds it to the mother land. Mr. Hitt, in moving the resolution in Congress, did not make that statement to the people of the United States. One point which strongly attracted my attention in connection with this discussion, was the similarity in the language and even the words used by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and Mr. Hitt when he presented the resolution before the House of Representatives. No one can place those statements side by side without coming to the conclusion that Mr. Hitt got his information from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). That would not in itself be objectionable, if the information was correct and honestly given, because the hon. gentleman would simply have been enlightening a foreigner. But when you conceal a part of the truth it is equivalent to telling a falsehood. When you keep back an important part of the truth that should be given to those people to enable them intelligently to understand the question, it is not only doing an injustice to individuals, but it is deceiving those who may listen to and be impressed by the arguments. I will read to the House the statements made to the House by Mr. Hitt when he presented his resolution, and the statements made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in bringing this resolution before the House. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said:

"Then we are told that England would not sanction such an arrangement. I do not know about that. England did sanction the treaty called the Brown-Thornton Treaty which amounted almost to unrestricted free trade, which put a very large number of articles on the free list."

Mr. Hitt said:

"Will it be said that England will not consent to any arrangement which would give a preference in one of her colonies to American goods over British goods? Her Government in a noted instance did this very thing not many years ago. In 1874, when the Reciprocity Treaty was being negotiated by Minister Thornton, the English Government instructed him to modify it at the suggestion of the Canadian Ministry and make such additions to the list of American goods to be admitted free into Canada as the Canadians desired. He did so, and made out a long list of American articles to be admitted free of duty, so long that it was almost free trade."

That is the statement of Mr. Hitt. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said:

"The treaty amounted almost to unrestricted free trade."

He then quoted an extract, as follows:—

"In 1874 when the Reciprocity Treaty was being negotiated by Minister Thornton, the English Government instructed him to modify it at the suggestion of the Canadian Ministry, and make such additions to the list of American goods to be admitted free into Canada as the Canadians desire."

Both gentlemen used almost the same language and the same words. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) proceeded to say:

"He did so, and made out a long list of articles to be admitted free of duty, so long that it was almost free trade."

Mr. Hitt used the same words and they are both crediting this as being their own language and originating out of their own heads:

"Not one of these articles coming from England was to be admitted free of duty—"

Says the member for North Norfolk; and—

"Not one of these articles coming from England was to be admitted free of duty—"

Also says Mr. Hitt in his speech. I say that it would be praiseworthy in the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to endeavor to enlighten a foreigner regarding our country, if he did not conceal from him a part of the truth which would have enabled him to correctly and intelligently understand our position. The hon. member for North Norfolk goes on to say:

"This draft of a treaty was sent to Lord Derby, who answered that the whole proceeding was approved, and the English Government assented to the arrangement admitting American goods free to a British colony, where a tariff of 20 or 40 per cent. was to be laid upon the same kind of goods coming from England or any other country than the United States."

And the Hon. Mr. Hitt uses exactly the same words. Who taught the Hon. Mr. Hitt; who instructed him if it was not the member for North Norfolk? I say that the discreditable part of it is that the hon. member for North Norfolk, who got that information from the Debates of the Senate on that treaty, read part of that debate and read it correctly, but he left out that portion of it which gives a flat contradiction to the words that he and Mr. Hitt used. Why did he not quote what the Hon. George Brown said in defending that treaty that he proposed to the United States? The Hon. George Brown is the man who conducted negotiations on behalf of Canada; he was the person who was sent by the Mackenzie Government to look after the interests of Canada in that, and he says:

"I come now, hon. gentlemen, to the objections which have been urged against the treaty from such quarters as entitle them to a formal answer. The first of these is the allegation that the treaty discriminated against Great Britain in favor of the United States. Nothing could be more unfounded than this. It was perfectly understood from the opening of the negotiations that no article could be free from duty in regard to the United States that was not also free with regard to Great Britain and nothing else was ever contemplated for a moment."

That is from the mouth of the very man who is sent there by the Canadian Government to negotiate that treaty, but the hon. member for North Norfolk concealed that information from his friend Mr. Hitt, and they both fell into the same error and conveniently kept the truth from the people of the country, so as to lead them to believe that England would have no objection to Canada negotiating such a treaty, if she thought fit herself. Is that fair; is it honorable; is it consistent? It is on a par with the consistency of the hon. gentleman in many of the courses he has taken in this House. In an article on this question the Mail newspaper appealed to the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, and asked him to say whether or not it was intended that that treaty should discriminate against England, and that paper was authorized to say that not a single article in that treaty was contemplated to be brought into this country under more favorable circumstances from the United States than from England, that the same duty on the goods coming from the United States was to be imposed on those coming from England, and every article that came from the United States which was on the free list should also be put on the free list if imported from England. It is a pity that Mr. Hitt should fall into such a mistake when he endeavors to enlighten the House of Representatives, and it is a pity he got his information from a source so unreliable and so dishonest as to betray him into an error which I think he would not make if he knew better. Such a thing is disgraceful to Canadians. Let every man lay the truth and the whole truth before the public, and enable them to judge for themselves, and no man should conceal part of the facts and then endeavor, from part of the truth and from false premises, to reason that England would have no objection to such a treaty. The Hon. Mr. Hitt goes on to say that Mr. Chamberlain had said that if Canada wanted such a treaty she could have it, but he stops there, and I am inclined to think that Mr. Hitt got that information from the same source. The speech which Mr. Chamberlain made before leaving the old country was construed by the Mail newspaper as an insult to Canada, that he should have made the statement that Canada could separate from England if she wanted to. The Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, in explaining this matter to the electors of Islington, said:

"What I said was, that there was a party in Canada which is seeking at the present time for commercial union with the United States. Commercial union with the United States, as I understood it, means free trade between Canada and the United States. While at the same time Canada is to continue to impose protective duties on imports from the mother country, that is to say, that she is to give a preference in every article of manufacture of the United States over Great Britain. Well, I say that if Canada—if a great majority of the people of Canada—desired any arrangement of that kind I have no doubt they would be able to secure it."

But here is where they stop the quotation, and they do not give the remainder of Mr. Chamberlain's speech, which says:

"I did not think that there was anybody in this country who would attempt to prevent it by force; but I regretted that in that case all that continued of this slender tie which still binds Canada to this country, so far as we are concerned, would disappear, and that it was not likely that the people of Great Britain would continue much longer to sustain the obligations and responsibilities of the relationships after the reciprocal benefit had been withdrawn, and so I said that if a union of this kind ever came about it would be the first step and the signal for political separation."

Now, the latter part of this speech of Mr. Chamberlain is left out by Mr. Hitt, and it is this part of the speech which is hidden from the American people when an unfair inference is intended to be conveyed that the people of England would have no objection to unrestricted reciprocity. If it is not out of place I would give the member from North Norfolk this advice, that in future when he endeavors to instruct the American people or the Canadian people either, let him take some solid grounds from which he can argue and give them the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. When the facts are laid before them in this way, then and only then can they fairly judge of the situation. The announcement by the Hon. George Brown in reference to this matter is unmistakable and it is backed up by the assertion of the late Premier, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. I very much mistake the feelings of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie to-day if he is in harmony with, or supporting those hon. gentlemen in what they are endeavoring to bring about in Canada. I said that I believed it means separation for Canada as soon as we enter into those free trade relations with the United States, and at the same time exclude the mother country from the same advantages, and if the announcement of the press of the United States, and the sentiments expressed in Congress and in the Senate, is any indication of the feelings of that country, there is but one conclusion to come to, and that is that free trade with the United States means separation from England. I say most unmistakably that it means annexation with the United States. I have here before me a number of extracts taken from American papers and from the speeches of prominent politicians of that country, who, like ourselves, are shaping the affairs of the nation, and I take their expositions on the public platform and in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of that country as an index of the sentiments of the people of the States. I take John Sherman, the Republican leader of the Senate, and what does he say? He says: "I say therefore that anything that would tend to produce the union of Canada with the United States of America will meet with my hearty approbation." That is what Mr. Sherman said in the Senate when he spoke on this very question of commercial union, and he continues:

"Yes, Sir, I want Canada to be part of the United States. Within ten years from this time, in my judgment the Dominion of Canada will be represented in the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain or in the Congress of the United States, and I say to senators on both sides that I hope that that representation will be in the Congress of the United States, and those countries up there, so interesting to us, and bound to us by so many ties, may be part of the great English speaking Republic of America. I do not vote against this treaty because it may possibly bring about this state of affairs, but I shall vote against it because I believe it tends to erect a barrier, and to prevent the very objects that are sought to be accomplished."

Now, I have given you Mr. Sherman's views. What does Mr. Blaine say? In speaking to the people he said:

"But I am opposed, teetotally opposed, to giving the Canadians the sentimental satisfaction of waving the British flag, paying British taxes and the actual cash remuneration of American markets. They cannot have both at the same time. If they come with us they can have what we have, but it is an absolute wrong against the rights of American citizens that millions of men who owe the United States no allegiance, and who have no part nor lot with us, who are not of us, but choose to be foreign to us; it is an absolute wrong for a Democratic congress to say that they shall have exactly the same share in our markets and the same privileges of trade under our flag that we have."

Now, these are the sentiments of two of the most prominent men in the United States to-day; and if I look at the press of the country I find the same views expressed. The Oswego Times says:

"He would make our neighbors across the lake a Canada with American institutions—in short we would annex them (virtually) if not in name, and that he thinks a political union would follow a commercial union is pretty clear from the fact that he said the flag of the union would follow the trade."

The New York Mail and Express says:

"If Canada agrees by statute to a general union, she must face probable abandonment by Great Britain, and then annexation with the United States, so that it is really annexation which is involved in this commercial union discussion; and, while there is a strong party in Canada favoring annexation, we fancy that the majority outside of the Maritime Provinces are not yet converted to the plan."

If he knew the sentiments of the Canadian people, he might well add that a large majority amongst the people of the Maritime Provinces are against this proposition. The Buffalo News says:

"The Tories are in control of the Government of Canada, and the keeping up of a close British connection is one of the prime articles of their faith. Between that and their dread of political annexation which in the opinion of many commercial union would lead up to, to the United States they will find it very hard to adopt Mr. Wiman's views."

The Syracuse Standard says:

"Mr. Butterworth scorns the idea that commercial union means political union. It means nothing else. We want no commercial union without political union."

There are a large number of similar expressions from the press of the United States, which I might give, but I do not propose to waste the time of the House by giving them. But I take a letter of Mr. Sherman's, written to a friend in Woodstock, who had eulogised a speech made by that gentleman in the west last summer. He says:

"I intend to follow up the speech, to which you kindly refer, by a more extended one on the Retaliation Bill, so suddenly sent to Congress, the chief object being to show the importance of our commercial and personal relations with Canada, the ties which bind our people together, and the benefits to both countries of a policy of free commercial intercourse and ultimate union."

They all speak of this movement as "ultimate union." Mr. Hitt himself, speaking of it to the manufacturers of the west, said:

"We in the west would like you manufacturers of New England, to have access to that great market of Canada, with a Reciprocity Treaty, or better still commercial union. You will have the preference over English, French or German goods, and in two years time after it is adopted, goods from Yankee manufacturers will be in every retail store from Montreal to Victoria."

I think there is not an hon. gentleman in this House, or in this country who will not agree with that. Now, I give these extracts as evidences of the sentiments of public men in the United States to the relationship that would be brought about in the event of any such policy being entered into by the people of this country, and I can only come to the conclusion that if it were carried out, it would mean annexation, and thereby the extinction of our national existence. It would destroy our commercial relations with the old country; it would destroy our Canadian nationality and our national sentiment; it would subjugate our people to foreigners who have no interests in common with us, but interests contrary to ours in almost every particular; it would delegate to them the control of our finances to the detriment of the country; it would lead to direct taxation, because when the control of our finances would be taken out of our hands, we should have nothing to fall back upon to raise money but direct taxation. We have been told by the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, that his only excuse for troubling the House with it was that he considered it of great importance. In view of the condition of the country, in view of the state of the people, in view of the dissatisfaction that exists among our people, in view of the arrested development which as he is pleased to say is to be found in every part of this country, he propounds this policy as the great panacea for all our evils—in view of the exodus, and in view of the fact, he says, that Confederation has proved a failure. Now, I would like to ask the people of this country: Has Confederation proved a failure? After the statement we had from the hon. Minister of Finance of the development of our country by railways, by canals, by commerce, by money put into the savings banks and the various banks of the country, by the circulation of money in our country, which represents its developed trade, by the rapid progress we have made during the last twenty years in every particular, by the extension of our boundaries since 1868, by the development of the resources of our country, by the large educational institutions that have been built up, by the imposing and ornamental churches which we find throughout our country, by the rapid growth of our cities, and by the increasing wealth and prosperity of our citizens—after all of these things are considered, I would ask: Has Confederation been a failure? On the contrary, has not its success been far beyond even the most sanguine expectations of the fathers of Confederation when they entered into it? What was Confederation intended for? It was intended to allay the unfortunate clashing of feeling among the discordant elements that were found among the different nationalities and religions comprising our people of that time; it was for the purpose of bringing us together for a common defense and for an inter-provincial trade which has been rapidly developing since; it was for the purpose of building up a national sentiment which would make the people of Canada feel that they had a common heritage and a common interest, and should live together in unity and harmony. It was for the purpose of allaying the discordant strife that has from time to time arisen between the French and the English elements in this country—between Roman Catholics and Protestants, and between the different nationalities; it was for the purpose of increasing that provincial trade; it was for the purpose of cementing and reconciling those various elements. And how far to-day has that been accomplished? Is not the evidence that we have before us of intelligent men from every part of this country extending from Prince Edward Island in the east away to Victoria in the west, who represent the various discordant elements which were found on this American continent before Confederation—is not the fact that these men are here working harmoniously together to-day to be accepted by us as an evidence that the great end of Confederation has been amply accomplished. I say we are building up a national sentiment; I say we are cultivating a spirit of amity among the various classes, nationalities and religions of our people; I say we are going to understand each other better by being brought here together in the same chamber, working out the same end, discussing together the various measures which affect our progress, working out the destinies of life as best we can, according to our individual and collective intelligence, and in this way building up a great nation. I ask, then, has Confederation been a failure? If we look at the advancement the country has made in its industrial pursuits. I ask has Confederation proved a failure? If we look at the provincial trade that has been established and carried on since 1878, I ask again has Confederation been a failure? If we look at the various teaching institutions and the enhanced intelligence of our people, as evidenced by the various lines of literature and of taste and arts that are rapidly being developed in the various sections of the country, we may well ask has Confederation been a failure? If we go into the homes of our people in the rural districts and find them provided with all that they require to supply their wants, find them amply provided with food and the ordinary necessaries of life and with the clothes to protect them from the inclemency of the weather—I say if we find these and if we find no inconsiderable portion of our people unemployed in our large cities, if we find commercial trade being rapidly developed, and if we find the evidences of peace and prosperity in all the ranks of life, we cannot fairly assume that Confederation has been a failure. Has any country in the world accomplished more under similar circumstances? Could any system accomplish more in Canada? Could the destinies of Canada have been guided better than they have been by the various Governments of Canada since Confederation? Could any country in the world point to a more rapid development? Could any country have been settled more rapidly? Could you have given a larger amount of peace and prosperity to the people by any other system than is found to-day in the Dominion of Canada under Confederation? If all these advantages have been brought about by Confederation, we must pronounce unmistakably that it has been a great success, and that the fathers of Confederation are entitled to the eternal thanks of the people for having in their wisdom seen fit to devise this scheme of bringing together the various elements of Canada and cementing them in one grand whole as they have been cemented within the last 20 years. Then, if Confederation has not been a failure, and if we find these evidences of satisfaction in the country, I may ask, who are the people who ask for this great change to-day? It has not been asked by petitions extensively signed by the people throughout the country who want something they have not got. It has not been called for by virtue of any information which has been given to us from the large centres of commerce. It has not been asked for by the agriculturists. It has not been asked for by the manufacturers nor by the fishermen. From whom then does this demand come? I say it comes but from one source. It comes from a few discontented politicians on whose brows disappointment has left its imprint, and whose highest aim in life appears to be to be transferred across the floor of this House to the Treasury benches. They, and they only, are the educators of the people in this discontent. Leave the people alone, and they are contented and happy; but it is an easy matter to make some people think that far away fields are green and that in a distant country there are opportunities for promotion and advancement which they cannot find at home, because the people are always shown the glittering side of the picture and never the dark side. Our people are shown the silver side of other countries, but only the dark side of their own by hon. gentlemen opposite, who, when speaking in other countries, take care to show the silver side, but in speaking at home they show the dark side. Is it to be wondered at that a few of our people, when they are subjected to this agitation from a source that they respect, by men whom they believe to be men of honesty and intelligence, should transfer themselves from Canada to these elysian fields which have been painted in such glowing colors by hon. gentlemen opposite? We do not need this resolution. The people of Canada do not require any great change. The country does not require unrestricted reciprocity to give it prosperity; the country only requires to be left alone under the care and management of the same men who have brought it to the pitch of prosperity that it has attained to-day. These men have succeeded admirably in their mission, and the people of Canada have shown their gratitude by electing them time and time again by increased majorities on each occasion. I ask them why should we entertain the demand for the change that they wish to impose upon us? That demand comes from no other class of people save those men in this House and their supporters who are anxious to be transferred from the cold shades of Opposition to the Treasury benches. In my opinion, as an observer of Canada and its affairs and destiny, I say if we can judge of the sentiment of the Canadian people to-day, by the evidences on every side, they only wish to be left alone to work out their own destiny intelligently as they are doing. We want neither annexation to the United States nor separation from the mother country. We want neither Imperial federation or commercial union. We want only to be left alone and then the people of Canada will prove, as they have proved in the past most unmistakably, that Confederation has been a great success, that Canada is a prosperous country and a country which any man ought to be satisfied to live in. Our people are keeping pace with the onward march of progress and prosperity equally with the people of every other country under the sun, and can do for themselves what the most intelligent and advanced people are doing in other countries. They can educate themselves, they can clothe and feed themselves, they can make for themselves comfortable homes if they are only left alone. If we can only keep these mischievous agitators quiet who are preaching everywhere discontent, those men who are impracticable in their views, and who are endeavoring every hour of the day to convince our people that there is something they should have which they have not and which they could get across the southern border. I say that Canada does not want their teaching to-day. Our people are satisfied that they have a good country with all the facilities for promotion and development that may be found in the most advanced and civilised country to-day, and all they ask is to be allowed to go on and develop their resources as they have been doing in the past. All they ask is not to be interfered with in this march of progress, and in addition to that they ask that those who have controlled the destinies of the country so well in the past, should be retained in their places in this House, in order that they may continue to administer the affairs of this country, until such time as the people will call for a change themselves, and I am sure the time will never come when they will ask for either unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union or annexation to the United States.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). I do not rise for the purpose of going into this question at any great length at this late hour. The question has been discussed so fully by members on both sides of the House, and especially on this side of the House, that hon. gentlemen on the other side have received, I think, a complete reply to their arguments. However, there are some matters affecting the Province I come from and the county I have the honor to represent, with which I desire to deal very briefly. Hon. gentlemen opposite, and particularly the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and, if I mistake not, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) made reference to the protective policy, as it affected the coal industry of Nova Scotia; and they made statements to the House which would lead the country to believe that the National Policy, which imposed a duty of 60 cents a ton on foreign coal, did not benefit the coal industry in Nova Scotia to any extent. In fact some of them made the statement that it did not benefit anyone except the men who had their money invested in that industry. These are the points to which I desire to refer for a few moments. The total production of coal in the Dominion of Canada is about 2,400,000 tons, two-thirds of which is produced in the Province of Nova Scotia. In 1868 the total production of coal in Nova Scotia was 453,624 tons. That is twenty years ago. In the year 1878 the total production only reached 693,511 tons, or a rate of 5 per cent. of an increase per annum on the production of the ten previous years. During that time we had no protection on our coal, and our chief market was the United States, to which we sent about three-fourths of the total production of the Province. In 1879 this Parliament imposed a duty of 50 cents a ton on American coal, and subsequently raised it to 60 cents a ton, which is still the duty on coal. I wish to show the House the effect of that protection on the coal industry of Nova Scotia. The total production in 1888, the year just closed, was 1,156,500 tons, or an annual increase of 18 per cent. for each of the ten years from the time the duty was imposed on coal to the present day. We may put this in another light, and possibly hon. gentlemen may then see it in a little clearer way. The value of the labor, or the cash paid for labor in connection with the development of this industry, is a matter of very great consideration to our laboring classes. Looking at the total production in 1868, and basing the cost per ton on the rate of wages paid at that time, we find the cost of labor in producing the coal to have been $1.52 per ton, and the total amount paid for labor in the development of that industry twenty years ago was $598,783. Ten years after, in the year 1878, the year before the imposition of the duty on coal, basing the calculation upon a higher rate of wages, in order to give every advantage to hon. gentlemen opposite, at the rate of $1.65 per ton, we find that the amount of $915,434 was paid in cash for labor in connection with that industry; or, using another calculation, $2.28 per head of the population of the Province. In 1888, after ten years' experience of the National Policy, basing the wages paid at the same rate—and I believe I might be justified in putting them at a higher figure, because last year I believe wages were considerably higher than they were ten years ago—we find that no less than $2,616,725 was disbursed in cash for labor in connection with the development of that industry, or about $5.81 per head of the population as compared with $2.28 before the imposition of the duty. To my mind, this ought to be a very satisfactory answer to those hon. gentlemen who contend that the protection to coal has not been a benefit to the people of Nova Scotia generally. It is a very great benefit, as will be seen by the statement I have made. Another feature of the case is the amount which the Provincial Government have derived from this industry; because for every ton of coal which is raised in the Province, a royalty is paid into the Provincial Treasury of a little less than ten cents per ton. In 1878, $53,697 were paid on the total production, while in 1888, ten years after the adoption of the National Policy, $151,388 were paid in as royalty, or 33½ cents per head of the population as compared with 12½ cents per head before the adoption of the National Policy. That is another answer to hon. gentlemen opposite which ought to be satisfactory. That is a benefit to the Province as a whole, it is a benefit to every man, woman and child in the Province, because it enables the people to get the benefit of the production through the payments which are made to the Provincial Legislature. It is also a benefit to the Dominion, because, previous to the imposition of duty on the importation of coal, we were obliged to come here year after year seeking subsidies and concessions to enable our Provincial Legislature to meet the expenses of the Province. Now that is not the case. We have a revenue of a very large amount from that particular industry. To-day we have $150,000 yielded by this industry, of which we get the benefit. The total annual revenue of our Province is about $650,000, and of this the coal industry pays $150,000, so that hon. gentlemen will see the benefit derived from this industry in that particular line, aside from the benefit derived by our laboring classes generally. Then we have to add to this the benefit derived from the employment of this labor in the mines, the employment of a large number of horses which consume large quantities of hay and grain, which are furnished by the Provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, so that not only does the protection of coal benefit Nova Scotia, but also Prince Edward Island. In addition, our miners are large consumers of flour, and, as hon. gentlemen know, flour is not manufactured in Nova Scotia nor in Cape Breton, where a large portion of these mining operations is carried on. They get the flour from the Province of Ontario, nearly all of it. In previous years they imported it largely from the United States, but to-day that is not the case. I am happy to bear testimony to the fact that to-day the flour that is supplied from Ontario to the people of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton is an article that gives satisfaction, both as to price and as to quality. I was astonished, the other evening to hear the statement by the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Campbell), who is a large manufacturer of the flour which is consumed to a large extent in Nova Scotia; the productions of that hon. gentleman's manufacture, I may say, enter more largely into the consumption of the people of the Island of Cape Breton to-day, than the production of any other miller in any other part of the Dominion. Yet we heard that hon. gentleman make the bold statement on the floor of this House that this duty was a tax on the people of Canada, and he ventured to say that the coal duty should be removed, because it is a tax on the people. Well, the money derived from the development of that industry goes more of it into his pocket, I may say, than into the pocket of any other man in the upper Provinces. I am sorry to find that the hon. gentleman has been so blind to his own interests and to the interests of his own Province, and of the people who want to get a market for their flour. I am sorry to find that a gentleman so prominent in the manufacture of flour should make such a statement. He seems to me to be cutting off his nose to spite his face. I would advise my hon. friend to leave the nose where it is, and the face as well. Leave the coal duty where it is, and it will benefit not only the people of the neighborhood of the mines, but it will also benefit the people of Ontario. Well, in addition to the people who are engaged in this coal industry being consumers of flour and other articles, they are large consumers of clothing, boots, shoes, cottons and wares of all kinds that are manufactured in Ontario and in Quebec. Our people buy largely from the Province of Ontario in those lines, notably from Montreal and Toronto and other large centres; so that the money which is earned by these people by reason of the development of the mines, is distributed not only to the people of the Province where the work is performed, but all over the upper Provinces as well. What the people engaged in this industry and interested in its development require now, is not only the maintenance of the existing duty on coal, but an increase of that duty. It would be only fair on the part of the hon. gentlemen representing Provinces which produce those articles which are consumed so largely in the neighborhood of these mines—it would only be fair that they should willingly concede to the people interested in the further development of those mines, a further increase of duty. In doing so they would benefit both themselves and the people engaged in the coal industry. This would not increase the price of coal. An hon. gentleman stated on the floor of this House in a previous discussion that the imposition of this duty upon coal had the effect of increasing the price. That has not been the case. There is no increase in the price of coal in any part of the Dominion to-day, as the effect of the duty which was imposed 9 or 10 years ago. Why, Sir, a year ago the duty was removed on anthracite coal, and what has been the effect? To-day the price of anthracite coal is much higher than it was ten years ago. In Halifax last November the price was $6 per ton, whereas ten years ago at the same date it was $5 a ton. The price of some kinds of coal, of some particular mines, is even lower than it was ten years ago, so that the duty that was imposed on American coal has not had the effect of raising the price, as hon. gentlemen opposite contend. There is another reason why hon. gentlemen ought to agree to this increase of duty that is asked for by the people interested in the development of that industry. In the year 1866, if I am not mistaken, the United States imposed a duty of $1.25 per ton on Nova Scotia coal. We continued to pay that duty for a period of five or six years. The result was that, whereas previous to the imposition of that duty, we sent in the neighborhood of 460,000 tons of coal to the American market; at the end of six or seven years, after that duty was taken off, our sales in that market were reduced to something like 160,000 tons, and for the last thirteen years they have not averaged more than 90,000 to 100,000 tons a year, which is chiefly culm coal, valued at 40 cents per ton. The duty was reduced to 75 cents per ton some thirteen years ago; yet we do not find that it increased our sales in that country. Now, a gentleman who is directly interested in, and connected with, this coal industry in Nova Scotia, published a letter upon the subject a few days ago, from which I will take the liberty to read an extract:

“And now a word about the coal duty: The first National Policy coal duty was only 50 cents per ton of 2,000 lbs. That was too low to shut out foreign coal, and as the National Policy tariff raised the duties on mining plant, the coal trade was not benefited. Subsequently 10 cents per ton additional duty was imposed, which in connection with low seaborne freights enabled Pictou and Cape Breton collieries to successfully compete in the Province of Quebec with coals from Britain and the United States; and as the National Policy started a number of coal consuming industries in that Province, the result is, Nova Scotia shipped in 1887 to the Province of Quebec 650,358 tons, against only 83,710 tons in 1878. The fact is our shipments to Quebec in 1887 were only 37,768 tons less than the total sales of all the collieries in Nova Scotia in 1879, the first year of the coal duty. That the National Policy saved a number of valuable collieries from going down into Hades every one connected with them knows.”

“But, as every one connected with the St. Lawrence coal trade also knows, low freights had much to do with the increased business. In '87, steam colliers carried coals to Montreal so low that Cape Breton screened coals were delivered there at $2.90 per gross ton. True, this did not net the collieries a paying price, but a low price with a large output may leave some profit. In '88 freights were a little higher and so was the price of coal delivered, and on the whole a little better net price was obtained than in the previous year. But this year freights are up; steam colliers are costing equal to 30 cents per ton on coal more than last year and there is reason to fear that Cape Breton and Pictou cannot pay that increased freight and compete with coals from the United States. My conviction is if the duty on coal be not increased our shipments up the St. Lawrence will be much less than of late years and if so it will be bad all round; less work at the mines, less royalty to the Province, and an unprofitable year's coal trade for Cape Breton at least. The United States protected and developed their coal trade in 1866 by means of $1.25 per ton duty, which they kept on for several years, subsequently reducing it to 75 cents, which it now is. Our coal trade needs somewhat similar encouragement to enable Nova Scotia to compete successfully with foreign coals in the Upper Provinces, and Ontario for her own sake should see to it and devise ways and means of becoming as independent as possible of the United States for an article so essential to her homes and factories, railways and steamers.”

“That United States capitalists desire to control the coal trade of this Province I have no doubt. That an effort was made to buy the Cape Breton collieries is well known, as also that it failed for the time being. That their policy may now be to cut us out of our upper Province market so as to make the working of our collieries unprofitable and induce their proprietors to sell out is quite probable. That a United States coal syndicate controlling the collieries of this country might be a very serious business for the whole Dominion of Canada, any thinking man may see; hence the need of such a coal duty as will prevent American bituminous coals supplanting those from Nova Scotia in the upper Province markets we now have.”

This letter was written by Mr. Lithgow, acting treasurer of one of the most important coal mines in Cape Breton. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) threw a challenge across the floor the other night to the effect that no coal mine had been opened in Cape Breton since this protection was given.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman is misstating me. I said that no new coal mine had been opened that I knew of.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). That is the point I am taking. But it must be remembered that we had coal mines at that time which were just being opened, and work upon which had just been commenced, but the condition of the industry was such that it was impossible for the people who had invested in those properties to make any pretence of developing them. They continued to produce year after year only a few tons up to the time of the imposition of the duty on American coal. What has been the result of the imposition of the duty? I will name to the hon. gentleman some of the mines that have been developed. The Reserve mine is one of the largest and most profitable mines in Nova Scotia. Its total production in 1878, the year previous to the imposition of the duty, was only 9,280 tons, or about four ship-loads. In 1888 it was 111,900 tons. The Caledonia mine, which is operated by my hon. colleague from the same county, produced in 1878 only 17,348 tons, whereas the total production last year was 102,927 tons. Victoria mine, another most valuable property, had a total production in 1878—and I venture to say that it had been open for nearly 15 years before the imposition of the duty—was only 12,191 tons; while the total production last year was 76,656 tons. I might go on and enumerate every one of the mines in Cape Breton with like result; but I suppose those facts are sufficient to answer the hon. gentleman's challenge. Another point raised last evening by an hon. gentleman opposite was with respect to the effect that protection on coal produced in the Province of British Columbia. That is the only Province which produces coal at the present time, except Nova Scotia, in the whole Dominion. The production of that Province is something in the neighborhood of half a million tons.

Mr. MITCHELL. What about the Galt mines in the North-West?

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). I do not think the production of those mines has been very much yet.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, yes, it has.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Allusion was made last night to the mines of British Columbia. The products of those mines find their market in California, where there is no competition of any consequence from American coal, and thereby the people who send coal into the California market do not pay the duty. The customer pays the duty because the producers of the coal control the price. If there is any competition it is among themselves; there is no competition in the market except as between the products of the different mines of British Columbia. So the American duty does not injure the people of British Columbia as it does the people of Nova Scotia. That will be sufficient answer, in my judgment, to those hon. gentlemen who have chosen to take up the coal question in the course of this discussion, and I will not trouble the House at greater length on this question, presuming that what I have already said is a sufficient answer to the arguments of the hon. gentleman. There is another point to which I desire to refer, and it is contained in a statement made by the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Perry), last night. During his address he made particular reference to the articles which entered into the consumption of fishermen, and he enumerated fish hooks, twine entering into nets and seines, as articles that were taxed by this tariff and on which the people engaged in the fisheries had to pay duty. The hon. gentleman was mistaken. If he had only consulted the proper authority he would have seen that those articles are exempt from duty, and that nearly every article that enters into the business of the fisherman is free from duty. I am astonished that the hon. gentleman should have made such a statement on the floor of this House, when speaking for the fishermen whom he is representing here. I am surprised that my hon. friend should make such a reckless statement on the floor of this House. Among the articles which enter into the consumption and requirements of the fishermen are hooks, nets, seines, lines, twines, and salt for fish, and my hon. friend tried to make a point that they had to pay duty on these as well as on the nails they used in building their boats. The facts are that a drawback is given equal to the amount paid in duty on material used in building all vessels including fishing vessels as well." In the face of these facts, facts which are under his hands, facts I venture to say which are in his desk if he chooses to examine them, the hon. gentleman makes this statement for the purpose of having it go back to what he considers an unintelligent class of the people who can be led away by any erroneous statement he may make on the floor of the House. If I mistake not, the fishermen of Prince Edward Island like all other fishermen are too intelligent to be stuffed with statements of that kind. I might also refer to the increase in our shipping to show the progress which we have made in this direction. The extent of the shipping is an index of the trade of our country or of any country and particularly of our maritime shores. Of course, a large amount of the shipping is in connection with our coal industry, and the amount of money earned by the people in connection with this shipping is very considerable. I venture to say that including this with the amount of money I have named to the House as being paid out in connection with our coal industry, that not less than $3,000,000 is paid annually in the Province from which I come. Let me give the House a few figures to show our progress in this direction. In 1878, the year previous to the adoption of the National Policy, we had in our Nova Scotia ports a total of 7,803 vessels of all kinds, including British and foreign; in the year 1888 which has just closed, I find that instead of having 7,803 vessels entering and clearing our ports we had 12,554, or 60 per cent. increase in ten years. In 1873 the tonnage was 1,855,831, and in 1888, 2,931,738, or more than 60 per cent. than what it was 10 years ago. The tons of freight carried in 1888 were 1,094,950 as against 657,233 in 1878. The crews carried by those vessels in 1878 were 81,035 while in the year 1888 the number manning those vessels was 133,617. If that is not an evidence of prosperity by reason of the protective policy which this House in its wisdom gave to the different industries in which the people of this Dominion are interested, I do not know what is. I am obliged to hon. gentlemen who have listened so patiently to my remarks.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron.) Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House on this very important subject I may say that I consider it is one of the most important questions which have before the Parliament of Canada for many years, and especially is it important from the farmers' point of view. It is from the farmers' standpoint that I shall endeavor to treat the question; but I may be permitted before so doing to offer a little criticism on certain misstatements which have been made by gentlemen on the other side of the House. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) stated that we had not the stirring times in 1883 that we had in 1878. Now, Sir, I shall contradict that statement by the words of the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches to-day, and by no less an authority than the Prime Minister of Canada himself. The right hon. the Prime Minister in a speech delivered in 1878 describing the condition of the country says:

"Here we are not only suffering depression in every trade and industry, but our people are leaving the country to seek employment in the mills and manufactories of the United States. Was it not a crying shame that in this country with a fertile soil, a healthy climate, a strong and well educated people, that 500,000 of our own people should have crossed our borders in these years and taken up their abode in the United States, because they could not find employment for their skill and energy and enterprise in consequence of the false policy of our leaders."

I leave the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and the Premier of the Dominion of Canada to settle between themselves as to which spoke the truth in regard to the condition of affairs in 1878, and as to whether we had the spirited times described by the member for East Grey, or the depression described by the Prime Minister of Canada. The member for East Grey also told us that it was not the Reciprocity Treaty that was responsible for the measure of prosperity that we enjoyed in Canada between 1854 and 1866. In this connection I would read another little extract from a document that was issued by the Coalition Government of Canada in 1865. It says:

"Under the beneficent operations of the system of self-government which the altered policy of the mother country has granted to Canada in common with the other colonies, in giving us our representative institutions; combined with the advantages secured by the Reciprocity Treaty and the unrestricted commerce with our nearest neighbors in the natural productions of the two countries, the agitation for organic change has ceased and dissatisfaction with the political rulers of the Province has wholly disappeared."

Let that be an answer to the member for East Grey when he states that if we had unrestricted trade with the United States it would end in annexation to that country. History is continually repeating itself, and we know, Sir, that gentlemen perhaps spoke from experience when they spoke with respect to the feeling existing in this country at the present time, that we wished to be annexed to the States. I believe that there are a few people in Canada that wish annexation, as well as a few in the United States, but the great majority of the people of Canada are perfectly satisfied with their condition, if you give us that free trade that nature has placed us in a position to receive a benefit from if it were not for the barriers imposed by the Government of the day. The Premier of Canada told us in 1878:

"That the blessed policy they were about to inaugurate would restore prosperity to our struggling industries which were sadly depressed. It will prevent Canada from being a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active inter-provincial trade and moving as it ought to do in the direction of reciprocal tariff with our neighbors as far as the varied interests of Canada may demand will greatly tend to secure with that country eventually reciprocal trade."

Now, Sir, that is the platform that was laid down by the Conservative Party in 1877, and yet, that is the very policy that they are contending against to-day. And yet, Sir, these gentlemen have the unblushing audacity to stand up and tell us that we on this side of the House are annexationists and traitors. The hon. Premier in 1878, said of his policy:

"By having all kinds of industries we would have a great country; the industries would be twice blessed, our sons would be prevented from going to a foreign country to add to its wealth and strength and skill. The fruits of their labor would be exchanged for the fruits of the soil, cities would multiply, and not only would there be a demand for the larger products, such as wheat, flour, cattle and everything we could raise, but for cheese, butter, eggs, roots and other kinds of small produce."

Now, Sir, I will not go further in that direction at present. The hon. gentleman for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) laid down a maxim, which if he himself had followed, his utterances would not have been what they were to-night. He stated that he who told a part of the truth and withheld a part, was guilty of base misrepresentation. Now, I hold that that gentleman was guilty of the very crime he charged against members on this side. He started to show what was the value of wheat during the existence of the Reciprocity Treaty, and how it had been increased in price after that treaty was abrogated. He showed us that it was worth $1.35 after the treaty was abrogated; but he should have told us that one cause which assimilated the price of wheat in this country to the price in England was that in 1871, we paid nine pence a bushel to have it carried from New York to Liverpool, while in 1886 we only paid one penny. Then, we know that in 1866, when the Reciprocity Treaty came to an end, the trade between the United States and Canada had assumed vast proportions in comparison with what it was at the commencement of the Treaty in 1854. It had gone up until there was a trade between the two countries amounting to $186,000,000; and yet when we come to 1887 we find that the trade between the two countries in that year not only did not exceed that amount, but did not reach it by $400,000, showing how greatly the country was benefited by the Reciprocity Treaty. Then we have been told time and again that it is the speeches of hon. members on this side of the House which have caused the great exodus of population that has taken place from Canada, but I think I shall be able to show that that is not the case. Now, we find that every Province in the Dominion receives a certain subsidy from the Dominion in lieu of what the Dominion gets from taxes on trade and commerce, to assist in carrying on the government of the Province. Now, we find that the subsidies to Manitoba and British Columbia amount to $647,746 a year, but we find that these two Provinces pay duties amounting to $660,012 or $12,166 more than the whole subsidy they receive from the Dominion. Now, some hon. gentleman may ask me what has this to do with population? I will endeavor to show. A great many people from the older Provinces have gone up to the North-West to settle and when they went there and found that such large amounts of taxation had to be paid in that country to support the trade policy of the Government, when they found that it was the policy of the Government to give large tracts of land in alternate sections to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and further when they found that the policy of the Government was only to grant settlers 80 acres for a homestead, with 80 acres of a pre-emption right, while across the line the conditions were much more favorable, they found that all they had to do to get rid of this large amount of taxation and those other hardships was to step across the line, although the soil they found there was not equal to the soil of Manitoba. With regard to this population question, I have been very much amused at some of the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, especially those made by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson). That hon. gentleman has made statements to show that the progress of Canada has been much more rapid than that of the United States. In comparing the population of Canada and the United States, instead of taking different States and comparing them with different Provinces, I would take the whole population of the United States, and compare its increase with the increase of the population of Canada according to the last census returns. The total increase of population in Canada from 1871 to 1881 was 19.80 per cent., while the total increase of population in the United States from 1870 to 1880 was 29.53 per cent., showing that the population of the United States has increased much more rapidly. Now, we have been asked to compare the population of some of the Provinces with the population of some of the States or Territories adjoining. The hon. member for Welland states that the largest increase of population was found in the Province of Manitoba, amounting to 247 per cent. from 1871 to 1881; and he goes on to state that this is a greater increase than could be found in any of the States or Territories to the south. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman might have just recalled to his memory the statement which he made in 1884, I admit under different circumstances; and I was just reminded of it to-night, when an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House stated that circumstances were a considerable element to be taken into account in regard to the view any gentleman took of a question. In 1884 the hon. member for Welland addressed this House upon the loan made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and, in endeavoring to show the great advantages to be derived from railways going into a country, he referred to the State of Kansas in this language:

"Without a solitary bit of material for the construction of buildings. Where the people live in dug-outs, in Kansas, the population has increased from 417,659 in 1870, to 1,080,090 in 1880, an increase of 158 per cent."

With all the fine climate that Manitoba has, with all its fine land, with all its superior advantages that he describes so well, he has only been able to show that that Province increased 247 per cent., but when we come to Dakota he made a comparison with that, and I hold that a comparison between Dakota and Manitoba is perhaps the best that can be made. He said:

"Take also the Territory of Dakota with a much inferior climate to ours, all I need to show its inferiority in these respects is to point out the physical features of that country. The Territory of Dakota is the watershed of this continent, and he says, with all these disadvantages the population of Dakota has increased from 14,181 in 1870, to 135,137 in 1880. Why, it has almost multiplied its population by ten in the short period of ten years."

And yet he asks us to-day if the increase of population of 237 per cent. is exceeded by that of any State to the south. Now, with respect to population, let me make a comparison between the period in Canada from 1869 to 1878, before the introduction of the National Policy, and from 1879 to 1888 since the introduction of the National Policy. The ten years from 1869 to 1878 inclusive, show an increase of population of 19.48½ per cent., while in the ten years from 1879 to 1888, during which we were to have had, under the operation of the National Policy, such a large influx of population that would consume all our extra produce, we find that the population increased but 19.26½ per cent., so that there is  $\frac{22}{100}$  per cent. of an increase in the ten years before the National Policy came into existence greater than that in the ten years after the introduction of that policy. Then with respect to the progress that Canada has been making. Take the years 1881 to 1886: During those five years Ontario increased in population 7.39 per cent, while Michigan from 1880 to 1884 increased in four years 13.38 per cent. Dakota from 1880 to 1885 increased in population 237 per cent, while Manitoba from 1881 to 1886 increased but 74½ per cent. Now, I hold that it is not the speeches of hon. gentlemen on this side which have caused this large amount of population to leave this country, but the policy of the Government in imposing heavy taxes on the people of that country. When a farmer goes to the North West he requires between \$700 and \$800 worth of agricultural implements within a very short period to successfully carry on operations; and taking a common binder as an example of the taxes he has to pay, I find that when that binder come to the frontier it is bought at \$100, but is valued by the Customs officer at \$130, and is sold to the settler of Manitoba and the North-West at \$180, as stated by one of the hon. members from that country, and that is a cash sale. When we consider that there is a tax of \$45 to \$50 placed upon that implement, and that all the settler has to do is to cross the line to the south to be free from the payment of this large amount of duty it is not to be wondered at that so many should take their departure from our country. Our settlers have to pay probably \$200 in the shape of duty on agricultural implements. That is one great reason of the exodus. Another great reason is that we granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway twenty-four miles of land on each side of the railway in alternate sections, and that the company are free from taxation for twenty years. Any hon. gentleman who settled in Ontario when I did, and suffered as we did by the locking up of the land by the Canada Land Company, when the country was only partially settled, thus creating great difficulty in building roads, and school houses, and bridges, and carrying on the general improvements of the country, will know what this grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway involves. People are not inclined to settle in a country where they find half of the lands situated within twenty miles on each side of the line free from taxation, and know that every acre they turn up, every improvement they make has the effect of increasing the value of these lands without giving the settler any corresponding benefit. Let me give you a statement that a young man made to me two years ago, who had been in that North-West and had settled upon 160 acres and performed the settlement duties and got his patent. He came back and spent a night in my own residence. I asked him when he was going to return to the North-West and he said: I will never return there until such time as the Government adopt a different railway policy. He said that as long as the monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway exists, it will drain the heart's blood out of every settler in that country, and put money into the pockets of the company, and we cannot expect to have those improvements we otherwise would have in lands close to the railway line. With respect to the exodus which has taken place, I would just say that the exodus is going on this spring as rapidly if not more so than ever. I am informed that a special train came down the London, Huron and Bruce Railway yesterday containing more than 30 people and their effects all coming from Wingham, Ontario, and bound for Louisiana, and this is the advance guard of others who expect to move this spring into the States. And on the 12th of this month, a similar number left the same locality for Dakota, and a large number left Clinton and Seaforth, also bound for the American side. The policy of the Government is therefore bearing fruit more rapidly than we in Canada desire, and I hope the Government will take warning and reverse a policy that is working so injuriously. I think I have shown clearly that the National Policy has not increased the population in our country in any degree, and this despite the fact that during the last seven years \$2,851,000 have been expended in bringing settlers into our North-West. I say it is folly to spend such a large sum to bring settlers into our country when those settlers will not remain there. Let me read what one of the Government agents in the North-West says. It is the statement of Mr. W. C. Grahame, the Government agent in Winnipeg:

"Many will be surprised to learn that the number of actual settlers in our Province and Territories, has not been as large as expected, neither has the amount of wealth brought in by those who have come, been as considerable as that of former years. This may appear strange, when we consider the many efforts that were put forth by the many different organisations, to induce immigration to the Province and neighboring Territories, but it is nevertheless a fact, that out of the many thousands who left the mother country, ostensibly for the North-West, a large number of them found occupation and homes on the Pacific coast, and I regret to say, a large majority of these are on the American side.

He continues:

"I took a keen interest in this matter and interviewed the pursers of the local steamboats from whom I gathered information that would lead me to believe that the steamboats plying between Vancouver, Victoria, San Francisco and the American ports at the head of Puget Sound, carried very little less than 10,000 immigrants, most of whom left Europe with the intention of remaining in British possessions."

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron).

There is positive evidence that it is not the speeches of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House which caused this, but the misrepresentations made to immigrants before they went to that country with respect to the condition of things, and they found them very different when they got there, and left the country accordingly. I will not say any more with respect to the question of population. I think I have shown clearly that the National Policy has been a failure in that respect, and has not increased the population of the Dominion of Canada. Now, take the question of expenditure: We were told, when the National Policy was inaugurated, that it was not to increase the taxation, but was to cause a redistribution of the taxation, and that the policy would not only benefit the manufacturing population but also the agricultural population of the country. Let us see how far the promises of the Government have been kept in reference to the increase in taxation. In 1868 we had an annual expenditure of $13,483,000. In 1873 we had an expenditure of $23,316,000, or an increase of $9,830,000, or $1,966,000 annually, or 73 per cent. of increase during the first five years after Confederation. There was a change of the Government, and the Conservative Government had to give way and allow the Reform Government to assume the reins of power. In 1873, the annual expense was $23,316,000, and in 1878 it was $23,503,000, or an increase in five years of $187,000, or an annual increase of $37,200, or four-fifths of one per cent. of an increase annually during the five years that the Reform Government held the reins of power. In 1878, the Conservative Government came into power again, and, with an expense in that year of $23,503,000, they increased it in 1887-88 to $35,653,000, an increase of $12,150,000, or an increase of $1,350,000 a year in nine years, or an increase of 52 per cent., or in five years an increase of 27 per cent. Taking the expense upon the basis of the population, which is perhaps the most correct system of estimating the expense of the country, we find that, in 1868, the annual expense was $4 per head; in 1874, it amounted to $6 per head, an increase of 30 per cent.; in 1878, it amounted to $5.75 per head, or a reduction of 7 per cent.; in 1885, we find it was $7 per head, or an increase of 30 per cent.; in 1888, we find it was $7.40 per head, or an increase of 35 per cent. That is the position in which the finances of the country stand to-day. We find that in five years Sir John A. Macdonald increased the expense $2.10 per head; that the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, during the time his Government held the reins of power, reduced the expense by 34 cents per head; and that, from 1878 to the present time, the expense has been increased by $1.64 per head. What has been the effect upon the taxpayers of this Dominion on account of this large increase? Take the amount of annual expense and base it on the ground of population, and allow the same amount which the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie collected from the people, $5.76 per head, and you will find that this Government have taken no less than $15,000,000 out of the pockets of the taxpayers and put into the Treasury. But this does not tell half the tale. Because I contend that, while the Government have taken $15,000,000 out of the pockets of the people to put into the Treasury, over $65,000,000 have been taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers which have gone into the pockets of the manufacturers of this country. I do not want it to be understood that I believe that the manufacturers have been making large profits during all this time. I believe there was a time after the National Policy came into force when the manufacturers did make a large amount of money, but that time has passed. Too much money was invested in the different manufactures of the country, and the time came when the production was greater than the country could consume. Take the cotton manufacturers for instance. We know that some of the cotton mills have had to stop. We know that for their own protection they have formed a combination and then they had to settle the amount of output, and after that they not only settled the number of yards which were to be put out in proportion to the number of spindles, but they settled the price which was to be put on the goods by means of that combination. This reminds me of a statement which was made by the Minister of Finance in his Budget Speech, that the cotton manufacturers of this country were in a thriving and prosperous condition, and he told us that they were sending their surplus products to China and Japan; but he did not tell us that, a short time ago, the cotton manufacturers of Canada held a meeting and decided to raise the price of cotton goods 15 per cent. to the consumers of Canada; so it is evident that we have to pay dearly in this country for the goods which go to China and Japan. And that is the result of the National Policy. Now, I must go on and criticise a little further the statements which were made by the Minister of Finance. If it had not been for some statements which he made, I do not believe that I would have taken the platform at this time, but the National Policy has proved to be a strange production, it has been an ever changing policy, but every change has borne more hardly upon the workingmen and farmers of Canada. I find that, in 1877, cotton clothing was admitted at 17½ per cent. In 1880, it rose to 30 per cent., and in 1889 it is up to 35 per cent. Printed cottons were at 17½ per cent. in 1877, they were 28 per cent. in 1880, and 32½ per cent. in 1889. Those are the cheap goods which the wives and daughters of the farmers and artisans of the country are to get, and the Finance Minister told us that the taxation laid lightly on those who were least able to bear it; but my lady can go and buy a silk gown and only pay 30 per cent., while the wives and daughters of the artisans and farmers have to pay 32½ per cent. on printed cotton. Then, earthenware and stoneware was admitted at 17½ per cent. in 1877, in 1888 it was 30 per cent., and in 1889 it is 35 per cent. Then we come to agricultural implements, and I make the statement again in regard to which I was contradicted before, that agricultural implements came into the country free in 1877-78. There was a clause in the tariff at that time which stated that agricultural implements which came in through agricultural societies, or for the encouragement of agriculture in Canada, came in free. Then it was the farmers' own fault if they did not get all the implements that came into the country free of duty. We had all the implements we needed down to the time that the National Policy was imposed duty free. In 1880, 25 per cent. was put upon implements; but that was not sufficient and they ran it up to 35 per cent. A waggon that paid 17½ per cent. in 1877 was put up to 30 per cent. in 1880, and now it pays 35 per cent. Then, in reference to pig iron, we find that in 1888 it paid 38 per cent. Now, just let me go on a little further. We were told that the farmers of this country pay very little taxation, that this was a policy that bore very heavily upon the wealthy classes, but that the farmer and the artisan did not require to pay any taxes, that they could live in the country without paying almost any taxes. Now, we find that earthen and stoneware pays 35 per cent., and chinaware 30 per cent. The Finance Minister also told us that the wealthy citizen could go to the States and buy a large amount of plate, and that in purchasing $500 worth, he would pay $150 in duty; but plate only pays 20 per cent. and that would make only $100 duty. He then goes to a farmer's house and examines his table, and asks what taxes he pays on his food? He says all the food placed upon his table was raised upon his own farm, and that it was free from taxation. I would ask the Finance Minister if all the food of a similar description that is placed upon the table of the farmer, is not free to the wealthy citizen as well as to the farmer. Have the rich not flour at the same rate? Have they not potatoes without duty? Butter and cheese, fowls, fruit and vegetables all free, just as well as the farmer? But what about sugar? Is the farmer not to have any sugar to sweeten his fruit or his vegetables? Does the Minister of Finance propose that the farmer shall live without sugar? And then how nicely he turned the question aside. He said there are two sorts of taxation, voluntary and involuntary. Now, Sir, it is not a voluntary taxation if the farmer purchases sugar. I was reading a work to-day in which it was stated that there is not a country in the world in which a large amount of sugar is not used; it is considered at the present time to be one of the necessities of life. I consider that in Canada to-day sugar is one of the necessities of life, and that a farmer has just as good a right to use sugar, or spices, or the other necessities of the table, as any other class of the community. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that I do not advocate for the farmer any special advantages. I do not consider that he is better than any other class. All other classes of the community are just as necessary to the welfare of the country as farmers; but being the largest class in numbers, the largest producers and the greatest consumers, and the greatest employers of labor, I hold that particular attention ought to be paid to that particular industry. Now, Sir, if the Minister had gone just a little further in trying to find something that was taxable on the farmer's table, he would have found that the table itself pays 35 per cent. duty. But he says the furniture is made out of our own lumber, it is grown in our own country and pays no duty. I tell him that furniture to-day is sold in Canada within one per cent. of the cost with the duty added, and we have got to pay that. I asked one of the largest furniture manufacturers in the western part of Ontario within the last few months, what effect unrestricted reciprocity would have upon his industry? He had a paper in his hand and he turned round, "there is a paper," he says, "I have just paid $250 duty upon furnishings that I cannot get in this country. Relieve me of that amount of duty, give me my furnishings free, and I will enter into competition with any firm in the United States, or any other country." I chanced to be in Belleville this fall, and I saw the owner of a large furniture manufacturing company. I put the same question to him, and received the same answer. I say, Sir, that a great many of our manufacturers are perfectly willing to enter into competition with the people of the United States, or with the people of any other country. Now, let us see what the manufacturers themselves said in 1878, and what some of them say to-day. I think there was a report presented to this House in 1878, of the condition of a good many of the manufacturers of the Province of Ontario. The first I will mention is a founder with a capital of $180,000. He says:

"No profit on fixed capital last year owing to bad debts and keen competition; the measure of protection they had enjoyed had unduly stimulated the industry, and the business was overdone."

That was before the National Policy was imposed, and if the protection that they enjoyed then had stimulated industry, what must it be to-day?

"Hosiery establishment in the west: too much home competition and business overdone; profits last year 6 per cent."

"Another hosiery establishment: trade fairly good; profits on capital last year 8 per cent."

"Extensive sewing-machine maker: not running on full time; satisfied last year with interest on investment."

"Agricultural implements maker in the west: making reaper harvesters and various machines; past ten months the busiest ever known; exporting largely to Great Britain, Australia and South Africa; export trade rapidly increasing."

I am only sorry that the high duties placed upon iron has put it out of the power of our agricultural implement manufacturers to pay the duty upon iron and to manufacture and export their goods successfully to other markets, as they could before the iron duties were imposed. When Mr. Massey was examined before the Combines Committee last year, what was his statement with respect to the effect that the increased duty upon iron had had upon his industry? His statement was that the increased duty upon iron in one year had caused his firm to pay the extra sum of $30,000. When the Bill was before the House, proposing to increase the duty upon iron, I wrote to one of Mr. Massey's agents and received from him a letter in which he stated at that time that it would be impossible for them to manufacture unless they increased the price of implements at least 10 per cent. This is the effect the increased duty upon iron has had, obliging every farmer in Canada to pay a price increased by 10 per cent. upon the implements he uses upon his farm. Here is another statement. James Nixon, of Ingersoll, says:

"The profits of this company last year, after making ample provision for bad and doubtful debts, were twenty-eight per cent. on the paid-up capital stock. Our usual profits were over thirty per cent. * * * There never was a more absurd cry than that manufacturers are languishing for want of protection, while the fact is the manufacturing industries, not including lumber, are to-day more prosperous than any other of the great industries of the country, with the possible exception of agriculture. It may safely be said, generally, that the manufacturers of Canada are as prosperous as are the manufacturers of any country in the world at the present time."

That is the statement of a manufacturer with respect to his industry in 1878. Now, let me read an extract or two from another class. I find that Mr. T. G. Haskett, of Peterboro', lumberman, miller and builder, was interviewed by a reporter of the Mail, and this is what he says:

"Our interests are very wide and extend to many lines of business. We are interested in wood working, flour milling, wool manufacturing, real estate, lumber, &c. An extended market, such as we should gain by commercial union, would benefit every line. I could manufacture to better purpose for 60,000,000 of people than I could for 5,000,000."

That is the opinion of one of the largest manufacturers of that part of Ontario. I will next read the opinion of a carriage manufacturer:

"The iron duties have greatly increased the price of iron, and consequently have reduced our profits, there being no corresponding increase in the retail price of the manufactured article. Some of our manufacturers here are not doing well under the protective tariff; in fact some of them have failed. Our market is too small and overstocked. We could produce a great deal more than we do without much extra expense or trouble if we get larger sales for our goods. I think I can face any competition, I do not know why I should not. If I am not as good a business man as my competitors why should the public suffer for my benefit."

Let me give the view held by the farmers in the County of Bruce. At a meeting of the Farmers' Institute, held a year ago in the Village of Teeswater, the following resolution was adopted unanimously at a largely attended meeting:—

"That in the opinion of this meeting unrestricted trade between the Dominion of Canada and the United States would be advantageous to both countries, and we desire that the same may be entered into."

That is the opinion of the farmers as well as of the manufacturers, and any hon. gentleman representing a constituency in western Ontario, who will rise in this House and state that the opinion of the majority to-day is not in favor of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, is not stating the facts as they exist. Let me now state what two respectable and educated Conservatives told me before I left home. They said: During the discussion of the trade question in 1878 we believed the Reformers of this country were fools for talking as they did; in 1883 we were not very certain about it, yet we voted for the Conservative party; but when it came to 1887, it had been proved to us beyond a doubt that the National Policy was a complete failure, so far as the farmers were concerned, and we will never cast another vote for any Government which will impose such a policy on the farmers and workmen of this country. That is not the opinion of an odd individual or two, but it is the opinion of hundreds of people throughout the western part of Ontario. I desire now to refer to a few articles adverted to by the Minister of Finance and I must say I expected that he would make a very different statement from that contained in his Budget speech, especially as at the outset he stated that his Budget speech would be characterised by candor and frankness of statement, but I was very much disappointed and thoroughly deceived in the hon. gentleman's statement. The hon. gentleman told the House that the farmers' houses were all built of their own timber, that their implements were made of timber grown in this country, and they had not to pay any duty on their implements. Does the hon. gentleman understand anything about farming or farm implements in Ontario? I was amazed that the Minister of Marine should have afterwards risen, when this point was replied to, and make the statement that the Minister of Finance did not mention implements; I was amazed to hear anyone make such a barefaced statement before this House. What did the Minister of Finance say:

"Nearly all the foods that are used by the farmer are raised upon his own farm and pay no duty; the wheat he raises he has ground at the neighboring mill, it is brought into his home and he pays no duty upon it. The home itself, the outhouses, the barns, all that is necessary in the way of housing for the work of the farm is built out of woods which grow in this country, of which we have a surplus and upon which he pays no duty."

He further said:

"The clothing for himself and his family is in many cases made from the wool which is raised by the farmer himself, or, if not raised by the farmer himself, he clothes himself and his family with the products of our mills, the raw material of which is admitted free. His lumber of all kinds, his furniture of all staple and solid kinds, his farming machinery, is made, and made to the best advantage, out of the woods of his own country."

I am astonished that any hon. gentleman occupying the prominent position of Minister of Finance of Canada should have made such a statement to go before intelligent farmers, viz.: that all their implements are made of their own timber. There is not $5 worth of timber entering into the construction of any implement except waggons, sleighs, cutters and buggies. A self-binder did not contain more than $5 worth of wood. In a mower there is only the tongue made of timber; in a pair of harrows there is no timber. Yet, the hon. gentleman tried to make us believe that all the farmer's implements were made out of his own lumber and paid no duty. I would advise the hon. gentleman to visit some of the Ontario farms and see the implements required, and before I take my seat I will state to him of what a set of implements consists, and the duties the farmer is called upon to pay. Then we have been told in regard to the ware he uses. The farmer has to pay 35 per cent. on his stoneware, the man in middle rank pays 30 per cent., but as regards the wealthy individual who can go to the United States and buy his gold or his silver plate he only pays 20 per cent. That is a specimen of the taxation at present imposed on the people of this Dominion. With respect to clothing the hon. gentleman said:

"So that, taking it in the gross, in the rough, the special articles of consumption, and of housing, and of fuel for the farmer are those of which this country produces a surplus, which are free within the borders of this country and upon which not one cent of tax is paid."

As to clothing let me say this: I am perfectly well acquainted with the laws of trade and with the condition of our farmers. It may be that years ago a farmer made his own homespun or he could take his wool to the mill and get it spun there, but that day has gone by. The farmer now takes his wool to a woollen mill and the manufacturer takes it at market price, and the farmer obtains his clothing at market prices—that is, within 2 per cent. of the cost of similar goods coming from Britain into this country, and that covers insurance and freight. So he has to pay the whole duty, and when he has paid the whole duty he has to pay 25 per cent. additional on the 35 or 40 per cent. of duty on woollen goods. Thus it is, I say, that the burdens of taxation bear very heavily on the farmers. I do not say that the farmers are begging from door to door; but the farmer's income is very much reduced by the heavy taxes he is called upon to pay. I am now going to give a list of implements used by every ordinary farmer in the Province of Ontario, and excluding a few implements that every well-to-do farmer has. I find that a binder costs $135, a mower $70, a hay rake $22, two waggons $120. In this connection just allow me to say that I have put the values on the implements at the same rate that the Experimental Farm here at Ottawa paid. I went to the Auditor General's Report and got the prices there, so that they must be the correct prices. There are also the following articles at the prices I name: 2 ploughs, $32; 2 harrows, $14; cultivator, $36; gang plough, $10; bob-sleigh, $24; drill, $75; scuffer, $16; roller, $20; fanning mill, $28; straw cutter, $45; horse power, $75; turnip drill, $15; knife grinder, $8; 2 sets double harness, $60; one set single, $64; surcingles, $4; horse covers, $4; ropes, pulleys and horse fork, $30; cutter, $10; buggy, $20; 2 stoves, $38; sewing machine, $40; clothes wringer, $6; washing machine, $16; kit of tools, $0. This amounts to $1,040. Now, what is the amount of duty that a farmer pays on all these? The duty on implements amounts to $270, and the total duty, including household implements, is $295.37, so that a farmer pays upon those articles $295.37. Now I hold that this whole set of implements that I have gone over including stoves, washing machines, and clothes wringer, will not last more than ten years on an average. If they have to be renewed every ten years, for implements of this kind the annual duty that the ordinary farmer in the Province of Ontario pays is $32.50. I put $3 duty upon twine with the $29.50 on farming implements, because I find that the duty on twine amounts to about that much. The furniture for a farmer's house costs $200, duty, $52; carpets in three rooms, $70, duty $20; clothes for family of five persons, $150, duty, $39; a barrel of sugar at 7 cents a pound, $21, duty, $8.50; coal oil, 10 gallons, at 30 cents, $3, duty, $1.24; rice, corn starch, spice, soda and raisins, duty, $2. So that $50.84 upon clothing and groceries for the house, and $32.50 on implements, amounts to $83.34 during the year. Then, we are told that a farmer can put up his dwelling house and that he has to pay no duty on the timber. I went to a hardware merchant who, every summer, supplies materials for farmers' houses and barns, and I found that for a kitchen, small parlor, two bedrooms and a little room upstairs, the hardware cost $52, and the duty amounts to $10. A common barn cost $81; duty, $16.33. Carpets, $70; duty, $20. Furniture, $200; duty, $52. Knives, forks and spoons, $10; duty, $2.50. Dinner and tea set, $30; duty, $8. Total, $443; duty, $108.83. We find that in incidental articles required, the duty on clocks is 35 per cent.; bed clothes, 43 per cent.; towels, 25 per cent.; drain tiles, 28 per cent.; fertilisers, 20 per cent.; and grain bags, 27½ per cent. I wrote to a firm that imports wire largely and I was told that the price of barbed wire wholesale in Canada was 5½ cents a pound, while in Chicago the price of the same wire is $3.85 per 100 lbs. wholesale. Wire is sold retail in Canada 6½ cents per lb., and in Chicago retail at 4½ per lb. A farmer in putting forty rods of a wire fence has to pay $5.36 more than he would if wire were allowed to come into the country duty free, and for the putting up of a quarter of a mile of wire fencing he has to pay $10.72. Now, the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries asked if the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) meant to state that the price of land had been reduced on account of the policy of the Government. Every gentleman who understands anything about political economy, or anything about the farmers' position to-day, knows that land is only worth the amount of profit that can be made out of it after all the burdens on it have been paid. Whether it be direct taxation or indirect taxation, or any other burden, the farm is compelled to pay. It has to come out of the land and it reduces the price of the land by just the amount he has to pay. The annual duty on implements is $32.50 as I have shown, and this, on a farm of 90 acres, with 60 acres of crop, amounts to 53 cents per acre, increasing the cost of raising an acre of wheat by 53 cents or a fraction over 2½ cents per bushel. That is the increased cost on account of implements alone of raising a bushel of wheat in the Province of Ontario. Now, if a farmer pays $32.50 annually for implements, capitalise that at 6 per cent. and you will find that for implements alone the price of a farm is reduced by the amount of $540, because 6 per cent. on $42 comes to that amount; thus a firm is reduced by $540 on account of the annual tax that is placed on it by reason of the duty on implements. Now, take the total duty of $33 that a farmer is compelled to pay, and capitalise it at 6 per cent. and you will find that it reduces the value of a good 160 acres of land in the Province of Ontario by $1,333; and yet hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that the farmers pay no duty, and that it does not injure them. Why, Mr. Speaker, I can remember twelve months ago that it was stated in this House that the revenue derived from a hundred acre farm in Ontario in one year amounted to only $790, and that the expenditure amounted to $720, leaving only $70 of profit to the farmer after all his year's hard labor. Now, Sir, just consider for a moment the effect of the duty on the farmer. The amount he has to pay eats up the whole of the profit he makes on his farm because in the calculation made, the duty was not included. Now, I find that the Postmaster General told us last year, in a speech he made, that the farmers of the Dominion of Canada could not be benefited by unrestricted trade with the United States, that the only article in which they would be benefited would be horses, barley, and a few chickens. That was the amount of the hon. gentleman's information. Now, let me go over a few articles that we have exported. In 1888 our total exports to all countries were $78,000,000, of which the products of the farm amounted to $40,155,656. To the United States we exported $37,300,000, and to Great Britain, $33,600,000, or $3,700,000 more to the United States than to Great Britain. In 1878, we exported to the United States, $25,245,000; and in 1888, $42,572,000, an increase of $17,327,000, or 75 per cent. To Great Britain we sent in 1878, $46,000,000, and in 1888, $40,000,000, a reduction of $6,000,000, or 15 per cent., showing conclusively that the United States is our natural market, and that our trade with that country is increasing. Now, take the amount of goods imported into Canada, and from Great Britain we find they amounted to $39,298,000, upon which we paid a duty of $8,972,739, while from the United States we imported $48,481,000, on which we paid a duty of $7,109,233; in other words, we imported $9,000,000 more goods from the United States than from Great Britain, upon which we paid $1,863,000 less duty; and yet hon. gentlemen on the Government benches call aloud about discrimination against Great Britain. Is this not discrimination? Is this not letting goods in from the United States on more favorable terms than from Great Britain? Now, take the annual average of our trade in two periods of five years each. With Great Britain, from 1873 to 1877, it was $95,665,000, and from 1884 to 1888 it was $84,300,000, a reduction of $11,365,000, or 12 per cent. The annual average trade with the United States, from 1873 to 1877, was $83,223,000, and from 1884 to 1888 it was $86,299,000, or an annual average increase of $3,076,775. Now, we have been told that the United States cannot be a market for the products of the farmers of the Dominion of Canada because they raise such large quantities of agricultural produce themselves. I was a little astonished at the hon. member for West Huron, who last year stated that the United States returns showed that the exports of agricultural produce in 1887 amounted to $485,500,000, of which the exports of beef amounted to $92,000,000. Then he said:

"I ask you, is it possible that a country that exports these quantities of agricultural produce requires the products of Canada?"

But he seems to have got a little light when he comes to the present year, for he says :

"Do they come and give us $200 or $250 for a horse just because they have an affection for us? No, Sir, it is because they want the horses, and if they did not want them they would not buy them."

He finds, Sir, that they want them this year, although there was not a market for them in the United States in 1887. Now, Sir, I just want to say that the United States, in 1888, took from the Dominion of Canada $10,406,278 worth of agricultural products, while Great Britain only took $4,292,640, leaving $6,103,638 in favor of the United States. Then, we sent to Great Britain 54,58 head of cattle and to the United States 40,047. Then, I find that in wheat, in 1888, 36½ per cent. of all we exported went to the United States and 63½ per cent. to Great Britain. The people of the United States actually come into our market to compete with other buyers for the purchase of our wheat, upon which they pay 20 cents a bushel of duty to take it into their own country. Will any hon. gentleman opposite tell me that if that duty were removed, instead of taking 777,000 bushels of wheat in 1888, they would not have taken three times that quantity. I maintain that if the duty were taken away they would have taken a much larger quantity, because they require our wheat for seed, and are willing to pay a good price for it, and everybody knows that seed from a northern country should be taken to a southern country. Now, these two articles show very clearly what benefit the farmers would derive from unrestricted reciprocity. Take eggs: We find, in 1870, during the last six months of the year, that $5,403 was the total amount paid for eggs going from Canada to the United States. Then, in 1871, when the duty was removed from eggs, and during the first six months of that year the amount had increased from $5,403 to $290,000, and it had increased in 1888 to $2,119,000, or an increase of 39,000 per cent. Take apples: We find that, in 1883, at the time the American Government removed the duty, we sent 33,700 barrels to the United States, while in 1887 we sent 103,000 barrels, and in 1888, 170,840 barrels, or an increase in that short period of 500 per cent., showing clearly that although the United States raises large quantities of eggs and apples, it would be a great benefit to us to have their market for our products. This is an example of what unrestricted reciprocity would do for Canada in the matter of agricultural products, and I believe the United States, if we had unrestricted reciprocity, would be our principal market. The duty paid to get our wheat into the American market in 1888 was $155,000, and on our barley $936,000. On horses, cattle, sheep, poultry, potatoes, hay, barley, wool and wheat, there was a duty of $2,565,000 paid to get these articles into the United States. But hon. gentlemen opposite may tell me that we would not be benefited by that, yet we remember that, in 1873, the hon. the First Minister said that when the Canadian farmer took barley over to the American side he got $900 for a thousand bushels where the American farmer got $1,000; and Senator Macpherson told us that the Canadian farmer, who took five horses worth $100 each into the Buffalo market, got only $400, while the American, who took the same quantity of horses and sold them at the same price, got the whole $500. Our farmers had to pay 20 per cent. to sell their horses in the American market. That is authority hon. gentlemen can have nothing to say against, since it comes from their own side of the House, and I hold that if these statements hold good with regard to barley and horses, they would likewise hold good in all other lines of agricultural products, because the quantities that we could send to the United States market are so small compared with the quantities they produce, that they would not have any effect in reducing the price. I hold that our farmers do not receive fair play under the present tariff. We were told by the Minister of Finances that raw material for the Canadian manufacturer, such as wool, hides and skins, and certain kinds of timber used in the making of furniture, came in free of duty, but where is there anything admitted free for the farmers? We find he has to pay duties upon tiles; we find that he has to pay duty upon fertilisers, and that in the matter of corn he is discriminated against as compared with the distiller. I hold that free corn would be a great benefit to our agriculturists. We send over 40,000 head of cattle to the United States annually to be fattened, over 30,000 of which come from Ontario, and these could be profitably fattened in our own country if we had the duty removed from corn. Our farmers to-day have to pay a heavy tax of seven and a half cents on corn. To-day, barley is selling for 54 cents a bushel and corn at 39 cents delivered in bond, and if the corn were admitted free of duty it would be a great benefit to the farmer, because it would be cheaper to feed his cattle with the corn at that price, especially as it gives 56 lbs. to the bushel whereas the barley gives only 48 lbs. to the bushel. We have heard a discussion about fertilisers, but there is no system that could give a cheaper fertiliser to the farmer than to allow him to purchase his corn free of duty with which to feed his cattle and save the manure to put on his land. The manure from a ton of corn is worth £1 11s. or $7.44 a ton, and if hon. gentlemen opposite love the farmer very much, why do they not place him on a level with the distiller and allow him a rebate upon corn, on his certifying that he has fattened with it cattle which he sent out of the country. But is any favor to be given the farmer? The time, however, is rapidly approaching when those gentlemen will feel the weight of the burdens they have placed on the farmers of Ontario; and if I do not mistake the signs of the times, the farmers of Western Canada are fully alive to their own interests. Having been deceived by the National Policy, and having found the promises made with regard to that policy have not been carried out, they are convinced the statements of the Government are not to be relied on. Take, for instance, the statement of the Minister of Finance, that all their agricultural implements are made of timber grown in the country. That was a childish statement for any hon. gentleman to put before the intelligent farmers of this Dominion, and there is not the least doubt but that they will remember this statement when they have an opportunity of going to the polls, and recording their votes. I am as well convinced as I can be of anything in the future, that just as soon as the Government of the day will give the farmers an opportunity, they will teach hon. gentlemen opposite the lesson they deserve to be taught. I was much amused to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Tupper) declare that the result of the elections of 1882 and 1887 were a complete answer to the statement of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and I was very much astonished to hear the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White) argue that the Gerrymander Act was based upon population. I was inclined to believe at first that he was uttering a falsehood, but I have come to the conclusion that his statement was perfectly correct, and that the Gerrymander Act was based on population—not, however on the numerical population but upon the political population. Take West Bruce and North Bruce. For instance, two adjoining counties. The Government found it was necessary to put a population of 25,418 into West Bruce in order to give the Grits there, but what did they do when they came to North Bruce? There they only put a population of 17,625. In East Middlesex they put a population of 24,542, and in South Middlesex 18,880; and when I come to South Huron, the constituency I have the honor to represent, I must say that I was made a member of Parliament by that Gerrymander Act. But what are the facts with respect to South Huron and the rest of the Hurons? South Huron has a population of 23,042, and there is only a population in Cardwell of 16,770. With respect to the County of Huron, I heard a respectable Conservative state that it was not Sir John Macdonald or his Government who were responsible for the gerrymander in that county, though it was true that it was gerrymandered, but he said the question was sent up there to him, and he gerrymandered it, and his gerrymander was accepted; but there is no doubt that it was only on party grounds and not, as the hon. gentleman from Renfrew would have us believe, in the interest of the country. If there is any Act of which the Government should be ashamed, it is the Gerrymander Act; and another Act of which they should be ashamed is the Franchise Act. I was surprised the other evening to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries state in his place that he was astonished at the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) make the statement he did in 1876 or 1877 that all the money borrowed or spent in this country was spent in paying investments. My mind took me back to the year 1885, when, on account of the mismanagement of the Government in the North-West, after warning following warning, after they had received all the information, according to their own statements, which it was possible for them to receive, after they had goaded a certain class of the people there by withholding the rights and privileges to which they were entitled, they had to expend over $7,000,000 of the money of the people of this country in suppressing the rebellion which took place. I should like to ask if that is a paying investment? Perhaps in one sense it was, because it may let the Government know that there is a limit to the endurance of a people in a free country, but certainly that is the only way in which they can show that it is a paying investment. I should like to ask if it was a paying investment to spend between $400,000 and $500,000 in carrying out the Franchise Act, which is such an iniquitous measure that they have not been able to have the lists revised since 1885, and in the elections which have recently taken place a great number of voters are disfranchised. Is that a paying investment? That Bill will be repudiated by the people of this country when they get the opportunity. My mind also takes me back to the License Act. I had the honor of a seat in this House when the Premier of the Dominion was warned by the leader of the Opposition not to pass that Act, until he had taken a test case and submitted it to the courts, because he would find that the Act was ultra vires of this Parliament. But the leader of the Government would not be warned, he would go on, and, after spending a large amount of money he had to go back to the position which existed before the McCarthy Act, as it was called, came into force. There is yet another question upon which a large amount of money has been spent, and yet who can tell but that was money well spent? We know that, on account of the aggression of the Federal Government, territorially and otherwise, on the rights of the Province of Ontario, a large amount has been spent in litigation; but whenever the Province of Ontario has appealed to the court of last resort, it has been proved to be right. There may be something in that in the nature of a paying investment, because it may warn the hon. gentleman that he may go too far in interfering with Provincial rights, and that there is a limit to the endurance of the people.

Mr. COCKBURN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. What is to be taken up to-morrow?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government has made an arrangement with my hon. friend opposite, as he knows, that this debate will be resumed and finished on Tuesday. To-morrow, the Government will go on with the measures on the paper, taking up those first to which it is likely there will be the least opposition.

Mr. LAURIER. Bills?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Bills.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this debate to be resumed to-morrow?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. On Tuesday.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12:25 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 15th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That, for the remainder of the Session, Government measures shall have precedence on Wednesdays, after Questions put by Members, and that the order of business for Mondays, hereafter be the order of business for Wednesdays, under Rule 19.

Mr. LAURIER. I submit that it is altogether premature for the Government to bring forward this motion at such an early stage of the Session. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Order Paper he will see that there are four or five pages of notices and almost two pages of Public Bills and Orders, and if the Government take Wednesdays it is tantamount to saying that those are to remain untouched for the present Session. I hope the hon. gentleman will not press his motion to take next Wednesday, but that he will wait for a week, or two weeks, before adopting this course. I offer these remarks in no other spirit than that of a wish to expedite the business of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. I entirely agree with the remarks of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, and during former Sessions I objected to the Government prematurely taking away the private days from the members of this House. I do not think there is any such pressure of public business as would warrant my hon. friend pressing this motion for next week. I think the hon. gentleman would do well to consider the interests of the private members who have matters to bring to the notice of the House affecting their constituencies, and I think that the motion should be let stand for at least a week more so that the Order Paper might be lessened.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The wish of the Government is not to curtail the time at the disposal of hon. members. The measures that the Government have on the Notice Paper are perhaps as important as those of private members, and if we want to have the Session closed not too late in the season, so that members may not be inconvenienced, we have to take a day more in order to finish the Session at the proper time. Hon. members have themselves spoken of Easter as the period at which they would like the Session to end, and by taking the Orders of the Day of Wednesday, on Monday, hon. members will see that they have the double advantage of having their motions during the first three hours of the sitting, and then in the evening there will be Private Bills. I think in this way the work of the Session would go on without inconvenience to hon. gentlemen. I have no doubt that the First Minister will do as he has done once or twice already.

Mr. MITCHELL. Concede to the wishes of the Opposition.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. For example, we can take unopposed notices on Monday. That was done before, but some hon. gentlemen were not ready to go on. I am sure that will give all the facilities that are possible to hon. gentlemen to bring forward their motions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think that the occasion has ever occurred before, where the Government demanded four days of the week in the sixth or seventh week of the Session. This is practically equivalent to making it impossible for any member to bring a Bill of public importance to a second reading. I may remark that I do not think the hon. gentleman will facilitate matters very much by this motion, because, as he knows, a great many more discussions are likely to take place on going into Supply than are likely if private members have time to bring forward their motions. I do not think the Prime Minister, whose memory stretches over a longer period than mine, will recall an instance in which at so early a period as the 15th of March, after the House opened on the last day of January, the Government proposed to take four whole days in the week:

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A motion similar to this was made last Session and adopted, but I must say not at such an early period of the Session. I have had some conversation with members of both sides of the House, and there seems to be a universal desire that Parliament should prorogue before Easter. Good Friday is on the 19th of April, and we would have to rise on Thursday, the 18th, or adjourn over Easter. It is because I believed that we were meeting the general interest of the House, that I proposed this resolution. In order to adjourn before Easter we must carry out three rules: first, we must have short speeches; second, we must sit very late; and, third, we must all be animated with a sincere desire to return to the bosom of our families. However, the Ministers are servants of the House, and as we all have our residences in Ottawa, it does not put us to so much inconvenience to adjourn over Easter as it would hon. gentlemen who live at a distance, and especially those gentlemen who are in business, and wish to be at the seat of their business at the opening of the season. We have gone over those notices of motions twice, and hon. gentlemen were not ready, but I suppose it often happens that at the first few weeks of the Session hon. gentlemen have not got well into harness. The motions, however, with two or three exceptions, are merely for papers, but some of them no doubt are designed as a peg to hang a speech on. If hon. gentlemen agree that I shall be allowed to move this motion on Monday next, I will let it stand in the meantime.

Mr. LAURIER. I am very glad that the hon. gentleman will let this motion stand for the present. With every desire to facilitate business, and with every desire to prorogue, if possible, at Easter, I do not think that it would be at all conducive to the public interests to have this motion carried. In addition to the three things mentioned by the right hon. gentleman, there is another also which we must not forget: we must do the business of the country, and there is a good deal of the public business of the country included in these motions. We have gone twice over the motions, it is true, and if so many are left on the paper, I do not think it is because those gentlemen were not ready, as the First Minister says, but because they desire to speak upon their own motions. There are some 30 or 40 motions relating to public matters which hon. gentlemen desire to debate before the House, and it is only fair that we should give them an opportunity to do so. I assure the hon. gentleman that it would be more conducive to the expedition of the business to let this matter stand for the present and take it later on.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. So be it.
Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not want to allow the statement to go uncontradicted which has been made by the hon. Minister of Public Works and by the right hon. leader of the Government, that the reason these notices of motion have been gone over twice has been that hon. gentlemen were not ready to go on with their motions. They have been ready with them, but they did not want them passed in silence. Those notices have been put on the paper by hon. members for the purpose of getting the documents and papers to which they relate before the House, so as to enable them to deal with the matters to which they refer. As I understand, the practice of going over the paper twice was for the purpose of passing the unopposed motions, so that the papers to which they related might be copied and sent to the House, but the motions remaining were those upon which hon. gentlemen desired to make some observations. Therefore both hon. Ministers are in error in stating that because any hon. gentleman's motion remained on the paper he was not ready to go on and discuss it. Now, we are very early in the Session yet, and while I agree that it is desirable that we should bring the Session to a close as soon as possible, there is a still higher duty we have to perform, in attending to the matters for which we have been sent here, in criticising the accounts of the Government, and in seeing that the interests of the people we represent are brought before the House. What opportunity have we had to do that? There are five pages of notices of motion alone on the paper, many of which have been there since the beginning of the Session, and it is impossible that hon. members can perform their duties to their constituents if they are foreclosed to one single day in the week, and to only a part of that day. Now, I do think the right hon. gentleman is not doing right in taking Wednesday, at all events the first Wednesday. If he would leave us next Wednesday, and take the succeeding one, I do not suppose there would be so much objection.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I do not think it would be quite right to bring this matter up on Monday or Tuesday again, because that would have the effect of taking away from us Wednesday without substituting the orders for Monday next. If it is to be brought up on a subsequent day, the motion might be made to apply after next Wednesday, otherwise the matter ought to be gone on with now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think I shall gracefully yield, and we shall only ask for the Wednesday after next.

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. AMYOT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call attention to the delay in the printing of the French translation of the Hansard. We have received it only to page 144, while the daily version has reached page 640. I have enquired, and I am told that the fault lies with the printer. The translators had translated 448 pages on the 13th of March, and they had given the printer on that day 350 pages. How is it that the same quantity has not been printed and issued to the members. I do not complain with the translation itself; I remark that this year especially it is very well made; I have read a great many of the speeches which have been translated, and have ascertained that fact. Though the translators are few in number, only nine, one of them, Mr. Beaulieu, is sick, and another is engaged in correcting proofs; but they have been able to follow the daily issue of the Hansard very closely. But we should have the translated Hansard printed; we have our rights; we represent over a million people, and we are entitled to it. For my part, I insist on it, and I hope the House and the committee will see that there is a remedy.

Mr. DESJARDINS. In answer to the question put by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), I beg to say that although the translators have been keeping up the translation, I understand that the printer has been delayed because some of the members have kept their proofs too long. He complained about that, and asked me to call the committee together, to see if some more stringent rules could not be adopted regarding members who delay delivering their speeches after correcting them, so that the printing of the translation could be kept up. Perhaps we can account for a little of the delay by the fact that the printing establishment has been newly organised, and that the printer has not all the hands that he ought to have in getting out the work. But I think there is something in his complaint that members have been keeping their proofs too long in their hands.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I think the apology put forward by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) is not exactly such an apology as ought to be offered to this House for the delay in the publication of the French edition of Hansard. It is well known that when a member gets the proof-sheets of his speech, there is a notice attached that they must be returned within 24 hours.

Mr. DESJARDINS. That is not done.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That is the rule, and I fancy that most members comply with it; and if the proof-sheets are not returned within twenty-four hours, the printer is at liberty to go on and print without the corrections. The excuse offered by the hon. member for Hochelaga, that the printer is not able to keep up with his work is, to my mind, very absurd. The Government took over from MacLean, Roger & Co., the entire plant of the printing establishment which carried on the printing of this House, and of the departments, for years, and not only that, but they have at their command thousands and thousands of dollars worth of other material which has been bought since the Printing Bureau was established. They have greater facilities now for turning out the work than MacLean, Roger & Co. ever had, and I cannot see that we can excuse the Printing Bureau for inattention to its duties in this way. If any person is to blame, it must be the department which has control of that bureau.

Mr. AMYOT. I do not want to attach blame to the department or to anyone; I do not know enough of the details of the organisation for that. My hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) has made the case a little worse, because he has evidently been humbugged by the printers. I am quite aware that if the members delay returning the corrected sheets, there must be delay in getting out the revised Hansard. But this is not the question in this instance. Once the corrected sheets are printed they go out of the hands of this House entirely and into those of the translators, who translate them, and there are over 200 pages of corrected sheets translated in the hands of the printers which are not yet printed. I only wish to draw the attention of the committee to this delay so that the remedy should be applied at once. It is unfair to French members and those who like to send out copies of the translated Hansard.

Mr. DESJARDINS. In answer to what my hon. friend from North Brant has said, I must say that the printer complained to me that he was greatly delayed in his work by the fact that some of the members had kept their proofs too long. I told him that there was a stringent rule laid down by the Debates Committee on which he should act, and that if members kept back their speeches beyond a certain delay, he should go on with the printing without waiting for the return of the corrected proofs. I understand now that he is doing that. With reference to the delay to which the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has referred, I will see that the printer is notified of the complaint.

Mr. LAURIER. As I understand it, the question of printing from corrected sheets has nothing to do with this matter. The complaint of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) is that the French translators have delivered to the printer some 400 pages of manuscript, and of that only 150 pages are printed.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I will see that the printer's attention is drawn to this.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL COMMISSION.

Mr. BARRON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to know if the commissioners appointed in regard to the Trent Valley Canal have yet made a report to the Government? A large section of the community is deeply interested in the completion of this work, and are anxiously waiting to know what the report of the commissioners is, and whether the Government is going on with the work or not. I asked the Government in the beginning of the Session if the commissioners had reported, and I was told they had not. I understand now that one of them has gone away, and that their work is done, and there is no reason why they should not have made their report by this time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would ask the hon. gentleman to renew his question when the First Minister, who now administers that department, is in his place.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 17) to make further provision respecting the speedy trial of certain indictable offences.—(Sir John Thompson.)

MASTERS' AND MATES' CERTIFICATES.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 26) to amend the Act respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships, chapter 73 of the Revised Statutes.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. TUPPER. I explained the other day the object of this amendment. It is to enable those vessels now managed by masters and mates holding port certificates to take their ships—which now they can only take to ports in Newfoundland and the United States, besides Canada—to any of the West India Islands; and I propose to add the amendment suggested by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis), by inserting the following words: "and the east coast of South America." So that those vessels may go to the ports in South America as well as to the ports in the West India Islands.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Why not say South America, and not simply the east coast?

Mr. TUPPER. If we do not draw the line somewhere, the extension will be, perhaps, hardly justifiable. In view of the fact that we restrict those vessels to the coasting trade, I think we should stop at the Horn, and I think that will be ample for all coasting purposes—certainly for those purposes which can be strictly called coasting. We are giving them quite a large district, the Gulf of Mexico, all the West India Islands, and the east coast of South America.

Gen. LAURIE. I presume the amendment of which I have given notice is covered by the amendment of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis)?

Mr. TUPPER. Yes, the resolution of the hon. member for St. John included that of the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie).

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The effect of this is, they will have to take certificates?

Mr. TUPPER. Their coasting certificates will enable them to make these voyages, just as they enable them to make voyages now to the ports of Newfoundland and the United States.

Mr. ELLIS. Do you think that form of expression will also cover central American ports?

Mr. TUPPER. I think so. Central American ports would be included in the words "on the east coast."

Mr. JONES (Halifax). And British Columbia?

Mr. TUPPER. That is now covered in the present Act as being ports in Canada.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not see much use in limitation at all. When a man can go round Cape Horn to British Columbia on one of these coasting licenses, you might as well let him go round the world.

Mr. TUPPER. There is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman says, but that is the state of the law now and has been for years.

Mr. EDGAR. I would suggest that South America should be added.

Mr. TUPPER. I do not object to that.

Gen. LAURIE. I do not think the Gulf of Mexico should be included.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the Minister made this extension of the existing laws under advice from any of the merchant shipowners? What is the real reason for this proposal? It appears to me that we are destroying any good which exists in the present law, requiring us to have as masters of ships men fitted for the position, and possessing a certain amount of knowledge of navigation. This amendment is going to take away very largely the effect of that provision. According to this, a man without any knowledge at all can sail a ship all round the coast of America, around Cape Horn, up to British Columbia.

Mr. TUPPER. Under the existing regulations as to the coasting trade, the master must have a coasting certificate, and pass an examination before he obtains it. In introducing the Bill, I explained that our restrictions in regard to the coasting trade were greater than those of almost any country in the world. These amendments have been introduced at the instance of those in the Maritime Provinces who are interested in the matter, and who represent that, unless our law is changed in this direction, the effect will be to transfer most of this coasting business to American bottoms. Captain Scott, the late examiner of masters and mates, agreed that the provisions here were too stringent for the trade, and I know that in Lunenburg and in Halifax County it was often found impossible to get a fit master for vessels engaged in the coasting trade, without a great and ruinous delay. Looking into the law, I found that in England they had no such stringent regulations, and in the United States none whatever, in regard to a master taking a vessel on such a voyage. It is, therefore, at the instance of these men who are interested in the trade, that I propose somewhat to slacken the regulations which now exist to some extent.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There is some force in the objections of my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), but he must remember that the persons who are engaged in the coasting trade have to pass an examination in order to qualify for the service. Besides, no one is going to place his property in the charge of a man unless he is satisfied that the man is able to command the ship, and to navigate her properly.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then you need have no law at all.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That may be so, but perhaps a man would be more likely to take care of his own property than to do what simply the law required. I think this extension of the privileges of these people who are almost born at sea, these captains and mates of boats along the shore running to the West Indies and other places, will be recognised to be in the right direction, and I do not see that any harm can come from it.

Mr. LOVITT. Does the amendment give any more privileges than the Bill?

Mr. TUPPER. Yes, the coast voyage will include South America and the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. LOVITT. I think there is a great deal of objection to that. There are difficulties in the navigation of the South American coast which do not exist further north. The Bill as it stands is quite enough, and I think the amendments will be unfair to the shipping industry, because men will be put on to navigate vessels without a chronometer.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). My hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Lovitt) cannot suppose that in this day a vessel will be sent to the West Indies without a chronometer. That is a thing of the past.

Mr. TUPPER. I should think that a vessel which can go through the West Indies could safely navigate the coast of South America.

Mr. LOVITT. They have a different system of navigation there. They have to go to the east in order to make allowance for the trade winds, or they would go ashore. The current there is all going one way.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is aware that for years past, without any great loss of life having occurred on that account, vessels have been permitted, and are permitted under the existing law, whether this Bill passes or not, to go around the Horn, which is the most dangerous place to navigate, and then upwards to British Columbia. This last season one vessel did clear from Halifax to Victoria.

Mr. WELSH. I object to that clause. I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Jones), and I think it is not fair for those masters who pass an examination. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine may be a very good lawyer, but I do not think that he is a very good navigator.

Mr. TUPPER. He does not pretend to be.

Mr. WELSH. I object to that. I think it is not treating past masters fairly to allow a man with a coasting license to go down to South America, where navigation is most difficult, to take a ship to England, or a ship to the West Indies? If my hon. friend will only take the trouble to ask any old sailor, he will tell him that the West Indian and South American navigation is much more difficult than taking a vessel across the Atlantic Ocean. It is not treating the past masters properly to allow any one who can obtain a license to go into the South American trade. I shall oppose this clause, decidedly. A sailing master with a fishing license and a coasting license can navigate these vessels to South America, or anywhere else.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I think this is a very useful Bill. I am not very anxious about the South American ports, but I think, so far as it applies to other ports, it is a very useful Bill and ought to pass.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Bill may be very useful, but the House must understand that by passing it they are practically repealing the law now on the Statute-book, which was passed after some consideration. That Bill declares that a man shall not handle a sea-going ship, or take charge of the property in a sea-going ship, unless he qualifies himself by passing a certain examination. My hon. friend to my left, argues that the owner of the ship has so much at stake that he will not put any but a qualified man on board. Well, the Legislature did not believe that argument was sufficient, and that is the reason that they passed the Act declaring that before a man could be qualified to take charge of a sea-going ship, he should pass a certain examination in navigation. A large number of men have gone to the expense and trouble of qualifying themselves to obtain these certificates, and if you determine that it is desirable to throw open the whole coast of America to men who have not got these qualifications, it is better to repeal the Act on the Statute-book altogether. It is not fair to say that under the existing law a vessel can go from eastern Canada to British Columbia, and then, more by accident than anything else, trade there. It was not the intention of the law on the Statute-book to permit men to navigate Cape Horn unless they passed a master's examination and obtained a certificate. It is true that they could do it, but the trade between eastern Canada and the west coast of America has been very small. I think myself, basing my opinion to a large extent on the knowledge of my hon. friend behind me, that if you dispense with a master's certificate for navigating along the east and west coast of America, you had better dispense with them for crossing the Atlantic.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). My hon. friend did not take into consideration all the circumstances. Now, this Bill will apply to the most skilled class of people along our Atlantic coast, who have been at sea all their lives. They are thorough, practical seamen and cannot be taught anything more about handling a ship in bad weather, or the navigation of a ship, and have qualified themselves by taking out a master's or a mate's certificate. From my own knowledge, I would as soon have one of these men to take charge of a vessel as many men who pass a regular examination. My hon. friend is not aware, perhaps, that of late years a considerable number of small vessels have been taken around the Cape to British Columbia by this very class of persons, and they always arrive successfully. With regard to South America, so far as I can see, it is a matter of no great importance, because, practically, we have very little trade in that quarter except with British Guiana and Brazil. We have some, of course, with Buenos Ayres and those places, but the chief ports are in the West Indies, and I do not think there will be any difficulty or danger arising under the provisions of this Act.

Gen. LAURIE. I think the matter is, to some extent, misunderstood. It appears that, under the existing law, which this Bill is intended to amend, the master of a vessel holding a coast certificate can sail from Newfoundland to New Orleans, and in that course he goes past the West Indies. We have submitted a proposition in the first place, and the Minister of Marine has submitted it to the House that he may call at a port in the West Indies, stopping, so to speak, on the road in which he is sailing; and we ask further that he may be permitted to call at ports in the Gulf of Mexico or in British Guiana. We have then the endorsement of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer), who are largely engaged in that trade, and who, owning a large number of vessels, will not run any risk that they can avoid, and they do not desire to place their property in the hands of men who are incompetent. In addition to that, under the Act, such masters are already entitled to pass to San Francisco or to British Columbia, and surely it is not unreasonable to ask that they may be permitted to call at a port on the coast of South America. I do not press that matter, but the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) has proposed it. I simply propose to include the West Indies and Central America, and I think it is very reasonable that they should be permitted to call at those ports.

Mr. LOVITT. I would ask if a man does not need as much qualification to go around Cape Horn as he does to cross the Atlantic?

Mr. SKINNER. I have information from vessel owners in St. John, who are thoroughly competent to give information in regard to this Bill, as follows:—When sailing from United States ports, masters and mates do not require to pass examinations or possess certificates. So long as we require in the Maritime Provinces larger evidence of efficiency than they do in the United States, the business is likely to pass to American ports, and I have information to the effect that, in very many instances, vessels owned in St. John would have taken on board cargoes from Canadian ports for South America, but could not obtain the required certificated masters and mates, and were compelled of necessity to have the vessel sail for an American port and take their cargoes from such port. We find, now that attention is being more directed to South American trade, than it was a few years ago, that a serious difficulty is looming up in connection with that trade in this respect. If we in Canada in regard to our coasting trade, however extensive the line of coast may be, place a heavier onus on masters and mates of vessels than they do in the United States, they will go to the United States and will ship their cargoes from New York or other ports in the States. It may be that the remarks of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Lovitt) are to a large extent correct, that it almost requires as much knowledge to go to South America as it does to cross the Atlantic.

Mr. LOVITT. More.

Mr. TUPPER. That class of vessels never wants to cross the Atlantic.

Mr. SKINNER. If it requires more skill, and it will not do to allow our masters to go on vessels without examination, because that is the effect of the argument, and the United States' laws do not require that masters and mates should be subject to such examinations, but a master or mate simply makes a certain declaration that he intends to become a citizen of the United States, which he may carry out years hence, or may never carry out, and that is being done, the effect must be to drive trade to the United States. If it requires more knowledge on the part of masters and mates to take a vessel to South America than across the Atlantic, and certificates are not required by masters and mates sailing from American ports, then the effect of the present law is to send our trade over to American ports. I placed the notice on the paper in order to bring this matter forward, because we are feeling the difficulty now, and we shall continue to feel it, and our vessels will sail from United States ports if we continue the regulations with regard to examinations and certificates. The insurance companies understand this, too. They do not require any heavier premium upon the cargoes of vessels commanded by uncertificated masters and mates than if they were certificated officers, and, of course, the shipowners are careful that they obtain proper men for the positions. It is found, by experience, that these men born, as it were, on the sea, although they may not possess the knowledge in a scientific sense required, are, in a practical sense, just as efficient, and the vessel is just as safe in their hands as in the hands of certificated officers. It must be remembered that our coasting trade is in direct competition with that of the United States. We cannot take a cargo on board a vessel and call with it at different ports in the United States, and subsequently sail to South America, and, therefore, this Parliament must be very particular in seeing that we have no heavier liabilities placed upon our masters and mates, and our vessels loading for foreign ports, than are imposed in the United States, or the Americans will beat us all the time.

Mr. LOVITT. There is a good deal of force in what has been stated by the hon. gentleman, that vessels are sometimes skilfully sailed by men who have not certificates. What I contend is that if we have an Act on the Statute-book declaring a master sailing across the Atlantic shall have a certificate, a master should also have a certificate if he is going to sail round Cape Horn. If you wipe the Act away altogether, it is all right. The contention that it takes more skill to sail a vessel to England than it does round Cape Horn, is absurd. In order to make this Act work, there must be some rule established, and if a man can take a vessel round Cape Horn, why cannot he take it round the Cape of Good Hope or to Australia?

Mr. WELSH. The Minister of Marine must be satisfied that an injustice will be done to those captains and mates who have passed examinations and obtained certificates, according to the law of this country. The hon. gentleman is now going to injure them by allowing any Tom, Dick and Harry to take command of vessels out of their hands.

Mr. TUPPER. You do not call men who command our coasting vessels in the Lower Provinces an inferior class of men?

Mr. WELSH. I know that masters and mates have to obtain certificates before vessels are allowed to sail. I have had many instances of hardship in that regard. I have had five or six vessels ready to go to England, and could not sail them until I produced certificates of certificated masters and mates. Here it is proposed that a vessel going to the West Indies, round Cape Horn, or to Brazil, shall be allowed to sail without certificated officers. That is not fair. I should prefer that the Government withdraw the Examination Act altogether than make this change. I repeat that it is not fair to those who have spent much time in studying in order to pass examinations and obtain certificates, that men should take their places who have not obtained those certificates. The examination of masters and mates, last year, cost $5,000, and I fail to see any reason for expending this money if the proposed change is to be carried out. Most of our trade is now with the West Indies and South America, and it would be better if the Government were to repeal the whole Act and do away with certificates altogether.

Mr. LOVITT. Let the matter stand as it is. It seems perfectly absurd that a master should require a certificate to go to England, and should not require one to go round Cape Horn. In regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner), with respect to masters, I can guarantee to supply him with all the masters he requires, and they will have certificates—in fact, I can supply two for every one that is wanted.

Mr. BAIRD. I fully concur in the remarks of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner). It must be borne in mind, that on the American coast, there is engaged over 6,000,000 of tonnage in their own home trade, and that the large coasting fleet is manned and commanded by a set of men who are under no such restrictions and regulations as are imposed on Canadian masters and mates. A large trade has lately opened up in the southern waters, particularly on the east coast of South America, and it is found that when Canadian vessels visit the port of St. John, although her master may be duly qualified to do a coasting business, and is every way fitted for his position, except that he does not hold a certificate, it is necessary that both he and the mate should obtain such certificate before they can have the privilege of sailing vessels from a Canadian port to South America. What is open to him? He visits, say the port of St. John, which is one of a great number of lumber shipping ports in the Maritime Provinces. He wants to load his vessel for the West Indies or South America. In order to do this without a certificated captain or mate, the vessel must be taken to an American port and sail therefrom, and vessels are now loaded at Calais, Boston or other ports, for South American ports. Our vessels are thus driven to this extremity of going abroad, and thus evading our law. We find, in some instances, that a vessel is loaded at St. John and is cleared coastwise for some American port, say Portland or Vineyard Haven, and when they reach there they have orders to sail for South America, and they thus get round the law. This requirement in regard to masters and mates passing examinations and obtaining certificates presses very severely on young men who have not received a liberal school education. Most of the masters of vessels in the coasting trade have not had the benefit of a liberal education. These young men, born on the sea, as it were, know no other business, and when they come to manhood it is found impossible for owners of vessels to employ them for lack of the certificate. It is true that a master of a vessel under a hundred tons is not subject to these regulations, and can sail anywhere he likes; but if the master is promoted to a 150-ton ship, or a 200-ton ship, then a certificate is required. At the same time he possesses most valuable practical experience. Such men will sail their vessels in the most dangerous waters from New York to Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, and pilot them among the currents with head winds and fair winds, and will strike their port of destination with remarkable precision. They often leave New York in a constant and overhanging fog, and land with with accuracy and certainty at the port of St. John, or any other port in the Maritime Provinces that they may be directed to go to. The science of navigation is very largely lost sight of in the coasting business. It is chiefly by soundings and charts that the navigation is done, and very few accidents happen. Our people find it a grievance that they cannot clear their vessels. They say that the Americans, who are in no way superior to them, take their cargoes and sail away, and as a last resort they are compelled to evade the law or to go out of an American port. They say: "We will have to change our colors, we will have to take the oath of allegiance, and then we can get to be masters of American schooners." The young man who works himself up to be a master wants to go further than a certificate enables him, and the American shipowners, knowing the worth of Canadian brain and the value of Canadian muscle, are willing to pay the price for it, and the inducement is held out to young men that if they cannot get a Canadian vessel to go abroad in they will have to get an American vessel. We ask that those restrictions should be removed, and that our young men should not be handicapped in the ocean race they have to run. Give them a fair chance and you will find that they will be all right. It may be said that we may have incompetent men under those rules, but it is not in the order of things that the owner of a vessel will send incompetent men abroad. Shipowners do not carry heavy insurance, and the merchant will not entrust his treasure on the sea if there is an incompetent man at the helm. While a man may not receive such an education as to enable him to pass this examination, yet he is perfectly well able to handle a vessel coastwise from our northern waters clear down to South America. I would urge on the Government to see that our men are not handicapped and that they have a fair chance in the race they have to run.

Mr. WELSH. I still maintain my objection to this amendment. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Baird) has represented that the coasting masters of this Dominion are men of experience, thereby inferring that the certified masters are only masters in theory. He should know better than that, because every certified master in this Dominion has to serve so many years on board ship as an apprentice before the mast. He has to produce a certificate of servitude for so many years before he can go before the board of examiners; then he has to pass his examination for mate, and, after serving so many years in that capacity, he comes up for an examination as master. I want to know if this is not better evidence of a man's experience, than by taking any man off the street who tells you a cock-and-bull story that he is able to navigate a ship. The law of the Dominion as it stands now was passed for the safety of life and property, and it costs $5,000 a year to keep that Act on the Statute book.

Mr. TUPPER. Not the Coasting Act.

Mr. WELSH. I do not mean the Coasting Act, I mean the Examining Act. You can hardly call it coasting, if you make a voyage from here, around the Horn, to British Columbia. I think that is just as difficult navigation as any part of the world. I do not think it is just or fair that men who are obliged to have a good education, who have fought their way up and who have all the experience the hon. gentleman refers to, should be put on the same level as others who have not got this education and experience. A qualified master has to go through a technical course to qualify himself for that examination; he has got to go before the board, and perhaps he has to go up two or three times to answer those questions. I wonder if the Minister of Marine has ever seen those questions. Some very nice slips have been put in the papers for the examinations under the Civil Service Act, but you had better look into some of the questions to masters when they go before this board of examiners. If you adopt this amendment you are making fish of one and flesh of another, when you should treat everyone fairly. I am a certified master myself, and I object to any man coming to take my place who has not the same knowledge or experience.

Mr. LOVITT. People sailed ships before this Bill was passed, and they will continue to do so whether it is amended or not. I have no doubt that a great many sail ships, and sail them safely, who have no certificates, but I complain that I am not allowed to choose any master I like for a foreign voyage, but the member for Queen's (Mr. Baird) wants to choose any man he likes on a coasting voyage. I ask the House, is it fair to allow a vessel to go by Cape Horn to British Columbia without a certificate, when, if a man wants to go across the Atlantic, he has to show a certificate?

Mr. TUPPER. That question has been asked by the hon. gentleman before. It seems to me that if that privilege had borne so unfairly on shipping interests, that the hon. gentleman would have been asked years ago by some one interested in the trade, to repeal the present law. I do not think that it is advisable for us on this occasion to discuss the wisdom of an Act which has been on the Statute-book for some time. I am not proposing legislation in the direction that the hon. gentleman suggested. He has had opportunities for some years of testing the opinion of this House on the repeal of the Act. It is difficult to make uniform these coasting laws, but there has to be a line drawn somewhere. In the United States they believe that the captains engaged in the coasting trade are smart enough and intelligent enough, and that the owners of the vessels are smart enough and intelligent enough too, to judge and choose men worthy enough and competent enough to conduct their vessels from port to port in the coasting trade. That is so in every country, and Captain Scott, the head of the Board of Examiners of Masters and Mates, and a man of great experience, has pointed out that our law was entirely too strict. I propose to amend that law, and in amending it I have been able to show the House that we have not as mild regulations in regard to our coasting trade as exist even in Great Britain. The British Parliament which first discussed this subject were most careful about protecting the lives of passengers, and they defined their boats as home-trade passenger ships and foreign-going ships, but, to encourage the coasting trade, they did not interfere with that trade by the regulations which they made to this extent, nor to the extent which we did some years ago. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) knows the correctness of the assertion that I made in connection with the coasting business generally. Those men who are technically unable to pass a high class examination have that shrewdness and practical experience which makes them so valuable to the merchant who owns a coasting ship. The hon. gentleman knows that this has been done, and done even in Lunenburg; they have sent to Halifax, obtained a certificated master having a high class certificate, and have put on a man who has practical knowledge and experience of the coast, and the moment the ship is out of port, the practical man has taken charge.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What conclusion do you draw from that?

Mr. TUPPER. I draw from that the conclusion that there is no danger in trusting the nautical ability and knowledge of our shrewd Maritime Province men to the same extent that Americans trust their shrewd maritime men, and I do not think any of the dangers the hon. gentleman has pointed out need be feared in this instance, especially as we are keeping within the mark of other countries which have legislated in regard to masters and mates.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Marine—although it is not in the Bill, it is germane to the subject—whether he has thought over the question spoken of the other night, of the shipping of American seamen?

Mr. TUPPER. That is rather foreign to the Bill; but I have no hesitation in saying that at present it is not in contemplation to amend the law relating to the shipping of seamen. The trouble that arose in regard to the shipping of seamen at St. John was in connection with a claim the American consul there made that American sailors should be shipped in his office, and by him, regardless of the provisions which require the shipping of seamen to be made by the master of the port. It was ascertained that the law requires a consent of the American consul at the port before there can be a prosecution, and the matter stands pretty much in that position. It has not yet been considered whether it is advisable to repeal the Act.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). May it not lead to some trouble in the United States in the shipping of our seamen?

Mr. TUPPER. We have heard of no trouble.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I have heard that it would create great difficulty in the United States if the same rule were in force there with regard to seamen on British vessels.

Mr. TUPPER. That is the danger, of course.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. member think, in view of the conversation this afternoon, that it is desirable to amend the Bill and include South America in it?

Mr. TUPPER. I intend to press the Bill as it stands, and I am glad to find it approved of by hon. gentlemen of experience on the opposite side of the House.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

THE WINDING-UP ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 98) to amend the Winding-up Act, chapter 129 of the Revised Statutes.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Will the hon. Minister explain the Bill?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Winding-up Act, of which this is an amendment, contains provisions for winding up a company which is insolvent, at the instance of the creditors, but there is no provision by which a company which is not insolvent can be wound up, although it may have lost a large portion of its capital and may desire to be wound up, and although for various reasons it may be desirable that its business should be closed. This Bill provides for the winding up of any company whose circumstances render it desirable that it should be wound up, by the same court which winds up insolvent companies.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. Minister of Justice, I think, will see that the existing Winding-up Act applies to companies which are incorporated by Acts of the Provinces since Confederation. There are certain new provisions which he includes in section 4 of this Act, and I do not see why he should not make those provisions apply to those companies which come under the Winding-up Act at present, as they certainly will not apply to those companies incorporated by the Provinces unless the language of this Act is changed. I do not know whether the Minister has any particular reason why the provisions of section 4 should not apply to the companies incorporated by the different Provinces which may be wound up under the present Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The theory is, we have no jurisdiction in regard to those companies unless they fall into a state of insolvency, and the provisions of the Winding-up Act for winding up such companies are insolvency provisions. If the companies are not insolvent, we have no jurisdiction.

Mr. EDGAR. Trading corporations are every day incorporated by letters patent in the Provinces, and they are very often wound up under the Dominion Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand that Ontario, for example, has a Winding-up Act providing machinery for winding up companies incorporated by itself.

Mr. EDGAR. Ontario has, but Quebec has not.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Nova Scotia has, and Quebec can have one if she pleases. I do not see how we can pass an Act for the winding up of a company incorporated by Provincial Legislatures, unless we can get jurisdiction over it as an insolvent company.

On section 4,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand that a corporation, the subject-matter of which we have jurisdiction over, may be, when its charter expires, wound up by order of the court at the instance of any of the shareholders?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Whether a majority or not?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That would be very awkward. There are several banking corporations in Prince Edward Island which were incorporated by the Province. Their charters will expire in the years 1890 and 1891, and it is the intention of the incorporators to apply to this Parliament for a new charter under the Banking Act. It is, therefore, possible that a single shareholder might wind up the whole institution once the charter has expired.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. A single shareholder could not prevent the application to Parliament to renew the charter, and the charter could be renewed easily before the time in which winding-up proceedings could be taken.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

On sub-section b,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Do you require a simple majority of the shareholders, or a majority in value?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would let that stand over.

Mr. EDGAR. Sub-section e appears to be taken from the English Act, and that clause has been taken to mean that these cases are only those mentioned in the previous part of the section.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think sub-section b makes it safe enough, because the way in which the owners are to vote is prescribed by the charter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then, it would be possible for a minority in number and in amount, constituting a majority at the meeting, to wind the company up?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Quite so.

On section 5,

Mr. EDGAR. I cannot see any reason why the application should not be made in some cases by creditors. Here it is limited to the company or a shareholder.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. When the company is insolvent, the creditor has the right under the present law. This Act is intended to provide that, when the company is solvent, that can be done by the company or by a shareholder. I do not see why we should give a creditor the right to wind up a solvent company.

On section 6,

Mr. EDGAR. We have cases where the head office is not in Canada at all, and this section should be amended to provide for such a case.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection to that.

On section 11,

Mr. EDGAR. That seems to be a very strong provision. I do not know whether there is any reason for it. It is giving very unusual power to the judges, who may not only act at discretion, but dispense with all notices.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Under the present Act a notice has to be given.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. At a very large expense.

Mr. EDGAR. I think that section is a great improvement on the present law, which had a notorious case of winding up under this Act, recently, in Toronto, in which the liquidators had to make special application to the court, and there were about fifty counsel, sometimes, who were moving without any responsibility.

On section 15,

Mr. EDGAR. That merely enables the liquidator of his own motion to make objection to a claim, whereas one of the creditors could do so before.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. At present the creditor, contributor, shareholder, or member, may object.

On section 16,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The section this is to amend, has given rise to a good deal of litigation.

On section 20,

Mr. EDGAR. I know that the Master in Ontario believes that he is exercising a purely voluntary part of his duty when he accepts anything under this Dominion Act. He thinks that his time and services are engaged by the Provincial Government, and as he is paid by the Provincial Government he assumes that he should give his whole time to the duties of the provincial court. I know that he has a strong conviction that having been, as he happened to be within the last year, engaged for the greater part of his time in carrying out the provisions of the Dominion statutes, that he has been doing it merely as a matter of course to the Dominion Government.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would be sorry to remove that impression from his mind. As long as he has the idea that he is doing this as a matter of grace and a matter of patriotism, he can at least hope for his reward in the next world.

Mr. EDGAR. Probably something in this world might come too.

Committee rose and reported.

CULLERS' ACT AMENDMENT.

Committee on Resolutions (p. 469) to assimilate and amend the laws in force in relation to the inspection, culling and measuring of timber.—(Mr. Costigan.)

House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. Minister has not, so far as I am aware, explained the objects of these resolutions.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The object of this Bill is to meet what I believe to be the general feeling of the House, with regard to the great cost of administering the Cullers' Act passed many years ago. On every occasion when I have had the honor of discussing the Estimates, in regard to the culling of timber, the attention of the House has been called to the large deficits in the receipts as against the expenditure. Of course, those hon. gentlemen who have taken an interest in that Act, know that it was passed many years ago to deal with a condition of trade which does not at present exist. At that time the whole timber trade of this country, affected by the Act, consisted in getting out square timber and exporting it to the old country. Since that time the proportion of square timber to other lumber exported from the country has become very much reduced, and it has been felt that the Act required very important changes. At the very time I took charge of the department, my attention was called to the imperfections in the Act as it stood, and gentlemen interested in the lumber trade made representations, from time to time, as to the changes which ought to be made. Of course, this particular branch of the service differs from any other. It is under the control of the Dominion Government, so far as the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec are concerned, for the reason, I presume, that at Confederation, this Act was found in operation, and it was simply continued in those Provinces, while the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had a system of culling and measurement which they have continued to enforce up to the present time. The first object in endeavoring to obtain a thorough change with regard to the inspection of lumber, was to try to get the consent and co-operation of those Provinces which did not come under the Cullers' Act. With that end in view, I got Mr. Patton, the chief supervisor at Quebec, to visit the Lower Provinces, in order to ascertain if an arrangement could be made for amending the law so as to make it uniform in all the Provinces, and thus reduce the expense. His report left upon me the impression that the gentlemen whom he met, and to whom he broached this subject, were afraid that the proposition would be an encroachment on provincial rights, and therefore did not entertain it favorably. The law continued to be administered as it always has been; but last Session I think it was expected by the House that some change should be made. During the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, a reduction was found necessary in the staff of officers, which had grown beyond the requirements of the service; and further reductions were made a couple of years ago, yet the expenses continued to be out of all proportion to the receipts. Therefore, the commissioner has spent a great deal of time in preparing this Bill, with the aid of such advice as he could get from the Department of Justice, and after consulting with gentlemen of experience in the lumber trade. It is proposed that the Bill shall have the character of a general inspection Act, and the carrying of it into operation will be optional. That is, the Bill will provide a means for culling and measuring timber and lumber of all kinds throughout Canada, but it will only come in operation in any of the Provinces by proclamation. It is very likely that it will immediately go into operation in Quebec and Ontario, where there is no other law to replace it; but other Provinces will have to be consulted, with the view of making it acceptable, and arranging the details, before it can be brought into operation in them. With regard to the powers taken by the Government under this Bill, I thought it would be more acceptable, and more in the public interest, if such powers were those necessary for the administration of the law. This Bill proposes, for instance, that the Province of Quebec and the Province of Ontario will each form a district; and I think the Maritime Provinces together, are to form one district. In each district there will be a chief inspector, and what are termed inspectors will replace the officials we now call cullers and measurers. There will also be a board of examiners for each district. The salaries of the different chief inspectors and the boards of examiners are the only salaries to be provided for by Parliament. The payment of the inspectors will be by fees, provided for under regulations to be made. The board of examiners for each district are to frame the regulations with regard to measurements and with regard to fees, subject, of course, to the approval of the Governor in Council. That, I believe, will be an acceptable feature of the Bill, because the board of examiners, with the chief inspector, will have an opportunity of consulting the whole trade within the district, and getting such information as will enable them to frame regulations in accordance with the requirements of the service, as well as to recommend a scale of fees that will be just and fair.

Mr. LAURIER. Do you intend to abolish the office of supervisor of cullers?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes, the whole office and staff at Quebec is abolished. We abolish the whole system, and it will be replaced by the one proposed by this Act.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What additional expense will there be?

Mr. COSTIGAN. This will only be brought into operation in the two Provinces immediately. But supposing it were brought into operation at once all over the Dominion, the whole cost the Dominion Parliament would have to provide for would be $11,600 against the fees to be paid, but supposing you got no fees, all you would have to pay would be $11,600, which would be a great saving on the amount we now have to pay.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How much do we pay now?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Last year the Estimates showed about $40,000 of expenses, and the revenue does not exceed $15,000.

Mr. LAURIER. The total expenditure was $57,000.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Of course, one portion will always remain a charge on the country, and that is the amount due to officers retired. But take the amount of pay of the cullers each year, it is over $20,000. Then there are the salaries of the permanent officers in Quebec, Montreal and Three Rivers, which will amount to $15,000 or $16,000.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman expects to make a saving?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Certainly. This is principally to meet the serious objection made by Parliament on the unsatisfactory condition of the Act. We were spending $40,000, without speaking of the men whom we had retired.

Mr. EDGAR. Provision is made for retiring a lot more?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman knows that, in dealing with a question like this, some provision has to be made in order that, while looking after the public interest, we do not sacrifice the interests of men whose services, through no fault of theirs, are being dispensed with. Under the provisions of this Bill, the men who will do the work formerly done by cutlers will be the inspectors. I propose, as far as I can, to get the work done under the new Act by the old officers. All who can be utilised will be utilised to discharge the new duties under the new Act, and some provision will have to be made for the retirement of those who cannot be utilised.

Mr. LAURIER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to propose to deal with the inspection of timber in somewhat the same manner as the inspection of leather and flour is dealt with? Will there be a board of examiners whose duty it will be to appoint inspectors of timber, as at present there is in Montreal a board of examiners to appoint inspectors of flour and leather, and will the inspection of timber take place in the same manner?

Mr. COSTIGAN. On the same principle.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand also that the hon. gentleman will dispense with the whole office in Quebec, which includes the supervisor of cutlers, the deputy supervisor, the cashier and several clerks.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. But that they will be retained under the new Act.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The whole office will be replaced by this law, and this law does not provide for the continuance of the supervisor of cutlers or of his office. It will have the effect of wiping out all the existing officers under the old Cutlers' Act. Provision is made to utilise the services of every man now in the service whose services may be required. If it be found that a certain number cannot be utilised, then the Bill provides that, so far as these officers are concerned, the fees collected in the districts of Quebec and Ontario will be kept separately in order that any portion of the moneys that may be taken out of the fees shall be taken from these two Provinces to meet the charges that properly belong to them—that is, the superannuation of these officers. They do not come under the Superannuation Act, but there is a special provision for their superannuation.

Mr. GILLMOR. I understand that this system at Confederation was taken under Dominion management rather than the local, and that changes are now necessary from the altered condition of the lumber business. Is it proposed to extend this system over New Brunswick? I would like to know if those engaged in the lumber business in New Brunswick, have expressed any wish to have the system extended to that Province? I have been surprised that the Dominion Government should manage this matter at all—these slides and dams, and the regulating of the surveys of lumber. There is a system established in New Brunswick which provides for the inspection of lumber, under which certain authorities appoint certain persons as surveyors, from year to year, to survey cargoes of lumber. It involves no expense to the Province at all, because the costs all come out of the parties selling and purchasing. Instead now of getting rid of this objectionable feature as regards the two Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, it is being extended to all the Provinces. It may be an improvement that these commissioners should come down to New Brunswick and look into this matter, but I think it is a matter that ought not to be taken cognisance of by this Parliament at all, so far as New Brunswick is concerned. If the Government can get rid of it in Quebec and Ontario, and throw it into the hands of the local authorities, who know more about it than anybody here, that would be an improvement, and that they should do instead of extending this objectionable arrangement over the whole Dominion. It is like creating another department in the Government. It is no small matter to regulate the appointment of surveyors and cutlers all over the Dominion, and commissioners to travel all over the Dominion. That can be better looked after by the local authorities.

Mr. SKINNER. If the law were extended to New Brunswick, what would be the taxation on our business there?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I do not understand that the inspection fees are to be compulsory. I understand that the Government propose to appoint inspectors, in addition to the chief inspectors, for whose services a tariff of fees will be fixed, but I do not understand that it will be compulsory on the trade to employ those inspectors unless they choose. If I am wrong, I hope the Minister will correct me. But if they are employed by any person engaged in the trade, a certain tariff of fees will be paid to them. I would like to enquire of the Minister of Inland Revenue whether the classification of different kinds of lumber is to be left to the board of examiners, or recommended by the board to the Government and authorised by them? I have not heard from the Minister that there was any provision to be made for that classification.

Mr. LAURIER. It is provided by statute.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). It was provided by statute, but I understand that those Acts are to be repealed, and, if so, there must be a new classification made, and the mode in which that classification is to be made is of great interest to those who are engaged in that trade. I would also like to enquire whether I am right in supposing that the employment of the inspectors is not to be compulsory but optional?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is nothing compulsory about the Act. It provides the machinery for this service, but it is not intended to force it upon any one, even upon my own Province about which my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) seems to be so uneasy. The Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia already have laws for the inspection of timber, either manufactured or raw, but here this has been carried out for many years under an Act of Parliament. The hon. gentleman says it is easy to wipe that provision out, but something must remain in its stead. So far as the classification and the inspection are concerned, the whole Bill is framed in order to guard the interests of the producer, the manufacturer and the exporter of lumber.

Mr. LAURIER. What about the classification of timber?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The moment a district comes under this Act, a board of examiners and a chief inspector are appointed, and it is their duty to get the information required. The most difficult point in the past in regard to the classification has been to get that information, but that board will make the classification, which will simply be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I do not think any necessity has been shown for this Act, and we should have further information upon it before it is passed. It is clearly intended, if it passes, to put a number of people on the permanent staff, and we know what that means when once they are there.

Committee rose.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No 99) to incorporate the Three Rivers and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Riopel.)

Bill (No 107) respecting the Wood Mountain and Qu'Appelle Railway Company.—(Mr. Macdowall.)

CULLERS' ACT AMENDMENT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on resolution.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. COOK. I did not hear the full explanation made by the Minister of Inland Revenue in regard to the resolutions which are now before the Committee, but I entered the House when his explanation was partially made, and I understood him to say that the resolutions were not compulsory, that they were so framed that any lumbermen who did not wish to avail himself of the opportunity of putting money into the pockets of the Government without obtaining any adequate return, would have the privilege of not doing so. I should like to ask the Minister how he proposes to pay the inspectors, for the inspectors will have to be paid pretty large salaries and their expenses in travelling from mill to mill, which is the most expensive way of travelling in those parts of the country where there is not railway facilities. They will have to make inspection of the lumber at the mills, and then they will have to leave their payment to the Minister's mercy. After reading the resolution, I entirely disagree with the proposition laid down by the Minister of Inland Revenue. The wording of the resolution is distinct. It says that every manufacturer of lumber "shall" pay—the word "may" is not used—to the Crown an annual registration fee of $2, if his annual output is less than 1,000,000 feet, and $10 when the output is greater than that quantity; and in addition one-fifth of one per cent. per thousand feet, board measure. That means one cent for every 5,000 manufactured, or $2 for every million. If a man manufactured 20 millions at his mill, which many of the mills at Ottawa and other places do, he will be compelled to pay $50. I do not believe there are many lumbermen that would pay that amount voluntarily. I think the Minister misconceives his own resolution. The result of this resolution, if carried out will be to repeal the old Act, to abolish the office at Quebec, and to superannuate every officer there; new officers will be appointed, or the same officers, with a superannuation fee, as has been very frequently done by the present Government. I do not think there is any necessity for the Bill. I do not understand that the Minister proposes to introduce a Bill such as once prevailed in the State of Michigan, by which the Government regulated the grades of lumber so as to have an equal inspection throughout the whole of the State. If he had undertaken such a thing, there might be some reason for a proposition of this kind; but I can see no reason and no object why the hon. gentleman should wish to have the office at Quebec abolished and levy a tax on the lumbermen at large, a direct tax. It is only a short time ago when the charge was hurled across the floor, to hon. members on this side of the House, that we wanted to impose direct taxation on the people. Could you have more direct taxation than this? What do you call direct taxation? Hon. gentlemen opposite have hurled epithets at hon. members on this side of the House with this idea—it was all in their own imaginations—that we were adopting some means by which to place direct taxation on the people. Is this the thin edge of the wedge which hon. gentlemen opposite are contemplating with regard to the question of direct taxation? It looks very much like it. They have squandered the revenues of the country and are looking round to see where they can raise more money with which to carry on the Government, and they now swoop down on the poor lumberman. Lumbermen have as much as they can do to take care of themselves without paying tribute to the present Government. I hope the hon. gentleman will abandon the resolution, it is certainly not a popular measure, and I would not wish the hon. gentleman to pass a measure that would not meet with the approbation of the lumbermen at large. I am satisfied that the lumbermen at large do not favor it; I do not know what lumbermen or other gentlemen the hon. gentleman opposite consulted; but I asked some questions when entering upon my legislative duties at the commencement of the Session.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman says "lumbermen or gentlemen." I believe the two terms are synonymous.

Mr. COOK. In conversation with some gentlemen engaged in the lumber trade at the commencement of the Session, I was about to state, when I was interrupted by that Shanghai from the North-West.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, Oh!

Mr. COOK. In conversation with some lumbermen and other gentlemen who are members of this House, and supporters of the Government, I could get no information further than that the Bill was not to be compulsory, that the office at Quebec would be abolished, but they did not say that the Government proposed to appoint inspectors. I should like to know from the Minister of Inland Revenue how he now proposes the inspectors shall perform their duties? Are they to travel from mill to mill to obtain the desired information? Are the lumber merchants to make returns to the Government, and if they are, on what condition—is it to be voluntary on their part or compulsory? I should like to know from the hon. gentleman whether, if the returns be compulsory, they will be made under oath? and I should like to know, further, and above all, whether his measure is within the jurisdiction of this House? I would like to know if he does not consider that it is a question entirely for the Provinces? It is all very well for the Government of the Dominion to have their office at Quebec, because they were administering both the Quebec and the Ontario side. The institution there was established before Confederation, and even if it was a provincial institution no one objected to it. If we all this time have been doing an illegal act, it is no reason why we should perpetuate that illegal act. We know that the Crown Timber Office in the city of Quebec, is somewhat under the control of the Governments of Ontario and Quebec, as well as under the Dominion of Canada, for they all share the responsibilities and pay their portion of the expenses. These are matters of very great concern, and matters which the Minister should very cautiously guard. I am afraid he has not consulted the lumbermen of this House, or of this district, because, if he did, I am sure that the lumbermen, as a rule, would not give their consent to have more taxes put on them at the present time. God knows they are taxed enough now. Everything used by the manufacturer of lumber is taxed, the saws are taxed, the axes are taxed, the flour is taxed, and the necessaries required from the grocery are taxed. I may state that Mr. A. H. Campbell, who is a very strong supporter of the gentlemen on the other side of the House, when they inaugurated the National Policy, stated that the lumbermen would be taxed to the extent of a dollar and a quarter a thousand by this policy, but the Government are not satisfied with that and they now want to put direct taxation on the lumber. It is a question, to my mind, if the matter will stop here. It is a question, to my mind, if the Government will not in a short time, probably after another election, tax wheat and the produce that the farmers grow. I would like to have an explanation from the hon. Minister in reference to the questions I have asked him.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I will endeavor, as far as I can, to give answers to the questions of the hon. gentleman. In the first place I may say that he has covered a good deal of ground in his observations, and he has criticised my observations very extensively. He says that he differs entirely with me when I discuss the point as to whether the proposed Inspection Act, which is to follow this resolution, is compulsory in its character or not. I stated to the House that the inspection under the proposed Act would not be compulsory, and that is the principle that has been adopted in regard to other matters under the General Inspection Act. The saw mill men will be called upon to make a return of the season's produce.

Mr. COOK. Will that be under oath?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It will be by declaration, and these returns will form very useful statistics for the country. As regards the constitutional question: Whether this House has a right to deal with the subject or not, I took the only means at my disposal to ascertain that fact, and it has been decided by the Minister of Justice, that it is entirely in our power to legislate on that matter; but I am not going to the full scope of the powers of this Parliament to introduce a measure to take effect at once, and to say to the people of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia: "We will pass this law, and we will force it on you whether you like it or not." The proposed law is entirely voluntary.

Mr. COOK. Is it voluntary for every individual lumberman?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes; that is the principle we follow with regard to fish inspection and other matters, that no man should be compelled to pay the inspection fee, unless that fee produced an equivalent in value. If he thinks the inspection is good, and will enhance the value of his property, then it is to his interest to pay the fee, but he is not compelled to submit to it unless he believes it is to his interest to do so.

Mr. COOK. Do you intend to inspect in grades?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes; but the grades will be fixed on representations made by the board of examiners, who will be selected from experienced men in the trade and whose ideas will be acted upon. We do not take power to fix those grades, but we want to leave it in the hands of men who have experience.

Mr. COOK. If they do not take advantage of it, how are you going to pay the inspectors?

Mr. COSTIGAN. We do not pay the inspectors at all; we do not pay the leather inspectors now or any other inspectors under the General Inspection Act. If they are not employed they get no fee, and it is not proposed that the country should provide a salary. In the old times, when the Bill was first introduced, those cullers were all paid fees, and, if my memory serves me aright, there were no salaries. After a while times got dull, and by-and-bye the timber was lessening, and those men said they could not continue on the fees. Some of them would not get any employment at all, some of them would get more work than they could attend to, and after a while they were put upon a salary. This Bill does not provide to pay any salary except for one inspector for each whole district, and the examiners are paid a sum not exceeding $10 a day. The salaries to inspectors and to the board of examiners will be amply met by this inspection fee, and that is what this is for. The other fees that will be levied for the inspection, culling and measurement of timber, are to be fixed after consultation with the trade, with a view to make it just what will cover reasonable fees to the inspectors, which inspectors represent the present cullers.

Mr. COOK. I suppose the meaning of the $2,000 a year is that if the inspector should make by his fees $3,000 a year, the difference would go to the Government and he could only claim $2,000.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am afraid I have not made myself clear to the hon. gentleman. That salary is for the inspector appointed for the whole district.

Mr. COOK. He gets that anyway.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes, that is his salary; but he gets no fees at all.

Mr. COOK. How many districts will there be?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is proposed to make three of the Lower Provinces, if they should come under the operation of the Act, one district, and in the Province of Quebec and Ontario there will be an inspector for each.

Mr. COOK. Do I understand you to say that he will not be paid out of the consolidated fund?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The salaries will be paid, but they will be covered by fees which will meet that expense.

Mr. KIRK. It appears to me that in this matter the Government are taking powers that I think they should not ask the House to give them. I have no doubt so far as I am concerned that the Government or Parliament have the power to pass this law, because I am aware of the fact that the British North American Act gives this Parliament power to raise money by any mode or system of taxation. This is simply another mode of imposing taxes on the people. The hon. Minister says that it is not to be compulsory—that it is not to come into force until the Government declares it to be in force. I think we have too many laws of that kind on the Statute-book already. We have a law which regulates the keeping of sawdust out of the streams in this country, which is to come into force when the Government thinks proper. It has been decided by the Government, I understand, to bring that law into force, and it is understood in some parts of the country that it is in force, and again that it is not in force. It is held over the heads of the people, so that they are kept in terror, and very likely it will continue to be held over their heads for the purposes of the Government in election times, and very likely this law will be used in just the same way. I am sorry I was not in my seat when the hon. Minister made his explanation of this resolution; but, if I understand it, it is to apply to all the Provinces. Now, this Government has never had control of the culling of timber or the surveying of lumber in the Maritime Provinces, especially in Nova Scotia. That has been a matter entirely in the hands of the local authorities, and, so far as I know, no complaint or inconvenience has resulted from that arrangement; and why the Minister thinks it necessary for this Government to take charge of that business now I do not know. I think he ought to be able to give good reasons why he asks this Parliament to give the Government that power. Now, if I understand this resolution, it means that every manufacturer of timber or lumber shall pay an annual registration fee of $2, besides a certain fee for all the lumber and timber he manufactures. I understand that it will affect not only large lumber dealers, but small ones as well. In Nova Scotia, at least, there are a large number of farmers who go into the woods in the winter season to manufacture square timber for sale, and according to this Bill, before they manufacture 100 tons of timber, they must first pay a registration fee of $2 to this Government, besides which they must pay one-tenth of one cent for every ton of timber they make. This is something new under the sun, so far as the people of Nova Scotia are concerned, and something which I believe they will resent. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook), has spoken of the heavy taxes the lumbermen have to pay at present; he said what is quite true, that the National Policy has placed heavy duties on articles which they consume, and I think it is hardly proper for the Government to place more taxes upon them. I do not like the idea of putting a law on the Statute-book, and giving the Government power to bring it into force or not, as they please. If we are to have a law, let us have it; but do not leave it dangling before the eyes of the people. As I believe this law will be burdensome, I will oppose it.

Mr. IVES. I would like to enquire of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue whether it is his intention to make this inspection apply to logs as well as to sawn lumber and hewn timber, and whether he proposes that these inspectors may be called upon, in case of any difference between the lumbermen and the party from whom he is purchasing logs, to survey or measure them—whether the inspectors are to act as a board of arbitration which either party may force the other to accept in case of difference as to the measurement of logs?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Of course, the Act is compulsory on the officers if it is brought into operation. If the inspector is called upon, it will be his duty to make an inspection and classification. In case of dispute, the Bill provides for a reference to the chief inspector. It is prepared with a great deal of care to meet the case the hon. gentleman speaks of.

Mr. IVES. That is not quite the point. The lumberman as a rule has his own scaler, and as a rule there is no difficulty; but occasionally the party who sells the logs thinks he has not received proper measurement, and what I want to know is whether in that case the seller can force the purchaser to submit to a survey and measurement by the Government culler, and whether the buyer or the seller would have to pay the culler, or whether the fee is divided?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I understand that if an operator sells his lumber without professing to sell it under the measurement provided by this law, it is a question of mutual agreement between the buyer and the seller, and the Government officer has nothing to say in the matter at all. That is in keeping with the fact that the Act is not compulsory.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The objection I see to the Bill is, that it is going to saddle four permanent officers on the country at a salary of $2,000 a year each.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Not necessarily.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). We know what the result will be. There is no doubt that it has been considered in all its effects, and that the Government have already some people in their eye, who will fill these positions very well.

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is not the slightest foundation for that statement.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). We know from our experience in this House, that these appointments will be made before many months elapse. Then, I do not understand how this law will work in the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman says there will be one inspector for the three Maritime Provinces. Well, suppose Nova Scotia accepted the law, while New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island did not, then I suppose the Government would appoint an inspector. I do not know by what machinery it is to be accepted by the Provinces. Who is to be the judge that they require it? Can the hon. gentleman inform me how he is going to come to a conclusion that they require this Act in the Province of Nova Scotia? Will it be on the representation of one lumber concern, or two, or half a dozen, when there may be just as many opposed to it? I do not see how the hon. gentleman is going to arrive at any conclusion as to the necessity of appointing an inspector in that one Province. That would be the chief difficulty; and when he had the inspector appointed, I do not understand whether those who are not satisfied to come under the operation of the Act would be bound, the moment the inspector was appointed, to come under his control. That would take from them all freedom of action in the matter. Our present arrangement is very satisfactory, and before such a hard and fast Act as this is placed on the Statutes, the hon. gentleman should have been able to show the House that representations have been made to the Government as to the necessity of this action. In Nova Scotia the measurers of lumber are appointed by the county councils. They are sworn, and are employed and paid by the mill owners. They have no other salary, their action is always approved of between the merchant and the lumberman, and in that way there is no friction or difficulty whatever; but if we are to have a Dominion officer coming down there and telling the lumberman to stand to one side, that he is to be the judge, there will be difficulty. The hon. gentleman should show on what representations he proposes to bring the Act in force and whether it is to be binding on the majority, because the minority may ask for the operation of the Act.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman cannot have heard my statement before. Supposing that New Brunswick unanimously asked for this Act to be put in operation there, it would not be compulsory on a single individual so far as measuring, culling, or classification is concerned.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the rules made by the boards of examiners in the respective districts be uniform throughout the Dominion, or will rules be made applicable to each district?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is one of the objects of the Bill. I think it would be impossible to frame any classification of lumber for the Dominion that would apply to the different localities throughout the country, and it is intended that the chief inspector and the board of examiners for the district in which they are acting shall recommend the classification best calculated to serve the interests of that particular district. The hon. gentleman will agree with me, that the actual classifications in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec differ widely. The more satisfactory way of dealing with the question is to have a classification framed for the particular district to which it applies.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would Ontario be included in one district?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Ontario would be one and Quebec another.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). There seems to be on the other side of the House a good deal of difference of opinion with regard to this matter. Speaking from the standpoint of one who has a knowledge of the workings of the Quebec office, which more especially affects the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, I may say that no serious objection, as far as the square timber men are concerned, is had to the operations of that office. The working of the office has been tolerably satisfactory to everybody engaged in the square timber trade, both manufacturers and purchasers; but I have heard for some years past, and notably last year from the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the complaint that in the carrying out of the operations of the Quebec office, the consolidated revenue was drawn upon, and the people outside the trade altogether taxed to the extent of $25,000 to $30,000 a year for the purpose of keeping up that office. I understand the introduction of this resolution, and the Bill to be based upon it, is to get over the objection that other persons than those engaged in the lumber trade are called upon to contribute towards the expenses of an office so directly in the interest of that trade. In carrying out that object, the Minister of Inland Revenue has deemed it expedient, from the information I presume he has obtained from other Provinces, to place a uniform law upon our statutes applicable to the whole Dominion; and, as he has stated, it is proposed, not that the whole Dominion should be one district, but that separate districts should be established in the separate Provinces, and that a chief inspector should be established for each of those districts. As I understand from the explanation of the hon. the Minister, there will not be at the utmost more than six chief inspectors appointed altogether. That will involve an expenditure of say $12,000 in addition to what may be paid to the board of examiners in the different districts. That will, at all events, be a saving to the country, even assuming that the payment to those inspectors should be taken out of the consolidated revenue altogether. There will no doubt be made the objection which has been made by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook) to the proposal that a registration fee shall be charged, and a fee on the output of the lumber, but, as I understand the hon. the Minister, that fee is necessary for the purpose of providing machinery which, whether it be used extensively or not, will be in the interests of the lumberman, because it will be competent for any person selling or purchasing lumber to say: If your inspection is not what we conceive it ought to be, we will agree to leave the matter to the inspection of one of the Government inspectors; so that while this tax may appear to be somewhat onerous and to bear somewhat heavily upon the lumber trade, the corresponding advantages that will be obtained by having some authoritative tribunal to whom disputes will be referred will be a sufficient advantage to counterbalance the charges that are proposed. But it seems to me that this proposal is not entirely equitable in its terms. I find it is provided that a registration fee of $2 shall be charged each manufacturer, and, in addition to that, it is proposed that if the annual output of the mill is less than 1,000,000 feet board measure, there will be a charge of $2 and an annual registration fee of $2 charged for where the output is less than 1,000,000 feet. And if you go beyond 1,000,000 feet the registration fee will be $10. It seems to me that there ought to be a gradation of the registration fee. The charge up to 1,000,000 feet should be $2; then, if the production is 5,000,000 feet, it should be $4; 10,000,000 feet, $6; 20,000,000 feet, $8, and over 20,000,000 feet, $10. It seems to me that that gradation of the registration fee would be more acceptable and less objectionable than to make an absolute charge of $2 on all outputs of less than 1,000,000 feet, and of $10 on all over that amount. It has been objected that, where a mill produces 20,000,000 feet of lumber, there would be a charge, under this resolution, amounting to $50. That is quite true, but that is not an excessive charge for the advantages which would be conferred.

Mr. KIRK. What advantage would be conferred?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I have endeavoured to point out, that where disputes occur, there would be a governmental authority, or, at all events, a tribunal clothed with all the authority the Government can give it, to which these disputes will be referred.

Mr. KIRK. Does the hon. gentleman suppose it is necessary to have salaried officers at $2,000 a year each, to decide differences which may possibly arise between lumber dealers and their scalars?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). My hon. friend will see that, under the present system, the people are called upon to pay $25,000 or $30,000 a year, and that has been objected to. Under this system which is proposed, even if you did tax the people, there would be a saving of a considerable amount of money; but as I understand the proposition of the Minister of Inland Revenue, it is that, whilst it is proposed to have these inspectors, no one will deny that it is desirable, if we have a number of licensed inspectors, to have some authority over them, someone who will be responsible to the Government for those licensed inspectors.

Mr. LAURIER. I would ask, simply for information, does the hon. gentleman believe that there should be compulsory inspection?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). No; I do not hold that there should be compulsory inspection.

Mr. LAURIER. Then, if there is to be no compulsory inspection, if it is to be purely voluntary, what reason can there be to appoint an inspector at such a heavy salary, or at any salary at all?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I was just coming to that. There may be cases where inspectors holding annual licenses and authorised and required to inspect when called upon, might be guilty of some malfeasance of office, then they might do something which should deprive them of their licenses, and it seems to me that there ought to be some head to those officers who may be able to report to the Government the reasons which would justify them in taking away the licenses which enable these men to collect fees. That is one reason as it seems to me—and there may be other reasons—why the lumber trade might be fairly called upon to pay the salaries of the inspectors as proposed by this resolution, so that some supervision may be had over the men who are to be authorised to collect fees, provided they are employed. I do not believe there should be any compulsory inspection, and I understand that the Government do not propose compulsory inspection.

Mr. IVES. I would suggest to the Minister of Inland Revenue that, as this Bill is intended to provide certain facilities for the classification of pine lumber, it should be confined to pine, and that the fee should not be exacted from every manufacturer of lumber. Everyone who knows anything about the working of the lumbering business in the country, particularly in the Province of Quebec, knows that a statute based on the general terms of this resolution, would bear very hardly on a large number of farmers and others who make a small amount of lumber every winter. I cannot suppose that it is intended to apply this Bill to a farmer who makes 50,000 or 100,000 feet of logs for the mill, or to a man who makes 2,000 or 3,000 railway ties, but the wording of the resolution is broad enough to cover every case of that kind, and that would involve great hardship to many of the people. I can see no advantage to be gained by this measure except by the manufacturers of pine lumber or pine timber. Everyone who knows anything about spruce knows that the inspection is a foreign inspection and that any inspection here would be useless. If spruce is shipped for the South American market, it has to go by way of New York or Boston, or Portland, and is sold, subject to inspection, at the seaboard. The same thing applies to hemlock, to scantlings and boards, which go subject to inspection when they arrive in New York, subject to classification there, and, if the shipper does not like the classification he gets, the only recourse he has is not to send any more. As I have said, as this inspection is intended to be useful to the manufacturers of pine lumber, I think it should be confined to that, and should not be extended to all lumber. If you sell railway ties to the Grand Trunk, for instance, they will not buy them excepting subject to being culled by their own cullers; so there is no advantage in this measure except to the manufacturers and dealers in pine lumber and pine timber.

Mr. PERLEY. I desire to make a remark or two in reference to what the last speaker (Mr. Ives) has said in regard to spruce lumber as applicable to pine lumber. I have had a long experience, as the House knows, in the sawing of pine lumber in this city, and I must say that, as far as my experience goes, there is no call for an Act of this kind for the culling of pine lumber. For the last 15 or 20 years, we have not required any official inspection of lumber, and have had no reason to call for inspection upon any transaction we have made. Our dealings have been upon the output of our mills, and, between the sawmill and the customers, there has never been, to my knowledge—and I am sure I should know of it if it existed—any question of dissatisfaction or trouble. I know there is not so far as my firm are concerned. I am quite sure every lumber manufacturing firm on the Ottawa will disapprove of an Act of this kind, subjecting them to a registration fee where there is no probability of their ever having occasion to call for inspection. I am perfectly sure of that, and I am sorry to have to oppose the provisions of this resolution. I think it would be an injustice to the lumbermen of the Ottawa Valley, and I consequently feel called upon to express my disapproval of it, because I think there is no occasion at all for a Bill of this kind as respects the business in sawn lumber in the Ottawa Valley. So far as the square timber is concerned I have nothing to say, because I am not very often interested in it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think we are entitled to the views of the Minister of Justice and the First Minister upon this subject, because it seems to me that they propose here to put the lumbermen of the country to a certain amount of expense and inconvenience, with no definite object in the world, beyond that of furnishing positions for the parties who may be appointed inspectors. This is said to be a voluntary inspection—on what grounds is it to be upheld? What is the motive for it? Is it a regulation of commerce? The hon. gentlemen do not represent it as such; they represent it to be a means of classifying lumber, and practically to determine disputes that may arise between the vendor and the vendee of this lumber. Well, is not that interfering with the right of contract? If it were compulsory undoubtedly it would be; if it is voluntary it accomplishes no object or end. What is the use of providing for the appointment of an inspector when nobody is obliged to submit to this inspection, and when he decides nothing? You cannot make a law here to say that the parties to a contract shall be compelled to accept the inspection of your officer as final in any matter of dispute that may exist between them. No court in this country would enforce any such obligation if you were to put it in a statute. The parties have a right to make their own contract, and this simple right belongs to them. You have no right to interfere with the provisions of that contract between the vendor and the buyer. If they do not agree they may decide who shall be their referee. I am told by those who are acquainted with the business, that it is in the interest of every lumberman to classify his own lumber, and when he agrees to furnish lumber of a particular class, he causes his own lumber to be inspected in order that what he proposes to give or furnish in fulfilment of his contract, shall be such as the law itself would require him to supply. If the hon. gentleman proposed something within their jurisdiction it would be different. I can understand, under the old practice that existed in the Province of Quebec, why there should be an inspection of square timber, but I do not understand why there should be an inspection of lumber, and with the design as explained by the Minister who has charge of this resolution. I think it is quite clear that no useful end is to be accomplished; the interests of the lumberman are not to be promoted; it will have nothing to do in securing for him a better price for his lumber than he otherwise would obtain. You simply propose to do that which, if you make it compulsory, would be an interference with the right of contract over which you have no jurisdiction at all, and which, if you make it voluntary, as you propose to do, can serve no purpose whatever.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I would like to ask the Minister for information on one point. Suppose that, in the Province of Nova Scotia, this Act should be accepted under some system which the hon. gentleman has not yet explained, and the small lumber people, in the pursuit of their calling, during the winter, wanted to send their teams into the woods to get out a small quantity of logs and have them sawn in local mills, will each one of those parties have to pay $2? Will every farmer be compelled to take out a license before he can get his logs sawn? Will the hon. gentleman explain that, because I do not quite understand it?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have not had an opportunity of considering that point yet, it has not been raised. But if the party be a farmer he is not a manufacturer.

Mr. KIRK. Farmers are manufacturers of timber in my Province, very largely.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Of course, if the hon. gentlemen are taking the view that was taken by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) it will be very difficult to satisfy them. The Bill is proposed to meet the charges made by different gentlemen outside the House, that, in the Province of Nova Scotia, particularly, a large amount of money is paid out for services for which the people do not get any benefit; and this Bill is to provide a remedy.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). In what way?

Mr. COSTIGAN. By abolishing that system, and by providing some simple means of getting the inspection and the measurement done. In the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario the Act is to come into operation at once. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick there is an Act which satisfies them very well, and they might continue to use it. The Act is not made for them, but they can avail themselves of it whenever they choose.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman has yet to consider the point which I raised. I think it is a most important point, as affecting the Lower Provinces particularly. The hon. gentleman says the farmers are not manufacturers; but almost any of these farmers or people living throughout the country during winter, are accustomed to get out logs and to send them down the streams to the local mills to have the lumber cut. My question was whether, under these circumstances, each one of these parties would have to take out a license under the operation of this Bill, whether it came into force or not?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No; that is not the intention—I hope it is not. The Bill does not bear that construction. It is not intended to be a tax upon the farmer who gets out small quantities of lumber.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It appears to me that, after the opinions expressed by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House who are familiar with the subject, the Minister would do well to limit the operations to lumber. Perhaps if it were confined to lumber it might not be so objectionable; but it is evidently useless so far as regards spruce, and hon. gentlemen opposite have shown plainly that it would be of no advantage as regards pine. Under these circumstances both these classes should be eliminated from the Bill.

Mr. LAURIER. The object of the Bill, as stated by the hon. gentleman in charge of it, is to effect economy. The chief office is in Quebec city, and it has been frequently complained that the expenses of that office were altogether out of proportion to the revenues collected there. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman has chosen a wrong course to effect the economy desired, because he does not propose to restrict the system, but to extend it all over the Dominion. The fact is, as has been stated more than once on this occasion, the revenue of the office at Quebec has diminished from year to year, and twelve years ago, in 1876, the expenditure had so much exceeded the revenue that it was thought proper to superannuate a certain number of cullers, and pension them at the public expense. Since that time the revenues have continued to decrease. What is the reason of that decrease? It is simply, so far as I understand it, and as it is explained by competent men, that the inspection has been less and less resorted to.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The hon. gentleman is mistaken. It is because the quantity of square timber produced has been decreasing.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes; the only lumbermen who patronise the office are the square timber producers; and although all other classes of lumber come within the Act, the office is not availed of. So all kinds of lumber are practically removed from the operation of the Act except the square timber. Under such circumstances a better way to effect the economy desired would be to diminish the expenses of the office at Quebec. I find that the expenses of that office last year exceeded $18,000; and we have there a superintendent of cullers, a deputy superintendent, a cashier and ten clerks and messengers, and $1,000 is paid for rent and $2,000 for contingencies. A better plan is not to create a system of inspection all over the other Provinces, because in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia square timber is produced to a very limited extent, and there is no necessity for the existence of the system there, but a better plan would be to curtail the expenses of the office at Quebec.

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) has the correct view of this matter. The falling off in the revenue is from two causes: First, because the square timber trade has diminished very much; and, second, because deals are no longer culled at Quebec. In years past, when the Act now in force was brought into effect, all the deal, manufactured in the country were sent to Quebec by raft and there culled and shipped. To-day, none of the deals manufactured are sent to Quebec in that way. They are all culled at the mills by the cullers of the manufacturers, and the deal cullers at Quebec are of no use whatever to the trade and are not wanted. In my opinion the best way to arrange this matter would be to continue the culling of square timber as at present; it is necessary, for the square timber goes to Quebec and is shipped there just as it was in years gone by. So far as the deal cullers are concerned, they are very old men, it is a very long time ago since any one of them was appointed; most of them are too blind to be able to cull deals, and they should be superannuated and let the whole affair die out. There is no necessity whatever for those inspectors, and they would only prove a nuisance to the trade. I would suggest to the Minister the propriety of withdrawing the resolution, except so far as the square timber culling is concerned; let the square timber culling continue, but so far as regards other inspection it would be perfectly worthless to the trade and we do not want it.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Does the hon. gentleman propose to accept the suggestion I made with regard to a sliding scale?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I think that is a very fair and reasonable suggestion. I have listened with attention to the objections taken to the Bill, and in my judgment what we have to consider is our present position in the matter. The last hon. gentleman who spoke said that the remedy we should apply was to continue the timber cullers at the Quebec office and retire the deal cullers. I am quite satisfied that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), and another hon. gentleman who spoke for Nova Scotia, would not think that a very equitable way of settling the whole difficulty, for that office was simply for the square timber of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Abolish it altogether.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That would not be a very acceptable way to any one. We want to reduce the deficit that has existed in that branch of the service for many years. There may be some other way of getting at it, and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to give their suggestions and their ideas to the Committee. In reply to the allegation that this measure will mean nothing but the creation of new offices with the new appointees, I assure the House that it is not intended to make any new appointments, but we would make use of the men now in the service and give them employment, and no new appointments would be made merely for the sake of favoring some particular person. We would take advantage of the measure to utilise some of the men who would otherwise retire, and of course there would be some men who must be retired. With regard to the point that it should not apply to the inspection of lumber, I may say that the present Act applies to all kinds of lumber, including pine, ash, basswood, butternut, red pine and other varieties; and yet it is said that I am going too far because I do not provide that it shall go beyond pine or spruce. I simply ask to provide machinery so that the board of examiners shall decide what classes of lumber shall be dealt with. Besides no lumberman will be obliged to have lumber inspected or to pay a cent if he does not choose to do so. The fee is a nominal one.

Mr. IVES. It would amount to $50 a year.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Those are the figures of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook) but those figures are not in my Bill. If the hon. gentleman will take the figures given by the member for Renfrew (Mr. White) he will find that it will hardly exceed $150 in any one case in the Dominion.

Mr. PERLEY. I may explain to the House that according to the provisions for the collection of this registration fee the annual payment upon the lumber sawn by my firm would amount to about $120. I do not see any reason why the sawn timber trade should be thus assessed and forced to pay a registration fee when they have no possible requirements for any such services. I look upon this as an unjust assessment made upon the lumber trade, and I feel it my duty to express myself in that way in connection with the sawn timber trade of the Ottawa Valley. The amount of lumber sawn by my firm is about 55,000,000 feet annually and we would have first of all to pay $10, and then one-fifth of a cent per thousand feet which would take $115 or $120. That would be the assessment on mills of the capacity of that of my firm, and I should look upon it as a very unjust tax.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). In reference to the objections of my hon. friends from Russell (Mr. Edwards) and Ottawa (Mr. Perley), I wish to say that both of these gentlemen are large producers of deal that is shipped to the English market. Their principal objection to this resolution is that it imposes a tax for registration purposes and a tax upon the production of their mills. I think both these hon. gentlemen will agree with me that under the law as it exists the counting fee that is imposed upon them and for which they get no benefit at all, and which they must pay under the Act as it stands at present, would greatly exceed in both their cases the amount they would be called upon to pay under the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. EDWARDS. As regards this counting fee the system has been that while the culling has been done at our own mills, the counting fee has been charged at Quebec for which we get no return whatever, but we refused to pay that fee for years and do not pay it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. What are you afraid of this Act for, then?

Mr. EDWARDS. I will tell you. While I agree entirely in the statement that the only parties that would derive any benefit at all from this arrangement, would be the parties who were appointed as the examiners, at the same time I dissent entirely from the idea that the Government is making this proposition for the purpose of giving such situations. I believe that the Government proposes this matter with the idea of putting the regulations into better shape, but so far as I am concerned I do not think this proposition is going to better the thing at all, but that it will make it a good deal worse. I will be glad to offer any humble opinion I can to the Government in order that this matter may be put into a shape which will satisfy the lumbermen.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This discussion shows that there is a great diversity of opinion on this subject, and of course it is useful in that regard. I should think, with the consent of my hon. friend who has charge of this resolution, that we would ask the Committee to pass the resolution now and allow the Bill to be introduced upon it. The Bill being introduced the whole question can be discussed, not only on the second reading but in Committee; and we are quite willing that in Committee the whole matter should be discussed as if on this resolution which is a basis of the Bill.

Committee rose and reported resolution.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 113) respecting the inspection of timber and lumber.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT.

Mr. HAGGART moved second reading of Bill (No. 100) to further amend the Civil Service Act, chapter 17 of the Revised Statutes. He said: The object of the Bill is to decrease the amount paid to parties who are at present engaged in examining candidates for the Civil Service. The first section says:

"The Governor in Council may appoint a person who shall be clerk to the board at a salary not exceeding $700 per annum."

The old clause in the Bill read:

"The Governor in Council may appoint a secretary to the board who may be one of the members of the board at a salary not exceeding $1,000 per annum."

You can see by that clause in the Bill that this secretary cannot be a member of the board and his salary shall be reduced to $700. The third clause says:

"Each member of the board shall receive such salary, not exceeding $400 per annum, as is fixed by the Governor General in Council."

Under the old Act it was $600 per annum. Instead of two examinations a year as before they are reduced to one for promotion and one for examination and less work will be entailed on the examiners.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How many members compose the board?

Mr. HAGGART. Three, I think; but one of those, the secretary, Mr. LeSueur, is not to be a member of the board. The next clause is for the purpose of adding post office inspectors to those who may be appointed without examination. By the next clause, I propose to have the salaries of accountants of Inland Revenue made from $600 to $1,400, instead of from $600 to $1,200, as at present, and the salaries of special class excisemen made from $1,400 to $1,600, instead of from $1,200 to $1,400. It has been found that these gentlemen—there are three or four of them in the country—have great responsibilities, being in charge of large distilleries; some of them collect revenue amounting to from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000. The other amendment provides for a change in the manner of computing the salaries of railway mail clerks. It is not intended to make any addition to their salaries, but the amount that will be expended for that service will be increased $250 or $300 a year; that is for the convenience of accounting. It was a form agreed upon by the inspectors who assembled here for that purpose. The last clause will enable us to pay the salaries to the different postmasters, whose salaries you will see by the estimates have been increased. One of them is the postmaster at Toronto, whose present salary is $3,000; we propose to make it equal to that of the postmaster at Montreal. Another is the Ottawa postmaster, whose salary it is proposed to increase from $2,400 to $2,600.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I would like to enquire in regard to railway mail clerks. The present arrangement I understand is that the first-class, second-class and third-class receive different remuneration, which is graded for night service; but under this proposition it appears that they are to be all put upon the same footing, that is, each mail clerk is to receive an allowance not exceeding half a cent per mile for every mile travelled on duty, and an additional allowance of half a cent per mile for every mile so travelled between ten in the afternoon and six in the forenoon. What I would like to enquire is whether this will reduce the salaries and allowances of the mail clerks to any considerable extent, and if so by how much?

Mr. HAGGART. On the whole, it will not reduce them any, but those who do more travel will get more, and those who do less will get less. The payments will be made according to the amount of travel they do.

Mr. LAURIER. For my part, I think the explanations given by the hon. gentleman as to some features of his Bill are very unsatisfactory. In one respect I am a Conservative; I am a conservator of the laws of the country; I do not want them to be amended or dealt with in any way unless some adequate reason is given for doing so. The hon. gentleman has explained the various changes he proposes to make in the existing law, but he has altogether failed to give any reason that should induce his Conservative supporters to agree with him that the law should be amended. I am sure there is not a Conservative on the other side of the House who has not the deepest respect for the laws of the country, and who would not wish to see them altered without adequate reason. What is the reason, for instance, why a post office inspector should be appointed without being subjected to an examination, as he is to-day? What reason can be given for taking that departure from the rule which has been established for the protection of the public and the efficiency of the service? Not one word of explanation has been given for that; and unless some adequate and satisfactory reason is given why we should make that departure, I do not think we should adopt the legislation of the hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman will see that the section is very little altered from the old one. At present, city postmasters, inspectors, collectors and preventive officers in the Customs Department, inspectors of weights and measures, and deputy collectors and preventive officers in the Inland Revenue Department may be appointed without examination; and it is proposed that post office inspectors, who are men to be chosen for special qualifications not to be found by an examination of the Civil Service board, but who are appointed because of their peculiar qualifications as men who will follow up any irregularities in the post office divisions, shall be included in that list.

Mr. LAURIER. But what is the reason of that amendment?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have just explained

Mr. LAURIER. I have not heard any explanation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot help that; I cannot furnish my hon. friend with apprehension.

Mr. IVES. I understand that it is not the intention of the Postmaster General to decrease the salaries of the railway mail clerks. He says there will be an increase in the case of some and a decrease in the case of others. I think probably I did not well understand him; but I gathered from what he said that if a railway mail clerk worked all night, he would suffer no diminution of salary, but if he did not, he might. It does seem to me as if the old plan of paying railway mail clerks was much more fair and equitable than that proposed. For instance, a railway mail clerk starts at 10 o'clock from Montreal to go to Toronto; he rides all night, and arrives at Toronto at half past seven or eight o'clock in the morning, and he receives half a cent per mile on the 300 miles, $1.50, in addition to his ordinary salary. Another mail clerk starts at the same time from Island Pond, and arrives at the same time at Montreal, but he has only travelled 140 miles. I am not aware that he has worked any less number of hours or that he has suffered any less loss of sleep. I am not aware that he requires any less degree of intelligence, and if he has worked during the same hours, has suffered from the same want of sleep, must have the same qualifications, why should he not receive the same pay? Under the old plan he was paid for any night service so much extra. That is the equitable plan. Now he is to be paid according to the speed of the train he is fortunate enough to be employed upon. I do not see that clerks have any control over the speed of the train or the route given them, whether long or short. The present system may be scientific, but it is unjust and not equitable. I have received a perfect avalanche of communications from mail clerks, objecting to the proposed change, and I think there is a good deal of justice in what they say. Under the schedule in the existing law a railway mail clerk of the first class, for night service, after ten years' service, receives $1,200; under the present Act he is to receive $360, and half a cent a mile for what he travels over during the night, between ten p.m. and six a.m. There is a difference of $240 in his salary for the year. That means, at half a cent, 48,000 miles which he must travel over during the year before he can receive the same salary as he does at present, or 160 miles a day for 300 days. I do not believe there are half a dozen mail clerks in the Dominion who can draw anything like the same salary under the new regulations that they did under the old. If the hon. Minister intends to reduce the salaries of the mail clerks he should do it openly, and not in this way.

Mr. HAGGART. The intention is not at all to reduce the salaries of the mail clerks. The Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial and Canadian Pacific Railway travel as fast in Quebec and Nova Scotia as they do in Ontario, and if the mail clerk serves the same time on board the trains in those Provinces as he does in Ontario he will get the same salary. The addition he receives is not half a cent a mile per night, but half a cent a mile for every mile travelled in day time and half a cent a mile extra for night travel, or altogether one cent a mile for night travel. It is an injustice to the mail clerk who travels in the North-West, and puts in more time on the railway than another in Quebec or Nova Scotia—he may cover 1,000 miles in the same time that the other will but 600 miles—that no distinction should be made in the salaries. It is for the purpose of apportioning salaries according to the duties performed that this Bill is introduced.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not quite understand the object of this amendment to which the hon. member has called attention, but I take it for granted that he means by relieving the post office inspectors from the previous law to enable the hon. gentleman to bring in persons who have never had any connection with the Post Office service before. That, I presume, he can do under this proposed measure. I think it is objectionable for more reasons than one. In the first place it is an injury to the service, especially the post office service, the members of which are hard worked men, as a rule, that an outsider should be brought in and put over their head, and although I have not a very special acquaintance with the details of that service, I am inclined to think, from the evidence of the case, that a post office inspector is much more likely to do his work well, if he has been trained in the office for a reasonable number of years and has become familiar with the various details connected with the work of the post office, than if he is a stranger to the work. Is it the object of the hon. gentleman to bring in persons who have had no previous connection with the post office service? It is deplorable and objectionable that we should interfere with the promotion of officials of the service who ought to have distributed amongst them the prizes; but, at present, the way that department is administered, we know the considerable prizes are given, not to men who have served their country for years in the arduous duties of the post office, but to men who have obtained their promotion by political work of a more or less reputable character—rather less than more. Besides that, I hold a post office inspector would do very much better work if he were familiar with the details of the service in various ways.

Mr. COOK. I would like to submit to the Postmaster General—if he will allow me the suggestion, it would atone somewhat for the shortcomings of his Bill—if he would add Bill No. 106 to it. That would give it grace, and elegance, and tone, and he would do a great deal for the protection of his country.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is a very important subject, which we should give serious consideration. In the first place, it is proposed to reduce the number of examinations annually from two to one. That in itself is a step in the right direction, but at the same time my opinion is that we could well do away with these examining boards altogether. There was a suggestion made to this House some years ago that, by the departments agreeing to accept students of a certain grade from our high schools and seminaries of education, the necessity of passing the examination board, and all the necessary expenses could be well done away with. There would be nothing at all to prevent the Postmaster General including a clause in his Bill that would enable us to accept students from any of those institutions of education who hold a certain degree of certificate, which would be amply sufficient to enable them to discharge the duties of post office clerk. I think by doing that, we could do away with the examination board altogether. I notice that in the last examining board Mr. LeSueur has been acting as secretary for the past year, for which he drew the sum of $700. I noticed, also, in looking over the list of superannuated civil servants, that as such he draws $1,400 a year. If his health was such that it became necessary for him to be superannuated, he should not be again engaged in the service and permitted to draw double pay in this way. Are we to suppose that there were some other reasons than ill-health for his retirement? I believe the superannuating system has been abused, and I think this is one of the features of its abuse. With regard to the other clause referred to, that of giving the Government power to employ any person to discharge the duties of inspector, it is unfair to the staff to pass an Act that would allow any person outside of the staff to be taken in and placed in the office of inspector. As has been truly said by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that a man who has served in the capacity of postmaster for a number of years is better able to discharge the duties of inspector than can a man who, no matter what his attainments in an educational point of view may be, has not had that experience. The third objectionable feature is the increase of the postmasters' salary in Toronto and in other places. I am certain the Government would have no difficulty in filling any of those positions for the salaries now given, yet we are still increasing the salaries notwithstanding our annual expense and the continued efforts on the part of the Opposition to prevent this increase. My own opinion is that a man in the city of Toronto can well discharge the duties of postmaster for $3,000 a year. I think it is an ample allowance, and I am quite sure that there are hundreds of men in this country with sufficient educational attainments, and other qualifications, who would be only too glad to get the position and discharge the duties. Where is the cause, why is it thought necessary, without any reason being given, that we should raise this man's salary from $3,000 to $4,000 a year, when we are required really to legislate in the other direction, that is, for a reduction instead of an increase in the expenses of this service? We admit that, in Toronto, the receipts are very large, but in other places the receipts are very little, if you deduct the expenses. If you look over the whole revenue of the Post Office, you will find that it is very small, after paying running expenses. I am reminded that it does not even do that. In view of a condition of things of that kind, why is it thought necessary to introduce an Act to increase a man's salary from $3,000 to $4,000, when we know that his services are well and amply paid to-day at $3,000? I do not understand legislation of that kind. The Government may think it is popular, but if it is popular it should not be, and I think it is legislating in the wrong direction. I also think that we could do without an examining board, and that would save $4,522 a year. As to the post offices, I am sure that hon. gentlemen can get any number of men to discharge the services required for the sums which are now paid. There is no more necessary officer than a sharp, shrewd, intelligent man as inspector, and to occupy that position, it is absolutely necessary that he should have had personal experience from the commencement up to the highest position in the service, so that he may efficiently discharge the duties of inspector, and if you take a man who has not had that experience, difficulties will be met with and troubles will arise in consequence of his lack of experience.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. the First Minister has given us a reason why the post office inspector should be taken away from the list of civil servants who are subject to examination, and should be put on the list of those who are not subject to examination; and the reason he gives is that the post office inspectors require special qualifications. I would have supposed that if a party is required to have special qualifications, it is necessary, if there is to be an examination at all, that there should be a special examination to ascertain those special qualifications. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. I was going to say there is nothing in it, but I mean that there is nothing in the shake. There is this to be said about the examination: If the hon. gentleman admits that an examination is necessary in regard to some officers, why is it not necessary in this case? A certain literary attainment and a certain qualification are required for the admission of a clerk into the civil service. Is not that required also in the case of an inspector? I do not understand that the inspector requires less qualification than the civil servant who is subjected to an examination, especially the civil servant who is subjected to an examination for promotion. He requires to have at least the qualification possessed by the others, and he ought to have another qualification besides. If the hon. gentleman thinks that an examination is not the proper means to ascertain the special qualification, certainly it is necessary to ascertain the general qualification which the inspector should possess, as well as every other officer. But I am inclined to think that, if the hon. gentleman would take the House into his confidence, he would tell us that this amendment to the Act is necessary to meet a special case. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, has in his eye, or in his mind's eye, at all events, the appointment of some person who, he thinks, possesses this special qualification. I wonder if the gentleman lives near the city of Galt who possesses this special qualification, and whom it would be infra dig to subject to this special examination; I wonder whether the eminent services which that hon. gentleman—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What hon. gentleman?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, the gentleman, has performed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What is the name?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have been told his name is Cowan.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I never heard of that before.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose not, and perhaps the hon. gentleman will be able to give us some other reason for this. It is also rumored that an hon. gentleman living in Toronto is the party who is to be appointed to a position as post office inspector, and it might be infra dig. to subject him to an examination. Now, the hon. gentleman could put an end to all these rumors and prevent the public from guessing in regard to the matter, if he would at once say who it is who is to be specially exempted from examination by this provision of the law. Then I observe that the postmasters in certain places are to receive larger salaries than they do at present. I think the Government ought to give serious consideration to the proposition of my hon. friend who spoke just before me (Mr. McMullen). The hon. gentleman will see that he is proposing to pay certain city postmasters more than he pays the Deputy Ministers. Is the qualification required by a city postmaster superior to that required by a Deputy Minister? Are his duties more arduous or more responsible? What is there in the position of a city postmaster that he should receive a larger salary than that of a Deputy Minister in the Public Service? Certainly, his intellectual attainments are not required to be greater, and the responsibility of his position is not greater. I believe the Deputy Minister at present receives the ordinary salary of $3,200 a year, while the postmasters in Toronto and Montreal are to get $4,000 a year. The hon. gentleman says he is now paying $4,000 to the postmaster in Montreal, and he proposes not to put down the salary of the postmaster in Montreal, but to put up the salary of the postmaster in Toronto. I do not think that is necessary in the public service. There are certain positions in the public service where you are obliged to take into consideration what men employed in similar positions elsewhere earn, and you are obliged to make the salaries such as to retain men of the first order of attainments, but you have no such difficulty in the case of postmasters. It is true, perhaps, that there are large sums and large interests passing through the hands of a postmaster, and that you require a trustworthy man to fill the position, but that does not require extraordinary ability, but simply integrity; and you can secure the services of men who may be trusted with the duties of a postmaster in the larger cities of the Dominion for, at all events, the salary which is received by the ordinary Deputy Minister. Now I do not say that you ought to reduce the salary of the present incumbent at Montreal, but I say you might provide that when the present incumbent disappears at Montreal, then the postmaster at Montreal shall receive the same salary as is now paid to the postmaster at Toronto. The postmaster at Toronto took his present position knowing what the salary was before he was appointed; and I do not think that he can say that his salary, looking at the duties he has to discharge, is altogether too low for one holding such a responsible position. Looking at the enormous burdens that are at present imposed upon the people of this country, it does seem to me that the Government ought not, in every step that is taken, propose to advance the charges upon the public by increasing the salaries of those parties

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know that I have any right to say anything—perhaps we had better go to committee before I say anything.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We are not objecting.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well, then we will go into Committee of the Whole, because I would like to make some remarks in reply to my hon. friend. This clause which the hon. gentleman objects to, about inspectors of post offices being appointed without an examination, is the only one which gives independent existence to this Bill, the rest of the clauses being money clauses, must be commenced by resolution. So I will propose that the Bill be read the second time and be committed pro forma to Committee of the Whole, then we will take up item No. 23, which is the money resolutions, and then, in carrying them, we will have plenty of time to discuss this point with my hon. friend.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee on Resolution (page 621) to amend the Civil Service Act, and to regulate the salaries of certain officers of the Civil Service.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It appears to me that the objection to be taken to this resolution is one that we have taken on too many previous occasions, viz., that every Bill that is introduced by the Government, is going to impose an additional burden upon this country. Every Bill brought down here proposes some additional salary to some of the civil servants of the country. Now these things are growing to such an extent that unless we make some protest as we go along we will find ourselves from year to year piling up such an expense in all these different departments, that it will become very formidable indeed. Now, the Postmaster General has not been able to show the House a necessity for any one of these proposed increases, notably why the postmaster at Toronto should have $4,000, why the postmaster at Ottawa should have his salary increased from $3,400 to $2,600, while the postmasters of Halifax, St. John and Quebec are left just as they were. It is a little piece of favoritism; it is a little piece of political concession here right under the hon. gentleman's eyes, and I suppose there has been a certain amount of log-rolling going on by which he has been induced to bring down this resolution asking that the salaries be increased for Toronto and Ottawa. I say it is very unfair, it is a very improper course, it is one that cannot be approved of by the country, and cannot be justified by any member of this House, when you come to look into the condition of the country. As has been remarked by hon gentlemen who have preceded me, there are plenty of men in this House and out of it who would take those positions if they were vacant to-day. The Postmaster General knows very well that if he had a vacancy in Toronto, there are plenty of members in this House to-day who would be glad to get it at the present salary; and if there was a vacancy in Ottawa, they would be glad to get it, as a member of this House took it on a previous occasion. Therefore, the proposition is utterly unjustifiable, and I protest most solemnly against this continued and persistent increase in the salaries of civil servants on every occasion when the Government brings down a Bill. We have seen it in the early days of the Session, and the practice is followed up to-night by this Bill. Now, Sir, I say that I cannot understand why the postmaster in Ottawa should have his salary increased to $2,600 a year, and the postmaster in Halifax only have $2,400. The hon. gentleman will fail, I think, to convince this House that the duties of the postmaster in Ottawa are of a more onerous character than those at Halifax, St. John or Quebec, and if he cannot show that, he has no case before the House at all, and cannot justify the increase which he is asking this House to accede to. Then again, in clause 9 it says that where the postage collections are less than $20,000, the salary is to be from $1,400 to $1,800, as the Postmaster General may determine. Well, there are a great many places all through the country where the postage collections will be very much under that sum, perhaps not a quarter of it, and still, under the operations of this Act, we are going to empower the Postmaster General to give them from $1,400 to $1,800.

Mr. HAGGART. There is no change in the law as it is at present; it is only repeating the law.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It should not be left to the Postmaster General, but it should be fixed by statute. I protest against these increases, and notably, the increases in the cases of Ottawa and Toronto, and I repeat that they are unfair to other cities I have mentioned, cities equally as important as Ottawa, at least, although, I admit, they are smaller than Toronto.

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the charge of the hon. gentleman that the Bill intends to increase the burdens of the people, I think when he has heard my explanation he will probably take an entirely different view of it. The proposition is to decrease the salary of the secretary of the board $300, to decrease the salaries of three other gentlemen $200 each, making $900. The change in the railway mail service may effect a saving, as my deputy estimates, of $250 or $300 throughout the whole country. All the increases the Bill proposes is to the salaries of city postmasters, $1,200, so that the amount of increases and decreases exactly balances.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). There is a class of men serving in the post offices who are very inadequately paid, and they are the postmasters of the villages and towns. Their salaries range from $300 to $1,000. They have to devote their whole time to the work, they are just as fully employed as are the postmasters of large cities, such as Toronto and Montreal, and they very frequently have to pay assistants out of their salaries. I think the Postmaster General should take their case into consideration.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Postmaster General, in answering my remarks, did not explain why the postmaster at Ottawa should have an increase over the postmasters at Halifax and St. John.

Mr. HAGGART. The Ottawa post office does twice the business of these other offices mentioned. The returns do not show exactly the business done. The postmaster here does all the business connected with the departments and his business is no doubt twice as large as the business of the postmaster either at Halifax or Quebec, so I am informed. With respect to the increase of the salary of the postmaster at Toronto, I may say that that is an important city, the receipts are as large as those in the city of Montreal—I am informed that they are $40,000 more. The postmaster at Montreal receives $4,000, and it is but right that when another officer performs the same duties and assumes the same responsibilities, and performs his duties as efficiently, he should receive the same salary as the postmaster at Montreal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; I do not think so. I think, on the contrary, if there is reasonable ground for believing that the official is receiving a larger salary than the sum for which an officer could be obtained to perform them fairly well, it is the duty of the Government and the duty of members of this House to take action so that the excessive salary be reduced to a fair scale. I do not care what the previous practice may have been, or what the law may have been in that respect. I think classes 1, 2 and 3, which are respectively $3,500, $3,750 and $4,000 are altogether too large for the class of duties that are discharged by the postmasters. There is a great deal of force in what the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has said, and there has been no attempt made to answer him. In connection with the Post Office Department there is a deficit of $729,000 a year, we cannot make both ends meet within three-quarters of a million, and the hon. gentleman under those circumstances should be very cautious about increasing the salary of postmasters or leaving them at too high a scale. I say that if you can obtain the services of a permanent deputy head of an important department in the Dominion for $3,000 it is absurd that classes 1, 2 and 3 of city postmasters should be paid from $250, $500 and $700 greater than a deputy head. It will be our duty at some other stage to move that instead of these being allowed, class 4 of $3,250 be made the maximum in all cases where the incumbent is not at present in receipt of a higher salary. I would not interfere now, of course, with the men now receiving higher salaries, but I think $3,250 is ample for the services of any postmaster in Montreal, Toronto or Quebec, or any city in the Dominion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. First, with respect to the remark made that the inspector of post offices should be examined like any other clerk in the Civil Service. We all know why the examination of civil servants was commenced and has been continued. We know there had been introduced, I am afraid by both sides when they had the power, the practice of appointing persons who did not possess the necessary clerical qualifications to become a decent clerk and writer. No doubt, in days of old, persons were appointed from political considerations only, and to avoid that the Civil Service examination was adopted, to provide that men should write a good hand, should know the principles of arithmetic and possess a good common school education, and that was the principle of the Civil Service Bill. With respect to professional men, such as legal men, if required in their professional capacity; to engineers, if required in the service; to trained accountants, who belonged to a special profession, they are exempt by the terms of the Act; and so, of course, if the Postmaster General desires to appoint an inspector of post offices, the country can trust him to appoint a man who could pass the ordinary examination. It is merely to prevent illiterate persons getting into the Civil Service. The Act has worked well in that regard and in improving the character of the service. Then as to the statement, I think, made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that no outsider should be appointed so long as a man could be found inside the department to fill the office. Imitation is the sincerest form of flattery is an old saying, and we follow in some respects the example of hon. gentlemen opposite. The late collector of Customs at Halifax was not a civil servant; I think the postmaster at Montreal was an outsider, he never was a clerk in the post office and never handled a mail bag. He was taken from outside—he is a very good man I dare say, but for political reasons he was placed there. And the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says we should not cut down the salary because he now holds the position, but that his successor should be cut down. That officer was appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite, he was an outsider. When he was appointed, the business of the Montreal office was not half what it is now, and I am informed they fixed the salary at $4,000, and we cannot, in justice to hon. gentlemen opposite, suppose that they were extravagant ten or fifteen years ago, when they appointed Mr. Lamothe, and that they acted wrongly either in taking an outsider or in giving him too high a salary. When the business of the Toronto post office is larger than that of the Montreal office, we come forward and say that the postmaster at Toronto should receive as much as his confrère at Montreal. I do not think there is anything wrong in that proposition. But then you know we want to get over the charge that is generally made against us, but which in this case is being made against the hon. gentleman: that is, French influence. This French influence has raised Mr. Lamothe's salary to $4,000, but you would not give a poor Englishman in Toronto the same salary, and you want to cut down—not Mr. Lamothe's salary—oh, no, but Mr. Patteson's who was not appointed by the hon. gentlemen opposite. I really think that this is not a fair game. I think that the hon. gentleman must see that in fixing the salary of this officer, who has more duties and more business going through his hands, at the same rate at which the late Government appointed this gentleman years and years ago—and not an unduly extravagant salary, I must say—that we are following their example. My hon. friend the Postmaster General, has shown that there is really no increase here, so then good naturedly, you will allow us to pass this resolution and we will have no recrimination, and we will not tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that years ago they gave Mr. Lamothe too high a salary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman would imitate us in our administration we will not object. Come down to the twenty-three millions and a half of expenditure and we will agree to leave Mr. Lamothe's salary where it is and let you make Mr. Patteson's salary $4,000 if you choose. If you are going to imitate us, imitate us all through. Be thorough in your imitation. Come down to the twenty-three millions and a half in your expenditure and I will support you in making the increase of the salaries of postmasters.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Lamothe was appointed at the same salary as his predecessor.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am told by my hon. friend that Mr. Lamothe was appointed at the same salary that his predecessor had.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have just been asking, and I am told it is so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not care one straw, or I do not think the House cares whether we appointed a man at too high a salary or not; but whether we did or not that is no justification for the hon. gentleman increasing salaries now that the deficit in the post office has been enormously increased. The deficit in our time was not more than $400,000. The business has increased, no doubt, but so has the deficit, and it now amounts to $729,000. The point I want to make is that surely if a salary of $3,200 is enough to pay to a deputy head of a department of this Government who has very important duties, and who ought to be a man of first-class abilities, surely in all conscience, $3,500 is enough for an ordinary postmaster in Toronto or Montreal. That is the point we make.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are more important and less important departments here, and some of the deputy heads have more important duties than others. As the hon. gentleman knows some of the deputy heads get more than $3,200, some of them get $4,000 and some of them more than $4,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Trudeau gets more for one and I think that the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Courtney, gets more than $4,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He may get a couple of hundred dollars more.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, they get more than $3,200. The two great post offices of the Dominion are Montreal and Toronto. There are others of importance and I hope that the growth of the country, notwithstanding the efforts of the hon. gentlemen opposite who repress the development of the country, will cause other towns in Canada to grow, and that the postmasters will have more important duties. Take, for instance, the duties of the postmaster in Montreal or Toronto. In the first place he has a large staff of clerks to manage; and, in the second place regularity and strict discipline is a matter of the utmost importance. A man may be of great intellectual capacity, yet if he has no order, if he has no firmness, and if he has not a sense of the necessity of keeping and saving time, he is not fit to be postmaster. You know we have transferred and are transferring all the savings banks which were Government saving banks formerly to the department of the Postmaster General. That is a money business, a banking business almost you might say, and it is of great and increasing importance. You want a thoroughly competent man, a man acquainted with accounts, and a man to see that a subordinate in the post office savings bank is a man of accounts himself, to fill the position of postmaster. Then the postmaster has got to attend to the registered letters, which is also an important matter. There is the parcel post and the book post, and one might go on naming the increasing business of the post office. The postmasters in those cities have got most onerous duties to perform; they have duties requiring regularity, energy, firmness of character, and a knowledge of accounts. I really do not think that when—in humble imitation of hon. friends opposite—we ask that the postmaster in Toronto shall have as much as the postmaster in Montreal, we are really going to ruin the country by our extravagance. I understand that Mr. Gouin, the postmaster in Ottawa, has, in addition to the ordinary business which goes through the post office, and which is not reckoned in the public accounts, an enormous amount of mail matter connected with the different departments going through his hands. That puts his work upon a different scale from almost any post town in the whole Dominion.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I think that the right hon. gentleman should bear in mind all the circumstances connected with the appointment of Mr. Patteson as postmaster, when he asks that this poor Englishman, as he calls him, should get an increase of salary. He should remember that Mr. Lesslie who preceded Mr. Patteson was well qualified to discharge the duties of that office. When he was superannuated, and superannuated against his will I believe, he was just as capable of discharging his duties as at the time he was appointed. I am personally acquainted with Mr. Lesslie.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. So am I.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I have seen Mr. Lesslie, and I may say that he is just as active a man to-day as he was years ago, and just as capable of discharging the duties of the office, but it was necessary for the First Minister to find a place for this poor Englishman in the post office in Toronto; and in order to find a place for this poor Englishman, as he calls him, they superannuated Mr. Lesslie and appointed Mr. Patteson who had done them good service on the Mail newspaper, and had stabbed the Grits under the fifth rib for months before, by order of the First Minister, no doubt. He was the man who got the position and Mr. Lesslie was superannuated. The Government should remember that if they raised Mr. Patteson's salary to $4,000, that, together with the superannuation of Mr. Lesslie, will make an annual charge of $6,000 for the head of the post office at Toronto. The First Minister should take all this into consideration and remember the fact that Mr. Lesslie was superannuated to make room for Mr. Patteson and not lead the House to understand that there is no good reason why this salary should not be increased.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). If the Postmaster General refers to his own report he will see that so far from the Ottawa post office being more important than the office at Halifax, it is far behind it. I find that in Halifax last year, $175,000 were issued in money orders and $535,000 in money orders paid. In Ottawa the money orders issued amounted to $190,000 and those paid amounted to only $152,000. The receipts in Halifax were $50,310 against $46,000 at Ottawa. Therefore, I cannot see how the Postmaster General can make out that the amount of work here is greater than that performed in the Halifax post office. Halifax, the hon. gentleman must remember, is the distributing point for all the mails throughout the Province; the English mails arrive there and depart from there, and that will cause, I fancy, quite as much extra work as is thrown on the post office here by the departments. Therefore, there is no justification, on the ground on which the hon. gentleman has placed it, for asking the House to give an increase to the postmaster here, and not to the postmaster at Halifax as well.

Mr. HAGGART. If you look at the Estimates, you will see that the number of employés at Ottawa is nearly double the number at Halifax.

Mr. EISENHAUER. Well, I understand that the population of Ottawa is not much greater than that of Halifax, and what is the reason for all these officials?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. More business.

Mr. EISENHAUER. The Finance Minister said a few days ago that the Government were going to economise, but we now find that they are going to increase the salaries of the judges and postmasters, and appoint inspectors of lumber. The hon. member for South Oxford stated a while ago that there was a deficiency of $700 in the revenue of the post office here, and if the principle laid down by the Postmaster General were sound, he would close up the post office at Ottawa, because he closed up one in my county because the revenue was not sufficient to cover expenses. It had been open for years, and I know it was closed through the influence of the ex-member. I believe a large number of the people of that section are not supporters of the Government, and that office has been closed and the people have been obliged to travel to a post office which has been erected at a distance of two or three miles. I brought the matter to the notice of the hon. Postmaster General, but he acts on the principle that there is not enough revenue to keep it open. I say that the Ottawa post office should be closed on the same principle.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. First Minister did not make good his position that he followed the example of the Government that preceded him in increasing the salary of the postmaster at Toronto to $4,000 a year. He said we had made the appointment of the postmaster at Montreal and fixed his salary at $4,000. When the facts are recalled, we find that that salary was fixed by the hon. gentleman himself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Why did you not reduce it?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is charging us with a sin of omission; but the hon. gentleman's sins are those of commission. He increased the salary to $4,000 in the first place, and because we did not reduce that salary, he says that is a sufficient justification for his increasing somebody else's salary to $4,000. Then, my hon. friend has shown that he superannuated a postmaster at Toronto for the purpose of making room for a friend.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; that is quite a mistake.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; it is not a mistake. I saw the communication from Mr. Lesslie himself, stating that he did not wish to be superannuated, that he considered himself fully equal to the discharge of the duties; and if I remember rightly, the hon. Minister of Public Works might be able to tell how it was that Mr. Lesslie was pressed to consent to superannuation, and how it was pointed out to him, that it was greatly in his interest to come to the conclusion that he was no longer fit to remain in the public service, and should ask the Government to retire him, in order that he should not be retired in some other way. Well, Sir, seeing that political exigencies rendered it necessary for the Government to turn out Mr. Lesslie, because Mr. Patteson's usefulness as a newspaper writer was gone, and that it was necessary to make room for another exponent of the views of the Government on the press, it seems to me that some regard should have been had to economy when the present Bill was under consideration. Now, although Mr. Lesslie is still able to discharge his duties to-day as well as he was before he was retired, his salary has to be provided for out of the public Treasury, and Mr. Patteson's salary as well; and, in addition, the hon. gentleman proposes to give Mr. Patteson another hoist. I am afraid the hon. gentleman did not give us that candid explanation which he said he would when we went into Committee. He has not told us who this inspector is to be who is to be exempt from examination. I do not know that we should have been in Committee yet if it was not for our anxiety to know who this inspector is to be.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Allow me to tell the hon. gentleman I do not know.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am astonished at the hon. gentleman's ignorance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would not be astonished at any amount of ignorance on the part of the hon. gentleman. But, seriously, I regret much that the question of Mr. Lesslie's superannuation has been obtruded into this discussion; that has opened up a new leaf. The question is not about Mr. Lesslie, but the question is whether the salary of the postmaster at Toronto ought to be raised. Mr. Lesslie I knew when a boy at Kingston, before he went to Toronto; his father and brother were book-sellers there. I know all about him, and I know all about the circumstance of his superannuation.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I do not think Mr. Lesslie would regret the matter being brought up here, because he has continually stated that he was superannuated against his will, and that he was just as able to discharge the duties of his office then as when he was appointed, and even better; and to this day he is as well qualified to discharge the duties of postmaster as the man who occupies the position. It is a question that ought to be brought into examination when this matter is up, because the charge for that office is now being raised to about $6,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would just point out that it seems to me absurd that the salary of the deputy head of the Post Office Department here, the superior of the postmasters, is only to be $3,200, which is largely below the salaries of first class, second class and third class postmasters.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10:55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 18th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

JESUITS' ESTATE ACT.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to ask the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), as the debate in which the House is now engaged will in all probability close to-morrow, at what date he intends to bring forward the motion which he said he would upon the Jesuits' Estate Act?

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. gentleman must be aware that since I gave notice of this motion, on the 1st March, there has been no day on which it could have been possibly brought forward. If the debate we are now engaged in concludes to-morrow evening as is expected, and I am sure we all hope that it may, I shall be prepared to proceed with my motion on the next occasion upon which the Minister of Finance moves to go into Supply; probably, I suppose, in the ordinary course of business, on Thursday next or whenever, whatever next, the occasion may arise.

Mr. LAURIER. I hope that the Government will be prepared to go into Supply on Thursday next.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I shall take that into consideration between now and Thursday.

Mr. LAURIER. In the meantime can we expect that the papers connected with the question will be brought down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, yes; they will be brought down to-morrow. I think I have got them now, but I wish to look over them.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Mr. BARRON. The First Minister was not in his place the other day when I asked the question regarding the report of the commissioners upon the investigation, whether it would be advisable or not to go on with the works on the Trent Valley Canal. I said then, and I say again, that a great many people in the locality through which this canal will run are deeply interested in the subject and wish to know what the results will be. I would like to know if the report has been received, and if it is not received, when it is expected, because I am informed that one of the commissioners has left Canada to remain away for a long time, and that for some time before his doing so no work whatever was done by the commissioners, in the way of taking evidence or otherwise, regarding the subject. There is no reason in the world, so far as I can find out, why the report should not have been received by the Government, and the country put in possession of its contents.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to send me a slip across the floor mentioning what he wants, and I will send the answer over to him.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 76) respecting the incorporation of the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway Company.—(Mr. Daly.)

Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the Ontario, Manitoba and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Macdowall.)

TITLE AND MORTGAGE GUARANTEE CO.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I was not in the House at the time motions were called, and I have just received a note asking me, in the absence of the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith), to move for leave to introduce Bill (No. 114) to incorporate the Title and Mortgage Guarantee Company of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. MACDOWALL moved that the Bill be now read the second time, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman explain what is the recommendation of the committee?

Mr. MACDOWALL. The recommendation of the committee was this: Unless the Bill be read the second time to-day, it is likely that it will not become law at all. There would not be sufficient time to have it referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee and have it reported upon by that committee before the end of the Session. Therefore, the Standing Orders Committee has recommended that it be read the first and the second time to-day. The object of the Bill is similar to that of a Bill which has already passed the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Mr. TROW. I question very much if it will be a public calamity if the Bill be never again heard of. I do not see why the House should go out of its order for the sake of this Bill. Let it take its regular course.

Mr. MULOCK. Has the Bill been printed?

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. MULOCK. We are asked to-day to read it the first and the second time, and to refer it to the Banking and

Mr. LAURIER.

Commerce Committee, without knowing anything about it. Of course, I would not like to obstruct my hon. friend in his procedure, but are we to have any practice or rules at all to prevent hasty legislation? I would like to know the reason for the delay. Was the Bill not duly advertised? or was there simply some delay in the presenting of the petition?

Mr. MACDOWALL. The Bill was properly advertised and all regulations were complied with, but the principal promoter of the Bill was taken very ill, and in consequence of that the delay occurred. I suppose that, to use a legal term, the delay was occasioned by the hand of God; and on that account, we cannot have stronger reason in appealing to this House for a little consideration. The Session is likely to be very short, and unless this Bill passes the first and second reading now, it will not be able to become law this Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. After that appeal, I think my hon. friend opposite will allow the Bill to be read the second time.

Mr. LAURIER. I am not quite sure this is a wise practice we are introducing. We are going very far in permitting the Bill to be read the first time to-day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This will not be a precedent.

Mr. LAURIER. I have heard that several times before. Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What sum has been expended on the Intercolonial Railroad and charged to capital account from 1st July, 1888, to 1st March, 1889?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The expenditure from 1st July, 1888, to 31st January, 1889, was $400,773 88. The approximate expenditure for February, 1889, is $9,300.

HONORABLE J. R. GOWAN.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. Cook) asked, Is the Honorable J. R. Gowan, Senator of the Dominion of Canada, the same person who was judge of the county of Simcoe? If so, was he pensioned before being appointed to the Senate? What pension does he receive, and what is the total amount to date paid him on account of such pension?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Hon. J. R. Gowan was judge of the district of Simcoe from 1843 to 1883. Since then he has been retired from that position. He has received the retiring allowance provided by law for County Court Judges who have served more than 25 years, namely, $1,737.73 annually. He commenced to receive this allowance before he was made Senator.

TÉMISCOUATA RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. DESSAINT asked, 1. What amount has the Témiscouata Railway Company received from the Government, up to this date, on the subsidy to which they are entitled? 2. What amount remains due to the company on the said subsidy? 3. Why has not the balance, if any, been paid, and when will it be paid?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. 1. The amount which the Témiscouata Railway Company have received from the Government, up to this date, on their subsidy, is $412,900. 2. There is no sum due on the subsidy, but the balance of the subsidy applicable to the main line is $70,700. 3. The balance has not been paid because the road has not been completed, and it will be paid when the road is completed.

WILLIAM BANNERMAN.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, 1. At what date was William Bannerman appointed postmaster at Calgary? 2. How long did he continue postmaster of Calgary? 3. Did he leave that office a defaulter to the Government? 4. If so, what was the amount of his defalcation? 5. Was he at any time acting as sub-collector, or in any other capacity, in the employment of the Customs Department at Calgary, or at any other point in the North-West Territories? 6. If at any time serving in such capacity, at what time did he enter upon the duties of such position, and when did he cease to discharge such duties? 7. If employed in any capacity by the Customs Department, was he, in the discharge of such duties, a defaulter to the Government? 8. If a defaulter, what means have been taken to ascertain his whereabouts?

Mr. HAGGART. William Bannerman was appointed postmaster at Calgary the 1st of October, 1883. He continued postmaster until March, 1885. He owed the department a balance of $2,071.68. Of this amount, $2,000 was recovered on his bond, and the balance is still unpaid.

Mr. BOWELL. William Bannerman was appointed to the Customs as sub-collector by Order in Council the 24th of March, 1884. He had never complied with the terms required of him, viz.: to furnish bonds or sureties, and to report himself for duty to the Collector at Winnipeg. Consequently he was never recognised or authorised to act as such sub-collector, and his name was never entered on the list of Customs officers. He was authorised on the 21st July, 1883, to act as preventive officer, but had no authority to collect dues or other revenues. I am not aware of his being a defaulter in Customs funds, and, consequently, no means has been taken to ascertain his whereabouts.

WILLIAM LOGAN.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. EDGAR) asked, 1st. Was William Logan a contractor for the carrying of the mail between Pickering Village and Pickering Station in 1888? 2nd. Does the name of B. Bunting appear as one of the sureties upon the bond given as security for such contract? 3rd. Is this bond now in the custody of the Post Office Department?

Mr. HAGGART. The conveyance of mails between the post office and railway station at Pickering is provided for by the Grand Trunk. The Post Office Department has no information as to the names of the persons who are employed by the Grand Trunk to carry the mail.

SIMS AND SLATER.

Mr. CAMERON asked, Whether the sum of $50,000, or any portion thereof, which was deposited in the Department of Railways and Canals by the sureties of Sims & Slater, contractors of the eastern section of the Cape Breton Railway, has been returned by the Department of Railways to the sureties, or otherwise disposed of? If so, what amount, and for what purpose?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. An Order in Council was passed the 6th of November, authorising the giving back to Sims & Slater the $50,000 deposited as security for the due performance of their contract on the Cape Breton Railway. Before giving it up a bond was taken from the surety the 23rd of November, engaging to pay all claims that might be legally made against the firm of Sims & Slater in connection with the said contract.

MACDONALD AND DOWLING'S GULCHES.

Mr. CAMERON asked, Whether any complaints have been made by the engineer in charge of the construction of the western section of the Cape Breton Railway in reference to the manner in which works have been prosecuted over Macdonald and Dowling's gulches by the contractors? Have the contractors driven the piles in those gulches as required by their specifications?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No complaints have been made, but a full description of the driving of piles at Macdonald and Dowling's gulches has been received. The contractors have driven piles in these gulches as required by their specification.

FRENCH-CANADIAN REPATRIATION.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. WILSON, Elgin) asked, What steps have been taken by the Government to carry out the policy or scheme of repatriation which was referred to by Sir Hector Langevin, the Minister of Public Works, in a public speech delivered in Montreal in November, 1883? Is the measure referred to by Sir Hector Langevin to be introduced during the present Session of Parliament, and if not, why not?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The measure which was referred to by me in the public speech at Montreal has been put into execution by the Government from that period, and therefore there is no measure to be introduced during the present Session.

CORNWALL CANAL.

House resumed consideration of Mr. Bérger's motion for:

Copies of reports, plans and surveys of the then proposed Cornwall Canal by J. B. Mills and Benjamin Wright, Esq.'s, Civil Engineers, and by Capt. P. Cole, Royal Engineer, in the years 1832, 1833 and 1834; also for survey and report of Colin Garman, Esq., C. E., of a proposed change of location of the Cornwall Canal, from Sand Bridge through Hooples' Creek to Archibald's Point, with plans, profiles and estimates.

Mr. BÉRGER. When the House rose at six o'clock on Wednesday last, I was discussing the manner of the construction of the Cornwall Canal, the foundation upon which it was constructed, and the materials with which it was constructed, and I quoted to the House the opinion of Mr. J. B. Mills, the engineer, as to the want of safety of a bank constructed along the river, and the necessity of constructing an inland canal. I now come to that portion of Mr. Page's report of the 27th February last, in which he says:

"It is quite true that the volume of water that passes down the 'Sny' is very small compared with the main body of the River St. Lawrence; at the narrowest place immediately below the rapids, the sectional area of the waterway at the lowest stage of the river is about 600 square feet, all of which passes through the dam at Moulinette and the opening made in it. When the river is at its high stages, the volume that passes down the 'Sny' is, of course, proportionately greater. In January, 1888, during an ice jam, large quantities of ice passed down the north branch, and destroyed in a great measure the mills and dam at Moulinette. If there had been a dam at that time at the north-west point of the island, it is fully believed that no one can say with any degree of certainty what would result, nor indeed what would be the effect at any time of closing the north branch of the river. The St. Lawrence is on too grand a scale to admit of the probable result of interference with it to be even approximated by the use of formulae fairly applicable to ordinary streams. It is a well-known fact that the river has been seriously affected by causes either little understood or altogether ignored by those desirous of accomplishing certain objects, apparently irrespective of ulterior results."

This criticism of the chief engineer upon the report of Mr. Keefer is certainly a most unfair one. He gives his Minister to understand that a large volume of water passed through the Chenailles, and that, if a dam were constructed, as was proposed, at the head of Sheik's Island, a serious result would ensue. If such a dam of the proportions mentioned had been constructed in 1838, at the head of Sheik's Island, not a drop of water could have passed through the Chenailles channel. The reference he makes to the gentleman whose report he is criticising, is unworthy of a professional man. The Chief Engineer of Canals might very properly say that the plans recommended by Mr. Samuel Keefer would not accomplish the ends desired, but there was nothing to warrant him in speaking of Mr. Samuel Keefer in this way, and to say that the causes affecting the river were "either little understood, or altogether ignored by those desirous of accomplishing certain objects, apparently irrespective of ulterior results." Such a criticism ought not to come from the Chief Engineer of Canals, but it serves to prove, as I said in the first part of my remarks, that the professional jealousy which served to make this an unsafe canal fifty years ago is to-day attempting to bring about the same result. He says:

"The effect of cutting loose a sheet of ice in a bay, then swinging it across the channel, has been known to lead to the drowning out for a time of a considerable tract of land along the margin of the river, and the closing of a branch of the river at the head of the Beauharnois Canal is well known to have led to a vast deal of trouble and an outlay for land damages of nearly $400,000."

There is no parallel whatever between the two cases—the closing of a branch of a river at Beauharnois, where there was a swift current, the length 600 or 800 feet and the depth 18 feet, and the closing of what he chooses to call the river, but which is not the river, only a little Chenailles, at the head of Sheik's Island where there is never more than two feet of water. In the latter case it is not possible that any damage could have been done by erecting a dam at that place. He endeavors, however, to create the impression that damage would result to the lands on the American side of the river, and thereby to induce the Minister to imagine that a dam should not be constructed at the head of Sheik's Island. What is the fact? After the dam was erected, all the water would go during the period of a flood, as it goes now between the islands, Barnhart's Island and the American shore, and the banks on the American shore are from 60 to 80 feet high, so that it is impossible that there could be any flooding of the American lands, for the water has never been known to rise more than 32 or 33 feet; therefore, no damage could arise, and there could be no complication with a foreign country. I think I have now dealt with every passage in Mr. Page's report, and I have shown very fully, by the reports of the engineers employed in the construction of the canal, and by all the evidence I have been able to obtain as to the manner in which the work was performed, to the House and to the public that this work was improperly located in the beginning, that the foundation upon which the banks were laid was bad, that the method of construction was bad, and that that might have been expected from the selection of the engineers under whose direction the work was done. To sustain my contention as to the engineers, let me read a passage from the Engineering News, a high authority in the United States, as to the result to banks when they are made under such circumstances, and, bear in mind, that the construction of the banks of the Cornwall Canal was under the direction of the consulting engineer, Mr. Wright, who was then also chief engineer of the Erie Canal. What was the result to the Erie Canal? The Engineering News says:

"The Erie Canal, 360 miles long, in a great many places forms a series of earthen dams, ranging from 10 feet to 50 feet in height, with water from 7 feet to 30 feet deep behind them. These banks were generally made of water-tight earth, with vertical puddle walls in the middle. Many of these banks have failed from improper construction. In a dozen or more places—"

And this shows that the same causes that resulted in the destruction of our banks here, have resulted in the destruction of the banks of the Erie Canal—

"In a dozen or more places the wheeling planks used in construction had been covered up, and thus provided for the escape of the first film of water which finally resulted in a breach. In another case an old tow-ropes left in the bank resulted in a breach. A third unlooked-for source of trouble resulted from the dumping of the wheeling planks, running across the bank, on material containing small stones."

Mr. BERGIN.

One would suppose that the engineer was speaking of the destruction of the banks from the Long Sault to Mille Roches in the Cornwall Canal.

"This stone naturally rolled to the foot of the slope and practically formed a blind drain which eventually brought about a leak."

Now, Sir, if this had been written of the Cornwall Canal, it would have been a strictly accurate representation of the causes and effects which have characterised that canal. I shall bring only one other authority to show that the banks of the Cornwall Canal are not in a condition to be meddled with in the manner in which it is proposed to meddle with them by the chief engineer, and the authority I shall bring in support of my statement, is that of the chief engineer himself, in his report made in the year 1874, on the navigation of the River St. Lawrence, to the Minister of Public Works. Speaking of the improved canal, he says this:

"From the general appearance of the south bank, together with what could be learned of its formation, there is reason to believe that it would be injudicious to interfere with it in any way. The widening must, therefore, be done altogether on the north side, although the ground is, for the most part, high, and has every indication of being unusually hard."

And you will remember, Sir, that, on Wednesday last, I quoted from the report of Mr. Page, made on the 27th February, that he actually had in contemplation, notwithstanding that he knew the insecurity of this bank of the canal, to go on and enlarge it in the manner proposed. He also adds:

"It may also be observed that the ground on the landward side is fully 40 feet higher than the proposed bottom of the reach. From the depth which the channel has to be sunk, it will be evident that the guard lock must be taken down and a new one built; at the same time a wider raceway formed, and a much larger supply weir constructed. To admit of this being done, and of new structures being placed in nearly the same positions as the present ones, the water would have to be drawn off for one full winter, a state of matters that should, if possible, be avoided, as it would involve the stoppage of all the mills and factories at Cornwall, and thereby throw a great number of persons out of employment. By the selection of another site for the lock and weir, this unfavorable result, it is believed, might be entirely avoided, a better class of work secured, and the outlay very little, if any, increased. There is, however, good reason to believe—"

And I would ask the attention of the Government to this, because it is the severest possible condemnation of the plan which he proposes now to follow—

"—that any place much below the present structure could not be judiciously chosen for the purpose, as the present water-level of the canal is several feet higher than that of the river immediately opposite, whilst the bank between them is of a nature unlikely to retain the water, if the level of the high stages of the river were extended farther downwards."

Yet the man who penned this report in 1874, who knew so thoroughly then that the bank was so bad that he could not move the guard lock further down, to-day, in his report, affirms that the bank is thoroughly safe and thoroughly sound, and that he has no hesitation in saying that the construction, under his present proposed plan, is feasible and safe, and that there can be no doubt of the correctness of his statement. If that is not enough, let me read you this further passage from his report:

"It is, therefore, believed that whatever advantages could be gained from a more easterly position for the guard-lock, they are more than counterbalanced by the risk connected with raising the water on an uncertain portion of the bank."

This, Sir, is the testimony of the Chief Engineer of Canals himself, and I do not think that anything has occurred to improve the quality of the bank from that time. He, himself, has shown by the report he has made, that the breach which occurred in the bank in the month of October last, and which caused so much injury to the commerce of this country, which resulted in such terrible loss to the merchants, mariners and others, in this country, was produced in the manner which had been predicted by himself and by the engineers who constructed this canal. He objects, it is true, to the dams which we proposed, as being equally uncertain and insecure. He surely cannot have consulted the engineering works of modern times, or he would know, from the reports that had been given in connection with the great dams that have broken away in different places in other countries, that there is a method of making dams secure, dams which will last for all time. The causes through which dams heretofore have broken away, have been thoroughly exposed, and amongst those causes is the cause of the breaking away of the banks of the Cornwall Canal in the month of October last, and that cause was the puddling of that canal by Colonel Philpotts, in his endeavor to make the bank, which he knew was bad, perfectly safe. Let me read to you from Mr. McAlpine—and there is no higher engineering authority on this continent, or in the old world, upon works of this kind—what he says as regards this puddling of banks, and he gives it as the result of an examination made in the breaking away of dams, both in the old country and in this, particularly the Croton dam, that was constructed by Mr. Jervis, one of the most eminent engineers in the United States, and another one which was constructed by the then Major General R. E. Lee, the great Confederate General of the South, one of the most accomplished engineers in America.

"No puddle wall should be made through the bank, for the effect of puddling is to render the earth more compact, and its eventual settlement will be less than that of the adjacent earth. And by reason of this unequal settlement, in time a vertical crack will be produced, extending along both faces of the puddle wall, and into these cracks rain or seepage water will settle and make it almost impossible to effect a subsequent union of the two masses."

And this, Sir, is what occurred in the Cornwall Canal banks. When it broke away, there were to be seen standing up, like broken pillars, portions of the puddle wall. They had not settled, the others had broken away from them, and that very puddling had been, to a great extent, the cause of the break. With this I conclude what I have to say upon Mr. Page's report of the 27th of February, and which, I repeat, would not have seen the light but for the notice which I put upon the paper, asking for it. This I have reason to know, because I asked the Minister of Railways to cause a survey to be made from Hooples' Creek to Sand Bridge, with a view to getting an increased volume of water, so that the Cornwall Canal might have a sufficient supply, both for manufacturing and navigation purposes. That survey was made, plans and profiles were prepared, and estimates were also prepared and sent in to the chief engineer, but they were pigeon-holed, and we have not seen them yet. The chief engineer gives it to be understood that any change in the work will cost a very much larger sum of money than that which he now proposes to expend. The same excuse for not building an inland canal was made in 1833, with the result that we have had several breaks, and although in the early days those breaks did not cause much interruption to the trade of the country, and did not cause any very serious damage to trade, yet this last one was so disastrous that the country cannot afford to-day, no matter at what cost, to leave the canal in an insecure condition. Let me compare the estimate which Mr. Page has made with the estimate which I have caused to be prepared, and which I have reason to know is in excess of what the work could be contracted for. Before doing this, let me briefly state to the House the changes which are sought to be made. These changes are: (1) A canal to be made from Archibald's Point through the low ground by Hooples' Creek to Sand Bridge; (2) A dam at the foot and head of Sheik's Island; and (3) the removal entirely of the lock at No. 19, and the reduction of the level between Nos. 20 and 19 to the level of No. 18. This would also do away with a guard lock, and as the result we would have seven miles of uninterrupted navigation from Archibald's Point to Maple Grove, requiring no towpath, and which distance could be traversed in from one hour to one hour and fifteen minutes, thus reducing the time now occupied by a vessel in passing through the Cornwall Canal—generally ten hours up and twelve hours down—to between four and five hours. I ask the House if such a change as that in the interests of the trade of the country is not worth the expenditure even of a hundred thousand dollars or so in excess of Mr. Page's estimate of the cost of the present work? But, when I come to read my estimate I think hon. members will find that the work it is proposed to carry out, in order to make the canal perfectly safe, will cost less than the work proposed by Mr. Page. The estimated amount of the contracts that he has given out from Mille Roches to the Long Sault is $1,200,000. To this I add—for which he has made no estimate, and I am sure I am $75,000 or $100,000 under what it will cost—for crib-work and rip-rap, which he proposes to add afterwards, $300,000, which will bring the entire cost of Mr. Page's proposed work up to $1,500,000. What is the estimate for the changes proposed? A new canal from Archibald's Point to Sand Bridge, inland, that can never break away, $900,000; cost of the two dams, which Mr. Keefer proposes, $195,000; from Maple Grove to Mille Roches, including bridge, $140,000; compensation to contractors on account of change of line and abandonment of existing contract, say $100,000, which will make a total of $1,235,000. From that sum I should deduct the cost of two locks, which at a very low estimate would be $300,000, or making the entire sum $935,000, as against Mr. Page's estimate of $1,500,000. But as our plan would also necessitate the raising of lock 20 six feet, I am willing to allow for that the full cost of the locks $150,000, which would make the total cost of our plan $1,135,000, still leaving a saving of $315,000. In addition to the saving which this plan would cause, there is the maintenance and operating of two locks for all time saved by our proposition, or about, including interest on capital, $10,000 or $12,000 a year. There is one remark to be made in regard to the change we propose. No matter if our plan costs more than that of Mr. Page, if it were carried out the Cornwall Canal could be injured by nothing short of an earthquake. But I have yet to find the engineer or practical man who will say for one moment that the present Cornwall Canal bank will be safe for one hour when the frost begins to come out of the ground. I go further, and I venture to predict that where the break occurred in the canal in October last, unless some change is made in the plan which the chief engineer is following to-day to repair that bank, the whole of it will be in the river by the middle of June. Why, any man of common sense—a man does not require to be an engineer to understand it—knows that if you throw great blocks of frozen earth into the water, this material cannot possibly knit together or consolidate. This earth is thrown in on the top of stone, there is no effort made to pulverize it, and when the frost comes out the mass will explode and the whole run into the river. A man does not require to be an engineer to know that, and I say, and am speaking with full knowledge when I say, that there never was a more mismanaged work than the repairing of that breach in the months of October and November last, and I charge that the Chief Engineer of Canals allowed most valuable time to elapse after the repair of that break. Then was the time when he should have taken the utmost precaution to have strengthened the bank and prevented it from ever falling away. During many weeks he had very fine weather, after the rainy season, during which the bank could have been repaired. He could have employed any number of men, and have put in solid dry earth, not the frozen material he is using there to-day, and in three weeks at the outside, long before the frost came, he could have made a solid and fairly strong bank, which would have lasted this season at all events. But he did not choose to do so, and the result will be as I predict. I now propose to direct the attention of the House to the dangerous state of this canal in other respects. The entrance to the canal is a tortuous, difficult and dangerous one. A tug when entering is obliged to steer over to the north shore of the canal in order to get within the pier. As she does so the current catches the hindermost barges of her tow and they are swung out to the stream, and whilst they are swinging to the stream she makes her way across from the north shore to get inside the pier which is on the south side of the canal, and then those barges swing back. They are caught there by the eddy, swung across again to the pier, and very often barges have sunk at the pier, and sometimes have broken away and drifted down to strand on Crab Island, or some place in the neighborhood. This causes great loss, and the underwriters are obliged to pay large sums of money in consequence. This is not a matter of which the chief engineer ought to be held entirely innocent, because he knows the condition of the river, he knows the state of the current and the eddies, he knows that the entrance is too narrow, he knows that there are boulders at the entrance to the channel on which vessels have grounded, and he knows, moreover, what is a matter of great importance to the town of Cornwall, that during three and sometimes four weeks of the year, the entrance to the canal is frozen solid to the bottom, that not a drop of water enters, and that the consequences are two thousand poor people in the town of Cornwall are during all that time unemployed. But, Sir, what excuse does he offer for leaving the canal in this dangerous state? He says that his excuse is that it is caused by frazil, and that nobody knows anything about frazil. Frazil has no more to do with it than I have. I took the chief engineer up there, and I pointed out to him that the ice comes down the river and fills up the channel between the pier and the main shore, then so soon as the surface is covered the blocks of ice that follow go under the top ice and so on, and so on, until it is filled to the bottom. It is only at great risk of life to the canal laborers that they are ever able to make a passage through that ice so as to get a supply of water for the mills. That is all because the chief engineer is wedded to his idols, and he appears to have seen nothing, to have heard nothing, and to have learned nothing, during the thirty years he has been in charge of the work. Because of that, forsooth, the canal is to remain in that dangerous condition and no change whatever is to be made. Having said this much as to the entrance at the head of the canal, let me say something as to the entrance at the foot. A few years ago, when the manufacturers and the forwarders of this country were calling for an increased water supply to the Cornwall Canal, the chief engineer recommended that the work of the improvement of the canal should be begun; but, in keeping with everything which he has done in connection with these canals, he proposed to give us a water supply, not by building new locks and a larger entrance at the head, but by building new locks and removing the entrance at the foot. Instead of giving us an increased water supply he showed us the way to let the water out, but he found out no means of letting the water in.

Mr. RYKERT. How did he do that?

Mr. BERGIN. By building the locks at the foot instead of at the head of the canal. Had they been built at the head they would have an additional supply. Now, this entrance at the foot is a dangerous entrance as well as the entrance at the head of the canal. We have no range lights at the foot, there are no buoys or beacons put upon the north shore of the Cornwall Island, and no lights to show the mariners the new channel which it is necessary for them to take if they would enter the Cornwall Canal with safety. We all remember the terrible accident to the Passport two or three years ago, by which the Riche-lieu and Ontario Navigation Co. lost an immense sum of money, and it was a miracle that a large number of lives were not lost also. Why did this accident occur? Because there were no range lights, no buoy or no beacon on the north side of the Cornwall Canal. Mariners to this day are ignorant that there is a fine channel between Peloe's and Colquhoun's Island. There is a safe channel, a deep channel and a straight channel running directly into the mouth of the canal, but they have had no information given to them, and they have gone on ever since that day using the only channel known to them, a channel on the north side hugging the north shore and crossing in a current to be caught in the eddy and forced upon the stone pier on the south side of the entrance to the canal. I charge that the accident to the Passport is not the only accident which has happened in consequence of the carelessness (to use the mildest possible term) of the chief engineer. Only the other day, comparatively speaking, the steamer Passport was wrecked at the foot of lock 19, when the captain had his thigh bone broken. He escaped with his life it is true, but several men were seriously injured. What brought about that accident? It was the improper construction of the weir at that lock, which was constructed many years ago under the direction of Mr. Legge. Mr. Page discovered long since that that weir was not only improperly located, but that it was improperly constructed. In his report of 1874 he pointed out the danger to navigation from that weir. He might have had occasion to point out a greater danger to navigation but for the close and watchful attention of the superintendent of the canal, who saw that the swash from this weir was constantly wearing away the bank; had it not been for the superintendent we would have had a breach in that bank at the foot of the lock as we had a breach the other day at another portion of the canal. Mr. Page himself was perfectly aware of this and during all these years, although it would not have cost a single dollar to this country to have altered that weir—because every day the men upon his scows were hauling earth away to strengthen the banks in the portions that appeared to them to be weakened at the time—and they could have taken that earth and constructed a new weir during these fifteen or twenty years; the weir would have led down straight into the canal, and the water would not have interfered with any vessel or have done any damage of any kind. Speaking of that weir, Mr. Page says:

"The balance of the supply required for the Cornwall level, in addition to that above stated, is furnished over and through a weir situated at right angles to the lock, a place nearly opposite the lower quoin."

It is almost incredible that a man of the high reputation of the Chief Engineer of Canals should have allowed that weir to remain there during so many years without making any attempt to alter or improve it, knowing full well that it must do great injury to navigation. The report goes on to say:

"It will be obvious that this means of admitting the supply must be wholly inadequate to the requirements, when it is borne in mind that at low stages of the river the water above the guard lock is on the same level as that below it, and frequently, during some years, the river level is not more than one foot over that of the canal."

He says again:

"The reach between locks 18 and 19 is 7,789 feet in length, and the supply to it is maintained in a similar manner to that of the level below, except that the weir is below the lock and in a position which throws the current more directly across the channel. The supply to this reach passes over and through a weir built on the north side, opposite the head of the lock, thence by a raceway which enters a short distance lower down on the same level as that of the canal. It is, however, found that the position and direction of the strong current thus produced are very objectionable to upward-bound vessels entering the lock."

Here, Sir, I have the whole case stated by Mr. Page himself, an acknowledgment made fifteen years ago that this weir was a source of danger to vessels, and more particularly to upward-bound vessels. Now, Sir, let me draw your attention to the condition of the locks, and I will speak first of the lock gates. Except in the two new locks which have been constructed, there is not to-day a lock gate on the Cornwall Canal that is fit for service. These lock gates, the majority of them, have been in use over 20 years, and during that time the gate posts have been worn; the stone in which the gate posts fit, and they ought to fit tightly, has been worn away; the gates have worn away; the heel points or pivots of the gates have worn away, and the sockets in which the heel points rest, and which are made of brass, have become enlarged, and consequently when the gates are opened they sway and swing. They have not a true pivot point on which to rest nor true sockets in which the points can work. That is not all. There is not to-day in a single lock a track on which any gate can run, and run with ease and facility, or which a man can move without the exertion of more than fairly honest effort. Why, Sir, on one of these locks we have had men injured for life over and over again, because the gates were so out of gear that it was impossible for the men to handle them. One man is lying to-day a helpless cripple, with an injured spine, and he will be so for all time, having been stricken down in the very prime of life in his attempts to open a gate which two men could not open without difficulty. His little family are dependent upon him for bread, he is powerless to help them. Not far from the canal is another man, a living corpse. In attempting to open the gates, he so over-exerted himself that his bowels were forced out, he was at death's door, and for two years past he has had a living death. All these things might have been avoided if the service of the canal had not been starved for years and years. Every representation that has been made with the view of having the service improved has been met with the answer: Wait until the canals are enlarged, and then we will have this done. It is the old story over again: Wait till the horse is stolen, and then lock the stable door. What I have said of the lock gates I may also say of the foundations. The foundations of each lock are rapidly going to pieces. At the foot of each lock, except lock 17—and I will explain why it is not in the same condition in a moment or two—I am speaking now of the old locks—there is a hole from ten to twelve feet deep, and as much in diameter, under the foundations, made by the constant dripping of the water during all these years; and the same would be found at lock 17, but that they found that the bottom was going to drop into the hole two or three years ago, and then they filled it up with stone. Is that a condition in which a great public work like this ought to be? And the mitre sills—well, the less I say about their condition the better. That there is not a good mitre sill on that whole canal—and I do not except those on the new locks—is a fact that cannot be questioned. Now, Sir, let me draw your attention to the method of opening the gates. We all know that a few years ago the Chief Engineer of Canals made a change in the gates. It was not an improvement, because most of the so-called improvements he was obliged to change almost immediately after constructing them. The valves did not work well; complicated machinery was employed, some of which is left. What I maintain is that everything in the shape of machinery in connection with the canal ought to be of the most simple character. It ought to be of a nature that can be comprehended by the poorest intellect. You know the material out of which lock laborers are generally made—not skilled men, machinists or mechanics, but ordinary laborers; and therefore the machinery put into their hands to work with ought to be of the simplest kind. But instead of that, the machinery given to them was of the most complicated kind. Then, one would think that in putting in these new locks to improve, as he said, the Cornwall Canal, the chief engineer would improve the method of opening the gates. But no; he went back to the old complicated plan of capstan and bars, which was in use when the canal was built. That plan would not work, it would not open and shut a gate and the engineer was obliged to resort to the old method of opening the gates. He took the crabs from the old locks and employed them on the new locks in order that the gates could be opened and shut. The Chief Engineer of Canals knows all about that; I have gone with him to the canals, and he has seen all this; and will you believe it?—in the specifications for the new locks he proposes to build on this canal, the same old method of capstan and bar, which experience has proven cannot work, has been called for. This is the way in which the Cornwall Canal is being managed, and it is time I should call the attention of the Government and the country to the matter. Why, Sir, the superintendent of the canal, the masters, the lock laborers, all are blamed for every little accident that may happen on that canal; but the real master, the man without whose authority the superintendent cannot dismiss any man, is the man to blame, and not the men under him who have no control over the canal except to carry out his instructions. You have no idea of the difficulty I have had in obtaining information about this canal. I have gone repeatedly to the engineers employed by him and asked for information, but I could not get it without the authority of the chief engineer. I will show you how important it is to the country that information should be obtained and laid before the country as to the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and how impossible it has been for me, up to this time, to get that information. We have, Sir, on the Lachine Canal—I do not know whether we have not also on the Beauharnois Canal—a telephone apparatus, which has been found to be of immense service. We have asked Mr. Page over and over again to give us a telephone service on the Cornwall Canal; but no, no matter what other canal gets a telephone service, he has none for the Cornwall Canal. You can well understand that once a break takes place in a gate, or a weir is stopped, or a valve breaks, or any accident occurs that requires immediate attention, should it happen at the head of the canal, a man has to come, perhaps in the dead of the night, twelve miles to the superintendent to give him information, and then they have to travel back twelve miles again, so that from twelve to twenty-four hours is lost, to the serious damage of the trade of the country, before any repairing can be done. All that might be avoided by the establishment of a telephone, which would cost but a trifle. The Cornwall Canal is lighted up, as it has been for many years past, by coal oil. Why can it not be lighted, as the Lachine Canal is, by electric light, and thus give extra advantage to mariners? We found the benefit of the electric light during the breach in the canal in the fall, when electrical apparatus was established there, and work was done both night and day. That would greatly facilitate the working of the canal, and had we an electric light of our own at the time the break occurred, much time would have been saved. All these drawbacks mean great delay in the passage of vessels through the canal, and these delays have been complained of time and again. They have been frequently brought before the chief engineer, but he never could see his way to increase the facilities or to lessen the time occupied in passing through the canal. Now, I have pointed out to him a way by which he can make an uninterrupted inland canal at less cost than by the means which he proposes. By making the head of the canal at lock 20, he will diminish the delay in passing through the canal from the number of hours I have mentioned to four or five hours. All these things I have mentioned—the telegraph or telephone, the electric light—will contribute towards the safety of the navigation of the canal. I wish to say a word or two as to the condition of the lock houses. I suppose that the plans for these houses were submitted to the Chief Engineer of Canals. I know that the intention of the Government has never been directed to the condition of these lock houses, but now that they will of necessity be obliged, in consequence of the change in the location and the new entrance to the Cornwall Canal at the foot, and in consequence of the floods which occurred, to build new lock houses, I ask them at all events to make some little provision for the health of the people who occupy them. These houses have two small rooms on the ground floor. They are only one story in height. The lock laborers, almost without exception, are married men with families—some of them very young, some of them almost at the full age, or, at all events, young boys and girls at the age of puberty; and they are obliged to crawl in by a little hole under the roof or else remain in the same room with their parents below. Is that a condition in which laborers ought to be placed by the parties having control of the canal? They ought at least to have a room or two, and these rooms ought to be of the height and size that would give them a sufficient quantity of air to breathe, to enable them to live in health during the hot season, for we know that, during the hot weather, people confined in small rooms cannot possibly be in a good state of health. I think it my duty, because these are little matters which have not yet been brought before the Government, and of which they could possibly know nothing, to bring before them now in order that precautions may be taken to secure the health and safety of these lock laborers. I have spoken strongly upon what I believe to be the defects in the management of the Cornwall Canal, and it may be that some of those who have listened to me are under the impression that I have some personal feeling against the chief engineer. Quite the contrary. The only personal feeling I have for him is one of very great respect. I believe his intentions are good, but intentions will not remedy the evils of which I complain. He, no doubt, has upon his hands perhaps more than he is able to attend to, and in that case help should be provided for him. Having said so much about the Cornwall Canal, I think it only proper that I should say something about the approaches to the canal from the westward of the river and to the eastward. The general impression is that no vessel can reach Montreal from Kingston that draws more than 14 feet of water. As the river is at present, this is true; but if you will look into the reports of Mr. Page, you will find that, at a comparatively small expense, a channel of 20 feet, safe and commodious—a wide channel without any danger of collision—can be made, all the way from Kingston to Montreal. Gentlemen who have been in the habit of going to Kingston by the river from Prescott and Brockville know what a narrow and tortuous channel it is in many places. We all know that at some point between Brockville and Kingston the channel is so narrow that it is almost dangerous for vessels to meet, particularly at Fiddler's Elbow, which is a point pretty well known to almost everyone who travels over that route. Some years ago, when I was at Prescott in command of the 59th Battalion, I had occasion to come in contact with a corps of engineers belonging to the United States service, who were then making a topographical survey of the lakes and river. We had the honor of entertaining these gentlemen at dinner one night, and during the course of conversation the chief of the party informed me that he had had a very pleasant interview, a few days before, with our surveyors in their camp on one of the islands above. He further told me, to my astonishment, that our engineers had pointed out to him several mistakes, and on going back to correct their survey he found that everything which had been said by our engineers was strictly correct, and that the fault had been in his own men, who had been careless in throwing the line and plummet. He said: We have been taught also a useful lesson by your engineers, who employ long poles when the water is swift, and in that way they get a more accurate measurement than by line and plummet, which are apt to be carried away, and to make the water appear deeper than it is, I have looked over the plans issued by the United States, and I find there is a perfectly safe and wide channel of more than a mile and a half shorter from Brockville than any of the channels now employed by our people. I would like to know what has become of the report of the survey made by our engineers at that time. I have looked in vain for it through the public documents. I have appealed to Mr. Page's engineers, and they told me they had no authority to give me any information; that whatever report was made, was made to the chief engineer, and that if he did not give it to the country they had no authority to give it; and they would not enlighten me in any way. But the fact is as I have stated. I have studied carefully the plans of the United States engineers, and I find that we can have a safe, wide channel, comparatively, in place of the tortuous and insufficient channel we have now, in no place less than 20 feet of water, and in places even 200 feet. A survey of Lake St. Francis was made in the year 1834 by Mr. Thomson, and the result of that survey, made under the authority of the Government of Upper Canada, showed that all the way from Cornwall to Coteau there was a channel nowhere less than 20 feet. And to-day vessels are grounding every little while upon the shoals in Lake St. Francis when within a few feet of a channel 1,200 feet wide, no less than 20 feet deep, and in the majority of places 80 feet deep. Why is that? Because the chief engineer has not issued a chart of that channel and pointed out where the wide and deep and safe channel is. I might go further and might keep on until 6 o'clock pointing out the laches in connection with this Cornwall Canal, but I think I have shown enough to prove to the Government and to the country that the closest enquiry should be made before any money be expended upon the contracts which have been let by Mr. Page. If I had been able to get the information, if I had known that the contracts were going to be made without proper enquiry on the part of the chief engineer, I would have moved in this matter twelve months ago, but I had no idea that the contracts would be let in that way though. I knew that Mr. Page was obstinately determined to pursue his own course. When I took him to the head of the canal, and showed him the current which carried the ice inside the pier and showed him that there was no such current through Hoopes' Creek to Archibald's Point, and that there never could be an obstruction by ice if the canal were carried in through there, he refused on the ground that so much money had been expended before. I pointed out to him that he was in no way responsible for the location of the original canal, that he was not in the country at the time, and that it would redound to his credit to remedy the evils which were complained of. He saw those evils and admitted them, but he would not change them because so much money had been already expended. He was determined to send much good money after bad, and the result is seen now. I tell the Government that, if they will issue a Royal Commission, as I hope they will, I shall be prepared to establish every statement I have made by the best scientific and practical authorities in this country. With the permission of the House, I desire to add to the resolution:

And the plans, profiles and estimates made by Mr. Clewes in the year 1886.

Mr. MULLOCK. I think the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergin) might more properly have been directed towards the Department of Railways and Canals than a mere servant of the department. It is a new doctrine to lay down in the House that subordinates are to be answerable on the floor of the House while their chiefs go uncensured and un-criticised. I think my hon. friend would have adopted a more courageous course, had he in this case confined his observations and criticisms to the Administration, rather than to an absent man. He has told us that the chief engineer in the employment of the Government is not possessed of the professional knowledge necessary to discharge his duties. He has criticised in various ways the shortcomings of the chief engineer. I think those are observations which cannot be accepted as absolutely accurate, coming, I think, from a person who is not capable, from his lack of professional knowledge, to be an infallible judge of what are, and what are not, the requirements of an engineer. I think it was General Grant who said, when he had closed his great military career, that the most ungenerous critics for military men who had been successful, were those men who had been drummed out of the service because they were unable to acquire even the elementary knowledge of the goose step. I believe I have seen it stated by a learned writer, that it is necessary that a man should serve his time to every trade except criticism, for critics are ready made. I have not the pleasure of knowing the chief engineer referred to, except by reputation, but we all know that he has a professional reputation extending far beyond Canada, and that the works he has superintended have deservedly earned for Canada the reputation of having the best system of canals on the face of the earth. His reputation is not limited to Canada, or to the western world, but great engineers, sent from Europe to learn what is best and newest in hydraulic engineering, have visited the great canals of Canada, have examined those works, and have recommended them to their own country. Knowing this, and knowing nothing whatever of the merits or demerits of this particular question, I think it would be unworthy of this House to admit that this is the proper course for any hon. gentleman to pursue, to appeal to the House against a subordinate of the department, unless it can be shown, beyond all question, that the chief of the department, the responsible head, has, first of all, been appealed to, and has refused to listen to the appeal, and has been incapable, for some reason or another, of redressing the alleged wrong. The hon. gentleman says that this incompetence, which he charges has shown itself in regard to this Cornwall Canal, has existed for a term of years. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergin) has had a seat in this House for fifteen or twenty years, but this is the first time, at all events within my recollection, that he has addressed himself to this question. I have never heard a reference to this matter from him before. He tells us that the incompetence of the engineer in regard to the canals, and especially in regard to the Cornwall Canal, has been shown for many years. Was it not then his duty, first of all, when he came to the conclusion that the engineer was not fit for his work, to prevent further mistakes by laying his grievances before the responsible head? It appears to me that would have been the proper course; perhaps he has adopted that course. I ask, has he adopted that course?

Mr. BERGIN. Go on, go on.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman does not say. In his address he did not refer to any such course as that. He did not say that he had appealed from time to time to one branch of the Administration or to another, but he seems to have laid by, all these years, and been making note of grievances that have occurred in his constituency, and at last, with indignation, he bursts upon this House in a speech extending over very nearly two days. Now, all that he has stated may or may not be true, but I think it is due to the Administration to adopt the responsibility of this case and to disapprove of, and, if they have the courage, to protect their officials from an attack of this kind. Those public works have been conducted under the direction of a responsible head. I do not understand that an engineer can proceed with the expenditure of money without first submitting his plans to his chief. Now, that was done in every case; it must have been done. Every expenditure of money voted by Parliament must be made with the assent and approval of the responsible head. It has to be done, it is on that theory that we vote money and place it at the disposal of the Administration of the day, and if there has been a waste of money, not the deputy, being the agent of the Minister, but the Minister, is responsible, therefore. It is a curious theory if we can affirm that there has been a waste of money and that we can only censure the agent who, according to our theory, at least, has been simply carrying out the directions of his principal, the head of the department. For these reasons I think that the speech of the hon. gentleman is entirely out of order, from a parliamentary standpoint. He has adopted an entirely wrong tone. These complaints, first of all, I think, should have been directed to the department, either privately or on the floor of the Parliament, I do not care which, but the charge should be made against the responsible party, the Government of the day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is, of course, no objection to the granting of the papers which the hon. gentleman has moved for. It is true, as the hon. gentleman says, that the Government must and ought to see that their subordinates in the different offices, the permanent officers, should get fair play, and I am not at all aware that any failure on that score can be attributable to the Government. But members of Parliament are free men, and they are here for the purpose of protecting the public interest. If they feel it necessary to attack the course pursued by the subordinates, or by their masters, or by the Government, it is perfectly open for them to do so, it is their duty to do so. I have been called away a good deal, both when the hon. gentleman spoke last week, and to-day, and I have not been able to follow him fully, although I heard a considerable portion of his speech on the first occasion. I understand that he has reviewed fully the system on which canals have been built in the vicinity of the St. Lawrence. It is quite open to him to do so. He has a right to reflect upon the skill, or the want of skill, in the construction of these canals; he has a right to look at the different reports made by the chief engineer, and either approve or disapprove of them. The Government—and a good many Governments have been concerned in the construction of that canal—the Governments all are responsible for whatever was done during their existence. The hon. gentleman who spoke last knows, of course, that any government must be in the hands, to a considerable extent, of the professional men whom they employ in all these public works. In very few instances are the members of any political government professional men, and able personally to judge of the accuracy or otherwise of the reports of their scientific employés. Every government has got to consider whether, in the first place, a great work should be undertaken or not; then they are bound to get the best scientific information that they can, and they have to rely on the reports made by their engineers, or their professional men, and finally come to the best decision they can as to how the work is to be carried on. I do not think that we can limit the power or the right of a member of Parliament to scrutinise fully and freely all such matters.

Mr. MULOCK. It is only a question of taste, that is all, not a question of right.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman said it was out of order; he used that expression.

Mr. MULOCK. I meant in that sense.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, every hon. member, as long as his speech is parliamentary and does not offend any rules, is to be his own judge as to the question of taste. The House can agree with him in that, or some of the House may not agree with him; it is a matter for each member to judge for himself, and to be governed by his own sense of propriety in using language. All the House can ask, or you, Mr. Speaker, can insist upon, is that there shall be no breach of parliamentary orders or rules. I will also say that I have always had a high respect for Mr. Page, although certainly I am not a competent judge as to engineering work; but I have always had a high respect for the common sense, experience and professional ability of Mr. Page. He has been of late years, I think, the head engineer of the canal branch of the Department of Railways and Canals. My opinion one way or the other would not be of much value, but I know that it has been corroborated, not only in verbal conversation with other professional men, but by reports and correspondence, from which I gather, that his status as a competent engineer is high amongst his professional brethren.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

EXTENSION OF THE FREE LIST.

Mr. PLATT moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to remove the duty on, and place upon the Free List, all grains and seeds which do not ripen in Canada, but which are now largely imported and sown for the production of food for cattle under the system of feeding called Soiling and Ensilage, now largely adopted by the farmers of Canada.

He said: This motion requires some slight change in our Customs tariff. I am aware that our tariff is considered by some, notably by hon. gentlemen opposite, to be a sacred institution, which profane hands, at least, should not dare to touch. I am likewise aware that hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches watch with peculiar care, and even with a jealous eye, any attempted innovation upon that peculiar institution, and are likely to regard with extreme care any attempt to infringe upon that portion of the Customs tariff which goes to make up the National Policy. But, notwithstanding that this resolution does propose to effect slight changes in the tariff, I think it will tax the ingenuity of hon. gentlemen opposite to interpret it as meaning anything antagonistic to the National Policy. On the contrary, I think they will be forced to conclude that the amendment proposed is in strict conformity with the principles of the National Policy as announced from time to time and from place to place. It is no conspiracy against the National Policy, or even against the system of protection; it is simply an attempt to obtain, if possible, from Parliament a recognition of the enterprise of the farming community, and of their efforts to maintain their calling at the highest point among the callings of people in this country, which I hold it occupies at the present time. In order to do this, I am asking Parliament for no grant, no Government assistance, but simply for the removal of an obstacle in the way of their richly-deserved progress. The branch of industry to which I allude may be considered a new departure on the part of the farmers of this country, it is one of our infant industries, at least it is an infant branch of one of our oldest and most important industries. It has, however, already obtained vast prospective proportions, and I consider it is far-reaching in its effect on the future welfare of our agricultural industries. It is well known to all of us that agriculture, with the conditions under which it is surrounded, in order to maintain its position as an industry, must of necessity seek different methods of advancement from those adopted and pursued in the early history of the country. The conditions which render this necessary are varied and, for the most part, unavoidable. Climatic changes, the depletion of the soil, the opening up of new territory, thereby increasing the extent of competition which our cereals have to meet with in the markets of the world, are all causes which conspire to compel the farming community to cast about for some new and better method by which to attain success in their calling. In this emergency the farming community have, I may say, with a general consensus of the opinion of the most intelligent and enterprising of the farmers, cast their eyes towards stock-raising or dairy farming as the most likely to be followed with success; and the result is that it is almost universally adopted, in some countries to a large extent, and in others to a smaller extent, throughout the Province of Ontario. In order to make this departure successful new lines have been laid down by successful farmers, and they have adopted new methods of keeping stock. It is well known that hay, grasses and roots have been found by experience to be too expensive for stock-feeding, and resort is now generally being had to what is known as soiling and ensilage, which simply means this: the production of the largest possible amount of nutritious and milk-producing food from a certain acreage of land, and feeding the same in a green and uncured state to sheltered animals both during winter and summer. I need not explain the details of this system; if this should be necessary, there are practical farmers in the House who can do it more successfully than I can. Suffice it to say that this system is very largely advocated by the most intelligent farmers in the country, and during the last year it has formed a great theme of discussion at the annual meetings of the Dairymen's Association and the Farmers' Institutes throughout Ontario. These discussions have led other farmers to determine to try this system more largely in the future than in the past. The seeds which are used for the production of the cheap food of which I am speaking have thus far been certain varieties of corn of northern production, varieties which do not, and cannot, I believe, be successfully ripened in this country, but which are very largely used for the production of this cheap food, large quantities being used throughout Ontario last summer. I cannot give the House the exact quantity, because I do not think the Trade and Navigation Returns make any definite distinction between corn imported for that purpose and corn imported for other purposes; but I know this fact, that a single importer of this kind of seed received twenty-eight car loads which came to London. This may be taken as an index of the extent of this industry; and I can assure the House the prospect is that during the coming season much more seed will be required in Ontario than has been used in any previous year. Besides these varieties of corn of southern growth, I have seen exhibited at meetings of Farmers' Institutes various other seeds, beans, peas and various grasses, all southern grown, and which are now being largely used in the middle and northern States, and which, no doubt, will be largely imported by Ontario farmers during the coming season. I submit it can in no way be considered as any innovation of the National Policy to ask that the Customs tax be removed from the seed of which I am speaking. It may be said, of course, that it would be too much trouble, that it would be hardly worth while to make tariff changes for so small a matter. It may be considered a small matter by some persons, but it is in the aggregate a very large matter, and one of very deep interest to the agriculturists of the country. We know that in farming, as in other branches of industry, the cost of production must be very carefully watched, in order to make that calling a success. We have heard very much of late about the desirability of keeping our cattle at home and of shipping to foreign countries the products thereof. This, I grant, would be of very great benefit to the country if it could be successfully carried out; but it cannot be successfully carried out until we have some improved system of feeding stock, and we cannot expect to have an improved system of feeding until we have cheaper food, and we cannot have cheaper food until our system of soiling and ensilage reaches a greater degree of perfection throughout the Province than it has reached up to the present time. We may consider the fodder fed to cattle as essentially a raw material, and if we carry out this much advocated principle of the National Policy, to feed our cattle and retain them at home while we ship the products, we would consider the feed as raw material, the animal as the machine, and milk, butter, cheese and beef as the products to ship. We cannot expect to have cheap products until we have cheap raw material for its production. Some time ago—two years ago, I think—the author of the National Policy and the present leader of this House very concisely defined what he considered the National Policy to be, and I will read his short definition. The right hon. gentleman said:

“That policy the Government adopted and carried out, in 1879—the National Policy—was simply this: that it made the free list as wide as possible of the articles which could not, for climatic or other reasons, be produced or manufactured in Canada, and that raw material which could be made up here would be imported free.”

This, Sir, is the definition of the National Policy given by the leader of this House, and if that be a true definition I cannot see how he or any of his followers can consistently object to the proposition I am now making. If we are to have raw materials admitted free, then I submit that what I am asking is that a raw material be admitted free. If we are to have admitted articles free which cannot for climatic reasons be produced here, I submit that I am asking the removal of a tax on an article which cannot from climatic reasons be produced in Canada. Besides that I am asking for the free importation of an article which enters into what I may say is the principal industry of this country, and into the youngest branch of that industry. Last year, when I brought this matter to the attention of the House, in a very few words the then Minister of Finance (Sir Charles Tupper) informed me that he could see no possible reason why my request should not be granted, and that if any tariff changes were made the proposition should be considered. I leave it to this House to consider whether or not they can justify the refusal of the request which I am now making on behalf of the farming industries of the country, or whether they will grant it. I make no lengthy appeal, but what I have said is as short and concise as possible. I can assure the House that this is a matter of very considerable interest to the farming community throughout this country, and some disappointment will be felt if the request is not granted.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). As the National Policy, when first introduced, was for the purpose of promoting all the different industries of the country, the agricultural industry along with the others, and as this is a very important period in the history of agriculture in the Dominion of Canada, I think we should consider what help we can give to our farmers. One of the principal agricultural industries, the manufacture of cheese, has been in a rather depressed condition during the last two years, from two causes—first, from the large shrinkage which has taken place in the produce of the country, and, second, the shrinkage which has taken place in the price, farmers in consequence are compelled to look around to see what can be done in order to enable them to produce more cheaply. In this connection there is nothing that has presented itself to the mind of the practical farmer of the Dominion of Canada at the present time, equal to the production of ensilage. I believe that this is a very small boom indeed for the farmers to request of Parliament. It is certainly made in the interest of dairying both as far as butter and cheese is concerned. Our climate is continually changing and we find that changes have taken place within the last few years which makes it imperative upon every farmer, in order to be successful, to provide some kind of summer feed for their cattle when pastures fail. There is no other feed that we know of, which the same quantity of land will produce to the same amount as this feed. But seed corn is something we cannot get in our own country. It has to be brought from the United States, and I hope, therefore, that the Government will see their way to grant this request, and to give us this seed free of duty, in order that we may be able to raise cheaper feed for our cattle. While we have not had the pleasure of any experiment in this direction from our our experimental farm here, we must remember that the farm is only young yet, and perhaps it has not had the opportunity of doing so, but I hope that the Government will see their way to give us the seed free, so that we may experiment for ourselves. I believe, if they do so, it will be the means of enabling the farmers of Canada to produce both beef cattle and dairy produce more cheaply than any other system which has yet been introduced into the country.

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the proposition moved by the two hon. gentlemen opposite, I can only say that corn introduced in this country pays  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per bushel. In the section of the country which I represent we use a good deal of it for the purpose of being sown broadcast and being cut green, for feeding cattle and for ensilage. We must all remember that that duty of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cents a bushel was put on corn coming into the country for the purpose of protecting our own corn growers in western Ontario. It is news to me that we cannot grow this article for dairy and other purposes when it is sown broadcast in our section of the country. I thought that the corn which was used for that purpose is the corn, or a similar corn, that is grown in the counties of Kent and Essex. There may be perhaps some of it that is from a southern part of the States and a different kind of corn, but as a general rule that corn is used in our section of the country and it suits perfectly well for cutting and for green purposes. No other seed has been mentioned by hon. gentlemen which should be admitted free. They told the House that there are a lot of other seeds which can be sown broadcast and used for this purpose that ought to be admitted free, but the only seed that they have mentioned is corn, and the duty put upon corn was for the purpose of protecting the corn growers in our own portion of the country. Their corn can be used perfectly well for purposes of ensilage.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to say a few words with reference to this subject. I live in the corn-growing belt along Lake Erie, and the kind of corn that is sown for green feed there is known as the mammoth sweet corn, and which does not mature in any of those counties. I believe possibly that in some seasons it may mature in some extreme southwestern portions of Essex County, but it is very uncertain whether it will mature there or not. The seed used by farmers is almost invariably imported from the United States, and my friend from Prince Edward County (Mr. Platt) is right in saying that it would be in the interests of the farming community of this country to allow that particular kind of corn in free of duty. There is perhaps not one year in half a dozen when that corn matures in any part of Canada. The cheese factories make a practice of importing this corn and soiling it to their customers for seed purposes, at cost price. Of course, with the duty on, it costs  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cents more to the farmer than if the duty were removed.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I endorse the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) with regard to the seed used for this purpose. It cannot be grown in the counties mentioned by the Postmaster General. The corn grown in the vicinity of Chatham is not suitable for the purposes referred to by the member for Prince Edward County (Mr. Platt), and I may say that I was present at a Farmers' Institute meeting, held shortly before the opening of Parliament, when this question was under discussion, and I can assure the House that it is a question which has excited a great deal of attention among the farmers of Ontario, who find that it is necessary to provide some cheaper food for their stock in the winter time. I think it is but fair to the farmers of this country that they should receive some benefits in the direction indicated by this motion.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Postmaster General asks whether there was any other seed than corn which did not ripen in Canada, and which would be useful for the purposes indicated. I think there is another seed which is imported for the purpose of growing food for cattle, and which does not ripen, or, if it does, only under great difficulties, in Canada—that is, millet seed.

Mr. HAGGART. It ripens here.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not know, of course, but it is stated in the press that it does not ripen in Canada. But, whether it does or not, last spring a portion of eastern Ontario, and, perhaps, other districts, suffered very severely from drought, and the grains that were sown in the early spring perished. It was too late to grow the ordinary crops which farmers use for fodder. At that time—well on in June—the only thing they could do was to plough up the land where the spring grains had been killed by the drought, and plant millet. But there was no millet seed in the country. If it does grow in Canada there was none to be found when it was wanted last year; and it became necessary to import large quantities of it. When the seed came to the Custom house the Minister of Customs, interpreting the Customs Act, held that it was a grain, a cereal, and liable to pay a duty of 20 per cent. Of course, I am not criticising the action of the Minister of Customs in making that ruling, as he was simply carrying out the law; but it was a carrying out of the law which operated very hardly upon the farmers. They had to suffer enough; they had lost their crops, and, when they tried to help themselves, the Government taxed them, in their distress and exigency, 20 per cent. ad valorem upon the seed which they resorted to. Now, I do not think it is in the interest of the country that seeds of the class referred to, imported under the circumstances mentioned, for producing food for cattle, should be taxed, and I think it would be only doing what is in the best interest of the country to place them on the free list.

Mr. BOWELL. Perhaps the strongest objection which I can have to the passage of this resolution is the impracticability of carrying it out. It states that we should place on the free list all grains and seeds which do not ripen in Canada, but which are now largely used for certain purposes and imported from foreign countries. Well, it is somewhat difficult, I should judge, to decide what seeds there are that would come under this designation. There has been but one variety of corn referred to, so far as I am aware, that has not ripened in Canada; that is what is termed the large sweet or dent corn, called by some, I believe, the horse-tooth corn, principally grown in Ohio. There are very few grains and seeds, and very few varieties of corn, if any, that will not ripen in some portions of Canada. I have a distinct recollection of certain varieties of corn having been introduced in the section of country where I live, and it was some years before they would mature so that they could be grown successfully. But this corn, like other seeds, becomes in time acclimatised, and can be grown successfully. I know that is the case in the section of country I come from; and though not a farmer, I have had some little experience, in connection with agricultural societies, of the wants and requirements of the yeomanry of the country. But apart from that, besides the class of corn to which I have referred, I am not aware of any other kind that will not ripen in Canada; and even assuming that this variety will not ripen, how much of a tax is imposed upon the very largest farmers in Ontario by the duty? The dairy industry is carried on very extensively in the county of Hastings. We have some forty or fifty cheese factories, and some farmers have from 50 to 100 cows on their farms; but I am not aware that any of them would sow for the purpose indicated more than from six to ten bushels of seed. Suppose I assume that the largest farmer would sow ten bushels of this particular kind of corn; he would have to pay a duty of 75 cents. That would be the enormous tax which this iniquitous National Policy, as hon. gentlemen opposite designate it, would impose upon him. But the probability is that not one farmer in fifty would use over five bushels of the corn referred to, for there are many who use corn that will ripen in the country. The hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) spoke of grasses which are largely used for feeding purposes. All grass seeds that come under that designation are free already. Although the decision of the department was that millet could not be ruled as grass seed, I confess that, after considering the matter, I have grave doubts whether the ruling was right; and if after further investigation I find that I have been wrong in that decision, I shall be happy to change it.

Mr. MULOCK. The Postmaster General says millet will ripen here.

Mr. BOWELL. That is another matter. Millet and Hungarian grass will ripen in this country, and so will most of the articles mentioned here. If the motion had been for one kind of grain for certain purposes, we could have understood it; but the first thing for the Customs Department to do in questions of this kind would be to decide whether the particular seed imported was not on the free list already, and most of them are. To decide whether they would ripen in this country or not would necessitate an investigation from one end of the Dominion to the other, which would render it utterly impossible to carry out the resolution without an immense amount of trouble and dissatisfaction from every importer in the country, and those who imported grain which would ripen in the country, and which had to pay a duty upon it. A moment's reflection will show the hon. gentleman that his motion is impracticable and could not with any degree of safety or justice, either to the revenue or the different importers, be carried out. I question very much whether there is such an agitation in the country as has been referred to. The agitation has arisen through the efforts of politicians who are opposed to the whole policy of the Government and desire to attack it in piecemeal. That may be legitimate enough from a political standpoint, but I would advise the House, before adopting the resolution, to reflect as to whether it could be possibly enforced. It would be much better to say that all corn and seeds, and all grains used by the farmer, should be put upon the free list. Such a resolution would be comprehensive and easily understood.

Mr. PLATT. I will amend it that way.

Mr. BOWELL. And I should have great pleasure in voting against it if you did; but that would be a straightforward and a manly way of attacking the whole policy, and would enable those who are in favor of that policy to defend it upon broader grounds than they can on a piecemeal resolution such as this one. This resolution would be applied, if adopted, to authorise the admission free of all kinds of seeds. It would include turnips and potatoes, and mangolds. In England, the turnip-tops, beet-tops, and all green things of the kind are used for the purposes of feeding cattle under the system called soiling and ensilage, while the root itself is growing. That may seem strange, but it is the case. In the agricultural sections of the old country every possible thing is utilised which can be obtained for the purposes of feeding cattle. Where labor is plentiful the children are sent into the fields to gather the surplus leaves which would otherwise rot while the root matures, but which, while in a succulent state, are preserved and fed to cattle. It would apply to vegetables, to barley, wheat and oats, and to winter rye, which is often sown in the summer for the purpose of being cut for the feeding of cattle. I do not think, under the circumstances, the House should adopt this resolution. If any particular quality of corn can be designated which cannot and does not ripen in any section of this country, and which is largely used for the purpose indicated in the resolution, that would be a question which the Government would take into consideration and deal with liberally, as we do in all cases where articles have been brought under our notice which are used in manufactures and are not produced in this country; but the adoption of a resolution of this kind is altogether out of the question, and if carried would be impracticable.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have the honor to represent an agricultural constituency, and one which is largely engaged in the dairy industry. This resolution reads that it is expedient to remove the duty on articles and place upon the free list all grains and seeds which do not ripen in Canada. The hon. gentlemen opposite claim there is a certain kind of corn—which we generally designate horse-tooth corn—which does not generally ripen in this country. This corn is sown for feeding purposes, but at the same time it is as good for feeding as the corn we grow in this country. Place that resolution on the statute, and what will be the consequence? I deal largely in corn, and I import a cargo of this corn free of duty, and sell it out to the farmers for feeding, or sowing, or any other purpose. The practical result would be to reduce the price of corn grown in this country, and every other grain fit to feed our cattle with, simply by  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cents a bushel. If the corn does not ripen in this country, the millet seed does. I have grown it largely myself on an island near Gananoque, and I have seen it grown and ripen in the North-West. But if there is a corn that does not ripen in this country, and which is required for raising green feed for cattle and for ensilage, why not pass an Order in Council, which the Government, I am sure, will readily do, admitting this kind of corn free when imported and sown for the purpose of ensilage, but not to come in for feeding purposes so as to come into competition with the grain grown in the country. There is not a farmer in my county who would favor admitting this corn free of duty for feeding purposes. The effect would be to reduce the price of coarse grains of all kinds for feeding purposes.

Mr. SCRIVER. Like the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, I have the honor of representing an agricultural constituency, and an agricultural constituency largely engaged in dairy farming. I cannot believe that my hon. friend's constituents are not as far advanced in modern improvements, with regard to farming, as mine. If they are, they do not use generally dent corn for feeding purposes. That kind of corn was used some years ago largely for that purpose, that is for summer feeding, but it has never been used for ensilage. As the result of experiments, other varieties of corn—one mentioned by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the mammoth sweet corn, but more particularly a variety of corn from the south—are used in the county I represent and the Eastern Townships generally. Those two varieties are now used almost altogether there for feeding purposes, and especially for ensilage purposes.

Mr. TAYLOR. It would make good feed for fattening hogs.

Mr. SCRIVER. No doubt, but the result of all experiments in growing that corn and attempting to ripen it, have been to show it will not ripen, as a rule, in this country. It is only in an exceptional season that those varieties will ripen. The result of all experiments of those varieties of corn, both for feeding and ensilage purposes, has been to show they are greatly superior to our native corn, or to that commonly imported from the Western States for those purposes. It would be no invasion of the principle upon which the defenders of the National Policy now proceed, to permit the introduction of these varieties of corn for that purpose. The Minister of Customs has admitted that. While I agree with him as to the difficulty of carrying into effect any such regulation as that referred to in the resolution of the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt), it would not be difficult for the Government to permit, either by Order in Council or by amendment to the tariff, the importation of these particular varieties which I have mentioned, free of duty. The hon. the Minister of Customs is very much mistaken with regard to the quantity of corn used for seeding. It may be the case in the county he represents that the farmers generally do not use more than five or six bushels, and would only have to pay 75 cents duty, but even that, upon the whole of the county, amounts to a considerable sum. In the county I represent, however, and that which the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) represents, where a great many are making experiments in ensilage, a much larger quantity is used by individual farmers, and the tax might be a considerable amount. I see no reason, upon the principle itself upon which the National Policy professes to be founded, why the Government should not consider seriously and thoughtfully the question of permitting the importation of the varieties of corn now largely used for feeding and ensilage purposes free of duty.

Mr. SPROULE. I think there is only one or two kinds of corn used for ensilage which are now imported and which cannot be grown in this country: the B. and W. mammoth southern sweet corn, the sorgham and perhaps the red cob ensilage corn. If we could admit these kinds of grain into the country without much trouble it would be of great advantage to the farmers, because it is being largely sown in some parts of the country, and I think, in that case, it would be more largely sown. I have personally had some experience in the last two years in regard to that corn—the mammoth southern sweet. I have obtained it and sown it, and only sowed one bushel to an acre. In the western country, Mr. Pierce, who was the pioneer in introducing that corn, was the first to introduce it, and three years ago he brought in only one car load. I think last year he brought in eight or ten car loads, but that is only one kind of corn. There is a great diversity of opinion as to whether that is superior to many kinds of corn which are grown in the country. If you look at the journal published in Hamilton, and the one published in London, in the interests of agriculture, you will see that there is a great difference of opinion as to the value of the different qualities of corn for ensilage or soiling purposes. The largest extent of ground which is sown for this purpose in Ontario, as far as I know, by any one farmer, is about 40 acres. I believe about three-quarters of a bushel to the acre should be sown, as a general rule, and that would be an additional expense of about 5 cents an acre to the farmer; but, if we sow a bushel or a bushel and a quarter to the acre—because, when sown broadcast, it would have to be sown thicker—it would seem to be a more important tax on the farmers. However, it is found to be a very valuable feed for cattle, and, if it could be brought in free without much difficulty, that would be in harmony with the principle which we have been endeavoring to carry out in connection with the National Policy, viz.: to bring in free of duty what we cannot raise or make in the country. No doubt, the Minister of Customs will take it into consideration. I do not think millet comes under this class of grains at all, because it ripens in almost every part of the country. I know it does in the counties of Bruce and Grey, and there is no difficulty whatever in ripening millet. The only corn I know of that should be affected in this way is the B. and W. sweet southern corn, and that is sown and is very valuable, and now there is a duty of 7½ cents a bushel on it.

Mr. ROWAND. As a farmer, I desire to express my opinion on this subject, and I am glad to hear that it has been brought before the House. It is very interesting to the farmers in the section of country from which I come. We have not done very much in regard to ensilage yet, but we find that, although Canadian-grown corn may mature in this country, it does not grow as well as we desire. There is the horse-tooth corn, and what is called the southern sweet corn, and those are the only two kinds we have grown for ensilage or green fodder. In the last two seasons the failure of the grass in the months of August and September has caused us to fall back upon green food to supplement the ordinary fodder, and we find that corn is better than turnips for the land. If this corn were admitted free, a greater quantity of it would be grown. As a farmer, I express the opinion of my fellow-farmers that we are anxious to get something that we can grow for food which will be less exhaustive than turnips and mangolds. We can grow corn much better than we can roots, and the roots are not available in the dry season in August and September. We use turnips generally for winter food, but there is a feeling that we must abandon them and substitute corn for them. We can grow an equal amount of corn per acre as we can roots, and with less than half the labor. We have heard from chemists, that two-thirds of an acre of corn is worth more than an acre of roots. We have heard a great deal about economising labor, and about the product of farmers' stuff in this country. We can economise labor, and get greater advantage, if the chemists are correct, and the tests they have made are true, in the way proposed. We can get 30 per cent. more food from corn than we can from turnips, and I can testify that less than one half the labor will produce an acre of corn than that which is required to produce an acre of turnips. This is not a very large matter, and I admit the difficulty of separating corn for seed from corn imported for other purposes, but, if the Minister of Customs can see his way to allow the seed to come in free, it will be a great benefit. It is not with the leading farmers that the difficulty arises. They do not care very much for 5 cents or 10 cents an acre added to the cost of the seed; but it is desirable to get the smaller farmers to follow our example, and the best way to do that is to cheapen the cost of the seed. I hope that can be done without wrenching the National Policy. It must be a very poor policy that will not stand that small wrench. As to the other classes of seed which are mentioned in this motion, I do not think there is much importance in that, if we can get the corn free.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not advocate the raising of turnips and mangolds so that the farmers would have to pick the leaves off them, but I merely referred to them to show the length to which this resolution, if it were carried as it stands, would go.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Gen. LAURIE. When the House rose at six o'clock, we had just heard a very able speech from the hon. member for West Bruce (Mr. Rowand), a speech which, I think, will commend itself to everybody in this House, a sensible speech on a subject which he thoroughly understands, and concerning which, he was able to speak practically. Now, I believe that if the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) had made his motion and his speech only for the information of the House and the farmers of the country, that alone would have justified him in moving the resolution that he has placed before the House; because I believe that the increased cultivation of corn, as food for cattle, would largely conduce to the interests of our farmers. I shall not follow the hon. member for West Bruce, because I think he has very fully put the subject before the House. I am particularly interested in this question, because I believe I am one of the largest growers of corn in the Maritime Provinces, and I have followed out the practice of storing corn in silos to a larger extent, perhaps, than any other farmer in my neighborhood. But I think several mistakes have been made by speakers who have preceded me, to some of which I will refer. I would call attention particularly to one point, and that is the quantity of seed to be used. We find it necessary, as a rule, to use one and a half to two bushels per acre, instead of from three-quarters to one bushel, as stated by my hon. friend. Then, the corn we find it desirable to use is not such as is produced in western Canada, nor that which is produced in Ohio and Michigan. I studied this whole question of ensilage in the New England States before I introduced it at home, and I was advised to go south for seed corn. When we examine the reasons for that, when we study vegetables and vegetation, we shall find that if we want a plant that will germinate and come to maturity early, we must go north to get it, but if we want a plant that will come to maturity late, we must go south for it. In the case of ensilage we want a plant that will not come to maturity at all; we want a plant that will continue green to the time we harvest it, that continues simply to make stock and forage, that will not make seed, and that will not, as I said, come to maturity at all. For that purpose we have to go south, and for the last ten years, and following the example of my New England tutors, I have done so. I find it necessary to import southern corn from Maryland or Virginia, and I have gone to Baltimore for it. We have found the large white southern horse-tooth corn the only corn suitable for forage and ensilage purposes. I do not say that there cannot be other corn equally suitable, but I do not know of any. I would like to see the Department of Customs make a distinction between corn introduced for seed purposes and corn introduced for food. Personally, as this House is aware, I am in favor of corn for food being introduced free of duty, and I submitted that point to the House, but the House was against me, and that was an end of the question, at least for a time. At the same time I infer from what fell from the Minister of Customs that he may possibly be able, under the provisions of the Act by which they are empowered to deal with such questions as these, to place this article upon the free list, or make such arrangements as will secure its being used without competing with our western grains. The Minister seems to think that is possible, and in that case he could permit it to be introduced on the free list.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the price of that corn you mention?

Gen. LAURIE. We have usually paid a dollar a bushel for it. Now, I agree with my hon. friend from West Bruce that this is not altogether a question for the large farmers. We want to see it more largely introduced among the small farmers, and the concession to them of such a boon as this would encourage them to grow it more largely and would conduce to the benefit of agriculture. I trust, therefore, that the hint thrown out by the Minister of Customs will bear fruit, and that he will see his way to have this article placed on the free list.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the debate closes it may not be amiss for me to say a word with reference to the resolution before the House. As has been pointed out by my colleague, the Minister of Customs, the resolution itself is a very indefinite and unsatisfactory one, and, in its present state, I do not see that it could pass at all, or that, if it passed, it would be workable. I think the House has listened with a good deal of interest to the discussion which has arisen on this question, and the ideas that have been put forth by practical farmers and those who have been in the habit of using this corn. After the discussion, I think two things are quite evident: first, the unsatisfactory nature of this resolution; and, secondly, the small amount of duty which is involved on the corn which has been under discussion; that is, if it could be confined entirely to the purpose which the hon. gentleman mentioned, for seed only. From what fell from the lips of hon. gentlemen who have discussed the question, it would appear that this corn is a valuable one for the purposes of silo, and that it is valuable in itself for food purposes as well. I think I may say that the discussion will not be without profit, and it is a matter which is well worth looking into; and if the Minister of Customs, after having looked into it, finds that it is one that he can deal with in justice to all parties concerned, and if it can be confined in that way, I am sure that he and myself will give it all the consideration that we possibly can.

Mr. PLATT. I am very glad indeed to find that the resolution has drawn forth so much information upon the subject from practical farmers. I likewise am pleased to observe the favorable manner in which it has been received by the Minister of Finance, and I trust that the future may prove that he is sincere in his desire to do something in the direction laid down in this resolution. As to the unsatisfactory character of the resolution, I may state that it was purposely made broad in order to cover the whole ground. This, of course, is not to become law, and if the House considers the resolution unsatisfactory I can see no reason why, if there be a disposition on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to consider the question favorably, the House should not go into committee and make such amendments to the resolution as would meet the case and make it workable. I do not think that the argument of its being a small question is one that can at all be raised with success in this House. It may be small at present, but this is only the beginning. Although the Minister of Customs may consider it a small matter, it is not so small in the eyes of the farmers. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs seem to have a strong suspicion that this is not asked for in the interests of the farmer, inasmuch as the farmers have not petitioned for it, and that as it is the work of a politician, therefore it loses importance in their eyes. I took care in my opening remarks to disabuse the House of any such idea as these hon. gentlemen entertain. I can assure the Minister of Customs that I put this question upon the paper without consulting any of my friends on this side of the House. It was placed there by a requisition received from the vice-president of the Creamery Association of Eastern Ontario, and I have received strong and pressing letters in regard to it from farmers of various parts of the country. I am very sure that the unsatisfactory character of the resolution mentioned by hon. gentlemen opposite consists, in their eyes, in the difficulty they have in getting round it. It is impossible for the Minister of Customs, with all his ingenuity, to show that it constitutes any attack whatever upon the National Policy. When he states that it is part of a piecemeal attack upon that policy, he states that which he does not know; I am in possession of the facts, and I can assure the House there is no such intention on my part. The Postmaster General, who took part in this debate, seems to think that corn ripened in this country is all that is necessary for the purpose mentioned. The hon. gentleman must have a very poor idea, indeed, of the farmers in his section, and in other sections, if, when they can secure as good results by using corn ripening here as by importing foreign corn, they will pay $1 or $1.25 per bushel for the imported corn, while they can get the home-grown at about half. The Minister of Customs, of course, says it is impracticable, that the proposition cannot be carried out easily. I suppose the interests of the farmer must always give way to the ease and comfort of the Customs Department. We find the Minister has no difficulty in arranging matters in the department when he sees fit to place a tax on goods used by the farmers, but when a proposition is made to remove a tax it is a very difficult matter to carry it into effect; and I can assure the hon. gentleman that if he cannot see his way clear to make such arrangements in his department as to make it practicable to carry out such a proposition, he might just as well give place to some one who would take hold of the matter and make the Customs Department a success. At all events, it is unfair to the farmers that their interests should be sacrificed to the comfort and ease of the management of the Customs Department. I know there are some matters respecting which it is very difficult to see how they can be managed, but the Minister succeeds in even very small matters indeed to make his department workable. He did not find any difficulty whatever when the duty was imposed on peach baskets; and yet he finds great difficulty in meeting a proposition for the removal of the Customs duties on the articles mentioned in this resolution. With regard to the varieties of seeds that come into question, I may say to hon. gentlemen opposite that I am sufficiently acquainted with the facts to justify me in stating what varieties would be required by the farmers for the purpose indicated. But the farmers are experimenting, and ere long they will come to some conclusion as to which variety is most profitable. The varieties I have mentioned will, during the present season, come under experiment by our farmers, and if it is decided that only one variety should be admitted free, then the House, on going into committee, could name the variety, and the Minister of Customs would have the privilege of moving such amendment as he might think necessary to make the resolution practicable. The Minister of Customs considers this a very small and trifling matter, and because it is a very small and trifling matter, it must be rejected. We have asked large concessions in the interests of the farmer and those have been rejected by hon. gentlemen opposite because they were large, and I suppose if we should propose something that is neither small nor large it would be rejected for a similar reason. There is always a good and sufficient excuse why anything asked in the interests of the farmers should be rejected by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), saw in this a very great inroad into the National Policy. He thought corn introduced for soiling and ensilage purposes could be used for feed, and he told the House, which is a very strange statement for the hon. gentleman to have made, that he would be able to import corn of this character, and sell it to the farmers of his country for pig feed or something of that kind. I do not know how the hon. gentleman could justify such a proposition, for I suppose he would have to go to the Customs house and make some declaration as to the character of his importation; but the same hon. gentleman told us, I think last Session, that some years ago he imported barley from the American side, and shipped it back to the States as Canadian barley, and thereby made a profit. I suppose the hon. gentleman is so apt in commerce, that he could, by some hook or crook, bring grain in for ensilage purposes and sell it for pig feed. But the farmers of this country would find out after a time, that it was rather expensive to pay for such food $1 or $1.25 per bushel, when they could obtain the home-grown for a very much smaller sum, notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Finance, as well as the Minister of Customs, seems to look upon this question as one out of which something might perhaps grow for the advantage of the farmer. I wish to state to those hon. gentlemen that the farmers are expecting something at their hands. Last week the farmers of Frontenac met in their institute and passed a resolution, unanimously, in very much the same terms as the motion I have submitted to this House, and the same occurred in the county of Lennox. If this is such a very small matter, I do not understand why the farmers of these counties have taken up this question and passed such resolutions as I have indicated. Farmers of that section of the country suffered very severely from the severe drought of last summer, and they have been put to their wits end to procure food for the present winter. The Minister of Customs gave relief under those trying circumstances by placing a duty upon millet seed. The farmers remember that, and the hon. gentleman might make some restitution for the wrong done the farmers on that occasion by granting free seed for ensilage purposes in the future. I have only to repeat that I cannot understand why, if hon. gentlemen opposite are really anxious that any portion of this resolution should pass, they are unwilling to go into committee and see what would come out of it. What is required to be done for the farmers might as well be done now, and it is no use waiting until next Session. A large quantity of seed is being now imported and a larger quantity will be imported next year, and there is no reason why the farmers should not have the advantage of immediate action on the part of this House.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I was very sorry I was not present to hear the entire discussion on this motion, but from the attention I have been able to give to this subject, I consider that the question of ensilage is going to work a revolution among the farmers in this country. During the last few years great strides have been made to that end, and it is eminently in the interests of the farmers that they should give more attention to this subject. The great droughts in the last two seasons have placed the farmers in such a position that they must obtain some means of obtaining more fodder for their cattle during the winter, and everything possible should be done for the farmers' interests. In my own district the drought was so great that nearly all the hay was lost and there was a great scarcity of fodder. The consequence has been that the whole country has almost become denuded of live stock. Thousands of young calves and yearlings have been exported from the country, and it will take us years before we can make up the loss. I have been advising the farmers to look more into the subject of ensilage, because it is by that means they are going to provide against dry summers. This fodder corn which is the subject of the debate can be grown in dry seasons, in fact the dryer the better, and it is such a productive crop that farmers can raise from 25 to 30 tons to the acre, and five tons will keep a cow for 200 days, that is to say, that the crop grown from each acre will support five or six cows. Anyone who looks at the subject in that light will see how much more efficient it will prove as an article of food than hay or straw or any other food, and that it is a cheaper food than any that can otherwise be obtained. If this is the case, I think it is the duty of the Government to assist the farmers and encourage them to introduce this corn and ensilage system, and encourage them in trying to grow the corn, and I repeat that in the next five or ten years there will be a perfect revolution in our system of feeding in that respect. All through Ontario now greater attention is given to dairy farming than ever before, and the dairy products of this country as we know have progressed in the last few years by leaps and bounds, until to-day the exportation of animals and their products is ahead of the export of the products of our forests, which for many years stood at the top of the list. If the Minister of Customs and the Government could be induced to admit this corn free of duty they would be doing a great service to the farming community. I understand the Minister of Customs has pointed out some objections to adopting this course, but I think those objections could be overcome. If twines and salt for the use of our fisheries can be introduced free of duty, I think that corn for seeding and grain for fodder purposes could also be introduced free, and a regulation of the department could be made which would guarantee that corn will not be introduced for feeding purposes but simply for seeding. Just as simple a resolution could be made in this respect as is made for the introduction free of duty of other articles for the benefit of our fisheries and ship-building industries. I submit that if the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Finance will put their heads together, they will be able to devise, within twenty-four hours, a resolution which will meet the object in view of the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt).

Mr. McNEILL. This is clearly purely a farmer's question. I take it that the reason why we have a duty on corn to-day is in order to protect our farmers. If the permission to import this special sweet corn free of duty would on the whole be of benefit to the farmer, I have no doubt that those who are in favor of the National Policy, and who have introduced this policy in reference to corn for the purpose of protecting the farmer, would, as a matter of course, readily agree to allow this sweet corn to come in free of duty. The simple question which we have to consider in this House—those who are debating this question, those who are themselves farmers, and those who desire to benefit the farmers—is whether or not the admission of sweet corn free of duty would be a benefit or an injury to the farmers of Canada. There is no doubt, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has said, that the question of ensilage is becoming one of the foremost questions of agriculture. It is indeed likely to revolutionise agriculture, and if the importation of sweet corn free of duty would very much benefit the farmer who is engaged in growing green fodder to be cut down and put in silo, it would no doubt be a good thing for us to put it on the free list. How much would it be likely to benefit the farmers of Canada if we had this policy adopted which my hon. friend (Mr. Platt) has suggested? Suppose a farmer grows, say, to the extent of five acres of sweet corn and sows one bushel of seed to the acre. If he gets his sweet corn free of duty it would make a difference to him of something less than forty cents all told. Five acres for each farmer, as I think my hon. friend for West Bruce (Mr. Rowand) and my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) who have spoken in this debate, will agree, is a very large allowance to make at the present day. I think my hon. friend from West Bruce had probably not more than one or two acres under this crop last year; but we will suppose each farmer grows five acres and then the amount of gain would be less than forty cents for each. If this sweet corn for feeding purposes should come in free of duty, the effect of that upon the farmers of Ontario would be a depreciation in the value of all their coarse grains, and for the sake of a saving of at most forty cents they would have a depreciation in the value of their oats and of all their coarse grains. Therefore, I think that it is a very serious question which we are brought face to face with here to-night. We have not merely to see that it would be a benefit to the farmer if he saved the forty cents, but we have to consider whether in endeavoring to save that forty cents we might not run the risk of injuring the farmer to a greater extent.

I think the hon. the Minister of Customs, who has told us that the Government will take this matter into their serious consideration, and endeavor to discover whether or not this importation of sweet corn free of duty can be safely allowed in the interest of the farmer, is following the course which wisdom would direct.

Mr. CASEY. I have only two or three words to say on this question. It is not one particularly concerning any special locality in Canada but it concerns the whole country. As I understand the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) he does not ask the free admission of any corn or seed which ripens in Canada. Therefore, I think that the admission of any kind of seed grain which is not grown in Canada cannot in any way interfere with the protection which the National Policy is supposed to give Canadian farmers. On that ground it seems to me that all the possible objections that supporters of the National Policy can have to the putting of those articles on the free list, are swept away and it only remains to ask whether this free admission of seed grain would benefit the farmers of Canada. It seems to me perfectly clear that this policy would not hurt the farmers and the only question remaining is would it do them any good? I think that every farmer will answer that question in the affirmative. Nearly every farmer wants to grow corn of different kinds for ensilage, and every year some new kind of corn or forage crop comes into use. It is clear that by the admission of seed grain of a kind which does not grow in this country free of duty would be of immense benefit to the farmers all over, and would be no detriment whatever to the farmers in any particular locality. I cannot see any excuse whatever for refusing to pass the motions put forward by my hon. friends from Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) and from Grey (Mr. Landerkin). Unless the members on the other side of the House are going to declare that they will not under any circumstance show a favor to the farmer, even in the case where no other farmer can be injured by the granting of that favor, they must logically support this motion. I think that these plain facts will come home so strongly to the members of the Administration that they will, on mature thought, grant what is asked on this occasion. I cannot conceive how they can do otherwise consistently with their professed principles as supporters of the National Policy, one of the principles of which is to admit free of duty raw material for any industry where it does not come into competition with existing industries in Canada. There can be no pretence that this seed, which is a raw material for the farmer who wishes to feed cattle, does come into competition with any corn grown in Canada, since the motion expressly states that nothing which comes into such competition is to be admitted.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Judging from the tone of this discussion, many members of the House appear to think that the passage of this resolution would be considerably in the interest of the farming community. Several members who support the Government have even held that something of this kind is necessary. The hon. Minister of Customs, while giving a quasi admission to the truth of this, sets up the idea that it would be impracticable to carry the resolution out. It does seem to me a little singular that when the farmers ask for the adoption of any measure calculated to advance their interests, the objection set up by the Government is that it is impracticable to carry it out. If the manufacturer of corn-starch desires to get free corn for the purpose of manufacturing his product, the Minister of Customs has no difficulty in giving it to him; if the distiller desires free corn for the purpose of making whiskey, the impracticable nature of the thing is at once forgotten by the Minister of Customs; but when the farmer desires free corn, some of the supporters of the Government say it is only a small matter, and why should the farmers ask it? Well, if it is such a small matter, why should the distiller or the manufacturer of corn-starch require it? And these hon. gentlemen hold up their hands with horror and say that if the farmers require this measure so that they can fatten their cattle, and produce more beef in the country, and ship it out of the country, the difficulty will be that it will lower the price of their coarse grains. I have examined this question to some extent, and I find that the prices of coarse grains always stood at the highest point when we imported the greatest quantity. The price of coarse grains has been very much lower since duties have been imposed on them than it was before. Taking oats, we find that before the duty was imposed in 1875, we exported a large quantity of oats, and we also imported a large quantity; and yet during that year we sold our oats at 43 cents a bushel; in 1876 we sold them at 43 cents, and in 1877 at 35 cents; an average price in those three years of 42 $\frac{2}{3}$  cents a bushel. Hon. gentlemen opposite got into power and placed a duty on oats, saying that they would obtain a higher price to the farmer for his oats. Look at the result: In 1885 we sold them at 37 cents a bushel, a falling off of 11 cents; in 1886 we sold them at 35 cents, a falling off of 13 cents; and in 1887 we sold them at 31 cents, a falling off of 17 cents a bushel, or an average price of 34 $\frac{1}{2}$  cents during those three years; so that the duty has been a great disadvantage to the farmers so far as coarse grains are concerned. This proves that the greatest benefit the Government could do the farmer would be to strike off the duty on these things altogether. The farmers are moving in this question. The farmers of Frontenac had an institute a few weeks ago, at which they asked that the measure now proposed should be given to the farmers to facilitate the fattening of stock; and I see by to-night's paper that the farmers of Lennox have also passed a resolution unanimously asking for the same thing; and if the Minister of Customs is not able to administer the department so as to meet the wishes of this large class and give them free corn, he should resign and allow a man to be placed there who would do so. I think there are gentlemen on this side of the House, and perhaps on the other side also, who could administer that department so as to give relief to this large, influential and important class in the community; but under the present system only the manufacturing classes are considered. When a matter of interest to the farmers of Canada is brought up, hon. gentlemen opposite set up a bugaboo, and say it is an insignificant question, a mean question, although experience shows that the protective policy has been a failure in raising the price of coarse grains or any other grains in the country. We have never known a period in Canada when coarse grains were sold at as low prices as they have been since we have had protection, and it is only natural that it should be so. That policy sets certain restrictions on the trade, and creates difficulties of every kind. I hope this matter will be seriously considered by the Government and the House, and that the Government will see their way to granting this very reasonable, just and proper request—one calculated to do a very great benefit to the farming community, and to bring about a system whereby failures in the crops from dry weather, or anything interfering with the grass production of the country, can be compensated by this system of ensilage which is being so largely adopted by the farmers. In my part of the country the farmers are growing a great deal of corn in this way for the purpose of feeding to their cattle in dry weather; and I think it is the duty of this House to do everything it can to benefit the farmers and increase the general wealth of the country.

Mr. HESSON. I do not think any hon. gentleman should be allowed to get off a speech like that without someone replying to him. He evidently made a bold effort to show that the price of oats had very greatly depreciated in Canada in consequence of the National Policy. If his speech meant anything, it meant that. If the hon. gentleman had been disposed to give a fair statement of the case, which both sides of the House might naturally expect from him, he would have quoted the price on the American side at the same time as the price in Canada. He left the impression that oats had declined in price under the National Policy from 11 to 15 cents a bushel. He will find that the price of oats is very considerably greater in Canada than in the States, and that ought to go to the country with the hon. gentleman's statement—that oats are selling in Canada at 7 cents a bushel to-day more than in the United States. In Buffalo they are worth 30 and 31 cents per bushel, and in Toronto 37 to 38 cents. Hon. gentlemen will see there is a difference in favor of Canada of 7 cents a bushel. The same remark will apply to Chicago, only the difference will be still more in favor of Canada. If the duty were removed from oats to-day, I would ask whether the same state of affairs would not exist now that existed before, when oats were cheaper in Canada than in the United States. I will not deny that it would be an advantage to the farmers to have admitted free that particular kind of corn which they require for the purpose of ensilage, and if that could be done consistently with protection to coarse grains, I would be strongly in favor of doing it. I feel that that concession ought to be made, but if it cannot be made except at the cost of the coarse grains and corn, it would cost the farmer too much. I am quite in accord with the wishes of hon. gentlemen on both sides, if it could be done without injuring the policy that has been adopted of keeping out the American coarse grains, but it would cost the farmer too much to permit 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 bushels of American corn to come in here free, possibly under the guise of coming in as seed. The more you look at this question the more important it becomes, because the enormous product of an acre of ensilage is perhaps more important to the farmer than any other crop he can grow. I believe the Government can by Order in Council manage to permit that to come in free. The hon. the Minister will understand the strong feeling there is on both sides in reference to this question; and it is after all a small concession to make in the interest of the farmers of the country. If that can be done, I hope the Minister will see his way to allowing that special kind of corn which cannot ripen in this country to come in free.

Mr. GILLMOR. I listened with a great deal of alarm to some of the speeches made on this question. The condition of the farming interest must be very bad if the extremes of this Dominion are as bad as hon. gentlemen state they are. Why, in the North-West, pretty near harvest time, the frost comes and strikes the wheat, and more than half the wheat is destroyed; and in the county of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) the drought is so great that the hay crop is all destroyed, and the cattle must be in a state of starvation. Well, I was never but once in that part of the Dominion, and if the cattle are poorer or any more miserable looking now than when I was there, there cannot be much of them left. I live in New Brunswick. I sowed some red eared and horse-tooth corn from which I expected to get a fine crop, but the frost touched it, and nothing under heaven could eat it. Part of my crop was barley and buckwheat, and on account of rains I could not get it housed for eight weeks after it was cut. In the meantime, my buckwheat floated all over 100 acres, and all I could save was what was stopped by the alders on the shore from going out into the Bay of Fundy. I planted an acre of barley too, and the rain came on before I got that in, and the barley and the buckwheat were all mingled together in the treshet. I went over in a boat to try and get my potatoes out, and to put my arm down at whole length before I could seize a stock of that edible, and as to the barley I sailed right over it. It was four feet high, and the water was above that again. I mention these facts to show what condition the country must be in when you find the eastern end and the west and the centre in the condition in which they have been depicted to-night. I am not exaggerating about my crop at any rate, for it had been eight weeks out under the rain. I wish my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) had part of that rain, because then he would have had some hay and I would have had some buckwheat. I do not rise so much to speak about the crops as to refer to what the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) has said. The other night, while we were discussing something in which the National Policy was concerned, he represented the National Policy as a most beautiful edifice, and I thought I discovered a tear running down his cheeks when somebody proposed to make a change. Not one brick, he said, was to be taken out of that beautiful structure, but now he wants a change made if it can possibly be done, but it cannot without taking a brick out of that beautiful structure. I tried in my mind to look at that edifice. In the first place I imagined an edifice which sheltered everyone who contributed to build it. But while I was speaking, I thought of the different interests that occupy this edifice. In the upper storey, with the most costly furnishings, I put the sugar interest; and I saw Mr. Drummond there in all his glory, in his purple and fine linen. Then I went over all the different parts of the edifice, and I found the farmers down in the kitchen, or out in the barn, or in the cellars, while the cotton men and the sugar men and the woollen men had all the comfortable apartments. All the others had nothing to shelter them; the frosts in winter nipped them and the rains in summer beat upon them. In regard to this corn matter the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) was willing to do something. But he spoke like a man in mourning, and said it would not do to break into the National Policy. If you are going he said, to break into this beautiful structure to let in a few bushels of corn so that the population of Frontenac, when the sun leaves them without hay, will have something to feed their cattle, why not let other things come in free. I have trespassed too long upon your time, but I think this National Policy has proved a complete failure, and it is simply ridiculous to hear folks talk about it in the way they do, that it is going to affect the price of oats, and the price of buckwheat, and the price of barley, and in regard to allowing a few bushels of seed corn, which you cannot grow here, to come in without paying a duty upon it. It will come in in any case. The duty of 7½ cents is not much, and, if the farmers are as rich as they are supposed to be, and as our Conservative friends say they are, they can easily afford to pay that rather than break in upon this great edifice of the National Policy.

Mr. BOWELL. It was not my intention to address the House again on the subject, but, after the discussion which has taken place, I hope my hon. friend from Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) will withdraw his motion. I have already stated that the discussion having been confined almost exclusively to the one article of corn, and that of a particular quality which does not ripen in this country, and has not been extended to the other grains and seeds mentioned in the resolution, the subject will receive the attention of the Government, and that has been repeated by my colleague the Finance Minister. I do not hesitate to say that the Government could not accept the resolution in its entirety, but, if the hon. gentleman does not press it to a vote, the matter will receive consideration, and, if the Government find that it will not interfere with other industries which we believe to be in the farmers' interests, it will be dealt with. That is as far as I can go. I congratulate my hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) on the facetious manner in which he dealt with the subject, and still more on the manner in which he repeated almost every argument and every word uttered by the hon. member for Prince Edward. If he was as apt a scholar when he was at school in repeating his lessons as he is in this House, in repeating what others say, I should not be surprised if he stood at the head of his class.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I beg to say that I was not in the House—

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. gentleman says he did not hear the remarks of the hon. member for Prince Edward, I must withdraw my compliment.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I say I was not in the House when the hon. member spoke.

Mr. BOWELL. Then I suppose it is another illustration of the saying that great minds run in the same channel. I find, by reference to the newspaper, that, on 16th March, at Chicago, oats were quoted at 24 cents, that they were at that amount for the whole month, and that the highest price and the lowest price during the month was 24 cents. In Toronto, to-day, the 18th March, I find that oats continue easy. Light quality are quoted at 33 and 35 cents and the heavy quality at 37 to 39 cents. If the duty were taken off, we would have the market flooded with American oats, and that might satisfy the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I did not speak of the present time, but took the three years comparatively.

Mr. PLATT. I have no disposition to antagonise the hon. gentlemen opposite, or to make them do anything which is not in the interest of the farmer. Personally, I would like to see this principle adopted by the carrying of the resolution, but if the hon. gentleman will promise that these seeds shall come in during the present season free of duty, and not make any indefinite promise in regard to the distant future, I have no objection to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

L'ARDOISE BREAKWATER, RICHMOND, N. S.

Mr. FLYNN moved for:

Copies of all correspondence and surveys in connection with the L'Ardoise Breakwater, in the County of Richmond.

He said: In regard to this motion, I must go back as far as 17 years ago, when the construction of a breakwater at this place occupied the attention of the Government. At that time, the late Mr. Levesconte represented the County of Richmond, and the people of L'Ardoise were urging the necessity of a breakwater there. The present Minister of Public Works was then in the same position, and he agreed that a breakwater there was necessary, and promised to place an amount of $30,000 in the Estimates to construct that work. In proof of that, I will read from a letter written at that time by Mr. Levesconte to a gentleman at L'Ardoise. He said:

"I am now happy to inform you that the Minister of Public Works has just come to a point with me on that subject, and has promised to place in the Supplementary Estimates for this year the sum of $30,000 for that purpose, and that the contracts will be offered to competition as soon as the engineer of this Government can report."

I read that in order to show that the Minister of Public Works was committed to the construction of a breakwater at this point, and, no doubt, if he had continued in office, he would have carried out his promise, but, the Government having resigned in the fall of that year, he was unable to do so. When I came here first in 1874, I found a report in the department from the engineer and a plan of survey in regard to this place. It was estimated that the cost of this work would be about $60,000, but the chief engineer reported that the work could be built by sections, and the money could be voted for it as the sections were built. The Minister of Public Works at that time, the present hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), agreed to build a section, and in 1875 a sum of $10,000 was voted by Parliament; and, in the winter of 1876, a further sum of $5,000 was voted; and in the following year a section about 400 feet in length was completed. I need not say that the completion of that section was a great accommodation to the people of that district, and to the boats and to the fishermen of that place until 1883, when the top of the breakwater was carried away by one of the heaviest gales which had ever been known on that coast, except the memorable gale of 1873. I think that it was the duty of the Government to see from time to time whether that breakwater, situated as it was in an exposed place, required repairs. We know that the action of the ice, the action of the worm on all those wooden structures, are continually wasting them away, and they continually require repair. I can show that, in this instance, the Government are culpable in not repairing that breakwater when its condition was officially brought to their notice by the engineer of their own department, who told them that the work was getting weak, and unless it was immediately repaired it would be destroyed. Now here is a copy of the report of the Chief Engineer of the Public Works Department, dated Ottawa, 6th February, 1883. He says:

"During 1876-77, a breakwater 400 feet in length was built by the department at L'Ardoise, Richmond County, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, at a cost of $10,330. An examination of this structure lately made shows that the portion of the work below the line of half tide has been badly damaged by the sea-worm, and is in a very weakened state, and liable to serious damage at any time by gales or ice. To protect and preserve this work which afford the only shelter for fishing boats and vessels on the L'Ardoise shore, it will be necessary to place about 5,000 cubic yards of heavy stone in the form of slopes all around it, as shown in the plans herewith, the cost of which will amount to $5,000, and I have to recommend that the work be proceeded with as it is not in fit state to withstand a heavy gale. With respect to any further works at L'Ardoise, I have to refer you to my report of the 14th October, 1873, No. 35,488, which contains a comprehensive scheme of which a part has been executed, for the construction of a harbor of refuge."

Now, here we have the chief engineer of the department bringing to the notice of the Minister the condition of this work in February, 1883, and informing him that, unless it was instantly repaired, it was liable to be carried away at any moment. Sir, the Minister of Public Works did not listen to this notice from his engineer, and the result was that in the autumn of that year the top part of that structure was carried away, and it has not been repaired since. In 1884 the Minister placed $5,000 in the Estimates for the repair of that work, and that sum was voted by Parliament. Now, before I go any further in this matter, let me say that although this may not be a matter that interests many members of this House, it is a very important one to the people of that town. Now, I believe, according to the Rules of Parliament, at all events, according to common courtesy, when a member is addressing the House, hon. members are supposed to keep quiet and not move about the House. At least that is the rule that I have seen observed in the Provincial Legislature of Nova Scotia, and I think it ought to be observed here. As I was saying in 1884 Parliament voted $5,000 for the repair of this breakwater, but not a dollar of that sum was expended by the Government. I have been told, unofficially, that the reason the money was not spent, was that it would take $20,000 to build a structure that would stand. Well, if it did cost $20,000, or if it cost $40,000, I still think the Government were bound to build it. I have shown you that fifteen years ago the then Minister of Public Works, now the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) saw the need of building that work, and a sum was placed in the Estimates, and I believe that hon. gentleman would have carried out the work had he remained in power. It is now over five years since this breakwater was damaged, and you have made no effort to repair it. Now, I hold that a public structure like that was of sufficient importance for the Government to keep it in repair.

You have a breakwater at Cow Bay and similar structures in other parts of the Maritime Provinces. They are from time to time damaged or injured by the action of the ice, but the Government does not allow them to go down; they are continually kept in repair, as the Government contracted to do at the time of Confederation. If the Dominion Government had not undertaken this duty they would have been kept in repair by the Local Government, but having come under the control of the Government of the Dominion I say it was their bounden duty to keep them in repair. Sir, I am at a loss to understand why this money that was voted by Parliament, has not been expended. Is it because I, who represent that constituency, sit on the left of the Speaker and vote with the Opposition? Sir, I hope that no such unworthy considerations influence the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, but I am reluctantly forced to the conclusion that there is no other reason for the conduct of the Government, when I see, Session after Session, a persistent denial of simple justice and fair play to those counties who are represented in this House by members sitting on the Opposition side of the House. Sir, I remember at the time of Confederation we were told a different story. We were assured that under Confederation a broad and liberal-minded policy would prevail, free from sectional influence. We were told that the leaders of the Federal Government would take a broad view of public questions, and that they would consider the interests of every part of the country. I remember reading at that time a letter written by a distinguished gentleman who now occupies the position of High Commissioner at London, addressed to Earl Carnarvon in 1867. There was no class of people who were urged more strongly than the fishermen of Nova Scotia to enter Confederation, and to whom great promises were made. It was pointed out to them that their harbors were exposed to the Atlantic, that their shipping had not adequate protection, and that if the people entered Confederation the Federal Government would build breakwaters, and give all the marine protection necessary. These arguments were specially addressed to the fishermen of Nova Scotia, and they were induced to accept Confederation by means of the promises. I will read to you an extract of the letter from Sir Charles Tupper to Earl Carnarvon:

"No one in the least acquainted with political science can doubt, that just in proportion as you extend the field of enterprise, and the minds of public men are occupied with large and important questions the moral status will be elevated and the intellect exalted above the narrow personal party, sectional and sectarian influences that often detract so much from the character of those upon whom the conduct of public affairs is devolved."

Now, Sir, these were the promises that were held out then, but they have not been fulfilled. We have seen that the enlarged and liberal views spoken of by Sir Charles Tupper, have not characterised the present Government of the Dominion. If a breakwater at that point was necessary at the time it was built, it is much more necessary now, because the population of that locality has increased; having once had the advantage of that breakwater during a certain period, they have now lost that advantage through the destruction of the work. I am asking for the repair of a work that was built by the Government, and I have a right to know what excuse the Minister has to offer, when, on the matter being brought officially to his notice, in 1883, no action was taken, and when at that time the old adage would have proved true "a stitch in time saves nine," and the work could have been carried out at much less cost. There is another important reason why this breakwater should not be allowed to remain any longer in its present condition. If the people of other localities failed to obtain the construction of breakwaters they were at least free from having a very long shoal created there. The situation is easily understood when it is remembered that 400 feet of breakwater was built, and the top part of it at tide water was eaten by sea worms to such an extent that it was carried away, while the remainder remains there as a dangerous shoal. Those acquainted with our coast are aware that during the summer months fog occurs almost every day. Our fishermen have this dangerous ledge to contend with, a ledge formed by the carelessness and lack of attention on the part of the Government in repairing this work. Buoys had to be erected there, and fishing smacks have been lost and lives endangered. If there were nothing else, that fact should induce the Government at once to have this structure repaired. I think if there is any class of our population that deserves the consideration of the Government it is our fishermen. This will be manifest to anyone who knows the hardships to which these men are exposed in their daily toil, the limited period during the twelve months in which they are able to work, because, taking the fishing season as extending from 1st June to 1st November, and excluding stormy days when they are not able to go out, there are not more than five months in which a fisherman can work to provide for his family. Since the breakwater was destroyed at this place, the fishermen have been compelled on the appearance of a southerly or south easterly storm to haul up their boats beyond the action of the sea, and after the storm has subsided they have launched them again, in doing which a day is always lost. Thus it is that the want of this breakwater in a completed and satisfactory state is a very serious loss to the fishermen in prosecuting their calling. I might speak further on this subject, but it is not necessary. The Minister knows that I am not asking for any particular favor. I would not ask for a new structure in that part of the county, for it would be refused; but I may tell the hon. gentleman that it is only right, it is only fair that this structure should be repaired, a structure on which over $10,000 has been expended and in regard to which the hon. gentleman promised to place $30,000 in the Estimates, while the leader of the late Government (Mr. Mackenzie) recognising the necessity for the work and having made surveys and obtained plans, determined to carry out the work at a cost of $60,000. That hon. gentleman constructed 400 feet of the work at a cost of $ 0,000, a portion of which has been carried away from the neglect of the Department of Public Works, and after it had been officially brought to its notice by the engineer, I hold the Minister responsible for its present condition. But, had this matter never been brought to the notice of the Minister of Public Works, had its present condition resulted from the action of the sea, or from the destructiveness of the sea worm, or from any other cause whatsoever, I maintain that it was the imperative duty of the department, on the condition of the work being reported, to have made the repairs, just as much as it was its duty to make repairs at Cow Bay, or at any other breakwater in the Maritime Provinces, or on any public building erected by the Government out of the money of the taxpayers. I have brought this matter before the House and the Minister, I have discharged my duty to my constituents, and I trust the Minister of Public Works will be animated by a spirit of fair play, and, late though it be, that he will place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates sufficient to place the breakwater in a proper state of repair.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It may be perfectly true that Mr. Levesconte, I think the hon. gentleman's predecessor in the representation of the county, may have said and written that he had seen me and I had told him I would submit a vote of $30,000 to my colleagues to be placed in the Estimates. I do not remember the matter at this time, but if Mr. Levesconte says that, no doubt he says what is correct. But in regard to that proposed vote, what happened has happened many times since in regard to a public work, that while the Estimates submitted to the Privy Council included such supplementary estimate, that estimate remained there. The hon. gentleman will, therefore, admit that the Minister has no right to promise that $30,000 would be voted; he may say that he will submit to his colleagues that proposition, but he cannot say more. The hon. gentleman, therefore, may be sure I did not, and I do not at any time promise more than that. It appears that, later on—I do not remember to what period the hon. gentleman referred, 1872 I think—in 1876, under the Government of my predecessor in office, there was a vote of $10,000 taken, and I think the hon. gentleman has said there was another vote of $5,000 taken the following year, and the wharf was built to the extent of 400 feet. The hon. gentleman finds fault with this Government because that wharf after five or six years was so damaged by the sea worms that a large portion of it was carried away. The difficulty in regard to wharves in that portion of the Dominion is that the sea worms destroy them in five or six years, sometimes in four years, and, therefore, the department has been endeavoring to devise some means by which piers and wharves in that portion of the country might be built to a certain extent out of the reach of the sea worms. The matter was submitted to my chief engineer, and at one or two wharves where there was a sufficiently large sum of money voted, he tried whether by some process, which I cannot now describe, the timber used might be put out of the reach of the sea worms, and he succeeded I think in two instances, but it was a very costly process. I was speaking the other day to the chief engineer as to whether we could not incur that expense in regard to other large works, and thus save them for ten, twelve or fifteen years instead of having to rebuild them every four or five years. We cannot do it in regard to small works, but in regard to large works I think it can be accomplished. This matter is now being investigated by my department. The hon. gentleman said that I did not listen to the representation made by my hon. friend. Well, I am afraid my hon. friend speaks of what he cannot know anything about. He draws his conclusion, because he says that no action apparently has been taken. He says I have not taken any action on that, and that my colleagues after considering the matter have not thought that the matter should proceed further. Of course I am responsible with my colleagues, and I take the responsibility with them, but I think it is a statement against the Minister of Public Works that my hon. friend might have avoided. The hon. gentleman would wish that I should put in the Supplementary Estimates this year an item for the purpose in question. All I can tell him is that I will call the attention of my colleagues to the discussion that took place here this evening. Beyond that I can tell him nothing more, because, of course, we will have to take that into consideration. The hon. gentleman in his motion, to which I think there will be no objection if he only limits it, says that he wants,—

Perhaps he has forgotten that on the 13th of March, 1888, all papers on this matter were brought down in obedience to an Order of the House of Commons. Therefore, I think the hon. gentleman should add to his motion for a return of the papers since the 13th of March, 1888.

Mr. FLYNN. Very well. I am perfectly willing that that should be added.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Whatever representation is made to the Government respecting the expenditure of money on breakwaters, or other matters that come under the charge of the Department of Public Works, the Minister is always sure to shield himself under the excuse he has offered to my friend to-night for having neglected assistance to a valuable public work in his county. The hon. Minister has informed us, on more than one occasion, that he always presents these recommendations to his brethren of the Privy Council with his own views on the subject, and he has told us that on this, as on many previous occasions, that when those applications from his department came out of the Privy Council, he found very often and to his very great regret that many of them are left out.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It is a most singular coincidence in connection with this hon. gentleman's recommendations that we always find that when those recommendations made by that hon. gentleman to the Privy Council pass through a final examination; that those that come out recommended are recommended for counties which are represented by gentlemen supporting the Administration, and that those which are rejected are thrown out because I must assume they belong to counties, and are not intended to be expended, which are represented by gentlemen on the Opposition side of this House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not so.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman says it is not so. I think he would fail to establish more than perhaps one solitary case during the last ten years, where money has been expended for the county unless it has been represented by gentlemen supporting the Administration to which he belongs. We have had that question fully threshed out on previous occasions and I do not propose to go into it again to-night, but it has been proved here that county after county represented by gentlemen on our side of the House have failed to obtain the slightest appropriation for public works, merely because they were not supporting the Administration of my hon. friend. Take the County of Shelburne for instance; it was represented in this House for a long time by Mr. Robertson, and year after year and Session after Session that hon. member made application to the Government of the day for a needed appropriation of money for his county in the public interest, but these applications were all refused, and not a cent was granted. Time went on and Mr. Robertson was succeeded by the present worthy representative from Shelburne in this House, and the first session we saw that hon. gentleman here, we found a large appropriation of money for that county. I do not mean to say that those works were not required, far from it, but I do say that the same appropriation that had been asked for by the previous member had always been refused until Shelburne returned a member to support the Administration. Take the case of my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Kirk). Year after year he has told us in the House that he has made a similar application to the Department of the Minister of Public Works, but year after year he has been refused in the same way. In Queen's County it was the same story, until Queen's returned a member to support the present Administration, and then we found a change and the Government all at once realised the importance of Queen's County and granted an appropriation for that county. Take the County of Antigonish. Antigonish had the misfortune it would seem for a long time to be represented on the Liberal side of the House here, and, of course, the representations made by the former representative of that county went in with the rest before the Privy Council and always came out among those not granted. But time went on and Antigonish was represented by the present hon. Minister of Justice. Then look what a marked change came across the dreams of the Government. The very first year the Minister of Justice took charge of the affairs of Antigonish we found a large appropriation for that county, and each succeeding year it was the same thing. I hold in my hands the return of the Minister of Public Works for last year, and in that County of Antigonish—a fine little agricultural county it is quite true, and deserving I have no doubt of certain expenses, and I am not complaining on that head, but a small county in comparison to those others to which I have referred, and with not more than half the line of sea coast, and much less in importance so far as regards its commerce and shipping interests—we find in the County of Antigonish figures in this return of the Minister of Public Works of this year for no less than eight appropriations for that county alone. I will not say they are not deserving, because I am not going through them all, but I have received a communication here from a very prominent citizen of Antigonish which, with the permission of the House, I will read :

“ARISAIG—NEW PIER.

“The Minister of Justice by way of gaining votes in the Parish of Arisaig promised large expenditures at Arisaig. The old pier was in pretty good repair, no pretext existed for expending any considerable sum of money on it, so a second pier had to be erected and the old one repaired.

“This new pier finished in the fall of 1887 is 380 feet long, 40 feet broad with an L of 40 feet, and with from 1 to 2 feet of water at its outer end at low tide. The ordinary rise of tide there is from 3 to 4 feet. It is rare to see even a small schooner there. There are neither ships nor shipowners. The inhabitants do not own a single ton of shipping. Almost the only vessel ever seen at Arisaig is a hooker of 15 tons subsidised by the Local Government, which calls or comes to once a week on her route from Pictou to Cape George. The new pier is entirely useless. Arisaig is a farming district; some few of the farmers fish a little; this new pier is of no service to them. It is useless to dredge there. The bottom of the end of the new pier is rock. One storm would throw more sand into the cove than could be dredged in the twelve-month. It is vain to attempt making a harbor at Arisaig, and a harbor there would be of little utility. It is not required.”

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Would the hon. gentleman state what he is reading from?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I am reading from a communication sent to me from Antigonish.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. You will not give the name, I suppose?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). No; I will not give the name.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Hon. members need not be alarmed. They sent me also a sketch of the work. If that expenditure at Arisaig is to be taken as a sample of the expenditure being made at Bayfield Harbor, Bayfield Wharf, Blue Rock, McNair's Cove and Moidart, all in the county of Antigonish, represented by the hon. Minister of Justice, I think the country will find that the Minister of Justice is rather an expensive article. The amount of the expenditure at the different points is not here given. All these may be correct appropriations; I am not saying they are not, for I possess no information on that point myself; I am only drawing the attention of the House to the fact as illustrating the extraordinary circumstance that these recommendations going into the Privy Council from the office of the hon. Minister of Public Works should be so fortunately considered so far as the County of Antigonish is concerned, while Richmond, Guysborough and other counties represented on this side of the House are neglected. No one would venture to say that it is because the Minister of Justice is sitting there to consider these very claims, but it does look singular on the face of it. I will not say that every application has been favorably considered, because we do not know how many more applications the hon. gentleman may have made; but we find that expenditures are going on at eight different points in that comparatively small county, and not one cent can be obtained for the County of Guysborough alongside of it, or for other counties represented on this side of the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Would the hon. gentleman mention the eight places?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I thought I did—Arisaig, Bayfield Harbor, Bayfield Wharf, Blue Rock, McNair's Cove and Moidart—seven places. Now, Sir, it just comes back to the old story again, that the Government think they own not only the revenue, but the whole country, and the public money must all be distributed for the benefit of their own friends. I think it is a degrading position of affairs in this country, when any member of this House should feel that he would be lowering himself to go to the Government for a recommendation for a proper expenditure in this country. But, Sir, I would not think for one moment of going to the Government with a recommendation of an expenditure in my own county, because I know very well the Government would not pay any attention to it. Every member on the Liberal side of the House knows that the Government would pay no attention to any recommendation of that kind from him. As my hon. friend has pointed out, a single breakwater in the County of Yarmouth has been allowed to become ruined for the want of a little money to keep it in repair. There was not a grant for Digby during the time it was represented in the Liberal interest, but when a change took place, there was a breakwater for that county. I say such things are degrading to the country and the Government, because the money belongs to the public, and should be distributed in the public interest. I repeat that all these expenses in the County of Antigonish may be strictly proper; but there are other counties of much more importance, and other points where expenses are much more required; and I say that the Government cannot properly defend such an expenditure as this and deny the applications made from counties right alongside of it; and the hon. Minister of Public Works will have to tell that tale over again a good many times before he makes this side of the House believe it is not the settled policy of the Administration to ignore every proposition which emanates from this side of the House, no matter how much it may be in the public interest.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection that the hon. member for Halifax should doubt what the hon. Minister of Public Works says. I do not suppose it is his practice or his policy to give much credit to explanations made on this side of the House, however apparent their truthfulness may be. But I do object to the statements he has made with reference to my own county. I will ask him to listen while I read a list of the works—I am not aware of any others—which he says figured in the Estimates of last year. Arisaig, Bayfield Harbor, Bayfield Wharf, McNair's Cove, Moidart and Blue Rock. I think I have included all the hon. gentleman named, and if there are any others, I shall be glad to have him name them now. We know how many times the hon. gentleman told the House that these were eight public works, whereas by his own tally the number is six. He did not require to add two to the number to make the list so imposing; and even to make up six, he made the works at Bayfield Harbor and Bayfield Wharf two works, whereas the wharf and the harbor are one.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). No, they are not.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There has been a breakwater under construction for a number of years for the purpose of affording shelter to Bayfield Wharf, and the wharf would be utterly useless without the breakwater. The great work which he speaks of in connection with the wharf was putting in some ballast and making some temporary repairs while the work on the breakwater was going on. But the hon. gentleman said that these might be very proper works—the five of them which he made eight; but he took the pains to make further statements to the House regarding them which, if they were true, indicated that these were not proper public works. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman stating at any time what works are being done, but I do object to his making to this House statements with regard to the requirements for these works, and the reasons for their being made, which are absolutely contrary to the facts in every particular. The hon. gentleman read from a letter something about Arisaig, and the reason I asked him to give the name of his correspondent, was that otherwise it would go upon Hansard and into the press, and into the hon. gentleman's telegrams in his own paper, as if he were making these statements on his own responsibility instead of on the responsibility of an anonymous correspondent, who, I venture to say if his name were given, would be known to be a liar wherever the man himself was known. The statement that I secured votes in the district of Arissig by promising the people there a public work is absolutely untrue in every particular. I made the statement with regard to the public works which then required repair, as I did with regard to other works of the kind, when alluding to them, such as any other hon. gentleman would make under similar circumstances, that I would make proper representations to the Government and see that the interests of my constituents were attended to as far as possible. So far from its being true that in no sense was there necessity for a public work there, that there were neither ships nor shipowners there, and that the new pier was entirely useless, the Arisaig pier is the only landing and shipping place on about twenty miles of a dangerous coast, where a boat of any size, even a fishing boat, bringing or receiving produce, can land its cargo or receive any produce. It is the only pier where the inhabitants can be supplied with fuel, and is the only possible place of shelter in that twenty miles of coast. The new pier that was built there—the old one had become useless and so weak as to be shaken with every gust of wind that blew, and it threatened dissolution at any moment—was for the purpose of protecting the little harbor from being filled with sand; and everyone who has gone near the premises knows that it simply requires to complete that useful work, that the dredging shall be done inside of the old pier and the new pier, and a very useful harbor for shipping and boats will be formed. Last summer when I went there, after this expenditure had been made, I found it was a place of refuge for 30 or 40 fishing boats and that a large fishing interest had sprung up there. I do not hold myself in any degree reprehensible for urging, as strongly as I could, upon my colleagues the necessity of giving some kind of shelter to the fishermen on that exposed coast, but I do object to the reason and to the necessity for that expenditure being misrepresented in the grossest way that any facts could be misrepresented before the House.

Mr. KIRK. I am glad this discussion has come up under the motion of my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Flynn). This is a question which is of great interest to a great many people in the Maritime Provinces, especially to the people of those counties represented by members of the Opposition. It is generally believed, in the Maritime Provinces at least, and the Government and their friends take care to leave that impression, that unless the people elect members who support the Government, there can be no money voted for their counties. Why, Sir Charles Tupper, in a public speech at Antigonish, in 1882, in opposition to the late member, told the people publicly that they could not expect any money from the Government for public works, because they did not send a Government supporter here to represent them. That is perfectly understood all over Nova Scotia. With regard to these breakwaters which have been built in Antigonish I know very little. I know nothing at all of the utility of the works, but that money has been expended on six or seven public works in the county is true. Last year's report of public works shows that to be a fact. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has said there were seven. If he includes the expenditure on the post office he is correct. Hon. gentlemen will remember well that last year $600 were voted for the purpose of improving the post office in Antigonish. That money may have been expended or not, but I do know that in the report of the Minister of Public Works there is a statement of what was done on the post office last year. This proves the statement of the hon. member for Halifax to be not so far wrong after all, but to be a fact perfectly correct. The hon. the Minister of Justice says that the Bayfield Wharf and the Bayfield Breakwater were not two different works. Perhaps they were. But let us see what the Minister of Public Works says in his report:

"Bayfield, Antigonish County, is on the southern shore of St. George's Bay, and a harbor is formed by an island and an outlying reef. The construction of a further length of breakwater commenced in 1886-87 was continued, and at the close of this year was about three-fifths completed."

Now, what does he say about the wharf:

"The wharf is on the western side of Bayfield harbor, one quarter of a mile to the south of the breakwater, is 402 feet in length and varies in width from 22 to 50 feet."

The grant made was intended to improve the one harbor, yet there are two works which I believe are under two contracts. Therefore, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) was right when he said there was an expenditure on seven public works in Antigonish County. We know that it has been the practice of this Government to ignore counties represented by members of the Opposition and not spend a dollar in them, and it does seem rather strange that the Minister will try to take credit for acting fairly in regard to those counties. I remember distinctly the late member for Antigonish making motions in this House and pressing upon the Government the necessity of expending money even to keep the breakwaters in repair, and they refused to do anything. The hon. the Minister of Justice has said, in answer to the charge that there were two breakwaters at Arisaig, an old one and a new one, that the old one was useless. But why is it useless? I have heard the late member for Antigonish in this House urging with all his force the Minister of Public Works to expend money there and prevent the harbor becoming useless.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. An expenditure entirely unnecessary, according to the hon. member.

Mr. KIRK. As I said when I commenced, I know nothing at all about the necessity for those breakwaters, but I do know that when Mr. Judge McIsaac represented that county, not one dollar was expended there towards either repairing or building a breakwater, although he pressed upon the Government continually, in this House and out of it, the necessity of keeping in repair the breakwater at Arisaig, which was being swept away, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, by the action of the sea, and it only required a few thousand dollars to keep it from being swept away altogether. And the Minister of Justice comes now and says it was actually useless and was rendered useless in consequence of the Government carrying out the policy which they are pursuing towards the Opposition members of the House. Now it is found necessary to build a new wharf at a very large cost to the people of this Dominion. I have said that the Government refused, at the request of the late member for Antigonish, either to repair this Arisaig breakwater, or to build a new one, but, when they had a member supporting the Government, a member of the Government, they did not repair the breakwaters in that county, but they swept them away and built new ones. I do not begrudge the people of the county one dollar that they received, but Antigonish is a small county. It is one of the best agricultural counties for its size—I believe the best agricultural county—in the Province of Nova Scotia, but it has not much sea front. Guysborough has twice the sea front of Antigonish, but it cannot get a dollar for a breakwater or a harbor. I have stacks of letters in my possession acknowledging the receipt of my applications, but that is all. I have been pressing for the expenditure of money in my county, but no money has come yet, and I suppose it will not come until we have a change a Government, as I hope we soon will have. Is that the way to use the people of this country? Does the money paid into the Treasury belong to the Tory party or the Government of this country? Have not the people I represent as much right to a portion of that money as the people of any other county? I think they have, and I think the Ministers will find out that the people of those counties who have been robbed of their rights in this way will not be coerced into voting for them. The members of the Government have tried to bribe them without success, and now they are trying to coerce them, but they will find that those people are made of different stuff and will not be coerced into voting for a Government of this kind under such treatment as they receive. I have been pressing for some consideration in this matter, because I believe I have some right to ask for it. I do not go on my knees to the Government, and I do not intend to. I do not beg for the rights to which my county is entitled, but I press for its just rights and for whatever money it is entitled to, and the Government are acting dishonestly in retaining that money. I have asked time and again for money to erect a breakwater at Indian Harbor, where a breakwater is much needed; for a breakwater at New Harbor also, but no money can be got for either place. I have pressed for money to build a small canal, three-quarters of a mile long, between two harbors, which, according to the Government engineer, would only cost $6,000, but I cannot get that. I have not given it up in regard to that canal, because I hope the Government will put an amount for that work in the Supplementary Estimates this year. I have numerous breakwaters and other things to ask money for in my county, but for two years I have given up everything but this canal, and surely I ought to get that small sum. An hon. gentleman says I would get it if I voted for the Government, but I cannot do that. I will vote, as I have always done, for any proper measure the Government brings down, but I am not going to sacrifice my principles for the sake of a small breakwater or a canal. I have also asked in connection with other members for a better service between the ports on the coast of the Atlantic and the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway at Port Mulgrave; but, instead of obtaining that, I find that the usual grant has been reduced this year by $1,000. That is the way in which the Counties of Guysborough and Richmond have been served, those counties being the most interested in that improved service. I hope the Government are not lost to all sense of decency, but will do a modicum of justice to the Counties of Richmond and Guysborough in the expenditure of the public moneys.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). My hon. friends from Guysborough (Mr. Kirk) and Richmond (Mr. Flynn) complain that sufficient amounts are not placed in the Estimates for harbor improvements and breakwaters on the coasts of those counties. I beg to assure my hon. friends, that, if the County of Antigonish and the County of Inverness and the counties bordering on the Northumberland Straits were so amply provided by nature with harbors as are the Counties of Richmond and Guysborough, there would not be much necessity for improvements in the way of harbors and breakwaters in those counties. It is well known that, from the borders of Pictou County all round the coast of Antigonish, which is much more extensive, taking the whole coast, than the coast of Richmond and Guysborough taken together, there is not a single harbor which will admit of ordinary vessels entering. It is therefore not unreasonable that the Minister of Justice would secure a fair proportion of the expenditures for such services in his county.

Mr. KIRK. He takes it all.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). My hon. friend knows well that the coast of Inverness requires public improvements of this kind, and I have no hesitation in saying in this House, as I would state in the county I represent, that if Inverness were so well provided by nature with harbors as the Counties of Guysborough and Richmond, I would never have asked for a vote in this House for any such service. Any person who knows the counties along the southern shore of Nova Scotia must know that they are studded with harbors from end to end of the Province; whereas those bordering on the Northumberland Straits have none. But as reference has been made to corrupt practices in connection with the voting of money for public works, I think it would be pardonable on my part to refer to a very important public work in my own county, which was trifled with during the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite. I refer to one of the most important works in the Province of Nova Scotia. It was under the consideration of this House in 1878. Attention was called to the necessity of that work by Mr. Tupper, who then represented the County of Cumberland, in the following language:—

“Mr. TUPPER said he would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works if the Government had arrived at any conclusion with reference to a work of considerable importance in Nova Scotia, which had been under the consideration of the late Government, and which had been brought to the notice of this Government from time to time. He referred to the closing of the Port Hood harbor, Cape Breton.

“Mr. MACKENZIE said he was fully aware of the importance of this work in question. At present there was great danger of this harbor being still more seriously injured owing to the action of the sea. Mr. Pailey's lowest estimate for a substantial work, however, $360,000, and owing to the state of the finances, this amount could not at present be spared. If $10,000 or $12,600 would be of any utility, however, this might be voted. This work was rather required for general than for local convenience.”

After him spoke Mr. Macdonald, who then represented the county. He said:

“This improvement was urgently needed in the interest of the shipping, provincial and American, that frequented the Gulf of St. Lawrence.”

He concluded by saying:

“He hoped that the Government would turn attention to this work at once. It was one that could not be constructed piecemeal; but he thought a small grant of $20,000 or so would be sufficient this season in order that the work would be initiated before another year elapsed. Although the contract might not be entered into till late in the season, it was desirable to procure such material as was necessary.”

This was in 1878, shortly before the general election. Mr. Mackenzie said:

“The Government would have no hesitation at all about a grant such as the hon. gentleman had named; but he feared that it would be utterly impossible to do anything with so small a sum. What he proposed was to have his plans, which were almost complete, and advertise to get tenders and see minimum sum for which it could be built, then they would know exactly where they stood at the next Session of Parliament. He feared that a grant of $10,000 or $20,000 would be practically useless, because it would be impossible to expend that amount with advantage unless that work were continued. Any attempt to build this by sections would be a failure. It would require to be carried on extensively at once, in order to avoid the damage from winter in an exposed condition of that kind. However, he would consult the engineer of the department before the Supplementary Estimates were brought down.”

After this discussion in the House, and before the vote of $10,000 was placed in the Estimates of that year, advertisements were circulated shortly before the general election, and plans were shown and tenders asked for the closing of Port Hood Harbor, which would cost $350,000, according to the report of the engineer at that time. The plan and specifications for the closing of the northern entrance into the Port Hood Harbor, as the public were misled to believe, were deposited in the office of the Collector of Customs, in Port Hood, on Friday before the election, which was the second or third day after nomination. Particular care was taken that the plan and specifications should not be placed there before the general election, because those who would examine them would find there, not the plan and specifications for the purpose of closing the northern entrance into Port Hood Harbor at all, but a plan asking for the construction of a small breakwater at Port Hood

Island. The deception was unquestionably for the purpose of securing the election of my opponent at that time. If the Government of the day were sincere, after tenders were asked for and the money voted, it was certain that the contract would have been awarded. A few days before the election and after tenders were in, the Government refused to award the contract because they had accomplished just what they desired, that was the return of a supporter in Parliament. Now, I ask seriously, which is the most honest course, to place a sum in the Estimates just on the eve of an election—

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What is the date when the tenders were in?

Mr. CAMERON. I cannot tell the date, but it was between nomination and election day, in 1878.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Government were out of power?

Mr. CAMERON. The Government were not out of power before the general election, and the Government were not out of power when the last of the tenders were in. The Government were not out of power until I myself, as the correspondence will show, asked the Minister of Public Works to award the contract before he left the Department of Public Works. But they left the work in that state, having accomplished their object, and it has been left there without any money having been expended upon it. Sir, this was a deception of the grossest kind practiced upon the County of Inverness for the purpose of securing a supporter from that county. It is a custom of people, and I think we can hardly help it, to judge others by themselves. Those who practice such deception as that for the purpose of securing elections, are those who are likely to suspect that others pursue a similar course; but after all, it is not a proper criterion to go by in order to arrive at a correct judgment.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—THE 15TH BATTALION.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BURDETT. I have a motion that I would like to put in.

Mr. MITCHELL. As next Monday is a holiday, and this is the only private day that we shall get this week, I think the hon. Minister ought to give us a few minutes longer. I do not think this a proper way to carry on the business of this House. It is the only private night we shall have to take up this business. I have three or four motions here, and I want to pay proper tribute to the way hon. gentlemen opposite have dealt with those motions, and the hon. gentleman should be allowed to proceed. I think the House at all events might sit another hour.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Before making this motion I asked the leader of the Opposition whether he would agree to it, and I gave him as the reason that the House would sit late to-morrow in accordance with the understanding arrived at the other day that we would sit the discussion out, and, in order that we may sit as little after midnight as possible, I thought it desirable that we should adjourn to-night at a reasonable hour. I hope the hon. gentleman will agree to this, but, of course, we are in the hands of the House.

Mr. BURDETT. The reason I desire to move this motion now is that I shall not be here the next day when such motions are reached. I will undertake to discuss it as briefly as possibly. I beg to move for:

Return of all correspondence between the Government and the officers or men of the 15th Battalion, respecting aid to construct a drill shed at Belleville, and for any reports made to the Government respecting the desirability of granting such aid.

The object of this motion is to point out the necessity as well as the justice of placing a grant in the Supplementary Estimates to aid in the construction of a drill shed at Belleville. I submit that so long as the volunteer and militia system is maintained, and considered desirable in the interests of the country, we should have proper buildings for drilling purposes, and these should be placed at the principal centres in the Dominion, such as Belleville. The battalion is located there, it being a central point in Ontario easy of access by water or rail, and could in case of need be called together in a few hours, and is thus ready for service within the shortest possible time. If it is right and proper that volunteer system should be maintained, drill sheds and the proper buildings for the storing of arms and equipments should be constructed at places like Belleville. Moreover, the spirit shown by the volunteers of Belleville and vicinity should be encouraged by any Government which desires to create a patriotic spirit in the country. I will briefly state what this battalion has done, and why they ask this grant. The battalion was formed in 1863 under the command of Colonel Ponton, an old British officer, who brought the battalion up to a great state of efficiency and strength. On his retirement the command was given to Colonel Campbell, a brother of Sir Alexander Campbell. On his decease the command was given to the present Colonel Lazier. Were it not for some recent occurrences I would not trouble the House with this motion. Last Session when I brought this matter before the attention of the Government, I was kindly told to wait and see the Estimates. At the beginning of this Session I placed a question on the paper asking if a sum would be placed in the Estimates for this purpose, and I was again told to wait and see the Estimates. The answer was more clear than it was satisfying, but, subsequently, I saw a short article in the Mail, which indicated that a grant would be made. I am not aware that the Mail at the present time is the mouthpiece of the Government; some time ago that was more clear than it is now. They may be only sailing in different ships and in the end may come into the same harbor. However honest and reliable newspapers generally are, we may be sometimes disappointed in their articles; and, therefore, not relying on the Mail, I bring the question before the House and ask for this appropriation. The Belleville battalion has shown itself worthy of being specially noticed by the Government. In 1866 they were called to the front, and they went to Prescott and served there with great efficiency and success. The Minister of Customs, on that occasion, campaigned with the others, and with glory. In regard to their conduct in the North-West, great stress has been laid by speakers on the advisability and utility of efficient men guarding the supplies, and keeping open communication with the front. That is, no doubt, a very proper and honorable service, but when a call was made for men to go to the North-West, among the very first to answer that call was No. 1 Company of the 15th Battalion, in whose behalf I am speaking. They joined the Midland Battalion, and the hardships they endured can be better imagined than described; at all events, when the day of trial came, that battalion was in the front at Batoche. The Midland Battalion was there, and No. 1 Company of the 15th Battalion were at the front and reached Batoche's house as quickly as any one. They were first in battle on that occasion. It is to their valor, it is to their courage, because it is to the men who made that charge and to nobody else that the credit is due in my humble judgment. They rushed forward and they put an end to the rebellion. What might have been the result? How much more treasure and how many more lives might have been lost, had not those men rushed forward as they did and virtually put an end to and stamped out this rebellion, we do not know and we can only guess or imagine. At any rate they were there and their breasts were decorated with bullets while others got theirs decorated with the order of knighthood. I claim that the men who presented their breasts to the bullets of the enemy are not to be ignored either in or out of Parliament, when they make a just claim for a grant of a few thousand dollars upon the Government. After they have done what they did, and endured what they did, and fought as they did, and won as they did, they ought to be reasonably provided for. If they are not to have any shelter under which to drill, and in which to keep their arms, what encouragement is there for young men to join the volunteers of this country? What encouragement is there for them to maintain the volunteer system if no facility is given to men of this class, and of this character? I am told that they have been knocking at the door of the Treasury here for some years for assistance in this direction. Feeling that the Government would in the end yield, they have gone to work themselves and built a drill shed; they have purchased the ground, and have taken the land in the name of trustees ready to deed it to the Government when they receive the grant. The volunteers have gone about for subscriptions, and they put their hands in their own pockets in order to build this drill shed, and they are now largely in debt for this fine building, which has cost them many thousands of dollars. I submit that those volunteers are coming forward with a just and an honest claim, and with a claim which, I believe, this Government will now acknowledge. I want to inform the Government that this is not a dead or a dying claim, this claim is going to live as long as I live, until it is satisfied. It is going to be pressed as long as I can press it, until we receive a reasonable assurance in the way of a reasonable grant. I believe that, when the Government fully understand this, after I have in a humble way explained it to the Ministers of the Crown, they will see the necessity of making grants of this kind to battalions of this character, in cities of this importance and situated as it is, if they wish to maintain our military system as it at present exists. In my judgment it is false economy if they do not do so. If the arms and accoutrements of the volunteers are to be scattered about and kept here and there they become spoiled and useless to a very great extent. In the event of a sudden call to arms it takes the men a long time to get ready, and even then many of their arms are found useless or past repair. I say that in building accommodation for the volunteers it is not only a useful way to expend public money, but it is an economical way as well. I strongly insist that the Government may consider this matter in a favorable light, and that when I come to see the Supplementary Estimates I will see at least a sum of $10,000 or $15,000 appropriated to assist those men in wiping off the debt that they have contracted, in paying for the large, commodious and fine building which they have erected, and which they will be obliged to pay for out of their own pockets, and by the little subscriptions they have collected, unless this Government comes to their aid. I think the Minister of Customs, who has always aided as far as he could the volunteers of this city and the County of Hastings, can bear witness to what I have said in their favor and of their conduct in the past. I have not had such intimate relations with the volunteers as that hon. gentleman; in fact I believe he is one of the oldest Belleville volunteers, having belonged to the early Rifle Brigade, and the Government in making this grant would not only be honoring the battalion but honoring as well a distinguished colleague in the Ministry. It is hardly a right thing that a Government like this, a Government which has got money to spend as we are told upon breakwaters and nearly everything else, should allow their volunteers, who have fought and won their battles, to go about with their hats in their hands begging for a few dollars to enable them to build a place in which they can drill. If we are going to leave them during winter and summer without any covering but the skies above them, the volunteers will now know it, and our military system will fail, and our battalions in many instances will disband. I ask earnestly, and I ask hopefully, that the Government will make this grant. I believe that if the Minister of Militia were in his place he would at once accede to it, but I am satisfied that when it is represented to him by his colleagues he will give us a reasonable grant for this purpose. If the Government do so, the benefit will accrue to this country from the valor of the volunteers should any disturbance ever occur again in Canada.

Mr. BOWELL. All that the hon. gentleman has said in reference to the valor and the services of the 15th Battalion is quite correct, and he might have, in all truth, applied the same remarks to the other Belleville and County Battalion, the 49th. The hon. gentleman could not with all his eloquence have said more in praise of the services and the worth of those battalions than they deserve. They have shown their valor in the field when they gave their time and risked their lives in the services of their country. There can be no possible objection to bringing down the papers to which the hon. gentleman refers. Having said this much, I can tell him that the claims of that battalion, and of the parties who have invested their money in the construction of a drill shed, have already been fully brought before the Minister of Militia by his colleague from Belleville who, I have no doubt, will second his efforts in support of this object. The claims of that battalion have not been forgotten in the past, nor do I think they will be forgotten in the future. But, unfortunately for the city in which he and myself reside, when I am out of official life, that city has not done as many other towns and cities of smaller size have, in voting sums of money to assist in the construction of drill sheds. If I am not misinformed Brantford has appropriated for such a purpose $10,000 to aid their volunteer force. It has not been very creditable to our town that they have refused to give one dollar, so far, to aid in the construction of a drill shed to cover the volunteers who have done so much for their country as the 15th and 49th Battalions of the county of Hastings have done. The policy of the Government in the past has been, in most cases, where either the land has been provided by the city, or an appropriation has been made by the city and county for the construction of a drill shed, to come forward and aid them; and I doubt not that the Government would have done the same thing in the case of Belleville had the same spirit been displayed in the city to which we both belong. I hope, however, for the sake of the officers and the privates belonging to the battalions, and the private citizens who have come forward and put their hands in their pockets to assist in the construction of this shed, that the corporation will do its share in the future, and in all probability the Government might aid them in relieving them of their debt. However, that is a matter that must be for the future; and, although my hon. friend has some fears of Supplementary Estimates, he may not be, or he may be, disappointed when they come down. This I can assure him, the claims of the battalions will receive the fullest consideration which the Government can give to a question of this kind.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think my hon. friend has made out a case favorable to the officers and men belonging to that regiment; they at any rate have manifested a good spirit; I was not aware of the position the municipality had taken in reference to the matter. I can understand the difficulty the Government have in determining grants if they have many claims coming in. The hon. Minister has mentioned the city of Brantford, and is cognisant of the fact, I believe, that there is an application from that city for a grant for a drill shed. I think the hon. Minister of Public Works is also cognisant of it, and I judge from what he has said that he is favorable to it, although there is a place called a Council where it must be decided. However, I would like to state that some twenty-one years ago the city of Brantford granted the use of a public square for a drill shed, and I think, gave a considerable amount towards its construction; I think it cost the Government only $2,500 or $3,000; I am speaking from memory and subject to correction. The lease expires in April, the city wants the ground, and insists on the removal of the drill shed, which is a very unsightly building; so that the battalion will be left without a drill shed at all. I cannot say that the battalion has seen active service, but it is known to the Militia Department, that it is commanded by officers who have shown the best possible spirit; and it will be disastrous to the regiment, I think, if the Government should not see their way to supplement the grant already made by the city, towards it, of $10,000. I make these remarks to emphasise the nature of this battalion's claim, and the necessity of its being given serious consideration before the Estimates come down, and not by any means to throw any obstacle in the way of my hon. friend who moves for his regiment. Whatever may be said, so long as we have this militia system, everyone must know that the officers commanding the force are men who serve their country at very great loss and expense to themselves. I think this has been shown in the case of the officers of the hon. gentleman's battalion, and I am sure it is so with the officers in my own city. I, therefore, take this opportunity to state what is known to one or two Ministers in reference to the officers of that regiment, in hopes that it will strengthen their claim when it comes to be considered in the full council.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10:50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 19th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

JESUITS' ESTATES ACT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I beg to lay on the Table the return to the Address moved by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron). There may be some other communications, more or less regular, to be received. If there are any, they will be brought down, but I thought it best not to delay these papers.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They should be printed at once.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly, they will be printed if that is wanted. I do not know that they can be printed in time for the discussion.

Mr. LAURIER. It should be printed in time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will look over the return before the order is made. I do not think there is much necessity for it, but I will be guided by my hon. friend. If he says it should be printed, it will be.

LEGISLATION EXPENSES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House, tomorrow, resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that there shall be granted to Her Majesty, out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, an annual sum sufficient to enable Her Majesty to pay the estimated amount of sessional allowances awarded by law to Senators and members of the House of Commons; and that all moneys expended for such purpose shall be expended and accounted for in like manner as moneys are expended and accounted for in respect of the contingent expenses of the House of Commons under the Act respecting the House of Commons as amended by any subsequent Act.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I desire to bring to the notice of the House and the Government, a matter which I consider of very great importance at the present time, as it affects the action which may be taken on a Bill now before the House (No. 68) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway. In 1885, a sum of money was granted for the construction of a road—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask the hon. gentleman to leave this matter over till to-morrow. This is a Government day, and we are under a sort of arrangement to conclude the debate on the Budget to-night.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Certainly.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster: That Mr. Speaker leave the Chair, and the House go again into Committee of Supply; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. COOKBURN. In view of the fact that it has been arranged that this debate should close this evening, and also in view of the fact that this debate has already been protracted to a considerable length and a number of gentlemen desire to speak on the subject, the observations which I have to make will be as brief as possible. I had not intended to deal with any statistics on this occasion, as I think we must all agree that the House has been fairly flooded with figures and statistics, and we have had a supply of them usque ad nauseam; but, in view of the extraordinary statements of the hon. member who preceded me, the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), I think it is necessary that I should call attention to some of the misstatements contained in his address. He starts out by stating that he is a farmer, and that he represents the farmer, and has the farmer's interests at heart. He poses as the representative of the agricultural interests, and he tells us that his heart is fairly wrung—when he sees the farmers, not indeed actually begging from door to door, but in the miserable plight to which they are reduced. I am not a farmer, but I have enough sympathy with the farmers of Canada to unite with them in the feeling of woe depicted by the hon. gentleman if the position to which they have been reduced is such as he states; but I shall endeavor to show the hon. gentleman that some of the statements he has adduced as to the miserable condition of the farming population exist only in his own fervid imagination. I think, in view of the hon. gentleman's position in the agricultural community, he should have been more careful in the statements he has made in regard to the condition of the farmers. I can imagine that, if he warmed up as he did the other evening in this House, before the agricultural audiences which he has been in the habit of addressing, the honest farmers must have left the meeting under the impression that they were indeed a badly-treated people, though they had no idea before that that they were suffering in that way. After such a speech as that of the hon. gentleman, they must have found that they were under a load of burdens, grievous to be borne, and that they were suffering, to an extent, which they never understood before. As long as the hon. gentleman contented himself with the old stale arguments of blue ruin and agricultural depression, I was contented to leave him alone, but when he descended to particulars, I felt it necessary to say something in answer to him. He tells us that not every well-to-do farmer, but "every ordinary farmer" pays to-day $29.50 per annum in duty on agricultural implements. He says that he went to the Experimental Farm at Ottawa to ascertain the prices paid for the implements, and he went to the Auditor General's Report and got the prices there, so that they must be correct. He gives us the duty on two ploughs, two harrows, cultivator, gang-plough, bob-sleigh, drill, scuffler, roller, and so forth. These, he says, are the ordinary requisites of the ordinary farmer, and he finds that on these implements, the farmer pays a duty of $295. He gives ten years for the life of these implements, and adds $3 a year for the duty on the article of twine, thus making the total duty $32.50 a year. I think, last year, it was allowed by both parties in this House that the number of farmers in this country was between 600,000 and 650,000. If I take the number of farmers at 600,000, and multiply $32.50 by that number, I find that the duty paid by the farmers each year on agricultural implements is no less than $19,500,000. The whole revenue from Customs is only some $22,000,000. God be thanked that our farmers are so very wealthy, that in these items alone, they can pay nearly the total amount of the Customs duties of the whole Dominion. Not content with that, the hon. gentleman says that the annual duty on clothing and groceries of ordinary farmers is still more. Let us see then what this poor, down-trodden farmer has to pay on his clothing and groceries. We find that the duty on clothes for a family of five persons, as he says, amounts to $39; on a barrel of sugar, $8.50; coal oil, 10 gallons, $1.24; rice, corn, starch, spice, soda and raisins, $2; and so on, so that $54.84 duty upon clothing and groceries for the house, and $32.50 on implements, amount to $83.34 during the year, according to his statement. When I multiply that by the number of farmers, I find a total of $50,000,000. Under these circumstances I call on the hon. gentleman to impeach the Minister of Customs, I call on him to impeach the Minister of Finance, and to demand what they have done with the surplus $23,000,000 which have been paid by the agriculturists of this country. Can it be that we have here in the Conservative party a body of men, whose Minister of Finance has been able to wring the vast sum of $23,000,000 from the horny handed sons of toil and dispose of it without the knowledge of any one? It is possible that there may be some secret explanation of this, and I would call on the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), for once in his life to soar above the minutiae of details in which he revels and endeavor to solve this mystery. Then there is the question of the balance of trade. The hon. gentleman from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) tells us: there is a balance of trade, as determined by the exports and imports, against us for the period 1881 to 1888 of no less than $166,420,104. Now, if the country has been able to suffer this supposed loss of $166,000,000 in eight years and still stand in the proud position it occupies to-day, all I have to say is that we have the grandest and the most wonderful Government that ever directed a country's affairs. Can it be that these $23,000,000, to which I referred to a moment ago, were surreptitiously sent over in gold to help to offset this wonderful balance of trade, which the hon. member for North Wellington cannot understand. The hon. gentleman is still away in the backwoods of political science of over fifty years ago and wants to settle the accounts of the country on the principle of the simple balance of exports and imports. My hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) then says: Look at twine. The farmer pays $3 a year duty on twine. I turned up the Blue Books Report Trade and Commerce, and I found twines of all kinds paid a duty of $15,904.14, or 2½ cents per farmer. I take these 600,000 farmers and credit each with $3 apiece, and I get $1,800,000, or more than enough to pay one-sixth of the annual interest of the national debt. Then he comes to sugar, and he asks, Why should not the farmer sweeten his poor cup of tea with a little sugar? Will we refuse him that comfort, or will we deny that the poor lone widow, after a day's hard labor, is entitled to put in her cup of tea a solitary morsel of sugar. I find the duty paid on sugar to be $3,433,333, but my hon. friend says every farmer pays $8.50 per annum duties, so that the farmers pay $5,100,000. Again must I call on the Minister of Finance to answer what he has done with this surplus balance of $1,666,666 which has been paid by the poor farmer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He has handed it to the refiners.

Mr. COCKBURN. Then I come to coal oil. What is the duty on coal oil? I find the duty collected was $325,656, but we have 600,000 farmers, all gushing with patriotism, who, the hon. gentleman said, are paying a duty of $1.24 apiece per annum, or $744,000, thus giving us a surplus of $118,344. Why, in these three articles alone, of twine, sugar, and coal oil, there is a surplus of $3,870,107. Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, what is the use of our analysing statements of that kind any longer? They may do for the backwoods constituencies of hon. gentlemen opposite. They may do for people who have been duped by their false statements, but they will not do to bring up before a house like this, where we have the means at our disposal for refuting such statements. But I have no doubt, despite the flat contradictions these statements have received, and received from authorities which cannot be gainsaid, the same old stories will be repeated again and again as if they had never been nailed on the floor of this House. Then the hon. gentleman says, Look at the exports for 1878 to the United States of $37,300,000, and of only $33,600,000 to Great Britain, showing an excess in favor of the United States of $3,700,000. Why, within a moment after these words had passed from his lips he told us that the exports to the United States in 1888 were, not $37,000,000, but $42,572,065, and that those to Great Britain were not $33,600,000 but $40,084,964, and he told us this because he wanted to prove a different story. He told us that in 1878 our exports to the United States were $25,245,000, and in 1888, $42,572,000, showing an increase of $17,327,000, or an increase of 75 per cent., while just before that our exports to the United States were $37,000,000 in 1888, or $5,000,000 less than his last statement. But what do $5,000,000 matter to a man like this? His great agricultural soul soars far above figures—millions or billions are alike to him. He told us that in 1878 we exported to Great Britain $46,000,000, and in 1888, $40,000,000, showing a decrease of $6,000,000, or 15 per cent., and this, he says, proves conclusively that the United States is our natural market and that our trade with that country is increasing. I thought it right to examine one or two points in connection with the United States being our natural market. The hon. gentleman took up the items of hides and wool, and I thought it best to find out what was the real state of the trade with reference to these items. I hold in my hand a letter from one of the largest dealers in the Dominion, a man whose word, I think, will be taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, inasmuch as he has always been a constant supporter of their policy and a steady enemy of the present Government. I refer to Mr. John Hallam, of Toronto. He says:

"Now allow me to state, that we do not import one single pound of wool which is the produce of the United States. It is quite clear that the United States is not entitled to this part of the trade, as all the wool is grown in other countries and shipped to the United States in bond, then bought by our dealers and manufacturers from wool merchants in Boston, New York and Philadelphia. In these cities there are a number of very large wool concerns, which import largely from Africa, South America, England and Australia; they sell what they can to their own merchants, and then offer the balance to Canadian dealers and manufacturers.

"Under the head of Hides and Skins the figures from United States are also misleading; seven-tenths, if not more, of all the hides imported into this country are South America stock and are usually bought in Boston or New York, and are sold by the pound, except sheepskins with wool on, which are usually sold by the piece, but we import very few sheepskins in this country, and when we do they are not the produce of the United States but of Africa, Australia, Buenos Ayres, or Monte Video."

We must thus credit, not to the trade of the United States, but to the trade with foreign countries in those two items alone of hides and wool, no less a sum than $1,743,000. In the matter of lumber alone I am credibly informed that we ship by the United States, through Boston, from 50,000,000 to 70,000,000 feet of spruce for the South American market. Hence hon. gentlemen opposite will understand, perhaps, the reason why the policy has been brought forward by the Government to subsidise steamship lines to foster that foreign trade which we see has already assumed so large proportions. I may tell my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), with reference to the farming population, that I find from returns just made that, in 1868, Canada exported to the United States 61 per cent of her farm produce, and to Great Britain 34½ per cent. But 20 years later the exact reverse took place, because we then shipped in 1887 to the United States only 35 per cent., and to Great Britain 60 per cent. In fact, if anyone will look at the tables which have been prepared by Mr. Johnson, he will find that the trade in farm produce during the last 20 years is steadily increasing with Great Britain, and steadily decreasing with the United States. Our friends tell us, Look at the United States, look at the State of New York. Well, I live in Ontario, but I know the State of New York, and I find that the official returns given by the State authorities of New York show that three-fourths of their farms are under mortgage, that 1-20, or 75,000 farmers are hopelessly in debt, that the decrease in land value in ten years from 1870 to 1880 was nearly as much as our whole national debt, or $216,000,000; whereas the increase in land values in Ontario in four years from 1882 was $66,750,000. I find by the Ontario statistics of the total value of real estate, that the mortgages held by the Land Companies amount to $30,400,000, or only 6½ per cent. of the actual value of the property, or considerably less than one-half of the value of the farm implements and live stock alone. Then in New York State, with a population of 5,000,000, equal to that of the Dominion, there are, say, 1,000,000 wage earners, who pay per head $20 per year, or 4 per cent. on the enormous sum of $500,000,000, for the support of paupers. This is the report given Mr. Ford of the Congressional Investigation Committee. In fact, we are told to look to the United States for everything. I am afraid that our friends, in looking to the United States, are simply looking to a matter of dollars and cents; they are confounding a plutocracy with an aristocracy—a plutocracy that will be, and has already become a curse to that country; a plutocracy whose names are not emblazoned in the glorious records of its country, but whose names are written in the defalcations and crimes of the police and other courts; a plutocracy whose names have never been associated with struggles for their country's liberties, but simply with struggles for its boodle; a plutocracy whose names are connected with no efforts to broaden the liberties of the people, who have never wrung from any Parliament a Magna Charta, but whose whole contest seems to have been for railway charters; a plutocracy which seeks to become master of every industry, which seeks to control the price of even the bread of the people, of the sugar that sweetens their tea, of the very light that lights them on their way, and which seeks to control the very coffins in which they are to lie. Why, Sir, look at that plutocracy, and you will find none of the kind relations that exist in this country between landlord and tenant, or that exist in Great Britain between landlord and tenant; and you will find that they ignore all political duties, sneer at those who attempt honestly to discharge them, and in their effrontery they have even gone so far as almost to drive the people of the United States into what we can only call one vast system of communism. But I wish to speak more particularly with reference to the resolution brought forward by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The resolution reads:

"That in the present condition of affairs, and in view of the recent action of the House of Representatives of the United States it is expedient that steps should be taken to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States, for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith."

He here alleges two distinct grounds on which he bases his motion; first, the present condition of affairs, and second, the recent action of the House of Representatives of the United States. Let us briefly examine these. I am free to confess that, after the clear and lucid statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance, and the able addresses of those who followed in his support, I am at a loss to see why, in the present condition of affairs, we should be justified in reversing the policy under which, during the last ten years, Canada has prospered to so unexampled a degree. I can only regret that during the last three consecutive Sessions so much valuable time has been wasted in the reiteration of arguments and statements, which, again and again, have received their emphatic condemnation from the electors at the polls. The constant and increasing efforts on the part of the Opposition to effect the most radical changes in our commercial and political relations, naturally tend to frighten capital. Capital, gentlemen, is always shy, and is ready to take flight at the least alarm. A mere flash of the electric wires, or a mere mote on the political horizon, may, in a few hours, or a few minutes, effect the transfer of millions of capital from here to New York or to London. Such being the case, I ask why it is that, year after year, we are asked to make these radical changes in the conditions under which it is able to protect itself. I feel that unless we have a time of rest, unless we feel that we are to have for years to come the same beneficent policy pursued that has produced such good effects during the last ten years, we shall experience troubles that we little calculate on now. If any person really and impartially desires to ascertain the present condition of affairs, I can refer him to a tribunal, composed of the keenest, the shrewdest, the best informed men to be found in the world, to men who have no direct or immediate interest in Canada, to men to whom Canada is merely a commercial or financial asset, who look upon all these matters with a cold and calculating eye, whose business it is to become thoroughly acquainted with the internal and external resources of every country in the world—need I tell you that I refer to the capitalists of Europe, to the men constituting the Royal Exchange, or the Stock Exchange at London. These men, when asked by Canada for a loan of 4 million dollars, tendered her 12 millions, and they offered the money at a less rate of interest than they ever offered money to any other Province, the lowest rate, either comparatively or positively, at which a loan has ever been effected by a colony. Sir, I am perfectly willing, apart from all political squabbles, to pin my faith to the calm and steady belief of those men who back their belief by the offer of 12 million dollars. As to the recent action of the House of Representatives, let us see, first, what that action really was, and secondly, why it should become expedient that steps should be taken to ascertain "on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity" with them. I may, in passing, state that action of a similar character to the joint resolution of Mr. Hitt, of Illinois, was taken over a century ago, and that the following offer was incorporated as article XI of the Federation of the thirteen states, in the year 1777, and has been standing since that time. The following is the offer:—

"Canada acceding to this confederation and joining in the measure of the United States, shall be admitted into and entitled to all the advantages of this union, but no other colony except on agreement of nine states; and in the address drawn up in French to the inhabitants of Canada—who then stood loyally by the Crown of Great Britain, as they were ever since (Mr. Dickinson says), 'Your Province is the only link wanting to complete the bright and strong chain of union.'"

In reply to the address drawn up in French at the time they stated they were loyal to the Crown of old England, as they have remained ever since, and as I am persuaded they will remain. These were the events of 1777, and the offer as stated is still open to hon. gentlemen opposite. I must say that I prefer the open, downright honesty of such an offer as this to the underhand attempt to entrap Canada into negotiations with the United States under false pretences. Perhaps the word "false" may appear to be a strong term and it may be unparliamentary; but let me read the words of the joint resolution of Mr. Hitt, and then hon. gentlemen will see whether I am justified or not in using such a term. The joint resolution is in these terms:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that whenever it shall be duly certified to the President of the United States that the Government of the Dominion of Canada has declared a desire to establish commercial union with the United States, having a uniform revenue tariff, like internal duties to be collected, and like import duties to be imposed on articles brought into either country from other nations, with no duties on trade between the United States and Canada, he shall appoint three commissioners to meet those who may be likewise designated to represent the Government of Canada, to prepare a plan for the assimilation of import duties and internal revenue taxes of the two countries, and an equitable division of receipts, in a commercial union; and said commissioners shall report to the President, who shall lay the report before Congress."

Mr. Speaker, there is not a word here about that hybrid monstrosity, unrestricted reciprocity. Let me read also Mr. Hitt's own explanation of commercial union, as given by him only a fortnight ago when speaking to the resolution. He said:

"What is commercial union with Canada? It means, as set out in this resolution, the adoption by both countries of precisely the same tariff of duties, or taxes to be levied upon goods coming from abroad, abolishing altogether our line of custom houses on the north by which we collect tariff duties on goods coming from Canada, abolishing their custom houses along the same line by which they collect duties upon goods we send into Canada, and leaving intercourse as unrestricted between this country and Canada as it is between the States. The line of custom-houses would follow the sea and include both countries. The internal-revenue systems of taxes on liquors and tobacco in the two countries would also have to be made uniform in both countries. The proceeds of taxation thus collected would be equitably divided, and the fairest way would seem to be in proportion to population."

And then further on he says:

"Undoubtedly they (the Canadians) in being subjected to the same tariff with us, would in all fairness be consulted as to its provisions; but we, sixty millions, would in all fairness generally have the prevailing voice in determining what the rates should be. The particular methods in which questions of detail should be treated need not now be discussed."

No, Mr. Speaker, I think they had better not. We had better first be inveigled into the net and then we shall feel, in all its force, the "prevailing voice of the people" who, in "all fairness," have overreached us in almost every transaction, who cheated us by false maps out of the State of Maine, dishonestly pocketed millions of dollars in connection with the Alabama award, and who recently applauded the infamous threat of the Retaliation Bill by a President who had, only a few days before, declared publicly that Canada had done everything that was fair, just and honorable. This Bill of Mr. Hitt calls for commercial union, not for unrestricted reciprocity; that is a mongrel which no self-respecting citizen of the United States would for a moment tolerate. Well do I recollect, Sir, during my recent pleasant visit to Washington, when casually introducing this resolution into an assembly of gentlemen there, I was asked: "Do you imagine we are such fools as to keep a back door three thousand miles long open to you to flood us with British goods?" I said: "Gentlemen, no doubt we shall be able to arrange everything honorably, so as to protect you against an onslaught of British and foreign goods." They looked at me. There was first a look of inquiry, and then a look of pity stole over their faces, and I could read the impressions passing through their minds: "Poor fellow, there is something wrong with his head." The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in defending his friend the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) against the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, said:

"It is not commercial union that is advocated by my hon. friend, it is not commercial union that is asked for by this resolution, but unrestricted reciprocity, and unrestricted reciprocity would leave in our hands the entire control of our own tariff, except in so far as relating to imports and exports between this country and the United States. They"—

That is to say, Messrs. Hitt and Butterworth.

"—are truly patriotic in their efforts to promote the interests, not only of the United States, but the interests of the Anglo-Saxon commonwealths upon the continent of North America."

Now, if it is unrestricted reciprocity with entire control of our own tariff, with the preceding modifications, and not commercial union, that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) desires, why does he base his motion on the recent action of Mr. Hitt, and of the United States Congress, when Mr. Hitt emphatically tells him that all the Custom houses in the north would be abolished, that the Custom houses would follow the sea and include both countries. It suggests to my mind a little incident that occurred in this Chamber this morning. I asked the member for West Toronto, if he had a copy of the Toronto directory at hand. He replied, he had not. An Irishman, sitting at his right hand turned round and, with that wit for which his countrymen are famous, offered me a copy of the Quebec directory, asking if that would not suit. I think the two cases are very much on a par. One party asks for commercial union and the other offers unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in the course of his address, also said:

"The feeling in the United States, I saw it evinced in Washington when I visited there, is an unmistakable desire on the part of American public men to cultivate friendly relations with Canada, to impress upon Canadians who visit their capital, their desire to treat us fairly and in a friendly spirit, and to show that they are ready to enter into a reciprocity treaty on a fair and equitable basis. There can be no doubt we can get it if we desire it, and the assertion that we cannot get it is not borne out by the facts."

I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, if the terms of Mr. Hitt's resolution and the explanations I have read to this House are such as to confirm the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that the United States are ready for a reciprocity treaty, however great we may acknowledge to be their kindness and hospitality to Canadians visiting their capital. But, happily, we are not left to decide this question solely by the words of the joint resolution and the subsequent explanation of Mr. Hitt; we have the public declarations of Senator Sherman, the leader of the Republican party in the Senate, to this effect, that if we wish to trade with the people of the United States on equal terms, we must join them politically and bear all their burdens as citizens of the United States; and that no uncertain sound may be given out in this matter, a few months ago, while addressing his constituents in Maine, the present able Secretary of State—the actual head of 60,000,000 of people—said:

"You pay your taxes in Maine; you pay your taxes in the United States; you yield obedience; you owe allegiance; you observe the laws, you live under the flag. You stand ready to fight for the national union, as you have already fought. Beyond the frontier, across that river, our neighbors choose another Government, another allegiance. They are subjects of Queen Victoria, they are loyal to Her Majesty. They live under a foreign flag. They do exactly as they have a right to do. I neither dispute their right nor envy their situation. It is their right to choose for themselves, as it is our right to choose for ourselves. But I am opposed, teetotally opposed, to giving the Canadians the sentimental satisfaction of waving the British flag, paying British taxes, and the actual cash remuneration of American markets. (Great applause.) They cannot have both at the same time. If they come with us they can have what we have, but it is an absolute wrong against the rights of American citizens that millions of men who owe the United States no allegiance, and who have no part nor lot with us, who are not of us, but choose to be foreign to us; it is an absolute wrong for a Democratic congress to say that they shall have exactly the same share in our markets and the same privileges of trade under our flag that we have."

We have seen within the last few weeks in the large daily journals spread broadcast over the land, from New York, Chicago and other large centres, maps in which our fair Dominion is parcelled out as so many states, and I have had sent to me to-day a large print from one of the New York papers in which the glorious old flag of England is represented as being trampled under foot and the flag of the stars and stripes has, forsooth, been hoisted. Here you see on one side stand the Prince of Wales and other members of the Royal family, while on the other side stand President Harrison, Vice-President Morton, and the other members of the Cabinet. This and similar representations on the part of the American papers are simply attempts to familiarise their readers with the annexation of our great Dominion. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they are prepared to pay their taxes to the United States? To whom do they owe their allegiance? Whose laws do they observe? Under which flag do they live? They have taken the oath to be loyal to our Sovereign Lady Queen Victoria, and I ask, in the name of common sense, if loyalty can lead to language such as we have heard from hon. members on the opposite side of this House? I say if a man is truly loyal and should find that his words are unfairly construed into such a shape as to be considered disloyal to England by sixty millions of people in America, it is time for him to alter his course, and try to observe the oath which he took at the Table before he was allowed to occupy a seat in the House. I ask such men, are you subjects of the Queen? Are you loyal to Her Majesty? Do you wish to live under the old British flag? Or do you wish to register yourselves under the stars and stripes? Already have you done too much to lead people to think that you wish to pursue that course? Come out like men, and say in a straightforward way, as Mr. Blaine said, that when you go in for unrestricted reciprocity you go in for annexation to the United States. One would think the declaration of Mr. Blaine explicit enough to set at rest all hopes of our having unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, unless we deserted the British flag for the stars and stripes, and so we are treated by the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to a picture of the easy conquest of Canada, as follows:—

"In case of war with the United States, England would be utterly unable to place an armed force upon the frontier between these two countries, adequate to the defence of Canada. The United States, with no greater exertion than was put forth in the rebellion of 1861 to 1864, could place in the field an army of 3,000,000 men, and it is folly to talk of England being able to cope with such a force, in British North America, so far from her base of operations."

Mr. Speaker, my recent visit to Washington led me to very different conclusions from those of my friend. I know we shall never get unrestricted reciprocity, but I know also that the people of the United States will never knowingly provoke us to war, or wantonly commence war upon us, and that for very good reasons. The Republican and Democratic parties are so very nearly equal in numerical strength that they cannot afford to pursue a policy leading to the forcible annexation of Canada, for, in that event, their action would serve to consolidate Canada, and when it entered the Union, under the title of eight or nine new states, these new states would, for some time, at least so long as they smarted under the sense of defeat, vote for the opposite or Democratic ticket. Indeed, they would temporarily hold the balance of power between the conflicting parties, and for similar reasons we may rest assured that the Democratic party will not, with their eyes open, force us into the arms of the Republican party. We may, therefore, bear with equanimity the hon. member's threat of the invasion of Canada by 3,000,000 of stalwart Yankees. The United States know too well what has been the cost to Germany of the forcible annexation of Alsace-Lorraine; to England, of Ireland; and to Russia, of Poland; and we have ample proofs in the manner in which they reconstructed the Southern States after the surrender of General Lee that they do not wish to hold any territory subject to conquest. If ever Canada becomes part of the Union, it will do so by its own free will and consent. I can only say that I sincerely hope that I, for one, shall never live to see that day, and I hope, Sir, also that I am expressing the not uncharitable hope that gentlemen on either side of the House will never live to see it either. It is said by hon. gentlemen opposite that England will not object to our forming a commercial treaty with the United States. Why, Sir, what does such a treaty involve? It involves a common tariff; it involves a common commercial law and a common court of appeal for the interpretation of that commercial law; it involves a power behind to enforce the decisions of that court; it involves, I almost think, power on the part of Canada to make peace with a nation at war with England. And what is England to do? England the mother from whose loins we have sprung; the mother of arts and civilisation; the mother who has nursed us so tenderly in our infancy, who has stood by us in many a hard battle. What is she to receive? She is to be treated as a foreign power; she is to assume all the responsibilities of a parent; she is to guarantee us from invasion, to protect our trade, and to assure us at the same time all the rights and privileges of British citizenship; and yet she is not to utter a word of control or even of remonstrance. Why, the whole proposition of commercial union is simply too absurd, unless political union is to accompany or follow it in the near future. In short, Sir, the United States cannot grant us unrestricted reciprocity, as such action will be in direct violation of the numerous commercial treaties that country has already made with foreign nations under the most-favored-nation clause. Hon. gentlemen opposite will tell me that that matters not, that the United States would trample under foot those treaties and obligations. Well, Sir, I tell you that if the United States are prepared to break their word with a foreign power, if they are prepared to trample their honor in the dust, we are not prepared to associate ourselves with them. But finally, Mr. Speaker, Canada is not for sale. We love our country dearly, Sir; we are proud of its past, we are hopeful of its future; and come weal or come woe, we are determined, with God's help, to work out our own destiny, and we refuse—aye, indignantly, scornfully refuse—to exchange the proud title of citizen of the great British Empire for that of any other nationality under heaven.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavor as far as possible to emulate the good example which the hon. gentleman has just set in one respect—I shall endeavor to be brief in the remarks I have to make to the House, and to recognise that at this late stage of the debate it would not be proper to submit very large masses of figures or to occupy very much of the time of the House. Sir, we have had a speech from the hon. gentleman the larger part of which consisted in expressions of his loyalty. Sir, I am not going to challenge the hon. gentleman's loyalty, but I notice that in this instance, as in many others, those who are too prone to flaunt their loyalty in the face of the country are very often found wanting when the time comes for putting their loyalty to the test.

Sir, he has charged the Reform party with disloyalty. His idea of loyalty seems to be loyalty to the particular policy which the hon. gentleman now at the head of affairs has promulgated. Sir, we are loyal; and the hon. gentleman forgets that in charging with disloyalty a party which represents one-half of the population of Canada, he is charging those who sent us here with disloyalty. But Sir, we are not disloyal; we are loyal to the Queen of Canada; we believe in promoting such a policy as will advance Canada's interests; and it is not by shouting loyalty, by professing allegiance to the flag, and by repeating eloquent statements that people are ready to die for their country—it is not by such expressions that we shall be enabled to ascertain whether a man is really loyal or not—whether he is advocating a policy best calculated to promote the best interests of that part of the Empire in which his lot is cast. I do not yield to the hon. gentleman in my loyalty to the Queen; but I will give the answer which was given in the House of Lords by a gentleman who was taunted with disloyalty. He said that while he was loyal to Her Majesty the Queen, it did not follow that he was bound to be loyal to her man servant and her maid-servant, to her ox and her ass. So what the hon. gentleman desires to be understood as loyalty is not loyalty to Her Majesty the Queen, but loyalty to the policy which he supports, and which was advocated and promulgated a few years ago by the hon. gentleman who leads the Government, even though the result of it might be to sever our connection with Great Britain. The hon. gentleman remembers the phrase, that they were prepared to support the National Policy, and if the National Policy in its effects would weaken the tie that bound us to the mother country, so much the worse for British connection. That was the cry, and the hon. gentleman is prepared to support that policy now; and I doubt not that if it ever came to the test, his allegiance to his party would be found superior to his allegiance to his Queen. The hon. gentleman made one reference, and one only, to that branch of the question which we are discussing, comprised under what we call the Budget, which, as I understand it, deals with the condition of the affairs of the country. That reference was to a statement of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) with regard to the taxes paid by the farmers of this country. I have not examined in minute detail the statements submitted by that hon. gentleman to the House. But I will undertake to say that in a matter relating to the farmers of the country, and the taxes paid by them, 99 out of every 100 would prefer the carefully prepared statement made by my hon. friend to the jocular reply made by the hon. member for Centre Toronto. The hon. member for South Huron is in the position of a man who knows what he is talking about, and we know that statements made by such a man are generally to be preferred to the haphazard statements of those who have not a practical knowledge of the question. The hon. gentleman thought he scored a great point when he alleged that the total taxes paid by the farmers, amounting to $28,000,000, were not to be found in the Treasury of the country, and he called on the Minister of Finance to produce the funds that were in default. It is all very well to trifle, and the hon. gentleman can afford to trifle, with the statement of great import made by the hon. member for South Huron; but the hon. member for Huron represents that class that pays these taxes. My hon. friend did not say that they were paid into the exchequer of the country; if they had been, this country would be so much richer, and the evil so much less; but what he said was that this $28,000,000 had been abstracted from the pockets of the farmers and transferred to the pockets of the manufacturers—that while the farmers lost, the exchequer did not benefit; and while the hon. gentleman was able to prove that a statement my hon. friend never made was not true, he failed to show that there was the slightest inaccuracy in the statement he did make, that the farmers paid, on the several articles the hon. gentleman mentioned, and in the proportions he mentioned, every dollar he alleged. I do not intend to go into this trade question at very great length, but coming from the Maritime Provinces I propose to discuss for a few moments the phase of the subject which bears more pertinently on that part of the Dominion than on the western part. I want to call the attention of the House to the statements which have been made with reference to the interprovincial trade, and more particularly to statements made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when addressing the House with reference to this line of railway by means of which the interprovincial trade is carried on. That hon. gentleman made a violent and fierce attack upon my hon. friend from Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and with that attack I have nothing to do. I have no doubt my hon. friend felt very deeply the severe castigation which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries gave him; but I was surprised and I was sorry that, in the heat of his argument, the hon. Minister should have allowed himself to use figures ostensibly taken from the blue-books of this country but which were very inaccurate. I wish to read the statement which the hon. gentleman made on that occasion. He charged that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was a deadly enemy to the Maritime Provinces, that he was always saying something adverse to their interests, that he had made an error in telling this House that there had been an enormous deficit in the working of the Intercolonial Railway last year—a deficit larger than it ought to have been by many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and larger than it was in the year his party was in power. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries challenged that statement, and denied its truth, and said he was prepared to prove by figures that my hon. friend was far astray, and that the deficit on the working of the Intercolonial to-day was greatly less than it was when the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) had charge of the finances of this country. In order that I may not be charged with having in the slightest degree misrepresented that gentleman, let me read to you what he said as reported in Hansard:

"The facts are that, in 1878, Government railways, including the Prince Edward Island Railway, and the Intercolonial Railway, consisted of 913 miles, whereas in 1888, they consisted of 1,185 miles. The facts show that the traffic carried in 1878, was 561,633 tons, while in 1888, owing to the expansion of our internal trade, as pointed out by the Finance Minister, it amounted to 1,348,426 tons. Now, I ask the House again to note that the principle enunciated by the hon. gentleman is that when there is a loss on working that road, it is due to political corruption. In 1878 the loss on working the smaller system and carrying a much smaller quantity of traffic, was $716,083, whereas in 1887-88 the loss was only half, being $363,043. The hon. gentleman has unwittingly given me an opportunity to testify to the marked success in the management of that road and the economy practiced under the present Administration, as contrasted with its management under the Administration of which the hon. gentleman was a member."

That is the statement which the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries made with regard to the carrying power of the Intercolonial and its earnings in 1878, as compared with its mileage and earnings in 1888, and this statement was greeted with vociferous cheering by his friends behind him. I think that the hon. gentleman claimed that it was unanswerable. I am here to tell the hon. gentleman that I examined his statement, that I examined the blue-books and that I cannot find the slightest shadow of foundation for the figures the hon. gentleman has given. The hon. gentleman is hundreds of thousands of dollars astray as regards the loss on the working on the Intercolonial in 1878. He must have let his imagination run away with him, but I hope it was not for the mere purpose of eliciting a few plaudits from his friends behind him. I do not believe he is capable of that, and I cannot understand how he could have allowed himself, for the mere purpose of making a point in a debate, to fall into such a grievous error. True, there was a larger mileage in 1888 than in 1878, but what deduction should be drawn from that? Should we infer from that that the loss should be greater? Not at all. If the Intercolonial, which was incomplete in its connections in 1878, has since been completed in its connections, its working should show a larger surplus in its favor in 1888, when it had all its connections completed, than in 1878, when it was incomplete. What are the facts? I find that the hon. gentleman, in the first place, when he gave the loss upon the Intercolonial Railway, said he was giving it upon both Prince Edward Island and the Intercolonial Railways, but he omitted the loss upon the Prince Edward Island Railway, altogether, in 1888; but when he came to give the loss in 1878, he added the Intercolonial and the Prince Edward Island lines together. Let us look at the statements carefully. In the year 1878, the total mileage of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways was 952 miles. The capital expenditure on both was $39,500,984; the working expenditure, $1,832,873. The earnings that year were $1,514,846, showing a deficit in 1878, on the working of the road, of $318,026. The hon. gentleman has told the House it was $716,000. He was only $400,000 astray. During that year, an arrangement was made by the Government, by which the sum of $543,000, which had been spent the previous year, should be charged over a number of years, and $200,000 was to be charged to 1878. These sums hon. gentlemen now charge to capital account. I have given the figures without adding that $200,000, because it was not expended in that year, and had nothing to do with the working of the road for that year. Suppose you put in the $200,000, and add the money which was not spent, and which—according to the system of bookkeeping inaugurated by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), when he was leading the Government—was to be charged to that year, you would then have only $518,000 as the loss upon the year's working instead of $716,000, as stated by the hon. gentleman. Now, if you add to that the loss upon the working of the road, the interest upon the capital invested in that road—and I have calculated it at four per cent., one half below what it should be—the total loss on the Intercolonial Railway since 1878 was $1,918,000. Adding the loss in the working expenses and the interest on the capital expenditure paid in the construction of the road, the loss will approach very nearly $2,000,000. We will see what it was in 1888. The hon. gentleman says they made such great improvements, and mind you, he says, whilst the loss was so much in 1878 and so much less in 1888, that shows less political corruption under our regime than under yours. If the reverse were the case the hon. gentleman must necessarily acknowledge more political corruption under his Government than under the previous one. In 1888, the mileage of the Intercolonial had increased to 1,110 miles. The capital expenditure, leaving out the Eastern Extension of the road altogether—because I did not take that into account in the statement of the expenditure, in other years—but including the Prince Edward Island, was $48,887,153, or an increase in those years of $9,337,000 upon the capital expenditure. Hon. gentlemen know well that from Session to Session, capital expenditure—sums of hundreds of thousands of dollars have been charged by hon. gentlemen opposite to capital expenditure, which should have been charged to mere working expenses. Sums which were charged by the Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), when they were in power, in regard to works of a similar character, to working expenses, are now charged to capital. The gross expenditure in 1888 of these two roads amounted to $3,506,081; the earnings were $3,076,146, leaving a deficit during that year of $430,935 upon the working of that system of railway. The hon. gentleman stated, when he addressed the House, that the loss in that year was only $343,000, so that he is more than $80,000 astray on that one point. Take then the deficit in 1878 at $318,026, and the deficit in 1888 at $430,935, and you have an increase in the deficit of $112,908 under the Government of these hon. gentleman compared with the previous Administration. And this is notwithstanding the fact that they have a completed road, running in all directions, with connections everywhere. If you add to the actual deficit in the working expenses of the road the interest upon the capital employed in its construction of over $48,000,000, at 4 per cent., you make a total loss on the Intercolonial roads, of $2,306,421, or an increase in the loss in 1888 over that in 1878 of nearly half a million of money, or, to be accurate, $463,395. That is the result of the working of the Intercolonial Railway under the management of the hon. gentlemen. That is the amount which it has cost the country more than it cost under the economical management of the Government of my hon. friend from East York, and those figures are the most damning evidence of the mismanagement and corruption which exists in every branch of that road, centering in that centre of corruption, Moncton, and extending all over the line. It is known that the road is run as a political road, run in the interests of the political party to which the hon. gentleman belongs, run not to develop the resources of this country, but run to put money in the pockets of the Spring Hill Mines shareholders at the cost of the farming community of this country. I wish hon. gentlemen, when they reflect on these figures, to remark that I do not charge one dollar in the statement of these sums which we say is improperly charged to capital account, and should be charged to working expenses. We take it simply as they have charged it, to working expenses, and, on that ground alone, there is a deficit during last year in the running expenses alone of over $430,000. What is the hon. gentleman doing now? He speaks of the increased tonnage carried over that road. Why is there an increased tonnage? Do they pretend to say that they are carrying coal and other stuff at paying rates? Not at all. They are charging paying rates, according to their estimate, for everything the farmer has to carry, but, when they carry the coal of the Spring Hill Mines, they are charging only three-tenths of a cent per ton per mile, instead of three-fourths of a cent, which is a paying rate.

Mr. TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman advocate the raising of that rate?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I advocate that, if you reduce the rates on the Intercolonial Railway in the interests of one class of the community, you must reduce the rates as far as the farmer is concerned in the same proportion. This only accentuates still more the difference between the policies of the two parties. We are determined, and always have been determined, that the public works and the public policy of this country shall be so conducted as that it shall bring about the best results to the whole farming and commercial interests of the country. These gentlemen say: No, our policy shall be devoted to enriching a particular class, to granting favors to that class in order that they may become rich, at the expense of whom? At the expense of the great tax-paying class of the country. That is the difference between the policies of the two parties. It comes again to the classes against the masses. We are for the masses; they are for the classes; and this is a very good instance of the difference. It is most interesting, when you consider this question of the Intercolonial Railway, to review for a little while the policy of the present Government in regard to that road. We have had for a little while the hon. gentleman the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who represents the county of Pictou, through which county a branch of the Intercolonial Railway runs. When the last general election took place, my hon. friend did not feel very secure in his seat. Just before that election took place, the hon. gentleman's friends introduced a Bill into this Parliament to authorise the expenditure of a large sum of money to build a branch of the Intercolonial Railway through his county, in order to save the hon. gentleman's seat. What is the fact? The Intercolonial Railway runs from the town of Truro to Fisher's Landing, which is just opposite Pictou and the terminus of the boats from Prince Edward Island. The then Minister of Railways introduced a Bill to run a line from Stellarton, on the Intercolonial, to the town of Pictou, one mile from Fisher's Landing. That Bill was introduced on the 9th April, 1886. The Minister of Railways told us that the distance would be 18 miles, and that the cost of the branch would be $300,000. When that Bill was introduced, I combated it. I said it was not run in the right place, if they were going to build it at all, and further, that, from information I had received from those who understood the character of the country through which the road was to run, it could not be built for anything like the money. The Minister of Railways told us then—and I am now using his own words—that we did not know what we were talking about. I asked, if they had had surveys made or proper estimates, and they did not answer and could not tell. They passed that Bill through the House, and pledged the country to its construction, stating that it would only cost $300,000, though they had not taken the ordinary precaution to have surveys made or to ascertain what it would really cost. Well, now we have had surveys, and we find, although you are not through the expenditure yet, that already this road has cost $535,603; and it will cost upwards of $600,000. And for what? In order to build a line to compete with our own line, and running for its whole distance nearly parallel with it, a line 14 miles in length to reach the town of Pictou. Does the hon. gentleman hope that this line is going to pay or that it is going to develop any trade? Not at all. I believe it was introduced from the estimable view, from a Tory standpoint, of securing the seat of the hon. gentleman from Pictou. I desire to show the House, by some other illustrations, the absolute recklessness with which the Government of the day have proceeded in regard to the Intercolonial Railway, in building branch lines everywhere. In 1882, they determined to build a branch at St. Charles. It was to be 15 miles long, and we were told it would cost $536,000; and one half of the sum that was appropriated was for the cost of a steam ferry to carry the cars from the wharf across to Quebec. One of the inducements tendered to this House to induce it to vote that money, in 1882, viz, the steam ferry, never has been constructed, not a dollar has been laid out upon it. In 1883 the Minister of Railways came down and stated that the steam ferry was practically abandoned, but he wanted the House to grant him $130,000 more to build the St. Charles Branch. The House having voted $536,000 the previous year had to finish the work, and they gave the Minister the money. Sir, he gave the House to understand then—for I have turned up the Hansard and looked at his words—that the money he was asking was sufficient to enable them to finish the road. The other day we put a question across the House and asked what the St. Charles Branch cost, and that road, which was estimated to cost $336,000—$200,000 besides was voted for the steam ferry which never was built—under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite, has cost this country $1,375,890, for a length of fifteen miles. Sir, the hon. gentleman came down a few years ago stating that the Government had a great scheme for the construction of another road, another branch of the Intercolonial Railway, but this time it was not to elect the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) it was to elect the High Commissioner, and the hon. gentleman who is now Governor of Nova Scotia. Well, they came down and wanted to build a road, and I want to charge here that Parliament has not been honestly dealt with in the statements submitted to it to induce it to vote money for the construction of that road; I want to charge, not only that they have voted in ignorance, but that they have voted under direct misrepresentation—for I say there was a misrepresentation—it was on a misstatement of the facts of the case that this House was induced to vote this money. Now, Sir, what is this Oxford and New Glasgow road?—this road running from Oxford to New Glasgow, a distance, I suppose, of some 70 odd miles—I am speaking generally. In 1882 Sir Charles Tupper, who was then Minister of Railways, proposed to this House that they should vote a subsidy of $224,000 to a company which was going to construct that road. The road was called the Montreal and European Short Line, and it was to be built by the end of 1883. When Sir Charles Tupper moved this House to vote that subsidy he declared solemnly that he had looked into the matter very carefully, and he pledged himself to the country that the proposed subsidy of $3,200 per mile would enable that road to be built. Sir, the hon. gentleman was very positive in his assurances. He was asked time and again, was he perfectly certain that the money would do it—because the House was pledging itself to a very large expense; and he pledged himself he was certain he had taken every precaution, and hon. gentlemen know the positiveness with which he can make assurances. Well, in the summer of 1883, that company that the hon. gentleman had assured himself in 1882 was going to construct this road with $3,200 a mile, burst up and became bankrupt, and the road stopped. In 1885, this House was asked to vote $125,000 to pay unpaid claims of sub-contractors and workmen on that road. The House voted the money, and in 1886, just before the general election, when it was necessary to capture votes in Cumberland and Colchester Counties, they came down and got another $25,000 to pay the balance of some claims which the hon. gentleman presented to the House. Well, after paying all this money, the road was not built. But in 1887, just before the election, the Government proposed a resolution to construct that road as a Government work, stating the supposed cost to be a million dollars in addition to the appropriation already made, and making the total sum to be paid by this country one million and a quarter of dollars. On what statement was this House induced to vote that money? The House was induced to assent to that on the positive and reiterated assertion, not only of Sir Charles Tupper, who was then Minister of Railways, but of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that the distance between Oxford and New Glasgow would be shortened from 40 to 45 miles. Not once, not twice, but four or five times, during the debate, in answer to questions put upon this side of the House by those who had reason to believe that the statement was incorrect, the hon. gentleman repeated it over and over again; and this House, on the solemn assertion of the hon. gentleman, and under the full belief that they were voting money for the construction of a road which would shorten the great Intercolonial Railway down to the sea by 45 miles, voted that million and a quarter of dollars. Well, Sir, last Session a vote of $750,000 was passed, and when the then Minister of Railways proposed it, I asked him: "Do you persist in the statement that it is going to shorten the line by 45 miles?" The hon. gentleman said he did not know. I said to him: I was informed that it would not shorten it four miles. The hon. gentleman said he did not know, but that he would bring down the papers. Now, what is the fact? The distance from Oxford to Truro, upon the present line is 46 miles, and from Truro to New Glasgow 43 miles, making in all 87 miles. We have a fully equipped road, paid for, running between those two places. This road from Oxford to New Glasgow is a parallel road. The distance is: Oxford Junction to Brown's Point, 72 miles; from Brown's Point to New Glasgow, 15, making 87 miles, or a saving of two miles alone on the length of this road, for which this country has been asked to pay a million and a quarter of money. Sir, hon. gentlemen talk about Nova Scotia sending a contingent to support the present Government. Do they think that it was because the people of Nova Scotia believe in their policy? The hon. gentleman knows better. He knows they have secured a network of roads all over these counties; he knows that they have expended millions in the past four years in the construction of those roads—and I have mentioned to you one at an expenditure of a million and a quarter, for a road parallel to our existing roads, and not shortening the distance more than a nominal quantity—for the purpose of spreading money through the district to elect men to support the present Government. Why, Sir, do I make such statements as I have made—for they cannot be contradicted, I challenge contradiction—but to open the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite? They saw this great European line that was going to be constructed with the object of shortening the distance 45 miles. Hon. gentlemen had dust thrown in their eyes. The distance was not shortened, but they were voting money to build parallel lines to their own road. Sir, it was the same way with another expenditure they wanted us to make, the Chignecto Ship Railway. In the first place, a commissioner was appointed to consider the feasibility of constructing the canal from the Bay of Fundy to the Gulf of St. Lawrence. That commissioner reported that the canal could be constructed for five or six millions, and I believe that the Government for a moment did entertain the idea that it was possible to construct it. But on examination it was found that it would cost over ten million dollars and the project was abandoned. Afterwards they decided to go on with this ship railway scheme, and Sir Charles Tupper came down here and induced the House to agree to a subsidy of $150,000 a year for 21 years. Subsequently we extended the time and altered the terms to $175,000 for 20 years, or in other words, the credit of this country has been pledged to the tune of three and a half millions of money for the construction of the Chignecto Ship Railway, and mind, the Maritime Provinces are charged with that expense as if it was some benefit conferred upon them. Well, Sir, I wonder if the hon. gentleman ever discovered a practical shipping man in the Maritime Provinces who did not denounce this scheme as a fraud. What benefit is that going to be? What ships are going to carry on trade between St. John and the Gulf of St. Lawrence? The hon. gentleman knows that the whole thing is done that the Government may have the expenditure of so much more money, and the hon. gentleman has never yet been able to find a practical ship-master or ship-owner who was not prepared to denounce the whole thing as a fraud. That is where the money goes, and we in the Maritime Provinces thoroughly understand it, and by letting this light in we can better understand the enormous deficits that annually occur in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. I will now leave that branch of the case, and will refer for a few moments to some statements made by the hon. gentleman with respect to the commercial prosperity of the country. Sir, I am not going to present many facts or figures to the House, but I will submit a few figures, and I do so because they show to my mind that the charge made on this side of the House of reckless extravagance on the part of the Government, has not been made without adequate foundation. Sir, we have had Estimates brought down by the Finance Minister this year showing that he intends to tax the people to the tune of $31,025,000; $23,900,000 he expects to obtain from Customs, and $7,125,000 from Excise. In 1878, the total taxes taken from the people were $17,841,000 and if you add the deficit of that year $1,128,000 you find the taxes required to carry on the Government of the country amounted to $18,969,000, and yet hon. gentlemen to-day require $12,000,000 of extra taxes for the coming year. They told us then when we went to the electors that too much money was being expended in administering public affairs, and yet this year they require $12,000,000 more. They have raised the duty on goods entered for consumption from 14.03 per cent. in 1878 to 21.57 per cent. in 1888, and have raised the expenditure from $24,455,381 to $36,718,494 last year, or an increase of over $12,000,000. These facts are sufficient to satisfy me that they require some more explanation than has been given by hon. gentlemen opposite. Shouts of loyalty are not going to answer figures of that character. But let us see whether the condition of affairs in the Maritime Provinces is as satisfactory as hon. gentlemen opposite contend. We have had most rosy pictures painted by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) and other hon. members of the commercial prosperity of that and other portions of the Dominion. I was astounded at the hon. gentleman's statements. Has the hon. gentleman been in St. John? Does he think there is commercial prosperity there?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Minister of Finance is the only one who can find it. I have been there, and I have been told by gentlemen resident there that the very opposite is the case, that there is commercial atrophy, that commercial depression exists there as it exists in the other commercial cities of the Maritime Provinces. Does the hon. gentleman find it in Halifax? Does he find it in Charlottetown? Has the value of real estate increased in those centres? Are our warehouses filled with goods as was the case formerly? Are our ship-building and ship-owning interests increasing year by year? The report of the Minister of Marine did not contain this year the annual statement of the tonnage built and the tonnage on the registry books of this country; but I was enabled by his kindness on making personal application to him to obtain the figures, and I will trouble the House for a moment in regard to this matter of shipping in the Maritime Provinces. I find, in 1888, there were upon the registry books of the Dominion on 31st December, 7,142 vessels, of the tonnage of 1,089,642; in 1887, 7,173 vessels, of the tonnage of 1,130,247 tons, or a decline of 40,604 tons in one year. Let me compare 1878 with 1888. In 1878 we had 7,469 vessels, of the tonnage of 1,383,015; in 1888 7,142 vessels, of the tonnage of 1,089,642, or a decline of 293,373 tons. Estimating the tonnage value at $30 per ton, the loss in the value of shipping owned by Canada in ten years is $3,801,190. In 1878 we built 106,796 tons of shipping which, at $45 per ton, gave $4,815,000. This year we built the paltry tonnage of 22,693 tons, of a value of $1,021,000, or a loss in the production of shipping in 1888, as compared with 1878, of $3,790,000. Do these figures show nothing; does the hon. gentleman pretend that these particular interests have increased in value or have improved, or have they gone back? Let the hon. gentleman point out the branches in which prosperity prevails in the Maritime Provinces. It is true that one or two more sugar refineries have been established; but I doubt if that is any great benefit to the community, and I think many people who thought they would be a benefit are now beginning very much to doubt whether such is the case or not. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) drew a parallel between the prosperity of the Maritime Provinces and the prosperity of the State of Maine. He said that the Maritime Provinces were more prosperous in some respects than was the State of Maine. Well, I have this to say with regard to the comparison the hon. gentleman made, that I do not think it is a fair one in this regard: I claim that the Maritime Provinces are more fruitful, that their resources—either mineral, agricultural or fishing—are greater and more valuable than those of the State of Maine, and that, accordingly, they should be more prosperous. When you consider the fishing interests of the Maritime Provinces, the wonderful mining industries, the fertility of the soil of Prince Edward Island, and the Annapolis Valley, and other parts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, we should, with such rich Provinces, and Provinces so favored by nature, have improved and progressed more rapidly than the State of Maine. But the fact of the matter is that the hon. gentleman took good care only to make a comparison in some respects. I am not going to allege that the State of Maine is improving more than are the Maritime Provinces, but I will give the hon. gentleman one item that he may think over. Hon. gentlemen opposite have alleged that the savings banks deposits afford an index of prosperity; I am not going to say whether that is a true index or a false one, but hon. gentlemen opposite have always adopted it, and I suppose they are prepared to adopt it in this instance. I find in the State of Maine in 1886-87, the amount deposited in the savings banks of that State was $37,215,071, or $57 for every man, woman and child in the State of Maine, while in the entire Dominion of Canada, if you choose to put the population at 5,000,000, the whole amount was $40,832,000, in both the Dominion savings banks and the Post Office savings banks, or $8 for every man, woman and child in Canada as against $57 in the State of Maine. I am not adopting the argument that the amount of deposits in the savings banks is an evidence of the prosperity of the country; but hon. gentlemen opposite never cease to adopt and proclaim it. I give them that fact in answer to the figures the hon. gentleman has quoted with reference to the relative prosperity of the State of Maine and the Maritime Provinces. We have had the statement made here from time to time, that this country is very prosperous and gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House have said that we are so prosperous and so happy and so contented that we do not want any change at all. Let us go to the North-West for a moment and see the condition of things there. The other day the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) gave us a most glowing account of that country and of its possibilities.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman opposite from Regina gave us the same account of the undeveloped resources of that country, and he pictured what the future was going to bring forth. The hon. gentleman from Selkirk told me that he was going to give me a shot across the floor of the House and I waited very patiently for the shot to come, but the only shot that he gave us was the statement that some firm in Ontario had sold $30,000 worth of buggies to Prince Edward Island. I do not see anything in that, but I want to ask the hon. gentleman how much Ontario bought from Prince Edward Island in return? What we are interested in in the Maritime Provinces is to know how to dispose of our surplus products. We are looking for a market and we do not find it in Canada, and that is why we support the policy embodied in the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). In this great North-West with its magnificent resources of all kinds and descriptions, its wonderful climate, its illimitable possibilities, to use the words of my hon. friend opposite, how is it that it does not improve? What is the reason it does not fill out with population? I am prepared to accept fully and unreservedly the statement the hon. gentleman has made, for I believe that Canada has in that great North-West a wonderful possession. I believe, Sir, its resources can hardly be exaggerated in the English language. I believe they are great and vast. I believe its climate is fine but I want to know why, in the name of common sense, with this railway running through that territory and with all its wonderful resources, that population is not going in there? I want to know also why it is that when population goes in there it does not stay? We, on this side of the House, have charged that this sad result is in a large measure due to the false policy the Government of this country adopted a few years ago. They had grand opportunities as has been pointed out time and time again with which to lay the foundations of a great country, if they had proceeded as they ought to have proceeded with prudence and caution. But they proceeded with absolute recklessness, and it is on record to this day, and I do not think that any hon. member will deny it, that the manner in which they attempted to open up the country has proved a failure, and that their policy was based on false lines. They wanted to make this fine country the great hunting ground of the capitalists and the speculators, while we on the other hand wanted to make it the home of the millions. I understand that there are only 118,000 white people in the whole of Manitoba and the North-West by the last census taken. I want hon. gentlemen opposite to tell me what is the cause of this failure? It is not because of want of natural advantages in the country, and it is not because of the climate, for both are all that can be desired. Then it must be the fault of the Government. It is not many years ago since they brought about by their misgovernment, a rebellion in that country, which cost us some six or eight millions of money, and which threw back the country eight or ten years, if not more. What do I find to-day? They talk about the policy of this Government developing that country, but I will take a picture of its present position from their own blue-book—and, remember, I am not going to hazard any statement of my own, because I would be told by hon. gentlemen opposite that I was decrying the country—but I take the statement published by the Government itself, and spread broadcast over the world, which is to the effect that the emigrants they are paying to bring into that country are leaving it by the thousands, if we can believe the statement of their own agent and representative. What says the agent at Winnipeg, Mr. Graham, in his report to the Government Emigration Office, which, to give it greater prominence, they embody in the report of the Minister of Agriculture, and circulate all through this country as well as abroad. He says:

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

"Many will be surprised to learn, that the number of actual settlers, in our Province and Territories, has not been as large as expected, neither has the amount of wealth brought in by those who have come, been as considerable as that of former years. This may appear strange, when we consider the many efforts that were put forth by the different organisations, to induce immigration to the Province and neighboring Territories, but it is nevertheless a fact, that, out of the many thousands who left the Mother Country, ostensibly for the North-West, a large number of them found occupation and homes on the Pacific coast, and, I regret to say, a large majority of these are on the American side.

"I came in contact with great numbers of people, who were, as they said, pushing through to British Columbia, having been advised by British and continental steamship and transportation agents, that work and opportunities for investment were never greater than during the present year. On arriving at Vancouver, a very active thriving young town, but, owing to its comparatively recent origin capable of supplying employment to a limited number, hundreds of these people were disappointed, and sooner than remain there in idleness, took the steamboat for Port Townsend, Seattle, Tacoma and other points in Washington Territory, Oregon, Arizona, and Northern California. During a visit to these territories, I saw hundreds of people, that I had met while they were en route through Winnipeg, many of them old Canadian residents, and others new arrivals direct from Europe. When I questioned them why they went over to the American, instead of remaining on the Canadian side, their reply was, in substance, what I have already stated, namely, that on their arrival at Vancouver and Victoria, they found the demand for labor limited, the facilities for active agriculture, with small capital, few, and, not caring to return, they went farther west, as they found it cost less money to do so. I took a keen interest in this matter, and interviewed the pursers of the local steamboats from whom I gathered information that would lead me to believe that the steamboats plying between Vancouver, Victoria, San Francisco and the American ports at the head of Puget Sound, carried very little less than ten thousand immigrants, most of whom left Europe with the intention of remaining in British possessions.

"Strenuous efforts have been made both by myself and staffs as well as others who are interested in immigration, to cause these people to remain but they preferred to follow out their own plans.

"I merely mention this as an illustration of the fast increasing difficulties attending the efforts of your agents to aid in the successful settlement of the large area of vacant lands in this Province and adjoining Territories."

Sir, that is a sad page in Canadian history, and I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite that they would be giving more evidence of their patriotism if they devoted their energies to determine why it is that such a sad state of facts exist, rather than by pouring out torrents of vituperation at hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. That policy of theirs with regard to the Opposition is child's play. The day has gone by when you can make the electorate believe that those thousands of people fly from this country because of any statement made by the members of the Opposition. It is nonsense, it is not true, and it is opposed to the facts, as your own agent reports them. There is something wrong in the political management of the North-West and it has been wrong for the last 10 years. You have tried to make the North-West the happy hunting ground of the boodler, and the result is you have driven the settlers out of the country. You have brought about a civil war which, as I have said, has retarded the country for ten or twelve years, perhaps, and you have squandered millions of money in paying the cost of that war, which ought to be paid properly out of your own pockets. Sir, I believe that if a more liberal policy to the North-West were adopted, a policy which would allow its great resources to be developed—if the policy proclaimed by the hon. member for East York (Mr Mackenzie), when he was in power, had been continued by hon. gentlemen opposite—instead of there being only 100,000 people in the North-West to-day, you would have had nearly, if not fully, half a million. Hon. gentlemen crow and cheer, but let them place their finger on any phase of their policy connected with populating the North-West or developing its resources, which will redound to their credit. It is a sad chapter in the history of the North-West, and I believe it will not be written in proper lines until the Liberal party come into power. Now, before I sit down, I want to say one word with reference to the amendment submitted by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Last year, Sir, a similar amendment embodying the policy of the Liberal party, was submitted to the House; and I notice, this year, somewhat of a change in the language and the arguments used by hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to the proposition. Last year, Sir, the burden of their song was that we could not get what we asked, and there was no use in our asking for it. This year they say, they do not want it. We have had speeches made by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson), the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry), the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and other hon. gentlemen opposite, proving what? Proving that this country would be better off without extended trade with the United States, that we had better trade among ourselves, that we had better swap jack-knives and we will get rich, and that we do not want to extend our trade beyond the border at all. These gentlemen prophesy dire effects from the policy we propose, and they tell us that we are all wrong as to the blessings which occurred to this country under the old Reciprocity Treaty. They devoted themselves for hours to minimising the blessings that flowed over this country during the period that free trade in natural products existed between Canada and the United States; and they said: Even if you do get reciprocity, you need not expect that the good times will come again. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), who, I regret to see, is not in his place, stated that the fact that men's views differed very widely depended very much on whether they were supporting or opposing the Government. Sir, it is true; and there never was a more notable instance of that than is afforded by the hon. gentleman himself. I think I remember when he supported a policy and a party almost diametrically opposed to the policy and the party he supports now. He takes a most roseate view of the condition of affairs in the country to-day; and why should he not? He is president and the largest shareholder in a railway running from Shediac to Cape Tormentine, which has been subsidised by the Government to the extent of $113,000, and it is no wonder that he takes a roseate view of the country with that subsidy in his pocket; but the people who have not the subsidy do not take the same roseate view. He says our condition is sufficiently prosperous, and we should not desire any change; and he threatens, and so does the hon. member for Kent, an exodus of loyalists, if we bring about a commercial union with the United States. These gentlemen are so loyal that they do not want to remain in this country an hour after commercial union is brought about. I do not think the country would suffer; there is not one of them that would not go to the United States to-morrow if he could better his condition. Hundreds of thousands of our people, unfortunately, have gone to the United States to better their condition; they are going every day, and we propose a policy embodied in the resolution before the House—for a disloyal purpose? Not at all; but for the purpose of bringing about commercial prosperity in the country, and keeping our people at home. But Sir, it does not at all follow, because these gentlemen are so very strong in their denunciation of our policy to-day, that they will not whip round and support that policy if they get the word of command from their leader. We have had instances of more extraordinary changes than that. I remember, last year, when we were discussing the statutory offer made to the United States, and when it was contended that in trees and fruits which had been admitted free of duty by the United States, we should reciprocate under the statutory offer, a debate arose in this House; and what did we hear? We heard hon. gentlemen opposite denouncing that policy with more vigor than they denounce unrestricted reciprocity to-day; and we heard their sentiments cheered to the echo by their friends behind them; even Ministers rose in their places and said that it was preposterous. I remember very well a speech made by no less a person than the Minister of Justice, in which he denounced the proposition as almost a disloyal one. I will read to you from Hansard what he said—I am quoting from his speech on page 492. This speech was made in answer to a proposition, emanating from this side of the House, that this country should reciprocate to the same measure as the United States had gone under the statutory offer:

"Now, the hon. gentleman has spoken of this as being a statutory offer, an offer on the part of this Parliament which involves a breach of faith if this Government should fail to carry it out to the full extent. Does the hon. gentleman mean to contend—because his argument goes that far—that this statutory offer—not only including the clause which has been brought to the notice of the House, because what is called the statutory offer embraces half-a-dozen other offers, and looks to the admission of free fish, coal and various other products into the United States—does the hon. gentleman mean to contend that it is a breach of faith on the part of the Government of Canada, even as to that part of the statutory offer, to decline to allow the United States to say: 'You have made that offer; we will take portions of it, and enact those which please us, and which appear favorable to our people, and we will shut the door in the faces of your people in respect to all the other portions?' I can only say that, in my humble judgment, if the Crown, having discretion, uses it in that way, it would use it to betray the interests of the people of Canada."

Sir, one week or a fortnight afterwards the hon. gentleman came down, as a member of a Government, tendering to this House the very policy to adopt which he had declared a week before, amid the plaudits of his followers, would be a betrayal of the interests of the people of Canada. I do not at all fear that because the hon. gentleman was fierce and loud in his denunciations of our policy to-day, he may not be one of the loudest advocates of it if he gets the word of command. We know that it has been so in the past, and history will probably repeat itself. The hon. gentleman, as I said, attempted to minimise the effects which flowed over this country from the old Reciprocity Treaty; and one after another hon. gentlemen declared that the enormous increase in the trade between Canada and the States was due, to a very large extent if not altogether, to the civil war which prevailed in the United States; and they said, there is no civil war now, and it does not follow, because you had an enormous increase in your trade before, that if you have reciprocity again you will have a similar increase. But the hon. gentleman ought to know that for the first eight years under the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 there was no civil war in the United States at all, and that the trade between this country and the United States during those eight years leaped up by bounds from the pitiful sum of $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 at which it stood when the treaty began to the sum of $84,000,000 when the treaty expired. We were told by the hon. gentlemen opposite that the Hon. George Brown was a patriot and that we would do well to imitate his example. Well, I find the Hon. George Brown was the man who attempted to negotiate a treaty with the United States to bring about reciprocity of trade, not only in the articles to which the old Reciprocity Treaty extended, but in one hundred and twenty other articles besides, and in advocating that treaty, the Hon. George Brown who is now held up as a patriot—and I may remark in passing that all Liberal statesmen are canonised as patriots by the Tories after they die, though denounced during life—the Hon. George Brown called attention to the advancement and the prosperity of this country, during the existence of the old treaty, in the following words—I am now quoting from his memorandum:—

“The grand fact remains that under the operation of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, the aggregate interchange of commodities between the Republic and the Provinces to promote which the treaty was concluded, rose from an annual average of $13,230,763 in the previous eight years to $33,492,754 gold currency in the first year of its existence; to $42,942,754 gold currency in the second year of its existence, to $50,339,770 gold, in its third year; and to no less a sum than $84,070,955 at war prices, in its 13th year.”

Why, there was no war during the first three years of the existence of the treaty, and the traffic had risen from $14,000,000 to $50,000,000 in that space of time; yet the hon. gentleman dares to say that we cannot hope for a recurrence of that prosperity or an increase similar to the increase then. Perhaps not to the same extent, but no doubt when one looks at the occasion of that increase of tariff, when one looks at the enormous increase of population to-day compared with then, one must conclude that if we could have unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, prosperity would flow over this country in a ratio equal at least to that during the existence of the old Reciprocity Treaty. It is of no use for hon. gentlemen to state to those who were alive at the time, and remember the prosperity that existed between 1854 and 1866, that free trade relations will not bring about prosperity to the people of this country. Why, in the Maritime Provinces he would be laughed at. I can remember, when, in the little Province from which I come, during the existence of the treaty, every creek and harbor was filled with small vessels to carry away the produce of the Island to its best market, and bring back the cheap goods we required. The barter and exchange was profitable to us and to those with whom we exchanged, and the same result will take place to-morrow under similar circumstances. And the same rule which applied to the Island will be found applicable to all the Provinces of the Dominion. I have no doubt about the rapid development of the North-West, if the barriers which restrict its trade with the country lying to the south were removed. I have no doubt that the prosperity of Ontario would be duplicated if it could get freer trade with the

United States, and the same effect no doubt would be felt by the Province of Quebec and the others. What are we told by hon. gentlemen opposite? We are told, you are not likely to get this. Why? Because Mr. W. H. Murray—Adirondack Murray, as he is popularly called—has published a pamphlet in which he says the people of the United States do not want reciprocity but want political union. Who is Mr. Murray? Is he a representative of the people? Is he responsible to the people? Is he authorised by the people of the United States to speak for them? No; it is absurd for the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry), and four or five others, to quote the ipse dixit or opinion of Mr. Murray, a private citizen, as representing the opinion of the American people. He is in no sense a representative man. If we want to know further whether it is possible or probable we may get free trade relations with the United States, we must go to those who hold responsible positions in the Legislature of that country and in the presidential Cabinet. We know what the late Secretary of State said. His letter has been quoted time and again, this year and last. He said he was in favor of freer interchange of products between Canada and the United States, and that his intention was not in any way to affect the political independence of Canada. He wanted free trade unrestricted. He did not propose that our political freedom or independence should be altered or endangered, but he wanted a freer interchange of products between both countries. And why do we not get it? Why was he not able to carry that out? Let me give you the answer, not in my own words, but in those of the High Commissioner. If you had not driven the people of the United States to the mood in which they were when Sir Charles Tupper went down to try and carry out the offer that Mr. Bayard made him, you might have had that offer carried out, if not to the full extent, in a modified degree. But Sir Charles said we could not carry it out. Why? Because our policy towards the people of the United States, instead of being a kindly considered policy calculated to develop kindly feelings, had driven that country to desperation. They were in no mood for a treaty; and much as Sir Charles desired to promote this unrestricted reciprocity scheme, we were powerless in the face of 60,000,000 irritated people.

Mr. FOSTER. Did Mr. Bayard say that?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Sir Charles said what I am going to read to you, and the hon. gentleman will see whether I have not quoted him fairly.

Mr. FOSTER. What did Mr. Bayard say?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am pointing out what Sir Charles said. He said:

“They said, secondly, that not only was that the case, but such was the expression of public men in regard to Canada, and the treatment by Canada of their fishermen, that if to-morrow any relaxation of the commerce of the United States was made by an Act of Congress, it would contain a clause excepting Canada from its operations, so as to deny us its advantage. But they say our policy is proclaimed on the housetops, you will read it in the President's speech, you will see it everywhere, our policy is as far as we can to make the natural products that come into the country free, and what lies in the way of that policy is this irritation connected with the fishery question. If we can solve that, if we can take that out of the way, you will find at once that our own independent policy, the policy of the United States on this question of commercial intercourse will be such as to produce the most intimate commercial relations again with the Dominion of Canada.”

When you can remove the irritation which these gentlemen opposite, by their mad, insensate and insane policy, have created during the last ten years, the result will be to produce the most intimate commercial relations between Canada and the United States. I do not suppose that Sir Charles Tupper came here retailing that which was not true, and if we did not succeed, these hon. gentlemen can charge the want of success to their own policy and to the results of that policy in producing ill-feeling and irritation among the American people. We are to-day differently situated and occupy a different position from that we occupied last year. We were making, then, a proposal to the people of the United States. Up to that time there had been no response, at any rate from the legislature of that country. Congress had not expressed its views on the matter, but since then Congress has reciprocated and passed a resolution which hon. gentlemen correctly call Mr. Hitt's commercial union resolution. Although the lines upon which Mr. Hitt would like to proceed are altogether different from the lines on which we would like to proceed, the end which he seeks to obtain—unrestricted freedom of commercial intercourse—is the same end as that which we are seeking. The means are different, but the end is the same. If two great legislatures like the Legislature of this Dominion and the Congress of the United States have the common view of obtaining that which would be a boon to the people of the two great countries, and only differ as to the means, what would be the course that any onlooker would say was a reasonable one to take? It would be that those two countries should send commissioners to meet and consider the situation, and consider whether any course could be adopted which would solve the difficulties existing between them. Perhaps, if our resolution were adopted, and commissioners were sent to Washington to meet commissioners appointed by the United States, having the same end in view, our scheme in its entirety might not be adopted, and it is possible that their scheme in its entirety might not be adopted; but what I charge the hon. gentleman with is that they are opposed to the end and not simply to the means; that they are opposed to the obtaining of reciprocity at all because that may damage the special interests that they have been put into power to protect. They will not even appoint commissioners to find a way by which the great object we have can be obtained as between the two countries. Mr. Hitt, in bringing forward his resolution, and referring to the resolution which was lost in this House last Session but was supported by 67 members, said:

"It is time we gave some assurance that such powerful movement of such immense consequences interests our people, and will be considered in as liberal and practical a spirit on our side."

It may be that, in the absence of negotiation and in the absence of means to thoroughly understand our view of that matter, they have adopted a policy of commercial union. Is it fixed for all time that they will not modify that view, that they will not adopt the views which we have in favor of unrestricted reciprocity as against commercial union? This country has not heard, and it will not hear, from hon. gentleman on the other side one word in favor of, or in sympathy with, the end which we seek to obtain, or in favor of any other reciprocity than a reciprocity which the hon. gentlemen themselves say can never be obtained. Therefore, I charge them with being opposed to any freer trade relations with the United States, because they think these freer trade relations will interfere with, or perhaps hamper some of the special interests which they have to advance. Representing, as I do, a district of 60,000 people, I am in favor of this resolution with both hands, and a large majority in my Province will support it and will vote for it at the next election. The people of Prince Edward Island know very well that, if that is adopted, commercial prosperity will take the place of the commercial atrophy which now exists throughout that Province.

Mr. MADILL. I shall only deal with one remark which has been made by my hon. friend on the other side (Mr. Davies), leaving the questions of the Intercolonial Railway and other matters of that kind to be dealt with by the members from the far East. I was struck very much with the remark that he made, that he would place very few facts and figures before the House, and I must compliment him on having kept his word, as he has made up for the want of facts by a great number of figures and assertions. As some seventy speeches have been delivered in this House, last Session, on this question, followed by a large number during the present Session, the arguments pro and con are pretty well exhausted, but, as I did not contribute to the septuagint version of last Session, I trust the House will bear with me for a short time while I refer to some points but lightly touched on by previous speakers. The term unrestricted reciprocity seems a misnomer, for although not restricted to natural products, it is the most restricted reciprocity possible—free trade restricted to the United States, with a tariff barrier against the rest of the world. I see virtually no distinction between "commercial union" and "unrestricted reciprocity" as to results. With commercial union, our tariff would be fixed at Washington, at the dictation of Americans, and on the same basis as their tariff against Great Britain and the rest of the world. Our people would be subjugated to the dictates of a foreign power, and the ties which bind us to the mother land would be severed. Unrestricted reciprocity would have the same effect, for although in that case, Canadians would arrange the tariff, that tariff would have to be as high as the tariff of the United States, otherwise the United States would have none of it. They are too astute not to understand that if our tariff against foreign goods was even 5 or 10 per cent. lower than theirs, foreign goods would seek Canadian ports and replace American goods in Canada, or pass over with Canadian goods into the United States free of duty to the loss of United States revenue, and they would not tolerate that for one moment. The principle adopted by our American neighbors is that we cannot have commercial reciprocity without political union. In Senator Sherman's interview published in the Toronto Globe of 3rd December last, he says:

"I studied the proposal of commercial reciprocity only to be convinced that it was illusory and impracticable."

And he goes on to say:

"It is of no use to discuss the theoretical advantages of Reciprocity. The American people won't have it and the question may just as well be dismissed at once. Political union is another thing."

And he goes on to discuss the benefits of political union. That is the position of the American people, and, although they may be encouraged by some of the speeches made in this House by our friends opposite, I feel satisfied that a Canadian national spirit with love for the motherland is stronger in the hearts of the Canadian people than ever. The Americans threatened to punish Canada with a retaliatory measure because the Senate of the United States rejected a treaty which the President declared honorable. And the only effect those threats had was to stir up the national spirit, and Canada became a nation in a day. The United States has been always hostile to Great Britain and to Canada, and jealous of our progress in making a great nation on their northern border. The United States have always been hostile to Canada and our progress has been so rapid that they are jealous of the great nation to the north of them on this continent. They have always been hostile and aggressive. They wanted Florida and they took it, Louisiana and Alaska they annexed, California and Mexico they conquered and Texas they stole. They wanted the State of Maine and they swindled us out of it by a false map. In 1775 they attempted to capture Canada and again in 1812 and were defeated both times. In 1812 Canada had only a population of 100,000, the United States 10,000,000, yet the Americans after three and a-half years effort to capture us gave it up as a bad job. With unrestricted reciprocity—a preference for the United States—a discrimination against England, the ties which bind us to Great Britain would necessarily be broken. We would not have her protection and the moment the United States Government desired to break up any business relations with Canada we would be helpless, alone and unprotected, and there could be no other result than annexation, or a political union, and Canada would be blotted from the lists of nations. Would it not be preferable to extend our trade to nations producing products that we need and do not raise ourselves; and who require our goods in exchange and place no tariff against us? The United States produce similar goods as Canada, so that the 60,000,000, our Reform friends speak of, would be simply rivals in our market. England does not produce sufficient in breadstuffs to support her people. She must import—she exports goods so cheap that the United States dare not allow them into the country, and so shuts them out by a high tariff. The United States produce a large surplus of breadstuffs as we do in Canada, and such surplus must find its way to the English market, the market of the world. If then you allow American breadstuffs to come into Canada free, our already over-stocked market will be glutted, and we would be forced to export the more; so that as producers of similar products the 60,000,000 of people would be rivals in our market, and our farmers would suffer by it. We have heard so many speeches in this House derogatory to Canada, and in praise of the United States, that it is an interesting subject for examination to dispose of the declarations of our friends opposite as to the ruinous condition of Canadians as compared with the people of the United States, and the gloomy pictures drawn respecting our own country and our abject dependence on the United States for commercial union, as advocated by the hon. member for South Middlesex, unrestricted reciprocity as contended for by the hon. member for South Oxford, or the doctrine of veiled annexation preached on the floor of this House by the hon. member for North Norfolk. So many speeches have been made, arguments advanced and proofs given by members on this side of the House, that I shall not take up the time of the House on that subject; sufficient to say that I wish now to say a few words in reference to the prosperity of Canada, in opposition to the declarations made by hon. gentlemen opposite. Our prosperity is attested by our numerous and valuable public works, our assets of 45 millions in reduction of our gross public debt, the increase of exports of animals and their products of over 10 millions in ten years, the increase from half a million to 5½ millions on our cattle exported to Great Britain in ten years. The increase of our exports on wheat and flour from 3,181,187 bushels in 1877 to 7,141,191 bushels in 1887. Our exports in apples increasing from $195,573 in 1877 to $846,795 in 1887. Peas from $1,479,945 in 1877 to $2,358,019 in 1887. Cheese, from $3,742,604 in 1877 to $7,096,658 in 1887. A decrease on money borrowed from chartered banks from $4 45 in 1877 on every $100 to $1.61 in 1887. A decrease in amount of business failures from $25,523,000 in 1877 and $23,908,000 in 1878 to $16,311,745 in 1887, a decrease of 9 millions from 1877, or over 6 millions from 1878. An increase of $12,000,000 on issue of bank notes and 4½ millions of Dominion notes from 1877 to 1887. An increase in the peoples' deposits from $66,503,757 in 1878 to $107,154,483 in 1887, or an increase of $40,650,726. An increase of 9½ millions in savings' branches, building societies and loan companies. An increase of over 36½ millions in deposits in savings banks by the people from 1878 to 1887. An increase of over 3 millions in money orders, and so on, give a complete answer to the statements made by our opponents respecting our status. In population also we compare more than favorably when contrasted with the New England States to the south. From a statement published in the St. Johns Telegraph of 22nd November, 1881, then under the control of the late Mr. Elder, an able writer and a sound Reformer, we glean the following:—

	1830-3.	1881.	Increase in 50 Years.
Maine .....	1,953,717	4,010,025	2,056,369
N-w Hampshire.....
Vermont.....
Massachusetts.....
Connecticut.....
Rhode Island.....	1,865,215	4,141,424	3,076,209
Ontario.....
Quebec.....
New Brunswick.....
Nova Scotia.....
Prince Edward Island.....

Whilst the New England doubled their population in fifty years, the older Provinces of Canada have nearly quadrupled theirs. Take Maine as against the Maritime Provinces:

	1830-1.	1880-1.	Increase in 50 Years.	Per Cent.
Maine .....	399,455	618,436	218,981	62
Maritime Province.....	275,379	869,195	584,116	212

Or exclude Prince Edward Island, and take twenty years.

	1860-1.	1880-1.	Increase in 20 Years.	Per Cent.
Maine .....	628,279	648,436	20,157	3
N. Brunswick & Nova Scotia	582,940	761,714	178,774	30

Maine, which had 45,000 more people than New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, in 20 years had 113,000 less. Dropping Ontario, let us compare Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont, the States that lie immediately on our borders, soil and climate are similar to ours, with Quebec and the Maritime Provinces:

	1830-1.	1880-1.	Increase in 50 Years.
3 New England States.....	919,435	1,327,713	378,278
4 Canadian Provinces.....	828,513	2,227,964	1,399,451

While the increase of population in three New England States on our borders in 50 years has been only 38 per cent., the increase in the four Provinces was 169 per cent. Figures like these require no comment.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MADILL. Mr. Speaker, our opponents are continually speaking about the magnitude of our debt and encumbrances. Let us make a comparison with the States who have enjoyed the alleged benefits of commercial union with each other. We find the lands of the Dominion encumbered to the amount of $81,000,000 or 9 per cent. whilst it is:

In Ohio.....	$761,000,000
Illinois.....	620,000,000
Michigan.....	350,000,000
Dakota, with 600,000 inhabitants.....	45,000,000
Iowa.....	351,000,000
Kansas.....	200,000,000
Minnesota.....	175,000,000
New York.....	35 per cent.
10 states encumbered to the extent of 3,422,000,000 and an approximate estimate at 9 billions for the United States.

Now, let us compare the products and prices as obtain in Canada and the United States. The Province of Ontario compares favorably in cereals with the United States. Take fall wheat for the years 1885 and 1886 and the net result has been as follows: The average price has been 77½ per bushel in the Province of Ontario, and the average product has been 22¼ bushels per acre. During the same period in the United States the average price was 72.9 instead of 77½ cents and the product 11¼ as compared with 22.4 or 9.17 in favor of the Canadian as compared with the American farmer. Take barley, during same two years in Ontario the average was 53.2 cents and the average product 27.1, and in the States the price averaged 56 cents, but the product was only 22 or a difference of 2.11 in favor of the Ontario farmer. In oats, in Ontario, an average of 36 bushels per acre, at 31.7 cents per bushel as against 26.55 bushels at 25.33 cents, on the other side of the line; therefore both in quantity and in price the average is in favor of the home farmer. In rye, the quantity with us is 16.2 bushels per acre as compared with 12 on the other side, or 25 per cent. more in our favor, and the price with us was 53.7 cents while that on the other side is 57.9 cents, a result favorable to us to the extent of $1.80 per acre, compared with the other side. In corn our product is not large, but our product is 66½ bushels per acre to 24 on the other side, and the price 27 cents on our side against 24 cents on the other side, meaning $10 per acre in our favor. There can be no comparison in peas as they are not grown to any considerable extent on the other side. Hay averaged $9.77 per ton in Canada and in the United States $8.71, showing a difference in favor of the Canadians of $1.06 per ton. Potatoes 43 cents in Ontario and 44.7 cents per bushel in the United States, the average product here 123 bushels to the acre; in the United States only 77 bushels—the difference in our favor being the enormous favor of $24.40 per acre. But compare the prices in Ontario with New York and Michigan. Wheat is $20 per acre in Ontario, in Michigan it is $16.17, in New York $14.76. Rye, $8.96 in Ontario, $6.67 in Michigan, $7.37 in New York. Barley, $15.27 in Ontario, $13.98 in Michigan, $15.62 in New York. Potatoes, $51.27 in Ontario, $29.53 in Michigan, $25.20 in New York. Hay $14.12 in Ontario, $12.85 in Michigan, $13.39 in New York. Corn, $17.86 in Ontario, $11.00 in Michigan, $17.00 in New York. In fact there is not a single article for those years of which the value to the farmer was not greater in the Province of Ontario than it was in the neighboring States of New York and Michigan, according to the returns of those two States. Now let us examine the benefit that would accrue to the Canadian farmers from unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union by the abolition of duties on American produce imported into Canada. And here let me say that if it is done for the purpose of giving our own people what our opponents call the cheaper goods of the manufacturers of the United States, don't you think they should be in favor of extending the same principle to British goods that are made so cheap that the manufacturers of the United States dare not allow them in their country but keep them out by an adverse tariff—the highest in the world—so that we would get not only the cheap goods of the States but the still cheaper goods of England? But no; they lay down a principle and chase the devil around the stump to avoid it. Our opponents continually compare the energy business enterprise of Yankees and Canadians to the detriment of the latter. The United States has been filled up and settled, and even wealth and capital went into that country from the whole civilised and uncivilised world at the time when Canada had no special advantages to offer, no great North-West, no help to settle her country by railway speed, and still we compare favorably with our cousins over the border in energy, purchasing power and business capacity. Take the volume of trade of both countries for the year 1887:

United States Imports .....	$683,418,980
do Exports .....	725,733,263
Total .....	1,409,152,243

Divide that sum by the population, 60,000,000, and we find that the United States average $22.00 per head of their population. Now, take the volume of trade for Canada for the same year :

Imports .....	$112,892,236
Exports .....	89,515,811
Total .....	202,408,047

Take our population at 5,000,000, or $40 per head of the population, that so far as business energy, capacity and purchasing power is concerned, we stand man for man nearly one hundred per cent. ahead of our American cousins. Now let us examine the benefits that would accrue to Canadian farmers by the abolition of import duties from the United States. The Americans exported in 1887, $523,073,774 of agricultural products, of which $184,000,000 was domestic merchandise, over and above what they consumed. With such a showing what chance would our farmers in that market already glutted with a surplus of the very products our farmers have to sell? Now what was the trade of our farmers in 1887 with the Americans, on animals and their products? We exported to the United States $7,291,369, and of agricultural products, $7,956,248. Taking the population of Canada at 5,000,000, or 1,000,000 families, or 600,000 farmers as the gentlemen opposite say, the whole trade of each farmer would be about $25, less $6.25 duty or $18.75 per farmer, not profit but the whole of his trade out of which he makes either his profit or has a loss; but $2,669,000 worth already goes in free of duty and a large portion of this trade would cease as American similar products would come into Canada on the duty being taken off. And for this are we to give up our present advantages and break up the ties which bind us to the mother land? This is not the sale of a birthright, but the sale of a nation for a mess of pottage. If the United States retaliate against us we are not at their mercy. We can find other channels and other markets in the mother country, in the colonies of the Empire, or in foreign countries. In trading with countries that produce goods required by us and which countries require our products in exchange, it is to the mutual advantage of both. For example, take those articles which we to so large an extent export to the United States, barley, cheese, butter, horses and other animals, eggs, poultry and apples. Great Britain imports of these $133,000,000 worth and Canada now supplies but $15,000,000, leaving as free a market to the Canadian as to the foreign farmer of $118,000,000 worth a year. Of barley Great Britain imports 33,200,000 bushels, Russia supplies one-half and Canada supplied 7,000 bushels. The Dominion raises 23,000,000 bushel, consumes about 14,000,000 bushels of barley, leaving 9,000,000 bushels for export each year, nearly all of which goes to the United States. Why is this? Simply because England uses and requires two-rowed barley for brewing purposes, and Canadian farmers grow six-rowed for the United States market; and Russia, France, Norway, Sweden, Germany and Roumania supply the English market. The United States require 11,000,000 bushels more than they produce, and England 33,000,000 bushels, and our farmers, by raising two-rowed barley (as two-rowed and six-rowed barley cannot be mixed for malting purposes), could have entrance into a market three times as large as that of the United States. As the price in England is one-third higher for two-rowed barley than for six-rowed in the States, and two-rowed barley is more prolific than six-rowed, the product in Canada, averaging 26 bushels to the acre, as against nine bushels per acre in Russia. Of eggs Great Britain imports $91,000,000 worth, but Canada sends her not a dozen. Of horses, Great Britain imports $1,000,000 per year, Canada only supplies $53,000 worth—and so on with other articles. Canada is not at the mercy of the United States; Canada is a prosperous country—the brightest gem in Britain's Crown,—a country larger than the United States, with illimitable resources; with untilled millions of acres, capable of relieving Europe of her burdened millions, with her Provinces united into one grand confederation, banded together by an iron band from ocean to ocean, under the flag and protection of the greatest empire the world has ever seen. Canadians, if true to themselves, have before them a glorious future. I will leave this subject after reading a despatch to the New York Tribune of 8th February, copied into the March number of Massey's Illustrated Journal, whose proprietor is certainly not unfriendly to gentlemen opposite. It says:

"Instances are constantly cropping up which, in themselves, refute the statements made by chronic grumblers, that farmers in Ontario are worse off than their brethren in the States. Last month we referred to the great distress existing amongst the farming population in Dakota, and now it seems that the farmers in New Jersey are in a very bad way. A despatch to the New York Tribune, of 8th February, says: 'Many of the best and oldest say they cannot make both ends meet, and that the outlook is not encouraging. Many farmers have made assignments, and others are in the hands of the sheriff. To add to their discomfiture, the tomato crop, which has been their main stay, has proved disastrous, both as to quantity and price. For two seasons the farmers have tried to form a trust. Last year they were indifferent, and but few could be persuaded to enter the combination to demand a higher price from the canning factories, and now the second season's meeting for that purpose has proved a dismal failure. They say they will make their own sales for whatever they can get. The canners are consequently jubilant, and are contracting with small farmers for $6 per ton and less, this being even a lower figure than was obtained last year.' With a fine soil and excellent climate it is difficult to understand why New Jersey farmers should be in such a sorry plight, when it is also taken into consideration that they have a market of 60,000,000 at their command. The condition of farmers in Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Wisconsin and other states is not much better than that of the farmers of New Jersey. In view of these facts well may we ask: What's the matter with Ontario?"

Our friends on the other side are continually crying out against what they term the extravagance of the present Government and the increase in the public debt, and promise retrenchment and economy if they succeed in carrying a policy of unrestricted reciprocity, so as to avoid to some extent recourse to direct taxation. We know what to expect from those gentlemen, when we consider their extravagance and want of economy during the five years they were in power. Let us compare the increase in the public debt under each régime:

The net public debt.....	$236,000,000
Deducting provincial debts assumed.....	106,000,000

	$130,000,000
Of which in 5 years under Reform régime it was increased..	40,000,000
In 16 years under the Conservative régime.....	90,000,000

That is, at the rate of 8 millions per year under hon. gentlemen opposite, and 5½ millions per annum under the Conservative. And when you come to compare the public works constructed by the present Government with the St. Francis Locks, the Kaminitiquia jobs and the Neebing Hotel, a standing or falling monument in the wilderness to-day of Reform economy.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is worth to-day five times the sum paid for it.

Mr. MADILL. It is occupied by the rats and the bats.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are using it now.

Mr. MADILL. Therefore we may know, what to expect in the shape of retrenchment at their hands. But they excuse their increase of the public debt on the ground that they were carrying out the contracts made by their predecessors, but as they cancelled contracts, made and retendered on their own responsibility, they cannot evade the charge. Therefore unrestricted reciprocity would bring us face to face with direct taxation. And although, of late, our friends opposite seem to avoid saying much about it; is it not the policy of the party and their organ up to last Saturday? Why, only in July last, before the Privy Council in the Ontario lands case, the hon. member for West Durham, the ex-leader and the ablest member of the Opposition, expressed his conviction in these words:

"These revenues are mainly provided from one potential and two actual sources. The actual sources are the Dominion subsidy and the revenues from the lands. The potential source is the power of direct taxation—a power which was not expected to be much exercised, which it was thought would not be required, and which, in fact, has hardly been used; partly from an ignorant impatience of direct taxation, and partly from an uninformed conviction, that whatever the Province could secure by Dominion subsidy would be clear gain to the Province.

Surely his convictions must be very strong for direct taxation when he calls the impatience of those not in favor of it as ignorant, and their convictions uninformed. In the Globe of 14th August, 1888, we find also an article in favor of direct taxation. Commenting upon this article, the Monetary Times says:

"The price of land in the old settlements of Ontario, except in the neighborhood of the cities, when not retrograde is stationary. Under any circumstances it would be equally preposterous and unjust to talk of throwing all the taxes of the country on the land, in the actual condition of things, it is little short of insanity."

Upon this the Globe says:

"About the greatest nonsense that can be talked on the taxation question is to say that the placing of all the taxes on the land would increase the burdens of the farmer. The farmer is beginning to understand that, under our indirect taxation system, there is stolen from him by the Government, and by Government authorised monopolies, about three or four times as much money per annum as any Government would dare to impose were the taxation direct, and collected in cash from the landowner. No class of the community would be more advantaged than the farmer by direct taxation imposed upon the land only."

That is the view of their leading organ up to last Saturday. Now, what does the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) say on this question? The hon. leader of the Opposition says he is only the follower of the hon. member for South Oxford on this question; and as the follower leads the leader, the policy imposed on the leader by the follower must with be accepted by him. It is with all due respect for the leader of the Opposition, the old story of the tail wagging the dog. The hon. member for South Oxford says:

"We will suppose, for argument's sake, that we have to face this bugbear of direct transaction—direct taxation—be it remembered, not for all our revenue—but a trifling portion of it alone. Now, Sir, I have to call the attention of the House in that connection to certain important facts. First of all, no man who has paid any attention to this subject will, I think, dare to deny the fact, which I think is recognised by every political economist, that direct taxation properly levied takes a great deal less out of the pockets of the people than indirect taxation, levied as our system of indirect taxation is levied now. Sir, I desire to say that in my judgment, we ought not. I do not think this Government would dare, I do not think any other Government would wish to add by direct taxation one farthing or one penny to the taxes that now press most heavily on the agricultural classes, on the fisherman, on the miners, on the lumberman, on all the great producing classes in this community. I shall be prepared to prove in some detail at the proper time and place, that among the many faults with which our system abounds, perhaps the greatest is this: that under it the hardworking industrious thrifty man is taxed enormously out of proportion to his earnings; and I say that with a system of direct taxation, if you must have recourse to it (although I doubt greatly whether you need with proper economy have recourse to it) that crying injustice must be redressed, and the respectable well to do, moneyed classes must be made to pay their fair proportion—no more should be asked—to the burdens of the country."

Now, why all these declarations, declamations, special pleading and arguments of the leaders of the Opposition, and their late organ, if not to pave the way for direct taxation, which would as they know be hand-in-hand with their scheme of unrestricted reciprocity, and certainly is part of their policy? Now, as I represent an agricultural constituency, I wish to consider this question from the farmer's standpoint. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman that the farmers pay more taxes under the present system of indirect taxation, but considerably less. Nearly everything a farmer eats, uses or wears is untaxed. He raises his own wheat, he has it ground into flour; his own wife makes his bread; he raises his own butter, his own beef and his own pork; his tea and his coffee come in free; he raises his own milk, makes his own cheese, raises his own sheep, and his own wool with which he makes his own clothes; and even on the lower grades of sugar used by the farmer, the mechanic or the workingman, there is a lower tax than there was before the introduction of the National Policy. The farmer wishes no such thing as direct taxation, which would tell unfairly on him. By unrestricted reciprocity the duties would be taken off exports from the United States into Canada, a loss to our revenue of over $7,000,000 per annum, whilst a large quantity of American goods would under a free tariff take the place of and reduce the importation of the $20,000,000 worth of British and foreign goods to at least one-half; so that our revenue would suffer to the extent of $15,000,000 or more, and this would have to be met by direct taxation. The economy cry of our opponents in the light and memory of the years of their administration is only a "will-of-the-wisp." Now, Mr. Speaker, I will tell you why the greater portion of the taxes under a system of direct taxation would bear unduly on the farmer. The millions worth of exempted property would bear no share of this assessment. It would rest on income and assessable real estate. Take the case of two men, A. and B. Each has a sum of $5,000. A. invests his $5,000, at, say, 6 per cent. interest. B. invests his $5,000 in a farm. The assessor comes around and asks A. what his income is. A. answers $5,000 at 6 per cent. means an income of $300 per annum. The assessor says I cannot assess you at all, because income is exempt up to $400. He goes to B. and says: I must assess you at the actual cash value of your farm, and as you paid $5,000 cash for it I must assess you at $5,000. The collector comes around and has no claim against A., but goes to B. the farmer and says the rate of taxation is 7 mills on the dollar (a low average), and his assessment of $5,000 at 7 mills means $35. So the farmer pays $35 direct tax and his neighbor equally wealthy, pays nothing. But an hon. member—of North Norfolk, I think—said they would get at the rich man by taxing over $1,000, and it would not be so heavy on men of moderate means. But it would be more disastrous to the farmer, because a farmer with a farm worth $14,000 in that case would pay a tax on it of $98, whilst the money lender's income on $14,000 at 6 per cent. would be $840 and exempt. So that direct taxation would be disastrous to the farmers, and they will have none of it. And unrestricted reciprocity will not be supported by the farmers who think and consider the question from a farmers' standpoint. But we could make no such commercial bargain with the United States and remain a part of the British Empire, for under the treaty between Britain and Germany now in force German goods are to go into the colonies of Britain on the same terms as the goods of any foreign nation and would be exported into Canada on the same terms as the United States goods. But this is only another of the many cries of our friends of the Opposition, whenever one fails another cry is raised, until at last the list being exhausted they are forced to take up and adopt the bantling of unrestricted reciprocity. They have adopted to be discarded successively: free trade, revenue tariff, French domination, incidental protection, commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, and remind us of the words of Tennyson:

"An infant crying in the night,
An infant crying for the light,
And with no language but a cry."

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not intend to trouble the House at any length, but it seems necessary in this debate that every person should say something. I suppose the reason is obvious. If we do not the local papers in our constituencies will put us down as dumb dogs. It is therefore necessary every man should rise to speak whether he can throw any new light on the important resolution before us or not. I am sure that I am candid, and that I cannot be found fault with on the score of lacking that quality. I have two objections to unrestricted reciprocity, against which I have not yet heard any good reasons. One is that, in my opinion, if unrestricted reciprocity was granted to us by the United States, it would tend to weaken if not dissolve altogether the bonds with the mother country. That, to my mind, is such a strong objection that whatever arguments hon. gentlemen opposite bring to show that, from a financial standpoint, it would be beneficial to the country, I would never allow that consideration to weigh against my strong feeling towards the mother land. The other objection is that if the proposition is a sound one, it will in the end lead to annexation, and instead of building up upon this northern continent a country of our own, a Greater Britain, we would become simply outlying States under the Union, and that possibility no lover of his country can contemplate with any pride whatever. It struck me, to place this matter in a practical view, that if this resolution were adopted it would necessarily lessen the bonds binding us to the mother country in this way: Supposing we had unrestricted reciprocity, there is no doubt that our tariff would require to be as low as the tariff of the United States. If that were not the case all goods coming in from countries in Europe would come to Canada if we had a lower tariff than the United States, and then find their way by smuggling into the United States. Therefore I think it is a reasonable proposition, which cannot be controverted, that, should we have unrestricted reciprocity with our neighbors, our tariff against foreign imported goods must be the same as theirs. What would be the result? We know very well now that the port of New York has quietly absorbed all the trade of the other Atlantic ports or nearly so, and we have had, according to the Trade and Navigation Reports for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1888, 438 vessels carrying 378,157 tons of freight coming in from Great Britain to the ports of Quebec and Montreal. We had, during the same period, 440 vessels carrying from Canada 456,420 tons of freight for Great Britain. There is an immense trade that we are gradually building up between our St. Lawrence ports and Great Britain. I imagine that were we to have unrestricted reciprocity there would be no reason why vessels should come out from British ports to Montreal and Quebec when they would not bring to us the goods they do now, because I apprehend that, were we to have this policy in this country, our imports from England would very materially decline. In that case, they could not send out their ships to Montreal and Quebec, for the sake of taking home, simply cattle and horses, and other things which we export. It would not be profitable to send ships to a country where they would have only a cargo one way. In order to make it pay, they must have a cargo both ways; and, if England did not supply us with manufactured goods, as she does, she would not send us those ships and take our cattle and other products. Therefore, our trade would find its way to the port of New York, and the magnificent trade which is growing up between our ports and Liverpool would soon come to an end. It seems to me that there would be no object for England any longer to send cargoes and ships to the St. Lawrence ports, and they would naturally go to New York and that would absorb our trade. From a Canadian point, I think that is a great argument against unrestricted reciprocity. I am assuming that a large trade would be developed with the United States, but I am doing that for the sake of argument. There are two sides to that question, but, assuming that we would benefit to a great extent by that trade with our neighbors, we would lose a great deal more than we would gain, and the question is whether we are gradually to drift into becoming a part of the Union, or to remain as we are, growing up as a nation by ourselves, developing our trade and extending it, as the Government may see fit in the interests of Canada, or to throw ourselves into the hands of the United States and build up a wall against the mother country. For these reasons I shall vote against the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Mr. SEMPLE. Although a great deal has been said on this question, and a great many figures have been given, and such as I will quote relate exclusively to the trade of the country, and the subject is a wide one and has not yet been exhausted, I do not intend to trouble the House with many figures. Facts deduced from figures taken from blue-books and other reliable sources are more important than deductions from fancy. I address you as a representative of a farming constituency, and, having been engaged in the sale of grain and other farm products for 35 years, I have had every opportunity of knowing from experience the state of the markets for that period of time. Perhaps it may not be amiss for me to state the cause of the prosperity of the country. It is true this country has been very prosperous some years ago, but prosperity does not exist at present in the rural parts of the country, and those who speak of great prosperity existing at the present time represent the towns and cities, but I am sorry to say this prosperity is not experienced in the rural parts of the country. That prosperity was caused by the industry, self-denial and perseverance of the people of this country. I am speaking of the prosperity of western Ontario. In regard to the other parts of the Dominion, such as New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, the representatives of those Provinces can speak for themselves; but the reason why Ontario prospered so rapidly was due in the past to the industry and the hard work of the farmers, who went into the country and cleared the land, and made the roads and bridges, and did everything that was necessary until they made the country what it is today, and I think its appearance now is a monument to those who went in there and preceded us. Previous to 1854, the foundation had been laid for prosperity. But we had not attained it owing to the restrictions on our trade; but after that time it took a great advance, when that eminent statesman, Lord Elgin, then Governor General of Canada, originated the idea of free trade in natural products with the United States, and through his efforts what is known as the Reciprocity Treaty, which caused so much prosperity in Canada, was put in operation. To show this fact, I will read a few figures showing how quickly the immense trade established with our neighbors in the United States was secured by the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. The following were our exports to the United States for the years mentioned:—

1855 .....	15,136,734
1856 .....	21,310,430
1857 .....	22,124,295
1858 .....	15,806,579
1859 .....	19,747,551
1860 .....	23,851,381
1861 .....	24,331,335
1862 .....	19,829,253
1863 .....	24,021,264
1864 .....	38,922,015
1865 .....	36,176,977
1866 .....	54,704,959

That shows an increase from $3,931,904 in 1854 to $54,704,959 in 1866. That was an enormous increase in exports in a few years. We received that amount of money, and the reason was that the United States was at that time our best market; the people there were the best customers we had for what we had to sell; and, in the year following the abrogation of the treaty, we received from the United States $21,100,781 less than we did in 1866, the last year of the treaty. These figures are taken from Johnson's statistics, prepared by an officer of the Government, and no doubt they are reliable and cannot be refuted; and they testify to the prosperity of this country during the sixteen years this treaty was in operation. Those who have seen the prosperity of this country during the time that treaty was in operation would like to see the same occur again. There are only two conditions to be fulfilled to have unrestricted trade with the United States. The first is that the United States are favorable to a trade arrangement with us, and the second, that the people of this country are favorable to that trade arrangement. Last year the hon. Finance Minister told us that while the idea of unrestricted reciprocity would not be entertained or even discussed, he had not met a statesman, or any man of importance in either of the two parties of the United States, but would hold up both hands for commercial union. So you see they admit the principle; and Mr. Hitt's resolution is in the same direction. We are told by some hon. gentlemen in the House in regard to the subject of Imperial Federation, that once the principle is conceded, it will be easy to arrange the details; so that if the main question is conceded regarding our trade between this country and the United States, I do not think there is anything that will prevent us from having unrestricted trade carried out. The resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is in the direction of finding out the feeling of the people in both countries, and if arrangements can be arrived at beneficial to the trade of both countries. The resolution reads as follows:—

"Resolved that in view of the recent action of the House of Representatives of the United States, it is expedient that steps should be taken to ascertain upon what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity therewith."

Now, extracts have been read from papers of the United States expressing the opinion that the outcome of unrestricted reciprocity would be annexation. Several hon. gentlemen have referred to a statement made by a Mr. Murray, of Boston. It appears that his address has been sent round this country in order to post hon. gentlemen opposite on the great subject. But he appears to have no official capacity whatever; he represents himself only. No doubt his lectures have been very fluent, and made to suit the crowd, and his great object is to say something that will please the people; but, so far from having any political weight, his opinions have none whatever. Now, I will read you an extract from a speech by a celebrated statesman and orator in Great Britain, touching in a few words both on the subject of Imperial federation, our relations with the United States, and our relations with the mother country. This gentleman says:

"Now there was a rather lively and plucky nobleman (Lord Roseberry) who had recently been making speeches on two subjects—one the reform of the House of Lords, and the other on Imperial Federation. These, as a contractor would say, were two very long jobs—(laughter)—and as to the former no doubt opinion would grow, and some good might be done some day, but as to Imperial Federation he thought the whole scheme impossible, and no better than a dream. If they were in the extreme east of the Dominion of Canada with their back to the Atlantic, and looked straight across the continent to the Pacific they would have an imaginary line of near 3,000 miles in length: on the right, the north, they would have five millions of Canadians, and on the south they would have 60,000,000 of the population of the United States. Now, what had these people done? The 60,000,000 of the population of the United States had built up along the whole length of this 3,000 miles a wall, not of brick or of stone, but of Acts of Congress, and they called it by the general name of "tariff," and on the other side, the 5,000,000 of Canadians had built a wall also of the same length, and pretty nearly of the same height, and they called that also "tariff;" but these walls were there for the purpose of intercepting commerce between the 60,000,000 on the south and the 5,000,000 on the north, and the 5,000,000 on the north had done another thing. They had turned a corner, and run their tariff on the eastern coast of the continent northward, and thus have done their best also, to a large extent, to shut out commerce with the mother country. That was a fair statement of the unwisdom of our kinsmen on the other side of the Atlantic. But this system—as systems so stupid and foolish generally did—failed to give satisfaction. On the northern side of the country the Canadians complained that they were shut out from free commerce with the 60,000,000 of neighbors in the south, and of course some persons in the south complained that they were shut out by this tariff barrier from the trade they might have with the millions of the Canadian population, and the Canadians said that their trade was blocked and, in point of fact, they were very badly treated, and that they could not buy things they would like to buy and cannot sell things they would like to sell. They neither buy nor sell with freedom, and they were greatly dissatisfied, and they wished those barriers to be thrown down. Well, that was a very sensible wish, and he was perfectly certain that whatever arguments might be laid against them they will be thrown down. (Cheers.) He had no belief in this scheme of federation, but had the greatest possible belief in the great future of those colonies and in their future also. He hoped there would be strengthened the amicable connection with this country. Might they not hope for the highest and noblest federation to be established among us? Under different Governments it might be; but united by race, by sympathy, by freedom of industry, and by communion of interests, and by perpetual peace, they might help to lead the world to that better time which we longed for and which we believe in (Cheers.)"

Now, Sir, those were the words of the Hon. John Bright, a gentleman who understands our position exactly. Prices of oats and wheat have been quoted at the prices paid in Toronto, Buffalo and Chicago, to prove that they are lower in the United States than this country. We make no claim to gain in those articles, therefore there can be no argument as far as those gains are concerned. I will now read a quotation from Sir Lyon Playfair to show that the contentions of advocates of the National Policy making a home market is not a fact, as far as the staple articles farmers have to sell is concerned, and that policy does not increase the price of articles of which we have a surplus. He said:

"Not many years ago the freight from New York to Liverpool was 12 cents to 15 cents per bushel, while now it is from 5 cents to 7 cents, and owing to extreme competition the inland freights have undergone even greater reduction, and similar reductions have taken place all over the world, the effect of these changes has been to destroy local markets and to consolidate all into one market, that is the world."

Coming from so high an authority, that disposes of the talk about a local market for the staple articles that farmers have to sell. We make no claim for an increased price for wheat, oats and peas. Our contention is that under unrestricted reciprocity a large gain would accrue to the farmers of the country from the sale of their horses, barley, lean cattle, sheep, poultry, hay, potatoes, hides and skins, and wool—for these, the only market worthy of a name, is the United States, and the amount of these articles our farmers have to dispose of, does not depress the market for these things in the United States or reduce the price. In 1887-88 the following amounts and produce were exported:—

Product.	Quantity.	Value.	Duty.
Horses, No.....	19,925	2,402,371	480,474

The grain, cattle and other articles were sent to the distributing points in the United States and $2,541,075 was paid in duty before the market was reached. Without duty the same price would have been paid, and this large sum would have gone into the pockets of the farmers of the country and have been distributed among the manufacturers and merchants of the country. In making the quotation from Sir Lyon Playfair, the argument adduced that the United States raising the large amount of grain would flood the markets of the country is disposed of by an examination of the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1878. These will still further dispel the delusion:

On the wheat a gain of 27 cents per bushel, $1,111,240 being the profit made by dealers in handling wheat. It would take a long time to hurt the country by such transactions. The value of the corn was 7 cents per bushel, and the peas 82 cents, being 15 cents per bushel more for peas than corn, and it has often been found to be an advantage to the farmer when corn came into this country free to sell oats and peas and buy corn. A shrewd farmer informed me he had bought corn at 47 cents per bushel and sold his oats at 50 cents per bushel. This, to the farmer I have mentioned, was a great advantage, as he always feeds a large number of cattle for the British market. But raising wheat for export need give the Ontario farmers little concern. The total of wheat exported from the Dominion in 1887-88 was of the value of $1,878,195; of oats, $58,185, or a total of $1,936,380. While of eggs there were exported $2,119,844 worth, or $183,464 obtained more for eggs than wheat and oats. Eggs have increased wonderfully in the last ten years under unrestricted trade in that article.—

There is more need now than in 1878 for corn to come into Canada free, as more peas and oats could then be sold and corn could be got any time from the large granaries in the United States. There need be no dread of direct taxation, as predicted. In 1878 the idea of the Government of the day was to stop all imports coming into this country. If that had been done as it was intended there would be nothing but direct taxation; but the goods were never stopped coming in. If the farmers of the country were prosperous they would be able to buy more goods and pay more duty on the goods imported. It has been said farmers pay very little duty or indirect taxation; then I would like to know what class of the community pay the largest amount of the $22,000,000 of duty received from customs and excise. The farmers are the most numerous class in the community, and I think they pay by far the largest part of this amount, besides the amount they have to pay to the manufacturers, who arrange their prices to be the same as goods manufactured outside of Canada, with the duty added, and it would make very little difference to them whether they paid that tax to the tax gatherer or to the Custom house officer. Under our present high system of taxation everything that the farmers use or consume has to pay a heavy duty. When the duty was put on iron the manufacturers met in conclave and decreed an advance of from ten to twenty per cent. on the articles they manufactured, and everything that is made of iron or steel and which is used by the farmers has to pay this heavy tax and has to come out of their profits. The farmer's reaping machine, mowing machine, plows, harrows, cutters, axes, spades, shovels, hoes and scythes, and everything he uses or handles. An increased price has to be paid for wire to fence the farm, for stoves to warm the house in the winter, and nails and building material, besides the enhanced price paid for sugar, cottons, woollens, coffee, raisins and other articles—everything he can use and everything that he handles is heavily taxed. Another question was touched on to-night which is of the utmost importance to the Province of Ontario: that is the policy of constructing and subsidising railways adopted by the Government. We were asked last year to vote, $750,000 for the construction of the Oxford and New Glasgow Railway, and this year we shall be asked to vote $300,000 more, making $1,050,000 for this railway. Last year we also voted $800,000 for the construction of the Cape Breton Railway, and this year we will be asked for $700,000 more, making $1,500,000, or $2,550,000 for these two railways. I believe that this policy of constructing and subsidising railways in the Provinces is against the solemn compact entered into at Confederation. I cannot see what right the Dominion Government has to construct or subsidise those provincial railways, and it seems to me like plunder to take the money from the pockets of the people of Ontario to build railroads in other Provinces which the people of Ontario receive no benefit from whatever, after having built their own railway with funds purely provincial. The small amount of aid given by the Dominion Government in subsidies was only an excuse for the purpose of extracting more money to be given the other Provinces. It is unjust that the people of Ontario should be called upon to pay larger sums than any other Province for the construction and subsidising of railroads which they will never see, although they hear of them and feel the expense they are to them. I notice also in a return which I moved for in the House last Session, that since 1880 the large sum of $16,385,565 was voted as subsidies to railways. The Provinces of the Dominion received out of this sum $12,538,765, and Ontario's share of that was only $3,846,800. It has been shown by an excellent authority, who was capable to deal with figures, that Ontario pays half of the direct taxation of this country, and when we see that it does not receive one-third of the money invested in these roads we are able to realise the injustice of this policy in the construction and subsidising of railways. The construction of the two railways I have mentioned is an outrage on the Province of Ontario, and it is really amazing that the members from Ontario have said so little about matters which affect the taxation of that Province. Ontario has been termed the milch cow of the Dominion, and I believe that is the case; but I am sorry to say that our Conservative friends from that Province are so wrapped up in the bonds of partyism that they do not care for anything in particular, so long as the present Government is in power. As several gentlemen wish to speak in this debate I do not care to be tedious to the House by prolonging my remarks, and I shall therefore close.

Mr. SIMPSON.

Mr. HAGGART. At this late period of the debate I shall confine the remarks which I intend to make as closely as possible to the question which is under discussion. On the motion that you, Mr. Speaker, should leave the Chair, there was a motion moved in amendment by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that in the light of a resolution that has been passed by the House of Representatives, declaring in favor of commercial union with Canada, immediate measures should be taken to bring about unrestricted free trade between this country and the States. I was curious to know what meaning the gentlemen on the other side put upon unrestricted free trade. We had them coming forward last year for unrestricted reciprocal interchange of manufactures and natural products, and a short time previously they were engaged in advocating commercial union. But the Opposition dropped commercial union because the history of all countries shows that commercial union means a Zollverein for the purpose of interchange of commodities between different nations, and the result of all Zollvereins or commercial Unions of that kind, tends to a political union. Gentlemen opposite found that that policy was an unpopular one throughout the country, and they changed then to unrestricted Reciprocity or the interchange of commodities between the two countries having a common tariff as against all other countries. The meaning which those gentlemen who have spoken on the other side have put on unrestricted trade relations with the United States, I find to-night is the same meaning as they put on unrestricted reciprocity. I can only use the arguments advanced by the member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) and the member for Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), who showed that if unrestricted reciprocity means anything it must mean commercial union. If you have unrestricted reciprocity between the two countries there must be a similarity of tariffs against other countries. This would make it the same as commercial union, because if you have not a similarity of tariffs one of the countries which has the fixing of its own tariff might admit articles at a lesser rate than the other party to the arrangement. For that reason two nations agreeing or trying to agree upon a commercial interchange of commodities between them, unless they did something that no private individuals would do, would insist upon some fundamental basis by which the benefits which were expected to accrue would inure after the arrangement. Let us see what the result would be if we had the fixing of our own tariff. In the United States the iron industries are protected to the very highest extent with a duty of from $6 to $17 per ton upon iron. Suppose we wanted to introduce into this country steel rails, upon which, if my memory serves me rightly, there is a duty of $16 a ton in the United States, and instead of taking them from the United States we chose to take them from the British Isles, and were to put a duty upon them of $2 a ton, which we have the right to do, according to the meaning these hon. gentlemen put upon unrestricted reciprocity? The result would be that we would buy our rails from Great Britain and prevent an interchange in that commodity, at any rate, with the United States. Would not the United States, in making a bargain with us, simply state, if you are to have unrestricted trade relations with us, you must have a reciprocal tariff? A reciprocal tariff means commercial union; and as the hon. member for Northumberland and other hon. gentlemen opposite admit, commercial union would finally end in the political union of the two countries. Let us look at the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who does not conceive his proclivities; the statement of Goldwin Smith, who is the author of that scheme; the statement of every gentleman of note on the other side, who admit that the effect of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union will be an assimilation of the two countries politically and otherwise. Goldwin Smith, in his speech in East Northumberland, said: "I am not a politician, I do not care what the gentlemen call the measure at present before the country, but I call it commercial union; there is no difference, and no intelligent man in the country can draw a distinction between unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union; I am in favor of commercial union, because the effect of it will be the union politically of the two great Anglo-Saxon nations that inhabit this continent." And do not the American people give the same meaning to it? Hon. gentlemen opposite accuse us of always raising the loyalty cry when this proposition is brought before the people. We simply tell the people the effect of the policy they propose. We know that the great mass of the supporters of hon. gentleman opposite are loyal, and we appeal to their loyalty and show them that this proposition would have an effect contrary to their wishes. Is that not a legitimate argument to use? I know the loyalty of my countrymen, who are the backbone of the party opposite, both in intelligence and in support, is no lip loyalty. When they joined the Empire, they had no mental reservation; it was with their hearts, and every vote they give throughout the country will be one for its perpetuation; and we have only to point out to them that the proposition of hon. gentlemen opposite will have a contrary effect in order to leave these gentlemen without a following. They have seen this themselves. The first proposition they introduced for the consideration of the people was commercial union. It did not go down. Then they changed it to unrestricted reciprocity. That was a failure too. It is now unrestricted trade relations with the United States. That will be dropped, silently dropped, too, Mr. Speaker, and the next thing we will hear of will be an interchange of raw materials between the two countries. They are preparing themselves for a change of base, because they know that their supporters throughout the country will not follow them in the policy they propound. The first resolution these gentlemen introduced in the House this Session was one in favor of our having the right to make our own treaties. It was almost laughed out of the House. Would the British nation be so foolish as to concede us the right to make our own treaties—a nation which has protected us in every respect, and which gives us the advantages of its power and influence throughout the whole world? Would it, in the hour of difficulty, when it might be at war with a foreign nation, allow us the right to make a treaty with the nation it was fighting with? If we had the right to make our own treaties, we would have the right to do this. The proposition was too absurd. Now, what are the arguments these hon. gentlemen furnish in support of the proposition they now offer us? They describe this country in the words of Goldwin Smith, in the words of the hon. member for North Norfolk, as a helpless country lining the north shore of the St. Lawrence, and stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, whose natural markets and natural instincts connect them with the people to the south. They describe the wonderful progress of that country; they speak of the number of men they could put in the field, the amount of wealth they possess, and the extent of their internal commerce; they give a glowing description of it, and at the same time point to the poverty of our own country and to the inability of our own people to do anything. Let me tell the hon. gentlemen who spoke in that way that the Empire to which we belong is the greatest and most powerful nation the world has ever known. A single one of its possessions is a more powerful and a richer country than the whole of that country to the south, which they talk about so much. India alone, with its 360,000,000 people, has more wealth than the United States; it has an army of 400,000 trained brown men, and 2,000,000 besides who live by arms; and if the system which prevails in some European countries were adopted here, they could put in the field, because they have the wealth and the resources to back it, an army of 20,000,000 men. The British Empire could put an army in the field capable, not only of defending its colonies and itself, but capable of conquering the world. The hon. member for North Norfolk describes the internal resources of the United States, and points out what a great benefit would flow to our people by opening the markets of that immense country to our productions. He said its internal commerce amounted to thirty-two billions of dollars. The figures rather startled and astonished me, when I heard the statement. Divide that amount with the population of the United States as given by the census, and it gives an internal trade to every man, woman and child in the country of $650. Now, that statement was made by Mr. Switzer, the chief statistician of the United States, but when I looked at his authority, I found that it was reduced one-half. I prefer to take the statistics quoted by the hon. gentleman himself, those of Mulhall, as to the resources and wealth of the two countries. Mulhall states that the annual earnings of the people of Canada average £38 sterling a year per capita, and the average annual earnings of the people of the United States £44 sterling a year per capita. We were then without statistics from British Columbia and Manitoba, where everybody knows the per capita earnings of the people are far greater than they are in the older Provinces. Take these into consideration and you will find that the wealth per capita of the people of Canada is as great as that of the people of the United States. We are in every respect as well off, as happy, contented and prosperous, I believe, as the people to the south of us. Now, Mr. Speaker, what advantages are to be gained from a union with that country? We cannot change our allegiance simply by a resolution of these people opposite. What the Government of this country always proposed and always intended to do was to trade fairly and equitably with the people to the south of us. We are willing to enter into negotiations for the reciprocal interchange of commodities consistent with the protection which we have given to the manufactures and industries of our country. Hon. gentlemen opposite say look at the development of our mines which it would give; look at the development of our copper and silver and iron. Why, do hon. gentlemen suppose that the people of the United States will admit our iron ore and our minerals into their territory free, without some corresponding advantages being obtained by them? Would there be a single pound of iron ore smelted in the United States, if they had free trade with the rest of the world? Would not the people of Great Britain supply them with iron? Would not the ores from some parts of England, from some parts of Spain anyway, enter into competition and put an end to the development of the mines in that country? They are not going to open their territories to our minerals without some corresponding advantage, and that advantage will be that they will have the monopoly in this country of manufactures and commerce. The result would be the closing down of the manufactures we have established and the transfer of the commerce of Montreal and Toronto to the large cities of the United States. It would wipe out the industries we have established throughout this country, and when those were wiped out, even if we had unrestricted reciprocity without any chance or expectation, as hon. gentlemen opposite say, of political union, could we rely on the continuance of that policy? The moment the Americans chose to say to us that they would no longer continue the system in vogue, the result would be that we would be left without manufactures and without commerce, and would have to commence all these things anew. The sequence to the proposition the gentlemen make, even without political union, must be a continuance of the policy. How do they propose to continue that policy? The only continuance of it possible at all would be by means of some legislature which would protect us and them. I was astonished at some of the arguments advanced in favor of this measure. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) began by describing the fearful amount of taxation which the farmers in this country endure through the National Policy. That hon. gentleman described and I say this notwithstanding his statement and the correction of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) because I heard the hon. member for Huron's remarks, and I am astonished that when the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) criticised his remarks, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) should have risen to state that the hon. member for Toronto had put arguments into the mouth of the hon. gentleman which he had not used. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) stated distinctly that the duty which each farmer pays throughout the country is at the rate of $83 per annum. Multiply that by 600,000, the number of farmers in the country, and you will see at once the absurdity of that statement. The result will be an amount of taxes paid by the farmers alone, greater by $13,900,000 than the total revenue of the whole year from all sources. Supposing the statement was in every way correct, what is proposed as a remedy for those evils? A union with a country which has a far higher tariff and in which, if the hon. gentleman's argument means anything, the incidents of taxation upon the farmers would be still greater than they are at present. The argument was the same all through. It was that we were overtaxed here, that there was no result open to us but union with the United States. There was another hon. gentleman who spoke, the new member for Haldimand (Mr. Colter). I suppose it is pardonable for gentlemen, on first coming to the House, to speak volubly and in the declamatory manner of my hon. friend, and that is a compliment to my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies). I suppose the hon. gentleman gave the address he has been in the habit of delivering throughout the County of Haldimand. It is pardonable in gentlemen on first coming to the House to deliver their election addresses. As a general rule, however, they deliver them when a new Parliament sits, on the resolution in reply to the Address from the Throne, but my hon. friend took the first opportunity of delivering his election address on this motion. He made the same wild statements. He stated that the amount of protection to the sugar refiners was at the rate of $1 per 100 pounds. I ventured, when he made this statement, the declaration "Hear." He said: "Yes, the hon. gentlemen may well cry, 'hear,' because these parties from the immense amount of money which they have wrung out of the poor people of this country are enabled to supply funds to the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches and keep them in their places." The statement of the hon. gentleman was entirely incorrect, to say the least. The amount of protection—for I have the figures here, as I went into the calculation very carefully—to the sugar refiners of this country is only 54½ cents per 100 pounds. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. I will give him the details:

	Quantity.	Value.	Duty Collected.	Price per lb.	Specific duty per 100 lbs.	Ad Valorem.
	Lbs.	$	$ cts.	cts.	$ c.
Sugar above No. 14, D. S. ....	4,003,558	171,052	123,898 82	4.24	3.09	72½ p c
Sugar not above No. 14, D. S. ...	10,884,445	289,896	203,756 02	2.66	1.87	70½ p c
Melado .....	186,393,682	4,669,097	3,092,869 78	2.54	1.66	66 p c

This gives an average duty on a 100 lbs. of refined sugar brought into the country of $2.20, and on the unrefined
 Mr. HAGGART.

$1.66, or a difference of 54 cents per 100 lbs. These are the species of arguments which have been adduced in the House to prove the effect of the National Policy upon the country. An hon. gentleman stated that in Buffalo he could buy sugar for 6 cents, for which he had to pay 8 cents in Haldimand or Cayuga, but a gentleman on this side proved conclusively that the price of sugar was equal in each of these places. But how the argument is one in favor of unrestricted relations with the United States, I confess I am unable to understand, because if the United States is anything, it is a more highly protected country than Canada; and if the hon. gentleman's arguments apply to the farmer paying a duty under our protective tariff, they would apply all the more if there was commercial union with the United States. Now, I shall come to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) this evening. He commenced by stating that the expenses on the Intercolonial—and again how that referred to the trade relations I cannot understand—was largely in excess of the revenue, that it was a corrupt and extravagant expenditure. The figures which were adduced by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, he began to correct. I have the figures here, but shall not go over them. I shall simply state that the figures given by the Minister of Marine were those furnished by the Department, and that the accounts were made up in the same manner as they always have been. No change has been made in the nature of the charges to one account or the other from the system which has hitherto been pursued. But was that a reason for the adoption of unrestricted trade relations with the United States, or was the alleged mismanagement of the Prince Edward Island Railway an argument for that? The hon. gentleman has toned down his statements from those he made last year, when he gave us such a lugubrious description of the state of Cape Breton through which he had been travelling, when he said that the young men of the country had been leaving it for the United States in order to obtain employment and get a living. He also described the sad state of affairs in his own country, which thousands of people were leaving and were going to the United States; and he said that the sad, sad tale would have been still sadder but for the remittances which were coming from those young men to their friends in Prince Edward Island. I was curious to see what was the total amount of emigration from that island to the United States, and I found that, according to the United States census, the total of all the people born in Prince Edward Island who now reside in the United States is 7,500. This is taken from the returns of the United States census of 1880, and there is a separate column for those who had left Prince Edward Island. They must have got into positions of opulence, they must have been very successful in the United States when their remittances to the dear old people who live in that dear old isle have kept them from being sadder than they would otherwise have been.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That was before the National Policy.

Mr. HAGGART. Let us look at Prince Edward Island, and see what the taxation is on the people there. The amount of duty paid by the people of Prince Edward Island is $47 per capita. The taxation of the people of the United States on their debt is $23 per capita, and the average tax on the State debt is $23 per capita in addition, though in many States it is very much larger than that. Besides that, they pay State taxes and municipal taxes, and they contribute to their schools. Prince Edward Island has only the Dominion tax to pay. It is furnished with postal facilities, it has communication with the mainland, it has its piers built, and it has the whole machinery of its Government provided by the Dominion, and it has not a single cent of municipal taxation to pay. I assert that it is in the most favored position of any country, any Province or any State on the continent of North America, and yet we have this lugubrious complaint as to the burdens which are placed on the people of that dear isle of the hon. gentleman. Then, as to the incident of taxation, the fishermen get their twine, the material for their nets, free from this paternal Government. I tell the hon. gentleman that he lives in a paradise, compared with most of the people who inhabit the Provinces of North America or the States of the Union. What is this proposition? It is that we should do away with this state of affairs and desert the Empire for the purpose of forming a union with the people on the other side. I have proved conclusively that unrestricted reciprocity, if it were carried out, can mean nothing but commercial union. Why should we leave our allegiance to the mother country to join with the people opposite? Are we not as prosperous as they are? Looking even at the returns of Mr. Mowat's statistician in Ontario, though it is true that the value of farms may have decreased, the value of farm houses, of machinery and of everything that constitutes the wealth of the farm has increased. Look at the business done by the banks, look at the deposits in the banks, look at the deposits in the savings banks, look at the increased communication between the people in different parts of the country and you will see this. The hon. gentleman stated that the tonnage of the country had decreased since 1867. The tonnage has increased in that time by 2,000,000 tons. Our trade has increased externally and internally, if you take the tonnage. In every respect the trade of this country is increasing and the only fault to be found is that the hon. gentlemen opposite have not the rule and direction of it. We know what the result of their direction was during the time they were in power. Was the country more prosperous then? Was the incidence of taxation less? Did the debt decrease? The debt of the country is now, in round numbers, $232,000,000. That is composed principally of the indebtedness of the Provinces when they entered into Confederation, the debts which we have since assumed of the different Provinces, the amount we expended in building the Intercolonial Railway, the amount we expended in building that magnificent road of which we are all so proud, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we may add to that the deficit which was contracted under the Mackenzie Government. Were not all these gentlemen as much responsible as the members now on the Treasury benches for all those matters, for the assumption of the debt of the Provinces, for the further assumption of the Provincial debts, for the building of the Intercolonial Railway, and did they object to the money expended on the Canadian Pacific Railway? This is leaving out the expenditure on the canals and the public works of the country, and those hon. gentlemen are as much responsible for these additions to the debt, and agreed to them as much as the gentlemen who support the Ministry on this side of the House. I know there is no feeling in this country in favor of changing its allegiance. I know that hon. gentlemen opposite have found out their mistake and are changing their policy. I know they are going to drop unrestricted reciprocity as they have dropped commercial union, and before a general election takes place, next year they will have a more modest resolution introduced into this House than the present one. They will have a policy more in accord with the views of the people. That is the tactics they adopt, and I am glad there is a sentiment among the people of this country of loyalty and attachment to the Empire to which we are so proud to belong, which has its effect in directing these hon. gentlemen. If there were an opportunity of appealing to the country on the cries which they have raised, I have every confidence that the people would show their attachment and loyalty to the Empire to which we belong, and the result would prove that those hon. gentlemen have been mistaken.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, I have listened patiently while the debate upon the financial statement has gone on for some days in this House, and I do not rise with the hope of being able to add much information to what has already been said upon the question. This year, owing to the amendment that was moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) there has not been as much time given to a criticism of the statement of the Finance Minister with reference to the finances of the country, as upon some other occasion; but I think the criticism that was offered by the gentleman who offered the amendment was a very full one. We have had somewhat of a criticism from others who have followed, and it is not my intention to night to enter fully into that question, or attempt to do so; for I recognise the fact, as does every other speaker upon this side as well, I believe, upon the other side of the House, that it is necessary to draw this debate to a close. But I cannot forbear this remark when I see hon. gentleman rise and speak so lightly and so flippantly of the public debt that is upon this country; I cannot help remarking that there was a time when hon. gentlemen sitting on the opposite side, when Ministers occupying positions on the Treasury benches, yes, and some of them the very gentlemen who occupy that position at the present time, in looking forward and contemplating a great increase in the public debt, hesitated and felt that it was an unsafe thing, and only persuaded the House as they persuaded themselves, that it was safe for us to heap up such a vast public debt as seemed inevitable, by declaring to us that they saw beyond a peradventure a source of revenue from which they could derive over $69,000,000 which were to come into the public treasury and recoup us for the money thus expended. I do not mention this incident to show how utterly they failed to grasp the situation of the country; I do not mention this fact in order to show how terribly they have failed in the administration of the affairs of this country. This has been pointed out on other occasions, but I emphasise it to show this one point, Mr. Speaker, that when these gentlemen were committing the country to such engagements as left us with such a terribly large national debt as we have, they only persuaded themselves and their supporters to it by a declaration that the country might be able to bear the strain because they had a source of revenue within their administration from which they could extract $70,000,000, which would go in reduction of the debt. The hon. gentlemen themselves, let them be the judges, will confess that the public debt that is upon the country is something that is, at any rate, serious enough to bring before the consideration of this House. Now, Sir, I do not pretend to enter into all the arguments that we have heard with reference to the state of the country, the position of affairs under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, with reference to the exodus, with reference to the depreciation of lands, questions that have been threshed out during the course of this debate, gentlemen on one side producing one set of statistics, and gentlemen on the other side producing another set. I just wish to make this one remark, however, with reference to a statement that was made by the Minister of Marine on the disputed question of the depreciation in the value of farm land in Ontario. His answer to the hon. member for South Oxford, who had pointed out that our lands had depreciated in value, was, granted that such is the case, granted that there is a slight depreciation, there has been an immense depreciation in lands in Europe, they have depreciated to an extent very much greater than they have in this country. He mentioned an amount for depreciation, which was an immense amount in itself, because it wiped out the whole values, and left the lands valueless. He quoted from a Mr. James who, he said, had declared that the value of farm lands in Europe had fallen 100 per cent. Well,

I thought there was a mistake in the figures. When challenged he read the quotation, I looked it up and saw that it did not prove the statement that he made at all, as any gentleman looking at the Hansard will see for himself. The statement of Mr. James, as read by the gentleman, was not that farm lands had fallen 100 per cent. in Europe, but that agricultural products had fallen 100 per cent., and not lands at all; so that, perhaps, is a sample of how arguments of hon. gentlemen are sustained by the authors whom they bring forward. With reference to the state of the country, gentlemen have said that we have gone on and we have prospered moderately well. There is this one fact which I wish to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite, that during the past few years the condition of trade in Canada has been helped somewhat unduly by the large expenditure of borrowed money upon public works, notably railways, in this country. That has given somewhat of a stimulus and impetus to trade in this country, that we might say was not legitimate, or, rather, was extraordinary in itself. But the hon. gentleman states that they have come now to the determination to stop this expenditure. Well, Sir, if they do I think they will find that there will be more tightness in trade, that there will be a greater stringency felt, that trade will be duller during a year or two, unless Providence favors us, as it has done in past years, with very bountiful harvests indeed. We know that a temporary benefit has resulted while this large expenditure of money was going on. But, I turn from these questions of debt and expenditure, because the figures are in the public accounts, which the people can see for themselves. I turn from them to consider the amendment that has been offered by the hon. gentleman for South Oxford, to which exception and objection have been taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. I trust that they will take no offence when I say that while they profess to experience some difficulty in understanding the position of the Opposition in reference to this question, I say I trust they will pardon me if I do say that after listening most intently and most earnestly, as I believe, I have done, to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, I have very great difficulty, yes, Mr. Speaker, I have been utterly unable, to understand what their position is in regard to the matter at all; their statements are so contradictory. Let me take the Minister of Marine, and let me examine his statement. Why, Sir, I find that he uses this language in reference to the amendment what was offered by my hon. friend from South Oxford. He says: the Opposition have been driven back to take this desperate and foolish course; and in another part of his speech he says, we are again renewing our foul attack upon the policy of the Government. Well, Sir, I should judge that the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford is simply this: that inasmuch the House of Representatives of the United States, that deliberative body, by an unanimous resolution, signify their willingness to enter into negotiations with the Dominion of Canada for freer trade relations; this resolution simply says that the United States having done that, we, as a legislature, ought to meet them in the same spirit, as there have been outstanding differences between the two countries, and that we should send men to confer with men selected by them, to ascertain on what terms and conditions we can have freer trade relations with them. Is that easily to be understood? And if it is not easy to be understood, I remind them of the terms we propose for full and unrestricted trade by the appointment of commissioners in order to ascertain in what way such a result can be brought about. I think that is a very plain proposition. But the Minister of Marine terms this a disastrous and foolish course we have entered upon—this resolution that we send persons to ascertain on what terms we can obtain freer trade relations—and he tells us in almost the next breath that the people need not be deceived, that the Liberal Conservative party are now, as they always have been, in favor of a treaty with the United States with respect to the exchange of commodities with them, and freer trade relations. While the hon. gentleman has made that statement, other hon. gentlemen have declared the opposite, and the Postmaster General has reasoned, if there be any logic in their arguments and anything to be gathered from their statements, that they are utterly and entirely opposed to freer trade relations with the United States in any shape, manner or form. Will some hon. gentleman opposite rise and tell us in plain terms what the Conservative party are willing to do with respect to freer trade relations with the United States? No doubt some hon. gentleman will follow me, and I call his attention to the fact, and I trust some one will be found, some Minister will be found to rise in his place, speaking with authority, declare what is the kind of freer trade arrangement, at which the Minister of Marine hinted, to be proposed by them. That is what we should like to know. Last year when the subject was discussed we found hon. gentlemen opposite willing to renew the old Reciprocity Treaty, but they found that was rather untenable ground, because when they admitted that it was desirable to have freer trade to a certain extent, why it logically followed that we might be able to increase the exports in other directions with benefit to ourselves; and this year, with the exception of the statement of the Minister of Marine, who spoke with authority in this matter, hon. gentlemen opposite have rather taken the line of argument that we want no reciprocity with the United States, we want nothing to do with them, we do not want to trade with them, we do not want to marry our daughters to them or have our sons marry their daughters, we will hoist the flag and we will have nothing to do with them. That has been the tone and temper of their speeches.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) An hon. gentleman opposite groans in spirit. If I have misinterpreted their position, I shall be glad to hear what kind of trade relations hon. gentlemen opposite want with the United States, what kind of a treaty they desire to have negotiated, or whether they are in favor of a treaty at all. We now come to consider some of the objections that have been urged by the hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to the proposal of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). And, in the first place, we will glance at the statement that has been made that a Reciprocity Treaty upon the lines of the old Reciprocity Treaty would not only be not beneficial but would be actually detrimental to the interests of our agriculturists. And what is that? The Minister of Marine in his most contradictory speech said, quoting from a paper, that the United States grows more agricultural products than they require, and therefore what advantage can it be to us if their markets are thrown open to the surplus products of our markets? That has been the line of argument followed by hon. gentlemen opposite. They cannot see, they say, that it would be any benefit to the agriculturist to have freer trade relations with the United States even in agricultural products, because the United States grow a surplus of those products, and, therefore, that country is not a market for our products. True, they are compelled to admit that even under the restricted trade relations that now exist millions of dollars worth of our products find their way into that country; but this does not affect hon. gentlemen opposite at all. It is, however, a statement that deserves a little consideration at our hands. On the face of it that statement before an audience, the declaration in so many words that the United States grow more than they require of wheat, barley, oats, rye and peas, and that therefore it would be no advantage for us to have access to their markets, is a plausible one. Let us examine the statement a little and ascertain whether it would confer any benefit or not. And now, in order to ascertain that fact, we must remember one or two things. There are more restrictions to trade than are created by governments. There are restrictions to trade that are caused by nature. Let me illustrate this from our own Dominion. Take a coal mine in the Province of Nova Scotia and take a coal mine in Pennsylvania: We will suppose that the coal produced from each of those mines is equal in quality, and that from each mine the coal can be laid at the pit's mouth for exactly the same money. Suppose there is a purchaser in Ontario who requires coal, Ontario not producing any. He looks around for his supply. He notices the price of coal is precisely the same and is quoted at the same price at each mine's mouth. What does he do as a business man? He looks at the restrictions that are imposed upon his purchased coal, and he finds—what? That the distance separating Nova Scotia from Ontario is great, that it is covered by a railway, but that the railway has cost money to construct, that accordingly there has to be a certain rate of freight imposed upon coal and other traffic passing over the road; and he takes that restriction to his purchase into consideration before he completes it. Next he looks at the mine in Pennsylvania. He observes that it is a distance from home, and that there is a certain tariff for railway freight against him before he can bring coal from Pennsylvania to Ontario, and accordingly he determines which offers the least restrictions to him and he will make his purchase in that market. But if in addition to the freight tariff of the railway company from the mines in Pennsylvania, the Government steps in and places a Government tariff of 60 cents per ton upon the coal coming from that mine, then the purchaser has not only to take the railway freight tariff into consideration as against his purchase, but he has to add 60 cents per ton as a Government tariff to the restrictions already imposed, and if those two combined restrictions operate less potentially from that mine will he make his purchase and not from the other. We all know the result, for I am speaking of experiments that have been made. The restriction of distance, the cost of freight from the coal mine in Nova Scotia is greater than restriction of the railway freight plus the Government tariff from the mine in Pennsylvania, and the result is that the mine in Pennsylvania receives the order for coal brought into Canada. I have used this illustration in order to show hon. gentlemen opposite, if it is possible to satisfy them, that you may have a country—and I will grant, for I do not wish to argue the question, although I might take exception to one or two items, that the United States have a surplus in agricultural products—having a surplus of agricultural products, and yet the conditions imposed on the two countries by nature might be such that we would benefit by freer trade relations with them notwithstanding. If I weary you not, allow me to give you just an illustration or two in reference to how I conceive that free trade relations with the United States would benefit Prince Edward Island, would benefit the Province of Quebec, would benefit Ontario, would benefit Manitoba and the North-West, admitting as I said that the United States grow a surplus of all those commodities. To ascertain the facts, which I am about to give the House, I had to take the figures from the census of the United States of 1880, this being the last census, and the census for Canada for 1881, our last census. The figures I will give you are for those years, there being no data of a later date that I can avail myself of. But I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will agree with me that relatively we have made progress with the States, and that, therefore, although things may somewhat have changed, yet those figures will hold; at any rate other figures are not to be found and I must use them. I find that Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts and New York, with a population of 8,484,583 souls, about one-sixth of the whole population of the United States at that date, produced 42,513,566 bushels of oats or a little over one-tenth of the entire crop of the States. Those States containing about one-sixth of the population of the entire United States only raised about one-tenth of the entire crop of oats grown in that country. Ontario, with a population in 1880 of about 2,000,000 people produced 40,209,919 bushels of oats; in other words Ontario with a population of 2,000,000 produced as many bushels of oats as the States I have mentioned with a population of over 8,000,000 of people. Illinois, Ohio, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Missouri, Kansas and Nebraska, all distant States from these before mentioned, produced altogether over one-half of the entire oat crop of the States. Prince Edward Island, taking the census returns of 1881, produced 3,533,219 bushels of oats, and Prince Edward Island exported in that year 1,606,894 bushels, of which only 172 bushels were sent to the United States, and last year only 1,372 bushels were sent to the States from Prince Edward Island. Now, what does that show? It shows that those New England States I have mentioned offering a near and close market for Prince Edward Island for the sale of her oats only received a very small portion of the crop. Why is that? It is because of the imposition by the United States of a tariff that restricts the trade there, and which was more potent in its influence in restricting the trade than was the freight on the greater distance to Great Britain. But, Sir, who will venture to say that if you wipe out that tariff, that barrier to trade, that restrictive potent factor of 10 cents a bushel against the oats of Prince Edward Island going into those neighboring States, which are of necessity from the figures I have quoted buying States, Prince Edward Island will find a ready market for every bushel of oats she has to sell in these States and at a larger profit too. Let us take again the potato crop, which with oats is the great staple product of Prince Edward Island. Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York and New Jersey, States lying close to and easy of access to that Island Province, with a total population of 9,615,692 souls, produced in 1880 only 54,212,704 bushels of potatoes. Ontario with a population of about 2,000,000, produced 18,893,996 bushels of potatoes, or Ontario with 2,000,000 population produced one-third as much as the States I have mentioned with over 9,000,000 people. Why do I give those figures? Simply to show that those States lying adjacent to Prince Edward Island did not produce the quantity of potatoes that they require for consumption there. Although the whole United States may produce a surplus of potatoes, yet the fact remains that these States being in the market to purchase potatoes will buy from the cheapest and nearest place that can supply them, and the nearest and cheapest producing market to them is that rich little Island Province down by the sea. As a proof of that I may point out that notwithstanding, the restriction imposed by freight from Prince Edward Island to those States which we cannot get over, and in addition to that the restrictions put upon that trade by the tariff of the United States Government, Prince Edward Island exported in the year 1881, 723,995 bushels of potatoes, and in the year 1888, she exported 1,184,940 bushels of potatoes to the United States. This proves conclusively that the States lying close to Prince Edward Island did not produce the quantity of potatoes they required. They are in the market to buy, and Prince Edward Island has been able to supply them with potatoes at a lower rate, even paying the duty, than they were able to bring those potatoes from the more distant States which produced a surplus, perhaps. What is the inevitable conclusion from that: simply, that if that American restriction of 15 cents a bushel be removed, Prince Edward Island holds the market of those States right in her hand, and that she can ask her price, and get it, for her products. Passing from that, let us come to the Province of Ontario, and let us see how this policy of unrestricted reciprocity will affect that Province. With reference to the crop of barley, which is a large crop in Ontario, I find that New York, Ohio and Michigan, three bordering States, and extensive malting States, requiring large quantities of barley for manufacture, produced according to the census of the States in 1880, 10,703,507 bushels of barley. Any one can see at a glance that those States have not produced anything like the quantity of barley that is required for their malting purposes, and you can have further proof of this from the fact that Ontario alone produced 14,279,841 bushels of barley, or 4,000,000 bushels more than those three States combined. Take into consideration this further fact, that California produces 28 per cent. of the total barley crop of the United States, Wisconsin over 11 per cent., Ohio over 9 per cent., and Minnesota over 6 per cent., or, in other words, California, Wisconsin, Ohio and Minnesota, all distant from these three manufacturing malt States, produced over one-half of the entire barley crop of the United States. What do we gather from that? We find that Ontario exported, in 1881, 8,805,579 bushels of barley, of which 8,378,002 bushels were sent to the United States. And in 1888 Ontario exported 9,370,158 bushels, of which 9,193,222 went to the United States. Sir, the trade worked in this way: Those States requiring barley for malting purposes found that it was better to get barley from Canada, notwithstanding the restriction of tariff, plus the railway rates from Ontario, than it was to get it from those distant States. But will hon. gentlemen opposite say that if that artificial restriction were removed, if that duty of 10 cents a bushel on barley were taken off, Ontario would not benefit, perhaps not fully, but almost to the amount of that duty, when hon. gentleman see that those States inevitably draw their supplies from Ontario, it being so much nearer, and the rate of freight being so much lower? Take wheat, which has been an important crop in Canada, and is to-day; what are the facts? The States of Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York and New Jersey, with a population of 9,615,692, produced in the census year only 14,379,045 bushels of wheat. All of these States, lying close to the Dominion of Canada, produced only one-thirtieth part of the entire product of wheat in the United States, although their population is one-fifth of the total population. Cannot hon. gentlemen opposite see, then, that although they might have a surplus of wheat in the United States, this question of distance from market and this question of railway tariff rates comes in as an important factor in determining the markets? The people in those States must inevitably buy the wheat and the flour they consume. They do not grow enough for their own consumption, and they must draw either from distant States or from the Province of Ontario or some of the other Provinces of this Dominion the supplies which they want. Now, Ontario produced in 1881 27,406,091 bushels of wheat; in other words, with a population of about 2,000,000, the Province of Ontario produced three times as much wheat as those six States I have mentioned, with a population of 9,600,000. Hon. gentlemen can see at once from these figures that there is not a sufficient supply of wheat grown in those States to supply the needs of the people; and what is the lesson to be drawn from that fact? Why, Sir, it is that those States would naturally draw their supplies from Ontario and the rest of the Dominion of Canada, as this country is their nearest and cheapest market. And, there, Sir, would be a solution of the problem that besets the Finance Minister with reference to the millers who waited upon him and asked that simple justice should be done to them; and he seems afraid to move for fear the Opposition might criticise their policy. Well, Sir, there is an opening for the millers of this country. There is a population which in 1880 amounted to 9,000,000, vastly increased since that time; there is a market now closed up, with low rates of freight, only awaiting the wiping out of the tariff that has been erected against the free introduction of our products, for the millers of Ontario to ship every single surplus bushel of wheat and every single surplus barrel of flour they produce. Sir, you would have a trade natural and profitable; you would have a market ten times greater than the market of the Maritime Provinces, which is only obtained by the imposition of taxes which the people of those Provinces resent; you would remove the friction that exists; you would allay the discontent that brews in the minds of those people, as they feel that every loaf of bread which goes into the mouths of their children is taxed. They would have free bread, while the millers of Ontario could have a market ten times better than the tariff forced one which they have now. Now, not to trouble you too long, I wish to call your attention and the attention of the agriculturists present, to some figures given by Sir Charles Tupper with reference to the imports into Great Britain; and I find here something that will tend to excite interest at any rate, I will not say alarm, in reference to the agricultural prospects of this country. What, then, do the figures he gives show? They show, Sir, that the imports into Great Britain from Russia were in 1886 between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 cwts., in 1887 between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 cwts., and in 1888 between 21,000,000 and 22,000,000 cwts.; while the exports from British America to Great Britain which were over 3,000,000 cwts. in 1886, nearly 4,000,000 cwts. in 1887, were only a little over 1,000,000 in 1888; and the High Commissioner comments on the fact that out of the total quantity of wheat which was imported, about 57,000,000 cwts., less than 12,000,000 cwts. came from British possessions. But in this 57,000,000 cwts. are included importations from India which is a British possession, and imports from other parts of the British Empire; and as the means of transport have been improved and the cost reduced, India is to-day a stronger competitor in the English market against Canada in the supply of wheat than it ever was before. Therefore, I say that we are able to demonstrate from figures which I think cannot be controverted, that there lies at our very door a market which is bare of wheat, and bare of flour, which does not produce and cannot produce what it wants, that there is a market which the agriculturists of this country would desire to have opened to them and which would be of the greatest benefit to them. Now, Sir, there is a crop in which our friends in the neighboring Province of Quebec are very much interested,—what do I find in reference to the hay crop? I find that the State of Massachusetts, with a population of nearly half a million more than that of the Province of Quebec, produced only 684,679 tons of hay, while the Province of Quebec, with a population of nearly half a million less, produced 1,614,906 tons of hay, more than twice the quantity produced in the State of Massachusetts. Well, Sir, what lesson do I draw from that? Simply that that rich and populous State, which has Boston within its bounds, as well as other thriving towns, where there are thousands of horses that must be fed, does not grow the hay required for consumption in that State. Who, then, should supply it if not the neighboring Province of Quebec which has a surplus, and which does largely supply it, notwithstanding the restrictive tariff of $2 a ton which is imposed upon it? Who does not see that if that $2 a ton were removed, our friends from the Province of Quebec could sell their hay and realise $2 a ton more for it than they are able to do now? And when you remember what an important crop it is in that Province, you can readily see that the agriculturists there are deeply interested in this question; and I think they will be able to see that even if the United States as a whole does produce a surplus of hay, yet it is produced in distant States, while Quebec lying at their door would have an advantage over those States, and would be the market from which they would draw their supply. With reference to horses, which concern very largely the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, what do we find? In taking the figures for horses from the United States census, I find those in cities and towns are not enumerated, and I was unable to get them, but that will make no difference as the same system is followed through all the States of the Union, and therefore for the purposes of comparison, the omission makes no difference. Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania—States easy of access to the Dominion, with a population of one-quarter of the whole of the United States—had only one-seventh of the total of horses. Hon. gentlemen can readily see that the question put by the gentlemen opposite, since the United States produce more horses than they require, what is the use of our making that country a market for our horses, is answered by the fact that these seven great States, with a population one-fourth of the whole of the United States only have one-seventh of all the horses, and the supply being spread over the whole Union, there is a scarcity in the States I have mentioned that must be supplied from some place. Whence do they obtain that supply? They obtain it now from the Western States, but there is a railway tariff rate against them. From Canada there is a railway tariff rate of a much less amount, but supplemented by the United States Government tariff, which reduces the price of horses in our market—but wipe out the United States tariff on horses, and what would be the result? It would be that the export of horses from Ontario to Quebec would vastly exceed its present proportion, because were our market open they would come and buy our horses, and would be able to buy them to more advantage than they could from our competitors in the distant States, whose animals have to be brought so far by railway. With reference to sheep, I have the figures here, but I need not go into them. They demonstrate precisely the same fact as I have endeavored to prove with regard to horses. I have been a little long on this point, but I thought it was worth the time I have taken to give an answer to the plausible statement made broadly that as the United States produce more agricultural products than they consume, they cannot furnish a market for our produce. But the figures I have shown show that while that is the case, the consuming centres do not produce what they require, and as we are nearer to them we could ship to them easier had we free trade relations with the United States, than can those distant States from which these centres now obtain their supply. Ontario, Quebec, the Maritime Provinces, Prince Edward Island, would grasp and hold the supply of those States, which are short of these articles, which they must get from us, or else from distant States at greatly enhanced cost, owing to the freight rates that prevail there. There is one other point on which I wish to speak. While these hon. gentlemen have attempted to prove that it would not benefit our agriculturists much to have free trade relations with the United States, they have in former years admitted it would. If the statement of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is to be taken to mean anything, it is that the Government favor something in that direction at present. If I mistake not, the right hon. the First Minister has given a hint, in some remarks he made, that he was in favor of free trade with the United States, as far as was consistent with the interests of Canada. Well, what are the objections taken by hon. gentlemen opposite? While they have this year declared that they doubt if it will be any good to the farmer to have free trade with the United States, I have not heard an hon. gentleman opposite say that free trade relations will not benefit the fishermen of this Dominion. Not one hon. gentleman opposite has had the boldness to argue that free trade with the United States would not benefit our fishermen. Well, are our fishermen not an important class? Are these men who go down to the sea in ships and draw their riches from the deep, and export to the extent of $7,000,000—more than the export of our mines—a class not worth considering in this country? Will any hon. gentleman opposite say that our fishermen would not be benefited by free trade relations with the United States? Why, hon. gentlemen opposite know they desire, and did desire, while negotiating a treaty at Washington last year, to secure the free admission of fish into the United States. There is not an hon. gentleman opposite who has ventured to say that free trade relations with the United States in the products of our forests would not benefit the great lumbering industry of this country, which last year exported $24,000,000 worth of goods. Not a gentleman has risen to say that the vast army of men employed in that industry would not be benefited by free trade relations with the United States. Not an hon. gentleman has risen to say that our mining interests would not be benefited by free trade with the United States. Not an hon. gentleman has risen to say that our mechanics and our laboring classes would not be benefited by free trade relations with the United States. But there is one class—only one, so far as I can learn—which they lay stress upon, and say that free trade between the two nations lying side by side would destroy, and that is the manufacturing industries of this country. That is the position of hon. gentlemen opposite. Well, let us examine into that position. When first came the anxiety for the manufacturers, which is so strong in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite? It did not come at the inception of the National Policy, for when the hon. the First Minister announced that policy, he declared that the imposition of these duties on manufactured articles and on agricultural products was imposed for the express purpose of promoting the bringing about the reciprocity in trade with the United States—not only in agricultural products, not only in lumber, but in all the articles on which he imposed a duty. That was the very ground on which he imposed the duty. Therefore, at the inception of the National Policy, the First Minister declared that his purpose in putting these protective charges on manufactured goods, was to bring about a reciprocity of trade in manufactured goods as well as in agricultural products. The hon. gentleman attempted to hedge somewhat when a remark was made the other night in reference to this matter. When the words of this resolution were quoted, which were to the effect that moving, as we ought to do, in the direction of reciprocity of tariffs, as far as the interests of Canada will admit, will eventually tend to bring about a reciprocity of trade, he said that his National Policy resolution only contemplated bringing about reciprocity as far as the interests of Canada required; and as the interests of the manufacturers does not require it, therefore he is not permitting it. But the right hon. the First Minister is a good enough logician to know that, that in the interests of Canada, applied to the imposition of duties, it may be found injurious to Canadians to put as heavy a duty on some articles as on other, and therefore they would not go as far in that direction. But the reciprocity was to be unlimited, not having reference to any industry or any interest in Canada. It was to bring about such a reciprocity of trade full and free as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) asks this House now to ascertain the means by which it can be brought about. I remember very well—and I will not take up the time of the House by reading extracts, as I easily could do, in order to prove it—that the First Minister often and often used the argument which the manufacturers also used, and what was that? We are not afraid of free trade with the United States; we would be very glad to get free trade with the United States, but we do not believe in this jug-handled free trade—that was a favorite phrase of the First Minister;—if they will take off their duties, we will take off ours, but we do not believe in taking off our duties while theirs are so high. That was the language, the avowed language, the declared language, not only of the First Minister and his supporters, but of those manufacturers who are to-day found supporting and aiding the First Minister in resisting the very policy which they said at the time they were not afraid of, when the National Policy was first introduced. In regard to the manufacturers, I wish distinctly to say that there is a distinction to be drawn. Hon. gentlemen opposite speak of being the friends of the manufacturers, and they point to the Opposition as being the enemies of the manufacturers. I deny it. I claim not that the manufacturers stand on any higher plane than the rest of my fellow citizens, but, as one of them, I have never been ashamed to stand with them. I admire the legal profession and other professions, I admire the agriculturists and all other classes of the community, but I believe the persons who are engaged in the manufacturing and commercial interests of this country stand equal to any. In the time of ancient Tyre, her merchants were princes, and her traffickers were among the honorable of the earth, and, from that day to this, I assert that the mercantile and manufacturing classes have been men who have been noble, intelligent, public-spirited men. Everyone who hears it will admit that that is the case, but I regret to say that, in that class, as perhaps in all other classes, there are some who have not maintained the dignified and manly stand which I think that class, as a whole, will maintain and ought to maintain. I think those manufacturers, or those who belong to that or any other class in this country, who will come to the Government of the day and ask them to shape their fiscal policy, not with a view to revenue, but so as to enable them to take money out of the pockets of other classes of the community and put it into their theirs, have dishonored the noble class of men to which they belong. It is an unworthy position to take, and I say that the manufacturers as a class have never taken that position. You speak of your manufacturers' association, but do you mean to tell me that they comprise the whole of the manufacturers of this country, or even a large portion of them? There may be some favored men there; there may be some men there who have had their peculiar interests looked after, but it is not to the credit of those men who were as loud as others when the National Policy was first introduced, in stating that all they wanted was free trade with the United States, to come now and besiege the Minister of Finance, and not only ask that the National Policy shall be continued under any circumstances, but that its stringent restrictions shall be increased. I draw another distinction, and, when the distinction is drawn, you will find that the number of men of this kind is limited whose conduct I cannot commend. I draw a distinction between those manufacturers of whom I have spoken and those who, in self-defence, have come to this Government and asked for an increased duty on some articles because the Government have legislated against them by the protection which they have given to other favored individuals, or by raising the cost of the raw material. These men asks no favors, but only to be left in as good a position, and no better, than they would have been in under a revenue tariff. These men are not to be confounded with the men who oppose the introduction of the resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). We have heard the remark made sometimes that these manufactures would be crushed out if this were adopted, because the United States would make this a slaughter market. I was surprised last year to hear a gentleman of the large mercantile experience possessed by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) use that expression. I think I also heard the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), use the same term, and I think the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White), in some well thought out remarks, from his point of view, which he made the other day, spoke of this as being made a slaughter market and leading to the crushing out of our manufactures. Why, Sir, it is impossible that that should take place under the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). That proposition is not to take down the Canadian bars and let American manufactured goods come in here free while the American tariff is maintained against our manufactures. It is a proposition to have men appointed here to confer with men appointed by the United States in order to see on what terms and conditions the bars of both countries may be let down. Then, where can be the danger of the manufacturers of the United States slaughtering goods in the Dominion of Canada? Let the Finance Minister himself bring what commercial experience he has gained by study, if not by actual experience, to the consideration of that question. Suppose a manufacturer in New York determines to make a slaughter market of Canada, understanding that we have unrestricted trade with that country in regard to his manufacture. He says that eight cents is the market price for his article in the United States, but he will sell it at six cents in Canada, at cost in fact, while he would keep up the price in the United States. If the Finance Minister were engaged in manufacturing that article in Canada what would he do? He would immediately buy up the six-cent goods offered by the New York merchant, he would stop them in transit in the State of New York, and would sell them in the eight-cent market, and would realise 33½ per cent. on the transaction. It would be an utter impossibility that such a thing could be done. There would be another alternative in such a case. If the manufacturer in New York was trying to kill the manufacturer in Canada in that way the Canadian manufacturer would say that two can play at that game; and, if the New York manufacturer was offering his goods at 6 cents here and keeping up the price in the United States, the Canadian manufacturer would very soon sell his goods in New York at 6 cents, so that the 8 cent price would be destroyed very quickly. The arguments would not bear examination by a business man for a moment of time. I make this proposition to the hon. gentlemen opposite. I say their objection to the hon. member for South Oxford embraces one of two propositions: either that the Dominion of Canada does not possess equal natural advantages with the United States, or that the Dominion of Canada has produced a race of men that are inferior to the inhabitants of the United States. I say their arguments that the manufacturers of this country would be killed out, that the agriculturists would be injured, that harm would be done to this country by free trade with the United States, involves either one or the other of these propositions: either that the Dominion of Canada has not as good natural advantages as the United States, or that the Dominion of Canada has produced a race of men inferior to the race produced by the United States. Which ground do they argue from? Sir, I do not think that they argue from the first ground, because they have taken occasion to charge upon members on this side that they depreciate their country, that we have a better country than the United States. I agree with them. I believe that in Manitoba and the North-West, our fertile wheat fields and lands, are better wheat-producing regions than any comprised within the American Union. I have said at all times, and I believe it now as I utter it, that not excepting the State of New York, I do not believe there is in all the region comprised within the American Union, a State with better natural advantages than the Province of Ontario, the Province in which I live. Sir, I am glad to agree with the gentlemen who say that our sister Province of Quebec has better facilities, is richer by nature, than the New England States. I was glad to hear my hon. friend from the Annapolis Valley speak the other day of the fruitful vale of Nova Scotia; they are fruitful indeed. I was glad to hear that. Our country, then, is equal to that of the United States. Then, Sir, if we are unable to hold our own, if the sad picture of desolation marked out by the Postmaster General, of Toronto obliterated, of Montreal wiped out, of Hamilton existing no longer, simply because we have gone into free trade relations with the United States, his argument amounts to this, they themselves confessing that we have equal natural advantages, that in his opinion, and in the opinion of those who agree with him, Canada has grown a race of men that are inferior to the men of the United States. I deny it, I hurl it back at him. The people of Canada are as able to hold their own as the people of the United States. Sir, I say that a Canadian is able to hold his own with the American, sharp, bright and active a business man as the American is, and I give as proof the thousands, the tens of thousands of Canada's sons that are to be found in the United States of America to-day. What are they doing? These gentlemen say that if we had free trade relations with the United States the dwellers in Canada would become hewers of wood and drawers of water to the men who inhabit the United States. Where are the tens of thousands of your countrymen that are scattered through that Union to-day? Are they hewers of wood and drawers of water in the community in which they dwell? Say it if you dare. Your language implies it, your logic inevitably leads to it; say it out if you dare. You cannot, because you know that to-day wherever a Canadian is found in the United States, speaking of them in comparison with the others, taking them in the aggregate, they rise to as high positions, they hold their own as well as any man that is born within the bounds of the United States. Sir, how did the United States develop their fishing industry? Where do they draw the bone, muscle and sinew that man their fishing fleet? They are drawn from the hardy sons of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Sir, will you not find them in the highest positions to be had in that country? Will you not find them elevated upon the bench, and in dispensing justice? Will you not find them in legislative halls? Will you not find them in the busy marts of commerce? Will you not find them in the seats of learning? Will you not find them in all the professions the equals of those by whom they are surrounded, in every respect? Sir, if a Canadian can go into that country, which is practically to them a foreign country, where they are unknown, among a people alien to them by nationality, though speaking in the same language, and can attain unto the highest places in that country, who shall say that Canadians are not able to hold their own in their own land simply because we have decreed to have, if we should so decree, free trade relations with the people of the United States? Sir, I am glad that it has fallen to the lot of hon. gentlemen opposite, by their statements and by their course of reasoning to declare that it is their belief that the people of Canada are inferior as a race of men to the people that are in the United States. We deny it on this side of the House. We deny that our country is inferior to theirs, we deny that our people are their inferiors in any respect. Where, then, is the danger of entering into free trade relations with them? Is it not rather to our advantage? For while they, with their 65 millions of people, have access to a market of five millions, the people of five millions have access to a market of 60 millions of people. Who shall say that the gain is not on our side? And, Sir, shrinking from a fear, and a candid discussion of the question, the Postmaster General says that the effect of this resolution is annexation to the United States. Sir, he may try to justify himself in voting against this resolution by such a proposition; but it is a plain resolution, written in plain English, a person of less intelligence than that possessed by the Postmaster General, can understand that it is a proposition reciting that as the United States have expressed a desire for freer trade relations with Canada, it would be expedient that this Legislature, in a like spirit, should appoint commissioners to meet with their own and report to us upon what terms and upon what conditions this can be brought about. What objection should there be to that motion in the mind of any gentleman who honestly desires to have freer trade relations with our neighbors to the South? Sir, if the proposition before us were adopted, if ways and means were devised, and it became evident that it implied political union with the United States, the hon. gentleman would not be bound by this resolution to assent to that. It is time enough to consider that, I think, after we have taken the first step. The Postmaster General must not think that suddenly, while he sleeps, the flag will be changed over his head, and all his liberties bartered away. Sir, will he raise a phantom, something that does not exist, in order to prevent the members of this House from expressing a desire to take the first initial step. Those who consider the subject, no matter what is their political leaning, must admit that it would be a benefit to the Dominion of Canada. Sir, I do not think that the effect of having free trade relations with the United States would tend in that direction of annexation. He referred to Germany, and he spoke about that trade policy having welded all those States together. I think he was mistaken. Was not Austria in the Zollverein, and it was not confederated? Was the union of the German Empire brought about by trade influences? No; it was brought about by the clang of arms. He gave us no parallel case. The Reciprocity Treaty we had with the United States before, instead of promoting a desire for annexation, stamped out the desire that had already begun to make itself felt; and in the light of all these facts why should hon. gentlemen opposite rise and try to throw dust in the eyes of those who wish to calmly consider this proposition? What does this proposition mean? It means a vast addition to the vitality of Canadian interests, for, if this scheme is carried out, in my judgment, all interests, manufacturing and otherwise, will be benefited by the vast extension of our trade. You may answer me that this cannot be carried out without inflicting injury on the different industries of this country. That there will be displacement of capital in some cases, that there will be some changes brought about by this new state of affairs and that in the turn of the wheel some will go down and some will come up, I do not deny. That transpires in the mercantile world every day. You cannot take up the trade journals but you will read that this firm has gone down and perhaps that another firm are prospering. Those changes will occur, but this great commercial change to which this resolution refers will not be brought about suddenly. Time will be given for trade to adapt itself to it; and having thus entered upon the broader field of trade and commerce, who shall say the development that will be ours? Hon. gentlemen opposite have pointed to the figures of the inter-provincial trade established by means of the National Policy. They could not have offended me by doing that. If we had been able to develop increased trade with the Maritime Provinces I would have rejoiced, for I desire, as a Canadian, above all things that we should have extended trade relations with our friends in the Maritime Provinces. But there are natural difficulties in the way. We have been unable to accomplish it, and their trade is largely with the United States as is ours in the Province of Ontario. But, if it had been fostered by natural means and not by tariff rates, much good would have been done in that regard. But if there has been a considerable development of inter-provincial trade, as is claimed by hon. gentlemen opposite, I ask them to consider this, if there has been a development of the resources of Canada, if there has been an increase of our wealth as the result of inter-provincial trade between the Provinces, what would be the increase of our wealth, the increase of our trade, if instead of having these seven Pro-vines to trade one with the other, the doors should be opened to over forty neighboring States and Territories to which our trade would extend, and in whose trade we would share. What has made the United States the country it is? It is its vast inter-State commerce. In that free and unrestricted trade Canada would share, and if they have prospered we would prosper too. To-day, the great need of Canada is, what? An enlarged market. This is the need of the manufacturers. What does the Minister of Finance tell us he is going to endeavor to do, in order to obtain increased trade? He declares that there is but one relief for the manufacturers whose interests he seeks to promote: we require a foreign market, and an outlet for our surplus goods. That is what the hon. gentleman tells us himself. To that end, and for that purpose, he will endeavor to remove in part that restriction which nature has imposed on trade between foreign countries, on trade between the Argentine Republic and other portions of South America, by subsidising steamship lines in order to achieve this result. We have that proposition and that declaration, that the manufacturers of Canada need a foreign market. Suppose we open up trade with the Argentine Republic to the extent of half a million dollars, supposing it is even two millions on account of subsidies given to steamships: the hon. gentleman at the same time proposes to vote down a proposition that initial steps be taken to ascertain whether we can secure free and unrestricted trade and a market of 60,000,000 lying at our very doors. Admitting that the manufacturers can only now find relief by securing an enlarged and a foreign market, the Finance Minister proposes to subsidise steamship lines to proceed to the ends of the earth in order to sell a few hundred dollars worth more goods while at our very doors lies a nation that, even under the restrictions at present imposed by both countries, takes over $40,000,000 of goods from us annually while we take about a like quantity with them, and the hon. gentleman will vote down and call upon his supporters to vote down a proposition looking to the removal of the barriers to our entrance into that trade which has benefited the United States.

Mr. DICKEY, I feel I shall need all the indulgence which the House generally accords to new members in rising to speak on this question which has already been so ably debated from both points of view, and especially when I have the honor to follow an hon. member who is so able as is the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. There is one statement which the hon. gentleman has made which I think was quite unnecessary, if he had waited till the close of his speech he might have left it unsaid, namely, that he did not understand and could not comprehend the position of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I think after listening to his arguments it was quite evident to any hon. gentleman who appreciated the position that he, whether intentionally or not, had not placed himself in sympathy with it. The speech of the hon. gentleman to which we have just listened was a very admirable argument in favor of the old Reciprocity Treaty. He showed that the agricultural products could be sold to the United States, that coal could be sold to the United States, in other words his argument was that the old Reciprocity Treaty would be a great advantage to this country. Does anyone on this side of the House deny that? All I desire to say to the hon. gentleman on that point is, that he is taking the very course that will prevent this country ever obtaining such a treaty, that hon. gentlemen opposite are taking a course that will prevent the United States from ever dealing with us upon any fair commercial basis, and only when we shall have got rid of all the difficulties raised by hon. gentlemen opposite and by the discussion they have had on this question, can any treaty be secured. I do not intend to answer in detail the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, or even as fully as I might be able to do, but I will touch upon them as I proceed with my remarks. The argument of hon. gentlemen opposite in favor of the amendment is this: In the first place, they return to their old love of ten years ago and attack the principle of the National Policy, which seems to be a labor of love to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Then the hon. gentleman tells us that the country is ruined, that we have no country left and especially that our farmers are suffering. He goes on to tell you that you have a ready cure, and he tells you further that the population of this country is stationary and that Canada is a case of arrested development. He tells us further, that we have the cure in unrestricted reciprocity, and that it is a cure we can get for the asking. I submit that hon. gentlemen of the Opposition, if they are were laying down a policy upon which to go the country should above all things ensure that it shall be a practical policy, and I say that it is a peculiar thing that the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite offer to this House and to this country, if they get into power, is that they will enter into negotiations with a foreign nation in order to obtain a treaty which they may get or which they may not get, and they give us no information whatever as to the mode in which they will carry on the business of this country until they get that treaty, or in case they fail to get that treaty. They offer us no policy in the meantime and they ask the people of this country in voting for them to go it blind, because no elector of this country, however intelligent he may be, can get the slightest information from watching hon. gentlemen opposite for the past ten years as to what their policy would be if they got upon the Treasury benches. One fact has come out in this debate which I think is of some value, and that is that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who is the financial exponent of his party in this House and in the country, has bound himself to a policy of direct taxation. The hon. gentleman has pointed out that indirect taxation is the trouble with the farmers of the country, and he has referred to England as a country where the poor man and the farmer are alike favored. I think that the farmers of this country will receive with a great deal of interest the announcement that so far as the hon. member for South Oxford can commit his party, that if he were put in power he would send his tax gatherer around hat in hand to every farmer in this country asking for a certain contribution to enable him to govern the country. Anyone who has had any experience with direct taxation knows that it is the property owned by the farmer which pays the largest share of direct taxation, no matter under what system you levy it, and this statement of the hon. member will be received with a good deal of interest by the farmers of the country. The hon. gentleman's proposition of direct taxation is one directly affecting the farmer, because under it he will have to pay the largest share of that taxation. I do not care to weary the House with statistics, but let us look for one moment at the condition of England at the present time. We are told that the policy adopted by England is one that we should imitate, and is one that has produced great results in that country. Possibly it may not be generally known that since 1867 the export of manufactures from England in wool, cotton, linen, hardware and other articles of iron, have decreased in 1886 as compared with 1867. During that twenty years there has been a decrease in the export of these articles under the free trade which the hon. member for South Oxford lauds and admires. The total per capita export of England in 1867 was £5 18s. 4d., and in 1886 it had decreased to £5 15s. 9d. sterling, or 3s. 7d. per head. If there is one industry in the world which it is perfectly certain is in an absolute state of prostration it is the agricultural industry of England. It is admitted in the Queen's speeches, in the speeches of public men, the books of economists, that the agricultural industry of England, which has been fostered under this free trade system that the member for South Oxford wants us to adopt for the benefit of the farmers of Canada is absolutely depressed and helpless at the present time. It is exactly the same if you look at the free trade colony of New South Wales. We have heard a great deal about that colony in this debate, and there were figures used with reference to it by hon. gentlemen opposite which I must say were very carefully culled, and culled with considerable judgment from the midst of other figures which told very seriously against their arguments. The agricultural development of New South Wales as compared with the neighboring colony of Victoria is almost trifling. Victoria has gone ahead of New South Wales in her agricultural development by enormous strides, and you find also that the population of Victoria is four times greater per square mile than the population of New South Wales. You find that in New South Wales, while one out of every 77 persons in the population is out of employment, in Victoria only one out of every 191 is out of employment. We find also that New South Wales has at the head of its financial affairs a gentleman who has undertaken to rival the member for South Oxford, and who has taken the position formerly held by that gentleman as the leading man of deficits. In 1883 the deficit in New South Wales on ordinary expenditure was $6,471,000. In 1884, $6,300,000. In 1885, $4,800,000. In 1886, $7,400,000, or a deficit in four years of $24,971,000, which were met as the hon. member for South Oxford was in the habit of meeting his deficits by a capitalised loan; while in the colony of Victoria, which pursue the policy of protection we find that she pays her way every year and has a handsome surplus in the end. There is another little fact about New South Wales which was not mentioned by gentlemen opposite, and that was that an election was recently run there in which the Free Trade Government was left in a minority when the House met. It is true that the Protectionist Government had been defeated by a majority of four, but I think that the comfort that can be gathered from free trade in New South Wales under those circumstances is very small indeed. In order that the position may be clear, I quote from an article written by Baden Powell, M.P., England, in the Fortnightly Review for the present month, in which he says at page 426 :

"Every year there, as in Europe, more articles go in the expurgatorial list and every year the cause of free trade seems to pass more into a purely defensive attitude."

It was said here that there were 100,000 popular majority of the United States in favor of free trade. Until I heard the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken I was surprised that a statement of that character could be made; a statement which every hon. member in this House must know is absolutely inconsistent with the true character of the last presidential election. Do not hon. gentlemen know that Mr. Cleveland had from one end of the Union to the other canvassers and speechmakers trying to convince the people that he was not in favor of free trade; and that the whole issue on which his election was run was in trying to force the people to believe that he was in favor of protection. But so great was their suspicion of a man who had gone so far as President Cleveland did, that in their jealousy the people of the United States turned out of office President Cleveland, whose administrative record was as good as that of any other president of the United States, and who had given no other reason beyond his trade proclivities for being turned out of office. Now, I do not wish to make any argument on the subject of free trade. All I wish to say is, as has been said before, that all the world, outside of Great Britain, is against those gentlemen. Of course, I do not say that all the world is right. It is possible that the hon. gentlemen opposite may be Noahs, and all the rest of the world may be wrong about this ark; they may have the true ark, but I very much doubt it; and I think they will have to show some stronger arguments to convince us than they have done. I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite this, that while frequently in the history of this world a few men, and sometimes one man, have been right against the rest of the world in starting a cause, or in a new and growing cause, the history of this world does not contain one instance in which one man, or a few men, who hung on to a waning and dying cause were right in the end. History has given to the men who hang on to a dying cause, like the cause of free trade, an entirely different name from any which hon. gentlemen would claim; it has called them reactionists, Tories, and a great many other bad names. The name of Tory would be especially offensive, I know, to the hon. member for South Oxford. Now, I am not here to argue that England is wrong in adopting free trade. I do not pretend to universal knowledge; I do not know what is best for England; I do not think we are called on here to consider what is best for England. I think trade questions are practical questions, to be settled by people for themselves with regard to the circumstances in which they are placed; and I wish to state that the aim of protection is simply to utilise the labor in the country, which, for the want of such protection, would go to utter waste, and be absolutely and irretrievably lost. That is the aim of protection, and in doing that, as all revenue must be raised by taxation, it taxes the inward foreign commerce of the country instead of taxing production or putting a direct tax on the operative and the manufacturer, leaving production free, so that labor may be employed. Now, there is one other advantage in protection, which I am glad to see the hon. gentleman who last spoke sustained, that is, that very frequently, though not in the majority of cases, under protection the foreigner pays your revenue for you by paying the import duty. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down gave a very good instance of that, because he said that when our farm produce was sold in the United States, we had to sell it at very much less than we would otherwise have to do on account of the duty that was put on it by the United States. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) gave a very good instance of the same thing in speaking of a lamb, with regard to which he showed great feeling, which he said had to pay $1 of duty as it went into the States. That is one advantage a protective policy has which is quite evident. Now, I do not wish to argue at any length about this free trade question. But I wish to quote the words of a gentleman who in this House is always recognised as a master of expression, a gentleman who can always clearly say what he means and can clothe his ideas in elegant and precise language; I refer to the hon. member for West Durham, the former leader of the Opposition. Speaking at Wellaud, in February, 1887, the hon. gentleman said :

"I speak now as the leader of the party expounding on all questions of principle, not merely my individual views, but the common sense of the great body of the party, the general lines on which the party would act if entrusted, as they will soon be, with power. What I am about to say on all questions of principle you may take as authoritative, and, so far from their being any divergence, I can assure you that there is, in my belief, a general concurrence of sentiment between us, including Sir Richard Cartwright."

"No man, I care not how convinced an advocate of free trade for Canada he may be, has yet suggested—no man, I believe, can suggest—a practicable plan whereby our great revenue needs can be met otherwise than by the imposition of very high duties on goods similar to those we make or can make within our bounds. I invite the most ardent free trader in public life to present a plausible solution to this problem. I have not believed it soluble in my day, and any chance of its solution, if any there were, has been destroyed by the vast increase of our yearly charge and by the other conditions that have been created. The thing is removed from the domain of practical politics."

That is a far better statement than I could make of protectionist doctrine, and in making that statement he pledged the party opposite to that policy. Now, the next statement made by the member for South Oxford is that this country is ruined, and I think hon. gentlemen on this side of the House must have appreciated the amount of dramatic ability which the hon. gentleman threw into that statement. Of course, we all know that as a patriotic Canadian, he was actually suffering as much wretchedness as a patriotic man could feel when he had to stand up in this House and denounce his country and say it was hopelessly ruined; and yet the hon. gentleman showed the greatest glee; his countenance looked as if he was never more pleased than when he made the statement that this country was deeply involved, and must cast in its fortunes with a foreign nation. That was a piece of good acting, for which the hon. gentleman deserves credit. The hon. gentleman says the country has gone to the bad. That is an assertion which was not backed up; and although the hon. gentleman has a very high opinion of his own assertions, I do not feel obliged to take them at the same value. I will meet it with a counter assertion. In words which have been stamped as parliamentary by the president of the Lime Kiln Club, to which as an authority I know you will bow, I beg to say that that is a matter of wrongfulness of statement; it is not correct as a matter of fact. We know the ability of the hon. member for South Oxford; but he did not answer one single figure or set of figures which the hon. Finance Minister presented to this House as showing the prosperity of the country; he did not attempt to do so; but he set up his own ipse dixit that the country was in a bad position. Now, I remember hearing of an election trial in the Province of Ontario in which the judge said that the sitting member stated that he did not know there was any corruption, and he said he would not believe that any more than he would believe that if the hon. gentleman went into Lake Ontario, he would not be wet. Now, I will say this, how the hon. gentleman dipped in the scenes of prosperity as he sees them everywhere in the country, could get up and say that this country is in a bad position, is more than I can understand. I do not propose to argue this matter. I do not propose to tell hon. gentlemen on the other side to read the financial papers; I do not propose to tell them to read the reports of the loan societies, because wherever they go, they will find signs of prosperity. I will only quote from two authorities, one, the New York Tribune. About a year ago I found in this paper the following article:

"It is folly for Americans to shut their eyes to the fact that Canada is becoming every year a more formidable competitor for the commerce of the continent."

That is the opinion of a foreign and not a very friendly source, the editor of the Tribune, who stands very high in the commercial world of the United States. But for fear hon. gentlemen opposite would not like that opinion, I will give them the opinion of a leading organ in the Maritime Provinces. The Morning Chronicle, only four months ago, in November, when this hideous depression we heard of this year must have been apparent to the gentleman, a good Liberal who edits that paper, the following article appeared in it:

"Canada is now assuming national proportions. She has an enormous territory, 5,000,000 of people, great wealth and large resources. She has every quality of a nation, except national life and sentiment. Why should 5,000,000 of wealthy and prosperous people, such as Canada now possesses, enjoy all the advantages of the Empire and contribute nothing to its support?"

There is the statement that Canada contains 5,000,000 of wealthy and prosperous people. But in order to show indirectly the prosperity of Canada, I wish to submit just one table of statistics, namely, with reference to the coal output in 1877 and 1888. In 1877 there was sold from the Nova Scotia mines 687,000 tons, and there was imported 978,000 tons, making a total quantity available of 1,665,000 tons. Now deduct coal exported 140,000 tons, and we have a total in 1877 of 1,535,000 tons. Now, in 1888, the Nova Scotia mines instead of selling 687,000 tons, sold 1,550,000 tons, and we imported, instead of 978,000, in 1888, 1,284,000 tons, or we sold 203,000 tons, and we consumed in this country 2,621,000 tons, or an increase of over 1,100,000 tons coal consumed in this country in that ten years, and that at a time when gentlemen opposite tell us there were no more people in the country. I would like to know then how that coal came to be consumed. It was consumed in the manufactories of the country, in the railways carrying our inter-provincial traffic from one point to the other. There is one fact from which hon. gentlemen opposite cannot escape and which is not explicable on any other supposition except the enormous development of this country within that period. We are told that the farming interests of this country are depressed. We will assume the hon. gentlemen opposite have the interests of the farmers at heart; we will assume that they are patriotic and trying to do what they can for the country, and I ask if they want to find out the progress that the farmers of this country are making, why did they not give us some comparative statistics? Why did they not compare the farms of this country with those of the United States? Why did they not compare the prices of farms here with those of the United States? Why take the farms of this country, and after telling the House of the enormous fall in value, argue from that fact that the farmers are in a depressed state? I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to compare the condition of the farmers in this country, in every particular, in general prosperity and general accumulation of wealth during the past ten years, with those of the United States, and I undertake to say that the farmers of Canada will come out with a far better showing than those of the United States. Statements like these, would perhaps be fair game in an ordinary political debate, but which whenever they touch the honor of a country and the instincts of patriotism they should be better sifted and be treated on a higher plane than they are by hon. gentlemen opposite. Hon. gentlemen opposite say the population is decreasing. That question is one of these assertions which are not borne out by facts. The statistics given us are very misleading. I am not in a position to discuss that question, and I take the liberty to say that no hon. gentleman opposite is in a position to discuss it, until the census is taken. These statements that the population of our country is decreasing, that our farmers are ruined, that our country is ruined, may be good politics, and I leave hon. gentlemen opposite to discuss that question. They are better judges of that, but I take leave to say, it is bad patriotism, and if I know the people of this country, when these hon. gentlemen come to the polls, they will find it is bad—it is bad politics. They will find that they cannot join bad patriotism and good politics. The people want both united, and are keen enough to distinguish the pure article. Why did not hon. gentlemen, if they wished to get at the facts, look at the movement of the population from east to west. Take the State of Massachusetts. It has been held up as a live State, and is beyond doubt one of the best in the American Union. We find that in 1880, Massachusetts had a population of 1,783,000 people in all, and you find residing outside of Massachusetts in the other States of the Union, men born in Massachusetts, who have moved away to the number of 1,366,000.

An hon. MEMBER. Where did they go?

Mr. DICKEY. To the western and other States. That is to say, if Canadians had left on the same ratio as the Americans have left Massachusetts instead of their being 1,000,000 of Canadians to-day in the States you would find 4,000,000. If the Legislature of Massachusetts produced such another gentleman as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), I should like to hear him get up in the House there and make a great essay on the decline of that State. Nearly half of its population has left for the west, and the State does not increase in population as fast as Canada. I would like to hear him say to the State: Let us take leave of the union and take up our place as Canadians and we will do as well as Canadians. That is exactly the line the hon. gentleman takes. Fortunately for Massachusetts, I do not think they have a gentleman there who would dare to get up in their House and take that position. Now, to come to the cure. The hon. gentleman opposite, having diagnosed the body politic and found a disease which did not exist, has proposed a cure, and that cure is unrestricted reciprocity. Well, unrestricted reciprocity is rather an uncertain quantity. I would take the two terms, commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, and, by a little legerdemain and transposition, I could make out the policy of the Conservatives and the policy of a good many gentlemen on the other side of the House. By a slight transposition, it is evident that the policy of the Conservatives is commercial reciprocity, and the policy of a good many gentlemen opposite is unrestricted union. By that transposition, hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially the hon. gentleman who spoke last, can get at the policy of the Conservatives, which is commercial reciprocity. So many answers have been made to this question that I scarcely know how to approach the subject. One very good argument which was used—and that was used by the last speaker—was that unrestricted reciprocity would cure annexation, and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was kind enough to name several Canadians, who, in former years, as he stated, had been annexationists, but were cured by the adoption of the old Reciprocity Treaty, and he seemed to take pride in stating that those gentlemen were Tories. Well, whatever they were at that time, at any rate it is safe to say that the annexationists in this House do not sit on this side and I think this House and this country will consider that the price we should have to pay for unrestricted reciprocity is rather too high a price to pay for the purpose of curing those hon. gentlemen of their peccadilloes in favor of annexation. I have already stated that I do not know how to distinguish between unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union. I know that is a fault of my own, and is owing to my inability to grasp the clear and lucid explanation which we have had from the other side in regard to it. One gentleman argues in favor of unrestricted reciprocity. Another gets up and argues in favor of the resolution, and declares he is straight for commercial union. Being in this state of doubt, I turn to the bible of the party, the Toronto Globe, and I find there the true statement of this matter, and this is what the Toronto Globe says in reference to unrestricted reciprocity:

"The opponents of unrestricted reciprocity sometimes ask what the term means. Having obtained the information, they hold up their horrified hands and groan: 'Why, that's just commercial union.' There is a story that Douglas Jerrold was once asked by a very dirty man for a cure for cold in the head. 'You take a pail of warm water,' said the joker, 'then bare your legs, put your feet in the water, and rub them with soap and a scrubbing brush.' 'Why, that's washing my feet,' cried the other. 'I admit it is open to that objection,' replied Jerrold. Just such is the answer to the cry that unrestricted reciprocity is commercial union. 'It is open to that objection.' But what of that?"

They go on to say:

"But the situation is that we cannot obtain the most valuable privilege, that of free trade with the nearest and wealthiest sixty million people in the world without consenting to forego that free trade with the rest of the world which they deny to themselves. We cannot obtain the inestimable boon of free access to the States for our products without accepting the closest approximation to the commercial position of a State of the Union. They will not favor us more than one another. Unrestricted reciprocity without a customs union is the unattainable best, with customs union, it would be very good, and that we can probably obtain."

Turning to this high authority in the Reform party, I find that commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity are interchangeable terms, which may be used indiscriminately. The argument, as I understand, is that, if we had unrestricted reciprocity, we would have a market of sixty millions people for our products. If these hon. gentlemen will condescend to look facts in the face, I think they will have to cut down that market of sixty millions very considerably. They tell us that Canadians are as good as anybody else, that Canadians can hold their own against all the world. So they can on fair terms, and I say further that, if Canadian brains had the handling of the capital possessed by the United States as a weapon, they could not only meet the people of the United States on equal terms, but could beat them out of their own market. But how is a man with $1,000 going to fight a man who has a million dollars? How is a man who has $50,000 invested, who is struggling along and trying to support his family on that small capital, to maintain a fight, a strong commercial fight against the surplus products of men who control millions, and that not for one or two or three years, but for many years? That is the question which must be solved, whether a man bare-handed can fight a man with a sword, who knows how to use it; because the position of the Canadian manufacturer, as compared with that of the American manufacturer, is almost that. They will tell us that we will have access to the American market. They must know that the American manufacturers have everything perfectly organized, that they have their agents in every hole and corner and cranny of the United States. They have their whole commercial system completed, and any man going in there from Canada would not only have to fight this establishment, but also the national prejudice, and that with only one hundredth part of the capital possessed by those against whom he was fighting; so that the market of sixty millions of people would be practically worthless to our manufacturers if it were open to us to-day. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have a great objection to Canadian manufacturers, but, if they would extend their researches, they would find that other manufacturers are just as objectionable; they would find that they are ready to combine in enormous numbers, not only to get at the American producer directly, but at the Canadian producer by getting into the Canadian market, stamping out the Canadian manufacturer and so getting the whole market to themselves. If they were to provoke a contest with the American manufacturers, with the enormous capital which they have, amounting to something like six thousand millions of dollars, they would find that they had a very hard battle and a losing battle to fight. As to the difference between unrestricted reciprocity and commercial reciprocity, you are told that the leader of the Government was in favor of reciprocity, and it is asked, if we are in favor of reciprocity, why cannot we go for unrestricted reciprocity? The distinction between the two terms and the two states of trade is absolutely radical. If we make a treaty for commercial reciprocity, we will see that our interests do not suffer, that the treaty will preserve to us our autonomy and our commercial independence, and our control over our own affairs in any political or any other exigency which might arise; but, if we adopted unrestricted reciprocity for a period of years, we would place out of our control the whole fiscal policy of this country and all our own affairs. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot argue fairly a readiness to go into unrestricted reciprocity, from the readiness to go into commercial reciprocity which this Government has always shown. Now, do hon. gentlemen opposite really mean to say that they think that we can get unrestricted reciprocity? Do they really imagine that this House will credit for a moment that there has been any change of sentiment in the United States upon that question? What is the indication of a change of sentiment? Will any hon. gentleman who attempts to answer me, point out in the United States any sign or shadow of a change in the sentiment of the people during the past year? We have, it is true, Mr. Hitt's resolution for commercial union, supported, of course, by Mr. Butterworth, and by the gentlemen who want to annex us to the United States kite as a sort of tail. But we were told in this House last year by Sir Charles Tupper that he had talked with leading public men in the United States, and found that every one was earnestly in favor of commercial union. Has there been any change since? Is there a single public man in that country who has declared himself in favor of unrestricted reciprocity? Since then we have had a declaration from Mr. Sherman and Mr. Blaine, stating in the strongest manner that unrestricted reciprocity they will not have, and commercial union they will only have as a step to political union. Hon. gentlemen opposite may get around that point the best they can, and try to show that there is a distinction between commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, but it is impossible for them to show that there has been any change of sentiment in the United States in favor of unrestricted reciprocity. All they can say is that the universal sentiment in favor of commercial union, which every gentleman in this House knew existed a year ago, has been put in the shape of resolution by Mr. Hitt which, I may say, is so transparent, is so thin, is so palpable a step to political union, that it is almost an insult to the intelligence of the people of this country. Hon. gentlemen surely cannot suppose that the United States would allow us to arrange our tariff as we choose. The United States imported last year $278,000,000 worth of goods which pay duty. Does any hon. gentleman suppose that the United States are going to allow us to fix the duty on those goods, are going to allow us to say that they shall pay 5 per cent. or 10 per cent. to come in here or to come into the United States? The proposition, as the hon. member for Queen's—who I am sorry to see is not in his place—said, would show that the Americans are arrant fools, that they were willing to do what hon. gentlemen opposite want Canada to do, that is, to sell their commercial independence to a foreign power, and that the Americans will never do. The only possible condition upon which they will give us reciprocity is a uniform tariff, and as a sort of rider upon that, they would have the making of that tariff. Now, there is another class of argument to which I wish briefly to refer. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) used some very extraordinary arguments. He argued that because the accounts of the Intercolonial Railway were not properly kept, we should have unrestricted reciprocity. He argues that because the carpets in Rideau Hall cost a certain sum, we should have unrestricted reciprocity. His ideas seem to be that, because what he elegantly called the Tupper family, cost the country a certain amount of money, therefore we should have unrestricted reciprocity—at least that was the class of arguments to which he addressed himself. I will say just one word as to the charge against Sir Charles Tupper which was made by the hon. member for North Wellington. Those of you who have read Oliver Wendell Holmes, will no doubt remember a very interesting character in one of his books—an old man who had passed his whole life in collecting beetles. He was very much annoyed if any one called him a naturalist. He said he did not deserve that name, that he was simply a collector of the genus scarabæus, and he said, I want you to call me a scarabeist. This gentleman spent his whole life in collecting these nasty, ugly, ill-smelling insects which, to an ordinary man, would be simply disgusting. Now it is, perhaps, proper that a political party in opposition should have a scarabeist to collect the facts of this particular class suitable to his taste. But I submit that when an hon. gentleman takes that scientific position, and claims to be a scarabeist, he should be sure that he classifies aright, and that the insect he has got is one of the true genus. I submit that his statement about Sir Charles Tupper lacks that essential element, because he should have known that Sir Charles Tupper, during the two years he referred to, never took one cent from the public treasury of this country, except the salary that was freely and cheerfully voted to him by this House, and which he amply earned. I make this statement because Sir Charles Tupper is not here to defend himself. I presume if he had been, the charge would not have been made. As for the Minister of Marine, he does not need any defence at my hands, and if he did, he could take care of himself. The hon. gentleman who spoke last seemed to indicate by his remarks that gentlemen who spoke on this side should enumerate every article that they were supposed to put in a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States. I for one would not propose to do anything of the kind. It would be a childish thing to do, it was an entirely mistaken thing to ask for. But I would say that the present Government is pledged to a policy of commercial reciprocity with the United States as soon as it can be obtained. Their policy, Sir, is this, that if we want to make a bargain with a man, you do not show that your whole life depends upon it; you show that you are able to stand alone, that you are independent, and then if it is for your interest and to the interest of the opposite party, you can perhaps make a bargain. As soon as the United States are satisfied that we can stand alone, and not until that time, will they consent to make a Reciprocity Treaty with us. This is no new policy. The Government have carried out this policy. It is the policy enunciated by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) when he spoke in Charlottetown in 1878. He said then that he would go in for no cringing to the Americans for a Reciprocity Treaty, that we should hold up our heads, and that if we adopted that course we would in the end obtain reciprocity. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) made use of similar language at Halifax, and stood up upon his dignity as a Canadian and declared that he would not bow to any American in order to obtain a Reciprocity Treaty. But there is a still higher authority and that is the leader of the late Government, the hon. member for East York (Mr. MacKenzie); and, in passing, I may say that it is instructive to read these debates, because they show what hon. gentlemen thought at that time, and, perhaps in their inmost minds, they are now in favor of the Government assuming a similar dignified position. I read these extracts from the debate of 1875:

"Mr. WALLAOE (Norfolk) asked, Whether during the Parliamentary recess it is the intention of the Government to renew negotiations for a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States?"

"Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE. We will always be glad to negotiate for a Reciprocity Treaty with any nation."

And with that the discussion closed. In 1878 we have the following:—

"Mr. BEOHARD enquire!, Whether a treaty of commercial reciprocity between the United States and Canada is at present in question between the Governments interested?"

"Mr. MACKENZIE. There is no such treaty at present in question between the Governments interested. The Government of the United States has made no proposition to us; but when the Government of the United States makes any such proposition, we will, of course, give it due consideration."

Hon. gentlemen there see the policy that the present Government has adopted, and I say that under the circumstances it is the only policy that could possibly be adopted. I do not go back upon the position taken by the Minister of Marine. I believe that this is the last desperate attempt of desperate men. I know that the last election was run in Nova Scotia upon a free trade issue, in Ontario on a protective issue and in Quebec upon the race and revenge issue; and having tried various policies and having failed, this is the last desperate attempt to formulate a policy which will to some extent satisfy the country. There is one element in this matter which I think hon. gentlemen do not seem sufficiently to appreciate, and that is the great and growing patriotism and national sentiment that animates true Canadians from British Columbia to Nova Scotia. We know we have resources unsurpassed by any country in the globe, and we are not now going to admit that we are unworthy of that heritage, that we cannot support ourselves without the aid of any other nation. Our forefathers fought for responsible government, and this colony set an example to other colonies of England which they were not slow to follow. We have acquired the right to legislate for ourselves on all trade question. The proposition of the hon. gentleman is that we proclaim to the world, and to those other colonies which, in times past, have looked to us for guidance and for example, that self-government is a mistake, that it is far easier to hand over our fiscal affairs to a foreign country to deal with, and that it is far better to allow foreigners to govern our trade, to control and regulate our commercial progress as seems to them best, and then we can sit at our ease and enjoy the rest that will come to us from being relieved from grappling with those great questions. I do not believe there is any such craven feeling abroad in this country. I believe, on the contrary, that Canada is prepared to fight her commercial battles alone against the whole world; and I believe the last proposition we will endorse is one that involves a loss of commercial independence. Hon. gentlemen opposite will at least admit that we have enough to eat and a little to spare, and I verily believe that the people of Canada would rather enjoy that much, as a self-contained and self-governed people, than clothe themselves in purple and fine linen for which they have to pay the price of their manhood and commercial independence. I fear my imperfect remarks have added very little to this debate, but I trust I have made my position pretty clear, namely, that I am unalterably convinced that there is a higher and a nobler destiny for this country than a condition of commercial vassalage to the United States of America.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat discussed the National Policy and then dwelt upon the evil effects of having any commercial intercourse with our neighbors in the United States, and finally wound up by saying that they, the Conservative party, were in favor of commercial reciprocity, and when the States were ready they were prepared to enter upon it. I fail to see in what point the hon. gentleman differs from the proposition laid down in the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). We claim unrestricted reciprocity. True, the hon. gentleman has chosen to contend that commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity were the same things, but in the course of this debate, and more particularly from remarks made in other debates, more particularly by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), the distinction has been pointed out, and at this late stage of the debate it is not necessary for me to enter into it. The Postmaster General said the results would be the same, because eventually there might be a similarity of tariffs. While commercial union would involve assimilation of tariffs or rather a union of tariffs, yet under unrestricted free trade we would have entire control of our own tariff. It is quite possible that, in the course of events, it might result in some condition such as the Postmaster General has pointed out, namely, a similarity of tariffs, but at the same time we would be independent in regard to tariffs; we would have a right to make our own tariff and frame it for the benefit of Canada. Under any arrangement for unrestricted reciprocity there would be no obligation to assimilate our tariff, either to lower or to raise it, but our position would simply be that of forming our tariff with a view to benefit this country. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) has stated that the last elections were run in Nova Scotia on free trade, in Ontario on the protective issue and in Quebec on race and revenge. I beg to differ with him. My impression is, and I think I will be borne out by the facts, that the elections in Nova Scotia were run on railways, and in Ontario on the gerrymander, and by these means the Treasury benches are now occupied by the Conservative party, and the people never had fairly before them the question of reciprocity, protection or free trade. I did not intend to go into the question of the National Policy or to discuss it, it has been discussed at length in this House, but the hon. gentleman has referred to the position of New South Wales and Victoria. The hon. gentleman was forced to admit that the Protective Ministry in New South Wales had been defeated, he said by the small majority of four in the Legislature, but if he will look at the latest accounts, he will find that the majority is much larger. The following is a comparison of the wealth of the two countries: In the year ended March, 1886, there were in the Colony of Victoria 304,693 horses, 1,290,790 head of cattle, 10,681,837 sheep and 239,837 pigs. New South Wales in March, 1886, had 34,507,062 sheep, 1,270,078 of horned cattle, 329,933 horses and 208,927 pigs. This shows that in the possession of sheep, which is the principal source of wealth in those colonies, the Free Trade colony of New South Wales had four times the number of sheep that Victoria had. I regret that my hon. friend (Mr. Dickey) alluded to the remarks that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) made with regard to Sir Charles Tupper and the Tupper family, for I do not think that it should have entered into this discussion at all. I think my hon. friend will find that during those two years referred to, not only did Sir Charles Tupper draw his salary, but that the Auditor General's report will show that pretty large sums were expended in travelling and other expenses, so that the remarks made by the member for North Wellington were fully borne out by the Auditor General's Report and by other reports laid before this House. My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) said that he deprecated this discussion now before the House, because by it we would prevent this country from getting a Reciprocity Treaty. Surely if hon. gentlemen opposite are sincere in stating that reciprocity is going to be an injury to the country we would from their point of view be doing a benefit to the country, if this discussion would prevent us getting such a treaty. I hold that this discussion is of benefit to both sides of the line, for I believe the Americans are astute enough to study the position and to know that when the matter is fairly discussed and considered that it will be found that reciprocity is not for the interest of Canada alone, but for the interests of the United States as well; it will be mutually beneficial that this great wall of protection shall be thrown down between those two great countries, and that we should unite together and enjoy the benefits of free trade between Canada and the United States. My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Landry) and my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood)—whom I am sorry is not here to-night and I regret the cause which prevents him being here,—made very eloquent speeches upon what was commercial union, and upon this subject my hon. friend from Westmoreland was very eloquent and touching. When he made that speech, so eloquent in bringing forward those facts, it led me back to the first time when I heard the hon. gentleman. It was an occasion in which he addressed in equally eloquent tones a meeting held in honor of my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) who was then visiting the county he represented. On that occasion, in 1881, the member for Westmoreland praised the policy of the member for West Durham and the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) as a great benefit to the country, and he deprecated the injury which we sustained by the National Policy which was then inaugurated. While he described himself then as a toboggan wavering on the top of the slide he took a downward slide himself because he could not resist the temptation of the fertile plains below him—shall I call them the plains of Sodom and Gomorrah.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The plains through which a railway runs.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I have felt the same difficulty that my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) did in not knowing exactly what is the line taken by members on the other side of the House in this discussion. My hon. friend from Welland (Mr. Ferguson), my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) and the Postmaster General were directly opposed to reciprocity. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) followed in the same line; but my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) was more candid in his admissions, and I can see that he is an apt pupil of the gentleman he succeeded, and that he is willing to follow the footsteps of Sir Charles Tupper when that hon. gentleman on the question of reciprocity diverged from the line laid down by his colleagues. My hon. friend from Westmoreland endeavored to explain away the great increase in our export trade to the United States between 1854 and 1866 when the Reciprocity Treaty was in force by stating that this increase of trade was due to Civil War which raged in the United States during the last years of that treaty. My hon. friend, however, found that this reason could only apply between 1861 and 1866, and in order to support himself in his position he had to attribute the cause of this increased trade previous to 1861 to the Crimean War which ended in 1856. We have a right in discussing this question to consider the great increase in trade which followed that Reciprocity Treaty in 1854, and my hon. friend from Queen's, Prince Edward Island, has shown the great bound which our trade made in the first years of that treaty. So far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned we must remember that when the National Policy was inaugurated it was stated throughout the length and breadth of those Provinces that the only means by which reciprocity could be obtained was by adopting the National Policy then put forward by the Government. This was reiterated on every platform throughout Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The people then really believed that this was the reason put forward by Sir Charles Tupper in support of the National Policy; that the policy which they were going to inaugurate would lead eventually to reciprocity. But this result failed, both because nothing flowed from it, and also because of the subsequent action of the Ministry. It is necessary that we in the Maritime Provinces should have the trade of the United States, because nature has placed us in that geographical position which places the markets of that country within our reach. My hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) was candid enough to admit that if the American market were open to us we would receive advantage from it, but he also said there were other foreign markets within our reach. I would like my friends from the Maritime Provinces who support the Government to point out in what part of the globe we would find a market for the products of our forests and mines equal to that to be found in the country adjacent to us. A few years ago we had a gentleman sent from Halifax to the West Indies with the intention of opening up trade between that country and Canada. He went there, had a very pleasant trip at the expense of the country, and made a report, but not the slightest advance has been made and no benefit has been received by the country. The other day a gentleman from my own city was sent down to the Argentine Republic for the purpose of opening up trade there. Here we are sending men away thousands of miles to establish trade relations, and I suppose that the Bill introduced by the hon. Minister of Marine, to which two or three hon. members objected rather strongly, is due to the fact that that trade may increase to such an extent that certificated masters have to be appointed to supply the vessels engaged in it. But we have a coasting trade, and a more important trade with the United States. Look at the number of vessels from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick which are employed in carrying the produce of one country to the other. But while I find that we send large quantities of goods to the United States, our vessels often come back in ballast. Taking up a return for last July, I find that 130 trading schooners came into St. John during that month; they all went away to the United States with cargoes, but only 29 came back with cargoes, while 99 came back in ballast. If we had free trade with the United States, they would all have return cargoes, so that they would be able to carry our goods at lower rates than they do now, and give more profit to the producers. Now, I confine myself in my remarks to the Maritime Provinces, as the other Provinces have been referred to by other speakers who are more cognisant of their circumstances than I am. Now, the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry) who spoke on this question, represents a county which I knew very well in my boyhood days. We had then a very fair trade with England. I can recollect the time when the navigation laws were repealed, and the first ship carrying the American flag that ever floated in our waters sailed into our harbor, and it was said that there was an end of British shipping, and that all our carrying would be done by the Americans. I need not say what the result has been, that so far from that being the case, not only has Great Britain the carrying trade of the world, in which our ships have a large share, but we all know that the great carrying trade from New York is done by ships carrying the British flag; and to-day many of the ships carrying products from that port to the East hail from New Brunswick.

Mr. WELDON (St. John).

Mr. WELSH. Most of them.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). My hon. friend says most of them. But we find that that trade has declined in consequence of our products being sent to the United States instead of to England. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Perry), the other day showed the amount of produce sent to the United States from the County of Kent, and I would ask the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) what effect unrestricted trade would have on his county. It is an agricultural county producing hay, horses, oats, and other grains, and containing valuable stone quarries; and I venture to say that all these productions have found a market in the United States, save a small quantity that has been sent to the Upper Provinces; and my hon. friend is himself engaged in that very carrying trade from the County of Westmoreland to the United States. Go up and down the Bay of Fundy, and ask where all the vessels sailing there are going to, and you will find that in spite of the heavy duties imposed by the United States, they are carrying products seeking a market in the United States. When I was a boy on the north shore smelts were only caught as a pastime by boys; but to-day, many tons of smelts are caught every winter and sent to the United States, the only market that will receive them, and the fishing of smelts has become a fruitful source of revenue during the winter season to people living in the Counties of Northumberland and Kent. The same is the case with the root crops of our Province, and the valuable quarries in the Counties of Albert and Westmoreland. The great market, in which the demand is growing greater every day and would be quadrupled, I was going to say increased in volume ten times, had we unrestricted reciprocity, is to be found in the United States. Now, the great cry is that the manufacturers will be injured by reciprocity. But, I think, if you went to New Brunswick, you would find that Mr. Gibson, who, as an individual cotton manufacturer owns probably the largest mill on the continent, will tell you that he would be perfectly willing to have the American market opened to-morrow; and if you go to the border line of the State of Maine, you will find that the manufacturers there are ready at any moment to enter into competition with the United States. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have great advantages over the State of Maine, in being more fertile and possessing mines and minerals, which are absent from the State of Maine. The only fertile portion of the State of Maine is the valley of the Aroostook, adjoining New Brunswick, which was taken away from us by the Ashburton Treaty, but the rest of Maine is sterile. Notwithstanding that, we find that the State of Maine has more looms and spindles than the whole of Canada—why? Because they have a large market; and not only that, but the States of New Hampshire and Maine have more looms and spindles to-day than New York and Pennsylvania put together. With the natural advantages we possess in the Maritime Provinces, with our great water powers far in excess of hers, and with our advantages of climate, I believe we could enter fairly into competition with any of the manufacturers in the United States. We would then be able to keep our people. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) seems to think that the people are not going away from the country; but I venture to say that you cannot go into any portion of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, or Prince Edward Island, where you would not find in every cottage or farmhouse at least one vacant chair, left by someone who has gone to the United States. The Postmaster General said that by the census of 1880 only 7,500 people went to the United States from Prince Edward Island. That may be true; but remember that was at the time the National Policy was inaugurated. I would like to see the returns of 1889. Anyone who will go to the international steamboats leaving the wharf of St. John, will find there morning after morning the stalwart men and women, the pride of the country, with their luggage, seeking to go to the United States.

Mr. HESSON. Why do they go?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Because of the taxation caused by the National Policy. My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) undertook to make a comparison between Massachusetts and Canada. He said that while Massachusetts had something like 1,700,000 people in her borders, about the same number of her sons were to be found in other States. That is true. Massachusetts is one of the oldest colonies in the Union. She was settled years before either Nova Scotia or New Brunswick were even thought of. But there is this difference between the exodus from Massachusetts and that from Canada, that in the case of Massachusetts, her sons and daughters remained under their own flag and did not seek a home on foreign soil, as the sons and daughters of Canada have done. My hon. friend spoke of the great output of coal from Nova Scotia and the large increase in its consumption. I would have been much more pleased if he had given us the quantity of coal from the Springhill mine as compared with that from other mines, because with regard to the Springhill mines we have been paying a very heavy tax on coal. We are paying a duty of 60 cents a ton, and probably the extra price caused by some combine to raise the prices, and lastly the people are paying taxes to have the coal drawn over the intercolonial at the expense of the public for the benefit of the producers. The coal taken from the Springhill mine is a very large proportion of that raised in Nova Scotia, and the quantity taken from that mine which is fostered and pampered at the expense of the public and carried on at an enormous loss, show what has to be paid for out of the public exchequer. In addition my hon. friend says it shows the country has increased. But look at the miles of railway which have been established throughout the country since then. We all know that within the last few years all the railways have become coal consumers and that wood has ceased to be a locomotive fuel, and the increase in the quantity of railway mileage and in the quantity of coal consumed by railways would quite account for the increase of coal which my hon. friend has put forward as an instance of the great development of the country. The objections made to this resolution are, first, that it is a weakening of the tie of the mother country, and that it will produce annexation. So far as I can judge by the past, so far as leading to annexation is concerned, any desire of that kind dies out according as our prosperity increases, and it is only when we are in penury, when our business is depressed, and we are hampered by high taxation and dear living, that the craving for some relief turns people's minds towards the United States. So far as I know, I believe that sentiment has not prevailed to any great extent. The more we prosper commercially the more markets are open to us, the less that feeling prevails. New Brunswick is peopled by the descendants of the men who left Massachusetts and New York, rather than live under an alien flag, and who still retain to a large extent the feelings of their forefathers, but they feel that in endeavoring to have increased intercourse with our neighbors, and to cultivate the kindly spirit that ought to exist between us in our social and commercial life, while it increased our prosperity would strengthen our connection with the other country. Mr. Wiman, in one of his addresses, shows that Canadian loyalty is a barrier to annexation. He said:

"Those who are most acquainted, however, with the public sentiment in Canada know that loyalty to British institutions permeates the whole country, and that with mother's milk has been drunk in the love for the mother land; love for the good Queen who has ruled them so wisely for half a century, and pride in all the glory of British connection; belief in British prowess, and faith in the integrity of the British Empire. Americans, who have shown their love of country by the vast sacrifices they have made to preserve its integrity, will not quarrel with this devotion of their Canadian neighbors, because they love their own land and the great nation on the other side of the sea that gave their ancestors birth. The sturdy loyalty of Canadians, to-day, never endured the severe strain that was put upon the loyalty of the colonies a hundred years ago, and the resistance to which resulted in the independence and creation of the great constellations of commonwealths that now rule so large a portion of the continent. The results of that resistance to British rule have not been confined to the United States. They have indeed been world-wide in their effects; but to no country in the world have the results been more beneficial than to Canada. The difference in the mode of government of Canada by the British authorities now, as compared with the mode of government attempted in the colonies previous to the American revolution, is the difference between despotism and freedom—the difference between the dawn of an imperfect civilisation and the full sunlight of the glorious present. Had the same liberality prevailed in the latter part of the last century in the treatment of her colonies by Great Britain as has prevailed in the latter half of this century, there could have been no American revolution; there could have been no cause for separation and the great experiment of republican institutions, on the vast scale, now being worked out, would never have been undertaken, because it would never have been justified. Canada has, however, profited by these stupendous events, which for a hundred years have been occurring on her border, and in no respect greater than that, while she has maintained the British connection, she has enjoyed all the privileges of self-government. Thus, to-day, except in the mere treaty-making power, she is just as free and just as self-reliant as if she were entirely independent. The relations which exist between England and the Dominion imply no interference whatever with local government; not even with the tariff which taxes the products of Great Britain, as you have seen, with the same rigor that applies to the products of all other countries. Not a dollar of contribution is asked from the colony to the Exchequer of England, while not a dollar of money of the British government is asked for by the Canadian authorities. About the only tie that is visible between the mother and daughter now is, that the mother selects, every now and again, some distinguished member of the British aristocracy, who, as a guest, she coolly asks Canada to entertain for a few years as a representative of royalty in the person of the Governor General. A few years ago the selection was made from the Queen's own household, and for a time the Marquis of Lorne and his charming wife, Princess Louise, held a mimic court at Ottawa. More recently the able and accomplished Lord Lansdowne, with his good lady, have dispensed the hospitalities of Rideau Hall, at Ottawa, the Vice-Royal residence, and won all hearts by their cordiality and unaffected courtesy. It is now only by such ties as these that a connection is visible between Great Britain and her great colony on this side of the sea, implying an interference so slight as to be in startling contrast with the exactions, annoyances, and petty tyrannies exercised by Great Britain with her North American colonies prior to the American Revolution. It is true that Canada is the gainer of the heritage of self-government, as the result of the struggle for independence which the United States endured; while her loyalty has been cultured and made perpetual by the liberality of the treatment she has received at the hands of the mother country."

That is put forward to the Americans by Mr. Wiman who advocates commercial union, a step beyond what is proposed in the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) spoke of the city of St. John, and his statements were contradicted by the hon. the Minister of Finance. I think, if the hon. the Minister of Finance would go to St. John and through the country in that neighborhood, and see what the price of real estate as compared with what it was a few years ago, he would find that the best test of the condition of the Province. If it had not been for the position in which we were placed by the Ashburton Treaty, if it had not been that lumber was sawn by Americans in the harbor of St. John and shipped to the United States, we would have been in a very sad state indeed, but now nearly all the mills in the city of St. John are sawing American lumber under American owners, and that is shipped to the United States, and that has done something to keep us up. By our ships being employed and being a source of revenue, instead of a source of loss, as they were a few years ago, and by the increase in the price of lumber, a better feeling is now prevailing than has been for three years past, when we were in a very depressed state in St. John. The suspension of that great cotton factory, which cost $235,000, and was sold for $75,000, and of other factories caused a great depression in that city. Our shipyards were idle, as they were throughout the whole Province of New Brunswick, and I believe that now only one solitary ship is being built in the Province. The Postmaster General referred to the Zollverein, and said that the result of the adoption of this resolution would be political union. The only Zollverein I am aware of was the German Zollverein, and that existed for half a century before the German Empire was consolidated, and that consolidation took place, not in consequence of the Zollverein, but, as has been stated, by the clash of swords and the clang of arms. It was by the power of the King of Prussia that Germany was brought under his control, and he became the German Emperor. It was altogether independent of the Zollverein which existed for half a century without any attempt being made to alter the political status. At this late hour, I will not detain the House. In our portion of the Dominion, this is a burning question, a question of vital importance, and every day, as the intercourse between the two countries increases, we find that the feelings of harshness which may have existed have been softened by time, and that there is now a friendly feeling between these countries. Certainly no citizen of St. John ought to hesitate to bear his testimony to that, because, in our hour of distress and trouble, when everything was swept away from us by that great conflagration, the first people who came to our relief were American citizens. The cities of Boston and New York came to our assistance at once, while, though that great emporium, as I think it is called, the city of Montreal, voted some money, they never sent it to us. I believe the Americans are willing to meet us in a friendly spirit. I have been a great deal in the United States, and have met that people socially and commercially, and I believe their feelings are every day growing warmer and warmer towards the people of this country. They feel that we are of one race and of one blood, and I believe, if the Government of the day, instead of allowing that fishery matter to delay day after day, instead of, when they were called upon by Lord Derby in 1833 to make arrangements for a treaty, letting it hang until they were forced to send Sir Charles Tupper to Washington and to make a treaty on the eve of a presidential election, if they had taken earlier measures, we would have had now a treaty in force which would have avoided the irritation which now exists, in consequence of the Government, by little petty measures, destroying those kindly feelings which exist in the people of the United States. I know of a case which took place the other day. The owner of a trading vessel, whose vessel has been trading for years between New York and St. John and had been allowed to go into harbors of refuge without any petty restrictions, found the other day that the fishermen laid an information that his vessel was in a certain harbor, and the result was that the vessel was fined $1,500, and I believe that, unless he can get relief from the bonds he has given, he will have to abandon the vessel altogether. We on both sides of the boundary line are of the same blood and speak the same language, and we came from the same motherland. The men who fought the battles in olden times, the great battles of the commonwealth, the battles of Marston Moor and Naseby, were the ancestors of those who fought before Richmond and Gettysburg. They are engaged in the same object that we are in creating a new civilisation on this great continent, and it ill-becomes us, with the same faith, with the same ties, and endeavoring in the same way to extend progress and freedom throughout this continent, to shut ourselves within ourselves, each holding itself in selfish isolation. Instead of that, let us throw down the barriers between us, and unite in carrying out what I believe to be the destiny of these two great countries, and in spreading civilisation and freedom, not under the same flag but with the flag of the Republic and the flag of the mother country floating over the same continent.

Mr. HESSON. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question; call in the members.

Mr. HESSON. If the House is ready for a division, I do not desire to delay it. If it is distinctly understood that this terminates the debate, I am willing to take my seat.

Mr. SPEAKER. Call in the members.

Mr. WATSON. I had the floor before the members were called in.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, the hon. member behind me Mr. Hesson arose, and the sense of the House apparently was that we should close the debate. He said that if it was so, he would re-ume his seat, and the House cheered him, and it was so understood. I think that under the circumstances the hon. gentleman should not now try to speak, especially after the Speaker had given orders to call in the members. If, on the contrary, the House permits the debate to go on, of course my hon. friend behind me has the floor.

Mr. WATSON. I do not wish at all to transgress any rule or to offend the House, but I must say that I am entirely opposed to the system apparently adopted by which the leaders of both sides agree that the debate shall close at a certain time. I acknowledge that my hon. friend opposite has the floor, if the debate is allowed to go on. I had intended to speak on this question last year, but a similar arrangement was entered into by some members of this House, and I remained silent. On this occasion I should like to address the House for a few moments on this question, coming, as I do, from a Province whose people are largely interested in trading with the United States; and if the House would permit me, I would like to speak.

Mr. DAVIN. As a question of privilege has been raised, I would like to say a word upon it. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) states that he would like to address the House. Now, Sir, although some members of the Government and some members supporting, and some members opposed to the Government, may wish to close the debate, if any member of this House thinks that he has something to say that it would be well for the House to hear, and that he should say in the interests of his constituents, I say it is a very improper thing to try to close the debate. Let me say on this question of privilege that I think it is a system utterly unknown to the British Parliament for the leaders on both sides to arrange with the whips to speak to the Speaker and arrange who shall speak or shall not speak. I say there is scarcely anything that could be conceived that would strike such a blow at the independence of Parliament as that—strike a fatal blow at free discussion, strike a fatal blow at the dignity of the Speaker, because if the Speaker puts his speakership in commission, becomes a speaker faintant, whereas the leaders on both sides would be maitres du palais, and then what would become of the independence of this House? I agree with my hon. friends of the party to which I belong, that we are face to face with a great crisis in this country. According to them—and I agree with them—whether by design or by accident, members on the Opposition side of the House take a tone that is calculated to play into the hands of those who would land this country in annexation to the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, Oh!

Mr. DAVIN. Did I not guard the statement properly so that it would not be offensive to you? I said, according to them, it is of the greatest possible importance, because we are face to face with a great crisis, and it would be a perfectly monstrous thing that free discussion should be shut off on such an occasion. As the question has been raised by the hon. member for Marquette, I wish to stigmatise this arrangement as it should be stigmatised.

House divided on amendment of Sir Richard Cartwright:

Amendment negatived.

Mr. AMYOT. I voted through error, and I wish to have my name erased. When I heard that Gen. Laurie, the member for Shelburne, had met with a serious accident and that he could not find a pair, I said I would pair with him, but I was not told that the pair had been accepted.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Resolutions reported.

ADJOURNMENT—ROYAL ASSENT TO BILLS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have received from the Governor General's secretary a message stating that the Hon. Mr. Justice Strong, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber tomorrow afternoon at three o'clock, for the purpose of giving assent to the Bills which have passed the Senate and House of Commons during the present Session.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1:35 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 20th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

GOVERNMENT STEAMER CRUISER.

Mr. COOK asked, Is the Government aware that the Government steamer Cruiser on the lakes carried last season an engineer who was an American citizen while so engaged, and that the said engineer carried an American certificate instead of a Canadian certificate?

Mr. TUPPER. During the voyage of the Cruiser on her way to Sturgeon Bay, the regular engineer of the ship was taken suddenly ill, and, without reference to the department, the captain of the Cruiser engaged an engineer, who had an American certificate, temporarily, while the regular engineer was ill. It was supposed the engineer would be back to his ship in a few days. The engineer so employed was altogether employed two months, and is not now in the employ of the Government.

COLLECTOR AT THREE RIVERS.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec) asked, 1st. Whether the Government is aware that the collector for the port of Three Rivers has levied, or attempted to levy, duties on catalogues distributed gratuitously by the booksellers of London and of Paris? 2nd. Whether, in so doing, the said collector is acting under orders from the Government?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the absence of the hon. the Minister of Customs, I would say that the Government is not aware that the collector at Three Rivers has levied, or attempted to levy, duties on catalogues, but if he has, he would only be carrying out the law. There are no orders given to the collector on the subject.

POSTMASTER AT THREE RIVERS.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec) asked, 1st. Whether the Government is aware that the postmaster at Three Rivers exacts, or insists on exacting, postage on newspapers and reviews addressed to persons who return them because they refuse to receive them? 2nd. Whether it is by order of the Government that the said postmaster so acts?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government is informed that the postmaster at Three Rivers does not exact, or insist on exacting, postage on newspapers and reviews addressed to persons who return them because they refuse to receive them. The postmaster at Three Rivers has received no special instructions, but acts in accordance with the regulations in force throughout the Dominion.

FISH PROPAGATION, N. W. T.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is taking steps to have the lakes and rivers of the North-West Territories stocked with varieties of fish not now found in those waters, but which from analogy, and according to the opinion of competent persons, would thrive there?

Mr. TUPPER. The department has made enquiry, and received reports upon this subject of stocking the rivers and lakes in the North-West Territories with varieties of fish not found there, and at present the question of transportation is engaging the attention of the department.

JESUITS' ESTATES ACT.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the notices of motion are called, I would ask the hon. gentleman if he has considered the subject of giving up a day to the discussion of the Jesuits' Estates Act, and, if so, what day he is prepared to suggest to the House?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In consequence of an informal communication from my hon. friend opposite, I spoke to my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), who says he is going to move on that subject, and, with his assent and concurrence, and after discussing the matter with other hon. friends, it is proposed to bring on Supply early on Tuesday next, so as to give my hon. friend the opportunity of moving in the matter.

Mr. LAURIER. I am very glad to hear the statement made by the hon. gentleman. It is, then, understood that the question will come up on Tuesday?

Mr. TUPPER.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The opportunity will be given on Tuesday for the hon. member to move in the matter.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the papers be printed by that time?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are being printed now.

SHORT LINE RAILWAY.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I desire to make a statement to the House in reference to an important matter, and, as it may take more time than I should properly occupy in a mere statement, to put myself in order, I would move that the House adjourn. My object is to bring to the notice of the House the facts connected with a very important measure which is likely to engage their attention with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. In 1835 the Government supplemented the previous grant for the construction of a line of railway from Sherbrooke to St. John, vid Mattawamkeag, and from Mattawamkeag to Harvey and Fredericton, and Salisbury, connecting with the Intercolonial Railway line to Halifax. The subsidy was $250,000 for 20 years. On that occasion it was understood that the Government would take every proper means and every security in order to secure the construction of that line to Salisbury, and the hon. the Minister of Public Works, speaking on that subject in reference to a motion made by the member for Guysborough, used this language:

"I am sure the hon. gentleman will be pleased to hear the declaration which the Government makes through me, that in the arrangements to be made with the company to build the railway, and to take advantage of this vote of money, of $250 000 during 20 years, the Government will take care to secure the completion of the railway, not only to Mattawamkeag, but also to Salisbury, and if that is not secured, there will be no subsidy given. We must act in good faith; the faith of Parliament is pledged, and we must take care that that money is employed as Parliament wishes."

In the Session of 1887 (his question was also before the House, and on that occasion, when a vote was submitted to the House, I took occasion to make an enquiry of the Minister of Finance of that day. I read from the Hansard:

"Mr. JONES. I see there is an item here for the Short Line Railway; and while we are on that subject I would like to ask the Minister of Railways to give us some information with reference to the Short-Line Railway which is now going on to the cities of St. John and Halifax, and which, it was expected, would shorten very much the distance from Montreal to those cities. There is a good deal of anxiety at present, on account of reports that they were about connecting with the Maine Central Line, instead of proceeding with the work as originally contemplated to Fredericton, Salisbury and Moncton; and if that is the case, it would appear from the information which reaches us indirectly, that while the road would have an advantage in connecting with the American line, the distance to be gained by the connection with St. John would not be anything like what was originally contemplated. I have heard it stated by a person who pretends to be well informed, that the line has been deflected so much, owing to the lack of accuracy in the original survey, that the distance to Halifax will not be shortened fifty miles. I should like to have some information from the Minister of Railways on that point, because the expenditure can only be justified on the ground that it would shorten the distance to Halifax and St. John by over 200 miles; and if, as is said to be the case—I speak from personal knowledge—it will not shorten it more than to the extent I have named, I think the intention of Parliament will not be carried out. If the hon. gentleman is in a position to give any information on this subject, I know it would be very acceptable just now, when the question is being discussed a good deal in the Lower Provinces.

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is aware that that work is in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, with whom a contract has been made, and that contract is on the line originally agreed upon by Parliament, to carry the road to Mattawamkeag, and from Mattawamkeag, the company, as I understand, have made arrangements with the Maine Central Railway and the New Brunswick Railway to go on to St. John. That was always the intention. The road is therefore being constructed precisely on the line and in the terms of the contract approved by Parliament, and the work is going on vigorously; and I am informed by the company that the line will be completed by the end of this year. The other portion of the contract requires the line to go from Harvey to Fredericton and from Fredericton to Moncton, for the Halifax connection, and that the company are also bound under their contract to construct on the line originally laid down by Parliament.

"Mr. JONES. If my information is correct, they are constructing the branch from Mattawamkeag to the central railway, and no progress is being made on the other branch. I am aware that it is said to be under the charge of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but it appears to me the Government should exercise supervision over those roads when public money is expended on them.

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly, the contract is with them.

"Mr. JONES. I would like the hon. gentleman to inform the House whether progress is also being made on the line from Harvey to Fredericton. I am informed that it is not.

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand that they are concentrating their attention on the main work first, and that they will then take up the other; but they are bound by the contract to take up the other and prosecute it vigorously, and complete it within a certain time."

That discussion took place in this House. In 1887, Sir Charles Tupper stated at a public meeting in Halifax, in reference to the same undertaking:

"When I stated last night that the last act I did before leaving London was to sign, as joint trustee with Lord Revelstoke and Lord Wolverton, the bonds for the construction of this line of railway (the Short Line) by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and that it is now in their hands; when I told him (Mr. Jones) that, he felt that it was a death-knell ringing in his ears."

And at a meeting the following night he repeats himself in these words:

"I have already told you that this gigantic Pacific Railway Company, with between 4,000 and 5,000 miles of constructed railway now in operation, with an army of 25,000 men in their employ, and expending money to an extent that is calculated to sustain and develop a country of itself, if we had to rest upon it almost alone. When that company have declared by the most solemn, important and business-like act that it is possible for them to do—by putting their hand and seal to a contract binding them to build not only the short line of railway that comes to St. John, but also the short line of railway that passes St. John by coming from Fredericton to Moncton, because that is in the bond, and that is the work with which they are immediately to grapple."

In connection with this statement of the late hon. the Minister of Finance, I think it is extremely desirable that the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should be laid upon the Table of the House before the Bill to which I have referred is proceeded with.

Sir JOHN A. MADONALD. My hon. friend, the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), made a motion the other day, which was carried, that all the papers connected with the Short Line should be brought down. They will be brought down; I do not really know why they are not brought down already, but they will be brought down at once.

Mr. LAURIER. In view of the fact that the Bill, concerning which my hon. friend wants this particular information, may come up at any moment, it is important that these papers should be brought down, not only at an early moment, but now, in the same manner that the hon. gentleman brought down, yesterday, papers connected with another question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, yes, the papers ought to be brought down at once.

Mr. LAURIER. What my hon. friend wants is that bond concerning the sale of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will bring down all the papers, all the bonds that we have got.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Will this be brought down before the Bill is proceeded with?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Bill is now in the Railway Committee, and before we proceed with it, in this House, I will see that the papers are brought down.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Was there such a contract?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot say until I see the papers. I have not looked at the paper yet.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Sir Charles Tupper says that there is.

Motion withdrawn.

DISMISSAL OF CAPTAIN R. CAMPBELL.

Mr. PERRY moved for:

Return of all correspondence between the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Ottawa, and A. Lord, Esq., agent, Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, or any other person, having reference to the dismissal of Capt. Ronald Campbell, harbor master for Summerside. Also copy of all complaints made against the said Capt. Ronald Campbell, showing by whom made, with a copy of evidence touching said dismissal."

He said: I wish to give the reasons for making this motion, Mr. Campbell was appointed in 1874, and he was dismissed in 1887. During all the time that he served I am not aware that he neglected his duty as harbor master for Summerside, and I do not know any reason why he was abruptly dismissed in 1887. I suppose some complaints have been made; but I do not believe any complaints were made that he had neglected his duty. I am afraid that he was discharged because he was accused of having voted for the Liberal candidates in 1887. Well, complaints were made, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries ordered Mr. Lord, the Marine Agent in Charlottetown, to hold an investigation, and a day was appointed for that purpose. It is hard to believe that Mr. Campbell was never invited to go to that court, he was never subpoenaed to go to that court, but it was held all the same. Well, the parties who made the complaint took a person well known about the police court, a person well known in the jail, and they called him forward, and without inviting Mr. Campbell to be present, they got this man to swear that Mr. Campbell, on election day, gave him a dollar to vote for the Liberal candidates. But Mr. Campbell has sworn that he does not know this person, that he has never given him, or anybody else, one dollar to get him to vote for any man. I do not know myself, Mr. Speaker, whether Mr. Campbell voted for the Liberal or the Government candidates. I do not know his politics. I never saw him attending any meeting, I never heard him speak at any meeting, and I never knew that he canvassed in any election. I am at a loss to understand why he was dismissed so abruptly without having an opportunity of coming forward before the court and defending himself. I suppose a report has been made; I think I ought to have the privilege of inspecting that report, but I suppose I will not get it. It is nearly seven weeks since I asked for the return of a report on the Lobster Fisheries from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and I have not got it yet.

Mr. TUPPER. It is on the Table.

Mr. PERRY. Well, Mr. Speaker, they came in good time. Where were they all this time?

Mr. TUPPER. On the Table, for some days—two or three days ago.

Mr. PERRY. They were not here last night.

Mr. TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. PERRY. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. TUPPER. They were on the Table.

Mr. PERRY. I do not know that. I went to the department and asked if the returns were there, and the hon. gentleman's subordinates said they were not. Now let him settle that question between himself and his subordinates. He is not going to run that down my throat, positively that these papers were on the Table for several days. They were not on the Table last night. The witness upon whose testimony the department dismissed that gentleman, has been guilty of telling a lie, and Mr. Campbell's enemies have got him dismissed because he was wise enough to vote for the Liberal candidates. Sir, I want to know if that is British justice and fair play. I do not blame my hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the present incumbent in that department, but I blame the Minister of Marine who was then in that department, now the Minister of Finance. If it is British fair play to condemn a man without giving him a hearing, I think it is a queer interpretation of British fair play. I am anxious to find out the reason, the grounds for Mr. Campbell's dismissal; I want to know whether he was charged with neglecting his duty. Sir, I am sure that my hon. friend in that department will not stand up here now and say that Mr. Campbell has been guilty of mismanaging his department. Mr. Campbell is a man of good standing in Summerside. He is a man who is not dependent upon the office, he can live independent of the Government. He has a good reputation, he is a good citizen, he is a man well off, he is a credit to Summerside, and a credit to the country that gave him his birth, and that has given him a living independent of all a harassing Government can give him. Sir, I have reason to complain of those gentlemen, Mr. Lefurgey and Mr. Hackett—if they did make the complaints, I do not know that they did—but I believe that when they found themselves defeated at the polls and found that Mr. Campbell had voted against them, they wished to have revenge upon him. Without going into the merits of the case I may state that the acting Minister of Marine, without any proper investigation being made and without giving this gentleman an opportunity of vindicating his conduct before a court of enquiry, dismissed him. And for what? Was it because he voted for me and my colleague? There was no other cause. He has not been charged with having neglected his duties, with having neglected the care of the buoys or with having done any wrong act. I contend he has not done anything for which he should be dismissed, and I exceedingly regret that the department should have been led away by the ipse dixit of the defeated candidates. The same thing is occurring now at other points. Similar occurrences are taking place in the Post Office Department. An application was made by 150 respectable citizens for a post office at a certain point in the county, and their representations were backed up by the two representatives of the county, but one of the defeated candidates at the late elections merely wrote to the Post Office Department to say that the post office was not wanted, and the people had to do without it. Is that the state of things what we have to expect? Is everybody to be a slave to the present Government in order to obtain justice in this country? If so, it is a very sad state of affairs. I charge the Department of Marine with having dismissed this officer, not for neglect of duty, but because he voted for us, and further, that the officer has been dismissed without having an opportunity to appear in court to defend himself. I hope and trust we will hear no more of the dismissal of officers because they are Liberals. I do not know whether anyone disclosed the fact as to how this officer voted, but it appears that hon. gentlemen opposite have to revenge themselves on some one, and that is the explanation of his dismissal; but the more they do that, the worse it will be for themselves, and the more the eyes of the people will be upon them, and they will fail to obtain the goodwill of the people by such a vindictive act.

Mr. TUPPER. In the first place, let me set myself right with the hon. gentleman in regard to the delay in bringing down the returns and papers asked by this House. I think I made a mistake a few moments ago, and it is only right I should correct the mistake at once. I had reference to a return which was moved for in regard to bounty claims filed from Prince Edward Island. There have been three returns moved for lately for papers from my department, and two of those are already on the Table, and the return to which I now think the hon. gentleman had reference was the one relating to lobster fishing, which is not yet on the Table of the House. This is, however, through no fault of anyone, and it will be brought down in a few days, but it requires certain care in preparation and the collection of information that is not immediately at hand. With regard to the particular charge which the hon. gentleman makes against the department in relation to the dismissal of the harbor master in 1887, I think if he had confined his remarks to the first division, which he seems to have made in his argument, it would have been better, and then when the papers were brought down he could have adduced the second branch of his argument; and if he had adopted this course I think he would, when the papers were brought down, have refrained from making the statements he has made across the floor of the House. The first branch of his argument went this far, that he did not know why the officer was dismissed, and his ignorance of the reason was obvious in the latter branch of his argument, when he stated, for instance, that the officer was dismissed without any enquiry or investigation being made, without any opportunity being given to the officer to be present and heard in his own behalf, and simply because he voted for the hon. gentleman, the Liberal candidate, at the elections held in that year. It is not satisfactory to the House to discuss very fully this matter at the present time, as the information relating to it is solely in the possession of the department, and, in consequence, I can only meet the statement made by mentioning that when the papers are brought down, the hon. gentleman will find that specific charges were made against the harbor master, not for voting, as he had a perfect right to do, for the Liberal candidates at that election, but because he not only voted for those candidates while in the employ and service of the Government, but he canvassed actively against the candidates supporting the Government; he abused the Government of the day in the most violent language; he offered bribes to a voter to vote for the Liberal candidates; and not only offered a bribe but was busy in driving voters to the polls who voted for the Liberal candidate. Those were the charges, and they were investigated by the agent of the department, a gentleman not in political sympathy with the Government of the day, but that does not matter. The evidence was taken, and that evidence will be laid before the House, and so far from the suggestion of the hon. gentleman that this man had not an opportunity to be heard, I may say that he received notice of the time and place of the investigation, that he attended that investigation and cross-examined the witnesses. The report of the agent on which the officer was dismissed, together with the evidence containing the points to which I have alluded, will be brought down as soon as possible, and I am sure it will be pleasant to the hon. gentleman to know that the action was not based upon the one statement he supposes it to have been based upon, viz., that this officer simply exercised his right under the franchise.

Mr. YEO. I think the hon. Minister, in the statement he has made to the House, is a good deal astray. If I remember aright the hon. gentleman was not in charge of the department at the time in question and had no personal knowledge of the matter; at all events, under the circumstances it is not much use to discuss the subject until the papers are laid on the Table of the House. Mr. Campbell, however, never took an active part in the election, to my knowledge, and those who are best acquainted with him and with his doings at the election will be able to say that he may have voted, but if so, no one knew how he voted, and as to the charge that he bribed anyone or drove anyone to the polls, or canvassed for the Liberal candidate, or took any action against the Government, that cannot be proved. I think there was one gentleman who came forward and stated that he had been offered money by Mr. Campbell, but Mr. Campbell swore that he never saw him and never knew that there was such a man, and in fact I understand that Campbell was not notified, but happened to come into the court towards its close. Mr. Lord is a strong party man; there can be no stronger party man; he was appointed by the present Government, and he did all he could in that way, and Mr. Campbell was told, at the close of the court, that he would be given a chance for investigation. The present Finance Minister dismissed him in a very summary way without giving him any chance to clear himself. When the papers come down we shall be able to go more fully into the whole subject.

Motion agreed to.

FISHING IN THE COUNTIES OF BERTHIER, MASKINONGE, ETC.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL (translation) moved for :

1st. Copies of any order or regulation adopted by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, with a view to regulate fishing and to put in force a system of licensing and taxing of fishing apparatus, in the counties of Berthier, Maskinongé, St. Maurice, Richelieu, Yamaska and Nicolet, during the two years ending 31st December, 1888;

2nd. Copies of all instructions forwarded, during the period aforesaid to the Fishery officers having jurisdiction in the said counties, respecting the enforcement, suspension, modification and re-enactment of the said regulation;

3rd. Copies of all reports and information furnished by the Fishery officers to the Department of Marine and Fisheries in relation to the enforcement of the said regulation;

4th. A list of all the fishermen of each of the said counties, as furnished by the Fishery officers, showing those who took out the license so required, the amount paid by each of them, the total amount received as the product of the said licenses from the date of the enforcement of the said regulation up to the 31st December, 1888; and also those who did not take out the license so required, and whose fishing gear was confiscated or not, as the case may be;

5th. Copies of all letters, petitions and correspondence addressed to the Government, or any of its members, asking for the repeal of the said regulation and the abolition of the said license, of all answers made thereto, and of all other documents relating to the matter.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last year, about the close of the Session, I had the honor of drawing the attention of the House and of the Government to certain petitions which had been presented by the fishermen of the counties bordering on Lake St. Peter, to wit, the counties of Berthier, Maskinongé, Saint Maurice, Yamaska and Richelieu, complaining of the imposition of a tax on fishing tackle. I received on that occasion, the support of the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Labelle), who joined his prayers with mine when asking the hon. the Minister of Fisheries to abolish this tax, which was useless to the Government and oppressive to the fishermen. The hon. the leader of the Government (Sir John A. Macdonald) at that time expressed himself in the following terms, in answer to the request which I made:—

"The Government have received several petitions from fishermen who are stated to be very poor and unable to pay the tax imposed. The Government have studied the question, but before coming to a definite decision, we must devote our time to the business of the Session. So soon as we have leisure, the day after prorogation, we will study the question. We shall endeavor as far as possible to satisfy the representations which have been made to us on the subject of the fishermen."

At this juncture I, myself, as well as the other members from the counties interested, received the impression that the Government were going to study the question and render justice to the fishermen. Unfortunately, they did not do so, and instead of being able to communicate the decision arrived at by the Government to those who were interested, the only news which we received was the redoubling of activity on the part of the employés of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and a system of terror established around Lake St. Peter, in the very midst of the fishermen who had reason for expecting, after the declarations made by the hon. the First Minister, that their request would be granted. This tax, it will be urged, is not a very great one. It consists of $1 on each scoop net, 5 cents per fathom on drag nets, 3 cents per fathom on stake nets, and 25 cents per hundred hooks employed on the night lines. These figures, taken alone, do, in fact, represent but a small amount, but when these small amounts are levied on a population poor and unable to pay them, such a net may have serious consequences. The fishermen seeing themselves prosecuted by the Government, threatened with fines and the forfeiture of their fishing tackle—for the instructions issued by the department left no option to the agents; the instructions being to seize the fishing gear of all persons who might be found fishing without a license addressed themselves, again, to the department and to the Government, and during the month of December last I had the honor of forwarding to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries a petition from the fishermen of my county, setting forth that they were unable to pay the tax, so that if they were compelled to pay it they would be obliged to leave their property, their homes and their country. Mr. Speaker, instead of making an enquiry, instead of sending officials for making certain whether these fishermen were really unable to pay for these licenses and at the same time provide subsistence for their families, the hon. Minister answered me in terms which I cannot characterize otherwise than as being cruel. In order that the House may have thorough knowledge of the subject, I shall read the answer which the hon. Minister sent me in return for the petition which I had the honor of forwarding to him. Here it is:

"DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES, Ottawa, 14th January, 1889.

"SIR,—I have the honor of acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, respecting the system of issuing fishing licenses in the County of Berthier"

"You are doubtless aware that my predecessor, Mr. Foster, gave very great attention to this question. It appears, from your representations as well as from those of other Members of Parliament, that the carrying out of this system was suspended in 1887; but that in 1888 the Government determined to again put it into force. Instructions to this effect were given before my joining the Ministry.

"In the opinion of this department, the fishing grounds of the county of Berthier possess a great commercial value; but I consider that unless they are effectually protected they will soon lose this value.

"I am aware how unpopular a system of licenses is at the outset; but in my opinion, this system ought to have been adopted long ago, and a further delay in putting it into operation will be injurious to the interests of the people in whose favor you are interesting yourself.

"The tax on scoop-nets is quite a nominal one; and if, as is alleged, this tax will have the effect of causing the disappearance of one-half of these fishing engines, I believe that the result, in the end, will be to the advantage of both the fish and the fishermen.

"The regulation fixing the size of the meshes at one and one-half inch is made with the object of preventing the destruction of the young fish, and allowing them to grow and increase in value.

"Regretting that I am unable to accede to your request as well as that of the petitioners.

"I subscribe myself, Sir,

"Yours truly,

"CHARLES H. TUPPER."

This, Mr. Speaker, is the reply which the fishermen of the county of Berthier received to the request which they humbly made to the hon. the Minister of Fisheries. I feel sure, and if my information is incorrect, the hon. Minister can correct it—I feel sure that absolutely no steps have been taken by the department to ascertain whether the fishermen of Grand Nord, as well as of the other counties bordering on Lake St. Peter, were able to pay for this license, and still continue their occupation. For my part, my information goes directly contrary, and I think that the members who are interested in the other counties are ready to bear me out in what I say, when I state that the keeping up of this license system will have, as its immediate result, the wiping out of one half of the fishermen of the five counties who are mentioned in my motion, and will drive away a great number from their possessions. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. the Minister of Finance, who acted last year as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, endeavored to justify the imposition of this tax on the plea derived from revenue considerations and statistics. The hon. Minister evidently desired to leave the House under the impression that, in 1888, the district in question was not subjected to the regulations relating to fishing and to the preservation of fish; that it was not provided with fishery officers, whose duty it was to prepare for the department the necessary statistics, and that the House was completely in the dark respecting the produce of the fisheries in the counties of Berthier, Maskinongé, Saint Maurice, Yamaska and Richelieu. Now, nothing is further from the truth. For a long time past the Department of Fisheries has had organised in these counties as well as in other portions of Canada, the system of fishery officers. The report of the hon. Minister of Fisheries for 1887,—I regret that the report for 1888 is not yet distributed and I have been informed at the Distribution Office where I asked for a copy, that it was not yet ready—the report for 1887 states that for the division of Berthier, Joliette and Montcalm, there are four fishery officers, and that the value of the produce of the fisheries in these counties for the years 1884, 1885, 1886 and 1887 was as follows:—In 1884, $15,699.40; in 1885, $5,424.40; in 1886, $13,231; and in 1887, $11,854.50. Not only these fishery officers give to the department a statement of the produce of the fisheries, but they even give the quantity of each kind of fish which has been caught within these limits; so that we find that there has been caught within these limits which I have mentioned: of eels, 1,820 pounds, in 1884; 1,420 pounds in 1885; 101,000 pounds, in 1886; and 3,300 pounds, in 1887. Trout, whitefish, maskinongé, as well as all other fish which are taken in these localities, are mentioned in the reports made by the fishery officers to the department, and by the department to the House. So that the pretext given last year that this new regulation has been promulgated with the object of collecting statistics of the fisheries in these counties, had no real foundation, because for a long time previous the Government had in operation the system of inspection and statistics as it now exists. Now, the hon. Minister of Fisheries, in the letter which he has addressed to me in answer to the petition of the fishermen of the county of Berthier, says, that in his opinion the fisheries of the county of Berthier possess a great value. If the hon. Minister, before writing this letter, had taken the trouble to consult his own reports, if he had taken the trouble to ascertain what kind of fish the petitioners caught in the waters of Lake St. Peter, he would have seen that with the fishing gear which he wishes to tax it is impossible to catch deep water fish, because these fish swim at a much greater depth than can be reached by the bag nets, the sweep nets and the other tackle which he has desired to tax. The only fish which these poor people catch are mud-pout, suckers, perch, bass, eel and pike, fish which are protected by no law, and possess hardly any value. These are the only kinds they are able to procure. In 1884, the report states that 631,250 pounds of mixed fish were taken. In 1885, this fell to 106,800 pounds; in 1886, to 29,200 pounds; in 1887, 114,500 pounds. Well, Mr. Speaker, after dividing the produce of this fishery among some fifty or sixty fishermen, I ask if it is possible that a greater sum than from $25 to $30 can be reckoned as the result of each man's labor. And if a tax is levied, of $1 for each bag net, of 5 cents a fathom for a sweep net, of 25 cents for each 100 hooks on the night lines, the fisherman is deprived by his means of probably one-fifth or one-sixth of the produce of his fishing, which renders it impossible for him to provide for his own wants and for those of his family. In this case, Mr. Speaker, figures do not fail us. The fish caught possess little value. The fishermen are poor; and when one talks of levying upon people in so wretched a condition, a tax of $1 per head, or $1 per drag net, to swell the public Treasury, it appears to me that people have but a faint idea of what the fisheries of Lake St. Peter are like. It appears to me that it is giving very poor pretext to sustain a bad policy. Once more, Mr. Speaker, the fishermen are, as a class, very poor, the produce of their fishing is the least possible, and they are unable to pay the tax which is imposed upon them. I appeal, then, to the sentiment of humanity in the hearts of the Ministry, and I ask the support of the House in their favor.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL (Translation). The object of my motion, Mr. Speaker, is to bring before the House all the documents connected with the various petitions which have been presented, as well as the instructions which have been given to the fishery officers of these various counties by the Department of Fisheries. We will then be in a position to know whether all the fishery officers have displayed in the counties interested the same activity they have been recommended to do by the Minister of Fisheries in his circular of the 19th April, 1888. In this circular signed by Mr. Bauset, for the Minister of Fisheries, we read, among other things, the following:—

"If any person refuses to obey orders, or is guilty of any violation of the law, you will at once seize his fishing gear, and report the fact to the department."

In the circular of 1887, the hon. Minister was not content with the making of a report to the department of the violations of the law, but he says:

"If any person refuses to obey your orders, or is guilty of any violation of the law, seize his fishing tackle and send it to the department."

When these various documents shall be laid before the House, and I hope that will be after as little delay as possible, for if the Government decide not to carry out the prayer of the petition which the hon. the First Minister promised to receive favorably last year, I shall be obliged to bring the matter anew before the House before the end of the Session; we shall know the number of fishermen who are protected by their license, as well as the amounts which have been collected by the department as the price of these licenses, and further, the number of those whose fishing gear have been confiscated. When the House is in possession of all these documents, I think that it will see that an injustice has been done, and that it is now time to make reparation for it.

Mr. LABELLE. My intention is not to censure the Government, but I want to ask that they shall do justice in this matter to our poor fishermen in Richelieu, Berthier and the adjoining counties. I do not think that the Government thoroughly understand the position of these fishermen, because, if they did, I am sure that they would not enforce the tax. I have told the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that what we wish the Government to do is to take off the tax on the "hoop nets," verveux. I hold that those fishermen ought not to be taxed at all, but at all events there should be no tax on the appliances which they use to take that common fish. It should be remembered that the fish they catch in that portion of the river and the adjoining counties is not a marketable fish, it is a common fish, and not even protected by the laws the same as other more valuable fish. There are millions of those fish in these shallow waters, and they are as numerous now as they were half a century ago, which is proof that they do not need protection, and they are caught in shallow water, where good, marketable fish is not taken. This fish, however, is the food of these poor people, and they have nothing else to live on. They catch a great deal of this fish, and they take it to the market, but they get a very low price for it, which does not enable them to pay any tax whatever. Let me call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in order to further prove the justice of the demand which we make in this matter, to the fact that fishermen in the Lower Provinces who are engaged in catching herring and mackerel are not taxed at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; they are.

Mr. LABELLE. Well, I have my authority from a very good source, and the hon. gentleman had better arrange that difference of opinion between himself and the member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas), who informed me that the deep-sea fishermen of the Lower Provinces were not taxed. Herrings, which are worth $5 a barrel, and mackerel, which are worth $28 a barrel, are not taxed, but those who catch salmon are taxed to the extent of 40 cents a barrel. If the Lower Province fishermen are allowed to catch a marketable fish—a fish which can be readily sold in the market, and on which they can make large profits—without paying any taxes, I think that the least the Government ought to do for us would be to take the tax off those poor fishermen of Richelieu, Berthier and surrounding counties. I have a great deal more confidence in the Government than my hon. friend from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), and I feel that when their attention is drawn to this subject they will, in a spirit of justice, look to the protection of those poor fishermen who have to earn their living by working day and night in order to make a few dollars to give bread to their children. If the Government imposes a tax on those fishermen, even though it be very small, it will be a very great burden on them. I hope that the Government will take off this tax on the poor fishermen of our counties.

Mr. TUPPER. This question, of course, is not a new one, but it involves a very important principle upon which Parliament has been acting ever since Confederation—that is, the propriety of the license system. In Ontario and Quebec, I believe, long anterior to Confederation this system was adopted, not so much for revenue purposes, as I understand it, but with the object of regulating the business of catching fish and of restricting to some extent and in some quarters the fishing, so as to prevent over-fishing. Now, if there be anything in the arguments so strongly urged to-day by both the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, that where fishermen are poor, we are to relax the regulations and abstain entirely from enforcing this system elsewhere in force, it seems to me that would attack the whole principle of the license system, because the system is not framed in view of these considerations but with a view of benefitting all fishermen, poor and rich alike, and protecting the fisheries from being exhausted by over-fishing; and we know how apt fishermen as well as other men are to take advantage of the present time to make as much as they can, regardless of the future. I briefly meet the argument as to the poverty of these fishermen in that way. But while this system is never popular in any district, and the enforcement of it seems at times to be hard, the fishermen do not often understand why the Government intervene between them and their business of catching fish which are common to all and, as they say, do not interfere with other occupations. Still, unpopular as it is, it has been the steady policy of this Parliament for some time back. Now, I am glad to be able to say that while, theoretically, the license fee may seem to be a tax, it is not so in reality. For instance, take the district to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, and the amounts paid for licenses. I have in my hand a statement in reference to not all the counties the hon. gentleman has alluded to, but the important ones, as Richelieu, Yamaska, Maskinongé and Berthier; and I find, running down the list of licenses, that the sums paid are as low as from 15 cents to 25 cents per man in some instances; there are a few men who have paid as much as $4 or $6; in one column there are a considerable number who have paid $2; in another column they range from $1.80 down to 50 cents; and so on. The fee paid by these men is not so very heavy. As to whether these fishermen are not only poor, but the tax inconsiderable, I regret that I could not follow the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution as closely as I would like to have done, not being sufficiently familiar with the language in which he addressed the House. I will not go back to 1884, as the hon. gentleman did, because these regulations were not then in force. I have the figures for 1888 giving the value of these fish, to show that no exceptional argument can be made with reference to the particular districts to which allusion has been made—certainly not as a whole. The value of fish caught in 1888 in Richelieu and Yamaska was $11,376, in St. Maurice and Champlain $85,619, and in Maskinongé and Berthier $11,682. These are approximations made in the usual way in which statistics are made by the officers of the districts. To show that the licenses are not for revenue purposes, I will take the amount that we pay for guardianship and official work in some of these waters; and I find that in a part of the districts mentioned—and the reason I am only taking a part is that I have not before me a complete memorandum of all the districts—the amount expended in protecting the division extending from Three Rivers to Coteau, including the Ottawa, in the year 1887–88, was $2,000, the total revenue derived by the department was $423, and the total number of licenses issued was 449, so that every license averaged about one dollar. So that if these districts are valuable, and the tax inconsiderable, certainly I would submit to the House that no case has been made out for exceptional treatment in those districts. Some hon. gentlemen who have put notices on the paper in reference to this matter, have pressed a new argument which I think the hon. member in charge of this motion did not press much to-day, that is, that while what I say may be correct of the districts as a whole, there are some portions of these districts where the fish are of so poor a description that they are merely used as food in the localities where the people are not very rich, and are not marketable, and not exported, or used in trade. That consideration has been pressed with considerable earnestness upon the department, and I have brought it to the attention of the Government, and it is being considered; because, as I have said, we have no desire to oppress the fishermen. The regulations are not those of any particular party, and we are anxious to meet the wishes of the fishermen so far as we can do so consistently, with the protection of the fishing interest itself; and further consideration will be given to the question as to whether it is possible, consistently with the regulations of the department, to make an exceptional rule in some of the districts where those special circumstances may exist. I have ordered an enquiry to be made as to that, and I have brought the matter to the notice of my colleagues, whose consideration will, of course, be given to the subject. I want to say, in reference to the circular that was issued, that the hon. gentleman will, on reflection, see that there is no such cruel spirit behind it as he supposes. It is a circular merely calling attention to the laws of the country, and follows on the enforcing of the license system; everything hinges on that. It would be far more cruel to refrain from sending a circular down to those fishermen, warning them of the consequences of violating the regulations, than to let the officers come suddenly upon them, and involve them in heavy penalties. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the effect of these regulations being to drive men out of the district, or out of the country. Well, that was the idea that he and those gentlemen who were with him propounded when they addressed the Government. It is quite true that they drew the attention of the right hon. the First Minister to the matter, and he promised to consider it. At that time it was stated the enforcement of these regulations would have a disastrous effect on the localities concerned. Well, we have had the regulations in force for some time, and I am glad to say that they do not seem to have driven away any people, as these gentlemen thought they would. I think the reason is, that in the working out, the fee is so inconsiderable that the consequences are not at all of a serious character. I again repeat that the demand which I have alluded to will engage the serious attention of the Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad indeed to find the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries approach this subject in such a calm, deliberate spirit, and to hear him intimate to this House that the Government are disposed to take the matter into consideration with the view of re-arranging the system under which the great fishing interest is carried on. While on my feet, I may say that either I misunderstood the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Labelle) or he misunderstood me in relation to my correction of a statement made by him, when he said there was no tax in the Lower Provinces for catching herring or mackerel. I would reply that in the bays or rivers of the Lower Provinces, as everywhere else, there is a tax upon the nets used for catching herring and mackerel, just as there is upon other fish; but I quite admit the correctness of the hon. gentleman's statement that in the case of vessels fitted out for the deep sea fishing or for fishing outside the coast, where the herring and mackerel are chiefly caught, there is no tax, but, on the contrary, there is a bounty given to vessels fitted out for that purpose. I sympathise with the motion of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoliel), and also with the views taken by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Labelle), in which he has so ably and eloquently submitted the interests of his poorer constituents; and I may say that I shall endeavor to impress upon the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries the propriety of considering this special application which has been made to-day. He should take up and review the whole system of licenses as applied to the river and bay fisheries of the whole Dominion. When I organised that fishery service and framed its first rules and regulations, I had in view very much the same object which my hon. friend confesses is the view of the Government—an object not of collecting revenue at all, but of regulating and controlling and protecting the carrying on of these fisheries. On a former occasion, I told my hon. friend that when a slight fee was imposed on the fishermen, it was never contemplated revenue should be raised, but it was imposed merely for the purpose of enabling the department to have some control over the fishermen. It was levied to enable the Government to regulate where nets should be set, and have some system of registration whereby they could follow up infractions of the law. The whole system of taxing fishermen is one I entirely disapprove of. I am now speaking, not in any spirit of hostility to the course pursued by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in maintaining the rules and regulations of the department, but for the purpose of suggesting a better system without seriously impairing the revenues of the Dominion. The system when established, with a small fee attached for the purpose of registration, was found to be very objectionable by the fishermen. No matter how small the fee you touch a class of men—a great many of whom are very poor, indeed—and those people, with poverty surrounding them, and with difficulties presenting themselves every day to find food for their families, would naturally object to even the smallest fee. I think, since my hon. friend has intimated to this House that he will take into consideration the propriety of revising the whole system of licensing the fisheries of this country, it will be well for him, and well, certainly, for a certain class of fishermen, if he would not impose any fee at all, but impose instead the taking out a license for the purpose of registration, and create a penalty if they fail to do so. By pursuing that course he will avoid the imposition of the tax, and will secure the object to be obtained by registration. He will be enabled to control the methods of conducting the fisheries, and at the same time give great satisfaction to a large class of the people who are very poor indeed. I may say that the fishermen of my own river, which I believe to be the finest fishing river in the Dominion, certainly for winter fishing, and the catch and export of smelt alone from that river is something enormous, and would surprise hon. gentlemen if they would look into the statistics. There are complaints far and wide over the whole river as to the licensing fees. True, they complain also of the rules and regulations and control of the department, but that is a necessity; about that I will not speak at present. What I ask the hon. Minister is that he should remove the paltry tax imposed, which only leads to irritation without bringing in any large amount of revenue. I make this suggestion in a friendly spirit, and I am sure my hon. friend will receive it in the same way.

Mr. LAURIER. It must be apparent to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) has brought up a real grievance from which a certain section of the country are now suffering. I am glad to notice that the tone of the Government in this respect is somewhat changed since last year. Last year my hon. friend brought the same subject to the attention of the Government, and then the statement was made that this license was exacted for the purpose of revenue. I am glad to see now that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries does not at all entertain this view. It would be preposterous to speak of these license fees as calculated to bring any revenue, and if they were, it would be all the more blameable. This light tax is not calculated to bring in revenue, while it is large enough to create a considerable irritation. It is in itself a light tax, but a tax may be light or onerous according to the means of the party who has to bear it. The people who now complain are a poor class, and the tax upon them is all the more onerous. As I understand it, the object of the license is, in some respects, to control the fisheries and prevent illegal fishing. This is a very inefficacious way of attaining that object. How does it work? If this tax is levied with a view of diminishing fishing, it will act in this way. It will allow those who are rich to fish, and prevent from fishing those who are poor, so that the very idea is one which cannot be entertained by this Parliament. I have no opinion to express on this subject. It may be desirable, perhaps, to restrict fishing, but if that is the real object the department have in view, the suggestion offered by my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) much better meets the case, and I hope the hon. gentleman will adopt it.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. The regulations which are now carried out in the counties mentioned in the motion were new in 1887. There was no license and no tax to pay in 1887. The system was established in that year only, and upon the representations of the member for the district the license and tax were suspended, but they were re-enacted in 1888, and they have been carried out since then. The kind of fish taken by this apparatus are not good fish, and have no commercial value, and when the Minister makes the distinction he does between marketable fish and those fish, he is under a mistaken impression. The fish caught by this apparatus are of no marketable value, and, therefore, the tax upon the apparatus bears upon the poor men who have no good fishing grounds. The statement I referred to was that which was addressed to the Minister in December, 1888, signed by 50 fishermen of the county, who stated that half of them would be compelled to leave their homes if this regulation were carried out. I hope that the licenses will be removed. I am willing to accept the view of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), but I hope that the tax upon the apparatus will be removed.

Mr. TUPPER. I think the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) has misunderstood my expression of opinion as to the object of these fees. While the object is not the collection of a revenue, the House should not lose sight of the very important fact that there would be a very heavy tax on the people of this Dominion for the preservation of the fisheries, unless we had that system in operation. I am not at all committing myself to the present system in saying this, but in the inland waters, and particularly in Ontario, where so many people take out these licenses, although the fee is a small one on each person, the result is that we get nearly every dollar which we spend on the protection of the fisheries. For instance, in Ontario, the House will, no doubt, be surprised to learn that, while the expenditure of last year in that Province was $19,000, in round numbers, we collected from these license fees over $18,000. It is, therefore, a very important matter. We collected altogether about $42,000 in Canada to go towards the expenditure which is made every year for the protection of the rivers. I simply desire to put myself right, as the leader of the Opposition drew from my remarks the idea that the fee had no purpose in connection with the revenue, but was merely imposed for registration purposes. What I meant to say was that, while the main object might be for purposes of registration and regulation of these fisheries—and sometimes it is necessary in order to prevent overfishing, as, for instance, in the case of the mackerel trap, for which a fee of $50 is charged—still we receive annually a large and important sum which is applied to the purpose of protecting this industry.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I was very glad to hear from the Minister of Marine that he intended to consider this whole question of the fisheries, and I would invite his attention to a broader view of the fishery question, and would ask him to ascertain whether it would not be desirable in the view of the Government, as I think it would be in the view of the people who are familiar with the subject, to ask the American Government to come to some arrangement in relation to purse seining. There can be no doubt that that practice is most destructive to the fish generally. On many occasions, when a vessel is out fishing for mackerel and draws her purse seine, it is only the large mackerel that are taken out, and perhaps out of fifty barrels there will not be more than twenty or thirty barrels of large mackerel. The small mackerel are all thrown away, and of course are dead. The same thing applies to herring, which are taken in large quantities in purse seines by mackerel fishermen, and, in fact, all kinds of fish are drawn in these purse seines; and when fishermen are only looking after one kind of fish, the rest are all thrown away. It is the opinion of fishermen, to my knowledge, that that is the reason for the destruction of the mackerel and herring fishery along the coast, and also of the larger fisheries, such as the codfish fishery. We know that the large fish feed on the smaller fish generally, and if you destroy one you destroy the other. This question is one of very great importance, and it would be worthy of the attention of the hon. Minister to ascertain whether some arrangements could not be come to with the American Government to prohibit the use of purse seines on their part as well as on ours. I believe that the Americans recognise the importance of this question, and I do not think they would object to enter into such an agreement. At all events, it is worthy of the earnest and early consideration of the Government.

Mr. TUPPER. I am glad to hear from the hon. gentleman on this very important subject. It is one which has engaged, and is still engaging the attention of the department, and I am in possession of very interesting reports from the different officers who have connection with the fisheries on this subject. I am sure that the hon. member will not be surprised to learn that there is a great difference of opinion amongst those officers, as there is amongst scientific men who are studying fish life, as to whether there is much injury, or any injury, caused to any great extent by purse seining. In England, I believe, Professor Huxley and others are carrying on quite a fierce discussion on the subject of deep sea fishing, and that some of them are contending that, while these restrictions may be useful in inland waters, yet in the deep sea these engines used by men cannot be compared with the natural enemies of these fish in regard to their destruction. However, this matter is being thoroughly investigated by the department.

Mr. KIRK. I am very glad this subject has come up for discussion at this moment. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has drawn the attention of the Government to this question, and he recommends that this Government should confer with the American Government, with a view to prohibit, if possible, the use of purse seines in deep sea fishing. Now, it appears to me there is but very little difference of opinion, I think, at least, on the coast of Nova Scotia, with regard to the injury that purse seining is doing within the three mile limit, and that is a matter which the Government have under their control. They can, if they wish, without the concurrence of the United States, enact a law to prohibit purse seining within the three-mile limit. Now, it is thought by fishermen along the shore, and I think correctly, that purse seining is very largely the cause of the scarcity of fish on the inshore fisheries during the last few years. Purse seiners are allowed to seine fish, no matter how closely to the shore. They surround the schools of mackerel with their seines, and haul them all on the deck of their vessels, whether they be great or small and they save only the large mackerel, while the small mackerel and all other small fish are thrown overboard. These fish float on the surface of the water for a while, and then sink to the bottom and foul the ground, or float to the shore, and rot there. Not only is there a large amount of fish destroyed in this way, but this method drives away fish from the inshore waters. The fish will not come in to shore whilst the ground is foul. The interests of our shore fishermen are seriously injured, and the fisheries have been largely a failure during the last two or three years, on account of the ground being fouled by the system of purse-seining. I would like the Minister to give his attention to that matter; it is one over which the Government has full control, without conferring at all with the United States Government.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I think the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken last are mistaken. The chief injury is caused by throwing the smaller fish away. I am certain that, so far as the mackerel is concerned, there is no waste.

Motion agreed to.

CLAIMS FOR LAND DAMAGES IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. MITCHELL. The motion now called for claims for land damages on Derby Branch, and the two subsequent motions, I intend to withdraw. I regret that the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government and the Minister of Public Works are not present, but it will be in the recollection of the House that when, a few days ago, I called attention to these motions and the probability of their not being reached, I suggested a means of getting these matters settled without occupying the time of the House. I said that if the right hon. gentleman would either deal with these matters, or entrust the business to one of his colleagues, I would be happy to meet him with a view to settling these claims that my constituents had in relation to some railway lands that were taken for railway purposes. I am happy to state that I met the Minister of Public Works, authorised by the right hon. gentleman, and in a few hours' time we settled pretty much all the claims that we had. 'Tis true they did not give over half what my constituents were entitled to, but as it is better to take a half loaf than no bread, I did not see a chance of getting much unless I accepted the suggestions proposed by the Minister as a compromise. I may say that he met me in a very proper spirit, and we came to a satisfactory arrangement about the larger portion of these claims; therefore, I withdraw these three motions. When the other motions are reached of a similar character, but which are not yet settled, owing to the department having to send to Moncton for information, I will have something further to say about them.

LUNENBURG HARBOR.

Mr. EISENHAUER moved for:

Return of copies of all correspondence between the Department of Public Works and the engineer sent to examine and survey the harbor of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, during the summer of 1888. Also all reports, maps and plans received by the department from said engineer.

He said: I have for some time been aware of the necessity that exists for dredging the harbor of Lunenburg, and have made representations to the Government. Last summer an engineer was sent down there; he spent a considerable time, and made a survey, a report and a plan. I called at the office of the department expecting to get that report, but I was told that I could not have access to it, that it was the property of the department, and made solely for the department. I was not aware that engineers are sent to various portions of the country, at public expense, to make reports and surveys only for the benefit of the department, but if that is the case I suppose I must submit to it. But a report has been handed to me by the chief engineer, Mr. Perley, in which he says:

"There are about ninety vessels belonging to this port which are engaged in fishing. Of this number about one-fourth are engaged in the West India trade during the winter, leaving about seventy idle until fishing is recommenced."

I find there is an error here, as, in point of fact, only about one-ninth, or ten of these vessels, are engaged in the West India trade during the winter, so that about eighty would be left idle. Mr. Perley goes on to say:

"From what could be ascertained during the examination, it has been customary to permit these idle vessels to berth both inside and outside of the legal channel, without any surveillance being exercised, and there is not a doubt that if a proper system were adopted, and care exercised in carrying it out, there would be ample room and freedom from danger of fouling, and this can be done by mooring the vessels in question instead of permitting them to ride on a single chain or hawser, and thus free to swing with the rising or a falling tide, or with the prevailing wind; and certainly no objection can be found to such a course, and it should be pursued, and the expense of dredging avoided."

Now, it is true, that by putting the owners of these vessels to extra expense for hawsers and other gear, the dredging might be avoided for some time, but this would entail considerable expense on those fishermen. The treatment extended by the Government to the fishermen of this country, and the fishing interests, is not that which they apply to the manufacturing and other industries of the country. They do not leave the manufacturers to paddle their own canoe; and while hon. gentlemen opposite are professing to take care of all the industries of the country, yet, whenever a request is preferred on behalf of the fishermen, it is denied. There was some dredging done in the harbor of Lunenburg, ten or twelve years ago, but it only covered a narrow strip of dredging along the wharves. When the wind is fair for vessels coming in or out of the harbor, it is all very well; but when the wind is contrary either coming in or going out, of course the vessels run aground. There was some further dredging done during the time my predecessor represented the county, but this was not of any great advantage. It was carried on in part of the harbor where it was not of general benefit, and, accordingly, it was of very little use so far as the shipping trade was concerned. I find on looking over the returns for 1887 there were 92 vessels in the Lunenburg fishing fleet. That number was increased in 1888 to 100 vessels, and during the present season the number increased to 112 or 115 vessels. The value of the catch in 1887 was $738,558. If we take the addition to the fleet and add twenty per cent. to the catch of 1887—of course we have not the figures here yet—the amount may be estimated at nearly $1,000,000. This industry has grown to vast proportions, and Lunenburg is a centre of the fishing industry. It is only right and fair that the Dominion Government should pay some attention to this important industry, as they devote attention to other industries in the country, but it seems to be the rule that hon. gentlemen opposing the Government should obtain nothing from the Government no matter how strong their case may be. These fishermen are taxed very heavily, as can be easily shown. The Postmaster General stated last night that they were not taxed at all, but that is mere nonsense, as the articles consumed by the fishermen's families are taxed, as are those of other people in this country. It is true that the fishermen obtain their salt free, their lines free, and a few other articles necessary for the pursuit of their calling, but so far as the fishermen's families are concerned they have to pay taxes as well as others. I have selected a number of articles upon which the fishermen pay taxes, and I find they number about forty, these all being articles used in the prosecution of their industry. I have brought this matter of dredging to the notice of the Minister, and I trust a vote will appear in this connection in the Supplementary Estimates. It is impossible to take care of this large fleet of vessels without some further dredging being done, and further, the ocean terminus of the Nova Scotia Central Railway will be at Lunenburg, and it will be necessary, after the Government has expended nearly a quarter of a million in completing the road, that considerable dredging should be done, as we expect to load large vessels at that port. The Government should send a dredge there next year, and after carrying out the dredging required for the large fleet of fishing vessels, the dredge should be left there to do further dredging required for the loading of large vessels at the railway terminus. I think the policy of the Government is a wrong policy in this direction. It is impossible for members of the Opposition to obtain the execution of any work in their different localities, and it is high time the Government changed their policy in this respect and do what is fair and just to the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite profess to have the interests of the country at heart, but their policy has been to favor their friends and do nothing for their opponents. At all events, I hope the Minister of Public Works will bear in mind this important work, and cause a vote in this connection to be placed in the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sorry I could not hear the hon. gentleman distinctly, because he was so far away his voice did not reach this side of the House, and, therefore, I could not follow him; but I understood that he complained that a dredge had not been sent to that harbor, as he would have wished. That may be so, but the hon. gentleman may depend upon this, that whenever we can do dredging where it is required we do it; but we cannot do all the work in one or two years, because there are only a limited number of dredges and a limited amount of money. The hon. gentleman has asked for copies of all correspondence between the Department of Public Works and the engineer sent to examine the harbor of Lunenburg during the summer of 1888. I am informed by the chief engineer of the department that there is no such correspondence. The report of Mr. Perley, the chief engineer, of 30th January last, contains all the information obtained by the engineer who made the survey under his direction. That report the hon. gentleman has in his own hands, I think, because he asked me to let him see it, and I gave orders to send him a copy. Of course, I could not send him a copy of the plans, but I gave orders, also, that if he would kindly call at the department, the plans should be shown him. He was informed of that by the secretary of the department. If the hon. gentleman, therefore, wants the report of the chief engineer to be placed before the House, I do not object to the amendment to his motion; otherwise, his motion cannot be adopted, because we have not the information required, but the report I will bring down if he wishes it.

Mr. EISENHAUER. What I complained of was that the report of the engineer who was sent down to examine and survey the harbor has not been placed before the House. In conversation with the chief engineer he told me that the engineer sent down there was not in the employment of the Government, but that he was out of a job and that the Government sent him there to give him employment. If they merely sent an engineer to give him employment, it is a waste of public money, especially if they do not intend to carry out his suggestions. I was not complaining of the dredging not being done last summer, but I wish to get the report of the engineer sent down on the survey, because, in conversation with that gentleman, I understood that the report would be favorable to the dredging, but the report now before the House is not in favor of the dredging. The report of the chief engineer goes on to say:

"As to Mr. Eisenhauer's fear that the sea-worm would attack vessels laid up on the mud, no evidence could be obtained to bear it out. Sometimes a vessel may bring worms from the West Indies, or probably from the fishing banks, but there is not any evidence that the "trede" exists in Lunenburg harbor."

That, I think, is a mistake, as vessels have got wormed badly, although not employed in the West India trade. I believe that this fleet of fishing vessels will go on increasing there, and I think that it is the duty of the Government to see that they should have better accommodation, otherwise we will not have accommodation enough in the harbor. Of course, if I cannot have access to this report I will have to submit, but I should like to see it, as the report which I have now in my hands is not in keeping with what the conversation of the engineer would lead me to believe.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman should not suppose that the chief engineer is giving a false report to the Minister of the department. Mr. Perley is a gentleman of high standing and high reputation, and he is not a man to deceive me or to deceive Parliament through me. I am responsible for Mr. Perley's action, and, therefore, I cannot assent to the hon. gentleman's suggestion. Those reports of sub-engineers who are sent out to obtain the information and to collect the data for the chief engineer, are never brought down; they are for the information of the chief engineer, who considers their contents and gives the information to the Minister in his own report; and that report, as I stated just now, I am ready to bring down if the hon. gentleman wishes it. I am afraid the hon. gentleman cannot have correctly understood the conversation between himself and the chief engineer. When we send an engineer anywhere it is not to give him a job or to give him employment, but it is because the employment of that engineer is required by the public service. The hon. gentleman may rest assured that this was the motive for sending down an engineer in this case. If the hon. gentleman wishes I shall have the chief engineer's report, and also the plans, copied and brought down.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I may say that the chief engineer told me that this engineer who made the survey was not in the employ of the department, that he was out of work, and that they sent him down there to give him employment. I want the report of the engineer who was sent down to make the survey, because he told me that it would be favorable, and this report is not favorable.

Mr. LAURIER. As I understand my hon. friend, he wants the report of the special survey which was ordered by the chief engineer, and if I understood the Minister of Public Works correctly, he said that those reports are never brought down. Well, though they are never brought down I do not know of any rule, constitutional or otherwise, why they should not be brought down, if the bringing of them down would be in the interest of the public service. Unless my hon. friend has some strong reason of his own to show to the House that this report should not be brought down, though it is not the rule so to do, I cannot see any reason why it should not be brought down. If the Minister of Public Works has not some very strong reason against it, the rule ought to apply that the light can be brought to bear on the recesses and corners of any department of this Government, and when my hon. friend asks the Government to bring down this report, the only answer that is made is: It is not customary to do so. Granting that it may not be customary, will the hon. Minister pretend to say that there is any reason why those reports are never to see the light of day, and why they are always to be confined under the eye, and the eye only, of the chief engineer who ordered the survey? I can very well understand that the chief engineer should supervise those reports and give his conclusions to the Government, but because such a thing may be the opinion of the chief engineer, it does not necessarily follow that his opinion is the right one, it does not necessarily follow that he may not have come to a false conclusion. As I understand my hon. friend (Mr. Eisenhauer), he complains that the chief engineer, in summarizing the report of that special survey, has not given the proper conclusion that should be arrived at. The Minister of Public Works says the chief engineer reported that those works are not advisable, and my hon. friend pretends that the special survey would show that those works are advisable, and that the conclusion arrived at by the chief engineer would not be supported by the report of the special survey. That is the reason why he wants to bring this matter before the House; and if this is the case it is a good and valid reason why this report, which he now asks for, should be brought down.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Those reports are made under the direction of the chief engineer, who gives his instructions to the sub-engineer to examine and report. The sub-engineers know that these reports are for the information of the chief engineer, and they are perfectly free to state matters as they find them, and to give their opinions as freely as if they were only conversing with the chief engineer. If these reports were to be laid before the public the freedom between the sub-officer and the chief would be lost altogether, and the chief officer could not obtain that full information that he must expect from his under-official. The chief engineer, in giving me the information which I have given to the hon. gentleman just now, said:

"My report dated 30th January, 1889, contains all the information obtained by the engineer who made the survey under my direction."

That is very clear. If the hon. gentleman wishes, I will give him the report in full, as well as the plans, and that is all we have ever given in matters of this kind. We have always refused to bring down those sub-reports, because, by laying them before Parliament and before the public, we would destroy the usefulness of those officers, and prevent them giving the full information to their chief which they ought to give. If the hon. gentleman wishes to see the report I have referred to, I have no objection that the motion should be altered in this respect. The hon. gentleman tells me that he has that report in his hands now, and if he is satisfied with that, I will not, of course, insist on giving him the report. If the hon. gentleman wishes more than that, I am ready to do this: let the matter stand and I will look over both reports myself, and if I find that something is omitted—it can only be through inadvertence of the chief engineer—I will see that the information is made complete, and will have a supplementary report made; but I must repeat that if the hon. gentleman insists on that report, we cannot bring it down.

Mr. LAURIER. While I cannot admit the reasoning of the hon. gentleman, I would advise my hon. friend to accept the suggestion now offered, and let the motion stand over.

Mr. KIRK. Before this motion is disposed of, I would like again to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to an application which was made a number of years ago by my predecessor, for a dredge to deepen the river St. Mary's, in the county of Guysboro'. A dredge was sent there in the summer of 1882, but, after working for some time, it was found that it was too large, and could not do the work properly, and was withdrawn.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is hardly speaking to the question before the House.

Mr. KIRK. Have you not got the subject of dredging before the House?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Not the general question of dredging.

Mr. KIRK. There can be no harm in my calling the attention of the Government to the necessity for a dredge in that river. I think the Minister promised that a smaller dredge would be sent, but that was not done. I hope he will be able this year to send one down to deepen that river.

Debate adjourned.

LOURDES AND SOMERSET MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. TURCOT (translation) moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, respecting the creation of a bi-weekly instead of a weekly mail service between Lourdes and Somerset in the County of Megantic.

Mr. Speaker, in making this motion, I wish to draw the attention of the Government, and of the Postmaster General, to the important interests concerned, which call for the creation of a bi-weekly mail service between Lourdes and Somerset, in the County of Megantic. The weekly service which is now carried on might have been enough when it was inaugurated, for at that time Lourdes was peopled by young settlers, who were beginning to clear their lands, and who did business only with the neighboring parishes. At that time there was but little correspondence carried on, and these people found that a weekly service was sufficient. But at the present time a great amount of trade is done at Lourdes. There is even a steam saw mill, the proprietor of which does quite a fair business in lumber; there are also merchants and blacksmiths, all of whom complain bitterly of the present state of affairs. It is easy to understand how, that these people who are in business, and who only have a mail once per week, on the Saturday, and who are obliged to wait until the following Saturday to receive their correspondence suffer much from such a mail service. From the information, which I received from the hon. Minister last year, the reason why we are given a mail service only once a week, is, because the post-office does not pay. It is true, that the post-office at Lourdes does not yield a revenue as great as its expenditure; but it must be borne in mind that having but one mail each week, those who are carrying on a correspondence are compelled to transport their letters to Somerset, in the neighboring Parish, and to go there for the answers also. According to the Postmaster General's report of last year, I see that the post office of Somerset had a revenue of $1,131.08 and that the expenditure only amounted to $422. In the first amount of the revenue is included a portion derived from the Parish of Lourdes because the bulk of her population who have correspondence to carry on during the week are obliged to go to Somerset, a distance of nine miles, and carry there their letters. Mr. Speaker, they say that a bi-weekly mail service would not pay. I admit it, but I am certain of one thing, viz., that a bi-weekly service would not occasion a greater deficit than the present weekly service, because, admitting that the expenditure would be increased, the revenue would be also. Do we not see every year the Government asking for an increase in the salaries of certain of its servants. I do not desire to blame the Government for doing so, but these increases of salaries are things from which no return is derived, the object being the rewarding of certain employees for their good services. This year it is proposed to increase the salaries of the judges, which will cause an annual increase in our expenditure of $80,000. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not ask for so much as that; I only ask for an increase of about $30; and I am persuaded that if this service was granted, the revenue would increase and the deficit would not be greater than it is at the present, because there would be proportionally as much revenue as expenditure. If we take the total amount of revenue derived from the post offices of the county of Megantic for the past year, it is seen that the forty-one offices have yielded a revenue of $6,555.43, and that the expenditure was $4,567.14, leaving a surplus in favor of the county of $1,988.29. If there is a deficit each year in the Post Office Department, I perceive clearly that the county of Megantic has not been the cause of it. It is not a favor that I am asking from the Government to-day, but it is a simple act of justice towards my constituents, who only receive a mail once a week. If the Government should grant the request which I am making at the present moment, their action would greatly assist in the settlement of this parish, because it is well known that a similar state of affairs sometimes hinders the settlers from establishing themselves in new places; it is always a disagreeable experience to find oneself in places where there is no easy communication with the outside world. I venture then to hope that the Government will take this subject into serious consideration, and that they will at least make the trial for one year; and I am certain that if this is done, it will be found that, while affording greater facilities in the service, the deficit will be less than it is at the present time.

Mr. HAGGART. The Government have not the slightest objection to bring down the papers. The only papers in their possession are a letter from the hon. gentleman himself enclosing a petition from some of the inhabitants, and I think a letter from a Mr. Lessard, a priest in his district. The matter was referred to the Inspector to report upon it. He reported that the cost of the service already is $50 per annum, and the increased service which the hon. gentleman asks would entail an additional cost of $50, or, in the whole, $100. The total receipts from postal revenue in that place is $12.65. On account of the great deficiency between the estimated cost and the revenue of the district, the department refused to entertain the proposition.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. TURCOT.

SEIZURE OF THE AMERICAN SHIP BRIDGEWATER.

Mr. EDGAR moved for :

Copies of all documents, papers, correspondence and telegrams relating to the seizure, or the release of the American ship Bridgewater at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, in the possession or control of the Government of Canada, including all correspondence which has taken place on the subject between Great Britain and the United States, and copies of all claims which have been made to recover damages from Canada, for the seizure and detention of such vessel.

He said: Most of the members of the House will have seen, during the past year, a good deal in the newspapers about the extraordinary case of the ship Bridgewater, and I propose to call the attention of the House briefly to some of the circumstances connected with that case, which will show, I think, a most extraordinary picture of the way some matters are managed in the Department of Customs. The ship Bridgewater, a large American vessel of over 1,500 tons burthen, was on a voyage from St. John, N.B., to Liverpool. She put into the port of Shelburne, N.S., seriously damaged by a storm, on the 5th of April, 1887. The vessel was, I believe, properly reported at the Custom house. She was offered for sale there, but there were no bids for her, and she was knocked down to her owner at a nominal figure. She was then being repaired by her owners, and on the 27th of July, the collector of customs at the port of Shelburne made a seizure of this vessel, claiming, I understand, that she was liable to pay a duty of 25 per cent. on her entire value, as coming under the class of unspecified manufactured articles of wood, which are subject to that duty. The owner of the vessel declined to pay this duty, and declined to admit that the vessel was subject to seizure at all; but he was delayed in his repairs, as the vessel was in the hands of the Government. I believe it will be found, when the correspondence comes down, that after the seizure, the Government or the collector tried to persuade the owner of this vessel to pay the duty to the Government, as a matter of form, and then trust to their tender mercies to refund it. He declined to take that course, as he resisted the seizure altogether. So the matter went on until September of that year, and I believe that the hon. Mr. McLelan, who was then the acting Minister of Customs, had the case brought before him and he telegraphed to Shelburne, to the Custom house officer there, a message to this effect:

"Allan can repair and take vessel away. If he requires Canadian register he will have to pay duty."

One would have supposed that would have ended the matter, because here was a telegram from the acting Minister of Customs declaring that the owner might take his vessel away unless he wanted to register her. He did not want to register her at all but to take her away; yet when he came to take her away, the collector required that he should previously give a release of all claims against the Government or against any officers of the Government, and should pay all expenses. To make this perfectly clear, I will read a letter, which the collector served on the owner, and which appeared in the Free Press of this city some time ago. Mr. McLelan's telegram, authorising the discharge of the vessel, was dated the 16th of September, and this letter from Mr. Atwood, the collector, to the owner, is dated at Shelburne the 22nd of September. The latter is as follows:—

"SIR,—I have to inform you that the acting Commissioner of Customs authorises the release of the ship Bridgewater on condition that she takes a clearance to a foreign port and leaves the country on completion of the repairs, after first paying all expenses incurred in connection with the seizure, and after you have formally withdrawn the protests made and given a written abandonment of all claims upon the Government or seizing officer on account of seizure. You will please let me know whether these conditions will be complied with; and I will give you an account of expenses."

I can hardly be surprised that the owner of this vessel, who certainly could see no reason, and when none had been validly given, why his vessel should be seized and detained by the Custom house officer, should have absolutely refused to take the vessel off the hands of the Canadian Government, and should have insisted upon its unconditional surrender to him; and no doubt he felt there were claims which he would be able to make hereafter for improper detention. After this correspondence, on the 15th of October, and just 81 days after the seizure, the Customs Department released the vessel unconditionally, and gave it back to the owner. Now, assuredly, that unconditional surrender made it impossible for them to say that that seizure was a proper and a legal one. It was either right or wrong to have seized and detained that vessel. They cannot now say it was right, because they have abandoned it. I understand there is a claim made by the owner against the Canadian Government, which partakes of the nature of an international claim. I understand that the claim is being pressed by the Government at Washington on the Canadian Government, through the British Government, and I have no doubt that this country will, in the long run, have to pay very handsomely for this extraordinary performance of the Customs Department. Well, perhaps the Minister of Customs will tell us that this man has no legal claim which he can enforce in the Canadian courts against the Canadian Government. That will depend on how far the Canadian Government would assent to his bringing a claim against them, but if the contention of the owner be correct, a wrong has been done him, and if the Government try to show that there is no redress to the owner in Canadian courts, that gives him the right to make his case an international question, and I must congratulate the Minister of Customs on having, so far as I will show, proved the case for the owner. I suppose it will be answered, in a case of this kind, if an American citizen claims to have been wronged, and asks his Government to seek redress from the Canadian Government, that he will be told by his own Government: You must make a claim in the courts of the country, and if you find, for one reason or another, that you cannot enforce any legal claims against the Canadian Government, then come to us, and it will be made an international matter. Well, the Minister of Customs, in order, no doubt, to save any trouble of that kind to this gentleman, wrote him a letter, of which he has very quickly availed himself, and which has enabled him, without having to go to court at all, to show the Washington Government that he has no legal claim here at any rate. I understand that the Minister of Customs wrote, on the 24th May, 1888, this brilliant letter to the owner of the vessel:

"SIR,—I am this day in receipt of the opinion of the Minister of Justice in re your claim for damages for alleged detention of the ship Bridgewater, at the port of Shelburne, N.S., in which he says: The claimant, Allan, cannot recover against any officer of the Crown for damages sustained in consequence of the seizure. Under the circumstances, I do not deem it advisable to further consider the question of recognising your claim until the decision of the case in the courts has been rendered."

And the hon. gentleman did not see that when he wrote that letter, he was saving Mr. Allan the necessity of going to the trouble and expense of going through the Canadian courts, and if the Minister of Customs had only reflected a little over the matter, he would have seen what a terrible mistake he was making and how he was placing himself at once in the hands of this vessel owner, by enabling him to make an international claim. There the matter stands, I believe. The Customs Department in 1886, as has been shown over and over again in this House, brought this country to the verge of war with the United States, by their treatment of vessels in the harbors of Canada during that year. And after they were stopped by the hand of the British Government from doing this in 1887 towards fishing vessels, they could not be prevented from doing their best to raise national disputes even in that year, when their hands were kept off the fishing vessels by the British Government. The Bridgewater was not a fishing vessel, so they were not kept in order by the British Government in respect to it, and, therefore, they made this seizure and kept this vessel for eighty-one days illegally. She was seized here, and illegally kept here, and then the Government gave her up, but they wrote a letter in reference to that subject which enables the owner of that vessel, more than anything else does, to make a claim against this Government. I wonder why this seizure was made. I wonder whether, in the seizure of a large vessel like the Bridgewater, there may not have been a good deal of plunder to be divided between the seizing officer and the informer. I suppose there would be something substantial in that if this man had been simple enough to do as they told him and to pay the duty into their hands, and let them divide it among the seizers and informers, as they have been doing, to the disadvantage of the country, as I think, in a great many cases. There is another view to be taken in this case. The Government committed a wrong. They authorised a collector in Nova Scotia to commit a great wrong, according to their own showing, against an American citizen. I have not heard that this collector has been dismissed or even censured, but we have heard of another collector, a man of high standing and respected by all in Nova Scotia, who, since this matter of the Bridgewater, for an act not of hostility, but perhaps an error of judgment in an act of friendliness to an American citizen, for allowing him a friendly privilege in his port which could do no one any harm, has been censured and dismissed. I think this case is a little more serious than it would have been if we had not had all these circumstances together—the troubles in 1886, the British Government interfering to try and make the Canadian Government behave themselves in 1887, and then the dismissal of Collector Ross in the port of Halifax for a simple act of friendliness and courtesy towards an American citizen. We remember very well that the Minister of Fisheries claimed on a recent occasion that the reason why American vessels were not seized in 1837 was that the fishermen had been taught by the action of our cruisers in 1836 that they had to behave themselves. Surely it cannot be said that the owner of this ship had been misbehaving himself. He had not been interfering with any Customs regulations which had been guarded so jealously by the Customs Department in 1886. He was an American citizen who was driven by stress of weather, in almost a wrecked condition, into a magnificent harbor in Nova Scotia, and what was the hospitality with which he was greeted? He was seized upon, he was threatened, and he was coaxed to admit the seizure, to pay the money and make an application for a refund. When he would not do that, he was still detained, after the acting Minister of Customs had given his opinion that there was no legal ground for the detention, and then conditions were sought to be made with him that, if the vessel was released, he should pay all the expenses of an illegal seizure, notwithstanding that, as I think his claim shows, he had been a very heavy sufferer by the loss of profits in the voyage he had intended to carry out.

After Recess.

ATLANTIC AND NORTH-WEST RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 65) respecting the Atlantic and North-West Railway Company.—(Mr. Hall.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is a Bill to enable the Atlantic and North-West Railway Company to build this railway, by obtaining an extension of time for the building that portion between Harvey, which is now reached, and Salisbury or Moncton. I move that the following be added to this section:

Provided that the extension of time granted by this Act in respect of the portion of the line between Harvey and Salisbury shall not be continued beyond the first day of January, 1890, unless before that time the company shall have expended on that portion at least the sum of $100,000 to the satisfaction of an engineer to be appointed by the Minister of Railways and Canals, and in that case the time for the completion of that work shall be extended for a further period of two years.

Mr. HALL. I believe that the company are disposed to accept this amendment, although the time seems unreasonably short; but in view of the existing difficulty over the Bill, there is no objection to the amendment suggested.

Section as amended agreed to, and Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SASKATCHEWAN RAILWAY AND MINING COMPANY.

Mr. DENISON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 86) to incorporate the Saskatchewan Railway and Mining Company.

Mr. WALLACE moved in amendment that the Order be discharged and that the Bill be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines to consider the following: To add after the word "Saskatoon" on line 8 of section 3, the words:

Thence in a generally north-easterly direction to Fort à la Corne, and to a junction with the Hudson's Bay Railway, or to a point on the Nelson River, and from the said crossing of the South Saskatchewan River, in a northerly direction to Green Lake, and a crossing of the Beaver River to Waterhen Lake.

Motion agreed to, and Order discharged.

ALBERTA AND ATHABASCA RAILWAY COMPANY.

Bill (No. 49) respecting the Alberta and Athabasca Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to the "Great North-West Railway Company," was considered in Committee and reported.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta) moved third reading of the Bill. He said: This provision was in the original Bill, but on account of sufficient notice not having been given in one of the districts, the Saskatchewan district, the Standing Orders Committee could not report that the promoters of the Bill had complied to the letter with the Rules of the House, and therefore this provision was left out of the Bill. It is now proposed to re-insert it, and, for that purpose, to refer the Bill back to the Railway Committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF FORESTERS.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 74) to incorporate the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters.—(Mr Jamieson.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have no desire to impede the passage of this Bill through the committee, but I have been communicated with by the officers of another Order of Foresters who, not having seen the Bill in its amended shape, think that, perhaps, they might be placed in a disadvantageous position through its provisions. They are anxious to understand it, and I think a deputation is coming to the Capital with respect to it. I would, therefore, ask the promoter of the Bill if it would be any great inconvenience, after the Bill has passed the committee, to let the third reading stand until Friday so that those gentlemen may have an opportunity of examining it. I think there is not the danger in the Bill which they imagine. One of the points of danger they apprehend is this: There was a Bill introduced for the incorporation of all benefit societies under one Act, and one of the provisions of that Act, as introduced in section 10, is:

Mr. EDGAR.

"That no society shall be registered under a name identical with that under which any other existing society is registered, or so nearly resembling such name as to be likely, or under any other name likely, in the opinion of the Minister, to deceive the minds of the public; and further, that no registered society shall change its name without the assent of the Governor in Council."

There are three orders of Foresters, the Ancient Order, the Canadian Order, and the Order of Foresters that is being incorporated under this Bill. I think the fear of the officers of the Ancient Order of Foresters is, that special legislation being given to one order, if this general Bill were passed with that clause in it, then this order might have the exclusive right to the name of Foresters, and as I understand the contention is, that if there was to be an exclusive right given to any one of those three orders to bear the title of Foresters, that it should be given to this Ancient Order of Foresters, which they claim, as their name would signify, is the most ancient order. I have no desire to impede the progress of the Bill at all, but I would ask the hon. gentleman if it would put the promoters of the Bill to any inconvenience if, after passing it through the committee, it were allowed to stand for its third reading until Friday, and in the meantime I might know something more of the views of those who fear that the interests of their order are somewhat jeopardized by this Bill.

Mr. JAMIESON. I have no objection to accede to the hon. gentleman's request, but, if it is not going to a third reading to-night, I would prefer to have it lie over till Monday.

An hon. MEMBER. Monday is a holiday.

Mr. JAMIESON. Well, on Friday. I would say, in reference to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman, that I cannot really see that the Bill is open to the objection which the hon. gentleman mentions.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Bill is not open to that objection. But I understand that the Finance Minister stated, with regard to the Bill relating to friendly societies introduced by the member for Carleton (Mr. Dickinson) last year, and re-introduced this year, that the Government will consider the matter during recess and introduce a Government measure on the same lines as next year. If the Government should introduce a general Act next year there might be some difficulty under clause 10 of this Bill, inasmuch as this company having been incorporated and entitled to bear the name of "Foresters," it might be made impossible for the Canadian Order of Foresters or the Ancient Order of Foresters to bear their name of "Foresters." The hon. gentleman will see the difficulty there would be created.

Mr. JAMIESON. If the general Act be introduced next Session, we can deal then with the question the hon. gentleman raises. I do not apprehend, for a moment, that the Independent Order of Foresters would attempt to exclude anybody else, or prevent any other society from using the title of Foresters, so that, in view of this fact, I cannot, at present, see any necessity for allowing the Bill to stand.

Mr. HALL. I think I can settle the difficulty in a moment. When the Bill was passing through the Committee on Banking and Commerce the criticism which has been mentioned by my hon. friend was stated. At that time I consulted the solicitor of the society, and was told that there would be no objection to the adoption of the use of the name "Foresters" by any other branches of the order in so far as the society itself is concerned. I have a letter in my pocket to which the solicitor in charge of this Bill states that officially. In fact, he says the adoption of the words, "the Independent Order of Foresters," is an acknowledgment of the existence of other orders of the same society, and that there will be no objection, therefore, on the part of this society to the distinctive name of "Foresters" being used by the other branches.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I place a very great deal of confidence in what has been stated by the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall), the chairman of that committee, and if he thinks there is no danger on the point I have raised, the Bill can go through, but I would like to have the third reading left over until Friday.

On section 7,

Mr. JAMIESON. I move an amendment that in the 35th line, after the word "proceeds" the word "thereto" should be struck out, and the words "of all such property" substituted. This clause provides for the disposition of the property on the dissolution of a branch. Unless this change were made there would be no power to apply the general proceeds of the property.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I see that this Bill provides that in a town of 6,000 population or over, the society should hold $25,000 worth of property, but in a town of less than 6,000 they can only hold $5,000 worth. I cannot understand why there is such a marked difference in this respect, because if a town happens to have 5,600 population it could only hold $5,000 worth of property, whereas if it has 6,000 population it can hold $25,000.

Mr. JAMIESON. One of the objects of that is this. The headquarters of this society is to be in Toronto, and it is altogether likely that a building will be put up there suited to the requirements of the society. In a large city it would be a comparatively poor building, including plans, which would cost less than $25,000, whereas in towns there would only be a branch or subordinate office which would not require a very large building.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I do not think the explanation is altogether satisfactory. I do not see why a town with 6,500 of a population or even 6,000 could hold $25,000 worth of property and a town with less than 6,000 could only hold $5,000 worth. I think there is a great disparity here.

Mr. JAMIESON. We had to draw the line somewhere, and in a case of this kind it must be somewhat arbitrarily drawn. I do not see that we could improve it very much. It was thought at one time that we could fix the population at 10,000. The matter was thoroughly considered by the Committee when they came to this conclusion.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think 10,000 ought to be enough. I am apprehensive of any of these societies being allowed to hold a larger amount of property than could reasonably be required for the purposes of the society. I wish to see everything done that is favorable to the interest of the society, but I do not believe in giving them the opportunity of holding an excessive amount of real estate. I, therefore, think that if you provided for $10,000 worth up to a population of 10,000 perhaps it would be better suited to the purpose of the Bill.

Bill reported.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 87) to amend the Act to incorporate the Quebec Board of Trade.—(Mr. McGreevy.)

Bill (No. 90) respecting the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company and the Napanee, Tamworth and Quebec Railway Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 73) to incorporate the North-Western Junction and Lake of the Woods Railway Company.—(Mr. La Rivière.)

Bill (No. 89) to amend the Charter of incorporation of the Great North-West Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Daly.)

Bill (No. 16) to provide against frauds in the supplying of milk to cheese and butter manufactories.—(Mr. Burdett.)

WRECKING IN CANADIAN WATERS.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved third reading of Bill (No. 2) to permit foreign vessels to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters.

Mr. CHARLTON. I suppose the House will agree with me in the proposition that it is always proper to make reasonable counter-proposals to any proposition presented to us. We have before us to-night a Bill which is the exact copy of the American Bill making a proposal to the Canadian Government with regard to wrecking upon waters contiguous to the two countries. That Bill is one which, I think, we may reasonably ask to have, in some minor respects, modified. I propose to-night to offer an amendment to it, so as to make a counter-proposal to the American Government, in the line of proposing slight modifications of the provisions of the Bill now before us. It may be charged that my object in offering this amendment is to defeat the Bill. I deny that such is the case. The object is to make the Bill more acceptable to the marine interests of Canada. The proposal is simply to open negotiations with the American Government, to take the proposal they have laid before us, to modify that proposal slightly, and to ask the American Government if they are willing to accept the modification of their proposal which we propose to make. A few days ago, when this matter was under consideration, the hon. gentleman who leads this House said that some middle course might probably be adopted with advantage, referring to the proposition which was made by the Canadian Government, and which is now upon our Statute-book, offering to the United States Government complete reciprocity in the coasting trade. The middle course would be something between our offer of complete reciprocity in the coasting trade and the American offer of reciprocity in only one incident of coasting. The amendments which I shall offer will be in that direction; they will be something midway between reciprocity in coasting and the American proposal to select only the one incident which would be of advantage to them, while they would deny us reciprocity in all other incidents of the coasting trade. I had no chance to urge the views which I hold in reference to this Bill in the committee. I was a member of the committee, but, by accident, probably, I never received notice of the meeting until it was over. I urge my views in this House, believing they are just, proper, reasonable, moderate, and that they will be likely to receive the assent of the American Government, if we make that proposal to them, as we will if we make this modification to their Bill which is their offer to us. As I said, the Bill before us allows the American Government to select from the coasting trade the one incident which would be of advantage to them and in which they desire reciprocity, namely, wrecking, and to exclude us from all other forms of reciprocity in coasting.

It happens that this matter of wrecking has been in the past in favor of Canada. This advantage was thrust upon us by the action of the American Government in 1874, by a regulation which was issued by their Treasury Department, that Canadian vessels were prohibited from taking hold of wrecks upon the American coast; and the enforcement of that regulation has been of the most stringent character. The Mackenzie Government followed that up by adopting the same regulation as to American tugs taking hold of wrecks on our coasts. The order issued by Under-Secretary Fox, in 1874, shows that the condition of things which has since existed has existed by reason of the action of the American Government, and that Government cannot accuse the Canadian Government of acting in any spirit of unfriendliness or in any spirit but that of the broadest and most liberal character. The Canadian Government were not responsible for that order. They were driven into the position by the action of the American Government itself. That being the case, I hold that, when the American Government approaches us with a proposal to reinstate them in the position they occupied before they issued the order, we are warranted in considering whether, under the circumstances, we shall surrender the advantage we possess without some quid pro quo, without some consideration beyond what they propose, which is really no consideration at all. There has been a large amount of investment of capital in wrecking companies in this country. At Port Colborne, there is the wrecking firm of Carter Bros, who have spent a large amount of money in the purchase of pontoons, hydraulic machinery, steam pumps, and all the necessaries to carry on the work of wrecking fully and efficiently, and that is one of the most efficient wrecking firms in existence. There is another wrecking company at Windsor, and there is another about to be formed at Windsor; and these have been induced to make their investments under the regulations of the Canadian Government. It is these regulations which have called these firms into existence, and have led to the investment of this money, and to sacrifice those interests without good reason is something the Government should hesitate to do. I think it is only reasonable that some slight concession should be asked from the American Government, and I propose it in the belief that it will be given. I do not offer these amendments on the ground of factious opposition to this Bill or in order to prevent its passage.

The humanity plea has been used with a great deal of skill, but there is nothing in the regulations of the Canadian Government that ever has or ever will prevent the succoring of a vessel in distress or the saving of life. If the vessel is on shore, and an American vessel is near, there is nothing to prevent the American vessel from rendering assistance to the one which is in distress. The regulations are made to prevent the wrecking on the coast after a vessel is on shore, after the crew has left, and regular operations have to be undertaken to save the cargo or the vessel, requiring perhaps days or perhaps weeks. Then, the Canadian wrecking plant has and should have the monopoly of that work, except where that wrecking plant is not available, and, in that case, the Customs Department has always been ready to give permits to American wrecking companies to undertake the work. I recounted the other night some 15 or 20 instances where the department had given that permission when there was no pressure of necessity, but such permission has not been given by the American Government under similar circumstances. In regard to the conduct of the two Governments in this matter, and the humane consideration shown for wrecked vessels and for distressed mariners, the comparison is very much in favor of the Canadian Government. I do not think there has been a single instance where the American Government have relaxed their rules or have allowed Canadian wrecking plant to be used for that purpose, while on our side many instances can be cited in which that has been done. This Bill is being pressed in the interest of a gentleman who lives in the city of Kingston, who thinks he has discovered, and who has patented, a steam pump which he believes will revolutionise wrecking. I am told by those who are acquainted with the matter that he is mistaken in his idea, but he desires to monopolise the business, as he supposes he is going to do, but, in doing that, he is putting in peril the whole wrecking business of the Dominion of Canada, and I do not think he is counting with his host as to the efficiency of his invention. The proposition that I make, that towing shall be permitted in the case of the tugs of each country, is one that is almost essential to the proper working of the concession of reciprocity in wrecking itself. If a vessel is wrecked upon the American coast of the great lakes, it is hardly possible that the wreck will be towed to the dry dock at Collingwood or to the dry dock at Owen Sound, but the natural destination would be to the dry dock in Detroit, to the dry dock in Cleveland, or in Bay City, or in Port Huron, or at Buffalo. In order to take that vessel from the coast and deliver it at a dry dock, it would be essential in the case of the Canadian tug that she should engage in coasting, she would be compelled to take that vessel from its position on the shore and coast along the American shore to deliver the wreck at an American dry dock. So that as a safeguard for the proper working of the provision contained in the Bill of my hon. friend, reciprocity in towing should be insisted upon, in the case of each country. Now our tugs are permitted to enter American ports and to take up tows of American vessels and tow them up and down the lakes, but they cannot deliver them in any American port. A tug can take up a tow of vessels in Buffalo and take them or cast it loose anywhere in Lake Huron up the straits of Mackinaw, but in case of stress of weather, and it becomes necessary to make port with its tow of vessels, the law prohibits it from doing so, it is not permitted to call at an American port. I think the modification that this amendment calls for is a just and humane modification, a reasonable modification, and I propose to make it reciprocal in respect of the tugs of both countries. I propose to ask that Canadian tugs should be allowed to tow vessels and rafts from port to port on the American side, and that American tugs shall be permitted to tow vessels and rafts upon the Canadian side, and this concession will make the law more easily worked with regard to reciprocity in wrecking. It is a reasonable concession, it is a concession in the interest of the men whose interests we are about to sacrifice if we pass this Bill; it is at least a proposition that is worth while making to the Americans, before we surrender the only thing by which we can secure any concession from them at all. I have heard it asserted that I am personally interested in this matter, and that is supposed to explain the reason of the position I take upon this wrecking question. Now, Sir, I never have been engaged in relieving a wreck, I never have been engaged in that business, and I do not suppose that I ever shall be; but I am connected to a limited extent with the navigation interests of this country, and I know enough of this matter to know that the proposal to give reciprocity in wrecking is a proposal made exclusively and entirely in the interests of the American marine. It is charged against me that I am acting in this matter inconsistently with my position upon the reciprocity trade question. Sir, I take my position upon the reciprocity question, upon the ground that the position the Liberal party takes is going to give us a fair advantage in return for what we give the Americans. But I oppose this particular Bill because there is no reciprocal advantage in this matter granted to the Canadian interest that is to be sacrificed, by giving to the American interests the possession of the business that the Canadians have hitherto done. It may be asked, why are Canadian tugs not able to compete with the American tugs in the business of wrecking upon the two coasts? Now, Sir, the insurance companies, with the exception of the Western of Toronto, that write risks upon vessels, are in the American cities, in Buffalo, in Erie, in Cleveland, in Detroit, in Milwaukee and in Chicago. Whenever a vessel is wrecked the insurance company will naturally employ the wrecking company the nearest at hand. And there is a system of granting commissions the wrecking company gives to the agent of the insurance company a handsome commission for placing the work in their hands, and this system is so perfect that wherever a risk is written upon a vessel by an American company, the job of wrecking for the vessel which is wrecked, is sure to go into the hands of an American wrecking company. Our wrecking companies understand that the passage of this Bill, with the acceptance of this proposal from the United States, is simply a proposal to deprive them of almost the entire amount of the business of wrecking upon the great lakes. Now, I do not know that it is necessary for me to go fully over this question, I have presented the leading points. This proposal is not designed to kill the Bill, but it is designed to put that Bill in such a shape that we may hope to derive some advantages from it. I object to any unconditional surrender. I believe that in this matter it is perfectly proper to make a counter-proposal. I do not think it is absolutely incumbent upon us to accept an American proposal that is not in our interests, without first seeing at least if we can get some modification of that proposal that will make it more acceptable and more advantageous to ourselves. It is said, why not pass the Bill, and then ask the Americans to make this arrangement with you about reciprocity in towing? Why not give away every consideration that you possess, for the purpose of securing a concession, and, after giving away all the considerations, then go and ask for the concessions. That is not a business way of doing business. I do not know that I need to engage further in this discussion. I say distinctly and positively that the object of this amendment that I am about to move is not to kill this Bill. I am prepared to accept reciprocity in the matter with a slight modification that will give reciprocity in towing to tugs, not reciprocity in coasting with vessels and cargoes, but simply a mutual reciprocity in towing vessels and rafts by the tugs of either country. This proposition would be mutually advantageous, it would be reasonable, and I am morally certain that it would be accepted. For that reason I think that this House ought not to place the country and this interest in a position where it is hopeless for them to ask for this concession after passing the Bill in its present shape. I, therefore, move that the Bill be not read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee with instructions to amend the first sub-section of the second section, by adding the following words:—

"And when the privilege of towing vessels and rafts from one United States port to another in waters contiguous to Canada is accorded to Canadian tugs."

If that is accepted, I will move a corresponding amendment to the other clause.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I was not in the House when this Bill was discussed before, but as I represent a constituency that has made very large investments in wrecking plant, I conceive it my duty, on the floor of the House, to enter my protest against such legislation at this time. I may say with respect to the wrecking plant at Port Colborne, in regard to which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) spoke, that the investment is very large. Individuals there have no less than $130,000 invested in such material. This wrecking plant has been purchased in good faith, some within the last six months, some previously, and I say that the interest of that particular industry should not be disturbed by the Parliament of this country. They have purchased the plant, and have brought it into the country; have paid duty upon it, and yet to-day we are asked that the Americans, who do not live in the country, who will not spend one dollar of their earnings in the country, shall be permitted to bring in duty free wrecking plant, machinery and coal to operate within Canadian waters. I decidedly object to this, and I think there is no hon. member who desires to place Canadian wreckers on a worse footing than his neighbor across the line operating in Canadian waters. I venture to say that all the work on Lake Erie would be done by American tugs, and all wrecking plant on the Welland canal would pass over to Buffalo. This is the reason why I rise to enter my protest against this proposed legislation. The humanity cry has played a very important part in this debate, and I desire to show from the statutes that the legislature in this country has years ago been not unmindful of their fellowmen in this particular. The statutes clearly set out that every provision has been made for the human family in this particular respect, and that cry should have no weight in this House to aid in defrauding the wreckers of this country out of their legitimate business. In the Act respecting the coasting trade of Canada there is the following provision:

"The master of any steam vessel, not being a British ship, engaged, or having been engaged, in towing any ship, vessel or raft, from one port or place in Canada to another, except in case of distress, shall incur a penalty of four hundred dollars."

In case of distress it is provided that vessels of all countries shall be at liberty to relieve a vessel out of the distress in which she has been placed. It has been said that the Americans have made an offer. So have we made an offer, and it is an offer standing on the Statute-book of this country to-day. The standing offer we have made is in these terms:

"The Governor in Council may, from time to time, declare that the foregoing provisions of this Act shall not apply to any ships or vessels of any foreign country in which British ships are admitted to the coasting trade of that country, and to carry goods and passengers from one port or place to another, in such country."

Let the Americans accept this offer. They do not, however, please to accept it, because they desire, as I have said, by their offer, to secure the wrecking trade of this country and place it in the hands of their own people, and, in my opinion, this Parliament should protect Canadian wreckers. At Port Colborne, as I have said, a very large investment is made, the wrecking plant costing $130,000. If this Bill is allowed to go into force, tugs from Buffalo and elsewhere will come to the entrance of the Welland Canal, go out into the lake and tow vessels into harbor. They will come with their tugs full of coal, on which they have paid no duty, and they will work in Canadian waters with free machinery and free coal. If, on the other hand, our tugs go out to haul vessels, they have to pay duty on all their machinery, upon their diving apparatus, on the pumps they use, and on the coal they use in doing that work. Canadian tugs may go to Buffalo, a distance of twenty miles, get their coal there, and will then have to return the twenty miles in order to get to the entrance of the Welland Canal. When they reach Buffalo there are dock dues and other fees to pay, so that the coal of a Canadian wrecker, at the entrance of the Welland Canal, will cost at least $1 a ton more than it will cost the American wrecker. We talk about reciprocity—and I do not intend to deal very largely with that question—but according to a paragraph I read in an American paper, a commissioner had been sent from Washington to find out if there were any Canadians on the Niagara frontier who were earning one dollar on the American side for his family, who lived on the Canadian side of the river, and if so, to have him expelled from the country. No Canadian will be allowed to live in Canada, and earn a dollar in the United States. That is the position of the Niagara peninsula, and the county where I live. It was stated the other night, that the Americans had taken the duty off fruit. Let me tell this House that, while they pretended to take the duty off fruit, they imposed such an embargo in the shape of charges on papers, and entries, and so forth, that fruit crossing the frontier at Niagara was met with a large protection in favor of American producers. In some cases the Minister of Customs has ascertained that these charges amount to a protection in favor of American fruit growers of from 50 to 75 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. Over 100; I have the evidence here.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I will say this, and I say it in all earnestness, that if the protective policy which was adopted ten years ago, and which has been in force during these years, is to be trifled with at the suggestion of either the American people or at the suggestion of a member of this House, who by his personal influence can carry a Bill like this; if the National Policy has no more permanence than this, I say do away with it altogether. If the National Policy is to be frittered away Session after Session, if after people have invested money in good faith to-day, protection is to be taken away from them to-morrow, I, for one, will ask this House to cease to delude and deceive those who are seeking investments in this country. If this measure is passed, it will drive investors of large capital, men of large means who employ a great deal of labor, to the United States. It will do so for this good reason, that every Canadian insurance company has now withdrawn from insuring the hulls of vessels, which business is now entirely in the hands of American underwriters. Most of the vessels wrecked are barges and sailing vessels. The few wrecks in Canadian waters that may occur will be assisted from the nearest point, but as soon as the vessel is abandoned, the American underwriters will send their own people to the wreck, and our people will have nothing to do. If this Bill should pass it would not only drive many good citizens out of the country, but also, I repeat, drive capital out of the country. It will not only do that, Mr. Speaker, but it will have a very bad effect upon capital seeking investment in this country. By adopting this Bill the House will show that there is no stability whatever in the policy which this Government has been sustaining for the past ten years. We, in this House must give that policy stability, we must declare by our vote and let it be known to foreign countries that capital seeking investment here will be treated in good faith; treated honestly and fairly. If we allow any other impression to go abroad capital will cease to come to the country altogether, and our resources will not be developed to the same extent as if we keep faith with those who invest their money with us. I hold in my hand a letter which I will not read as it is too long.

Mr. BOWELL. Read.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). The Minister of Customs asks me to read it, and I will. It says:

"We see by the report from Ottawa that Mr. Kirkpatrick has again introduced his Bill in the Commons for reciprocity in wrecking. We think the Bill would be very detrimental to the wrecking interests here. You perhaps are aware that the last Canadian Marine Insurance Company (viz., The Western Assurance Company of Toronto) insuring vessels and steamers on the lakes has retired from the whole business, leaving that line of business wholly in the hands of American assurance companies, so that the whole patronage of the wrecking on both the Canadian and American shores will be at the disposal of the American insurance agents, and they will certainly throw it into the hands of the American wreckers and they will do most of the wrecking on this side if Mr. Kirkpatrick's Bill for reciprocity in wrecking becomes law. We know from experience when the Americans were allowed to wreck in Canadian waters that where vessels were insured in American companies, the American insurance agents would bring American wrecking tugs and though we would have our tugs at work on the vessel in trouble they would discharge us and continue the work with their own tugs; but where a Canadian insurance company was interested we always got a share of the work. We do not think that there has been a time since the Americans were excluded from wrecking in our waters that it would have been more injurious to us to grant reciprocity in wrecking than the present. Most of the crafts that get in trouble now are the sailing vessels and barges, and as they are rather unprofitable, and usually insured for their whole value, they are at once abandoned to the insurance company, and that, of course, places the insurance company in a position to take any means they choose for their release. The only chance for us to make a living at wrecking, if this reciprocity in wrecking Bill becomes law, is for us to become American citizens, and then they cannot refuse us a job because we are not Americans. There are laborers and mechanics in this town that have lost good situations in Buffalo and had to return here because they would not move their families over there and take the oath of allegiance to the United States, while others have moved and taken the oath, and hold their places. If reciprocal wrecking privileges are granted we would be very badly handicapped on all sides."

The letter goes on to speak on the matter in the same terms but I have given you the main ideas advanced in the letter and I will not read further. There were 15 wrecks in 1887 at that end, on the Canadian shore of Lake Erie, and 10 of these got their assistance from Port Colborne. There was only one craft in trouble at this end of Lake Erie, on the American shore, in 1887; that was the schooner Manzanilla of St. Catharines and she became a total loss very soon after stranding, so that there was no American wrecking in 1887 at the end of Lake Erie that the Americans could have given us.

Mr. KIRK. Who wrote the letter?

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). Carter & Bros, of Port Colborne. They are good Reformers too, and they vote against me every time, but I am supporting the amendment of the member for North Norfolk, not upon party lines but in the general interests of the country. In 1880 there were sixteen wrecks, and nearly all of them received assistance at the hands of Canadian wreckers. Now, Mr. Speaker, I find the following item in a Windsor newspaper of a recent date:

"A plasterer who had secured work in Detroit a few days ago was turned back to Canada while more than a hundred workmen came over to work in Canada and were unmolested."

That is the reciprocity we receive at the hands of the American Government and that is the way in which we are treated. I ask in the name of my constituents, I ask in the name of the National Policy, I ask in the name of the people of this country that we shall not give this privilege to American wreckers unless we get something in return. We are willing to grant them reciprocity in everything that is fair and right; but I say, Sir, that we are not called upon to sacrifice every interest we possess in order to induce or to entice the American people to do something for us. We as Canadians ought to stand upon our rights and upon our privileges, and I would ask this House, that before passing a Bill of this kind an effort should be made—if it is necessary to have reciprocity of any kind—to see that something be done between the two Governments in the direction indicated by the amendment, in order to in some way modify the tone of the Bill which is now before the House. If that is not done and if this House will not consent to such a policy in this matter I will ask that this Parliament shall do the next best thing, and place the Canadian wrecker on the same footing as the American wrecker. I say, Sir, that the Canadian wrecker ought to be allowed to import all his materials free and that he should also get his coal free; privileges which are now extended to the American wreckers. I believe, Sir, that a modified treaty in this respect, which would be fair to both countries, could be ratified by mutual concessions and by mutual arrangement between the Governments of the two countries. I would therefore ask the House to support the amendment of my hon. friend from Norfolk.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. member whether he does not hold the opinion that the consumer pays the duty on the coal, and if he does hold it I would ask him when did he change his opinion on the matter?

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). That is a point of law which I will leave to the hon. member for Bothwell to decide. He appears to be the only member in the House who is able to deal with a question of that kind.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am sure that after listening to the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), all the members of this House must be pleased at one effect of the debate which concluded last night, for it cannot be denied that the speeches which have been delivered during that debate have made a convert of the member for North Norfolk. They have evidently converted him to a belief in the salutary benefits of the National Policy to this country, and have caused him to become an enthusiastic supporter of that policy. But like all converts he has "out Herodded Herod," and he has advocated the policy further than the advocates of the policy themselves. Hon. members on this side of the House believe that the National Policy, taken as a whole, is designed to promote the greatest good to the greatest number, but the hon. gentleman, in order to promote the good of two wrecking companies, wants to make subservient to their interests the interest of the ship owners of Ontario and Canada, and the whole of the shipping interests of the mariners of Canada. The hon. gentleman wants to make the interests of all the wreckers in Canada subservient to the interests of those two wrecking companies, one of which companies he has something to do with; he did not explain what.

Mr. CHARLTON. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The hon. member says, that because those companies have invested some thousands of dollars in wrecking plant that therefore they should be protected. What is the policy that has been advocated by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and what is the policy that the hon. gentleman has time and time again denounced with all his eloquence and all his vigor but that very policy? Because money has been invested in factories and industries of this country the hon. gentleman has time and again said: Sweep them away; let us go in for unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union or anything to do away with that policy. But when the interests of two wrecking companies are concerned, the hon. gentleman changes his tune, and asks this House to adopt a different policy from that which he has advocated before. Now, I submit that, in the interest of those two companies themselves, this Bill should become law, because when it goes into force they will have a better chance to make money and to utilise the capital they have invested than they are able to do under the present law, and I will show you how. The hon. gentleman contrasts the action of the two Governments, and he says that the action of the Canadian Government has always been eminently humane, conciliatory and forgiving—that the Canadian Government has always been ready to give away and allow American tugs to come in and do business in Canadian waters, and he gave twenty or more instances in which that was done; but he says that you cannot refer to a single instance of the American Government reciprocating and allowing Canadian tugs to go into American waters. That is precisely what I say. Our Government allows American tugs to come into our waters, but our tugs and wrecking companies are debarred from going into their waters, and that is a right we want to obtain. Whenever we ask the American Government for it, they say: No; there is our offer, as soon as you accept it, you will get admission to our waters, and not before. This Act will give us that right; Americans will gain nothing from it, and Canadians will gain everything. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) argues with great force, but he argues not merely against the Bill, but against the amendment as well. He seconds the amendment to allow reciprocity in towage, and he says what will be the consequence? This very reciprocity in towage which he asks us to give to the Americans will ruin the tug companies on the Welland Canal, because American tugs will come on the lakes and tow the vessels through the canal. I cannot understand the consistency or the logic of the hon. gentleman. To be consistent, he should have said that he would oppose both the Bill and the amendment. Now, I should like to tell this House, as I have told it before, that this Bill is not promoted in the interest of any one man or any one firm. It is true, there is a firm doing business near Kingston, which has recently invested a large amount of money in wrecking appurtenances, and it has to-day the most complete wrecking plant on the whole inland waters. Those men are in favor of this Bill, and say that they are able to compete with the Americans, and are desirous of gaining access to those waters where the greatest number of wrecks take place and where great riches are sunk fathoms deep. They are ready to operate not only on Lake Ontario, but on the upper lakes as well.

Mr. CHARLTON. How much capital have they invested?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I cannot tell, but I know that they have the most complete wrecking appliances on the inland waters.

Mr. CHARLTON. They have $30,000 invested, about one-fifth of what Carter Bros. have.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. No matter how much it is, it is quite ample to do all the business, and they are not afraid to compete with Carter Bros. or any other firm. But, Sir, they are not the only wrecking company we have. Donnelly & Son, Calvin & Co. and all the other wreckers on Lake Ontario are anxious for this Bill to become law. I hold in my hand a letter from the Lake Superior Tug Company of Port Arthur, in which they say:

"We approve of the stand you have taken in regard to reciprocity in wrecking; that is, that the wrecking question should be settled on its own merits, and, while we approve of reciprocity in coasting, we do not think the question should be combined as Mr. Patterson puts them. We might say that we are the only tug owners on the northern or Canadian shore of Lake Superior, and if we cannot hold our own in competition with American companies we deserve to go under."

I am told, Sir, that the capital of the company to which I have referred is $100,000.

Mr. CHARLTON. How much paid up?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. All of it, I suppose. I am not a member of it, and do not know anything about it; I am only giving you the information which is conveyed to me. This Bill, I say, is not promoted in the interest of any one firm or any one wrecking company. It is promoted in the interest of the ship owners on the inland waters of Canada, in the interest of 35,000 mariners who plough the waters of our great lakes, who risk their lives in stormy weather in all seasons of the year, and whose association has petitioned this House unanimously in favor of the Bill. It is also in the interest of the insurance companies. We are told that the Western Insurance Company went out of business; perhaps it was because there was not in Canada any good wrecking company. The very company with which the hon. member for North Norfolk is so well acquainted at Windsor, knows that the system which has been in vogue, of keeping the Canadian waters for Canadians, except when the Minister of Customs allows American tugs to come in, has been so beneficial to that company that it is almost in liquidation; if it is not fully so, it ought to be, because it cannot pay its debts. Am I wrong in that statement? I pause for a reply. Now, I am not going to detain the House any longer than simply to ask them to reject this amendment, because if it is tacked on to the Bill it will practically destroy it, because it will prevent our people from taking advantage of the offer made by the United States Government. I may say that this Bill was prepared in its present shape with the concurrence of the hon. Minister of Customs and the hon. Minister of Justice. The hon. Minister of Customs in the debate which took place at a previous stage of this Bill, said :

"If we are to have a Bill at all, let us have one in words precisely of the same effect as that which the Americans give us, and no more."

I ask the House now to vote down the amendment, and to give the Bill its third reading.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish simply to strip this case of all verbiage and side issues, and present the plain direct question. We have a proposition from the American Government to surrender to them the advantages we possess in the matter of wrecking, and my amendment simply takes the ground that it is proper for us to make a counter offer proposing modifications to the offer of the Americans. These modifications I believe, will be accepted; but if we accept their offer without making a counter offer we part with all the means we have of procuring any concession, and rule ourselves out of court. I moved this amendment for the purpose of placing ourselves in the position of securing, if possible, some concession in this matter which will be of advantage to us. I do not oppose reciprocity in wrecking. I do not say, if these concessions were refused, that I would oppose my hon. friend's Bill, but I do say it is desirable to get these concessions, and if we do not take this way to get them, we will not get them. For this purpose I move the amendment.

Mr. CASEY. I cannot understand why either my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. Ferguson) or my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) should have used the language they did in regard to this matter, nor can I understand on what principle the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) can defend his amendment. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) says that we should not give anything without getting something in return. Well, nobody proposes to do that. The Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) proposes to accept the offer already made by the United States. We do not propose to give them anything. The existing state of things has been pointed out to be what our friends on the other side used to call in the old low tariff days, "one-sided reciprocity." American vessels are now allowed to wreck in Canadian waters, but Canadian tugs are not allowed wrecking facilities in American waters. This Bill will have the effect of removing the disability on Canadian tugs and of allowing them the same advantages in American waters which American tugs enjoy in ours. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says illogically that he proposes to make the acceptance of the American offer contingent on their giving something else, and he does this, not for the purpose of preventing reciprocity in wrecking, but for the purpose of getting larger privileges. The only result of tacking on anything to the counter offer would be to postpone, at all events, if not entirely prevent the concluding of an arrangement which even my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says he would not object to if it came up by itself, and the other offers were rejected. The hon. gentleman said if the offer of reciprocity in towing was rejected, he would be prepared to support this Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; I did not. What I did say was that if this counter offer was rejected, I would not say that I would oppose my hon. friend's Bill. I did not say I would support it or oppose it.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend leaves himself entirely in the clouds as to what he would do in case the offer of reciprocity in towing was rejected, so that by accepting my hon. friend's proposal and making the counter offer, which we know will have the effect of postponing reciprocity in wrecking for a year, we do not know where our hon. friend will be should that proposal be rejected. He may oppose reciprocity in wrecking then as strongly as he does now. The common sense of the House will prefer to accept a definite proposal instead of postponing the matter and probably making an agreement impossible forever. I would have no objection at all to a Bill which contained this proposal, that we should accept the Americans offer of wrecking in coasting, and making the offer that whenever they would be willing to give us reciprocity in towing and coasting we would do the like with them. I would not care to accept the Bill in the sense of the resolution of the hon. member for North Norfolk, even if it were accepted by the United States, because if we are to have reciprocity in wrecking and towing only, the Americans having larger plant than we, would simply run us out of the business in our own waters. If you put coasting along with that and get it accepted, that would be a different story, and the Bill of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson), as it stood, embodying these three features was preferable to this narrow resolution of my hon. friend from North Norfolk.

Sir DONALD SMITH. I rise to say a few words in support of the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). The merits of the Bill have been discussed in all their bearings. I will content myself with alluding to that which has been urged upon me in the strongest way possible by those interested in the carrying trade and commercial interests of Montreal. One and all are in favor of this Bill, and they surely know what are their best interests and what would be most to their own advantage. I trust, therefore, the House will accept the Bill as it stands without amendment.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not propose to continue this discussion, nor would I have risen to my feet had it not been for a remark from the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), which must have left the impression in the House that I concurred in the principle involved in the Bill when he stated that I had been consulted as to the wording of it. It is quite true that I was consulted. The hon. gentleman showed me his Bill in connection with the Minister of Justice, not the Bill as it is before the House, and I pointed out its defects, and told him if he intended to do anything in reference to wrecking he should not, without an equivalent, propose to this House any greater concessions than were given in the American Bill. That is what I stated without committing myself at all to the principle of the measure. The hon. gentleman, if he had read a little further the remarks I made, would find that they referred exclusively to the suggestions of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). I said that if we adopted the suggestions made by the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) that the Bill should apply also to the sea coast, there would be no probability of its being accepted. With reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Casey) he, not intentionally I am sure, misled the House when he said the Americans were permitted to wreck in our waters. In no case have they been permitted to wreck in Canadian waters except where life was in danger or property at stake. In such cases, the Government considered the question became one of humanity, in so far as it affected the life of those who were on board the vessels, and in order to save the property of the country, I have given the permission required with the consent of my colleagues, in every case, no matter how restrictive the law might be. If the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Labelle) will permit me, I will say if the tug to which he referred refused to tow his vessel, under the circumstances he laid before the House, into a Canadian port, it was not because it would have been interfered with in a case of that kind. But I presume the reason for the course that the tug owner took was that he had a longer distance to take the vessel in order to get it into an American port, and would make more money thereby, and no doubt, patriotic as they are, he thought that, by taking it into an American port, all the repairs necessary to that vessel, and the benefits arising therefrom would go to American artisans.

Mr. LAURIER. When the Bill passes, he will not have that temptation.

Mr. BOWELL. That is unrestricted reciprocity. I am, not arguing that question at present, but I am giving what I presume to have been the reasons which actuated him. I differ altogether from the leader of the Opposition in his statement that the temptation would not have been there if this Bill were passed. It matters not whether there was reciprocity in wrecking or not, if the tug-owner were actuated by the feelings which I have suggested, the interests of his own country would have led him to take that course no matter what privileges he might have in Canadian waters. It would be a question for the owner of the vessel of saving his vessel, and if the tug-owner refused to come into Canadian waters, he could not compel him to do so.

Mr. LABELLE. I would ask the Minister of Customs, if that tug that took our steamer down the Sault Ste. Marie canal had taken her to Owen Sound, would he not have seized her, because he took her on Cariboo Island on the Canadian side of Lake Superior? Would not the Customs officers have seized her at Owen Sound?

Mr. BOWELL. Not under these representations. I do not say they would not have seized her.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. BOWELL. Of course, Customs officials have a duty to perform, but the moment a representation of that kind had been made to the department, the vessel would have been released.

Mr. MITCHELL. The position, as I understand it, is that the Customs Department would have seized the vessel and that they had a right to seize the American tug—

Mr. BOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL,—if she brought the vessel into a Canadian port. What, then, is the position of the American tug-owner? He says, am I going to place my vessel, which may be worth $15,000, $20,000, $30,000 or $40,000 at the mercy of a Canadian Minister of Customs, in view of all the vagaries which that peculiar department has exhibited during the last few years. This is a case of humanity, and I trust every man in the House will support the motion.

Amendment negatived.

On the main motion,

Mr. CHARLTON. In order to give the House an opportunity to surrender most perfectly and unconditionally all chances of getting concessions from the American Government in this matter, I beg to complete this by moving the complement of the previous amendment. I move :

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to Committee of the Whole with instructions that they have power to amend it by adding to section 1 of the said Bill the following words:—
"And United States tugs may tow vessels and rafts from one Canadian port to another in Canadian waters contiguous to the United States."

I regret very much the action of the House in this matter. I believe we have voluntarily and very absurdly surrendered our chances of obtaining reciprocity in wrecking.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. You must not reflect upon a vote of the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the Bill passes in its present shape, we have the satisfaction of going altogether without reciprocity in towing.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to ask the acting leader of the Government what he proposes to do in the present exigency. It is a clear defeat of the Administration, though he himself voted for it as a saving clause, but I think it is a clear evidence of the condemnation of the course the Government have pursued, and the hon. gentleman should give an explanation of the action he intends to take.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I would like very much to know whether a decision has been arrived at between the hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle) and the Government with reference to the Bill standing in his name, that has been on the Order Paper ever since the 4th of February. The Bill had an early birth, and it has been standing there from that day to this. It is a Bill of considerable importance, and seriously affects some of the industries of the country. I should like to know whether the promoter of the Bill intends to go on with it, and whether the Government intends to allow legislation of that kind. The Bill proposes to interfere with a trade in which many people are engaged. At this season of the year the nurserymen are under the necessity of making their purchases, of making arrangements for their supplies, and bringing from the United States the trees necessary to carry on their business during the coming year. I, therefore, think that it is only fair for the trade and for the country that we should have some statement from the promoter of the Bill, or from the Government, as to what is going to be done about it.

Mr. BOYLE. I do not think it will take so long a time to pass the Bill as the hon. gentleman has occupied just now in asking about it. I was prepared to go on with the Bill when it was reached on the last occasion, but the House desired to adjourn, and I could not move it. I am prepared to go on now, if the hon. Minister of Public Works will allow me to do so.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. After the long sitting of yesterday, hon. members on both sides of the House with whom I have consulted, are of the opinion that we should adjourn now. To-morrow and Friday are Government days, when we shall have to sit much longer than we are sitting this evening, and unless we take a little rest we cannot do so.

Mr. LAURIER. On next Monday the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity, I presume, to move his Bill, as it is private members' day, and I understand that it will stand as the first order.

Mr. WALLACE. There are some other Bills immediately following this one, which I think the House has been promised an opportunity to discuss. I think we should proceed with the business to-night, and work a little later. I have brought a Bill before the House, and the Government have promised full opportunity for discussing it. I would like to know from the leader of the House when the Government proposes to take that up, because if the Bill is put off until next Monday, there will be no sitting of the House on that day, and these Bills that are on the list will have to be postponed until next Monday week, and the Bill of the hon. member for Monck, being the first on the list, it will throw mine back indefinitely. I would like to know from the Government when the Bill that I have introduced will have a chance of being considered.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to say this evening, but I will mention the matter to the First Minister, so that when we meet again my hon. friend will be able to obtain an answer.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The hon. leader of the House has not answered my question, whether the Government intend to allow the Bill of the hon. member for Monck to go on and when. If it is to pass it certainly ought to be proceeded with, if it is not to pass, and I hope it will not, I think it is only due to the parties engaged in the line of business to which I have alluded, that the Government should make some announcement as to their intention in regard to it.

Sir HECTOR LANGENIN. This Bill is not in the hands of the Government. It is in the hands of a private member, and I understood from the promoter of the Bill that the first time it is reached again he will be ready to move the second reading.

Mr. BOYLE. I can scarcely understand the impetuosity of the hon. member for Elgin in respect to this matter.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin).

He is evidently suffering from congestion of the brain, or some such ailment. If he complains that the Bill is a detrimental one, surely in the natural order of things, the longer it is put off the better for him and his view of the subject. So far as I am concerned, there has been no unreasonable delay. The Bill unfortunately has been reached just at the time that the House desires to adjourn. Of course it is in the hands of the Government, because when they call for an adjournment the House must adjourn unless the Government are willing to sit longer. I will endeavor to meet the views of the hon. member for Elgin, and I will move the second reading at the earliest occasion. So far as I know, in order to correct some misapprehension, there is nothing in the way of its becoming law.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10:45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 21st March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BELLEVILLE HARBOR.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 116) respecting the harbor of Belleville, in the Province of Ontario.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the nature of this Bill?

Mr. TUPPER. It is simply to put the harbor into commission.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Will that involve any expenditure?

Mr. TUPPER. I understand that the hon. gentleman means that, in that case, the Bill should be introduced by resolution, but the Act which is repealed by this Bill provides that certain fees shall be collected by the town of Belleville. This Bill simply provides for putting the harbor in commission, and there is no change in regard to the fees. Therefore it does not require any resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION LANDS ACT.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill amending the Dominion Lands Act?

Mr. DEWDNEY. It is the intention.

EMPLOYÉES ON THE CAPE BRETON RAILWAY.

Mr. KIRK asked, Are William Stewart, Archibald Cameron, Wentworth McDonald, Joseph Freer and Daniel McGregor, or either of them, employed by the Government in connection with the Cape Breton Railway? If so, in what capacity, and at what salary?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. William Stewart is not employed on the Cape Breton Railway. Cameron, McDonald, Freer and McGregor are employed by the Government in connection with the Cape Breton Railway: Cameron, as overseer, at $75 per month; McDonald, as track boss, at $115 a month; Freer, as masonry inspector, at $80 a month, and McGregor, as walking boss, at $115.

JOLIETTE MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. NEVEU asked, 1. When did the contract for carrying the mail between Lanoraie Station and Joliette expire, or when will it expire? 2. To whom has the new contract, if any, for carrying the mail between those two places, been awarded, and what is the amount to be paid in money?

Mr. HAGGART. This contract will expire on the 31st March, 1889. The new contract has not been awarded.

ADULTERATION OF LARD.

Mr. SPROULE asked, Is it the intention of the Government, in view of the extensive adulteration of lard imported from the United States, as shown by the Report of the Chief Analyst in Bulletin No. 7 of the Inland Revenue Department, to provide against its being brought into this country, either by increased duty or otherwise?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government is not in a position to give an explicit answer to this question at the present moment. It is engaging their consideration.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 98) to amend the "Winding-up Act," chapter one hundred and twenty-nine of the Revised Statutes.—(Sir John Thompson.)

SALARIES TO POSTMASTERS.

Mr. HAGGART moved that Bill (No. 100) further to amend the "Civil Service Act," chapter seventeen of the Revised Statutes, be read the third time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I shall not renew the discussion which took place in committee on this Bill, but I would simply say that the arguments which were used on that occasion, notably by the First Minister, have entirely failed to convince me, for one, that there is any propriety in giving our postmasters in the large cities a salary larger than that given to the permanent head of the department. I, therefore, move:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be re-committed for the purpose of amending the same by providing "that the salaries of postmasters shall not exceed the sum of $3,200, being the amount paid to the deputy head of the Post Office Department."

Mr. HAGGART. For a number of years, in fact since 1874, the salary paid to the postmaster at Montreal has been $4,000 a year. In this Bill it is proposed to leave it optional to the Postmaster General to increase the salary of the postmaster at Toronto to the amount of salary paid to the postmaster in Montreal, and to increase the salary of the postmaster at Ottawa $200 per annum. This Bill is for the purpose of giving power to introduce into the Estimates these increases. These sums will be placed in the Estimates, and a vote of the House can then be taken on it.

House divided on the amendment.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

House resolved itself into Committee to consider resolution (p. 469) amending the Customs Act.—(Mr. Bowell.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the Minister will require to give some explanation in regard to some portions of this resolution which are not very plain.

Mr. BOWELL. My intention was to allow the resolution to be read, and then to explain each of the sections if the committee desired it. I may say further, that my intention is, as soon as the Bill has been laid before the House, to place before each member an explanation of the reasons for making the changes in these different clauses, in order that hon. members may be in full possession of the reasons that actuated the department in asking a change in the Customs Act. If, however, it is the opinion of the committee that we should discuss the matter now, before hon. members have the Bill in its entirety, and the explanations before them, I shall be quite willing to give a synopsis of the changes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think, at all events, an explanation should be given with respect to the clause that provides for the cost of transshipment being added in all cases to the value for duty, in order that we may know what the intention of the Minister is in respect to it.

Mr. BOWELL. If the committee desire, I will give a short explanation at the present time, and afterwards will lay a fuller explanation before the House, as I did when the amendment to the Customs Act was proposed two years ago. I may say that the changes which I propose are not of that radical character which one would suppose them to be, from having read the comments which have been made upon them by various newspapers in the country. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not find fault with those comments, because the resolutions are so vague that I am not at all surprised they were misunderstood and misinterpreted. The proposition is to amend the 33rd section of the Customs Act, so as to prevent the bringing into the country, during the night, of goods in waggons and sleighs and placing the same restriction upon parties so bringing in goods—except it be with permission of the Customs officers, who of necessity would have a knowledge of what the goods were and where they were going to, so that they could follow them in the morning—as is applied to goods brought into the country by vessels or any other conveyance. At present goods are brought over at all hours of the night, just across the frontier, and particularly down in the Eastern Townships and other places where there is but an imaginary line between the two countries. If the parties are caught bringing them in, no matter at what hour of the night, they say, "Oh, we intended to go to the Custom house in the morning." When they were caught probably they would go, but if not, the probabilities are they would not go.

Mr. SCRIVER. Will the hon. Minister allow me to ask what is meant by "the night;" is it all the hours of darkness? If it becomes dark at five in the afternoon, as it does in the autumn, is "night" supposed to last from that hour until 8 o'clock the following morning? That is a very important consideration to the people of the Eastern Townships, and to the inhabitants living along that part of the frontier of whom the Minister seems to have such a poor opinion.

Mr. BOWELL. I have expressed no opinion of the gentlemen or the inhabitants who live along the frontier. So far as my remarks apply, they apply to a certain class of residents with whom my hon. friend who has just spoken is as intimate and as well acquainted as I am, and if I wanted a witness in this House to show the propriety of adopting a clause of this kind, the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) would be the man I would look to.

Mr. SCRIVER. I will have something to say on that hereafter.

Mr. BOWELL. What is intended by "night" in this resolution is after office hours, no matter what time that may be. But if the wording is not sufficient to cover that, I am quite prepared to make any amendment that may be suggested.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is the first time I ever knew you to be prepared to make an amendment to the Customs Act, and I have tried to get amendments pretty often.

Mr. BOWELL. I have been charged on more than one occasion by my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), with making too many changes, of a restrictive rather than a liberal character.

Mr. MITCHELL. I said amendments, not changes.

Mr. BOWELL. I understood what you said perfectly well. An amendment is a change whether for good or bad. The 61st clause is to make the law applicable in respect to the "value for duty" on all goods, no matter from what part of the world they may be imported. It has been stated that the proposition was to add the transportation charges to the port of entry, but such is not the case. As the law reads at present the provision is as follows:—

"In determining the dutiable value of goods, except when imported from Great Britain and Ireland, there shall be added to the cost, or the actual wholesale price, 'for duty,' all the expenses included from the place of growth, production or manufacture, whether by land or by water, to the vessel in which shipment is made, either in transitu to or direct to Canada."

The proposition simply is to strike out the words "except when imported from Great Britain and Ireland." Thus placing the goods purchased in Great Britain and Ireland in the same position as those which are bought in the interior of Russia, Germany or France.

Mr. MULLOCK. That is not loyal.

Mr. BOWELL. Perhaps, if the hon. gentleman will wait until I am through my explanation, he may find it is strictly in the line of loyalty.

Mr. MULLOCK. All right, we will wait.

Mr. BOWELL. I think I will be able to make my remarks much shorter and my information better understood by the House if gentlemen will not interrupt quite so much. There is another proposition to change this clause so as to make it clearer what is really meant by the "value for duty." At present you will notice the Act says "there shall be added to the cost, or the actual wholesale price or fair market value." I propose to change that wording so that it shall more clearly bear the interpretation which has been given to it, that is, to make the value for duty the price which is paid in the country in which the goods are purchased; namely, in the proportions in which they are purchased. All merchants know that in going to a foreign market a wholesale purchaser who buys more extensively than another gets a larger discount, and as the law is based upon what is termed a fair market value, that in all cases has been ruled to be the "value for duty." I hope I have made myself understood upon that point?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Which clause are you explaining in your resolution.

Mr. BOWELL. Clause 61, of the Customs Act. I may state that the principal reason for striking out this exception as regards Great Britain, was from the fact, that the working of this clause was brought under the notice of the Imperial Government by Germany, calling attention to the fact that a treaty existed between Great Britain and the German Empire, which was entered into in 1866, before Confederation, and in which what is termed the "most favored nation clause" is accorded by Great Britain to Germany, and the other countries, which became a party to that treaty, and in that treaty the colonies are included.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How will that affect the bounty on sugar?

Mr. BOWELL. That cannot affect the bounty on sugar.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Why not?

Mr. BOWELL. Because it is governed by another clause, and because the bounty on sugar is applicable to all countries, it matters not from where purchased. If England, to-morrow, were to grant a bounty on sugars exported from Great Britain to Canada, the amount of the bounty would be added to the value of the sugar for duty; consequently, the favored nation clause could not apply, because Great Britain would have no advantage in shipping sugar to Canada, over Germany, Hungary, or Austria.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman did not quite catch my idea. What I wanted to enquire was, in the case of sugar exported from Germany under the bounty system, how would this clause enable you to add the bounty?

Mr. BOWELL. As I have already explained, that is governed by another clause altogether. There is a special provision in the tariff, and also in this Act, which gives power to add the amount of a bounty or royalty, or any other commission or privilege granted by any country from which goods are imported.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It is not important, I admit, under our system of testing by polariscope.

Mr. BOWELL. In that case it does not apply, but it does apply wherever the ad valorem principle is adopted, even to sugar tested under the polariscope. However, this clause will not in any way interfere with that. As I was explaining, the attention of the Government having been called to the working of this provision of the law, there were but two courses to pursue: to abolish the principle of adding to the value for duty the inland transportation to the port whence the goods are shipped, or to take out the exemption in the clause. When the House learns that the charges upon goods coming from the interior of the continent add to the value of goods for duty about 50 per cent.—the German despatch says 60 per cent.—it will be apparent that the charges for inland transportation could not be repealed. Goods are purchased at such a very low price in the interior that the cost of transportation to the port of shipment is in many cases greater than the cost of the article itself; and those who have had any experience of the working of the Customs Act, and of the difficulties that always present themselves as to the true value, know that the safest way is to make the value for duty that at the last port of exportation. If that would raise the value too high, and make the duty too onerous, then it would be better to reduce pro rata the rate of duty imposed than to remove the cost of transportation altogether. The amendment of the 62nd clause is simply to place it in accord with the resolution to which I have already referred. The 64th clause is so amended as to make clear that the value for duty shall include the value of any royalty, rent or charge made for exclusive right to any territorial limit in which to sell or use any machine or goods, and to compel the addition of such value to the invoice. The only difference in that clause is the addition of the words, "or use." At present, if the importer of any foreign article is given any commission by a reduction of value or royalty, or if a bounty is given to those who export, that is now added to the value of the duty; but instances occur in which a person has his invoice made out to state that the goods are for use, and not for sale. Under these circumstances the law did not apply, though after the goods were entered, and after the purchaser used them for a short time, he could place them in the market for sale at an advantage over those who had the royalty added to the value of the goods they brought in for sale. The next provision is simply to give authority to the Board of Customs, that is, the Dominion Appraisers, over port appraisers. As the law now stands, it is in doubt whether the ruling of a port appraiser as to the value for duty of imported goods, however erroneous it may be, can be overruled. The amendment is in the interest of uniformity, and instances have occurred in which the Board of Customs knew goods to be undervalued, or overvalued, as the case might be, by a local appraiser; and under clause 62, it was doubtful whether he, being a sworn officer, could be overruled by the authorities at headquarters. For instance, the sugar inspector reports to the department that certain sugar is undervalued. The appraiser in Montreal said: "No, I have taken the oath of office; I believe the entry, as I allowed it to pass, is correct, and I will not change it." The intention of this amendment is to give power to the Board of Appraisers, consisting of the inspector, and such others as we might add to the board, to go and make a full investigation into a dispute of that kind, and report to the department; and if the department thought the evidence was sufficient to warrant the raising or lowering of the value, they would have authority to do so, and to relieve the local appraiser of any conscientious scruples he might have in the matter.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That is quite proper.

Mr. BOWELL. The 89th section of the Act is so amended as to make clear that goods entered for warehouse must be warehoused at once, some importers having claimed that there was no absolute law requiring immediate action, they could take their time or save the trouble of removing the goods in case they could dispose of them before being called to account for the duty. Instances have occurred of this character. A man imports goods and puts them in the sufferance warehouse, refusing to put them at once in the bonded warehouse, where they would be under lock and key; and it has been claimed that he has a right to do that because the law gives him power to sell the goods without being placed in bond; and a dispute has arisen as to whether the Custom house authorities have the right to enforce bonding at once unless the duty is paid, and the goods are transferred to the buyer. I think merchants will see the importance of a clause of this kind, in order to make the law clear, and to prevent as much as possible disputes between Customs officials and the importer, as these cases are constantly cropping up.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What class of goods would that apply to?

Mr. BOWELL. It would apply to all classes of goods. If a merchant imports a chest of tea he can sell it immediately on its arrival, and transfer it at once. The entry has to be made whether there is duty or not. If the law permitted the merchants to hold the goods for two or three days, it would necessitate officers watching them all the time.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Is it going to reduce the time merchants now have for warehousing?

Mr. BOWELL. No, not as it has been practiced. I do not propose either to extend or restrict the time, but simply to make the provision so plain that the merchant, on reading it, will exactly understand what his privileges are. The next provision is a new one. It has been deemed advisable to have some means by which we can, as far as practicable, ascertain the actual transit trade of the country, and I ask for power to enable me to give instructions at the frontier ports to keep a record of all goods brought into the country and passed through it. I do not anticipate being able to obtain an accurate record. That could not be got without imposing onerous duties on those engaged in the trade. I want power, however, to enable the officer to compel either the steamboat owner or the railway proprietor to give us a statement of the number of cars entered at any one port, and, as near as he can, the contents.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Have we not that power now?

Mr. BOWELL. It is doubtful, and I thought it better that it should be placed beyond peradventure. The object is to add to our Trade and Navigation Returns something similar to that which we find in the American Trade and Navigation Returns, that is, a statement of the inland transportation of goods. They have it, to a certain extent, through the interstate trade. But what I propose to find out at present is the transit trade through Canada.

Mr. SCRIVER. Would the collectors at the frontier ports be called on to obtain that information?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; we want, as far as possible, to have that done. If fifty cars are entered in one train, we want to have a report of the number of cars, and, as far as practicable, their contents. The next clause is to define the time at which goods are exported from a foreign country. The law now provides that the value for duty shall be the value at the time of exportation. It is contended that if a vessel is loading with sugar, for instance, in Jamaica, and she lies at the wharf for three months, and takes part of her cargo at the beginning of May, and does not sail until the 1st of August, the goods which were placed on board in August, as well as those taken on board the 1st of May, should be considered as having been exported at the time they were put on board the vessel. Instances have occurred when vessels commenced loading molasses, the molasses was selling at from 14 to 15 cents, but by the time the vessel left molasses was selling at 18 cents per gallon. The price fluctuated from 14 to 18 cents during the whole three months. When the merchant made his entry the officer at the port said the value of the molasses at the time the vessel sailed should rule the whole cargo. He replied that the Act provides that if you export any article from this country to another, the date of exportation is the time at which the goods are placed on the vessel. In order to avoid any dispute in the future, I propose to adopt the clause which is in the American Act governing this point. Article 500 of the American Rules and Regulations is as follows:—

“The time of exportation must be deemed and taken to be the date at which the merchandise actually leaves the foreign port for its destination in the United States, which period may ordinarily be established by the production of the clearance granted to the vessel at the foreign port and the declaration of the master, under oath, at the time of the entry, and of the date when the vessel sailed.”

The insertion of a clause of that kind will prevent, in the future, all trouble between merchants and the Customs authorities.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). You propose to take the value of the last port shipped, whether higher or lower?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes. There have been many cases in which the merchant has purchased in a foreign country and the goods had fallen in price before the vessel left. Their invoices have been reduced for duty, and they paid the duty on the reduced value.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Done voluntarily by the Customs Department?

Mr. BOWELL. It has been done when the attention of the department was called to it. We are not such exacters as you think we are.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think, under the construction the hon. gentleman is going to place on the Act, it would be rather difficult or unfair to value the cargo at the highest rate. The importations of molasses now come chiefly from the British Islands and Porto Rico. We used to get a large quantity from Cuba, but, since we are importing from Porto Rico and the British Islands, there are various grades. For instance, there might be fifty puncheons at 20 cents, and more at 18 cents, and more at 24 cents. It would, therefore, be according to the different values that the duty should be levied, and it would not be fair to apply the principle to the whole cargo at the highest rate.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. That does not apply. My argument was on the general principle. If a merchant went to the West Indies and purchased fifty puncheons of molasses at 20 cents, and twenty puncheons at 10 cents, and sailed the next day, and the value the next day was 20 cents and 10 cents, that is the price which he could enter them at. The only object of the clause is to define the duty at the place of exportation. If you had purchased an article worth 20 cents, and it lay at the wharf for a month, and the price went up to 25 cents, then you would have to pay on the 25 cents. If, on the other hand, the price had declined to 15 cents, the value for duty would be 15 cents. The next two clauses are simply intended to place money which has been paid in lieu of goods which may have been seized in precisely the same position as the goods themselves would be in case they had been taken into the possession of the Customs Department. At present, if goods are seized for the crime of smuggling, they are held. If, on the contrary, the merchant says, I do not wish you to take these goods, but I will pay the duty-paid value of them, the proposition is to place that money in precisely the same position as the goods would be in case they were in the custody of the Customs.

Mr. POWELL.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Will you sell the money at auction?

Mr. BOWELL. No, there is no necessity for that, because there is no difficulty in getting rid of the money. If under the law, goods will not sell for the amount of duty, they should be destroyed, but, as a rule, money is worth its face. These amendments are simple in their character, and are only intended to make the Act more workable, and to prevent, as much as possible, friction between the importers and the exporters. The only really important change which will affect the rate of duty which the merchant has to pay, is one to which I called attention at more length than any others, and that is the repeal of the exception as to Great Britain and Ireland, in reference to the adding to the value of an invoice the cost of inland transportation to find the value of the goods for duty.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister of Customs has largely drawn our Customs law from the Customs law of the United States, and, in some of the changes he is now proposing, he is availing himself of the arrangements which have been made over there in regard to the collection of the revenue. I would like the Minister to give us his views in regard to transshipment a little more fully, and I would ask him if it is not true that the United States law has been changed in that regard, and that, while at one time they added the inland transshipment charges in order to ascertain the value for duty, they have repealed that, and they are not added in that country now in any case? If that be so, I would ask the Minister, simply for information from his knowledge of the workings of this law, what are the advantages to be gained by adding these inland transshipment charges to the actual value of the goods? Is it for the mere purpose of securing greater revenue? Does he, or does he not, conceive that, by the maintenance of these charges, preference may be given to one market in a foreign country over another? Does he think that the United States have accomplished a reform when they abandon in toto the inland transshipment charges?

Mr. BOWELL. Have they abandoned them? Does the hon. gentleman say they have?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I will not speak positively, but that is my impression.

Mr. BOWELL. The latest authority I have is that it is not so.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). My question is proceeding upon that supposition. I thought I saw a work in the library which led me to understand that it was so. There was an enquiry before a sub-committee, in which the officer at New York was summoned to give testimony, and he stated that it was his individual opinion that those charges should be re-imposed; so that I took it for granted that the charges had been abandoned. I ask this question, because, while it may strike a person not having the means of information which the Minister has, that while the adding of those charges might secure more revenue for the country, and might act more favorably to merchants in one port than in other ports in the same kingdom, that might be outweighed by other considerations.

Mr. BOWELL. I cannot speak positively upon the question which the hon. gentleman has asked me, but I will make enquiry in regard to it. The latest authority I have on the subject, which I will not quote at length, says, amongst other things:

“All such merchandise, being manufactured of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, shall, in every such appraisal, be estimated to have been that at the time of exportation, and at the place whence the same was imported into the United States.”

So I draw the conclusion from this, that the price at the last place of exportation, would be the value for duty.

Whether that has been changed or not, I am not prepared to say. In regard to the advantages or disadvantages to which the hon. gentleman referred, I may say, that this law has been upon the Statute-book for a good many years before I had anything to do with the Customs, and I have always understood that the object of making the value of the goods the value at the place whence they were last exported, was not so much from a revenue standpoint, but was, in order to obtain, as nearly as possible, a uniformity of price upon the same article. The great difficulty which presented itself in the past, was in reference to goods purchased in the interior of Russia, in the interior of Germany, and in many other continental countries, where the goods are purchased at so low a price that really they have scarcely any value. It was deemed advisable, in order to secure uniformity, to provide that the value for duties should be taken in the principal markets of the country where the goods are produced, and at the port of shipment. There is no doubt, however, that by adding the inland transportation to the face of the invoice, it increases the value of the article for duty, and to that extent increases the revenue. I called attention to that, I think, when I was referring to the question before. From my experience of this Act I am satisfied that to change it, or to repeal it, would lead to a great deal of trouble and a great deal of confusion with regard to the question of undervaluation. Since my hon. friend put that question to me, the Commissioner has sent me a note, in which he says:

"See 2907 of Revised Statutes of the United States, containing provisions for collection of duties on inland transportation. It includes also charges for packages, putting up and preparing the goods for transportation, with many other particulars."

I should judge from this that all the inland charges are added to the value of the goods for duty.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am still under the impression—and I speak subject to correction, as the Minister does not know—that while that law prevailed with reference to adding the inland charges, for many years, three or four years ago a change was made. However, that can be ascertained, but when the Bill is introduced I will try to be in a position to know more positively.

Mr. BOWELL. I will look it up.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I understand the position taken by the Minister of Customs with respect to the value of goods at the time of shipment, but I would like the Minister to say how he would construe the expense of placing the goods on board the vessel at the port of shipment. For instance, take a cargo of molasses of which the loading may cost 50 cents or $1 a puncheon. There is an ad valorem duty on the barrel; would the hon. gentleman hold that to apply to the expense of placing it on board the vessel?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not propose to make any change in the law as it stands at present, with reference to any country. I only define the time of exportation, and whatever would apply to an article as the law stands now with reference to the charges, whatever they may be, will continue in the future; there is no addition or diminution.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Yes; but the hon. gentleman says that he defines the value of the goods to be the value at the time of shipment at the place where the vessel lies, plus the inland expenses of bringing them to the port for shipment. I merely desire to know whether he would consider that the expense of placing them on board the vessel should also be included in their value?

Mr. BOWELL. Whatever is included in these words, section 61, without the exception:

"In determining the dutiable value of goods, there shall be added to the cost, or the actual wholesale price or fair market value at the time of exportation, in the principal markets of the country from whence the same has been imported into Canada, the cost of inland transportation, shipment and transshipment, with all the expenses included, from the place of growth and production."

And so on.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How would the hon. gentleman interpret that himself?

Mr. BOWELL. If you have a case in dispute, send it over to me and I will give you an answer.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I would be glad to have an explanation from the hon. Minister concerning a case that is happening every day. I would like to know how this clause is going to work in the following case. We have in Quebec importers of furs; they purchase large quantities of furs in Nijni Novgorod, and Leipsic, and many other places in Europe. These furs are carried inland to a port in France, generally to Havre, to be imported to Quebec. Will the duty be charged on the whole cost of transportation inland, say, from Nijni Novgorod, or Leipsic, to Havre, in France, or to Liverpool—would the cost of transportation be added to the cost of purchase?—because the whole cost of inland transportation from any place in Russia where these furs are purchased, to the port of shipment, is very considerable. It would make the importation of these articles almost impossible. The purchase price is very low, but the cost of inland transportation to Havre or Liverpool is very high. I would like to know if, in that case, the cost of inland transportation is to be added under this new provision?

Mr. BOWELL. The cost of inland transportation that was paid in Russia to the port of shipment from Russia—

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). There is no port of shipment from Russia.

Mr. BOWELL. How do they get out? How do they get to England?

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). They are carried by rail to Havre or to Liverpool. The distance is immense, as the hon. gentleman knows, and the cost would be a very serious item, because these people do a very large trade with Russia and Germany in these furs. I know, as a matter of fact, that they are carried by land to Havre or Liverpool and thence shipped to Quebec.

Mr. BOWELL. The value for duty would be that at the principal market of the country in which they are purchased. That is the law now, and I do not propose to change it. If they are bought at Leipsic, that would be the place from which they would be last shipped for Liverpool, and the price at Leipsic would be the price for duty. If they were purchased in St. Petersburg and then shipped to France or England for Canada, the price at St. Petersburg would be the value for the duty.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). But I cannot see how the resolution can be construed in that way. The resolution says that in every case the value, which includes the charges for transportation and shipment, shall be the value for duty. The charge for transportation would certainly include the price of transportation from Leipsic, for instance, to Havre, because there is no transshipment. Those goods come directly from Nijni Novgorod or Leipsic, which are the great fur markets of Europe, to Havre for transshipment, so that the port of shipment is generally Havre or Liverpool.

Mr. BOWELL. Does not the hon. gentleman see that the goods are not purchased at Havre, and the law strictly provides, and very pointedly, that it must be the principal market of the country in which the goods are purchased. If the hon. gentleman went to Paris, or to Havre, and purchased his furs, then the price he paid there would be the value for duty. That is the law, and I do not propose to change it.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). What would this clause mean? I want to know what is going to be the effect of the proposed law on the case I mentioned.

Mr. BOWELL. I thought I had explained half a dozen times that there is no proposal to change the law in that respect. The only change I have suggested is to strike out the exemption in the 61st clause, which applies to Great Britain and Ireland, and then the law stands precisely as it stood before.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think my hon. friend's proposition was this: Where would the value be taken? The idea of the Minister of Customs is that you take the goods at their original cost, plus the expenses of bringing them to the port of shipment, be it at Havre or at Liverpool.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes. I understand the point of the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier). The difficulty has arisen from the wording of the Act, because it says, "to the vessel." Take for instance, a car load of coal, or a car load of iron from Pittsburg to Toronto. There is no transshipment, and in such cases there is nothing in the law enabling the department to add the inland transportation from Pittsburg to the bridge where it crosses. But if the car had gone to Buffalo, and it had been placed on a vessel, then the law provides for the case. I suppose it will apply to a certain extent to the case put by the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier).

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I might, perhaps, now bring to the attention of the Minister of Customs a question in order that he may examine more closely into it, as he says he will do in regard to the whole subject; and I do so not in any captious spirit, but in order to obtain information. I may say that, although we have a large library, it appears there is only one copy of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and it is difficult to get information. I now desire to refer to an enquiry made by a sub-committee of the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate to conduct investigations ordered by a certain resolution, the members of the committee being Senators Allison, Aldrich, Miller, Beck and McPherson. I notice that they commenced their examination on February 12th, 1886, in New York, and they had the collector of that port before them to give testimony. Touching the first subject on the list the collector said:

"We want a change of the principle entirely. I do not feel disposed to criticise the legislative body, but I expressed the opinion at the time, that it was a great mistake when the seven sections of the Act of March 3rd, 1883, was adopted, and the best thing that could be done now to remedy this evil of undervaluation is for Congress to repeal that section and re-enact section 2907 of the Revised Statutes."

I think this is the one given by the Minister of Customs as being in force in the United States. I continue to quote:

"Mr. BECK. I suggest that you read those sections.

"Mr. HEDDEN. Very well (reading):

"Section 7. That sections 2907 and 2908 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and section 14 of the Act intitled: 'An Act to amend the Customs-revenue laws and to repeal moietyies,' approved June 22nd, 1874, be and the same are hereby repealed, and hereafter none of the charges imposed by said sections or any other provisions of existing law shall be estimated in obtaining the value of goods to be imported, nor shall the value of the usual and necessary sacks, crates, boxes, or covering of any kind be estimated as part of a value in determining the amount of duties for which they are liable; provided, That if any packages, sacks, crates, boxes, or coverings of any kind, shall be of any material or form designed to evade duties thereon, or designed for use otherwise than in the bona fide transportation of goods to the United States, the same shall be subject to a duty of 100 per centum ad valorem upon the actual value of the same.

"Section 2907 reads as follows (reading):

"In determining the dutiable value of merchandise, there shall be added to the cost, or to the actual wholesale price or general market value at the time of exportation in the principal markets in the country from whence the same has been imported into the United States, the cost of transportation, shipment and transshipment, with all the expenses included, from the place of growth, production or manufacture, whether by land or water, to the vessel in which shipment is made to the United States; the value of the sack, box, or covering of any kind in which such merchandise is contained, commission at the usual rates, but in no case less than 2½ per centum and brokerage, export duty, and all other actual and usual charges for putting up, repairing, and packing for transportation or shipment."

That was section 2907 of the Revised Statutes, which the Minister said enforced those provisions; but the Collector of Customs, New York, testified that subsequently section 7 of an Act passed in 1883 repealed that section, and it expressly declared in the words I have already read that section 2907, embodying the provisions we have in our Statute, was repealed. I was sure I had seen a statement to that effect, and that is why I present these facts now to the Minister. My question is this: The United States having adopted for years the provisions which are now on our Statute book, and having seen fit to repeal them, I ask the Minister of Customs to carefully consider the question as to whether it is in the interests of the public also to repeal these provisions here; as we have followed the United States very closely in imposing those conditions, we may follow them in relaxing the provisions.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman forgets that there is no proposition before the House to change that clause.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No; but you are going to make it more stringent.

Mr. BOWELL. This clause has been on the Statute-book a great many years, long before the present policy was inaugurated. Whether it was copied from the statute of the United States—or they copied ours—I do not know, but the words are certainly alike. I quite agree with the collector of New York, who made that statement before the committee. It would be a great mistake and cause endless confusion and trouble if the clause were repealed in this country. The only effect so far as the importers are concerned is, that they have to pay a little more duty, while great confusion would arise if we were to determine the dutiable value of goods when the inland transportation was not added, or, in other words, to establish any other basis for value than that of the value of the goods in the principal markets of the country.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Customs to a practice prevailing in Montreal when horses for breeding purposes are brought into the country. A certificate of that fact, also a certificate of value and an affidavit is made by the individual when he goes to the Custom house, and the first statement made to him is to go and employ a Custom house broker. This is unjust to importers of stock. The charges made by these brokers are sometimes exorbitant, $8 to $10 for getting the papers passed through for two or three horses; I have also known not so much to be charged. But importers should not be compelled to make this payment. When they bring these papers and certificates they are all that should be asked, but it is an invariable custom of the Custom house officers to tell the importer to go and engage a broker. I am not speaking from hearsay, but from actual experience.

Mr. BOWELL. The complaint made is not a new one, I have heard it repeatedly, and instructions have been given that in no case should the Custom house officers refuse to take an entry from anyone. An officer is not allowed to make an entry, and he is not allowed to take a fee for it, for this reason: that if any mistake is made in the entries, whether designedly or not, if he made out the papers he would be held responsible for it, and if the importer gave wrong information designedly he would at once attribute the error to the Customs officials. Hence the Customs officials are not permitted to make out the papers, except in country places where parties perhaps cannot make them out themselves. But the officers have no right, as the hon. gentleman says, to tell anyone that he must get a broker. If my hon. friend went to Montreal, all he would have to do is to demand the papers, for which he would pay for a duplicate copy, I think, five cents. He would have his pen and ink there, he could make out his entry without the aid of a broker, and the officials have no right to ask any importer to employ a broker.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). The universal custom in my part of the country is to charge 50 cents for making out the papers. I do not so much object to that, but it is being ordered to employ a Custom house broker that I object to.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I would like to ask if clause "b" of the resolution will provide for cases which must have come to the knowledge of the Minister of Customs, and which have caused a great deal of difficulty; that is, the difference in the manner of appraising goods at Quebec and Montreal. I have got several letters on this subject, and one, amongst others, states that Morocco skins undressed are to pay 10 per cent. by the tariff, but this same kind of goods if imported through Quebec pay 15 per cent., and if they are imported through Montreal 10 per cent. is only charged. Several complaints about this were made to the department by the importers in Quebec, but they got no satisfaction, and the result was that they found it to their advantage to import through Montreal, where they had to pay only 10 per cent. on the very same goods that 15 per cent. was charged on in Quebec. This is a discrimination against the importers of Quebec in favor of the importers of Montreal. It is quite possible that this was due to the circumstance mentioned by the hon. Minister a few moments ago, when he stated that until now the Minister or his deputy had no revision over the valuations made by the appraisers because they were under oath. If this clause is calculated to put an end to that system of irregular valuation, whereby the same goods are classified in one way in one port and in a different way in another port, it will be a great boon to the importers of the particular goods I have mentioned, as well as to importers of other goods. I think that this system whereby classification is not uniform should not be continued any longer.

Resolution reported, and concurred in.

Mr. BOWELL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 117) to further amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SHORT LINE RAILWAY.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) asked, What amount per annum has the Government paid, or is now paying, to the International Railway Company, or the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or any other parties, on account of the subsidy of $250,000 granted by Parliament for the construction of a line from the St. Lawrence to Moncton, via Mattawamkeag and Harvey, and Fredericton to Salisbury? Do they intend to pay any portion of this subsidy for line completed to St. John, while the company fail to carry out the terms of their agreement by leaving that portion from Mattawamkeag to Harvey and Salisbury unfinished?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The answer to the first part of the question is; "The Government have not paid anything." As to the second part: "Do they intend to pay any portion of this subsidy for line completed to St. John, while the company fail to carry out the terms of their agreement by leaving that portion from Mattawamkeag to Harvey and Salisbury unfinished?" The answer is: "Yes, by an Order in Council dated the 31st September, 1888, the Government paid $186,000 to the company for the sections from Caughnawaga to Sherbrooke and from the end of the section built by the International Railway, 11 miles long, which runs to the boundary at Mattawamkeag."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is $186,000 per annum?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE—PENSIONS.

House resolved itself into Committee on resolution (p. 469) providing for pensions to certain members of the North-West Mounted Police Force.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, will state to the House generally what his reasons are for introducing this measure, which is somewhat of a new departure and requires careful consideration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The object is to increase the efficiency of the Mounted Police. The hon. member for South Oxford has been in that country and has some idea of the duties thrown upon the Mounted Police Force, which is admitted to be as fine a body of men as can well be collected together. It has been found that for the first three or four years of service, as I have had occasion to say before, the men however qualified, physically or otherwise, to perform the duties, are really not completely efficient. In case of an insurrection or a riot, they would be very valuable as soldiers; but the duties of these men are those of peace officers; they are employed on the trail, on patrol, following law breakers of every kind, and keeping the peace over half a continent; and it has been found that until a man has been moved about from place to place and has performed the various duties which devolve on the force, he is not as efficient as he ought to be. The consequence is that as the term of enlistment is five years, the best men, seeing no hope of promotion, leave the service. Some of the men who are fit to hold commissions are promoted, but there are many men who make first-rate constables and non-commissioned officers who are not fit to hold commissions. They then leave the service, and their places are filled by new men, who have to learn the country, the nature of the Indians, how to overtake raiders and horse thieves, and how to perform all the duties imposed upon them. Therefore, it is thought a wise economy to give the members of the force some assistance. The Bill, which is based in principle on the Irish Constabulary Act, provides, that a man who has served not less than fifteen years, and has been incapacitated from injury to his health, or from bodily infirmity, shall receive a pension according to the ratio mentioned in the resolution; but, if a man serves twenty-five years, he shall have a right to retire, although fully able and healthy, on a pension mentioned in this list. It is believed, that if a man who takes up the service in the Mounted Police, has before him a certainty, that when he has served his twenty-five years, he will get a pension, the most valuable men will be retained in the force. I shall read a statement which has been furnished me, showing the number of men now in the force who, in the event of incapacity of mind or body, would have a pension in the next eight years. This statement was prepared last year, and it gives one man in 1888, four in 1889, five in 1890, two in 1891, two in 1892, three in 1893, seven in 1894, and none in 1895. Then the memorandum goes on to state:

"The present state of the health of the men included in the above summary justifies the expectation that very few of them will be incapacitated prior to having completed twenty five years' service. Should all remain for that period, the following will become entitled to long service pension between 1893 and 1905:—in 1894 one man; in 1895, four; in 1900, five; in 1901, two; in 1902, two; in 1903, three; in 1904, seven; and in 1905, none. The pension of a constable will vary from 22 cents per day for fifteen years, to 50 cents for twenty-seven years' service; the pension of a sergeant will vary from 30 cents per day for fifteen years' service to 66 cents per day for twenty-seven years' service. The pension of a staff-sergeant will vary from 37½ cents per day for fifteen years' service to one dollar per day for twenty-seven years' service. The Irish Constabulary pensions are calculated on full pay, which includes a constable's subsistence. The Mounted Police pensions are calculated on actual pay exclusive of subsistence, clothing or allowances. Liberal provision is made in the Irish Constabulary Bill for pensions for men incapacitated by infirmity of mind or body after five years' service. The Mounted Police Bill provides only for incapacity, after fifteen years' service: after fifteen years' service and under twenty, not exceeding one-half pay; after twenty years' service and under twenty-five, not exceeding two-thirds pay; after twenty-five years service, and under thirty, not exceeding three-fourths pay; after thirty years' service and over, full pay."

I think it will be found to be very wise economy to keep the fully trained men in the service. Of course, there are very few commissions for a thousand men, and if you do not provide for a system of pensions, you will lose your experienced men, because where the peace of the country is involved, where the efficient performance of their duties by the police officers is required, where enormous tracts of country have to be travelled over, where offenders against the law have to be tracked for hundreds of miles, one trained man is worth five recruits. Therefore, after full consideration, in the first place by the officers of the force, and then by myself as concurring with them, we venture to submit this provision to the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I regret very much that the hon. gentleman has brought this proposition before the House. I think it is a great misfortune in this country to extend the principle of pensioning any portion of the community beyond its present limit. In fact, I think we ought to retrace our steps and undo a great deal of what has been done. The hon. gentleman has read a list of those who are now in the service, who would be entitled to pensions under this resolution. The number the hon. gentleman has given shows the Bill that he proposes could not, for many years to come, have any appreciable effect upon the efficiency of the service. The number now in the service who would be entitled to the pension, under the resolution, is very small. The right hon. gentleman intends that the number shall be very much increased, and the community burthened with a very large tax. I do not think it is in the public interest that men should be retained for a very long period in that service. On the contrary, it would be better that after five years those men should leave the force and engage in other industrial pursuits. There is no doubt that if they are kept in the service for a long period, they will become unfit for settling down to ordinary industrial pursuits. Should, however, they be compelled to leave the force after a short period, when industrial pursuits will no longer have lost their attraction, they can be replaced by younger men; and in the case of an emergency we would then have a species of reserve force composed of those who had retired from the service, which we would not have if the hon. gentleman's scheme could be successful in the way he indicates. The hon. gentleman has had no difficulty in securing a sufficient number of recruits. There have always been men ready to engage in this police service on the terms that now exist. Why, then, should we undertake to burden the public Treasury with a large sum, when such burden is wholly unnecessary to secure the number required? What does the hon. gentleman propose to do with those who have already retired and have had long service? It is something like fifteen years since the force was organised. Those who have served 14 years and 11 months are not entitled to anything, but if they served but a week longer than the fifteen years they would be entitled to pension. If the hon. gentleman would, instead, retain a certain percentage from the salaries of those men, and pay that over to them, with accumulated interest at 4 or 5 per cent., on their discharge, whether the time they served was long or short, that would be a reasonable arrangement. The hon. gentleman says that the efficiency of the force will be increased by his scheme, that a man who has had many years experience in the service is worth four or five men or more who are new to the business. That is not the opinion of those who are acquainted with the police force. The men do not always improve according to the length of the period they have been engaged in the service. On the contrary, there is deterioration in some cases, and there would be a manifest interest on the part of a man to remain in the force when there might be a manifest interest on the part of the public that he should be got rid of. Admitting for a moment that the proposition of the hon. gentleman would increase the efficiency of the force, there are other considerations besides efficiency. There is the consideration of the public interest at large. If you are unfitting a large number of the community for industrial pursuits in the latter period of their lives, you are doing a positive injury to the community, and you are bound to take that into consideration as well as the simple question of the greater efficiency of the force. I say that a man who has served fifteen years, and much more, a man who has served twenty-five years in the force, would be utterly unfit for any other pursuit in life afterwards. The hon. gentleman knows that a man who has served a great many years in the idle life of a soldier or policeman becomes, as far as industrial pursuits are concerned, a poor member of the community. It is not desirable that young men should remain in this force for a long period. I deny altogether the statement that a man who has been ten years in the force is several times as efficient as a man who has been only five. If there is proper organisation and discipline and control on the part of the officers, if they are straightforward, law-abiding, energetic men, the man who has been but twelve months in the service under them has learned his business and is as well fitted to engage in it as a man who has been in it for years. One would suppose that the whole Territories were overrun by thieves and robbers, which these parties have to engage in the pursuit of, and that, like ordinary detectives, they require a very long experience to learn the business of tracing these people over the whole of the North-West Territories. I do not admit that. The hon. gentleman has given no information to the House to show that a condition such as that exists, and as the country becomes settled, there will be less and less chance of the lawless section of the people congregating in the Territories, and committing depredations upon industrious and law abiding people. I do not understand the police force are to any great extent performing functions of that sort. The police force, in a great portion of the Territories, have very little to do.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says, "Oh." I think he will have a good deal of difficulty in making plain to this committee that these people have very much to do. There are periods when there are indications of lawlessness on the part of the Indian population, when the police have to be on the alert. There may be occasionally horses and cattle stealing which requires the active exertions of the police to reclaim the property and catch the wrongdoers, but these must be rare cases. The report of the hon. gentleman does not disclose a very different state of things in the North-West Territories from what exists elsewhere in this respect, but however that may be, I submit we ought not to engage in the business of pensioning a large portion of the community in order that they may, for a great portion of their lives, be supported by the industry and hard labor of others. Who pensions the farmer? Who pensions the mechanic? Who pensions the men who are engaged in daily toil in order to obtain a daily subsistence? If these parties were not getting as much or more than they could get in other avocations, they would not be there, or the Government would have to offer them more pay, and that would be an indication that higher salaries should be paid. But there is no difficulty found in getting the number of policemen who are required at the rate of pay which is offered. This system is opposed to the genius of democratic government, and I am opposed to pensioning one portion of the community at the expense of another portion who are just as much entitled to the product of their earnings as these men may be who have engaged in the public service. One would suppose that this is a sort of anti-hill government in which one portion are the masters and the others are the slaves. These may be neutral ants for whom the others have to labor. The hon. gentleman may bring his friends in here, and may cram the Government offices to repletion, and may pension them by giving them Indian timber and Indian lands, but, when he begins to pension them from the public Treasury, I think the House and the country will be disposed to resist such a proposition. I trust the hon. gentleman will not force the House to divide upon his proposed measure, but will be content to withdraw the proposition. When the police force cannot be adequately kept up for the salaries which have hitherto been paid to its members, he will be able to satisfy the House that they are entitled to something more. If he thinks they are entitled to a retiring allowance, he should provide for that by keeping back a part of their salary, and then, when they retire, whether it be at the end of five or ten or fifteen years, let that amount be paid over to them. If they have not the necessary prudence or the necessary economy to provide for themselves, that might be a proper provision, but I cannot agree to the proposition that the Government should be able to dismiss a man at the end of fourteen years and eleven months without anything, while a man who was dismissed at the end of fifteen years would receive a pension for life. At all events, the whole pension system, whether long or short, is grossly unfair to the great mass of the people of this country.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before discussing this measure, I would call the attention of the House to the system of pensions which we now have. We have a system by which we superannuate a number of our civil servants. It has been frequently pointed out that the salaries which are paid to Civil Service officers are equal, or in excess of those which are paid to people of equal ability throughout the country occupying other positions. As to the Mounted Police, I think we should look forward to the reduction in numbers of that service as soon as possible. It is evident that the increase was made in consequence of the trouble in the North-West, and now we should be hopeful that we will be able to reduce that number in a very short time. In that case, you will be able to dispense easily with the services of the men who are not efficient, but, if you inaugurate the pension system in connection with that service, you will have to make the country pay for those who leave the service. There are now about 1,000 men employed in that service, and the wages paid are about equal to those paid to men who would be able to fill any ordinary position, such as that of a laborer, a mechanic or an artisan. These men receive pay fully equal to that which is received by men occupying similar positions, except in the cases which require extra education. These men are receiving, on the average, $300 a year, and I understand that they are provided with their clothing and their food. All they do is to discharge the duties of mounted police. I find that such things as carrying their supplies from the railway to the stations are not performed by them, but are paid for separately, and I think it is unwise to increase our pension system, for this reason, that, the moment you pass this law, the men who leave the service and have not served the full term will press for a gratuity such as is now granted to the civil servants. There will be no end to that. A great many of them have gone into that service with the intention of eventually taking up land and becoming settlers in the North-West. While they are going round the country on their duties, they are inspecting the country and forming an idea of the best place in which to settle; and I think the best way for the Government to act is to offer them an inducement to become actual settlers rather than to continue in the service in the hope that they will be pensioned off at the expense of the country. I think we should do away with the pension system altogether. The country cannot afford to continue it, and, instead of the Government taking a step in the direction of restricting the amount of these pensions, this is a step in the direction of increasing the drain upon the country's resources for this purpose. I have never heard any complaints with regard to the Mounted Police in this matter. They are well taken care of, they are well fed, well clothed, and well paid for the service they perform, without its being necessary to offer any further inducement or to give them a retiring allowance when they leave the service. I do not think it is desirable to countenance this proposal, because we should allow those who are zealous and active in the discharge of their duty to understand that they are not the first who will be removed from the service when the Government think it desirable to reduce the number. That time cannot be far distant. We have got rid of a great many of our troubles in the North-West, and we hope that in a short time, as people get into the country and settle it, the necessity for the Mounted Police will grow less year after year. There is no reason, whatever, why we should put on the Statute-book an Act to allow these men to look forward to being pensioned at the country's expense, instead of retiring from the service and becoming citizens and depending upon their own resources. We want to educate our people to depend upon themselves, and not upon the state. I think it is unwise to institute a system of this kind in the North-West. There is no need for such a measure. If a man should be injured in the service, and his case should be looked into by the Government, I have no doubt that this House and the people of this country would agree to giving him proper consideration. I say, to inaugurate a system whereby every man that is now in the service may at some future day look forward to becoming a charge upon the resources of this Dominion, is a wrong course to adopt, and it will tend to lead those who are now in the service to suppose that they may look forward to living at the public expense, in ease, while at the same time they are drawing an annual allowance equal to that which they could earn in any other position in life. I say, if you take that force, man by man, there is not one of them who could find any other public position in which he could earn more than he is getting now, and perhaps in a great many cases, not as much. Now, why is it considered necessary to pension those men? I say it is unfair. The First Minister says that the system that he has about to introduce is modelled after the Irish Constabulary system. The police in Ireland are paid but a miserable pittance, when compared with the pay given to the Mounted Police in the North-West. The Irish Constabulary are barely paid, the pittance is a mere nothing. The result is that when they have put in twenty five years they are pensioned off, and allowed a small sum for the balance of their life. But these men in the North-West are getting every dollar they are capable of earning. They go into the Mounted Police, not because they are so absolutely devoted to the peace, prosperity and welfare of their country, or because they are willing to sacrifice their lives in defending the country; but they go into the force because they consider that it affords them an opportunity of posing themselves on the resources of the North-West, and of eventually becoming settlers, while at the same time they are getting a fair allowance for the services they render. I have not the slightest doubt that if the First Minister, to-morrow, will put a notice in any well-known paper in this country that he wants to add 100 men to the Mounted Police force, he will have 500 applications.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. Why? Because the pay they are getting is a fair remuneration to them, and it is an easy job. There is very little to do, and a great many men would be willing to perform the duties they perform for the amount that is now paid. I hope that the First Minister will seriously consider before he decides to press this measure upon the House, because it is adding to the pension list already burdensome, and becoming more burdensome every year, and I believe that the people of this country will resent it when they get an opportunity.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to add my testimony in the same direction as the views that have been stated by my hon. friend. The right hon. gentleman has chosen, as he generally does choose, if he has got any very doubtful thing in view, to quote from the Imperial Parliament and the Imperial Acts, what is done in England, and what is done in the Irish Constabulary.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And in Australia.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, Australia too. My hon. friend is always ready, when he has anything of a very doubtful character to propose, which adds to the charges upon the people of this country, to quote England and English precedents. Now, Sir, I must say that when some years ago the Superannuation Bill was introduced, no man who sat in Parliament at that time had the slightest idea that the charge would swell to the proportions that it has reached, or that it would become such a burden upon the country as it has become. Why, Sir, no one ever thought that men, such as have been superannuated, would ever be superannuated and be getting two-thirds of their regular salary, some of them even more, I believe; and these men, many of them, as healthy, yea, much more healthy, than the hon. gentleman or myself are to-day—just as fit to perform their duties in the departments here as they were ten years before they were superannuated. If this length of service, if this great experience, if the great advantages accruing from their knowledge of the duties of the departments amount to anything, surely they should not have been superannuated until they were unfit for public service. Let any man take up the blue-book containing the list of people superannuated, and he will find that many of these men, in the cities of Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa and elsewhere, have been superannuated, not because the men were not fit for their duty, but because it suited the right hon. gentleman and the Cabinet to make vacancies, in order that they might put others in their places. That is the way the system has been carried out, and has been made to work injury to this country; it has become an enormous charge, which never ought to have been inflicted upon us. I must say, that I am one of those who do not believe in pensions. I believe that men who are getting a liberal salary, as almost every person employed by the Government is now getting, ought to save, out of their annual receipts, enough to keep them in their old days, and that the poor people of this country, should not have this enormous tax imposed upon them, while, at the same time, it increases what the poor people of the country have to pay for their food, for their clothing, and for the articles they require to use in their various industries, for the purpose of supporting a lot of men who, out of the liberal salaries that the country is giving them, should lay by enough to keep them in their old age. I believe that this system of pensioning the North-West police is all wrong. My hon. friend talks about men who, when they have been ten or fifteen years in the service have become more efficient and we ought to retain them. I believe a man is as efficient in the police after two years' service, if he had any brains at all, as he will be after he has been ten years in the service. I perfectly agree with the views expressed by my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen), that if an advertisement were put in the papers to-morrow for 100 men for the Mounted Police in the North-West, you would probably get applications from 500, and of a class of people who go to that country with a view of settling there. Therefore, I think the right hon. gentleman is carrying out a principle which is wrong, which is unfair, and which is a great injury to this country. It is taxing the people, in addition to the numerous taxes which have been imposed upon them by the tariff. The system of pensioning these policemen is one which ought not to be adopted, and the hon. gentleman would do well to pause before he intensifies the system by giving to the North-West Mounted Police the remuneration which he proposes to give in the Bill under consideration. I want to express my ardent conviction that the duty of this House is to sit upon that measure, to sit upon any measure that adds to the pension list of this country, and that we should receive with care any suggestion of the right hon. gentleman, when he points to England as a precedent, for any measure which will add to the taxation of the people.

Mr. ELLIS. I approve of the suggestion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that if the superannuation list is to be extended, it had better be extended so as to take in every industrious man who, for fifteen years, contributes to the wealth of the country. Now, what is the present position of the superannuation fund? For every dollar that is paid into the superannuation fund we pay out three; there has been received so far about $800,000, while, as near as I can recollect, about $2,400,000 have been paid out, and the disproportion is growing greater every day. When the Finance Minister made his budget speech, he promised that the expenses would not be increased, that he would be able to make both ends meet at the end of a year or so, and that at the end of three years, there would be no deficit. Yet hardly has the House ceased to echo his words, when there is another proposition to extend the charges for superannuation. Now, how is the country getting the money to meet this charge? We are borrowing it. Of course hon. gentlemen may cover it up by saying that they are borrowing the money for railways, or some other purpose, but if the money was not expended in this manner it would be left in the Treasury of the country; indeed, we would not have to borrow it at all. I think it is time for us to put an end to a system that is so entirely foreign to the genius of this country.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think the hon. gentleman, by introducing a resolution of this kind, says, in effect, that he has not the confidence in the Mounted Police in the North-West which he formerly had. If the members have done good service, as has been declared in this House, why propose a system different from that which at present exists? If the statements made are correct, there has been no difficulty up to the present time in obtaining any number of Mounted Policemen for service in the North-West, and why, therefore, is this scheme required? I do not deny that the mounted police have performed their duties well, that they have been efficient during the past, and have discharged their duties to the satisfaction of the Government. Am I to understand that in the opinion of the First Minister the force has not been competent and efficient, and is it on that account that inducements must be held out to members to remain in the force for a long time and thus become competent? I do not think such is the case; but the announcement of the First Minister has been made for the first time that the system which has heretofore prevailed in the management of the police has not been a system satisfactory to the Government and to the country. Will the hon. gentleman state whether such is the fact, and if that is one of the reasons for introducing the present resolution? I think it is not, and that the object is a very different one. It will give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to expend more money and to impose more burdens on an already overburdened people. The hon. gentleman's proposition is that the men should remain in the service a number of years and thereby become more efficient. Do they require to be taught for twenty or twenty-five years before they understand the different trails, and be able to follow them? Is that a reasonable proposition for the hon. gentleman to submit to this House as a reason for bringing this measure down? We know that with advanced age and with the exposure such as they are stated to be obliged to endure, the men belonging to the force become less efficient and competent, for we know that exposure induces various kinds of disease. Again, I should like to know if the introduction of a pension system in the police force is merely a forerunner of a pension system for the whole of the militia force of Canada; it is the thin end of the wedge which in a short time will result in pensions being granted to various officers from one end of the Dominion to the other. I verily believe that if the right hon. gentleman remained in his present position very long he would see the necessity of holding out stronger inducements in the future, and he would be granting pensions all through the Dominion in order to retain power, because I do not believe it is necessary to introduce a system to ensure the efficiency of the North-West Mounted Police. Under these circumstances the hon. gentleman should hesitate, especially when there has been no request, except, perhaps, from parties interested, for this legislation, before he imposed heavy burdens upon the Dominion for the sake of a class who are already well paid and amply compensated for the services performed, and when there is no difficulty whatever in securing as many men for the positions as are required. It is unreasonable that the hon. gentleman should make a proposal of this kind, and it is certainly not because he has been unable to get good men.

After Recess.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Will my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Wilson) allow me to make a suggestion? I know that he wants to get home as soon as he can, and as several of my hon. friends on the other side have called the attention of the committee to what they call the imperfections of this proposition, if the hon. gentleman will allow the resolution to pass, so that the Bill can be introduced, I promise him that we will have a full discussion on the second reading. Otherwise, we will have a discussion now, and a discussion on the second reading as well. If the hon. gentleman has no objection to this, it will expedite business and give every gentleman an opportunity of expressing his opinions on the Bill itself.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I have but a few remarks to make with reference to the resolution before the Chair, and perhaps, it would be the better plan for me to make them now. I was trying to induce, if possible, the Minister to understand that this Bill was not really required in the interest of the services of the North-West, and that, judging from the manner in which the police service has been performed during the number of years we have had mounted police in the North-West, the Bill was uncalled for. I do not think that any representations have been made—except by parties interested—from the North-West as a whole, that the Mounted Police service is in any way deficient, or that members of the force should be pensioned. If you observe the progress of the increased expenditure which has taken place in the North-West for a number of years, I think you will agree with me that it is highly inexpedient that we should take any action to put an additional increase on the ordinary expenditure, which has been growing rapidly for a number of years. I would call the attention of the First Minister to the Public Accounts, in which he will see the rapidity of the increase in the expenses of this force from the first year it was established up to the present time. I do not think it is in the public interest that we should put any additional burdens on the country in connection with this force. The expense of that force for the year 1873-74, the year of its inauguration, was $199,599.14. In 1874-75 the expenditure had increased to $333,583.90. In 1875-76 it increased to $369,519.39, and in 1876-77 we find the expenses had somewhat diminished. I think that, perhaps, the present Government was not in power at that time, or certainly we would not have found a decrease in any expenditure, as they are not troubled with any sins of that kind. However it may be, we find that in the year 1876-77 the expense had decreased to $352,749.05. In 1877-78 it still had diminished, showing that economical individuals were at the head of the Government and that they tried to curtail expenses there as much as possible, for we find that in that year the expenditure was $334,748.50. In 1878-79 the expenditure was $331,823; in 1879-80, it was $332,855.12; in 1880-81, it was $389,485.33; in 1881-82, it was $368,456.47; in 1882-83, it was $477,825.45; in 1883-84, it was $485,983.26; and in 1885-86, the expenditure was $564,249.64. The year 1885-86 was an exceptional year, on account of the mismanagement on the part of the Government of the affairs of the North-West, and by reason of the neglect they displayed towards the people of the North-West, in allowing all manner of abuses to take place there and in refusing to pay any attention whatever to the representations made to them of wrongdoing on their part towards the people of the North-West. The result was, that in this year, an unfortunate rebellion took place, and I do not hold the Government responsible for the increase, any more than that it was brought about by their acts; but during that year, the expense of the North-West Mounted Police Force, amounted to the enormous sum of $1,029,369.20, and in 1886-87, the following year, we find that the expenditure was $781,664.42, and in 1887-88, the last financial year for which we have returns, we find that the expenditure was $862,965.06. I would say, in all justice, that this expenditure on the force is ample and sufficient, without the First Minister coming down and asking us to vote an additional sum for pensions. We are liberally paying our mounted policemen, and it is unreasonable, unfair and unjust, to the rest of the Dominion, that we should be called upon to pension them as well. I repeat what has been stated before, that our Mounted Police Force is very different from the police force in Ireland. The Irish policemen serve for a mere pittance, whereas, in the North-West, we pay our men liberally. I say, that if the Government pursues this course, and holds out to the members of the North-West Mounted Police the pensioning system, that the men will not be inclined to leave the service, for the purpose of engaging in other pursuits, but that they will continue on for the sake of getting their pension. I would advise the First Minister, and I think it would be wiser for him to withdraw his resolution and not to introduce this Bill, particularly as it is so late in the Session. I think that the right hon. gentleman should try if he cannot retrench a little in the expenditure for the North-West Mounted Police, and set a sum aside to compensate such special cases as he may find absolutely necessary to pension. I hope the First Minister will take my advice, although I did not take his, and withdraw his resolution and not introduce this Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). As I am entirely opposed to the principle of superannuation I intended to speak on this Bill, but as the hon. the First Minister wished us to allow this resolution to pass, and stated that he would give us an opportunity of discussing the matter when the Bill came before the House, I will, in deference to his request, postpone my remarks. I suppose the First Minister will give us an opportunity of discussing the whole system of superannuation on a future occasion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes. Of course if this resolution be adopted, I can then introduce a Bill, which must get its first, second and third readings, besides being considered in the Committee of the Whole, so that the House will have half a dozen opportunities of discussing the Bill.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). But my hon. friend is apprehensive that this Bill may be postponed till the last days of the Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will undertake to bring it up early enough to give every hon. gentleman an opportunity of discussing the whole question of superannuation, which can be brought up in Supply, as well as on other occasions; but there is no objection to bringing it up on this Bill.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I may say that there is a very general desire to discuss this question thoroughly. There is such a feeling of dissatisfaction with the present system of affairs, on this side of the House at least, that we are anxious to have the whole matter gone into, and if we yield to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman to-night, we expect to have an opportunity to do so at an early day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly, I will undertake that.

Mr. McMULLEN. In my opinion the Opposition have not sufficiently discharged their duties in regard to important questions in the last two Parliaments. I sympathise with the hon. First Minister; he is always very courteous to the House, and when he makes a request, I feel like granting it; but, in my opinion, the Opposition have not been discharging their duty in failing to discuss thoroughly Bills of an objectionable character which have been brought before the House. I have noticed in the last two Sessions, when many members wanted to get away, Bills which were exceedingly objectionable in their character have been allowed to slip through without that criticism which they ought to have had. For my part I am not going to share the responsibility if that course is going to be adopted in future. I can well remember that last year things were rushed through concurrence like sheaves going through a threshing machine. It has been a mere farce, and I, for one, am not going to be responsible for it in future.

Resolution reported, and concurred in.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 118) to authorise the granting of pensions to members of the North-West Mounted Police force.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MONTREAL HARBOR COMMISSION.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 103) further to amend the Act, 36 Vic., chap. 61, respecting the Trinity House and Harbor Commissioners of Montreal. He said: The object of the Bill is to repeal section 19 of the Act. The harbor of Montreal, long ago, was charged with the responsibility and duty of placing and maintaining buoys and beacons, not only in the harbor, but in what was defined to be the port of Montreal, including a very large portion of the River St. Lawrence running from Montreal close to the city of Quebec; and Parliament, by subsequent legislation, enabled the commissioners to levy certain dues upon shipping in order to obtain a fund for the maintenance and placing of these buoys. Since then, changes have occurred. In connection with the deepening of the channel, Parliament assumed the debt which fell upon the harbor of Montreal, and in the Act passed last Session, the clause enabling the commissioners to raise a revenue for all these purposes was repealed, so that, to-day, the taxes which the commissioners may impose to meet the different duties which devolve upon them are confined to wharfage dues and rates, and taxes on shipping for other purposes have since been removed. For some years anterior to this, Parliament made a grant of $7,000 a year to enable the commissioners to carry out this responsibility. The position of the commissioners was, in this respect, anomalous, because no other port in Canada is chargeable with the maintenance of these buoys and beacons, the Act relating to the Department of Marine and Fisheries imposing that duty upon the country at large, and an appropriation being made every year to meet the expense. The object of the present Bill is to remove the obligation remaining on the port of Montreal to maintain that service, outside the harbor of Montreal, which is some two miles in length, in the River St. Lawrence, and which comes within the definition of the port of Montreal. The Bill has no further object, and the clause to which I ask the consent of Parliament is to repeal that obligatory section of the Act relating to Trinity House and Harbor Commissioners of Montreal, so that instead of the clause reading that the Board of Harbor Commissioners shall maintain that service, it will read that "the buoys and beacons within the port of Montreal may, by order of the Governor in Council, be placed and maintained by the said corporation." If the Government could make a contract with the harbor commissioners of Montreal, as they make them with other people, for the performance of that service, the harbor commissioners would still have the power to make that contract, but the effect of this Bill would be to relieve them from the obligation of maintaining that service.

Mr. MITCHELL. What about the second section?

Mr. TUPPER. The second section follows, as a matter of course, the main section. It is that the buoys and beacons within the port of Montreal, and the plant used in connection therewith by the harbor commissioners, shall hereafter belong to the Government of Canada. There are some 500 buoys and considerable plant and material, and it follows that if the commissioners are relieved from the duty of maintaining the buoys and beacons, that property and plant shall become the property and plant of the Government, just as in the Act of last Session, when relieving them from the obligations in connection with the deepening of the channel, a clause of this kind was inserted transferring all the dredging plant to the Government of Canada. This Bill will leave us free either to make a contract with the harbor commissioners to carry on the service with this plant, or, in the event of our being able to make a better contract with other parties, we will be able to do so according to the practice of the department. The principle of the Bill has been virtually sanctioned by the course of Parliament in the last few years in appropriating the sum of $7,000 to meet this expense, and which has been handed over to the harbor commissioners in a lump sum to carry on this service.

Mr. MITCHELL. It appears to me this is a very inoffensive kind of Bill, and the explanation of the hon. Minister seems to be a reasonable one. The Government have agreed to relieve the port of Montreal from the burden of maintaining and placing these buoys and beacons, which hitherto devolved upon them, and for which they were allowed a sum of money by this Government. This seems reasonable and fair; and when I asked information about the second section of the Bill the hon. gentleman said the object was that the Government should take over the plant and property for maintaining this service. This possibly follows, as a matter of course.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). When the harbor resolutions were before the House, it was explained that the harbor commissioners paid a certain amount, $7,000 I think, and the Government an equal amount, for the maintenance of these buoys and beacons. By relieving the commissioners from this duty, the Government are assuming a larger amount than they have been in the habit of paying. It was understood that the harbor commissioners had undertaken this duty at the expense of the port of Montreal, and I do not see upon what principle the Government are going to relieve them now.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must speak from recollection, for I do not think that that was ever contended by the harbor commissioners of Montreal, nor was it put forward, in any representation they made, that they would assume this obligation in consideration of the Government assuming the debt of deepening the channel. The tax was taken away out of which they formerly maintained that service.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, and reported.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 5) relating to bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The First Minister has expressed a desire that the House should get through the business before Easter. This Bill, which I have no doubt is a very proper one, is not one which there seems to be much immediate necessity for, and it will undoubtedly take a very considerable time in passing through committee. I would suggest to the Minister of Justice whether it would not be advisable to allow it to stand over to another Session, and take it up at an early part of that Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think, notwithstanding this Bill is on the paper, we can get through by Easter. If we put it off till next Session, we may not be able to get through before Easter of next year, as there may be a great deal of important business.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the suggestion of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones) is a very good one. This is a very important Bill, because it is practically consolidating the law in respect to promissory notes. After looking over a portion of the Bill—and I have not had time to study it throughout—I notice that, in many respects, it would vary the law very materially, and I think that most gentlemen on this side of the House who are interested in subjects of this sort would like to have an opportunity, at their leisure, between this and the next Session, of comparing this Bill carefully with the law as it stands and with the various judicial decisions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The House has had the Bill before it for more than a month.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the House has been busy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not more than in other Sessions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is true, but this Bill requires a great deal of attention because, it is really an attempt at a code.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think this will be found to be the simplest Bill on the paper, because it is almost an exact transcript of the English Act and our own law. If there is any objection to going on with this Bill, I do not understand under what circumstances any Bill can be introduced hereafter with a view to its consideration during the same Session. The Bill was not only announced in the Speech from the Throne, but it was introduced on the first available day. It has stood on the paper for six weeks, and I think plenty of time has been given for its consideration. I have taken pains to distribute it through the country, and I cannot see any reason for postponing it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I agree with the views which have been expressed on this side of the House, that this Bill should be allowed to stand over, in order to allow the country to consider it. The Minister of Justice has amended the Bill very considerably since its introduction, and he has issued copies in galley form, and very few members, I think, have their copies to refer to. I have not been able to get extra copies. Bankers, and brokers, and notaries have applied to me for copies, but I had only my own, and one which was given me by a friend. Now, we are asked to go into Committee on this Bill, without having copies of the actual Bill which the hon. gentleman proposes. This is practically, as my hon. friend has said, a commercial code for this country, and I do not think we should deal in a hasty or summary manner with a Bill of this nature, voluminous in its character, and very important in the way in which it affects commercial and trade relations. If the hon. gentlemen desire to get through before Easter, I think they should consider the propriety of allowing the Bill to be printed, and to go into the hands of members, and to go to the various commercial institutions of the country. I do not say this from any desire to oppose the reconstruction of the law in regard to this matter, but it is not a safe principle that, because it is an exact transcript of the English law on the subject, as the hon. gentleman says, that we should accept it. There are many things which take place in England, in the way of legislation, which are not at all fitted to a new country, such as Canada is, and this Bill should not be rushed through the House. I understand that we have very little more than 18 working days before Easter, with a mass of legislation before us, with the Estimates, nine-tenths of which have yet to be passed, with the Supplementary Estimates, and the railway legislation which is before us. I do not see how we can get through if we take up a Bill like this, which will occupy a great deal of time.

Mr. EDGAR. I entirely agree with the general objects of this Bill, and, I think, if it becomes law, it will greatly facilitate commercial transactions and, also, the work of the legal profession; but this is largely a codification of the law, and the House will recollect that, when we consolidated the Statutes, and when we have any important commercial piece of legislation, such as an Insolvency Law, we refer them to Special Committees who can give some attention to the minute and important details of that class of legislation. Now, the Minister of Justice will be the first, I think, to admit that the Committee of the Whole of this House is not exactly the place to give calm and careful consideration to the complex details of a commercial Bill like this. It has not been referred to any Committee, not even the Committee on Banking and Commerce, although I think that would be much too large to deal with it properly. The measure itself may satisfy the Minister of Justice, it may satisfy the very few members of this House who have not had an opportunity to study it, but most of the commercial and legal gentlemen of this House who can study the question will be utterly unable to do it in the Committee of the Whole. The confusion incident to such work we all understand, and I do press upon the Government, apart from the question of the lateness of the Session, to consider whether it would not be far better to have this measure referred to a Committee, either this Session, or, if it is too late, to a sub-Committee.

Mr. WELDON (St. John.) This Bill being of a nature of a codification, is one which requires very careful examination in Committee. The hon. Minister of Justice well knows that a codification, when you introduce strict statutory provisions, requires to be done very carefully, and I think it would be well to refer it to a sub-Committee, as suggested by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar). Indeed I do not think the country would suffer very much if the Bill was allowed to remain over until next Session. In the meantime the members would have an opportunity of exchanging views with the bankers and other persons interested. No doubt one great and very proper object of this Bill is to render the law uniform throughout the Dominion, but while I would like to see that done, I think the necessity is not so great but that the Bill might be left over until another Session. I think that is the general feeling on both sides of the House, because if we go into this Bill now, every section would have to be carefully scanned in order that the law might be put in such a shape that it would create no difficulty, and no great change in the present system. I also agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that in following the English statute we have to be very careful, because the condition of affairs in England is so different from ours that frequently in following too slavishly English legislation, we are apt to pass laws which we find very difficult of application.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to remark that there has been placed in my hands a reprint of Bill No. 5, which was placed in the hands of the House some three or four weeks ago. I understand that a number of changes have been made in the reprint; and I also understand that it has been placed in the hands of the legal representatives in the House, while non-professional men, like myself, have not been favored with a copy. Now, if the important matters dealt with by this Bill are to be attended to only by the legal representatives in this Chamber, and that men from the rural districts, non-professional men, are not supposed to be worthy of receiving a copy of the Bill, I want to know it. I claim as a representative of a constituency that I have a right to be placed in possession of a copy of this Bill, as well as any other man in this House. I know there are other members who sit around me who have not received a copy. Now, I claim it is nothing but right, before you leave the Chair, and before this House goes into Committee on this Bill, that every member should have a copy of it. Changes have been made since it was first printed, and it is unfair that only professional men should have an opportunity of examining these changes. I applied to the distributing department for one of these reprints, and was told there were none to be had. My esteemed friend who sits beside me has obtained a copy by sending over to the Minister of Justice and requesting one. I suppose if anyone else wants to get a copy, he will have to send his compliments in a polite manner to the Minister of Justice in order to get it. This is an exceedingly important Bill, and it is one of a class that affects everyone in the country. The poor man who does an ordinary business of $50 or $100 a year, is just as much interested in the provisions of this Bill as another man who does his business by millions. I have no doubt that legal men are perhaps able to deal more satisfactorily with the peculiar clauses of this Bill than ordinary men; but sometimes other men that are not even possessed of a legal mind, may make suggestions with regard to the provisions of the Bill, that are perhaps even more valuable than the suggestions of a lawyer.

Mr. PATERSON (Bant). There is no blame attaching to the Minister for not introducing his Bill at a sufficiently early date. He did that, and it has been in the hands of members. The Minister says that he has received many suggestions in response to copies sent out, and that in deference to the opinions expressed, he has considerably altered the Bill; that fact shows that the Bill when first introduced was not entirely satisfactory. Now, it is not from a sense of hurt dignity that I speak, but although I am somewhat interested in this Bill as a commercial man, I have not seen any of the proposed changes at all. I agree with my hon. friend who spoke last that while in a great many matters legal gentlemen in this House are better fitted to deal with them than non-professional men, still, I am proud that my hon. friend has paid me the compliment of supposing that while it is necessary for legal gentlemen to have an opportunity of studying the amendments beforehand, he thinks a commercial man may take them up on the spur of a moment. From all that I can hear there has been no particular demand for this Bill, and it does seem to me that a Bill so important as this, and in which the Minister has discovered by enquiries that several amendments must be made, and seeing that no interest is suffering, perhaps it would be advisable to take the suggestion that was made, and let the representatives of the people go to their homes and, during the course of the year, ascertain the opinion of their constituents upon the measure. The boards of trade and bankers will consult in regard to it, and we shall be able to obtain a more perfect Bill. I do not desire to say more, nor do I desire to push objections from this side of the House in regard to it, but I hope the Minister will see that the suggestions offered are reasonable and perhaps in the public interest.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As a matter of order, we have not this Bill before us at all; we cannot have it before us except informally. The Minister of Justice introduced another Bill, and that is the one under consideration. The hon. gentleman may have put this before us merely to show what changes he proposes, but this Bill could not be before us formally. He would have to begin again if he desired to put this Bill before the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am sure no one would be more indisposed than I would be to force a Bill on the attention of the House if the House were not ready for it. If it was suggested that there was a strong feeling in the country against the principle of the Bill, against the policy of consolidating the laws respecting bills of exchange, I would not desire to press it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not so.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If any one were able to say that this subject being committed to us by the British North America Act, twenty-one years afterwards was too early a period to legislate upon it, I would hesitate about pressing the Bill upon the attention of the House. Or if any one could suggest an earlier period of the Session at which it could possibly have been laid before the House, I might think something had occurred to delay the Bill this year; but I have listened to the suggestions of the hon. gentlemen opposite as regards the reasons for letting it stand until next year, and I fail to see in what Session of this Parliament such a Bill can ever be considered if not now. But least of all did I expect to be reproached because, having intended to propose certain amendments in Committee of the Whole, as we always do in reference to a Bill of any importance, especially a Bill of any length, I committed the indiscretion of announcing pretty generally to the House the nature of the amendments which I intended to submit. I have enjoyed the advantage of conferring with different gentlemen occupying seats in this House, who take an interest in this subject, who are more or less entrusted with or at all events are acquainted with the interests of bankers and merchants in so far as they might be affected by this Bill, and to those gentlemen I thought it only proper and fair to give an intimation of the kind of amendments I had to propose in Committee of the Whole. That would not have stood in my way if the House had gone into Committee, and I had moved these amendments without notice in manuscript, and had the Bill afterwards reprinted. As regards the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), I have only to remind him of what he probably knows already, that this Bill was read a second time and was laid on his desk five weeks ago. It was read a second time, printed in English and French on 5th February, which is considerably more than five weeks ago, and, under these circumstances, I hope the hon. gentleman, if he takes any umbrage at the circumstance of my having distributed something else, will lay it aside and give his attention to the Bill that has been five weeks on his desk. The Bill will be reprinted before the third reading. What I ask the House to do to-night is not to consider simply at the outset that this is a large Bill and a somewhat abstruse subject, but to take up the Bill and pass it so far as the Committee is prepared to do so to-night. I think it will be found that we will make substantial progress with the Bill. If there be any amendment which I propose that the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) or anyone else is not prepared for or does not understand, it will stand over until there is ample opportunity to consider it; but I ask the House to go into Committee, and pass some of these clauses, and we can make substantial progress and not delay the prorogation of the Session. I have done the best I could to make the nature of this Bill as well known as possible, and I have received information from all parts of the Dominion, from business men, boards of trade, banking institutions and private persons intimating that their opinion is favorable to the principle of the Bill—to the proposal that we should codify and make uniform as far as can possibly be done the laws relating to this important subject all through the Dominion; and I think that, inasmuch as the principle is accepted and there are no abstruse details in the Bill and the changes in the law are very slight and very few, the sooner the codification is accomplished the better, and I can promise no better means of disseminating the information or making the provisions better known to the House next Session than I have adopted this Session.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not think the hon. gentleman has rightly apprehended the spirit of the objections that have come from this side of the House. There is certainly no fault to be found with the hon. gentleman in regard to the introduction of this Bill and pressing it forward; but the objection raised by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) is one which I think cannot be successfully met. It is that the desire prevails on both sides of the House, as was expressed the other day by the First Minister, to have prorogation before Easter. Now, there are not more than about twenty-two or twenty-three working days, and considering that we have part of the Estimates, the Supplementary Estimates for the current year and Supplementary Estimates for next year, and we have already on the paper nineteen different subjects to go through, it is almost impossible to prorogue before Easter if this measure is taken up and considered. The hon. Minister has asked at what Session this subject can be taken up, if not at this Session. Perhaps next Session Parliament will be called at such a time that Easter will not happen to fall about the tenth week of the Session. If we do not prorogue before Easter, the Session may be prolonged for some time afterwards. There is, however, a commendable desire to prorogue before Easter. We on this side of the House desire to do so, and we will help the Government in that respect; but I am afraid if the hon. gentleman persists in pushing this Bill, which is a heavy one, we will not realise our hope. No doubt the Bill is an essential one, but it is not an urgent one, and the community can wait twelve months without suffering.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think I can put the case any better than the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has done, and perhaps not quite so well; but I endorse every word he has uttered in relation to the general desire for an early prorogation, and I think both sides of the House will agree in that sentiment. I agree that if we take up this Bill, a Bill every line of which involves a lawsuit, and there is a great many lines in the Bill, there may be doubt as to proroging before Easter; and as it is one which requires the greatest consideration, I think it is unwise for the Government to press the consideration of it at this stage of the Session, which everyone expects to be short. The hon. Minister has said that if he thought the principle of the Bill did not meet with the approbation of the country at large, he would not press it. Everyone who has expressed their opinions about the Bill admit that its principle will be approved by the country at large, but what I object to is this, that this Bill which the hon. gentleman has laid before the House at the very earliest stage he could lay it before the House—and nobody blames him for delay—but that he has, at a subsequent stage, made amendments to the Bill, which, as he says himself, have been the result of correspondence with bankers, brokers, notaries, boards of trade and individuals of the general public, and which amendments we have no notice of. The fact of those representations being made to him shows that important interests are involved and that the public are anxious about the measure. I believe that it is almost a certainty that discussions of a very extended and lengthy character will arise upon this Bill. What I object to particularly, and what my hon. friends the Minister does not refer to sufficiently in his answers to the objection, is that the public have endeavored to get information about the amendments, and that they have been unable to obtain it. I have sent for those amendments every day last week to the Distribution Office, but I was unable to get them. The only copy I could get was one sent me by the hon. gentleman himself and which I sent away to a person who had asked me for it. On every occasion on which I visited Montreal during this Session I have had people asking me to get a copy of this Bill for them, and since this amended Bill has come in enquiries for the amended Bill have been made over and over again. Nobody denies the necessity of codifying our laws in this respect, but none will pretend that the question of dealing with promissory notes, the manner of meeting them, their dates, the liability of individuals, the liability of partners and the course pursued by banks, and matters of that kind, does not involve an important principle and that therefore time should be given for its consideration. While the country does approve of the codification of the laws controlling the financial affairs of the country, yet, before old lines of business are disturbed, and new issues created, the people interested have a right to feel that they fully understand the changes that are to be made, and they should have ample time to deliberate on and consider them. I repeat again, what has been so frequently stated from this side of the House, that it is important that a Bill of this nature should receive the most ample consideration, and that gentlemen who sit here representing the public should have a full opportunity of consulting the people as to the provisions of this Bill. There is no measure which could be brought before this House on which so much correspondence could arise, and on which so many suggestions could be obtained from people interested. If hon. gentlemen wish to close the Session at the time they say, and we are all anxious that they should, they should have this Bill reprinted, in order that the public may be aware of the changes which are proposed, and defer a consideration of the Bill to an early stage of next Session. I believe, that this will meet with the approval of the country, and I am sure it will meet with the approval of the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think that the request I have made is a reasonable one, notwithstanding the repetition of the objections for our making progress with the Bill. The fact that the Bill was a re-cast in galley form, and the amendments I intended to make embraced in it, has given the hon. gentleman an idea that the Bill has been entirely remodelled. Such is not the case. What I propose is that the Bill should proceed, and, if we think there are such changes introduced in the galley form as will require a reconstruction of the Bill or a protracted discussion, I am quite willing that such a clause should stand over, and I am ready to listen to any representations as to the necessity for making these changes at all. So far as this being a Bill that will involve serious changes in the present system the hon. gentleman will be surprised when he finds out, as I am sure he will, how much there is of it which is the present law, and a law known to every one interested in the business.

Mr. MITCHELL. The point I make is that as there are important changes proposed we should have an opportunity of sending copies of that Bill to the business men of the country, in order that they may discover and point out to us what changes are desirable, and how far the changes that are suggested are such as are required by the needs of the case. The members of the House ought certainly to have notification of those changes before they go into the consideration of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What is "notification?" I do not quite understand that.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will see that actual acceptance on the face of the bill may be waived.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I can understand it if the acceptance had been, as it can be sometimes, by letter. Acceptances are not necessary under our present law, but now the acceptance must be on the face of the bill itself.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In section 21 there is a provision as to how the acceptance is to be made. The acceptance implies not only the writing of the name on the face of the bill, but delivery.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to know what acceptance by delivery means? Does it merely mean presenting a draft at a man's office or to his servant?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If a bill should be drawn on the hon. gentleman, and he desires to accept it, his acceptance is not completed by his merely writing the word "accepted" on the bill and signing his name under it, but he must deliver it back to the holder before his acceptance is complete. But the object of this Bill is to provide that while that completes an acceptance, the hon. gentleman, if he accepted the bill, could send his notification by letter, which would have the same effect as delivery. It is intended to make that a binding contract of acceptance, although the bill itself may remain in the possession of the acceptor, and not have been delivered.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to ask, in the case of a person accepting a bill and signing his name upon it, does this bill make provision that he can complete the acceptance by telephone—by notifying the bank that he accepts it?

Mr. MITCHELL.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. I intend to propose instead of the definition of banker in the Bill, that the expression banker means an incorporated bank or a savings bank carrying on business in Canada. Hon. members will fully understand that it is necessary in this country that we should have a different definition of banker from that in the English Act. In the United Kingdom there are very few incorporated banks, the business of banking being principally carried on by firms and private banks. In this country I think it would be more convenient, and would answer all purposes, to limit the definition to incorporated banks and savings banks. If we adopted the English definition, viz., all persons who carry on the business of banking, it would be very difficult to determine who are bankers and who are not.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know the object of limiting these transactions to chartered banks and excluding private banks. There are a great many places in the Province of Ontario where there are none but private banks, and I would like to know whether this provision will interfere with the business of those banks.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It will not restrict business at all, but certain special provisions are made in the Act with respect to bankers in this country, and we all understand a banker to mean in this country an incorporated bank. It would take me a long time to explain the operation of these definitions, and therefore I am quite willing to let the interpretation clause stand so that as we go through the Bill hon. gentlemen will see the force of these various definitions.

Mr. AMYOT. I would suggest that the following subsection be added to section 2:—

The expression "signature" means the name in full of the party signing, or his ordinary signature, or his usual cross in the presence of one or more witnesses.

On section 3,

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I think the article in the Quebec Civil Code is much shorter and more satisfactory than this section. The article reads:

"A bill of exchange is a written order by one person to another for the payment of money absolutely and at all events."

That definition has always been found very satisfactory.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It means the same thing. The language is very terse and expressive, but it has the disadvantage of being mere code language in contradistinction to the usual language of statutes. It is better to follow the English definition.

Mr. McMULLEN. The section reads that a bill of exchange is an unconditional order in writing. Suppose a bill is half in writing and half printed, will it be covered by that section?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This section is precisely in the words of the English statute, which certainly applies to bills partly written and partly printed.

Mr. LAURIER. The word "writing" is simply in contradistinction to verbal agreement.

Mr. GIROUARD. This section defines a bill of exchange to be an order payable to a specified person or to bearer. Supposing there is an order to pay to blank. Will that be a bill of exchange?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; not without some further provision. It may be so in its effect, but it will not be so under this clause.

Sub-section 2,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). In the 9th section a party is allowed to draw a bill of exchange payable at the current rate of exchange. That has been held not to be a bill of exchange, and as this 9th section would appear to be contradictory to the sub-section we are now on, that contradiction should be removed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will add the words "unless hereinafter otherwise provided."

Mr. LAURIER. Do I understand that under this Act a bill will not be payable to order, but payable to a person named, and will be negotiable?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If it is not payable to order or to bearer it is not negotiable except by sub-section 4. We define that a negotiable bill must be made payable to order or to bearer.

Mr. GIROUARD. I presume an I.O.U. without order or bearer, would be negotiable under this clause. That is a change in the law. It is a serious thing to change the mode of doing business in this way.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think that is the law of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. LAURIER. No; in the Province of Quebec, unless it is made to order, it is not negotiable. If it has not one of these two qualities certainly it is not negotiable.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman is right, but the object of the main section is to establish the validity of the instrument, to make plain and simple the law relating to bills of exchange, and to abolish the magic effect of certain words, or the omission of certain words, in the instrument itself.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the magic effect of words should be retained as far as practicable.

Mr. LISTER. I think the clause as it stands now is the proper legislation. According to the law in the Province of Ontario, if we want to make a bill payable at a certain place, we must put the words "not elsewhere."

Mr. McMULLEN. I am satisfied that advantage will be taken of simple-minded people if this provision becomes the law as it is at present drawn. It is desirable to change the law as little as possible.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I never saw any simple-minded person who was so well acquainted with the law as to understand that notes were not negotiable unless the words "or order" were upon them, although, of course, there may be such cases. The whole object of the Bill is to make the law broad and plain, and a contract should be just what it purports to be on its face. We should do away with collateral arrangements by word of mouth and compel persons who give notes and wish any restriction to put the restriction on their face. This was the law of Scotland, and it has now been adopted as the law of the United Kingdom.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I can see no objection to the provision, which will not make much difference as regards the law of the Province of Quebec. Under the Code, if a bill is negotiable it is payable from bearer to bearer, but it can be transferred by a notarial deed of assignment.

Mr. LOVITT. Supposing there is no rate of exchange named in a bill, what would be the rate?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The law at present provides that it should be paid at the rate of exchange on the day that the bill is payable.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Suppose a bill is drawn in France, and no rate of interest is mentioned, would the Canadian rate or the French rate obtain?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It would be a foreign draft, and, probably, the rate would be according to the rate of the country in which the bill was drawn.

On section 10,

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). As I understand it is proposed by this section to make a sight bill payable on demand, that bill would cause a change which would be very inconvenient to a great many people.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think that the present custom of three days' grace should be maintained. It is now quite customary to allow those three days on bills payable on sight.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). That is the law.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not settled to be the law, but the practice is so. This is to make it clear what the law on the subject is.

Mr. GIROUARD. I do not see how in face of the custom of giving three days' grace we should interfere with it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will let the clause stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the custom of allowing three days' grace is one of great importance between banks and merchants, and I hope the Minister will see his way clear to continue the custom we have now.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Of course it would be an advantage to those who have to pay. At present there is no obligation to give the three days' grace; some do and some do not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the present system is interfered with, it will cause a great deal of inconvenience—it would make sharp and short payments.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I think the present system is much the better one, and I would not like to see it changed as regards sight drafts. Suppose a bank has a draft payable on demand, it would be inconvenient for the holder of the draft to wait for its payment. The distinction between sight drafts and demand drafts is that a sight draft is understood to be a draft payable three days after it is accepted, and I think that custom should be continued. I think it ought to be so expressed in the Bill, if the law does not already express it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Most business with merchants is done through the banks. An arrangement is made to pay on demand or in cash. The draft is presented to the merchant, and if he were not ready there and then to pay the cash, the note would be protested; but where three days' grace are allowed, he accepts the bill and has three days' in which to provide for payment, and that arrangement meets all practical purposes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Now that attention is called to the matter, I will allow the section to stand so that it can be looked into.

On section 13

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it is not wise to make a bill a legal instrument when it is dated on Sunday. The present law is that when a note is dated on Sunday it is not collectable.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We do not change the law regarding the validity of notes made on Sunday. This is simply the present law, but in order to remove doubts we declare that a note is not valid by reason of being dated on Sunday, which may have been done by mistake.

On section 14,

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I would suggest the propriety of doing away with those days of grace. They have been done away with in France, Italy, Germany, and I think in Spain. It seems to be childish that when a bill is payable on a certain day three days additional should be given. This used to exist in the French law, but they abolished it in the code of commerce.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It presents a great anomaly as compared with other contracts, but I think the custom is too old and too well established to be now changed.

Mr. GIROUARD. I think we should add civic holidays to the list. It is inconvenient for banks to have to keep their doors open on those days when other places of business are closed.

Mr. McMULLEN. I agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). It is unfair on a civic holiday to oblige the banks to keep open. Bank clerks should have a respite on that day as well as others. I have known of cases where, on such days, it has been difficult to get men to protest a note. The notaries were away and the notes have had to be protested at a late hour at night, after their return, in order to hold the endorsers.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That subject is dealt with in the Act relating to banks. We are only dealing with one class of contracts, and even if we adopted the suggestion just made, that would not make those days bank holidays. It would be inconvenient for the bank when its doors were open, to have to throw over all bills and notes until the following day on the mere proclamation of the mayor of a town.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the mayor were a debtor he might proclaim a good many holidays.

Mr. DALY. The custom with banks is when a civic holiday is proclaimed for the manager to arrange with his customers several days beforehand to meet their bills, or to arrange with their solicitors to attend at three o'clock in the afternoon, and one clerk is kept on hand to receive payments of these bills.

Mr. GIROUARD. Under our Code, article 2290, if a bill is refused by the drawee in case of need, it must be presented to the referee.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). That is a very good provision.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In the United Kingdom that matter was unsettled, but in the United States the presentment is obligatory. It seems that by the German law it is obligatory. It is a question whether we should adopt the provision of the Quebec Code or the English system, and certainly the suggestion as to the inconvenience which may result from the necessity to present the bill to the referee is a serious question.

Mr. LISTER. I think the Statute should remain as it is. The referee may live a long distance away from the place where it would be impossible in point of time to reach him, and therefore both trouble and expense would be saved by adopting this provision.

Mr. GIROUARD. I do not think that is a correct position to take. If the holder accepts that, he knows what he is doing. If the referee lives at too great a distance, he should not accept the bill in that form.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I think it would be well to take the law as we have it in Quebec. As the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) has stated both parties to the bill should be equally responsible.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I agree with my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) that a great deal of inconvenience might be caused by the adoption of this provision.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Then why should the referee accept the responsibility?

Mr. LISTER. Probably he could not get anything better.
Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec).

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Then it is for him to decide when the bill is made.

Mr. GIROUARD. There may be two drawers and the Bill may be payable in two places, and if the holder could not go to the two places it would be a serious inconvenience.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think it would be a serious inconvenience, as the reference in case of need will not be much used, because the bill proposes to prevent damages for dishonor as it does.

On section 19,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I know that this is the English law, but their banking system is different from ours, and I cannot see any reason or argument why that practice should be introduced in this Dominion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is the English law, and it is the law of Canada as regards bills of exchange, and it seems much better to make it applicable to promissory notes as well. I do not see why there should be any distinction between promissory notes and bills of exchange, and it seems to me that it would be much better to make the law uniform unless there is some serious objection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In Ontario a great many people make their bills payable at their business offices or at their bank. The bill has to be presented there before it is protested, and I would like to know whether this clause interferes with that or not?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It seems to me that it might place the acceptor in a very awkward position. Suppose a person at Halifax accepts a bill payable at a bank and provides the funds to meet it. He may be away, and if this alteration is made in the law the bill need not be presented to the bank and the party may be sued unless he hunts up the bill himself. Suppose my friend from Bothwell lives in London, Ontario, and he makes a bill payable at a branch of the Bank of Montreal in London, the first thing he knows is that a lawyer in Ottawa may have the case in hand to sue him, although if the bill were presented at the proper bank the funds were there to meet it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the reason for the change in England was, that in a great many of those transactions the person in whose favor the Bill is drawn requires, for the convenience of protest, notice of presentment, that some place be designated in which he can perform those duties, and in very many cases it is intended only as an address.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that if a party makes a bill so payable he ought to be bound by it. The words "not elsewhere" would be regarded as superfluous in any other case than that of a bill or promissory note. If a party designates a particular place as the place of payment surely he means "not elsewhere." You give no meaning to those words under the present interpretation of the law. If a man makes a note payable at the Bank of Commerce in Toronto, and if he does not add the words "not elsewhere," the holder can make it payable where he pleases. That makes the words "payable at the Bank of Commerce in Toronto" perfectly meaningless. It seems to me most absurd that we should persist in inserting words that in any other document in the world would be regarded as superfluous.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am only arguing in favor of the present statute, not only of England, but of Canada as well, on that subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before this section is passed, I would like distinctly to understand whether, if a merchant makes a bill payable at his office or at a bank in a certain town or city where he does business, it is necessary to present that bill at that place. In the great majority of cases the custom is to make notes or drafts payable at the bank where the maker of the note does business, and it is not necessary for him to be there when the note falls due, because it is usual for the bank to charge the note to his account. That is a great convenience, because when people are away from home, their bank in that way protects them. To make the law such that a note would be placed in the solicitor's hands and costs incurred if the maker were not present when it falls due at the place where it is made payable, would be changing the whole custom of business and would be a great injury to the business of the country. I hope the Minister will take this into consideration, and ask any merchant or bank whether it would be to the interest of the business community to make this change.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand that the hon. gentleman is perfectly satisfied with the present system. Well, this Bill does not change it. It is true, under the present law, the bill need not be presented at the particular place, and an action may be brought or a protest made without its being presented there. It may be an inconvenience to have the law so; but the hon. member will see how slight the inconvenience is when he urges that that system is carried on everywhere now and is a good one. But the inconvenience, on the other hand, is the inconvenience affecting the liability of the parties, and imposing the necessity of presenting the bill at that place, in order to charge the parties at all, in order to enable them to be sued at all, even though there may be no funds there, or the place may not be accessible or it may be a place where no body lives. It is necessary to go through the form of presenting them before an action can be brought against the maker of a note.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will guarantee that you will not find these words in the printed form of any bank in Canada.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. These addresses are given mostly for the convenience of the banks, especially in the case of persons living in the suburbs or at a distance from the town. They say, you must give us the address of someone in town where we can present the note for acceptance or payment.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think this provision was first put in the Act of 1886, having been taken from the Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada, but until that Act was passed the practice in New Brunswick was very different. There the acceptor made the bill payable at a particular place, and that was done for the convenience of all parties, and it must be presented at that place when it falls due. The effect of this provision is that an acceptor must hunt up the parties to the note or else he is liable to be sued, and I agree with the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) that those words are never used. I never saw a bill accepted yet with those words; and I am told by gentlemen cognisant with the system in England that it is more the exception than the rule there. What additional inconvenience is it to present the bill where it can be charged to the acceptor? The majority of bills in this country are payable at a bank, and if the party has good credit or funds at the bank, the bank meets the draft, and thus conveniences him, no matter where he may be. But the effect of the present system is to make the acceptor liable to be sued without being called on to pay the note at all, and it seems to me that it would work unjustly. It works no injustice or inconvenience, because, when presented, he must pay it. So far as this country is concerned, the old doctrine was a great deal better, and it is a doctrine we always held in New Brunswick until the Revised Statutes were passed.

Mr. GIROUARD. I find this is another change in our Code, but I presume it is useless to notice it. It is very desirable to have uniformity in the English law, but we ought to act carefully when we come to make so many changes in the business relations of the community. Article 327 of our Code says:

"If a bill of exchange be made payable at any stated place, either by its original tenor or by a qualified acceptance, presentment must be made at such place."

By this Bill, in order that presentment should be made at a particular place, the words "only and not elsewhere" must be inserted. This clause is to be found in the statute of 1849, which was the first statute of importance concerning bills of exchange and promissory notes, but after a few years it was found to be so inconvenient, and gave rise to such misunderstanding, that the law was repealed. The Code promulgated in 1866 did not contain those words. It is very much to be regretted that so many changes should be made just to have uniformity with the laws of England. We ought to be more careful to have uniformity among the different Provinces, especially as these words "not elsewhere" are not to be found in the laws of any nation on the continent of Europe or in the United States.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was taken from the Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada.

Mr. GIROUARD. Where it applies to Ontario only.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection to let that clause stand, but I hope it will not be supposed I do so because I do not see the necessity of making that clause. I am open to conviction as to that or anything else in the Bill, but it will be in more uniformity with the whole Bill that if there is any limitation in the contract it should appear on the face of it. The theory is, the acceptor owes a debt; he agrees to pay the debt at a certain place on a certain day, but he should pay the debt anyway, and it is no answer for him to say that he has given the address of a particular place, and that the creditor must be obliged to go there or lose the debt. I have known cases where a note was made payable at a particular place where it was impossible to present it for payment.

Mr. GIROUARD. In our Province the acceptor must have funds at the place named, and there is no presentment unless he proves he has funds there and kept them there afterwards.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not so elsewhere.

Mr. GIROUARD. It ought to be so everywhere else, instead of taking the law of England.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I know of cases where parties sold lightning-rods to farmers and took notes payable at the farmers' residences. Later on these parties received notices from a solicitor in Toronto that those notes were in his possession and asking payment there with costs, although they understood the notes were payable at their residences.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will let the clause stand, on condition that the hon. gentleman will banish from his mind these notes for lightning-rods. I would not like the law of bills and notes to be settled to suit the hard cases of lightning-rods.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I quite agree with the hon. the Minister that these parties should not be relieved of the liability to pay because the notes were not presented at a particular place, but I object to the makers of the notes being put to costs through no fault of their own. If my note is payable in the town where I live, a notary in a distant place should not have the power of putting me to the expense of paying the costs of that note because the holder did not choose to present it at the place where it was made payable.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Suppose you take the converse case, where an acceptance is made payable at a particular place and before it falls due the agency of the bank is withdrawn from that place. You will not allow the acceptor to escape liability from the impossibility of the holder presenting it at the agency where it was made payable.

Mr. DALY. In Manitoba the Ontario Bank had an agency at Portage la Prairie which they afterwards closed, although a great many notes were made payable there. The court held that presentation there was not necessary.

On section 20,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The provision in England is the same as it was at Common Law, that the signature to a blank paper stamped was an authority to the holder to fill it up to the amount which the stamp justified. We have no regulation as to stamps, but I propose to adopt the same principle, and to provide that:

Where a simple signature on a blank paper is delivered by the signer in order that it may be converted into a bill, it operates as a prima facie authority to fill it up as a complete bill for any amount, using the signature for that of the drawer, or the acceptor, or an indorser; and, in like manner, when a bill is wanting in any material particular, the person in possession of it has a prima facie authority to fill up the omission in any way he thinks fit: In order that any such instrument when completed may be enforceable against any person who became a party thereto prior to its completion, it must be filled up within a reasonable time, and strictly in accordance with the authority given; reasonable time for this purpose is a question of fact: Provided that if any such instrument, after completion, is negotiated to a holder in due course, it shall be valid and effectual for all purposes in his hands, and he may enforce it as if it had been filled up within a reasonable time and strictly in accordance with the authority given.

Of course, that proceeds on the principle that the man who signs and authorizes another to fill up the blank is negligent and must bear the consequences of his negligence. As to the first parties to the contract, it must be shown to be according to the authority given, but the innocent holder may be misled, and the provision is therefore necessary.

On section 21,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Suppose a bill was stolen from the acceptor?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Then it would not have been delivered.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Then, in the hands of an innocent holder, it would not be valid?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think not.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11:50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 22nd March, 1889.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADJOURNMENT—ANNUNCIATION DAY.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That when this House adjourns to-day, it stands adjourned until Tuesday next at three o'clock.

Mr. TROW. I would ask the Minister of Public Works if it would make any difference that the House should adjourn until eight o'clock on Tuesday evening instead of at three o'clock? There are many members who want to go home and to whom it would be inconvenient to get back at three o'clock.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Let them stay here.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House desire to prorogue before Easter, and if we adjourn until eight o'clock on Tuesday we lose half a day. It is not likely that during that half-day there will be many divisions which hon. members would miss; therefore, I think we had better say three o'clock.

Mr. LAURIER. I think these remarks will commend themselves to my hon. friend. If we want the blessing of prorogation at an early day we must work hard and every minute.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 115) to amend the Railway Act.—(Mr. White, Renfrew.)

LEGISLATION—JOINT COMMITTEE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That a Select Committee be appointed to act with the committee appointed by the Senate to enquire into the expenditure of the country in respect of legislation, and the practicability of reducing it, and that the said committee do consist of Sir Hector Langevin, Messrs. Bowell, Charlton, Foster and White (Renfrew), and that a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honors therewith.

Mr. LAURIER. Is that the whole of the explanation which the hon. gentleman intends to make in reference to this very important movement. I would expect that some different course should be pursued from this.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The reason why the other House has appointed a committee and asked us to join in that committee so as to make it a Joint Committee of both Houses, is that they desire to enquire with respect to the expenses connected with both Houses of Parliament. The expenses in the Upper House and in this House are different, and we thought it would be a proper thing to ascertain whether there could not be an assimilation of the expenses between the two Houses, and whether the expenses could be reduced as regards the general expenditure connected with legislation. That is the reason why the committee is asked for.

Mr. EDGAR. May I ask the Government if the step taken in this direction is with the object of abolishing one of the branches of the legislature, for, in my opinion, that would be the simplest way of reducing the expenditure.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no intention of abolishing the hon. gentleman and this House, or the Upper House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think this is a question that the Government ought to undertake itself, if it is necessary, and not intercept a buffer composed of a committee of this House, on which I may say there are to be three Ministers, one supporter of the Conservative party and one member of the Opposition, who, I may add, is not present to say whether he is prepared to sit on that committee or not. I have no opinion whatever of the value of these committees, for I hold that the responsibility should be assumed by the Government of the day. I do not believe the slightest good will result from a committee of this sort being appointed, or, for the matter of that, can it be said to be in any shape or way a representative committee of this House, as there is but one member of the Opposition upon it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me this is an extraordinary proposition to come from the Senate. If we are to have a committee of investigation in regard to the management of the finances of the two Houses, it seems to me that proposition should originate in this House. Not only is it the duty of the Government to assume responsibility for any such proposition, but the Government should initiate such a proposition in this House. This proposition comes from the other Chamber, which has no constitutional control over the finances, and yet this proposition is one to consider the propriety of reducing the expenditure. This is a most unconstitutional proposition, and it is one which this House should not entertain. Why, the Senate might as well propose to amend the Supply Bill as to initiate such a proceeding as that which they have initiated in this case.

Mr. LAURIER. Before this motion goes further, I would ask the ruling of the Speaker as to whether it is in order or not.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot see how this proposition is out of order. If this Honorable House chooses to waive their undisputed right to initiate measures for the control of the expenditure of public moneys, and consent to the joining themselves to the Senate in such measures, it is for them to say so.

Mr. LAURIER. The reason why I asked your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on this proposition is, that it is one dealing with the finances of the country, and, therefore, under all constitutional rules it should be initiated in this House and not in the other House, which is not responsible for the finances. That, I repeat, is the constitutional method of procedure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The object of the Senate, of course, is to ascertain whether by joint action we cannot make reductions in the expenditure connected with the affairs connected with the two branches of Parliament. The other House has control over its own expenditure, and we cannot, without quarreling with one of the estates of the realm, interfere with their expenditure, and they make this proposition in order to ascertain if the expenses for the working of the machinery of Parliament can be reduced, and how it can be reduced and re-arranged. I see nothing unconstitutional in the matter, for it is admitted they have a right to regulate their own expenditure.

Mr. MILLS. They propose to come here to assist us in regulating ours.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The object is, as everyone will admit, a worthy one, and the point raised is one of those constitutional fads which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) always takes up. I am very glad, indeed, to see that the Senate are inclined to enter into this subject, because, if hon. gentlemen will look at the Public Accounts they will find that the expenditure in the Upper House—perhaps it is on account of their superior dignity—is considerably more per man than it is here, and, I repeat, I am very glad to see that they desire, by concerted and common action, to consider and report on this subject. I do not think the Constitution can be degraded if this committee sits.

Mr. BLAKE. Had they not better take the beam out of their own eye before they take the mote out of ours?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad to see there is a beam in the hon. gentleman's eye that is gleaming brightly.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman is in error in saying that we cannot interfere with the expenditure of the Senate. The other House spends the money voted by this House, but it cannot compel us to vote any particular amount for their expenses. We can thus compel the Senate to economise by reducing the amount of contingencies voted to them. It would be more constitutional if any movement tending towards economy were made by the Government itself instead of by an irresponsible committee. The Government should take the responsibility of action in this matter, instead of throwing it on a committee.

Mr. EDGAR. Does the leader of the Government think the committee fairly constituted, having regard to the members of the Opposition and the supporters of the Government in this House? Although I admit there is a Government majority, I think it is hardly so large as four or five to one. If we are going to have a committee, I think the number should have some proportion to the strength of parties in the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We cannot appoint a larger number on the Committee than the Senate have appointed. There is only one representative of the Opposition, but I do not think they can have two; and then it must be remembered that the representative of the Opposition is a very strong man, in fact he is a hoist in himself, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton).

Mr. LAURIER. I do not apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that the Constitution will suffer very, very much if this motion is carried, because I am sure that the Constitution is so strong that it will resist any assaults of this kind. At all events I think that the principle is well defined that all questions concerning public expenditure should originate with the Government and in the House. The right hon. gentleman is too familiar with the Constitution not to agree with me that in this I am altogether right, and that this principle is one that cannot be successfully assailed. I may say that I believe the hon. gentleman has departed from the true spirit of the British Constitution in this respect to try to shield himself, because he does not dare to grapple with the questions he has himself raised. I cannot help seeing that his end must be somewhat in that direction, since it has originated in his own motion on the other side of the House. However, I am glad to see that the right hon. gentleman is somewhat appalled at the enormous public expenditure of this country. There was a time when the hon. gentleman said he thought he could govern the country for $22,000,000 a year, but now it has reached $37,000,000, and he has to ask the aid of the Opposition in order to stem the current of public expenditure which he has thrown upon this side of the House. I think it would be much better if the hon. gentleman had asked the assistance of the House when he was raising the expenditure, instead of asking its assistance now to stem the rising tide and to decrease it. The hon. gentleman should take the responsibility of stemming the expenditure himself, because practically he is responsible that the expenditure has reached the extraordinary amount which it has reached now. The increase is his own act and he is responsible for it. The hon. gentleman has now asked the Opposition to come to the rescue, and he says in effect, We are powerless to stem the current, give us a help: Would it not be more manly for the hon. gentleman, who is responsible to the country, to assume that responsibility boldly, since he has also the emoluments and profits of his office.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not think this little innocent motion of mine was going to give rise to a great constitutional question. I quite agree with the statement of my hon. friend opposite that all the expenditures of the country must originate here, but the expenses of the machinery of the legislation is quite a different thing, and it stands all of itself. My hon. friend says that we do not interfere with the expenditure of the Upper House, and if we do not interfere why should they interfere with us. Well, there has been considerable discussion about this question of expenditure. They are willing to have that considered, and I think a committee chosen in this way would be able to reduce the expense very largely in this House, for, practically, the expenditure must be under you, Mr. Speaker, and your subordinate officer, the Clerk of the House, and for all the minor appointments under the Sergeant-at arms. If we have a joint committee to look into these things we might be able to introduce order into matters in which there is considerable disorder, and to make a considerable retrenchment. I may take the complete responsibility of saying that I would like to have this joint committee, and the sooner it sits the better for the House and the better for the country. I hope that my hon. friend, being an economist himself, will let this joint committee sit. We are a retrenched Government, as the hon. gentleman knows, and we would like to have expenses cut down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We know very well what you are in practice.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It seems to me, that the appointment of this joint committee is really, by inference, admitting the right of their Honors at the other end of the building, to interfere with the expenses of this House. If the right hon. gentleman will look at the Public Accounts, he will see that the expenditure at the other end of the building is much larger in proportion than it is at this end; but perhaps that is in accordance with the dignity of the other body. However, if their Honors desire to reduce the expenditure, they have it in their own power to do so, and if they have any real desire to reduce the expenses, let them commence by reducing expenses in the Senate. By appointing a joint committee, we are virtually admitting that their Honors have some right to interfere with the expenditure in this House. We should not forget that we are the representatives of the people, and our duty is to try and keep down the expenditure here. I believe we try to do so, and we ought to do so, without any interference from their Honors in the other end of the building.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman forgets, that if the other House is going to interfere with our expenditure, we are going to interfere with theirs, because this is to be a joint committee.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Therefore, you are putting them on an equality.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are on an equality.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not in this.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, there are matters of considerable importance to come before this committee. We are overloaded with a separate staff in the two Houses now—law clerks and things of that kind, as well as with the expense of separate printing for each House. There are a great many other matters which can be attended to by this committee for the benefit of both branches of the Legislature, and which would save considerable expense if the expenses were joined together. That is the object of this committee, and it is so good an object that I think we might allow the joint committee to act.

Mr. BLAKE. The end justifies the means.

Mr. SPEAKER. Carried.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not much, Mr. Speaker. It is not carried yet, for I want to say something in this matter. I agree with the hon. gentleman in my eye; I don't know what constituency he represents.

An hon. MEMBER. Frontenac.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). We know that this Government is very extravagant, and I must say that while there is a good deal in what that hon. gentleman says, that any proceeding which bears on an increase of expenditure ought to be originated in this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. I knew my right hon. friend would approve of that. He says "hear, hear," to the whole of my statement, I suppose, including the charge of extravagance. I may be excused if I say that there is in this House a great absence of independent criticism in relation to the expenditure of the country, but what I object to now is the composition of this committee which my right hon. friend has submitted to the House. Now, Sir, when we look at the composition of that committee, what does it mean? It means that his extravagant Government, that we have been complaining against for years and years, propose that the committee shall consist of the following gentlemen: First, Sir Hector Langevin. I might just say here, that I have a great deal of confidence in that hon. gentleman whose name I have mentioned, because I think he is one of the best members we have in the Cabinet.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I do think so; and I say it sincerely and honestly that I believe Sir Hector does his duty well and faithfully. Then another member of the committee is Mr. Bowell. Well, I have very little confidence in Mr. Bowell, very little indeed. He will collect every dollar that he can scoop out of the industries of the people and construe the Customs Act in a way to get every shilling he can, whether it is legal or not, and he will then appeal to the majority behind him to sustain him, so that I have little confidence in Mr. Bowell. I come to the next member of the committee, Mr. Foster. I described a man to-day as a fledgling politician with the pen-feathers sticking out of him yet and that might apply to Mr. Foster, because he has not much experience. What he may develop into we cannot tell, because we have not seen any signs as yet of economy or anything else from him. Now as to another member of the committee—Mr. White, of Renfrew. He is a coming Minister; he is a disappointed man because he was not made a Minister before, and, therefore, I have not a great deal of confidence in him.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). May be you might have.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will give you a chance to speak just now. You are a coming Minister, and no doubt you are very anxious for the position; and the next fellow that dies or gets out of the way, you will succeed him in the Cabinet. The only man who is named at all on that committee on this side of the House is my respected friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and I must say that the very fact of the right hon. the Premier naming him has created a good deal of suspicion in my mind in relation to a member of this House whom I esteem very much. I always suspect the right hon. gentleman when he talks about economising or about making changes, and refers to the practice in England and Ireland, as he did the other night when he proposed to pension the Mounted Police, I always have great suspicion that there is some little job behind. What I want to say is this: There is another party in this House who are apt to speak out their minds and say what they think—the Third party; and if the Government really want suggestions about economy in that committee, they ought to appoint a member of the Third party on it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name one.

Mr. MITCHELL. Myself, Sir. There is no money or pay attached to the position, but I think—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him one moment? I move that the motion be amended by striking out the name of Mr. Bowell, in whom the hon. gentleman has no confidence, and inserting the name of the Hon. Mr. Mitchell instead.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I will not take up the time of the House any longer. I think if there is anything to be done by a minority of the committee, my hon. friend from North Norfolk and myself will accomplish something.

Mr. DAVIN. I may point out to the House that I felt certain, on general principles, that the action of the Senate was constitutional; but I sent to the Library for May, and I find, according to him, that the constitutionality of the motion could be perfectly maintained.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 103) further to amend the Act 36 Vic., chapter 61, respecting the Trinity House and Harbor Commissioners of Montreal.—(Mr. Tupper.)

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 108) to amend chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes, intitled: "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It has been considered expedient by the Treasury Board that the credits which are placed at the disposal of the various departments of the Government should be placed at the disposal of more than one officer, so that the cheques drawn from time to time shall be drawn by two, and a check will be had upon the drawing of accounts. In respect to all the departments of the public service, except the Senate and the House of Commons, that matter is subject to the control of the Treasury Board; but inasmuch as the expenditure in connection with the Senate and the House of Commons is regulated by Statute, it is necessary, in order to make the same change there, to have the statute amended; and the purpose of this Bill is to provide that credit may be made in favor of the accountant and the assistant accountant, or any other two officers who may be designated by the Commissioners of Internal Economy.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the present law?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The present law is that the credit shall be made to the accountant alone.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the Government under what authority these payments by the accountants are made, and what rule governs their conduct in making them? The reason I put this question is this: It will be remembered that in 1883, I think it was, the party who was held to be improperly returned for Bothwell, in my place, sat here for a part of the Session before the Supreme Court finally disposed of the case. He was paid for a portion of the Session that he was here, and I was paid for that portion of the Session that I sat here after the Supreme Court upheld the decision of Mr. Justice Galt. In the Session before that, there was, I think, a Mr. Brecken returned here for one of the constituencies in Prince Edward Island. A Mr. Jenkins claimed the seat, and was ultimately given the seat by the Supreme Court. Mr. Jenkins took his seat near the end of the Session; I am not sure whether he sat a week or not, but he was paid for the full Session.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. No, no.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes; he was paid for the full sessional allowance, and a part payment was made to Mr. Brecken. It was reported to me by the accountant at the time.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Is that the case in which there was a double return?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, there was not a double return; and the accountant undertook to justify his conduct by stating that he had paid under the order of the First Minister. Now, I would like to know whether any member of the Government has a right to interfere and give instructions to the accountant. The question is whether he has the right to order the full payment to one member and the partial payment to another, under exactly the same circumstances. Now, I am not complaining, and I never did complain, of the payment made to me when my opponent continued to sit here in opposition to the decision of Mr. Justice Galt, because he had taken an appeal to the Supreme Court, and retained his seat until the final decision was given; but I do object to one rule being applied to members on this side and a wholly different rule to hon. gentlemen opposite. I believe the payment to Mr. Jenkins was made through the interference of the First Minister, and I call on him to tell this committee by what authority he interfered with the accountant, and upon what principle of law or justice he proposed to pay $1,000 to a member who sat here four or five days at the conclusion of the Session, while he applied a different rule to hon. gentlemen on this side. This Bill is based on a good principle, and if it will improve the law it is a step in the right direction. I hope the improvement will be such as to prevent the improper interference by any member of the Cabinet with any officer of this House in the discharge of his duty.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that the officers of this House could not be interfered with improperly, but I really do not remember any of the circumstances which the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend has a very good memory, but not perhaps altogether an accurate one. But I am quite sure I never interfered, so far as I am aware, in any of these matters, and I think I am the last man chargeable with trying to deprive an hon. member, who sits on the other side, of his rightful dues, or drawing a distinction between members on this side and on that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, it was done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have always dealt with anything connected with the compensation of members without reference to party. I do not mean to say that the accountant, or his deputy, would not be given my opinion if he asked me for it. No doubt, if he asked me, I told him what I thought was right, and I would do so again if he came to me. The accountant should get his opinion, however, from some legal authority—for instance, the Minister of Justice, although he is a member of the Government. If this law will prevent any such interference as that suggested, I would be only too glad, and the hon. gentleman may put in a clause providing that the accountant shall in no case ask the advice of the First Minister.

Mr. LAURIER. It is of little importance whether the hon. gentleman interfered in the case referred to or not. The Ministry is responsible, because the Government practically control the whole expenditure of this House. The Commission of Internal Economy is altogether in the hands of the Government, and, therefore, practically, the Government may shield themselves behind the Commission; still they are the parties who are responsible. If the accountant did not consult the hon. gentleman, or some member of the Internal Commission, where did he get his authority? If he has to consult anybody, he should consult the Internal Commission.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Commission of Internal Economy have nothing to do with the salaries of members.

Mr. LAURIER. But, according to the admissions of the accountant, if he consults anybody, he should consult the Commission of Internal Economy. Of whom is composed this Commission? It is composed of members of the Government altogether, so that whenever a case occurs in which the accountant is in doubt, he should bring the question before the Commission. Mr. Brecken had been sitting part of the Session. He was not entitled to the seat, still he was in the House. Then Mr. Jenkins came in at the end of the Session, and, practically, he had been all the time a member of the House. The question might arise as to how the indemnity ought to be distributed. Were they both entitled to part of it or not? I apprehend the accountant then required advice, and I suppose he went to the Speaker, or some other member of the Commission. What I maintain is that this Commission is useless, because, practically, the whole expenditure is in the hands of the Government.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What I pointed out was that in my case one rule was adopted, and in the case of Mr. Jenkins and Mr. Brecken another and a wholly different rule was followed. A man who came within a week of the close of the Session was paid his whole sessional indemnity.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. If I understand the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) rightly, he says this occurred in the Session of 1883. I have no recollection of any such case occurring. I do not think the accountant would consult anyone but his superior officer, who is the Speaker of the House. I am very sure he received no such order to pay any member that came the last week of the Session the whole sessional indemnity. The law would not justify it. If the accountant took orders from the First Minister or any other Minister, he deserves severe censure. I know of some other cases where the question of indemnity came up, and which were referred to the Speaker, and in the only case where there was any doubt, and in which the Speaker gave his decision, his decision was referred by the Auditor General to Mr. Christopher Robinson, of Toronto, who endorsed the Speaker's decision. The law is plain that a new member takes his sessional indemnity only from the day he takes his seat, deducting the days when he was absent. I am sure there is no case of Mr. Jenkins being paid his full sessional indemnity. With regard to the Bill under discussion, we have appointed a joint committee to act with the Senate. Why should we make a law with regard to the House of Commons, and say that the money shall be paid out here by cheques signed by the accountant and his assistant, when we do not know anything as to the way in which they pay out in the Senate? How do they pay out the money in the Senate?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The cheques are paid out of the credit.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Paid by the Clerk on his own authority?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, but I am proposing a Bill to amend that.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. There should be the same law for both Chambers, and if it is salutary that two officers should sign these cheques, the same law should apply to both Houses alike.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose a slight amendment giving power to the Commissioners to designate any two officers from time to time to sign these cheques, and providing that any officer who may be so designated shall give security.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. EDGAR. When two officers are to be appointed to perform the duties which were formerly carried out by one officer, I do not see why it is necessary to take power to dispense with the services of those gentlemen, and appoint other persons to do this work.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The object is to have always two. At present there is but one, and that is the accountant. The assistant accountant is not recognised in the Act. One of these officers may be absent from duty or may be ill, and it may be desirable to have power to appoint another in his place.

Mr. EDGAR. That is, in place of one of them?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This would enable the Commissioners to dispense with the services of both.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is it the intention by the provisions of this Bill, to dispense with money payments to members altogether, and only to pay them by cheque?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is not a necessary consequence of this Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It would be most inconvenient if that course were adopted; and, if there has been no loss sustained by the Government in this respect, the present system should be continued.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no change in that respect.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before this Bill is reported, I desire to refer to a case which has been mentioned by an hon. member in reference to the member for West Northumberland (Mr. Guillet). A year or two ago, that hon. member was unseated during the Session; he drew his full allowance, less the number of days he would have to put in from that time to the end of the Session. A writ was issued, and he was re-elected, and then he drew his sessional allowance less the number of days he was absent. He thus drew two sessional allowances for one Session of Parliament; and I think, when we are considering a Bill of this kind, we should make provision that that should not be repeated. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), who came here last year, but a few days before the House rose, was only permitted to draw for the few days he was here, and not for the whole Session less the number of days he was absent. What is sauce for one should be sauce for the other, and if our law is so vague as to permit a man to take an advantage of the kind to which I have referred, and to draw two sessional allowances for one Session of Parliament, there should be a change made so that all parties should be treated alike.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The case to which the hon. gentleman refers, was an exceptional one. The reason for it was, that there was an extra indemnity voted during that year. It was the year 1885, when we had the long Session, and it was the reading of the Members' Indemnity Act, coupled with the Act granting the extra indemnity, that gave the extra amount to the hon. member. Mr. Christopher Robinson endorsed the decision which was come to, and such a case could not occur again, under the ordinary circumstances, when an indemnity is granted.

Mr. McMULLEN. We are to have another Franchise Act, and we may sit for six months again. The Government has given notice, every Session, of a new Franchise Act, and we cannot tell when we may have to sit six months. We are to have a new Franchise Act this year, and we have not got to the consideration of the first clause yet; but I tell hon. gentlemen that, if we are to have a Franchise Bill this Session, they will not see their homes at Easter. We know that the last time we had a Franchise Bill to consider it was held over until the end of the Session, and we were asked to consent to a hurried review of its provisions; but we did not consent to that, and in consequence the Session was lengthened out to nearly six months.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

EXCHEQUER COURT OF CANADA.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 109) to amend the law respecting the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would it not be well to unite the Chief Justice, say, of the Supreme Court, along with the Judge of the Exchequer Court, to make these rules? If there were a court of more than one, it would be different, but when you have a court consisting of a single judge there would be more responsibility if the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court were united with the Judge of the Exchequer Court. It is a large power to give to one man; he has no one to consult.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it would be awkward to have a judge of another court; but I have no objection to having some other control. I would be willing to make it subject to ratification by the Governor General in Council, or to put in a provision that the rules should be laid before Parliament and could be negatived at any time during that Session.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 105) further to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act. He said: This Bill involves a principle which I do not propose to press on the House—that is, the principle contained in the first section, namely, that a judge who sat on the trial should not sit, or take part in, or adjudicate upon the proceedings in the Supreme Court. If we had intended to pass the Bill it would have been necessary to have proceeded with it with more expedition than has been observed, because the sitting of the court to which it was especially intended to apply, has already commenced. I understand that the necessity is not so great as I supposed, and that the opinion of the judges, as to the necessity of legislation of this kind, is not what I was led to understand it was. I will not, therefore, press upon the committee the first clause. I think it would be undesirable to legislate in this connection, and thereby disturb the arrangement in regard to the quorum, except more urgency is shown. The view I understood to be taken was this: that the learned judge who has recently come to that court, having heard a large number of cases in the Appeal Court in Toronto, held that he should not sit on hearing appeals, and he was obliged to sit for the lack of any provision of the law to relieve him. I have had the benefit of communicating with the learned judge, and I understand that is not his view, and that he thinks legislation of this kind is not necessary. For that reason I do not propose to proceed with the first section. I would not have moved the second reading of the Bill except to give the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) an opportunity to move some amendments which he desires to have incorporated in the Supreme Court Act, and which he thinks are necessary. I now, however, move the second section. The facts which led to the framing of this section are these: Courts are actually constituted in various Provinces for the purpose of regulating the assessment of property in those Provinces, and it has been the practice in two or three of the Provinces of late years to give those courts, although they are not in the ordinary sense courts of justice, and although sometimes they are not presided over by professional men, very large jurisdiction indeed. In some cases it has been brought to our notice that adjudications have been made by those courts involving taxation to the amount of tens of thousands of dollars a year. There is no appeal to the Supreme Court, by reason of the fact that those courts are not in any sense superior courts, and it is provided that there shall only be an appeal from a superior court. In the North-West Territories we found it necessary to give a very liberal interpretation in regard to appeals, and an appeal can be had whenever a judge of the Supreme Court thinks it proper to allow an appeal to be taken. The provision made in this Bill is intended specially to apply to the Province of British Columbia, which has established a provincial tax and authorised an assessment court in which there have been adjudications involving payment by a single company to the extent of between $60,000 and $70,000 a year. It is proper, under these circumstances, that an appeal should be permitted, and I may say its provincial Legislature has so far concurred in that view, that they are prepared to permit an appeal from the assessment court, and, therefore, all that is required is authority to appeal to the Supreme Court here. I propose to take the view of the committee as to the amount which shall regulate an appeal.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WELDON (St. John). With regard to the second section I propose to add another clause to that Bill with regard to appeals from the Court of Probate. Suits involving millions may come before these courts, and I think it is very important in these matters, especially as regards our Province, that there should be an appeal in cases before the Probate Courts. I beg to move in amendment the words:

(K) From any judgment on appeal from a case or proceedings instituted in any Court of Probate in any of the Provinces of Canada, other than the Province of Quebec.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That amendment may be added.

Amendment concurred in, and Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

PAYMENT OF SESSIONAL ALLOWANCES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to provide that there shall be granted to Her Majesty, out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, an annual sum sufficient to enable Her Majesty to pay the estimated amount of sessional allowances awarded by law to Senators and Members of the House of Commons; and that all moneys expended for such purpose shall be expended and accounted for in like manner as moneys are expended and accounted for in respect of the contingent expenses of the House of Commons under the Act respecting the House of Commons as amended by any subsequent Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the reason for this?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is a measure like the one we have just passed relating to the House of Commons, and is intended to provide that cheques shall be drawn in like manner by two officers of the Senate. Perhaps the Bill did not require to be preceded by a resolution, but having the appearance of a measure involving the expenditure of public money, I thought, to avoid any objection, we had better proceed by resolution.

Motion agreed to, resolution considered in committee, reported, and concurred in.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 120), to amend chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes, intituled: "An Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons."

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE, CHEQUES AND PROMISSORY NOTES.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 5) relating to bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. Before we take up this Bill, I would once more call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the objections raised on this side of the House, yesterday, to going into this Bill at all. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman will be as obdurate to-day as he was yesterday, but I must say, at the rate we progressed last night, it will take three or four days more to go through with this measure. The hon. gentleman would do well to consider the propriety of postponing it until next Session. Though the Bill is an important one, we can well go one year longer without it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think we made very substantial progress with the Bill last night. In two hours we passed twenty clauses, and very valuable assistance was given me by members of the House. I am not so obdurate as the hon. gentleman's remarks would imply, but I am not yet prepared to abandon the Bill. I do not think we have arrived at such serious difficulties that they cannot be removed. I will, however, promise to consider the representations of the hon. gentleman and consult my colleagues.

Mr. LAURIER. There is no intention to criticise the Bill in any hostile spirit. I only speak from the point of view that, even with every desire to assist the hon. gentleman, it must take still a very long time to go through with it, and, at this time of the Session, time is valuable.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the Committee rise and report progress.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Pensions payable on account of Fenian Raid ..... $3,036

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In this I see there is an increase in the shape of a pension to Mr. James Bryan, amounting to $109.50. That requires explanation, seeing that it is now 20 years since these Fenian claims accrued. How does this occur now for the first time? What are the circumstances which induced the Government to recommend this pension at this distant date?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am informed that James Bryan is a regular pensioner, but he was not paid last year because the department could not pay him without the regular voucher, which he did not send in.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the amount of his pension?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. $109.50.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose he was paid for last year?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes; that is true.

Veterans of War 1812..... $3,150

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the average age of these old gentlemen? Speaking generally, it cannot be very far short of 96 years apiece.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have been endeavoring for some years to ascertain the average age, and it is rather doubtful still.

Compensation to Pensioners in lieu of land..... $1,800

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Can the hon. gentleman tell us anything in reference to the pension awarded by the department to Sergeant Valiquette?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Sergeant Primat Valiquette, No. 4 Company, 65th Battalion, entered the active militia at about the age of 18 years and was 22 when he left with his battalion for the North-West, 2nd April, 1885. Was most robust. Had never been sick. Wages between $1.50 and $2 per diem, all went to his father. On the march from Beaver River to Fort Pitt, 37 miles marched in one day, 25th June, 1885; took sick with gastric enteritis of which he died on the 4th July, 1885. His father, Antoine Valiquette, is 58 or 68 years old. He is unable to work since 20 years, on account of chronic asthma. His wife is 50 years old, manages all the affairs of the family, and works outside for their living. Children: 4 girls, 16, 18, 20, 22 years; 2 boys, 12, 14 years old. All with father and mother working the best they can, but family is poor and at times has been depending on public charity. Board (4th March, 1887) recommended pensions as per sections 15, 16, 17 of Order in Council of the 8th July, 1885. Father; half widow's pension, that is, $51.33 per annum, and a pension at the same rate to the two boys until they attain the age of 18, and a pension at the same rate to the three youngest girls until the age of 21. Then, in regard to the case of Ryan, I have this: Gunner John F. Ryan, No. 2 Battery, Montreal Brigade Garrison Artillery, enjoyed good health up to 23rd May, 1885. When at Regina, he was seized with symptoms of acute bronchitis which resisted treatment owing to unfavorable weather. The patient growing worse was admitted to the hospital on the 13th June, 1885, improved there, returned to camp and fell ill again. He was discharged and arrived in Montreal on the 29th June, 1885. He is now permanently disabled—tubercular disease of the lungs. Cannot follow his ordinary occupation as a moulder nor any heavy work. Was paid up to the 31st July, 1885. Has no means of support except his parents. Married man, wife 26 years old; he is now 28 years old; no children. His salary was $10 to $12 per week when working. The Board (26th October, 1885) recommended that he be put in the second class, Regulation Orders 1009. By Order in Council of the 21st January, 1887, the widow was granted an annual pension of $68.44, being the three-eighths of a daily pay of a gunner during twelve months, and, as it was afterwards found that she had a daughter, the Minister of Militia and Defence had an Order in Council passed (23rd August, 1887) granting to Mary Elizabeth Ryan, the daughter in question, a pension of $14.60 per annum, being calculated at the rate of one-thirteenth of a pay of a gunner. Paragraph 7 of General Order No. 14 of the 19th July, 1885, contains two scales of pensions, first in the case of a soldier killed in action or who died from wounds received in action, and second in the case of a soldier who died from illness which can be traced to exposure in the active service. This last scale is the lowest and applies to both Valiquette and Ryan, but Mrs. Ryan's question was calculated upon the rate of pay of a gunner, whilst that of Valiquette's father on sergeant's pay, at the rate of half the pension given to a widow; and the brothers and sisters of Valiquette received the same rate of pension as per Paragraph 16 of General Order 12,214.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What change has been made in the amount awarded to Valiquette last year?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is no change.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Last year exception was taken to the fact that the department had awarded to Valiquette more than it had to Ryan, and even more than the man himself received when he was in the service; and, further, that it had awarded to members of the Valiquette family who were brothers and sisters, and not children, a pension. The Minister then, and the First Minister, also, agreed with the views which were expressed from this side of the House that that appeared to be irregular and should be looked into.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It has been looked into, and this is the report which I have read. That shows that Valiquette was paid as a sergeant under the Order in Council, and the other man was paid under the same Order in Council, according to the rates fixed to be paid to a gunner.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the sum total paid to the Valiquette family?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The amount paid to the Valiquette family was entirely contrary to law. By the rules and orders the family of his brothers and sisters cannot receive any pension from Parliament, and the amount awarded to them is in excess of his pay during the time he was in the service. The Minister promised to bring down a report last year on this point, and he brought down nothing more than the report which is read to-day. When the discussion took place it was so generally concurred in, and appeared to be such a ridiculous departure from the rules of the department, and appeared to be such gross favoritism, and so contrary to law, that the First Minister said that it should be looked into.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will repeat again to the hon. gentlemen the amounts which were paid to the Valiquette family upon the Order in Council which was passed.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That is not what we want.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I make it, over $300 are paid to Valiquette's surviving relatives.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will give the hon. gentleman the figures which have been reported to me as being the amounts paid. The father gets half a widow's pension, $51.33 per annum, and a pension at the same rate is paid to the two boys until they attain the age of 18, and a pension at the same rate to the three youngest girls until the age of 21, all the pensions to date from the Order in Council. The brothers and sisters are treated in the light of children.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Under what authority?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Under the authority of the Order in Council, and under the authority of the regulations which were laid down.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). No; no.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I beg your pardon. It was considered that the family were exclusively dependent upon the work and labor of Sergeant Valiquette who was killed. The matter was tried by the Commission, like every other pension claim, and the Order in Council was passed upon the report of the Commission which I have just read.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here you pay, not to the wife, not to the widow and the children, but you pay to the father, to the brothers and sisters of Sergeant Valiquette, $319 a year, if I have made the addition correctly. Another man—not in the same rank, it is true, a private gunner, while the other man was a sergeant in the same regiment—another man dies leaving a wife and child, and she is only to get $98 dollars a year. The objection was taken from both sides of the House, not altogether in making a liberal provision to Sergeant Valiquette's relatives, but to an extravagant disproportion. It did seem to us, and in spite of the explanations, it seems to me still, that to give $98 to a widow and child, and to give $300 to the brothers and sisters and father, is a very extravagant difference, far more than the difference in rank between the two, or the income lost by the death of either of these parties, justified. The hon. gentleman will know that, according to his own statement, Gunner Ryan was in receipt of, I think, $10 or $12 a week, that is precisely the same income that Valiquette was receiving, $1.50 or $2 per day; so that the losses to the family of Gunner Ryan were quite as great as any possible loss that could be sustained by Sergeant Valiquette's death, and the widow and infant child are, presumably, not as well qualified to support themselves as the brothers and sisters of Sergeant Valiquette. The father, the hon. gentleman states, was quite dependent upon his sons, but the brothers and sisters were of reasonable age.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Let me read the paragraph:

"Paragraphe 7 of General Order No 14, of 19th July, 1885, contains two scales of pensions; first, in the case of a soldier killed in action, or who died from wounds received in action."

This is Valiquette's case—

"And, second, in the case of a soldier who died from illness which can be traced to be from exposure in actual service."

The last scale is the lowest, and applies to both Valiquette and Ryan, but Mrs. Ryan's pension was calculated upon the rate of pay of a gunner, whilst that of Valiquette's father, on sergeant's pay, at the rate of half the pension given to a widow; and the brothers and sister of Valiquette received the same rate of pension as per paragraph 16 of above quoted General Orders.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hardly think paragraph 16 involves that. It seems to me that Mrs. Ryan should get more.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see the pension list has been increased since last year by the sum of $2,275. What is the cause of that increase?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I remember that it is strictly laid down in the Act that no pension can be granted under authority of that Act, to the brothers and sisters of the party, but in this case we have granted a pension to the brothers and sisters of Valiquette. It was discussed very generally in the House last year, and the hon. Minister, as I have said before, promised to inspect and report, but there was no report except his own statement of the case. When that was very fully discussed here Sir John A. Macdonald said:

"I think the circumstances mentioned by the hon. gentleman require some investigation. I will undertake that the matter shall be fully investigated."

Now, the only investigation the hon. gentleman appears to have undertaken, is to repeat the same explanation that he gave us last year, which was no explanation at all. I say that he had no authority under the law to grant these pensions to the brothers and sisters of Valiquette, and that he exceeded his authority and transgressed the laws in so doing. The hon. gentleman will have to give some better explanation than that before he can satisfy this House on that subject.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I consider that regulations 16 and 17 warrant the action that was taken. I can state that the cases now under discussion came before the Board and had every consideration as to the facts. The matter came before Council, and an Order in Council was passed, and the cases were taken into consideration, one being that of a sergeant and the other that of a gunner.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It is strictly laid down that if there is a daughter or brother living there shall not be a pension given, and in one of these cases there was a brother, sister and father living.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The regulation has been carried out.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). But the father was living.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. But the Governor in Council is able to consider the special circumstances of a case. Although the father was alive, he was reported to be absolutely dependent upon the earnings of Valiquette, and by his death the father was deprived of his livelihood, and it was considered that under that provision and under clause 17, after the report was made by the Commission, that Sergeant Valiquette's family were entitled to the pension mentioned.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It is distinctly laid down that the department cannot give a pension in such a case. It is an improper act and an unlawful exercise of the Minister's authority. So much is that the case that the First Minister declared last year that he would have the matter investigated. The Minister of Militia has been unable to afford any other explanation of his action than that furnished last year, when the First Minister, as I have said, thought it was such an extraordinary proposal that he would have the matter looked into.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I fail to see anything improper in what has been done. It is stated by the regulations which have been passed by Council that, in instances where the regulations do not meet the circumstances of an individual case, those circumstances may be specially considered by the Governor General in Council. I have told the hon. gentleman as frankly as possible the nature of the report made by the Board on the circumstances of Sergeant Valiquette's family. All the details came before Council, and Council decided that under clause 17—of course there must be some one to judge what the special circumstances are—and on the report of the Commission, they would grant the pensions.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Those children were not orphans, for they had brother and father living.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The brother is young and unable to render help.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I regard this as a highly improper and illegal proceeding, and it was so considered at the time the promise was made by the First Minister that the matter would be investigated. The result is that these have been made permanent charges on the pension list. I protest against this action, and I think those hon. members who take an interest in this question should mark their sense of what has been done. I am quite willing that any man who was unfortunate in the services of his country should be rewarded as the law provides, but I am not willing to allow the Minister of Militia to interpret the Act to suit himself, which he has done in this case.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have not.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I repeat there was been an improper exercise of authority.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. gentleman has so interpreted the law that the amount received by the family is in excess of the actual earnings of the deceased when in public service. Surely that cannot be an exact interpretation of the law.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the exact pay of a sergeant per day?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The pay of a sergeant, 75 cents; of a gunner, 40 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then the sergeant would have been in receipt of about $280 per year?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And this sum is $319?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes; but the hon. gentleman is not considering the question fairly. If the man had been alive he would have been receiving a much smaller pension than the united pensions which were allowed to his mother and his sisters and brother. The individual pensions granted to each are very much smaller sums than he would have got himself, while altogether they make a larger sum.

Mr. LAURIER. Does the hon. gentleman pretend that if a case does not come within rule 17 it might be considered by the Governor in Council as to whether it was a favorable one in which to grant a pension or not? I understand the hon. gentleman to find his authority in rule 17, that it authorises him to look into the special circumstances, and if the special circumstances appear to him favorable, although the case could not fall under any other rule, he would in such a case grant a pension.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman is asking a question that is answered by article 17. It states that if the regulations do not meet the circumstances of an individual case, those circumstances may be considered by Council upon the report of the Commission stating that certain circumstances existed in regard to the possibility of the father or mother earning a livelihood for their children. These matters would come up in connection with the case, and it would be considered by the Governor in Council. The only interpretation that could be given to clause 17 was that the Governor in Council could judge of the special circumstances of the case, and if Council decided that a pension should be paid, it would be paid.

Mr. LAURIER. I am not familiar with these rules, but rule 17 seems to be very wide, and very liable to be abused. It appears to be left optional with the Minister to consider whether there are special circumstances in a case or not, and if, in his opinion, there are special circumstances which are not covered by any rule that warrant a pension being given, it is granted. The rule is a very wide one.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My authority cannot be questioned under that rule; but, of course, the rule itself can be attacked.

Mr. LAURIER. I repeat that I am not sufficiently familiar with the rules to say whether the Minister has gone too far or not, but he should not be placed in a position where he is liable to exercise the full authority given by that rule.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. member says his authority cannot be contradicted. I beg to point out what the law provides. It says:

"The sisters collectively of the officer or soldier killed in action or dying of wounds received in action, within twelve months after such wounds, without leaving widow, legitimate child and provided there be an orphan or orphans without surviving brothers."

Now these were not "orphan or orphans," and they had a surviving brother. Both of those circumstances placed them beyond the consideration of the department. The Act further says:

"And mainly depending for support on the officer or soldier deceased may under special circumstances to be determined by the Minister of Militia, be granted an allowance equal to half of the rate of the widow's pension."

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If the hon. gentleman would go on and read section 17.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I have not it here.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Well, that is just it.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That is the rule.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not the rule; that is clause 16. We will allow the item to stand over.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Very well, let it stand over until I get my authority. I have sent into the Library for it and could not get it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I wish to say now, because I may not have an opportunity of doing so when this matter is up again, that I was in this House when the matter was brought forward last year, and I certainly do agree with the member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) that this would prima facie appear to be a gross case of injustice. I do not think that the Minister of Militia has at all improved on it by his explanation. I know that a pledge was given by the First Minister, that this matter would be looked into, but this Session we have the same injustice repeated. It does seem a most monstrous doctrine that a man's family should be allowed a larger amount than he could earn if he were alive. That makes the pension system ridiculous, and what emphasises it is that the Minister of Militia refused a pension in a case where the facts were all in favor of granting a pension, on a technical rule, whereas in this case he stretches the technical rule and, as I believe, goes beyond it in order to justify a pension in another case. It seems like a gross case of favoritism, and it appears to be an extraordinary thing that in one case the rule should be stretched even beyond a technical point—where in another case, when all the facts were in favor of the technical rule being superseded, it is not done. I think this item should not be allowed to pass.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There was another case in which explanations were demanded and also promised last year, that was the case of Mr. Swinford, of Winnipeg. He was killed in action or died from disease contracted on the field, I do not know which, but at any rate his father received a grant of $752 a year. Captain Brown was killed in action and his widow received a pension of only $259 a year. Now I call the attention of the Minister to what would appear to me to be a most extraordinary decision of the Board, viz., that the widow of an officer killed in action, of superior rank, only received $259 a year, while the father of an officer, of inferior rank, was assigned just three times as much. I cannot see that the explanation that we have got appears to me to justify the Board, on whose recommendation the Minister acted, in deciding upon those different amounts. There certainly is an extraordinary difference between the case of a widow and the case of a father surviving a son, even though the son had been, and I suppose he may have been, largely assisting in the support of his father. In that case, also, an explanation should be given to the House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON, I remember the circumstances perfectly. I have the report of the Board by me, but I have not the explanation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We want the explanation.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I cannot explain anything more than what the Board lays before me. All these pensions were granted without any reference to the Minister.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman will allow me the point was taken last year, and the reason that the discussion passed over for the time being was that we admitted that the hon. gentleman was not acquainted with the facts, but we thought there was a clear discrepancy in the decision of the Board, and that the Minister should give reasons for this extraordinary action on the part of the Board. These reasons we expected the hon. gentleman would provide to-day.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If the hon. gentleman will allow the item to pass, or to stand for the present, I will give all the explanation that I can get, from the report which has been made to me, that is all I can produce.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We wanted you to get the full particulars.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). We will let this item stand.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will get full particulars and give them to the hon. gentlemen.

Pensions on accounts of Rebellion to North-West Mounted Police, &c. .... $4,324 91

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). In connection with this item, I must express my regret that the Minister of Militia has not seen his way to make a provision for the men who performed useful services to the country in 1837. I called the attention of the House to this matter a year ago, and I think that then I did not receive that satisfaction from the First Minister which I thought I ought to receive. I notice, Sir, that a case has been related where a man had been in service, and had caught cold, through which he got bronchitis, which rendered him unfit to perform his manual labor, and not being able to provide for his family the Government gave him an allowance. I have a case exactly similar to that, of a veteran of 1837. I know that it is a disputed point between the Dominion Government and the Local Government as to the responsibility of giving justice to those men who served in 1837; yet it is very unfair, in making provisions for the veterans of 1812 and for those who served during the Fenian Raid, that you should not compensate those who served in 1837. It is not for me to say who was at fault on account of that rebellion, but we know that there was a rebellion, that the citizens were called out and ordered to go to the front and serve their country. No doubt some may have gone unwillingly, but they took the field, and they should be compensated for any disabilities they sustained while on duty. I hold that it is an injustice to those men that they should not be compensated, whether it be the Government of Ontario, or Quebec, or the Dominion Government that is responsible. These men were true and loyal. It does not concern me now whether the rebellion was justified or not; all I ask is that simple justice should be done to those men who served the country faithfully, many of whom received injuries which left them cripples for the remainder of their lives. I can well understand that the First Minister might not wish this question to be brought up; I can understand that there are many who would not wish to have recalled to their minds that time when the people in their desperation rose in arms for responsible government, and tried to overcome those who were oppressing them. We might perhaps say that those who rebelled at that time were justified; but whether it was right or wrong, those who were called out to put down that rebellion ought to receive consideration at the hands of the Government, and as the Government are now so generous in being ready to pension everybody who comes along, even those who are well compensated at the present time, I say it is their duty to consider the cases of those unfortunate men, who, through difficulty, privation and neglect of their families, went to the front and assisted in repressing the rebellion, which, perhaps, was instigated by those who had charge of the administration of the affairs of the country. I regret exceedingly that the Minister of Militia has not been able to suggest some scheme for granting to these men that justice which they have been demanding. It is quite indifferent to me whether they belong to one class or the other, whether they were forced to go to the front or went freely of their own accord. I say they ought to receive the consideration of this House, and so long as I have a seat here and have an opportunity to call the attention of the Government to the fact that these men have claims, so long will I continue to raise my voice in the interest of those who are entitled to justice.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I believe they have been denied justice since 1837. My hon. friend says, "hear, hear." I will guarantee that, if he had served the country half as faithfully as these men have done, and anything happened to him, we would find an item in the Estimates which would enable him to luxuriate for the balance of his life. But those true and loyal citizens of Canada, who have served their country faithfully, and did their duty as well as the Minister of War has done, are to receive nothing, while he, forsooth, is to be knighted, honored, and respected. I say it is a burning shame and disgrace to the Dominion of Canada that these poor men should be allowed to remain in that position, without a single effort being made, or a single proposition being presented to the House for affording just recognition to these men for their services. Sir, I would advise the First Minister to put off his pensions to the Mounted Police in the North-West, and do justice to these poor old unfortunate men who aided in putting down the rebellion that very likely he had a little hand in instigating. I appeal to the House to grant the justice to which they are entitled.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I congratulate my hon. friend on his speech. I hope it will be carefully reported, and it will do him a good deal of good in his county, which, I have no doubt, was his object in being so very eloquent. The difficulty in this case is that the Dominion of Canada had nothing to do with the rebellion of 1837, and that is a point the hon. gentleman must consider. He says he is not going to decide the question whether those who rebelled or those who put down the rebellion were right. But the hon. gentleman said that those who put down the rebellion and suffered so much in doing so, ought to be pensioned; but do you not think that the others who took arms to defend the liberties of the people ought to be pensioned as well? I think the hon. gentleman must see from what he is saying that the rebels and those who put down the rebels ought both to be pensioned; and considering the state of our finances, in consequence of the enormous extravagance of the present Government, I think the Exchequer would not stand paying pensions to both sides. Then, I would ask the hon. gentleman to consider for a moment the rebellion in Lower Canada, where I think there were more rebels than there were men employed to put the rebellion down; we would have to pension them also—both sides. I think economists, like my hon. friend, who are so much against superannuations and pensions, would find their hair standing erect, like men distraught, if they found that we were going to pension all the rebels and those who put them down in both Upper and Lower Canada. But, joking apart, these matters belong to the Provinces where those unfortunate events took place. If there is any reward to be given to those men who fought on one side or the other, the Province of Ontario, which was not then joined to the Provinces of Lower Canada, must attend to its own soldiers; and so in the Province of Quebec. Then, we must remember that on several occasions the volunteers in the Maritime Province were called out and did service on the frontier, not only in 1837, but also when there was great danger of war with the United States. They would all have claims, but their claims must ex necessitate call upon the different Provinces to which they belonged when they were called upon.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I must congratulate the Premier upon his high appreciation of what he considers to be the duty and responsibilities of a representative in this House, as shown by his insinuation that I ought to get this speech reported and distributed through the riding I have the honor to represent, as it might do me a great deal of good there. Sir, if such base and sordid motives influence the hon. Premier, I give him to understand that these men have rights; they have a just claim against their country; and if he is induced to act for the purpose of making himself popular in the country, and disregards what is honest, and right, and just to these men, such motives do not influence me. Sir, we have a duty to perform here higher than that, and I am satisfied that there are few in this House who would take the responsibility of speaking, and having their speeches reported in Hansard, if they were influenced by such base motives as a desire of gaining a local popularity, regardless of the just rights of those who faithfully, honestly, and valiantly defended their country. I can hardly expect those were the motives influencing the First Minister. Many of these men I know were of the hon. gentleman's own leaning, but I guarantee that after they have heard the remarks the hon. gentleman has made here, they will feel it their bounden duty in the future to refuse any longer to support a man who treats their just claims in the flippant manner in which the hon. gentleman has treated them. These men have just claims and the First Minister knows this. Let him twist any way he likes. By no light jesting can he possibly remove the impression from these men and the country that they have just claims which should be considered.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

Pension to Mrs. Gowanlock..... $400

Mr. BARRON. In regard to that item, it will be remembered that last Session the House voted a pension to Mrs. Gowanlock, which was unanimously consented to by both sides. I am informed that she has not yet received one cent of that pension. She naturally complains of that, and I think we should know why it is that she has not received the money.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make enquiry in regard to that.

Mr. McMULLEN. I made some enquiries as to the large pension of $4,724 which appears to have been paid to one family under the head of Mounted Police.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is my hon. friend right in saying that $4,700 is paid annually to one family?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. This sum is in different items for gratuities and pensions.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wanted to know on what basis these gratuities and pensions were granted.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This is not in my department, and the Prime Minister has promised to get the information.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has the item been carried?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it stands.

Brigade Majors, salaries, transport expenses, &c..... $15,100

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. This vote brings up a question in connection with the staff who are doing duty in Ontario, and I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Militia to the fact that he has recently amalgamated the 3rd and 4th Military Districts, and that in those districts there are only two staff officers, Col. Straubenzie, the Deputy Adjutant General, and Col. Lewis, the Brigade Major. These districts extend from Bowmanville east to the provincial line, and include about 6,000 volunteers, scattered over a very large tract of country. The Deputy Adjutant General is occupied most of the time at Kingston, where he is employed on boards, and on courts of enquiry, and on courts-martial, and I believe he is unable to give that attention to the duties of the district which is necessary. Very much the same was the case with his predecessor, Col. Villiers. As the result of this the regiments in that district are not visited and inspected with that regularity and frequency which is expected; and, as a matter of fact, for years past there has not been the regular inspection of arms and clothing which is required by the orders and regulations. I submit to the hon. gentleman that he should appoint another staff officer for these two districts. At present there is practically only one staff officer who is available for the purpose in that extensive district, and I think another brigade major should be appointed there. When I state that the rifles and the arms and accoutrements in that district are not inspected as they should be, and that there is Government property which is not looked after with the regularity which is required, I submit that the Minister should look into the matter, and, should not, from any false motives of economy, say: I will not appoint another staff officer there; because I believe the House would willingly vote the money in order to have the Government property, which should be under the care of Government officers, efficiently looked after. I know many cases where the arms are in such condition that they should be called in and repaired; and there is no use, as we all know, in putting in the hands of our volunteers arms in which the locks, when they are taken out to the butts, are so useless that the men cannot fire with them.

Mr. GUILLET. I endorse and corroborate everything which has been said by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), as to the pressing necessity for another staff officer in these districts to look after the proper condition of the arms and accoutrements of the men. In all the other districts in the Dominion there are two staff officers in each, while in this case there are only two for the two districts. I do not understand on what ground this can be justified. There are just as many men in the service in each of these districts as in the other districts of the country, and I do not understand how it can be expected that the work can be looked after by only two officers. The result is that the work is not done, and serious damages are resulting to the equipment of the different regiments. Pressing representations have been made to the Minister of Militia by every member representing those districts, and I am sure that a change is urgently needed; and, if it is of any importance at all to have the arms properly looked after, the change should be speedily made. I can assure the Minister of Militia that the matter requires his earnest consideration in order that he may find a remedy. The fact that the brigade major, upon whom this duty devolves, lives at Brockville, makes it necessary that when he does, once a year, or less frequently, visit the other district, he has to travel a long distance and at considerable expense. Therefore, on the score of economy the work could be done much cheaper if another officer was appointed, or at least, without much additional expense, as a large portion of the expenditure for travel would be saved. I hope the Minister will take this matter into his favorable consideration and have the appointment made.

Ammunition and manufacture of small arm ammunition at the Cartridge Factory at Quebec, clothing and military stores.....$200,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think we will have to ask the Minister to let that stand to-night. We want some information about that, and we want to discuss it at considerable length.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Well, let it stand.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I think it would also be well to hold over the item relating to the Royal Military College, for I shall have considerable to say upon that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was going to suggest to the Minister that this item of clothing and great coats, and the item of the Royal Military College stand over. I know there will be a long discussion on both.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I would like to ask the Minister of Militia whether the Deputy Adjutant General at Kingston has requested the appointment of an assistant of the staff?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Heretofore I have had difficulty to keep down the expenses of the staff. Hon. gentlemen who take an interest in militia matters, have told me time and again that it was far better to reduce the staff and give the amount thus saved to the rank and file, and I have tried to comply with those suggestions. Now, as soon as the staff is reduced in one district, hon. gentlemen in Parliament who, no doubt, know the locality where they live, are subjected to pressure to have deserving officers appointed to those positions. Occasionally gentleman come to me and ask that the staff be increased. We cannot properly admit that the service is not sufficiently carried out as it is. The Deputy Adjutant at Kingston is one of the most efficient officers that we have in the service. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman if he has made any representation to that effect; if he has, he did so to the Major General, and it has not come before me. But I cannot at all admit that the service is not efficiently carried out with the present staff in those districts. To-day the facilities for travelling from one place to another are very different to what they were a few years ago. There are railways in every direction, and it is much easier now than formerly for officers of the staff to perform their duties. Until I am convinced that it is necessary to increase the staff, I cannot recommend any change.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. How often have the different company armories been inspected within the last five years in that district?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman who is much more of a military man than I am, would, I think, find it very difficult, the question being put to him, to answer with mathematical exactitude how many times those armories have been inspected. That they have been sufficiently inspected is clear from the efficiency of the service, otherwise orders would have been sent to the inspector to inspect them.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Will the hon. gentleman ascertain that from his department and bring down the information before concurrence?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Public armories and care of arms, including pay of storekeepers, caretakers, storemen and armorers. $60,000

Mr. BARRON. I do not think there is a weaker spot in the whole management of the department than the care given to the arms throughout the country. My information comes from all quarters that the care and custody of the arms are such that rifles and guns, when taken out occasionally, are absolutely useless. I had occasion lately to see some gentlemen in Peterborough who gave me the information that, by reason of the policy pursued by the Minister of Militia, in regard to the volunteers in that part of Ontario, no care whatever was taken of the arms. They complain that proper accommodation has not been given, and they lay the blame entirely upon the department. Now, it is perfectly nonsensical to my mind to go to an enormous expense in having a militia force, and to find the arms insufficient when occasion may require to use them. I, therefore, think that more attention should be given to the care of the arms, and that the Minister should see that throughout the country such care is taken of them as that they may be useful when occasion arises.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think the experience of the past has shown that when we required to use the arms, they were found to be in very serviceable order. Whenever we were called upon to draw upon the resources of the department, we found the arms were in very good order. But I must admit frankly that all the arms which we have in the Dominion of Canada are not in perfect order; but I claim that for the amount of money which Parliament has put at the disposal of the Militia Department, everything possible has been done to keep the arms in proper repair. Some complaints occasionally come in after a camp, that certain stands of arms are not in as perfect a condition as they might be, but it must be remembered that we have the most experienced armorers all over the Dominion, men brought out from England and placed at large centres like Toronto, Quebec and Halifax, and the arms are at once sent to them to be repaired. Of course that takes some little time; but hon. gentlemen on considering the amount of money voted by Parliament, will, I am sure, be sufficiently fair to admit that with the amount voted it is impossible to do any better than has been done in the past and is being done now.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I called the Minister's attention to the fact that the armory in Chatham, belonging to the 24th Battalion, is in a very bad state. I have already called the Minister's attention to it, and he promised to look into it. I trust it will not be forgotten. I am told that had it not been for the caretaker removing the arms to another building, which he rented, they would have been rendered entirely useless. The account he had rendered for the rent of the building, however, has not yet been paid, and I should like to learn from the Minister why it has not yet been settled.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I promised to look after the arms and the repairing of them, and I have given instructions accordingly. I made no promise, however, in regard to paying rent. The hon. gentleman knows that we pay a certain amount to companies for looking after the arms. Of course, I will look into the matter. I cannot say whether it is a special case or not. If so, it will be treated as a special case, but, judging at first blush, I should imagine that the arms should have been taken care of by the captains of companies who received a certain amount for the purpose. I will ascertain how the matter stands.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The account has been rendered for some time, but has not been paid.

Mr. TROW. I understood the Minister to say that the arms were everything that could be desired in regard to efficiency. Judging from our past experience I should doubt whether such is the case. If the arms are so satisfactory and the ammunition is unsatisfactory, surely the latter should be looked after as well as the arms themselves.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. In justice to the Minister of Militia I should say that, from all the accounts I have received, the ammunition made at the cartridge factory at Quebec, is as perfect as it can be made. The riflemen of the Dominion support my statement that it is better than any ammunition imported from the old country. There were great complaints in respect to the ammunition turned out from the cartridge factory at first, but I have had some dealings with riflemen all over the Dominion, and from all sides I receive reports that the ammunition made this year has been as good as can be manufactured; in fact, that it has reached perfection.

Mr. PRIOR. I endorse what has been stated by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). We have tried this ammunition in British Columbia lately, and we have found, without doubt, that the ammunition manufactured by the Canadian Government is far ahead of any we have ever had from Great Britain. No doubt there was a time when it was very bad, but, I believe, that at the present time, it is as good as can possibly be made.

Mr. BARRON.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to know roughly how many thousand stands of arms are under the care of the storekeepers at the various armories?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is very large. We have depots at Toronto, Quebec and other cities where arms are issued to the militia force; but beyond those corps we have large depots of arms at the different centres. I can procure from the storekeeper at Ottawa a correct statement, if the hon. gentleman wishes it. The whole force of Canada is armed, and that would be about 42,000 men. Outside of that number we have depots at Quebec, Toronto, Kingston and Halifax.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What are the arms?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Most of them are Snider-Enfield and Martini-Henry.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In what proportion?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The proportion of the Snider-Enfield is much greater than the Martini-Henry.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like the hon. gentleman to bring down a statement showing the number of stands of arms in serviceable condition, distinguishing the number of Martini-Henry and Snider.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). And add the cost of each.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will bring it down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman stated the number of men at 42,000. Am I to understand that that is the number actually enrolled at the present moment, or is it the number when all the companies are filled?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think the actual force is about 34,000 men.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I notice in the Auditor General's accounts an item of $20,676 for transport. That seems to be a large sum.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The transport is carried out by tender, and it forms the most expensive item in connection with the camps. Every general who has been out here has advised us to have these camps of instruction for the rural companies, and I should be very sorry to see one disappear. I think they do good service; but the conveyance of the troops from one point to another runs away with a good deal of money. The items are sent in and can be discussed in detail, but the amount is large I admit.

Improved Rifled Ordnance..... $3,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many guns is that intended to buy?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Not very many. I wish we could have a larger number brought out every year. It is intended to purchase two 64-pounder rifle guns with standing carriages to cost £300 sterling each, including freight and transport, from England. These guns are intended for the armament of fortifications. Every year we are trying to get out a few of these guns which are considered of the first importance, in so far as arming the fortifications of the country is concerned.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I ask that question because I desire to know whether the Government has any scheme or plan for protecting our seaboard. It occurs to me that 64-pounder guns would be very little better than pop-guns as against an ironclad squadron which might possibly bear down on our seaboard, either on the Pacific or the Atlantic. I am not very familiar with the power of penetration of the modern rifled ordnance, but I have seen some of those first-class ironclads, and I cannot conceive it possible that the 64-pounders could produce the smallest possible effect on them at any imaginable range that they might come within.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I must admit they are not the most improved ordnance, which, as my hon. friend knows, are very expensive. The question of the defence of the country has been given to a commission, which will report to the Government, and when the report is made it will be easier to explain what the policy of the Government will be on that point. It would hardly be prudent for me to give any opinion until the report of the experts composing the commission is made to the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am quite aware that it is not within the power of the Government, on a vote of $3,000, to obtain arms that would be of any effect against a hostile fleet. If that be the case, is it wise to expend our money on these 64-pounders?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The report of Colonel Irwin, who is Inspector of Artillery, as well as the report of the General, agree that those guns are valuable for our purposes. It is considered that if we buy a few of those guns every year they will very much improve our defence.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Might I ask the Minister of Militia what has been the result of the experiments carried on by Captain Palliser with regard to the rifling of some of our old guns. Have those experiments been a success or not?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We entered into a contract for remodeling the guns, but it was not as satisfactory as we expected. The firm which we gave the contract to for the experiment got into difficulties and we could not carry out the experiments.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Did the plan itself succeed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The plan was reported as a good one by General Strange.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If it is practicable to turn our old guns into modern ones it would be better than importing second class guns from England.

Construction and Repairs of Drill Sheds, &c..... $75,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where does the hon. gentleman propose to expend this $75,000. I suppose it is for the construction of drill sheds.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes; and for repairs to military property. I can give the hon. gentleman the details of the amounts which is to be distributed over the Dominion. London, $500; Toronto, $1,700; Kingston, $16,920; Ottawa, $2,277; St. John, P.Q., and Montreal, $3,970; Quebec, $19,625; Fredericton, $4,115; Halifax, $385; Winnipeg, $3,872; Victoria, $650; Charlottetown, $940.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman propose to construct a new drill shed at Kingston?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I may explain to the hon. gentleman that in Kingston and Quebec, where we have large military establishments, the cost of keeping them in repair is very much greater than in other places where we have not such establishments.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, this is for repairs?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, this is for repairs. Any amounts for new buildings will be found in the Estimates of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I notice in the list which the Minister of Militia has read that he has made no provision for the town of Chatham. I hope he has not forgotten that.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I promised the hon. gentleman to look after the drill shed at Chatham and I mean to do so. The amount needed for that purpose will be taken out of the vote of $22,000 for drill sheds and rifle ranges.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I would ask the hon. Minister if he proposed to add an hospital to the Royal Military College at Kingston, because I believe that it is a very necessary building in the college. If we are to have young men there we ought to have proper provision made for them in case of illness, and we ought to take steps to see that they are properly taken care of.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Any amount for a building of that nature would have to be provided for in the Estimates by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. McMULLEN. We have a company at Mount Forest in my constituency, but we have no drill shed. That company has been in existence a number of years, and I am rather induced to make an application on its behalf after hearing the reply the Minister made to my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell). I quite agree that in order to care for military stores it is necessary that there should be an armory. Some years ago we had something that answered the purpose, but it has not been in proper condition for a number of years, and a portion of the town hall has been used for that purpose, but it is not at all satisfactory, as there are not proper opportunities for drilling. That company has had a very good record, and I would like something to be done to secure it a drill shed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That would cause the expenditure of money.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We do not generally give a drill shed for one company, but there is an Order in Council applying to all such cases, in which it is stated that if the locality gives a lot and contributes a certain amount of money, the Government will contribute a certain portion of the expenditure. I shall be very glad to send the hon. gentleman a copy of that Order in Council, so that he can see if it is possible to apply it to the case he mentions, and we can then talk the matter over together.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would say, in reply to the remark of the First Minister, that the hon. gentleman has never failed to be kind to his political friends, and I can assure him that he has a number of friends there who would appreciate a drill shed. If he happened to come around there in his car "Jamaica" at any time, we have not a building large enough to accommodate those who would wish to hear him. I am sure that if we had a drill shed, they would be glad to hear him, and I would have no objection at all to his coming.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think I shall have to use the language of the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson)—to think I would be influenced by such base and sordid motives as to erect a drill shed for my friends.

Mr. TROW. I hope when the Minister of Militia is considering the subject of drill sheds he will not forget what promises to be the greatest railway centre in the Dominion of Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Where is it?

Mr. TROW. The city of Stratford. Our drill shed is out of repair, and our volunteers have to go to other quarters to drill.

Mr. BARRON. I hope when the Minister sends the Order in Council to some gentlemen on this side of the House, he will not forget me, because in my riding there is a place which, though not celebrated as a railway centre, is celebrated as possessing a university of which the hon. gentleman has no doubt heard. I refer to the village of Cobocok; and I have no doubt that place is entitled to a drill shed as much as some other places to which the hon. gentleman has granted money for that purpose. But I just want to read the remarks of Colonel Straubenzie regarding Peterborough in reference to the matter I spoke of a few moments ago. He said:

"I found the rifles much out of repair and have ordered them to be sent to Kingston for repairs. This corps is also under great disadvantages in having very bad armories. A plan for a new armory has already been submitted and which I hope will meet with the approval and sanction of the Honorable the Minister. There is great esprit de corps in this regiment, and officers and men are deserving of encouragement in a substantial form."

That bears out the private information I received, and I think the Minister of Militia ought to give this particular item his constant attention.

Permanent Forces and Cavalry and Infantry Schools...$484,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How is the hon. gentleman effecting this reduction of $38,700?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If we establish a cavalry school in Toronto, we shall not require the whole amount this year, and there is a small amount remaining unexpended from last year. I hope to be able to keep within the reduced amount in the Estimates.

Mr. DENISON. I did not quite understand whether the Minister said that the reduction was on the cavalry school at Toronto or not; but if it is a reduction of the expenditure for permanent schools, I am rather pleased to see it, and I am in hopes that it may be transferred to the credit of the militia in general. The sum of $38,000 would be sufficient to drill a great many more rural battalions which have in past years been neglected for want of funds. I think there is no expenditure in the country which would be more cheerfully granted than a sum to drill all the rural corps every year; and I hope the Minister of Militia, if he strikes this amount out of this item, will use it for general militia purposes. While on my feet, I would like to say a word or two in reference to the schools. Under the present arrangement no person can enter one of these military schools without being either an officer of the force or a private. I think it would be in the interest of the militia of Canada, if we reverted to the old system which we had in force some twenty years ago. Then it was possible for a gentleman to enter a school as a sort of cadet and get his certificate, and on his passing out he received the sum of $50, failing he got nothing. This enabled him to pay for his board during the time he was in school, and on leaving he had quite as good a knowledge in almost every respect as a man leaving one of the existing schools. But what do we find now? If a young lad desires to get a certificate from the school, he has either to go to the expense of getting a uniform on obtaining a commission, or else to put on a private's uniform and go into barracks, where he will have to associate with those who belong to the permanent force. It is not always desirable—I need not point out why—for young lads to be thrown into a barrack room along with men older than themselves, who sometimes contract habits which are not very good. Under the old system numbers of young fellows went through the schools, got their certificates, and, having acquired a taste for soldiering, afterwards joined the militia as officers or otherwise; and, even though they did not find their places in the militia, it was a great advantage to the country to have a large number of men who were drilled sufficiently to take command of companies or battalions in camp or barracks. At present there are only the two classes. If they go into the ranks, they are taught the duties of non-commissioned officers or privates. What we want is to have men with certificates in the country, so that in case of trouble in the land, they could be given commissions and could drill the yeoman of the country. I see that Col. Smith, who commands No. 1 District, has made some very practical remarks in this connection. He says:

"For many years to come our militia must be our main defence, and it should be placed on the best footing possible both as to efficiency and numbers, but numbers or corps rather than numbers of men. If we have a large number of well organised and expansive bodies, they can be rapidly filled up when the need arrives, but it is a difficult task to organise the bodies in the case of danger."

These remarks are somewhat in the line of the argument I made in this House last year in favor of our militia being increased. I then advocated an increase of 100,000, and I hope still the Government will see their way clear to having a considerable increase. I would like to have some opinion from the Minister of Militia as to what he considers can be done with reference to the idea I have thrown out, of allowing the men to obtain certificates in the schools without having to live in barracks as officers or privates.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. There is a great deal in what the hon. and gallant colonel from West Toronto states. The great difficulty at present is to get qualified officers for our rural battalions. If we have qualified officers and good non-commissioned officers, it is easy enough to get the men, as there is plenty of martial spirit in the country, and in time of danger any number of volunteers can be got. But what we are deficient in is competent officers and non-commissioned officers, and it is to train these that the schools were established. Do the schools fulfil that duty? Well, the officers and non-commissioned officers who go through the schools are very well trained, but we have not a sufficient number going through. I have tried to find out why it is that the officers and men from the rural battalions hesitate to go to these schools, and I find the reason is the expense. First of all, they have to provide themselves with uniforms, and then they have to provide mess uniforms. It is not necessary under the regulations to provide the latter. I believe they can wear their tunics, but they do not, as a rule, care to go to mess in buttoned up tunics, and they like to have this mess uniform which costs a great deal of money. Then they join the mess, which adds to their expense, so that parents object to their sons going to these schools on this account and on account of the danger the cadets run of contracting idle habits while living in barracks. I believe if the men attending the schools were allowed to board outside, and to attend their drills during drill hours, there would be a better attendance. It would be better if the compulsory attendance was done away with, and the officers could go to these schools without being compelled to remain in barracks. Mothers do not want to send their young sons, from 15 to 18 years of age, just when they feel this martial spirit and want to qualify for a commission to barrack life, but prefer to send them to board with friends where they might be looked after and to whom they could go home at night. If that system were adopted, we would have a larger attendance in the schools and a more useful military force than at present, for if we can get plenty of competent officers and non-commissioned officers, we can get the men at any time.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It would not be practicable to carry out the scheme suggested by the hon. and gallant colonel from Toronto (Mr. Denison). The schools are not numerous enough, and we can only train men who go in for the long and the short course. There would be great difficulty in maintaining discipline if those attending the schools were not bound by the regulations of the militia force of Canada. As to what the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has said about the expense of living in barracks, I do not see how it could be possible to give proper training to the militia men in the batteries and infantry schools if they were not obliged to live in barracks. One of the important branches of their studies is the internal economy of a regiment, and they can only learn that in barracks. As to the uniform, there is no reason why there should be expense. A man wears the uniform of his corps, no matter to what branch of the service he belongs, so that really I do not see any very great expense incurred. As to the loss of time in barracks, judging by the reports we have, the men who follow the course are kept busy pretty near all the time. The hon. member for South Oxford has asked me the details of expenditure incurred in the different schools and batteries of the Dominion. First, there is a Lieutenant Colonel commanding, pay of $4 a day; allowance, Inspector of Artillery, $1.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was asking in reference chiefly to the hon. gentleman's proposed reduction, and as he had taken a vote for $522,700, I want to know the total expenditure incurred on those services last year.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Last year we expended $431,983. A deduction of $30,700 has been made in the amount of the total estimate for the forts. This, however, does not imply any proposed reduction in the numerical strength of the artillery, cavalry, and military schools, as at present ordered.

Mr. DENISON. I entirely disagree with the hon. the Minister of Militia in his remarks. I attended one of these schools some 20 odd years ago, and I know the discipline of the men while in the schools was just as good as it is in the schools to-day, the only difference being that instead of the cadets going to barracks at night and sleeping there, they went to their homes or boarding houses. And during the days when they had their ordinary duties to perform and to learn the interior economy of the force, they went with the officer or non-commissioned officers, and obtained a knowledge of that interior economy as they do now. The only difference was that, instead of sleeping in barracks each night they slept in their own quarters, and I do not see why there should be any difficulty in regard to the number. At that time four or five non-commissioned officers were told off from the regular army, as they could now be told off from the schools, and they formed the staff of the school. They did the drilling, and that was all that was required, and what is done now. At that time they generally had in the Toronto School 200 or 300 at a time, while now I believe they never have more than 50 or 60, if even that number.

Mr. BARRON. I cannot speak of my own knowledge in regard to the discipline to-day, but I know from my own experience that the remarks of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison), as to the past are correct. When I went through a military school, I went to my own lodgings at night, and I know that during the day the military discipline was thoroughly carried out, and no fault was ever found with it. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has referred to the necessity of having additional competent officers, and that seems to be the view of the Major General, who says in his report:

"One thing necessary is an increase of competent officers with a view to the discipline and efficiency of the force."

I would ask the Minister of Militia whether he has taken any steps to carry out that recommendation. We import the Major-General at great expense from the old country, though I think that is unnecessary, because we have just as competent men here, but, if we have him here, we should carry out his recommendations.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We are carrying out every year the recommendations of the Major General by training each year a larger number of competent officers in our schools. The Major General does not attack the present system, but says that the number of competent officers should be increased, and we are doing the best we can through our schools to get a greater number of competent officers.

Mr. PRIOR. Before this item passes, I desire to say a few words as to "C" Battery, which is now stationed in British Columbia. I am sorry to see that the Minister of Militia has not seen fit to place an amount in the Estimates sufficient to complete the barracks for that battery.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That does not come under my Estimates. That is under Public Works.

Mr. PRIOR. It is now some years ago since we were promised the advent of that battery, but we had almost given up all hopes of seeing them when at last they arrived, and we were very glad to welcome our brothers in arms from the East. At that time there were no proper barracks for them, and there are not yet. The only place which was at all fit to receive them, even for temporary accommodation, was what is called the agricultural hall, which is not at all suited to the purpose for which it is now being used. It is simply a board shed, battened. When the weather is good, as every one knows it always is in British Columbia in the summer, it is all well enough, but in the winter it is altogether unfit for the purpose of barracks. The battery arrived in Victoria in October, 1887, and I think it was in December, 1887, that the Minister of Militia paid us a visit, and inspected "C" Battery and the local militia. At a banquet which was given to him there, the hon. gentleman stated to those who were present that he had bought a site for the erection of the barracks, that a contract had been let, and that the barracks would be completed at once. No doubt the hon. gentleman meant what he said at the time, but his promise, like a good many more promises, has been broken, for up to the present time the only thing which has been done has been to erect three huts for the gunners. There are no quarters for the officers, there is no cook house, or guard room, there are no cells, there are no married sergeants' quarters, no married men's quarters, no parade ground, but simply three huts in the midst of a dense wood. I do not blame the Minister of Militia, because there may be circumstances over which he has no control. Last year he told us he was in the hands of the Finance Minister. I trust the Finance Minister and the Minister of Militia will put their heads together and see if they cannot do more justice to those men, for it is a manifest injustice to treat them—as fine a body of men as can be found in the world—in the manner in which they are being treated. I have heard it said that, if they do not like to put up with it, they can resign. I do not think any hon. gentleman on the floor of this House would make that remark if he thought of what he was saying, because these men contracted to give their services to the Government for certain considerations, in the same way as any clerk who is engaged by a merchant. They contracted to give their services for a certain amount of money per day, certain quarters, and certain allowances, which are all laid down by the rules and regulations of the militia. I believe these men have faithfully done their duty and have carried out their contract, but I regret to say that I do not think the Government have carried out theirs in this particular. In regard to the pay of these men, the officers particularly are laboring under great disadvantages in being stationed in British Columbia, because of the great difference in the cost of living between British Columbia and the East. I have here a scale of prices of certain things and of certain services rendered which I will not detain the House by reading, but this statement of prices was compiled by the contractor who supplies the battery with groceries. He gives a long list of the articles which he supplies, and proves that the prices paid in British Columbia over the prices paid for the same articles in the East are from 25 to 40 per cent. more. I have another list here of services and labor. This has been compiled by a gentleman who lived many years in Eastern Canada, and has lived five or six years in British Columbia, and he knows what he is talking about. I will mention only a few of the items. He says that repairs to boots and shoes cost 100 per cent. more, tailoring 100 per cent. more, milk 100 per cent. more, cab hire 75 per cent. more, horse hire 75 per cent. more; and there is another item which is of great importance in a country like ours where we want population, and, as he has a large family, I have no doubt he is competent to speak in regard to it, and that is that monthly nurse charges are 125 per cent. more. I do not know anything about that myself, but I am sure he would not have put that down unless he had proved it. I know that all Imperial officers who have been stationed in Victoria or Esquimalt have got an extra allowance on account of the extra cost of living there. I have a letter from a gentleman who has been for the last two years an Imperial army officer, in which he says :

"DEAR SIR,—With reference to your enquiry about my extra pay while on duty at the station, I have to say that I practically receive double the pay, over and above all allowances, when on ordinary pay. There are several precedents of this recognition by the Imperial authorities, that owing to the high price of everything in the Province, some compensation should be made for the additional expenses, unavoidably incurred by officers on duty. I think I am correct in stating, that all the officers of the Imperial service, who have visited Esquimalt on duty, have invariably been granted extra pay."

Now, Sir, this is from an Imperial officer who was on duty at Esquimalt for a long time. I may state that even the banks agree that their officers should have more. Here is a letter from the manager of one of the banks in Victoria :

"DEAR SIR,—In answer to your letter of the 1st instant, I would inform you that an allowance pay, $500 per annum, is made to our clerks while serving the bank in Victoria, to compensate them for the additional cost of living here, as compared with Ontario and Quebec."

Now, when you take that into consideration, and also the fact that the post office officials who are in the pay of this Government at the present time in British Columbia, are allowed, I think, 25 per cent. extra for provisional allowances, and also taking into consideration the fact that the Government have acknowledged the necessity of this allowance by giving the gunners of "C" Battery an extra 25 per cent. advance on their wages—their wages reaching the enormous sum of 50 cents a day—I think that when you look at all these facts, you must agree that if it is necessary for the gunners to have that increase, it must be far more necessary for the officers to have an increase. I may say that the officers find that the heavy expense of living is a great hardship at the present time, owing to their not having proper quarters. It must be remembered that they are brought into contact with officers in the Imperial service, and they have to keep up a certain appearance; and I do not think any hon. gentleman in this House would for a moment expect an officer of Canada to behave otherwise, or live differently, from any officer of any other country. It is very difficult to-day for an officer, unless he has private means, to live on the pay they get from this Government, and the only way they can do it is to allow them free fuel, and free quarters and cheap soldier servants. An officer must come to grief unless he has either the one or the other; that is the only way he can get on. I do not ask you to take my unsupported opinion, but I will refer you to the report of the general officer commanding the militia in Canada, in which, reporting to the Minister of Militia, he says :

"I hope the barracks for this school will be finished next year—"
This is in regard to "C" Battery—

"—as they are at a great disadvantage at present. I still think that some addition should be granted to the allowances of this battery as a special case, the general cost of living in Victoria being greater than in the rest of the Dominion, the addition being in the shape of an allowance to cover increased cost of messing, and to be regulated by a sliding scale for the several ranks."

I am perfectly aware that the officers are allowed a certain small allowance at the present time for lodgings, but it is simply nothing for a place like Victoria. I may also state that some of the married sergeants, and some of the married men, are living in sheds that were put up on the fair grounds for the accommodation of the horses exhibited at the agricultural show. I have seen them on a rainy day nearly drowned out. I do not think this is the right way to treat our militiamen who are serving the country, and no wonder there is a good deal of grumbling and many desertions. I will not take up the time of the House in stating what buildings I think are necessary to be put up by the Minister of Militia, because I believe that after he has read the reports again he will do what is right. But I think he ought to give the men exactly what they are entitled to, nothing more and nothing less. I have asked him before, I am asking him now, and I shall continue to ask until he either gives me a very good reason why he should not give an extra allowance, or else yields to our reasonable request. Last summer I was very glad to see both the members from Hamilton visiting Victoria, and I hope they will endorse what I have said as to the barracks which they visited. I can state without hesitation that if the Minister will confer with the General commanding, or with any of the permanent heads, or others who ought to know, and who do know, he will find that they will all agree in saying that it is imperatively necessary that the barracks should be built for that battery, and that the battery should have some extra allowance.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend was rather severe, I think, when he stated in his opening remarks, that my promises were made to be broken.

Mr. PRIOR. Oh, no; I did not say that.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think the only difficulty between my hon. friend and myself is that he fancies, possibly, that I may take a little more time than I should in carrying out my promises, but it is certainly my intention to carry out all the promises I have made to the hon. gentleman. With reference to the barracks, it is true that the quarters of the battery at present are not what I should like them to be. As the hon. gentleman stated, I went to Victoria and selected a site, and I gave orders to commence building the huts. The Estimates which the Minister of Public Works will bring down will show that I never considered that what had been done was all that we intended to do so far as "C" Battery is concerned. The hon. gentleman speaks of the expense of living being far greater in Victoria than in Ontario or Quebec. Well, that is an evil which is being cured with the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, by means of which communication is easily had with the East. The difference in the expenses are being reduced every day. I think it would be a very invidious distinction to make any difference in the pay between the batteries in the Dominion of Canada. The principle upon which all the military forces are organized is that the same pay shall be given to all members of the force of equal grade. The hon. gentleman states that we have made a difference in so far as the rank and file are concerned. We made this difference, that if they carried out their term of engagement for three years they should receive at the end of the period a bonus of 10 cents per head per diem in addition to the ordinary payment, or 60 cents. At that time it was considered an inducement to get some members of the other batteries who enlisted in "C" Battery, to go out to British Columbia. I was very glad indeed to see how well "C" Battery was received by all the members of our military force in British Columbia. They were treated as comrades, and the good feeling shown them has increased ever since they have been serving with the ordinary militia in British Columbia. I think when the plan which is contemplated is carried out, the hon. gentleman will agree that we desire to treat "C" Battery in Victoria fully as well as any other battery in Canada. I know very well that they have to put up with very many inconveniences, but the new barracks will be so perfect that I hope it will make them forget the little inconveniences which they have suffered. I am sure the hon. gentleman has shown a great deal of interest, he has spoken to me time and again about the matter, and I think he will find that what I have promised to do for "C" Battery, will be fully carried out.

Mr. PRIOR. The Minister misunderstood me when he supposed that I said that his promises had been made to be broken. I said that his promises had been broken—there is a great deal of difference. In regard to the difference in the cost of living, I may state that although the hon. gentleman says that the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway brings down the prices, Mr. Smith, the Deputy Minister of Marine, told me, after he had taken a trip down the coast to San Francisco, that he had come to the conclusion that it was not a question of Victoria or Vancouver being the dearest places to live in, but it was a question of the whole Pacific coast. They are higher, and they will continue to be higher.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In regard to supplies, we find that the prices in the contracts for supplies in British Columbia are about the same as in other districts. I do not know whether the contractor was so anxious to supply "C" Battery that he reduced his prices, but the contracts are at about the same prices as in other districts.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that $28,000 were expended last year on "C" Battery. $300 is down for six months' ground rent. To whom was that paid? I was looking over the place when I visited there, and I thought it a very high rent.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not for ground rent. It is for the barracks which "C" Battery are now occupying.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). What amount was appropriated to "C" Battery last Session, and what amount has been expended to date?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. $50,000 for payment of staff, officers, men and maintenance, and for the maintenance of the battery.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Has the total sum been expended?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I presented a return in answer to a question put by the hon. member. I think about $7,000 has been expended upon the new building, and an appropriation will appear in the Estimates brought down by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). It is clear that the department had money with which it could have improved the condition of "C" Battery. There appears to be no reason why the work was not carried on more rapidly. Can the Minister give any reasonable explanation? If he cannot, the hon. member had just cause to complain that the men should be compelled to live in barracks such as he described. As to the question of expenses of living, that is a different question; but the House should know why "C" Battery had not the amount appropriated devoted to the purpose for which it was voted.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The sole reason why a balance remained was that we could not have commenced without a further appropriation to carry out the work of constructing the barracks to be put up for the force.

Mr. CHISHOLM. I endorse everything that has been said by my colleague from British Columbia (Mr. Prior), in regard to the higher cost of living in British Columbia. I desire to enquire whether it is the intention of the Government to do this year something towards fortifying the city of Vancouver, which is the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the port of landing of the Chinese steamers?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I can only answer the hon. gentleman, as I have already replied to another hon. gentleman, that the question of defence is now being studied by a commission that has been appointed, and the Government of Canada and the Imperial Government have been in communication in regard to the same question. I am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman any further information at present.

Additional Public Building, Ottawa..... $90,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What has been spent on the new public building on Wellington street to date, and what is it estimated to cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The total amount expended up to December last is $519,000; balance due on contract $35,000; balance on iron roof $10,000 and so on. When the building is completed it will have cost, including the cost of land, $714,000. The amount of $90,000 asked for now will nearly complete the expenditure and we will require probably only $6,000 more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As a matter of curiosity, how many clerks does the Minister intend to accommodate in that building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say as to the number of clerks, but I can mention the number of departments. The basement will contain the Archives and the clerks connected therewith; the first flat or ground floor will be occupied by the Department of the Interior; the next floor will be occupied by the Department of Agriculture and Indian Affairs, and the third floor will also be occupied by the Department of Agriculture, leaving probably a few rooms for future occupation. The attic will be occupied by the models and the officers connected therewith.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What was the original contract for this building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contract for the stonework, without the iron work, the roof, &c., was $295,000.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Did the Government find the stone?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; the contractor found the stone himself. A sample of stone was furnished to those who tendered and they were bound to find stone of equally good quality, to the satisfaction of the chief architect.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What are the extras up to the present time?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say that. Contracts have been given for iron joists and girders, the iron roofs, the iron staircase, and those are additional works.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Were they included in the original contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Have you no extras from the contractor?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course the contractor has a claim for some extras, but they are not settled until the final estimate is made by the chief architect.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). At what do you estimate the amount of those extras?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say. The contractor did not fulfil his contract within the specified time, and he gave as a reason that he was delayed sometime by the architects and by the other contractors, and we had to use the means named in the contract to put ourselves in a legal position towards him; that is to say we protested him. His claims will have to be viewed in the light of our protest, and at all events, if the question comes to a lawsuit there will be claims on both sides. I suppose the contractor will rely on the justice of the department without going to the courts.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Was it understood in the contract at what rate the Government would bring the stone for him over the Intercolonial Railway from New Brunswick to Ottawa?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There was no such condition made. As I explained last year the contractor made his arrangements with the Department of Railways as to the rate for carrying the stone from the quarry at New Brunswick to Ottawa. He also arranged the rate with the Grand Trunk Railway, and I believe also with the Canada Atlantic Railway authorities.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Did the Government expect to make any money by carrying that stone from New Brunswick at $1.50 per ton?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I don't know; I cannot say.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). This is in the Minister's department, and he ought to be able to give us some information about it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I suppose the Department of Railways, as in any other case where freight is offered, tried to make a profit out of it.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman knows that the department would not make much money by carrying it at $1.50 per ton.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps so.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Would it not be an important point in favor of the contractor, would not the Government, in fact, lose a large sum of money by carrying this stone on the Intercolonial Railway at that rate, and would not the contractor get the benefit of it? If the stone was carried here at a considerable loss to the revenues of the country ought not that be added to the cost of the building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The rate given to this contractor would be the same as is given to any other contractor. The contractor tried very hard to get stone up to the standard of the sample in the neighborhood of Ottawa, but the Chief Architect was not satisfied with the specimens produced, and he had to go elsewhere. The contractor thought that the Chief Architect was rather hard with him, and he asked that Mr. Page, the Chief Engineer of Canals, who has experience in this matter, should also examine the stone, but Mr. Page agreed with the opinion of the Chief Architect. Finally they came to the understanding that the New Brunswick stone was the proper stone, and I think the hon. gentleman will admit that apparently, at all events, it is a very fine stone.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I do not find any fault with the stone; on the contrary, I think it is a very handsome building material. But what I do find fault with is the Government giving out the contract, and then bringing up this stone at a heavy loss, because any contractor, if he had known at the commencement that stone was going to be brought up by the Government at $1.50 a ton, would doubtless have made a difference in his offer. I think the Minister must see that by such an operation the country is at a considerable loss and the contractors at a considerable gain. Whether that is what the hon. Minister intended or not, of course I cannot say, but it looks very like it on the face of it.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Was not the original tender for stone from a particular quarry in Albert County?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No. They knew from what district the stone came, but it was not stated that they should take it from one place or another. It was stated that the stone should be of as good a quality as the sample; and the contractor went all over the country trying to find as good a stone, so as to avoid the expense of haulage.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Was it to be as good a stone in quality as that obtained in Albert County?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It was to be equal to the stone shown. I do not know whether it was taken from one section or another. The tender was the lowest, and it was very low; and when the bargain with the contractor was made, the question was purely and simply whether that stone was equal to the sample, and when the chief architect agreed that it was so, the contractor went to make his arrangements with the railway company. He has always claimed that his contract was too low.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The sample stone, I believe, was from Albert County, but the stone itself came from Miramichi, did it not?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think so. It came from New Brunswick.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I want to know is, did the Intercolonial Railway undertake to bring that stone from Miramichi and deliver it at Ottawa at $1.50 per ton, or was the $1.50 paid simply for the distance it travelled on the Intercolonial Railway?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contract for carrying the stone was not made with my department; it was made with the authorities of the Intercolonial Railway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have a right to know, because it materially affects the question of the true cost of this building. If this stone was conveyed some 800 miles, 200 miles or thereabouts being over the Grand Trunk Railway, which I presume, charged a higher rate than the Intercolonial, and if it was brought here for a $1.50 per ton, that would amount to one-sixth of one cent per ton per mile. I do not suppose it was possible to convey it at that rate without loss to the country, and the amount of that loss should be added to the cost of the building. The hon. gentleman's department may not be responsible for it, but a sister department is. Has the hon. gentleman any idea of the quantity that was brought up?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; it was a large quantity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That information we should have when the Intercolonial Railway items come to be discussed. Will the Minister of Finance take a note of that?

Mr. FOSTER. I will take a note of it.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It is curious to find how little the Minister of Public Works knows on some occasions. Last year he told us that this stone was brought up at 12 cents a cubic foot, with something under 12 cubic feet to the ton, which would make the cost about $1.44 per ton. The Government must have lost heavily on every ton of stone they brought over the Intercolonial Railway, and the contractor must have gained correspondingly.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know whether, when the tender was asked for, the question of stone was settled, as well as the question of the rate to be charged for conveying it from the quarry to Ottawa. That would be a very important item. A man in tendering would probably estimate what it would cost to bring a certain stone like the sample to Ottawa from the quarries, and he would probably get a rate from the railways before putting in his tender; and if, after he made his contract, he got the stone carried over the Intercolonial Railway at a considerable loss to the railway, that would be so much to his credit. Was the question settled before or after the contract was made?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It was stated in the specifications that the successful tenderer would have to provide stone equal to the sample exhibited at the office—nothing else. It was not stated whether that stone should be from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario or any other Province or place. There could be nothing done about the rates for carrying the stone, because it was not known where the contractor would find a stone of the required quality. Therefore, no preference was given to any one, but everyone who tendered was on the same footing. The successful tenderer has complained repeatedly that the stone he had to furnish cost him delivered here much more than he ever thought it would cost. But he had to furnish a stone equal in quality to the stone given as sample.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot understand how any contractor could give an intelligent tender under those circumstances. He has a sample of the stone provided and is called on to tender, without having the slightest information as to where he is to get the stone. Certain information should be given to tenderers as to where they are to find the stone, so that they might enquire as to the cost of quarrying and freight. If he went into the question of freights on the Intercolonial he would find that he could not get a quotation of one-sixth of a cent per ton per mile, because the road cannot possibly carry freight at that price. I suppose this was a part of the great international trade which the hon. the Minister of Finance referred to in his Budget speech.

Amount required for construction of Port
Arthur Harbor and for Kaministiquia River $133,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the condition of the works now?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is a revote of $43,000 and a new vote of $90,000, and it is for the completion of the works in Port Arthur Harbor and of the improvements in Kaministiquia River. The amount due the 22nd November, 1888, on the breakwater was $30,000. The probable expense on the three sections was $30,000; during 1888-89 it was $15,000. Amount due 22nd of November for dredging the Kaministiquia River, $7,000. The total amount expended up to July, 1889, from November, 1888, was $54,580.

Kingston Graving Dock ..... $124,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What will be the total cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $350,000. Length, 280 feet; width at bottom, 70 feet; width at top, 72 feet; at the entrances, 48 feet. That will be sufficient for the largest vessels that ply on the lakes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I have no objection to the Government building a dry dock at Kingston, as they have the Military College there, and as it is represented by the leader of the Government, and as the majority is not very large, and as there are other considerations of the same kind, but I do object to the Government making this class of public works Government undertakings in all Provinces except Nova Scotia. There are none in New Brunswick yet, it is true, but the tide falls so much there that they do not require a graving dock. In British Columbia, the graving dock is a Government work. In Quebec, the Government have relieved the city from their liability, and now they propose to build a graving dock at Kingston, and all these are under control of the Government and are managed by them. It may be quite proper that these works should be of that character. I am not objecting to that so much, but what I do object to most strongly is that, while the Government are taking charge of these public works and assuming all responsibility in connection with their construction and maintenance, in Halifax we have to pay $10,000 a year in order to get a similar work. It is quite true that the Government are paying $10,000 a year for a certain time towards the construction of that dock in Halifax, but that is nothing at all compared to the amount they have assumed and are incurring in the city of Quebec, in the Province which the Minister of Public Works so ably represents in this House. I venture to think that, if the Minister of Public Works had come from Nova Scotia instead of from Quebec—and that might have been a very good thing for us for the time being—the work in Halifax would have been placed on the same footing as the works in other parts of the Dominion. When the late Finance Minister was in Halifax, during a discussion in relation to this dock, he gave his opinion that, if these works were assumed by the Government, if the Quebec dock was assumed by the Government, the Government would also assume the Halifax dock, and I believe a representation of that character was made by the late Finance Minister to the Government of the day. The Government however did not apparently favor the view which the then Minister of Finance entertained, and we then applied to the Government to loan us the money on the same terms on which they were loaning it to the city of Quebec. We expected at that time to pay the interest, which I believe the city of Quebec never did, so it would have been a safer investment; but, when the Government changed their policy and took the dock off the hands of the corporation of Quebec, I think they were bound in good faith to take the Halifax dock on the same terms and to relieve Halifax from the charge which I admit we voluntarily assumed in order to obtain the construction of the dock there. That being the case, I do not feel very kindly disposed to the expenditure of these sums for docks in other parts of the Dominion, unless the Minister can give us some indication that the Government will carry out their general policy and relieve us to that extent. It would only make the amount $20,000 a year, instead of $10,000 for the twenty years, and the Government would not have to assume the whole cost of the dock because that is being built by a company with English capital, but it would relieve the taxpayers of Halifax of the $10,000 they now contribute, and which I think the Government are bound to assume in order to place us in the same position in which they have placed the other parts of the Dominion. Last year I brought this matter to the notice of the Government, and I shall never rest content until the Government do justice to the city of Halifax in this respect. I think the hon. the Minister of Public Works, with that sense of right and justice and fair play which has characterized his public career—as some people say, and I have nothing to say to the contrary—will admit that the case I have made entitles us to be placed in the same position as Quebec, Kingston and British Columbia.

Mr. MULOCK. No doubt the case is very much as it has been placed before the House by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), but I feel that the case is not yet complete, and in order to lay the views of the people of Halifax properly before the Government, I think the statement should be supplemented by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny).

Mr. WELSH. I quite agree with the remarks of my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Jones) in reference to the Halifax graving dock. The people there have put their hands in their own pockets, and that is a thing which is not often done in the North-West, or in British Columbia, or on the St. Lawrence. The Government have had to assume the debt of the Harbor of Quebec, and the debt of Montreal, and the debt for the rivers. I hope the suggestion of my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) will be heard by my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny). I know he loves Halifax and loves fair play, and I have no doubt he will go in for letting Halifax take her share of the public plunder. Coming to Prince Edward Island we are coming nearer home. I assure the House that we are starved out in Prince Edward Island in the way of piers and harbors. We want a graving dock badly. Will you believe me? There was a dredge boat repaired in Charlottetown. She was on the north side of the Island and got damaged and she was ordered round, and there was no graving dock there, and, instead of taking her to Picton where there is a slip, they took her into Charlottetown and they built a slip for the purpose of repairing her there. Will you believe me when I say that the cost of repairing her hull was $12,600, while the contract for building that dredge new was only $7,000? There is a nut for my hon. friend to crack. You laugh, but the taxpayers will remember it. Let my hon. friend take a note of that if he pleases, and let him answer that, if he pleases also, when he has the opportunity. When we reach the harbors and rivers of Prince Edward Island, I shall have more to say. The Government of this Dominion are bound to take the harbors and piers of Prince Edward Island off the people, and they have not done so. What is the result? I see that the organ of the Government, or some other organ, has published a speech made by the Conservative Prime Minister of Prince Edward Island in which he says that the six members for the Island are blocks of wood and the Senators are no better, because we do not get the piers taken off by this Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Whenever a Senator dies, you will make a very good peer.

Mr. WELSH. I think you will have to come down to the Island again. You found it a very good place when you did come down, and if you will come down again, I will undertake that we will cure you again and will make it a very pleasant place for you, and when you come back, you will be gnashing your teeth and will say it is a shame that the Minister of Public Works does not do this. Now, you come down with me and I will be bound we will get some benefit out of you. I will be happy to do all I can to make your visit pleasant. I will take you around and show you your piers, and you will come back gnashing your teeth, and your piers, too; and you will be ashamed the moment you stand up in the House and utter a word. I am bound to say that you will come back a wiser man, if you do not come back a better man, but I will guarantee that you will enjoy yourself. Now, the Minister of Public Works is laughing, I hope he is taking note of that dredge, because if he don't, we will dredge him as sure as he is a living man. Will you believe me, Sir, last summer the people came to me with long faces, and I said: "What do you want?" "Well," they said: "We cannot ship our potatoes, there is no wharf, and we don't know what to do;" and I had to pull $5 out of my pocket to help put the Government piers in proper order. Why, Sir, my pay here would not permit me to do that. There are a great many more things that I could tell you, but I do not feel inclined to now. When the time comes, I will dredge the Minister of Public Works a little more.

Mr. KENNY. It seems that the hon. gentlemen opposite take more interest in the junior member for Halifax than I ever gave them credit for doing. I regret that I did not hear all the remarks that fell from my hon. colleague. I have no doubt that he said something against the Government, I am quite sure he did, and I am quite sure that was the prime object of his speech. It seems that the subject under discussion is the expenditure on the Kingston Graving Dock, and that my hon. friend and colleague took that opportunity of reminding the Minister of Public Works that we are building a graving dock in Halifax, and that the city of Halifax has contributed from its own funds a portion of the money necessary to build that very much needed work in order to complete the winter port of the Dominion. We all know that the Dominion Government contributes so much by statute towards the construction of these graving docks, and that any community, or any company, or any association, requiring additional aid must supplement it themselves. In this instance the dock is completed from a fund derived from subsidies to which the Imperial Government, and the Dominion Government, and the city of Halifax contribute; and I suppose that if we called on the Dominion Government for a portion of the contribution, we shall also have to call upon the Imperial Government. So far as the action of this Government is concerned, all that Halifax asks is that she shall be treated in the same way, and on the same terms as other places are treated. We ask no favor, but we ask fair play.

Mr. BARRON. I wish to draw the attention of the Minister to the circumstance that while he is repairing the dam at Bobcaygeon at a cost of some $15,000, we want a dock there for the repair of steamboats, and while this work is going on it would be a good opportunity for building this dock. It can be done by lengthening the piers, there being a natural bottom. It can be done at an expense of one or two thousand. If it is not done by the Government it must be done by a company to which I belong, and, of course, that company would have to ask the other boat owners to pay whenever they want to have their steamboats repaired. Now is a good opportunity to do this work at a very little expense, and as it is very necessary, I think it should be done at once.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The matter mentioned by the hon. gentleman is not under my control. I think that when the item for railways and canals comes up, he will find that the Government has not lost sight of that matter.

Cape Tormentine Harbor, N.B. .... $68,000

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is a revote. The total cost, when the work is completed, will be $197,000. This vote is for carrying on the harbor works during the fiscal year, and to afford wharf accommodation at Cape Tormentine in connection with the terminus of the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway. It will permit this route being utilised as a means of communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I see that the Minister in his report mentions the fact that the first contractors have failed to prosecute the work, that fresh tenders were called for, and a contract had been entered into for the completion of the work. Perhaps he would tell us what the first contract was, and what the second contract is?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contractors were Strong & Perkins, and the amount of their contract was $131,869. The new contractor is Edward Murphy, and the amount of the contract is $169,907 for the same work.

Mr. WELSH. I have got a little to say about this harbor. The Almighty never intended that a harbor should be built there, or he would have made one. Now, I would like to know from the Minister of Public Works who asked for the pier. No one in Prince Edward Island. I want to tell him that the Almighty has made some very fine harbors in both Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. There is the harbor of Pugwash, represented by my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey). There is also the harbor of Shediac, New Brunswick, right opposite Summerside, a capital harbor. There is a narrow neck of land which, for winter crossing, is very good when they utilise it. This harbor would be for about three months in solid ice, and therefore it would be of no use in the winter. This vote has been here for two or three years, and every contractor has failed in carrying out his contract, and the harbor has not been built. If it goes on in this way, it won't be built for some time, and the public money will be expended. Well, it will accommodate the railway of my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood). It may do some good, I am not going to cry down the work of my hon. friend from Westmoreland. He has changed the title of that railway, and he has got Prince Edward Island into the name of his railway. It was called the Cape Tormentine Railway, but he has applied for a new charter, and now he calls it the Prince Edward Island Railway. I have brought this harbor up ever since I came to this House; money has been voted for it, but the work has not been completed, and it has been a failure. I ask this Committee, what is the good of having this harbor completed, unless there is a proper connection made? The next vote should be to form a harbor at Cape Traverse. They have a wharf there now, but nothing can go to it.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). This is for a wharf.

Mr. WELSH. You know nothing about it. There is not a man who knows more about where it should be built than I do, and I say they are building it in the right place. If the Minister of Public Works is in earnest about this matter and wants to complete the scheme, why does he not construct a harbor opposite to where the connection has to be made? Why does he not have a vote passed for a harbor opposite Cape Tormentine, where there could be a summer route and a ferry carrying mails and passengers a distance of eight or nine miles from Cape Tormentine to Cape Traverse? It is proposed to expend money for a harbor on the New Brunswick side, but nothing is given for a harbor on the Island. And yet it is made to appear as if it was done for the benefit of the Island. The Government know well that if they intend to carry out this scheme they should insert $100,000 or $150,000 in the Estimates to build a harbor opposite the railway at the connection with the Island. If any hon. gentleman will look at the map they will see that at Tormentine there will be a very safe and good harbor, with from twelve to thirteen feet of water when completed; but what good will it be unless there is one built opposite? Prince Edward Island never asked for this harbor to be built. If I ask for $500 or $1,000 to improve the harbors of Prince Edward Island it is refused or a decision is postponed. I can prove it and I will prove it by-and-by. And yet I have presented prayers and petitions from the people. I say to the Minister that if his prayers when he goes to bed at night are not attended to better than are the prayers of the people addressed to him he will get drilled by-and-by, and will have to suffer. I present petitions from the people, and I come back next Session and find they have not been attended to. I am, however, going right along with this matter until the Government come down with a firm platform, and see that the public works in Prince Edwards Island are put in as good order as are the works at Three Rivers and the works along the St. Lawrence. I will keep on until I get every pier in Prince Edward Island in a good state of repair, and every harbor and breakwater attended to by those valuable engineers that the Minister talks about. He told us that he had valuable engineers in his office and that one of them had had an offer from England, and so he was obliged to pay more money and asked an increased vote. I wish some one would offer the hon. gentleman something and let him take his engineers away, and let us have young men who will look after the works and put our harbors and wharves in proper order. There never were public works in such a state on God's earth as are the public works in Prince Edward Island, and I hold the Minister of Public Works responsible; and if he or any member of the Government will come down and they do not go away satisfied that such is the case, I will eat every one of them. I guarantee that any hon. gentleman belonging to the Government who sees our public works will be ashamed to hold up his head and face to the people in any part of the Dominion. I will stake anything on the truth of what I am saying. Hon. gentlemen wonder as to the position taken by Prince Edward Island members. What should they do? Should they kiss the hand that smites them? The Government are killing their own interests in the Island, for it has been a Conservative Province and it has always sent a fair share of supporters to the Government, and I wish I was supporting the Government to-day; but I can tell them, they will never get supporters from the Island so long as our public works are attended to in the present fashion. I will give some proof. When I first sat in this House, I did not like to rise and address it. But I went and quietly asked the Minister Public of Works whether he would prefer my pointing out to him the wants of the people quietly or stating them on the floor of the House. He said he would much prefer that I should make my wants known to him. I spoke to the Minister of Public Works and said that such and such wharfs wanted repairing. He took a note of them and said he would attend to them. I said Pinette River required to be attended to, and that China Point wharf was falling down. He said: I will attend to them. I went home. I found that the first work was put in a fair state of repair, but the wharf at China Point, which was much worse was not attended to. The Conservatives wanted to complain. I said: No; the Minister no doubt overlooked the matter. The Conservatives did not write against him because I would not let them. When I came up last year there was an amount placed in the Estimates for China Point Wharf quite insufficient to do the work. $3,000 were placed in the Supplementary Estimates, and will the House believe it that wharf has fallen into the river, and the people have had to travel 7 or 8 miles round in order to ship their freight. I had a long interview with the Minister about other matters, including the New London Breakwater, and I spent several hours with him and one of his valuable engineers, and it was very satisfactory as far as the discussion went. The Minister then agreed that the matter should be attended to. I thought next day I would write him a note and get a reply so as to have something I received the following reply:—

“OTTAWA, 20th April, 1888.

“DEAR MR. WELSH.—In answer to your letter of yesterday, I want to tell you that the matter of the New London Breakwater has been referred to Mr. Perley for consideration and report, and that I will have the harbors of Pinette and Wood Island examined at the proper season this year.

“Yours truly,

“H. LANGEVIN.”

This letter was dated the 20th April, 1888. Will you be kind enough to answer me, Mr. Chairman, what year that was? That was the 20th April, 1888, and would you believe me, that during the year 1888 there never was anything of the kind done.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Impossible!

Mr. WELSH. It is a fact, and as true as you are sitting there.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WELSH. It is no laughing matter at all for the members, and we will have a little talk about it. I felt aggrieved about this and I went to the Minister, and what do you think was the answer I got from him? He said “Poo-oo-oo-oo, that is for next year, I meant the financial year of 1889.” I wrote those words of his down in the presence of Mr. Perley, and they are as follows: “Sir Hector Langevin said that that promise meant the 1st of July, 1889.” Would any hon. gentleman believe that? Is there an hon. gentleman on the floor of this House who would justify such an answer as that? Let me hear of him if there is. There is not one. I dare any hon. gentleman to get up, and if he does, I will send him the letter across the floor and let him answer it. Is this the proper way to treat the representatives of the people when they come here attempting to do their duty? I want to know from the hon. the Minister of Public Works or from the leader of the Government, what are we to do if a gentleman does not keep his word and his bond. Here is the bond of the hon. gentleman, and what has been the result to the New London Breakwater? I asked the Minister the other day, and he could not answer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. WELSH. It is not carried yet. I had a friend last year and he was the Minister of Marine then, and I could get a shot at him but now he is the Minister of Finance and he is out of my reach, but he holds the purse and he will have to open it, for I hope my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works will come down in the Supplementary Estimates with a sum sufficient to put all those Prince Edward Island works in proper order. I want my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works to get up on the floor of the House and give me an assurance as one of the representatives of the people of Queen's County that the harbors and the breakwaters of Prince Edward Island shall be thoroughly examined and the duty of the Government performed to the fullest extent in putting those works in proper repair. I ask this as a representative of the people, for if I had to go on a personal matter I would turn to my friend the Minister of Finance. I thought he gave us a hint last year that there was something going to be done in the way of matrimony. He told us in the Budget speech too that he did not drink rum, or gin, or use tobacco, but he said the population was going to increase, and if the population does increase it will not be in a legitimate way if he keeps on in the way he is now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WELSH. Order, it is quite right to have order. Before I leave this subject I may say that I looked in the Hansard, and I found that when we were discussing that old boat the Northern Light that the First Minister got tired of the Northern Light and he said: "If the hon gentleman will keep quiet we will make him a present of the Northern Light." Those were the words of my hon. friend as they appear in Hansard, and I suppose when he said "we" he meant the Government. Now, that offer mollified my feelings a good deal, and as you offered me the boat I think I will take it. I will accept it in the same spirit that you offered it, but I hope it won't be an Indian gift—that you will want to take it back again. You have got this white elephant of a Northern Light on your hands, and wouldn't you be glad to get rid of her. I hope that the Minister of Public Works will rise on the floor of this House and state that those public works in Prince Edward Island belonging to this great Dominion of Canada—which will only cost a trifling sum of money—will be put in a proper state of repair. Prince Edward Island is an Island—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WELSH. It is surrounded by water, and it has got some very fine harbors and more harbors in proportion to its population and extent than almost any other Province of the Dominion. As I said before, in some of my former speeches, we are shut out from the rest of the world for five months of the year, and it is only during the fall and spring that our farmers can ship their produce, so that we require the Government to give us every facility that our farmers may get their produce shipped to market. I hope and trust that the Minister of Public Works and the Government will see that this thing is attended to. On the 29th of July, when I found that these promises of the Minister of Public Works were not being carried out, I wrote him a letter and here is the answer:

"SIR,—I am directed by the Minister to acknowledge the receipt of your communication, dated the 29th ult., calling attention to surveys required at Pinette and Wool Islands Harbors and to repairs at China Point and Halliday's Wharves and asking that the above repairs be attended to.

"A. GOBEL."

I submit now that I have satisfied every hon. member of this House that I have not only made a statement, but that I have proved that statement, and I challenge any hon. gentleman on the floor of this House, or on the floor of any other house—

Mr. WELSH.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WELSH. It is all right; you may laugh. If your constituents were treated the way our constituents are treated you would not laugh, and if you did laugh they would not send you back here to laugh any more. I am going to wait till my friend the Minister of Public Works gives me an answer.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I may say that I think the House will pretty well understand that this appropriation of $190,000 for this pier will go a long way to account for the roseate views entertained by the member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) respecting the condition of affairs in the Maritime Provinces just now, and also to account for the fact that that hon. gentleman's views differed so much from the views of gentlemen who spoke on the same subject.

Mr. WELSH. Just let me say that I find a paper here which refers to this matter. There is a letter in the Examiner as follows:—

"CHINA POINT WHARF.

"SIR,—There appeared in the Examiner of the 1st instant, a paragraph referring to a report of a sum money being granted for the pier at China Point, which was not expended. It is so—but on Mr. Welsh's statement that Sir Hector Langevin promised him to have $3,000 added to the appropriation for China Point pier. Mr. Welsh also stated in 1887, that there was $300 for the repairs to China Point pier, and it was expended at Pinette. If these reports are untrue, they do not lie on the people of

"CHINA POINT.

"China Point, March 6, 1889."

It is a most extraordinary thing that something is not done here, and I wonder at it because if there is one spot in Queen's County which has a majority of supporters of the Government it is China Point. Whoever wrote that letter is an honest man, because he wrote that letter, no doubt, from the statement I made to him, and whatever statement I made to him is a true statement, as far as I am concerned.

Public Buildings, Nova Scotia. .... $13,950

Mr. EISENHAUER. I would ask the Minister of Public Works on what principle the Government proceed to erect custom houses and post offices in different localities in the Dominion, and whether they will proceed on an estimate of population or revenue, or on what other principle? I find in the county which I represent there were $15,000 collected in the shape of revenue last year at a cost of collection of about $3,000. At Annapolis only $13,822 was collected at a cost of $2,157, leaving the net revenue $11,635. At Baddeck, which has a public building, only $1,460 was collected at a cost of $1,896, leaving a loss to the Dominion of $436. In Antigonish $13,751 was collected, and the cost of collecting it was $1,528, leaving the net revenue about the same as that of Lunenburg. Then, when we come to the amount received from postal revenue, the receipts at Antigonish were $1,120, at Annapolis $2,026; and I find by returns that $1,675 was collected at Lunenburg, from the 1st of January, 1888, to the 30th June, 1888. I do not know what the total would be for the full year, probably more than was collected at Annapolis. As the hon. gentleman well knows, the Government purchased a site for a post office in the town of Lunenburg in 1826, and they did nothing more, while in 1887 they proceeded to erect a post office in the town of Annapolis, for which $10,000 was voted, and for which there is now $10,000 more. I would like to know on what principle the Government proceed in erecting public buildings—whether it is altogether on political favoritism, or is the population or the amount of revenue taken into account?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Post offices and other public buildings are erected in accordance with representations made to the Government. If they are informed that in a certain town or city the public service requires a custom house or post office, the matter is investigated. It is done not merely on account of the population of the place or on account of the revenue derived, but the general importance of the place and all these things combined are taken into consideration. There may be some public buildings erected in places where the population is smaller than other places which do not get them; but we have tried to erect these buildings as they appeared to us to be necessary, and when the condition of the revenues of the country enabled us to do so. Sometimes the post office, the custom house, the inland revenue office, and other offices are scattered in a town, and it is represented to us that the public service is suffering on that account, and that if there was one public building the work would be better attended to and the cost would be less than the rents paid for the different buildings, and there would be less danger from fire and from burglars. Altogether, we think we have done what is required from us, and Parliament seems to have agreed with us in that respect. The hon. gentleman asks just now whether these works are done by favoritism. Of course not.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Oh, no.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am very glad to see that my hon. friend agrees with me. For example, last Session there was a vote for a public building at St. Hyacinthe for a post office, custom house, &c.; and that city is represented by an hon. member sitting on the other side of the House. We have asked for another vote this year for that work, and will have to do that until it is completed. The same thing I think was done at Laprairie, which is represented by an hon. member who, unfortunately, does not support us. With regard to the items included in this vote, there is a post office and custom house at Annapolis. The total cost of the building will probably be about $24,500, and another vote of $6,500 will be required next year to complete it. The sum for Halifax Dominion buildings is for repairs; it is the ordinary vote required for the large cities. For the Sydney post office and custom house we have a revote of $3,000 and a new vote of $7,000. That will not finish the building, which will cost about $26,000 altogether. We have already taken, including this vote, about $17,000, so that we shall require about $9,000 to finish it.

Mr. EISENHAUER. The hon. Minister has stated that the Government act on the best information they can get with regard to the erection of public buildings. I would like him to tell me whether Annapolis is a more important town than Lunenburg? In erecting a building at Annapolis, is he acting on the information of the member for the county, or has he sought information for himself? Now, I think the Government must have been convinced of the necessity of a public building for the town of Lunenburg when they went so far as to purchase a site; and I do not think it can be for want of information that they have failed to do anything further. I cannot help thinking it is for no other than a political reason, because when the county ceased to send a supporter of the Government here, they stopped proceedings. I think that is very wrong. I suppose it is useless for me to bring this matter up. I have brought it up in two Sessions; but I have been sent here to do my duty, and I do not want the blame to be put on my shoulders. I do hope the hon. Minister will make some provision in the Supplementary Estimates for this work. The trade of the town of Lunenburg is increasing very rapidly and it is more necessary to have a Custom house there than it is to have one in the town of Annapolis. As far as the business connected with Customs is concerned Lunenburg does five times as much as Annapolis.

Mr. FLYNN. I would call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to the fact that some years ago the necessity of erecting a public building in the town of Arichat was brought to his notice, and a correspondence took place between parties there and the Government, the result being the purchase of property as a site for the erection of a public building. Tenders were called for, but the building has never been erected. There are many towns less in size and less entitled to buildings than the town of Arichat, which have been given public buildings. I am not claiming that the town is entitled to a custom house, but I ask the hon. gentleman why, after he had recognised the fact that it was, and had bought the ground for $1,000—which to-day he could not get $200 for—the building was never erected. There was a lengthy correspondence on the subject; a survey was made by an officer of the Public Works Department, and a great deal of expense incurred independently of the cost of the site, and no building erected. The town of Baddeck which is not so important a town as Arichat has been more favored in this respect. I do not regret that Baddeck has a post office, but I maintain that we are entitled to one, especially after the preliminary steps the Government have taken with a view of going on with the work.

Mr. KIRK. As this appears to be the time to represent our wants with regard to public buildings, it is my duty to draw attention of the Government to the claims of Guysborough. The hon. the Minister of Public Works has said that he does not act partially, and he has given one instance in which he erected a post office in a town represented by an opponent. That occurred in Quebec, but so far as Nova Scotia is concerned not a county represented by a Liberal has a public building at all. In the County of Cape Breton no less than two custom houses have been erected. I suppose that is because the county is represented by two members supporting the Government. In every county in Nova Scotia represented by members supporting the Government, there are public buildings. The hon. gentleman says he erects public buildings in those towns where it costs less to erect them than to pay rent, but in Baddeck I would ask him if it does not cost more for interest than the amount of rent which the Government had to pay for the buildings they rented. The hon. gentleman has said that before buildings can be erected in any place it is necessary that application should be made for their erection. Well, Guysborough has made application, but nothing has yet been done, and the Minister has not thought proper even to make any enquiry. I take it for granted, therefore, that nothing will be done. I take it for granted that not one dollar will be spent in the County of Guysborough for public buildings. Well, I have only to say that if the Government think they will force by such means as this the people of Guysborough to support them they will find the people are not made of stuff of that kind. There is no reason why any county, no matter whether represented by a supporter of the Government or the Opposition, should be treated as Guysborough has been.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I had a motion for a return of the various sums which had been expended on the different public works in the Dominion. The hon. gentleman has not brought it down yet. I am aware that it would take some time in preparation.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is a long return, but I will try to bring it down early next week. My hon. friend will remember that there were three returns asked for on the same subject. However, I will press it on my department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If it would shorten the return I would be content to have it for the last ten years instead of the last twenty years.

Public Works, New Brunswick .....$ 15,050

Mr. FLYNN. I think the question which I put in regard to the public buildings at Arichat should be answered. It is not treating the House or myself with that courtesy one would expect when no answer is made. I stated that $1,000 had been spent for a site, that tenders were invited for the construction of a public work, but that no contract was awarded and no building was erected. There is a heap of ruins there which is known as the Government property. I think the hon. gentleman should state the reason why the site was purchased, why the tenders were invited, and why the buildings were not erected. If we come here as the representatives of the people, we may not receive the public money, we may not get our share of what we are entitled to, but I think, at all events, we are entitled to common courtesy, and, when a fair case is put before the House, such as I think I have put, the Minister of Public Works, who has the reputation of being, and I believe is generally, a very courteous gentleman in administering his department, has not come up to that character in omitting to make any answer. I demand it as my right that he should answer my questions, so that I may be in a position, when I am questioned in regard to it by my constituents, to state the reason which he or the Government give.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is right in saying that he is entitled to an answer, and that answer I intended to give him, but I cannot give it now, because the word "Ariehat" is not in these Estimates or in those of the previous year.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That is what he is complaining of.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I could not give the hon. gentleman an answer unless I had known beforehand that he was going to mention the subject, but I have made a note of it and will enquire into the matter.

Mr. FLYNN. That is very satisfactory.

Mr. KIRK. As far as it goes.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What will be the total cost of the Dalhousie post office?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It may probably cost $23,500, or it may be only $22,000. I cannot say exactly.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Is it both post office and custom house?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. ELLIS. It seems to me to be absurd for the Government to put up stone buildings in these scattered places where there is not another stone or brick building. A post office and custom house could be hired at Dalhousie for $100 or $150 a year, and yet the Department of Public Works put up in these little villages large stone buildings which completely dwarf the whole town, because they are the only buildings which look like anything. It may be a good example to the people to improve their style of building. I suppose the hon. gentleman has been at Dalhousie, where many people go now in the summer, and certainly, if he owned the town, he would not certainly propose to put up such a building as that. The building at Newcastle also is quite out of keeping with the place. A solid brick building would answer all the purposes and would be half as expensive.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The fact that other buildings in a town are erected of wood would be a sufficient reason for my department or the Government to erect a substantial building, though without any architectural pretensions, in stone or brick, because there would otherwise be greater danger of the destruction of the building by fire when the other buildings were of wood. Besides, as the hon. gentleman says, perhaps it is not a bad thing to give new ideas to the residents of a place of that kind, which is growing, to induce them to build something more substantial. I believe that, if we erect Government buildings, they should be substantial, though without any great architectural pretensions.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). If, as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) states, a building could be rented for $100 a year, it seems a very unbusinesslike undertaking to spend $26,000 to put up a stone building there. The interest of the insurance on such a building would be quite a sum, and, if a building can be rented, what is the use of spending so much money as this?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What has the Woodstock post office cost altogether?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. About $46,000. In 1888 and this year we have voted $3,000. The remainder was voted in previous years.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Has the Bathurst post office been finished?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; it has been completed.

Public Buildings, Quebec..... $69,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman keep the Hull post office insured?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, it is not insured; but I took care to make it as fireproof as possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total cost of the Joliette post office?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The probable cost will be $21,000 or $22,000.

Mr. LAURIER. The population is 5,000.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is a growing place.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, $20,000. This has been in our Public Accounts for a long time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The works intended for the completion of the penitentiary are not finished. A new wing is necessary, and although a large portion of the material is upon the ground, it was thought better this year not to proceed with it, but to construct what is more urgently required—a boundary wall.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was supposed to have been built, I thought, last year; at any rate, it has been figuring in our Estimates for a long time.

Public Buildings, Ontario..... $184,650

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Cayuga post office, $4,500—what is the total cost here?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The total probable cost is $15,500. That includes furniture and heating.

Mr. BARRON. I do not see anything here in regard to the Peterborough post office.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The word Peterborough is not here, but it is in the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Government Printing Bureau $33,000—What is the sum total for this?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The total probable cost of the building is $222,640. This is built on our own ground.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the necessity of building a post office in the town of Blenheim, in the County of Kent. I had the honor to present to the Government a largely signed petition from the municipal council of the town, and a large number of business men. I think when post offices are being built in little villages like Dalhousie, that a flourishing town like Blenheim ought not to be without a suitable post office, especially as the present post office is altogether inadequate for the business that is done in that town. The petition I presented set forth that the town proposed to build a large public building, and they offered to the Government to furnish a suitable building, to heat it, and to take care of it, for a nominal rent of $300 a year. That would be an excellent bargain for the Government to make. The Government will be obliged to put up a building in that town some time, and I know they cannot build it and heat it for anything like that sum. I would like to know from the Minister what he thinks of that proposition. The petition was presented to himself, and also to the Postmaster General and the First Minister.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot give an answer now, but I will take a note of the statement and will discuss it with the Postmaster General.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For what is this vote of $20,000 at the Kingston Penitentiary required?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount required will be $30,000, but we now ask for $20,000 to carry out certain works, including a high service water tower with a special supply pipe from Lake Ontario, $4,000; alterations and repairs, covering the roof of the dining hall, reflooring dormitories, &c., $19,000, and then there are contingencies.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Taking into account the appropriation for the current year and this $30,000, the hon. gentleman is going to expend nearly $50,000 for works of which the high service water tower is the only new structure. It seems a very large sum to spend on what are practically repairs.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am speaking of the work to be done next year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On what was the money expended? because I am not aware that there have been any new works of importance.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I gave the statement last year as to the objects on which the money would be expended, and I have not the statement now.

Mr. BARRON. What is expected to be the total cost of the post office at Lindsay?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. About $28,000.

Mr. BARRON. What was the amount of the accepted tender?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contract was for $16,497, then there were additional works, furniture, painting, fittings, heating, fences, foot-paths, &c.

Mr. BARRON. Is the contractor for the building the same as the contractor for the additional part of the building that has to be done?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If fittings are required in a new building, and the contractor has been a good contractor, the work is done by him on a tender examined by the Chief Engineer, and if the tender is too high the Chief Engineer reduces it to the proper sum. The amount is generally $2,000 or $3,000, and the contractor has the benefit of having the workmen at hand.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand the hon. Minister thinks that by next week he will be able to give the information moved for. I asked that because otherwise there might be a good deal more discussion in regard to many of the votes we are now passing; but if the hon. gentleman will agree to have it brought down next week, we will let them pass without further discussion at the moment.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have taken a note of it. I will see my officers to-morrow specially so as to have it ready next week.

Public Buildings, N.W.T. .... $47,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought a residence had been provided at Regina long ago.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The residence at Regina is a very old building, it being a portable building. It costs a great deal to maintain, the building being very cold. A new one is required.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much will it cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. About $50,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman did not state what the total cost of those four buildings were in Moose Jaw, Wolseley, Maple Creek and Medicine Hat. Does the hon. gentleman intend to put substantial buildings there, or are they wooden buildings which I suppose will share the fate of the Governor's residence at Regina, and be found to be insufficient or too cold, as I dare say they would be in that country.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Those will be frame buildings. We think it not advisable to build more substantial buildings there at present, because, in a few years, it may be that the centre would be changed to some other point and the buildings would become useless.

Arisaig Pier ..... $6,000

Mr. KIRK. How much did the new pier at Arisaig cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There has been $14,460 expended. We ask $6,000 now, and we will require $2,000 more next year, making $22,000 altogether.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that for a new pier or is it to rebuild an old one?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is for the renewal and extension of the pier, and for some dredging that is required. The pier is to be used for fishing boats, and the little harbor that will be constituted by the dredging will accommodate small vessels as well as the steamer that runs along that coast.

East River of Pictou ..... $3,500

Mr. JONES (Halifax). From the best information I have been able to obtain I learn that this money seems to be expended for some purpose not certainly in the public interest. Near where this river terminates the Government have for some purpose, not very clear, undertaken to clear out the centre of the river, which is dry at certain times of the year. I have my information from Mr. Carmichael, who was here the other day. I mention his name; and he told me that the money expended on this was utterly thrown away. I know nothing about it personally, except that I derived that information from a man of the high standing of Mr. Carmichael.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Pictou). The hon. gentleman's information is entirely astray. I know the locality very well, and I believe that the money was well expended in clearing those rocks in order to allow the descent of timber down the stream.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). No logs come down there now.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Pictou). There have been logs coming down there for a great many years, and some came last summer.

Mr. KIRK. I have not the slightest doubt that the rocks are being taken away, not in the public interest, but to get votes for the Government. I know the locality, and I am quite positive that that money, if expended, will not be in the public interest. Logs and timber have been driven down that river since Pictou was settled, and it is only since the system was adopted of spending money to obtain votes that any one ever thought of the necessity of clearing the rocks to let the timber come down. I want to know why this Government should spend money on clearing the rocks out of a river, even though it should be necessary. I do not see that that is the business of this Government to have anything to do with streams that are not navigable, but I have been trying for years to get a few dollars expended to clean out a river in order to let fish come up, and I could not. There has been money expended in my county for a similar purpose, and it was just about as much needed as it is in Pictou County. I did not hesitate to condemn the expenditure of $2,000 in my county at the time of an election when it was being expended, when I was looking for votes, and among the people who were working the money, and I condemn it now. It is not for the purpose for which the people's money should be expended at all. This Government have the fisheries under their control, and they have assumed the right, I believe very properly, to clean out streams where it was necessary to clean them out, so as to enable the fish to get to their spawning grounds. I have been applying to this Government for a few hundred dollars to clean out a very important stream, but not a dollar is granted; and the people were told distinctly, by an officer of the Government, that they could not get any money until they sent a supporter of the Government to Parliament, as that was the principle on which the money was granted. These Estimates are bristling with votes of that kind, for corrupt purposes, placed there for no other purpose than to influence votes; and I do not hesitate to say that the $500 voted here to clean out the East River of Pictou, is for that purpose and no other. Although much larger drives of logs have gone down that stream in the past than will ever go down again, there was no necessity of cleaning it out until last year, when it was necessary to secure votes for the Government. I say it is a scandalous waste of money, and is granted for corrupt purposes.

Mr. TUPPER. I must say one word on this small vote for a very necessary purpose. It seems to me an extraordinary thing that the hon. gentlemen, who are dissatisfied because the Government have not come down and asked Parliament to appropriate all the money that they think their own particular counties in Nova Scotia require, should carp and criticise the Government for voting money in other districts where it is needed. The hon. gentleman, I am quite satisfied, after hearing him in the last few minutes, has not the slightest knowledge of the subject on which he is speaking.

Mr. KIRK: I know more about it than you do, although you represent the county.

Mr. TUPPER. I venture to say that this vote is taken largely at the request of people who differ from myself in politics, and who live on East River. As the hon. gentleman has said, logs are driven down here; I believe four large rafts went down this year, but the driving is obstructed by the rocks, and on this Parliament devolves the duty of removing those obstructions. Why did not the hon. gentleman find fault with the Government in the past for removing obstructions in large rivers in other parts of the country? How is it that he has to fall foul of this small river in his own Province, and make statements which I beg to assure the House most sincerely are not founded on facts. I have been in that county a good deal, and I know its needs, and the representations of the people. The hon. member points out that Mr. Carmichael, a former representative of this county, had given his opinion that this expenditure was not necessary. Mr. Carmichael has been told in the past that he did not understand the wants of the people sufficiently to induce them to send him to this House; he was not able to present their claims properly to Parliament, and he was elected long ago to remain at home; and out of a feeling, perhaps, of jealousy, he has been induced to make those statements, although this expenditure is a direct advantage to the town of New Glasgow, where he lives; and I am amazed that any man's political feelings could carry him so far as to lead him to challenge an expenditure of this kind made at the request of the people of the locality. I would like to know where the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Kirk) got his knowledge that these rocks do not impede the rafts coming down that river, because it would be a curious piece of intelligence to give to the people who live on both side of it.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The vote should be understood as being, not for the accommodation of the logs, but a little grant for log-rolling. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken knows very well that before he was in the County of Pictou, ages ago, when ship-building was going on there, timber and logs came down that river without let or hindrance, and it is only of late years, when there is no ship-building going on, and when no logs to any extent are coming down, that we are asked to vote, last year $700, and this year $500, $1,200 in all, that is, $250 apiece for each of the four rafts which came down the river last year. Perhaps we may have another appropriation next year. I believe that this House and the people of Pictou would take the opinion of the gentleman I have named far before the opinion of the Minister of Marine, who, although he represents Pictou, can know very little of a practical subject such as this; and I have the assurance of a man who does represent the business of Pictou that this is an unnecessary appropriation. The hon. gentleman says Mr. Carmichael was elected to stay at home—why? Because he would not log-roll in this way; he would not come to Parliament and ask for money for such an improper purpose. If he had descended to make use of the means which the hon. gentleman and those who preceded him made use of to obtain grants of money for that county from one end to the other, or on such representations as those exposed by the hon. member for Queen's, the other night, Mr. Carmichael might have represented Pictou to-day; but he was not the man to do it, and I suppose the hon. gentleman thinks he can hold Pictou by these paltry little grants. But it is the principle involved in this matter which we complain of; and if we allow this sum to go to-night, we shall have another vote next year for some other purpose—for a political purpose, without any advantage to the County of Pictou, and wasting public money.

Mr. TUPPER. I do not wish to be tried by the principle the hon. gentleman seems to entertain in connection with the expenditure of public money. I did not go to the people on the East River of Pictou and tell them that if they would send me to Parliament I would obtain a grant for the removal of these rocks, but the hon. gentleman thinks I must have; and, no doubt, because in the days when his party was in power he went to the people of Halifax and told them that if they would send him to Ottawa he would ask for a sufficient sum to extend the Intercolonial Railway to West's Wharf, at the cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars, therefore the hon. gentleman thinks I must have pursued the same tactics. This was not a question before the people at the elections in that county. The people of Pictou are not so low and so corrupt that they are to be controlled and influenced by these votes. We were told to-night several times that the people of Guysborough and of Lunenburg, and a portion of the people of Halifax are not in the slightest degree influenced by the amounts that the Government spends or refuses to spend in those particular districts. If the hon. gentleman is logical, he asperses by his method of attack the people of Pictou, and insults that county in a manner not at all reflecting upon his own intelligence. The people of that county and of the East River make a demand in connection with this vote which is perfectly proper. The hon. gentleman suspects there is some wrong mixed up with this, and makes a serious charge against the people in imputing that it was necessary to pay them for their support by this kind of an appropriation, and that, in fact, they were bought by this and the railway to which he was so fond of alluding and the justification of which has been successfully made in this Parliament. I am amazed at the effrontery and audacity of the hon. gentleman in making these charges broadcast upon mere suspicion and upon the information of a beaten politician, a man who has been repudiated by the county in which he lived, and I do not think the friend of the hon. gentleman will be obliged to him for dragging his name into this House in connection with a matter of this kind, when the hon. gentleman was capable of giving no further facts than the mere ipse dixit of that disappointed politician for an attack upon this appropriation. If we were to follow the hon. gentleman through the expenditures made in his time, we could make out a much better case, for he seems to know no other reason to induce the majority of Parliament, of which he may be one, to make a grant of public money unless for some purpose in connection with the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to West's Wharf in Halifax. I know the hon. gentleman has an unpleasant recollection of Pictou, and in consequence of that is ready to malign the majority of the people of that county and to state here that they are bought by railway subsidies and appropriations of $500 and $700 to remove obstructions in the navigation of the river. The day was when the hon. gentleman would not have dared to make such an insinuation. That day was when he was a thousand miles away from here in that county addressing the people and seeking to obtain the return to this Parliament of the gentleman he quoted as his authority.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). While the hon. gentleman was speaking, I could not help thinking of the appropriate remark made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) to-day in reply to another gentleman, who had the effrontery to address him in the manner in which the hon. gentleman has assumed to speak to me, and other hon. gentlemen on this side, on a previous occasion. The hon. member for Northumberland told him that he had not yet got his pin-feathers of a politician.

Mr. TUPPER. You have lost yours, I am sorry to say.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman will learn, after he has been a little longer in this House, that when he speaks of a subject of that kind, and uses the language of effrontery towards any member on this side, a little more modesty would become his age and position better. With regard to this matter, if I were disposed to go into it, I could, perhaps, reveal a condition of affairs to which the hon. gentleman is entitled for his seat that would not be creditable or agreeable to him. The hon. gentleman has referred to my efforts for the extension of the Intercolonial to West's Wharf in Halifax. I do not know to what he refers. He may be indebted to his imagination for his facts. It is a very fertile imagination and he comes honestly by it. The hon. gentleman is well aware that the question of the extension of the railway to West's Wharf had been a public question for a long time. If I did say so, and I do not know that I did—

Mr. TUPPER. Hear, hear. You are drawing on your imagination.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I repeat I may have said I was in favor of it. I always was in favor of it, but I did not go surreptitiously, as the hon. member did, and have a little vote put in for an improper purpose.

Mr. TUPPER. You were in the Government at the time.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I was not; it was the election before that. But the hon. gentleman, using his position in the Government, gets a sum put in the Estimates for an improper object, merely for the purpose of assisting him in a certain locality, wasting the public funds of the country, and then he comes here and says we have the effrontery to oppose it. The hon. gentleman must be aware that we understand his game too well to be intimidated by any such assertion as this. He must remember the exposure made of him the other night in this House, when he was proved to have misrepresented the whole position of that road which was built to elect him and without which he would not be in this House to-day, and which has cost this country $1,500,000,—he must know that, valuable as may be his services to his party, they may arrive at the conclusion that, perhaps, like Mr. Weller's muffins, they are rather filling at the price. If he expects to retain the County of Pictou by such improper appropriations of public money from year to year, before he lives to a great time in his public career the amount will be no small one. We know that road was built on the representation to this House that it was going to shorten the distance 45 miles, and we know by the actual result that it does not shorten the distance two miles.

Mr. TUPPER. You do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). When an hon. member comes to this House with such a statement and such misrepresentation, and claims a grant of public money on such a misrepresentation of the assumed facts, when it is proven by the actual result that the road does not shorten the distance two miles, it is evident that any statement coming from an hon. gentleman of that character is not worthy the attention of the House, and will always be received with discredit. That is the position the hon. gentleman occupies in that county, and he should understand that before he attempts to lecture me as to my position in Halifax.

Mr. TUPPER. When the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) rises to make ridiculous statements; connected with my county, I will expose those statements, and the ridiculous position in which the hon. gentleman must find himself is evident when he cannot even be original in his retort but has to borrow something funny from the leader of the third party to use across the House. I just want to tell the hon. gentleman that, for an hon. gentleman who has not only obtained his pin-feathers but has lost them all, he is an extraordinary statesman to draw a distinction between the right of a member of Parliament to obtain a grant of money for his county when he is outside of the Government, when he says that under those circumstances it is open for him to approach the Government and lay the wants of his county before them, while, according to the creed of this veteran statesman, the moment you go into the Government you must become dumb as to the requirements of your county. The statements which I made to the people of the County of Pictou in regard to the expenditure of public money have been verified, while the statements which the hon. gentleman made to the people of Halifax have not been verified. You will find that his promises are confined chiefly to election speeches, while mine are to be found in the Public Accounts, and I am here now or at any other time ready to justify the expense, as Parliament has justified it. The hon. gentleman speaks of my not having come here if that expense had not been made. It may be truly said, to a large extent, that the majority of the members of this House would not be here if it were not for the judicious expenditure of public money for useful public works in this country; but I have to inform that veteran statesman, who I suppose had his pin-feathers at one time, that I came to this Parliament without any promise that any public expenditure would be made which he thinks has assumed such alarming proportions, and as to which he cites the statements made by the member for Queen's (P.E.I.) in a previous debate, reference to which on his part was highly improper at this time. The expenditure to which he refers was not only acceptable to the people in the three counties which are traversed by that line of railway, but to the Province at large. It was an expenditure which the hon. gentleman never, to my recollection, on any public occasion attacked in his native Province; but smarting under some feeling which has driven him to object to this expenditure of $500, he has again found fault with an expenditure voted by Parliament for his own Province. I had no opportunity to justify that expenditure in the past debate. The attack was made upon it when I could not answer, and to-night I would not abuse the condescension of the Committee by undertaking a justification of that expenditure. The hon. gentleman, however, has not attacked, and I do not believe he will attack, the expenditure of that money in his own Province where the facts are known. It is an expenditure which was highly necessary, highly useful, and which develops a most important portion of the Intercolonial Railway, which has not only met its expenses, but has produced a very good profit. I think the hon. gentleman had better keep his fiery indignation in regard to the expenditure of public money in his Province for sums over $500.

Mr. KIRK. The hon. gentleman has gone into a long explanation to justify the expenditure of money in his county. He says that money has been judiciously expended. Was it a judicious expenditure to pay $3,700 a mile to build a branch road from Stellarton to Pictou? Will anyone tell me that it requires that amount to build a road when the right of way is furnished, when not a dollar is required for rolling stock, when five or six miles of the road was an old road and must have been bought at a lower price than it would require to build a new one? When he says that the expenditure of such an enormous amount of money as that which was spent on the Pictou Branch Railway is a judicious expenditure, he must think that the people of this country are pretty easily deceived. I do not believe that the road cost anything like that, but the figures which were given in this House this year, in answer to the question of an hon. member, show that it did cost that. The hon. gentleman has also tried to justify the building of the Short Line Railway for the reasons which were given at the time this Parliament was asked to vote the money. He questions the truthfulness of the statement made by the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies).

Mr. O'BRIEN. I rise to a question of order, and ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. My attention having been called to it, I think this is out of order.

Mr. KIRK. I would not have touched upon this question at all if you had not allowed one of your Ministers to talk upon it for half an hour. However, there will be another opportunity. The justification for building that road was that it was to benefit the whole of eastern Nova Scotia, Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island, and was to save 45 miles of distance. I find here that $22,100 is asked for harbors and rivers in Nova Scotia, and where is this money to be expended? Is one dollar of it to be expended in a county represented by an Oppositionist from Nova Scotia? Not one. All the money is to be expended in counties represented by hon. gentlemen supporting the Government. Is this a mere accident?

Mr. BOWELL. Purely.

Mr. KIRK. Surely it must be an accident. Surely the Government would not be so unjust as not to give a portion of this money to other counties.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. BOWELL. Wait till you get the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. KIRK. The Government may do justice in the Supplementary Estimates, but there is no justice in this item or in any other items. The hon. gentleman has tried to leave the impression by his speech that I oppose this measure because it is a vote for Nova Scotia.

Mr. TUPPER. I did not allude to you at all.

Mr. KIRK. You alluded to the member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and myself as well. You said that we objected to this vote and would not support it while we would support votes for other Provinces. I object to this because of the principle upon which it is voted. This Government has no right to vote money in order to clean rocks out of the river for the purpose of driving logs or timber. I have always approved the granting of money for cleaning out rivers or streams for purposes of navigation; but I say it is not the proper thing for this Government to vote money for the purpose mentioned by the Minister, and I shall oppose it. I do not believe there is any necessity at all for this grant, because timber and logs have been rafted down the river, perhaps, ten times more than was driven down it last year, every year for the last 50 or 60 years, perhaps more than that. There is very little timber on that stream now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a small sum, it is true, but the principle involved is not a trifle. If the Government are going to undertake the improving of streams for the benefit of lumbermen, we have a right to know it because there are several hundred streams in Ontario, Quebec and the other Provinces, on which it would be very convenient for the lumbermen, who have large interests there to have, public money expended for their benefit. If no better answer can be given than that which has been given for the propriety of this vote, I shall certainly challenge it on concurrence. I think that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Public Works are introducing an extremely dangerous precedent in allowing it to be understood that votes of public money are to be taken for the purpose of improving rivers to enable lumbermen to raft their property down to the sea, or the lake, as the case may be, more easily than they have done. I am not aware that that has been done heretofore.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, on this river, East River, Pictou. This is not the first time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have you done it in other places?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This did not begin in our time, it began on the first of July, 1876.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What river? Give the place?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It continued from time to time until the 30th June, 1887. At that time there had been expended $4,681.82 in this East River, Pictou.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not for the purpose of improving it for logs?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Last year $700 were voted, this year $500 more. Of course, I give the information that has been furnished me. The hon. gentleman must understand that it was not made up for the moment, but I find it in the book of information that I have here. As the hon. gentleman says that he will challenge this vote on concurrence, I will be ready to give the details then.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The work that was done in the East River at the time he refers to, was dredging lower down, not at all at this point of the river; and the hon. gentleman knows it very well, and it is not fair in him to put it to the House in that way, because if he is aware of the fact at all, he knows that the dredging took place down at a lower point of the river for the accommodation of shipping.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman has no right to say that. He affirms that I knew this. How does he know that?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). You must know it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman has no right to treat a colleague and a Minister in that way.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). You ought to know it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He has no right to affirm a thing of that kind. I say that I did not know it; the hon. gentleman should not affirm that I did.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman should have known it before he affirmed it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is my affair, to a certain extent, because I was responsible for the item. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) is unfortunately not able to be in his place, but I have a very distinct recollection, not of what occurred there, but of what was stated to me, and I do know that my hon. friend, Mr. Mackenzie, did not suggest votes to me in my capacity of Finance Minister, for the purpose of improving these rivers for lumbering purposes; the votes that he suggested to me were for the purpose of improving them for navigating purposes. He may have been deceived. I may have been deceived, but I know that neither in 1876 nor in 1878, did we bring down votes for the purpose of improving rivers for lumbering purposes. If a vote was obtained for the purpose of improving rivers for lumbering purposes, then I was deceived and the House was deceived. But I do not think, on enquiry, that the hon. gentleman will find that to be the case. Even if it were so, I think he would have been wrong, or that we would have been deceived in doing it. But that would not in the slightest degree affect the course that I propose to take, because I think this practice of using public money for purposes such as the hon. gentleman has now stated, is a very mischievous one, and likely to lead to a very injudicious expense over the Dominion. You cannot confine it to Nova Scotia; there are hundreds of other places where, on the strength of such a precedent as this demands, would be made for the expenditure of public money, and the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that we have more than enough to do to make both ends meet as it is.

Mr. LOVITT. Yarmouth, removal of rocks, $1,000—a similar sum was voted last year for the removal of rocks, but the engineer found that the rock, instead of being loose, was a ledge, and I understand he has given up the project. I would ask the hon. gentleman to have it put into the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As the hon. gentleman says, it was found to be not loose rock, but a ledge. In that case a sum of this kind would not be at all sufficient, therefore, I will enquire into what the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. LOVITT. The sum would be sufficient to erect a beacon so as to keep ships from going on to it.

Resolutions reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12:30 a. m. (Saturday).
