charges which they proposed to collect in compensation for the issue of licences for such performing rights in Canada. The bill made it possible, after an investigation by the royal commission appointed by the government, for the governor general by order in council, on the application of the Secretary of State, to supervise rates, and if the rates so filed were deemed to be exorbitant or inequitable, to reduce them.

Before proposing to relieve this company of the payment of registration fees, and after having met its representatives in London in December, 1930, I secured a copy of the evidence and the report of a special committee appointed by the House of Commons in England to consider a musical copyright bill then before that house. I ascertained from the report and the evidence taken by that committee that grievances had arisen in England with regard to what was alleged to be exorbitant and inequitable charges exacted by the parent company in Great Britain. That committee reported unanimously to the house on July 3, 1930, as follows:

> Your committee are fully satisfied that apart from classical and educational music, the society controls ninety per cent or even more of the performing rights in copyright music, and promoters of entertainments who require to use music of the popular type, are in our opinion, not in position to do without the music controlled by the society, and are therefore compelled to pay the charges made by the society. In such circumstances, the fear of music users, that the society may use what may be termed its super monopoly to demand still higher fees, appears to be well founded, and it is not unnatural that they should desire to have a right of appeal to an independent body when they are faced with unreasonable demands and are unable to come to a mutually satisfactory agreement with the society.

Paragraph 18 of the report of that committee reads:

> Your committee consider that such a super monopoly can abuse its powers by refusing to grant licences upon reasonable terms so as to prejudice the trade or industry of persons carrying on business in this country, and to be contrary to the public interest, and that it should be open to those persons to obtain relief in respect of such abuse by appeal to arbitration or some other tribunal. This should apply only in those cases where the ownership or control of copyright has been transferred to an association.

Having in mind that report, which I believe was unanimous, I felt in 1931 that before removing from the Copyright Act, as it then existed, the provision compelling this association to pay one dollar for each registration of assignment and transfer of copyright in musical productions, parliament should take into consideration that report. A committee was appointed by this house, which held very long sittings and made a report. In considering the act then existing, I found that by the provisions of a proclamation made on December 29, 1923 under the provisions of the original Copyright Act of 1921, which, if I remember correctly, was to come into force and have full effect on January 1, 1924, an arrangement had been made between the Canadian government of that day and the government of the United States, whereby Canada agreed that citizens of the United States would be able to obtain copyright in Canada under the new Copyright Act, which was about to come into operation on January 1, 1924. The terms of that arrangement were that Canada would extend to citizens of the United States the benefit of copyright on substantially the same basis as to its own Canadian citizens. Therefore, without reading that agreement and proclamation further, I ascertained that so far as the United States was concerned all that Canada was bound to do was to extend to the citizens of the United States the same rights and privileges which it conferred upon its own citizens by our Copyright Act of 1921. But when we came to consider before the committee the further effects of the legislation then proposed, I directed the attention of the committee to the terms of the Rome copyright convention of 1928, which had been adhered to by Canada, which in fact had been signed by a Canadian representative, when it was signed by certain other countries at Rome on June 2, 1928. But until that date and until this time the United States had never and has never adhered to the Rome convention and therefore its citizens can claim no rights under that convention.

The question then arose as to the rights of the Canadian Performing Right Society under the Rome convention; and after having consulted the best legal advisers to whom I have access, I found that in their opinion the Canadian Performing Right Society, having been incorporated in Canada and having acquired in respect of Canada two million or more individual copyrights of performing rights in music, was subject to Canadian legislation the same as any other Canadian citizen. But apart from that, which I believe to be an accurate statement of the law, it was clear, on an examination of the Rome convention to which we then adhered, first, that the Rome convention gave no rights in Canada to Canadian nationals. The Rome convention merely purported to give Canadian nationals rights in respect of copyright in those foreign countries which had adhered to that convention. Therefore we were not bound to consider the Canadian corporation otherwise than as a Canadian citizen whose rights had to be determined by Canadian law. But, second, it was clear that the countries which had adhered to the Rome convention had the right with respect to their own nationals to enact so-called domestic legislation, and in the fourth article of the Rome convention it was provided that:

> Consequently, apart from the express stipulations of the present convention, the extent of protection, as well as the means of redress secured to the author to safeguard his rights, shall be governed exclusively by the laws of the country where protection is claimed.

That section gave a wide liberty to the parliament of Canada and provided that, except as rights had been stipulated in express terms by the Rome convention, foreign nationals would be subject to the domestic legislation of this country. Furthermore, it was ascertained before the commission, and by evidence given, that no Canadian author was affected because at that date no Canadian author had been admitted as a member of the performing right society of Canada. It was also common ground that copyright in the vast body of these musical works was no longer vested in the original author but had been assigned to the publishers of music at the time or about the time of the first publication of these works; and it appeared that, to a very considerable extent, the whole matter of forming such a combination in Canada rather partook of the nature of a racket in which the publishers of music were to obtain a super-monopoly and control of musical performances in Canada.

But a very considerable part of the complaints against the operations of the Canadian company was due to complaints made by those who broadcast music and by those who receive music by means of broadcast through the receivers for which they obtain dominion licences; and I think one of the main controversies which were from time to time reported to the office of the Secretary of State was with regard to excessive charges made or demanded by the Canadian Performing Right Society from the broadcasting companies as well as those who receive music through the ordinary receiving apparatus. But the Rome convention provided in 11 bis:

> (2) The national legislations of the countries of the union may regulate the conditions under which the right mentioned in the preceding paragraph shall be exercised, but the effect of those conditions will be strictly limited to the countries which have put them in force. Such conditions shall not in any case prejudice the moral right (droit moral) of the author, nor the right which belongs to the author to obtain an equitable remuneration which shall be fixed, failing agreement, by the competent authority.

The moral right is provided for in article 6 bis of the convention, which is the right of the author to object to any distortion, mutilation or other modification of the said work which would be prejudicial to his honour or reputation, so that reservation of the moral right of the author does not now concern us, except this, that article 11 bis does provide that by domestic legislation a competent authority may be appointed which shall see that an equitable remuneration may be fixed. Therefore the controversy which arose with respect to the Canadian Performing Right Society has simmered down, in so far as this bill before the committee is concerned, to some way of fixing an equitable remuneration for performing rights such as those which are dealt with by the Canadian company. Under the bill of 1931 it was provided, on the recommendation of the committee of that day, that if complaints were made to the governor in council, then, the governor in council having proceeded by the appointment of a commissioner, and the commissioner having heard the evidence and reported, it would be competent for the governor in council by order of the governor in council to fix the rates of remuneration which were equitable in the case. Complaints came to the notice of the department, and, pursuant to an order numbered 169 dated January 28, 1932, Mr. Justice Ewing was appointed a commissioner to make an inquiry and report, on the petition of six broadcasting stations in the province of Alberta: Edmonton Journal Limited, CJCA; Calgary Herald Limited, CFAC; the Alberta Pacific Grain Company Limited, CKLC; the Albertan Publishing Company Limited, CJCJ; the Voice of the Prairies Limited, CFCN; Lethbridge Broadcasting Limited, CJOC. Evidence was taken by Mr. Justice Ewing, who made a report dated June 29, 1932. Mr. Justice Ewing found that the company, instead of filing a list of the specific musical productions over which it claimed to have copyright, had filed with the Department of Secretary of State catalogues of publishing companies, and he found that those catalogues included many works in which copyright no longer existed. He says:

> A casual examination of the catalogue showed that it contained numerous works of the old masters such as Mendelssohn, Chopin, Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Handel, Haydn and Verdi, all of whose works are in the public domain.

That is, copyright no longer existed in those works. He continues:

As these catalogues have been sent from England, the representatives of the society at the hearing were unable to offer any explanation. A request for information was cabled to England and a reply was received to the effect that these works had been "rearranged" and that these rearrangements had been copyrighted.

The judge proceeds:

This may or may not be entirely correct, but in any case these catalogues contain musical works which are not in the society's repertoire. For instance, the list contains operettas or operas as a whole whereas the society can only license instrumental excerpts for these operas. The society claims that as a matter of technical compliance with the act it may file lists of works in respect of which it claims this authority to license, and the fact that these lists contain other works over which the society has no control would not affect the filing.

Then in regard to the list of fees filed the judge reports:

In my opinion the intention of the act is—not, as is suggested—that the society shall be permitted to file a list of fees perhaps extravagantly high but at any rate bearing no relationship to the actual fees which the society intends to collect and then to proceed to collect any fee it chooses provided only that such fee is not more than is prescribed in the statement filed.

The judge proceeds to quote the schedule of fees, and he finds that the fees are based upon the power output of the broadcasting station. Then he adds:

The result is that the society has filed a statement of fees for broadcasting stations but it is clear that these are not the fees which it proposes to collect and to that extent it has not complied with clause "B" of section 10 of the act.

The judge then proceeds:

While several matters entered into the fixing of a proper fee to be paid by a broadcasting station for broadcasting copyright music, it was generally admitted that the basic determining factor is the number of people reached by the station in question, that is to say, the "audience."

He proceeds to show that the western companies were being charged approximately the same as the broadcasting companies in the larger centres of Toronto and of Montreal; and he adds:

In fixing the fees the society has left out of consideration the population within the service range of the station. When the facts as to service range, coverage and relative populations were brought out in evidence, the representative of the society very properly admitted that the statement filed was made up without appreciating some of the factors above mentioned as affecting western Canada and this situation ought to be remedied. Without taking advantage of an admission so made, it must be said that the society has proposed to collect excessive fees from the petitioners.

Then he gives what the society thinks would be a fair price to be charged to certain of these complainants, and he says:

I think it would not be unfair to divide this sum—

That is, the sum claimed:

—by five instead of ten in order to correct the results of inequalities of population.

After receiving this report of Mr. Justice Ewing I was sent by the government as a delegate to Geneva. While there Mr. A. Boosey, who stated to me that he was the executive director of the British company, visited me and discussed the terms of this report. He stated that if the government would refrain from taking action by order in council to fix the limit of the general charges, he would undertake to communicate with his officials in charge of the Canadian company, and see to it that reductions were made in the fees and an amicable adjustment reached on an equitable basis. On his assurance I made no report to council asking for an appropriate order in council to be passed dealing with the Ewing report. But instead of complying with the assurance then given, which I repeated to the president of the Canadian society in an interview with him after my return, the Canadian Performing Right Society apparently assumed that it could go on making these charges and increasing them at will without making any reasonable effort to come to an amicable understanding with the other interested parties.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that he has spoken for more than forty minutes.

Mr. NEILL: I would suggest that we follow the practice adopted the other evening, and now that I have spoken the hon. gentleman can continue.

Mr. RINFRET: I would suggest that the hon. gentleman be allowed to continue. At the same time, in consideration of the fact that I greatly desire to have this bill sent to the senate for to-morrow morning, perhaps the committee will consent to sit a little after eleven o'clock if that is necessary to put the bill through.

Mr. CAHAN: After the legislation of 1931 was passed the Canadian Performing Right Society filed a tariff of fees, on June 18, 1931. It then filed a supplemental tariff on September 2, 1931; then it changed again by withdrawing the supplemental tariff on the 6th October, 1932. Then, after I had received the assurance of the executive director of the British company which controlled half the shares of the Canadian company, that Mr. Justice Ewing's report would be considered and adjustments would be made in compliance therewith, a further tariff was filed on the 5th January, 1934, dealing only with broadcasting. Then another complete tariff, the third tariff, was filed on the 29th January, 1934, and on March 10, 1934, another amending tariff was filed. On July 11, 1934, another tariff was filed which was limited in its application to public parks, and again on the 12th July, 1934, another tariff was filed with regard to performance of new works.

The general tendency of all these changes was not in compliance with the report of Mr. Justice Ewing but to insist upon a further increase in charges and fees to the broadcasting stations. In the early autumn of 1934 those who were interested in the use of music, broadcasting companies, hotels and other organizations, protested so vigorously that I asked the president of the Canadian Performing Right Society to meet representatives of the broadcasting companies at my office, and they met on October 26, 1934, in Ottawa. I went into the whole matter with the president of the Canadian Performing Right Society in the presence of ten or twelve persons representing these various broadcasting companies and other interested parties. I then agreed, in order that the Canadian Performing Right Society might have a further opportunity to come to an amicable agreement with the broadcasting interests, that I would not ask for an inquiry for a period of three months, in which time I was assured by the president of the Canadian company that efforts would be made to reach an amicable settlement of the difficulties.

This three month period expired on the 26th January, 1935, and I was informed that no agreement had been reached. Yet in the face of the facts as they then existed, and despite the consideration that had been shown from year to year and time to time by the Department of the Secretary of State to the Canadian society, that Canadian society formally filed on the 30th January, 1935, a new tariff, still further increasing the rate and, incidentally, suggesting that they were not going to comply with the request and the suggestion I had made in regard to an amicable settlement. Therefore on the 22nd March, 1935, the governor in council appointed His Honour Judge Parker a commissioner under the Inquiries Act and under the provisions of the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931, to make a further inquiry into the facts and to report. Matters had then reached such a stage that no minister in charge of a department, who had any self-respect at all, could further delay taking action in this matter.

Judge Parker made his report on October 29, 1935, and hon. members will at once perceive that the former Secretary of State had then no official authority in the matter. But I do commend my successor in office that in a matter of great public interest such as this, in respect of which neither of us had any personal interest whatsoever, and in respect of which each of us was merely anxious to preserve and protect the public interest, he proceeded upon receipt of this report to consider ways and means by which the report might be carried into effect. It is not for me to suggest that I might have found other ways and means. But I do personally commend the policy pursued by my successor in this respect, because he has proceeded by this bill to provide for the constitution of an independent tribunal to review complaints. If I had received that report I think, from my knowledge of the facts, that I might have proceeded directly by an order in council fixing the fees. My successor has adopted a rather more conservative course. By this bill he has provided for the appointment of an independent commission to which applications may be made in case excessive and inequitable charges are made by the Canadian Performing Right Society.

Judge Parker reported certain facts. Dealing with the increased rates filed in 1935, he says, on page 34:

> A comparison with the fee charged for a one hundred watt station under the 1931 tariff shows a great increase, and the stations required to pay the increased fee naturally objected and complained that the new tariff charged was excessive and unreasonable.

That is, the new tariff filed after the previous complaint had been brought to the attention of the Canadian Performing Right Society and after Mr. Justice Ewing's investigation and report. Then a comparison is made between the charges in England and the charges made in Canada, and Judge Parker finds that in view of the scattered population, particularly in the west, it is unfair to charge the same amount per receiving set as is paid in a country so closely settled as Great Britain. He finds that the charge made in Canada should in his opinion be reduced to a rate of 7½ cents per receiving set, which is not very much below the prevalent charge in Great Britain at the time.

Then, again, with regard to the use of these musical compositions in theatres and public buildings of that kind, the Canadian Performing Right Society does not charge a fixed fee for the performing rights in individual musical compositions, but it charges a rate based upon the entire seating capacity of the theatre or public place in which the performance takes place. And Judge Parker finds in that connection that in the rural districts, the country towns, especially in the country towns of the west, public buildings have been erected and theatres provided for large audiences, exceptional accommodation for exceptional occasions, and because a musical performance may be given to a small audience in one of these larger theatres he finds that it is unfair to charge, not according to the numbers of the audience, not in accordance with the tickets paid for, but upon each seat of the large seating capacity of these buildings whether occupied or not.

Then, with regard to the society's increase of charges, raising a certain minimum fee for matinees and other theatrical performances from $10 to $30, Judge Parker finds that the evidence makes it clear that the raising of the minimum fee was done under pressure of Mr. Mills of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers. It was not looked upon with favour by the directors of the Performing Right Society of London, England. The raising of the minimum fee in the United States by Mr. Mills was reluctantly followed by the Canadian Performing Right Society. Mr. Jamieson, the president of the Canadian society, however, said in justification, in his evidence, that he regarded the theatre tariff as inadequate and that he only waited to raise the rates in Canada until the rates had been raised in the United States. Then Judge Parker finds that his comparison of the two tariffs shows that in some cases the fees of the Canadian Performing Right Society are higher than those of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, and in no case are the fees in the 1935 tariff of the Canadian society less than the fees in the 1934 tariff of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers.

Bearing these facts in mind, and having regard to the fact that ten cents per seat in the past has been acceptable to the Canadian Performing Right Society and was not strenuously objected to by the larger theatres in Canada, he finds that it seems a fair conclusion that the rate of 1931 should not be changed and that the 1935 tariff is unjust and unfair.

Then near the close of his report he says:

> ... it seems only fair and reasonable that the Canadian Performing Right Society, Limited, should extend that concession—

A certain concession made:

> —to all theatres, and especially to those in the west where they are suffering from drought, and to other places in the east where the towns were dependent upon one industry, and that industry is not now in operation. The theatres were built some time ago and a seating capacity provided when conditions were more prosperous. You have in the maritime provinces, for instance, districts dependent solely upon coal mining and districts dependent solely upon lumbering. Both of these industries, according to the evidence, are at a standstill, and in some localities the percentage of people on relief is very considerable.

I do not think I need proceed further, but I wish to state that when the committee of this house, of which I was chairman, considered the copyright amendment bill of 1931, Mr. H. T. Jamieson, President of the Canadian Performing Right Society Limited, gave his final evidence just before the committee brought its proceedings to a close. Mr. Jamieson stated that certain organizations including the Canadian National Railways and the Toronto Daily Star refused to make contracts with his company until it was placed under government regulations. As chairman of that committee I proceeded to inquire as follows:

> Q. Quite so. Do they not attach to their refusal to pay a demand for regulation, that is, as I understand their position, they think that, in case a difference arises with you as to what is a proper compensation, there should be an independent tribunal, by agreement or arbitration or otherwise, to which an appeal could be made to determine whether your demands are reasonable?
> A. Well, Mr. Atkinson admitted to me that our tariffs—not demands, our tariffs—were reasonable, and he said it was simply a matter of principle with him, that he would not negotiate with us until we were under government regulation. I said, pay those reasonable tariffs meantime and let us settle the other question later, but they refused.
> Q. Just one moment. Is it not a fact—I do not wish to submit the whole record—but is it not a fact that in the evidence before the committee in the British house of Commons it was shown that your British Performing Right Society had entered into contracts for short terms, and at the expiration of those contracts higher rates were demanded, which, in many cases, were regarded by at least the users as exorbitant.
> A. Well, sir, there were some increases asked for by the British society, but those increases were asked for only after there had been very considerable accession to the membership for one thing, and only after there had been accessions of many other affiliated European societies.
> Q. That, to my mind, represents a valid consideration in support of increasing your royalties and charges, but it is not conclusive as to whether the increases which you demanded under those circumstances, you holding a monopoly, should not be submitted, in case of dispute, to some independent tribunal or to arbitration.

A. As Mr. Hawkes could show you in detail, he having knowledge of the operation of the British society, those so-called demands were merely the ideas of the British society as to the increased value of their repertoire.

Q. Why do you refuse really to submit your prices to arbitration, or to the determination of an independent tribunal? I am not here to say that a single charge you ever levied is excessive. But you have a monopoly of 90 per cent of modern music, and, in case of dispute, your views not being accepted by the music user, why should there not be some independent tribunal to which you, as a monopolist with 90 per cent of all modern works in your control, should submit your charges.

The final answer of the witness was:

A. Because we do not know that these rates to be fixed would be fair and reasonable.

The conclusion of the committee was that this being a super-monopoly, combining what had originally been a great number of private monopolies now vested in the Canadian corporation, its charges should be subject to an independent tribunal. That independent tribunal is provided for in the terms of the bill now before the committee.

As the hour is advancing I shall postpone to another session a discussion of other matters to which I had intended to refer. At the same time may I commend the principle and policy of the bill—and I speak only for myself and from my own official experience—which the present Secretary of State has introduced for the purpose of creating an independent tribunal to whom those who have grounds for complaint may make such complaints, receive a decision and obtain an equitable adjustment.

Mr. WILTON: Mr. Chairman, from my knowledge of the activities and demands of the performing right society I think it might well be compared with a cross-word puzzle. In the first place I doubt very much whether the officials of that society know exactly what they want, and I am quite sure that the public from which it tries to derive its income does not know what it is all about. I question, further, whether hon. members know the meaning of it.

If the government is desirous of relieving the public from a great and unnecessary nuisance, it should enact such legislation as would curtail or better regulate the activities of this organization. Since the opening of the session hon. members have been circularized from time to time with literature pertaining to the passage of this bill, much of which literature has been misleading and incorrect. Certain statements made therein require answering. It was stated that the hotel proprietors had admitted the principle that radio loud speakers in private rooms should be included in the performing right society licence. The hotel proprietors through their association claim they never made any such admission; yet we know that hon. members have been circularized to the effect that the proprietors had agreed. As they have recorded at their association meetings, the hotel proprietors state that the tariffs filed by the performing right society in 1934 and 1935 are too complicated, and the prices fixed too onerous. Mr. George O'Neil, President of the Ontario Hotel Association, is quoted as saying that the 1934 tariff was satisfactory. Mr. O'Neil's own statement is that he never made any such admission. Mr. O'Neil does not admit that the tariff of 1934 was or is reasonable. Still hon. members have been advised through circulars sent to their office from time to time that Mr. O'Neil and the association had agreed to this kind of thing. That is the sort of unfair work which has been going on in an effort to put this thing through. The performing right society now admit that the minimum fee of $30 is too high. They are willing to accept $10 when it is paid voluntarily.

His Honour Judge Parker was appointed a commissioner in March, 1935, to conduct an inquiry into this matter. Considerable evidence was taken in various parts of Canada, and in October, 1935, Judge Parker submitted his report. In that report he classified the performing right society as a monopoly. In passing, I should like to refer to a statement made by the former Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). He said that the fee of ten cents per seat was acceptable to the theatre owners. I know for a fact that such is not the case. The theatre owners have protested vigorously against this fee of ten cents per seat. In fact, they protest against paying anything to this society because they feel that its whole activities are piratical; that it has no licence or right to collect any fee from them. Judge Parker classified this society as a monopoly, and it certainly is a monopoly in every sense of the word, and then some.

I should like to cite one case which came to my personal attention. A certain business man had occasion to employ an orchestra in connection with his restaurant. He was approached by a representative of this performing right society and told that his fee for the year would be $72. Just how the society arrived at that fee of $72 the restaurant man did not know, and the representative of this society could not tell him. The proprietor of the restaurant said he would not pay it; that he would go to court first, and after considerable dickering the representative of the society took $12 and gave a receipt in full.

I mention this case to justify the statement I made at the outset of my remarks, that the performing right society does not seem to know itself what it is all about or what it wants. It demands $72 of a fee and accepts $12.

As I understand it, the Copyright Act was designed to protect the author and publisher against duplication, publication and distribution. If you purchased a copyrighted book you would not expect to have to pay some society an additional fee because you read it. Country fairs, race tracks and such places are affected by the operations and activities of this organization. The Toronto exhibition bands are concerned, and so on. This society claims the right to step in and collect a fee every time you use a piece of copyright music, which you have already bought and paid for. This is a vicious system of abstracting money from the public.

The tabulated list of music is so lengthy that it is understood only by a few. It is hard to understand just what the list does contain. I telephoned the copyright branch in Ottawa a few days ago to ask if certain pieces of music were on the list, and I was advised that they could not tell. I am also informed that no Canadian author or publisher receives one penny of the money thus collected. If you engage an orchestra to furnish entertainment, this society steps in and demands the payment of a fee for every piece of music played, although it has been bought and paid for. When an author produces a piece of music and it is published, the author receives his pay from the publisher and through royalties on the sale of copies of the music. The publisher gets his profit from the sale of copies of the music. But if you or I buy a copy of that piece, take it somewhere and play it in public, we have to pay an additional fee. If we play the piece three, four, five or a dozen times in one evening, we must pay the special fee for every time we play the piece.

If the activities of this society continue, it will not be safe for a man to whistle a tune on the street or play a mouth organ; if he happens to play or whistle one of the pieces on this list, this society could rightly collect a fee from him. In the best interests of an already overburdened public this society should not be allowed to operate in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I interrupt my hon. friend for a moment? It is getting on toward the hour of adjournment and I do not know whether hon. members would be agreeable to continuing this evening's sitting. If so, it would be necessary to have the motion put before eleven o'clock. I do not think it would be reasonable to ask hon. members to take up any other business than the bill we are discussing at the moment, but if hon. members would be agreeable to continuing with this bill, say until midnight, I would move accordingly later on that the rule requiring adjournment at eleven o'clock be suspended and that we continue the sitting until midnight. I am suggesting this because the senate will want to consider this bill to-morrow, and refer it to one of the committees of the senate. If we do not conclude the discussion this evening, we could get it over to the senate fairly early to-morrow.

Mr. RINFRET: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONTINUANCE OF SITTING UNTIL MIDNIGHT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That standing order No. 11 be suspended, and that the present sitting of the house continue until midnight this day.

Motion agreed to.

COPYRIGHT AMENDMENT ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 55, to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Infringement of copyright.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my hon. friend for permitting me to interrupt.

Mr. WILTON: I shall not take up very much more of the time of the committee. I want to repeat what I just said, that in the best interests of an already overburdened and overtaxed public, this society should not be allowed to operate in Canada. It is a racket; it is unfair; it is unjust, and it should not be tolerated. Assume that I purchased twenty or thirty copies of a musical orchestration; I pay for them at the regular price, out of which the publisher and the retailer receive their profits. The author receives his payment from the royalties paid. Place that music in the hands of an orchestra and have it played behind closed doors privately, and so far as this association is concerned it is O.K.; but admit the public and in steps the performing right society and demands the payment of a special added fee, not once but for each time a piece of music is played. It is almost impossible to find a selection of music that does not appear on their preferred list, and if it is played a second time on the same occasion there is another fee, and so on. If the music goes on so also does the demand of the performing right society for additional fees. This, we are told, is to protect the copyright owners. I am not sure whether the Maple Leaf Forever or our national anthem is included in their list. I telephoned the copyright branch yesterday but they were not in a position to tell me whether God Save the King was on the list or not. Nevertheless, if it should happen to be there—and undoubtedly they will get it on—then we shall have a fine situation in Canada, for every time a band or any person or group of persons plays the national anthem, a special fee will have to be paid. I suppose that if they played the Maple Leaf Forever that would mean a perpetual tax.

It is said that the effort of this organization is to protect the performing right society, but I would ask; What about a little protection for the public, the public that has been suffering greatly under this and many other things for many years? This protective organization has been a pest to the people who provide entertainment in Canada and I repeat: What about giving some consideration to the public and protecting it from this legalized system of highway robbery which this outfit has been carrying on? It is a vicious hold-up of the public and it is the duty of the government to put a stop to it. The appointment of a commission even without salary will cost the Canadian taxpayer—this is a guess—perhaps $50,000 or $60,000 a year, just to take care of this matter. I say: It should be stopped. The only conclusion I can come to—and, in the past few years I have had a good deal of experience in regard to the activities of this organization—is that in fairness to the Canadian people throughout the country there is only one right and just thing to do in connection with the Canadian Performing Right Society, and that is to stop them doing business in Canada.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: The ground has been so well covered by those who have preceded me that I shall not delay the committee. I congratulate the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) upon having introduced in this bill one of the recommendations of Judge Parker with respect to the copyright appeal board, and I also congratulate the late government, through its Secretary of State, the present member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), upon having introduced into the copyright amendment act of 1931 two subsections providing for a stay of proceedings, whereby I take it that we are now allowed to discuss this question. There are no amendments in the bill now submitted, but though I approve the principle of a copyright appeal board I should like to know whether that board will be easy of access to the small performers or licencees, allowing them to make their complaints in such a way as to secure justice. If this appeal board is to be stationed permanently in Ottawa, it stands to reason that people, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, will have to travel at their own expense to submit their complaints to the board. On the other hand, if the board were itinerant it could go from one end of Canada to the other and that would involve an extra charge upon the exchequer of the country. These are the alternatives.

The question is this: Are we going to pay just for the benefit of other countries? Every member of this house is aware that not one Canadian author, composer, arranger or publisher gets any benefit from the Copyright Act. Though I congratulate the Secretary of State on having introduced one of the recommendations submitted by Judge Parker, I must say that this will not appease the dissatisfaction which exists in Canada to-day, because out of 10,000 shares, if I may use that term, there are 9,998 that do not belong to this country; and our own Canadian authors, whether they be of Anglo-Saxon origin or French-Canadian, have no show and are not entitled to any share in the profits. There may be four or five who at one time were registered in Washington and obtained American citizenship and they will benefit to a certain extent. But as the saying is, where there is smoke there is fire, and if there is dissatisfaction and suspicion from the Atlantic to the Pacific there must be something wrong. I am not casting reflections on anybody nor am I calling anything a racket; I do not say that there is a nigger in the wood pile. I say, however, that there are thousands of small operators, hotelkeepers, theatre owners, owners of dance halls, and men of initiative who engage orchestras and bands, who are getting no consideration at all. We cannot afford to have unrest in this country at the present time. If even a small proportion of the small operators, the users, the licencees, as the Canadian Performing Right Society wish to term them, express dissatisfaction, it is not for the good of the country that their protests should be disregarded. I say that with a full recognition of the eloquent speeches which have been delivered in this house on behalf of the authors, and I am glad to see that the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Chevrier) is now in his seat. When the hon. member made his plea last February on behalf of the authors, I admit that I fell for it. But are the authors getting the money that they should get? I ask: Are they?

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Yes.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Well, let me tell the hon. member that I have before me correspondence which challenges that assertion. How can they get their money? The law requires and each week the Canadian Performing Right Society imposes upon the users the task of making a report of the titles and of the names of the authors, but in this correspondence I have received the writers state that they have made no reports of either titles or authors' names. Under those circumstances how can a proper distribution be made of the moneys collected for the authors? I could refer to some of these letters, but this afternoon it was mentioned that we should not quote newspapers or letters, and I shall abide by the rule even before it is enforced. But the point is: How can the authors, the composers, the arrangers, the publishers, get the amount that they should receive if no report is made of whose music was used? I thought there would be an amendment of this bill this afternoon. Unfortunately there is none. I would have suggested that a committee of this house should have studied the whole problem from A to Z, because there is dissatisfaction, and where there is dissatisfaction there is unrest.

We cannot afford at this time to have our money go without just cause to foreign countries. An analysis made in 1934 of music broadcasted or performed showed that eighty per cent of the fees in respect of our copyrighted music went to the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, which has fifty per cent of the shares of the Canadian Performing Right Society. The other part of the fees being paid to the London Performing Right Society. Now, if eighty per cent goes to the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers and twenty per cent goes to the London Performing Right Society, which includes eighteen affiliated societies, and is where our educational music and training in music comes from, I am unwilling to believe that our money is well spent. I admit, with regard to the creation of the appellate tribunal, that it is an improvement on what the 1931 copyright amendments gave us, but it seems to me that we in Canada are giving money to somebody to take our money away. I ask hon. members to think about this matter to-morrow morning, and decide if I am wrong, because not one composer, not one author in Canada is receiving any benefit. Our composers, our authors, our arrangers, who give us some nice programs on the radio and in dance halls, concert halls, recreation halls and community halls, do not receive anything. Yet we have to pay just the same to the Canadian Performing Right Society, which is composed fifty-fifty of American authors, composers and publishers, who, by the way, were not parties to the Berne convention and were not even parties to the Rome convention. The Berne convention in 1886 had to do, I believe, with copyright. As far as I understand, the definition of copyright is this: It means the exclusive right of multiplying copies of an original composition. Try to find something else in either the Encyclopaedia Britannica or Larousse; you cannot.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Why does my hon. friend not look into the law? That is the place to find it, not in the dictionary.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: But in 1928, let me inform the hon. member, there was a convention in Rome, because the progress of mechanical and electrical instruments had come to the fore. Those who were organized thought they could reap more profit by taking the benefit of anything that was reproduced either mechanically or electrically. But if inventions continue to multiply as they are doing at present, the author of The Peanut Vendor and the author of Yes, We Have No Bananas will be reaping a benefit which no one in this house, no matter how hard he tries to work, can hope to equal. My point is, I think clear. I listened to the speech delivered by the original promoter of the bill, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling), and the speech in rebuttal by the hon. member for Ottawa East, and I was greatly impressed. But I say that the hon. member for Ottawa East has laid too much stress on the Berne convention, the Rome convention, and on what should belong to authors for the product of their genius. If eighty per cent of our money collected under copyright goes to the United States and twenty per cent goes to the London Performing Right Society with the eighteen affiliated societies, the comparison is clear and the conclusion is plain. Where does the educational music come from if not from the old country? The author of Yes, We Have No Bananas is not deserving of so much as the author of In a Monastery Garden, by Ketelby, or the waltzes of Strauss. The small broadcasters, the small performers, the small theatre owners have no option in the choice of their music. Whether they just use music written by Jean-Baptiste Lalonde or Jean-Baptiste Le-francois, jigs and reels, they have to pay the author of The Peanut Vendor, and the authors of the jigs and reels get no reward, as the hon. member for Ottawa East says, for the products of their genius.

I wish to be fair, sir. I have no prejudice. I have heard all the arguments for and against. I have read all the newspapers, and I shall not quote one of them. I have been in that game for the last thirty years as an orchestra leader, a bandmaster and a dealer in reproduction instruments, and I know the game. But I wish to inform the hon. member for Ottawa East, who so ably and so eloquently, on January 19, presented the case for the authors, that although I believe him to be sincere and honest I cannot agree with his arguments, for this reason. Ninety per cent of the time, when an author composes one of these love ballads, he goes to work and sells outright his rights, privileges and everything. Therefore he gets no money afterwards; it goes to those who have organized so as to take these assignments.

Let me conclude my remarks, Mr. Chairman, by saying that I want justice for the publishers and justice for the men who, in a shrewd and businesslike way, have formed this lovely little bit of machinery called the Canadian Performing Right Society. If their cause is just they have my support one hundred per cent, and on the other hand I want justice for the authors, so ably represented by the hon. member for Ottawa East, so long as those authors have the courage to attend an inquiry such as that conducted by Judge Parker and make out their claims. If they do not appear at such an inquiry it must be because they are not interested, and if they are not interested it is because they have assigned their rights, boots, hats, shirts and coats. I wish to be just. Look at all the correspondence I have had in connection with this Canadian Performing Right Society. I shall not quote it, but I shall say this: If you wish peace in this country do not forget the man operating a small theatre, or the man conducting a small dance hall and employing extra help. Do not forget the man who has an orchestra. If he is threatened with a lawsuit and out of that orchestra of six or seven pieces he has to drop one man, you are putting one man out of work. I know it is too late to propose any amendment, but we should have this problem studied by a committee where we could go over the whole matter thoroughly. I should like to do that, because it is my line. We could give justice to everyone; there would be no protests and no recriminations. If any part of our population figures that it is being discriminated against we are not working for the peace and comfort that we should have in Canada. I should like to talk all night, Mr. Chairman, but I shall not do so.

Mr. GRAYDON: I had intended originally, Mr. Chairman, to make my remarks on a subject such as that now before the committee somewhat extended, but in view of the fact that at this stage of the session it seems unpopular to make a long speech—I am not so sure that it should not be unpopular at any time during the session—I shall be very brief indeed and simply bring to the attention of the minister and the committee the situation as we find it in the banner county of the Dominion of Canada, the county of Peel.

I should like to preface my remarks by saying that as far as music is concerned we in that county are vitally interested, because there we have annually the largest amateur musical festival put on in any county of its size in the Dominion of Canada. Contributions come from various sources to enable that to be done, and for that reason perhaps I may be excused for telling the committee that the people of my riding are intensely interested in the fact that at various times they have had to pay money to an organization such as the performing right society.

Without going into the legal or constitutional aspect of this matter in any way may I just point out that one of the real difficulties with which the people are faced in connection with these charges is, I believe, the fact that no one seems to know what the charges mean and where the money is going. Perhaps that might appear to be an unfair statement as far as the society is concerned. I have no desire to say anything unfair, but I have in mind particularly four halls in the county of Peel, one in Streetsville, two in Brampton and one in the village of Bolton. The organizations controlling these halls are finding it difficult to make ends meet, as most people who come from rural ridings will understand, and when the performing right society comes to the owners or managers of these halls this is what happens: In the first instance they ask for $30 from these people and finally, in connection with the Orange hall in Brampton, accept an adjustment of something like $25. Then they go to the Odd Fellows' hall in the same town and agree to an adjustment of $14.88. Then they come to the Odd Fellows' hall in Streetsville, in the middle of a dance, and suggest that $2 should be paid and finally agree to take $10 for the year. In these circumstances perhaps I may be pardoned for suggesting that such practices are scarcely fair to the owners of the halls.

I should like to make a suggestion to the minister. I do not wish to interfere with any legal rights which may belong to the society, but after all I think, if there have to be such charges, there should be some standardized scale of fees. The average person in the country believes that if the society asks for $30 and accepts $14.88, there must be, as my good friend from Verdun (Mr. Wermenlinger) suggests, a nigger in the woodpile somewhere. It is not fair to the performing right society to have that impression abroad. That is something which should be corrected. In addition we have six of the best rural agricultural fairs in the riding. I think, so far as they are concerned, being supported largely by the people of the rural sections, and the halls being kept up by people who have great difficulty in making ends meet, it would be in the interest of all concerned if no fees of any kind were charged to either halls in rural sections or to rural fairs. I make that suggestion without going into any extensive argument, but it is something which should be given consideration. I suggest to the minister that he should make that change so that the people of the rural parts of the dominion will not suffer by virtue of the operations of the performing right society. I have no desire, nor have the people of my county, to avoid paying for something for which we should justly pay, but in the present position they feel that an injustice is being done, and therefore I bring this question to the attention of the minister.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Can the minister inform the committee how much a year the Canadian Performing Right Society is getting out of the country?

Mr. RINFRET: I shall note that question. I understand that hon. gentlemen want to speak on the question generally, so perhaps it might be better to finish that part first.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I was going to speak on this subject, but I feel that it is not the time now to go into it. This is too serious a matter to be rushed through in the last moments of the session. But I urge on the minister that this is a very serious matter and we should have a committee to deal with it in the course of the next session if at all possible.

Mr. RINFRET: I can give that information now:

Mr. BETTS: The remarks of my colleague from Peel (Mr. Graydon) lead me to say a few words about the amendment proposed by the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott), with the idea of relieving fairs and exhibitions from the necessity of paying a licence fee. I am entirely in accord with the principle of that amendment, but I am not at all sure that the amendment will serve the purpose intended. As hon. members know, these fairs, great and small, from the Toronto exhibition down to the smallest county fair, serve a most excellent object. They are set up for the purpose of encouraging an interest in agriculture, of improving agricultural methods and products, and also of giving a certain amount of diversion and entertainment to a class which gets very little, that is the farmer. The Parker report made it abundantly clear that the feeling of the commissioner was that these fairs, great and small, should not pay a licence fee to the performing right society. That feeling has been expressed in other forms. For instance in Ontario the legislature has relieved all fairs and exhibitions which are conducted by societies set up under the Agricultural Societies Act, which includes every fair in Ontario—and it will be found that in other parts of the dominion fairs are set up under similar legislation—from paying any amusement tax. That provision is found in the Amusements Tax Act of Ontario, R.S.O. 1927, chapter 32, under the regulations which are part of the act, which provides that the following fairs and exhibitions are relieved from paying any tax: Canadian National exhibition, Central Canada exhibition, Western Fair Association, Royal Winter Fair, Ontario Provincial Winter fair, Ottawa Winter fair, and two annual fairs held by any society organized under the Agricultural Societies Act.

Now the objects of the various societies so organized are set out in chapter 71. I shall not read them, because time is passing and we want to get through. But I think I need not stress the fact that these fairs serve a most excellent purpose, and surely these people should be relieved from this tax.

The amendment moved by the Postmaster General is, I know, directed towards exempting these fairs and exhibitions from the payment of fees. It does that defining the term "private profit" used in the act. The amendment, if I took it down correctly, reads:

Provided that such performance shall be deemed to be given without private profit if the only fees which are paid are paid to individual performers or their agents.

I urge with all the emphasis I can that that will not have the effect of relieving most of these fairs and exhibitions from payment of a licence fee, for this reason: Most of those fairs and exhibitions, certainly the larger ones, allow concessions on their grounds, perhaps a small company conducting a side show, and the concessionaire will receive profit, which under the amendment I take it would be a fee. In other words, there will be very few fairs in which the only fees paid are paid to individual performers or their agents. If the only fairs and exhibitions which are to be exempt are those which qualify under that amendment I say that these various entertainments will be in just as bad a position as they are in now.

It is not as if the performing right society were loath to assert its rights in the courts, because it will be remembered that in 1931 this house made an attempt to do just what we are trying to do now, that is relieve the fairs and exhibitions from the necessity of paying a licence fee, and the ink was hardly dry on the amendment before the society sued the Toronto exhibition. I shall not go into the case, but those interested may find it in 70 Ontario Reports, 34. The result was that the performing right society shot a large hole through the amendment of that date. My submission is that they will be just as zealous in attacking the present amendment. I think we require something better than that. I venture to suggest to the minister that perhaps we have been adopting the wrong touchstone or wrong criterion in determining what is private profit. The point is that all these exhibitions are organized for the purpose of stimulating interest in agriculture and improving agricultural conditions in the districts in which they operate. They are not designed for the purpose of making private profit for anybody. The acts under which they are set up, the Agricultural Societies Act of Ontario, and similar acts in other provinces, provide that if there is any profit resulting from the fair or exhibition such profit shall be devoted to the purposes of the society. That is to say, the profit shall be held from one year and used the next year. But it is not private profit for any person. It may be returned to the authority, whether dominion, provincial or municipal, which makes a grant in aid. Practically all these exhibitions receive help from one governmental source or another. I submit it is not a matter of importance that some minor concessionaire on the grounds makes a small profit or that he does not, and it certainly is very undesirable that the fact that some such small operator does make a profit should render the exhibition or fair subject to licence. I move in amendment, seconded by Mr. Esling—

Mr. ESLING: No.

The CHAIRMAN: It does not require a seconder.

Mr. BETTS: That is good. I move:

That section 1 of Bill 55, an act to amend the Copyright Amendment Act 1931, be amended by substituting for subsection (viii) the following subsection, namely:

(viii) The performance without private profit of any musical work at any agricultural, or agricultural and industrial exhibition or fair which is held under or receives a grant from or is promoted by dominon, provincial or municipal authority, provided that such performance shall be deemed to be given without private profit, if the only profit accruing to the society, board, or corporation or other authority holding the exhibition or fair is applied in the furtherance of the general purposes for which such society, board, corporation or other authority is constituted, or has returned to any dominion, provincial or municipal body such grant of money in aid of the said exhibition or fair.

The amendment will protect these fairs, great and small, and I submit they have a right to protection. The hour is late, and I shall not enlarge upon my observations.

The CHAIRMAN: May I point out to the hon. member for London that there is already an amendment before the committee.

Mr. RINFRET: I was going to call that to the attention of the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. member is in order in moving another amendment, unless the one now before us is disposed of.

Mr. RINFRET: The chairman is right. My colleague has moved an amendment; the suggested amendment of the hon. member for London is an alternative one.

Mr. BETTS: Yes.

Mr. RINFRET: We cannot deal with the hon. member's amendment until we have disposed of the one before the chair.

Mr. BETTS: I shall have an opportunity to move it after the amendment by the Postmaster General is disposed of.

Mr. RINFRET: It will remain on the record, in Hansard.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): It cannot be accepted as an amendment, because it does not amend.

Mr. RINFRET: The hon. member intends to move it after the amendment now before us is disposed of.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): The situation would be the same then as it is now.

The CHAIRMAN: We already have an amendment. Is the amendment to clause 1 moved by the Postmaster General agreed to?

Mr. ESLING: It is regrettable that we should be kept here at this late hour. The bill went to the committee two months ago, and as we have not been swamped with legislation I think it might have been considered earlier. Notwithstanding some observations made to-night I should like to share the views of some hon. members that the work and genius of a composer are his personal property to dispose of as he pleases. It is unfortunate that Canadian authors and composers have been forced out of the picture. The only way in which they could possibly get into the picture would be through the operation of the Canadian Performing Right Society, which is not a very happy avenue of recovery. This would more properly be entitled a bill to control the operations of the Canadian Performing Right Society than an amendment to the Copyright Act.

Probably there is not a member in the house who has not received some sort of protest from some portion of the dominion against the arbitrary activities of the Canadian Performing Right Society. We may admit that such a society is necessary. There are performing right societies in England and in other European countries. Then there was the Havana convention which takes in the South American countries.

The operations of the Canadian Performing Right Society have prompted a great deal of antagonism and, as I have said, there have been protests from practically every portion of the dominion. If those complaints are justified they exist simply by reason of the fact that this parliament has made them possible because of the statute. By the same token parliament can remove the difficulties; it can remove any cause for complaint against the operation of the Canadian Performing Right Society.

As early as February, I received complaints from my district. We ought to get away from the legal aspect of the question, if we can, and get the views of the man on the street, the man who does not understand what all this means. Copyright legislation does not appeal to many of us, but this bill is a matter of real interest to every hon. member because it affects every constituency, every municipality large or small, every community in which there is a broadcasting station, a theatre, a hotel, a restaurant, a skating rink, an entertainment hall or any public place in which music is played. The Canadian Performing Right Society is simply a subsidiary of the American Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers, and of the Performing Right Society of England, with the latter of which are affiliated the various societies throughout Europe. Each country gives these societies authority to issue licences and to collect fees for the performance of music. They saw that apparently Canada was a fertile field, and the Canadian Performing Right Society was organized. What were the assets? It was simply an assignment of the alleged control of two million pieces of music. No person knows whether those who assigned them to the Canadian Performing Right Society had any title to them. That society to-day does not know to what music it has title; it could not tell you, under any circumstances. But it is quite willing to assume that everything in the air belongs to it. They continued such arbitrary actions as the issuing of licences and the collection of fees. They fixed a minimum charge of $10 per annum. They virtually said to users of music in Canada: We control from two to three million pieces of music; some time within the twelve months to follow you will use some of those pieces; we shall not be there to check you up, so we are going to charge you a minimum of $10 per annum. There was not much said about this charge. As a matter of fact, the public generally were not cognizant of the operations of the society. But they became cognizant in 1935 when this minimum charge was raised to $30.

Forget about the large restaurant or hotel in the east, but think what this means to the modest restaurant or hotel in the west. A representative of the performing right society walks in and tells the proprietor that he wants $10. He shows him a list of the cases they have successfully prosecuted. The restaurant man does not know exactly what he is paying the $10 for, but this collection is always punctuated with a legal threat. The representative comes in again and asks for $30. When he is asked why, he simply says that they have raised the rates. That is all there is to it, and if the man will not pay, they threaten to sue. Such operations do not tend to promote very good feeling. You are required to make an application and attached to the application form or the bill or whatever it is, in many instances, are slips of paper showing the various cases which have been successfully prosecuted. Whenever authors or composers pool their works in such a society, it becomes inevitably a monopoly. This monopoly increased its rates and the result was the appointment of Judge Parker as a royal commissioner to make an investigation. To some extent, this bill is based upon the recommendations of Judge Parker.

This performing right society with its usual arbitrary attitude does not admit the right of this parliament to fix its rates or to interfere in any way with its operations. These operations are being conducted by virtue of the provisions of the Copyright Act, which permits the society to issue licences and to collect fees, and I submit that this parliament, therefore, has authority to remedy the arbitrary tactics of the society. The society takes refuge behind the fact that Canada is a signatory to the Berne convention. That may be so, but there is no obligation in that convention which delegates to this society or any similar society in another country the power to fix or regulate rates. As the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) said, the Berne convention gives the signatories all the rights and privileges of the other countries which are signatories in so far as the copyright laws of those countries govern. In other words, as has been stated before, the recognition of possession, the extension of protection and the means of redress are governed entirely and exclusively by the copyright laws of the country in which such redress is sought.

We come now to England. I must say that the Performing Right Society in England did not approve the Canadian Performing Right Society raising its rates, but the American company which practically controls the situation told the Canadian directors to put on more pressure and get more money. So the fees were arbitrarily increased to a minimum of $30. It must be remembered that that is a minimum charge, the fee being raised in accordance with the returns on the various pieces of music which are played. In the old country the rates are arranged to some extent by negotiation or arbitration, but in this country there has been no such thing as negotiation between the Canadian Performing Right Society and users of music. The society simply say: We want so much or we will sue you. Even with the arbitration and negotiation that went on in the old country, there were protests against the fees charged. Only recently the British Board of Trade made a recommendation to His Majesty's government that the British delegates to the forthcoming convention in Brussels should indicate to the convention that where excess charges are made by bodies which control a number of copyrights, legislation be brought down to do away with the copyright monopoly.

While the bill introduced by the minister may appear on its surface to have some merit, I am absolutely opposed to any further expenditure of money from the public treasury for the purpose of facilitating the collection of fees by the Canadian Performing Right Society. That is all it amounts to. This society has been so arbitrary in its actions as to require the expenditure of some $17,000 for the purpose of conducting an inquiry by a royal commissioner, and the appeal board set up by this bill will mean an expenditure of some $30,000 or $40,000 per annum.

Mr. RINFRET: Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to correct him? The members of the board will receive no remuneration. I am presenting an estimate of $1,000 to cover expenses for the coming year, which figure is far from the figures mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. ESLING: I shall accept the minister's explanation. It may be that the members of this board will receive no remuneration, but they will receive travelling and living expenses. I do not think the minister believes for one moment that all the disputes in connection with hotels, restaurants and broadcasting stations will be settled in Ottawa. That is not the intention of this bill as it provides that the members of the board shall receive travelling and living expenses. To receive those expenses in connection with a federal activity is a pretty good job at any time, even without salary. In addition to the travelling and living allowances to be paid to the members of this board, there will be the fees for the experts who appear before the board. Who will those experts be? They will be the representatives of the Canadian Performing Right Society who will appear before the board to try to prove that their fees are moderate and within reason. They will be paid from the federal exchequer.

Let us look at this matter from another angle. Why should the Secretary of State not appoint from his own department someone thoroughly familiar with the act, or why should the Minister of Transport not appoint a member of his department thoroughly familiar with radio and, to be fair, appoint a third member from the Canadian Performing Right Society? In view of the fact that this bill is intended to smooth out the wrinkles I suggest that the performing right society should foot the bill. There is no reason why one dollar should come out of the federal treasury in order to carry out the purposes of the act.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St.George has pretty well gone over the question of fees. No one knows anything about fees. The hon. member for Ottawa East will no doubt give us to-morrow a very full refutation of the adverse criticism made to-night, but what do we find in connection with fees? I submit that we are on very good ground when we take Judge Parker's report and any evidence submitted during the course of his investigation, and he shows that the society is collecting on the basis of ten cents for every receiving set in the dominion. If you inquire from the radio department you will find that there are about a million of which they have knowledge and a few hundred thousand more about which they do not know; you may be sure that the performing right society does not overlook any number of receiving sets, and their fees are allocated accordingly. But in the old country, instead of ten cents the fee is only 7¾ cents. What the man in the restaurant, what the man who runs an hotel or a skating rink says is this: "I have paid for a federal licence for my radio and the broadcasting station pays ten cents for every receiving set in Canada. Of what use is my radio if I must pay for the music that comes out of it?" The situation is ridiculous. If the broadcasting stations did not pay a blanket rate, the matter would be different. Take skating rinks. They can use only half a dozen records or so. They use gramophone records on which royalty has been paid, and these records are adapted to a certain rhythm for skating. They have loud speakers and they play the music over and over again. Well, they want to know why they should have to pay a minimum fee of $30 a year to the performing right society.

I would not hesitate to accord to that society every consideration in the world if there were Canadian authors or composers participating in the revenues collected by the society. As a matter of fact the society has said: "We are extending an invitation to Canadian authors and composers." Yes, they did, but only since Judge Parker submitted his report, because he said that in 1934 he could not find that one dollar went direct to a Canadian author, composer or publisher. It is true that some of them joined the society in the United States, and I know that to-day some Canadian authors are being invited to join.

I want to say one thing in conclusion. I am going to advocate that when this society goes to any man to collect $30, it should be required to present him with a list of the compositions to which it claims title. It is only since this house met that the amateur dramatic society of Toronto wanted to put on the Pirates of Penzance, and what happened? They wanted to broadcast it for seven minutes and the president of the dramatic society said: "We shall have to go to the performing right society and ascertain what we have to pay them." Well, they found that the fee was $61 for seven minutes, but the broadcasting station said no, and they put the matter into the hands of a solicitor and discovered that the Pirates of Penzance was in the public domain. The performing right society had no copyright in it. If that is done in one case, is it not reasonable to suppose that the people throughout the dominion have been generally mulcted? Those who come from the prairies know what it means for a man to put his brand on a steer that does not belong to him. There is a distinct place in society for such a man. Is there any difference between putting your brand on a steer that does not belong to you and putting your brand on music that is not your property and attempting to collect a fee for the use of it?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): The amendment does not carry. I am in the hands of the committee. I understood that we were to rise at twelve o'clock but I shall go on if the committee is agreeable.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Saturday).

The house met at eleven o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Ottawa, June 18, 1936.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate chamber Saturday next for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENT PRICES—RECOMMENDATION THAT INQUIRY BE CONTINUED NEXT SESSION BY SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald) moved that the fourth report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, laid on the table on Thursday, June 18, be concurred in.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to make a few observations with respect to this report. The course which has been taken by the committee is one that certainly does not commend itself to me, in view of the fact that a tariff board has been set up for the purpose of considering the very matter that has been referred to the committee and we have been expending substantial sums of money without obtaining, it seems to me, any real result. I think it desirable to make a few observations also because of the fact that in 1930 we increased the tariff on agricultural implements, and the action taken at that time by the manufacturers was, as has been represented to this house on more than one occasion, an undertaking not to increase the prices. During the period of time that elapsed from 1930 to 1935 they actually reduced the prices; in 1936 the prices were increased to the point from which they had been reduced, and I had hoped that there would have been a little clearer appreciation of and fairness to the interests upon which the west so largely rely for sustenance and support when they are bankrupt. I say that with great frankness. These western provinces are coming to the dominion, asking for money, asking the dominion to find it by borrowing from the people of the country, and then denying to industry the right that it should have to compete in its own territory upon at least even terms with those who would take its market from it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is hardly correct.

Mr. BENNETT: It is hardly correct?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is not correct at all, Mr. Speaker, but I wanted to be polite. I knew I was out of order but I wanted to be polite.

Mr. BENNETT: Then, if the hon. gentleman knew he was out of order there is no reason why he should depart from his usual custom and be polite.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I want to point out a few facts that I think should be borne in mind by every Canadian. First, we cannot build our country if we are going to do it on a sectional basis. I referred to that the other day in connection with another matter. The Canadian manufacturers have at no time during the depression used the tariff to exploit their customers, the farmers. Why have they not done so? Because, having given an undertaking that they would not increase their prices, they have maintained that undertaking and kept their honourable word to the people of this country. Second, the Canadian prices have not been materially, if at all, higher than the United States prices despite the advantage they have in regard to mass production. Third, Canadian prices of implements, as a whole, are not higher to-day than they were in 1930, despite the small increases that took place this year. Fourth, these increases only restored, in any event, reductions that were made in 1932 when the position of the farmers was so difficult. Anyone who is familiar with agricultural conditions in western Canada and who knows the extent to which the farmer has more or less relied upon credit for the purpose of obtaining his implements, cannot help but be aware of the fact that the implement companies took enormous losses and wrote off hundreds of thousands of dollars—I am not sure that in the aggregate it would not run into the millions—because of the depression. Then in 1932 they reduced the prices and the increases of 1936 only put them back on substantially the same basis.

The fifth point is that the Canadian companies made special provision for the wheat producers when conditions were at their worst, providing cash discounts and also reducing the receivables, that is, the obligations of the agriculturists, by very large sums of money when the situation was found to be at its most acute point, in 1933. Sixth, the Canadian companies, as I have pointed out, have taken great losses in notes due and interest due and have given the greatest possible consideration to their debtors as compared with that given any other class in this country. Add to that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and you have a situation that is not similar to that in regard to any other class in the country.

There is a seventh point to which I think attention should be directed, and it is this: In opening our markets to the large United States concerns without Canadian plants we have simply further divided the market, lessening the employment in Canada and rendering it more difficult for the Canadian manufacturer to reduce his cost of production. As to that

I think there is no reasonable doubt. Then there is a further point, the eighth point, that Canadian companies carrying stocks of machines and parts give service and extend credit to those who desire it on terms that are somewhat different from any other enterprise of which we have knowledge.

These seem to me to be compelling reasons why we should at least consider this matter on as favourable a basis as we consider any other enterprise. I am not arguing that any preference should be given these people but I do argue that they should have the same right that is accorded to others. While to others we accord an opportunity to appear before the tariff board to present their case, however, this committee now recommends that this shall be a continuing inquiry. The companies have already intimated that they desire to apply to the Minister of Finance for the opportunity to appear before the tariff board.

Mr. DUNNING: No, my right hon. friend is quite wrong. I have had no such intimation.

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly saw in the press that they proposed to ask for the opportunity to appear before the tariff board, and I remember passing down the street with one of the representatives of the companies whom I met. I asked him, "Are you going to the tariff board?" And he said, "Yes, if we get rid of this committee." That is as far as I can go. I certainly accept the minister's statement that no formal application has been made, but my understanding was that they intended to avail themselves of the offer the minister made the other day, when he said if they asked to have this matter considered by the tariff board he would permit that to be done.

Now let us look at it from another angle. Almost every other agricultural industry has some measure of protection in this country. Fruits have an ad valorem protection in the vicinity of 15 per cent. On cereals we have a protection ranging from 15 per cent to 80 per cent. Poultry has an ad valorem duty of between 15 per cent and 20 per cent. Dairy products are protected to the extent of from 15 per cent to 50 per cent, and the ad valorem duty on live stock runs all the way from 15 per cent to 70 per cent. These are the ad valorem duties dealing with farm products, and is there any member of this house who does not recall the agitation in connection with the increased duty on butter coming from New Zealand? The Minister of Finance of that day and of this day (Mr. Dunning) was compelled to give notice terminating the New Zealand treaty because the Canadian dairy farmer said he was not able to compete under the uneven terms that resulted from the imposition of so low a duty as that which then prevailed. The then government, the then minister who is the present minister, took steps to terminate the New Zealand treaty and on the very day that the succeeding government came into office the treaty was terminated.

I should like for just a moment to put this from the point of view of one who has been charged in eastern Canada, and especially in these two large central provinces, with having been unduly friendly—in the sense of giving public support—to the wheat grower. There was a time when wheat was sold in the markets of the world on a supply and demand basis, but with the support of various kinds that was given the wheat growers of other countries the Canadian position became such that steps were taken at the public expense to endeavour to improve the position of the wheat grower in this country. We have many things. In the first place we have a duty against importations of wheat from other countries, which is unimportant because we are an exporting country. Then we have the Crowsnest pass freight rates, which involve a very large sum of money per annum, being lower rates than those prevailing in the United States of America. Then we have the stabilization operations which were carried on under the aegis of the government which involved this country, on the application of the Minister of Finance, in an expenditure amounting to in the neighbourhood of $7,000,000. Further, we have the fact that last fall we fixed the price for wheat at 87½ cents, which price witness after witness has said is not an unreasonable price to have fixed for Canadian farmers. Wheat is now being sold at from seven and a half to ten cents a bushel less than the price paid for it. The Canadian people must bear the loss. I differ from the policy of the present government which makes that inevitable, but I just want to put it this way: the wheat eaters of Canada do not consume more than one-fifth of the wheat grown and sold. If by reason of the fixed price of 87½ cents that we now have we are involved in a loss of five cents a bushel, it means that the taxpayers, that is the wheat eaters of Canada, will pay a premium of 25 cents on every bushel of wheat they consume. That is what it means. And if the loss is 10 cents it means that for every bushel consumed in Canada a premium of 50 cents a bushel is imposed upon the consumers of Canadian wheat. That is a matter of computation. I repeat, we do not consume more than one-fifth of our wheat. If it means that we have a loss of five cents a bushel, that is 25 cents a bushel imposed upon the wheat eaters of Canada, the taxpayers; and if the loss is ten cents, it means fifty cents. Now, that will amount to many millions of dollars, $10,000,000, $15,000,000, whatever it may be. I put it to the house whether it is quite fair for the agrarians in the west to say to the manufacturers in the east that they, being in the centre of the most populous part of the country, where the larger part of the wheat is consumed, shall pay an added tax burden of 25 to 50 cents a bushel for what they consume, and expect them to contemplate with satisfaction their market being taken away from them by those who are outside of Canada. Is it fair? That is my point. I leave it at that.

One word more. This country according to the last census is no longer an agricultural country. Over half our population is now in cities and towns. We have become an industrial country, and we are taking our place now as the sixth trade country in the world—last year or thereabouts. That being so, can we contemplate with equanimity a situation which, without a hearing, reduces such measure of protection as was afforded to the manufacturers of implements, who had not raised their prices beyond what they were in 1932, and whose prices were not substantially different from what the prices are in the United States of America? It is true we exported some farm implements to the United States during recent months. Why? Because with the revival of agricultural production they found themselves short of implements, and we were sending implements to them as we did to other parts of the world.

I mention this at this time only because I cannot give concurrence to a report that contemplates sending back to a committee of the House of Commons, which has never been a useful body for the purpose of studying tariff matters, a question of such importance to every part of the country as that which has been under review. When I found the report of the tariff board on other matters accepted by the minister—and I cannot recall any reports made by the tariff board since it came into being which successive ministers of finance have not accepted and crystallized into legislation—

Mr. DUNNING: Not in whole, in all cases.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, substantially that is so. What is the exception?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: The exception is one of the reports this session.

Mr. BENNETT: To which does the minister refer?

Mr. DUNNING: I refer to the report which recommended that the government use its powers to increase the tariff when necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, that is only a matter of procedure.

Mr. DUNNING: That is a very important exception.

Mr. BENNETT: I quite appreciate that point. The point is this, that the board thought the government should be in a position where if conditions varied it could increase the tariff so as to maintain the basis upon which the recommendations were made. That is a matter of governmental policy which the government, with its expressed view of policy, of course would not adopt. But that has not to do with the point I was making. As far as tariff changes in ad valorem and specific rates are concerned I know of no case in which the rate recommended has not been adopted, substantially at any rate. That is the reason I suggest that this report, contemplating a further review by the committee, is not in the public interest.

Mr. THORSON: May I say a word?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. THORSON: Might I remind the right hon. leader of the opposition that there are other than tariff matters which must be inquired into in order to carry out the investigation entrusted to the committee by the house.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) indicates that other matters are to be inquired into. My impression of the reference was that it was for the purpose of ascertaining whether the tariff was adequate or inadequate.

Mr. DUNNING: It did not mention tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: The discussion in this house was about prices. It was said that there had been an increase in the price structure by the implement producers which was unfair, when there had been a reduction of duty; therefore there should be an inquiry into the matter. That is how it came about.

Mr. THORSON: No, the reference is to inquire into the causes underlying the high prices of agricultural implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices in 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: But undoubtedly in operation it has meant an inquiry into tariff matters.

Mr. THORSON: That is only one of the subjects of the inquiry.

Mr. BENNETT: One point more and I shall have concluded. We had before the price spreads committee and commission under oath a most complete inquiry, which may be found embodied in the minutes of that body. The matter was gone into in great length and detail. I have no desire to limit inquiries by any body that has to do with the conduct of the business of Canada, but why multiply them, when it accomplishes no useful purpose? There is the evidence before the price spreads commission; there is the report of the commission; here is the tariff board, and if it is desired certainly the minister has power under the tariff board act to direct that the board shall extend its inquiries, make them sufficiently wide to reach the very points that the committee has in mind. I can only say from observation during my experience in the House of Commons that I have never seen a House of Commons committee deal adequately with a matter of that kind, nor do I believe in the very nature of things it is equipped to do so. That is the reason the government, in dealing with wheat, said: We will have a royal commission. The very government that now is asking this house to vote concurrence in a report which contemplates the continuance of a committee to deal with the problem of implements of production, a matter closely allied to the wheat problem, asked the house to accept the view that there should be a royal commission to deal with the wheat problem, and not a committee of the House of Commons. I certainly agreed with them in that regard, and I do yet. I have no doubt that a royal commission is better able to deal with such a matter than a committee of the House of Commons. Why have two policies, one with respect to wheat, the other with respect to implements, which have already been investigated, and which the tariff board can deal with? As a matter of fact, dealing with the question of textiles, to which reference has been made—I can only pass it by because the report has not been made—no House of Commons committee but a royal commission was appointed to deal with that. If it is desired to appoint a royal commission to deal with this matter, well and good; I can understand that. But from what one sees and from the preconceived attitude of mind of those who have to deal with these matters in a committee of the House of Commons, is there any chance of being able to arrive at fair conclusions?

I have ventured, Mr. Speaker, to make these observations, because when in 1930 we dealt with an exceptionally difficult situation and had to do something to redress the adverse trade balance and deal with other acute problems connected with currency and finance, the duty upon agricultural implements was increased to a very high point. It was increased to a high point on one understanding, that it would not involve the payment of higher prices by those who used implements. And because the implement producers kept their word and maintained their honour in that regard, I do not think it is fair, in view of our present conditions, of the contributions we have made to the wheat growers in the west and to western Canada as a whole, and of the present economic conditions in the western provinces, that we should not afford some opportunity to the implement industry to present its case to an independent, fair-minded tribunal rather than to a politically constituted committee of the House of Commons.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it has already been pointed out by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) that the reference to the committee made on March 2 reads as follows:

> That an immediate inquiry be made by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization into the causes underlying the high prices of agricultural implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices in the year 1936.

There is no direct reference in that statement to the tariff question. Tariffs of course have an effect upon the prices of products, and, as has been often said, if tariffs did not have the effect of making an increase in price possible there would be no necessity for putting them on.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh, no; nonsense.

Mr. GARDINER: It is evident to almost any one that the intention of those who advocate tariffs is that there should be an increase in prices.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite the opposite.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not my intention at this time to go into a discussion on the question of tariffs. I wish only to point out to the house in the first place, the subcommittee of the agriculture committee was unanimous and in the second place the full committee was unanimous in its findings. There was only one point of difference in the committee and that was as to whether this investigation should be committed next year to the whole committee on agriculture or whether there should be a smaller select committee. The final finding was that it should be a small select committee.

I am surprised that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) should take exception at this stage to the adoption by the house of the finding of the committee, and I am astonished at the reasons he gives for taking that position. This is the first committee of this chamber upon which I have had the privilege of serving, but I believe I can say—and in this I think all hon. members of the committee from both sides of the house will agree—that we had the full cooperation of the implement companies in the investigation so far as it has gone. Representatives of the International Harvester Company came here in numbers from their head office in Chicago; others were here from Hamilton, and there were representatives from the Massey-Harris Company. They answered in every particular, so far as it was possible for them to do so in the time at their disposal, the questionnaire which was sent out by the committee, and they made no objection whatsoever to giving their evidence to the committee. The only reason a finding of a definite nature was not made by the committee was recognized by every member of the committee, and by those who represented the companies, namely that the evidence was not by any means complete. But I have no record, and I am sure the committee has no record, indicating that the representative of any of the companies objected to giving evidence to the committee, either during this session or at the next session.

Mr. BENNETT: It has never been suggested they had.

Mr. STEWART: How could they object?

Mr. GARDINER: It was suggested a few minutes ago that while walking down the street someone had said it should be before the tariff board.

Mr. BENNETT: That is different altogether.

Mr. GARDINER: That suggestion was not made to the committee, so far as I remember the representations made by the gentlemen who appeared before it. They gave their evidence without objection, and raised no objection to the committee hearing further evidence with regard to it.

Mr. STEWART: Is that not the proper attitude of witnesses before a committee of this house?

Mr. GARDINER: Certainly it is the proper attitude.

Mr. STEWART: Is it their business to suggest that some policy should be followed other than that adopted by the government?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: But is it not the proper attitude for every member of this house to accept the position taken by the representatives of the implement companies as being the position that we can expect them to take before a committee at the next session?

Mr. STEWART: Certainly.

Mr. GARDINER: All the evidence available will be given to the committee.

Mr. STEWART: They would have to take that position.

Mr. GARDINER: The whole speech of the leader of the opposition presupposes that some finding will be made by the committee on agriculture that will not be favourable to the implement companies.

Mr. BENNETT: Not any such thing, nor did I say it. I will not be misrepresented by this gentleman. I made no such suggestion.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, hon. members will have within their memory the words of the right hon. gentleman, and I shall go on to deal with a few of them at length, in order to indicate to him that some such suggestion was made. In beginning his argument the right hon. gentleman founded much of what he had to say upon the statement that the western provinces of Canada were bankrupt.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so, of course.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Of course they are not any more than in other places.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course it is not so; but it has been inferred in this house on another occasion during this session, by the leader of the opposition, that the western provinces are not in a position to finance, and I think some explanation of their position is due to the house. It was also stated by the leader of the opposition that this country is no longer an agricultural country. I do not suppose he will deny that statement.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; what he said was that this country is not an agricultural country solely, or only, or primarily.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Never was.

Mr. GARDINER: I wrote down the exact words of the right hon. gentleman as he uttered them. His statement was that this country is no longer an agricultural country.

Mr. BENNETT: And followed with a sentence afterward.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; true, he followed it by that statement. But his statement was that this country is no longer an agricultural country. I submit that will be news to many inside and outside of Canada. This country is still an agricultural country, and while probably no more than fifty per cent of our people are actually living upon the land, the right hon. gentleman's government, while it was in power, tried in every possible way to get a larger percentage of the people of Canada back on the land, because he realized it would probably be much better for us if more than fifty per cent were still on the land. In other words, this country from that point of view is preeminently an agricultural country. Then, in addition to that, the railways which have been built from one end of Canada to the other, the ships that are plying down the lakes and canals from the eastern ports to western Canada, those who are engaged in taking supplies into every agricultural community in the dominion are, in every proper sense of the term, concerned with the development of agriculture in Canada. All those who are interested in extending financial assistance to the people across the prairies, the people in the agricultural areas of eastern Canada, the farmers in British Columbia and the farmers in the maritime provinces—all these make their living from the pursuit of agriculture in some of its spheres.

I suggest that while only fifty per cent of the people are living upon the land, at least seventy-five per cent of them owe their living directly to the fact that agriculture is pursued in Canada. And for anyone even to suggest that Canada is no longer an agricultural country, when these facts are admitted by every member of the house and every person who has made a study of the situation in Canada, is to suggest a situation which does not exist.

I was astounded, too, at the statements made to the effect that agriculture has had more consideration from the governments of Canada than have the industries for which the leader of the opposition was speaking a few minutes ago.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I said no such thing, and I am not going to be misrepresented in this house in this way.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not going to take so long to make my points as my right hon. friend took, but that was the point he made.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not the point.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: You can call "order" as much as you like.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What is the point of order to which the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Bennett) is addressing himself, I should like to ask, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, the statement attributed to me was not made. I ask therefore that it be withdrawn.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman argued a few moments ago that the paying of 87½ cents a bushel on wheat under conditions where only one-fifth of the wheat of Canada is consumed in Canada meant the compelling of the payment with respect to the other four-fifths by those who were consuming that particular commodity in Canada of anywhere from 5 to 10 cents a bushel; or he indicated that if it were 5 cents a bushel it would be a certain amount, if it were 10 cents a bushel it would be a certain amount, and this was assistance which was going to the farmers of Canada at the expense of all the population. He pointed over to this side of the house—I do not know why, because there are members from western Canada sitting on the other side—and called the attention of the house to the fact that western members were making certain requests in spite of the fact that they were getting this assistance from the people of Canada through the government of Canada. Well, if there was any point at all in placing an argument of that kind before the house it was to try to convince hon. members that some consideration was being given to the farmers in addition to the consideration which is being given to people in other parts of this dominion. I suggest to the hon. gentleman, when he speaks of butter coming in from Australia, that the government of Canada for years has been subsidizing boats to bring butter from Australia into Canada to compete with our farmers. I suggest to him also that the government of Canada, whether Liberal or Conservative, has since the time of confederation been assisting other lines of industry. I am standing in my place to-day not for the purpose of objecting to the assistance that has been given, but for the purpose of pointing out to the leader of the opposition that when he contends that agriculture is getting more consideration than some other lines of industry in this country—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that or contend that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I am not going to permit that statement to be made. I have tolerated this long enough.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Tolerated it, oh!

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, tolerated it—that is what I said.

Mr. GARDINER: Some of us think we have tolerated the hon. gentleman for quite a long time.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. You had to deal with this thing the other day. No member from his place can attribute a statement to another member which he did not make.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, I have been following the argument of the hon. gentleman—

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the point. The question is the statement.

Mr. GARDINER: —and I think the conclusions I drew were reasonable inferences.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not complaining of conclusions. I am talking of the statement which the hon. member said was made by me, which I did not make, and which every member of the house knows I did not make.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the statement?

Mr. BENNETT: I wish to have that statement withdrawn, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARDINER: I would ask the hon. gentleman what the statement is that he did not make.

Mr. BENNETT: That is easily answered. The member stated—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, now that order has been restored, I wish to conclude. I was just observing that the member stated that I had said agriculture was receiving more consideration than was accorded to other lines of activity. I made no such statement, and I desire that statement to be withdrawn.

Mr. GARDINER: It will be within your memory, Mr. Speaker, that what I stated was that his argument led to that conclusion.

Mr. BENNETT: No, that is not what was said at all.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think the hon. gentleman has any more right to say what I said than I have to say what he said.

Mr. BENNETT: You can make this house ridiculous, Mr. Speaker, by a little effort, but I press the matter, Mr. Speaker. Do not for a moment, sir, think that I am going to yield on this point, for I am not. I did not make the statement that agriculture was receiving more consideration than anything else, neither did I argue it. On the contrary, I argued something else. I cannot question conclusions but I can question what the hon. gentleman says I said. As a member of this house I have certain rights which cannot be taken from me very readily, and I would ask therefore that I receive at your hands, sir, those rights which you have always accorded to others.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, if Hansard shows I made the statement which the hon. gentleman has just now said I made, I am quite prepared that it should go on Hansard that I withdraw. But I think he will find when he reads Hansard that the statement he infers I made was not made.

Mr. BENNETT: That is just the sort of thing that brings the house into a condition that we had not long ago. If the hon. gentleman conceives that to be a withdrawal, and you accept it, Mr. Speaker, it is not for me to question it, but it is for you to determine, as the custodian of the rules and conduct of this house, whether it is a withdrawal or not.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the house that there is a rule in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, No. 313, page 193, which says:

> It has been formally ruled by Speakers in the Canadian Commons that a statement by an hon. member respecting himself and peculiarly within his own knowledge must be accepted, but it is not unparliamentary to temperately criticize statements made by a member as being contrary to the facts; but no imputation of intentional falsehood is permissible.

And there are references to Bourinot, pages 352 and 365. It is sometimes difficult to determine the exact words that were used by an hon. member, and different interpretations may be given. I did not understand the Minister of Agriculture to attribute motives to the leader of the opposition, and as he has said that he is willing to withdraw his statement if it was contrary to the facts, I think he should be considered to be within the rules of the house.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer again to the point raised by the leader of the opposition. I was discussing the statement that this country is no longer an agricultural country and the arguments that were based upon that statement. I should like now to deal with the first remarks made by the leader of the opposition when he took the floor. At the beginning of his remarks he sought to imply that this investigation before the agriculture committee was being carried on largely as a result of discussions which had taken place in western Canada and as a result of requests from western members on this side of the house. In dealing with that he referred to the condition of the western provinces. This is not the first time this session that he has inferred that the western provinces of Canada are in a condition of bankruptcy, and in referring to them to-day he used the word "bankruptcy."

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARDINER: And now he says, "hear, hear." I should like to suggest that at least one province in western Canada has taken action to indicate to the people, both inside and outside the province, its exact position. I realize that when we look at the public debt of Saskatchewan we cannot help but see that it is of considerable proportions. I do not need to dwell upon the reasons for the proportions of this debt, but I think it is very suggestive that the greater part of it was added during the years between 1929 and 1934. At the moment I am not so much concerned about the public debt of Saskatchewan as a province, the debt which has been incurred by its government, as I am with the position of the people generally and their ability to pay as they go along and to liquidate their debts.

A great deal has been said from time to time about the condition of the municipalities in the three western provinces. I venture to say that the western provinces, and more particularly the province of Saskatchewan, will compare favourably with the oldest and most highly industrialized province in Canada, especially when a comparison of the financial positions of the different municipalities is made. When I make that statement I am not saying anything that is contrary to the facts. Inquiry was made into the debt situation of the people of Saskatchewan, and that inquiry is not yet twenty-four months old. As a result of that inquiry it was determined—I speak from memory and the figures may vary a little, but only a little—that two-thirds of the school districts in Saskatchewan had no debenture debt whatsoever, and over one-third of the school districts had no indebtedness. A condition of that kind is not so bad.

It was found also—again I speak from memory—that only 16 out of 301 rural municipalities had an indebtedness of more than $200,000. The increased indebtedness of these sixteen, and much of the indebtedness of many of the others which had a debt under $200,000, was because of the relief payments during the last four or five years.

As far as individual indebtedness is concerned, the last census showed that something in the neighbourhood of fifty per cent of the people in the province had no mortgage indebtedness against their property. I do not know that anyone is justified in getting up in this house when we are dealing with a report that has to do with the price of farm implements and stating, with regard to a province with such a record, that after all the consideration that has been given to a part of the country where bankruptcy prevails, we should not be passing the inquiry in connection with this matter to a committee to meet in a succeeding year.

I scarcely understand the argument of my right hon. friend when he suggests that a committee of the house cannot investigate a matter of this kind, at least to the stage of obtaining the facts. Publicity would be given to the evidence presented from day to day in the press of Canada; it would be broadcast over the country, and irrespective of what finding might be made by the committee, the people of Canada would formulate an idea as to what that finding should be at all stages before the committee. If the committee to be appointed next session found. after all the evidence was before it, that they could not come to a conclusion, there would still be sufficient time to refer the matter to the tariff board or to some other board that might be able to inquire further along certain lines. The tariff board certainly would not inquire along the same lines as the committee has already started to inquire.

For the benefit of hon. members who were not on the committee, I may say that in view of the intricacy of the matter referred to the committee, the house was asked to consent to the appointment of counsel and accountants in order that the necessary information might be gathered. That was agreed to. Under the instructions of the committee, the accountants and counsel prepared a questionnaire which was sent to all the important implement companies. They in turn consented to make a return. As we drew towards the end of the activities of the accountants and the counsel, it was evident that the house would conclude its session before a report could be made. The implement companies were asked to come before the committee and answer such parts of the questionnaire as it was possible for them to answer. This they consented to do. The answers to the questionnaire which had been placed in the hands of the counsel and the auditors constituted only from sixty to eighty per cent of the information asked for. The companies indicated their willingness to present the other twenty to forty per cent to a committee on a future occasion. The committee thought it highly important that evidence should be heard at a succeeding session, in view of the fact that the companies could not be brought back this session.

According to the report of the committee, the questionnaires and the answers received have been placed in the custody of the Minister of Agriculture. The instructions of the committee are that the officials should receive the remaining replies or any other information which may be available as a result of the sending out of the questionnaires during the interim. All this information is to be submitted to the house through a committee at the next session. I do not know of any more reasonable way of dealing with the situation. I suggest to the leader of the opposition that for the time being we forget any argument we might like to present with regard to tariff matters, or any argument we might like to advance with regard to other matters, and that this report be allowed to go through in its present form. At the next session, when all the information is produced to the committee, the house will be in a position to determine whether there should be a further inquiry by a committee or whether it should go elsewhere. At the moment the committee is of the opinion, and I think it is unanimous, that the proper thing to do is to have this investigation submitted to a smaller committee to meet at the next session. That committee can receive the evidence in full and either make a report or recommend something further.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): In my remarks with reference to this subject, Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to be brief. The reference to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization was in these terms:

> That an immediate inquiry be made by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization into the causes underlying the high prices of agricultural implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices in the year 1936.

I confess that I was astonished when I heard the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) oppose the adoption of this report. I thought from his argument that there was a misunderstanding in his mind as to the terms of the reference. As I see it, the tariff in its various phases is only one of the fields of inquiry that the committee should explore. Not only the tariff on the finished agricultural implements, but also the various tariffs that apply to the materials that go into the manufacture of such implements should be investigated. There is a wide field relating to the tariff that ought to be explored, but the tariff field is not the only field that is of vital concern to the farmers of this country, and when I speak of the farmers of this country I mean not only those of western Canada but also those of Canada as a whole. All of us who represent agricultural constituencies in this house know intimately the deplorable condition of agriculture at this time throughout the whole length and breadth of Canada. There are other fields of inquiry that, as I have said, should be explored. There is for example the whole question of the efficiency and the capacity of the industry which serves this country in the matter of agricultural implements. We must go into the question of capital set-up, of possible overcapitalization. We must consider the equipment of the various plants engaged in this industry, with a view to determining whether such equipment is in excess of normal, ordinary demand or is adequate to the demand that might be expected. We must also investigate the very wide spread which exists between the price of the machine at the door of the factory and the price the farmer must pay for it when it is delivered to him. The whole field of distribution of agricultural implements is one that needs to be explored. All of these are important lines of inquiry.

I have a high opinion of the tariff board, but that board is not equipped for the conduct of an inquiry of this kind. Its duty is to determine what should be the tariff to be put into effect on any particular commodity. But as I have pointed out, the scope of this inquiry is very much broader than that of tariffs alone. Nor has the tariff board either power or jurisdiction under the statute to undertake an inquiry of this sort.

I believe all the members of the agriculture committee were convinced that not before in the history of this parliament has there been a reference to a committee so involved and intricate as the subject matter of this inquiry. There must be a detailed and careful search into all the factors that enter into the cost and the present price of agricultural implements. The committee was fortunate in having the services of counsel and an accountant, and in the course of preparation for the purposes of their inquiry they prepared a most exhaustive and thorough questionnaire. Everyone realizes the value of careful and intense preparation for the prosecution of such an inquiry as this. That exhaustive preparation has been made. Copies of the questionnaire have been sent to the companies. The companies have sent their replies to the questionnaire—in some cases fairly complete replies; in others replies not quite so complete. In addition, not all the replies that have come in to the questionnaire are wholly upon the same basis, and it will be necessary for the purposes of a continued inquiry to coordinate and correlate the information supplied by the various companies.

It is highly desirable that this inquiry should continue. It is in the interests of the farmers of this country, and of the industry itself. I believe that if it is thoroughly and properly made it will benefit both the farmers and the persons who are engaged in the agricultural implement industry, because the interests of the two groups are related. If the farmer is not able to pay, how can the agricultural implement industry prosper?

The committee approached this inquiry in no spirit of hostility towards anyone, but rather with the desire to ascertain as completely as possible the essential facts. There were no preconceived ideas in the minds of the members. There was the desire to ascertain facts, so that upon the ascertainment of the facts a report could be prepared that would be of real value to the people as a whole, both to the farmers and also to the persons engaged in the industry. The fields of inquiry are important. Never yet have they been properly explored by any parliamentary committee or by any agency instituted by parliament for the purpose. In my opinion this is the most important inquiry that parliament has had to deal with for a number of years.

I would be inclined to agree, with qualifications, with one suggestion made by the right hon. leader of the opposition. I thought he was wrong in suggesting that this inquiry should be made by the tariff board, but perhaps that error was due to a misunderstanding on his part as to the terms of the reference. However, I do agree with him that a royal commission might conduct the inquiry with greater thoroughness than could a committee of the house, whether the standing committee on agriculture or a special committee to which the subject might be entrusted. I agree with the leader of the opposition in that expression of opinion because of the involved and intricate nature of the proposed inquiry. But while a royal commission could explore the fields of inquiry that have been opened to us by the exhaustive and careful preparation that has already been made, it by no means follows that a committee of the members of this house could not make a proper and thorough inquiry. It would be difficult for such a committee to carry out the investigation that should be made in this sphere, but it is not impossible, if hon. members would devote to it, with its intricacies and its difficulties, that intense application, that careful study, and that willingness to ascertain the facts which are requisite for the purposes of a report that would be of any value.

I think there will be agreement in the house, as there was in the committee, that this inquiry is such an important one that it ought to be continued. Frankly I would have preferred to have the inquiry made by a royal commission, but next to a royal commission I would like to see it carried on by a committee of the house. I think members of this house may be trusted to give such an important inquiry the study and application it deserves. Therefore I support the motion for concurrence in the report, and I hope that in view of the statements that have been made the right hon. leader of the opposition will withdraw his opposition to the motion so that the house may be as unanimous in adopting the report as the members of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization were in presenting it to the house.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word, as a member of the committee and perhaps also because of my association with the little group in this corner. We want to see as thorough an investigation as it is possible to make into this question of agricultural implements. I believe it is always difficult to get a commission which will command the confidence of all the people of the country, but having listened to a great deal, though not quite all, of the evidence, it seems to me that the matter is tremendously involved. Early in the inquiry I was greatly impressed with the very efficient work that was being done by our own bureau of statistics. I think if I had known as much about the bureau of statistics earlier as I did later I would have expressed myself as unfavourable to engaging any other assistance in order to bring out the facts in relation to this matter. However, that was done and I concurred in it because, in common with most of the members of the committee, I thought it the best thing to do.

With regard to the recommendations of the committee, Mr. Speaker, I think it is doubtful whether a large parliamentary committee such as has been going into this matter can arrive at a unanimous or nearly unanimous decision, because there are political streams which we must recognize. If the government could appoint a body that can command the respect of the producers and the people of Canada generally I believe it would be well worth while, even with the expenditure involved.

With regard to the tariff board, I think that perhaps the board has the confidence of the people of Canada to a greater extent than such boards have had in the past; nevertheless the tariff board views a problem from the standpoint of the tariff, and, that being the case, I do not think it is altogether fitted to look into this matter as we wish to have it looked into. There are so many factors involved. When I listened to certain evidence, to which I am not going to refer because we are more or less under obligation not to do so, I could not help thinking that this is something of a tangled skein and it strikes me that the tariff board is not the body to look into questions of capitalization, the various methods of doing business, the profits as between different parts of an organization, and so on. Consequently I am going to support the motion for concurrence in the recommendations of the committee.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is dealt with by this house I should like to say just a few words. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) has read to the house the terms of reference in regard to this matter, which apparently were misunderstood by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). The terms of reference provided that an immediate inquiry should be made by the standing committee into the causes underlying the high prices for farm implements, with particular reference to the advance in price for the year 1936. In my own mind I am sure the right hon. leader of the opposition misunderstood these terms, because he embarked on an abusive harangue to some of the members on this side of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I rise to a point of order. I am now going to protect my rights in this house as far as I can. I direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the hon. member used the words "an abusive harangue," which are offensive words and must be withdrawn. It might also be well to direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that when a point of order is raised it is the duty of the hon. member who has the floor to take his seat.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I shall withdraw the words, immediately and unreservedly, but I may say that it was in view of the kindly and polite way in which the right hon. gentleman addressed himself to me when I ventured to pass a remark that I thought he was under a misapprehension. If not, I am all the more surprised that he should have advanced the reasons he did advance in objecting to the motion for concurrence.

Here we have the greatest industry in Canada; it has been so for many years in the past and is likely to continue to be so for many years to come. The right hon. gentleman says the industry does not take in half the people of Canada to-day. This industry of agriculture has been sick almost to death during the past five years particularly, the years during which the policies of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition have been in effect.

Mr. BARBER: Oh.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Oh, what? My hon. friend from Toronto knows that what I am saying is the truth. He knows it in connection with the people with whom he deals.

Mr. SPENCE: I did not say a word.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am sorry, but I did not mention any name, so I do not see how the hon. gentleman can say I referred to him. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that this great industry, the greatest in Canada, is financially sick nigh unto death because of two things principally, drought and weather conditions in one part of Canada and, for the rest, mainly the policies of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition for the last five years. On the other hand here is a secondary industry, a subsidiary industry, which is very important to the primary industry of agriculture. It too is sick almost to death. Why any man who has the well being of his fellow men at heart and who has the well being of the primary or secondary industry in mind, should object to a searching, kindly, adequate inquiry into the causes underlying these high prices, which have made it impossible for the secondary industry to sell its goods to the primary industry, is beyond my conception.

Mr. BENNETT: Once more I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I did not object to the most searching inquiry being made; I only indicated the tribunal that should make it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I accept the words of the right hon. gentleman, of course, but let me say that he shows little faith in his fellow members of this house, which is not surprising to me because he has shown little faith or confidence in them for the past six years. He persists in reading lectures to them at every opportunity. I have listened to them and taken a great deal of pleasure out of them, because I have laughed at them within myself, and probably will continue to do so.

What does the right hon. gentleman want us to do? He wants us to stop looking at the underlying conditions with which the order of reference asked us to deal. He wants us to get away from that point and to confine the inquiry to the question of the tariff on implements and to submit that matter to the tariff board. The right hon. gentleman knows more about that board than I do. He knows how its members were appointed; he knows the previous occupations of some of the members of that board. I am not going to mention any names, but it is well within the knowledge of members of this house that one of the gentlemen whom he placed on that tariff board was previously a valued employee, a salesman, of one of the companies that would have to be investigated. I do not say that that would affect his judgment, but I do say that it would affect—

Mr. BENNETT: I had no knowledge of that fact until now.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): My right hon. friend has less knowledge about the men whom he places in high positions than I should think would be desirable. I am not saying this should be held against the gentleman whom I have in mind and whose name I will not mention, for I have no desire to draw attention to him. But I do say that the farmers of western Canada who were induced to buy combines in districts where combines were not suitable or profitable, by the gentleman whom I have in mind and who is now a member of the tariff board, really could not be expected to have much confidence in the decisions arrived at by that same gentleman, knowing his bias in matters of tariff, implement companies and that sort of thing. Therefore I think the people of Canada, east and west, would have more confidence in a committee of members of the House of Commons, of whom my right hon. friend seems to have a lowly opinion as to their capacity as investigators of a question of this kind, than in the kind of tariff board that we have at the moment in Canada.

Now the leader of the opposition says that this matter should not be further investigated by a committee of this house because the implement companies should have a fair chance in their own country and their own market. That was a cry that was very popular five or six years ago—that the manufacturers in Canada should have a fair chance in their own market. The market for farm implements in this country, Mr. Speaker, is not the property of the implement companies of Canada. The farmer is the only one who owns that market. He is the one who has to buy, and to say that a few companies, employing a few men in this country, should have that market, that it should be their market, and that it is to be treated as though they had a monopoly ownership of it, is most unfair.

Then the right hon. gentleman adds that they did not raise their prices because they agreed not to do so. Well, that is a most amazing statement. I am surprised that even the leader of the opposition, little as is the knowledge he has shown in the house at times this session in connection with some matters when he has lectured us so profusely, now makes it a virtue. I am amazed that he does not know more about this question than to try to make it appear as a virtue that the implement manufacturers did not raise prices between 1930 and 1932 or 1933. Everyone knows that the only reason they took lower prices was that they could not sell their goods. I hold in my hand an official document which leads me to believe that they did not in fact lower their prices. The president of one of the companies, on the stand the other day, told us under oath that they had not lowered their prices during these years. In order to encourage sales and try to collect their money they gave a discount in addition to the cash discount. What they did in connection with collections was to give a small discount, and part of the same policy was to give a higher nominal price for wheat in order to collect more money in that way. But whereas many other companies were in a position to give and did give very large discounts, the implement companies limited themselves to something like ten per cent. I am not complaining of that at the moment, but when the leader of the opposition says they did so and so, it should be remembered that they did it because they could not help themselves. They could not raise their prices in those days because they could not sell their goods as it was.

I have been told many times during this session that the companies agreed to do certain things. I read here the words of my right hon. friend in which he says that the manufacturers of implements are of the opinion that the consumers of agricultural implements should not pay higher prices for them. And they are equally emphatic in the statement that if the Canadian market is secured to Canadian factories instead of opened to a volume of goods manufactured elsewhere they will not increase prices to consumers, with this important proviso:

> Provided the factors entering into the manufacturing costs are not increased.

The promise was not worth the paper it was written on. This promise I find was signed by seven companies. But the one large company, the company that sets the pace, the company that supplies a very large percentage of the implements in Canada, did not have its name on this promise. And when the vice-president of the parent company, the president of the Canadian company, was asked the other day who had made the promise and in whose name it had been made to the government of that day, he knew nothing about it. When the document was looked up it was found that the name of the largest producer of agricultural implements in this country was not there.

Now I pass to another matter. I say it is necessary that a certain inquiry be held into this matter by those who are in sympathy with the needs of the primary industry, to which the secondary industry is so important. The companies during the last few years, we are told, have lost large sums because of their ventures in foreign markets.

Mr. SPENCE: Does the hon. member not believe it?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is not the point. I am glad my hon. friend asked the question. The point is that companies enjoying twenty-five per cent protection under the regime of my right hon. friend, and having the advantage of many other forms of protection, which were not of value to but were a distinct detriment to the primary industry, were investing their money elsewhere, money they had accumulated from the Canadian primary industry; and they lost it elsewhere, not by hundreds of thousands of dollars, but by the million, on this and other continents. They lost money galore everywhere. Then they come back and say that the Canadian farmer, because that is the market in which the Canadian implement manufacturer happens to be located, should be pleased to allow them all the protection that the high-minded tariff advocates of this country want to give them.

I want to say a word further about the success that came to the companies during the time my right hon. friend gave them such extreme tariff protection, protection which he himself acknowledges to-day was very high. In the four years from 1926 to 1929, when a reasonable tariff policy was in effect, the average number of employees in the Canadian agricultural implement factories was 10,844. In the four years of the high tariff regime, the regime of the leader of the opposition, the years 1931 to 1934 inclusive, the average number of employees in these same factories fell to 3,493 per annum, and the output was reduced from $40,000,000 to $5,000,000. The industry was sick almost to death financially, and it is time it was looked into and investigated by those who have the greatest interest in it. Let me quote one or two figures.

During these years with which I have just been dealing, when the number of employees fell from 10,000 to 3,400 and the production declined from $40,000,000 to $5,000,000 a year factory valuation, I find that costs of certain kinds went up very greatly. I have here a statement of one of the largest companies in Canada, giving the average cost of six implements in 1913 and 1933. Some one might say, why bring in 1913 and 1933? But the prices of farm products to-day are comparable with prices in 1913.

I find several increases in cost, some reasonable and others unreasonable. For instance, the prices of material at the factory increased 77 per cent. Productive labour increased 105 per cent. Prime cost was therefore increased by 83 per cent. But listen to this amazing item: Other factory expense increased by 505 per cent during these twenty years. Most of that increase was incurred during the period 1930 to 1934; lack of sales, because of lack of flexibility of price structure that would enable the implements to be exchanged for a comparable amount of agricultural wealth, caused such a decrease in production that other factory expense was increased by the enormous percentage of 505, against 105 per cent for labour and 77 per cent for material, or an average increase of prime cost of 83 per cent.

Another Canadian company had an increase in this item of 247 per cent as against an increase for productive labour of 27 per cent. That is very striking. I would like hon. members to bear it in mind. During the years from 1913 to 1933 for this large Canadian company the increase in cost of materials was 64 per cent; the increase in productive labour was 27 per cent, the prime cost increase was 58 per cent, but the increase in other factory expense was 247 per cent. I submit that when conditions of that kind are found, something should be done about it.

Mark you, these conditions existed and were accentuated during a time when, because of two specific conditions I have mentioned particularly, one the climatic conditions in western Canada and the other the effects of the economic and fiscal policy of my right hon. friend opposite, the income of the farmers in the province of Saskatchewan—and I will take that province only because the evidence respecting it we have had before us recently—had dropped from the high mark of $333,000,000 to the low mark of $66,000,000 between 1925 and 1931. That income of $66,000,000 is spread over a million people who had formerly enjoyed an income of $333,000,000 from agriculture alone, leaving aside their secondary production. My right hon. friend knows that the prices of implements had increased to such an extent, in comparison with prices of agricultural products, that instead of taking 200 bushels of wheat to buy a binder, as it did in 1925, it took 1,500 bushels of wheat at the low of the 1932 crop price to buy the same binder. These are extreme figures, and I would not want anybody to think I am giving them to the house as average figures—not at all. But during those years when the income of the largest Canadian customers for the implement people was being reduced from $333,000,000 to $66,000,000 the cost of the implement was going up, in terms of goods that the customers of the implement people were producing, and in actual cost. Those costs were going up in some items at the rate of 505 per cent and 247 per cent as against a time in 1913 when the prices were comparable.

I do not think there is much more I need say at this time, except to point out that there are many factors entering into the question of cost, namely, conditions of sale, freight rate, methods of shipment, and methods of collection, which sometimes add a great deal. Then we must consider customs and valuation for duty purposes. I wonder what the leader of the opposition will say when I tell him that in the sworn evidence we found that a Canadian subsidiary of a great American manufacturing company was being charged $200 per piece more on an American tractor coming into Canada than the American selling agent was being charged. I repeat that there was an additional charge of $200 per piece on the same kind of tractor.

Mr. SPENCE: You heard the reason for it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes, I heard the reason. I am asking my right hon. friend what he thinks of his policy which made it necessary to have such a condition. And in addition to the increased value for duty purposes on tractors there were increases on other implements of around 13½ per cent. The present mark-up as against what the parent company charges the American company is around 6⅔ per cent. That is something which I am sure the committee will be interested in looking into at the next session if a committee is appointed—and I hope it will be. Six and two-thirds per cent is too high to-day, but what do we think of 13½ per cent and 25 per cent, amounting to $200 on a tractor sold in the days of the régime of the leader of the opposition?

What did that mean? It simply meant that the Canadian company was not able to make a profit at the prices they charged the farmer on goods they sold those farmers. Those very products were made by the owners of the same parent company; they were made in one country. But my right hon. friend's administration which was so much embarrassed for money in those days was content to see those profits stay in the country to the south of us where a foreign government was collecting taxes due to them; it was content to see the Canadian company struggling along without making as much profit on these particular items as it would have made if it had not been for these charges for duty purposes.

We are told that the companies lost much money under these conditions. Of course they did. With a flexible production and an inflexible price structure I do not see how those companies could avoid losing money, and they will probably continue to lose money until the time comes that they are able to sell their product at a lower price in relation to the prices received by their customers for what they have to sell.

There is one observation I should like to make here before passing on, and that is as to the opinion expressed by the leader of the opposition that the agriculture committee has never been a useful body in respect to tariff matters. That is his opinion, and he is entitled to it. But I do not think he sat in on the agriculture committee to listen to the discussions. I would say that probably never in this house has a committee worked with a more sincere desire to obtain the truth first. Perhaps some of us looked for one thing and some for another, but the desire of the committee as a whole was to learn the truth in order that they might know how this question might best be approached. We cannot get at the truth by lowering the rate of duty on one particular line of implements. Back of that line it is important to know how much protection, how much privilege and how much added cost to the consumer of those goods in Canada went into the factories and machinery that built this implement, that went into the homes and into the cost of living of the man who had to produce it. I do not mean to say that those men working in Hamilton or Brantford are too highly paid for making implements; I do not suggest they are overpaid, but I do say that the cost of their living—not the standard of living—in this country, and particularly in the last five years, has been too high in comparison with the purchasing power of the people to whom they sell their products. That has resulted from the fact that for many years many artificial charges have been loaded on to everything that has been done in connection wtih the living which these men are able to obtain from their work in the plant. It is added on to the clothes that they wear, the roofs that shelter them, the furniture that surrounds them and everything that goes into their mouths. Everything that they use has been loaded up with undue costs, and that is passed on to the machine they turn out or any other wealth they produce. It could not be otherwise. The loaded cost or, as the manufacturers describe it, the added burden, is passed on to the primary producer who simply cannot pay these prices and compete with other people in the world market, where his competitors are free from such high costs. The attitude of the committee which has just made its report was to try to learn more about these things in order that they might more intelligently weigh the facts.

There are two large companies in Canada, and we are led to believe that they are not in good shape financially, and that something must be done for both of them before the situation can be improved. But when the leader of the opposition says that the agriculture committee has not been a useful body—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I took down his words at the time. These are the words he used, "The agriculture committee has never been a useful body in respect to tariff inquiry matters." That is what he said.

Mr. BENNETT: That is different altogether.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I said that a minute ago, and he denied it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not correct.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There are many other matters in addition to direct tariffs which must be inquired into. There must be tariffs back of many articles which have led to an accumulation of costs, and that is a condition which must be investigated.

Dealing with the agriculture committee the right hon. gentleman referred to the preconceived attitude of mind of those who deal with such matters on the committee, and he went on to read the lesson that the committee could not deal with the matter fairly because of that preconceived attitude of mind. I want to tell him that the members of the committee, as a composite body and as individuals, are more open-minded, to say nothing of their intelligence, than some of the appointees he made to the tariff board to whom he would have this matter referred.

I just wish to add one word in answer to the statement of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I am glad to see he is supporting the motion, even if he had to support the leader of the opposition to a certain degree in connection with the tariff board. He said that the tariff board has the confidence of the people to a greater extent than any previous board has had their confidence. That is a matter of opinion, and he has a right to express it. I do not want to go into detail in the matter, but I would say that within the past few months the people of Canada have shown whether or not they have confidence in the tariff board as at present constituted.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would say that this inquiry, which was commenced but not completed because of lack of time, should be carried on by those who are sympathetic and know something of the difficulties of the primary industry, and who are inclined to look without prejudice upon a secondary industry that is most important to the primary industry. The inquiry should be committed, in short, to those who will carry on the sort of investigation which the agriculture committee has carried on. It is a matter of record that the implement people who came before us assured the committee that they were highly pleased with the courtesy and consideration and kindliness with which we endeavoured to get the information that was desired. There was no misunderstanding. They were asked to give certain information, and a great deal more information will no doubt be required. But as to the manner of securing the information that was placed before the committee, the implement people expressed themselves as highly pleased. I have great pleasure in supporting the motion.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other members of the house have been trying to conclude the business of the session, that we should lose so much time having to listen to a tirade of abuse from a member of the agriculture committee, one of the worst kinds of political speeches that we could hear at this stage of the session.

I am quite satisfied that the committee were sincere in their viewpoint, but their viewpoint was different from mine in many instances. I do not criticize the committee for that. We started to investigate the price of farm implements, which meant implements all over Ontario and all over Canada, and finally we wound up with nothing accomplished, nothing but talk about Saskatchewan, Dakota and Montana. That is all that was talked about. On two or three occasions highly technical men from the departments gave us lectures that I do not think five per cent of the committee understood, and in the end we wound up by sending out questions to the farm implement people, who told us they thought they would not be able to answer them for two months, and so the work of the committee was held up for a considerable time.

I am of the opinion that an investigation is not needed at all. I am not in favour of these royal commissions. All they do is spend money and the only result is that we are poorer and poorer. We had the International Harvester people before the committee and the evidence they gave was satisfactory. No one can doubt that Mr. Russell of the Massey-Harris Company gave his evidence in such a way that only a suspicious mind could come to any conclusion other than that the Massey-Harris Company were doing their very best for the farmer, and doing a great deal more than they were getting credit for. He showed that the losses in the farm implement business were very heavy, and that bad debts were very heavy. That is one of their great difficulties, that they have to get the money somewhere. It is like going to a specialist on one particular disease. My friend might go to one and take so long that he would be charged $1,000, while I, because I am poor, might be let off with $100. The same sort of thing applies in the farm implement industry. They have to try to make up their losses through bad debts; they have always got to figure that in their overhead.

Some hon. members should get a training in the business world and then they would be better able to criticize men in the business world. The wheat industry is not the only industry in the world. I am sorry it was interfered with, and it would be better off if it had not been interfered with, but the only way to get it back to where it should be is to make up your minds to play square with the consuming public and give the buyers in Great Britain and elsewhere a square deal —give them what you are purporting to sell to them, without mixing grades and deceiving them. There is too much interference in business.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Hear, hear.

Mr. SPENCE: You want to be a Mussolini, a dictator, like you did on the committee.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I have no desire to prolong the proceedings, Mr. Speaker, but my hon. friend has just done the very thing of which his leader complained so bitterly a few days ago. He has called me Mussolini, and I know that he will be pleased to withdraw that remark.

Mr. SPENCE: I should not have used the word, and I apologize, but will anybody say that my hon. friend did not try to be a dictator on the committee—I think that is parliamentary, Mr. Speaker. I did not intend to insult the hon. member, for whom I have a great deal of regard.

I was saying that these investigations only mean a waste of public money. We started our investigation on March 17 by selecting a lawyer, whom I am not going to criticize, but who acted like a police court lawyer when it came to getting evidence. We also selected an accountant, a high type of man, I assume, and we have spent a lot of money, probably $15,000 or $20,000, but what have we accomplished? I admit that the recommendation we made was the only one we could make under the circumstances. We had to compromise. We could not do other than recommend a continuance of the investigation. I was personally opposed to a royal commission because I thought it would cost too much money. I have to make every dollar I get and I do not like to see money wasted.

I say without fear of contradiction that only a man with a suspicious mind would think that the implement people were not giving this country a square deal. As a matter of fact I believe the implement people are getting the worst of it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): We never said they were not.

Mr. SPENCE: But the inference was that something was doing something to somebody. Evil be to him who evil thinks.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not care to interrupt the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) in his very moderate and courteous observations, but perhaps I might now answer his question by referring to the statute. What I had reference to was subsection 5 of section 4 of the Tariff Board Act:

> It shall also be the duty of the board to inquire into any other matter or thing in relation to the trade or commerce of Canada which the governor in council sees fit to refer to the board for inquiry and report.

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the standing committee and having attended, I think, every meeting, I am amazed at the turn which this discussion has taken. We were not able to finish our inquiry into the price of implements and make a complete report to the house, and it is likely that another price list will be given out by the implement manufacturers before the inquiry is completed. That is the sad part of it. We have heard a great deal about Saskatchewan and the west, and the condition in which they are placed because of these things. In the district I represent I do not think five per cent of the farmers have a full equipment of efficient machinery. That has been the condition during the last four or five years. The situation was so serious that they did not know what to do regarding further investments, with the prospects that lay before them.

I was amazed to read a little while ago that the prairie provinces from 1900 up to the present time produced $12,500,000,000 of new wealth; that is equal to $1,000,000 per day. And yet we find these people in the situation they are in to-day. We must remember that if western Canada suffers, the rest of the dominion will suffer with it. Our interests are theirs, and on behalf of this group I wish to express our concurrence in this report.

Motion (Mr. Weir) agreed to.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

WRECKS IN ONTARIO WATERS

On the orders of the day.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a short question of the Minister of Marine (Mr. Howe) with reference to two wrecks which occurred yesterday in Ontario. One was at Amherstburg, where the steamer Tashmoo, with 1,100 passengers, had great difficulty in making shore, and the other was at Brockville, where the steamer Kingston was damaged. Is it the intention of the minister to have the wreck commissioner hold an inquiry under the act?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine): I have asked the officers of my department to investigate both these matters. If an inquiry is called for it will undoubtedly be held.

NIAGARA RIVER SHOAL

On the orders of the day.

Mr. H. E. WILTON (Hamilton West): Will the minister look at the conditions on the Niagara River, where there is a big shoal three miles long, and large steamers are running over it? It is partly in American waters and partly in Canadian.

[Mr. Needham.]

COPYRIGHT AMENDMENT ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO FEES, CHARGES AND ROYALTIES, AND TO CONSTITUTE A COPYRIGHT APPEAL BOARD

The house resumed from Friday, June 19, consideration in committee of Bill No. 55, to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last night we were discussing section 1.

Mr. RINFRET: Before we proceed with the discussion of the section, I desire to say a word or two with regard to a remark made by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) before the house rose at one o'clock. The hon. member has been very accommodating, and my observation is made in a friendly spirit and is, I hope, courteous in relation to his view of the matter. The hon. member said that he thought this matter should go before a committee before the house passes upon it. May I remind him and other hon. members that there is no subject upon which so many committees of the house have sat as that of copyright. We have had them from year to year and from session to session. Besides that, there have been two inquiries, one by Mr. Justice Ewing, which was held in 1931, I believe, the other one by Mr. Justice Parker, in 1935.

I repeat that the object of this bill is neither to redraft the copyright bill, nor to abolish it, as some hon. members, to judge from their remarks, seem to think, but to regulate the matter, and only on the points that have been touched by the inquiry of Judge Parker and his commission. The recommendation is for an appeal board. In other words, the inquiry that my hon. friend wishes to have continued by sittings of a new committee of the house can be made before that appeal board. Representations from both sides can be made to that board, which will sit from year to year. But I say again that it is urgent that we adopt some legislation before parliament prorogues. We cannot continue in the undecided state in which the whole question is at the present time.

Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, and very properly so, because there was no discussion on the second reading, you gave quite a leeway to the various speakers to deal generally with the question in discussing the first section. I understand that the hon. member for Ottawa East wishes to speak to this matter. I am sure the committee will give him the same latitude that was given to the hon. member who spoke yesterday. But once that is done the committee, I suggest, should be ready to proceed with the two sections of the bill, and as they are very clear, we can deal with them in an orderly but expeditious way.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): In these the dying hours of the present session it is not my intention to traverse all that was said yesterday in the three hours during which we listened to speakers on the other side. I have no hesitation in saying that at least nine-tenths of what was said last night was absolutely irrelevant to the issues now before us. What we are confronted with is the bill in committee. The bill is divided into two clauses. There is an amendment to clause 1 which I shall speak about in a moment or two. At the outset I desire to say that this bill was more or less called for by reason of the legislation which was enacted by the previous secretary of state. It would have been very much better if that legislation had not been enacted at all. In that event we should not have been faced with the conditions that now confront us—a most difficult situation, not for the performing right society as such, because I am not concerned with it as a performing right society, but for the authors.

This bill is not a bill for the performing right society. This is a copyright bill, and so long as we continue to misunderstand the purport and intent of the bill, so long we shall face the difficulties that we experience at this moment. The copyright law is not for the purpose of protecting some society; it is for the purpose of affording that rightful protection to which authors are entitled by law. I said it had been called for by the legislation that was passed by the former secretary of state and upon which Judge Parker's report was initiated. It would have been very much better if that investigation had not taken place in the manner in which it did. We are not concerned here with the control of the performing right society, because it was on trial before Judge Parker, and nobody in that instance received any measure of justice. The authors got no justice and the users of music got more than they were entitled to.

I say at the outset that this bill, when enacted, will have the result, by giving effect to section 1, of making clear the statutory permission to infringe copyright in flagrant contravention of an international agreement and in defiance and violation of authors' personal rights, and, by giving effect to section 2, of establishing and fixing rates interfering with the collection of fees, again in violation of an international agreement and in defiance and violation of private rights; and thirdly, in an endeavour to meet an isolated case, namely that of the performing right society—which, by the way, is a very bad way of legislating, from the particular to the general—of inflicting heavy and unjustifiable hardships upon innocent bystanders, all of which, again, is in flagrant violation of an international agreement and in defiance of private rights.

Time will not allow me fully to go, as I should like to have done, into the question of law, but I gravely doubt whether this matter could not have been achieved, and the present situation remedied, by a procedure altogether different from the creation of an appeal board and inflicting upon authors the restrictions which are again inflicted upon them. I should have been satisfied to make an endeavour to reduce the restrictions that were placed upon the authors, but apparently it never rains but it pours, and now I am faced, in an endeavour to remove the difficulties that previously existed, with an amendment conceived for the purpose of making more onerous the inflictions upon the authors, through the extension of the unwarranted privileges that are now being accorded to industrial fairs. First we had this provision giving agricultural fairs the right to use the music of these composers without obtaining their permission and without paying fees. Now we find that is not enough, that up to the moment the composers have not been sufficiently ill treated, that in their greed some people have insisted that industrial fairs now must have the same privileges. If this sort of thing continues there will be nothing at all left for the authors.

I should like to point out also, Mr. Chairman, that up to the moment there has been no definition of an industrial fair, and if this amendment passes and becomes law it will provide another subject of contention, as to what constitutes an industrial fair. We will not only be faced with the situation that existed up to the time the Canadian National Exhibition was sued by the Canadian Performing Right Society in order to determine what was private profit; the situation will be made even more complicated. In that case the court decided what private profit meant. Now we are to extend the law and inflict further restrictions upon the rights of the authors.

I wonder if hon. gentlemen really appreciate the position of an author. This morning the right hon. leader of the opposition said that protection existed for practically everybody in industry, and he mentioned the fruit growers and others who were protected. With that I have no quarrel, but it seems that in Canada the only one who is not protected is the Canadian author. May I cite what the honorary secretary of the Canadian Authors' Association says:

> The basic fact of all the feeling against the performing right society (and against the composers and authors for whom it acts) is that the public has not yet realized that composers have both moral and legal right to be paid for their work, and next, that (with the sheet music and gramophone records for private use practically superseded by talkies and radio), the only means they have of getting paid is through performing rights.

Now by this amendment covering industrial fairs, to this further extent we desire to deprive the authors of their rights.

I am going through my notes rather hastily, Mr. Chairman, but yesterday we were told what copyright was. Well, the copyright with which we are concerned is not the copyright as defined by Webster's dictionary or any other encyclopaedia; copyright is defined in terms of the law and section 3 of the Copyright Act says:

> For the purposes of this act, "copyright" means the sole right to produce or reproduce the work or any substantial part thereof in any material form whatsoever—

Then paragraph 2 of article IV of the convention of Berne says:

> The enjoyment and the exercise of these rights shall not be subject to the performance of any formality; such enjoyment and such exercise are independent of the existence of protection in the country of origin of the work.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment exempting industrial fairs unduly takes away from the rights of the authors. In this matter we are not at all concerned with the performing right society. That society has nothing to do with the rights of the authors, in regard to letting their works be used for fairs, whether they are under the control of the dominion, the province or the municipality. Why in the name of common sense should a composer be forced to allow his music to be played gratuitously at any agricultural fair under the dominion, province or municipality, or at an industrial fair? Why, Mr. Chairman, the peanut vendor is paid at these fairs; everyone makes money at these fairs except the author. The farmer makes money; he is protected, but the author is not protected. I do not believe there would be any fairs if there were no music. Everyone is prepared to pay all those who have anything to do with the fair except the author who provides the very first requirement in order that the fair may be held. I do not think the point needs to be elaborated to show how illogical, how uncharitable and, I might even say, how unlawful that is.

While I am on this point may I say that in taking this step we are not only dealing with Canadian authors. Under the terms of the convention of Berne a large number of authors living in such countries as France, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland and many other countries are protected in Canada. If I had time I could easily proceed to show that while we in this country have the right to treat our own nationals in any contemptible way we may wish, the law of the land is that we cannot treat nationals of other countries in the same way. We can do what we like with our own people; we can be as mean as we wish towards them, but if we act in that way towards authors belonging to nations other than Canada we do so in flagrant violation of the convention of Berne. If proof of that statement were needed I could go back to 1921, when the licensing clauses were under consideration. The then Minister of Justice, Mr. Doherty, decided that the licensing clauses placed in our law could be operative only in connection with our own nationals and not in connection with the nationals of other countries who were protected by the convention of Berne. So I submit that by taking this action we are not showing respect for an international convention in which we have participated. We are told that this does not amount to very much, that the authors will not lose very much in the way of fees by exempting these small fairs. But, Mr. Chairman, may I point out that at page 42 of the Parker report 278 fairs are listed in the province of Ontario.

I have not time to go through the whole of the report or to traverse everything that was said last night, but most hon. gentlemen who spoke then stated that the fees charged were exorbitant. I am not concerned with whether it is the performing right society or any other society that collects these fees. These are the fees of the authors and composers, and I say we have not the right to place this further hardship upon them. For the time being the Canadian Performing Right Society is the duly constituted agent of a certain number of authors, and they have the right to collect their fees.

Mr. BETTS: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Last night I listened with great patience to every speaker on the other side, and time is now so limited that I hope they will extend to me the same courtesy that I extended to them.

The rates were stated to be $5 to $30 a day; I say it is not so. The Parker report shows that no such fees as $30 a day were exacted. But if they had been I say it was perfectly all right, because after all those would have been the fees the authors would have asked, and if people do not like to pay for music why should they have it? If they do not want to pay for a fur coat why should they get it? After all, my property is mine and if anyone wants to use it he should pay for doing so. Although hon. members say the performing right society gathered in the fees, the evidence will disclose that none of the small fairs operate for more than a day or two; even if they paid $5 a day for two days it would amount to only $10, so that at no time is there any such amount charged as was stated last night.

I am sorry I have not the time other hon. members had, but if I had and proceeded to show what the Canadian National exhibition in Toronto gathered in in the way of fees and what they paid for the privilege of using this music, hon. members would be astounded. The society submits that a fee of $982 for the use of music at the Canadian National exhibition during 1935 when the total attendance was 1,444,000 is prima facie evidence that the fee is fair and reasonable. It is also established in evidence that large sums are paid annually by the Canadian National exhibition to the performers of music. There was spent on bands in some years I think $35,000 or $40,000. In 1934 the bands got about $15,000. There was a definite understanding that Rudy Vallee would get somewhat less than $30,000 for two weeks. I could continue that ad nauseam but I do not think I should insult the intelligence of the committee by further argument that the authors have a perfect right to ask what they think right for the performance of their music. If they choose to select the performing right society or any other society to represent them for that purpose I care not. If the performers desire to use the music they should pay what the authors ask; if they do not want to pay, then let them not play the music.

May I point out also that there is a public demand for this music. The author is protected during his lifetime and fifty years thereafter. Every day a tremendous amount of music falls in the public domain which may be used free, and not only music but all kinds of artistic and literary work. Why do not those who use this music take that which they can have free? But it is with them just as it with moths; you always find the moth in the nicest piece of fur, and you always find these people trying to get the latest music and paying nothing for it.

Now that is in relation to clause 1. Under the terms of the Berne convention and under the terms of the Copyright Act we have no right to take the music of any Canadian author, or of authors of any of the other nations adhering to the Berne convention without paying proper fees. I submit that it is a further spoliation of the author's rights to enact this amendment into law.

I should like to proceed with the other feature of the bill, that which has to do with fees. The explanatory note to the bill reads thus:

"10c. In March, 1935, His Honour Judge Parker was appointed a commissioner under subsection 2 of section 10 of The Copyright Amendment Act, 1931 (hereby repealed) and under the Inquiries Act, to investigate and report whether the Canadian Performing Right Society Limited or any other society, association or company proposed to collect excessive fees. The commissioner submitted a report which, inter alia, recommended the appointment of a copyright appeal board and also recommended modifications of the tariff filed with the minister by the Canadian Performing Right Society Limited in January, 1935. The act, chapter eighteen of the statutes of 1935, provided for a stay of proceedings pending the receipt of and action upon the commissioner's report. This section is designed to enable the governor in council to provide for the revision of the tariffs filed in January, 1935, in the light of the recommendations contained in the commissioner's report and also to prevent the recovery of fees or damages in excess of the fees prescribed by the governor in council.

Here is a piece of legislation directed against one society. As a result of the investigation that took place into this society, and followed by the Parker report, we now have general legislation affecting everyone that may be in the same position, every society, every company, all who may deal with performing rights, whether rightfully or wrongfully, whether they charge proper fees or whether they do not, whether their business was investigated or whether it was not—all will be subject to this iniquitous legislation. I say that proceeding from the particular to the general is as bad a way of legislating as could possibly be conceived.

If I speak of the performing right society I do so for two reasons: because it is the collecting agency for the composers, and because any fair-minded member of this committee is interested in justice. Let me point out that you can legislate against this society; you can legislate it out of existence if you like, but by doing so you would be depriving the musical composers and authors of what is at the moment their only collection agency. But notwithstanding that, you cannot compel authors and composers to accept fees that this committee or anyone else may desire to impose. You can do as you please with that society but you cannot fix the fees to be received by composers, whether nationals or those outside Canada. That is the situation. I have a telegram from John M. Elson, secretary of the Authors' and Composers' Association of Canada, protesting against this legislation. He says:

Meeting executive Authors and Composers Association of Canada Doctor Healey Willan presiding following resolution was passed on motion Sir Ernest MacMillan: We desire as representing authors and composers throughout the dominion to protest strongly against passage of Bill 55. This measure we feel distinctly contrary provisions Berne convention and will react unfavourably against Canadian authors and composers whose works may be performed in other countries. Authors, composers, publishers appeared before Parker commission but our evidence seems to have been ignored judging by page 46 of Judge Parker's report and terms of Bill 55.

Those two statements are true:

We request you to delay this measure for further consideration.

Appropriating to myself the words of a Canadian musical publisher and composer, I say that no other country in the world, not even the most barbarous, has treated the rights of its authors and composers as Canada proposes to do under this bill. Whether or not it is against the letter of the Berne convention it is certainly against the spirit of it. The memorandum addressed to the Prime Minister states:

The curtailment of the rights of foreign authors and composers in Canada is bound to react unfavourably upon the rights of Canadians in foreign countries. This was the case in connection with the mechanical royalties which Canadian authors and composers struggled so long to acquire. If this bill is aimed particularly at the Canadian Performing Right Society, would it not be better to control the society in some other way rather than by imposing hardships on Canadian authors and composers?

Is not that a fair request, Mr. Chairman?

Copyright is a property right vested in creators of intellectual work and as such should be subject to the same laws of supply and demand as any other commercial commodity. Compulsory charity is not relished by Canadian authors and composers. Other property owners are not compelled to hand property to a charitable organization.

Is there any place in Canada where a Sunday school organization may ransack a bakeshop to get supplies for a Sunday school picnic to be held to-morrow, because it is for a charitable purpose? Is there any place in Canada where a person can go into a retail store and take goods, clothing and provision for the upkeep and maintenance of the needy, simply because it is for a charitable purpose? Is not this property just as sacred as any other?

The world's best music is free to all users. Mendelssohn, Handel, Schubert, Beethoven, are free to all. While the performing right societies control the majority of present-day copyright works they have by no means a monopoly. The music users might create their own music.

There are a number of other observations which could be made along the same line.

Coming back to the proposed change in the law, may I place on record subsection 2 of section 10, under which the investigation took place:

Whenever in the opinion of the minister, after an investigation and report by a commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act, any such society, association or company which exercises in Canada a substantial control of the performing rights in dramatico-musical or musical works in which copyright subsists, unduly withholds—

Who will say that they unduly withheld? We have had an investigation, and it has been stated that they did unduly withhold. Why should they not withhold? Why should I not have the right to withhold my musical composition? It is not something like insulin; it is not something which could be classed as a necessity of life. Music is not a necessity of life. It is not the object of public utilities corporations, as are telephone or steamship lines. Why not withhold? It is suggested that if I do not wish to let my song be played anybody can come and take it over, and pay what he wishes, and I must let it go. Then the section continues:

... or proposes to collect excessive fees—

Why be so arbitrary? I cannot determine for myself what the fees shall be, but have to be kept within bounds by a guardian who will look after my fees. It continues:

—or otherwise conducts its operations in Canada in a manner which is deemed detrimental to the interests of the public.

Can anybody by any construction, say that the withholding of a piece of music from public performance or otherwise is detrimental to the interests of the public? Yet that is the law. But what I want to point out is that the law as framed to-day affects the performing right society and every other society now doing the same thing in the same way in Canada. May I point out that in addition to the performing right society there are French societies which control a certain number of titles, and the former Secretary of State is not without knowledge of them. For instance, one of the largest societies now doing business in France and Canada is La Société des Auteurs, Editeurs et Compositeurs de Musique. That society, doing business in France and Canada, was never the subject of the investigation. Yet by the operation of this act that company has to go through every one of the things iniquitously prescribed, in violation of the convention of Berne, in violation of our own statutes, and in defiance of property rights. Those other companies have to do that. I cannot help the inflicting of the direct punishment upon our own societies, even to our own disgrace, but I do say there is an international statute which ought to be respected and which is not being respected by this law, nor was it respected by the former law.

May I say a word about the findings of the commission. The most important problem before the Parker commission was the determination of what would be a fair tariff or fee. In the first place there was no legal right to go into that matter. The report states:

> It is a fair assumption that the present tariff of the Canadian Performing Right Society Limited was made higher because of the expenses incurred in persuading a public that was often unreasoning and ignorant of the society's legal rights to purchase a licence.

I, the author, who owned the play or composed the music or wrote the work, have to suffer because the public was ignorant.

> The demand for payment by the society was regarded as an unjust imposition, and the music user honestly believed that the author, composer or publisher was not entitled to any payment for his performing rights.

If the public were ignorant to that extent, does it mean that this committee must inflict punishment upon authors because of the ignorance of the general public?

> Due to the very nature of the intangible right possessed by the society, it is most difficult, if not impossible, to determine what is a fair fee.

Notice the unfairness of all this.

> The society, however, is not in as good a position as the broadcasting stations themselves to determine—

Substitute the words "author and composer" for the word "society," because the society is the collector. Then we say that "the author and composer is not in as good a position as the broadcasting stations themselves to determine what part of this gross should be contributed by the various stations in Canada, and it was suggested by one of the witnesses, who was closely connected with broadcasting, that an association of the various stations could best determine what each station should contribute." Is that a fair statement? Is it fair to go into a store and say, "I know better than the merchant does what he should charge for his wares. If he does not want to take what I offer, I have a right to appropriate it unto myself." Then, with regard to theatres they say:

> The commission is of opinion that the 1935 tariff is excessive.

I am not concerned about the performing right; I am concerned only about that which is due to the authors. That is the only way in which it can be collected. May I say right here and now that if this attitude is continued and if the pious or expressed wish of the gentleman who spoke last night is that of putting the performing right society out of business, I do not care if it does, but if they do put it out of business then I ask hon. members to notice the chaotic condition into which you will throw the authors and users of music. There will then be no one to whom one might go in an endeavour to make a bargain or to procure rights to perform. All people who operate hotels, theatres, music halls and the like who have to pay fees from time to time will be driven to finding out who the authors and composers are and endeavouring to make bargains with them. Just imagine what the condition will be! Instead of dealing with one corporation in Canada you will have to try to find out the name of the copyright owner in Canada, and what if he happens to be not in Canada but in Switzerland? If, without his authority and consent his music is used, then so long as the law remains as it is and so long as the rights are still preserved for him, he may invoke the law for infringement of his copyright, and one can readily appreciate how difficult it will be to secure the consent under such conditions. It simply means that if this is to be pursued the whole organization will be broken down.

Mr. ESLING: Probably a good thing.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Probably a good thing, the hon. gentleman says, but then he is driven to the situation I have just explained, and may heaven help him then, because if he wants to obtain by proper legal means the right to perform music or a play, he will have the obligation put upon him to find out the copyright owner, and probably the author. I know that my hon. friend has too great a sense of justice to want such a situation as that to exist. May it not be that there is some nefarious influence at work for the purpose of wrecking this society and every other such society in order that some people may unduly appropriate to themselves that which does not belong to them and perform it without paying any fee.

We heard yesterday that this was a racket. I am not concerned with the word racket. I am concerned only with the one racket which some people are establishing in another attempt further to strip the composer of his rights through the amendment that is being proposed. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the author in Canada is placed in a tremendously difficult situation. He has to enter into competition with such companies as Famous Players Canadian Corporation. Let us see what obstacles there are in his way. Nobody mentions this, nobody presents the counterpart of the difficulties of the author and composer. Let us see who is directly opposed to the author. Let us see who is the one who is trying to take unto himself without any payment the works of the author. The gross earnings of Famous Players Canadian Corporation in 1935 were $1,788,000, and the current assets of the corporation $2,000,000. We have all these other corporations, which time does not permit me to mention, leagued together in an endeavour to get every possible drop of blood out of the author and composer and pay nothing for it in return. We have all these other concerns on whose behalf Colonel Cooper has been so continuously active to take away by all conceivable means from Canadian authors and composers every bit of revenue they might possibly obtain. Let us see what his activities are in connection with this matter, and I mention this to show what authors and composers have to suffer. On November 16, 1935, shortly after Judge Parker had made his report, Colonel Cooper wrote to a Mr. Hess, one of his New York correspondents, the following letter, which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of March 26, 1936, and in the Ottawa Citizen of March 31, 1936:

> The agitation for the royal commission and the investigation under the royal commission have occupied a good deal of our attention for nearly two years and I am glad to have it behind me. We still have to get an order in council through at Ottawa implementing the report. After that will follow some amendments to the Copyright Act in the next session of parliament.

That is what Colonel Cooper says. That is the way in which the rights of Canadian authors are recognized by the general public.

May I again point out, what I stated before, that in one of the reports of the committee it was shown that $90,000 was paid for rentals, $65,000 to the performers, and $20.24 for fees for the music. There was $20 odd paid to the authors and $150,000 for rentals and talent. I have here a reply from Mr. Paine, of New York, in answer to a telegram of mine:

> If an artist of Rudy Vallee's importance performs an evening of Irving Berlin music, ten songs in the broadcast, which goes over a national hook-up of fifty stations, according to figures given me by National Association of Broadcasters, Irving Berlin would receive fifty cents for each station or twenty-five dollars for his contribution to the success of broadcast, Rudy Vallee would receive three thousand dollars or more for his contribution, and the broadcasting station would receive seventy-five hundred dollars, approximately, for its contribution. This indicated disproportion of receipts by creator of the musical works and inadequacy of his remuneration, for without him in the first instance the program could not have been given.

That is true, Mr. Chairman, all along the line. Without the music in the hotels there would be less food consumed; there would be no dances; there would be no circus without music. And yet the fiddler, the man who plays the music, the dancers and the entertainers and everyone else are paid.

The CHAIRMAN: I must inform the hon. member he has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. RINFRET: I do not think we should continue on the same lines all the time. Every copyright discussion in this house and in committee has always brought forth an exposition of both sides of the question. But there is one point to which the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Chevrier) alluded in his very striking although not true picture of the situation to which I should like to refer. He mentioned Rudy Vallee performing an evening of Irving Berlin's music. Now, I wish to make a complete distinction between a performer being paid for a personal appearance and a performing right being paid to a composer. When Rudy Vallee appears in person the people want to see him and hear him in person, and they will come no matter what music he sings. Irving Berlin is in a different position. He might get a smaller amount that night than Rudy Valleee got for performing his music and making a personal appearance—I do not know whether the figures are correct—but do not forget that probably at a hundred different places Irving Berlin's music was being played that night, in hotels, at the theatres, in dance halls, everywhere, and I believe very strongly that Irving Berlin made more money that night than Rudy Vallee. As a matter of fact Irving Berlin is a very wealthy man, and if you want my personal opinion of Rudy Vallee, high priced vaudeville artist, and Irving Berlin, the composer of much jazz music, I think both of them are very much overpaid.

Mr. WILTON: Mr. Chairman, having already spoken on this question it is not my intention to take more than a few minutes in reply to my hon. friend from Ottawa East (Mr. Chevrier). But first I want to compliment the minister (Mr. Rinfret) upon his explanation in reply to the statement that hotels and entertainment places could not be run without the performing right society. I do not think I ever heard such nonsense in my life, and I commend the minister for straightening that out.

Throughout his address the hon. member for Ottawa East has stressed the point that his whole effort is to protect the authors. Well, Mr. Chairman, the performing right society does not aid the authors one iota. I understand that the authors do not benefit from the activities of the performing right society to the extent of one single penny. Canadian authors do not get one penny of the money collected by the performing right society. A large number of the authors of musical compositions sell their works outright and have no further financial interest in the matter. A large number of the authors of musical compositions for which this organization collects reside in the United States. The whole thing can be summed up in just a few words: It is a yankee doodle racket which is playing Canadians for suckers.

The hon. member says that this is detrimental to the authors, but I would point out that it is detrimental to the public, and when I say the public, I mean the taxpayers. The activities of this organization have forced the government to spend money on royal commissions, and the government is being forced to spend still more money on the creation of a board to regulate this piratical organization. Much stress has been laid upon the protection of the author, but as a Canadian I am interested in protecting the taxpayer. That should be the object of every hon. member of this house and every loyal Canadian, especially when the authors are not benefiting from this organization to the extent of one single penny.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, upon inquiry last night from the minister I learned that for the fiscal year ending January 5, 1936, approximately $113,000 have been collected by this Canadian Performing Right Society Limited. It seems to me that this whole system is entirely wrong. The efforts of genius, whether they be expressed in inventions, discoveries, compositions or in any other way, are in the public domain the moment they are placed before the public. Patent rights and copyrights have been instituted in order to enable the responsible people to make more profit over a certain limited period of time. Eighty years ago a patent had a life of fifty years, to-day its life is under twenty years. The term of copyright is continually being reduced. The productions of composers and authors should be in the public domain; for that is where they belong.

I admit that we should respect the Berne convention and any other convention to which we are a signatory, but the government should eliminate the collection of fees by the performing right society. A flat rate could be given to the society by the country and we could have done with all this nonsense of people going through the country suing the small theatres and individual performers. I think this could be done for a flat rate of less than $100,000. I assume the company's costs of collecting $113,000 would be twenty per cent. The government could set aside $10,000 a year for the first few years to pay Canadian composers according to the number of times their productions were played over the radio and by performers throughout the country. In that way we could develop music in the country and as the venture proved its success, we could increase the amount to the point where we would have some real cultural development in Canada.

Mr. BETTS: Mr. Chairman, last evening I moved an amendment to section 1 of this bill which was ruled out of order. In a moment I intend to move a subamendment to the amendment of the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott). In reply to the eloquent plea of the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Chevrier) for the rights of the authors and composers, I must say that I would have been more impressed with what he had to say if he had told us how many Canadian authors or composers are members of this association.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Seven.

Mr. CAHAN: In that case they must have come in within the last month or two.

Mr. BETTS: They were not members at the time of the Parker inquiry. I am speaking on behalf of all the agricultural and industrial exhibitions in Canada, and I should like to point out the results of this licence fee, as disclosed in the evidence taken before the Parker commission. The evidence of Mr. John A. Carroll, superintendent of agricultural societies in the Ontario government, is to be found at page 1306 of the evidence. He pointed out that some 292 fairs were conducted under his supervision in Ontario in 1934. These different fairs were in receipt of legislative and municipal grants. No effort was made to make a profit, but if a profit was made, it was devoted to the improvement of agricultural conditions in the community or returned to the municipality or the province or the dominion government which had made the grant in aid. He went on to enlarge on the excellent work that these fairs were doing, and I do not think I need to elaborate that.

I would remind hon. members who come from rural ridings of the helpful activities carried on by these fair associations through the years. There are boys' and girls' clubs and the fair comes along as a sort of day of achievement. The youngsters come to the fair with the animals they have been attending or with whatever exhibits they have to offer. They find out what is going on in other parts of the district and they have a most cheery day. The band plays, which is a good thing. If there is any class of people who get the minimum of relaxation and cultural advantages, it is the people in the farming community.

Mr. Carroll went on to give instances which had come to his notice as superintendent of these societies where those in charge of the fairs were deleting music from the program because of the licence fee being demanded. Many of the smaller fairs are carried on entirely through voluntary efforts. The directors are not paid and much of the actual manual labour is done free of charge. The horticultural societies in the district may scrape together a little money to hold a fair and if they want some music they are forced to pay a fee to this performing right society. This society has a very wide outside field in which to work. There are the hotels, the public dance halls and similar places, and it should leave these educational and instructive country fairs alone.

The hon. member for Ottawa East referred to the contemptible way in which we treat our own nationals, and he spoke of the greed of the exhibitions and fairs, as I remember, and used the word "uncharitable." I should like to remind him of some of the remarks made by Mr. Jamieson, the president of the Canadian Performing Right Society Limited, when in the witness box before the royal commission. He was asked as to the basis of the fees charged and how he conducted his tariff making operations when it turned out that those from whom a fee was demanded were unable to pay it. His answer in effect was that that was something for them to worry about; that was their business—if they could not pay the fee they could do without the music. I think the words he used were that the society was in no way concerned with the ability of the music user to pay. That will be found on about page 198 of the evidence. Later he said there were no Canadian authors or composers in the membership of the society because the Canadian authors and composers were too greedy.

I have to agree with the hon. member for Ottawa East when he says that this legislation is actually an interference with private rights, but we have heard the principle expounded in this chamber time after time that although private rights must be preserved throughout the country as far as possible, when private rights conflict with public rights, to a certain extent private rights must yield. When that was expounded in the course of the past week or so I think it was put something like this: There may be, there undoubtedly are, times when private institutions view matters exclusively from the point of view of their own shareholders and investors, and private interest becomes contrary to public interest. At all such times the public interest should be made to prevail. Music, when it is controlled by a monopoly, is in a sense a public commodity, just as transportation is, or bread, or coal, or any other necessity. The hon. member for Ottawa East says that music is not a necessity. But it is pretty close to becoming a necessity, and it is an extraordinary situation, when we spend large sums of money training the young people in our schools in an appreciation of music, if we do as is done in Ontario in connection with these fairs—exempt them from payment of the amusement tax in respect of the admission fee, and then permit this performing right society to crack down on them and deprive a number of the small fairs of the right to have music. Therefore I am going to move an amendment to the amendment, in the following terms:

That the proposed amendment be amended by striking out all the words after the word "only" in the seventh line thereof and substituting the following: "profit accruing to the society, board, corporation, or other authority holding the exhibition or fair is applied in furtherance of the general purposes for which such society, board, corporation or other authority is constituted, or is returned to any dominion, provincial or municipal body which granted money in aid of the said exhibition or fair.

Just to explain the purpose of that amendment, may I state that it would leave subsection 8, which is the subsection defining private profit, as follows—perhaps I should explain that the purpose of the subsection is to exempt from payment of a licence fee any performance without private profit, which the subsection goes on to define:

The performance without private profit of any musical work at any agricultural or agricultural and industrial exhibition or fair which receives a grant from or is held under dominion, provincial or municipal authority, provided that such performance shall be deemed to be given without private profit, if the only profit accruing to the society, board, corporation or other authority holding the exhibition or fair is applied in furtherance of the general purposes for which such society, board, corporation or other authority is constituted, or is returned to any dominion, provincial or municipal body which granted money in aid of the said exhibition or fair

As I said last night I am entirely in sympathy with the purposes of the amendment of the Postmaster General, but I fear that it will not accomplish its object, because it limits its definition of "performance without private profit" to cases in which the only fees which are paid are paid to individual performers or their agents. My submission to the committee is that a bandmaster cannot be properly called an individual performer. His very function militates against that description. He is a conductor. And if you limit the exemption to cases in which the only fees paid are those paid to individual performers, you will have every fair which employs a band and pays a bandmaster subject to a successful action by the performing right society, who have proved themselves among the keenest litigants and defenders of their rights in the courts that we have seen for some time in Canada. Therefore I ask the members of the committee to vote for the subamendment. With all deference I must express my fear that the amendment will be a mere gesture to protect those fairs and societies, whereas the subamendment will be rockbound.

I would remind hon. members of the committee that this question is not clouded by party issues; that they will be going home soon, and when they get back, if they have not protected the local fair from the payment of this licence fee, they need not expect the old brass band to be out to meet them.

Mr. RINFRET: I regret I cannot accept the subamendment. I do not jump at that conclusion; it is the same point my hon. friend wanted to make last night. I wish merely to point this out, that in this bill we wanted to give a definition of a fair where there is no private profit, and that is in accordance with the act of 1931 and also with the recommendation of Judge Parker. What my hon. friend now proposes is that even when there is a profit, but the profit accrues to the fair, it should be exempt from copyright. I do not think that would be in the spirit either of the recommendation of the judge or of the act of 1931, but would introduce an altogether different principle. Therefore I would ask the committee not to accept the subamendment but to accept the amendment.

Amendment to the amendment negatived.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment to section 1 carry?

Mr. CAHAN: Before we proceed there are one or two matters I wish to point out. I was awaiting the hon. member for Ottawa East; I did not know he had concluded his address.

In the first place, when musical compositions began to receive copyright there was no question of licensing the performance of musical copyrights. The publishers of music bought the copyright from the author and published the music and distributed it at a price for each sheet of music. That was the return which publishers obtained in compensation to them for their publication and for the prior payments which they had made to the composers of the music. When the Copyright Act as it now exists was first enacted by the British parliament, and then when certain clauses of it were enacted in 1921 by this parliament, the provision with regard to the infringement of copyright and the performance of musical copyright was adopted and remains the same in Canada as it exists in England. I desire to read section 26 of the Copyright Act of Canada, which I think is taken verbatim from the English copyright act:

26. (1) Any person who, without the written consent of the owner of the copyright or of his legal representative, knowingly performs or causes to be performed in public and for private profit the whole or any part, constituting an infringement, of any dramatic or operatic work or musical composition in which copyright subsists in Canada, shall be guilty of an offence, and shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars, or, in the case of a second or subsequent offence, either to such fine or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two months, or to both.

That is the provision in the statute of 1921 dealing with and providing penalties for infringement of musical copyright. But the exception made in England, which was adopted by statute in Canada, was that the performance in public for private profit only should constitute an infringement of the copyright of a musical work. Therefore there must be private profit in order to constitute an infringement, and since then the question has arisen as to what constitutes private profit in connection with fairs and educational institutions. The minister has introduced an amendment to the existing legislation, which I assume has been framed by the law officers or at least approved by them.

Just a further word. There can be no infringement by a public performance of a copyright musical work unless that performance is for private profit, and this definition of private profit, providing as to when it applies, which is embodied in the proposed amendment, I am prepared to accept because

I am not prepared to present any argument against it at the present time. But I should like to remind the hon. member for Ottawa East that he has confused the former Secretary of State with the parliament of Canada. He has repeatedly stated that the copyright act of 1931 was enacted by the former Secretary of State, and I should like to remove from his mind any such misapprehension, because the Secretary of State has no power of enactment. A bill was introduced. It was referred to a committee of this house, where it was studied for weeks, and many witnesses were called. The whole matter was thoroughly investigated; a report was made thereon and the bill was reported with certain amendments by a majority of the committee. I grant that the hon. member for Ottawa East was a dissenting member of that committee, but the bill then passed this house almost unanimously, with the exception of the vote, I think, of the hon. member for Ottawa East. It was then passed on to the senate, who again referred it to a committee. It passed the senate and received the endorsement of His Excellency the Governor General. So it is hardly fair to the former Secretary of State to suggest that an enactment passed in the ordinary course is an enactment by the former Secretary of State.

The hon. gentleman has also stated that this bill is a flagrant violation of the copyright convention and a defiance of public rights. Last evening I quoted from the report of a committee of the House of Commons in England, which I believe to have been unanimous, and that report appears on Hansard. It was referred for the consideration of the Board of Trade in England and that government department obtained the opinions of experts. Only recently the reports of the experts were considered by a special committee of the department, which reported to Right Hon. Walter Runciman, president of the Board of Trade, on November 21, 1935. This committee does not discuss the question whether legislation such as is here proposed is within or without the terms of the Rome convention, but they do insist, whether it is within or without, that at the ensuing meeting of the copyright union at Brussels, which was to take place in September of this year, the position of the British government should be made clear in this way, and I quote from the report:

117. We have taken account of the findings and recommendations of the select committee of the House of Commons on the musical copyright bill—

From which I read last night——and we recomend that a proposal be put forward for the addition to article XI of the following two paragraphs:

[Mr. Cahan.]

(4) Each country of the union may, by its national legislation, provide for the regulation of the exercise of any of the rights covered by this article in respect of musical and dramatico-musical works in any case in which any person, or any body of persons, owns or controls such rights in respect of so great a number of such works that such person or body of persons is able to, and does,

1. impose unduly onerous charges or conditions for permission to exercise any such rights, or

2. unreasonably refuse to grant any such permission; but no such legislative regulation shall prevent the payment of an equitable remuneration for any dealing with such works in any of the ways covered by this article,—

That is, the amended article of the convention of Rome that is to be proposed at Brussels.

—such remuneration to be fixed, failing agreement, by the competent authority in the country concerned.

(5) For the purposes of the preceding paragraph, a musical or dramatico-musical work shall be considered to include the combination of music with any words so closely associated therewith as to form part of the same work.

Then the report proceeds, in paragraph 118:

We further recommend that, in the event of the non-acceptance at the Brussels conference of the principle underlying the provisions proposed by us, the United Kingdom delegates should be instructed to make a reservation or declaration to the effect that His Majesty's government consider that this country is free to enact such legislation as may be considered necessary in the public interest to prevent or deal with any abuse of the monopoly rights conferred upon copyright owners by United Kingdom law.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Will the hon. gentleman read paragraph 119 also? It says:

We would add, however, that our recommendation should not be taken to imply that we think that such legislation is called for in this country.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): The hon. gentleman did not read that.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend did not give me time.

Mr. RINFRET: This committee found that the rates in England were not excessive, but they wanted this provision in case the rates should become excessive. I may say they are much lower than the fees asked by the Canadian Performing Right Society.

Mr. CAHAN: I was proceeding to give the quotation in full and the explanation with regard to it. It was due to the fact that the rates have not been raised in England, and the performing right society in England has conformed to public requirements and by amicable arrangements from time to time has dealt with the public interest so that the exorbitant rates demanded in this country have not been demanded there. But in view of the possibility of rates being so raised in England the government of the united kingdom have taken preliminary steps to make it clear that if such exorbitant rates are demanded legislative action will be taken there, as this parliament is requested now to do.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Subject to the approval of Berne.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg pardon, no. They say if Brussels does not agree they will make a reservation—

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): But we have not done that yet.

Mr. CAHAN: That is not necessary. They make the clear, clean-cut statement that their delegates shall be instructed to make a reservation or declaration to the effect that His Majesty's government consider that their country is free to enact such legislation as may be considered necessary. The British government desired that there should be no confusion in regard to the matter.

One thing further. I do not intend to descend to the sort of platform argument that my hon. friend suggested is applicable to this case. He made the suggestion that a producer of musical copyright has the same right to ownership of his product and the sale of his product as the farmer who produces potatoes. Granted. We have done nothing in this country to interfere with Canadian authors of music or composers, and not one of them while I was Secretary of State made any such suggestion to that department. Furthermore, there are other societies, foreign societies, which conformed to the requirements of the law. The French society has so conformed and not a complaint has been received from them, and until I left office not a complaint had been received from the public of Canada with regard to their operations in this country.

But let me refer to the case of a grower of potatoes. If I grow potatoes I have a perfect right to keep my potatoes in my cellar and not sell them for a price. But if some company is organized in this country which purchases the entire product of over 2,000,000 producers of potatoes and then fixes a price for the product which is beyond the capacity of consumers to pay—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: —how long do you think the parliament of Canada would allow the operation of such a super-monopoly as that to continue? That is similar to the case we are now dealing with. We are dealing with a quasi-criminal attempt to exact excessive fees and charges from hotels, from broadcasting companies, and from every café or restaurant which uses music. We are not abolishing the right to receive compensation. This bill, which the government has introduced simply places it in the power of and imposes the duty and responsibility upon an independent body now to be created to ascertain in each case whether the price asked is equitable and just or whether it constitutes an undue exaction.

I am glad to know that at last there have been found four or five or six Canadian authors who since this last investigation was made have been induced to join the Canadian society. I assume that the literature which has come to me, some of it most extravagantly abusive, so that I regard it as a breach of the privileges of this house that it should be sent to a member of parliament, emanates from the three or four Canadians who by some means have been induced to become identified with this society. I can only hope that they enjoy the pleasure of sending this anonymous correspondence to members of parliament and to former ministers. I simply say to them that as far as I am concerned it does not affect my temper in the slightest. This Canadian Performing Right Society, which, despite all that is stated by the hon. member for Ottawa East, is the only society at present in Canada that is prejudicially affected, and it has for four or five years been defying the parliament of Canada, by stating that neither the government nor parliament dare regulate its proceedings. They are not acting on behalf of the authors of this country or on behalf of the authors of any other country. They are not mere agents to receive fees for the authors. Ninety per cent of these musical compositions are owned by publishers, and have been so owned since they were first published. It was only when the objection was made that they did not really represent the authors that they undertook as a subterfuge to grant a certain portion of their receipts to the authors of the musical works concerned. This society stated in the evidence which came before the committee of which I was chairman that the rights of these authors and publishers had been transferred to it, and this legislation deals only with a society which has acquired musical works and deals in the acquisition of musical works and in the licensing or granting of licences for the performance of such works in Canada. As the law now stands and as re-enacted in this bill it applies to:

10. (1) Each society, association or company which carries on in Canada the business of acquiring copyrights or dramatico-musical or musical works or of performing rights therein, and which deals with or in the issue or grant of licences for the performance in Canada of dramatico-musical or musical works in which copyright subsists, shall, from time to time—

Two facts must concur before this statute applies. First, the society must acquire the copyright of the musical works, and then it must proceed to deal with the licensing of such works. I suggest that this company, incorporated under the laws of this country, incorporated here in order to obviate certain obligations which would apply in case it was not incorporated here, has to submit to such legislation as the parliament of Canada enacts within its legislative jurisdiction.

I do not intend to pursue the matter further, no matter what objection may be taken, except to say that in the course of the examination of Mr. Jamieson, the president of the Canadian Performing Right Society, before the committee of which I was chairman, he had proceeded to cite a decision of the English court to the effect that copyright is a privilege or monopoly right conferred by statute, and in regard to that I questioned him as follows:

Q. It is a monopoly or privilege conferred by statute upon an individual owner or author?
A. Right.
Q. But you—your company is a super-monopoly. In your company—thirty thousand men have joined together and vested in your company the right to deal for the whole thirty thousand, so that when, in the ordinary course, a broadcasting company approaches you, you say, "Our terms for the use of the works to the number of two and a half million or three million of these thirty thousand authors are granted to you wholesale, for a certain price which we fix." Now, that is new. That super-monopoly, or combination, which you represent is a combination of two million five hundred thousand little monopolies which are created by statute. We do not want to interfere with the author, we do not want to prejudice the author; but we do desire to arrive at some mode, or method, by which we can regulate this super-monopoly of performing rights, which, by virtue of an international combination, is not found in any other trade?
A. We appreciate, sir, all that you have said; but let me make one point: We must associate in order to protect.

I wish to add to that observation the fact that even under the international convention of Berne, revised at Rome and now about to be again revised at Brussels, the author who is a national of one country has only the rights which are specifically granted by the convention, and the rights which are accorded him by the domestic legislation of any other country which is a member of the union. There is not one line in the Rome convention which authorizes either a combination of authors or the fixing of prices by such a combination or, in fact, the fixing of prices by an individual author in violation of domestic legislation.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 1 as amended agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCE ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 27, to amend the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

He said: The amendments will be found at page 525 of votes and proceedings for Friday, June 19. They are not contentious.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR BOARD OF DIRECTORS—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 21, to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933.

He said: These amendments are of only minor importance. There are eight of them. The first is a technical correction; the second is a substitution of words; the third, fourth, fifth and sixth make it perfectly clear that no officer or director of the company can obtain more than one salary from the railway, which agrees with the views of the government, and the seventh and eighth provide that the appointment of auditors shall be by resolution of the senate—

Mr. BENNETT: Joint resolution.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, joint resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons, instead of by resolution of the House of Commons, as previously.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

The house proceeded to the consideration of a message from the Senate insisting upon its amendment to Bill No. 97 to amend the Combines Investigation Act.—Mr. Mackenzie King.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the amendments made by the senate to the bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act are set forth at page 528 of the votes and proceedings of this house for yesterday. The purpose of the clause which has been deleted by the senate is merely to place the investigating commission, under the Combines Investigation Act, in the same position in respect to documents produced during an investigation as that of a royal commission investigating under the Inquiries Act. So far as I know no one has suggested that a person who is required by a royal commission to produce documents is being subjected to proceedings which are contrary to the traditions of British law. Yet the purpose of such royal commission may be, and frequently is, to seek out wrong doing of a type punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Until amendments of last year prevented the effective use of this power equal to that exercised under the Inquiries Act, the Combines Investigation Act contained no provision limiting the use of documents produced in an inquiry at any subsequent trial. To-day documents obtained under the Inquiries Act can be used in a subsequent trial of the person who produced them, but under the Combines Act they cannot be so used.

Section 4 of the Inquiries Act reads as follows:

> The commissioners shall have the power of summoning before them any witnesses, and of requiring them to give evidence on oath, or on solemn affirmation if they are persons entitled to affirm in civil matters, and orally or in writing, and to produce such documents and things as the commissioners deem requisite to the full investigation of the matters into which they are appointed to examine.

Under section 11 of the Inquiries Act the commissioners may be authorized to appoint and depute any qualified person to exercise these same powers and otherwise conduct any portion of the inquiry.

There appears to be no good reason why investigations under the Combines Act should be hindered and the act itself rendered practically valueless by this obstacle in its provisions which was placed in the act last year, an obstacle which does not impede investigations under such statute as the Inquiries Act.

In the Natural Products Marketing Act, passed in 1934, Part II gave to the minister, his authorized representatives, and to committees appointed to investigate matters of excessive price spreads, all the powers of a commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act. Under the marketing act persons receiving or attempting to receive excessive spreads in natural products to the detriment of the public are guilty of an indictable offence. Yet the marketing act does not provide that a document required to be produced in an inquiry shall not be admissible in any subsequent trial of the person who so produced it. Neither do the security frauds prevention acts which are in force in various provinces of the dominion. The Ontario Security Frauds Prevention Act of 1930, section 10, contains provisions on this point as follows with regard to investigations by the attorney general or his authorized representatives "to ascertain whether any fraudulent act, or any offence against this act or the regulations has been, is being, or is about to be committed." I quote:

> No person shall be entitled to claim any privilege in respect of any document, record or thing asked for, given or produced on the ground that he might be incriminated or exposed to a penalty or to civil litigation thereby, and no evidence given shall be privileged except under the Evidence Act or the Canada Evidence Act.

Nova Scotia, Quebec, Alberta and British Columbia have passed acts for the prevention of security frauds, which contain identical or similar provisions. Various other acts which include provisions authorizing investigations, such as the Ontario Milk Control Act of 1934 and the Quebec Electricity Commission Act of 1935, provide that witnesses may be required to produce documents, but do not limit the use of such documents in any trial.

Under the Tariff Board Act of 1931, the governor in council was authorized, by section 4, subsection 4, to empower the tariff board to hold any inquiry authorized by the Combines Investigation Act and in so doing to exercise all the powers vested in the registrar or commissioners appointed under the combines act. These powers included that of requiring production of documents which could nevertheless be later used at the trial of the person producing them, the same power which remained in the act until it was removed last year.

One reason for this unlimited requirement for the production of documents under these various accounts, including the combines act as it was, is that the person giving evidence and producing documents is doing so in an investigation and not in a court. He is not accused of a crime and is not on trial. If as a result of such investigations any person is later charged with an indictable offence, he is not obliged to give evidence at his trial, and no statement he made in an inquiry under the combines act is admissible against him. His proof of a document produced in an inquiry cannot be used as proof of the document in the trial; it would have to be proven by someone other than the accused.

It has been suggested in another place that the commission can issue a search warrant and compel production, that it has all the power that the crown has in any court of law. That is incorrect; the combines act does not give such wide powers to the investigating commission.

Section 24 of the combines act as it was prior to the 1935 amendment did not take away from a defendant in a criminal proceeding any right which he would otherwise have had. What it did do was to guarantee to the member of an alleged combine that any oral evidence which he might be required to give during an investigation could not be used against him in any subsequent prosecution. It gave to him the same protection as the Canada Evidence Act makes available to a witness in a trial. Under section 5 of the Canada Evidence Act a witness at one trial may be compelled to answer a question, but the same section provides that his answer cannot be used against him in that or any other criminal trial except for perjury. The exemption is clearly restricted, however, to answers to questions, in other words to oral evidence. In no section of the Canada Evidence Act is it provided that the documents which a witness is required to produce are inadmissible against him in any subsequent proceeding.

In speaking on the amendment to this act a few days ago I read to the house a communication which I had received from Mr. Sedgewick, chief commissioner of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission, setting forth the need for the amendment to the act. Mr. Sedgewick has since read the debate which has taken place on this measure in the other house and has given me his opinion with respect to some of the impressions he gathered from it.

He entirely disagrees with the argument that a person charged with a criminal offence is entitled to protection from documents which he has previously been called upon to produce. He points out, as the court pointed out in a British Columbia fruit combine case, that such a provision would keep from the court documentary evidence which, but for the act, would be admissible.

Mr. Sedgewick says it has been alleged that if a corporation were involved the secretary or manager of the company could be required to produce the documentary evidence and then, while it would be inadmissible against these individuals, it could be used against the company.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. Sedgewick says that in his opinion it would be inadmissible against the company, too, if the act remains as it is.

The opinion of the law officers is the same as that of Mr. Sedgwick. I have been given the following opinion by the Justice department with respect to the amendment which is at the moment before us for consideration:

> With respect it is suggested that there is a misapprehension on the part of the members of the senate as to the effect and purpose of the amendment to section 24. As the section now stands if a person investigated is required to produce the agreement which is objected to as offending against the act, section 24 renders this agreement thereafter inadmissible in a prosecution of such person. Surely such a document should be admissible against him if properly proved, i.e., by oral evidence other than his own.
> The purpose of the amendment is not to render admissible documents otherwise inadmissible, but to provide that admissible documents are not inadmissible.
> If the section stands, the best thing that could happen to a person guilty of combining in restraint of trade is to be required on investigation to produce the documents proving the offence. Thereafter he will be immune from conviction by means of the agreement.

I should like to add that if the amendment made by the senate is not withdrawn and the clause retained in the bill as introduced in this house, it will be necessary for the government with respect to certain inquiries which it was hoped it might be possible to conduct under the Combines Investigation Act, to proceed by royal commission under the Inquiries Act, and until the clause deleted by the senate is restored, a number of royal commissions may have to issue to conduct the investigations which it was intended should be made as provided for by investigation under the combines act. I therefore move, Mr. Speaker:

> That a message be sent to the senate to acquaint their honours that this house disagrees with their amendment to Bill No. 97, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act, for the following reason:
> Because the amendment of their honours would have the effect of exempting documents which are ordered to be produced during an investigation from use in any subsequent criminal proceedings against the person producing them, thereby rendering impossible effective enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that last year I asked the house, under protest, to accept the amendment made by the senate. It was in the closing days of the session and I disagreed with the view taken by the senate, but in order to close parliament the general sense of an amendment similar to this from the senate was adopted. I disagree with the action taken by the senate now, and I think a conference is highly desirable. I have thought a good deal about the matter and the only explanation I can give—and I say it with deference—is that there is a confusion in terms, and that they have used the word "admissible" in a wrong sense. Suppose I am engaged in an investigation and during its progress so many documents are produced. The mere production of these documents does not render them admissible when they are tendered in evidence before judge and jury in the trial of a criminal action. I fear that the senate concluded that we were trying to make documents admissible without the reservation of the right to object before a criminal court to the admissibility and the proof of the documents.

I think the language we have used to clear up the difficulty might be that the documents shall not be rendered inadmissible upon proper proof in any trial of a criminal action. I say that only for those who may have to deal with the matter. I feel quite certain that there is a confusion between "proof" and "admissibility." To prove a document means that you must establish its authenticity to the court that has to deal with its admissibility. The admissibility depends not only upon its proof but upon its relevance. It does not follow in a criminal case that you can ask the court to accept as admissible every document you produce merely because it was before an investigation, but it is equally true that it should not be precluded from being admitted because it was produced before a commission. The admissibility depends upon proper proof being given before the criminal court. In view of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said, I cannot help thinking there is some slight confusion between the questions of admissibility and proof. What the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) tried to do and what the commons has now done is to say that documents produced on an investigation shall not, by reason of being so produced, be admissible in a criminal case; that is all, and I think if that is made clear there should not be any difficulty in another place in providing appropriate words to make it clear. Upon its being properly established that documents constitute real evidence, they shall be admissible when offered in court.

For instance, to produce a copy of a letter might be quite satisfactory before an investigation, but it would not be competent to use it in a criminal trial unless proof were given as to the loss of the original or other matters of that kind. Documents that are frequently used on investigations are, in cases where the liberty of the subject is at stake, not admissible because there has not been adequate proof of their authenticity or as to the competence of the documents as real evidence in the inquiry. I support the view taken by the government in this matter. I think I mentioned the matter to the Prime Minister last year. I walked across the floor of the house and spoke to the right hon. gentleman about it. It was close to the end of the session and we accepted the amendment rather than delay matters. However I see no reason why between now and Monday there should not be sufficient time to consider the matter in its legal implications. I feel quite confident that upon investigation and discussion it will be found that the mere fact that a document was produced and used in an investigation has never prevented its being accepted as evidence in a criminal case, provided appropriate proof was given.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): We are very glad to support the motion of the Prime Minister. I am heartily in favour of the amendment and if by any chance a conference will facilitate the passage of this measure at this session, I think a conference should be held.

NATIONAL PARKS

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT IN NOVA SCOTIA AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines) moved the second reading of Bill No. 102, respecting the establishment of a national park in each of the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to impede the progress of this bill into committee, but I should like to make one or two observations. I see no reason why similar treatment should not be granted to New Brunswick as is being granted to Prince Edward Island. No area is set out for a park in the case of Prince Edward Island, and no area need be set out with respect to New Brunswick. In our time I was urged very strongly to deal with the matter and they were prepared to go on, but I felt that the financial situation was such as not to warrant the expenditure involved in the creation of new parks. It is not the acquisition of the park that has to be considered as it does not cost the dominion anything, but the minute a park is acquired there begins an annual expenditure on a very substantial scale. It was because of this fact that we did not care to embark upon the project. But I have always felt that there should be similar power with respect to New Brunswick as there is in the case of Prince Edward Island. The government is not committed to any particular area, but it is committed to the general principle of the park. Perhaps I may be pardoned for making these observations as I was born in New Brunswick, but I have a strong feeling that if a park is to be created in Prince Edward Island, with its limited area and small population but with its valuable attractions from the tourist standpoint, similar treatment should be accorded to the neighbouring province through which the tourist must proceed, generally speaking, to reach Prince Edward Island.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Addition of lands to the park.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it not possible to treat New Brunswick in the same way as Prince Edward Island is being treated? We are not committing ourselves to a park in Prince Edward Island; we are not defining the area and we have not established the park, so why could not similar treatment be granted to New Brunswick?

Mr. CRERAR: The only reason I have to offer, and perhaps not a very good one, is the fact that the expenditure for a park in Prince Edward Island will not be extensive, in the very nature of things.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to ask the estimated expenditures in both areas for 1936-37.

Mr. CRERAR: It is proposed to spend $40,000 in Prince Edward Island and $100,000 in Nova Scotia. My right hon. friend will recall that one or two years ago an investigation was held in connection with the sites in both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I am not sure of the time, but at any rate it was when my right hon. friend was Prime Minister. There is a difference of opinion in New Brunswick as to the site. I intimated to the committee when the estimates for these particular parks were being considered, that it is the intention of the department to have a resurvey of the sites in New Brunswick this year. In Prince Edward Island the choice has been narrowed down to three or four sites, but in the very nature of things the park in that province will not be as extensive as the park in Nova Scotia, or as it will be in New Brunswick. I hope to be able to come to parliament at the next session and make a definite recommendation as to a site in New Brunswick, and ask parliament for a vote to initiate the creation of a park in that province.

Mr. BENNETT: That is certainly a fair statement. The minister has said that the selection in Prince Edward Island has been narrowed down to three or four sites, but in New Brunswick it has been narrowed down to only two. Therefore there is a choice between one of four in Prince Edward Island and between one of two in New Brunswick. As long as the assurance given by the minister is merely a delay, I think this will satisfy, as perhaps nothing else would, the people who are affected, because it is probable they will not get further in Prince Edward Island than the selection of a site if the Minister of Finance has anything to say about the matter. In any event I think the site chosen in Nova Scotia is so admirable as to warrant an expression of hearty good will on the part of anyone who knows that beautiful section of the country. It involves an area of a little less than a quarter of a million acres, perhaps 229,000 or 230,000 acres, and the scenery is so striking, the surroundings are so beautiful, and an historic site so near to it, that I cannot but think it will be a place of great interest to everyone who desires to journey into that part of Canada.

Mr. NEILL: This section requires the province to furnish Canada "with clear title to the said lands." I understand from that, everything above or below the surface. Would the minister make a pronouncement whether the dominion government in the past has ever set a precedent, or is inclined to do so in future, of accepting title from a province containing a reservation as regards oil or water or minerals?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not able to make a statement on the point my hon. friend has raised, but if my memory serves me aright, I think the underground rights go with the surface rights of the park. Perhaps the right hon. leader of the opposition knows that.

Mr. BENNETT: Without endeavouring to lecture, I may mention that in the west, as will be recalled, the crown in right of the dominion owns the whole rights, and therefore the mines and minerals around about Banff and all the country north still belong to the crown in right of the dominion. But there are some parts of this country that are still held as park areas in which, I believe, the crown in right of the province still controls the mineral rights. Perhaps the minister recalls one or two places connected with the western parks where he has had to deal with that situation. I think the patents which are outstanding in Nova Scotia do no more than reserve to the crown in right of the province all gold and silver and other precious metals. There is no reservation of water, but there is, I believe, a reservation of gold and silver and other precious metals. I think the point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is one that is well worth drawing attention to, and once attention has been directed to it one may assume that the law officers of the department will take such action as is necessary, because it is inconceivable that a park would be established under the aegis of the dominion and staked out for mines and minerals in the right of a province.

UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF AND ASSISTANCE ACT, 1936, TO ASSIST PROVINCES IN RESPECT OF RELIEF EXPENDITURES

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. 100, to amend the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. STIRLING: When this bill was before the committee previously, the minister did not have an opportunity of explaining in general terms just what it means. I have read the wording several times but I am not at all clear what it means. The amount payable by the province in question during the months of February and March appears to be a datum to which the dominion government is going to refer its subsequent payments under agreements with the provinces, but for what period of time?

Mr. ROGERS: The clause as drafted is designed to accomplish two objects: First, to permit the dominion to loan to the provinces such parts of payments made by the provinces for direct relief or relief undertakings during the months of February and March for which accounts have not been rendered to the dominion before the expiry of the relief act of last year.

Mr. STIRLING: It has nothing to do with subsequent months?

Mr. ROGERS: Nothing whatever. The second object of the clause is to permit the dominion government to loan to the provinces their share of direct relief payments or their share of payments for undertakings carried on cooperatively with the dominion government. Under the clause as originally drafted and before the amendment which was introduced a few days ago, provision was not made for a loan by the dominion in excess of the amount which might be paid by the dominion to the province under any agreement with that province. The amendment is designed to meet a quite unique situation which exists in Manitoba, arising out of the continuation of an agreement made by the late administration with that province touching the construction of a sewer and sewage disposal project in the city of Winnipeg. Under the terms of that agreement the dominion is obligated to loan to the province its share, which is twenty per cent of the total cost of the undertaking, and to the city its share, forty per cent of the total cost of the undertaking, the remaining forty per cent of the cost of the undertaking having been assumed by the dominion government.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister was going to give certain information with regard to the numbers of men who were sent to the railway camps. Will he make it ample in the sense that he will give us the information with regard to those who had the opportunity to go, how many of them went and how many refused, and how many are now in those camps?

Mr. ROGERS: I had intended to make that statement. I quite recall, as the hon. member has just stated, that when this bill was before the committee at an earlier stage I gave an undertaking that I would deal at this time with the movement from relief camps to the deferred maintenance work on the railways for which provision was made under the special supplementary estimates.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister will pardon me if I suggest that he deal with Saskatoon and Prince Albert at the same time, the movement in Dundurn camp and matters arising out of that, since it is part of the same subject.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps a general statement might be couched in very brief terms. On February 26 it was announced on behalf of the government that arrangements would be made to place 10,000 men from relief camps on deferred maintenance work on railways; that the wage allowance to men remaining in relief camps would be increased from $5 a month to $15 a month effective March 1, and finally that it was the intention of the government to close the relief camps on July 1. I am now able to state that the movement of men from the relief camps to the railways has been carried out according to plan. There has been a steady reduction of the camp population, which now stands at less than 1,500 including supervisory personnel, and finally that the relief camps will be closed, as proposed, on July 1.

I am quite sure my hon. friend would desire me to amplify that statement, and I think I might do so in the first instance by indicating the transfer of men from relief camps to maintenance work on railways by provinces. Prior to June 15 there had been 8,689 men placed in the railway extra gangs, recruited from the relief camps, and the following are the figures according to provinces:

Nova Scotia	252
New Brunswick	642
Quebec	1,679
Ontario	2,938
Manitoba	636
Saskatchewan	912
Alberta	954
British Columbia	676

That makes a total, as I said, of just less than 8,700 men.

Mr. BENNETT: Did they all come from the camps?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; all these men have come from the camps and have gone to the special maintenance work on railways. I should add that from March 1 forward there has been a steady reduction in the camp population, to some extent in excess, I should say, of the normal reduction of the camp population which in other years has taken place during these months. But in addition to the men who have been placed on the railways, through the cooperation of the department of colonization and the employment service some 650 men from the camps were also placed at farm labour.

As to the remainder, we have reason to believe that a very considerable number left the camps to return to employment, and also that a considerable number left the camps to go to their own homes. I think it may be stated quite definitely that quite a large number of those who were in the relief camps went to such camps from homes where it was difficult to meet expenditures and where the camps offered, as it were, a shelter during the winter months. During the spring, quite naturally, for some years past there has been a very considerable movement from the camps back to the agricultural communities from which, as I suggest, some of these men come. In addition, undoubtedly there have been some hundreds—I am not prepared to give the exact figure—who have left the camps because they did not desire to accept employment upon the railways.

I should like to mention at this point that on the announcement of this policy employment on railway work was offered to every man in the relief camps. I think it is reasonable to believe that some hundreds, at any rate, left the camps because they did not desire to accept this work which was offered upon the railways, nor did they desire to continue to work in the camps, because when the allowance was increased from $5 to $15 per month instructions went out that if men refused to work they were to be summarily dismissed. In the nature of things the removal of some hundreds of men from camps to the larger urban centres of the western provinces has led to a concentration of transients at certain points. Possibly that is the question my right hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I had in mind the press notices with respect to the situation in Saskatoon and Prince Albert.

Mr. ROGERS: We have sought to meet that situation in at least some degree by offering to these transients, through employment services, an opportunity to go on this deferred maintenance work on the railways. The camps have supplied, as I have indicated, some 8,700 men for the railways, leaving some 1,300 men to be supplied. The situation in some of these western centres has been relieved to some extent at least through the additional employment that was offered in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was very glad to hear the Minister of Labour discuss this problem, but I may say that in the dying hours of this session I am troubled over this whole situation with regard to unemployment, particularly as it affects the single men of the country. I have discussed the matter with the Minister of Labour himself, and I do not propose to refer to specific cases that we have taken up. I am quite satisfied, as far as the minister personally is concerned, that within the limits of the authority given him he is endeavouring to do what is possible to meet this situation. Therefore what I am about to say is not any personal criticism of the minister.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that we are facing a very grave problem in the larger centres, particularly in certain areas of Canada. The right hon. leader of the opposition asked some questions concerning Saskatoon and Prince Albert. I remember that last week end, in four cities of Saskatchewan, there were something like 1,000 single men, transients, being provided for. I also noticed that during the week a resolution was passed in Saskatoon by a conference convened very largely by disinterested people, shall I say, such as United Church ministers, deploring the situation there and pointing out that the men concentrating in these cities were increasing in number day by day. I believe the same thing will happen in other cities of Canada in the near future.

We have to remember, also, that work may have been offered to a majority, perhaps all, of these men. In my opinion one of the tragedies of this continuous unemployment, particularly among young men, is that it completely undermines them physically and mentally, and, if continued long enough, will create a permanent problem in this country. I feel that this parliament and the government, together, have not taken adequate measures to meet the present situation. This afternoon my mind goes back to the occurrences in Regina last year. I well remember meeting that group of young men who came to Regina, I believe almost exactly a year ago to-day, in an endeavour to concentrate public opinion upon the difficulties which they faced. Now I know it has been said, and it may be said again, that that was the result of the work of a few men agitating among them. But that was not my observation. You cannot agitate unless there is suitable soil in which the agitation may grow. For my part, meeting many of these young men as I did, I found them to be largely average Canadian boys who were not out to cause difficulty but were there in order to direct public attention to the conditions under which they suffered. What I am afraid of is that the concentration in various cities throughout the dominion, of young men from the unemployment relief camps, will lead to similar trouble in other parts of Canada. I submit to the minister and to the government that the requests which these young men are making for work and wages and the opportunity to live are natural requests, requests which deserve well of the government and of the Canadian people. To-day we have not only thousands of young men transient throughout the country, but in the homes of Canadian people many thousands of other young men who are unable to get employment, and a similar number of young women in much the same condition, although we hear very little about them. I would draw the attention of the committee and the government to this situation.

It is true that work for 10,000 has been provided on the railways. There is considerable criticism of conditions in some of the construction camps that have been established. I have no first hand personal knowledge of those conditions. I believe that they will be carefully investigated. But I know this, that after young men have been in relief camps, for several years under the conditions existing in those camps, they have become unused to heavy work such as they now have to undertake, and working as they claim they are for ten hours a day under summer conditions, that of itself is liable to cause grave dissatisfaction and unrest. I do not know what the government propose to do at the end of the four months of work during which these agreements will run. As we come closer to the winter season I am convinced that this condition will become more and more aggravated. We may say that conditions in Canada are improving, though there is not a great deal of evidence to support that statement. Moreover, even if this year we have a comparatively good crop on the western plains, it will not absorb more than a fraction of this class of labour. That, of course, is largely due to the mechanization of western farms, the use of the combine and other labour-saving devices. Consequently I must impress upon the government that it is useless to look forward to the garnering of a good crop in western Canada as a solution of the unemployment problem there. That being the case, in my opinion it is even less likely that improved crop conditions there will assist materially in eastern Canada. In support of that may I say that if a good crop is garnered in western Canada and marketed at an adequate price, it means that pressure will be brought to bear upon the farmers, by their creditors, so that their purchasing power for eastern goods will not be so much greater than it was during the last year or two.

Consequently I view this whole matter of unemployment, both of married men, for whom some quite inadequate provision is being made, and of these thousands of young men throughout the country, with great apprehension. I think the committee generally knows that I have been engaged in dealing with young people during the major portion of my life. One thing that has saddened me in the last few years is observing young men whom I knew as boys, with ability, initiative, ambition, unemployed for long periods of time and sinking down into deep hopelessness. I fear for the future of our country unless more comprehensive steps are taken than we are taking at the present time to solve this problem. In Saskatoon these transient single men are being allowed, I believe, fifty cents a day for bed and board. That, of course, is totally inadequate and tends to breed grave dissatisfaction, which may result in serious difficulties. As one of those who witnessed the coming of those young men to Regina a year ago, who knew that the intentions of the great mass of them when they came to that city were peaceful, that they desired only to compel public attention to their condition, I view this situation with the very gravest alarm.

Then I go a step further and say that I sometimes fear that the government and the departments which are handling these particular difficulties are not acting wisely or properly. From my own personal experience I believe that among the men who came to Regina were officers of the law who may not always have acted in the interests of law and order. I was hoping that an opportunity might be given to discuss that phase of this matter on the estimates of the Department of Justice. But from my personal knowledge and experience in connection with one of these police officers who gave evidence in connection with these young men, I know perfectly well that for a long time he was secretary of a communistic organization and propagated communism, although at that time he was in reality an officer of the mounted police. I say that not only on my responsibility as a member of parliament, but on his own sworn evidence, a copy of which I possess, given at an investigation about a year ago. So I say to the Minister of Labour that I hope that every effort will be made by this government not only to provide work at adequate wages for these men but to see to it that nothing is done which will create again a situation in any of our Canadian cities similar to that which has arisen from time to time and which was particularly acute in Regina just a year ago.

Mr. BAKER: If I understood correctly the hon. member who has just spoken, he said that there were hundreds of men on relief coming from these camps and flocking to the cities. Also I understood the Minister of Labour to say that employment had been offered to all these men. The net result seems to be that unfortunately we have hundreds and perhaps thousands of young men who are refusing to work. That is quite a different question and needs a different method to deal with it. We have hundreds and hundreds who are refusing work; they would rather flock to the cities and live on fifty cents a day.

Mr. ROGERS: That is one side of the question. As I said before, we must face it. There were some in the camps who were not prepared to accept work when it was offered.

Mr. BAKER: There were a great many of them, according to the minister's statement.

Mr. ROGERS: I said that I would not hazard a statement as to the actual number; obviously it would be impossible to give such a figure. The point I made was that on March 1 the announcement was made that those who remained upon the project would receive not $5 but $15 per month. The understanding at the same time was that if they refused to work satisfactorily, that is to the satisfaction of the supervisors in the camps, they would be dismissed.

Then came the opportunity to offer railway work. Less than 9,000 of the men in the camps have been moved to that work, but, all who remained in the camps at the time the railway work was provided had an opportunity of accepting it. So I believe we are justified in saying that my estimate would be conservative, rather than extreme, when I say that some hundreds of men in the camps were unwilling to accept the work that was offered.

Mr. BENNETT: How many?

Mr. ROGERS: I suggested some hundreds. Obviously I am not in a position to give the exact number.

Mr. HEAPS: Nine thousand accepted it?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, 9,000 accepted it, and I want to say with respect to those 9,000 that we have received from the railway companies assurances that they are giving the utmost satisfaction. There has been no difficulty at all, and the railway companies have found them most suitable in every way.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words about the situation in Saskatoon. I have had communications from the mayor and city council, and other public bodies interested. In that city we have what appears to be a concentration of single, transient unemployed men in greater numbers than at any other point in the same province. The last advice I have is that we have approximately 450 single unemployed transients at that point. Until recently there was a camp at Dundurn where a number of men were located. My advice is that a large number of men at Saskatoon did not come from the Dundurn camp, but came from various other points in Canada. I am advised further that about twenty per day are arriving. I placed the communication I received before the Minister of Labour and other ministers of the government. May I thank the Minister of Labour for getting into communication immediately with the provincial government in order so far as possible to alleviate the situation. But I want to suggest to the government that those particular men should not be the responsibility of that community. They do not belong there, and have never lived there.

We have a difficult problem to handle our own unemployed in the city, and I would ask the government to take special notice of the conditions I have described and to see if it is at all possible to give the men useful employment, or in any event to make sure that the problem does not become one for the city of Saskatoon.

Mr. MacINNIS: Was any examination made as to the physical capacity of the men who refused to do the work of railway construction? It is a particularly strenuous kind of physical labour, and from having had some experience with it I know that not every man one might pick up on the street could be engaged for that work and be expected to give satisfaction.

Mr. ROGERS: At least there must be the presumption that every one who entered the relief camps was physically fit, because there was a strict medical examination upon admission. As a matter of fact complaints have been made that the medical examination was altogether too strict. I am not prepared to say at this time whether or not those who are doing railway work had to undergo a special physical examination, but I believe the fact that the men when they entered the camps had been accepted as medically fit would argue against a further examination, except in the event of a man being reported ill and requiring hospital attention.

Mr. MacINNIS: Being physically fit and in a condition to pass an examination, and being in a physical condition satisfactory for construction work, are two different things. For example, the Minister of Labour, myself, the leader of the opposition or the Minister of Justice might pass a physical examination, but I doubt whether we could last a week on railway maintenance work. I am very doubtful whether it would be safe to run trains on railway tracks we might lay.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. member has suggested that all the work was of a heavy nature, involving the movement of rails, and the like. From my knowledge of the work that particular operation forms only a small part of it. A great deal of it has to do with the clearing of right of ways, and is not of the particularly difficult character suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was talking to two men who had been working on the railways and who, incidentally, had left the work. They maintained, although I see that the agreement calls for an eight hour day, that they were working ten hours per day laying rails. They said that they were putting in new rails at points where old ones had been removed. They told me that when the rails were deposited by the crews those rails were thrown off the cars and down an embankment. The result was that the men had to carry those rails weighing one hundred pounds to the foot—

An hon. MEMBER: Per yard.

Mr. MacINNIS: How many yards are in a rail?

Mr. BAKER: One man would not lift a rail.

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite so; it would require more than one man to lift a rail. However, that was the kind of work these men were doing for ten hours a day, although the agreement calls for an eight hour day.

Mr. ROGERS: A basic eight hour day.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, a basic eight hour day, and a twenty-six day month. Would the minister tell us the remuneration the men receive per day, and the deductions for meals and other necessities in the camps?

Mr. ROGERS: First of all, may I speak concerning the hours of labour. The hon. member has suggested that the men worked ten hours per day when the agreement called for an eight hour day. I am quite sure he has examined the agreement and is familiar with its provisions. He will correct me if I am wrong when I state that in the past a ten hour day has been the accepted rule for extra gang work on the railways in Canada. This is the first occasion there has been a recognition of the basic eight hour day. This is seasonal work, and no doubt the men will be interrupted because of a change in weather conditions. It is provided in the agreement that they may work in excess of eight hours per day provided that the total number of hours in the month shall not exceed 208 on an average for six months.

Mr. BENNETT: I noticed that provision in the agreement.

Mr. ROGERS: Having regard to the nature of the work and the period of the year in which it is to be done that appeared to be a reasonable arrangement. The hon. member has asked me about the wages being paid. In the course of the negotiations the government insisted that the men who worked should receive not less than the current wage for this type of work. That wage, as the hon. member is no doubt aware, is twenty-five cents per hour.

He has also asked as to deductions. That is not covered by the agreement. The railway companies in the past have themselves made arrangements according to practice for the feeding of men doing this class of work. I understand the arrangements existing at the present time are in no wise different from those in force in other years with regard to catering.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the charge per month for feeding?

Mr. ROGERS: Again I speak subject to correction, but I believe it has been customary to charge $1 per day for the catering; that is to say, it would come to about $6 per week. That has been the practice.

Mr. BENNETT: That includes shelter and food?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: When we go home we shall be asked immediately and frequently for the terms of the deal between the government and the railway. Much of this debate could have been avoided if we had had that information in front of us; I think the minister should furnish each of us with a copy.

Mr. ROGERS: I have arranged to have copies of the agreement mimeographed. I have at least fifty copies available and I shall be glad to have a copy sent to every member who desires one. The agreements themselves were tabled some time ago and were before the house for the information of members.

Mr. HEAPS: Before this clause carries, Mr. Chairman, I realize, along with others who have spoken before me, the importance of the question of our youth in the camps and the effect of the camps on them, but I think the question of the relief camps and of those employed in them is only a very small part of our general unemployment and relief situation. At this time when we are on the eve of prorogation I think we ought to have, if we possibly can, some definite statement of policy from the Minister of Labour on behalf of the government. At the beginning of the session when parliament had just met it might have been a little difficult for the minister to give that desired information to the house. But the present government were elected to a very large extent because of the economic conditions which prevailed in this country last year and in the years preceding, and the people who elected them hoped that when they met parliament they would present to the house definite and constructive proposals to deal with the problem of unemployment in this country. Not only have we not had those proposals presented to us but so far all that the government and the Minister of Labour have suggested to us, I believe, has been the employment commission which was recently appointed. That legislation took up a great deal of the time of the house, although in my opinion it was hardly necessary to have legislation to appoint the commission. But I think the people of Canada want something more than a commission to deal with this problem of unemployment. The commission with its limited powers can do very little to cope with the unemployment situation.

A few days ago the Minister of Labour indicated by the figures which he gave to the house that there was very little diminution in unemployment this year as compared with last. In presenting his various statements to the house the minister spoke of the haphazard and disconnected efforts of previous governments to deal with the whole problems of unemployment and relief, and yet this year it was impossible for us to find out from the minister exactly what the government are doing to cope with the unemployment situation existing in Canada to-day. A glance at the estimates will not give members the information they desire, and when the minister was asked to give the exact amount of money that is being spent on unemployment in the present fiscal year he was not able to do so, nor could he give a breakdown of the figures submitted in the estimates.

Mr. ROGERS: The figures are in the estimates. I do not need to do the calculations for my hon. friend.

Mr. HEAPS: If I asked the minister to say how much we are spending this year as compared with last, could he give those figures?

Mr. ROGERS: A comparison of the amount expended?

Mr. HEAPS: The total.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend from Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) asked me when this bill was before the committee what was the amount expended this year and last, and I think he will agree with me that I gave that information to the house a few days ago.

Mr. BARBER: That is right.

Mr. ROGERS: If there is any other information that my hon. friend desires I shall be only too glad to give it.

Mr. HEAPS: I am sorry if I misrepresented the situation. I remember asking the same question myself, and we could not get a break-down of those figures because there was an unexpended portion left over from the amount voted in the previous year.

Mr. ROGERS: It is right here in the recapitulation of the special supplementary estimates: Department of Labour, projects already undertaken, $7,720,115; other projects, $11,825,000. That is to be spent in conjunction with the provinces on a fifty per cent basis, so if my hon. friend desires to know precisely how much is going to be spent for joint relief projects he has simply to double each of those amounts.

Mr. HEAPS: That is assuming the provincial governments go into the scheme.

Mr. ROGERS: That assumption may be taken for granted. There has been no question whatsoever as to the intention of the provincial governments.

Mr. HEAPS: That is only part of the general statement which I wish to make. Assuming that all that is correct, and that an equivalent amount is going to be spent this year with last, that hardly begins to deal with the general problem of unemployment. The minister asked me a direct question a few weeks ago, whether I thought relief works in themselves were a remedy for unemployment. I answered just as directly, no, they were not a remedy for the unemployment problem.

I think as a nation we are about the most backward in the whole world when dealing with unemployment. I do not know any other civilized country that has not a definite scheme of some kind and that is not trying to do something in a general way for the unemployment situation, but in this dominion for the past six years we have apparently been proceeding on the basis that unemployment is a temporary problem. Unemployment is not a temporary problem, and while we may talk of conditions to-day as being abnormal, I am inclined to think what we call these abnormal conditions are likely to be normal for many years to come. If that is the case—and it is being accepted; I believe it is accepted to-day by all students of the problem of unemployment—I think the government ought to have some proposal to submit to parliament for coping with this problem in a completely different way from what has been followed in past years. We may hope for a good crop, but even a good crop will not solve the situation. I know the Minister of Labour is a keen student of economic problems and I believe he realizes as well as we do here that what he is doing now is merely toying with a very grave problem. Some of us who come from industrial centres will be back in our own constituencies within the next few days. We shall be going back to the men and women who are unemployed, to the men and women who are only partly employed, to the men and women whose jobs hang by slender threads, and what are we going to tell them as to what has been accomplished during the present session on their behalf? What has been accomplished in a definite sense? It is true that we have in a way taken control of the Bank of Canada; it is true that we have passed appropriations for relief and for the creation of public works; it is true that we have passed other pieces of legislation—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And appointed a commission.

Mr. HEAPS: As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) says, we have appointed a commission to deal with the problems of employment and unemployment, but beyond that, what has been done? Year after year the unemployed have been living in the expectation that something would be done for them. We find that we must go back and tell them they are in just the same position as they were in previous years.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to the demoralizing effect of unemployment upon the youth and even upon the older generation. I know there is nothing more demoralizing for a young man who has completed his school education than to tramp the streets of our industrial areas year after year and find no chance or hope of being absorbed into a useful vocation. It is quite true that camps have been closed, but although that was laudable, it does not solve the problem of thousands of other young men. The young men previously in the camps are now helping to construct railways, but when August or September arrives they will be no longer required. What is to become of them? May I point out to the Minister of Labour that we shall be faced with more or less the same problem as we were faced with a year ago.

I should like to see this government take hold of this problem in a definite manner and deal with it in a fundamental way. It cannot be dealt with piecemeal as has been done during the past few years. I should like to take back some ray of hope to the thousands of men who are either partly employed or totally unemployed. I should like to be able to tell them that this government has proposed to deal with unemployment in a fundamental way, in a way which holds out some ray of hope for the future. I am sorry I cannot take that message back with me. All that has been done this session is very little different from what was done in previous years although it may have been done in a different way. It is true that instead of a blank cheque the government is being granted a definite amount, but I do not know that the man or woman who is out of work cares very much whether the government has been given a blank cheque or a cheque with a stated amount. All he or she is interested in is work at reasonable wages. Whether or not a cheque is blank is not the important question; the important question is how many people can this government by its policies absorb into useful employment in the Dominion of Canada? As far as the figures would indicate, so far only 8,700—the men previously in the camps—have been absorbed into some form of useful and productive activity in constructing railways, but what about the tens of thousands, yes, even the hundreds of thousands who are unemployed in our cities with no hope of any useful work in the immediate future? That is a problem we must face and we are going to leave this parliament in the next few days without having solved this very serious and grave problem.

Mr. BAKER: I should like to ask the hon. member how he would deal with the problem of young men who come to the cities and refuse to accept work?

Mr. HEAPS: There were 8,700 young men who were willing to go into construction work and who had probably never done that type of work before. Apparently they are giving complete satisfaction, and I shall not allow any hon. member to judge all the unemployed by the misdemeanours of a mere handful.

Mr. BAKER: I asked how you would deal with the young men who refuse to work.

Mr. Speaker having resumed the chair:

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

PROROGATON OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Ottawa, June 20, 1936.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General will not proceed to the Senate chamber to-day for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF AND ASSISTANCE ACT, 1936, TO ASSIST PROVINCES IN RESPECT OF RELIEF EXPENDITURES

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 100, to amend the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 1 as amended carry?

Mr. STIRLING: The minister told the committee that 8,700 men had gone from the relief camps to the railway camps. Could he tell the committee how many of them have remained in the railway camps?

Mr. ROGERS: According to the latest information available there has been a turnover to date of only six and a half per cent of the total number who went from the relief camps to work on the railways. I am advised that this compares very favourably with the turn-over of those engaged in normal industrial employment.

Mr. STIRLING: Ninety-three and a half per cent remain in the camps?

Mr. ROGERS: That is my information.

Mr. STIRLING: With regard to the 1,500 who are yet in the relief camps right across Canada, that number, I take it, is composed of those who, though physically fit, were not considered capable of taking on this work, and besides that, the supervisory staff. I do not remember the numbers of those men, but what will happen to those two classes of people on July 1? With regard to the second class, the supervisory staff, I should like the minister to remember the faithful and excellent work these people have done at a time of considerable difficulty when they helped us out.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. member for Yale has asked as to the disposition of the men who will remain in the camps on July 1.

Those who, presumably, will be demobilized on July 1, will have received the $15 a month wage allowance from March 1 to July 1. My hon. friend will recall that there was a special provision under which a portion of that wage allowance would be deferred, so we are justified in saying that those who will leave the camps on July 1 will have this deferred allowance of $4 a week for at least seven weeks. They will also be given special rates upon the railways to the points from which they came.

Mr. STIRLING: And the supervisory staff?

Mr. ROGERS: There was also an increase in the allowances paid to the supervisory staff of the lower wage brackets. They have been offered work upon the railways if they desire to accept it. I doubt whether a very large proportion of them will accept work upon the railroads. I join with my hon. friend in the tribute he has paid to the excellent work they have done in a very difficult situation within the past two or three years.

Mr. STIRLING: Supervisory work on the railways, or labour?

Mr. ROGERS: Provision was made for some of these men to receive supervisory positions upon the railroads, but obviously there was a limited opportunity whereas the supervisory staff of the camps was quite large.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I want to make a few remarks with reference to this situation, but before doing so, I desire to know from the minister whether any deduction is made from the pay of these men in the railway camps for blankets and that sort of thing, other than board.

Mr. ROGERS: The figure that I gave before six o'clock covered—

Mr. DOUGLAS: Everything?

Mr. ROGERS: —provision for blankets and shelter as well as food, and I am informed that the figure I gave at that time was correct and that the deduction made is $6 per week.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I should like to follow up this question of inability to get these young men to accept positions in the railway camps. It may be difficult for us here, far removed from the actual situation, to realize something of the problems that have confronted these young men, many of whom have not worked for several years, while some have not worked at all.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend will recall, perhaps, that they were supposed to be working in the relief camps.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am sure the minister knows perfectly well that it was not very hard physical work, hard manual work.

Mr. STIRLING: Oh.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Be that as it may, let us look at the inducement that is being offered. The minister will correct me if I am wrong. Twenty cents an hour—

Mr. ROGERS: No, twenty-five cents an hour. In fact the wage paid is the wage which has always been paid for that type of work on railway maintenance.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Twenty-five cents an hour on the basis of an eight-hour day, twenty-six days a month, amounts to $52 a month. Deduct $24 or $25 for board, and the average young man would have to spend from $8 to $10 a month to keep himself supplied with clothing. I do not suppose that covers clothing, does it?

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friend will permit me. Provision was made for the clothing of the men while they were in the relief camps, and I am certain that instructions were issued that, when the men left the camps for the railway work, they should take with them this clothing.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Quite so, but any person knows how quickly shoes and gloves and overalls, in particular, wear out when men are doing the type of manual labour that these men are doing, and I do not suppose the railway or the government is supplying them with clothes during the summer. If they are, I want to know it; if they are not, this means that out of $52, of which $24 or $25 a month goes for board, they must buy clothing. It seems to me that that leaves them about $15 a month, which means that at the end of four months they have the magnificent sum of $60. I wonder what is going to happen after that. It is not much of an inducement to these young men to go out and do the type of work that is entailed in the railway camps, that at the end of the summer, if they are fortunate, they will have about $60, not including the nominal fee they may be charged for moving them from one place to the other. True, the minister says that is what has been paid for that type of work, but I think he will recall that it is what has been paid to, very largely, oriental labour in different parts of the country. It is what we call Chinese pay. I submit that this is no inducement to young men, and while I am not excusing them for not taking up that type of work, I maintain that we have to put forth something much more concrete if we are to get definite results in so far as putting these young people to work is concerned.

I was very much struck the other day with a statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) that in most of these cases it would be far better to spend some of the money in dealing with the underlying causes rather than to try to mop up the results of our mistakes. I think that is particularly true of the problem we are facing to-day. In a case of this kind an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. There are groups of transients gathering in different parts of western Canada. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) told me just before the six o'clock recess that he noticed that a group of, I believe he said, a thousand unemployed were coming by truck from York, outside Toronto. They cannot all be malcontents; they cannot all be agitators. All over Canada groups of people, young men particularly, are looking to this parliament. The railway camps, which may absorb 10,000 of these men, cannot begin to meet the situation, and we are going to be confronted by a very real problem before this summer is out. What I have to say is said in no spirit of rabid criticism, for there is no man in this house who more demands our sympathy and admiration than does the Minister of Labour. He has a tremendous problem, and I can think of no better way to meet it than appears in one of the sensible statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer)—one of the most sensible he ever made—in a message to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) on May 1, 1935. He said:

> Communist organizers and agitators taking advantage of justifiable dissatisfaction on part of citizens in every state of society and particularly objectionable features of relief camp system.

Then I shall leave out a paragraph that deals with details which are not important, and continue:

> Am confident that if federal government would cooperate with provincial and municipal governments situation could be remedied and riots with their inevitable consequences would be avoided. In name of humanity I appeal to you to come to assistance of provincial and civic governments in this province so that our people who want to work may be permitted to earn wages.

I would direct attention to the words "justifiable dissatisfaction." I saw these young men who were mentioned this afternoon, when they went to the city of Regina. It has been said that there were agitators among them and I have no doubt that is true. The point we fail to see, however, is that agitators do not stir up trouble. It is economic dissatisfaction and insecurity that provide the material which enables agitators to make trouble. When the average Anglo-Saxon is working; when he has a job and a home and normal social ties, he is not good seed for revolutionary propaganda. The commissioners themselves said that these young men in the main were not of a vicious type. I met many of them. Some had gone partly through college; some had graduated from high school and some were university graduates. Never mind the leadership; the fact is that these young men were longing for some type of expression and were not finding it. A great mass meeting was held in Regina, and on the platform sat representatives of every church and of different social organizations. I shall never forget the words of the representative of the Roman Catholic church, who said, "You men, you have taken the only means left open to you to uncover the ulcer that lies at the heart of modern society." The commissioners who discussed this matter stated that in the main the citizens of Regina were sympathetic towards these young men because they came to know them and to understand their problems. It is significant that with the exception of the day of the riot there was no vandalism and no property destroyed. The very men who supported these young fellows and tried to help them were elected as mayor and city councillors in Regina the following fall.

I say this because I think it is very easy for us here in parliament, far removed from some of the realities of life, to throw the whole matter aside by saying that the young men were agitators. They were not agitators. I do not say that there were no agitators among them; I know better than that, but the great majority were not agitators, and we have to deal with the situation in a much more realistic manner.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Evans, for instance.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am not discussing Mr. Evans. I am wondering why Mr. Evans ever was able to get the hold he did.

Mr. DONNELLY: Or Shaw.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Or Shaw, or anyone else. The fact remains that if these conditions had not existed these men would not have had the power they possessed. So my argument holds good, that the solution lies in giving these young men opportunities to live that will make ineffective the declamations and harangues of the professional agitators. That is my position. But unfortunately we do not do that; unfortunately we refuse to realize the urgency and the dangerous nature of the situation until it is upon us. Then a catastrophe occurs for which no one wishes to accept the blame. I was in the city of Regina and I never in my life saw brutality to equal that which occurred in Regina on July 1 last. I am not going into the details of that incident, since it does not bear directly on this subject.

Mr. BENNETT: Did the hon. gentleman give evidence before the commission?

Mr. DOUGLAS: No; I was never asked to give evidence.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): What good purpose is served by talking about riots and agitators at this time, during this debate?

Mr. DOUGLAS: A very good purpose, I think. It is people who ask questions like that who help create conditions that lead to occurrences such as we had last year. If we continue to do nothing—and I mean not the government only but all of us—it will not be a trek of two hundred people, or ten thousand people or one hundred thousand people, marching on Ottawa. We shall have this thing growing all about us. We may resist it this year or the year following, but there can be only one result and that is bloodshed such as we have had in the past, only more so. This can mean only hard feelings, distrust and further material for the type of men who started the trouble last time. I am not speaking in this way to ask that such people should be absolved from blame; I am suggesting that we take such action as will make their action impossible in the future.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): Seven thousand of these men have been put to work at fair wages, and my hon. friend is criticizing that action.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is twenty-five cents an hour a fair wage ?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): Under present conditions it is not bad.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The hon. gentleman has a marvellous sense of proportion; he says that 7,000 men have been put to work, and at the present time we have on relief nearly a million and a half people.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): We are talking about the men in the relief camps.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am talking about the whole situation, and the men in that trek were not necessarily men from relief camps; other men joined them, and other organizations are springing up. The men from York county who are planning to come to Ottawa, according to my hon. friend from Davenport, are not men from relief camps. I am not asking that we criticize what has been done in the past; I am asking that we do something for the future.

Mr. GRANT: What would the hon. member do?

Mr. DOUGLAS: If the hon. gentleman will just wait, he will see. We have placed our program before this house time and again.

An hon. MEMBER: So did Aberhart.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am not worried about Mr. Aberhart.

Mr. DONNELLY: You would not say you were not a social crediter when you were running in the election, would you?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am endeavouring to discuss an issue that is economic, that bears upon the welfare, happiness and livelihood of nearly a million and a half people throughout Canada. Unfortunately some hon. gentlemen opposite cannot forget partisan politics long enough to discuss anything. They sit in this house and sneer and laugh. Then when something takes place such as occurred in Regina last year we appoint a commission; we try to whitewash the thing, and attempt to forget about it. We say, "We all regret it, but we will let bygones be bygones." I say that is not sufficient; I say the time has come to go into this matter very thoroughly. I do not rise to criticize; I rise to ask the Minister of Labour—

Mr. GRANT: Who was responsible for the trouble in Regina last year?

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am rising to ask the Minister of Labour—

Mr. GRANT: They say you were the fellow.

The CHAIRMAN: I must appeal to all members in all quarters of the house not to interrupt.

Mr. DOUGLAS: If the hon. gentleman has any legitimate question he cares to ask, or if he wishes to debate the issue rather than hurl these remarks across the floor, I shall be glad to discuss the question with him. What I am saying to the minister is that a repetition of what took place last year is not at all improbable. In the light of that we ought to be prepared to approach this matter sympathetically. We ought to be prepared to see the men's point of view. I doubt whether many hon. members know much about the actual conditions under which these men are living.

We ought to know. There was the report of the Macdonald commission on the camps, which I believe have been cleaned up since, but no one believed that those conditions actually existed until the commission revealed them. We do not know what the conditions are in these camps.

Mr. ROGERS: If the hon. member will permit me. Is he speaking now of the relief camps?

Mr. DOUGLAS: No, of the railway construction camps. Has the minister some information on the question?

Mr. ROGERS: I have the information that the men who have gone from the relief camps to maintenance work on the railways are living under precisely the same conditions as the men who did this work before. We have received very few complaints from the men, and not a few letters expressing satisfaction with the conditions under which they are working.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I wonder whether the government is carrying on any inspection as to conditions?

Mr. ROGERS: If any complaint is received we see that an investigation is made immediately.

Mr. DOUGLAS: By whom is the investigation made?

Mr. ROGERS: Through the representative of the Department of Labour especially charged with this work, in cooperation with the railway.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I do not want to delay the committee, but undoubtedly during this coming summer the Minister of Labour will be confronted by many of the situations that arose last year.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): How does the hon. member know?

Mr. DOUGLAS: I have already cited a number of reasons: The fact that men are gathering in different parts of the country; the fact that there is talk of some coming down from East York. Undoubtedly if unemployment continues as now there are going to be mass demonstrations. I am asking the Minister of Labour to approach this question sympathetically. I am asking that we attempt to spend money in trying to clean up the situation rather than to whitewash it after it has occurred. I suggest that what occurred in Regina last year is an excellent demonstration of how not to settle a labour dispute.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. QUELCH: I have had a good deal of practical experience in railway construction work and also in farm labour, and I say without any hesitation that it is absolute nonsense to expect that men who have been trained as clerks in a city or who are physically too weak are able to go out and do eight or ten or twelve hours' work a day on railway maintenance or farm. The minister stated, I believe, that some men had refused to go out. Were those men physically fit to do that work? I have been in some of those camps and I know that many of the men would not be able to stand up under such work. That was recognized in the camps and they were given work which was suitable. If they are not fit for railway work or farm labour, what is the alternative? Is it suggested that they are either to do that work or to be turned adrift? Are they to be treated as convicts and sentenced to hard labour? Are they to be condemned to what is nothing more or less than physical torture or to be told that they will be deprived of the means of living? I should like to know what other alternative will be given these men.

Mr. ROGERS: As I have said before, the men in the camps were given an alternative. As from March 1 the wage allowance for work in the relief camps was increased from $5 to $15 a month, and as far as the projects could be usefully continued an opportunity was given to the men to continue in that work. Subsequently, when the railways were able to take on men for this extra gang work, all the men in all the camps were given an opportunity to accept that work if they so desired. There was no compulsion whatsoever.

Mr. QUELCH: The rest were allowed to stay in the camps?

Mr. ROGERS: They were allowed to stay in the camps as far as the projects could be usefully continued. The Department of Labour also made every effort to secure alternative employment through cooperation with the employment service of Canada and the colonization branch of the Department of Immigration. As I have already mentioned, some 700 men found employment on farms in western Canada as a result of this effort. We have information also that a considerable number in the camps went to employment which they found for themselves.

I also suggest that at no time did I state that any large number of men in the camps had refused work. I was very careful to put the number in hundreds rather than in thousands. I know the danger of any general indictment. I was equally careful to point out that the railway companies had expressed the utmost satisfaction with the quality of the work done by the men who did go to this work.

Mr. BENNETT: We are being asked by this measure to grant to the governor in council authority to deal with two specific matters, one of which is for an ascertained amount and the other for an undetermined sum. We are also asked to reenact the provision that permits the governor in council to make arrangements with corporations and companies. I suggested the other day that I thought it desirable that as we are to advance money by way of loan to the provinces for the sums they had expended, some supervision should be exercised with respect to those expenditures, and I indicated that at least at one time an officer was sent by the Minister of Finance to supervise in order to ensure: (a) that moneys being advanced by the dominion were actually being expended for drought relief; (b) that the dominion advances were being expended in such a way that individuals and municipalities in need of relief by reason of crop failure due to drought were being treated equitably with each other, having regard to crop record and other circumstances determining the degree of need; (c) that the moneys advanced for relief in the drought areas were being expended on a scale proportionate to and in line with relief payments made in other provinces and in other areas.

Under those instructions it will be recalled that certain investigations were made and that in one case payments were claimed amounting to $5,134 and the investigators were able to locate only $3,078. It was also found that payments made in adjoining municipalities were not on the same basis. It will perhaps be recalled that the representatives of certain municipalities explained that they did not regard it as their duty to take any action, if the population felt it desirable to receive relief, regardless of what their crop conditions were. And what was true in those particular localities was true, perhaps to a lesser extent, in other parts of Canada. The result was that the Minister of Finance satisfied himself that it was desirable to exercise the utmost care and supervision where moneys were being advanced by the dominion by way of loan to take care of the portion expended by the province, for in the result it merely means that we are furnishing the whole of the money, as the minister said the other day. The only difference is that in one case we have treasury bills, that may or may not be paid, for that portion of the expenditure which nominally is to be made by the province. This bill now before the committee, amending a statute already passed this session, which has been given the number 15, it being an unusual proceeding in itself that there should be an amendment of a statute during the same session of parliament, is brought about by the circumstances to which the minister refers. One can understand that difficulty, but it does not explain why it is thought desirable to provide a blank cheque with respect to the other matters, even though it would be on a qualitative rather than a quantitative basis, as the hon. gentleman said the other day, or perhaps it was the reverse.

I mentioned, too, that relief in Saskatchewan was being carried on by men in whom the public had not great confidence. I mentioned to the minister that the alleged commissioner of urban relief was a disbarred solicitor and that there were two other disbarred members of the bar engaged in relief work in that particular province. For some strange reason the commissioner of census for one of the constituencies in Manitoba was also a disbarred lawyer. Just why the preference should run to these men I never have been quite able to understand. I need not mention names, although I have them beside me. I have always refrained from mentioning names, so far as possible, unless it had to be done in court proceedings, when I have been speaking about a man who has been disbarred. But it is difficult to have relief administered in any area by those who have deprived deserving persons of their means, and who have found themselves in difficult positions by reason of the embezzlement of funds.

I suggest to the minister the desirability in the public interest, where the dominion is finding all the money, half of it by way of its own expenditures and half by way of loan, that there should be in cases of that kind in any province a general supervision which will satisfy the minister that the moneys have been properly expended. It will be recalled that an order in council was passed directing the auditor general to take such steps as might be thought necessary, and in one province, an eastern one, payments have not yet all been made because the proper vouchers have not yet been forthcoming. That, too, is a circumstance which strengthens the suggestion I make to the minister.

I desire also to point out that the criticism urged some years ago against the efforts made to provide work through the railways in shops and other facilities owned by railway companies is rather out of step, shall I say, with the action now taken. I quite agree that it is desirable to take these men from the camps and give them work on the railway rights of way as maintenance men. But in looking at the agreement I find that it is nothing but a gift to the railway companies who become the agents of the crown to make expenditures, and are paid for making them. I was amazed when I read the first paragraph of the agreement to find that a substantial sum of money is being given the railway companies for the organization, and I use that word for lack of a better one. The sum they are to accept is stated in the agreement. If the minister will look at the agreement I believe he will find in the opening paragraph what I mention. I looked at it upon an earlier occasion when the agreement was laid on the table of the house.

From the terms of the agreement I suppose part of it could properly be regarded as a loan and part of it as not. The position taken by the government is the position taken by the former administration, the only difference being that in one instance the work was given in shops which were paying much greater pay per diem, and the men were from urban communities rather than from the camps.

I indicated to the house, as I do to the committee, that I think it was a mistake in policy to increase the monthly pay to $15 when the men were being given notice that on July 1, their employment—or, shall I say, their engagement—in the camps was to terminate. Of course the result was to create a situation of some difficulty, but inasmuch as it was a difficulty for the government perhaps it should be left at that. Fifteen dollars per month for food, clothing and shelter was regarded as a very satisfactory arrangement by some, obviously not by all, and not by the younger men who desired to have employment. But there is the fact. The protest made by the hon. member for Weyburn is hardly correct, because working twenty-six days at $2 a day they would receive $52, and board at one dollar per day for thirty-one days leaves $21. So that at the end of four months they would have a substantially larger sum than that which has been suggested.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I subtracted for clothing.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member states that he made an allowance for clothing, but, as the minister very properly pointed out, particularly after notice was given, those men were pretty well supplied with clothing, as we know from the indents which were made upon the stores of the country.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Those of us who have followed this matter from its beginning will remember that the camps originally came into being to meet a pressing problem in connection with single unemployed men, and it was never intended that the camps would become a permanent institution. When the government took the step of ordering that they be shut down by July 1, what amazed me was the number of bitter cries and criticisms which have gone out from certain men, and the earnest entreaties that they be allowed to remain in the camps. Those who have foregathered in Saskatoon are now saying, "Why is Dundurn to be closed on the first of July?" This illustrates some of the difficulties that any government must experience in dealing with a problem of this kind.

The situation as disclosed by the press—and the minister will have more information than I have—indicates that communications had been sent to the minister from Prince Albert and Saskatoon. In the Third Avenue church of one of the cities a meeting was addressed by a minister of the gospel and a social service worker. The attitude taken seemed to indicate that they did not quite appreciate the general policy of the government in dealing with the problem. I suggest that possibly through no fault of the minister, but through the fault of those who have charge of the matter, his intentions have not become thoroughly known to those who are directly affected, because some of the statements made could not possibly have been made had the authorities been aware of what the minister said this afternoon. I feel that possibly there has been a lack of understanding on the part of those affected as to just what the intentions of the minister and government are. It is quite clear that they seemed to think no opportunity was being offered for work, whereas the minister has made it clear this afternoon that there was an opportunity for work on maintenance of way operations, and that that opportunity was still open to at least 1,300 persons. That being so, it appears that it would be desirable—and I offer this in no sense of captious criticism—to make it clear in Saskatoon and Prince Albert that work is available. Press dispatches disclose that the situation in Prince Albert is a little different from that in Saskatoon.

Leaving that aside for the moment, I could not but reflect upon the fact that a year ago, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, complaints were made of the policy being followed. There has been no departure from that policy. There is only one change in the policy of a year ago and that of to-day, and that is that the so-called relief camps are to be closed on July 1. That means that for the present there is no shelter afforded in the camps for the unemployed but it does not mean that some camps may not be required later to take care of a situation which may become pressing. So far as the general movement out of camps is concerned, it is quite clear that last spring there was a movement out of the camps which was not as large as the present movement, but during the summer, in the height of the season, the numbers in the camps did fall. I visited two of those camps and I am bound to say that what the minister said this afternoon is quite true, namely, that there were men in them who had come from farms, had remained during the winter and then, not being able to find employment on farms to their satisfaction, were remaining on. The action taken by the government in that regard is, I think, to be commended. That is, the camps, for the moment at any rate, are no longer to be kept open for the purpose of providing opportunities for food, clothing and shelter without work, and I trust very sincerely that the agreements which have been made and which contemplate the employment of the men in the camps upon railway maintenance work may be successful. On the other hand, it is equally true that the criticisims which were urged against the former administration for endeavouring to secure employment for men on the railways, in shops and among skilled mechanics, can no longer be directed in view of the steps, and, I believe, proper steps, taken by the government to meet the situation at the moment.

I mentioned the other day a difficulty which had been experienced in Belleville in connection with the employment of these men, and the Minister of Railways was to look into the matter. I stated that my information was that the men had been required to produce cards. I find that that is not the statement which is now made. It is that two employees of the Canadian National Railways who are supporters of the government pass upon the fitness of each individual to receive employment on the railway. It was not a question of receiving cards in an organization but rather that they should be acceptable to these two gentlemen, who are employees of the railway. I believe an investigation by a royal commission will substantiate that fact beyond a question of doubt. I think such a situation is very much to be deprecated, if it exists. I have no doubt that the minister will be told it does not exist. As soon as anyone is discovered carrying on actions of that kind, at that moment they deny any such thing and abandon the operation. But even at the risk of losing their jobs I believe there are some who are prepared to indicate, if a proper investigation is held under oath by a properly constituted commission, that such conditions have existed.

Mr. HOWE: I have asked for an investigation. I had received a snap report and I sent it back to the management with the demand that the matter be investigated by officials whose probity could not be questioned. I had hoped to have the report by now, but it could not be. I sincerely hope to have it by Monday for my right hon. friend's information. I may say that if such a thing has happened there, it will never happen again.

Mr. BENNETT: I am satisfied that neither the Minister of Railways nor the Minister of Labour was cognizant of the facts, because I do not think either of them would become a party to such a thing. But it created a good deal of feeling in some quarters. I naturally felt that there must be some mistake, but the information was so accurate with respect to that phase which I have now presented that I do not think there is any question about it. I am of the opinion, as the minister says, that the practice has stopped for very good reasons, among others the inquiry which was made.

I could not but be reminded, as I was saying, of the barrage of criticism and attack that came from this side of the house a year ago. I wonder if those present in this chamber at that time recall the nature of the attacks which were made from time to time and from hour to hour. To-night, a new government, through an enterprising and patriotic Minister of Labour, is desirous of giving effect to policies that for the life of me I cannot see differ in any respect from those of his predecessors, except in so far as closing the camps on the first of July is concerned. Railways? Yes. Advances of money to enable them to carry on? Yes, the same as before. Farm placements? Yes, the same as before. Increased payments, it is true, are being made to the men in the camps, with, I think, doubtful results.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend would not expect me to agree with that.

Mr. BENNETT: Not for a moment, because undoubtedly the minister took the action he did after careful consideration, believing it a useful thing to do. Then you have your agreements with the provinces, your contributions to the provinces, your loans to the provinces, your public works—the same old story in the same old way, all these things just as they were before, without a single change, not different by the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i" so far as bringing them into legislation is concerned. And now we have the last, the blank cheque, on a small scale. It was on a larger scale. Quantitative and qualitative distinctions had not then been made; the disarmament conference had not then been held, but as it is now, with the restrictions upon the armaments that protect the federal treasury removed, we find the government still clings to the desire without limitation to make "agreements with corporations, partnerships, or individuals engaged in industry respecting the expansion of industrial employment." That, of course, is very desirable; it sounds well, and I hope it will have something more than mere sound to it as the months go by. That is all I have to say with respect to that, except to point out how differently men view matters when they occupy different positions in a legislative assembly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend forgets that he did not allow the present government to get into office until away on in October, and at that time it was wholly impossible to make many changes that might otherwise have been made.

Mr. BENNETT: I am delighted to have the Prime Minister make that observation because, whatever may have been his intentions, it is quite clear, like the language which he used with respect to the Bank of Canada Act, that when his intentions became crystallized into legislation we could certainly understand what he meant, and this legislation provides for loans, l-o-a-n-s, spelled the same old way, provides for public works, spelled in the same old way, for advances, spelled in the same old way, provides for agreements, spelled in the same old way, provides for employment by the railway, spelled in the same old way. It is not a matter of time with these things; they are all now matters of legislation. They have been reduced and crystallized into statutes. However skilful one may be in disguising one's thoughts with words, when they find expression in a statute it is not so difficult to understand them, and the legislation we have here, as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North said, is exactly similar to what we had before, not the slightest difference except with respect to the amount of the blank cheque.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Previously it was all done under peace, order and good government or the blank cheque, except that in his last year or two of office my right hon. friend yielded to the pressure of the opposition and enacted certain legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: No. Orders in council speak for themselves. There was special provision for loans to provinces, just as there is to-day. There was special provision for public works, without limitation as to the amounts. To-day the public works are stated in the appropriation bill that has been passed, passed twice, for that matter, part of it passed two years ago and part of it this year. I congratulate the minister upon having the courage to act as if change was not necessarily progress; when he adopts and continues the methods in vogue by his predecessors, he must realize after all that they were the best methods available under the circumstances that existed, and he finds himself unable to make any changes except as to the method in which he carries out some of these matters.

Mr. ROGERS: That is a very important factor.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, very important to the man who is looking for a job. He is vitally interested in knowing whether there is a limitation by parliament on the amount that may be expended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So is the taxpayer.

Mr. BENNETT: He is going to pay anyway. As one hon. member said this afternoon, he has to pay. The Minister of Public Works said that there was no reduction in the amount available for the purpose of looking after unemployment relief. Perish the thought that there should be. We are taking a generous attitude towards this matter and providing for it just as did our predecessors. He tells the committee that there is no reduction in the amount to be expended. But, forsooth, the taxpayer receives no protection. It does not make any difference in actual fact whether the amount of $20,000,000 is arrived at by one method or another, the taxpayer has to pay. It does not make any difference to him if he has to pay it in one way or in another way. The difference between quantitative and qualitative payments is so refreshing. It is such a delightful thing for the unfortunate taxpayer to be told that he should not complain, that this is a qualitative tax measure, whereas the one he had before was a quantitative tax measure, or vice versa. How delightful it is to think that, after all, we can look into the past and perhaps we can learn something, even though it comes from Thomas Carlyle, but for the present we shall shut our eyes to the facts and look into the future.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, in discussing this question we do not seem to be able to get away from the blank cheque. I have always had the idea that the blank cheque was not adopted in order that the government might raid the treasury; I believe it was adopted in order that expenditures might be kept as low as possible. I can see how that situation would come about. After the former government was elected a special session of parliament was held and $20,000,000 was voted for unemployment relief. This money was distributed to the various municipalities and provinces on the understanding that the municipalities and provinces would appropriate an equal amount. The result was that some of the municipalities, thinking they were getting something for nothing, very nearly went bankrupt in order to meet the amounts being paid by the government. The astute Prime Minister of that time decided that another method should be adopted; that he would ask for a blank cheque. That meant he could pay as much as he wished, or could issue as little as he wanted. He did issue as little as he could get away with. I do not think there need be much time wasted on that phase of the matter.

I have been interested in the agreements entered into with the railway companies. These agreements were not tabled until a few days ago. As has been pointed out by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), each railway company is given $1,502,450. As far as I can see, this is a clear gift to the railway companies, on the understanding that they will employ a certain number of men.

Mr. ROGERS: And that sum will be paid in wages to those men.

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite so. Furthermore, the government is to loan each of the railway companies two amounts, one not to exceed $554,700 and another amount of practically the same size. These amounts are to be used for organization work and materials. I noticed in the estimates the other day that there is an item of $55,000 to pay the sales tax on the materials the railway companies are going to use for this purpose.

Mr. ROGERS: In the absence of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Howe) I hesitate to correct my hon. friend, but my impression is that that item for sales tax relates to the transaction of last year when certain equipment orders were placed with certain railway and locomotive companies in this country.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is right.

Mr. MacINNIS: If the Minister of Labour is satisfied I shall make no further mention of it. What will happen is that each railway company will receive $1,502,450, which they will pay out in wages to the men who are to do the maintenance work. If these men work eight hours a day—I shall come to the matter of hours a little later—it will mean $2 per day. For every day a man works, and, I assume, as well for the days he does not work, he pays approximately $1 to the company for his keep. Each railway company is getting a free gift of $1,502,450 worth of labour from the people of Canada, while the men who perform the labour will receive very little.

I do not know, nor, do I suppose, does any one else, how long the men will be working. Any estimate as to the time they will put in before the end of the season would be merely a guess but I think five months would be a good average. At the rate of twenty-five cents per hour, working eight hours per day and six days per week, the total wages for the five months would amount to $260. A man's meals would cost about $125, at $6 per week. I am told that there is a blanket rental of fifty cents per week, which would amount to approximately $11 for the five months. That would total $136, which would leave the man $124 after working five months.

Mr. ROGERS: I hope my hon. friend will allow me to correct his statements as he goes along, as I know he does not want to make misstatements. I am sure that the blanket rate is included in the $6, which is a deduction for shelter and food.

Mr. BENNETT: There is also a small deduction for medical services.

Mr. MacINNIS: The statement was made to me that this $6 was for meals, and that there was a blanket rental of fifty cents.

Mr. ROGERS: In addition to the $6?

Mr. MacINNIS: My information is that it is in addition.

Mr. ROGERS: I think my hon. friend is misinformed.

Mr. MacINNIS: I thought the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was in his seat. He was present when I got that information. At the end of the five months, provided a man does not spend anything on tobacco, provided he does not spend anything on clothes, provided he does not spend anything on magazines and books, provided he does not spend anything on amusement, provided he does not spend anything on any of those things the average individual requires, he will have a total of $124 provided he has worked every working day during that time.

The minister said that the agreements called for a basic eight hour day. That is correct, but the wording is such that a ten hour day can be worked most of the time. Let me read that part of the agreement referring to the working day. It says:

> The basic working day for men so furnished shall be eight hours, but inasmuch as this is seasonal work, subject to intervals of discontinuance, and exceptional owing to pressure of work for the time being, the hours of work may exceed eight hours in any one day, or forty-eight hours in any one week, in which case the men so furnished shall be paid overtime pro rata for the additional time worked beyond eight hours; provided that the number of hours during which any man is actually engaged in work on his regular assignment during any six consecutive months shall not exceed 208 hours per month as an average.

The possibilities are that the men will not be working six months, and when you take into account that month which they have not worked at all, and calculate the average of the time they have been working, they could not possibly work more than ten hours a day and be within this agreement, so that I do not think that part of the agreement is worth very much.

A question was raised of some of the men having refused this kind of work. I do not think the minister wished to give the impression that this happened generally; he said that a few hundred out of a good many thousands refused this kind of work, and I think in that respect he was right. But let us look at the situation as it is. A great many, if not the majority, of the men in the camps are young Canadians. Many of them have had a fairly good education. In the past this kind of work on the railroads has been done by Chinese, at least on the Canadian Pacific Railway to some extent, and in many parts of Canada by Europeans recently arrived in the country. Very few Canadians heretofore have done this sort of work, and it is not surprising that a few men out of eight or nine thousand should have refused to do it.

Mr. ROGERS: Will my hon. friend permit me to state that I have received representations from Canadians in, I believe, every one of the provinces, desiring to participate in this particular work at the present time?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, I can quite understand that.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend is speaking of times when there was an ample supply of general employment for Canadian workmen.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. MacINNIS: The Minister of Labour must realize how hard it is for men who expected something very much better than that to bring themselves to the position where they have to do that kind of work, which offers no hope whatever for any future advancement or progress. I do not know whether the minister is able to make any announcement in the matter or not, but I should like to know what the government has in mind to do for these men after the work on the railways is over. It does not seem to me that we can hope that through any general improvement in conditions these men will find work in the ordinary channels of trade and industry. Clearly they cannot do that. They will have very, very little money when they leave railway work, and it will not carry them very far. And men who have been away for several months from all contacts with the rest of the community will be very likely to have a "blowout" when they get away from the monotony of four or five months of such work, and who can blame them?

Now, let me refer to the general improvement about which we hear so much. Building construction is one of the best barometers of industrial activity that I know of. I have before me the figures compiled by MacLean Building Reports Limited for the first four months of the present year. Taking the seven largest cities in Canada, I find that in all but one of those cities building permits in that period are considerably lower than they were last year. Vancouver is the only city where they are higher than they were last year. There is a reason for that, namely the new city hall and a few buildings of that kind. The figures are: Vancouver, this year, $2,219,000; in 1935, $621,000. Let us look at the other cities: Toronto, 1935, $3,008,000; 1936, $1,477,000; Montreal, 1935, $2,446,000; 1936, $1,118,000; Ottawa, 1935, $1,740,000; 1936, $312,000; Hamilton, 1935, $1,056,000; 1936, $305,000; Winnipeg, 1935, $1,911,000; 1936, $160,000; Quebec, 1935, $125,000; 1936, $90,000. I have given round figures. So there is no possible hope of improvement, and I think, before the house adjourns, the government ought to give some indication of what the general policy is in regard to unemployment for the coming fall and winter months before parliament meets again.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I had decided before lunch that probably it would not be necessary for me to deal with a matter that had been brought up on two previous occasions while discussions of this bill were under way, but since lunch time the matter has been again referred to. Therefore I should like to clear up one or two references that have been made to the administration of relief in one of the provinces of Canada. On page 3653 of Hansard I read these words, spoken by the leader of the opposition:

Since we were dealing with this legislation before I have had occasion to follow up the question which I then raised as to the supervision which the government was exercising. I pointed out that the government had removed from office one who had been sent by the Department of Finance to check over the expenditures in Saskatchewan.

In the first place I should like to call to the attention of the committee that the man spoken of in this connection was not sent to Saskatchewan to check up on the work which was under discussion on a previous occasion we referred to, that is on farm placements. He was sent there under an arrangement made between myelf, as premier of that province, and the council of the government of Canada, meeting in the council chamber under the chairmanship of the present leader of the opposition, and the arrangement made is set out in a letter under date of November 2, 1934. That letter is signed by Hon. Edgar N. Rhodes, who at that time was Minister of Finance.

Dear Mr. Gardiner,—

Confirming our telephone conversation of last evening, we are to-day forwarding to Regina by wire the sum of $750,000 as an accountable advance, to be used only for relief purposes.

The government has from the outset recognized that there was a grave problem in Saskatchewan in the drought areas which could be properly regarded as national in character, and which called for special assistance from the dominion government. This view was kept fully in mind when the Prime Minister telegraphed to you on the 31st day of August offering to assume full responsibility for food, clothing and shelter, and to deal with the question of feed and fodder as outlined in that telegram.

While we are still of opinion that inasmuch as the dominion was providing the funds it was our duty to assume responsibility for their expenditure, notwithstanding the fact that you declined the proposal made by the Prime Minister as outlined above, we would adhere to that position if to do so would not impose hardship upon a large number of people resident in the province of Saskatchewan.

Notwithstanding the fact that our position was made clear to you as far back as August last, you now return seeking assistance at a period when it is too late in the season to attempt to set up our own machinery, and therefore to provide further assistance, there is no alternative to our utilizing the machinery you have set up for distribution.

We are prepared to advance such sums of money as may be necessary to take care of our full obligation in the drought area and such further assistance from time to time as it may be our duty to render, also to provide such portion as may be required for general relief purposes, if any, over and above the sum of $200,000 per month which we are now paying, provided always we are satisfied that the moneys so advanced are required and expended for the purposes intended.

The measure of this advance will have to be determined as we proceed, and to avoid delay and to ensure that the expenditures are being made in conformity with this understanding, we propose to take such steps as may be necessary to provide for a proper check and audit of all relief expenditures which will only be paid by us from time to time as it may be established that the expenditures are warranted and made for the purposes intended.

I take it that in conformity with your advice to me over the telephone this course will be perfectly satisfactory to you and that you will confirm this arrangement by wire as speedily as possible after receipt of this letter.

This letter is signed by Hon. Edgar N. Rhodes. It was addressed to me at Regina, under date of November 2, and there are one or two references in the letter to which I should like to direct attention. I should like to read this statement from the letter once more:

Notwithstanding the fact that our position was made clear to you as far back as August last you now return seeking assistance at a period when it is too late in the season to attempt to set up our own machinery, and therefore to provide further assistance there is no alternative to our utilizing the machinery you have set up for distribution.

We are prepared to advance such sums of money as may be necessary to take care of our full obligation in the drought area—

I wish to point out that in those and other statements contained in the letter it is emphasized that the obligation was an obligation of the federal government which the Prime Minister of that time undertook to assume, as early as August of 1934. The objection I took to the proposal when I met the government was due to the fact that the greater part of the expenditure to be made in the drought area would be for feed and fodder. The cost of feed and fodder in the drought area is much greater in a year when there is a crop failure than is the cost of actually feeding, clothing and sheltering the people who live in that area. I emphasized the fact that it would be inadvisable to have set up in the province of Saskatchewan one relief organization to look after feed and fodder and another relief organization to look after direct relief. I indicated that either one or the other, either the provincial or the federal government, should assume full responsibility for setting up the organization for distribution of both direct relief and feed and fodder. During the period intervening, between August and the 2nd November, an organization was set up in Saskatchewan to purchase feed and fodder, to make provision for straw as it came away from the threshing machines, and to look after the problem generally. When the then Prime Minister returned from Great Britain, where he had been during October, I met him in Ottawa and made the arrangements that are agreed to in this letter I have just read.

The point I wish to emphasize is this: The provincial government was asked at that stage to use an organization that it had set up in order to look after an obligation which was entirely an obligation of the federal government, and recognized by the federal government as such. In order to check the expenditure of the money required they sent a man to Regina. Some of the reports that were made by Mr. Barnett, who was appointed to do this checking, were quoted to-night by the right hon. leader of the opposition without being referred to definitely as having come from that source. I recognized them because of the discussion that took place at the time in connection with reports dealing with the treatment of one municipality in Saskatchewan as compared with another, in the matter of giving assistance under this plan. All I wish to say with regard to that criticism is that after Mr. Barnett had been on this job during the entire winter; after he had investigated an expenditure that ran to something like $9,000,000 prior to the time he left the service of the Department of Finance, he had refused payment of only $40,000 of the amount that had been distributed. The federal government, out of the $9,000,000 that was involved, paid all but some $40,000, after they had placed a man in a position to check the accounts both before and after payments were made. Well, I venture to say that no other organization set up by one government in Canada to administer the affairs of another government in Canada, in connection with the expenditure of money, has shown as great efficiency as was shown in Saskatchewan both under the government in power in Ottawa at that time and under the government that has had to meet some of those expenditures since.

I wanted to make that statement in order to clear up the reference that is here made. This man was not appointed for the purpose of checking up on farm placements; he was appointed for the purpose of checking up on the expenditure of federal money spent by an organization created by the federal government in order to do a federal job.

Well, Mr. Chairman, having made that perfectly clear there are one or two observations I think should be made with regard to the other matter that has been referred to continuously, namely the payment of those who were entitled to $5 a month from the fund provided for farm placements. I have before me letters and telegrams from the files of the Department of Labour which I had copied a few days ago, after the reference made to this matter by the right hon. leader of the opposition. I find at an earlier date a telegram sent by myself to the Minister of Finance on January 8, 1935:

Hon. E. N. Rhodes,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Reference placement; single homeless persons on farms under terms agreement September 15, 1933, and privy council order of October 11, 1934. Chief accountant unemployed relief branch federal Department of Labour rules that agreement instituted to assist in the relief in urban centres of homeless persons and who are definitely found not to be a legitimate charge on any municipality. Therefore persons who have resided in rural municipalities are not qualified for bonus even though they are homeless, destitute and unemployed. Primary object of whole scheme as concurred in by your premier at interprovincial conference 1933 was to provide measure of relief to thousands of farm labourers in drought areas of province thus retaining men on farms in preference to their congregating in cities. Ruling department labour officials above referred to practically nullifies whole scheme in so far as our drought areas are concerned and would urge you request labour department to issue ruling based on terms of agreement which simply states that five dollars bonus available to persons placed on farms.

That matter was referred to by the Minister of Municipal Affairs in Saskatchewan, in charge of labour, on February 5, 1935, and I shall read one paragraph from that letter for the purpose of indicating to the committee and to the leader of the opposition what the point at issue was between the government of Saskatchewan and the government at Ottawa:

I understand that during the winter 1933-34—

That is the winter before the change of government in Saskatchewan, the winter before the last provincial election.

—a large number of farm labourers were placed on farms, presumably under the terms of the agreement, and that the records and accounts for these placements were submitted to representatives of your department, approved, and payments were made.

Let me emphasize that point. These accounts were submitted to the representative of the Department of Labour; they were checked by him and they were paid in the winter of 1933-34.

We now find that a sum amounting to nearly $90,000 of the money which had been passed upon one year ago, and actually paid out, is being questioned by your department because of an interpretation placed upon the agreement by officials of your department, and that this interpretation is also being applied to the placements being made this year, which also will undoubtedly result in a large percentage of the moneys paid to these single homeless men being charged back to this government.

That was the point at issue throughout November and December, 1934, and January, 1935, and with that point at issue during January, 1935, I took the position as premier of the province that we could not become responsible for the payment of $5 a month to men placed upon farms in Saskatchewan, from funds of the dominion government, for the purpose of carrying out a policy of the dominion government, if payments of $90,000 made in the year previous were going to be charged back against the province. We indicated to persons who were receiving payment from that fund that no payments would be made after January 31, 1935, by the province. We took the position that we would not make the payments until the matter of policy had been definitely settled. We did this because to have followed the policy set out by the Department of Labour with regard to payments for the previous winter would have resulted in money paid out from this fund being charged back to the province on all but a very small percentage of the cases. We notified all the men that payments would not be made after January 31, 1935.

What action was then taken by the dominion government? The action is set out in a letter dated February 23, 1935, written by the Deputy Minister of Labour to the Deputy Minister of Finance. I am going to read that letter in part, because it sets out the action taken by the government at that time and the reasons for it:

Under the provisions of P.C. 2465, October 11, 1934, the agreement between the dominion government and the province of Saskatchewan, dated September 5, 1933, was revived as from October 1, 1934, effective to March 31, 1935, thus providing for payment by the dominion government to the province of $5 per month for persons placed on farms. I enclose copies of the order in council and agreement referred to for your information.

Now these are the important parts:

The provincial authorities have interpreted this measure of assistance as applying to all persons, whereas this department has taken the stand that the 1933 agreement and the revival thereof by order in council merely renews the provisions of the 1932 agreement, confining this provision to transients.

I may say by way of explanation that by that time the transients were supposed to be in the relief camps, and transients as they came along and qualified for the relief camps by health tests were placed in the relief camps.

This situation is set forth in my letter of February 18 to the Minister of Municipal Affairs for Saskatchewan, copy of which I enclose. I also enclose copy of a letter of February 18, addressed by the Hon. Minister of Labour to the premier of Saskatchewan. If you will refer to the final paragraph of this letter, you will see that the minister has informed premier Gardiner that the dominion will provide for the continuation of the bonus of $5 per month to the 5,300 persons reported by the province as being on farms under the plan as at January 1, last.

I may say that there is apparently a stenographical error here as the 5,300 persons referred to were reported by the province as at January 31, last.

I do not think it necessary to read every paragraph of the letter, because this paragraph really sets out the point that I wish to bring before the committee. It is this, that down to February 1, 1935, the dominion government refused to make payments to men other than those who were transients. There were 5,300 persons receiving $5 per month from the provincial government, who qualified under the provincial interpretation of the plan to be paid by the federal government at January 31, 1935. The dominion government refused that payment through the provincial authorities, and therefore the provincial authorities refused to pay it to the men. But immediately the provincial government stepped out of the field, the dominion government took on the whole 5,300 men and agreed to pay them $5 a month, not through the provincial government at all but through a man they themselves appointed to do this. That man is indicated in this letter:

This department has at Regina an auditor, Mr. Symons, who is engaged in auditing the accounts of the Saskatchewan relief commission and who is familiar with the situation as regards the $5 a month farm placement plan. He will be instructed to place himself in touch with Major Barnett and it is suggested that he shall jointly, with Major Barnett, certify the accounts sent to this department for credit to the advance made.

The point is that Major Barnett was sent to Saskatchewan for the purpose of checking the accounts as they passed through a provincial set-up, with regard to moneys that were being paid to farm labourers through an undertaking that the federal government assumed as their responsibility. He had nothing to do with farm placement until the provincial government entirely passed out of the picture. Then the payments of the $5 amounts were made through Mr. Barnett by the federal government advancing to him $60,000, $30,000 per month, with which to make payments during February and March, and those payments were made and audited without any necessity for any check on the provincial government whatsoever. The moneys were paid by the dominion official, and paid directly by the dominion officials to the farm labourers who were placed on farms.

Mr. Barnett and, later, Mr. Burgess, checked the payments in the drought area. In dealing with their criticism I want to read to the committee one document I found on the file of the Department of Labour. This is a letter addressed to Harry Hereford, Esquire, Dominion Unemployment Relief Commissioner, Department of Labour, Ottawa, reading as follows:

Dear Mr. Hereford:

I enclose herewith quotations from letters and telegrams received by the minister with reference to relief in Saskatchewan.

Yours very truly,
D. L. Burgess.

D. L. Burgess was secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. On the file sent down to the Department of Labour from the office of the Minister of Agriculture are samples of some of the checks that were being made and the results of those checks upon relief expenditures in Saskatchewan, under the set-up referred to. I have before me a letter which I shall read. I do not know who wrote it, because the file does not show, but the letter I have just read indicates it was clipped from a communication received by the Minister of Agriculture:

Since Mr. Gardiner took office the relief allowances have been cut down from $2.50 per family to $8 per family.

"Per family" obviously should come after the "$8."

Remembering what was said in this house in connection with the necessity for checks and the insinuations that have been made—I call them insinuations because of the references I shall make in a moment—that all was not well in connection with the administration of relief in Saskatchewan, and the inference to be drawn that some very close check should be kept by the Minister of Labour upon expenditures in Saskatchewan because of what is happening there, let me read it again:

Since Mr. Gardiner took office the relief allowances have been cut down from $2.50 per family to $8 per family. I know this, and here are the actual reductions, for a family of fourteen in April, 1934, received $15 and two sacks of flour. In April, 1935, $10 straight. From this you will see the difference and they say now it is all going to be cut off and a single man cannot get work here so I should like you to try and picture what will happen here if they do cut it off and they are not giving us any road work yet.

That is the kind of reports which were coming in, the kind of report being sent by one department of government in Ottawa to another department of government in Ottawa, in order to see to it that a proper check was kept by the department on the Saskatchewan expenditures of relief moneys which, the leader of the opposition is quite correct in saying, were supplied by the government of Canada.

But that report shows that the government of Saskatchewan was actually cutting down the relief allowances. Actually it was paying less than was being paid before, actually saving money to the government of Canada. I say if there were many reports of that kind being sent on from one department to the other they could not have resulted otherwise than to make the ministers believe that relief was being properly administered.

I now come to the other statement to which reference was made to-night, and which has been referred to on previous occasions. I read from Hansard of June 12, 1936, page 3653 where the leader of the opposition is reported as follows:

I pointed out that the government had removed from office one who had been sent by the Department of Finance to check over the expenditures in Saskatchewan. I find that certain relief expenditures in that province are under the control of a disbarred lawyer who was guilty of embezzling trust funds. That would hardly be a highly desirable person to have in charge of the expenditure of moneys which we have to pay.

Before going on to deal with the statement itself and the reference it makes to an individual in Saskatchewan, I want to say that ever since the government in that province was taken over by the Liberal party in 1934, or at least ever since the reorganization put into effect after that, direct relief expenditures in that province have been under the control of T. M. Molloy who was at first Deputy Minister of Labour, and who is now in charge of the Bureau of Labour in that province. I know that any official in the Department of Labour in Ottawa will agree with me when I say that Mr. Molloy is one of the most capable labour officials to be found in any provincial government. He has had twenty-five years' service in the province of Saskatchewan. He is the man who has administered the expenditure of all direct relief funds in Saskatchewan, ever since the present government of the province of Saskatchewan came into office and set up a new organization for the expenditure of those funds. He is not a lawyer.

Naturally we were concerned the other evening when my right hon. friend made that statement. The Minister of Labour asked this question:

Mr. Rogers: Would my right hon. friend care to name the official in question?

Mr. Bennett: I prefer not to mention a man's name.

Mr. Rogers: Is my right hon. friend suggesting that he is an employee of the dominion government or of the Department of Labour?

Mr. Bennett: I said he was in charge of expenditures in the province of Saskatchewan.

Those two statements are very plain ones, namely, "I find that certain relief expenditures in that province are under the control of a disbarred lawyer who was guilty of embezzling trust funds," and "I said he was in charge of expenditures in the province of Saskatchewan."

Later on I came into the house and asked one or two question in regard to the matter. I asked:

Mr. Gardiner: What was the nature of the position held by the gentleman?

Mr. Bennett: In connection with the administration of relief.

Mr. Gardiner: Out in the country or at the head office?

Mr. Bennett: My memory is that he was in a position of some considerable authority, that he was not an ordinary administrator out in the countrly, that he had come into Regina and was administering from there. I will have the letter with me and will give those particulars when the bill is in committee.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that three persons were referred to.

Mr. Bennett: There were two others who were also members of the legal profession and who, according to my information, were also in the same unfortunate position.

I think there can be no misunderstanding about the inference which was left in the minds of all those who listened to that statement, and there can now be no doubt in the minds of those who listened to it as to what it really means.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARDINER: It means that someone in the province of Saskatchewan who had been disbarred as a lawyer—and I might say some persons have held responsible positions in Canada after they have been disbarred as lawyers—

Mr. McPHEE: Cabinet rank.

Mr. GARDINER: This gentleman is said to have been disbarred. That evening, after the discussion, the leader of the opposition was kind enough to send to me the name of the individual. I did not know the man. I had never heard of him, as a matter of fact. Not having heard of him I was quite satisfied he was not in charge of the administration of anything. So I wired Regina in order to get the facts. On the night of June 12, 1936, I sent this wire to the Hon. T. C. Davis, Attorney General, Regina, Saskatchewan:

Mr. Bennett stated in house to-day that a member of the legal profession who had been debarred because of embezzling funds had held or now holds an important position in the administration of relief funds in Saskatchewan. He also stated there were two other employed who were in the same unfortunate position. Kindly wire me any information possible. If such persons were employed, give details re time of debarring and present standing.

I received a reply to that wire from Mr. Davis. The wire is dated Regina, June 13, the following morning, and reads as follows:

Statements made by Mr. Bennett are not true and the facts are as follows. Former solicitor in employ of relief department in minor position of correspondence clerk at salary which barely provides existence. This man was at one time a practising lawyer but was accused of failure to account for some funds and was struck off the rolls of law society. Since then he has made complete settlement of claim against him and I am satisfied that if he applied for reinstatement he could secure it, but he has never had the funds wherewith to do this. No profession in this province more hard hit through depression than that of law. Two other former practising solicitors employed in connection with northern settlers' reestablishment in minor clerical positions. One is still solicitor in good standing.

I have had information since that this gentleman who was still a solicitor in good standing is not practising because his practice practically disappeared because of the hard times. The wire continues:

The other was suspended for three months for irregularities and subsequently voluntarily filed statement of non-practice with law society and therefore is not on the active rolls.

I am informed, on applying for further information, that this gentleman while not on the active rolls at present, was reinstated, had not sufficient practice to be able to get along in the community where he was, and then ceased to be a practising lawyer.

These three gentlemen have been given employment in very inferior positions, not in the administration of relief, but merely clerks in the office in charge of distribution. They are not handling any funds whatsoever. After a man in Canada has met with a difficulty which has been brought upon him by the situation through which our country is passing, after he has got into some difficulties that probably he would have been wiser had he not got into, and after he has had his punishment, whatever that punishment may be, is anyone going to say that that man is never again going to obtain employment in this country? Is any man going to say that governments must see to it that he is passed up every time he makes application for a job? Is anyone going to say, if that man can write letters properly and be a correspondence clerk, he must, instead of taking that kind of work, go into a relief camp or some other place to find an existence?

I do not think even the leader of the opposition would take that position. I can quite agree with him that had any of these gentlemen been in positions such as the leader of the opposition must have thought they were in from the correspondence he has obtained, he would probably have been justified in raising the question, but I think all of us, before raising questions about individuals who find themselves in difficulties in these days, should be very careful to get all the facts with regard to them; and if I had not all the facts with regard to these men, I would very much prefer to err on the side of not knowing all that is to be known about them than to err on the side of coming into this house as a representative of the people, even as a humble member attending his first session, and raising the matter on the floor of the House of Commons. I think we have much bigger matters to talk about, much bigger matters to discuss, much bigger problems to settle. I regret that the right hon. gentleman found it necessary to bring up this matter on three occasions in order to elicit some kind of reply to the question. I hope that the incident is closed.

Mr. MacNEIL: I wish to bring to the attention of members of the committee another aspect of this problem. I think nothing could be more dangerous than to allow the impression to go abroad that members of this house are not entirely sympathetic with the plight of those whose welfare is being discussed. It would be equally dangerous to have the impression go abroad that we are more interested in what might be termed the political aspects of the problem rather than in the rehabilitation of Canadian homes and the lives of many of our Canadian people.

I am not disposed at this stage to indulge in any criticism of the government's policy. We must, I assume, adjust ourselves as best we may to the plans outlined. I appreciate the magnitude of the problem and the difficulties facing the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and in the name of those who are suffering misery and distress at this time I hope that we may achieve in the ensuing months some appreciable degree of progress towards the solution of this problem.

I have on previous occasions stated my views with regard to the government's policy, and I cannot admit to any optimism as to the outlook. I cannot see any hope of the reabsorption into productive employment of any substantial number of those now on relief. But at this moment I would rather plead with the Minister of Labour to give his most earnest consideration to some aspects of the problem that in my humble opinion seem to be most important. When the Minister of Labour was dealing with the unemployment situation on a former occasion, in committee on the bill, he gave statistics of those now unemployed and on relief but he did not have an opportunity to give the statistics on employment. I notice in our journals in Canada several attempts to analyze the situation and to give the impression that the number of those on relief is not decreasing as might be expected from the statistics given as to the increase in the number of employed, and propaganda is abroad that the majority of those out of work are out of work because they won't work and that relief should be severely reduced accordingly. I think the most effective answer to that propaganda was given by the Minister of Labour himself this afternoon when he stated that 8,700 men in the relief camps had accepted work on the deferred maintenance work of the transportation systems. Nevertheless this opinion is abroad, and I would ask the Minister of Labour, in administering the measures under his supervision, and also the Minister of Transport, to attempt to convince the single men and the married men on relief that it is the earnest desire of the government to give all these people a square deal.

There is on the part of many officials dealing with this problem what is sometimes called a hard-boiled attitude. Without question there is the occasional chiseller, the result being a tendency on the part of some to judge all the unemployed on relief as being a class of human beings quite different and apart from the rest of our people. It must be held in mind very clearly at all times that even if a man is down and out, even if he is unemployed and on relief, he is still a human being; those whom we classify in general terms as the army of the unemployed, the jobless and so on, we must never forget are human beings, and unemployment is doing terrible things to human beings. These people are part of our nation. We cannot divide our nation into a number of water-tight compartments. These men live in a separate world, for those on relief do live in a separate world. But they have the same aspirations, the same ambitions and the same desires as other people and these things are being denied them. The denial of these natural ambitions and natural aspirations over a prolonged period is bound to have a terrible influence upon human beings, and the results of a prolonged period of unemployment with inadequate relief measures must be taken into very sympathetic consideration. There must be some effort made to gain an understanding of the problem, from this point of view.

I urge the consideration by the Minister of Labour of the problem of our single, homeless young men, to whom reference was made this afternoon. It was said that some of these men would not accept work when it was offered to them. The minister has said that no medical examination was provided to determine the physical fitness of these men for this arduous, manual labour, or their aptitude for this kind of work.

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps I should have said that I had no knowledge of such an examination having been made.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am sorry if I have misquoted the minister. My information is that no medical examination was conducted. May I remind the minister that in every large relief camp which I have visited there was a sick bay or hut. At all times there were a certain number of men requiring medical attention in spite of the physical examination they had received upon admission to camp. I have personal knowledge of men who were quite incapable of undertaking maintenance work such as is being arranged for them with the transportation systems. There are also a number of elderly men in these camps. I met men of the ages of sixty and sixty-five years, and it is quite obvious that they would be unable to do this arduous manual work. I ask the minister to investigate the cases of men alleged to have refused work, and to ascertain whether or not their reasons for refusal were valid. I am very sure that all but a small percentage who did refuse to work did so for justifiable reasons. From my personal knowledge I know there are a considerable number of these men who are wholly unfit for this work.

I bring to the attention of the minister the question of clothing, a problem now facing these men on maintenance work. It is quite true that they were permitted to retain the clothing they had in the relief camps, but very little of that clothing is of the protective nature necessary for the work in which they are now engaged. Many of these men are working in swamp lands and some of them are working in rough country where, for instance, they require gloves. If we consider the work they are engaged in, a pair of gloves would last only a week or ten days.

An hon. MEMBER: Boxing gloves?

Mr. MacNEIL: I am talking about work gloves to be used in clearing work. I am endeavouring to gain a sympathetic consideration of this matter. Any one who has done work of this kind will realize the truth of what I am saying.

Another point to be considered is the conditions under which these men are living. We all know that men engaged in construction work must endure a certain amount of hardship, but these men are of the opinion that they are being treated as coolie labourers. Very often they are housed in box cars which are not clean, and sometimes through lack of a sufficient supply of water they are unable to keep themselves clean and observe the ordinary decencies of life. I ask the minister to exercise the most careful supervision and try to obtain the best possible living conditions for these men under the circumstances. What is more important, the men should be convinced that the federal government is endeavouring to give them a square deal. I speak feelingly of this subject.

There has been a disposition in the past to treat these men as cattle. Some time ago a young man from a relief camp was killed on the railway in the Rocky mountains, and I am told that when they were gathering up the boy's remains, the official in charge complained of having to go to Vancouver to attend the inquest and referred to this boy and his companions in profane terms as being cattle. That attitude has been communicated to the men and I leave it to hon. members to realize that there can be only one result when men believe they are being treated as cattle.

Mr. ROGERS: Would my hon. friend give me the particulars of that incident, when it occurred and where? Perhaps not now, but if he would send me a letter.

Mr. MacNEIL: I was not making any charges, I was using this incident to illustrate a general attitude.

Mr. ROGERS: I would not for the world have my hon. friend leave the impression that that is typical of railway officials, and least of all of any official of the government.

Mr. MacNEIL: I assure the minister that it was not an official of the government; it was an official of the railway. I am merely illustrating the attitude.

Reference was made this afternoon to the unfortunate occurrences which took place in Vancouver and Regina. I am not attempting at this time to fix the blame, but I want to say that I have an intimate knowledge of the circumstances leading up to the most unfortunate occurrences in the city of Regina last Dominion day. I also had knowledge of the facts long before the men invaded the city of Vancouver. Time and again efforts were made to make representations to the authorities that certain action was necessary to prevent any disorderly occurrence. All that was necessary was a frank man to man negotiation in this matter. The men finally came into Vancouver and I had daily contact with them. I knew the men who were designated this afternoon as communist agitators, and I also knew a large number of other men who came to me day after day and told me that they had no sympathy with the communist leadership which was directing the movement. They told me that all they wanted was a chance to present their views. I think I am fair when I say that during the earlier stages of the negotiations, which were conducted on behalf of the men by many representative business men in Vancouver, the attitude of those in authority and in close contact with the problem was arbitrary and high-handed. The result was that some of these men, decent men and some well educated, told me that they would rather take the bull whips in the gutters of the streets of Vancouver than return to the conditions they had had to endure in the relief camps.

Time after time we pleaded with them not to engage in any disorderly action, and they told us that they had no intention or desire of challenging constituted law and authority. On the other hand, they contended that they had been denied the processes of reasonable negotiation. Time went on, and I was personally present in the streets of Vancouver when these men were beaten up in a most brutal fashion by the city and provincial police. I ask any hon. member: If you had been present on that occasion, would you regard those occurrences any differently? The attack made upon these men on that occasion was unnecessary, unjustifiable and unprovoked. They were ousted from their quarters where they had been holding a peaceful and orderly meeting. When they scattered through the streets, they were followed and beaten up with bull whips. However, this is all past and ancient history. I point to it in the hope that we may profit by the mistakes which have been made.

If I know anything about the situation, as I think I do; if I know anything about the thought processes of these men whose interests are at stake, as I think I do, I fear for the situation that will arise next winter when these men are released from this maintenance work. It is for this reason that I urge upon the minister at this time the necessity of taking, through the very capable men he has around him in his department, such action as will make clear to these men that he is endeavouring to give them a square deal.

[Mr. MacNeil.]

May I point out that there is a great deal of confusion with regard to the wages paid to these men, and the general tendency or influence of that schedule of wages set forth in the agreement is to alarm other recipients of relief who are working for their relief that the rate of wages secured by them while on relief projects will be lowered. The Vancouver Daily Province of June 15, 1936, in an article from Victoria, has this to say:

> When the federal government agreed to finance half the cost of the work and loan the province the remaining half, it was understood at the labour department that men would be paid at the rate of twenty-five cents an hour with a ten hour day. This is the rate which the department is informed will prevail on railway maintenance work under the federal government and it was understood the federal authorities would insist on the same scale in provincial work. This rate was considered far too low here. It has been arranged now that the current wage rate shall be paid and this, while varying in all districts, is much higher than $2.50 a day.

Mr. ROGERS: There is no foundation whatsoever for that statement in so far as it pertains to the agreement between the dominion and the provinces.

Mr. MacNEIL: I appreciate that, in view of the minister's statements in the committee, but I bring to his attention that a great deal of confusion and alarm resulted from this misunderstanding. The article goes on to say:

> Wages usually average about 40 cents an hour for an eight hour day.

I fear that the measures employed by the government to achieve economy have been misunderstood by municipal and provincial authorities, and a series of repressive measures that are quite unnecessary is being brought to bear upon the unemployed. The result can be only bitterness and discontent, and I think something should be done to allay this uneasiness, otherwise the ministerial chair in the months to come will be a very warm and uncomfortable seat. I think we should address ourselves to this problem with the idea of stabilizing this situation, and one way of stabilizing it is to create an altogether different atmosphere with regard to this problem, having in mind at all times the depression, misery and degradation endured by those who must accept relief. May I ask the minister to do what may be done to bring to the attention of the public the factors that are maintaining the number at present on relief? As each day goes by there are people who are reaching the end of their resources. Prior to this period they have been able to maintain themselves, but now they must, very reluctantly, apply for relief. Only this week I have had no less than a dozen men, all of them ex-service men, call at my office in this house. They say: We have managed so far to get along without accepting relief; God knows we do not want to take relief; we have done this, that and the other thing to secure employment; do you know of any employment we can get in any way? The only alternative before them is that of applying for relief. That illustrates in a degree, I think, how people who have hoarded their resources through these years, with the help of casual employment, are now coming on the relief rolls. In addition, there are the young people—a new draft each month, of course—and besides them, an increasing number of people suffering from impaired physical health. I am not placing the blame entirely on the federal government; rather I am asking the government to do what may be done to avoid the sort of thing that is illustrated in a notice I have before me. For obvious reasons I shall not mention the town, but I notice, in a newspaper published in that town—

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What newspaper?

Mr. MacNEIL: Unless the hon. member insists, I would rather not give it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): We should have it.

Mr. MacNEIL: Well, it is in the Pembroke Advertiser, "Notice! Change of Relief Regulations," addressed to the "relief recipients and ratepayers of the town of Pembroke." Among these "changes" I find the following clauses:

3. All clothing allowances of 20 cents per head shall be cancelled after March 31, 1936.

6. No fuel allowance will be granted during the months of May, June, July, August and September.

7. The rate of 20 cents per hour shall be used in computing the amount of time to be worked for relief granted for the month of March, 1936, and thereafter.

8. Any relief worker not doing an honest day's work while on the job may be discharged by the foreman or town engineer in which case he will be cut off relief.

10. All families who have wage earners in the home earning in excess of the relief schedule for such a sized family are struck off relief.

11. All relief recipients 70 years of age are to be granted no further relief after March 15, 1936. Also, anyone upon attaining age 70 will be automatically struck off relief regardless of whether they have applied for an old age pension or not.

12. All deserted families are to be cut off relief March 1, 1936, and advised to secure support from their fathers or husbands. No "grass widow" will receive relief while her husband remains at liberty.

13. Single persons who marry and apply for relief will not be granted same until they have been married at least one year and a half.

14. Single persons will not be granted relief unless they are physically or mentally incapacitated; in such cases arrangements will be made to transfer them to an institution.

15. The following food allowances are effective after February, 1936:

Number in family:	Monthly food allowance
Man and wife (2)	$ 8 67
Man and wife and 1 child (3)	10 83
Man and wife and 2 children (4)	13 00
Man and wife and 3 children (5)	15 17
Man and wife and 4 children (6)	16 25
Man and wife and 5 children (7)	17 33
Man and wife and 6 children (8)	18 42

The maximum monthly food allowance shall be $18.42.

16. Any family applying for relief in Pembroke who have not established their residence here (12 months' continual residence previous to application) must arrange with the municipality responsible for them to have the cost of same relief charged back to the municipality they moved from.

17. All relief recipients who are unable to work for their relief shall receive ten per cent less than those that work.

20. All relief recipients who are not satisfied with the relief distribution after publication of this notice and who create any disturbance whatsoever will be cut off relief entirely.

That is about the general trend of these regulations.

Mr. FINN: Will the hon. member say who signed them?

Mr. MacNEIL: They are signed by the Pembroke Relief Committee, A. E. Cockburn, Chairman; D. W. Blakely, Secretary; G. E. Doran, Administrator. I understand Mr. Cockburn is the mayor of that town. Taking all these regulations together one may get some picture of what must result in that particular municipality or town. It is apparent that such regulations can only lead to disorder, for the very obvious reasons that they result in dangerously lowering the living standards of those on relief; they make it practically impossible to live decently; they deny all responsibility for those who reach the age of seventy, and for the wife who has been deserted.

Mr. BENNETT: There is the old age pension.

Mr. MacNEIL: I point out to the leader of the opposition that the regulation states that at the age of seventy relief recipients will be cut off relief whether the old age pension is paid or not.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not paid if it is not applied for.

Mr. MacNEIL: The regulation applies to all persons seventy years of age.

Mr. BAKER: If they are cut off relief they would be eligible for the old age pension.

Mr. MacNEIL: The point I am objecting to is that——anyone upon attaining the age of 70 will be automatically struck off relief regardless of whether they have applied for an old age pension or not.

There are lots of cases where, for obvious reasons, under the regulations, such as residential restrictions, those people cannot immediately obtain the old age pension. In my humble opinion such regulations provoke disorder. They create the impression that no responsibility is assumed for the welfare of those who are helpless, under these circumstances, to fend for themselves. These regulations are restrictive and coercive. I would urge upon the Minister of Labour at this time that he exercise as far as possible the supervisory powers conferred upon him with regard to the expenditure of federal moneys through provincial governments, insist that reasonable standards of living be maintained, that the utmost freedom be allowed to enable people to live decently, and assure them that there is some hope that as quickly as possible the federal government will institute projects which will enable them to obtain a secure and decent livelihood. I feel that at this time these considerations are important in order that we may avoid many of the unpleasant and regrettable occurrences which we have experienced in the past.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I must make a few observations in reply to the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture, and I shall endeavour to do so without being offensive to certain gentlemen who have been mentioned.

As far as the supervision of expenditures is concerned, under the drought relief act it is quite clear that provision was made to deal with it; that Major Barnett did deal with it and that there was an auditor who dealt with it under the directions of the treasury department, also endeavouring to check up expenditures made by other branches of the public service. That, I think, goes without saying from a perusal of the records.

As to the other point, with regard to the extent to which bonus payments were made in connection with farm placements, if the hon. member had read the whole of the letter written by Mr. Dickson to the deputy minister of finance, which I assume the hon. gentleman will lay on the table since it is a public document, it would have been clear that there were also difficulties in the auditor general's office, and that because of certain attitudes taken by the Saskatchewan government Mr. Gordon, then Minister of Labour, directed that payments should be made through the Regina representatives of the dominion government, one of them being the auditor whom I have mentioned. Receiving that list from the Regina government, of 5,134, the representatives of the dominion government were able to trace only 3,828 persons. That is what I said was the difficulty, and I did not say it was in any sense a matter of criminal intent. It was a fact, however, that payments were thus being made to something like 1,300 more people than the auditors could ascertain. That is why I suggested to the minister that it was desirable that some steps should be taken to see that the public purse was safeguarded.

Mr. GARDINER: If I may say just a word here, which will probably save quite a bit of discussion, all the men were cut off on the 31st day of January, and the Department of Labour at Ottawa naturally did not come into the field until two or three weeks later. In the interval some of these men who had been cut off had gone away from their jobs before the work was taken over by the dominion government.

Mr. BENNETT: I simply say there were 5,134 on the list and the representatives of the dominion government found less than 4,000 when they made the payments for the months of February and March. That is what I said originally, and it seems to be borne out by what the hon. gentleman has said.

The other question is not so easily disposed of; the reply received from the Attorney General of Saskatchewan would seem to indicate that unfortunately there must be more than three of these gentlemen. The first gentleman to whom I referred and whose name I gave the minister, because I do not intend to use his name in the course of this discussion, was known as commissioner of urban relief. That was his title.

Mr. GARDINER: According to this telegram, which is the only information I have, that is not so.

Mr. BENNETT: I am saying that is his title; that is what he calls himself, and that is not hearsay at all. I have that information from a source that had to deal with him. That is that. One of the other two, unfortunately, was a registrar of land titles, and he was convicted of theft and sentenced to the penitentiary.

Mr. GARDINER: He is not connected with this service at all.

Mr. BENNETT: He was, when I spoke of it; he was in the relief service.

Mr. GARDINER: No, not at any time.

Mr. BENNETT: At least he put it in that way; perhaps he is doing something else now. The other had embezzled funds belonging to private persons.

The only reason I mentioned these three was because people who have had their moneys embezzled now find themselves in an impoverished state, and they raise the question as to why these men should be retained in positions connected with the administration of relief to those who, by their actions, they have compelled to be on relief. That is a very serious situation. I have—and I suppose as long as I live I shall continue to do so—tried to assist men of the legal profession who have found themselves in that unfortunate position. I have paid large sums of money for that purpose, and I have no regrets for having done so. But I suggest that when a government desires to assist such men—and I have no objection to a government doing so—it should not be done in that branch of the service having to do with the administration of relief. That brings these men into contact with those who have suffered by reason of their actions and who are now denuded of their moneys and their properties. These people see these men enjoying such positions; they write down and ask: "Is it possible that, going on relief, I must suffer and be placed in this position because my money has been embezzled, and the person who embezzled my money is now employed in the administration of this very relief?"

That is the position, and I have been very careful not to mention names. I do not intend to do so, though the provocation is great. I hold that men have every right in the world to another chance, but they should not be given that chance in such a way that their person is obtruded upon the attention of those who have suffered by reason of their action. That, I think, is a pretty elementary rule and one which should not be departed from. For the reason that I do not desire to do any harm to these men I have not mentioned their names, but with the influence the minister has, I trust he will suggest that they be kept in positions in which they will not have anything to do with the administration of relief.

There was an observation made with respect to persons occupying high places. That gentleman had not been disbarred. There is a power of punishment possessed by the courts of the country with regard to members of the legal profession who may be thought to have committed offences against the ethical rules of the profession. That is an entirely different matter from having embezzled moneys. In the case in question the gentleman was suspended for six months for the offence which the judges thought contravened the rules of the profession. That is the story as far as that is concerned. I know of men who have held very eminent positions, on the bench of the country finally, who in earlier days had been guilty of offences which brought upon them the punitive power of the courts. That is an entirely different matter from the embezzlement of moneys that impoverishes and brings suffering upon people. It was with great hesitancy, notwithstanding what the Minister of Agriculture may think, that, having been appealed to, I brought the matter to the attention of this committee without mentioning names, because I believe it is a bad thing for society—using the word in the broad sense—to have men obtrude their activities upon the attention of those whom they have defrauded. That is the real truth of the matter; they have brought themselves to the attention of those whom through their criminal acts they have brought to a position of poverty. In any help I have endeavoured to give to men thus situated I have tried at least to keep them out of the sight of those who have suffered by reason of their conduct.

That is all I have to say about the matter. I shall give the minister the other two names, as I gave him the first name, without mentioning them in public, because I have no desire to do any harm or injury to these men. I wrote to the persons who were complaining to me and said that I had always taken the opposite view, that men must be given a chance. But do not obtrude them upon the attention of those who have suffered by reason of their conduct. That is the story. The other part of it was that apparently they were fairly active politically, which makes the matter a little worse, and that is one of the difficulties. The reason I mentioned the fact of the commissioner of census for one of the counties being a disbarred practitioner in Manitoba, was that it was stated in the newspaper that he had been disbarred. Notwithstanding that fact, however, that man was appointed a commissioner, and the very persons who suffered by his defalcations are now in such an impoverished condition that they wonder whether they cannot do something to garnishee the moneys which he is to receive in order that they may be kept from relief and obtain the money of which they were defrauded. That is the reason I bring these matters to the attention of the committee, without mentioning names, in the hope that sufficient has been said to bring a remedy for the conditions to which I have referred.

Mr. DUNNING: Just one matter to which I think I should refer, not in any controversial way. Frequent reference has been made by the leader of the opposition to the removal of what he describes as certain checks which were formerly exercised by the Department of Finance. The position in that regard was, as I think my right hon. friend now knows, that in connection with Saskatchewan, because of the special arrangements made in respect to the drought area, there was a degree of supervision the complete effect of which I need not repeat—

Mr. BENNETT: But there was a representative of the treasury there who supervised other matters in respect to drought.

Mr. DUNNING: But I see no reason for undertaking any different method of supervision in Saskatchewan from the method now obtaining in connection with all the other provinces of Canada. The audit of the auditor general is available in that case just as in all others.

Mr. BARBER: Statements have been made to-day in regard to there being a considerable percentage of men in the camps who are unable to work. I have visited these camps for some time; I have fourteen in my district, and have kept in close touch with them. I cannot agree with the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) as to the conditions, because I think the conditions are as nearly ideal as they can be in any camps, and I have visited lumber camps and other camps. The camps were clean, the food wholesome, and the men in charge were ideal. I do not think a better class of men than the foremen and superintendents could have been found in Canada; they were sympathetic, always willing to help the men, and taking a paternal interest in them.

Is it the intention of the government to dispose of these camps, or do they intend to keep some of them open so that some of these men who are not capable of working may be taken care of?

I should like to ask another question, which I believe has already been answered but as to which I should like to put in a plea. As to those foremen and superintendents who have been so faithful in that work during the last few years, many of whom are not prepared now to step out into the cities and get a job, some of whom are engineers, very capable, I should like to know if something could be done to employ them. I understand the minister said that he has had something under consideration or at least might make provision for some, but I should like an answer to the other question in regard to the future of these camps; is the government going to dispose of the buildings or to put someone in charge by way of a caretaker?

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend, of course, will realize that the disposal of the physical equipment is a matter to be determined by the Department of National Defence. It is not the intention of the government to continue to maintain these relief camps as such after July 1. I quite appreciate the point raised by the hon. member with regard to those in the camps who perhaps are no longer employable because of age or of temporary illness. We are looking into that side of the question and taking the most humane measures possible to meet it. As my hon. friend will understand, the camps were designed for physically fit men and there was no assumption of obligation to care for men who are not physically fit, that is apart from giving them hospital care. If they are unemployable we must consider that question with the provinces in which the camps are situated. But I again assure my hon. friend that we are not indifferent to the various important considerations which he has raised.

Miss MACPHAIL: We hear much about single unemployed men, and a good deal has been done to take care of them, whether it has been well done or not, by way of camps, and now by transferring them to work on railway maintenance. This leads one to wonder what has become of single unemployed women. There must be a terrible unrevealed condition affecting single unemployed women. Often in listening to the debates in this chamber I have thought that we have a pretty masculine society, and at no time am I so impressed with that condition as when we are dealing with unemployment. A great deal has been said and written in times past about the "weaker sex." If men are not capable of taking care of themselves during periods of stress and unemployment, does parliament think women are more capable of taking care of themselves? If they are not, what provision has the government made, or what provision does it propose to make for single, unemployed women?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not sure that I can do more than recognize as fully at this time as I have before the importance of the question raised by the hon. member. As she is aware, we have appointed a woman on the national employment commission, and also propose to set up a special committee of the advisory committee to deal with the employment of women. It is a phase of the problem which so far has received inadequate attention. I can only hope that as time goes on we may be able to make some amends for this lack of attention.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not think the minister answered the question just asked as to whether the buildings in the camps will be disposed of.

Mr. ROGERS: I think I answered it; I think I said that the physical equipment—

Mr. STIRLING: That is the contents, but what about the buildings, the lumber?

Mr. ROGERS: None of that has been transferred to the Department of Labour; it all belongs to the Department of National Defence, and that question is under discussion between the two departments.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the minister think it is wise to dispose of the buildings or the equipment? We may be as optimistic as we please, but we must be realistic too. I was recently in a camp where there were fifty-eight men whose average age was fifty-four, unable to look after themselves. I am quite convinced either that our institutions for aged people will have to be greatly enlarged or that something will have to be done in the way of camps for this class of men.

Then, however optimistic the government may be, I am convinced that under the measures taken by parliament at the present time there is no possibility of providing employment for all single and married unemployed persons in the Dominion of Canada within a measurable time, so I suggest that very careful consideration be given to the matter before disposing of the buildings and equipment.

To provide for payment of salaries and expenses in connection with the investigation in Canada of the improvement of the waterway from Montreal through lake Champlain to the Hudson river, $20,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the house rose on May 8, I believe one of the items under discussion was that referring to the Richelieu river improvements, and in connection with that item I should like to make a few observations. From what the minister said at that time it would appear that this expenditure of $500,000 is only an initial amount, and that the ultimate improvements in connection with Richelieu navigation may cost about $10,000,000 or $12,000,000.

In the course of his remarks the minister referred to two of the proposed junction canals from the St. Lawrence river system to the Richelieu system, one from Chambly and, if I remember correctly, the other from lake St. Francis, which might be considered in the future. The subject of canals and everything pertinent to the waterways of this country and those of the United States has long been a study of my own. I have in mind the fact that in 1897 the report sent by the Deep Waterways Commission to the United States government, and later confirmed in the 1919 report of the War Department of the United States, proposed several other routes including the two mentioned by the minister. As I understand the situation, those routes would tap the traffic in the St. Lawrence system and divert it from Montreal and the St. Lawrence river east of Montreal to the Richelieu system, and via the Hudson river system to New York.

One of the routes began in the two western lakes, namely lake Superior and lake Michigan, afterwards entering lake Huron. From lake Huron one route according to the map I have, proceeded through lake Nipissing and the Ottawa river to lake St. Louis, and then from the west end of lake St. Louis over to Chambly on the Richelieu. From that point it went on up over the height of land and down through the Hudson river to New York. Another route which is not commonly referred to, but which is shown on the map, was to leave Georgian bay at the mouth of the Nottawasaga river, then overland, I assume, via the Nottawasaga valley and the Humber valley to Toronto, then by lake Ontario to Oswego and the Erie canal, or down the St. Lawrence to lake St. Francis, and from lake St. Francis over to lake Champlain at a point near Plattsburg.

Another proposal was to divert the traffic by lake Michigan and the Chicago canal to the Illinois river, the Mississippi river and then to New Orleans. Personally I am opposed to any proposal which would divert traffic that should follow the St. Lawrence river to Montreal harbour and the river, east. The St. Lawrence river route is the natural route for traffic from the west via water, and the route via the Richelieu river, the Chambly canal and the Hudson river is an unnatural route. The United States Champlain canal, from the point where it enters the Hudson river at the Mohawk river is and for some years has been canalized to take care of boats of considerable length. I believe the locks are 331 feet long and 45 feet wide, with a draft of twelve feet. As I understand the matter, the minister proposes to follow up with other locks in the Richelieu river to permit traffic up that river of boats which would pass through the Champlain canal locks. The locks are to be 339 feet by 49 feet, with a twelve foot draft. I cannot help feeling that that would divert from the St. Lawrence system a great deal of traffic that should be going down that river. That traffic should go from Montreal down to the sea by the natural route. It is some considerable distance longer by way of New York than by way of Montreal to Father Point, which is in the deep water section of the St. Lawrence river.

After referring to these maps which I secured some years ago from the War Department, during trips to Washington, I wonder if the department is certain that the building of the canal would be beneficial to Canada. Personally I do not believe it would. I feel that any diversion of St. Lawrence traffic down the Hudson river would be detrimental to traffic in the St. Lawrence river which is Canada's great artery and certainly the natural route. Unless the United States up traffic is particularly beneficial, I cannot see how it would be of great benefit to the boats using the system, because of the elevation that ships would have to ascend from Sorel to the south end of lake Champlain where Champlain canal commences. I believe it rises about ninety feet in all, then from lake Champlain up over the height of land and into the Hudson river, which I believe is up about forty-five feet and down about 140 feet, before it enters into the Hudson river near Albany. It is to cost $500,000, and then later millions will have to be paid out. In my opinion that large amount of money might be better spent in Montreal harbour and the route east from that harbour.

The Montreal Standard of March 30 has a little item headed "Low water in port vexing problem. Channel control now suggested. Montreal port future menaced." That is just one of many articles which have appeared in the papers for some time past. In my humble opinion it would be much better to spend this money on deepening the Montreal harbour or providing works east of Montreal or improving the St. Lawrence river. I do not know if the minister can change the item from the Richelieu to the St. Lawrence river, but I hope it is possible to do so. I am not opposing the spending of this money because it will provide work, but I would much rather see this ten or twelve million dollars, which the minister has given as an estimate of the eventual cost, spent in Montreal harbour and on the river east of Montreal than on the Richelieu river.

Mr. STEWART: When we left off the discussion of this item on a previous occasion I had raised certain objections to this expenditure. There are two very serious objections to it at this time. The first is the amount of this item itself, but more serious than that is the fact that it commits the Dominion of Canada to a very much larger expenditure in the future.

Following the discussion in this chamber there was some newspaper comment of which I am sure the minister has taken notice. The Montreal Gazette of May 14, 1936, contains an article which sets forth opposition to this expenditure and it indicates that the local council of the board of trade—

Mr. DUPUIS: I do not think, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman is in order in reading from a newspaper.

Mr. STEWART: I have not yet done so. I am just referring to the fact that the newspaper contained comment on this expenditure. I do not desire at this stage to read long extracts from newspapers, but I desire to base my comments on what has appeared in the newspapers, and a very responsible paper in the city of Montreal is opposed to this project. It is being opposed by the council of the board of trade, and I assume the minister has been made aware of the objection from that quarter.

The Montreal Daily Star of May 29 also contains a long article setting forth objections and criticisms of this proposed expenditure.

As the minister knows, this is not a new proposition at all. It is one which has been considered by the department at different times, and one which has been postponed for reasons with which the minister is familiar. This waterway, if developed at an estimated expenditure of eight or ten or twelve million dollars, will, after all, be a light draft waterway. The minister knows that the tendency of the day is toward larger ships, ships of deeper draft. In years gone by ships of lighter draft did serve a useful purpose and carried quite a large volume of traffic. Still, the trend of traffic is toward larger ships and deeper waterways. There is also a very marked tendency toward the carriage of local freight by truck. In view of these facts we should seriously consider at this time whether it is advisable to undertake the deepening of waterways which, after all, will not carry ships of heavy draft and which will have to depend to a certain extent upon local traffic.

The minister indicated that there would be tourist traffic coming up from Albany and from the Hudson to the St. Lawrence. That is all right, but it is, after all, not a very heavy volume of traffic and not very profitable from the standpoint of the government. The minister knows that in Ontario the Trent canal system has been abandoned and taken over from the Department of Railways by Ontario for the development of power. The Rideau canal, a good canal in days gone by, passing through my own county, and a canal in which I am very much interested, has outlived its usefulness except for small craft and for tourist purposes. I am sure that for the traffic which would be on any of these canals we would not consider to-day the expenditure of any large amount, and this proposed expenditure is a very large sum, ten or twelve million dollars, and that in these days when we are urged and find it necessary to economize in every direction. I would urge upon the minister that this is a work which is not justified by the volume of traffic that will be on this waterway, and if the minister presses the item and carries it through the committee I beg of him to reconsider and review the whole situation from every standpoint. The passing of an estimate is not a commitment of the government. It is not a contract to undertake the work, and I would ask the minister to review and discuss the matter with his colleagues and delay this comparatively very large expenditure for this year, and the very much heavier commitment for the future. I really think from my knowledge of conditions acquired in the department and from everything that has been said as to the possibilities of this waterway, that circumstances at this time do not justify our embarking upon an expenditure that ultimately will amount to eight or ten or twelve million dollars.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, I think it is only fair that I say a word in answer to the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this matter. At this late hour I do not feel like entering upon a lengthy discussion to justify the proposal which has been made, or mentioned incidentally, the rebuilding of the Chambly canal. Certain comments have been made outside this house by certain people who, I am sure, do not know the first thing about the matter, and have never seen the Richelieu river and its surroundings. Without being too severe I may say that that criticism and their contention were most unfair and were evidently the result of a desire to say something disagreeable to the minister.

My hon. friend (Mr. Stewart) has referred to an article in the Montreal Gazette. That article is really very mild, but it contains some kind of answer to the fear expressed by my hon. friend. It says that already a very important paper company in the province of Quebec has built two ships capable of navigating the rowboat canal as we have it at present at Chambly, and that other paper companies are contemplating the building of ships capable of navigating that canal in order to ship their paper and wood pulp to the United States, avoiding by that method going round the Gaspé peninsula into the gulf of St. Lawrence and the Atlantic ocean in order to reach New York and other important ports in the United States. They have found it advisable to build ships to navigate the present canal. We must remember that this canal is capable of being navigated only by vessels of 250 tons. That was all right in the old days, but the experts tell us that it is possible to develop this canal to permit its navigation by ships of 1,800 tons. This would be quite sufficient to take care of any possible traffic.

The objection was raised the other day that there was no traffic available. Well, there was no traffic available when the Canadian Pacific Railway was first initiated. There was no traffic available when both parties decided to build the Hudson Bay railway and to develop a port on the Hudson bay. We all wanted to develop any possibilities in Canada, and we took those methods of developing traffic. Many undertakings have been started without any present justification. The development of the St. Lawrence river from the ocean to Montreal was not undertaken when vessels were waiting in the gulf to go up to Montreal. The development of the wharves and other port facilities at Montreal were not undertaken when the traffic was waiting in the harbour; those facilities were provided for the traffic that might develop later on.

The same thing applies to the Richelieu river and the Chambly canal. There is no traffic at the present time because it is no longer profitable to use ships of only 250 tons. The traffic through the St. Lawrence canals when they were of the same size as the Chambly canal would compare very favourably with the traffic passing through the Chambly canal. To-day there is a great difference in the traffic through the two canal systems because the St. Lawrence canals have been deepened to permit vessels of larger draft to go through. If the St. Lawrence canals had been kept at the old depth of twelve feet, the present depth of the Chambly canal, there would be no traffic going through the St. Lawrence from the great lakes to Montreal because it is not profitable to transport goods in vessels of only 250 tons.

I regret I have discussed this canal at this time because there is no necessity of this entering into the discussion. The vote which I am asking the committee to pass provides for a regulating dam between St. Johns and Chambly. This will be used more particularly for reclaiming low lands in the vicinity of St. Johns-Iberville and Missisquoi counties. It has been established by a report now in the Department of Public Works that a revenue of $500,000 per annum can be obtained from these low lands. These lands are so low that they cannot be cultivated at the present time. They are flooded every spring and as far back as 1900 requests were made to the department for the dredging of the Richelieu river in order to permit the water to flow off in the spring so that these lands might be cultivated. When the federal government started to dredge the Richelieu river an objection was made by the United States. It was contended that this dredging would precipitate the flow of water in the Richelieu river and lower the level of lake Champlain. The Canadian government then submitted to the United States authorities a proposal for the building of a dam, which was approved. This dam would regulate the flow of water in the spring. When the water is high, the dam would be opened and the river having been dredged, would permit a more rapid flow of water and the lowlands in the vicinity of St. Johns-Iberville would not be flooded. When water is needed in the summer or fall for navigation purposes, the dam would be closed and the normal flow of water would be permitted down the Richelieu river.

That is the proposal under consideration. Out of this vote of $500,000 to cover the building of the dam we want a few thousand dollars to be used for survey purposes to determine the desirability of rebuilding the Chambly canal. My hon. friend mentioned an amount of $12,000,000 for this work, but the figure I mentioned the other day was $8,000,000. This figure was a mere guess on the part of the engineers. As there are no plans in the department for the rebuilding of this canal, no one can say definitely just what it will cost. I gave that figure the other day because I was pressed, but it represented a mere guess on the part of the engineers. If the government should decide to proceed with this rebuilding, the matter would come up next session or at another session. There would then be a vote placed before the committee, or possibly some other legislation would be introduced to provide for the reconstruction of the Chambly canal. I want it to be clearly understood that this amount is just to cover the building of a dam which has been contemplated as far back as 1900. After this explanation I feel that any apprehension which may have existed with regard to the rebuilding of this canal should disappear. If it is definitely decided to rebuild this canal, the house will have an opportunity to discuss the matter at a future session.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE WITH RESPECT TO SENATE AMENDMENTS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the senate informing this house that the senate agrees to the amendment made by the House of Commons to the tenth amendment made by the senate to Bill No. 67, to amend the Customs Act (Canadian waters), without any amendment.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE WITH RESPECT TO SENATE AMENDMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the senate informing this house that the senate do insist upon its amendment to Bill No. 97, to Amend the Combines Investigation Act, for the reason that the amendment is necessary to accord witnesses the reasonable protection vouchsafed them in all British courts.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE WITH RESPECT TO SENATE AMENDMENTS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the senate informing this house that the senate do not insist upon its first, second and fifth amendments to Bill No. 17, respecting the National Harbours Board, to which the House of Commons have disagreed, and do substitute the following in lieu of its third amendment:

Page 6, lines 1 to 6 both inclusive. For subclause 2 of section 12 substitute the following:

"(2) Whenever, in the case of any works, tenders are required by this Act to be called, the board shall, after having given the tenderers reasonable notice of the time and place of the opening of the tenders, open them in public and thereafter submit them to the minister, who shall submit them to the governor in council and the contract for the work shall be awarded under the authority of the governor in council."

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, June 22, 1936

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

VIMY PILGRIMAGE

Mr. REID:

1. What persons have been invited by the government to attend the unveiling of the Vimy memorial on July 26, 1936?
2. Have any Canadian pipe bands been asked to take part, and, if so, will the personnel consist of representation from the various militia units of Canada?
3. Is the government taking any steps to look after any Canadian pilgrims who may suffer through illness or disability during their visit to England and Europe?
4. In what way, and to what extent is the government cooperating with the Canadian Legion with respect to this national ceremony?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. The following have been invited to be the guests of the Canadian government at the unveiling of the memorial: Sir Robert and Lady Borden; Sir George and Lady Perley; Sir Eugène and Lady Fiset; Lady Byng; Lady Currie. A number of invitations to be present at the unveiling will also be issued by the High Commissioner for Canada, London, England, and the Canadian Minister to France.

2. Yes. One piper (selected by the officer commanding the regiment) from each highland regiment in Canada; and the drummers will be supplied by the 48th Highlanders of Canada.

3. The hon. the Minister of Pensions and National Health has given authority to cover the pensioner-pilgrims during the official trip as if they were resident in Canada. All pensioner-pilgrims have been notified to this effect in detail under circular letter issued from the department under date of May 29, 1936. The honourable the minister has designated the 31 ex-soldier doctors who are accompanying this trip as pilgrims, as temporary medical representatives of the department, with power to act. The minister has also arranged for a certain amount of casual medicines for all pilgrims at departmental cost, and is sending a medical hamper with each ship.

4. While the government is making the necessary arrangements for the unveiling of the memorial, there has been the closest possible cooperation between the government and the Canadian Legion. The Canadian Legion has not asked that any financial assistance should be extended to the pilgrims; but in fixing the date for the unveiling and in all other arrangements, the government has at all times had first regard to the requirements and convenience of the pilgrims.

INSPECTION OF CATTLE—VETERINARIANS

Mr. REID:

1. At what cities or towns will examinations be held for positions as temporary veterinary surgeons in connection with cattle inspection at the various customs ports?
2. Who will conduct the various examinations?

Mr. GARDINER: No examinations are contemplated to fill positions as temporary veterinary surgeons in connection with cattle inspected at the various customs ports, but the Department of Agriculture is holding an examination on July 8 to increase the number of accredited veterinarians. These veterinarians are not remunerated by the department but are paid for their services by the live stock owner who employ them. They are authorized to conduct tuberculin tests of export cattle and tuberculin tests of animals purchased for additions to herds under the department's tuberculosis control policies, and to collect blood for serological tests for Bang's disease of export cattle.

These examinations will be held at: Moncton, New Brunswick; Montreal, Quebec; Ottawa, Ontario; Toronto, Ontario; London, Ontario; Winnipeg, Manitoba; Brandon, Manitoba; Regina, Saskatchewan; Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; Calgary, Alberta; Edmonton, Alberta; Vancouver, British Columbia.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

An officer of the health of animals branch will be in charge of the examination at each of these points.

*REVEREND HENRI LANCTIN

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Was the Reverend Henri Lanctin at any time debarred by the Canadian radio commission from the use of the broadcasting station at Moncton, New Brunswick?
2. If so, for what reason or reasons?
3. Was a formal complaint made against the said Reverend Henri Lanctin, and, if so, was such complaint investigated?
4. If investigated did the radio commission find the complaint justified?
5. Has the radio commission withdrawn the suspension, if any, against the said Reverend Henri Lanctin?

Mr. HOWE: This is a matter for the broadcasting commission. The Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission filed a return of papers in this connection, and evidently they thought that covered this question as well. If further information is required I shall be glad to secure it and give it to my hon. friend.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—ALERT BAY, B.C., STATION

Mr. NEILL:

1. Has a station of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police been recently started at Alert Bay?
2. Has it been recommended that a barracks should be built for their accommodation?
3. Was there a station of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at that place about the year 1921?
4. If so, when was it closed?
5. Since then has there been any considerable increase in the number of crimes committed?
6. Since then has there been any serious crime committed, and at what place?
7. Is there a station of provincial police at Alert Bay?
8. Is there any reason to suppose that they are not competent to handle the enforcement of the law in that neighbourhood?
9. Before recommending the establishment of a station of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at that place, was the attorney general of British Columbia or the commissioner of police, for that province, consulted or asked if they were unable to handle the enforcement of the law in that place?
10. On whose recommendation was the establishment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police station at that place authorized, and what reasons were given.
11. Were any steps taken to check up the accuracy of such statements?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

1. Yes. A detachment of the R.C.M. Police was reopened at Alert Bay on the 15th January, 1936.
2. No.

3. Yes. It was opened in the first place on the 26th January, 1920.

4. 26th April, 1924.

5. No information.

6. No information.

7. Yes.

8. They are believed to be competent to handle the situation, but the Department of Indian Affairs report that the members of the provincial police are too busy with other matters to attend to Indians who are considered federal charges.

9. No, but the conditions complained of were investigated by the R.C.M. Police, and charges were laid and convictions obtained. This seems to bear out the contention that the British Columbia provincial police are too busy to attend to such matters. Furthermore, some of the Indians in the area have become hostile to authority and are alleged to be getting out of hand.

10. In October, 1935, the representative of the Department of Indian Affairs in British Columbia requested the officer commanding the mounted police in that province to establish a detachment at Alert Bay, in order to protect the Indians in that area from the sale of intoxicants. As stated above, the conditions complained of were investigated by the R.C.M. Police and charges were laid against certain persons and convictions followed. After the investigation previously mentioned, the officer commanding at Vancouver recommended the establishment of a detachment at Alert Bay, principally to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquor to Indians, and to enquire into any infractions of the Excise Act.

11. Answered by No. 10.

CANTERBURY STATION, N.B., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Has Thomas J. McMullin been removed as postmaster of Canterbury Station post office, York county, New Brunswick?

2. If so, for what reason or reasons?

3. Was the said Thomas J. McMullin appointed by the civil service commission?

4. Is the department aware that the said Thomas J. McMullin is a returned soldier who served overseas with distinction and bears a military decoration?

5. Has the department received any protest or protests from any branch or branches of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League relative to the above change?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. Yes.

2. In order to place the office at a more central site and to provide better accommodation and service.

3. Yes. Before the office was removed from the jurisdiction of the civil service commission.

4. Records show that Thomas J. McMullin is a returned soldier.

5. Yes.

GOODS IMPORTED UNDER $100 EXEMPTION

Mr. PURDY:

1. What is the value of the goods brought into Canada during the month of May, 1936, by tourists returning from the United States, under the $100 exemption?

2. Under what classifications do these goods come?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. $107,172.

2. For the purpose of this item the following classifications of goods have been adopted:

Automobile accessories	$ 2,643
Automobile tires and tubes	2,065
Boots and shoes	10,393
Clothing	60,481
Foodstuffs	115
Furniture and household appliances	11,280
Miscellaneous articles	20,195

*STEAMER TASHMOO

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to a disaster in Ontario waters at Amherstburg on Friday, June 19, to the steamer Tashmoo conveying 1,400 passengers and which steamer struck a shoal in the Detroit river?

2. Will an inquiry into the said accident be held by the wreck commission under the federal statute?

3. Will the government consider some form of recognition to the captain and crew who showed great heroism?

4. What steps, if any, will be taken to improve these navigation channels with a view to the public safety?

Mr. HOWE: I answered this question verbally on Saturday.

*STEAMER KINGSTON

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to an accident which happened at Brockville on Friday, the 19th instant, to the steamer Kingston?

2. Will an inquiry be held into the same?

3. If so, in these inquiries will protection be given the captain and crew?

Mr. HOWE: Answered on Saturday.

*NIAGARA RIVER SHOAL

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to a large sand shoal and formation at the mouth of the Niagara river on lake Ontario, partly on the Canadian side and partly on the American side, which sand shoal is a menace to navigation and to the large steamers using the Niagara river ports and the new Welland canal?

2. Will the government take steps to protect navigation in the interests of public safety?

3. Will the government negotiate with the government of the United States regarding the removal of this shoal in the eastern entrance to Toronto harbour in the interests of navigation and public safety?

Mr. HOWE: Answered on Saturday.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

REPRESENTATIONS FROM HAMILTON BUSINESS MEN REGARDING THE $100 DUTY EXEMPTION

Mr. MacNICOL (for Mr. Wilton):

For a copy of all letters and all correspondence from Hamilton business men to the Minister of National Revenue on making effective the $100 duty exemption on American goods coming into Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Wilton) is not in the house, but if he were here I should like to request him to withdraw this motion, in view of the fact that I have received communications from the parties concerned stating that they do not think any correspondence addressed to me on a matter of public interest should be used in a manner which would be calculated to injure their business, and requesting me not to make their communications public. I feel a little embarrassed about it; I am quite sure the matter is not one of great importance to the hon. member for Hamilton West, and I am quite sure he would have withdrawn his motion on that representation if I had had an opportunity to speak to him.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton West is not present, but the issue raised by the observations of the Minister of Finance would, I think, require further consideration. Inasmuch as we are at the end of the session it seems to me the question can be dropped for the moment, but I could hardly be taken as agreeing with what the minister has stated. Those who write letters on public questions to departments of the government must be prepared to accept responsibility for the communications they make, assuming they are in the public interest.

Motion dropped.

CANTERBURY STATION, N.B., POSTMASTER

Mr. BROOKS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, affidavits or any other documents in the possession of the Post Office Department regarding the dismissal of Thomas J. McMullin, postmaster at Canterbury Station, York county, New Brunswick.

SANCTIONS AGAINST ITALY

NEWS BROADCAST FROM STATION 2RO, ROME, ON WEDNESDAY, JUNE 17

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are called I desire to direct attention to a matter which may or may not affect the privileges of this house, or at least of parliament as a whole. At seven o'clock Atlantic standard time on Wednesday evening last there came in the news broadcast from Station 2RO, Rome, the station through which the Italian government sends its broadcasts, the following:

The Canadian council of ministers at a meeting held yesterday decided to favour the abolition of sanctions because they had proved worthless.

That was two days before the news was communicated to this house. It may or may not involve the necessity on the part of the government of making some inquiries; I do not know, but I think it is my duty to direct attention to it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My right hon. friend is quite right in directing attention to the communication to which he has referred. I had not personally known of the matter which he has brought to the attention of the house. If I had I should certainly have adopted the course which he has suggested and had it inquired into at once. It will be inquired into forthwith.

STAFF AT PORT OF CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe). On June 15 an order was passed for a return showing the seasonal and temporary employees at Churchill. The minister was kind enough to write me a note stating that he had sent on the reference to Churchill. If it is not tabled to-day it certainly cannot be tabled during this session. I wonder if he would be kind enough to agree that when the return comes back from Churchill he will let me have the list of employees.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine): The orders for returns go through the Secretary of State. I am sure if my hon. friend will write a note to the Secretary of State he will receive the list from him.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Perhaps I may add that my officer has had instructions to collect everything possible to-day, and returns will be tabled right along during the sitting. I shall direct the special attention of my officer to my hon. friend's request.

REFERENCES TO SUPREME COURT

NATURAL PRODUCTS MARKETING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) whether he has any information to impart to the house or any statement to make in regard to the effect of the supreme court decision on the Natural Products Marketing Act?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, up to the present council has not had time to consider the matter fully, but the vote in connection with marketing is still to be considered and I hope to have some information at that time.

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF OPINIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) whether it is the intention to print and publish the opinions of the Supreme Court of Canada on the matters referred to it by the government at the last session of the court.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the printed opinions be available for distribution to members?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, this has been arranged, and as soon as possible my hon. friend will be supplied with a copy.

Mr. HEAPS: And all hon. members?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course.

RAILWAY MAINTENANCE WORK

EMPLOYMENT OF MEN FROM RELIEF CAMPS UNDER AGREEMENT WITH THE GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe). Why have men from British Columbia been brought into the Peace River country by the government to work on the Northern Alberta railway when there are many hundreds of residents on relief at the point where the work is being done?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways): My hon. friend is aware of the agreement entered into with the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways to absorb men from relief camps. It is pointed out that this work is in addition to maintenance work which would normally be done this season, and obviously in order to absorb 9,600 men from the relief camps it is necessary to distribute them in every part of the dominion. My hon. friend's position in that respect is no different from that of any other hon. member of the house.

Mr. D. A. CAMERON (Cape Breton North-Victoria): I should like to ask the minister if the undertaking given in parliament that the employment of these men would not interfere with the ordinary maintenance work is being adhered to by the railways.

Mr. HOWE: It has been suggested to me by some hon. members that this clause was not being adhered to, and I have stated to each of them that if they will give me the name of any man employed in this work last year who is not employed this year I shall be very glad to take it up with the railway. Up to date I have received no names.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): By the time you get the names of the men the work will be pretty well all over.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): In the agreement between the government and the railways in connection with the employment of men from relief camps on maintenance work there is provision for overtime pay when overtime is worked. I should like to know whether the pay for overtime is at the regular rate of twenty-five cents per hour, or if there is a difference in the pay when the eight hour period per day is exceeded.

Mr. HOWE: The agreement covering this work has been tabled, and my hon. friend could very easily look it up. I am not able to answer offhand.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member wants to know what it means.

Mr. MacINNIS: The agreement says—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not wish to cause any debate on the matter, but the agreement states that overtime will be paid at pro rata rate. I should like to know just what that means. Perhaps the Minister of Justice might answer.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I should like to ask a question of the minister of transport, in regard to the agreement between the department and the railways in connection with the relief camps. In municipalities where there are large relief lists of registered men, and where railway work might be done on spur or subsidiary lines in connection with the department, is the department working in conjunction with the relief authorities in that division where they may want five or ten men for a short time? Is that being worked out?

Mr. HOWE: The agreement between the department and the railway speaks for itself. It covers one particular feature of unemployment relief, namely single unemployed men previously in the relief camps. I believe that a few hundred men required to fill up the quota have been obtained by the Minister of Labour from certain municipalities, but that course is not general in any sense. Only some six hundred men were involved.

Mr. LOCKHART: The department is working in conjunction with the municipalities in that connection?

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

SMALL PROPERTY OWNERS

PROPOSED STUDY OF THEIR FINANCIAL SITUATION LOOKING TO EQUITABLE TREATMENT

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): Some time ago the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) introduced a resolution in regard to giving assistance to industrial workers in urban centres. It was discussed in this house and supported by many and accepted by the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret). It is understood that people in industrial centres are losing their homes as rapidly as people in rural centres. The government promised to give them some consideration or assistance by way of lower taxation or lower interest. I assume they cannot lower the taxation, but it is taxation and interest that is killing the people who are losing their homes. The Prime Minister said that day that the Secretary of State was not in the house but he would see that he would answer the question. That was a month ago.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): If my hon. friend will allow me, I made a reply the day after the Prime Minister said I would take the matter up. The hon. member will find the reply in Hansard.

Mr. SPENCE: Well, I am sorry; I happened to miss it in Hansard the next day.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 26, to amend the Pension Act.

He said: The amendments are not of great importance. For instance, the word "seconded" has been changed to "delegated."

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

BANK OF CANADA

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 82, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

He said: The only change made was the insertion of the word "registered" before the word "holder" in conformity with similar changes made in this chamber.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the senate to Bill No. 17, respecting national harbours board.

He said: The amendment requires that the board shall open tenders in public. The previous amendment, which was rejected, provided that the minister himself must open the tenders in public. The change removed the objection, and I therefore ask that the amendment be accepted.

Mr. STEWART: I understand that the bill retains the essential feature of opening tenders in public.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENT

The house proceeded to consideration of a message from the senate insisting upon its amendment to Bill No. 97, to amend the Combines Investigation Act—Mr. Mackenzie King.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house will observe, the senate insists upon its amendment to Bill No. 97, an Act to Amend the Combines Investigation Act. By the bill as it went from this house to the senate it was sought to have the word "documents" dropped from the act as it stands, because the presence in the act of that word, in the opinion of the chief commissioner of the Trade and Industry Commission, renders the act useless. The opinion of the chief commissioner, Mr. Sedgewick in that regard was supported, as was shown when I referred to the matter for the second time in this chamber, by the opinion of the Department of Justice. However, notwithstanding the views as expressed in that official way, supplemented by statements at some length as to reasons why the fears of the Senate would appear to be unwarranted, and the grounds upon which the amendment had been insisted upon not well founded, the senate insist upon their amendment. Of course the effect of the senate amendment, as I have already said, is that of rendering the Combines Investigation Act worthless.

May I point out that this is the third time this chamber has requested that the clause in question in the Combines Act should not include the word "documents" in order that the act might serve the purpose for which it was intended. At the last session the present leader of the Opposition (Mr. Bennett) then Prime Minister sought this in a bill which passed this house and was sent to the senate, which bill contained a clause similar to the one which appears in the bill introduced by the present government. As the leader of the opposition has remarked, when the bill of last session returned from the senate it contained the amendment which the senate has now insisted should be made at this time. It was very late in the session and the government of that day permitted the senate amendment to remain, under protest.

At this session of parliament reasons were given in this house before the bill was sent to the Senate making clear wherein the amendment made by the Senate at the previous session rendered the Combines Investigation Act valueless. As a matter of fact it has not been thought advisable to proceed under the act since the Senate took their previous action. It will not be possible with the present suggested amendment to proceed under it, from now on, until the act is changed in the particulars indicated by this house.

For three times in succession within a year the Senate has refused in connection with the Combines Investigation Act to make a change which this house regards as imperative, and has each time said so unanimously. May I point out that the last time we discussed the matter not only was the view of the government supported by the leader of the opposition but it was supported by the hon. member who leads the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. In short, the view of the government was supported by all hon. members. Ordinarily I assume the next step would be to ask for a conference between this house and the Senate. Indeed it was suggested before the bill was sent over to the Senate for the second time this session that a conference might be asked for. However, from a reading of the debate in the Senate it would appear that no useful purpose could possibly be served by a conference. The bill was sent back to the Senate last Saturday afternoon, and before the evening session the Senate had taken its action upon it. Apparently the opposition in that house did not seek even to ascertain the views which had been expressed in this house on the matter. In fact, reference to the debate of that chamber will show that when the leader of the government in the Senate was about to put the motion that the Senate do not insist upon its amendment, the leader of the opposition in the Senate anticipated what the leader of the government was about to say and suggested that the words in the motion should be that the Senate insisted upon its amendment. When the leader of the government in the Senate sought to have further consideration of the matter and drew attention to the fact that the Department of Justice had given an opinion on the matter, as well as Mr. Justice Sedgewick, who is Chief Commissioner of the Trade and Industry Commission and, who as hon. members well know, was for years an eminent judge of the High Court of Ontario, the leader of the government in the Senate was told by the leader of the opposition in that chamber that he was not aware of any will of the Department of Justice in the matter, that he had not seen any opinion of that department, and to put the matter briefly that he the leader of the opposition was not going to debate the matter over again. The leader of the opposition concluded by saying, "I intend to resist the position of the Commons, and to stand by the position the Senate has taken." I might also point out that another member of the opposition in the Senate stated that it might be well for the House of Commons to try the matter again next year.

In these circumstances I can not see that any useful purpose would be served by a conference at this time. As I said the other day, the government has determined to carry out certain investigations which i' regards as very much in the public interest, and which it had intended to have proceeded with under the Combines Investigation Act. But seeing that the act has been rendered valueless by the action of the Senate we will, in all probability as I indicated the other day, where other provisions of the act respecting the trade and industry commission do not suffice proceed with these investigations under royal commission between now and the time the house reassembles. The Combines Investigation Act will need to have several amendments. These amendments will be considered between now and the next session of parliament, and the amendments which will be sent from this house to the senate at an early stage of the next session will include the clause which, as I have said, this house has three times already asked should be inserted in the combines act in order to render that measure effective. But, with the position what it is at the moment, I certainly do not intend as leader of this House of Commons or Prime Minister of this country to go on my hands and knees to the senate to ask for consideration at least of the representations which this house has made to the senate with regard to an act which is so all-important to the public interest.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I greatly deprecate the language the right hon. gentleman has just used. It is not seemly that the leader of the House of Commons should speak of one of the other houses, one of the three factors that constitute parliament, in the terms in which he has spoken. I think this is a case for the utilization of such conciliatory powers as we possess, and our constitution has provided for a conference; that is the usual course. Why is a conference not held?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I gave the reason.

Mr. BENNETT: The reason being that the suggested amendment had been rejected by the senate. But there is another method, the method of conference, and twice to my certain knowledge we have been able through that method to arrange matters, because it afforded the opportunity for an understanding. I feel quite certain there has been a misunderstanding in connection with this matter, and that if the Minister of Justice and others were to meet the representatives of the senate there would be little or no difficulty in having it adjusted.

Neither is it correct to say that insistence by the senate upon the amendment in any sense nullifies the powers of the combines act. It does not lessen them in the least; it has to do only with what may be done in a criminal court. There is no restriction upon the power of the commission under Mr. Sedgewick to make any inquiries it may desire to make. The only result of the action taken by the senate is that thereafter there is a limitation upon the use that may be made of the material thus secured: the witness can set up the plea or defence that it will incriminate him, and that will be the end of it. Now the law will stand as it did before we introduced the amendment into this house. It does not take out the section that we passed last session; it leaves it as it then was. The proposal we made in this chamber was that—

> No person shall be excused from attending and giving evidence and producing books, papers or records, in obedience to the order of the commission, on the ground that the oral evidence or documents required of him may tend to criminate him or subject him to any proceeding or penalty,—

That is one phase of it.

> —but no such oral evidence so given shall be used or receivable against such person in any criminal proceedings thereafter instituted against him, other than a prosecution for perjury in the giving of such evidence.

That is the section we sent from this house. The senate struck out the section and left the act just as it was. In other words, the action which we took dealing with documents was nullified by the action taken in the senate. I cannot but think that if the Minister of Justice were to discuss the matter with a committee of the senate in the sense in which it was done in this chamber last Saturday, the result would be an adjustment of the difficulties; because I still think the senate is labouring under a misapprehension with respect to what the action is, and is confusing two terms. Apparently, when the leader of the government in the senate pressed his motion the senate had not before it the discussion in this house, and I think, had the discussion in this house been before the senate, whom I know to be reasonable men, they would have taken a different attitude from that which they have now taken.

I cannot think it is conducive to the conduct of orderly government to suggest that any one house of parliament goes on its knees to any other house of parliament. That is entirely beside the question. They have coordinate powers and jurisdiction except with respect to money bills; they are a part of the constitution of this country. A method is provided by which reasons may be given when we disagree with them or they with us; they are read to the chamber affected, and then appropriate action is taken. I think it would have been better to have a conference rather than to send the bill back the last time, because when there has been a rejection once of a suggestion of the commons the next appropriate course is a conference. I recall several occasions upon which a conference has been held with satisfactory results.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask my right hon. friend whether we had a conference last year on the same point?

Mr. BENNETT: No, because, as the hon. gentleman will remember, when it came down—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was the last day of the session.

Mr. BENNETT: It was a few hours before the time fixed for prorogation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Have there been conferences with this house this year on any other bills when the senate had rejected certain of their provisions?

Mr. BENNETT: Not that I know of. That is why I say there should be a conference. Last year we had conferences; the year before we had conferences. Conferences are the method by which we meet together with the representatives of the other body and arrive at a conclusion, and I think it is the appropriate method; because in a debate in the house there is not the same opportunity for explanation and contact as there is when a conference is held. I cannot recall any conference I have known of that has not resulted in a satisfactory adjustment. I feel that if a conference were held there would be no necessity for using the language that has been used, nor would there be any cause for complaint or any grievance against another chamber. That is the position I desire to make clear. I think the senate is entirely in error in rejecting the proposals we have made in the measure we passed. I think so for the reason I gave in the house the other day, and I will not repeat it. I also feel confident, from my knowledge of the members of the senate as reasonable men, that if they understood clearly the effect of our proposal they would not so summarily reject it. Further I believe that a conference of a few minutes' duration would remove the difficulties, and I think we are not taking the right course in not holding one. It is no lessening of our own dignity or our own authority or importance to deal with the senate in a manner which heretofore has always been the method employed when there has been a deadlock. I regret very much that the minister has taken the view that the conference should not be held. It is not conducive to harmonious working, nor in the long run will it improve the position of the institution of parliament in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon leader of the opposition says he thinks a conference should have taken place at the present stage.

Mr. BENNETT: After the first rejection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After the first rejection. May I point out that the senate has rejected several clauses of bills which have been sent over from this house in the course of this session, and in no instance has anyone suggested that a conference should take place at that stage; indeed a conference was not necessary, because the senate at the time was prepared to reconsider its attitude, and on reconsidering it they did accept in most cases the views of the House of Commons. There is no reason why a conference should have taken place after the first reading in the case of the combines bill any more than it should have with respect to the harbours bill and several other important bills—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes; because last year they rejected it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —which have gone over from this house. That is the first point. In the second place, may I say my right hon. friend is wrong when he says that the reason we are not asking at the moment for a conference is that the senate insists upon this amendment. That is not the reason. If the senate had taken due notice of what was said in this house, if it had taken notice of what the leader of the government in the senate asked its members to consider, namely the opinion of the justice department, the opinion of Mr. Sedgewick, and I may add, the opinion of the right hon. leader of the opposition, and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Confederation (Mr. Woodsworth), and if there had been a disposition to consider the matter at all, I think then that possibly a conference might have served some useful purpose. May I point out again just how all-important the request of this house is and why the attitude of the senate at this time would seem to render any conference fruitless. The Honourable Mr. Sedgewick has given in a sentence or two his opinion as to the significance of the clause in the amended form in which this house wishes to have it appear:

> The purpose of the amendment is not to render admissible documents otherwise inadmissible, but to provide that admissible documents are not inadmissible.

If the section stands, the best thing that could happen to a person guilty of combining in restraint of trade is to be required on investigation to produce the documents proving the offence. Thereafter he will be immune from conviction by means of the agreement.

Mr. CAHAN: Did the leader of the government in the senate bring that opinion and the opinion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to the attention of the senate?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend has asked me that question, I will answer it by reading from the senate report. It is as follows:

Hon. Mr. Dandurand: —that the Senate do not insist upon its amendment. I suppose my Right Honourable friend after having made a noble fight to affirm his own principles, will abide by the will of the Department of Justice, supported by the opinion of Mr. Justice Sedgewick, and will vote for my motion.

Mr. Sedgewick's opinion is referred to there specifically.

Mr. BENNETT: Did he read it?

Mr. CAHAN: It was not read.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was not read, but for what reason? Immediately after the leader of the government used those words in the senate, the right hon. leader of the opposition in the senate used these words:

I do not know of any will of the Department of Justice in parliamentary matters, and I have not seen any opinion of the Department of Justice.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Listen to what follows:

To put it briefly—for I am certainly not going to debate the matter over again—I intend to resist the position of the Commons and to stand by the decision the Senate has taken.

What further opportunity was offered to the leader of the government in the senate to discuss the matter at that stage?

Mr. BENNETT: He should have seen the two opinions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon. leader of the opposition says that the senate action does not render the act ineffective, that other provisions of the act remain, but the other provisions are not as important as this one. Mr. Sedgwick says that this provision is all-important; that if it is not there you simply enable a man who has taken a course of proceedings which may be criminal to protect himself against any subsequent criminal proceedings by attempting to proceed under the Combines Investigation Act. I am reminded that Mr. Sedgewick's views were expressed in the discussion which took place when we first dealt with the matter on June 12.

Mr. BENNETT: But it was a subsequent opinion which was read later.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The first opinion covered the essential points. It was after this that the leader of the opposition in the senate stated that he did not see any object in debating the question further. In these circumstances there would appear to be no prospect of having the amendment made at this time. Having regard for the language used by the leader of the opposition in the senate I certainly think it would be quite futile to attempt anything further by a conference.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are apparently unanimous in our opposition to the senate amendment. We differ only as to method. While I should be the very last to advise going on our knees to the senate, it does occur to me that since a conference is the recognized procedure, it might be a good thing to go through every possible step, if for no other reason than to pile up a case against the senate and leave them no loophole whatever. I say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that I am very glad indeed that the government has determined to go through with the inquiry in spite of the senate.

I should like to take this occasion to suggest to the government that the people generally—I hope I can interpret aright their ideas—are ready for the government to take some steps to curb the power of the senate in this country. As every hon. member knows, in Great Britain the House of Lords, to which in its functions our upper house to a certain extent corresponds, is unable to thwart permanently the will of the people. As I understand it, they can twice reject legislation passed by the commons, but when such legislation is presented a third time it must go through automatically. In any case the House of Commons in England has a club over the House of Lords in that it can create a larger number of lords. I think we have the most antiquated form of control by a second chamber to be found in any democracy. Since the Liberal party has for years urged the reform of the senate, in view of the various incidents that have recently taken place it is high time steps were taken to reform the senate, if necessary by changes in our constitution.

In this particular case the situation is aggravated by the fact, known to all, that a well known member of the senate was recently involved in an inquiry. It is an outrage that the fullest inquiry into what is a very serious state of affairs should be blocked by a chamber which has not taken action against certain of its members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I draw attention to the fact that the opinion of Mr. Sedgewick was brought to the attention of the senate on June 17, 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: That was the first opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and it includes the following words in conclusion:

> I am quite satisfied in my own mind that the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission —of which I am chief commissioner—would not risk having an investigator require the production of any documents until this act is amended.
> I hope it may not be considered presumption on my part to say the amendment suggested is indispensable to a proper administration of the Combines Investigation Act.

Apparently the fact that Mr. Sedgewick's opinion had been cited in this house, and that Mr. Sedgewick had ventured an opinion was resented by the leader of the opposition in the senate instead of inducing further consideration, because I find the following words on page 579 of the senate record:

> Right Hon. Mr. Meighen: Yes.
> Honourable members, I want to make a brief comment on the letter of Mr. Justice Sedgewick, just read by the leader of the government. The intimation of the letter is that the amendment made in this house and accepted by the other house, was merely in the nature of a last gasping spasm while we were in the midst of death.
> As far as this house is concerned, it was nothing of the kind.

So far as this house is concerned, there will not be any last gasping spasm in connection with securing further action in this matter from the leader of the opposition in the senate. I want to say to my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Woodsworth) that I concur very strongly in the views he has expressed on these matters which so vitally affect the well being of the great masses of the people of this country. Where the House of Commons, representing the people in their elected chamber stresses at least on three occasions the necessity for some all important legislation, unless there is something in the nature of very exceptional reasons to the contrary, that legislation should be granted by the senate.

I would say further that this is not the only piece of legislation which the present government has introduced at this session, which we regarded as of importance in dealing with the most difficult of all problems facing the country at the present time, and which the senate has thrown out. It may be just as well for hon. members of the Senate to have a month or two to reflect upon what is going to be the consequence of repeated action of this kind; and, believing that reflection is advisable, the government proposes to allow the matter to stand as it is for the present, with respect to the Combines Investigation Act, but to proceed again at an early stage next session with amendments to that measure including the one which we have endeavoured to have carried at the present session.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): For the purpose of setting the facts right, and in answer to my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), I may say that not only was the opinion of Mr. Sedgewick given to the senate on June 18, when this bill was in committee of the whole in the senate, but the opinion of the Department of Justice was also given to the members.

Mr. BENNETT: Not the second opinion.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no doubt the first opinions were before the senate, but the second opinions were not. I should have had great confidence in the conciliatory presentation of the case by the Minister of Justice to the members of the senate. In the last five years I have been on joint committees of the house and the senate and I believe that on one of them the present Minister of Justice was also a member. In any case, a reasonable presentation by oral argument, in which misapprehensions are removed, will almost certainly lead to an amicable agreement with respect to almost any difference of this kind.

Amendment read the first time.

SUPPLY

STATEMENT OF MR. BENNETT WITH RESPECT TO DISMISSALS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): This would seem to be the only appropriate opportunity that will be afforded this session to present grievances before supply is granted, and I desire to direct attention, in no acrimonious spirit, to one or two matters that have arisen out of the conduct of government in connection with appointments to the public service and dismissals. I am not for a moment dealing with that phase of administrative action that has to do with ordinary employment and dismissals. I recognize, as I have so frequently said, that the government of the day must necessarily, under our institutions, give effect to the views of its supporters and make appointments and dismissals of those who are not protected by the terms of the Civil Service Act or who have in other ways, by other methods, made themselves amenable to the punitive provisions of our statutes with respect to those who are in the public service. But there is another phase of the matter to which I should like to direct attention. It is far more important in one sense to every member of this house than any mere question of patronage because it affects an arrangement that was made many years ago and which in the main has successfully worked, but one that can work only with the exercise of the utmost good faith on the part of those who are responsible for its administration.

In 1911, when Sir Robert Borden came into office, a discussion took place in the first session regarding the question of patronage and dismissals from the public service. Sir Robert Borden said:

I would like to point out to my hon. friend what he seems to have forgotten, that with respect to both the inside service and the outside service this matter has been settled. In the first place by a statute of Canada concerning the inside service, in the second place by a resolution of this house, concurred in by both political parties with regard to the outside service. So far as the inside service is concerned, the statutory provision to which I desire to call attention is to be found in the act of 1908 introduced and passed by the late administration. Section 43 of that statute is as follows:

No officer, clerk or employee in the civil service shall be debarred from voting at any dominion or provincial election if under the laws governing the said election he has the right to vote; but no such officer, clerk or employee shall engage in partisan work in connection with said election.

That has been somewhat modified, amended by section 55 of the Civil Service Act; but the general purpose is exactly the same and the end sought is attained, I think, by the use of substantially similar words. Sir Robert Borden continued:

Now, so far as the outside service is concerned, the rule was embodied in a resolution of the House of Commons moved by Mr. Lake on the 17th July, 1905, and accepted by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who was then leading the government, and that rule is in these words:

That whilst it is desirable that every official in the employ of the government of Canada, should enjoy perfect freedom of political opinion, and the untrammelled exercise of his franchise in accord therewith, no official should be engaged, or permitted to engage, in partisan work of any description in the election of a representative to the provincial or dominion legislature.

[Mr. Bennett.]

On the same page—890—referring to Mr. A. K. Maclean, he said:

Now, my hon. friend has spoken of what should be necessary to convince the government or a minister of the crown that an official has taken an offensive part in any election. There are obviously some cases in which inquiry would be rather futile. For example, on the 21st of September last, I myself personally saw three office-holders of this country engaged in active partisan work in the city of Halifax. ... In that case I would not grant an inquiry because I saw it with my own eyes.

At page 891, he said:

Now, my hon. friend is anxious that inquiry should be had in proper cases, and so am I. No one is more unwilling to dismiss officials that I am, but where the government or responsible ministers is convinced that an official has been guilty of violation of the plain terms of a statute or of a resolution of the House of Commons concurred in by both political parties, by which his conduct ought to be guided. I would ask my hon. friend what alternative would a government have in a case of that kind?

Then Mr. E. M. Macdonald, member for Pictou at that time, raised a very interesting question as to whether or not representations made by a defeated candidate would have the same force and effect as those made by a member, and he put the case very shortly in these words, as reported at page 923:

I have no objection to an offensive partisan being dismissed, but we should have evidence to bear out the charge that he is an offensive partisan. I am not here to say that a statement made by a member of this house under his hand in writing to the minister giving specific facts would not be sufficient evidence. I think that every member of this house is entitled to be considered as worthy of credence and there is this further protection that we can discuss the question in the house with the member who makes the statement. But when we come to deal with the written statement of a defeated candidate—

Mr. Rhodes: Does the hon. gentleman object to a minister taking the recommendations of a defeated candidate?

Mr. Macdonald: Most certainly, and I have just given the reason why. We are now dealing with the question of the minister being satisfied by the evidence that a certain fact is true and the minister must justify his judgment to parliament. If he takes the statement of a member of parliament, that statement can be discussed in this house in the presence of the member who made it.

But if he takes the statement of a defeated candidate, he takes the statement of one who cannot discuss the question here, who cannot even give the details to the minister, or put them on record in the department as well as one can who holds a place in this house.

In 1928, on May 29, the then member for St. Lawrence-St. George brought to the attention of the house a case in which a gentleman had been dismissed for partisanship. He had held office for seven years and seven months and was efficient. An inquiry was asked for but not granted. It was contended that as the minister had given a certificate he should be dismissed without further inquiry. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce in that debate said, at page 3526:

I will admit that the matter to which the hon. member has just referred has given me some little concern. The dismissal took place entirely in accordance with the principle that has been observed by all parties. The complaint of a member of the house that an individual has been exercising partisanship in elections has always been accepted by the minister as a reason for dismissal. I have followed that principle, but I am glad to say there have not been many instances in my own department. I am not going to express an opinion as to whether that is a good practice to follow, although perhaps I might be just so bold as to say that I have a good deal of sympathy with the position taken by my hon. friend. Although many members may differ with me, I can see no particular reason why, where a man happens to be in the service of the government, he should not be allowed to exercise any influence he may have on behalf of any political principle in which he believes. However, I will have to take any responsibility there may be in following out the practice that has always been followed.

The result was that the gentleman dismissed from office was without any appropriate remedy. I am going to refer to that presently. During the progress of the first debate, to which I have alluded, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not entirely in accord with what had been said by the previous speaker. Sir Wilfrid said:

I beg my hon. friend's pardon. We said in 1896 that no man should be dismissed unless he was first given the opportunity of being heard. But I said also that we would accept the written statement of a member of parliament, giving the facts, and asking for the dismissal. That is the rule we laid down, and we have lived up to it. I am told by hon. gentlemen opposite that we did not live up to that rule. I do not admit the charge. I think we did, but even if we were deficient I would expect that the hon. gentlemen who are on the treasury benches at present would at least act according to their own doctrine. Are they going to throw over their own doctrine and institute dismissals right and left without giving any man the opportunity of defending himself or without any member of parliament taking the responsibility of placing on record a charge against the man whose dismissal he seeks?

He then proceeds, and these words are important:

I would insist on the leader of the government that he should enforce the rule that no man should be deprived of office without being given the opportunity of defending himself or at least unless the member of parliament who asks for his dismissal has the courage to put on record the reasons why he demands it.

That principle was the one to which I alluded as being under discussion by the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, in 1911-12. Then we come to 1923, and according to Hansard for February 15, 1923, at page 286, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) used these words:

In some cases charges have been preferred against certain officials by hon. members of this house. Where an hon. member has been prepared to state to the house that of his own knowledge an offence contravening the provisions of the Civil Service Act respecting political partisanship has been committed, the government has acted under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, which provide that a civil servant guilty of political partisanship shall not be retained in the service. I think that list will cover any of the dismissals to which my right hon. friend has referred.

Mr. Meighen: I presume that that list would cover practically every case, because the statement from any member that a man has been guilty of political partisanship is not very hard to secure from a partisan supporter.

To which Mr. Mackenzie King replied:

I did not say a statement from any member. I said a statement from an hon. member of this house that of his own knowledge a civil servant had been guilty of a certain offence which was in the opinion of the government sufficient to warrant his dismissal under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

That principle having been accepted, I am rising in my place this morning for the purpose of directing attention to the fact that it is based upon one assumption, which is that an hon. member of this house who certifies to such a condition has satisfied himself of his own personal knowledge as to the authenticity of the statements which he makes and that they are true. But if he sees fit to make a statement without regard to the fine detail of its being true or untrue and the man is dismissed, I think probably the man has an action against that member of parliament because he has compassed his dismissal and destroyed his position. At any rate I think the question will be determined in some of the courts of the country within the next year, because there are cases in which members of this house have certified that a man has been a partisan, of their personal knowledge, when as a matter of fact not only was the man not a partisan but he took no part in the elections in any way. But he has lost his position, with all the rights that appertain to it and obviously, having suffered damage, that matter will have to be contested in some other way.

The cases to which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George referred in a previous parliament need not now be discussed, but there are three cases to which I desire to direct attention because they affect this matter very directly. Some years ago a man who occupied a position on an Indian reserve was dismissed from office on the certificate of the member of parliament for the district in which he lived. The servant of the Indian department said the member had been incorrectly informed, that the member had no knowledge of him personally and did not know him at all. In the end, after much effort, the unfortunate man having been out of office for years, an investigation was obtained. The investigation was held and the secretary of the Liberal association in that community was called as a witness. Without a single dissenting voice they all agreed that this man had taken no part in the elections and that they had seen no evidence of his activity in any shape, form, kind or description whatever. That man lost his position by an improper certificate having been given by a member of parliament.

Since the present government came into office several cases have occurred in which, under the certificate of members of parliament, employees have been dismissed. Those returns have been tabled in this house during this session, but there are two cases in Quebec to which particular attention is directed because the papers brought down in the house indicate that a very grievous wrong has been done to an unfortunate man. One is the father of eight children and he has been in the employ of the government for a very long time, in fact since November, 1915, twenty-one years this fall. No complaint has ever been made against him, but in a letter directed to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) on the 29th January, 1936, a member of parliament stated that to his personal knowledge this man was guilty of political partisanship. Immediately the man was removed from office. As soon as he ascertained why he had been removed he began to gather together his friends, who were all able to say that for twenty-one years he had taken no part in politics, realizing how important it was for him to make a living for himself and his eight children. He has supported that statement further by a statutory declaration which he made on the 19th day of March, 1936. In that declaration he makes the following statements:

I, the undersigned, Michel Bedard, of Boischatel, do declare and say:—

1. I was employed by the public works department of Ottawa, as chauffeur, at the Quebec post office building, since the 28th of November, 1915;

2. Since then, I have always worked for the same department in the same capacity, and my work was always satisfactory to the department;

3. During the time I have been employed by the Department of Public Works, as above mentioned, I never did any political partisanship; I never took any interest in the political campaigns and all what I did was to vote, according to my own conscience;

I have never taken any part in any meeting or any political discussion;

4. I am the father of eight children and, since I have been dismissed by the department, I am without work, and I cannot see where I can find some;

5. No complaint was ever made before against me, and I do declare that I do not deserve the situation in which Mr. Wilfrid Lacroix put me lately in asking my dismissal as he did;

6. It is absolutely impossible that Mr. Wilfrid Lacroix be aware of any act of political partisanship on my behalf, I never met him anywhere and I believe that he does not even know me personally;

7. I make this solemn declaration according to the federal statutes, to have the same effect as if it was a declaration duly sworn.

And I have signed:
(Signed) Michel Bedard.

Solemnly declared before me, this 19th day of March, 1936.
(Signed) F. O. Demin,
Commissioner Superior Court,
Dist. of Quebec.

The reason I am directing this matter to the attention of the house to-day is that I have not seen any evidence on the part of my fellow members, even though they are supporting the government in large numbers, that would induce me to believe they would consciously do an injustice to a man who has been in the employ of the government for twenty-one years. I have no reason to believe that the Prime Minister would desire that that be done. The effect of this is to throw a man on the street after twenty-one years of service in a particular position. The file is here, having been brought down in consequence of a motion passed by the house, and the file indicates clearly that the Minister of Public Works acted upon representations made to him by a member of parliament. The member of parliament asked that it be done, the Minister of Public Works therefore did it. I am not complaining of the Minister of Public Works having done it, but I am saying that it creates an almost intolerable position if the government is not prepared to take steps to protect one who has thus been injured, thus been deprived of his position. I said a moment ago that I believe the man who made the recommendation has subjected himself to an action. I have not much doubt about that, although it may be that as a member of parliament he can protect himself.

The other man was employed from October 8, 1930, and the man who was appointed to office believed that the first man, who has made a declaration in the same sense, had obtained a position to which he was entitled.

But the report made indicates that that was incorrect, and the people of the settlement in which the man lives, without regard to their political faith, signed a recommendation to Mr. Lacroix, M.P., asking that the injury which had been done to this other man, namely Mr. Ubald Vézina of Beauport, be undone. He makes a declaration, which I shall not take the time to read, in exactly the same sense as Mr. Bédard. He says he has not been interested in political matters, nor has he been a partisan since his appointment, but he has lost his job because a member of parliament made a certificate upon which the Minister of Marine took the steps I have indicated, and he was replaced by another.

These two cases I mention. There are two or three others, which perhaps I should not deal with at length at this time of the session, but I desire to invite the attention of the government and the house to the principle involved. It is of far-reaching consequence, and I believe that appropriate measures should be taken to place in the estimates provision for this man. That is a strong statement, but if a man who denies any partisanship has been deprived of his position on that ground, I suggest he should be allowed an investigation. I ask the government to provide an investigation for these men, either before a judicial commission or by such other commission as they think proper. In other words, in view of the challenge to the statement made by the member of parliament, should he not now have the right to present his case before a proper tribunal?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What was the employment of the man in question?

Mr. BENNETT: I said he was a chauffeur, and the other man was working as a sort of carpenter. One was under the Indian agent, a chauffeur, and the other was employed as a carpenter or general labourer.

Mr. MULOCK: Was he a temporary employee, or permanent?

Mr. BENNETT: The record shows that he was there for twenty-one years.

Mr. MULOCK: I beg the right hon. gentleman's pardon, I meant the second man.

Mr. BENNETT: I should say the second one would be regarded as not a permanent employee, although I cannot say with certainty. The record is not clear on it and I therefore speak subject to correction on that point. But even if he were a temporary employee I suggest to the government the desirability of following the case and permitting an investigation.

If hon. members take the trouble to look through the records of the last five years they will find that in some cases complaints were made that we set up too many investigations. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hold the view that it is better to suffer from giving men a chance to be heard, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier contended, than to take arbitrary action if there is a possibility of being wrong. Mr. Macdonald, of Pictou, who presented the case in 1911 or 1912, felt that there was an obligation upon a member of parliament whose honour was pledged by reason of a certificate he gave, but one ventured to point out that in these days of extreme partisanship you might have a situation which would be difficult to reconcile with that principle.

I do not desire to make any acrimonious observations with respect to the matter: I still believe in the fairness of mind of the Canadian people, regardless of what party may be in power. I hope that steps will be taken to afford to these men the right of investigation, and that if it is found, as was found in one case, that they have been improperly removed, it will be seen that they are recompensed for what has happened. In the case of this unfortunate man who was in the Indian department, it was years later when he got the investigation, because, he having been dismissed before the late government took office, they felt hesitant about granting an investigation. But finally the minister of the department said: This man has pleaded with me for his own reputation. He said: "My reputation is at stake. I accepted office and pledged myself by that acceptance that I would not engage in political activities, and I have kept faith in that regard." That was in 1927. Finally a commission was appointed and after hearing the evidence of people in the community of the Liberal faith, including the heads of the organizations, the commissioner was satisfied beyond question and reported that there was not the slightest evidence of this man having been a partisan.

Mr. CRERAR: When was the commissioner appointed?

Mr. BENNETT: Not until 1934, I think. The minister, as I say, felt that this was an old matter which should not be reopened, but the man was so insistent, putting it on that ground, not asking for compensation but seeking only to vindicate his own reputation that an investigation was ordered. Officers of the Indian department on the spot were examined, and many others, including the mayor of the town, the former Indian agent, merchants and others, who had been associated with the complainant—the minister of the church who was there at the time, and those who had had to do with this Indian agent in the closest way. One of them, a lawyer and the secretary of the Liberal Association at the time this occurred, went so far as to say that he had no personal knowledge of the man being active politically, that in fact he "considered him quiet in that respect." One of them went so far as to say that if there had been any partisanship on his part he at least would have heard of it; and he had not.

Mr. CRERAR: Would the right hon. gentleman give the name?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but I wondered whether it was desirable to give names. The name of the man was MacConnell, of Kamsack, Saskatchewan. The former minister endeavoured to escape, as I say, but finally an appointment was made; the report was not made until January, 1935, at Kelvington, Saskatchewan, and they all agreed that there was not the slightest evidence of political partisanship on the part of this unfortunate man who lost his job. I think the difficulty arose because of the fact that after his dismissal he held a position under the provincial government as liquor vendor or something of that sort, and there was confusion as to the two positions. That may explain it in part. At any rate I have given the facts as shown on the record.

Under these circumstances I suggest that in all cases of this kind the rule should be laid down by the government, consequent upon a certificate being given by a member that to his personal knowledge—although Sir Wilfrid Laurier said he should recite the facts—an employee of the crown had been guilty of partisanship, and the employee denying it in toto, the government should grant him the right of investigation. I do not wish to go farther than that at this time, because I realize that this is a matter about which there has been much controversy and which has been discussed at various times. But I go so far as to say that where a man has been removed, on certificate given to the minister by a member of this house, if he makes denial immediately upon being made acquainted with the fact that he has been removed in consequence of such complaint he should be accorded the privilege of investigation. That is all I ask. I might go farther, because I believe there are certain consequences or implications which arise, but I believe my request is reasonable. Certainly we endeavoured to act on that principle.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUPUIS: Does he not have his recourse before a court of justice?

Mr. BENNETT: That is an open question. But how can a poor unfortunate man be driven to court and to consultation with lawyers on these questions when probably he is making only a poor subsistence for himself and his family? He has not the money with which to consult lawyers; he has not the money with which to carry on litigation. But if he is accorded an investigation, all would be well. No member of parliament should complain for a single moment against an investigation of his certificate when a man denies validity of the charge made against him. I do not think any hon. member would consider such investigation unfair.

The other point to which I wish to direct attention arises out of the same matter. Numbers of men holding positions have been let out, and others have taken their places. Some of those dismissals have been made under great hardship, because the returned man's preference has been swept aside. I will not go into the cases before me in detail, but I have been asked to bring the facts to the attention of the house as strongly as possible. These facts affect a number of men who occupied positions in the public service. For instance, a returned man, whose name I shall not use unless I am asked, who had worked for a long time in the Prescott elevator, has been replaced by a man who, to use the expression of the complainant "while I was fighting for my country, was stealing from his country," the present employee having stolen from the mails and having been sentenced to the penitentiary. This man now occupies the position formerly held by the returned soldier. I ask any hon. member how he would feel under like circumstances.

Mr. HOWE: I would ask the right hon. gentleman to give me a memorandum respecting the situation he has just mentioned. I was not aware that any man had been replaced in the Prescott elevator, for any cause.

Mr. BENNETT: I will gladly give the minister a memorandum. I shall not mention any names unless I am asked to do so, because I feel that in some sense such action might result in handicapping the man's position, and if at all possible I desire to avoid doing that. As a matter of fact I have three complaints. One man puts his case this way: "While I was offering my life for my country, the man who succeeded me was stealing from my country. He was convicted for theft from the mails, and served two years in the penitentiary." Now this unfortunate complainant is walking about without a position, and naturally he feels keenly his present circumstances. Then, a second man, I am sorry to say, has been succeeded by one who did time. I am not raising the issue because men have done time and should therefore be precluded from re-establishing themselves, but I am saying that returned men are entitled to different treatment, not because I suggest it but because the statute says so. That is the reason. Do not for one moment think that I do not appreciate the difficulties the government faces. For instance, I do not believe that the Minister of Railways and Canals would for one moment sanction such conditions; but these are the facts. How they have developed, or how they have been brought about, is not for me at this time to discuss.

Then, I have another case which touches the Department of Railways and Canals. This is one affecting a man who had been working two or three years in the department. It is only fair to the hon. member for York North (Mr. Mulock) to say that this man might be classified as a temporary employee. However he had a position in the department, and had seen long service. He served in the South African war, in the Zulu war and in the great war. Before the war he was what might be described as a bridge man, and had been given a position of lesser importance on the Welland canal. However, only a few days ago he found himself deprived of that position and succeeded by one who had not any such creditable service. This man is very much incensed and resentful about it. I shall give the facts to the Minister of Railways and Canals because if I were to discuss the matter in the sense in which I should like to discuss it I might prejudice a position which I desire to assist.

Other cases have come to my attention during the session. Letters dealing with some of them have been brought down. One is in the far west, one is in the far east, and so on But in connection with all these cases conditions develop, not because of a desire on the part of the government but because there is not an opportunity for the government to deal with every phase of a matter. That is what I desire to point out.

One of the men about whom I have spoken had worked for three years as leg operator at the Prescott elevator. From 1914 to 1919 he served in the great war, and has been replaced by a man whose name I shall not give, but who was convicted of robbing the mails and as a result served two years in the penitentiary. The man who succeeded the former employee is not a returned soldier. Another case to which I referred affects a man who had held a similar position at Prescott, and who has been replaced by one who was formerly convicted and served a sentence. The last case to which I referred affects a man who served in the Canadian artillery and who was in the Zulu revolution. In 1912 he went to Natal and joined the Natal Light Horse.

Mr. DUPUIS: How old is he?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is he not about seventy years old?

Mr. BENNETT: No. There are men who have served their country continuously since 1900 who are not seventy years old. He was discharged in Hamilton early in July, 1919, and on April 11 of this year was replaced, through a patronage committee which did not have a returned man on it, by a single man without a war record.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is that the man on the Welland canal?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The minister to whom he has appealed has been making some investigation. In this instance the minister to whom the appeal has been made is the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), not the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Howe). The minister has been making certain investigations, and there the matter stands.

There are large numbers of these Canadians to whom I might direct attention, but my doing so would serve no useful purpose because I desire only to describe conditions which I believe require the taking of two steps: (1) Where the action taken by a member has resulted in the loss of a position by a civil servant, such servant should have an opportunity for investigation if he denies the correctness of the allegations made, and (2) we should continue to give effect to the provisions in our law with respect to returned men. Particular care should be exercised in placing those who, not having served in the overseas forces violated the criminal laws of the country during the absence of those whose positions they have taken. I think that is not too strong a position to take. I trust that I may present this grievance before we proceed with supply, in order that the government may be advised as to what the conditions are. I feel sure they will take such steps as may be necessary to protect those who desire only what Sir Wilfrid Laurier described as the opportunity to be heard before they are deprived of their positions.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to review what my right hon. friend

(Mr. Bennett) has said, for the simple reason that, as all hon. members know, there is probably no more controversial question than that which relates to appointments to and dismissals from the public service. That is my first reason for not attempting at this time to go into the different cases which he has mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not expect the right hon. gentleman to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the second place, I do not feel that it is necessary to do so because in all that my right hon. friend has said he has not intimated that the government itself has departed in any way from the principle which he has enunciated as the one that previous administrations—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —followed or were supposed to follow, namely that of taking the word of a member of parliament with respect to dismissals for political partisanship and acting upon it without further question. My right hon. friend is now laying down, for the present administration, a course of action which I do not think was followed by himself—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes; we gave an investigation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —during the time he was in office. In the five years that my right hon. friend was in office there were, according to a return that was submitted to this house on June 10, no less than 6,352 dismissals from the public service. Of this number, as many as 1,370 were from the Department of the Interior, 1,600 from the Department of Marine, and 1,093 from the Post Office Department. But that does not begin to indicate the extent to which changes were made in the public service which resulted in men being dismissed or losing their positions without having any investigation at all.

Mr. STEWART: Will the right hon. gentleman allow me to ask him how many of those were dismissed because of reorganization?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am coming to that.

Mr. BENNETT: We abolished the positions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend asks how many were due to reorganization. Perhaps I cannot better illustrate in what fashion they were due to any "reorganization" than by giving figures with respect to the Department of Agriculture. According to the figures brought down there were 187 dismissals from that department. There was another return with respect to appointments in the same department, which showed that the number of appointments made in the Department of Agriculture was 2,725.

Mr. BENNETT: That figure is cumulative, of course. Those were temporary from year to year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No doubt that was "reorganization."

Mr. BENNETT: No, no; that was merely from year to year, covering temporary employees who came in during the spring and went out in the fall.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want to go into this in any controversial spirit, because I believe my right hon. friend himself has been careful to avoid that. Moreover there is no opportunity at the present of hearing the other side of the cases cited or from the hon. members concerned. Further, at an earlier stage in the session I intimated that at the beginning of next session the government would ask the house to appoint a special committee to go into the whole question of appointments and dismissals under the Civil Service Act. That will be the time, I think, when matters of this kind can be taken up and gone into more fully and carefully.

That covers, I think, all I wished more particularly to say, namely that the course which my right hon. friend is now suggesting is not one which, up to the present, has been regarded as in accordance with the general practice. I do not wish to say that there may not be much to be said in support of the position taken by my right hon. friend. Where it can be shown that anyone has been dismissed from the public service obviously without any cause, as long as we have such a thing as justice, which is what above all else government stands for, the government would desire and wish to see that justice was done.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot do more than say to my right hon. friend that the government will be glad, during the period of the recess, to consider carefully the representations he has made. As to indicating what further action, if any, it may be advisable to take, that will have to await a more favourable opportunity for intimating the results to the house.

SOCKEYE SALMON INDUSTRY—CLOSING OF HATCHERIES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I desire to draw to the attention of the government a matter which is of very great importance owing particularly to developments of the last few weeks. I refer to the sockeye salmon industry, one of our greatest industries in British Columbia. The reason I raise the matter at this time is that an order in council was passed in March which is not, in my opinion, in the best interests of the industry, and particularly now that the United States have accepted the treaty. I present the matter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government in the hope that they may decide not to carry out the provisions of that order in council.

The industry to which I refer is a very valuable one. At the present time it is worth something over three million dollars a year; that is as it stands to-day, with a depleted run. It should amount to twenty-five million dollars if we had given attention to it and to the propagation of fish to keep up those runs. The sockeye spawns altogether in Canadian waters. That is one reason why the adjoining states are vitally interested. Without doubt, the restoration of the Fraser represents the greatest conservation project which we in this country have attempted. I draw the attention of the government particularly to the fact that the order in council which was passed on March 2 of this year is based on a report filed with the minister on February 21, 1936. One clause of the order in council reads as follows:

> The minister, on the advice of the Deputy Minister of Fisheries, recommends that when the present season's operations in the above-named hatcheries—

Giving a list of ten hatcheries in British Columbia.

> —are completed, they be closed, and disposed of to the best advantage, and that the employees be then retired under the conditions imposed by law.

That action has been taken. I think it must be admitted that it is very drastic, when one considers that the two countries are about to come together under this treaty with the idea of helping this industry and trying to provide that the run of salmon be increased.

The fight for the preservation of the sockeye has been going on for some forty years. I think it was in 1922 that a commission was appointed to investigate the sockeye salmon industry in the province of British Columbia. This commission filed its report in 1922. The Department of Fisheries prepared a memorandum based on an interim report issued by this commission. In section 15 of that interim report the commission stated:

> 15. Hatcheries.—Your commission has gone into this matter very thoroughly and heard a great deal of evidence both from employees of the said hatcheries and men engaged in the fishing industry, both as fishermen and purchasers of fish, and we are of the opinion that most of the hatchery operations could be suspended except that two hatcheries be kept in operation to experiment with the new proposed system and that a certain amount of the moneys now spent in hatchery operations be used for the clearing of streams, obstructions in rivers and improving the spawning grounds for natural propagation.

In this memorandum, to which I have referred, the department in reply proceeded to make out a case for the hatcheries. They referred to the fact that during the sittings of the commission only two hatchery employees were called, and they were connected with small hatcheries. I shall not read this memorandum in full, but I should like to quote from page 1 as follows:

> There are twelve hatcheries in British Columbia in which there are several men who have had much longer experience in hatchery operations than Messrs. Catt and Reid, who, however, are both good officers. The district inspector of hatcheries for British Columbia and Major Motherwell, chief inspector of fisheries, could have given authentic and valuable information regarding results that are apparent from British Columbia hatcheries generally.

They then go on to show that from the official records the hatcheries have played a wonderful part in keeping up the runs.

Mr. NEILL: What memorandum is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. BARBER: This is a memorandum issued in connection with the interim report of the fisheries commission concerning hatcheries. Referring to the Skeena river watershed, this statement is made:

> It must be appreciated that, with 1,091 salmon gill nets, each 1,200 feet in length and with a depth of 50 meshes, if it were not for some extraordinary measure, which in this case is artificial propagation, there would be no likelihood of the run being maintained.

In connection with the Rivers Inlet area, they have this to say on page 5:

> Previous to the establishment of the hatchery sockeye salmon did not run in Meadows creek, which is situated just alongside the hatchery. Each year since hatchery operations were commenced fry had been liberated from the hatchery in Meadows creek. As a result a splendid run of sockeye has been built up in this creek and a considerable portion of the hatchery collection is obtained each year at this point.

On page 6, referring to the Vancouver Island area, the memorandum states:

When the hatchery was established, a considerable area had to be covered in order to secure the required supply of eggs. The fry, up to the last two years, have been liberated directly from the hatchery into the lake. The result has been that now large quantities of returning spawning fish come practically to the hatchery door and are obtained by seining on the lake shore. The greater part of the run of fish to this whole area in many recent years have spawned at this place.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the take of eggs now is from a run built up entirely by the hatchery operations and after the full toll has been taken from it by the commercial fishermen.

The New Westminster hatchery is referred to on page 9 as follows:

In 1916 sockeye fry were taken from the New Westminster hatchery and liberated in tributaries of Kawkawa lake. The stocking continued each year for four years. A good run of fish is now returning to that particular lake each year. Previous to this stocking, no sockeye were known to frequent these streams.

How ill advised are suggestions that hatcheries are responsible for the depletion of the Fraser will be realized from the foregoing. On the other hand it may be pertinently asked what the runs would have been in view of the notoriously excessive fishing that has been going on, due to international conditions, if the hatcheries had not been operating.

The following general observations are made:

It has been suggested that hatcheries are only useful for replenishing streams that have been depleted. If this argument is accepted and it is granted that the hatcheries will replenish a depleted stream, it must also be granted that they will maintain an established run equally as well.

There are numerous streams in British Columbia in which a good run of sockeye at one time occurred and which through overfishing is almost extinct. Artificial means are the only way by which these streams can be replenished and a commercial run reestablished. The existing hatcheries can only look after a portion of these streams and if they are again to be productive the fish cultural service must not only be maintained but must be largely extended.

And again:

Against the present condition of barrenness of these once productive areas where there has been only natural reproduction, the splendid condition of the lower Fraser, where natural reproduction has been assisted by artificial means, is strong evidence of the efficacy of hatcheries. The run to Pitt lake, where there is a small hatchery, is more than holding its own and the run to the Pemberton district has steadily improved since the hatchery was established there.

And then further along:

With the experience in British Columbia and Alaska there can be no doubt that the sockeye runs will not maintain themselves against commercial fishing unless fishing operations are so restricted as to imperil the success of the industry and that some assistance must be given nature and this can only be by means of artificial propagation.

It would be interesting to know just what knowledge is possessed by those whose evidence before the British Columbia fisheries commission has not been favourable to fish culture and the extent to which they have personally examined into and studied the conditions that prevail on the spawning grounds and in a sockeye stream, as against those that obtain in a hatchery during the period of incubation.

It is admitted by the sportsmen of the province and the numerous angling associations that hatchery operations with game fish have been eminently successful, and in this connection the introduction of Atlantic salmon at Cowichan lake, eastern speckled trout in the Kootenay district and black bass in Christina lake and Vancouver Island points are excellent examples. If such operations are successful with these varieties of fish why should they not be equally successful with sockeye?

Mr. DUNNING: What is the date of the report?

Mr. BARBER: It is a memorandum based on the interim report of the commission which sat in 1922. The concluding words of the memorandum are as follows:

One argument which is very eloquent is the fact that for hundreds of years hatchery operations have been carried on in some of the oldest countries of the world, and they are sufficiently satisfied with results to continue such operations.

Although the federal government of the United States does not administer and does not derive any revenue from the fisheries, except in Alaska, it operates a large and comprehensive fish cultural service entirely at its own expense, and which extends to nearly every state in the union.

In conclusion it is pointed out that the arguments against hatcheries are all presumptive. On such basis it may fairly be asked why—in view of the fact that the foregoing are points of definite knowledge—hatcheries are not the most effective and economical means known for maintaining our anadromous and inland fisheries.

That is the memorandum prepared by the Department of Fisheries. We have the example of Harrison lake, where 2,500,000 sockeye were planted in 1920. In 1927, when they were due to return, 12,000,000 eggs were taken from a point where there had never been any sockeye salmon. Surely this is evidence that the hatcheries have helped the Canadian runs. I have here a copy of the report of the Minister of Fisheries in which the superintendent of Cultus lake hatchery on page 12 states that in recent years not only have the runs increased, but the size of the salmon has also increased.

We have had on the coast for a number of years a fish that is not only recognized as a sport fish but is used extensively in the fresh fish trade and to a certain extent in canning. In this connection I wish to give the house an illustration of what can be done through hatchery methods. I can remember the time some years ago when there were very few steelhead in the rivers leading to Cultus lake. Eggs were secured from other sections and hatched and the fry placed in the creeks. Here are the results, obtained entirely from hatchery methods. In 1932 there were collected from returning steelhead 18,600 eggs; in 1933, 98,900; in 1934, 125,163; in 1935, 133,560; and when I was home this year they had finished collecting and I was informed that the total collections for 1936 stood at 410,000 eggs. I do not think that one can get better evidence than this of the efficacy of hatcheries, and this is recent evidence. These fish stood the so-called hazards of the sea and returned, and if this is true of steelhead it is surely true of sockeye. This, I submit, should surely be satisfactory evidence, and it comes from the department itself, which has carried on this work for a number of years.

I wish now to refer to the order in council, and in this regard I should like to know the reason for this right about face in the department's policy. Perhaps I had better read the order in council:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 21st February, 1936, from the Minister of Fisheries, submitting as follows:

As it was not clear that the hatching of sockeye salmon in British Columbia was justifying the cost involved, it was decided in 1925 to have the biological board undertake a thorough investigation into the relative efficiency of artificial and natural reproduction of sockeye salmon, and at the time it was anticipated that it would take twelve years to complete it, but it found it possible to report finally in the premises at its recent annual meeting. The basis of determination as to the efficiency of reproduction in any year was the number of young fish that of their own volition left the lake for the sea. This young sockeye do in the second year of their age and they remain at sea until they reach maturity. The results of the investigation, which comprehend different methods of hatching and also the rearing of the young fish to various ages up to nearly one year, are summarized in the following statement:

Natural Reproduction	1925	1927	1930
Migrants as percentage of total eggs available	1·13	1·05	3·16
Artificial Propagation With Liberation of Fry	1926	1929	1932
Migrants as percentage of total eggs available	3·93	2·38	1·71
Migrants as percentage of total eggs obtained from the adult salmon that were stripped	4·54	2·76	2·43
Artificial Propagation With Eyed Egg Planting	1928	1933
Migrants as percentage of total eggs available	0·95	3·55*
Migrants as percentage of total eggs obtained from the adult salmon that were stripped	1·44	4·67*

* Indicates that possible two year old migrants of the 1936 migration have yet to be added.

In the light of the above, the following conclusion was reached by the biological board:

On the whole it may reasonably be concluded that in an area such as Cultus Lake, where a natural run of sockeye occurs with a reasonable expectancy of successful spawning, artificial propagation, for purposes of continuing the run to that area, is unnecessary and, if producing any additional results over natural spawning, these would not appear to be in any way commensurate with the cost.

This conclusion may not apply to areas where there is no reasonable expectation of successful natural propagation.

The minister observes that it was the hatching of sockeye salmon only that was in question, and the investigation does not reflect adversely on the hatching of trout and Atlantic salmon that is being carried on in different parts not only of Canada but of several countries in the world, the good effects of which so far as Canada is concerned, have already been reasonably established.

The following sockeye salmon hatcheries in British Columbia are being operated by the Department of Fisheries:

Babine lake and Lakelse lake on the Skeena river;

Rivers inlet;

Anderson lake and Kennedy lake on Vancouver island;

Cultus lake—Smith's Falls; Pitt lake, Harrison lake and Pemberton on the Fraser river.

In the light of the findings of the board, and as a natural run of salmon with a reasonable expectancy of successful spawning occurs to all the areas in which the above named hatcheries are operated, the minister, on the advice of the Deputy Minister of Fisheries, recommends that when the present season's operations in the above named hatcheries are complete, they be closed, and disposed of to the best advantage, and that the employees therein be then retired under the conditions provided by law.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

When this investigation was undertaken eleven years ago, hatchery methods as they then existed were taken as the basis of trial and no deviation has been permitted to this day. Four systems of fish culture have been tried at Cultus lake. The first is fry planting, the second egg planting, the third fingerling planting, and the fourth natural reproduction. The first, fry planting, was abandoned long before the biological board started the investigation; the second, egg planting, has never had a fair trial, a point I shall deal with later on; the third, fingerling planting, was altogether too expensive; and the fourth, natural reproduction, particularly in these mountain streams, has been too destructive.

These methods have been tried again and again by the biological board but nothing has been done to see whether they can be improved upon in any way. Sockeye rearing has been condemned owing to the excessive cost; it will be observed that the whole argument in this order in council turns on the question of cost. And notwithstanding this, no attempt has been made, nor has any suggestion been put forward, looking towards economy.

Mr. MICHAUD: Who makes that statement?

Mr. BARBER: I make that statement. I have gone through the whole report, which I have studied carefully, and I do not think you can find one suggestion as to any means by which the cost might be reduced. I want to call attention to the way in which the biological board arrived at the figures given in regard to the percentage of migrants as compared with eggs planted. If you will refer to the reports of the different superintendents from year to year you will get an idea as to just how these figures are arrived at by the board. So many eggs are planted in the different streams. They are counted, the operators know how many have been planted, and then the migrants as they leave the lake are also counted; and on the basis of so many migrants from so many million eggs they arrive at the percentage given in the order in council.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. BARBER: When the house took recess, Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with the order in council, and I said it was based on a report of the biological board. The reason for disposing of the hatcheries of British Columbia was given as the cost of carrying them on, and I want to refer particularly to the figures upon which this order in council was based, because I am going to try to show that they are not well founded and that the minister might very well make further inquiries before taking this action. I want to refer to the report of the Department of Fisheries for 1934-35, at page 111. There I find the report of the superintendent of the Cultus lake hatchery, in which he calls attention to the planting of eyed sockeye eggs in tributaries to the lake. He says:

> The distribution above mentioned commenced on December 20, 1933, and was completed on February 24, 1934. Approximately thirty-three per cent of the total number of eggs planted were deposited in Spring creek. This stream, as its name implies, is fed by natural springs, is not subject to freshet, and eggs planted therein should give good results.

Further on he says:

> The remainder of the hatchery output was deposited in other tributaries to Cultus lake, and although the areas planted were thoroughly cultivated and properly prepared for reception of the eggs, it is impossible to protect against damage from freshets and resultant scouring of the beds of these streams.

With this in mind I should like to deal with three abortive attempts at egg planting, which was first tried in 1928. In that year scientists connected with the biological board, along with the superintendent of the hatchery, looked over the creeks to decide where the eggs should go. They insisted in putting the bulk of the eggs in Frost creek, and this was done. The creek dried up about half a mile above the lake, and the fry were unable to get down. The return of 0·95 per cent, which it will be noticed appears in this order in council in connection with that work, was the result almost entirely of the few eggs that were planted in Spring creek. In 1933 egg planting was repeated and the eggs were put into Windfall creek and Watt creek, which were not dependable. Heavy freshets in March washed practically the whole of them out with the exception of those planted in Spring creek. The count of migrants from the egg planting of 1933 shows a percentage of 4·67, or a total of 242,458. But that number of migrants was not the result of the 4,371,500 eggs planted; that was the result of 1,259,000 eggs which were planted in Spring and Smiths Falls creeks. This would show the percentage to be 19, rather 4·67. Destruction of these eggs is well authenticated, and the minister would have no trouble in securing these figures, because I understand the biological board kept track of all the eggs planted in the different creeks. But in coming to make up their percentages they said there were so many eggs planted, without caring whether they were planted in potato fields or by the side of the road; they were not interested where the eggs were planted but only interested in the result. They said so many migrants resulted, and they figured the result to be 4·67 per cent. If, on the other hand, they had only counted those eggs that had a chance to hatch the figure would be about 19 per cent.

Again in 1934 and 1935 they insisted that the eggs be planted as was done in 1933, and again all the eggs, with the exception of those planted in Spring creek, were destroyed through the creeks drying up. This information, as I have said, is available to the minister. Why was it not checked up before this order in council was passed? The value of the biological board figures is further weakened by the punishment inflicted on such runs. I have been interested in this work for ten years. One day I went out and found one of these little streams coming from Cultus lake spattered with dead fingerlings. I asked the man in charge what was wrong, and he said, "Well, we cut three fins off these fish so that we could identify them when they returned." When fish need all their faculties to survive this was certainly some handicap.

The report of the biological board stresses the futility of hatchery work in a small area such as the Cultus lake area. I am advised that in that district there has been a run-out of 2,500,000 yearlings in one year and a return of 81,000. That was in 1927. The scientist who has been employed under the board gives it as his opinion that the lake has enough food every year to produce two and a half million yearlings. If the fishermen catch two fish for every one that returns, in 1927 they caught 160,000 fish which, at twelve to a case, makes 13,000 cases worth $130,000. That is what this one little district can do, and the food is there to do it every year.

Another charge against the Cultus lake hatcheries is that the cost of food is too high. From a wire that came through last fall I understand that orders were given to dump the fish that were in the hatcheries and close them up because they had not sufficient money to carry on. It was only because of the protests of boards of trade and other public bodies in the Fraser valley that an effort was made to carry on at a reduced cost for food. The biological board had ordered that nothing but fresh beef liver should be used for food, and this is one instance where no attempt was ever made to cut down the cost. Fresh beef liver, at 15 to 20 cents per pound, increased the cost to about $240 per month. The practical men said, "We believe we can feed them for less than that," and they used stripped fish and dried milk refuse, and reduced the cost of rearing sockeye to one-third the former cost. The cost of collecting was also reduced very considerably. The experience at Smiths Falls last winter, where one man operated five ponds with food costing only a quarter as much as the food used by the biological board, has completely upset the figures of the board in this phase of the work. So if there is any merit in sockeye rearing at a third of the cost incurred by the board, there is no justification in closing the hatcheries. The evidence which I have produced is based on definite knowledge and proves conclusively that hatcheries have been most effective in maintaining our fisheries. I do not suggest that we should discard the services of the scientists, but I do suggest that some scientists be brought under the department to cooperate with the practical men. That is what we want, instead of having it left entirely to a board of scientists.

The successful method of restoring these streams which have been depleted, particularly in the Fraser area, in my opinion is a combination of artificial and natural reproduction. I think that is admitted by every man who has studied this question. That was done in years gone by when the run kept up. We cannot afford, if we are going to continue to replenish these streams, to dispose of the hatcheries as has been suggested. The two-way method is the only method by which they can be restored. In studying the fish industry I have often wondered what would happen if the same methods were applied to the poultry industry in our province. Hon. members from British Columbia know that the poultry industry has made great advances during the last ten years. We have very large plants in our province, incubators producing thousands and thousands of chicks. Suppose the Minister of Agriculture through his deputy sent out a board of scientists and they said: Now, these birds are costing too much money, they are not just what they should be; we recommend that the hens be turned loose, that they be allowed to go and lay in the grass and brush roundabout, and if you want to keep track of them just cut a wing or a leg off. That is about what they are doing with the fish. If one-tenth of the practical knowledge that has been devoted to poultry were applied to the fish industry we would not be in the sad condition we are to-day.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. BARBER: Let me say to the hon. member who groaned, across the way, and to the Prime Minister, that this is a most serious matter. I am dealing with one of the most valuable industries we have in Canada. Other countries are going ahead, Japan by leaps and bounds, and Russia; the states of Washington and Oregon in spite of handicaps, are coming back, and this is the only country in the world that has suggested doing away with the hatcheries. In fact other countries are encouraging them. As I have shown, there is not a state in the union to-day but is encouraging hatcheries. They are not merely holding post mortems as this board did; they are trying to devise improved methods in fish culture. But apparently this board did not.

It is very interesting to refer to the conclusions at which this board of scientists arrived. I have in my hand the report of the biological board. In addition to that, attached to it is one from the director, Mr. Clemens. He says:

I feel that there is an opportunity for the department in this way to put the salmon production of the British Columbia coast on a sound basis.

That refers to clause 5, which reads:

Looking at the problem on a broad basis, it would seem that the quickest and most effective method of keeping up the spawning stock is to limit the catch.

That comes from a scientist!

As I have pointed out in my annual reports to the commissioner of fisheries of British Columbia, if on the Fraser river in a given year, instead of the industry putting up 120,000 cases it put up only 100,000 cases, this would mean approximately 480,000,000 additional eggs on the spawning beds. This reduction in pack would in a sense cost the industry $240,000. On the other hand, to gain this advantage, the hatcheries, even allowing a four per cent efficiency as compared with a natural efficiency of two per cent, would have to handle 240,000,000 eggs. This would require the erection of at least five additional hatcheries, each having a capacity equal to that at Pemberton, and the operating costs would be approximately $200,000. All this would be at the expense of the country as a whole.

Then he concludes:

I feel that there is an opportunity for the department in this way to put the salmon production of the British Columbia coast on a sound basis. Until the catches are brought under control and limited to the productive capacity of the river system, I see little hope of maintaining the sockeye salmon fishery.

This comes from a scientist employed by the department to carry on an investigation. The control of catch has been carried on by men in the department. It does not require a scientist to advise limiting the catch, but that is all this scientist had to offer us after eleven years of investigation.

In conclusion I urge upon the government, in view of the acceptance by the United States of the sockeye treaty, that further investigation be made before such drastic action is taken, because I think it will be found, under one of the clauses, which I have not at hand at the moment, that the United States will contribute fifty-fifty in regard to the propagation of salmon. I understand that the hitch is that they have amended it to provide that there should be eight years' investigation. I do not blame them for asking for further investigation, because I would not like to see any board set up and proceed to carry out recommendations upon which this order in council is based. I would suggest to the Prime Minister—and this is not criticism of the government; for the government are not responsible, for this condition, but they are responsible for passing the order in council—I would suggest an inquiry in the meantime, something in the way of a judicial commission that could go into the findings of the biological board and call in practical men. I suggest to the government a more thorough investigation before the government act on this order in council.

To take action on the order in council at this time when the treaty is about to be accepted, and wipe out all hatcheries in British Columbia, would be a very serious thing. I feel that the matter should receive further consideration. As I have said, the order in council is based entirely on the figures of the biological board, which are not on a sound basis. It does not make any difference what was done with the eggs; the biological board say: "We are interested only in the results, and we arrive at those results by simple arithmetic—so many eggs planted, so many migrants pass out; therefore it does not pay to raise these fish." That is the only criticism that is offered; it is the whole basis of the conclusion. In this report no suggestion is offered as to how the cost can be cut down. The entire investigation, extending over eleven years, has simply been a post mortem.

I want to tell the Prime Minister that one reason why I cannot give further information is that any time I talked to a man employed in the department he would say: "For heaven's sake don't quote me, or my head will come off." That is an unfortunate condition. If the Prime Minister would appoint someone who could call these men in and go into it with them, I think it would be in the interests of this great industry, which we are told to-day can be built up from $3,000,000 to $25,000,000 a year. I am convinced the proposal is well worthy of consideration before the order in council is put into effect.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): I understand that the grievance which my hon. friend has laid before the house is based on the action of the government and the departmental officials in closing some of the salmon hatcheries in British Columbia.

Mr. BARBER: Not some, all of them.

Mr. MICHAUD: This action was determined by a report of the biological board made to the government, as my hon. friend has said, after five years of experimentation.

Mr. BARBER: Eleven years.

Mr. MICHAUD: Eleven years of experimentation. The hon. gentleman quoted extensively this morning, I understand, from an interim report of a commission which investigated the British Columbia fisheries in 1922. In the final report of that commission suggestions were made as to whether or not the artificial propagation of sockeye salmon in British Columbia was worth while, and whether or not the expenditures in connection therewith were warranted.

Mr. BARBER: I did not quote from that; I quoted from a memorandum in reply prepared by the department.

Mr. MICHAUD: I understand. I am quoting from the original report of the commissioners who in 1922 suggested to the government and to the Department of Fisheries a careful investigation of this matter. One paragraph is as follows:

> We do feel most strongly however in the light of all the evidence here and documents consulted that the department should move slowly until we have more definite and satisfactory proof that the industry and country is receiving some return for the annual expenditure of more than $130,000 in British Columbia alone.

And quoting again:

> Consequently we urge that before the service is extended some definite experimental tests should be carried on over a series of years. We make the condition however that the operations be carried on and observations made directly under competent scientific supervision, not under fisheries officials or fisheries officials alone, who have no scientific knowledge.

I understand there was some divergence of opinion among practical men in British Columbia, the officials of the department, and others interested in fisheries of the province of British Columbia. As a result of the difference of opinion it appears that in 1925 the government asked the biological board, which is composed of scientists, biologists, chemists and men of repute from the universities who are not directly officers or officials of the Department of Fisheries or the government, but are an independent body constituted by act of parliament, to conduct the investigation recommended in the report of 1922. It would appear that since 1925 the investigation has been proceeding, and this year a report has been made in which the conclusion is reached that, as in their opinion the artificial hatching of salmon in British Columbia did not justify the cost involved, such hatcheries should be closed. As a result of the recommendation the hatcheries were closed. It would appear that considerable saving to the treasury will be effected by this action.

I may add that not only is there a divergence of opinion among those interested in fisheries as to the advisability of expending these amounts of money yearly on hatcheries, but from the fishermen themselves there comes the urgent appeal the hatcheries be closed because they injuriously affect the fishermen's interests. These facts would seem to indicate that there has always been a difference of opinion between the different parts of the industry in British Columbia. In view of the report of the biological board we felt there was no alternative but to accept the report and act on the suggestion.

Apparently there have always been differences of opinion as to whether natural or artificial propagation is the more satisfactory. There can be no doubt that both are efficient, but those who claim to know and who have taken eleven years to study the problem have reported to us that in view of the sufficiency of natural production in these waters we are not justified in spending the moneys we have hitherto spent on those hatcheries. That is the reason why they have been closed. I know that practical men are objecting to this course; some who are personally interested in keeping them open are objecting. This is only natural and to be expected, but as I said a moment ago we have no alternative other than that of accepting the conclusions of the biological board; otherwise there would be no justification for their existence. They are the people to whom after all we must resort for opinions and suggestions in scientific and technical matters.

My hon. friend has suggested that the change might have some influence on the artificial propagation of the steelhead, which, I understand, is considered to be a sport rather than a commercial fish.

Mr. BARBER: I used that only as an illustration.

Mr. MICHAUD: Representations have been made that it might hurt that industry. The steelhead is considered more a sport than a commercial fish, and the province must look after that angle of the matter. However, we have undertaken to hold a conference this summer with officials of the province of British Columbia. We will attempt to come to a definite conclusion respecting jurisdiction or authority, a decison as to what department will undertake to look after the propagation and supervision of sport fishing in British Columbia, and if as a result of the conference the federal department is entrusted with this duty we will do our best to help develop the industry in British Columbia.

Mr. BARBER: The minister intimated that all the hatcheries would not be closed. Of the ten named, how many would continue operating

Mr. MICHAUD: I understand a few will not be closed, and when the estimates are under discussion and I have my books before me I will answer the question.

Mr. BARBER: I understand only ten hatcheries are operating now.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is my understanding.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the question as to whether or not hatcheries are efficient is a subject on which there is as much divergence of opinion as on the question whether a high or a low tariff is good. With the greatest of sincerity men could argue for weeks on both sides of the case. I am sorry the debate has arisen at this date and in this manner. It should not have come up in this way at all. As the minister has said, there is in connection with this matter a divergence of earnestly held points of view, and I submit it should have been placed before the marine and fisheries committee. That committee was not called together this year, but I say it should have been called for a discussion of this and many other important subjects. I note that the order in council to which the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) has referred, as a result of which the hatcheries were closed, was passed on March 2, at which time the house had been sitting almost a month. It would not have been inappropriate to submit a matter of that importance either to the fisheries committee, composed of men from all parts of Canada, or to the members from British Columbia, regardless of political affiliation, who would have local information and would be in a position to give good advice. That policy was not adopted, and the result is that this question is flung into the debate here at the last hour of the session, when we are going into supply on a motion which does not allow debate across the floor of the house. I submit that the reason it was not brought up was that the fisheries department is run not as a department but as a close corporation: officialdom said it was not going to be discussed, and it was not discussed; only the unbreakable rules of the house enabled it to be brought up here. It is another instance of the pressing need for the thorough reorganization of this department. In saying this I cannot be held to be attacking the minister, who has only recently taken over two generations of inertia and is trying to do something. The argument might have been used—I was surprised the minister did not use it in answer to the hon. member for Fraser Valley—and used with some degree of accuracy, that the conditions the hon. member referred to applied to some years ago, that times have changed and we have to change our opinions and actions with them.

Mr. BARBER: It still stands to-day.

Mr. NEILL: He did bring it up to date to support his argument against the closing of the hatcheries. Mention was made of the fisheries commission in 1922. I happened to be a member of that commission. There were six members of parliament on it, and, as an illustration of the changes time brings, I may say that of the six one has gone to the senate, two have fallen by political misfortune, two have gone to the bench, and I am the only one left of that commission; I alone am left to tell such a tale as my feeble intelligence and increasing years may permit.

Mr. REID: No telling where you are going.

Mr. NEILL: The minister quoted in part the recommendation we made. He did not give it all but he quoted what he wished, and it was correct. He recited the representations that had been put before us by a number of men supposedly well qualified to judge—cannery men, deeply interested in canning, managers of fishery plants, and so on. We put these more or less divergent views on record, and then made the recommendation that the minister has alluded to:

> Before the service is extended some definite experimental tests should be carried on for a series of years.

The only trouble is that that was not adhered to and hatcheries were increased in very considerable numbers, but the tests were begun. I note we also recommended that—

> More attention be paid to improving the spawning places by ridding them of enemies of the salmon, and clearing streams for the passage of the fish, and by taking such other measures as may be deemed prudent in the premises.

That is what I was arguing the last time the estimates came up, but it is so long ago one has almost forgotten when it was.

We made this report, and it did not fit the views of officialdom. At that time they were wedded to the idea of hatcheries, and, being at that time politically young and, perhaps, more innocent than I am now, I accepted their statements; they brought forward such convincing argument and proof that it was a heaven-sent blessing I really took it at its face value. They did not like this modified report we presented recommending that we should have an investigation, so they got out the memorandum that the hon.

member for Fraser Valley was quoting from, which made a bitter attack on almost everybody who differed from them. They attacked if not the integrity at least the intelligence of everybody who ventured to differ from them, right down the line.

Where the argument comes in now is with reference to what the hon. member for Fraser Valley says. This was what they were so convinced of, the last word of experience at that time; why the complete turnover? Of course the minister can say it is only a fool who never changes his mind, but let us observe the conditions under which it was changed. We recommended that an investigation should be made by practical men accompanied by scientists. In the course of a year or two—because it takes a long time to get a department to move—they got the thing going. In 1925 they started this investigation, and they picked, out of all the world, Cultus lake, presumably because the geographical formation made it convenient to put in the necessary weirs and traps. The word Cultus is a Chinook or Siwash word meaning "worthless," and I am told it was so named in the early days because it was useless for any class of fishing. The biological board said that in this lake there are large numbers of squaw fish and Dolly Varden char, and they also refer to suckers, Williamson's whitefish, and chub. Apparently the lake is swarming with these predatory fishes, which feed almost entirely on the young salmon, and it was a godsend to them when we started rearing young salmon for their daily meal. Consequently they could hardly expect that the results would be distinctly favourable. Now they come along and decide to shut down on all the hatcheries. And on what data? Here it is. The minister quoted in part the report. It is a voluminous report, but this is a summary of it:

On the whole—

After eleven years' experiments.

—it may reasonably be concluded that in an area such as Cultus lake, where a natural run of sockeye occurs with a reasonable expectancy of successful spawning, artificial propagation, for purposes of continuing the run to that area, is unnecessary and, if producing any additional results over natural spawning, these would not appear to be in any way commensurate with the cost.

That is fairly vague, after eleven years' experimenting. Then they add a rider, in case that was not vague enough:

This conclusion may not apply to areas where there is no reasonable expectation of successful natural propagation.

So that it leaves the door open to say: Go to the place where there is no good natural propagation and it will be a success. But if it is a success in the one place it should be a success in the other place. After eleven years' experimentation that is as far as they can go towards making a definite conclusion. It is known to the department that this investigation has been going on since the year 1925. It was intended to run for ten years, and they finished with the work and made that report last fall. One would suppose, would one not, if one were dealing with a body that was a business organization in any way at all, that they would suspend action on this policy until they saw the results of this investigation; in other words, that they would not build any more hatcheries, at any rate so close to the period when the report would be expected. But I found last fall that the hatcheries in my district were being frozen out, men were being taken away from them just at the very time they were needed, their efficiency impaired and reduced. Why? Because the money voted was exhausted. I naturally asked why, and the answer I got is this, among other reasons, that there was the construction of a new hatchery in Nova Scotia. This is not an attack on the minister, because my friend the right hon. leader of the opposition was in charge at that time. Indeed, the leader of the opposition had no more to do with it than the present minister, being equally ignorant, I have no doubt. I do not say that offensively: no doubt the department knew about it. The department knew these investigations were narrowing to a focus, a conclusion that was more than likely to be inimical to their policy, and yet they go and build a new hatchery in Nova Scotia. There was an election coming on. I do not know whether that had anything to do with it. At any rate the department should have put its foot down and said, "No. Pending a decision on this point we won't build a new hatchery anywhere." But there is the sort of haphazard policy—no, it is not a policy, a hand to mouth method by which they go along.

Now, in the last few years hatcheries have cost us not a little. I got a return limited to the last fifteen years, and the total cost of hatcheries in Canada was $4,728,000—practically four and three-quarter million dollars. That is a good deal to spend on hatcheries. We are now going to throw them into the discard and we are not clear whether we should or should not do this. We are saying that it might be as well to do this, or perhaps there may be some other place where the same system would be successful. I should like to quote from a resolution passed by a large number of fishermen living in a place called Sointula in my district. Lest I should be accused of political partisanship, I might say that I got nineteen votes out of the 212 cast in that place. It may be that these men have a sounder judgment about fishery matters than they have about political matters, at least I hope so. They write me and say:

According to press reports the Department of Fisheries is planning to close up the salmon hatcheries on the Pacific coast.

At a meeting of the Sointula branch of the Fishermen and Cannery Workers' Industrial Union on the second of April, 1936, the membership unanimously decided to protest against such action on following grounds:

Although the Rivers inlet area has been subjected to most intensified fishing for a good many years, the sockeye run has shown practically no decline due to the fact, we believe, that the hatchery operated there has effectively counteracted the havoc wrought by fishing gears.

We strongly maintain that the experiments on Cultus lake alone do not justify the closing of all hatcheries, as natural conditions vary in different localities.

According to reports the hatcheries on the Columbia river have been a tremendous success, also in other areas in United States the artificial propagation has shown splendid returns. Why not in Canada?

Furthermore, due to the conditions in other industries there has been a great increase in the number of people depending for a living from fishing in recent years. Consequently, fishing is more and more intensified. Therefore, if the hatcheries, as the only known means of replenishing the stock of salmon, were to be closed, a complete depletion of salmon would result in few years.

I put this up to the department and I received some data combating these views, as far as that particular area was concerned. When I communicated this data to these men, they wrote back that they did not agree with the statements made, and that it was a mistake to close the hatcheries. They said:

We agree with you that illegal fishing should be stopped. We also agree with you that the natural means of propagation should be protected.

However, the fact still stands that Rivers inlet, about the most exploited fishing area on the British Columbia coast still shows good runs and we believe the hatchery in great part to be responsible for that.

We still believe that the experiments on Cultus lake alone do not justify the closing of all hatcheries.

As the representative of these men, even though an unwelcome one, I feel that I should put their views before the house. If I was asked to state my views, I am afraid I would have to say that I do not know. I would not care to say that the hatcheries in my district, with which I am familiar, have been a success, but it may be due to the fact that the wrong methods were adopted or the fundamental principles followed were wrong. At the same time, I would hesitate to say that after we had spent four million dollars on hatcheries we should give them up because of the results on Cultus lake alone.

As the hon. member for Fraser Valley pointed out, and as I know also, for many years the department maintained with enormous vigour and warmth the howling success of these hatcheries. As the hon. member for Fraser Valley has stated, he has met officials who told him that they must not be quoted or their heads would be taken off, and I agree entirely with that statement. The closed corporation does not permit the fisheries officials to have souls of their own or to dare to be quoted. If the deputy minister wants further information along this line, I shall be glad to furnish it when we are on the estimates. We have the peculiar picture of every official being in favour of hatcheries and saying that anyone who was not was either a crook or lacking in intelligence, and then there is a quick turnabout, and the hatcheries have to be closed up holus-bolus. And the same deputy minister has been in charge all through.

I have just one more quotation I should like to make. A fisheries paper published in British Columbia makes the statement that the Cultus lake hatchery may operate this year. It states that while the sockeye hatcheries are being closed up and the employees dismissed, there is still some hope that the hatchery at Cultus lake will be kept open for a few months, possibly to the end of the year. They state that the number of steelheads caught in the last two years has been greater than for many years. They state that these results are definitely an aspect of the operation of the local hatchery. This might be because of climatic conditions or something of that kind, but I do think that when the hatcheries are being closed so abruptly, the action should have been based on something other than just the Cultus lake experiment. A policy to be in effect all over the country should not depend upon the results obtained in one particular spot. The biological report from which I quoted states that these results may be due to the enormous number of predatory fish, and they propose to attempt to do away with them and see what results ensue. I cannot and will not say that the hatchery system has been a success in my district. However, I contend that this is a matter that should have been discussed around the table in the fisheries committee where every hon. member would have had a chance to get the required information from competent witnessses who could be called.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—STATUS OF FORMER WESTERN UNION EMPLOYEES AT NORTH SYDNEY

Mr. D. A. CAMERON (Cape Breton North-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I propose to take up only a very few minutes to discuss a matter to which I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Howe). This matter concerns a number of men who were in the employ of the Western Union Telegraph Company which was taken over in 1928 by the Canadian National Telegraph Company. Since last November I have been endeavouring to have the claims of these men dealt with by the proper authorities. I first appealed to the Minister of Railways and Canals and I was informed that this matter did not come within his jurisdiction. I then appealed to the chairman of the board of trustees and I was informed that it did not come within his jurisdiction. I then appealed to Mr. Hungerford, the president of the Canadian National Railways, and I received a like response. I then transferred my activities to Mr. Galloway, the president of the Canadian National Telegraph Company, and I was informed by him that the incident was closed.

I should like to direct the attention of the minister to the facts as they appear to me. I respectfully make the submission, first, that the incident is not closed and should not be so regarded, and, second, that the men have what I consider to be a real grievance in connection with the manner in which their claims were disposed of. There was a group of about ten or fifteen men who were in the employ of the Western Union in what was known as the cable office at North Sydney, and in addition to cable work they did what is known in the telegraphic world as land line work. They were brought up and trained to cable work, which demanded a very special degree of efficiency, and they had made for themselves a splendid reputation as good operators at North Sydney. This was the situation in 1928, when the negotiations began between the Canadian National Telegraph Company and the Western Union for the taking over of that utility, and these operations continued until some time in 1929, when the arrangements were completed. I stated a moment ago that the men in the employ of the cable office were highly trained and efficient, and they were commanding as a result salaries a little higher than the ordinary ratings which were in effect in other portions of the Western Union service. A conference was held between the representatives of the men and the management of the Western Union Telegraph Company in New York, and one of the conditions of the agreement to transfer from the Western Union to the Canadian National Telegraph Company was that the ratings of the men in the Western Union should be continued unimpaired while they remained in the employ of the Canadian National Telegraph Company.

A few days ago we discussed in this house the reorganization of certain departments of government and I was glad to notice that members on both sides of the house were solicitous that employees who had given a good part of their lives to the work of various departments should not suffer financially by reason of the fact that consolidations were about to take place. I applaud that sentiment; I think it is the proper method of dealing with men who have become trained experts in any line of activity, if it can be properly carried out. All that these men are asking for, all that I am asking for on their behalf, is that the same measure of justice and fair play which we bespoke for the men in the employ of the government in these departments should be meted out to men who gave from ten to fifteen years—and one man gave as much as forty years—of service in the Western Union Company.

The agreement entered into with these men was carried on, so far as the Canadian National Company was concerned, by Mr. Robb, the vice president. Mr. Robb gave his undertaking to Mr. Carlton, the manager of the Western Union Company in New York, whose letter is on file in connection with the proceedings under the act respecting conciliation, in which he stated that, acting for the Western Union Company, he would not have agreed to the transfer of that corporation to the Canadian National Telegraph Company if he had not been assured that the men who were in the employ of the Western Union Company and had given faithful service for so many years would not suffer in any degree in consequence of the transfer.

I wish to read from the judgment of His Honour Judge Murray, who was one of the members of the conciliation board. Let us see what he has to say in that connection:

> I have not the slightest doubt of the merits of the contentions of the North Sydney men regarding the arrangements made by them with Mr. W. D. Robb, vice-president of the Canadian National in charge of telegraphs, and with the officers of the Western Union previous to their joining the Canadian National Telegraphs. The year 1929 was a prosperous one, and, in my opinion possibly an improvident yet sympathetic bargain was made by Mr. Robb, with the approval of Sir Henry Thornton, with these men and the Western Union. It is also doubtful if the Western Union would have entered this agreement if this collateral contract had not been consummated by the Canadian National Telegraphs for protecting the North Sydney group on their Western Union ratings. (Mr. Robb stated in evidence that the Western Union refused to sell the lines unless this undertaking, respecting basic salary ratings, was agreed to by the Canadian National).

I call attention to the fact that this is the evidence of Mr. Robb. Evidence was taken in 1933 and this report of the conciliation board was released in 1934.

I have noted the exhibit of the North Sydney group marked "A,"—

That is the letter from Mr. Carlton to which I have referred.

—which, in my opinion, showed an absolutely strong case that the Canadian National Telegraphs should be bound by the agreement made with the Canadian National Railway officials that the North Sydney group should be taken over by the Canadian National Telegraphs at the ratings they were receiving in North Sydney. With all due respect to any opinion to the contrary, I feel that this agreement was a collateral one and need not be embodied in the main agreement of sale. I think that the fact that the officials of the Canadian National Telegraphs not only paid the North Sydney group the increased ratings for a period of three years or more after the agreement, but recognized these ratings in correspondence, without protest, should be sufficiently convincing to find that no person or corporation could repudiate it.

The findings of the board were not unanimous, but the report was signed by Judge Murray and the representative of the men. Judge Murray was the chairman. Mr. McInnis represented the Canadian National and Mr. Lunn represented the men. A majority of the board, consisting of the chairman and Mr. Lunn, representing the Commercial Telegraphers' Union of North America, found in effect—I am not going to read the finding—that the men had made out the case they were contending for, that they were entitled to their ratings and that these ratings should be continued. Some person has handed me a note saying he is very anxious to get home. So am I, but I want to say that these men have been struggling for a number of years to establish the justice and equity of their claim. They proceeded in the regular way, recognized by the government and the parliament of this country; they went before a conciliation board and established their claim, and all I am asking on their behalf and all they are asking is that this claim be recognized by the proper authorities.

Let me quote a few salaries in order to show this house how these men have been treated. D. Merritt had served the company for twelve years; he was rated as a clerk, but he was an operator. He was receiving $130 a month and in 1933 his salary was arbitrarily reduced to $90 per month. In addition the ten per cent cut, which was applied all around, was applied to this man also, leaving him to bring up a family of six or seven children on a salary of $80 a month. J. Rogers was receiving $175 per month; he was reduced to $125. Y. F. Tutty, whom I know very well, who was born and brought up in North Sydney and who, I imagine, must have served for thirty or forty years, had his salary reduced by $50. Some of these men were removed from North Sydney and located in other offices. They had been enabled to build their homes under a loan agreement with the Western Union, and they had properties at North Sydney. Owing to the depressed state of the real estate market those properties to-day are of very little use to them, but these operators were compelled to leave their homes and their families to work in another place with their salaries reduced anywhere from $20 to $50 a month.

That is a situation, Mr. Speaker, which is not going to be settled by the mere statement of Mr. Galloway, the head of the Canadian National Telegraphs, that the matter is closed. The matter is not closed as long as the findings of a competent court, which said these men made out the case they sought to make out, are ignored, and as long as the other party to the agreement of submission has not lived up to those findings. I am asking the minister to do these men the justice of having their case, I will not say reviewed, but studied and the facts as they were brought out before this court looked into, so that between his department and the Department of Labour the appropriate remedy may be applied. I know one of the suggestions urged is that if you pay these ratings to the men in North Sydney you will be in conflict with the union now in control of the Canadian National Telegraphs. I am not concerned about that conflict. I am concerned, however, that the pledged word of this country, given through the management of the Canadian National Railways, should be honoured and redeemed by those now in positions of authority and responsibility, who are able to give effect to the findings of the board. I ask the minister to give this matter his most careful and sympathetic attention.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): I may say that this is entirely a matter for the internal management of the railways, but I shall be glad to call it to the attention of the president.

REGINA RIOTS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is a matter I had intended to take up on the estimates of the Department of Justice, but since it does not relate immediately to the work of the present government I think perhaps I had better introduce it at this time. Earlier in the session, owing to a commission having been appointed to consider the matter of the Regina riots and also owing to several court cases arising therefrom which were pending, we were prohibited from discussing the matter. Some of the men who were in those riots have been convicted.

The question arises as to who was responsible. An attempt has been made to place the blame on communist agitators, but I should like to point out, as was so eloquently pointed out by Liberal speakers a few days ago, that communism makes an appeal only when conditions become desperate, and without going into the question of the camps I would remind the house that even the Macdonald commission found in connection with the British Columbia camps a good many things which were far from satisfactory.

It seems to me that the root of the trouble was in the unsatisfactory methods of dealing with single unemployed men. I take it that the abandonment of the camps is a recognition of the fact that those methods were unsatisfactory. The immediate difficulty in connection with the riots appears to be due to the bungling and incompetence of police officials who apparently had the backing of the late government. In a recent editorial the Winnipeg Free Press remarked:

> The record remains a lesson as to how not to deal with the problem of law enforcement.

The former government has been removed from office. The high officials of the police, however, still hold their positions, and a certain number of men are in gaol. Let me review, as briefly as I can, some of the outstanding facts about the situation. On May 19 the mayor of Vancouver, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), warned the government of the seriousness of the situation. He said that the situation was extremely critical; he suggested a certain plan and warned the government that unless it was accepted serious trouble was certain to occur. I think the position of the government can be very well understood from these sentences contained in the reply of the then Prime Minister on May 20:

> Should they collect in a municipality it is obviously the duty of that municipality to seek any assistance required from their provincial authorities. . . . I note your anxiety as regards possible disturbances in Vancouver. . . . Any requests for assistance must in the first instance be made through the province.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard replied on May 21:

> Communist organizers and agitators taking advantage of justifiable dissatisfaction on part of citizens in every strata of society and particularly objectionable features of relief camp system. . . . We cannot hold situation any further without resorting to force. Am confident that if federal government could cooperate with provincial and municipal governments situation could be remedied and riots with their inevitable consequences would be avoided.

At that time there seems to have been ample force to stop the trek at Vancouver. The former Prime Minister declared in the house that there was no force to stop them. On the other hand the commission report says in clause 14:

> Had the dominion government wanted to stop it at that point there was a combined police force in Vancouver at the time and ample for that purpose; in fact a larger force than was available at Regina when the movement was actually stopped there.

It was when the men reached Regina that there was a complete reversal of policy. Before that time they had been allowed to proceed. The railways had actually assisted them, sometimes holding the trains and stopping them at convenient places. But when they got to Regina it was decided that they were to be prevented from proceeding east. Premier Gardiner objected to this. On June 12 he telegraphed:

> Am informed Ottawa has issued orders without consulting provincial government that Ottawa marchers from British Columbia and Alberta are to be prevented from passing out of this province by the means they were permitted to enter. We object to police force which acts in matters of law enforcement under instructions of this government being used for any such purpose and will so instruct them. C.P.R. delivered these men in Saskatchewan en route to Ottawa and we expect them to carry them through.

The commission states that the government had decided to stop the trek at Regina and to do so regardless of the attitude of the provincial government thereto.

Now, there we have the situation. The men had trouble in British Columbia; they were assisted by the railroads to go east. The government at that time claimed that it had no right to interfere, so the men came east to Regina. There they were stopped. The then Prime Minister claimed that he had authority under some special provision as to duty of the police to enforce dominion statutes, including the Railway Act. A very short time after that, however, the commissioner seems to have assumed very arbitrary powers. On June 24, the commissioner of police advised the assistant commissioner by telephone that no movement of the strikers eastward was to be permitted by railway, motor cars, buses or trucks, and subsequently confirmed these instructions by telegram as follows:

No movement of the strikers eastward is to be permitted by railway, motor cars, buses or trucks. Truck and bus companies should be asked to cooperate with the government. If the situation develops seriously on Wednesday permanent forces will be called out to support the police and state of national emergency will be declared by the government.

On June 27 the commissioner gave further instructions. Still later, on that date, he further advised the assistant commissioner:

Confirming my telephone conversation with you government is taking action under the relief measures act declaring national emergency so as to maintain peace, order and good government. This will protect you against such actions and seizures which you consider it necessary to take with regard to present situation affecting camp strikers in Regina. Those whom you find it necessary to arrest should be confined under escort where most convenient and prosecuted in the usual manner.

Surely that is an outstanding example of a blank cheque! That was sent from Ottawa, giving the assistant commissioner carte blanche, going even so far as to state that those were to be arrested whom it was found necessary to arrest. Let me point out that the relief measures act, referred to in this last telegram, is chapter 13 of the statutes of Canada of 1935. Section 3 of that act provides:

In addition to the powers conferred under the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may, when parliament is not in session—

Let me call particular attention to that phrase, "when parliament is not in session."

—take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament,, peace order and good government throughout Canada.

Let me point out that Mr. Guthrie stated that no order in council of any kind had been passed in connection with the Regina situation. That is an extraordinary situation; action was taken against those men under the authority of the relief measures act; yet that act requires an order in council, and action could be taken under it only when parliament was not in session. There was no such order in council, and parliament was in session. In regard to this matter of the order in council the commission say:

This statement was of course contrary to the information given by Commissioner MacBrien to the assistant commissioner in his telegram on the evening of June 27.

That is a severe indictment of the commissioner of police. He was taking these extreme measures, said he had authority to take them, when he had no authority.

The commission states that the government was justified in stopping the trek. In clause 16 of the report I find the following:

That the dominion government was justified in the conclusion they had reached in adopting all lawful means to terminate the movement is amply borne out by the evidence.

Now, that is an extraordinary statement, especially to come from a body composed of legal gentlemen. "Lawful means," they say; yet the commission themselves acknowledge that the means taken were not lawful or at least not in conformity with the commissioner's statement. There had been no order in council, and further than that, parliament was still sitting. The commissioners go on to express an opinion in this same clause 16:

Being absolutely without means of subsistence on the way to Ottawa they would have been a menace to the peace, order and good government of every town or city in which they stopped unless and until their needs were supplied; on arriving at Ottawa, unless their demands had been fully met, one can readily surmise the danger involved. It probably would have been necessary to call out the militia in order to preserve the peace and a worse riot would likely have occurred than that which actually took place at Regina.

That was by no means a legal decision. It would require a great deal of foresight to tell what might take place during the course of a trek from Regina to Ottawa. Talk about "precautionary arrests!" I submit that that is an altogether new type of thing in Canada. These men are to be arrested lest they might do something which would get them into trouble with the law. Prior to that time these men had not broken the law. But they were prevented from proceeding on their way to Ottawa lest perchance they should get into trouble. Surely, that is an infringement of the liberty of the subject. The arrests were justified by the commission on that ground. I would suggest that it would not be a long step to what has been called "protective arrest" in which an innocent man might be arrested lest someone should injure him. After this remarkable opinion, which in no sense can be called a legal opinion, the commissioners naively proceed:

Whether or not and if so to what extent the dominion government exceeded its power in stopping the trek and in taking control of the police to enforce its will is not for us to decide, and it follows it is not for us to pass judgment upon the validity of the protest made by the provincial government in either of the matters complained of.

The commissioners felt perfectly free to pass judgment on the victims of official blundering. On the other hand they said it was not their task to see whether or not the officials were within their powers in taking that course. There also came at that stage an announcement in the press that no one was to give any assistance. Assistant Commissioner Wood afterwards limited the application of this to assistance in setting up a camp. Let me say that the attorney general still claimed that highway traffic was not illegal, if authorized by the highway traffic board.

Here let me pause for a moment to point out the situation in which these men were placed. They had been brought east to Regina. The government had refused to take action; the railways had assisted. Suddenly the men were stopped. They were being given no further help by way of food, and so on. That was to be denied them. They were refused the right to travel eastward either by way of rail or by bus or truck. They were completely bottled up. When matters reached that stage the commissioner ordered the arrests. I quote from the report:

On the morning of the 28th Colonel Wood was advised by the commissioner by telephone that the government desired the arrest of the leaders as soon as possible. During the conversation—

Mark this:

—Colonel Wood stated that so far as he knew the leaders had done nothing in the province to warrant their arrest.

It was, however, decided by the commissioner to arrest under section 98 of the criminal code the well known leaders Evans, Black, O'Neil, Shaw and "others you think necessary."

That is, there was an open warrant to arrest the leaders "and any others you think necessary." Here special agent Leopold was called in. This man is a spy, maintained by the Department of Justice and I believe under the control of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It was he who testified very largely at the time of the trial of the communists in Ontario. He was supposed to be an expert in such matters. I met the individual once, I believe, when, some years ago, I was addressing the Trades and Labour Council in Regina. At that time he was an official of the council. I recalled afterwards that he wanted me to come to his home after the meeting to discuss certain affairs. I happened to be too busy at the time, or I would have gone. Had I gone I suppose I might have been gathered into his toils.

In passing I want to protest against the maintenance of people of this kind who worm their way into labour organizations and often act as agents provocateur. After the calling in of Leopold, on Sunday morning, June 30, the commissioner called Colonel Wood by telephone and asked him if he had yet effected the arrest of the leaders.

Colonel Wood again advised him that so far as the conduct of the men in this province was concerned, there was no evidence to warrant their arrest.

The commission has this to say in its report, section 13:

We are of the opinion that had Assistant Commissioner Wood been asked to conduct these negotiations and been given some discretion in the matter a satisfactory arrangement for the disbandment of the men might have been reached, and further trouble avoided.

That is, it was the long distance administration of justice which was the cause of the difficulty. Had Colonel Wood been given authority he could have managed to straighten out matters. That course was not taken.

The warrants were issued at 6 p.m. on the evening of the trouble. Let me point out that prior to this time in my opinion the dominion government had bungled, and the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had bungled. Now came the bungling of Assistant Commissioner Colonel Wood. He immediately proceeded to make elaborate plans for the arrest. One witness testified that he thought blue prints had been drawn up. It was decided to effect the arrest at Unity Centre, the headquarters of the strikers in Regina, or in the market square shortly after the opening of the public meeting.

Evidence given in the trials showed that no attempt was made to arrest the men at Unity Centre. This elaborate plan of action provided that plainclothesmen were to be employed and——as a precautionary measure and to prevent any attempt at rescue and to protect those to whom had been assigned the duty of effecting the arrests three squads of police on foot were to be stationed in the vicinity of the square at the north, east and west sides respectively, and these were to move on the square should necessity arise for action on their part.

Inspector McDougall of the city police swore at the trial that the plan was to rush the meeting——regardless of whether the plainsclothesmen needed assistance or not.

They were to rush the meeting on signal from a whistle. Let me here emphasize an extremely important point. Ostensibly the purpose was to arrest the men, but apparently no effort was made to arrest them prior to the meeting. They might have been arrested for days past, but they were not so arrested. It was just at that last minute, when the public meeting of the citizens had been called to make protest, and in an effort to collect money from the citizens that the arrests were to be effected. Most of the trekkers were not present at the meeting when the arrests were made. There was no attempt by Evans to escape. That statement was made at the trial. Further than that, no attempt was made to rescue Evans.

But with an excitable crowd, and under such circumstances, the inevitable happened and a riot was precipitated. Let me point out that at this very time negotiations were in progress between the provincial government and the men.

A meeting of the members of the government available was held at eight o'clock on the same evening and while the proposals were being considered Mr. Gardiner was notified by telephone that a riot was going on at market square.

It is quite unnecessary, and I believe would serve no useful purpose, if I were to give details with regard to what took place. Anyone who has seen how readily the passions of a crowd are aroused could have foretold there would be trouble. The evidence as to details was very conflicting. For example, the commission states that it is impossible to reconcile the evidence of Inspector Cooper with that of Inspector McDougall. Apparently the equipment of the city police was complete. They had revolvers and ammunition. The mounted police were not supposed to have ammunition, but they had a quantity of tear gas bombs, and wore steel helmets. Here are a few items that may give an idea of the situation:

Inspector McDougall of the Regina city police force at one stage ordered his men to draw their revolvers and fire over the heads of the advancing mob.

Apparently the Riot Act was not read. The commission states:

It is unlikely that more than one or two policemen fired at the strikers....

Again:

At another stage inspector McDougall went to telephone the police station requesting the despatch of another supply of ammunition.

The result was—without going into the details of a scene too horrible for contemplation—that:

Forty strikers and citizens were sent to the hospital for treatment, many of them seriously injured and seventeen of them suffering from bullet wounds.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Again:

One city policeman, Millar, had been killed; eight city policemen had been sent to hospital for treatment; many city police and Royal Canadian Mounted Police were injured. Of the latter force thirty-nine were sent to hospitals.

The commission reports:

In view of the rioting which took place on the advent of the police, the expediency of effecting the arrests on the market square may be questioned; the right of the police to effect the arrests on the market square, however, cannot be questioned. It is the duty of policemen in possession of warrants to execute them at once, using their best judgment as to the time and place of arrest.... It is clear that Colonel Wood and his associates underestimated the violent opposition that developed and did not foresee the rioting that followed.

Surely a very lenient judgment on the officials in charge. In view of that horrible bungling, all the commission says is that "the expediency of effecting the arrests on the market square may be questioned." I believe the public of Canada has already very decidedly questioned the "expediency." The commissioners indeed, seek to condone the action; they say, "the right of the police to effect the arrests on the market square cannot be questioned." Nobody questions the right of police to effect arrests. But surely the whole situation must be taken into account. For days and days these men might have been arrested. The warrants were not got out until about two hours previously, and apparently no effort had been made to serve them before the leaders came to address a public meeting in the market square. At the time of that public meeting the whole elaborate plan of mass attack on the public had been arranged, in which were involved not only the mounted police but the city police, and for which ammunition and all other equipment stood ready. Surely it is a question of "expediency," but in my judgment it is a great deal more than that.

At this place I should read, I think, a portion of the subsequent telegram of the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to the then Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). It is dated July 2.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend might read the answer.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, I don't know. I shall look it up. I shall read from the telegram anyway:

Yesterday morning men indicated to your representative Mr. Burgess their willingness to disband the march and return to the points from which they came. They repeated this to Mr. Burgess and representatives of the police at 2.30. Your representative refused to have provincial representation at that meeting. The men met us at five o'clock stating that since your representative had refused to consider this the provincial government take responsibility for disbanding men to their camps or homes and supply them with food in the interval. While we were considering this matter police raided public meeting to arrest leaders, precipitating a riot.

Let me pause to say that that is a pretty serious charge to come from the premier of one of our provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: And the commission found it was not warranted. Now, be fair about that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say that this is a serious charge.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. They found that charge not warranted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I read a few minutes ago what the commission found.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. They found distinctly that the charge was not warranted.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Let me read this:

Men at present in buildings at fair grounds completely surrounded by police who permit no one to enter and men to leave only in twos. This will end in a worse riot than last night.

There follow some other statements, and I quote:

We would ask you to immediately withdraw orders issued affecting the liberty of individuals within this province and affecting the law and order of this province.

This was tendered and marked exhibit No. 49.

Mr. BENNETT: The reply is there.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I have most of the report and the evidence before me, but I simply want to make this case: I have left out a great mass of evidence which would take hours to read. This is not a court, and we here cannot be tied to court procedure. I cannot hope to go through these matters in the detail that would be necessary in a court. I have simply tried to present the case in as brief a form as possible. The greater number of the statements that I have made have been taken word for word from the official evidence or from the commissioners' report.

The recent trials centred on the action of the men during the riot period. There was no trial of the police officials. I think any member can understand under what a disadvantage that circumstance places the men under trial. Further one cannot get a view or picture of the entire situation. These men who struck policemen were hauled up under arrest and tried for their particular actions. I suppose a court cannot do anything else, but in that court no account was taken of the provocative actions of the police, and much more serious than that, no account was taken of the whole situation. Anybody who has been present at a football match knows that when a little fuss arises on the grounds there is sometimes almost immediately a big row, in which very often the spectators become involved. Anyone knows that at a fire or at any time of intense excitement people lose their heads and do the most absurd things. I am not suggesting that desperate, horrible things were not done by some of the trekkers at that time, but I say that from the evidence submitted and by the account of eye-witnesses horrible things were done by the police.

The more serious consideration is the fact that these men were driven into that position. They were refused permission to proceed on their way to Ottawa. I admit the commission states that such action was justifiable, but it also says that it is not for it to say whether or not it was legal. The riot was precipitated by the action of the police. Now the men have been tried and a number of them convicted. Further, it should be remembered that the arrests were made under section 98 of the criminal code. Those charges against the leaders were subsequently withdrawn. I assume that the attorney general's department found that there was not sufficient evidence on which to proceed. Let me point out that Assistant Commissioner Wood said there was no evidence upon which the men could be arrested. Trumped-up charges under section 98 of the criminal code were produced, and an attempt was made to arrest the men under those charges, all of which were subsequently withdrawn. So there was no ground for the arrests. But worse than anything else, the method of the arrests was objectionable, because the arrests were attempted on the market square in the presence of a big crowd, where, it seems to me, anybody should have recognized the danger of serious difficulty. In my judgment the dominion government clearly exceeded its powers and the commissioner of the mounted police, apparently with the backing of the dominion authorities, acted in a very arbitrary manner. It would seem as though the authorities were anxious to attack the trekkers rather than to effect peaceful disbandment.

The government of that day is no longer in office, but I appeal to the present government to make the most rigid inquiry into the responsibility of the commissioner in ordering these arrests. I do not think a man who has the responsibility of having brought about these arrests should be allowed to remain at the head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Inquiries should also be made into the actions of the assistant commissioner in attempting to serve the warrants in the way he did.

Just one other word. To-morrow will be the King's birthday and very often in the old days that was made an occasion for clemency. I have tried to outline some of what I regard as the official blunders that led up to this tragedy. The victims of those blunders are still in gaol. Although the officials exceeded their authority and blundered, although they may have lost their heads at the time, they are still in charge, but the poor victims are in gaol. I ask the minister to consider seriously the possibility of granting clemency to these men and may I include others who are serving sentences to-day because of acts committed in riots or other troubles connected with industrial disputes.

I was delighted with the high position taken the other day by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and other supporters of the government in supporting the repeal of section 98 of the criminal code. I am not so much interested in trying to place the blame here or there. The trouble is we have not paid sufficient attention to the underlying causes; in future we should try to remedy the causes before adopting repressive measures. We blame the trekking unemployed but I believe that if the police had acted as they did with a group of university students the results would have been similar. These results did not come about because of anything inherently wrong with these men; it was because of the conditions in which they found themselves. Let me point out that the leaders are not among those now in gaol, the charges against them having been subsequently withdrawn.

I felt that I could not let this session pass without calling attention to this very serious situation and making a plead for clemency. I suggest that we try to wipe out these blunders as far as is possible by a gesture of generosity towards those who have been the victims.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no right to speak again because it is all one motion, but when the appropriate estimate is reached I shall deal with this matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Perhaps it would be better to wait until this item is called.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

YUKON MINING CLAIMS

Mrs. MARTHA LOUISE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, this is neither a grievance nor a protest; it is merely an explanation. During the last half hour of the evening of May 29 the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) asked the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar) if he knew of claims in the Yukon which had been staked, proved and abandoned but which were still closed to the public. The Minister of the Interior replied that the matter had not been brought to his attention. At the request of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), the matter was allowed to rest as the member for Yukon was not in her seat. Since that time I have made a painstaking study of this question.

In the very early days of the Yukon when it was part of the Northwest Territories, and possibly for two or three years after the Yukon territory had been created, there were many grave subversions of justice in connection with the administration of mining claims. Huge concessions of mining land were given to political favourites, especially when compared with the lands which were rightfully staked by the prospectors and miners. This prevented development because in some instances these lands lay idle and unworked for years. Miners were cheated out of their claims by the meanest of subterfuges, the falsifying of mining records. It was a common experience for a man who had staked a claim on a distant creek and who had given a description of his claim on his application to record, to be told to call at the office later. Then, when he did call later he would be informed that the claim had already been staked ahead of him. Men stood in line for days to reach the recorder's wicket, while the favoured ones used the side door. Similarly, at the post office the long customary wait was shortened by the usual palm crossing. When communication with the government at Ottawa became a matter of weeks instead of many months—it is now only a matter of days—conditions changed and for years past staking and recording in the Yukon have become the merest routine. The officials at any of the recording offices are ready and willing to help at any time.

I doubt very much if there are any mines in the condition suggested by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. When five or more are staking property 100 miles or more from a recorder's office, one of the party may be selected as an emergency recorder. Any person who has duly located a claim may obtain a grant thereof for from one to five years by paying in advance to the mining recorder the prescribed fees. Monthly statements of grants issued and fees paid may be had from the office of the gold commissioner. Ten days from the date of staking are allowed for recording and an owner may abandon a claim at any time by giving notice to the mining recorder. No claim may be relocated until after thirty days. A survey of the claim is made by a dominion land surveyor at the expense of the claim owner. Section 42 of the Yukon Placer Mining Act reads as follows:

If the owner of a claim has done the required work thereon, but has failed to renew his grant thereof, the mining recorder may issue a grant to any person relocating such claim.

The owner may, within six months after the date at which his grant came due for renewal, apply for a renewal grant—

This is given if the first owner proves his bona fides and pays all the expenses to which the relocator has been put and the cost of work, if any, that has been done. Claims can be renewed each year but only upon payment of the fee and upon the furnishing of proof that work to the amount of $200 has been done. Claims are forfeited if the work is not done or the fees paid each year, but fourteen days of grace are allowed. The government has carefully protected both the owner and the public in case of either the death or insanity of the owner. In case of death the act says:

The commissioner may from time to time extend the period of exemption as the necessity of the case may in his opinion demand, provided that in the case of deceased persons the period during which such exemption shall apply shall not extend beyond three years from the date of the death of such person.

In the event of insanity, the owner is equally well protected, because the act provides:

If there is no other legal representative of any such deceased or insane person, the commissioner may appoint the public administrator of the territory to take possession of the property and administer the same.

All charges are to be taken from the output. The Yukon Quartz Mining Act is equally comprehensive. Some years ago it was suggested that there were rich mining lands for from ten to thirty thousand men in the Yukon, and that the federal government would be justified in sending that number there. There may still be many a hidden Eldorado or Bonanza but such wealth is not to be had without gruelling work and perseverance. Many men have worked and slaved for years, hoping to develop a good paying mine, but at the end only to acknowledge that they have made but the barest living, while others have invested their all to find nothing in return. I do not believe there are a baker's dozen claims in Yukon, either placer or quartz, that have been staked, proven and abandoned either through death or insanity, and that are not open for relocation. At any rate, to make sure that such is the case I shall certainly investigate the matter very thoroughly on my return within the next month. I am informed by the Minister of the Interior that because of certain local conditions the Yukon council has extended the period of relocating until 1939, in the case of companies who may of necessity do ten or twenty times the amount of representation work demanded in one section of the district, applying part of that overwork to property in another section of the district.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Militia Services—
Engineer services and works — further amount required, $273,000.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the minister give an explanation of this?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): This total is made up of the following items:

Rockcliffe aerodrome, $95,000.
Barriefield, $35,000.
Petawawa, $15,000.
Valcartier, $20,000.
Quebec, citadel walls, $25,000.
Shilo, $30,000.
Dundurn, $45,000.
Yorkton, $4,000.
Kingston, $4,000.

Item agreed to.

General stores—further amount required, $712,800.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The item is made up as follows:

Clothing, necessaries and miscellaneous stores, $25,800.
Artillery stores, $151,350.
Telephone signal and wireless equipment, $36,900.
Inspection of stores, $13,000.
Mechanical and water transports, $7,000.
Dominion arsenal, Quebec and Valcartier, $478,750.

Item agreed to.

Permanent force—further amount required, $66,626.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The item is made up as follows:

Courses abroad, $5,000.
Pay and allowances, nine months' basis, $10,000.

Pay and allowances, increase in establishment, $9,000.
Pay and allowances, nine months' basis, increase of 30 non-commissioned officers and men required to complete the formation of anti-aircraft battery, $20,000.
Pay and allowances, reclassification of branch of master general of ordnance and judge advocate general, $2,226.
Salaries, civilian personnel, $2,400.
Printing and stationery, $18,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the minister be good enough to give the comparison between the vote for permanent force this year and last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For 1936-37 the amount is $5,546,700, and the amount voted in 1935-36 was $5,589,147.

Item agreed to.

Naval Services—
To provide for the maintenance of the ships and establishments of the naval service, including the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve and the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve—further amount required, $245,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is almost entirely for technical equipment for wireless sets, torpedoes, anti-submarine purposes, repair to hulls of Saguenay and Skeena, and to cover the cost of modern installation.

Item agreed to.

General—
Compassionate allowance to Rose and Anna Moscovitz, widow and child respectively of the late Himan Moscovitz, $2,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: These are suspicious looking names. What are the particulars?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In this case a truck was driven by a driver in the service of the National Defence department. The case went to the exchequer court where a verdict was returned in favour of the claimants for $7,500.

Mr. BENNETT: Against the driver.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Against the crown. It was in connection with one of the unemployment relief projects at Trenton. The case was appealed by the crown and taken to the Supreme Court of Canada, and on a technicality, referred to some weeks ago by the leader of the opposition, it was disallowed. I have the report of the judge advocate general, who states that in equity there is no question whatever about the case being a thoroughly deserving one.

Mr. HEAPS: Will this sum go to the widow or to the lawyers?

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If I have control over it, it will all go to the widow.

Item agreed to.

Aviation—
Royal Canadian Air Force—expenses in connection with the general maintenance and training of the permanent and non-permanent active air force, and provision of facilities therefor—further amount required, $555,028.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The item consists of the following:

Towards engine parts, $25,000.
Towards general purpose, aircraft, $100,000.
Towards flying boats, $170,000.
For civil salaries, $15,060.
Revote, wireless equipment, $15,000.
Torpedo bomber aircraft, $166,298.
Engineer services, $33,670.
Training aircraft, $30,000.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation—expenses in connection with the control of civil aviation, airways, government and public airports and grants to aeroplane clubs—further amount required, $346,400.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I may inform my hon. friend from Yale that there is a revote of $16,000 for the airport in the vicinity of Chilliwack.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Would the minister give the details making up this total of $346,400?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is a revote of $58,000, and the estimate is divided up as follows: Stores and equipment, $5,300; aeroplane clubs and schools, $23,700; trans-Canada construction, works and buildings, $231,400; to purchase land, $16,000. That makes a total of $276,400. Then for wireless services in connection with the transatlantic aviation development there is the sum of $70,000, making the total stated in the estimate. The main amount is $231,400 to complete airports and landing fields not finished under the unemployment relief projects.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Since the estimates were last under discussion has anything definite been decided with regard to the proposed landing site of the transatlantic service?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; it has not been definitely decided.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Then I should like to direct the minister's attention to the fact that within the confines of Cape Breton North-Victoria we have the best landing site in Nova Scotia.

Mr. HARTIGAN: I should like to ask the minister if some of this money is to be spent on a port outside Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Is there any intention on the part of the department to equip an airport outside Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, except an airport in Newfoundland, in connection with radio and meteorological service. That was voted in the previous estimates.

Mr. HARTIGAN: That is what I had in mind. I am not a lawyer, but if anything is unconstitutional surely it is equipping an airport outside Canada, using Canadian money. That is what I have in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is not in this vote at all.

Varennes—protection wall, $15,000.
Verchères—protection wall, $10,000.
Victoriaville—protection work, $5,000.
To provide for payment of salaries and expenses in connection with the investigation in Canada of the improvement of the waterway from Montreal through lake Champlain to the Hudson river, $20,000.

Mr. STEWART: In the past the practice has been to call each vote in these items, since they include long lists of public works. For some time we have discussed the one vote in connection with the work on the Richelieu river. When the matter was before the committee previously the minister made a statement which to some extent changes the nature of the expenditure. We started out with the assumption that the expenditure was in connection with the improvement of the Chambly canal and that it was but the beginning of an estimated or probable expenditure of $8,000,000 or $10,000,000. Strong objection was taken from different sections of the house to a commitment of that kind at this time. I do not propose to enlarge upon that at all; it seems so self-evident, so apparent that we ought not to embark upon anything like that now, particularly in connection with a work the result of which very likely would not justify the expenditure of any such sum.

In a general way I am familiar with this proposition. It has been considered previously, and was under consideration when revenues were more buoyant than they are at present. I do not think the minister can contend for a moment that prospective traffic on this canal justifies this expenditure. However he has now said that this will have the effect of reclaiming a large area of land. If the expenditure is made for that purpose only and is not to be regarded as a commitment for the larger expenditure to which we have referred, the matter is placed in a more favourable light. But I wish to point out to the committee that if the expenditure is for the reclamation of land the general policy has been that the provincial government should make a contribution towards the cost. If that is the reason for the expenditure, then I would urge that this practice should be followed and that the minister should secure from the provincial government a contribution of, say fifty per cent of the cost of the work. If the effect is to reclaim a large area of land, undoubtedly this is more a provincial than a federal matter. Since the minister says that this work to some extent will improve navigation in the river and at the same time benefit a large area of land, it seems to me that it is a work which, under the general policy, might be fairly considered a joint undertaking as between the province and the dominion. I can only ask the minister again, as I did before, to review the whole situation in the light of all the circumstances and not to regard this as a final commitment on the part of the dominion to this expenditure at this time. Particularly do I ask him not to regard this as a commitment to an expenditure of eight, ten or twelve million dollars in this connection.

Mr. BENNETT: I have just one word to add. The committee should keep in mind that an expenditure of half a million dollars is provided for on the preceding page in connection with this very matter. The words to which I directed attention previously—and I do so again—is that this provides for a waterway which will enable freight to be shipped out through the Hudson river by way of Albany rather than through Canadian ports. The words, "through lake Champlain to the Hudson river" are the governing words about which I raised objection the other day. I am not going to take more time than to say that, having regard to the fact that this matter has been before the department for many years, in days of, shall I say, great buoyancy of revenue, and the application has been refused, I am of opinion it is undesirable to make this expenditure now. The minister has given the explanation, so I am content to let the matter rest there.

Mr. SPENCE: It is not often that I object to any development in any part of Canada, particularly in connection with the main arteries of traffic, but it seems to me that this development is absolutely unnecessary. If it is carried on, however, I think the province of Quebec should contribute some part of the cost, as the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) suggested. To-day people are astounded at the amounts in the estimates for the interior parts of the province of Quebec. In this case it is proposed to spend $500,000, and if that money is spent it will be absolutely wasted unless you go on with the full development which, as the minister says, will mean anywhere from eight to twelve million dollars. I do not think any engineer can estimate how much it will cost to develop the Richelieu river, which is about eighty-five miles long. It may be stone or quicksand in the bottom; nobody knows.

Another point is that this project will employ very little labour as compared with other jobs that might be done. Take, for instance, the tunnel job in Toronto that was turned down, a million dollar job; it would have given $750,000 to the unemployed, but in this case there will just be dredges and cement mixers which very few men can operate, and most of the money will be spent and the unemployed will get very little out of it. Furthermore, this development is more in the interests of the United States than of Canada, because this Richelieu river empties into the St. Lawrence at Sorel which is immediately east of Montreal, and there are the new locks built some time ago, which should never have been built, because all the other locks on this Richelieu river take only boats with a draft of six feet. Why is there any necessity for more than six feet to float logs and flat-bottomed scows to accommodate a pulp and paper factory? There is no need for developing this lock to a depth of twelve feet and a length of 339 feet. This means that after a while much of the traffic which would go down the St. Lawrence will go by the Richelieu river to lake Champlain and by the Hudson to Albany, for the United States are trying to get everything they can and take everything they can from Canada. This work will be in the interests of the United States and their transportation systems rather than in the interests of Canada. The first thing we know grain boats will be going by this route to the big elevators in Albany and taking the business from our maritime ports. We must be careful. I think the minister has been inveigled into this matter innocently; I do not for a moment think he is doing anything which he believes will injure the country, but if we are going to spend ten or twelve million dollars on this project, it will be a worse proposition than the Hudson Bay railway, only on a smaller scale. The Hudson Bay railway will assist in developing the natural resources and some day it may pay, but I do not think this will ever pay; it will only help the people to the south. The minister said the other day that it was to help the pulp and paper industry. It would be better for us to buy the pulp and paper industry and burn it—

Mr. DUPUIS: How much did the Welland canal cost?

Mr. SPENCE: It cost a good deal more than it was supposed to, and this will also. I think it was $130,000,000, but it is giving great service to the whole dominion, while this project will give no particular service to the dominion, but simply to the province of Quebec. I congratulate Quebec on many of the things they have done, the repatriation scheme and everything, but Quebec should not ask the whole of Canada to pay for things that they should pay for in part themselves. This development of the Richelieu is not going to pay; it will probably be a lot of money wasted, and in these times when money is so scarce and unemployment so bad we should use the money where it will employ more labour. I do not mind even if it is spent in Montreal, but under this project there never will be any business other than running logs to accommodate the pulp and paper people and to help the United States to get the traffic through the Hudson to Albany.

Harbours and Rivers—Ontario

Amherstburg — reconstruction of marine wharf, $26,000.
Amherst island (Long Point)—breakwater, $2,500.
Burlington channel—reconstruction of south pier, $150,000.
Byng inlet—dredging, $10,000.
Chenal Ecarte—dredging, $22,500.
Cobb lake—dredging, an equal amount to be contributed by the provincial government, $5,000.
Cobourg—maintenance dredging, $21,000.
Honey Harbour—dredging east of Roberts island, $16,000.
Honey Harbour—wharf extension, $9,000.
Kingsville—reconstruction of east pier, $18,000.
Kingsville—harbour repairs and improvements, $8,500.
Lake Wahnapetei (Massey bay)—wharf, $1,900.
Lake Wahnapetei (Portage bay)—wharf, $2,000.
Little Current—wharf extension, $3,000.
Oshawa—to replace old west pier, $50,000.
Owen Sound—harbour improvements, $4,600.
Penetanguishene — wharf reconstruction, $21,200.
Port Arthur — harbour improvements, $180,000.
Port Hope—rebuild pierhead east pier, $15,500.
Port Stanley—repairs and reconstruction of harbour works, $36,000.
Rondeau—repairs to west pier, $28,000.
Sarnia—dredging, $23,000.
Saugeen River—extension to north pier, $18,000.
Sombra—wharf repairs, $3,000.
Thames river (Chatham)—protection work, $7,000.
Thames river mouth—dredging, $18,500.
Tobermory—wharf extension, $7,000.
Toronto island—breakwater, the city of Toronto to bear a like amount, $133,000.
Windsor—warehouse extension, $5,000.
Wolfe island (Horne's Point)—wharf, $16,300.

Mr. LENNARD: I should like to direct the minister's attention to the third item, Burlington channel, reconstruction of south pier. Can the minister tell me when this work will commence and if tenders will be asked for it.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): This work has not been commenced yet.

Mr. LENNARD: I know that, but can the Minister tell me when it will be commenced?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that plans have not yet been prepared for the work. It may take a month or a month and a half.

Mr. LENNARD: Will tenders be called for?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. SPENCE: Again this is absolutely unfair. There is an item for the Toronto breakwater, where the city of Toronto pays $133,000, half the estimate. Why should we do that and the province of Quebec pay nothing at all?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPENCE: Oh, the party opposite is strong enough to carry everything, but this is not fair. Would the minister give some explanation why the city of Toronto has to pay half for the work there, while other places pay nothing?

Mr. CARDIN: Because this work in Toronto is on an island and has no connection with navigation, and the city owns the island.

Mr. SPENCE: But it is the duty of this government to protect the shore of any lake. If the city owns the island, why does this government give anything at all?

Mr. CARDIN: I do not think it is the duty of the government to protect the shores of all lakes.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers generally—improvements, maintenance of services, repairs and additions, $500,000.

Mr. STEWART: Was there an item under this head in the general estimates as well?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: This amount is a much larger sum than usual. What is the reason?

Mr. CARDIN: My right hon. friend will remember that each province has an item for harbours and rivers; this is the general item. I do not remember for the moment the amounts for each province. Under this item the amount is general, covering all provinces.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest to the Minister of Public Works that there is courtesy in all matters and when he is considering the expenditure of the money under this item he should bear particularly in mind the meritorious claims of one of the really great harbours of Canada, Port Credit.

Item agreed to.

Roads and Bridges—
Ottawa—paving, $8,000.
Edmonton low level bridge—repairs and improvements—the city of Edmonton and the Canadian National Railways to contribute like amounts, $1,300.
Rainy River—international bridge between Rainy River, Ont. and Beaudette, Minn.—survey and investigation, $20,000.

Mr. BROOKS: On June 6 I directed a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) with reference to the reconstruction of a bridge at Fredericton, New Brunswick, which was carried out by the ice last spring. The minister has not yet answered my question. I should like to know whether it is the intention of the government to reconstruct that bridge this year. I see nothing in the supplementary estimates concerning it.

Mr. HOWE: I explained very clearly to the hon. gentleman that the government have nothing to do with that bridge; it is owned by the Canadian National Railways. I have told him that the hon. member who represents that constituency is working with the railway and they expect that between them they will probably reach a solution.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. HEAPS: I notice the sum of $20,000 for an international bridge between Rainy River, Ontario, and Beaudette, Minnesota. Is this for the purpose of investigating the feasibility of such a scheme? Is it the usual practice of this house to spend this amount of money for a survey for an international bridge, or has a similar amount been voted by the people on the United States side?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that it is the general practice to have a certain amount placed in the estimates to make a survey for a proposition of this kind. This has been before the department on many occasions for a long time. This is only to make a survey.

Mr. HEAPS: Who is asking for this bridge?

Mr. CARDIN: The province of Ontario and the adjoining state, I am informed.

Mr. HEAPS: Then should not Ontario make provision for this bridge, and not the federal government?

Mr. CARDIN: Bridges between Canada and the United States come under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the minister know the population that is to be served, and is he aware as to whether or not a bridge is desirable at that point?

Mr. CARDIN: Frankly I do not know at the present time.

Mr. STEWART: Does the minister know of any other international bridges in connection with which there have been contributions by the dominion government? As I recall it, the policy of this government is to make contributions in connection with the construction of interprovincial bridges, but not international bridges.

Mr. CARDIN: My information is that we pay half the cost.

Mr. STEWART: In connection with international bridges?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: We do not do that in connection with bridges over the St. Lawrence. They are privately financed. I do not know of an international bridge to which we have made contribution. There are international bridges at Detroit, Niagara Falls, and other points.

Mr. CARDIN: They are private bridges.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, but international bridges. They are private in the sense that they are constructed by companies and exact tolls. What does the minister mean by a private bridge?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that on the St. John river there are four international bridges in connection with which we pay half the cost.

Item agreed to.

Public Buildings—Nova Scotia—
Berwick—public building, $18,000.
Lunenburg—public building—repairs and improvements, $5,000.
Oxford—public building, $26,000.

Mr. STEWART: I do not wish to object to the item, but may I point out that in several cases we find provision for the construction of buildings and the completion of other undertakings which were provided for in years gone by under public works construction acts or supplementary public works construction acts. For some reason, although tenders are in and plans have been prepared, the government has scrapped those undertakings and is now beginning over again. Is it the intention of the government to prepare new plans and invite new tenders, or will it proceed on the basis of what has already been completed in the department?

Mr. CARDIN: Speaking from memory I would say that in most cases we shall follow the tenders that were in before this government took office.

Item agreed to.

Ontario—
Fenelon Falls—public buildings—further amount required, $2,000.
Haliburton—public building, $8,000.
Kenora public building—installation of fittings, $7,000.
Kitchener—public building, $100,000.
London, Westminster Hospital—addition and improvements, $30,000.
Ottawa — building for supreme court, $250,000.
Rainy River—public building, $15,000.
St. Thomas public building—alterations and improvements, $6,600.
Sarnia public building—addition and alterations, $17,000.
Watford public building—further amount required, $1,100.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the estimated cost of the supreme court building?

Mr. CARDIN: It is difficult to give an exact figure, but the opinion of the chief architect of the department is that it might run pretty well over $1,000,000 and possibly to $2,000,000. It has to be a fitting and substantial building.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is there any suggestion as to where it may be built?

Mr. CARDIN: It has not yet been decided.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia—
Kelowna—public building, $40,000.
Lillooet—public building—further amount required, $2,500.
Powell River—public building, $40,000.
Prince Rupert—public building, $100,000.

Mr. HEAPS: I notice the government is spending $100,000 for a public building at Prince Rupert. It seems to me that for such a small city $100,000 is a large amount. Would the Minister of Public Works tell the committee what kind of building is to be built, and the purposes for which it will be used?

Mr. CARDIN: The amount of $100,000 may not be sufficient to build the public building at Prince Rupert. It may cost as much as $125,000. There are five governmental services in that city, and when I use the figure of $125,000 I am capitalizing the rentals the government is at present paying at that place.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister been there?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the rentals now being paid to private persons be more than sufficient to cover the cost of the erection of the new building?

Mr. DUNNING: To cover the interest.

Item agreed to.

Generally—
Dominion public buildings—to provide for completion of payments in Winch building, Vancouver, and sundry military properties now under purchase by instalments, $1,531,000.
Tractors—for postal purposes, $2,500.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this cover all payments and all outstanding instalments on buildings?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: On the Winch building—the Daly building has long since been paid for—and other military buildings, as well?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and Rivers—Nova Scotia—
Bear River—protection work, $3,200.
Brooklyn—dredging—further amount required, $2,500.
Halifax—addition to north wing—R.C.N. barracks, $9,500.
Hantsport—to purchase warehouse, $12,500.
Morden—wharf repairs, $16,600.
North Sydney—wharf, $15,000.
Pictou—dredging, $29,500.

Mr. BENNETT: Most of these are further amounts required?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: I notice one item to purchase a warehouse at Hantsport. Would the minister give an explanation?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that last year there was an appropriation to build a warehouse at that point. Before we were ready to start on the building I understand a private company began operations on a building similar to the one we proposed to erect, and we are acquiring that building at a cost less than the amount contemplated we would have to spend.

Mr. BENNETT: By expropriation?

Mr. CARDIN: By mutual agreement.

Mr. STEWART: In a return brought down it is stated that the reason for not proceeding with the work last year was that the company for whom the building was to be constructed had erected a building. I am wondering why it is being purchased, if of its own accord the company erected a building?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed the warehouse has been built on a government wharf. We want to make it a public rather than a private warehouse.

Mr. STEWART: When was the agreement made for the erection of the building on the wharf?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed a private company had a lease to use part of the wharf. We are buying the warehouse they have erected, and intend to make it a public warehouse. It is possible to do that at a price less than it would have cost the government if it had gone ahead with the work.

Mr. STEWART: Does the minister say that the warehouse now being purchased is in all respects the equal of, as large or as good as the one we proposed to erect?

Mr. CARDIN: That is my information.

Item agreed to.

Public Buildings—Alberta—
Calgary—instalment on purchase of property for ordnance stores, $9,000.
Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $17,000.
Peace River—public building, $31,500.
Red Deer—addition to armoury, $1,500.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it that all the instalments in connection with buildings that were partly provided for in the main estimates will now be taken care of in the other estimates?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Generally—
Experimental farms — replacements, repairs and improvements, $100,000.
Flags for dominion public buidlings, $4,500.
Military buildings—repairs, fittings and additions, $25,000.
Military hospitals—repairs, improvements and alterations, $80,000.
Post Office equipment, $14,000.
Public buildings generally, $30,000.

Mr. BENNETT: In connection with flags, may I suggest that the minister issue peremptory orders that flags shall be lowered at sundown. Often I have come into a town and got off a late train and found valuable flags being pounded to pieces at night. I know the department has done what it can, but if those in charge were told that their positions depended upon their taking care of these flags, it would be a desirable thing.

Item agreed to.

Rents, Repairs, Furniture, Heating, etc.—
Ottawa Public Buildings and Grounds—
Elevator attendants, $124,000.
Departments generally—char service, including $150 for firing noon gun, $461,000.
Heating, including salaries of engineers, firemen and watchmen, $408,000.
Light and power, including roads and bridges. $190,000.
Repairs, improvements, additions and maintenance, $353,000.
Rideau hall—allowance for fuel and light, $19,000.
Rideau hall—improvements, furniture and maintenance, $42,000.
Telephone service, $88,000.
Water, $67,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Some of the accommodation on the sixth floor of this building, occupied by members of the house, is very dull and dingy. I wonder if something could not be done to bring our office accommodation up to a more modern standard of health. If some of these rooms were in private dwellings they would be condemned as unfit for human habitation.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEAPS: I know whereof I speak. The windows are extremely small, about fourteen inches in width, and the rooms have little light or ventilation. I understand that members of this house who are condemned to be in opposition have not much chance of getting better accommodation, nevertheless I make this plea. It may be argued by the minister or by others that if any effort were made to increase the lighting space or improve the ventilation of these rooms it might in some way militate against the uniformity of the architecture of the building. Personally I have not much faith in an argument of that kind. While improvements in the direction of increased light and ventilation might involve a certain amount of expense, it is something that ought to be done in respect of the rooms on the sixth floor which face the front of the building. I ask the Minister of Public Works to have some of his departmental officials go into the matter and see whether something can be done to make these rooms a little better.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia—Under Contract—
Esquimalt R.C.N. barracks and H.M.C. dockyard—new buildings, repairs and improvements, $100,000.
Essential Undertakings—
Fraser, Skeena and Naas rivers—operation and maintenance of snagboats, $37,500.
Harbours and rivers generally—
For maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $100,000.

Mr. BENNETT: In the meantime have workmen been going on with the work on all these buildings under contract?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Then they must be much more advanced towards completion than they were when we started.

Mr. DUNNING: All these have been discussed before.

Item agreed to.

Dredging—
Maritime provinces, $300,000.
Ontario and Quebec, $320,000.
Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, $50,000.
British Columbia, $185,000.

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that this includes provision for the operation of the government dredges on the Fraser river.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Estimates of Expenditure for which Votes are Required—
Miscellaneous expenditure, including remuneration to members of the mounted police force (to be expended under order in council, and not to exceed $1,300), for assistance in the remission service of the Department of Justice, $15,000.

Miss MACPHAIL: Will the minister make a statement about the work of the royal commission for the investigation of penitentiaries? When does he expect it will get under way? I have been quite patient about this third member of the commission, and I had hoped that before prorogation the Minister of Justice would make a statement to the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As my hon. friend knows, the third commissioner, Mr. Harry Anderson, unfortunately died, and another gentleman whom I expected to induce to accept the appointment has also been called by death. I have in mind another prominent gentleman who has always been deeply interested in these matters, and who entertains to a large extent the views regarding these questions held by the late Mr. Anderson. I am in hopes that he will accept when he is through with some work which he actually has on his hands. At all events the investigation will be proceeded with before the next session of parliament.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of litigated matters, Department of Justice—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the position of the litigation in connection with the extradition of Captain Hatfield?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The matter is still before the supreme court in appeal.

Mr. BENNETT: It was ordered that Captain Hatfield be extradited and he appealed. When the last return was made to the house I believe the time for appeal had passed, and I was wondering if he is now liable to be given up and brought into this country under the warrant.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That action has been started but it is not concluded.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the position?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Our agent has been instructed to ask for the dismissal of the appeal.

Mr. BENNETT: For non-prosecution?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Pay of force and allowances, arms and ammunition, barrack buildings, repairs and renewals and furnishings, clothing and equipment, communication services, court and legal expenses, criminal investigation branch, enforcement of federal statutes, fuel and light, transport horse and dogs, transport mechanical, dental, medical and hospital, miscellaneous (including grants to Royal Canadian Mounted Police messes and publication of Royal Canadian Mounted Police Quarterly for instructional purposes), special services Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, printing and stationery, transport railway, rations, rents, travelling expenses, transport water, $5,583,800.

Miss MACPHAIL: Can the minister tell the committee why the salary of the present commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is almost double that of his predecessor? It seems to me that this is not the time to double salaries. Earlier in the session I asked some questions in connection with the commissioner and I was told that he received a salary of $12,000, less five per cent, as well as free rations, free fuel, free light, free medical attendance and other things, all being valued at another $2,000. In addition to all this he has the use of a government car with chauffeur. It seems ridiculous to have the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police receiving almost as much as the prime minister and certainly as much as a cabinet minister. It would seem that either the prime minister and the cabinet ministers are being paid too little or the commissioner is being paid too much. I cannot imagine what he does with his salary when he gets free rations, free fuel, free medical attendance and a free car and chauffeur. Not only that, but he was given a title and has a lot of initials after his name. It all looks to me as though it is playing favourites. While I am on my feet I should like to ask the minister if the commissioner receives a special allowance when he travels in aeroplanes, and if that kind of travelling is done at the expense of the government.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Apart from the salary, which I understand was increased at the time the present commissioner was appointed, all the other items mentioned by my hon. friend are the same as have always been allowed to commissioners of the mounted police. As to aeroplane travel, when the commissioner or any member of the force uses an aeroplane in the execution of his duty, it is paid for by the government.

Miss MACPHAIL: Is there a special allowance when he uses an aeroplane?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Miss MACPHAIL: Before this item passes, as it undoubtedly will, I want to register a very strong protest against the salary being paid to this commissioner. Compared to the salaries being received by responsible ministers of the crown and by deputy ministers, this salary seems to be extravagant. The business of the commissioner is to keep people from rioting and to maintain law and order, but I think the payment of such salaries will incite the people to discontent and restlessness, if not to actual rioting. There are many Canadians who are quite as good as anyone in the government service, ministers of the crown and the commissioner included, and nothing makes them angrier than to read a long list of pay and allowances such as was given in reply to questions which I asked earlier in the session. The salary is large, the allowances are extraordinary, and all the favours that possibly could be given have been given to the commissioner. I have nothing against the commissioner personally; I want him to receive a substantial salary and be honoured for the good work he does, but I think it is just ridiculous that he should receive such a salary. I do not suppose anything can be done about it at the moment, but I do suggest to the government that they give careful consideration to the lessening of these allowances and the decreasing of this salary until such time as all Canadians are in a more comfortable position. I almost see red—it is hardly safe to say that in the presence of the commissioner—when I think of the number of people in Canada who are suffering real want and who are making a desperate effort to raise families in decency so that they will not be citizens who require the police to keep them in order. When there are such people throughout the country, just as good as any of the rest of us, and they see a thing like that, I do not wonder that they feel there is no use relying on parliament—and there is that tendency in Canada. They say that we do nothing but talk; but if they saw the items going through to-day they would change their minds about that. But there is a feeling that direct action of some sort will have to be taken finally unless we, their representatives, wake up to such things as this. I am indignant when I think of this in connection with the commissioner, the head of the force, who is supposed to keep in order people who are out of order because they have not sufficient of the necessities of life to make them comfortable. The two things simply do not go together. Of all the high officers of government this more than any other is the one that should not be extravagantly paid or in any way made conspicuous. It seems that the thing that matters in Canada is the use of force to keep order rather than the alleviation of conditions, distressful economic conditions, that cause the disorder. It is a stupid emphasis of the importance of police—

Mr. LENNARD: Carried.

Miss MACPHAIL: No, it is not carried. I am going to talk; you people do a lot of talking.

Mr. LENNARD: Not me.

Miss MACPHAIL: That is something to be thankful for. I say this last word to the government. I trust that by the time the next session comes around they will place the commissioner on terms of equality with other government servants who are doing similar work.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it would be unfair to attack the present Minister of Justice for this item; he is in no way responsible for it. The late government must assume responsibility for the item, because the present Minister of Justice found it there and has not changed it. I think that should be stated in fairness to the government. I should like however to point out in the first place that there has been no change in the allowances given to the commissioner of mounted police for many years—I think perhaps for twenty-five or thirty years—and any change that has been made is one that has been made also with respect to the other members of the force, from the constables up. So that so far as allowances are concerned there has been no change. Whatever rule prevailed before still prevails with respect to this and other services mentioned. With respect to the salary, the late government must take full responsibility; in no sense must blame be attached to the present Minister of Justice or those sitting around him. And the reason the salary is what it is is the fact—I wish the commissioner were not here—that we believed there was no other man in Canada who could render similar service or undertake the enormous duties involved in the prevention of smuggling on sea and on land, and the administration of the law with respect to liquor. All that was taken over by him, and he had a position that enabled him to secure a fairly large salary—he had an offer of one at the moment. In addition to that, my memory is that he had a pension, which of course is suspended during the period of time he holds the office of commissioner, so that the sum total of salary received by him is, in my judgment, not out of proportion in any sense to salaries paid elsewhere, having regard to the conditions I have referred to.

I am sure that my hon. friend from Grey-Bruce has no desire to be unfair, but it must be pointed out that you could not secure a man of the capacity and the experience and the ability of the commissioner; you could not secure such a man anywhere for less money. Go to England and see what Scotland Yard pays, or go to any other first class country and see what payments they are making, and compare them with the salary we pay for the enormous service which we put upon our commissioner of police. Think of smuggling, if any, in Nova Scotia; think of smuggling, if any, in Cape Breton; think of smuggling, if any, in the interior provinces, smuggling by sea and by land—the prevention of all has to be directed through his department of the public service.

Some thirty years ago in western Canada there was a constable in the northwest mounted police whose name was James H. MacBrien. He was around about Calgary. He went to the South African war, where he made a notable contribution to our country's service. He went back and began with the police there. He passed ultimately the staff college at Camberley, and I have it—I give it only as I have it from one of our former governors general—that we have not produced in this country a more distinguished soldier. I am only giving that for what it is worth. Having regard to the peculiar service that had to be rendered, there was no person in Canada we could secure who would undertake like duties and discharge them with equal efficiency and effectiveness. I would go further. On three occasions I personally endeavoured to get the commissioner to take this position, and twice I failed. On the third occasion, putting it to me as a matter of public service to the country at this time, he said he would take it, and he did. And the terms and conditions under which he did were first of all the suspension of any pension he had—I believe there was; there may not be—secondly, that he should secure the pay and allowances heretofore paid, and thirdly, that the salary should be as mentioned. These were the conditions, and he did not seek the position.

If I were asked my opinion with respect to any services rendered the dominion, which were outstanding so far as the personnel in charge of distinguished positions were concerned, I know of no appointment that was more advisable, and I say that frankly to this committee whether it agrees with me or not. I would go one step further. Reference has been made to the fact that there had been conferred upon the commissioner the rank of Knight Commander of the Bath. He had already held a Companionship of the Bath at the end of the war, and it had been purposed that he should be given the rank of Knight Commander. But for reasons well known to all members of this committee that opportunity was not offered to the sovereign. When the opportunity was offered and the first and only K.C.B. then made available, the then Prime Minister, without hesitancy, recommended the present commissioner, and he is very proud to think that he was able to render that service to a Canadian so distinguished, who had given outstanding service to a country such as this at that time.

Mr. POULIOT: Is he dead? This sounds like a funeral oration.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock, the item under discussion was No. 167, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, pay of force and so on.

Mr. NEILL: Under this item I should like to take a few minutes to discuss a matter which has arisen in my district. It is not often that I object to having money spent in the district which I represent, but this is a waste of money. The tale can best be told by consideration of the questions and answers that were submitted to the house to-day, so I shall refer to them briefly first:

Has a station of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police been recently started at Alert Bay?

The answer was yes.

Was there a station of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at that place about the year 1921?

The answer is:

Yes. It was opened in the first place on the 26th January, 1920.

I may say that it was closed in 1924 on my recommendation. Then I asked:

Since then has there been any considerable increase in the number of crimes committed?

The answer is: No information. Then I asked:

Since then has there been any serious crime committed at that place?

The answer is: No information. Then I asked:

Is there a station of provincial police at Alert Bay?

The answer is yes. Then I asked:

Is there any reason to suppose that they are not competent to handle the enforcement of law in that neighbourhood?

Surely that is a pertinent question, and this is the answer:

They are believed to be competent to handle the situation, but the Department of Indian Affairs reports that the members of the provincial police are too busy with other matters to attend to Indians who are considered federal charges.

If that is true the first part of the answer is incorrect, because in that case they are not competent and are not attending to their duties, but as a matter of fact that is not true. They are thoroughly competent and have always shown their ability in that regard. Then I ask:

Before recommending the establishment of a station of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at that place was the attorney general of British Columbia or the commissioner of police for that province consulted or asked if they were unable to handle the enforcement of the law in that place?

Surely that is a very proper question, in view of the relations that obtain between the dominion and the provinces. If a bargain was made with the province to carry out the enforcement of the law and it was found that the law was not being enforced, surely the proper procedure would be to go to the attorney general and say, "Are you not able to do it? If you are not, we shall have to put in our own men." The answer is:

No, but the conditions complained of were investigated by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and charges were laid and convictions obtained. This seems to bear out the contention that the British Columbia provincial police are too busy to attend to such matters. Furthermore, some of the Indians in the area have become hostile to authority and are alleged to be getting out of hand.

The charges that were laid and the convictions that were obtained were these: The Royal Canadian Mounted Police sent a man up in disguise, and as a result I think three charges were laid against two men, and two or three convictions were obtained. That was the extent of the crime; two men were convicted, and that was the end of the matter. I took it upon myself to write the commissioner of police for British Columbia and ask if he and his force were not capable of handling the situation there. He wrote back to the effect that they were fully competent." His letter continues:

I do not know on whose instructions they were sent, but there are two mounted policemen at Alert Bay at present. We have two constables there ourselves . . . and the game warden is also sworn in as a provincial constable—

So we have five constables in that small place. I also asked the provincial police commissioner with regard to this serious increase in crime, these major crimes that have been occurring, and he gives me the record:

During the past two years . . . there were sixty-two cases recorded against white persons and seventy-six against Indians. The great majority of these were minor offences and we have had no serious crime at Alert Bay for a long time.

There were altogether 138 cases, against Indians and whites, which gives an average of one and a quarter a week, with five constables on the job. The commissioner of police says he is fully capable of handling the situation and would have done so if he had been advised of it. In 1928, I think it was, this same trouble arose again. I had the station closed in 1924, but practically the same element wanted this station reopened. At that time all I did was to recommend that the Minister of Justice apply to the provincial police and ask their opinion. The attorney general promptly wrote back and said, "If we need more men there we will send them, but we are thoroughly competent to handle the situation." Now we are going to start a station there with two men. Again I asked:

Has it been recommended that a barracks should be built for their accommodation?

The answer is no. Probably I used the wrong word when I said "recommended"; I should have said "suggested," and then I think the minister would have had to say yes. At that, a recommendation will come along soon, because once you start a station with two men you must have some place to put them, and there will be a demand. Then I asked:

Were any steps taken to check up on the accuracy of such statements?

The answer was no. No such steps were taken, but this reply shows that the representatives of the Department of Indian Affairs in British Columbia requested the officer commanding the mounted police in that province to establish a detachment at Alert Bay in order to protect the Indians in that area from the sale of intoxicants. At that point the cases average one and a quarter per week for whites and Indians, over a period of two years. When the Royal Canadian Mounted Police took charge and sent in a secret agent, in disguise, they secured three convictions and that was the end of the matter. Since those convictions were obtained there has been no great crime; yet we are going to have five constables in a place of that size.

This all originated with an official out there who thought it would be quite grand to have the mounted police running around with him, in gold lace and uniform, as a sort of glorified bodyguard. That is the whole thing in a nutshell; it cannot be and never has been denied. I have the whole file before me, though I shall not detain the committee by reading it. That is the situation; that is what has been suggested, and I suppose the government will go on with it, but I must make my protest. We are wasting this money; it is not necessary, and it will create ill-will. In 1924, on my advice, that station was closed. I asked if there had been any serious crime since that time, and the answer was no. I asked if there had been any great increase in crime, and the answer was no. The provincial police are a smart, non-political, uniformed force. Their men are moved around from time to time in order to keep them from getting too familiar with the local people. They are a very capable body, of whom we should be proud, and it is an insult and a slur upon that body of men to say that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police must go in there because the provincial police are too busy—which is another way of saying too inattentive—to look after these people. It is ridiculous to say that the provincial police are too busy, when the cases average only one and a quarter per week. This insult is totally uncalled for, and we are going to be saddled with these expenses simply to gratify the desire of an official to have a glorified bodyguard go around with him.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I may assure my hon. friend that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are carrying on work in the various provinces throughout the dominion simply at the request of some department of the government, and that is what has been done in this case. The Department of Indian Affairs requested that this detachment be sent to this point. We would be only too glad not to have to send anyone, but we—and when I say "we" I mean the police—receive instructions from the various departments of the government which we have to carry out. Unfortunately, or fortunately, it is from them that we have to take our orders.

Mr. NEILL: That may be so, but I do not think the minister would go so far as to say that he is the servant of any cheap jack department that comes along with a request of any kind. This arose in this way, according to the records, which I shall not take time to read: One of these Indian officials went down to Vancouver—his own letter says so—and saw the head of the British Columbia police. Apparently he said to him, "Captain So and So, wouldn't you like to start a detachment of the mounted police at Alert Bay"? Like all officials, always ready to get a bigger circle of attendants, he said, "Yes, we have a man who is just the very man for the job; we shall be happy to send him in if you say so." And the whole thing was settled. He reported to the Indian department here, and the department without any investigation said, "Yes, it is a good idea," and they planted him on the department. All I can do is to repeat that this was not necessary.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I shall be pleased to look into the matter. My information does not entirely coincide with what the hon. member has said.

Mr. BENNETT: I know something of this as well, and thinking of the two very fine men who fell victims to the assaults of some Indians in British Columbia I made up my mind that we should have to maintain some assistance in Indian reserves to prevent the possibility of repetition of such an event as that which happened in the interior of British Columbia where two mounted police were murdered under terrible circumstances. Wherever there is the possibility of liquor among the Indian population there is need for those who will guard them as our wards.

Mr. NEILL: But may I ask the leader of the opposition: Is it not a fact that the dominion made a bargain with the province to enforce the statutes, which bargain the provincial authorities are willing to carry out? Until they show evidence of failing—

Mr. BENNETT: No; there is no such agreement.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The Indian Act is a dominion statute and the province has nothing to do with the enforcement of that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. NEILL: No; the item is not going to carry on an assertion of that sort. Is not the criminal code a dominion statute?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Do not the provincial police enforce that?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, because the administration of criminal justice is under the jurisdiction of the provinces; but the enforcement of dominion statutes, our own acts, is under our own control.

Mr. NEILL: Then, why is it that you do not have a station of the mounted police at every Indian village all over the country?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Because it is not necessary and is not requested.

Mr. NEILL: Who does enforce the provisions of the Indian Act in nine out of ten places in British Columbia? It is the provincial police, by request of the dominion government. If I am wrong, the department ought to have a policeman stationed at every village, because wherever there is an Indian there is danger of his getting liquor. It is not correct to say that the enforcement of the Indian Act in British Columbia is confined to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I was an Indian agent for ten years, and whenever I wanted a policeman I applied to the provincial authorities who supplied one or more as needed. All this talk about the Indians getting out of hand in that district is nonsense.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I assure my hon. friend that there is a detachment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in every large Indian community in British Columbia.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, while you passed item No. 492 without my having an opportunity to notice it, I had intended to make an observation or two in respect to it. We listened this afternoon to a very long and bitter attack in connection with these Regina riots, so-called. I think the minister should make a statement on that item.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I might make a statement without reverting to the item. All I want to say in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who referred to the matter this afternoon, is that it is always easy to be wise after the event. There is no doubt that long after an event has taken place one can see where something might have been done differently in the light of what has happened. This affair occurred more than a year ago. Fortunately the same troubles do not exist at the present time, and I do not think it would serve any good purpose to try to find that those who were at that time faced with a very grave and serious responsibility might perhaps have taken another course than the one they did take. All I wish to say with regard to the many statements made this afternoon is that I was especially interested in what the judges, who were appointed not by this government but by the Saskatchewan government to inquire into that serious matter—which was very regrettable because one man was killed and many were injured—found in regard to what the police did in those circumstances. On page 288 of the judges' report I find this:

> In our report we have dealt with as many of the cases as we believed merited it and have reached the conclusion that although the police used force on a number of occasions it was so used either to repel attack or to overcome resistance to arrest, and that in no case was there reliable evidence of an unprovoked assault by a member of either force.

Then I want to call attention more particularly to this part of the report, at page 303:

> An effort was made by some of the witnesses to create the impression that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have deteriorated from their earlier standards. As to the character of the men at present in the force Colonel Wood stated that under present conditions it had been possible to procure a type of men "superior to anything we have had in the force for the past thirty or forty years." And he added, "I have lived in barracks all my life." Several thousand applications are received each year and only a small quota is selected twice a year. A written examination is required and an investigation into the character of each applicant is conducted. Many members of the force, both officers and men, appeared before us and the impression made upon us does not bear out the criticism levelled at the present force.

We are of the opinion that Colonel Wood during all the time the strikers were in Saskatchewan acted with care and moderation, always of course bearing in mind the orders from his superior officer which he was bound to obey. We think also that the members of the force as a whole acted with courage and marked restraint during the riot and this notwithstanding the fact that they were repeatedly engaged in repelling attacks which were characterized by viciousness, brutality and a disregard for human life.

And at page 311:

We think it may be said, to put it mildly, that the men from the camps were most unfortunate in placing their cause in the hands of such leadership. The evidence indicates that a percentage of the men were lawless and dangerous. On the other hand we have reason to believe that the majority of them were of a different type and call for sympathetic consideration. The leaders, however, gave the whole movement a colour and character which condemned it from its inception and which caused it to be branded as dangerous by those in authority, who are responsible for the preservation of the peace, order and good government of the country.

All I have to say is that we must consider with justice and fairness, but with a little sympathy, the positions of those who are placed in offices of responsibility in times of trouble and difficulty like the occasion of the spring of 1935, and we must do our best to strengthen the hands of those who have, after all, to maintain peace and order in Canada. On the whole I do not think the evidence as given in the investigation carried out at Regina, and the report which was presented by impartial commissioners, members of the high court of justice in Saskatchewan—

Mr. BENNETT: There was one county court judge.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes; there was one county court judge. I do not think the country has to be humiliated in any way by the part played by those who had to take responsibility at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: I deprecate very greatly the province undertaking to inquire into the conduct of federal affairs. This is a new precedent in the constitutional history of Canada. But it was done, and I can only point out that there was not continuity of government, when the commission was sitting, as between the dates of the events. I was not asked to be heard. The former Minister of Justice was not asked to be heard. We were not represented either in person or by counsel. I was told I was to be asked to attend. I was not asked. The attempt made to indicate that members of a government undertook to direct proceedings with respect to what happened at Regina, a long distance away from Ottawa, is entirely unwarranted.

But the principle of a province appointing a commission to investigate the conduct of the federal government is a dangerous precedent and will in the end, in my judgment, create great difficulty in the operation of our constitutional system. I have only to point out that a few days ago a man was killed in British Columbia, and the prisoner was sent up for trial. He was charged with murder, in the first instance, but the charge was reduced to manslaughter, and when the case came up for trial the attorney general discontinued it. I shall just read this statement from a Vancouver newspaper and ask the Minister of Justice whether he thinks we should not appoint a commission to investigate this matter. The article reads:

New Westminster, May 14.—A stay of proceedings in the charge of manslaughter against Louise Rosse resulting from the death of R. A. Hanna after a drinking party and brawl in a Port Coquitlam hotel last month was requested by H. J. Sullivan, crown counsel, in assize court to-day. Chief Justice Morrison granted the stay and freed Rosse, who has been awaiting trial on $15,000 bail. Rosse and Gordon Wismer, his counsel, appeared in court. Mr. Sullivan then announced that the Attorney General had authorized him to apply for stay of proceedings.

At the preliminary hearing evidence was given that Hanna, well known Maple Ridge resident and oil agent, had died of hemorrhage of the brain after being struck in a fight by Rosse, hotelkeeper, following a card game quarrel.

And that man has never been tried before a jury of the people. There has been no investigation, except before a magistrate, and yet there is no means, except by the appointment of a royal commission, to investigate as to how the man's life was taken.

Mr. REID: What date?

Mr. BENNETT: The article is dated May 14.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is that all the information my right hon. friend has about the case, namely, what he has obtained from the New Westminster paper?

Mr. BENNETT: It was taken from the paper. I am reading it from a newspaper clipping.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has my right hon. friend no further information?

Mr. BENNETT: Except that a man was killed. And I was told, also, that he was killed. But it does not matter in what circumstance he was killed; there should have been a judicial investigation. This afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made some complaints to the effect that certain men had been convicted. They were convicted by a jury. They were found guilty by a jury. All sympathy and all appeals that could be brought to bear were attended to by counsel, and yet they were tried and found guilty by a jury.

Now, the question of divided jurisdiction is nowhere so important as it is with respect to criminal law. In this house on more than one occasion competent men, men who have not been members of the legal profession, have urged strongly that there should be some provision for the federal power exercising jurisdiction in the discussion of cases before the courts of the country. That at the present time is not the law. But as a result of a province appointing a royal commission to investigate into the workings of the federal power it should follow that the federal power could appoint a commission to investigate the workings in the provinces, which, of course, would be injurious to the working of the whole machinery of government.

Bnt on the other hand if a complaint is made that a man's life is lost, and you enter a nolle prosequi, and the accused is not proceeded against, it matters not what the facts are, I say, that there should be a judicial and public investigation as to the circumstances which brought about that result.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was there a coroner's inquest?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know; there was a preliminary investigation. The man was sent up for trial, and the charge was reduced to manslaughter. He was given bail, and—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My right hon. friend is surely not condemning the proceedings by virtue of what he has read in the press.

Mr. BENNETT: I know this, that this man was not tried, and a man was killed by him. That is the important point; he killed a man, and he was not tried. It is the only time I have ever seen that done in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I object to this proceeding. The right hon. gentleman has only a newspaper version of what happened.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. BENNETT: No; complaint was made to me about the affair, and the statement was made that this matter should be discussed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is different. May I ask my right hon. friend if he received complaints with regard to this particular case?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Could he read the letter?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason this clipping was sent to me; that is the reason I have it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, honestly I must protest against this.

Mr. BENNETT: Why protest?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Because by inference my right hon. friend is condemning the administration of justice in British Columbia, and is condemning it on a mere press report.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but I say this, that a preliminary investigation was held before a justice of the peace; the case was sent to trial and nothing further has been done about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is never final.

Mr. BENNETT: But there was never a chance to investigate the circumstances under which this life was lost; that is my complaint. It is a precedent that is established, and I here put myself on record, protesting to the Attorney General of Canada that they should have opened up the case, because I believe the circumstances were such that it was not a proper exercise of powers of a province to set up an investigation over the federal government, any more than the federal government should investigate the operations of a provincial government.

Now, what happened? As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said this afternoon, the leaders were not proceeded against. Evans was not proceeded against. The other leaders to whom reference was made in the report were not proceeded against. But the smaller fry were convicted by verdict of a jury and, as the hon. member said, were sentenced. I say that that is not proper; it is not the proper course to pursue, in view of what has happened. That is all I have said.

The temptation to discuss this matter at length at this time of night is great, but having regard to the fact that we are at the end of the session, I do not suppose any great harm would come if further discussion of the question is postponed to another time. So far as I know the report has not been fully printed; I have received only a portion. There are many observations I would like to make, but I take it that at some other time there will be adequate opportunity to do so. In view of the lateness of the hour and the near approach of the end of the session I shall defer making any further observations with respect to the matter, because I think it is one of such seriousness as warrants a most careful discussion of the circumstances under which the investigation was held and of the refusal, for instance, of the court to receive evidence as to where the five hundred dollars came from that was given to these trekkers at Regina. I could have assisted very materially in showing where that money came from. I was not given an opportunity to do so; that was shut out. There are other matters to which reference might be made, but this is not the time to do so; I prefer doing so later. But as I said, I had hoped that there would have been opportunity during the present session to discuss the matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Surely the case mentioned by my right hon. friend is not at all identical with this one. He mentioned something that is supposed to have happened in British Columbia.

Mr. BENNETT: It did happen.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He has learned something from some clipping in the newspapers, but it is something that comes directly and exclusively under the jurisdiction of the province of British Columbia. We have nothing to do with it. On this matter of the riots at Regina my right hon. friend cannot claim that the province of Saskatchewan had nothing to do with the question.

Mr. BENNETT: But I say, an investigation by the federal government—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But there were many provincial matters connected with the case.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): So much so that until the federal government decided to take a hand in it because of the Railway Act, to assist the railway companies to prevent the strikers from travelling on the trains, the opinion that had been given from Ottawa all the time since the strike started in British Columbia and the trekkers came to Alberta was that it was a provincial matter. Until then the federal authorities claimed that it was a purely provincial matter, and Saskatchewan was not only concerned in it but did all she could for the purpose of trying to settle the difficulty. When the federal government intervened—well, they were both mixed up in the matter, and in the end it was Saskatchewan that contributed most to the solution of the difficulty and succeeded in sending the trekkers back to their respective homes.

Mr. BENNETT: We paid for that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And there had been loss of life. Under our law everything concerning murder and any other criminal matters is under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Surely it was the right of the province of Saskatchewan, indeed it was its business, to investigate into all that surrounded this painful occurrence, and this was done judicially and in a way that, I believe, has contributed to let the public of Canada know better what were the circumstances. At the opening of the session I told my right hon. friend that I thought it was in the interest of everybody, the police, the government and all of those who had anything to do with the matter, that it should be fully investigated. I had the greatest confidence in the personnel of the commission. I am glad that this report has been given out to the public of Canada, and I cannot understand why this should be criticized and why my right hon. friend should think it would have been better to allow the various rumours and reports that were circulated to remain uninvestigated and unanswered. It would not have been for the good of the authorities or in the interests of peace and order that the public should have been kept in ignorance of the real facts.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman has not quite appreciated my point. There was provision made for a judicial investigation, because several men were charged with the commission of offences, and it is the duty of the courts to make inquiry at a properly constituted court. That is the point; and while such a court was available—and in the end that proceeding had to take place—a commission was set up, consisting in part of judges who might and would in the ordinary course have to deal with this judicially, and investigated it from another angle altogether. If a charge is made against a person, and the courts are there for the purpose of holding the fullest investigation, and that investigation must ultimately take place in the courts of the country, why have a commission of judges appointed to investigate the circumstances in connection with the event, the striking of the men, the circumstances under which the rioting took place, before the judicial trial takes place and an opportunity is afforded to investigate the matter in the manner and form by law provided? Surely we have created a most dangerous precedent. That is the point I endeavoured to make, based upon a strong opinion I hold which has nothing to do with this case at all. I suppose there is hardly anyone in this house who does not remember what took place in India when General Dyer found himself in difficulties. He came to England and brought action against those who libelled him, and he succeeded, with the aid of a jury, in recovering his reputation and damages. The late Mr. Justice McCardie dealt with the matter at great length in a judgment which is a classic of its kind. But to prejudice the judicial hearing by a prior investigation, and then to have the authorities that have set up the commission nolle prosequi the proceedings against the leaders and proceed against others, and the jury convict them, and the judges, having regard to the circumstances set out this afternoon, give them a light sentence—I say that creates a dangerous precedent and one upon which I should like a discussion on another occasion, though not, for the reasons I have stated, at the present time.

Mr. GARDINER: As the one responsible for appointing the commission I desire to say a word or two. The commission was not appointed in the first instance for the purpose of examining into what was referred to by the leader of the opposition. In 1927, while I was premier of Saskatchewan, I came to Ottawa and arranged with the federal government to have the mounted police force police that province. We were the first province in Canada to make an arrangement of this kind: since that time the majority of the provinces have followed suit. In 1935 the riot took place at Regina, and there was some controversy between the dominion government and the provincial government as to jurisdiction. We claimed that we had the right to direct the mounted police in dealing with this particular trouble. The federal government took it upon themselves to direct the police.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman might give the reason, too.

Mr. GARDINER: After the men had arrived at Regina and the issue was drawn we remained out of the contest until final action, the riot, took place. When the riot was over and the men were gone from Regina, having been moved out by the government of the province, the province then appointed a commission to investigate, and one of the directions given was to investigate the relationships existing between the provincial government and the federal government towards the mounted police force. The agreement which was made in 1927 came into effect in 1928, and comes to an end in 1936. It was thought wise that the legal position of the province and the federal government should be known before a new agreement was drawn up. After the commission had been appointed, other matters were referred to it, upon requests from the men and others. This was done to clear up the whole matter. It has been cleared up, in my opinion fairly satisfactorily to all parties concerned. I have nothing further to say at the moment with regard to it, but if the subject is to be discussed at a later time we can probably go into all questions connected with it.

Mr. BENNETT: There was a provision in the agreement preserving to the dominion government the right to deal with breaches of dominion statutes, as the Minister of Justice has mentioned. It was in furtherance of that agreement and the statute that the mounted police, when complaints were made and a request was made upon them by the railways, took the action they did to protect the property of the federal railways. The reasons were given in this house.

Mr. NEILL: I shall detain the committee only a minute. The minister's conception of provincial responsibilities for enforcing the law appears to have broadened to some extent since the last item we were discussing. Apart from all this, it is evident that New Westminster is a lawless place and requires more police protection so let me say that as a generous gesture to the hon. member, I would be quite agreeable to letting him have the detachment now at Alert Bay where we have not had a murder for forty years.

Mr. REID: I must contradict that.

MISCELLANEOUS

Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, $106,600.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, a number of the members of the wheat committee would have liked to have had an opportunity of discussing the problem of the marketing of coarse grains. At the last meeting of the committee the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) assured the members, and myself in particular, that on some item in the estimates we would have this opportunity. I shall be very brief and I regret that this important problem has to come before the committee in the closing hours of the session.

The question of the marketing of coarse grains is becoming almost as important as that concerning the marketing of wheat. I shall not take the time to go into the comparative values of coarse grains from the feeding standpoint, as sufficient figures have been placed on Hansard during this session by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), and during last session by the then member for Souris, Mr. Willis. That would take too long, but I should like to read briefly from a memorandum which was sent to me. Following the discussion we had on the resolution which stood in my name on the order paper early in the session, I received the following memorandum:

One of the counterbalancing factors influencing farmers in planning their acreage to be sown to barley is the cash return per acre. The superiority which barley possesses over other cereals in producing additional live stock food value per acre will make an appeal to the cereal producer who is growing cereals for feed purposes on his own farm, but will have little attraction to the farmer producing the cereal as a cash crop.

The two principal reasons why barley is not more extensively grown as a straight cash crop are: first, unfair grading, which results in too small a proportion of the crop earning whatever premium may be carried by malting or export barley, i.e., that is the trade does not in any year pay the premium for all the barley they export or turn to the malting companies; and second, the price to the farmer of ninety per cent of the barley grown in Canada in any year is governed entirely by the export price of from two to six, and not in any season exceeding ten per cent, of the crop produced.

The farmers in western Canada, particularly those in the southern halves of the three prairie provinces, were forced last year to market their coarse grains because of the destruction of the wheat crop by rust. The price at which they were forced to sell their coarse grains in order to get some money with which to carry on was very low; in fact it was unprecedently low. I have in my possession a letter which I received the other day from a farmer in the Wolseley district. This man farms two or three sections of land and last year he lost most of his wheat crop through rust. He told me that in order to get a forty gallon barrel of gasoline he had to sell seventy bushels of barley.

Following the short discussion which took place on the resolution that stood in my name on the order paper I received many letters endorsing the proposal that coarse grains should be brought under the Canadian Wheat Board Act. I also received copies of resolutions which had been passed by boards of trade, pool organizations and municipal organizations. Section 14 of the wheat board act provides for bringing coarse grains under the operation of the act by order in council after a recommendation by the wheat board to the government. The machinery is already set up, and I think it is important that this action should be taken. I trust the government will give this matter its consideration immediately. It is important that the step should be taken in time so that the farmers will have an opportunity of marketing their coarse grains under the act when the new crop comes on the market. I do not want to delay the committee and I regret that we have to discuss this very important matter so late in the session. I know many hon. members of this committee, particularly those from western Canada, will endorse this proposal. I hope that as soon as parliament prorogues they will bring what pressure they can to bear upon the government to have them take this problem into consideration.

There is just one other matter I should like to discuss. I may be a little out of order, but much time has been taken up to-day in discussing matters that were really out of order. I should like to direct attention to the fact that in western Canada a great many organizations are anxious that the board should handle the 1936 crop and that a minimum price should be set at an early date. The crop year ends on July 31, and I think it is important that this price should be set in good time. Last year a delay occurred because of certain necessities, but this year the machinery is set up, the board is in operation and there is no reason why a price should not be set in good time.

I should like to bring to the attention of the committee and the government three resolutions which have been passed recently in Saskatchewan. One was passed by the retail merchants' association at their meeting a few days ago in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. They suggest that the board continue and that a price of 87½ cents or better per bushel be fixed at as early a date as possible. Another one was passed by the live stock breeders' association meeting in Moose Jaw, in which they ask that a price be set and that the government consider taking coarse grains under the wheat board act. The third resolution was passed by pool delegates from the northern half of the province in convention at North Battleford. This resolution was in similar terms—I do not intend to take the time to read them—and asked that a price be set and that coarse grains should be brought under the act. When such organizations as these are anxious that the board should continue; that it should handle coarse grains as well, and that a reasonable price should be set so that there may be no misunderstanding this year before the crop goes on the market, I do not think the government can do otherwise than give serious consideration to the matter.

I noticed that certain members of the government are going overseas. At least three members of the advisory committee to the wheat board will be leaving Canada, and I think they should deal with this matter before they go overseas in order that there may be no misunderstanding and that the western producer may know where he stands. I think the government owe it to the producers to make a statement before parliament prorogues or before these members of the government leave for overseas. I regret that I have had to deal with this matter in so short a time, because a good deal of argument could have been produced. I am only sorry that the rules did not allow me to refer to the question sooner. I wish to thank the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture for having enabled me to bring the matter up even at this late date.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): May I say to the other members of the committee that item 191, Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, would probably give rise to some further discussion were it not for the fact that later we shall be considering item 445 in the supplementaries with regard to the marketing of agricultural products. An arrangement was made before the six o'clock recess to permit the hon. member for Qu'Appelle to say what he has said on this question in order that he might be able to catch his train this evening. The Minister of National Defence, for a similar reason, would like to take up his estimates, and I would therefore ask hon. members to defer, until we reach item 445, anything they may have to say in this connection. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle will understand, knowing western conditions as he does, that the date for the consideration of this question finally cannot possibly be earlier than probably the middle of July. There will probably have to be some discussions in council with respect to general policy before the ministers concerned go overseas, and that discussion has not yet taken place. The matter of policy will be decided on and any decisions arrived at will be announced in sufficient time for the handling of this year's crop.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special grants for cold storage warehouses—
Co-Opérative Fédérée de Québec, Rimouski, P.Q., $5,100.
Co-Opérative Fédérée de Québec, Québec, P.Q., $18,000.
Northern Fishermen's Cold Storage, Prince Rupert, B.C., $30,000.

Mr. BARBER: What is the difference between this item and the preceding one: "subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act"?

Mr. GARDINER: The preceding vote gives the extra amounts required for regular subsidies paid to cold storage warehouses; this vote has to do with special grants. The three concerns mentioned did not give notice before starting to build that they would apply for the grant, and the Department of Justice would not pass them otherwise. We are, therefore, required to vote the amounts, the percentage being the same.

Mr. BENNETT: The former government considered some of them and felt that it was impossible to make the grant under the circumstances for the reason that, on the one hand, they had not conformed to the regulation, and, on the other, that the expenditures had not been in terms of the act.

Mr. GARDINER: My understanding is that the expenditures were made in the same manner as they would have been made had the procedure been followed in the legal way.

Item agreed to.

Live stock, including assistance to fairs and exhibitions—further amount required, $8,300.

Mr. BARBER: What are the particulars?

Mr. GARDINER: There are three fairs, one at St. Hyacinthe, one at Winnipeg and one at Moose Jaw. Two of them, the one at St. Hyacinthe and the one at Winnipeg, are qualifying for class A fair grants. Previously St. Hyacinthe had a class B fair. Winnipeg had not been showing for a number of years until last year, though at one time it had one of the best exhibitions in Canada. It is coming back this year and states that it intends to live up to the regulations governing class A fairs. Moose Jaw is coming in as a class B fair this year. It had been showing before, but during the difficult years it had not been putting on an exhibition.

Mr. BARBER: This whole grant is for fairs?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Health of animals, administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act and Meat and Canned Foods Act—further amount required, $750,000.

Mr. SENN: In what way is the additional amount to be expended? Is it for animals already slaughtered or for restricted areas?

Mr. GARDINER: It is entirely for paying compensation for animals slaughtered in restricted areas. The area in which the greatest number are being slaughtered is around Toronto. Five or six counties are being placed in a restricted area around Toronto and the number of animals slaughtered makes necessary this extra expenditure.

Mr. STIRLING: Wherein does this differ from the next item?

Mr. GARDINER: The next has to do with a number of items under the Health of Animals Act. They do not come strictly under the regulations in connection with this item.

Item agreed to.

Health of animals—to provide for payment of compensation to owners of animals affected with diseases coming under the operation of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, which have died or have been slaughtered under circumstances unprovided for under the above act and regulations thereunder as follows:

Lawrence, N. F., Sheridan, Ont., $36.
Henry, Robt. T., Rossendale, Man., $40.
Suitor, Roy L., Lennoxville, Que., $50.
Lamarche, Victor (estate), St. Eustache, Que., $8.
Lounsbury, Earl K., R. 1, Killam's Mills, N.B., $20.
Wells, Wm., R. 1, Oakville, Ont., $38.
Prosser, Howard, R. 3, Petitcodiac, N.B., $54.
Stokes, E. A., Bury, Que., $20.
Eby, Irvin S., Kitchener, Ont., $64.
Quintal, David, Clairvaux, Que., $14.
Trottier, Lucien, St. Nazaire, Que., $24.
Petrin, Joseph, Wickham, W., Que., $24.
Manseau, Nap., L'Avenir, Que., $6.
Harpin, Joseph, St. Ours, Que., $28.
Wyttinck, Vic., Cypress River, Man., $8.
Lamothe, Louis, St. François Xavier, Man., $8.
McLaughlin, Wm., Finch, Ont., $50.
Parenteau, Conrad, St. Nazaire de Bagot, Que., $18.
Nadeau, Onil, St. Germain, Que., $28.
St. Germain, Jean B., St. Robert, Que., $24.
Lariviere, Napoleon, St. Bernard, Que., $26.
Peters, Hilton T., Hampton, Ont., $64.
Rose, Rod., Pictou, R. 4, Ont., $26.

Mr. GARDINER: This is the item to which I have just referred.

Item agreed to.

Marketing of agricultural products, $300,000.

Mr. SENN: When the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) this morning asked a question on the orders of the day, the minister informed him that he would have a statement to make with respect to what the government had in mind in view of what has happened to the Natural Products Marketing Act. Is the minister prepared to make that statement now?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to announce the policy of the government on this matter in view of the fact that since the supreme court brought down the decision there has been no time to give consideration to it in council. I can only say that there is a possibility that the matter may be carried to the privy council, in which event the act will remain, as I understand it, pretty much in the same position as it has been since the question was referred to the supreme court. If that is not the case, the government intends to carry on in connection with marketing in a manner which will assist the marketing of these different products. As regards fruit, it is the view of the department that in the Fruit Act itself the minister has power to do most of the things which an export board had power to do under the marketing act, which has been declared ultra vires; at least, though part of it has not really been declared ultra vires, the fact that other sections have been thrown out renders the act as a whole invalid. But we have power, so far as fruits are concerned, to act pretty much in the same way as the export board could have acted under that legislation. It is not thought there will be great difficulty in doing the things we want to do with regard to fruit. In connection with other matters the intention is to use the sum now before the committee for the purpose of promoting marketing in the interval.

Mr. STIRLING: It is quite probable, as the minister says, that with regard to the export of fruit it will be possible under the Fruit Act to do at least a certain amount of valuable work. Certainly it will not be possible, under the Fruit Act, to carry out control work such as the boards have been doing. I should like to say that to me the judgment is not intelligible, particularly that portion which occurs in the middle. I read the middle paragraph:

Regulation of individual trades, or trades in individual commodities in this sweeping fashion—

Referring to the earlier language of the judgment.

—is not competent to the parliament of Canada and such a scheme of regulation is not practicable in view of the distribution of legislative powers enacted by the constitution act, without the cooperation of the provincial legislatures—

In this matter that is exactly what we have. In British Columbia there was a statute passed for the purpose of dovetailing into this very act, and where the judgment says there is a lack of cooperation on the part of the provinces, certainly that cannot apply to British Columbia. There, as the minister knows, the British Columbia tree fruit growers had the most prominent and possibly the most successful of these boards. At the present time, not unnaturally, the members of that board do not know what their position is.

I wonder whether the minister would amplify his statement a little with regard to the possibility and desirability of assisting a case to be carried through the courts, if necessary to the privy council. My idea is that the only thing to be done at the present time is for the board to prosecute the first infringement which comes to its notice and, if necessary, carry the case through the courts up to the privy council. It is obvious that the tree fruit board, subsisting as it is now on what remains of the levies on last year's crop, cannot finance such a procedure. So I should like to know to what extent the dominion government would be prepared to assist, if that be the course considered desirable by all concerned, in order to carry the matter through. I have a strong feeling that if this act had not been thrown to the supreme court holus-bolus, the act being in operation at this time and boards being in operation under it all over Canada, but rather if a concrete case had been taken to the supreme court and argued by capable counsel, it is not at all unlikely that the judgment would not have been similar to this sweeping judgment. This judgment is based upon the statement that there is no legislative assistance on the part of the provinces, and certainly with regard to British Columbia that is contrary to the facts.

Mr. BENNETT: Just before the minister speaks, I believe the judgment of the supreme court was inadequately reported in the statement that appeared on the day the judgments were delivered. I have been told that that is so; that these words appeared in the precis that was given out:

Regulation of individual trades, or trades in individual commodities in this sweeping fashion, is not competent to the parliament of Canada and such a scheme of regulation is not practicable in view of the distribution of legislative powers enacted by the constitution act, without the cooperation of the provincial legislatures—

[Mr. Stirling.]

The words from "in" to "legislatures" are quoted in this precis. The preceding paragraph, to which reference is made, reads:

The powers of regulation vested in the commissions extend to external trade and matters connected therewith and to trade in matters of interprovincial concern; but also to trade which is entirely local and of purely local concern.

That, the precis says, may not be carried on except with the cooperation of the provincial legislatures. Nothing was clearer than that this statute never would have come into being but for that fact. It was never intended in this house to provide a code for marketing that extended to purely local transactions. The act says distinctly that it refers only to interprovincial and external trade, and local trade is regulated by provincial legislatures. If the local legislature empowered this local board to ask the federal board to act as its agent, or if the federal board asked the local board to act as its agent, that might be done. That is the position, and when this act was passed it was for the sole purpose of coordinating the efforts of the federal and provincial powers in order to secure a marketing act. It would be news indeed to every member of this house to learn that this parliament cannot deal with the licensing of imports and exports; that it cannot deal with interprovincial trade, solely and exclusively, and that it cannot deal with foreign trade outside Canada in any way it pleases. If such were the case, we would have entirely to revise our conception of the constitution.

I am sorry the Minister of Justice is not present, but when I urged that he should not have referred the marketing act to the courts because it was really in operation, that to do so was contrary to every well established and recent precedent, I had in mind the words used by the privy council in the case of the attorney general for Ontario v. the Hamilton Street Railway Company:

With regard to the remaining questions, which it has been suggested should be reserved for further argument, their lordships are of opinion that it would be inexpedient and contrary to the established practice of this board to attempt to give any judicial opinion upon those questions. They are questions proper to be considered in concrete cases only; and opinions expressed upon the operation of the sections referred to, and the extent to which they are applicable, would be worthless for many reasons.

We at least had high authority for saying such opinions would be worthless.

They would be worthless as being speculative opinions on hypothetical questions. It would be contrary to principle, inconvenient, and inexpedient that opinions should be given upon such questions at all. When they arise, they must arise in concrete cases, involving private rights; and it would be extremely unwise for any judicial tribunal to attempt before hand to exhaust all possible cases and facts which might occur to qualify, cut down, and override the operation of particular words when the concrete case is not before it.

Those are the words of the privy council, but notwithstanding that this government referred this matter to the supreme court, though the act was in operation. Those words dealing with concrete cases never had greater application than they have to this act to-day, namely that it would be extremely unwise for any judicial tribunal to attempt beforehand to exhaust all possible cases and facts which might occur to qualify, cut down, and override the operation of particular words when the concrete case is not before it.

Under those circumstances, having regard to that precedent, I suggest that this is a worthless opinion. Those are not my words at all; that is what the privy council have said:

They are questions proper to be considered in concrete cases only; and opinions expressed upon the operation of the sections referred to, and the extent to which they are applicable, would be worthless for many reasons. They would be worthless as being speculative opinions on hypothetical questions.

I say to the minister and to this committee that if to-day we had a concrete case from the Okanagan and we were able to show the concrete facts as we would be in any case that might be brought before the courts, as in the British Columbia case of the Crystal Dairy, we would be able to prove that there was a local board; that there was a federal board; that there was a provincial statute and a dominion statute; that there was cooperation between the two, and that the two together made a perfect code to deal with the marketing of fruit in that particular locality. Under those circumstances, taking the words of the court as they appear in this opinion, from the standpoint of the concrete facts that must arise in connection with the administration of the marketing act, I suggest to the minister that the proper course to pursue is to take an appeal in order that this language of the privy council may have full application; or not to take an appeal at this moment on the general question but to take an appeal on a concrete case and, as my hon. friend and former colleague from Yale has suggested, let the dominion government undertake to pay the cost, which is not an unusual thing to do. In other words, let a proceeding be taken in the Okanagan valley at once, on an infringement. Let all the facts be proven as to the constitution of the local boards, for the minister doubtless will recall—because he has had to do with the question in his own province—that when the Crystal Dairy case came up it was held by the privy council that inasmuch as it provided for a levy being made it was beyond the competence of that legislature to enact that form of taxation. That was the decision of the privy council.

Now we have a case in which infringement of this act may be set up, the facts proven, the local board, the dominion act, the dominion board, the coordination between the two. Then, by special leave, the case can be taken at once, per saltem as we say, to the privy council; we can get it there for early decision so that the question may be settled as to the validity of the sections which deal with concrete facts and not speculative opinions. I cannot say how much I regret that an act which has been in operation should have been referred to the court in the face of the declaration of the privy council which I have just read. But this has been done and we have this judgment in the terms in which we have it. I have not any doubt that this parliament must have power to deal with matters of trade that affect interprovincial transactions or transactions with foreign countries. But the extent to which we may do so through the doctrine of agency and by cooperation between provincial legislatures and boards set up by provincial authority and boards functioning under authority of the federal act is a matter which might well require further argument in order that there might be an ultimate decision by the court of last resort. I urge that on the minister, because having regard to the circumstances I think it is what he would do if he were a private individual. Now that the speculative provisions have been dealt with by the court, let him take the concrete case and do what he would do in his private business, have a decision of the court of last resort as to the validity of the proceedings. And I suggest to the minister that we should follow a course which is not unusual, which in fact we have frequently done in part if not in whole, that the expenses incident to the matter should be borne—with an understanding beforehand what they are to be—by the crown itself. In the meantime I suggest that the act itself should be continued just as though there had been no expression of opinion, which according to another decision of the supreme court is no better than that of the law officers of the crown themselves.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall not presume, of course, to argue the legal question in connection with a decision which has been given.

I would not feel competent to do so. But I should like to read to the committee the two sections which are concerned in the decision given. Section 5, subsection 4 reads:

> Before any scheme is approved the governor in council shall be satisfied,
> (a) that the principal market for the natural product is outside the province of production; or > (b) that some part of the product produced may be exported.

If that were the only statement in the act with regard to the matter I think there probably would be no doubt as to the view that should be held. But in section 2, paragraph (g) we find:

> "Regulated product" means a natural product to which a scheme approved under this act relates, but does not include > (ii) in case the said scheme relates only to the product marketed outside of the province of production, such product in so far as it is marketed within the province of production.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, it does not apply within the province?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; there is an attempt made to make the situation appear as has been stated by the leader of the opposition, but apparently the court holds that there has been some interference with the marketing within the province itself, the local marketing. I do not intend to argue that point; the court has given its decision upon it. I would just say in regard to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) and supported by the leader of the opposition, that I am naturally not in a position to state exactly what the government will do in the circumstances set forth. I assume that a number of these acts which were submitted to the supreme court will be appealed to the privy council, and I think I can go so far as to state that the government will take exactly the same action in connection with this piece of legislation as they see fit to take in connection with the others.

Mr. BENNETT: They stand on a different basis.

Mr. STIRLING: One has been in operation.

Mr. GARDINER: The Minister of Justice will take this all under consideration, and we shall be advised in accordance with his views, also keeping before us, when we consider the matter, the expressions of opinion that have been given by both the hon. member for Yale and the leader of the opposition.

Mr. SENN: A short time ago when another item was under discussion the minister made a statement regarding the intention of the government not to continue the cheese bonus this year. That is going to be detrimental to the dairy interests of Canada. The minister said at that time, and quite properly so, that the reason for giving the bonus for the sale of cheese last year was to increase the production of cheese in Canada and at the same time to curtail, if possible, the production of butter, the reason for that being that we were consuming all the butter we produced in Canada and for that reason the price was higher in Canada than it would have been had we been on an export basis. This was the reason which induced the former government, I believe, to give a bonus on cheese last year. But this is not the only reason. The minister also stated that the bonus last year had not been successful in achieving the purposes assigned. With that conclusion I am not prepared to agree. In the first place, for many years past the production of cheese in Canada had been gradually falling. In 1934 we manufactured about 99,000,000 pounds. In 1935 this had increased to 100,000,000 pounds, so that we had not only stopped the reduction by giving the bonus but already increased the production by a small amount.

A good deal has been said in this house about the importance of wheat growing as a branch of agriculture in Canada. I should like to point out how important the dairy industry is to this dominion. I took the trouble a short time ago to get some figures from the bureau of statistics regarding the value of the production of the different branches of agriculture in Canada. They gave me the figures for the six years 1930 to 1935 inclusive which I am going to read to the committee:

> Live stock and animal products, $637,000,000.
> Poultry and egg production, $327,000,000.
> Fruit, $95,000,000.
> Fodder crops, $1,057,000,000.
> Wheat, $959,000,000.
> Dairy products, $1,169,000,000.

Or over $200,000,000 more for dairy products than the value of wheat during those years. It seems to me, therefore, that while certain amounts have been spent to assist the wheat growers of the western provinces —and I have no fault whatever to find with that—the government might very well consider continuing this bonus for another year for the benefit of the dairy industry.

We produce in Canada annually some 16,000,000,000 pounds of milk. I should like to give the committee the percentages of that milk used in the manufacture of the different products into which that milk is manufactured and the different ways in which it is consumed. Cheese production took only 6·88 per cent of our milk production last year. Butter took 49·45 or approximately 50 per cent. One per cent is manufactured into processed milk, such as condensed milk, powdered milk, et cetera; ice cream consumes only about one-half of one per cent of the milk that is produced, and some 42 per cent goes into fluid consumption.

A difficulty has arisen already this year which, it seems to me, is more or less alarming. I have before me the daily news letter sent out under the authority of the Minister of Agriculture. This issue dated June 15, states that the production of butter in Canada for the first five months of this year is ten per cent higher than it was for the first five months of last year. It seems to me, if that goes on for the year, that we shall be producing much more butter in Canada than we can possibly consume. If we get on an export basis I am afraid the price of butter will drop materially, and if the price of butter drops I am afraid the price of all other classes of dairy products in Canada will also drop accordingly.

I have only one further word to say. I do not need to go back over the ground and show that there has been a continual falling off in cheese production for the past number of years, or that there has been a gradual increase in butter production. The minister stated that another reason they were not giving the bonus this year is that there has been a certain amount of cheese sent to the United States since the inauguration of the present trade agreement. That is undoubtedly correct. But I do not think we can afford to sacrifice a market which we have had in Great Britain for years simply because we have entered into the American market for the time being. Canadian cheese enjoys a place of its own in the British market. For the past twenty or twenty-five years it has received a bonus of one, two and sometimes as high as four cents per pound in the British market. If we lose that market by failing to send our cheese to it and by failing to cater to it we would suffer a very serious loss indeed.

I have only one further observation and I shall have concluded. I should like to show how our cheese exports have fallen off. In 1927 we sent 136,000,000 pounds of cheese to the British market. By 1929 this had fallen to 112,000,000 pounds; in 1930, to 92,000,000 pounds. In 1934 it was 94,000,000 pounds, and in 1935 it had dropped to 60,000,000 pounds. It seems to me that this is a serious situation. Only five per cent of all the dairy products we produce in Canada have to be exported, the other ninety-five per cent being consumed in Canada. If we are to hold our market in the British isles it seems to me that this is the only way in which it can be done, because the only way in which we can profitably export dairy products at this time is in the form of cheese. I am sorry the government has made this decision, and in conclusion my only observation would be that I hope by the time another year rolls around the dairy industry will not be suffering in the manner I am afraid that it will. If it is, I am sure that at that stage the government will do something about the matter.

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE

Ocean and River Service—hydrographic and tidal and current surveys, and to provide for the maintenance and repair of hydrographic steamers, $406,700.

Mr. BARBER: Could the minister state how much of this vote is to be spent on the Pacific coast?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine): I doubt if I have that division indicated in my notes. We have it divided as to salaries and expenses. Hon. members will be aware that we maintain a very fine steamer on the west coast, namely the Stewart. We do a great deal of mapping out there, and I believe we have pretty well mapped the Pacific coast from the United States boundary to the Alaska boundary. I believe there is a little work to be done this year at the lower end of the Queen Charlotte islands.

Mr. BARBER: There will be only a small expenditure on the Pacific coast?

Mr. HOWE: We are doing the usual amount of work, this year, as much as we did last year.

Item agreed to.

Public Works—chargeable to capital Marine department—

River St. Lawrence ship channel dredging—

(a) To provide for contract dredging in St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, $2,000,000.

(b) To provide for the maintenance and operation of the government ship channel fleet and the government shipyard, including all necessary repairs and reconditioning, $1,138,400.

Mr. BENNETT: Is not this the item we discussed, dealing with the dredging of the St. Lawrence river?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The other evening when we were discussing it the minister made a statement which I thought at the time was not quite in accordance with the facts, not as a question of fact, but simply as a matter of professional opinion. He said:

As we improve the St. Lawrence river below, there is no question that when we take twelve inches off the bottom, we take about five inches off the top. That goes on continuously.

Mr. HOWE: Did I say five inches?

Mr. BENNETT: It was so reported, and I took the trouble to look the matter up, because before we entered into this contract we had a report prepared for the department by the joint board of engineers on the St. Lawrence waterway project. The report itself was prepared in November, 1926. That committee consisted of Messrs. D. W. McLachlan of the Department of Railways and Canals, Olivier O. Lefebvre, Chief Engineer of the Quebec Streams Commission; Brigadier General Charles Hamilton Mitchell; Major General Edgar Godwin, Chief of Engineers, in the United States; Colonel William Kelly, Corps of Engineers, United States; and Lieutenant Colonel George B. Pillsbury, Corps of Engineers, United States. We find the following at page 47, paragraph 211 of their report:

Restoration of Navigable Depth

211. Channel below Montreal harbour—The navigable depth of the channel below Montreal harbour can be restored by dredging and an analysis of the gauge reports shows that the dredging heretofore done has lowered the level in Montreal harbour at the rate of 0·15 feet for each foot of navigable depth gained and has lowered the level of the river between Varennes and Quebec by an average of 0·06 for each foot of navigable depth gained.

According to this statement the dredging could have lowered the water level in the harbour of Montreal at the rate of 1¾ inches per foot of dredging, and three-quarters of an inch per foot of dredging in the main channel below Montreal.

I do not know whether the minister has had occasion to look up the interim report of March 4, 1935, but the Interdepartmental Montreal and Ship Channel Water Level Board state on pages 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8, paragraphs 8 to 22, the cause of low water conditions. I shall not go into the matter at length, but I believe the minister was inaccurately reported, because these are the words used by the board:

A loss of 1·75 feet due to dredging of deeper and wider channel below the upper harbour; of this amount about 0·80 feet is due to dredging between the upper and the lower harbour.

Again, at paragraph 21, the board states:

The above table 5 shows a drop of 1·70 feet in water level in Montreal upper harbour due to enlargements and obstructions in channel of Montreal and in the river below. Of this amount, 1·10 feet may be ascribed to work done by the harbour commissioners of Montreal and 0·60 may be ascribed to work done in the ship channel below.

These two statements really mean that the dredging in the main channel has been responsible for a drop of 0·80 feet or 0·60 feet. We must remember that the drop in the level due to dredging is greater at a lower level of water. Without going into the matter at length I think it is sufficient to say that the drop in depth caused by dredging depends upon the distribution of the area of water, and under present conditions it would appear that the loss cannot be greater than, say a little over three-quarters of an inch per foot. This report that we had before us at the time we were entering into this agreement was another departmental report supplementing the report of 1926 to which I have made reference. I had notes prepared covering the whole situation, but I desire only to correct that, because if the statement made by the minister were accurate we have been greatly misled in dealing with the matter, and I wanted to verify it by reference to the original of the report of 1935, supplementing the report of 1926, to ascertain that the figures upon which we relied were at least those that were contained in the report. I think it may be fairly said that the dredging reduces the depth in the harbour approximately three-quarters of an inch per foot.

Mr. HOWE: I certainly appreciate the correction. If I said five inches out of twelve, I was grossly in error.

Item agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS

To reimburse Peter R. Jack and Chas. A. Ackhurst, one-time harbour commissioners at Halifax, for expenses incurred by them in connection with the inquiry into the administration of the Halifax harbour commission in 1930, $3,855.10.

Mr. CAHAN: I should like an explanation from the minister as to why an attempt should be made to reimburse these two gentlemen for expenses incurred by them in connection with this inquiry. Documents brought down by the minister disclosed—is it too strong to say?— very discreditable action on the part of that commission. The full report of the commissioner could not be made on account of his death. But it seems to me novel and unprecedented to propose a vote to pay for the legal expenses incurred by these two gentlemen. I should like to know why that proposal is made.

Mr. HOWE: These two gentlemen were appointed by the government to conduct a government service at Halifax. Their services were dispensed with, charges of improper conduct were brought, and a judge was appointed to investigate. These men were under obligation, I think, to the government to defend the position they had taken. They hired counsel to do so. Before doing so they wrote to the Department of Marine and asked for counsel to be appointed by the department. The deputy minister of the department, whose letter we have on file, wrote them that consideration would be given to the cost of counsel. The case was tried.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister has the letter, will he read just what the deputy minister said? That may be very important from our standpoint.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. This is a letter to the then Deputy Minister of Marine, Mr. Alex. Johnston, under date of November 13, 1930:

> Mr. Charles W. Ackhurst, one of the other commissioners, as well as myself have engaged the services of Mr. L. A. Lovett, K.C., and I wish to take this opportunity of drawing this matter to your attention and to ask that you arrange to defray the expenses of our counsel and any other expenses that we shall be subject to in connection with this inquiry.

To this Mr. Johnston made reply on November 17, 1930, as follows:

> Just a line to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 13th instant and to say that the representations contained therein will in due course be submitted for consideration.

The inquiry proceeded, and I understand that complete evidence was taken. I have not personally read all the evidence, but I asked one of our officers to read it and to draw to my attention anything that he thought was pertinent as reflecting on the actions of the commissioners. The judge conducting the case, when he was about to prepare his report, died. No other judge was assigned to complete the work, and these two men, who had been public servants, were left in the position of having been accused and of being unable either to have themselves acquitted or proven guilty. I think this is a very unfortunate position. I must say that in reading the evidence I could find nothing which seemed in any way to justify the charges. It seemed to me that it was in view of the public service of these men that they were placed in that position. They being accused of criminal actions, and being proven neither guilty nor innocent, it seemed to me that the least the government could do was to reimburse them for their out of pocket expense for legal assistance.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a very serious matter to create a precedent of this kind. I am not going to discuss the matter now, but a perusal of the evidence leaves certain convictions in one's mind. I believe the minister is wrong in saying that any criminal proceedings were suggested. But compare this treatment with that of the man whom I mentioned this morning! Just compare what is being done for these men at Halifax with the treatment accorded to the man whom the former Secretary of State discussed in this house, who lost his job, against whom not a single word of evidence was adduced, and who still alleges that there never was any evidence which could be produced against him! Certainly that cannot be said in connection with this Halifax matter. But this other poor unfortunate, unimportant in the world, not occupying a position like that of a harbour commissioner, having no redress and no ability to hire lawyers, much less to write letters asking the department to be reimbursed for any expenditure, has nothing done for him. We are creating a precedent which may be very useful with respect to such unfortunates as I referred to this morning, and I only hope that the same measure of generosity will be extended to those who are less vocal, less important, and who cannot make the same contribution to the well-being of political parties that the commissioners of Halifax harbour could do. I cannot but think that this is a precedent which will have far-reaching consequences. The death of the judge was not the only difficulty; it had the effect of terminating the whole inquiry and necessitating a new inquiry being carried on by a new judge, and some of the evidence was no longer available, and would have to be heard over again by whoever was appointed. I was not in the country when the commission was appointed; I know nothing about the matter beyond reading the testimony that was brought down, but certainly the minister would find it difficult to say that he had read the evidence and was satisfied there was no cause for just complaint. However, I remember this one circumstance. Before the contract was made at all, certain steps were taken by the commissioners which it would be difficult to justify in dealing with a transaction of that kind. It will be recalled that the final contract in connection with the matter, which involved very heavy expenditures being made by this dominion, was executed between the defeat of the government and the coming into office of its successors. That is true at least in connection with part; I cannot say that it is true with respect to the whole. I point out to the minister that the precedent is very far-reaching and enables me to assert with some measure of authority the right of those to whom I referred this morning to receive similar treatment from the government of the day.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that these gentlemen were made defendants by the government. I take it that they were not being tried for a criminal offence.

Mr. BENNETT: Not at all.

Mr. HOWE: I might point out that there are precedents where an officer of the crown is tried and found not guilty. In those cases judges have awarded legal expenses, and had the judge lived to complete his report, that might very well have happened in this case. I think these gentlemen were placed in a most unfair position and I believe it is only just that their counsel fees should be paid.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not wish to read the documents which the minister laid on the table earlier in the session, but I doubt whether any independent mind could consider those documents and come to the conclusion that these gentlemen are entirely exonerated. It was not a criminal proceeding and they were not defendants; it was an inquiry under the Inquiries Act into the conduct of two servants of the government. I can understand the deputy minister's letter suggesting that in case they were exonerated, consideration might be given to the payment of their expenses, but certainly not otherwise.

Item agreed to.

Meteorological service — further amount required, $77,000.

Mr. BENNETT: We know about the meteorological service, but why this fairly large extra amount?

Mr. HOWE: This is almost entirely due to aviation work. There have been some observations made in the west and we have been required to do something in connection with the transoceanic service.

Item agreed to.

Loans and advances—to provide for soldier land settlement advances and for advances under the British family schemes recoverable from the British government, $323,800.

Mr. BENNETT: There is an additional amount in the supplementaries.

Mr. DUNNING: Just a minute; this item is not under this department.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but it can be put through. It is a matter of computation only.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—Trent canal—to provide for a grant by the Department of Railways and Canals towards the cost of the construction by the corporation of the town of Orillia of a dam, power house and log slide on the Gull river, $7,500.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister be good enough to inform the committee as to what action, if any, has been taken to turn this canal over to the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario? I saw something to that effect in the press.

Mr. HOWE: No action of that kind is being taken. We are consolidating certain leases with the hydro commission and have made certain arrangements for the regulating of levels better to suit their purpose. There is no change in the ownership of anything.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payment, under such conditions as the Minister of Finance may prescribe, to national harbours board or the respective corporations constituted to administer the harbours mentioned herein, of the amounts hereinafter set forth, to be applied in payment of the deficits (after payment of interest due the public but exclusive of interest on dominion government advances and depreciation) arising in the calendar year 1936 in the operation of the following harbours:

Halifax, $178,600.
Saint John, $59,300.
Quebec, $268,900.
Chicoutimi, $16,500.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister tell us if any of these harbour boards are meeting their interest charges, I mean of the four mentioned in this item?

Mr. HOWE: No. These are for operating deficits.

Mr. NEILL: Is Vancouver not meeting its interest charges?

Mr. HOWE: No, but it is doing better than meeting operating expenses.

Item agreed to.

Loans and investments—additional amount in excess of the sum of $5,303,000 already appropriated, required to provide for payment of additional sales tax, imposed by "an act to amend the Special War Revenue Act" (House of Commons Bill No. 76, 1936), to contractors for railway equipment ordered under the provisions of the Supplementary Public Works Construction Act, 1935 (section 9) on equipment delivered after May 1, 1936, $55,000.

Mr. BENNETT: There was some misunderstanding as to this item. Perhaps the minister could explain it in just a sentence.

Mr. HOWE: We bought some $15,000,000 worth of equipment on the Philadelphia plan and this is the extra two per cent of sales tax to be applied on the balance which has not been delivered.

Mr. STEWART: The purchaser has to pay it.

Mr. HOWE: The purchaser pays the interest on it.

Item agreed to.

Advances to national harbours board or the Vancouver harbour commissioners with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council, for such periods and upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, and to be applied in payment of capital expenditures in the harbour of Vancouver in the calendar year 1936, $11,500.

Mr. BENNETT: The effect is to put them all out of debt.

Mr. HOWE: It is to refund certain debentures outstanding in the hands of the public.

Item agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: I have just learned that a bill with a small amendment has come from another place. It is desirable to have it before the house and I therefore move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day in order that the Speaker may take the chair so that we can deal with that bill.

Progress reported.

COPYRIGHT AMENDMENT ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 55, to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister will explain the amendment.

Mr. RINFRET: In section 2, which amends section 10, subsection 1 of the act, after the words "lists of all dramatico-musical and musical works" the senate has added the words "in current use." The other amendments are grammatical. In lines 16 and 25 on page 2, the senate has substituted the word "its" for the word "such."

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Annuities Act, $150,000.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not proposed to change the rates this year?

Hon. N. McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): That is a matter which would have to be considered by the government. I am not prepared to make a statement at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: Can it be done by regulation?

Mr. ROGERS: By order in council.

Mr. BENNETT: But this government would not do anything like that.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the department contemplate any changes in the rates?

Mr. ROGERS: That is not the kind of question I can answer at this time. I am quite aware of the investigation that had taken place in the other house, and obviously we shall be giving consideration to the recommendation of that committee. The whole question of annuities in relation, for instance, to old age pensions, is one that must receive attention.

Item agreed to.

Conciliation and Labour Act, $30,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the estimated additional expenditure by reason of Quebec adopting old age pensions?

Mr. ROGERS: As my right hon. friend is perhaps aware, the administration of old age pensions has been transferred from the Department of Labour to the Department of Finance. I have not the figures available.

Item agreed to.

Royal commission on anthracite coal, $15,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Is this under the Department of Labour?

Mr. ROGERS: This is an appropriation to meet the expenses of a royal commission appointed to inquire into the importation and distribution of anthracite. The commissioner has been appointed.

Mr. CAHAN: Who is the commissioner?

Mr. ROGERS: Doctor H. M. Tory.

Item agreed to.

Employment and Social Insurance Act—further amount required, $25,000.

Mr. HEAPS: I wonder whether, before parliament prorogues, the government, through the Minister of Justice, will be in a position to make some statement as to its intention with regard to the legislation that has been declared ultra vires.

Mr. ROGERS: Some days ago the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said that before making a statement with respect to further action he would give consideration to the judgments delivered in this matter.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics—further amount required, $778,548.

Mr. BENNETT: Is this in connection with the census in western Canada?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Miscellaneous—Secretary of State, $10,000.

Mr. CAHAN: I see an appropriation of $68,971 under the heading of adjustment of war claims, for the Department of National Defence.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): That item, of course, does not belong to the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. CAHAN: What has the Department of National Defence to do with war claims?

Mr. RINFRET: I could not say, and the minister is not present. This item under my department has not to do with war claims; it is to provide for litigation in connection with certain pending cases which are still before the courts.

Item agreed to.

Public printing and stationery—plant—repairs and renewals—further amount required, $11,000.

Mr. CAHAN: Before we finally pass the estimates of the Secretary of State I should like to ask what justification there is for the appointment of an assistant to Mr. Castonguay, the chief electoral officer. That strikes me as an appointment which cannot possibly be justified.

Mr. RINFRET: If my hon. friend will allow me, that will come under the vote for the office of the chief electoral officer. This vote is for the printing bureau.

Mr. CAHAN: I wish my hon. friend in the meantime would try to think up some reasonable explanation.

Mr. RINFRET: That item will be called in a moment.

Item agreed to.

Civil government—Public Archives—salaries, and to provide for the continuance in office of J. B. Noble, senior bookbinder, from April 1, 1936, $92,020; contingencies, $9,200.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I should like to ask the minister whether any steps are being taken to fill the vacancy in the office of dominion archivist?

Mr. RINFRET: The matter is still under consideration. Sir Arthur Doughty, though pensioned, is still going to the archives, as everyone knows. He has been practically the founder of that department, and he is still giving much attention to it, but we are considering the matter.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I take it that someone else is acting as archivist. Sir Arthur Doughty is not acting, is he?

Mr. RINFRET: No. I can promise my hon. friend that we shall attend to that very soon.

Item agreed to.

Chief electoral officer—salaries and contingencies of office, $16,270.

Mr. RINFRET: I must say to my hon. friend that it is true that the position of assistant electoral officer has not been filled for a number of years, but the salary has been voted every year. I do not know what has been the experience of my hon. friend, but even when I was in office previously the chief electoral officer always pleaded that it was not wise to leave that office without an assistant.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RINFRET: My hon. friends may smile, but I think that is right. I am going to remind my hon. friend that when he appointed a dominion franchise commissioner he also appointed an assistant, and this is in exactly the same position. It is a very small office, consisting of Mr. Castonguay and two or three minor clerks, and if Mr. Castonguay goes away for a day or so the office is practically left alone. The fact is that not only were we right in appointing Mr. Stewart to that position but that an appointment should have been made some time ago. Now that we are going to revise the electoral law I think it is very wise to have assistants for both the franchise and electoral officers, to be trained as such under the main officers.

Mr. CAHAN: All I can say is that when I went into office in 1930 the office of assistant had not been filled for some years.

Mr. RINFRET: I think both parties are to blame.

Mr. CAHAN: The chief electoral officer then had the duties of both electoral officer and franchise commissioner. Early in the first year some question arose as to the duties of Mr. Castonguay's office, and I called Mr. Castonguay to my office and asked as to the need of appointing such an assistant. He told me it would be utterly indefensible for the government to appoint an assistant, because during a great part of the time he had very little to do. He said that he did not need an assistant, and that if his recommendation was required with regard to the appointment he certainly would not give it. That was the gist of his conversation with me. Subsequently the work of the office was divided, and at least half the work of the chief electoral officer was given to the franchise commissioner. Before the general election I suppose I must have had a score of applications for the appointment of somebody as assistant in this office. I again called Mr. Castonguay to my office and I have a very clear recollection concerning the interview. He stated that the appointment of an assistant was not necessary and that if it depended upon his recommendation he certainly would not recommend it. I so advised my colleagues, and no appointment was made. In fact a suggestion had been made in regard to the appointment of a particular individual, and I may not reveal what took place at a certain place but I shall say that I advised all my colleagues that I would not support that waste of money.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose there never was a greater piece of political jobbery in this country than the appointment of this man to this job. What the former Secretary of State has said I desire to support, because not merely by scores but by more than that people were asking for the position. It was too late to take steps to abolish it; if it had been abolished there would have been less trouble. The present government when in office from 1921 to 1930 did not fill the position. The commissioner then had the duties of both offices. In 1925-26 the position was not filled. When the general election of 1930 came on it was not filled. During the five intervening years it was not filled. In 1935 before the general election it was not filled. But now this $3,000 job has been filled by the appointment of the son of the president of the Liberal association in Ottawa, after the position had remained vacant all these years and after a general election, when the duties, according to the chief electoral officer, are very light indeed. In fact, it was because of the representations made by the then Secretary of State to his colleagues and after the closest inquiry, and after he had communicated to us the sense of what he has now said, that it was quite clear that no appointment could or should be made. This is another illustration of what my hon. friends may call the practice of economy.

Mr. RINFRET: I should not like to seem discourteous in not replying. I can only say what I said before, that in both these small offices we thought it was proper to have a chief officer and an assistant. I do not doubt for a moment that the statements made by the former Secretary of State are accurate, but I shall say on my personal word that Mr. Castonguay came to my office and pleaded with me more than once that we fill this job.

Mr. BENNETT: Since this government came into office?

Mr. RINFRET: I mean since this government came into office. His report was to the effect that when he left the office either for a trip or even for a few hours a day the office was left with no one there.

Mr. CAHAN: During all the years that my hon. friend was Secretary of State before 1930 was any such representation made to him by Mr. Castonguay?

Mr. RINFRET: No; I admit I do not recollect any. But take this session for instance; Mr. Castonguay has been in attendance most of the time on the special committee dealing with the amendment to the elections act.

Mr. CAHAN: He has nothing else to do.

Mr. RINFRET: I admit that the situation is awkward, because for a number of years the office has been left vacant, but I am wondering why it was so. It seems so natural that in a small office consisting of an electoral officer and two or three very minor clerks there should at least be an assistant to look after the office when the chief officer is busy elsewhere. I understand the estimate was voted year after year; I believe that the appointment is justifiable on that ground, and I again point to the analogy. When the former government appointed a dominion franchise commissioner he was given what I would call an assistant similar in kind to the one we have given Mr. Castonguay.

Mr. CAHAN: The reason was that he had something to do; there was something for the office to do in preparation of the electoral lists. But Mr. Castonguay has nothing to do except two or three days' work at each by-election and a certain amount of work in case of a general election.

Mr. RINFRET: I can only say that I shall look into the matter and see that the assistant is kept busy.

Mr. BENNETT: He cannot be.

Mr. STIRLING: What can he do?

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has said either too much or too little. He has said that Mr. Castonguay came to him since August 7, 1935, and pleaded with him to appoint an assistant.

Mr. RINFRET: I repeat that.

Mr. BENNETT: Then Mr. Castonguay is an active partisan, for during all the time the preceding government was in office he not only said there was no use for an assistant, but protested against the appointment of any such assistant. That shows that Mr. Castonguay is an active partisan and desired to hold that office open for a Liberal administration. That is a despicable act on his part, showing that he is unfit for a public office, when he reported to the former Secretary of State that an appointment should not be made and that he would not recommend it, and then pleads with the successor of the former Secretary of State to appoint an assistant, when the duties are less than they were at any time during the preceding five years. There has never been a more glaring case of the conduct of an official, indicating sheer partisanship and unfitness for his position, and it is one that should be remembered by this country.

Item agreed to.

Dominion franchise commissioner—salaries and contingencies of office, et cetera—further amount required, $6,000.

Mr. HEAPS: There was another gentleman appointed to assist in the work of revising the elections act. I think everyone who was on that committee appreciated the work he did. How long was that gentleman in the employ of the government, or have his services now been dispensed with?

Mr. BENNETT: I had a note to ask what Mr. Butcher was being paid.

Mr. RINFRET: I understand he has now finished his work.

Mr. BENNETT: What was he being paid?

An hon. MEMBER: He was engaged by the committee of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: No; it was not any committee of the house; he was appointed by the administration, and I had a note to ask when the estimate was up why he was appointed and what salary he was paid.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was retained in order to prepare material for the committee. He worked with the committee while it was in session. I have not at hand the amount he was paid. My right hon. friend will appreciate the reason why I cannot give it at the moment.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is his work finished, or is he still in the employ of the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; I understand his work was finished some days or weeks ago.

Item agreed to.

Mr. CAHAN: On item No. 221 of the general estimates my hon. friend the Secretary of State said there was an assistant to the dominion franchise commissioner. Who is he and when was he appointed?

Mr. RINFRET: I have that before me. Mr. Minns is his name, and I understand he was appointed at the same time as the commissioner himself.

Mr. CAHAN: I accept that, but I do not think he was appointed as a permanent assistant; he was seconded from another office to assist temporarily when the heavy work of the revision of the lists was on.

Mr. RINFRET: Lieutenant-Colonel E. H. Minns is the name, and he is paid $2,964. I might say he is still with the office. When I communicate with that office he usually replies.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. RINFRET: I think it was a very good appointment, and he is an efficient man.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not discussing his appointment, at all. The minister justified the appointment of an assistant—

Mr. RINFRET: I said there was an analogy.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes; an analogy. But there was no assistant appointed permanently to assist the franchise commissioner, if my memory is correct. There was seconded from another department a Mr. Minns to assist, but only while the preparation of the lists was on. No permanent appointment has been made. I could have recommended the permanent appointment of an assistant, but there was no necessity for a permanent appointment. So far as my memory goes no permanent appointment was made; an officer was loaned from another department to act temporarily.

Mr. RINFRET: My hon. friend knows, and I believe on a similar occasion he took the stand while Secretary of State that the two electoral officers are independent. The Secretary of State is only the means through whom the estimates are voted. Naturally they have more leeway, but I was led to believe from the minute I took office that Lieutenant-Colonel E. H. Minns was the assistant to Colonel Thompson, and I never had any intimation that his was a temporary position. I know he is a very busy man, and I have often had occasion to refer to him

Mr. MacNICOL: What is he doing? He cannot be doing anything at the present time.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Geneva—publications of League of Nations for distribution to members of parliament and a grant to the League of Nations Society in Canada, $3,000.

Mr. CAHAN: On a former occasion when these estimates were before the committee I expressed the desire to make a lengthy statement, but I shall restrict my observations considerably; if hon. members will permit me I shall make only a short statement.

My contention is, first, that the passing of certain orders in council prohibiting imports from Italy into Canada and certain exports from Canada to Italy were passed without proper authority; and second, that the agreement made with respect to the imposition of sanctions at Geneva was not made through an organ of the League of Nations, and that the suggestion that the League of Nations was recommending the imposition of sanctions, as a league, is not in accordance with the facts; and third, that the action with regard to sanctions is a repudiation of the pledges made to this parliament by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on a previous occasion, and not in accordance with a resolution introduced by the Prime Minister and passed unanimously by parliament in June, 1926.

I do not intend to enter upon a full discussion of the matters, but I should like to refer to them in order that they might be considered before further sanctions are imposed or further action taken, so that they may be considered in another light by the Prime Minister and his advisers.

On October 31, 1935, an order in council, P.C. 3461 was passed by His Excellency the Governor in Council, prohibiting the exportation, reexportation or transit to Italy or to any Italian possession of the arms, munitions and implements of war enumerated in a list attached thereto, and it was ordered that a proclamation to that effect be issued forthwith and published in The Canada Gazette.

That order in council was passed under the authority of section 290 of the Customs Act and was, in my opinion, a valid and effective exercise of a power conferred on the executive by legislation of parliament.

On November 15, 1935, an order in council, P.C. 3594 was passed by His Excellency the Governor in Council, prohibiting by article 1, imports from Italy into Canada; and by article 2, certain exports from Canada to Italy; and by article 3, prohibiting any person in Canada from making, contributing to, participating in or assisting in the making of any loan to or for the benefit of,—

(1) The government of any Italian territory, that is to say, the kingdom of Italy and the colonies or dependencies thereof and any territory in the effective military occupation of Italy;

(2) Any person, not being a body corporate, of whatever nationality resident in any such territory;—

A most extraordinary thing.

—or (3) Any person wherever resident being a body corporate incorporated under the law of any such territory.

A subsequent amendment of the same order provides that giving a guarantee or becoming party to a bill of exchange, or buying a bill of exchange, or giving credit in any form shall be deemed for the purposes of this article to be making a loan.

This order in council is entitled the Treaty of Peace (Covenant of the League of Nations) Order, 1935. But it was not made in pursuance of any obligations which Canada had as a member of the League of Nations, and it is a misnomer to call it a covenant of the League of Nations order.

The Customs Act in section 290, provides:

290. The governor in council may, from time to time, prohibit the exportation or the carrying coastwise or by inland navigation, of arms, ammunition and gunpowder, military and naval stores, and any articles which the governor in council deems capable of being converted into or made useful in increasing the quantity of military or naval stores, provisions or any sort of victual which may be used as food by man.

In so far as the order in council of November 15, 1935, P.C. 3594, prohibits exports from Canada within the terms of section 290 of the Customs Act, it was passed with the authority of parliament, but, in so far as the said order in council prohibits either exports or imports which are not authorized by the Customs Act,

I respectfully submit that the said order in council was passed without express parliamentary authority and is of doubtful validity.

Whence did the government assume that the extraordinary powers were derived which purport to be exercised in the order in council of November 15, 1935? The order recites that it is made under the provisions of the Treaties of Peace Act, 1919, but certainly no member of the House of Commons or of the Senate of Canada in 1919 conceived that the Treaties of Peace Act, 1919, would be construed, in 1935, to authorize the government of Canada, without the consent of parliament, that is, without the consent of both the Commons and the Senate of Canada, to prohibit all trade, all financial and business dealings between residents of Canada, and all those resident in Italy or in Italian territories, even though they be British or Canadian nationals temporarily resident there.

Moreover, if the government of Canada was authorized by that act of 1919 to impose economic sanctions against Italy or against any other nation, without consulting parliament, then the same act of 1919 authorized the government of Canada, without consulting parliament, to impose military and naval sanctions as suggested by the terms of the covenant of the League of Nations and to enter upon active warfare against any recalcitrant member of the League of Nations, Italy or any other nation, then or at a future date. When the parliament of Canada had the Treaties of Peace Act, 1919, under consideration, the Hon. W. S. Fielding, I well remember, inquired of the government of the day whether that involved the carrying out of the terms of the covenant. The question was first put, would it authorize the appointment of a delegate to Geneva in order that organization might be made under the league covenant, and the answer was a specific no, given by the Minister of Justice of the day, although later he did modify to a certain extent that emphatic no by saying that it might authorize the government to send a delegate to Geneva for the purposes mentioned.

The parliament of New Zealand, on November 24 last, enacted The League of Nations (Enforcement in New Zealand) Act, 1935. This special act authorized economic sanctions only, and provides that naval or military sanctions would require further special authorization by parliament. The New Zealand act empowers the governor general by order in council to make regulations enabling the dominion to fulfil its obligations under article 16 of the League of Nations to enforce economic sanctions, but it requires that all such regulations shall be laid before parliament within twenty days after the making thereof if parliament is then in session, and if not, then within twenty days after the commencement of the next ensuing session. This New Zealand act also provides that the regulations are to lapse on the expiration of two months after they have been so laid before parliament except so far as they are expressly validated or confirmed by an act of parliament. By that New Zealand legislation the rights of parliament are strictly preserved.

Again, the parliament of Australia, when called upon to deal with the matter of sanctions, passed an act relating to the application of sanctions against Italy for the purpose of implementing the proposals of the coordination committee of eighteen.

On November 7 last the Dail of the Irish Free State also enacted a special statute entitled the League of Nations (Obligations of Membership) Act for the same purpose.

No session of the parliament of Canada was convened to consider this matter, and if the government of Canada had authority under the Treaties of Peace Act, 1919, to enter upon and prescribe economic sanctions, it had exactly the same authority to provide for naval and military as well as economic warfare against Italy. The Treaties of Peace Act, 1919, which is chapter 30 of the acts of parliament for that year, recites that on behalf of the allied and associated powers treaties of peace had been signed with Germany and Austria, and then provides:

> (1) The governor in council may make such appointments, establish such offices, make such orders in council, and do such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the said treaties, and for giving effect to any of the provisions of the said treaties.

Did any mortal man in parliament or outside parliament in Canada conceive at that time, under that clause, which was intended and stated to be intended to wind up the matters relating to war under the war measures acts, and to adjust the conditions in Canada resulting from the war, that it was the intention that ten or twenty or one hundred years thereafter the government of the day would be authorized by such general terms to impose sanctions and to precipitate a state of war between this country and any other nation that was a party to the covenant?

Discussions in the commons in 1919 were participated in, if I remember correctly, by the Minister of Justice of this day. I believe that the Minister of Pensions was then in parliament, and that he asked very pertinent questions with regard to the purpose and intent of that act, and it was explained that it would merely authorize the government to adjust financial and other matters such as indemnities, reparations and the like, arising out of the war, and then awaiting adjustment and settlement. It was never suggested to parliament that for a decade or a century in the future that act would authorize the government of the day by order in council to exercise the powers and legislative functions of parliament in relation to all matters arising out of the operation under the covenant of the League of Nations.

When the covenant of the League of Nations was under discussion in the parliament and press of this country in 1919, special emphasis was laid upon the last two paragraphs of article 4 and the first paragraph of article 5 of the covenant. It was then explained and contended by those then advocating the ratification of the covenant, that in respect of any prospective decision of the council of the league that might specially affect the interests of any member of the league which was not represented on the council, such a member would be invited to send a representative to sit as a member of council and to vote in respect of that decision, and that, as such decision must be unanimous, Canada, even as such member pro tempore, would have the power to veto any proposed decision specially affecting Canada's interests. That was so stated to be the purpose and intent of the provision. This contention was based on the provisions of articles 4 and 5 of the covenant, which read as follows:

> Article 4. Any member of the league not represented on the council shall be invited to send a representative to sit as a member at any meeting of the council during the consideration of matters specially affecting the interests of that member of the league.
> Article 5. At meetings of the council, each member of the league represented on the council shall have one vote, and may have not more than one representative....
> Except where otherwise expressly provided in this covenant or by the terms of the present treaty, decisions at any meeting of the assembly or of the council shall require the agreement of all the members of the league represented at the meeting.

It was impossible to reach within the terms of the covenant any agreement between all the nations represented on the League of Nations to enter upon any campaign of sanctions against Italy. There were, and it was openly stated that there were, two or three who were recalcitrant and would not endorse a unanimous resolution to enforce sanctions against Italy. But those who were anxious to impose sanctions against Italy very adroitly arranged that, outside the league assembly, outside the organs of the league, representatives of the governments might be convened and a new organ created of those members who were agreeable to and accepted the proposal to impose effective sanctions against Italy. We saw it stated in the press from one end to the other of this country and in other countries as well that this committee which was so constituted was not a league organ but was created outside the league, and was not merely carrying out the terms of the covenant of the league. In my opinion it was a mere pretence to assume that the character and dignity of the league would cover such action as might be agreed upon independently by certain members of the league in the adoption and enforcement of sanctions against Italy.

Hon. members are aware that after full discussion in the assembly of the league and its committees in the years 1921, 1923, 1924 and 1925, various proposals were presented for amendments to sections 10 and 16 of the covenant of the league, which could only be invoked by such unanimous action as I have stated. In order to provide uniform methods whereby military and naval sanctions might be adopted and enforced, a treaty of mutual assistance was drafted at Geneva in 1923 and reported for the favourable consideration of members of the league. That draft treaty provided in detail for the coordination of all measures for the enforcement of military and economic sanctions against a recalcitrant member of the league. That draft treaty was intended to define and supplement the existing obligations contained in article 16, and to obviate the necessity of unanimous agreement for the adoption and enforcement of sanctions.

The Prime Minister of that day, who is the Prime Minister of to-day, in a memorandum to the League of Nations, signed by himself on behalf of Canada, declined to approve the proposed treaty of mutual assistance on the ground that Canada would not agree "to transfer the right to decide upon the scope of the action Canada should take from the Canadian parliament to the council of the League of Nations." The letter of the present Prime Minister rejecting, on behalf of Canada, the proposed treaty of mutual assistance was dated July 9, 1924, and will be found in the records of the assembly of the League of Nations for 1924, at page 146. This letter reads in part as follows:

> Canada has already indicated disapproval of the interpretation of the terms of article 10 of the covenant as implying an obligation upon her to intervene actively under that article. The proposed treaty creates an obligation wider in its extent and more precise in its implications than any which article 10 could be interpreted as imposing, and it proposes, moreover, to transfer the right to decide upon the scope of the action Canada should take from the Canadian parliament to the council of the League of Nations. It is true that, for the purpose of deciding upon the assistance to be given by Canada, the council would include a Canadian representative and that the draft limits the liability of a signatory in another continent to measures not involving naval, military or air operations.

In that respect it was less onerous than the terms of the covenant. The Prime Minister continued:

But the presence of a Canadian representative on the council would hardly compensate for the, at least nominal, transfer of authority, and, again, Canada's position in the British empire effects the protection afforded her by the continental limitation of which in any event the utility is uncertain since it appears doubtful if hostile action can widely or indeed safely be undertaken by any state upon the principle of limited liability.

There was then no doubt in the mind of the present Prime Minister that the imposition of economic or military sanctions by Canada against any recalcitrant member of the league must first be specially authorized by the parliament of Canada. At that time public discussion of the liability of members of the league in regard to the enforcement of military and economic sanctions against an aggressor state became very lively indeed. The proposed treaty of mutual assistance in the carrying into effect of these sanctions failed to obtain general support and was never brought into force. Not only did Canada not accept it, but she made independent representations to Great Britain with respect to it and Great Britain failed to accept it as well.

As a result of these discussions, the matter was again brought up at the imperial conference which met at London in 1926. That imperial conference adopted a resolution recommending that a certain procedure should be observed in the negotiation, signature and ratification of international treaties and conventions. On his return to Canada, the Prime Minister of that day expressed himself as not being satisfied with the form of the resolution proposed and approved at that imperial conference of 1926. On June 21, 1926, as reported on page 4758 of Hansard of that year, the Prime Minister of that day, the right hon. gentleman who is Prime Minister to-day, submitted this resolution of the imperial conference for the approval of the House of Commons, but he attached to the imperial conference proposal a very significant clause. The Prime Minister's resolution, after citing the procedure mentioned, proceeds as follows to indicate that independent action should be taken by Canada:

This house approves of the procedure proposed for the negotiation, signature, and ratification of treaties and conventions, and advises further that before His Majesty's Canadian ministers advise ratification of a treaty or convention affecting Canada, or signify acceptance of any treaty, convention or agreement involving military or economic sanctions, the approval of the parliament of Canada should be secured.

At that time I sat as a member of His Majesty's loyal opposition and the Conservative members of that opposition asked me to discuss in the house the terms of that resolution. During his remarks on that occasion, the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 4756 of Hansard:

We declare that in regard to the ratification of treaties, conventions or agreements involving military or economic sanctions we stand first, last and always for approval in the first instance by the parliament of Canada.

In reply to a question put by myself, the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 4768 of Hansard:

What I wish to make clear, however, was that all treaties or conventions involving military or economic sanctions must come before parliament, and where military or economic sanctions were involved I wished to make the terms broad enough to include agreements, so that in referring to treaties or agreements of any kind we should not have a difference over the mere use of words.

In commenting upon this, the former member for Labelle, Mr. Bourassa, gave the following interpretation, to which no member of the government or any member of the house dissented at the time:

The government invites the cooperation of parliament and declaration by parliament that no treaty, convention or agreement, whether Canada is mentioned or not, but involving military or economic sanctions, shall be accepted by the government of Canada without the approval of parliament.

Representing for the day His Majesty's opposition, I commended highly the stand taken by the Prime Minister. The result was that the resolution which I have mentioned passed this house unanimously.

Therefore I was somewhat surprised on February 11 last, with respect to the statement of the Prime Minister regarding the sanctions enforced against Italy by Canada, by orders in council to which I have called attention, and without parliament being called together, without the opinion of parliament being taken, without that confirmation of the action of the government which was necessary if the pledge given to parliament and the resolution adopted by parliament were to be carried into effect, as understood at the time, in 1926—I was somewhat surprised, I say, at the statement of the Prime Minister on that date:

On October 29th I issued a statement to the effect that Canada would apply these sanctions. Sanctions were enforced by Canada on the following dates: Embargo on the export of arms, October 31st, 1935; prohibition of credits to Italy, November 15th, 1935; embargo on imports from Italy, November 15th, 1935; embargo on exports of certain key products to Italy, November 15th, 1935.

I have referred to these orders in council, and so far as I can discover, apart from the particular section of the Customs Act which partly authorized the first order, there was no authority outside of the Treaties of Peace Act, 1919, the purpose and import of which had time and time again been stated to parliament as being restricted to the closing up of incidental matters which were left to be settled between the allied governments and the other governments after the Treaty of Peace had been ratified. But certainly the imposition and enforcement of such sanctions by order in council, under a new agreement made by this government's representatives, without the sanction of parliament, was a violation of the resolution of the Prime Minister, which I have read and which was unanimously approved on June 21, 1926. In discussing the matter at the opening of the session a question was put in reply to which the present Prime Minister said, as reported at page 94 of Hansard of the present session:

May I say to my right hon. friend, because I understand his difficulty in appreciating the situation, that the committee of coordination at Geneva was not a League of Nations committee in the sense in which I have no doubt he regards it. It was not a committee of the assembly nor a committee of the council. It was a committee of representatives of different countries represented at Geneva who took under review the question of deciding what particular sanctions the different countries that were representatives of the league would agree upon. This committee set up a further committee of eighteen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend pardon me a moment. I understand it is agreeable to hon. members that we should proceed past eleven o'clock, seeing that there is a bare possibility of proroguing some time to-night. To enable us to sit after eleven it will be necessary to have a motion put and adopted, with the Speaker in the chair. I would therefore move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move that the house shall not be adjourned at eleven o'clock p.m. this day and that standing order 7 in relation thereto be suspended.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the Prime Minister until what time he intends that the house shall sit.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will depend on hon. members. I believe there is a disposition on the part of all to conclude some time to-night, and unless there is strong objection we shall proceed until we do.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the representative of the crown attend after midnight?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The deputy of his excellency has been extremely obliging as far as parliament is concerned, and has informed me that he is prepared to come at any time. Moreover, there is precedent for parliament proroguing as late as half past one o'clock in the morning.

Mr. HEAPS: There are some hon. members who think we might sit for a while longer and if necessary come back in the morning and finish up early.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We might see what progress we make.

Mr. POULIOT: Ask St. Lawrence-St. George to make it snappy.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Geneva—Publications of League of Nations for distribution to members of parliament and a grant to the League of Nations Society in Canada, $3,000.

Mr. CAHAN: At a meeting of the council of the League of Nations—

The CHAIRMAN: I regret having to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. BENNETT: But he was interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN: He was given extra time on account of the interruption.

Mr. BENNETT: But the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps I am taking a mistaken view of the importance of this question, but I do regard it as very important indeed. At a meeting of the council of the League of Nations held on October 7, 1935, a committee of the council, appointed on October 5, reported in effect:

(1) That a state of war exists between Italy and Ethiopia.

(2) That war had been resorted to by Italy in disregard of article 12 of the covenant of the League of Nations.

It was perfectly clear, and admitted, that the ordinary procedure under which unanimity would be required in the council and in the assembly in order to carry out, under the League of Nations, the proposed economic war against Italy by imposing sanctions, was impossible of achievement; and therefore, at a plenary meeting of the League of Nations held on October 10, 1935, the president made a statement which, in the official report of that plenary meeting of the assembly, reads as follows:

The president said that the general committee had considered, with a view to laying suggestions before the assembly, what arrangements might be suggested for the constitution of the organ of coordination. The delegation of Italy, vice-president of the assembly, sitting in that capacity in the general committee, had stated, at the opening of the meeting, whilst repeating his earlier reservations, that he would abstain from taking part in the deliberations.

Then he proceeds:

He would add that the organ which the members of the league were invited to constitute was not an organ of the assembly or of the council. It would be a kind of conference of members meeting to consult together with a view to applying the provisions of article 16.

That was indeed a very suave and tactful way of stating that a new international agreement was proposed to be framed by which the nations which accepted it would commit themselves to the imposition of economic or military sanctions against Italy. It was a coordinating committee. It was not deemed to be an organ of the council or an organ of the assembly of the league. It was merely a meeting of representatives of member states to frame a new agreement among themselves as to the enforcement of sanctions against Italy. At page 267 of the Journal the Baron Aloisi of Italy said:

The proposed committee could not therefore be regarded as in any way an organ of the league. As the president himself had explained, it was only a conference of certain states consulting together on the steps which they would agree to take on their own responsibility.

I am anxious to conclude and shall go through my notes as rapidly as possible. At page 267 of the Journal the president replied:

No body of the league had the power to decide compulsorily for all members that one of them had committed a breach of the covenant.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Then he went on to say:

Having replied to the first observation of the delegate of Italy, he would admit that the delegate of Italy was right in respect of the doubts expressed regarding a vote on the resolution if the text before the assembly was to be regarded as a formal resolution of the assembly. In that case the question of unanimity or voting by a majority would arise. He had felt bound to state at once that, in the present instance, the assembly was not asked to consider a resolution in the strict sense of the word but an invitation addressed by the assembly to the states members.

The original draft used the word "invites" and he suggested that it should be replaced by "recommends" because there was no authority on the part of the assembly to invite such a conference. Then, without going fully into the matter, this coordination committee set up a committee of eighteen, consisting of the representatives of eighteen states. When this committee met Mr. Coulondre, the French representative—and I know Mr. Coulondre as one of the most astute officials on the permanent staff of the French foreign office—said:

The committee of eighteen, an offshoot of the coordination committee, was a conference of sovereign states—

And, as a conference of sovereign states it sought to reach an agreement between the several states respecting the enforcement of economic sanctions. Later the matter was dealt with. At this stage I do not intend to deal with the various discussions whereby Canada was represented on this coordination committee, or with the proposal of Doctor Riddell, as the representative of the sovereign state of Canada, or with the fact that the various representatives in discussing that proposition referred to it, as the official report shows, as the Canadian proposition.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member, although he is making a very entertaining speech, is reading it.

Mr. CAHAN: I have to read extracts which are taken from the official reports of the League of Nations, and for convenience I have made typewritten copies. That was referred to as the Canadian proposal and the list of petroleum and derivatives, coal, iron, cast iron and steel, was referred to as the Canadian list. I do not think that was with a view to imposing any special responsibility upon Canada, but I can well understand how the press in considering these proposals would use the same term.

That agreement was reached with regard to the imposition of sanctions covering certain lists which were before the committee.

The committee of eighteen reported back to the coordination committee and the coordination committee adopted the report. So Canada entered into a new formal agreement with regard to the imposition of sanctions, an agreement which was not covered by the terms of the covenant and which was made through an organ, so-called, outside the council and the assembly.

I suggest that when the Prime Minister, as Minister of External Affairs, proposed the orders in council adopting and imposing sanctions, which have been laid upon the table of the house, he certainly had forgotten altogether the resolution of this house, introduced by himself, under which no agreement of any kind would be made thereafter—and that was in June, 1926—with regard to the imposition of economic or military sanctions without parliament being convened and confirming that agreement. I think, first, that except by resorting possibly to the peace, order and good government clause of certain then existing statutes, to which the Prime Minister would not resort under any circumstances on that date but to which he has resorted on several occasions since, there was no statutory or moral right or authority on the part of the government to adopt and impose the sanctions which I have mentioned, other than the embargo on the export of arms.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, I am sure my hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George does not regret more than I do that at this stage of the session and at this hour of a closing day it is not possible to go fully into the all important matters he has been discussing. What my hon. friend has said does bring out very clearly how involved with respect to the matter of sanctions the whole question of procedure at Geneva has been and also the necessity of careful revision of some features of the covenant of the league and the obligations assumed thereunder. That revision may be expected to take place this fall. I believe that what my hon. friend has put on the record this evening will be of assistance not only to our own government but to other governments as well in reviewing the entire situation.

As I understand my hon. friend's point of attack, it is mainly that the present administration imposed sanctions by order in council when a resolution had passed this house some years ago to the effect that the government should not in future enter into agreements to impose sanctions without the approval of parliament in the first instance. May I say in just a word that I had not forgotten the resolution of 1926. In fact it was very much in my mind at the time the government had to deal with this question. But it was perfectly clear to me then as it is now that the resolution related, not to treaties and agreements that had been entered into in the past, but to treaties and agreements which might be entered into thereafter. We were not entering into a new treaty; we were taking action under a treaty which had been in existence for some years. My hon. friend takes exception to our having acted under that treaty. May I say that if our course is to be condemned in that particular the British government itself must also be condemned, because it adopted an identical course, it proceeded under precisely the same treaty. The action taken by the British government in passing the orders in council imposing sanctions was taken under the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919 the action of the British government was taken before the Canadian government took the action it did.

May I point out further that the British government took the action it did by order in council while its parliament was in session. In the case of the other dominions I think most of their parliaments were in session at the time. We were faced with a situation which was one of great reality. It required to be viewed in a realistic manner. The problem with respect to the imposition of sanctions for the most part had presented itself before this administration came into office. To a certain extent it might be said that our hands were tied with respect to the action it would be possible to take. I prefer to say that we had to consider very carefully how parliament would view our action in imposing sanctions by order in council. Considering all the circumstances we felt that, having regard to the situation itself, to the position of hon. gentlemen opposite when they themselves were in office and the support which we as an administration had received from the country and would have in this parliament there was little doubt that, as soon as parliament did assemble, our actions would receive the support of hon. members on all sides. I think we were fully justified in making that assumption and acting in the light of it. The fact that this is the first time this question has been raised in parliament since parliament assembled some five months ago is the best evidence that the administration has a right to feel that it did act wisely and wholly in accordance with the wishes of hon. members of the House of Commons in this matter.

I do not wish to take up time, but I think it is important to make clear the following facts, namely, that the assembly met on September 9 and adjourned on September 28; that the Italian forces entered Ethiopia on October 2; that the members of the council of the league approved the report of subcommittee indicating that Italy had begun war in disregard of the obligations of article 12 of the covenant on October 7; that the assembly concurred in the action of the council and passed resolutions recommending the setting up of a committee to coordinate measures to be taken under article XVI on October 10; that the committee of coordination set up the subcommittee of eighteen on October 11; that the coordination committee adopted four sanctions proposals on the following dates: October 11, prohibition of export of arms; October 14, prohibition of loans and credits; October 19, prohibition of imports of Italian goods; October 19, embargo on export of certain metals and other exports to Italy.

The committee recommended that the first recommendation should be put into force forthwith. All of that was done while hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, while my right hon. friend the present leader of the opposition was Prime Minister. All that had taken place before the present government assumed office at all. We came into office on October 23. We then had to consider whether we should immediately call parliament before imposing sanctions. Parliament could not have been brought together for at least another six weeks. What position would Canada have been in before the rest of the world had we called parliament together to consider what action should be taken on sanctions, and had waited six weeks or more before these sanctions were imposed, when it was recommended at Geneva by the powers represented there that sanctions, to be of value, should be imposed with as little delay as possible; forthwith, in fact? I have mentioned that the recommendation with respect to the prohibition of export of arms urged that the prohibition should be imposed forthwith. That was done by Canada on October 31, P.C. 3461, under section 290 of the Customs Act. I think my hon. friend will agree that under the Customs Act we had authority to do that. With respect to the second recommendation, the prohibition of loans and credits, on October 14 the committee—

Mr. CAHAN: Which committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This coordination committee.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. CAHAN: No; the coordination committee did not act until November 2.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my hon. friend. I should have said the committee of eighteen.

Mr. CAHAN: That is a subcommittee simply making a recommendation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This committee invited the governments of the principal states to put into operation at once such measures as could be enforced without fresh legislation, and to take all practicable steps to secure that the measures recommended be completely put into operation by October 31, 1935. Let me repeat, it was October 23 when the administration assumed office.

Mr. CAHAN: May I be allowed to make a statement, because I think the right hon. gentleman is giving an impression which he does not intend. It is true that the subcommittee reported at that time, but the coordination committee did not take action until November 2, at 3.30 p.m., when it passed a resolution requesting that full legal effect be given to proposals two, three and four by the members of the league by November 18. All that went before November 2 was simply preliminary conversations by certain subcommittees.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The different countries had to indicate what they would be prepared to do before the committee of coordination could take the action it did. As I say, and as my hon. friend says, these were necessary preliminary undertakings, and it was the only way in which matters could be arranged. It was in this way that the recommendations were brought into force at different dates by different countries, though the four chief European banking countries, Great Britain, France, Belgium and Switzerland, arranged to bring the recommendation regarding loans and credits into force simultaneously on October 29.

Mr. BENNETT: They asked to have them brought in by November 18, I think.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is quite correct. In Canada, at the beginning of November, the Minister of Finance secured the cooperation of the chartered banks and other financial institutions in carrying out the recommendation. On November 15 an order in council, P.C. 3594, was passed prohibiting loans and credits to Italy. It was brought into force on November 18.

With reference to the third and fourth recommendations, the Secretary General of the league requested each government on October 20, to inform the committee of coordination as soon as possible, and not later than October 28, 1935, of the date on which it could be ready to bring the measures provided for into operation. On November 2, as has been mentioned, the committee of coordination adopted a resolution fixing November 18 as the date of entry into force of these recommendations.

Mr. BENNETT: Nos. 2, 3 and 4.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. The Canadian government brought them into force by order in council on November 15, effective November 18.

May I point out another circumstance which I suggest ought to be considered. The government had to consider the entire situation and ask itself what would be the result of bringing parliament together some six weeks later, the first session after a general election. One measure which we felt to be vital to the success of trade in Canada was if possible, a reciprocal agreement with the United States. Certainly no reciprocal agreement with that country could have been negotiated during that period of time had the government been obliged to take immediate steps to bring parliament into session. We would have lost all opportunity of getting that measure underway or securing it at all. A new government taking office after a general election, and after a previous government has held office for more than five years, is faced with a multitude of problems. To have immediately brought parliament together to deal with the question of sanctions would have meant that, so far as the business of the session was concerned, it would have been practically impossible to have had legislation in readiness for hon. members. Moreover, a wholly erroneous impression of the European situation might thereby have been created. If there had been the slightest probability that there would have been objection to not bringing hon. members together for the purpose of obtaining their consent before sanctions were imposed, I say that, notwithstanding all the difficulties there might have been, parliament would have been summoned for that purpose. But we believed—and I think this session has confirmed the wisdom of our decision—that, when they assembled, hon. members would view this matter in the light of all the circumstances, with which the government was faced, and would feel that the government had acted in a way which was most in accordance with their wishes and most in accordance with the will of the Canadian people.

I should like to put before the committee the position in which the country would have been if we had waited before imposing sanctions until parliament could assemble. This dominion would have been responsible for not having agreed to impose sanctions at a time when practically all other parts of the British empire and other countries members of the league had imposed them. We would have been open to criticism on this score. I think my right hon. friend, had he been in office, would have found, just as we found, ample precedent and authority in the example of the British government with respect to imposing sanctions by order in council, under the act to which I have referred.

I say all this without in any way wishing to indicate that I do not think the hon. member was quite within his rights in bringing up the matter and speaking as he did and, in fact, criticizing the government as he did. I fully expected that criticism would be made. I can only thank the hon. member for the considerate manner in which he has spoken, and I thank the house as well for not having found it necessary to seek to bring any criticism on this score until the last hours in the last day of the session.

Mr. CAHAN: With respect to New Zealand may I say that that country convened a meeting of its parliament and passed the League of Nations Enforcement in New Zealand Act, 1935, on November 24. They delayed until after November 24 to put their order in council into effect. They also provided that within twenty-eight days after the commencement of the next ensuing session, the one after the special session, the regulations would lapse unless parliament should ratify them within twenty-eight days after the next ensuing session. What the Prime Minister has said has some force. It has this force: That a government having serious problems to face must at times face them by taking action for which there may be no clear statutory authority at the time, feeling confident that when parliament meets it will by act of parliament ratify and confirm the action the government has taken. That has to be done frequently, in times of emergency. But when I raised the question at the beginning of the session and suggested an early discussion the Prime Minister asked to have it postponed to a later date, and suggested that at such later date the matter would be brought up.

Some hon. members on this side of the house were waiting until the last bill was brought down expecting that the government would bring down a bill and ask the house to ratify and confirm the action it had taken with regard to sanctions. That was not done; it has not been done to date, though I really expected there would then be an opportunity to discuss the whole matter. Because, if this is to be taken as a precedent—and I trust it will never be taken as a precedent—then Canada may be forced into war, without parliament having been advised or given an opportunity to consider or prescribe such course of action as parliament may desire to follow. That is all I have to say at this time. At some future date, when there is an opportunity, I should like to say more, but I do not wish to prolong the discussion at this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with my hon. friend when he says that the action of the government at this time should not be regarded as a precedent. I feel as strongly as he does that parliament should, in all of these matters, have its voice heard before the country is committed to anything that may involve us in a war.

I make no apology, however, for not having invited a debate on this subject at an earlier stage of the session. There again, what my hon. friend has just said about a government facing actual situations and deciding its course in the light of them, has its force. I believe I can say now, in the light of what has been said by the Prime Minister of Great Britain as to the significance which the imposition of further sanctions upon Italy would have, that there was the possibility of a debate in this house arousing adverse comment and possibly more in the way of misunderstanding in Europe. That would not have helped the situation there. After all, while the situation in Europe is of great concern to all the people in Canada, it is of infinitely greater concern to the people of European countries. They, I believe, were entitled to first consideration. I believe this parliament has contributed to the solution of that situation, in so far as there has thus far been a solution, much more effectively by its silence, up to the present—so far as it has been silent—than it would have contributed by any prolonged discussion.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am not going to enter into a lengthy speech at this hour of the night, but I am as anxious as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) or any other hon. member to speak on this subject. I do not agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his last observation that anything which would be said in this parliament regarding Canada's foreign policy or her position in respect to sanctions, or on any other question, would be as upsetting as was feared.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend at once? I hesitate to do so, but she has just said "or any other question." I have made no such statement. I confined what I had to say to the present very critical situation as it has been in the last month or two, and as the government has known it to have been.

Miss MACPHAIL: I disagree with the Prime Minister. I do not think a discussion in this house would have been upsetting, and I think it is a left-over of colonialism that we cannot discuss in the House of Commons matters which are freely discussed in the British house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Again may I say to my hon. friend that I pointed out in this house that anyone who wished to bring up the subject could bring it up at any time we were going into committee of supply, but that he must take the responsibility for bringing it up, rather than that the government should take responsibility for introducing the discussion. I made that clear.

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes. Well, a debate in which the government would not take any part would have been a one-sided debate, so that the Prime Minister—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, the government would have taken its part all right, but it would not have had the responsibility for provoking the debate.

Miss MACPHAIL: I doubt very much if the Prime Minister would have stated the position had the debate come earlier in the session.

I want to proceed now to say what I started out to say. I think we should have had a debate, not only for the one day which we were promised, but for several days, on Canada's foreign policy. We spent one month debating the trade agreement between Canada and the United States, which could not be in any way changed. A month is a long time, and I think most of the debate was useless.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It could all have been changed if the house had not approved it. My hon. friend is mistaken in saying that anything is done without the approval of the house.

Miss MACPHAIL: In theory that is true. In practice the house would approve it when the government approves it, because the government in this instance is almost the house. But we did take a month on the trade agreement between Canada and the United States; we were promised by the Prime Minister himself a day to discuss Canada's foreign policy or external affairs, and we did not get anything like a day. All we got before six o'clock was a very interesting statement by the Prime Minister, for which I thank him, and in which he went further in the direction of my thinking than I expected he would go. It was a very interesting statement. It was one that touched many angles of the problem and one that gave me a desire to discuss it. But after the Prime Minister had finished his statement at six o'clock there were just two hours left, so that the day that we were to have for external affairs boiled down to just two hours. For this reason I protest. It is impossible to go on at this time; no one feels like it and the committee is not in a mood for it. But at another session the importance of Canada's external or foreign policy should be recognized by allowing plenty of time for discussion. We spend days and weeks in fairly futile talk, and why could we not have a debate on Canada's foreign policy? It seems hard to find a real reason. In the Prime Minister's speech, which I enjoyed, the other day, in the speech made by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), to a degree in the speeches made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), one could see a lack of clearness of thinking which I have and which we all have. That is, Canada is only feeling its way to a much more distinctively Canadian foreign policy than we have ever had before.

Three lines of thought showed very distinctly in at any rate three of those speeches: the collectivist or league line of thinking, which in theory we all once subscribed to, the imperialistic line of thinking, and last, the more isolationist or North American way of thinking. I am not clear and I do not believe any other hon. member is very clear about what he or she thinks Canada should do, other than we feel that Canada's foreign policy should be determined by Canada's interests and should not be too closely allied either with empire policy, or with league policy unless league policy is materially changed from what it is at the moment. I am not going on, because it is useless to do so. But I repeat that at another session not only one day but several days should be available so that the House of Commons may in some degree clarify its thinking on this subject, which is certainly a very important one, and much more important than, shall we say, the trade agreement with the United States, on which we spent a very long time.

Mr. BENNETT: The address which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George delivered was prepared over six weeks ago. We—for I associate myself with him—have been watching for an opportunity, believing that the government would ultimately introduce a bill to ratify what had taken place. I think it was not too much to expect, when we were asking about legislation that would probably be included, but it was not introduced. As to dealing with the matter on going into supply, we had only Mondays and Tuesdays and Wednesdays. If one will look at the record he will find that the number of days we had an opportunity to do that were extremely limited. I have been waiting for an opportunity to take up what I dealt with, for instance, to-day, and the opportunity was very slow to present itself. I quite agree that the position the Prime Minister has mentioned is one of extreme difficulty, and one that I think any one of us, if we had to meet it, would find it difficult to deal with in any way, perhaps other than the way in which it was dealt with, having regard to the fact that we had a general election and it was difficult to call the house together, the slowness of making returns to writs, and matters of that kind. But it is competent for this parliament by proper enactment to express its ratification of what had taken place and make it retroactive in character, that is, to validate the order in council in that sense, and we have been doing that this session with respect to many matters, carrying the provision back to a date antecedent to that on which we legislated. I say it would have been quite competent to have done that in view of the commitments which were made in 1926, which were unanimously adopted by this house, in consequence, I think, largely of the general expressions that were made by the Prime Minister in answer to the discussion which was precipitated by the questions of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. That is the only observation I have to make, because I appreciate the difficulties the Prime Minister has had. My real criticism is that no validating legislation was offered to this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I just say that the reason no validating legislation was offered in this parliament is precisely the same as the reason why no further legislation was found to be necessary in the British parliament. The British government acted by order in council under the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919. Its action was clearly approved by the parliament of Great Britain. I think we were equally wise and sensible in adopting a like attitude in this parliament. I say to my right hon. friend that I do not believe he himself would have sought to propose any vadidating legislation at any stage of this parliament except the one we have now reached.

Mr. BENNETT: My observation was made in view of the commitments entered into in 1926, which were not made by the British parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That commitment, as I have already said, related to agreements and treaties that might be entered into after that date, not with respect to obligations which had been assumed prior to that time.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a clear distinction in the resolution between treaties and agreements and conventions.

To provide for the cost of printing reports, $1,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I must protest against this procedure. We cannot find the items as fast as you call them. There are limits beyond which this committee ought not to be allowed to go. If we are not permitted to find the items before they are carried, I think it is high time we gave up for to-night and came back in the morning. I wanted to speak for a moment on this item, and I shall not hold up the committee very long as I do not want to disregard the general feeling to-night. Again and again some of us have felt that our library is a disgrace to this parliament. We are facing the necessity of appointing a new librarian in the near future and I think we ought to have a man who knows library work. There should also be a reorganization of the whole institution from top to bottom along modern lines. I know a little about libraries and I do not know of any staff more kindly and considerate than the one we have here, but I think it is perfectly ridiculous that the parliament of Canada should not have a better system in its library. I want to protest against the appointment of a new man simply for political reasons and not one who is thoroughly conversant with library work. Any assistants who are appointed should be thoroughly trained in this work. Instead of putting up buildings to house the mounted police, we should provide a decent stack room for our library. Also we could have an index along modern lines. I should have liked to have the time to deal at some length with what I think might be done, but at this time I must be content with these remarks. I again protest against this rushing through of estimates which occurs year after year and which does not give a chance to hon. members to express their views.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

Empire settlement scheme, $6,800.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What is this empire settlement scheme?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If this is what is to happen in this committee we might as well admit that this boasted parliamentary institution of ours is becoming a mere farce. I asked a plain question and I think I should receive an answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let it stand for a minute.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the minister himself does not know what the scheme is, then I think it is a rather serious state of affairs.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I ask my hon. friend to give me an opportunity to get this information. I think it is asking too much to expect a minister to carry the details of four or five departments in his head. I do not think the tone of the hon. member's remarks is called for at all. If he will give me an opportunity of getting the deputy here he will have his information in a few minutes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In the meantime, may I suggest that if it is too much to ask that of the minister, is it not too much to ask the committee to pass these items without any information being given?

Mr. CRERAR: I quite agree with that and I am not dissenting from the criticism my hon. friend has made. In 1923 there was inaugurated what was known as the 3,000 family scheme for the purpose of bringing 3,000 British families to settle in Canada. That was a cooperative arrangement and it has been discussed at various times in the house in previous sessions. This item is simply to clean up some of the outstanding unsettled items with the British government.

Item agreed to.

Soldier and general land settlement—
To provide for the cost of administration of soldier settlement and general land settlement, and for the cost of administration of soldier settlement staff, performing investigations for the war veterans' allowance committee and Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, $786,300.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Could we have an explanation of this large item which involves an increase of $12,700?

Mr. CRERAR: The increase is practically all due to the statutory increases to the employees in that branch.

Mr. BENNETT: In connection with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, may I say that I think those who occupied positions under this act and who were appointed under the statute for five years should be given something more than a month's notice of the termination of their employment. There are two or three cases which I think the government would do well to consider carefully and determine whether it would not be consistent with the general view taken by the government in connection with these appointments to do something more than has been done. There is not a single person left except the judges.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend is discussing an entirely different matter.

Mr. BENNETT: This item refers to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I merely suggest to the government that they give sympathetic consideration to these cases. Similar representations were made to the late government in connection with other matters of the same kind and they were dealt with in a much more sympathetic manner.

Mr. CRERAR: May I point out to my right hon. friend that this item has nothing to do with the administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. This is merely some appraisal work which the soldier settlement board inspectors do when requested by the authorities in charge of the administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. BENNETT: As long as it comes under the act, that is all I desire to say, because it involves the payment of costly administration for part of the work done under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and it affords me an opportunity, not to say the things I might properly say, but to suggest that it would be at least—

Mr. STIRLING: Decent.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend says 'decent." I put it no more strongly than this, that it would be at least reasonable for the government to consider giving more sympathetic treatment than has been accorded to those who made arrangements in consequence of their appointment, changed their homes and found themselves, with a month's pay, relieved of their positions under, in some cases, extremely difficult conditions. I merely ask the minister to give careful and sympathetic consideration to the matter. The Minister of Finance is, of course, more vitally affected than the Minister of the Interior. The dictates of reason, of sympathy and of the decent amenities of public life would warrant more sympathetic treatment being accorded the people of whom I have spoken than they have yet received.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—
To provide for the administration of the Royal Canadian Mint, including salaries, contingencies, retiring and other allowances, and general expenses, $230,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why the increase?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): An extension has been built owing to an increase in business. The increase is to provide for statutory increases in wages and salaries, $9,500; for equipment for the new refinery, $5,000; for recovering values from the old refinery, $7,000; and for contingencies. The increased expenditure is due to new business.

Item agreed to.

Administration of the Old Age Pensions Act, $12,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Can the minister give particulars of the probable increase by reason of Quebec accepting old age pensions?

Mr. HEAPS: Perhaps the minister will give us an approximate figure as to the number of persons he expects to come under the provisions of the act in the province of Quebec.

Mr. DUNNING: The final estimates have not been completed with respect to the anticipated cost in the province of Quebec. Naturally experience is more important than any estimate in connection with a matter of this kind, but it is anticipated that the additional cost to the dominion in consequence of the addition of the province of Quebec will be in the neighbourhood of $6,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought it would be more than that.

Mr. HEAPS: Then the minister cannot give us an approximate idea as to the basis of his figures? Did he take Ontario as an example, for instance?

Mr. DUNNING: There are 54,000 pensioners in the province of Ontario.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the minister basing his Quebec figures on Ontario?

Mr. DUNNING: Partly; population, character of population; character of institutions, character of family relationships, and so on. There are a good many indeterminate items, and really I must confess that I have not pressed the officers of the department to try to come very close with regard to the matter, because the statute is there and the cost must be met, whatever it is,

Mr. BENNETT: But it is important to know. The minister's estimate would cover only about 25,000 people.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council and for the cost of administration thereof, $1,950,000.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in this item, but at this late hour I do not intend to say all that I was going to say if it had come up at an earlier stage of the session. This item has to do with subventions in connection with the movement of coal, and I wish to express my appreciation of the attitude of the government towards these subventions for the present year. These subventions have been provided by successive governments since 1924, and they have increased to some extent until the present year. I had intended to make an appeal to the government still further to enlarge the amount of the subventions to be voted, on the ground that I believe this would be probably one of the most productive investments we could make in the way of solving our unemployment problem. I have now made up my mind, however, that instead of going into the matter as fully as I had intended I shall submit a statement to the government in writing, because the argument I intended to present to-night would have had for its purpose only to ask the government to look into the question of subventions more fully during the recess in the hope that a permanent policy might be evolved for submission to parliament at the next session.

The other matter I had in mind has to do with the question of coal from another angle, that is, supplying our Canadian needs from our Canadian mines. We have sufficient coal in Canada to supply all our needs, but unfortunately these coal deposits are so situated geographically that it is somewhat difficult to overcome that handicap and sell our coal in competition with the American products in the markets of central Canada. The most serious problem with regard to unemployment with which we have to contend in Nova Scotia is the industrial centres around the coal producing areas of that province. It is estimated that if we could market an additional two million tons of coal per annum we would be able to take care of the unemployment situation in those centres. According to the returns of the bureau of statistics there are about two million tons of coal used in the manufacturing industries of Ontario over and above the coal supplied by the Nova Scotia mines. There are about nine million tons consumed in Ontario in all, over and above the coal supplied from Nova Scotia and if, with the aid of subventions, we were able to provide the entire coal requirements of Ontario we would be keeping within the country something like $60,000,000 annually.

I believe we could do that with a comparatively small expenditure, probably not more than $5,000,000, and my first submission is that as a national investment we would be furthering our own best interests if we broadened our coal policy in that regard. I believe that would go a long way towards solving our railway problem. It would take up the slack in respect to labour as far as unemployment on our railways is concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that if I am not interrupted I do not intend to take many minutes, but if there is any man in this house who thinks he is going to prevent me from expressing my opinion by calling "carried," he does not know to whom he is talking.

What I am particularly concerned about to-night is not so much placing my opinions with regard to coal subventions before this committee as it is with regard to a question which was asked here the other evening concerning the possibilities of a trade treaty with Russia. One of the items which undoubtedly will be made the subject of discussion in regard to a treaty with Russia will be the matter of coal, and every ton of Russian coal that will come into Canada by virtue of any agreement which may be entered into can have only the effect of displacing a ton of Canadian produced coal, which will be bound to lead to increased unemployment in our Canadian mines.

Mr. REID: What about anthracite?

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Anthracite screenings from Russia will take the place of bituminous coal from the east for power purposes in the manufacturing centres of this country. We can produce coke in this country to take the place of the very best anthracite in the world. I wish to point out—I have these figures from the fuel board—that last year there was imported into the United States over 400,000 tons of anthracite coal from Russia over a duty of $2 a ton. In my judgment it will be impossible to arrange with Russia, having regard to what they were able to accomplish against a duty of $2 a ton going into the United States, a trade treaty including coal which will not be of serious damage and injury to the coal industry of the Dominion of Canada.

I am of the opinion that many hon. members fail to realize the tremendous economic importance of the coal mines in Nova Scotia. Last year even with the depression there was paid out in wages to the working men of that province over $14,000,000. I say to my friends from Ontario that the industrial centres of Nova Scotia furnish one of the very best markets in Canada for both the manufactured goods and the agricultural products of the great province of Ontario. I propose to develop this feature further if I am spared at another session; we of the maritime provinces at confederation were given the assurance that we might expect the market for our coal not alone of Quebec but of Ontario. I can prove that from the records antecedent to confederation. Economically we have a splendid case for the consideration of the government, and from the standpoint of the development of this dominion we in the maritime provinces have a right to expect the most favourable consideration.

I have been associated more or less with public life for the last forty years, and one of the great questions always before the public of the maritime provinces has been the attitude of the federal government in regard to coal and steel. I should like to see in this parliament favourable consideration given to that subject, and as far as I am concerned if I felt that I contributed in the least degree towards a policy which would stabilize the attitude of all governments toward this great industry, to bring it out of the doldrums in which it has been struggling for some time and place it on a basis whereby those who have their money invested in this great enterprise will be able to go forward and develop it so that it can make the contribution of which it is capable towards the economic life of this dominion, I shall be amply satisfied. I regret that I have taken so much time, but I feel very keenly on this matter. I want to emphasize my profound fear with regard to the question of Russian coal coming into competition with coal produced in Canada.

Mr. BROOKS: I had intended to make some extended remarks in connection with the subvention for coal, but briefly I want to protest on behalf of New Brunswick against the fact that the coal miners in that province have not received the same consideration as have the coal operators in Nova Scotia. I am glad indeed that Nova Scotia has received this consideration, but we have a thousand men employed in the town and area of Minto, who for the last four or five years had almost steady employment. But to-day they are working only two or three days a week. The coal operators have applied to the government but have received no consideration, and on that ground I want to register a complaint on their behalf.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister kindly tell the committee the basis of this subvention to the mining industry of the maritime provinces?

Mr. CRERAR: The arrangement was entered into a little over ten years ago, or rather the subvention principle was adopted. The purpose was to put Canadian coal, particularly that from Nova Scotia, into a position to compete effectively with coal imported from the United States. To do that a complicated system of accounting was worked out. The subventions have been paid since that time on the basis of what is required to enable Nova Scotia coal to compete with American coal.

Mr. BENNETT: A rate per ton per mile.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, based on a rate per ton per mile, and undoubtedly it resulted in a great deal of Nova Scotia coal moving to the western part of Quebec and on into a considerable area of Ontario.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the minister inform the committee how much coal was involved in this item of $1,950,000? Can he tell the committee how it works out per ton?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot at the moment give the information as to the number of tons that were assisted. The amount paid in subventions last year was slightly under $2,000,000. Some of that went to western Canada; one figure that sticks in my memory is that the subvention paid on the movement of Alberta coal into Ontario last year was $65,000. It was at the rate of $2.25 a ton. The information is available; I can give it in a moment.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): About 1,400,000 tons for Nova Scotia.

Mr. CRERAR: As the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria has said, the amount of coal which received subvention assistance last year from Nova Scotia amounted to about 1,400,000 tons. To be exact—and I always want to give the exact information to the hon. member—it is 1,498,000 tons.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister does give that information, and I do not ask for it very often. It works out to $1.40 a ton.

Mr. BENNETT: There is more besides that. What about western Canada coal?

Mr. HEAPS: There is very little.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. CRERAR: The average on the Nova Scotia coal is 83 cents per ton.

Mr. HEAPS: Eighty-three cents is not very much, but at the same time I always feel these subventions are not consistent with the Liberal policy. I hope some day we shall get away from coal and wheat subventions. I always like to get at the costs of production between this and other countries with which we compete. I do not wish to delay the passing of the vote, but my view is that the cost of Nova Scotia coal at the mine mouth is probably fifty per cent higher than similar coal in the United States. I do not wish to go into that question now, but it is an important point. When the matter is raised at another session we shall give it further consideration.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): The report of the bureau of statistics shows that bituminous coal from the United States is sold at about $1 a ton higher than Nova Scotia coal is sold at in the markets of Quebec.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): The report from the bureau of statistics shows that the average price of bituminous coal from the United States is about $6 a ton in Ontario centres.

Mr. HEAPS: I am talking about the cost of coal at the mine mouth.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Well, the cost of coal at the mine mouth, plus railway haul would work out about right.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. HEAPS: No; there is no "railway haul" about it; I am talking about coal at the mine mouth.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): But you get at it pretty closely by taking the railway haul from the $6 price. May I make one further observation, namely that the production of coal involves about sixty-four per cent labour, a point worthy of consideration.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the price of soft coal in Ontario?

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I do not know what the retail price is, but I have said that the bureau of statistics has given the total amount paid for it, and it works out to about $6 a ton.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is $7.50.

Mr. NEILL: I notice a big reduction in the vote. I trust the bonus paid in British Columbia on the coal mined on Vancouver island has not been reduced.

Mr. CRERAR: No; I assure the hon. member there is no change.

Mr. HEAPS: Has this subvention had the effect of increasing the production of coal in the maritime provinces?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that the production last year was practically the same as in 1934. If we contrast that figure with those of several years ago we find there has been a change. The depression has had its effect. Better methods of using coal for heating purposes, and the use of fuel oil have operated to reduce the normal consumption of ten years ago.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister give the figures for some years, giving first those for the first year of the subvention, and then those for other years leading up to the present time?

Mr. CRERAR: In 1928, with the subvention the production of coal in Nova Scotia amounted to 6,700,000 tons. In 1935 it was 5,800,000 tons.

Mr. BENNETT: That is hardly the fair way to put it. The movement to Quebec and Ontario has increased. The increased markets in Ontario and Quebec have been made by the subventions.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): I notice we are called upon to vote nearly $2,000,000, and I have observed that since 1928 the vote has been regularly approved. I would gather from the remarks of the minister that at no time including this evening has there been any reservation in so far as labour is concerned. I am going to say that where government moneys are concerned there should be a definite reservation that labour should be paid a fair wage in connection with the mining of such coal. I state definitely, positively and from personal knowledge that that has not obtained in the past, in so far as Saskatchewan coal is concerned. In respect of certain agencies there is a premium paid in excess of the cost of mining and placing that coal upon the market in which it is sold. In respect of other agencies there is no relationship between the cost of production and the amount that is paid to labour for the production of such coal. I state, generally, that where government moneys are paid in regard to subventions or subsidies or bonuses, or in respect of tariffs of any kind, the Department of Labour has a distinct and separate responsibility to see to it that labour is cared for and paid the percentage of the cost of production to which it is entitled. In so far as the mining of coal is concerned, in the light of my experience I am going to say definitely and positively that that has not been so in the past.

Mr. NEILL: I beg to endorse emphatically the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the Prime Minister not think we should adjourn, in view of the fact that the Hansard reporters have been working continuously, and it will be pretty hard to keep at this very much longer. It is now 12.30, Tuesday morning. We could be back at 10.30 a.m., I should think.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend insists, I will move the adjournment—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, I will not insist.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Possibly we might run as late as one o'clock, and have it understood that we shall adjourn at that time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What is the sense in that? It seems to me that we are all tired out and cannot do our work efficiently. As the leader of the opposition has said, I think that more hard-worked than we are are the reporters here. People on the Hansard staff will be forced to work morning, noon and night, with no cessation. It is not fair to carry on in this way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I remember a time when frequently this house sat until six o'clock in the morning.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, yes, I have been there, too.

Mr. BENNETT: But it did not meet in the morning.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I remember very often when this house sat until six o'clock in the morning towards the concluding part of the session. Certainly, however, the government has no desire to have hon. members or any of the staff unduly taxed at the present time. My impression is that both the staff and hon. members rather hope that we may get through before the king's birthday, and that we were obliging everybody by so doing.

Mr. HEAPS: It is the twenty-third now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: However, we might continue I think, until one o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think that is fair.

Item agreed to.

To provide for report on cultural conditions in Canada (literature, art, drama, education, et cetera, $2,500.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no objection, in one sense, to this small item, but I do not like this way of doing things. We had last year an item of this sort, "to provide for a report on cultural conditions in Canada —literature, art, drama, education, et cetera." I understand that this is a sort of disguised grant which is being made for a very laudable purpose, to literary people who need help. I think it is high time that we provided for them in some recognized, regular, decent fashion, and not under a camouflage of this kind. What is the good of carrying this item year after year? Let the grant be made openly and regularly, and in such a way as would approve itself to the people generally.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item, I think, was explained to the house a couple of years ago, at the time it first appeared in the estimates. I regarded it as an undertaking which had been made by the previous administration and one, therefore, which should be carried on at least for the present year.

Mr. BENNETT: With the approval of the present administration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says, "with the approval of the present administration." I think that is quite right. It was a grant to a distinguished literary gentleman in this country and, in the circumstances, seemed to be entirely warranted. But

I agree with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, who has just spoken, that it is in the nature of an exceptional grant to an exceptional person, and that in these matters there should perhaps not be so many exceptions.

Mr. NEILL: Is the report made by one person or more than one? In any case where can the reports be found? Are they published or circulated?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a grant to Sir Charles Roberts. I have no doubt that his report, when it is presented, will be an admirable one.

Mr. NEILL: Is it presented annually to anybody, or is the printed record available?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think there is any condition about it being an annual report. It no doubt will prove to be a volume of considerable importance.

Item agreed to.

To authorize, subject to the approval of the governor in council, appointment of such extra temporary officers, clerks and employees as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of any of the items in these special supplementary estimates.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the amount? This has been discussed fully. Why is it blank? Is it included in the previous item? There is no amount filled in there. I think something was said about $12,000.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a general item covering the special supplementary estimates in order to permit of the engagement of some temporary help.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but how much money is it to be?

Mr. DUNNING: No money. It applies to all of the items in the special supplementary estimates, and takes the place of a similar provision in the former relief acts with respect to the engagement of temporary assistance for the works contemplated.

Mr. BENNETT: But there must be an amount.

Mr. STIRLING: How are they paid?

Mr. DUNNING: Out of the special funds in the various supplementary estimates. I suppose "one dollar" might be put opposite this.

Mr. BENNETT: No. It would limit you. You could not do anything then. We discussed this some evenings ago, and I thought there was some sum mentioned. As it stands now it should be struck out unless there is a sum placed there, for the obvious reason that an appropriation which contains no amount is not an appropriation at all. It is not even a blank cheque.

Mr. DUNNING: I had that looked into from the standpoint of legal draftmanship and legal requirements, and I am advised that the language of it is sufficient to make it applicable to any item in these special supplementary estimates, the language being:

To authorize ... the appointment of such extra temporary officers, clerks and employees as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of any of the items in these special supplementary estimates.

It is a proviso with respect to the whole of the items contained in these supplementary estimates, in precisely the same manner as a similar clause in the relief acts of former years made a similar provision with respect to expenditure under them. That is the intention.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the Prime Minister will say this is bad. I have heard him so frequently refer to the poor old colonel's authority on Parliamentary Grants. A parliamentary grant that carries with it no sum cannot be said to be an appropriation. Under the relief act, which was a blank cheque, the authority was given to the governor in council to name any sum that might be necessary for that purpose. This is a new proposition, to grant the governor in council unlimited right to make an unlimited expenditure for unlimited purposes.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. BENNETT: It is. We may as well face this frankly and admit it without any question:

To authorize, subject to the approval of the governor in council, appointment of such extra temporary officers, clerks and employees as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of any of the items in these special supplementary estimates.

In other words, if it takes one thousand employees costing a millions dollars, it can be done.

Mr. DUNNING: No; that is not the intention, I am sure.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what it says. Why not?

Mr. DUNNING: The intention is to authorize expenditure for temporary assistance out of each item in these estimates. That is the intention, and I am advised that this section gives the necessary legal authority to do so; that is to say, to provide, for instance, for what we just discussed, let us say the dry dock improvements at Esquimalt, $8,500. There is authority to take out of that $8,500 as much as may be necessary to pay for the wages of the men on the work. It is not by any means an additional appropriation, but merely provides that the government can take out of each of the appropriations sufficient to pay the men on the work. That is the intention. If there is any doubt about it I shall again check it although I have already done so with the law officers. But that is the fact. Certainly no payments will be made other than out of the individual amounts mentioned in the supplementary estimates and separately voted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the minister mean that these individual votes may be diverted from the specified purposes?

Mr. DUNNING: No; for the purpose of the item only; positively.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is a proviso proposed by the government which might have been added to several resolutions included in these special supplementary estimates. It has been drafted so as to avoid repetition. It is not unusual to ask that a grant be voted for certain works on condition that they be approved by the governor in council. Vote 419 in these very estimates provides for certain reimbursements to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways "upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine." The same proviso is made in vote 420. Vote 425, which is the present one, is nothing but an authorization applicable to several other votes. The fact that it is separate from those votes does not make it irregular. The government has the right to submit to the committee of supply estimates to which conditions are attached. My right hon. friend has referred to Durell's Parliamentary Grants. I will give him, as the authority for what I have said, page 27 of that work.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. That is not this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Take for example item 314:

To aid, in cooperation with provincial governments concerned, in reestablishment of needy fishermen.

That item of $300,000 has already been granted by parliament for that purpose. Parliament has made the grant and any temporary clerks who are employed in connection with that grant will have to be paid out of the grant. This item does not mean or imply that we are voting any additional money for clerks; the money has already been voted with respect to the various services which are to be rendered. What this item does is to authorize the appointment of temporary clerks, under authority of the governor in council, where temporary clerks are needed in connection with any of the items for which this parliament has already made appropriations, and to pay them out of those appropriations.

Mr. BENNETT: There will be no difficulty about imposing conditions on grants; that is elementary. This item number 425 does not state the essential point to which the Prime Minister has referred, namely, that the amounts will be charged against the appropriations of the several items.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no objection to it so doing.

Mr. BENNETT: I ask the Prime Minister to be fair and look at the item which reads:

To authorize, subject to the approval of the governor in council, appointment of such extra temporary officers, clerks and employees as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of any of the items in these special supplementary estimates.

No mention is made as to what this is to be charged against.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the intention.

Mr. BENNETT: If that had been there, there would have been no discussion. The right of this house to say that when we appropriate $10,000 for X, that shall include the cost of clerical assistance necessary to put that in operation, is quite within our power. But that has not been said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is understood.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest the proper way to do this would be to amend the bill which will be based upon these resolutions by inserting a paragraph that any of the items mentioned in the special supplementary estimates shall include the cost of the payment of such extra clerks, and so on as may be necessary for the carrying into effect of the expenditures contemplated by such item.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no objection on the part of the government to such clarification.

Mr. BENNETT: This item does not say that.

Mr. DUNNING: The law officers advise that that is the intention.

Mr. BENNETT: An intention not expressed is not any good.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend often advises me to take the advice of my legal officers, and until this moment I have done so. In view of the fact that we shall evidently not finish to-night, I shall give instructions that the words suggested by my right hon. friend be added to this section in order that there may be no doubt whatever that the intention is to charge such costs against the individual votes and not create authority by this item to make further expenditures. This will be considered between now and when the house meets this morning, and the necessary words can be added. I would prefer to amend the item as the bill is already printed.

Item stands.

To provide for payment to the Canadian Wheat Board on account of the liabilities of Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers, Limited, assumed by the Canadian Wheat Board, under the authority of paragraph (f) of section 7 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, $15,856,645.35.

Mr. BENNETT: This item will certainly be opposed as vigorously as it is possible to oppose anything. I consider this is the most monstrous effort I have ever seen to use parliament for a purpose that has not to do with the regular transaction of fair business. Under the agreement given by the crown guaranteeing the ultimate liability or responsibility of the wheat board, it will be determined, when this matter is settled, what is the liability of the crown. But this item is departing entirely from the provisions of the statute. There is no provision for this at all in the wheat board act. In view of the evidence given by Mr. Murray that two-thirds of the sales made were charged against the carry-over, to which this refers, it is quite clear that to pay this money at this time is nothing more or less than an effort to trim up the books in a way that should not be permitted. I put this to the Prime Minister: There is an outstanding guarantee by the Dominion of Canada to pay the ultimate balance that might be due to the banks on the carrying out of the business of the wheat board. The wheat board act provided that the surplus should be taken over by the board. The board took over that surplus from the old cooperative enterprise, and the liability of the old enterprise became the liability of the new wheat board. Mr. Murray said that the sales which were made from time to time were appropriated as to two-thirds against the old balance of wheat taken over from the cooperative enterprise. It is now proposed to fix the value of the wheat that was taken over at the price prevailing on that day, and show a loss of $15,000,000. I just leave it to the Prime Minister and to this country whether or not this is even a legitimate exercise of the power conferred upon the government under the wheat board act. I am going to take the trouble to point out the section in order that there may be no misapprehension about it. It is chapter 53 of the statutes of 1935, and paragraph (f) of section 7 reads:

> The board shall undertake the marketing of wheat in interprovincial and export trade and for such purposes shall have all the powers of a corporation and without limitation upon such powers the following:—
> (f) notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, to acquire from Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, upon terms to be approved by the governor in council, all wheat or contracts to purchase or take delivery of wheat in respect of which the government of Canada has given a guarantee.

The entire number of bushels held by the Canadian cooperative enterprise was transferred to the wheat board under the direction of the government, pursuant to the arrangements made. The banks made the wheat board their debtors instead of the cooperative enterprise. It is now proposed that we should make right any loss so that a profit may be shown, if possible, for the balance of the transactions. I ask the Prime Minister if that is ordinary business, apart even from anything else. The provision is quite clear that we are assuming the ultimate liability with respect to the transaction. At this moment it is not possible to determine what that loss has been. I think there will be some loss, but that cannot be ascertained until the last bushel of that wheat is sold. Mr. Murray said that two-thirds of the sales made at the date he gave evidence were sales out of the wheat transferred by the cooperative enterprise to the wheat board. How then can the loss be fixed by taking the price it was on that day as against the cost, and showing that as $15,000,000 loss? As a matter of fact, the sales that have been made since may increase or diminish that loss—I assume they will increase it—whereas the sales made from now on to the end of the crop year may diminish the loss. The only time at which this matter can be ultimately decided is at the expiration of the crop year, which is July 31. At that time it can be determined whether or not there is any wheat of the old crop, so to speak, to be carried over as distinguished from the year's crop of 1935. The ultimate loss in the terms of the guarantee can then be established. In fairness to everyone connected with this transaction, I must say that I do not think there is any point in endeavouring to put before us that this loss is more or less than it really is.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, and it cannot be determined until the end of the crop year.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall deal with that in a moment.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Finance can juggle with the figures as much as he likes, but he cannot change that fact.

Mr. DUNNING: When my right hon. friend gives me an opportunity—

Mr. BENNETT: Right now.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend took the responsibility in his early remarks of accusing me of cooking the books of this government.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. I did not use that word at all.

Mr. DUNNING: He said, cooking the books of the country.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. DUNNING: What did my right hon. friend say?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. The minister makes that statement. I deny that I made that statement, and no one heard me say it either.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my right hon. friend repeat what he did say?

Mr. BENNETT: I say that I made no such statement.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my right hon. friend say he did not use the words "cooking the books"?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not.

Mr. DUNNING: Thank you; that is all I want to know. At any rate, he takes strong exception—

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I certainly do, and I shall talk another day if necessary.

Mr. DUNNING: May I tell him that this government determined that the people of this country should learn exactly what was the position of this wheat transaction from time to time in the same manner as they would learn if they were shareholders of a corporation which had a similar liability.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not a printing mill or a lumber organization.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, we shall look at Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, we shall look at Hansard.

Mr. DUNNING: The Canadian Wheat Board Act did not authorize the transfer of the liabilities of the Canadian Wheat Producers—

Mr. BENNETT: That is what was done.

Mr. DUNNING: —but it did, in its express terms, authorize the board to acquire from the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, upon terms to be approved by the governor in council, all wheat or contracts to purchase or take delivery of wheat in respect of which the government of Canada had given a guarantee. I assume, perhaps improperly; that those responsible for the language of the statute anticipated a settlement on a definite basis as between wheat producers and the new governmental wheat board which was taking over the wheat. For that reason the price on the day on which the wheat was taken over was taken as the basis of settlement. My right hon. friend's whole remarks indicate that that involved a process of deception. If he did not mean that he meant nothing.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, that is improper language to use. The hon. gentleman complains of the use of words, but that is an improper word to use, and he knows it.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend, then, does not accuse the government in this matter of practising deception.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not allege the practice of deception and my hon. friend knows it.

Mr. DUNNING: We are improving right along.

Mr. BENNETT: That is another highly improper observation. It will not advance us.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it won't; "cooking the books" is serious.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister says that I alleged that he cooks the books he makes a statement which is not true.

Mr. DUNNING: What was it—doctoring the books?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I said about the books. I was talking about transactions as shown by this estimate, and the hon. gentleman will find from Hansard what I said.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall. On the basis of the date upon which this transaction was concluded there was a loss of $15,856,000 with respect to wheat then taken over from wheat producers. Perhaps I had better be careful and ask my right hon. friend in advance whether he said that the object of doing so was to attempt to show a profit after that date.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall deal with that; go on.

Mr. DUNNING: Apparently I am in order this time. May I tell my right hon. friend, as I told him when this matter was discussed on a former occasion, that there was no anticipation on the part of the government of any such thing. In fact, further losses have occurred; and may I suggest that this method of accounting for these losses will make it absolutely clear from time to time to anyone just what the losses are, not the losses chargeable particularly to my right hon. friend's government or the losses chargeable to the period in which this government was handling the transactions, because such a differentiation would be, I believe, quite impossible under the circumstances. I do not believe it could be made. But this was a situation in which this country had a definite liability to the banks, guaranteeing whom? The wheat producers association. The wheat producers' liability came to a head when the wheat board, established by this parliament, took over the holdings of the wheat producers, and as of that date there was a loss of about $15,000,000, as I have indicated. That loss is provided for in these supplementary estimates. Why? Because undoubtedly it relates to the year which has passed, in fact, to several years which have passed. It is an accumulation along with the $6,000,000 which has been voted with respect to the wheat of 1930. It is an accumulation of losses with respect to the handling of wheat grown between 1930 and 1935 until the time of taking over.

Now, with respect to the new wheat of the 1935 crop, that is in an entirely different position, because it is taken over under the terms of the Wheat Board Act; and under the terms of that act, if there are any profits then they must be distributed to the farmers through the medium of the participation certificates provided for in the law. Hence we are dealing, it must be remembered, with an inventory of wheat which was on hand at the date when this transaction took place. On that date a definite loss was ascertainable, based, it is true, on the price of the day. If further loss is experienced, that amount will have to be added, because it in no way conflicts with the 1935 crop. That amount will have to be added to the amount provided for in this item. The question in my mind, quite frankly, was: To what fiscal year of the dominion should the loss with respect to this transaction be charged? It had been accumulating, in the nature of things, through the whole period during which the government guarantee had been operative. My right hon. friend argues that the loss is not determinable until the whole transaction is closed. I submit that if we adopted that principle this country could easily remain in virtual ignorance of the extent to which it currently had lost money with respect to these wheat holdings. In any business, I submit, there is a period in each year when the inventory of that business is valued at the value of the day of the inventory, and loss with respect to it is ascertained and charged.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend might have some complaint if, from the time of establishing this $15,000,000 loss, there had subsequently been a profit of which some political use might be made by the government now in office. That is not the case. It is extremely unlikely, nay, all but impossible, that it should be the case. There will be a further loss. I cannot conceive of any circumstances under which a further loss can be avoided. It is merely a question whether or not we should pile up a concealed loss, argue about it, dispute as to what it is, or determine, when we have a definite loss with respect to a a particular year, to take it. If by good fortune that loss should be reduced in a future year, by virtue of something happening which none of us expect can happen with respect to that portion of the wheat, then so much the better. I submit that far from this being unfair to the previous government, or in any way unfair from the standpoint of a business handling of the matter, it is completely the reverse. I want to assure my right hon. friend that it was conceived in that spirit, absolutely in the spirit of getting as nearly as possible a correct assessment of the situation in which the country stood with relation to wheat. I can assure him that as far as I can now see, with respect to the disposal of the wheat prior to the 1935 crop there still will be a further loss for which parliament will have to make provision during the present year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: One o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: The case I have made has been proven by the minister, and I cannot quite understand any man of affairs or business who, reading the statement that the minister made, would desire to pass this estimate. The minister said what is true, that always, in a business, you take your inventories to determine your position, but did you ever hear of doing it at a particular moment because you drove out existing men and put somebody else in their places? When is the time to take the inventory? It is at the end of the fiscal year, and why? Because the relief act provided that notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council might, upon terms and conditions which might be agreed upon, enter into agreements and so on, and grant financial assistance to any province and to Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited by way of loan, advance, guarantee or otherwise. And the country did give its guarantee to the wheat producers for the wheat taken over from the cooperative enterprise. Had it been taken over a few days sooner the price would have been higher.

What about the sales that were made a few days later? In the middle of it, just because you got rid of McFarland and Grant, for that reason you fix that as the day and you make the loss from that moment. The time to figure the loss is the time when, by law, every corporation makes its inventory, the end of the fiscal year, which in this case is on the 31st day of July, as every man knows who has any knowledge of business at all. Now the minister tells this committee, "We took an inventory on the 6th or 7th of December because it pleased us to do so, that being the day on which we fired McFarland and his associates and put in somebody else." That is not the time to take the inventory; the time is the end of the fiscal year, when you take the amount of wheat that has been sold in order to determine the extent of the loss. Suppose wheat had continued at $1, $1.25 or $1.50; what about the inventory then? The date on which the inventory is taken is at the end of the fiscal year.

I repeat that. Look at the accounts of any business; is that not the way in which it is done? How are the assets and liabilities determined? They are determined after inventory, and when is the inventory taken? It is taken at the end of the fiscal year, or on a day that is fixed. That is what is done by everyone for the purposes of the auditors. What do the auditors certify by? By the inventory at the end of the fiscal year. Anyone who knows the elements of business knows that. They do not take an inventory in December for the purpose of making a report on the operations of a company at the end of July. It is no good to say that this is going to give a picture, for it does not give a picture of the facts. It was not a case of putting somebody in charge; it was the continuance of a wheat board, and only the personnel of that board was changed. The liability of the wheat board, as provided by law, is under a guarantee given to the banks, and the guarantee to the banks says "ultimate liability." That ultimate liability can be determined only after the end of the sales.

If—and I assume this is what the government intend to do—they think it desirable to say, "on the 31st day of July we had X bushels of wheat, and the loss to this date has been so many millions of dollars," until such time as the wheat has been entirely liquidated, there might be some reason to it, though it is quite certain that the wheat will bring no enhanced price. But whatever price it brings, whether that price increases or decreases the loss is a matter for the determination of the ultimate liability at the expiration of the period of time when the liquidation is complete, whenever that may be. Every man who has had anything to do with business knows that. There is not a balance sheet prepared anywhere in the world on any other basis. What do the auditors certify on? Not on an inventory taken in the middle of the year; but we are asked, because for political reasons you removed three men from the job and put somebody else in, to fix the loss, which you can fix, as the minister said, only when your fiscal year is ended.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: I am answering that. I think the minister said "once a year"; I am not sure of his exact words, but I think he referred to an annual statement, an annual adjustment of assets and liabilities, and there is not a man who does not know that is the way in which business is transacted. It is because of departures from that principle that disaster usually follows. As far as I am concerned, I say that this is not only unfair—

Mr. DUNNING: Unfair to whom?

Mr. BENNETT: It is unfair to the enterprise. I am not talking about individuals; it is unfair to the enterprise, because you are taking an inventory, a valuation, on a date other than the day when it should be taken. In the second place you are substituting an immediate determination of liability when the agreement was that this country was to pay only the ultimate liability. You have changed the guarantee, which is based on the ultimate liability. Now this government is asking us to pay on an intermediate liability, a liability that might have been greater or less depending on the date on which the wheat was taken over. If it had been taken over a few days sooner the liability would have been less, but is that the way to determine what the real liability is? This can be determined in one way, and in one way only, and that is by the ultimate liquidation of the property, namely the wheat. Then you know what the ultimate liability is. Suppose, although it will not happen—and this is the test to impose—that immediately after the wheat was taken over, it began to enhance in value and by the 31st day of July it reached a figure that showed not only no loss but a substantial profit. What about the situation then? That is the test. When the wheat is all liquidated the ultimate liability is determined. I put this to the committee: There was a time when, according to the current values of wheat in this country, that transaction showed a substantial profit, in the hands of the cooperative enterprise. That was a real, substantial profit, one measured not by hundreds of thousands of dollars but by millions of dollars.

Mr. McPHEE: What date was that?

Mr. BENNETT: Along between 1930 and 1935, I think in the early part, when wheat went up to its highest point. I do not carry the months and days in my mind.

Mr. McPHEE: What particular year, for instance?

Mr. BENNETT: Whatever year it was that wheat went to the high price. It does not matter what the year was; I do not carry in my head the years, months or days, but there was a real profit if you could have sold all the wheat at the price then prevailing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: But the way you are doing here, you are acting as though we could have sold all the wheat at the price which prevailed on the 6th of December.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: This loss is made up in that way. Let there be no misunderstanding as to how it is made up. This loss is the difference between the arbitrary price fixed on the 6th day of December and the liability.

Mr. CRERAR: The value of the wheat on the 6th day of December.

An hon. MEMBER: What year?

Mr. HOWARD: The value of the wheat on a fixed date.

Mr. BENNETT: But why fix that date when it was not the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. DUNNING: Because that was the date the board actually took over the wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the date on which the liability was assumed by the wheat board. They did not pay for it; it was provided by another statute that there should be this guarantee. We were especially careful about that very thing, and when the matter was under discussion in this house it was pointed out that what happened was that you had a complete novation by which the liability of the cooperative enterprise was taken over by the wheat board; the guarantee was given by the nation to the wheat board for that liability, against ultimate liability, and ultimate liability means on the realization of the assets.

It is now one o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and I shall complete this argument when we resume.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister should have the right to reply.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course. I have not finished by any means.

Mr. DUNNING: I might call my right hon. friend's attention to the fact that he was sufficiently sure of a loss to pass an order in council agreeing to pay out $8,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That had nothing to do with that transaction at all. It had not anything to do with this, and the minister knows it.

Mr. DUNNING: There must have been in my right hon. friend's mind an idea at least that that much money could not be realized by the producers for their members. Therefore he was making an effort to reimburse them for something which could not come out of the wheat itself. That involved an assumption of a loss.

Mr. BENNETT: No; on the contrary it was a profit, which they did not realize—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: But anybody knows, if they will apply business principles, that it was a profit which they would have made had they not used their wheat for stabilization. Because it was used for stabilization they said: We must get the money we otherwise would have.

Mr. DUNNING: In other words there was a loss of this amount. The wheat is not sold yet. Well, unfortunately it is no use trying to convince my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend certainly will not.

Mr. DUNNING: I rose with some heat because an accusation—

Mr. BENNETT: I made no accusation.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall not repeat; we shall see what Hansard says. I have no doubt at all as to the correctness of the course pursued. The new body created was taking over this wheat from a formerly constituted body. Some basis had to be arranged for the transaction.

Mr. BENNETT: And there was; they assumed the liability to the bank. That is what happened. That is all there was about it.

Mr. DUNNING: And between the liability to the bank and the value of the wheat on the day they took it over, there was a difference of $15,800,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. DUNNING: Now, is that clear? My right hon. friend might have some complaint if between then and now, or at any time in the future there was any prospect at all that it would appear that some abnormally low point was taken for some ulterior purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: The moment you concede that your case is gone.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not agree that my case is gone.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of logic it is.

Mr. DUNNING: I am in the judgment of members of this committee and I shall be in the judgment of future sessions of this parliament with respect to the matter. I have advised the people of Canada, advice which they had never previously received, that as of a certain date they had a loss in connection with this transaction—

Mr. BENNETT: They once had a profit.

Mr. DUNNING: I admit at once that if the new Wheat Board Act had provided otherwise than it did with respect to the 1936 crop then we would have had to follow a different course, but with respect to the new crop the Wheat Board Act is quite clear, that if a profit is made the farmers are entitled to it through the medium of participation certificates, but a profit on that one crop only, not with respect to the previous crops which formed part of the wheat taken over by the wheat producers.

Mr. BENNETT: That is quite clear.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite clear and quite true. In the meantime further disposal is taking place of the crops prior to that of 1935. There is no doubt at all that further losses will result; my right hon. friend knows it. I desire to show the losses as nearly as possible in the year in which they occur, and to charge them to that year in the accounts of the country. By my right hon. friend's method we would never be admitting a loss until heaven knows when, and then we would have to tell the country it had lost a great deal more than we now state, and provide for it now. In some one fiscal year—

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly the opposite of what I said.

Mr. DUNNING: —instead of having the loss spread with some approximation over the years to which it applies. My right hon. friend has been lecturing me on my lack of wisdom and business judgment and that sort of thing. I have as much right to my opinion as to what constitutes good business as he has, and I think he would have been wiser had he made an approximation of the loss year by year as the years proceeded from 1930 to 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: When? In the middle of the year?

Mr. DUNNING: If he had turned over the wheat to another organization I would expect those responsible for the conduct of that other organization to insist on some valuation with respect to the property they were taking over. I would not like to try to sell to my right hon. friend the kind of pig in a poke which he suggests the new board should have taken over from the old Canadian wheat producers. I would not have a chance in the world.

Mr. BENNETT: On the contrary, Mr. Murray said that he would apply the sales on the basis of two-thirds and one-third.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly; he had to have some basis.

Mr. BENNETT: Precisely.

Some hon. MEMBERS: One o'clock.

Mr. DUNNING: Can we not pass this item?

Mr. BENNETT: No, not by a long way.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the resolutions passed this day be now read a second time and concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 1.20 a.m. (Tuesday).

Tuesday, June 23, 1936

The house met at eleven o'clock.

SANCTIONS AGAINST ITALY

NEWS BROADCAST FROM STATION 2RO ROME, ON WEDNESDAY, JUNE 17

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yesterday my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) referred to a news broadcast from Rome on the evening of Wednesday, June 17, which stated that the Canadian council of ministers at a meeting held the previous day, that is June 16, had decided to favour the abolition of sanctions. I replied that I would make inquiry as far as possible to see if there was any ground for believing that this statement indicated knowledge in advance of the policy of the government announced in the House of Commons on June 18. I do not think it does.

The statement quoted is incorrect since as a matter of fact the question was not discussed in council at all on June 16 as stated. The general position had been discussed some days earlier, and council's decision reached at the time, but the final wording of the statement of the government's position was taken up at the special meeting of council on the morning of June 17. I notice in the Montreal Star of June 16 the following dispatch from Ottawa:

> It is understood that the government is giving consideration to-day to its position in respect to sanctions against Italy. What precisely will be the attitude is not officially determined. It is believed, however, that the government is practically certain to join that section of British thought which favours the lifting of the penalties.... Discussion is tentatively fixed for Thursday. The Prime Minister on that occasion is expected to define the attitude towards a continuance of sanctions. Inasmuch as these penalties in time of active war did not frustrate the annexation of Ethiopia by Italy, their continuance, in time of peace, may be regarded as futile.

I think there is little doubt that the statement to which my right hon. friend referred was simply a more positive expression of the above, or similar anticipations. For some days before the announcement of the United Kingdom government the press contained similar surmises as to the decision which would be announced.

I may repeat that there is not the slightest indication that the decision of the government was communicated to any outside person.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I have only to say that it was not a press report. It was at seven o'clock p.m. Atlantic standard time, as I indicated, that it came over the radio from the Rome station in the terms I have indicated. That station, fortunately or unfortunately, seems to have been very accurate in its statements during the last six months, especially regarding the Ethiopian situation.

CANADIAN MINISTERS ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have pleasure in informing the house that His Majesty has been pleased to approve the appointment of Sir Herbert Marler as Canadian Minister to the United States, and the appointment of the Hon. Randolph Bruce to succeed Sir Herbert Marler as Canadian Minister to Japan.

VIMY WAR MEMORIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): The other day a return was brought down in regard to questions I had asked with respect to the names of those who had been invited to attend the unveiling of the Vimy war memorial. My question this morning is to ask the Prime Minister whether it is his intention to attend that ceremony?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In reply to my hon. friend I may say I should like very much to be able to be present at the ceremony at Vimy next month, particularly because of the nature of the ceremony and also in view of the fact that His Majesty the King has accepted the invitation of his Canadian ministers to be present, and the president of the French republic has accepted the invitation of the government of Canada to be present on the occasion. I have however had to ask myself what may be involved in the way of absence overseas during the next twelve months, and as hon. members know, the coronation ceremonies will take place in London in May of next year, to be followed by an imperial conference, and I expect, unless something unforeseen happens, to be present in Great Britain at that time. I had anticipated that it might not be necessary for any reason other than in connection with the unveiling ceremony at Vimy to visit Europe this year; I am inclined, however, to believe that the importance of the meeting of the League of Nations Assembly which is to be held in September, and which will have to do with the critical situation in Europe and the revision of the covenant and which may mark a fresh start in the affairs of the League is so important that it would be desirable for the leader of the government of Canada to be one of the representatives of the government at Geneva at that time. In these circumstances I fear I may have to forego what would be an exceptional privilege, namely, being present in France at the unveiling of the monument at Vimy. I have asked my colleagues the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) and the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) to represent the government at the Vimy ceremony, and it has been so arranged.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF OPENING OF NEXT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this would seem to be the appropriate place to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if he has any information to give the chamber regarding the probable date of the opening of the next session of parliament. I quite appreciate the difficulty to which he has referred with respect to his own personal movements, but I recall that on more than one occasion he made similar inquiries of the late administration, and it occurred to me that this might be a suitable occasion on which to indicate generally his intention. I agree that if the League of Nations is to revise the covenant this year it is highly desirable that the Prime Minister of Canada should be present. Whether or not that would interfere with any plan which might be prepared for the early opening of a session of parliament of course I do not know. But it is quite clear that the right hon. gentleman would have to be absent moderately early in 1937, and it is probable that we would not have parliament continuing to sit in his absence. This is a matter of some interest to hon. members, and I have been asked to try to ascertain whether the government has any information to communicate in this regard.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend is correct in anticipating that the date at which parliament may reassemble will necessarily be contingent, in part, on what may take place at Geneva. It is possible that some action taken at Geneva may necessitate the calling of parliament in the fall of this year. There is also the circumstance which my right hon. friend has mentioned, namely that the coronation ceremonies take place on May 12. Obviously in order to permit those who may be attending the coronation ceremony, and the conference which follows, to be present at these meetings it will be necessary for parliament to have adjourned either at the conclusion of the session's deliberations, or during the proceedings of the session itself.

If it is found necessary to have a fall session hon. members may expect that the house will be called together during the latter part of November. The present hope of the government however is that if we meet in the early part of January, it may be possible for us to conclude our labours before the coronation ceremonies take place.

SUPPLY

CANADA'S FOREIGN POLICY—METHOD OF DEALING WITH ESTIMATES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I address a few words to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) before you leave the chair. He has intimated that he may attend the meeting of the league at Geneva. I am sure the house will be delighted to learn that he has made that decision. It seems to me the world situation is important enough to necessitate the attendance of the Prime Minister, but may I point out that he has not given the house a clear statement of the policies he will advocate at Geneva. I recognize that if there is to be a reorganization of the league there has to be a good deal of latitude allowed, because the whole subject would be one of negotiation. At the same time, since the issues of peace and war are so largely dependent upon what is done at Geneva, it seems to me only right that the Prime Minister should give us, even now, some indication as to the general lines he intends to advocate at Geneva.

Further than that, in this session the opportunities for the debating of international affairs have been obviously very unsatisfactory. Last night the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) intimated that she had been very anxious to present her views in the matter. She had not been able to do so earlier in the session. Near the last of the session we were promised that we would be given a day to debate the subject, although at an earlier stage that opportunity was refused us. The "day" we were promised dwindled down to two hours.

Last night we had the curious spectacle of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) attempting in the midst of considerable disorder to present a highly technical and learned dissertation on some of the constitutional issues involved in the action of the government with regard to Geneva. It was impossible for any of us to give careful attention to his presentation. That is an absurd situation. The only opportunity we have to discuss a matter of such great importance is in the dying hours of a session. I would ask the Prime Minister whether or not he could give us the assurance now that near the beginning of the next session a committee may be appointed charged with the definite responsibility of studying Canada's foreign policy. I cannot see where there could be any objection. None of us is anxious to drag to the light of day matters which ought to be kept quiet. We recognize clearly that certain things may come to the knowledge of our Department of External Affairs which could not at all times be made public, but surely we must get away from anything like secret diplomacy. More than that, it seems to me very desirable that the public at large should take an interest in its external affairs. It was all very well when Canada was a colony for us to confine our attentions to matters within our own boundaries; but to-day Canada is part of a big outside world. I believe it is the responsibility of this house to debate these matters, and that of the government to afford opportunities for wider discussions leading to greater public interests. I offer this suggestion to the Prime Minister.

I have one further suggestion along another line. No person could sit in the house last night and fail to be impressed with the ridiculous situation which results when we try to pass a great variety of estimates at the last moment. Indeed, I have often thought that the present method of handling estimates in committee of the whole is not the best that could be devised. Last night in connection with a particular estimate the minister in charge quite naturally did not know exactly the details in connection therewith. He had to wait until his deputy was called in. All along the deputies must attend in the house, and there is the curious spectacle of the minister leaning over to get a few sacred words from his deputy in order that he may pass on the information to the house.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Sacred, or salient?

[Mr. Wermenlinger.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: "Sacred" is the word I used, and perhaps in this connection it is as good as "salient." We as members of the house are supposed to remain in our places to hear wide discussions covering the whole range of government departmental administration. It is obvious that a good many of us are interested in only one department, and can be interested in only a few departments; certainly we cannot all be interested in the whole wide range of subjects covered by all the departments.

Some of us have earlier advocated a change of procedure. It might be possible, just as we have experimented a little with a special committee on national railways, to have the estimates referred to appropriate committees. The fisheries committee could deal with the fisheries estimates; the agriculture committee with the agriculture estimates; the external relations committee, if one can be set up, could deal with external relations. In such a committee we could call in the deputy ministers who could be questioned in the easier and less formal atmosphere of a small committee. If necessary we could even call in outside witnesses who might give expert evidence. The members would be able to specialize in certain departments, and that specialization carried on year after year would give a great deal of added interest to the lives of a great many members who are keenly interested in specific affairs and in certain details but who are not so much interested in the general debates in the house.

Someone may say, "Well, but that would not give all the members an opportunity to speak." It would, because the report would come from the committee, and if there were any outstanding evils or any questions of importance we still would have the opportunity to discuss them in the house. We would not be precluded from doing that. Of course it may be said that Hansard would not get it all. From my standpoint I think that would be a decided advantage. It would shorten the session tremendously if we did not have Hansard record all the casual observations made during the discussion of the estimates. I venture, therefore, to ask the Prime Minister whether he will not at least consider some change in procedure by which the estimates may be placed for consideration before appropriate committees, thus saving an enormous amount of the time of this house, as well as adding to the efficiency of parliament.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in reply to my hon. friend, first with respect to his desire that I should make a clear statement as to the government's policies on matters pertaining to the League of Nations and the European situation, which I presume would be the most important feature of all, may I say that I think I made a very full, very complete and very clear statement to this house as recently as Thursday of last week. From what I have since seen of the press comments on the statement then made it would appear that the journalists of the country at least had the same impression. I confess that at the moment I cannot think of anything further that could be said with advantage. What will have to be considered at Geneva in September will depend very largely upon what appears on the agenda of the League of Nations at that time. As my hon. friend and members of the house generally know, the assembly of the league meets again on the thirtieth of this month to resume the session which was adjourned last fall. After that session is held the government will be in a better position to know what questions will be uppermost at the meeting of the assembly in September. Until that session is concluded I do not think there is anything I can add to the statement which was given to the house the other night. I feel, however, that my hon. friend and other members of this house may with some degree of confidence rest assured, that the position which will be taken by myself and the colleagues who may be present with me at the assembly will be one which will very much accord with the views of this house. As far as I am able to sense the situation I believe members of all parties in this house are pretty well united with respect to the views they entertain on Canada's foreign relations. There may be differences here and there, but as a Canadian people I think we are singularly united in the essential features of our foreign policy, and certainly those essential features will be kept to the fore at the meeting in September.

My hon. friend has spoken of the desirability of having a committee to study foreign relations. May I say that there is nothing to preclude any number of members of the House of Commons forming themselves into a study group for any purpose at any time. In Great Britain that is done in connection with many matters in the House of Commons, and I see no reason why those who are interested in foreign affairs should not constitute themselves at any time into a committee for the purpose of making as complete and thorough a study of foreign relations questions as can be made. I would point out, however, that we have a standing committee of this house which deals with industrial and international relations. That would appear to be an appropriate committee to consider, as far as one of the standing committees might consider, matters relating to Canada's foreign policy.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But may I point out, without any desire to interrupt that in practice that or any committee can consider only such matters as are referred to it. As far as my memory goes, the only matter ever referred to that committee with regard to foreign affairs was a motion of my hon. friend from Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) some years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What my hon. friend has just said only emphasizes what I am saying. The hon. member for Grey-Bruce evidently suggested that some question should be referred for study to the committee and the suggestion was acted upon. If hon. members have suggestions to make as to particular subjects to be referred to that committee I think there is every reason to expect that their suggestions would be favourably considered and the necessary references made if it were apparent that the desire to have them so referred was at all general.

However, the matter of procedure is quite secondary to the importance of having subjects themselves carefully considered, and I must say that I entirely agree with my hon. friend as to the desirability of having the fullest study given these all-important questions. Probably the more study that is given to them the less will be the desire for premature discussion in many phases. With regard to discussion I am one of those who believe in the wisdom of the fullest possible discussion except where it is perfectly obvious that such discussion in this house and this country may have the effect of adding to the difficulties of those who are contending with very great problems in other parts of the world. I must say that, with the knowledge the government has had of the very critical nature of the European situation this year, I make no apology to any hon. member of this house for having done my utmost to prevent premature discussion of questions that were inflaming the minds and the passions of peoples in the old lands. I think we owed that much to them, to see that nothing should be done here in the way of adding fuel to what I believe was very near to becoming a pretty serious conflagration across the ocean.

With respect to the procedure to be adopted in connection with the discussion of estimates, what my hon. friend has suggested has been discussed on previous occasions. There is much to commend his suggestion, but at this stage of the session I should not like to say more than that between now and next session I will ask my colleagues to consider with me the wisdom of adopting a course such as my hon. friend has suggested. Perhaps when parliament reassembles, if hon. members feel it their desire so to do, we might have a discussion of the matter on the floor of the house. In regard to the estimates and the time of bringing in supply, may I say that this year the main estimates were laid on the table of the house during the very first week of the session, so the house has had the supply before it for a long time. If we have not concluded with the supply I would say it has been because we have had an exceptionally heavy and important sessional program with a great deal of legislation embodied in bills on one subject and another, which was relatively of much greater importance than anything which appears in the supply. In the estimates we have sought to avoid as far as we could items that we believed might prove to be contentious. In this first session of parliament we have not only endeavoured to get through but have actually succeeded in having enacted legislation which in other parliaments would have occupied the time and attention of this house over two or three sessions instead of being brought as has been the case with this year's program within the compass of a single session.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair might be a proper opportunity to mention a matter of privilege. The other evening the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated that the house had been compelled to spend fifty-two per cent of its time in sitting and listening to the leader of the opposition. I hope his other remarks were nearer the truth than that. The fact is that not twenty-five per cent of the percentage stated by the Minister of Agriculture was taken up by the leader of the opposition.

I desire to point out that I occupy a statutory position and am paid the salary of a cabinet minister. During this session, except for the time when I was indisposed, I have been here continuously six hours a day, from three to six o'clock and from eight to eleven o'clock except for two days. It may well be that I have had a good deal to say, but I can assure the house that the Minister of Agriculture was not present during all that time to hear me, because his duties kept him elsewhere for a considerable part of the time. I have a duty to perform and I have endeavoured to perform it. I have been continuous and assiduous in my attendance in this house because I conceived it to be my duty to do so as long as I occupy the position I do.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my right hon. friend that I think all the members of the house will agree with me when I say that he has earned his salary. If he will be good enough to allow us to prorogue at noon, he will be entitled to a bonus.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Salaries and disbursements of fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol and fisheries protection services, $878,600.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, this is the item that deals with the practical work in the field. I do not know why the minister called this item because when we were discussing this matter before we did so under another item. However, I do not suppose it makes much difference. This item shows a tremendous cut in the practical work, that is the work in the field in the protection of fish. It is true that an amount of $71,000 is provided for in the supplementary estimates, but actually the cut in the practical work is being replaced only to the extent of $40,000. A total of $185,000 has been taken off the fishery votes, and this providing of $71,000 in the supplementary estimates is something like the boy's idea when he robs a bird's nest. He believes that the mother cannot count and if he leaves one egg out of four she will be quite satisfied. The amount left here is totally inadequate for the work required.

I took the trouble to try to find out the amount spent in British Columbia on what I call the practical work, and also what was spent on supervisory work or overhead. It is possible I have exaggerated the figures, but I do not think so. I might say that I found it very difficult to obtain these figures as the accounts of this department are kept in the most disgraceful manner. It is necessary to look up the auditor general's report and then you must have a close and intimate knowledge of the situation to find out where the money has been spent. Certain items are put in under different headings and sometimes you have to guess how much relates to this, that or the other item. The minister cannot be blamed for this as these accounts have been kept in this way for a long time. So far as I can make out, $105,000 was spent on practical work while $196,000 was spent on overhead expenses. Even supposing that I have exaggerated the figure, it would still leave an enormous amount being spent on clerical and office work when compared to the amount being spent on the practical work.

When reductions are made in other departments it is not so vital. For instance, if the public works vote is cut down, a bridge may not be built in a certain section, but the old bridge is still there. But when you reduce this vote you are ruining a small part of the fishing industry. It works out like this. The wages of the permanent force cannot be cut, so the only thing to do is to take off some of the seasonal men who are paid for three months or six weeks to protect the fish. That is the only way a reduction can be made, as we all know how difficult it is to reduce the permanent employees.

I was speaking on this matter before but I shall briefly review what I said. The fish are spawned in a river and then at the end of a period they go out to the sea. At the end of four years, or in some cases, two years, they come back to that same river. For certain reasons they do not go up the river at once. They hang around the mouth of the river, perhaps to get acclimatized to the brackish water, perhaps to wait for the biological urge to go up the river to spawn, perhaps to wait for high water in the river—we really do not know why they wait, but they congregate there. When they are out in the open sea the fish are spread over an enormous area and the fishing is necessarily less intensive, but when they gather at the mouth of the river, sometimes packed almost as close together as sardines in a tin, a man can come along with a seine and make a tremendous haul. It is possible to take 40,000 fish in a couple of hauls. Such treatment does not merely deteriorate the run, it eliminates it entirely. When a run of fish is wiped out like that, it is not renewed again perhaps for ten or fifteen years. That is why we have the guardians.

A guardian is placed at these points for six weeks or two months or so to protect the fish. When you take the guardian away, you invite people to poach. Human nature is human nature and when a man who is making his living with a seine boat knows he can catch 40,000 fish in a couple of days at the outside, he is going to do it. We are no worse in British Columbia than any other people, and that is exactly what I would do if I were in the same position. The temptation is too great and that is why we put on guardians. When a guardian is taken off in order to reduce expenses it means that that particular stream may be ruined for fifteen years. If the run is wiped out there will be only a mere handful of fish the next year. It would be no good to put the guardian back the next year, because there would be no fish left to protect. It will take two or three cycles of runs to build up the run again. Out in my district there was one spot which had practically been fished out. Two rivers run into a lake, there being falls on both rivers where the fish could readily be taken. The government put on five year closure. They put guardians on these falls every year for a few weeks in order to prevent poaching, because the situation lends itself very readily to poaching, and they put in an expensive fish ladder that facilitated what fish were left getting up. The result was that in a few years, instead of four or five gill net fishermen there were 165 last year or the year before. That shows how protection pays. One of the guardians is being cut out this year because there is not enough money to pay him, and in consequence there will be poaching on a large scale. We must have money and we must have guardians, and apparently we have not the money. You cannot cut down on permanent wages, but I submit that you can cut down on overhead both here and in British Columbia—and I am dealing with the British Columbia estimates. This is no new idea of mine, because in 1928-29 when the Liberals were in power I raised the same question. I said then that the Vancouver office was overstaffed. I was informed that there were a great many returns to be handled. Yes, handling is the right word—they are handled by one official and then another. Officials are copying letters from some inspector out on the coast, sending a copy of a letter from a man at Prince Rupert on to the head office, whereas the man in Prince Rupert could save two if not four days by sending the letter direct to Ottawa. That is the sort of unnecessary overhead that exists. Some years ago I discovered that a man in the Fisheries department out there had been padding his accounts; in plain English, he was stealing money. I set myself to find out who was responsible for not checking up on him. Finally I gave it up in despair—and I do not easily give up in any undertaking like this—not because I could not find someone responsible for checking the accounts but because I found that there were so many responsible officials that they all passed the buck. With one or two exceptions, with one accord they were all lending themselves to the covering up of the whole matter. One official had been found guilty and they would cover it up at any cost. Finally I gave it up in despair. There were too many cooks.

I want to quote a typical letter I received the other day:

I think the government is doing wrong by cutting down on the fishery patrol. I think it would be better to cut down on the office staff and increase the fishery patrol. There are a number been fishing and selling blue back salmon for the past two weeks—

And that is illegal.

—and they get away with it. At Powell River you can buy fish all the year round both in season and out of season. What is really essential is the conservation of fish; clean out all the streams that the salmon go up to spawn and find a market for the fish.

On one occasion a number of men got together and proposed to the government that if they would appoint a man to round up offenders against the regulations they would supply a man who would do the work for nothing—and men do not generally work for the government for nothing. One man wrote me to this effect: "The main thing is that the Vancouver office will have no strings on our man." Do you get the idea? If the government would send out an independent man, someone not directly interested in the department, the cost of the Vancouver office could be cut in half and that would provide a good deal of money for ground officers, because the permanent man is paid by the year while the ground officers are paid only six weeks or three months.

In this connection may I quote the leader of the opposition. The other day we were discussing the estimates of a department, and while the right hon. gentleman was not criticizing, he used this language:

The department is an efficient department and I think it reflects great credit upon the deputy head, but I think if you said to him, "Go and cut down that staff by twenty-five per cent," he would do so and have a more efficient organization than he has to-day.

And he was not contradicted. The Minister of Railways the other day, giving the reasons for the amalgamation of the various branches of his department, said that there was a central purchasing office in one branch, with a staff of twelve, in another a staff of five, in another four, and so on. Then the leader of the opposition made the statement that in his time they cut out 12,000 officials, and he said:

That is a terrible thing to say, and yet the service was more efficient by reason of it.

And he added that that was a still more terrible thing to say. He went on to warn the minister that even if he found that some of the superfluous staff had to be paid he should not keep them in the office but if necessary pay them to keep them away from the office, because the organization would be improved by having a smaller and more practical staff.

Coming to the question of hatcheries, I believe that in British Columbia some ten are closed out of sixteen or fourteen; yet the cost of overhead has been cut down only two per cent. It is notorious that there must be a good deal of work in overhead connected with the running of the hatcheries, and yet the cost has been reduced only two per cent, whereas some of the practical works have been cut down seventy-five per cent. What do we want with a purchasing agent and a statistician in the Vancouver office? The minister may reply that there are no such officials. That may be true; but I was a member of the house when they were appointed in 1928-29 and I know what they were called then. I protested against them at that time; I said we did not need men filling those positions. Now they are called something else, but they are still there drawing salaries. Then we have an inspector of chartered boats. We might as well have a chaplain; indeed he would do more good. These boats are chartered by the government, but the government takes no responsibility. If the boat is unseaworthy, if there is anything wrong with the engine, that is up to the owner; the government will not even be responsible for insuring it. The owner must insure it himself. All that is necessary is to see to it that the boat is reasonably seaworthy, the engine capable of running; and the inspectors who travel on boats under their own control can readily discern anything wrong with them. But we have a man whose ostensible business is to inspect these boats.

Unfortunately there is an idea abroad that any official with a high salary and a fancy title is bound to produce results, but that is not so. A Welsh rabbit, which is neither Welsh or rabbit, sounds nice, and I compare the two, because in the case of the Welsh rabbit the element is ennobled by a fancy name and some skill in cooking, while in the other case an ordinary clerk is dignified by a fancy title and a high salary. But the fundamental basis in both is the same—just a plain ordinary piece of cheese, useful and wholesome, but just—cheese. A gentleman who was once appointed for the first time to the position of minister was struck by the enormous number of officials in his department, and he conceived the brilliant idea of making inquiries, not of his deputy, who would say at once that there were not nearly sufficient officials, but of the officials themselves. He sent a circular to them inquiring of each official what his or her duties were. One official exlaimed, "What a shameful thing to ask us to do. What do I do anyhow?" Many years ago a certain man was elected as alderman in a certain city and, being one of those pestiferous fellows who ask a lot of questions, he fixed upon two employees and demanded to know what they were doing. This was in February when there was four inches of snow on the ground, and by steady persistence he elicited, against the opposition of the officials, that these two men had been put on in the previous June to make hay in the park, and they were still making hay in February. In this house I was once approached by a man who asked me to help him in connection with his superannuation. In the course of conversation he said, "After all, the government have not treated me too badly, because my job petered out four years ago and they have only fired me now." That is an illustration of how things go on.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell us the whole story.

Mr. NEILL: It is good to put these departments now and again through the threshing mill and separate the wheat from the chaff. They are honeycombed with dry rot in some cases, and bureaucratic and departmental politics. An official in one of the departments once told me: "I have been here a long time; I have not suffered myself, but I have seen more harm done to the public service of Canada by the exercise of departmental politics than ever any of you political chaps could exercise, because you have a nemesis waiting for you in the House of Commons; you can be exposed, but departmental politics is subtle and underhand and you don't know what is going on." I was very much struck the other day by the remarks of the leader of the opposition when the Minister of Marine was introducing the bill in connection with the harbour board. He complimented the minister for doing it right away, and he said, "If you had not done it then, you never would have done it," and he instanced his own experience where he had the same desire to do it and was not able to; and I think the Minister of Marine knows now that if he had not done it when he first went in he never would have done it at all. This is a parallel case. The Minister of Marine was taking control of a thousand men; this is a much smaller thing and could be very much more easily done. I do beg the minister to put his hand to the cleansing of the Augean stable; I know it would be a great boost to his reputation. We need a great shake up, different views, and different policies.

Let me quote an illustration. I will not take the trouble to look up the page, but in the last fishery report the chief supervisor of fisheries for British Columbia said that the pack of salmon was "very satisfactory"; he said it had amounted to 1,582,000-odd cases. But the record year a few years before that was 2,000,000-odd cases. That is a drop of practically half a million cases, equivalent to three or four million dollars, a heavy drop, about twenty-five per cent, but he said—it is "very satisfactory." Well, there is the official point of view. It is "very satisfactory" that we have dropped our output twenty-five per cent. What are our competitors doing? Here is the record of Japan. A few years ago she was not in the picture. Last year she put up 2,418,000 cases, nearly a million cases more than we did; say, at $5 a case, $5,000,000 more than our total output. But the official says everything is "very satisfactory." Is it?

Then take Newfoundland. A complete reorganization of Newfoundland fisheries is provided for by the newly appointed fisheries board. Yes, they are taking time by the forelock and doing what is necessary to a complete reorganization. That is what we want in British Columbia, but the answer is, "very satisfactory." Is it? "Now" is the watchword of the wise; now is the time; now is the accepted day, as it is said. If the minister would cut loose from these palsied influences of the past he would have an opportunity to create a reputation and a record for himself that have not been attained by any minister for many years past, because we have never had for any length of time a separate minister of fisheries, although for a few months the Hon. E. N. Rhodes was a very efficient minister. But now the present minister is making a new start and he has got a chance to make a record for himself that may do wonderful things for the industry and for his own reputation. He can cut down on the overhead, and, as the leader of the opposition says, with better efficiency—not with less efficiency but with more; that is the point. Let him spend the money he saves in that way on patrol men, on guardians, on air patrols, on the destruction of sea lions and hair seals, on the building of fish ladders to let the fish get up where sometimes now they cannot for lack of water; on the cleaning of creeks to help natural spawning. If these things are done the fishermen will have their livelihood assured, and that is about all they want. All they need after that is a market. If the minister would take out of the $300,000 vote sufficient money to help with the freight charges, they would have a market. The British Columbia government, I understand from Victoria the other day, has expressed no desire to take up the $50,000 out of that grant, so that that $50,000 will rest with the department and I suggest that this would be the most profitable use to make of it. Let me quote this one sentence from an editorial in a fishery paper published in British Columbia:

> Fishermen realize that the best aid given them is the guarantee of an assured future and the maintenance of a source of income which, if allowed to go to ruin, no appropriation, least of all to "needy fishermen," will be able to reestablish.

That is the spirit of our men out there. They do not want pork barrel aid. They want to be helped to help themselves, and they will be only too glad to do their share.

One more thing I suggest, and it is all important. Make the Fisherman's Loan Act workable. Was not a question answered the other day that not one loan had been granted under it? Certainly not, because the regulations are such that loans cannot be made, and never will be except to a very small extent. Make the act workable, and then there will be a chance for these men to help themselves. The British people are doing it. I have a record here showing that they are going into a scheme of this kind. Now the minister has got this $50,000 that is available, so to speak, that should be credited to British Columbia out of that $300,000, I suggest that it should be used to help the causes I have indicated and make the Fisherman's Loan Act workable. By "workable" I mean, conditions by which they can take advantage of it. Make it apply to sums greater than a thousand dollars if necessary, and make it apply to the boat and gear. It is now confined to the man who has got real estate which, forsooth, he must occupy. How can a fisherman be occupying real estate? But he has to occupy it and it has to be worth double the amount granted. Take the halibut man with a boat worth $25,000; he may not have enough land to put a henhouse on, but for that reason he cannot get any loan. If the act were made workable in that way it would be a tremendous advantage.

I put forward these views without any desire unduly to criticize the minister. I have not criticized the minister; he is only new at the thing, but I am pointing out conditions as I see them and have seen them for a long time. I claim to have some knowledge there. I have lived in a fishery district for over forty years, and for nineteen of those years I have represented it either in the house at Victoria or here, so I may claim to have some working knowledge of conditions. I should appreciate it if the minister would investigate the matters along the lines that I have indicated.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): Just a word in respect of the remarks that have been placed before this committee by the hon. member (Mr. Neill). I am pleased to be able to inform him that, with the additional amount provided in the supplementary estimates, it will be possible this year to have expended for patrol work the same amount that was expended last year, and have the same patrol and the same force that we had last year. There is the amount as requested in the main estimates this year, in item 145. With the amount provided in the supplementaries, added to the amount which we are asking the house to vote in the first column, we shall have exactly the same amount that was expended last year—not that was voted by parliament, but that was expended for the service of patrol that my hon. friend has pointed out.

Mr. NEILL: Item 145?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes. With the additional amount provided for in the supplementary estimates we shall have enough money to give to British Columbia the same amount of patrol work that the government did last year.

Mr. NEILL: If the minister will allow me, the decrease is $141,548, vote 145.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is the whole vote.

Mr. NEILL: No, that is vote No. 145. It is decreased $141,548 and increased $40,000 by the supplementaries.

Mr. MICHAUD: But last year of that vote $913,702 was actually spent. This year we are asking parliament to vote $878,600 plus $40,000, which will make almost $5,000 more than was actually expended last year. That is why I say I shall be able after this vote goes through to implement the recommendation made by the hon. gentleman as well as other hon. members representing fishing districts, and give the patrol that was provided for last year.

My hon. friend has complained about the Vancouver office, about there being too many cooks, too many officials. Unfortunately I am not familiar with the local situation there, but I promise my hon. friend that as soon as it is possible for me to do so I shall have this investigated and see for myself what the conditions are, and if they are as represented I can assure him that not only fifty per cent but seventy-five per cent or one hundred per cent if necessary will be dismissed if they are superfluous. Of course there are some officials whose work may not appear to be necessary, but when one considers that in British Columbia during the year we have twenty-one boats belonging to the government, two large boats and nineteen smaller ones, and besides that during the summer we hire on an average eighty-two boats for patrol work, the amount of work involved is apparent. There is an official there, I understand, whose duty it is to supervise that fleet of small craft, direct them and see that they are in working order. But if the work of that man after investigation is found to be unnecessary I can assure my hon. friend that his services will be dispensed with.

My hon. friend made one remark which I think was not justified. He said that the books or accounts of that department were kept in a disgraceful manner. If that be so this department is not responsible for it, because the books and accounts are kept by the treasury department. They have officials of their own keeping the books and accounts of our department as well as of other departments, and the officials of the Department of Fisheries are not responsible.

Mr. NEILL: If the minister will allow me, perhaps I should not have said that the books are kept in a disgraceful way; I should have said that the system is such that it is almost impossible to ascertain what was spent on this or that.

Mr. MICHAUD: Well, the criticism should be directed to the Department of Finance, which has jurisdiction over the treasury department. However, this matter I am sure will be taken note of by those responsible.

As to departmental politics, I am safe in saying that I know nothing about it, and I have had no actual fact pointed out to me. But if any hon. member has a complaint to make about political activities by officials of the department I shall be pleased to have the facts laid before me, and if after inquiry the official is found guilty of breach of his duties the minister will not countenance any such activities on the part of any official.

Mr. KINLEY: Even at this late hour in the session I desire to say a word. We are now dealing with the main fisheries estimates, on which we would naturally discuss both matters of policy and matters of routine. I hope the presentation of that vote at this late hour in the session is not an indication that the fishing industry is not considered of paramount importance in this committee and to this country. Coming as I do from a county which is largely interested in the fishing industry I regard it as my duty, as far as I am able, to place before the committee and the government the importance of the fisheries.

Fisheries are of national importance, and have an international aspect. While the fisheries department has direct control of the fisheries I regard our fisheries as an industry with which practically every department of the government is concerned. I know of no man who could do more for the fisheries than the Minister of Trade and Commerce, by making proper trade arrangements with other countries whereby we should be able to sell our products and bring new money into this country. The fisheries invite foreign trade. For that reason I trust that the Minister of Trade and Commerce during the recess, in conjunction with the Minister of Fisheries, will give his attention to the matter of marketing our fish products in foreign countries.

The same is true of the Minister of Transport. Transportation is a big item in connection with fish. It is a bulky product, freight rates are high, and transportation is all important. The Minister of Transport can give great assistance to the Department of Fisheries in facilitating transportation, both as to cost and as to speed, and making fish more readily available to people throughout Canada and to the people of other countries. The Minister of Agriculture also, through the acts relating to cold storage and farm loans, in which the fishermen are interested, can do his part. So that while the fishery estimates have to do principally with the regulation of the fisheries, all these departments are represented in the picture. The fish trade is unique and important and should appeal to the imagination of every member of the government.

Fisheries are of greatest importance to us in the maritime provinces. We are a maritime people. If we are to prosper as a part of Canada it must be in the industries that are naturally ours; I refer to activities on the sea—the fisheries and the mercantile marine. If we build up the industry that is naturally ours, when we get it to a state of efficiency and secure the trade it will be ours against competition and will be economically sound. For that reason I say that as far as the maritime provinces are concerned, while we have our interest in farming and other industries, common to other provinces also, if we want to excel as a port of Canada it must be in our activities upon the sea. That has been our history in the past. There was a time when we had more ships per capita upon the ocean than any country in the world. Our men sailed to every port on the seven seas. Our fisheries sustained us and were the admiration of foreign countries. In fact one of the reasons set out for the pact of confederation was that this country would develop the fisheries of the maritime provinces.

We hope that the minister who has now taken charge of the fisheries of Canada will amplify these thoughts and see to it that this natural primary industry of the maritime provinces receives every consideration. The main countries with which we are in competition are stimulating their industry, and we must put ourselves in a position to compete. Geographically we are in a favoured position; Nova Scotia and the maritimes are adjacent to the finest fishing banks in the world. There is no good reason why we should not meet competition of every kind. This is one thing which will help to relieve unemployment in my constituency. I therefore enlist the sympathies of the Minister of Labour, because he too must be interested in the fisheries. Fishermen are a class who can live on a smaller amount of this world's goods than can most people, and they deserve consideration.

Something has been said about cutting down the fisheries estimates. The votes for fisheries are very low, and perhaps they have been pared down lower than is justified. But we must realize that we have supplementary estimates which to a certain degree make up the loss.

I notice that the wages of guardians have been lowered, and I must say there is some justification for that action. In the rural parts of Canada I believe it is a mistake to have government men getting more money than people engaged in private industry. The man who works for a private company should not be placed in the position where he must envy the government employee. Everybody is looking for a government job, because it is paying more than anybody else. I believe hon. members will agree that the reduction per day of wages of these men is in some degree justified, because it shows a disposition on the part of the government to save money —for other active items of fisheries estimates. If we are serious in our efforts to save it in the Department of Fisheries I am sure the fishermen will cooperate as far as possible. At any rate the total expenditure this year will be greatly increased.

The last government made provision for loans to fishermen who offered real estate as security. The principle of offering loans is a step in the right direction, but it was inadequate for the purposes of the fishermen because, as a rule, they hold no real estate. I suggest that the legislation should be amplified so that the fisherman may get a loan on his gear or boats. The proper way to do that would be to give the loans through the people who know how to give them, and know what credit should be given. I suggest that the government could make some arrangement with the chartered banks, branches of which are found in every fishing village. If the government would guarantee or share the guarantee of the loans the fisherman could get the small amount of money he required, because he usually does not need very much.

The Minister of Finance might look into the matter during the recess in an effort to reestablish the fisherman. I believe with a proper expenditure of money and proper attention our fisheries will stand the strain and stress of days to come.

Item agreed to.

Building fishways and clearing rivers, $1,400.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest the amount in this vote is unreasonable, to the last degree. Last year there was a vote of $6,000, and this year it is only $1,400. I can point to one island alone where we could use all that. I know the minister has arranged for a further sum of $3,000 in the supplementary estimates, but when we are shutting up the hatcheries we must surely give further help in building fishways and clearing rivers. The total amount will be only $4,400 as against $6,000 for last year, and I suggest that instead of a decrease there should have been an increase towards helping to preserve the fish. There is a general idea that the best way to help them is by clearing rivers and building fishways. I realize the minister has obtained a substantial increase, but to begin with he suffered a cut which was out of all reason. My quarrel perhaps should be with the Minister of Finance; possibly the Minister of Fisheries did not present sufficient of what we call in the west a "skookum tumtum," or a strong mind, that is he did not take a sufficiently firm stand with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. KINLEY: May I say that if hon. members want the thrill of their lives they should come to Nova Scotia and catch a tuna. In that way we would enlist the interest of the tourist department in the fisheries of Nova Scotia.

Mr. REID: And if you want good salmon, come to the Fraser river.

Item agreed to.

Fish culture, $240,000.

Mr. NEILL: This is an expenditure for fish culture and, I assume, includes hatcheries. The cut is no more than two per cent. Could not the minister have made a greater cut in this vote, in view of the reduced expenses in connection with hatcheries?

Mr. MICHAUD: It is a fact that the closing of the sockeye hatcheries in British Columbia will bring about a saving of about $50,000, but I wish to repeat—if I did not make it clear yesterday—that only the sockeye hatcheries are being closed. All other hatcheries in the rest of the country are maintained. Further I must add that they are not closed because it was found that artificial propagation was not proper or adequate, but because it was found the natural propagation of sockeye salmon was sufficient to meet the requirements. The money we saved by closing those hatcheries is being expended on other hatcheries throughout the country—in British Columbia as well as in the rest of Canada. We have estimated that out of the $50,000 we will spend $43,500 to improve other hatcheries.

Mr. NEILL: After the minister closes what he is going to close in British Columbia, are there not only four left? He is going to close ten of them.

Mr. MICHAUD: We are closing Anderson lake, Babine lake, Smiths Falls, Kennedy lake, Lakelse lake, Pemberton, Pitt lake, Rivers Inlet and Harrison lake.

Mr. NEIL: That is nine; you are keeping four.

Mr. MICHAUD: We are keeping Cowichan lake, Argenteuil, Lloyd's creek, Nelson, Penask and Summerland.

Mr. NEILL: Those are merely sport fisheries. They are little better than breeding ponds, in some cases. I cannot see where we can save $50,000 out of certain hatcheries, and then spend all of it on these small hatcheries.

Mr. MICHAUD: No, on the rest of the country.

Mr. BARBER: The minister said something about a fifty thousand dollar reduction in the amount to the fish hatcheries in British Columbia. Would he give us the reduced vote to British Columbia?

Mr. MICHAUD: It is not a separate vote for British Columbia; it covers all the hatcheries in the country. Fish culture was taken under one vote. We have closed some of the hatcheries in British Columbia; the closing of the hatcheries I have just enumerated will cause a saving of $50,000, but the money is to be expended for the improvement of some hatcheries in British Columbia and others in the rest of the country.

Mr. BARBER: I take it that the minister proposes to reduce the vote to British Columbia by fifty per cent, and to distribute it in other parts of the country.

Mr. MICHAUD: No.

Mr. BARBER: Well, that is the only place hatcheries are being eliminated.

Mr. MICHAUD: No; it is because British Columbia is the only place where there are sockeye hatcheries.

Mr. NEILL: No; yesterday I spoke about the building of a new hatchery in Nova Scotia last fall. Can the minister explain why, when the government had in view a change in policy, it should build a new hatchery? What was the cost of it, and where was it built?

Mr. MICHAUD: I am told that the hatchery in Nova Scotia was constructed to carry on the artificial propagation of Atlantic salmon in order to maintain the supply, while the report of the biological board is to the effect that on the Pacific coast, in connection with sockeye salmon, natural propagation is sufficient to maintain the supply.

Mr. NEILL: I can hardly agree with that; if you look up the report of the biological board they do not say that. What they do say is this: they have decided that while propagation by artificial means can be done, the results are not sufficiently more profitable than the natural propagation to make it desirable to continue that, but certainly they do not say that the natural system is sufficient in British Columbia, because the facts are against that. We are going down every year, a thousand cases this year and perhaps a million cases next year. I cannot quite grasp why, in view of the information gained by the biological board, it should be necessary to start a new station on the Atlantic at a considerable expenditure. One would think the conditions on the two coasts were practically similar. Was there some depletion of a run on some particular river that justified this expenditure, or what was the idea?

Mr. MICHAUD: I am told that it was in order to build up the Atlantic salmon fisheries in the eastern part of Nova Scotia.

Mr. NEILL: What particular rivers were concerned?

Mr. MICHAUD: I am told that practically all the rivers in the eastern part of Nova Scotia were concerned.

Mr. NEILL: And what was the cost of the hatchery?

Mr. MICHAUD: Some $30,000.

Mr. NEILL: And for that we had to go hungry in British Columbia.

Mr. MICHAUD: Oh, no.

Mr. NEILL: Officials were discharged from the hatcheries in my district in the fall of the year, when there was work for them to do. When I inquired as to the reason I was told that the vote had petered out. I inquired further, and I have a letter from the deputy minister saying that the construction of a new hatchery in Nova Scotia took up a good deal of their money.

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not think it is fair to draw the conclusion that the hatcheries in British Columbia were closed in order to provide money for the construction of a hatchery in Nova Scotia. There was no relation between the two.

Mr. NEILL: The minister misunderstood me; that was not what I was trying to convey. I did not say the hatcheries were closed, but in the fall of the year, when the hatcheries in British Columbia were still running, their work was hampered. Men were taken off, and when I asked why I was told there was no more money. If you put a man in a hatchery to do the work of two men, provided he was not underworked before, the assumption is that the work will suffer.

Mr. MICHAUD: I understand that in the fall of last year the appropriation was practically exhausted, and the work in the hatcheries all over Canada was curtailed to the limit in order to make the vote extend to the 31st March.

Mr. NEILL: Let us be frank about it; was it in order to help the political fortunes of Mr. Ernst?

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not know anything about that.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni with regard to the appropriation for the hatchery in Nova Scotia. I think that salmon hatchery is destined to do a very good work with regard to the rivers in eastern Nova Scotia.

Item agreed to.

Marine Biological Board of Canada, $188,300.

Mr. NEILL: What is the extra $13,000 for in the supplementaries?

Mr. DUNNING: We will come to the supplementaries in a moment.

Mr. BARBER: I notice that the total vote for this board, including the item in the supplementaries, is $201,000. Would the minister explain whether this covers salaries and expenses and, in case an investigation is carried on such as was carried on at Cultus lake, whether any money comes out of the fish culture vote to assist in that work?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. BARBER: Would the minister give me the details of the salaries and expenses?

Mr. MICHAUD: The salaries at Nanaimo station are as follows: Doctor Clemens, $5,400; Doctor Foerster, $3,900; C. R. Elsey, $2,760; Doctor J. L. Hart, $3,000; C. McMottley, $2,400; Doctor A. L. Pritchard, $2,760; A. L. Tester, $1,620; J. P. Tully, $1,740; W. E. Ricker, $1,800; Miss D. Dickinson, $960; Miss E. Robinson, $960; Miss E. Keighley, $1,020 and T. Russell, $1,200. Then there is the foreman at Cultus lake, W. F. Baxter, $1,500; E. L. Kennedy, $1,200, G. G. Thomson, $1,200. J. H. Stannard, foreman, Queen Charlotte Islands, $1,500, and D. Crocker, $1,200.

Mr. BARBER: I am not so much interested in that. The information I wanted was whether this vote for the biological board, totalling $201,000, is for salaries only.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes, for salaries and investigations all over the country.

Mr. BARBER: No expenses connected with it? Are the expenses paid out of the fish culture vote?

Mr. MICHAUD: There is the cost of publicity and the travellling expenses, and there is the salary of Doctor Huntsman, as well as the salary of Miss Rigby, who is assistant editor and clerk. There are expenses totalling about $18,000, but this covers salaries for the Prince Rupert station, the Halifax station, the Nanaimo station and the St. Andrews station.

Mr. BARBER: I just wish to point out that the vote for fish culture, which has been condemned by some, amounts to $240,000. That has to do with one of our main industries, perhaps the best of all the industries having to do with fish, the sockeye salmon industry. To-day, on the other hand, we are paying $201,100 in order to maintain this board of scientists. Once more I wish to stress the importance of the minister taking into consideration the application of a little more practical knowledge and consultation with some of the practical men engaged in this industry, instead of leaving it all to a board of scientists.

Mr. NEILL: I asked the reason for the $13,000 that appears in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. MICHAUD: That provides $10,000 for a biological station in the lower St. Lawrence and $3,000 to pay the salary of a lobster investigator in the maritime provinces. The lobster supply is getting low and for some years the lobster fishermen and the lobster packers have been requesting that a scientist should be entrusted with the duty of investigating the cause of his diminution of supply.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): There are one or two general observations that I wish to make. The matter to which I shall refer may be new to the minister, but it certainly is not new to the department. For a number of years the fishermen in Nova Scotia have been agitated over the continued use of the beam trawler. Several royal commissions have been appointed to consider this matter and have made reports adverse to the continued use of the trawlers.

Mr. ISNOR: Did the hon. member say that all those reports were unanimous?

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton) : I did not use the word "unanimous" at all.

Mr. ISNOR: What did you say?

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I said that the reports were against the use of the beam trawlers.

Mr. ISNOR: All the reports?

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): All of them.

Mr. ISNOR: That is not quite correct.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I know some of the reports were not unanimous, but in my training a report of the majority is the report. I was going on to say that what might be termed a makeshift policy was adopted some years ago for the licensing of these trawlers, and I understand some licences have been issued this year. Before a licence is issued the department must be satisfied from evidence that the issuing of a licence is necessary in the interests of the trade. My idea of evidence is that an opportunity is given to both sides to be heard, and my complaint is that on this occasion only one side was heard. I am going to suggest to the minister, on behalf of the fishermen whom I represent, and I know I can speak for the fishermen in many other counties, that no licence should be issued until both sides to the controversy have been heard.

I am sorry I must differ with the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley); I do not believe sufficient money is appropriated for the purpose of properly guarding our streams. One of the best assets that the province of Nova Scotia could have from the tourist standpoint is streams well stocked with sport fish. I do not know where the hon. member got the idea that the salaries paid to these guardians were too large. The hon. member's idea was that they were so large as to be almost discriminatory when compared with other industries. These guardians are paid only $25 or $30 per month.

Mr. KINLEY: Not in my county.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I have the figures under my hand. They are employed for only two or three months and I do not think you can expect to have an efficient guardian when you pay such low wages. If you want to have your streams properly protected you must pay more money for this service. I cannot recall the term used by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), but whatever it was I hope the minister will remember it in his attitude toward the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in the coming year when estimates are being considered.

Mr. KINLEY: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend must have misinterpreted what I said. In one stream in my county we put on more guardians, but the department is paying them less. I think that is sound business. I am not saying that our streams should not be properly guarded; on the contrary what I say is that it is better to have more guardians, and that can be done at the lower rate; the same money employs more guardians.

I should like to say a word about the use of beam trawlers. In the light of conditions that exist I cannot see how anyone in authority in this country can think that the beam trawler is necessary at the present time for the success of the fisheries. Some years ago the Maclean commission was appointed to report on conditions in the maritime provinces and they reported against the use of the beam trawler. Doctor Cyrus Macmillan was perhaps the strongest member of that commission advocating abolition, and he became Minister of Marine and Fisheries later on. He is now a professor at McGill university. It is true that Judge Maclean, for whose opinion I have a high regard, had a different opinion from that of his colleagues, but that difference was quite small. In effect he said that the beam trawler should be used only for the purpose of taking up the slack, to use the vernacular of the fishermen; he said that it should be used only when necessary to provide a continuity of supply.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), who was then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, presented an order in council to the government, which he said had been prepared with the assistance and on the opinion of his deputy. The government passed that order in council, which in effect, entirely prohibited the use of the beam trawler. This order in council was questioned and it became the subject of litigation in the courts. After an adverse opinion had been rendered by one court, an appeal was started, which was later withdrawn. The tax was paid back to the one firm that had paid it.

Another order in council was passed by the government of the right hon. gentleman to my left which set out in effect that beam trawling would be permitted only if it did not interfere adversely with the line fishermen, and that before a licence would be issued the minister must be convinced that they would not decrease their purchases from the line fishermen. In the face of this order I have received resolutions from groups of fifty, one hundred or two hundred fishermen in my county who have been laid off by these same companies and who have since been unable to get any work. I contend that if there ever was a time when the provisions of that order in council should be enforced, it is the present.

Then we had the Jones commission which investigated the economic conditions of the province of Nova Scotia. That commission reported, recommending that the beam trawler be gradually abolished. They pointed out that it was not necessary. I am not giving my own opinion. My opinion is the opinion of the fishermen whom I represent, and they are unanimously against the beam trawler, but that is not the opinion I am giving now. I am quoting the opinion of scientific men who heard the evidence. The Minister of Public Works himself travelled along the coast taking the views of fishermen from place to place. The beam trawler people themselves say it is not essential to the carrying on of the industry.

This matter was before the price spreads committee at the last session and that committee reported against the beam trawler. With one exception, Mr. Young of Weyburn, the committee was unanimously in favour of the report against the beam trawlers. Mr. Young was in favour of the trawlers but all the others reported absolutely against them, and in the course of the evidence given before the committee the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), who was then chairman, made a comment which I should like to read. I quote:

> By the Chairman:
> Q. Just before you leave that, may I say this: your idea is that an international arrangement be made to discontinue the use of those trawlers?
> A. Surely that would be the logical thing to do, for there is not any necessity for beam trawlers to have continuity of supply; and they are a great expense to the companies who are operating them. They admit that themselves very frankly. I know the president of the National Fish Company, Mr. Britton, and that particular year I was here on the subject of advertising, and he admitted to me that the only reason they wanted beam trawlers was that it gave them a certain amount of independence.

In other words, they want the beam trawler as a club to hold over the fishermen. Not a great amount of fish can be caught by the trawlers. There are three trawlers and it is estimated that each can catch nine million pounds of fish a year, or twenty-seven million pounds. Personally, I think that is an exaggeration, but those are the figures. Now that is a large part of the deep sea catch in Nova Scotia. We may be told that they do not catch a large percentage, but the fact is that it puts the beam trawler corporation man in the position where he is a primary producer and he can say to the fishermen, "I have a beam trawler coming in to-morrow; you take what I give you for your fish or you can go home." The fisherman has no bargaining power.

We are not opposed to the beam trawler as an economic factor; we are not opposed to progress. But it is not real progress, for the fishermen can produce better fish more cheaply than the trawler can. And what is more, the fishermen do not destroy fish. At this moment the United States government is concerned about haddock fishing on the banks adjacent to Nova Scotia, and there is a suggestion that beam trawlers be prohibited west of St. Pierre. The banks off the coast of Nova Scotia are being ruined by the beam trawler. However, that is an international matter with which we are not concerned at the moment. The point is that we want the Canadian market for Canadian fishermen, and we think that they should have some way of determining the price for which they must sell their product. But the beam trawler is one instrument that defeats that object. We may have to come to a minimum price for the fishermen. To my mind the fishermen of Canada, whether they are right or wrong, will never be satisfied until the beam trawler is abolished. We have a population of only 10,000,000 while in the United States there is a large market with a population of 120,000,000. If we had a population of 20,000,000, the beam trawler might be necessary, but we have a condition that does not exist in any other country. Ground fishing is only one part of the activities of our fishermen; they must fish in the outports to catch lobster, mackerel, herring and seasonal fish that come along the shore. Put these men in Halifax and make them coal heavers and beam trawler operators and you will denude the shores of Nova Scotia and ruin the industry. The government must know, surely, that scientific men like those who composed the commissions that have studied this matter are not men who would be parochial in their opinions or who would give opinions without reason. And the opinions are there.

I submit that in the interests of employment the experiment should be tried and if necessary the beam trawler operators could be compensated. Just allow them the profit they showed in their income tax returns last year. This is a matter that has been before the country a long time and we will keep it before the country, not because we are opposed to progress but because we believe that progress should be genuine, and the interests of our men who need work should be paramount. There is no other means by which men can live than by working, and until you can allow men to sit at the table without working you must see to it that they have work.

Mr. MICHAUD: My hon. friend from Cape Breton North-Victoria and my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg seem to be under the impression that the Minister of Fisheries has the power to abolish the beam trawler. I have not, nor did I have that power last spring when the time came for the renewal of licences. It is true eminent men have given their opinion as to the necessity of the steam trawler, but one fact remains, and it is this. The parliament of Canada has dealt with the question in all these investigations that have been carried on, and in 1929, I believe, passed section 56 of the Fisheries Act. Under the provisions of that act power was given to the governor in council to make regulations for the operation of steam trawlers. These regulations were questioned before the courts and one tribunal decided that they were ultra vires inasmuch as they were prohibitive in effect.

Mr. KINLEY: The trawlers were taxed by order in council.

Mr. MICHAUD: The tax was so high that it was prohibitive; it really prohibited the trawler from operating. If parliament wanted to prohibit the trawlers it would have passed a statute forbidding the use of them; but it provided for the regulation of these trawlers. So far the regulations have been made and administered by the Department of Fisheries; and I felt last spring, when the time came for renewing licences, that, not having the power to refuse to issue licences, I should confine myself to renewing those that had been in force in the previous year or for the last few years.

Mr. KINLEY: The minister is no doubt aware that so far as the companies carrying on the fishing business in the maritimes are concerned, it is a matter of privilege, because there is only one company that is allowed to have steam trawlers.

Mr. MICHAUD: If they complied with the regulations and made application in due form I renewed the licences. Last year one application was refused because the conditions had not been complied with.

Mr. KINLEY: That was in my constituency and I compliment the minister on not having granted it. The minister takes the point that the statute was for regulations, but I want to point out to the minister that the order in council was in effect a prohibition—absolutely—which showed the intent of the government of that day.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the payment of a bounty for the destruction of harbour seals, $15,000.

Mr. NEILL: Is "harbour seals" a misprint? Is it intended to mean "hair seals"?

Mr. MICHAUD: Hair seals.

Mr. NEILL: I compliment the minister upon putting that item in. It is a very necessary thing.

Item agreed to.

Fisheries—Salaries, $113,331; contingencies, $20,000.

Mr. NEILL: This is the item dealing with civil government at Ottawa. I have prepared elaborate data that I proposed to unload, but I am going to take mercy on my weary fellow members and cut it down very substantially.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hand it over.

Mr. NEILL: I will put it into three minutes if I can. First, I just wanted to correct a misstatement that was made when I was speaking on this matter on March 3. I was reported somewhat generally in the press as having said that in my opinion the civil servants of Canada were asleep. That was a mistake. What I said was, certain sections, and that I am prepared to stand up to. To say it applied to them all would be doing a gross injustice to the civil service, a large majority of whom are very faithful, conscientious people, and some of them entirely devoted to their work. I then intended to deal with, though now I am only going to summarize it, some of the statements the deputy minister put into the mouth of his minister in connection with the figures, with which he dealt with the utmost abandon. Discrepancies of twenty-five per cent and in some cases seventy per cent I can readily prove. I proposed to show also the type of figures that his chief supervisor in Vancouver sent out, but I showed it to the minister, so I will not repeat it. It was not a case of typographical error; it was a straight case of faking figures, they faked figures at the bottom in order to make them agree. That was at the least gross carelessness. If the minister wants details I have them under my hand. Page 56.

Mr. MICHAUD: Intentional?

Mr. NEILL: Absolutely. If it is not intentional the man is a fool. It is not a typographical error. I will show it to the minister if he wishes.

Mr. MICHAUD: I have seen it.

Mr. NEILL: The reason I say it is intentional is this. They add up seven columns and they do not add them up correctly, but to make them agree with the other two totals they put in a false statement. You have only to look at the thing, on page 55. If you take the number of cases inspected of sockeye, 270,000, and reject 21,000, you surely do not have 349,000 left, do you? It does not need a statistician or a purchasing agent to tell you that. But they make the totals correct. Then I show that the deputy minister's own bulletin, the bulletin for May, says that the British Columbia product increased $550,000 last year, but if you compare it with his own report on page 6 you will find the increase is only $452,000, a trifling difference of $98,000. But here are the only points I want to make. I am taking their own figures. They show that the marketed value for 1935 went up $550,000 while the landed value to the fishermen, according to the January bulletin, went down $178,150, showing that the fishermen got less for their product that year while the cannery men got a large increase. That goes to support my contention, and that is the trend of my remarks, that the policies of the departmental officials and their sympathies in British Columbia lie wholly with the big cannery interests, as the men who are prominent in the business world, in the financial world, in the social world, and perchance in the political world also. Their sympathies go there; they are not with the working fishermen.

Mr. MICHAUD: The sympathy of the minister goes with the working fishermen.

Mr. NEILL: I thank the minister for his kind words, and I shall look forward with hopeful anticipation to his making good on that.

I see in the item there is a purchasing agent in the office at Ottawa. What do we want a purchasing agent for? In the same building there is a purchasing agent for the Marine department; on the same floor or the next one there is a purchasing agent for the Public Works department. There is also a government contract supervising committee that takes charge of the salvaged stuff that has to be disposed of. What does that department need a purchasing agent for? Will the minister tell us why? It will tax his ingenuity, I think.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is to purchase all that the department needs. Most, though not all, the purchases for the eastern section of the fisheries department are made in Ottawa through tender from the main office. It is only in British Columbia that we have a special purchasing agent, a man in Vancouver who looks after the purchases in British Columbia, but all the purchases in the eastern section are made in the head office at Ottawa through that gentleman.

Mr. NEILL: In that case, what does he buy?

Mr. MICHAUD: All kinds of things.

Mr. NEILL: Stationery? Coal? Gas?

Mr. MICHAUD: No. We have boats on the Atlantic. He buys supplies for all the boats, and supplies for all the hatcheries. There are repairs needed for our boats, and everything is done through tender. I think the officer justifies his existence as such by the work that under my observation he has to do. Possibly a concentration of all the purchasing departments of the government might result in some saving, but it is a matter of policy.

Mr. NEILL: Could we not cut out the man in British Columbia? The Atlantic purchasing is done here; could not the Pacific coast purchasing be done here also?

Mr. MICHAUD: I doubt it. The purchasing of supplies for British Columbia would be difficult to do from Ottawa. The distances are against us; it is so far away that it takes a long time to communicate. I understand the system that now prevails in Vancouver has been in vogue for over twenty years. Prior to that time the department was administered wholly from Ottawa, and it was not found satisfactory. That is the information I have.

Mr. NEILL: We have a three day mail service now; try air mail and telegraph and wireless; I do not think the distance has got any greater. Is it not a fact that within the last five or six years the department in British Columbia bought three boats? I forget the names of them all, but one, I think, is called the Vanidis. If my information is not erroneous they have already had to rebuild two of them, or they have rebuilt one and contemplate rebuilding the other two. I do not know whether "rebuilding" or "reorganization" is the correct word, but I understand some very big alterations have had to be made on a comparatively new boat.

Mr. MICHAUD: I understand some alterations were made in a boat.

Mr. NEILL: A new boat.

Mr. MICHAUD: A new boat which was bought some years ago.

Mr. NEILL: Then for God's sake get a new purchasing agent.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS— SIXTEENTH ASSEMBLY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps the house will permit me, there is a statement which I should have made this morning when speaking on external affairs. The Canadian government will be represented at the adjourned meeting of the sixteenth assembly of the League of Nation's at Geneva on June 30 by the Hon. Phillippe Roy, Canadian minister in France, and the Hon. Vincent Massey, Canadian high commissioner in the United Kingdom. Doctor W. A. Riddell, Canadian advisory officer at Geneva, and Mr. Loring Christie, counsellor in the Department of External Affairs, Ottawa, will act as advisers.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Ottawa, June 23, 1936.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Thibaudeau Rinfret, acting as the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber Tuesday, June 23, at 4 p.m., for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

F. L. C. Pereira,

Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

To authorize, subject to the approval of the governor in council, appointment of such extra temporary officers, clerks and employees as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of any of the items in these special supplementary estimates.

Mr. DUNNING: This item was discussed last evening. My colleague will move an amendment in the terms suggested by the leader of the opposition, which will place beyond any doubt the question as to the use to be made of the item.

Mr. CRERAR: I move:

That item 425 be amended by adding thereto the following:

"payment therefor to be made from the particular item with respect to which such extra assistance is required or from any item providing in terms for salaries or administration expenses."

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

House of Commons—

Publishing debates, including salaries of amanuenses, etc. — further amount required, $13,095.55.

To provide for the full sessional indemnity to members of the House of Commons—days lost through absence caused by illness, official public business, or on account of death during the present session—notwithstanding anything to the contrary in chapter 147 of the revised statutes, 1927, an act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, or any amendment thereto. Payments to be made as the treasury board may direct, $12,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to say one word with respect to this matter. I mentioned it to the Prime Minister when we rose. I refer to the question of the payment of sessional stenographers. During the last régime there were no statutory increases, and it will be recalled there was a reduction in payments made to civil servants. The policy which had been adopted for many years in connection with the sessional stenographic staff was a salary of $4 per day to begin with; when they had served a second session they went to $4.50 and in the third session they went to $5. But after the failure to provide statutory increases, and the diminution of salaries which took place in consequence of a general reduction in the salaries of civil servants, that was not continued. It has resulted in some ill feeling, if I may use so strong a word, on the part of those who have served in some cases three and four sessions, and in other cases longer than that. Mr. Speaker will no doubt be aware of the circumstances. The old rule of the sliding scale has been discontinued. I remember having personally discussed the matter at the instance of those then in charge, and with the gentleman who looks after the staff. He told me—and I believe it is still so—that beginning with a fixed rate and increasing fifty cents the next year and fifty cents the following year was eminently and entirely satisfactory. I trust when the committee on internal economy makes a final adjustment of these matters at the end of this session they will return to the old rule departed from by the late government at the time I have indicated, when there was a lessening of salaries paid to civil servants and when statutory increases were discontinued.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

To provide for expenses connected with the administration of Indian affairs, including salaries, supplies, relief, medical attendance, hospitalization, dwellings, agricultural activities, surveys, roads, bridges, irrigation, dyking, education, etc. — further amount required, $130,000.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. BENNETT: I have made certain inquiries about this from the Minister of the Interior, and he has explained to my satisfaction that this is to look after increases in salaries provided for by statute and other matters of that kind. I shall not take up the time of the committee with any further discussion.

Mr. CRERAR: I might say that the grant for the educational side of Indian work was cut in the main estimates, and this simply restores it to where it was last year.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

Dominion Lands, Parks, etc.—

To provide for the expenses connected with the national parks of Canada, historic sites, care of indigents in the parks, the appointment of stipendiary magistrates in the parks and the payment of their remuneration, etc. —further amount required, $50,000.

Administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act—further amount required, $4,000.

To assist in the development of the Canadian section of the International Peace Garden in Manitoba, $12,000.

To provide for the expenses incurred under the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act, 1921, and under the agreement between the Dominion, Ontario and Manitoba, confirmed, by the Lac Seul Conservation Act, 1928, for the construction of a dam at the outlet of Lac Seul and its operation by the Lake of the Woods Control Board, moneys expended to be reimbursed to the dominion by the province of Manitoba under the terms of paragraph 8 of the Manitoba transfer agreement, $20,000.

To provide for the expenses incured under the Lake of the Woods convention, 1925, for Canadian participation in legal proceedings in the United States incidental to acquiring a flowage easement over lands bordering on lake of the Woods in the United States, two-thirds of the moneys expended to be reimbursed to the dominion by the provinces of Manitoba and Ontario under the terms of the agreement of November 15, 1922, $10,000.

Mr. BENNETT: In order that it may appear on the record, may I publicly direct the attention of the Minister of the Interior to a matter about which I spoke to him privately. In the national park at Banff there is a publicly owned lighting system developed from the water in the river. It is very satisfactory. There are two sets of rates, that which they charge domestic customers and that chargeable against others. With great effort the permanent officials were induced to believe it might be possible to provide a cheaper rate for what we might call heat and power for larger motors. A rate was provided with a minimum of $3 per month. The meters are paid for on a rental basis of twenty-five cents per month, so that that need not enter into the discussion. Unfortunately with respect to the smaller motors the officials of the department are not prepared to make the experiment. I do suggest that the minister this season might yield to the urgent demand of those who live in the community and try the rate which has been suggested, as an experiment to see how it will affect the revenue. I do not believe there will be any added cost, for the power is there and might just as well be utilized. If the minister will try that experiment certainly I shall be entirely satisfied; for I had intended, if we had been in the place that he is now in, at least to make the experiment during this year.

Item agreed to.

To provide for a contribution to the government officers guarantee fund and to authorize the establishment and administration of such fund including payments therefrom in accordance with regulations prescribed by the treasury board and to authorize payment of interest on such fund at the rate prescribed by the treasury board, $20,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask whether anything can be done in the near future in connection with social insurance? I am thinking now of the present act having been declared ultra vires, and I should like to know what will be the next step taken by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The officers of the Department of Justice at the moment are carefully studying the opinion given by the supreme court, and the Minister of Justice is also giving thought to the matter. I think later he will make a recommendation to his colleagues with respect, possibly, to further consideration of the intra vires or ultra vires of the measure by the privy council. Pending that time the organization already effected with respect to social insurance will be maintained, and nothing will be done to prejudice in any way what has been established. More than that I do not think I can say at the moment.

Item agreed to.

To provide for expenses of the royal commission on the textile industry, including honoraria as follows:—A. S. Whiteley, secretary, $1,000; Robert Rene, assistant secretary, $350; Gordon E. Hooper, adviser on tariff matters, $500, $100,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a very large expenditure. Does it include the $20,000 covered by governor general's warrant, or is it exclusive of that sum? Can the minister say what it is costing per day to operate this commission?

Mr. DUNNING: The $20,000 is to recoup unforeseen expenditures already made. The cost per day is rather difficult to give, but I have some information which may have a bearing upon the matter. It is estimated that a total of ninety days' reporting will be required. The judge, of course, gets no salary; he gets a per diem allowance for expenses. Counsel fees and so on are estimated to require, all told, $38,000 or thereabouts, and travelling expenses will be about $2,000. For auditors and accountants the cost will be approximately $10,000, and for an economist $2,500. Then there are a number of small items, including $3,500 for printing the report and certain honoraria which are mentioned in this item to civil servants who are working on that particular job. There is also a miscellaneous item of $6,000. That will give a rough idea as to the cost of the commission.

Item agreed to.

To authorize payment of the insurance money under policy No. 16736, written under the authority of the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act on the life of Percy William Roper, to Maggie Amanda Roper, notwithstanding the provisions of the said act, $1.

Mr. BENNETT: What is this item?

Mr. DUNNING: This is a curious case, Mr. Chairman, and I should like to give the particulars.

Mr. BENNETT: The only difficulty is as to why the sum is $1.

Mr. DUNNING: I think I can only explain it by reciting the facts of the case. As I think my right hon. friend knows, there are certain provisions of the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act under which the Minister of Finance has to give a decision with respect to the disposition of the insurance. In this case—I suppose I can mention the name, since it appears in the item in any event—the assured under the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act named his first wife, Maggie Amanda Roper, as beneficiary. He obtained a divorce in the United States, if my memory serves me aright, and remarried. Both the assured and his first wife were advised by officers then administering the act that the second marriage could not be recognized and that the first wife must remain as the beneficiary of the insurance. The first wife, therefore, continued to pay the premiums and did so until the death of the assured. Later, however, the pension commission recognized the divorce, and therefore the first wife is ineligible to receive any benefits.

When the matter came before me I thought it was very unjust that the first wife, on the basis of an assurance given years ago by responsible officers, should continue to pay the premiums on the insurance covering the life of her divorced husband, and then, on his death, be deprived entirely of the benefits of the insurance for which she had paid simply because, in the meantime, the pension commission had decided to recognize the second marriage. There is no other way to render what appears to be simple justice than in the manner provided by this vote.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What is the dollar for?

Mr. DUNNING: It is merely a nominal amount, because it is the sum of the insurance policy that is affected. It is not a vote of money by this parliament; it is a right. The money is there, to go to someone under the policy of insurance.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister should have said that the policy was made payable to the wife without designating her name.

Mr. DUNNING: The name is in the estimate.

Mr. BENNETT: It is now, and the difficulty arose as to whether or not she was legally his wife. I recall the circumstances in another way entirely. The policy, like many policies, was made payable to the man's wife. He divorced her, and the new wife said she was the wife. Now, under the provisions of this item, the first wife is recognized as being entitled to receive the money, and very properly so, but the action of the pension commission was limited to the purposes of pension and would have no effect upon this. But litigation might have resulted, and I take it this ends that. There was another case somewhat similar that I recall, and the dollar is a token payment in recognition of the charge against the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payment of the Canadian Wheat Board on account of the liabilities of Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers, Limited, assumed by the Canadian Wheat Board, under the authority of paragraph (f) of section 7 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, $15,856,645.35.

Mr. DUNNING: I have a word to say, which is due to the right hon. leader of the opposition. Last night I understood him to use the words "cooking the books," and attributed those words to him. I find that he did not use the words I attributed to him; the words, which appear at page 4116 of Hansard, were, "an effort to trim up the books."

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: Not a very excellent expression.

Mr. EULER: What does it mean?

Mr. BENNETT: I will tell you what it means.

Mr. DUNNING: I make the acknowledgment, and leave the words which were used to speak for themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the date upon which this wheat was taken over, what was the price fixed for taking it over, and how many bushels were taken over?

Mr. DUNNING: I have the memorandum of release which has already been tabled. The aggregate sum is mentioned therein, but of course that involves wheat and wheat contracts, the cash closing price on that day being 84⅝ cents for number one northern. Every contract which existed was treated, for price purposes, according to the contract itself.

Mr. BENNETT: How many bushels were there?

Mr. DUNNING: There were 205 million bushels, in wheat and wheat contracts.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the figure is 205,060,000 bushels.

Mr. DUNNING: Approximately, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the date?

Mr. DUNNING: December 2, 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: The actual delivery was taken a little later. The reason I have objected so strongly to this is apparent on the face of it. The price of wheat was rising—it went to 90 cents. There were 205 million bushels, and it is said it involved a loss of seven cents per bushel or a little more, making a total of $15,000,000. That meant the entire accumulations of wheat extending over a period of years from 1931 to the month of December, 1935. This is what Mr. Murray said, as reported on page 37 of the proceedings of the committee held this year:

In that connection I might state—and perhaps it would be a good place to start—that our inheritance on December 7 (that was a Saturday, and we started to work on December 9) was 122,863,000 bushels of cash wheat and 175,492,000 bushels of wheat contracts, making a total of 298,356,000 bushels.

I then asked if the cash wheat was all 1935 and Mr. Murray replied:

No. There would be of that, Mr. Chairman, 69,263,000 bushels 1935 crop; on the old account, 53,600,000 bushels of cash wheat. Perhaps I should divide, for the information of the committee, the 298,356,000 bushels total between the 1935 crop and the old account. There were 93,295,000 bushels of the 1935 crop and 205,060,000 bushels of the old account.

He explained that by the old account he meant the accumulations of wheat which had begun in 1931 and which had continued to that date. That is, he took over from the wheat board 93,295,000 bushels of the 1935 crop. I want to know if any part of this $15,000,000 has any reference to that.

Mr. DUNNING: Any reference to the 1935 crop?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not intended to have any reference to the 1935 crop.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no verification of those figures before this committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I can supply that.

Mr. BENNETT: This was the figure I was anxious to get last evening. Remember I am dealing with the price of 84⅝ cents per bushel. From the record it will be seen that the price of wheat advanced. According to page 45, the average price on December 9 was 87·849 cents per bushel. There is a difference of three cents per bushel, which on 205 million bushels, amounts to $6,000,000.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Is that price not for May option?

Mr. BENNETT: I am quoting the figures Mr. Murray gave in answer to this question by the Minister of Mines (Mr. Crerar):

> Q. Have you the average price there?
> A. 87·26 cents.
> The Chairman: You may as well put it in.
> Witness: In the list I have here, I have the average price reduced to three decimals, but in reading it I presume it will be sufficient to give two decimal places, and the exact figures can be entered in the record.

Date:	Bushels	Average price
December 9	820,000	87·849
December 10	2,779,559	87·266
December 11	581,500	87·285
December 12	1,776,000	86·888
December 13	22,025,445	88·779
December 14	2,934,827	89·906

If you take 84·906 from that you have a difference of five cents per bushel, which makes a lesser loss of $10,000,000, predicated upon that figure, than the figure in this estimate. That is the reason why I point to the unfairness of this estimate. Mr. Murray produced under oath a statement showing that if he had taken over on December 14 instead of on December 2 there would have been a loss of only $5,000,000. The price of wheat went up to 90 cents per bushel and the loss would really have amounted to less than $5,000,000. Can that be said to be fair? Can that be said to be just? Can that be considered a business transaction by any stretch of the imagination? I am sure that anyone who is familiar with transactions of this kind will say that I am quite moderate. He did not have to pay over any money; he merely assumed the liabilities at the bank, all of which was in accordance with the provisions of the arrangement. He took over at 84⅝ cents per bushel, but a few days after that the figure was 89⅝ cents per bushel or a little more. Had the transaction happened on that date, the figures would have shown a loss of about $5,000,000. Can that be said to be a fair thing? Can that be said to be even a just thing?

We shall now turn to the further facts in connection with this, namely, those given as to what the effect of these changes meant from day to day. Last night the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) asked me if I could give a date upon which there was a profit in this transaction. I told him I did not carry these figures in my head, but if he would turn to page 338 of the record of last year he would find a complete record of these transactions from July 31, 1931, to June 22, 1935. What are the facts· They are as follows:

	Loss
July 31, 1931	$2,558,352 02
August 31, 1931	4,435,060 53

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my right hon. friend from what he is reading?

Mr. BENNETT: From the evidence given before the committee of the House of Commons that dealt with this matter a year ago. These figures were produced in answer to a request by the Hon. Mr. Ralston. I continue with the figures:

1931	Profit	Loss
Dec. 31		$ 746,285 82

Mr. EULER: Does that estimate include the charges for storage?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the statement of the total indebtedness to the banks and the net liability after deducting the cash deposit and grain stocks at market values of the 1931 season, pool special account down to that date. And further, at the top of the page, evidence is given as to the approximate average cost of special wheat on the following dates. I give this because it has a distinct bearing on the figures that have been submitted and on the computation of the amount:

1933	Bushels	Approximate cost per bushel
April 30..	72,020	50·272 cents
June 30..	69,342	50·095 cents
1934
April 30..	107,843	63·089 cents
June 30..	97,919	63·052 cents
September 30..	129,382	65·663 cents
1935
April 30..	150,662	76·328 cents
May 31..	156,446	79·011 cents

Therefore if 84 cents was received for wheat in December, I find it difficult to figure out how there could be a loss of seven cents a bushel.

Mr. EULER: Will the right hon. gentleman answer the question whether in that cost storage is included?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it includes everything.

Mr. EULER: I think not.

Mr. BENNETT: All I know is that these figures were produced with respect to cost. Colonel Ralston was anxious to know what the position was from time to time and these figures were produced; and the costs, in thousands of bushels, were the figures given at the top of page 338. The cost certainly included storage and nearly everything, 84 cents a bushel.

Mr. CRERAR: With regard to the figure my hon. friend has quoted, 79 and some cents, what was the date of that?

Mr. BENNETT: May 31, 1935, last year. Now there are two points I desire to make. The words I used last night, "trim up the books," were not the best words to use, and if the minister inferred from the use of those words that I was reflecting on him, he was entirely in error and I regret that he should be. What I was endeavouring to say was that, fixing the 2nd of December as the date for taking it over, which was a week before they did take it over, they fixed a price that was lower than the price which was prevailing when they actually took it over. That is unfair; it is worse than that. Why did Murray do it? The answer is obvious.

Mr. CRERAR: That was not done.

Mr. BENNETT: But it was. The minister read the figures, and he said the 2nd of December. The evidence given before the tribunal was that they did not take it over at that date. In order that there may be no misapprehension I will look at it again, and the committee will see that it makes all the difference.

Mr. EULER: On what page is that?

Mr. BENNETT: I read from page 45 a moment ago. At page 37 he said:

> In that connection I might state—and perhaps it would be a good place to start—that our inheritance on December 7 (that was a Saturday, and we started to work on December 9) was 122,863,000 bushels of cash wheat....

That is the story, and I would point out that the figures now given are figures that relate to the 2nd day of December, according to the evidence given us by the minister just now. The figure of the second of December was 84⅝ cents, whereas on the ninth day, the day on which they started, the figure was 87·849. The seventh was a Saturday and they started on the Monday. The total sales for the week showed an average price of 88·589 cents.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Is the hon. gentleman not quoting figures based on the May option? He quotes 88 and something as against 84 and something, the figure for taking over the wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: All I can say is that Mr. Murray does not put it on that basis.

Mr. DUNNING: Cash was the basis of the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): But if I remember correctly, in the committee Mr. Murray gave figures all the way through on the basis of the May option.

Mr. BENNETT: Not on the basis of cash wheat. It works both ways. Whatever he did there he did in connection with this transaction. Now does anyone realize what an unfair thing this is to the previous government and to the farmers and the pool owners of western Canada? Why should contracts that actually sold at a higher price be fixed in value at 84⅝ cents to show a loss? Why the anxiety to get wheat on a rising market? Why, they did not agree to sell at all and in the end it was taken from them by force —the evidence is there on record. It was taken from them by force. Why?

Mr. CRERAR: Taken from whom?

Mr. BENNETT: Taken from the pools; the evidence is there. They telegraphed at last and said, "If you don't do this we will shut off your credit and seize this stuff and get possession of it"—and this on a rising market. The market was going up rapidly, three and four cents beyond what it was when it stood at 84⅝ cents. And on that rising market we have an estimate introduced in this house to make it appear that there was a loss of $15,000,000, when the wheat had not been liquidated, not sold, and when the ultimate responsibility had not yet been determined. That is justice in the Canadian House of Commons.

Mr. CRERAR: Does my hon. friend contend that it should have been left with the pool?

Mr. BENNETT: No, of course I do not, because the statute provided that it should be taken over by the wheat board on such terms and conditions as might be agreed upon; and when these people were not willing to exchange on the proposals made to them the strong arm was used, the wheat was taken from them, and they were threatened with loss of bank credit and other things which are on record in this house. That is what happened. I go to the second point—

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask the right hon. gentleman, just to keep the record clear, what proof he has of that statement?

Mr. BENNETT: It is on the record. The telegrams that were sent are on Hansard; they were put there by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: The record put on Hansard by the Minister of Agriculture is a record which shows that in spite of any telegrams that passed after that date, the wheat pool delivered on the second day of December, and that is the day they say there. The telegrams were passing back and forth.

Mr. BENNETT: The actual delivery of wheat was not made then. They signed a document, which is an entirely different thing. What is more, that only makes the point stronger. In the anxiety to get this on a rising market—it was a rising market—

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): How did anybody know it was a rising market?

Mr. BENNETT: It seems that everybody did. That is the answer, that everybody did.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): For over five years you did not know.

Mr. BENNETT: And what is more: On that rising market this wheat was taken from the pool by force, by threats, by duress, and it was taken from them at 84⅝ cents. Mr. Murray says, "We did not take over until the seventh, and we commenced our business on Monday, the ninth." What right had he, then, to take wheat at all on the second? He commenced his business on the ninth, and on that date the price of wheat was 88 cents or thereabouts, or four cents more than the price now indicated. That proves beyond peradventure my point that you cannot deal with this except as it is liquidated; you can deal with it, on the terms of the agreement, only on the basis of ultimate responsibility or liability, ultimate loss, and the ultimate loss is determinable only after the liquidation of the security. The security was the wheat indicated by this report, and until such time as that was liquidated there was no determination of the loss. That is apart from the law, which is so simple as not to require argument. When it is provided in an agreement that the ultimate loss shall determine the measure of the liability, the ultimate loss can be ascertained only when there has been liquidation of the security; and that security has not yet been liquidated. Last evening the minister said there is going to be a still greater loss because they sold the wheat for less than the 84⅝ cents at which they took it over.

Mr. DUNNING: Carrying charges.

Mr. BENNETT: And the carrying charges, the two together. To go to another point: Mr. Murray said he arbitrarily fixed two-thirds of the sales as being attributable to the 205,000,000 bushels that he took over. The crop of 1935 he dealt with in one way. He took two-thirds of the sales and appropriated them against that. What is the warrant for that course? Remember the guarantee of this country was a guarantee only against ultimate liability. What right had he to do that? What right has anybody to do it? This country had given this guarantee; it was outstanding, there it was, against ultimate loss—a guarantee against ultimate loss which could be ascertained only upon a liquidation of the security. Suppose an individual in this house gave a guarantee in those terms, what would he say to the bank? "Realize. You must realize before you can come to me. I gave my guarantee against ultimate loss." Then there must be the realization of the security, not on a price fixed of 84 cents when it is still on a market of rising prices going up to 88 cents or 90 cents, which would have shown either no loss or a practically insignificant loss. But in spite of this rising market, Murray wants to take that property over by strong arm methods, and we know the methods he used for the purpose of getting it, when on the Monday he commenced operations the price was rising to 88 cents and had gone to 90 cents.

I say that the introduction of this item estimate is worse than trimming; it is an effort on the part of Murray to make it appear that the losses of the producers were great and that his are not—nothing short of that. Go and tell the pool in western Canada that for the purpose of accomplishing this end, that is what was done: The price on December 2 was 84⅝ cents; on the succeeding Monday it was 88 cents, but the parliament of Canada is asked to pass an appropriation of $15,000,000 for a loss which would not have been a loss if the price had been a little over 90 cents—and it went to 90 cents. It sounds good. It it political propaganda. That is what I mean by "trimming" this account. It is an effort by Murray to repeat the same old story, and had it not been that the wheat was put up by direction of the government to be sold in the markets of the world regardless of what it had cost, this would not have happened, as was pointed out by dealers at Rotterdam and other markets of the world. Not in my time in parliament have I known a parliament that would lend itself to a transaction which permitted its servant to take possession of wheat by force, by the strong arm, and then fix the price at 84⅝ cents, when on the succeeding Monday it had risen to four cents better than that; it did go to over 90 cents, which, on 200,000,000 bushels at 6 cents a bushel, would have reduced the loss by $12,000,000 and left it at the small amount of $3,000,000.

Mr. CRERAR: Reduced the loss where?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Reduced the loss just as it has been done here; reduced it on the paper loss that is in this estimate. This estimate would have been $3,000,000, not $15,000,000.

Mr. CRERAR: Does my right hon. friend contend that in the final analysis the loss to the government would have been less?

Mr. BENNETT: If the product had been sold for the price indicated. That is the point exactly. Here is Murray getting hold of this; he says the price is 84⅝ cents and, because that represents a loss of $15,000,000, he wants the Dominion of Canada to pay that loss, although at one time there was a profit of $39,000,000. But the wheat is not yet sold; until there is a realization of the security there is no ultimate loss, and there being no ultimate loss there is no liability. Until such time as that liability has been determined by the sale of the security there is no knowledge of what it will be. Yet the government of the day is lending itself—and I use the word advisedly—to the scheme of Murray to make a loss of $15,000,000 based on the figure of 84⅝ cents, when a few days later the figure was 88⅜ cents and later 90 cents.

Mr. DUNNING: And later still?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Later still, 70 cents.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And before it was a dollar a bushel.

Mr. BENNETT: That illustrates better than any words I can use just what I have been trying to say to this committee, that to determine a loss before there has been liquidation is a violation of any known rule of conduct that governs in private enterprise, and I cannot see why it should be departed from in a government. There is no such thing as a determination of a loss until there has been a liquidation, and the security, in the case of a private individual, would of course have to be realized upon before the loss was determined. And yet we find the government doing this, for what purpose? What purpose is served by it? Fixing the loss upon an anticipated price, and the minister saying it is going to be larger still, when there has been no liquidation of the security. Go and tell the business men of this country that you put an estimate through parliament to try to show that the late government, or those who operated on its behalf, had incurred a loss of $15,000,000 because they took the grain over at these figures, and ask them what they think about the item as dealing with a transaction in which ordinary business rules should prevail. Let the Minister of Trade and Commerce give a guarantee against ultimate loss in connection with his printing plant, and let the other party call upon him to make good his guarantee; he will say: "Have you realized on the security? because my guarantee was only for ultimate loss." That is all I have suggested. That loss cannot be known until such time as there has been liquidation, and there will have been liquidation only when the last bushel has been sold; until then, that liability does not arise.

To introduce this estimate at this time is an action political in character, inspired by the conduct of Murray, whose evidence given before the committee indicated that was just what was to be done; first of all, sell regardless of cost; send your men abroad and tell the great buyers of the world: We are going to get out of the business, sell at less than cost, and then fix the price for the security held by the banks at 84§; disregard the agreement, disregard the provision for ultimate responsibility and ultimate loss, forget all about it and introduce into parliament a provision to pay $15,000,000 in order that you may go around the country and say: They lost $15,000,000 on wheat, whereas if the price were fixed at the price that prevailed on the Monday, the day Murray swears he took hold, the loss would have been reduced by four cents a bushel; if it were later it would be increased. How then can it be determined until there has been liquidation? That was the reason for the agreement between the banks and this country, and I say it was the duty of the Minister of Finance to protect this country.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear; I am doing that.

Mr. BENNETT: Is he?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, by this very vote.

Mr. BENNETT: Then why is he putting in a vote that fixes the loss at $15,000,000 without knowing what it is going to be?

Mr. DUNNING: Because the money is going to be lost.

Mr. BENNETT: But until there is liquidation of the last bushel it is not lost. The whole of it is not lost.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the principle upon which my hon. friend handled wheat for five years. On that principle we differ.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not the principle. Oh, hon. members may cheer as much as they please, but the fact remains that until such time as that agreement with the banks has been implemented, it is not determined. Why depart from that agreement? Why change it? Why change the ordinary rules of business? Why depart from sound business practice in a matter of this kind? Why say: "We will not wait for liquidation; we will not wait until the loss has been ascertained; we will anticipate the loss and say it is $15,000,000 without knowing whether it is $15,000,000 or some other figure?" I ask the hon. minister if that is the way he or anybody else has been accustomed to doing business. Where security is held and the agreement provides for liquidation and the determination of ultimate loss, there must be liquidation before that loss can be ascertained. Until that is done it is a departure from the agreements; it is a breach of the agreement made between the government of the day and the banks—for what purpose? For one purpose and one only: to magnify the operations of 1936 and minimize the operations of preceding years.

I protest, Mr. Chairman. It is all I can do. To depart from law, to forget agreements, to wipe them out as scraps of paper, to fix a price regardless of conditions; on a rising market to fix a loss, which has not yet occurred, at a figure which can be determined only when the security has been realized upon, is to depart from all sound business considerations and to create a precedent in this country that the machinery of the treasury is to be used to show a loss for purely political reasons.

Mr. CRERAR: I have observed in this house that when the right hon. leader of the opposition speaks with the greatest vehemence he is usually on the weakest ground. He never was on weaker ground than he is at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, he is prepared to be judged on that.

Mr. CRERAR: He has been setting up straw men and knocking them down with great vigour. Now, what are the facts of this whole business? My right hon. friend has given some of them himself. The mistake that my right hon. friend has made was that he always looked upon this whole transaction from the time he and his government took hold of it as if it were a great speculation. That was the fundamental error of my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so.

Mr. CRERAR: I will prove it from his own words uttered just a few minutes ago.

Mr. BENNETT: All right; I say it is not so.

Mr. CRERAR: The right hon. gentleman gave us a survey of prices in 1933, 1934 and 1935, and he reeled off month after month profits and losses on this transaction on which his government had guaranteed the banks. At one time, July, 1933, he had a profit on his own statement of over $30,000,000.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It was $38,000,000.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my right hon. friend why, when Mr. McFarland had that profit on these transactions, he was buying wheat instead of selling it?

Mr. BENNETT: To save the market, as the minister knows. Because there was no other buyer.

Mr. CRERAR: How in the world can my right hon. friend say it was necessary to save the market when the market was going up every day?

Mr. BENNETT: But he sold when the market went up. Here is the evidence.

Mr. CRERAR: Excuse me; I did not interrupt my right hon. friend when he was making his speech.

Mr. BENNETT: Pardon me.

Mr. CRERAR: That happened in July, 1933. In May, 1934, Mr. McFarland could have sold his wheat and got out without a loss, on the statement given by my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: But he could not sell it. That is just the point.

Mr. CRERAR: Why did he not sell it?

Mr. BENNETT: For the same reason that Mr. Murray has not been able to sell it yet.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall come to that. I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, why it was. It was because Mr. McFarland had, if my right hon. friend had not, an ambition to make a big showing and make a lot of money on a wheat speculation in which the credit of this country was pledged. That was the fundamental difficulty with my right hon. friend and Mr. McFarland from the beginning.

Now we come to these more immediate transactions. I am not going to say anything as to why the government changed the wheat board, but I am satisfied that time will justify that action, and indeed has already justified it. What position were we in when the new wheat board took charge on December 3? The Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, which had been managed by Mr. McFarland from 1930 until 1935, had over 200,000,000 bushels, actual wheat and contracts for delivery of wheat. They owed the bank not millions of dollars but tens of millions, backed by the guarantee of the government of which my right hon. friend was the head. Does my right hon. friend for a moment contend that when the new wheat board was formed that immense amount of wheat should have been left in the hands of the cooperative wheat producers, free from any control by the government, when the guarantee of the government was outstanding against it?

Mr. BENNETT: He provided by statute that it should be taken over.

Mr. CRERAR: All right; that is precisely what we did on December 2 when the arrangement was made with the wheat board. Now my right hon. friend says: "You took it over when the price was 84⅝ cents on December 2," and he quotes from Mr. Murray's evidence to show that the wheat was not all delivered to the wheat board until some days after that date.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. CRERAR: That is true. In the very nature of things it could not all be delivered on December 2, but the arrangement with the cooperative wheat producers was consummated on December 2 and the price fixed as of that date.

It was necessary for another reason for the wheat board to have control of that wheat. It was making sales of wheat, and when my right hon. friend criticizes the government for that action and criticizes the wheat board for taking delivery of wheat on that day he is leaving himself in the position of saying that that wheat should have been left in the hands of the cooperative wheat producers, where the government had not a single string on what they would do with it.

Mr. BENNETT: He provided quite the opposite.

Mr. CRERAR: That is why we insisted that the cooperative wheat producers should agree to deliver the wheat in question to the wheat board as contemplated by the legislation, and the date of delivery was fixed as of December 2. My right hon. friend makes a great play of the fact that the market advanced for a little time after this date, and he speaks about a loss, and shakes his fist in the face of the finance minister—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no; he is too far away.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, metaphorically he shakes his fist in the face of the finance minister and says: "You have increased this loss." What an absurdity! If it reduced the amount guaranteed by the government for the cooperative wheat producers it correspondingly increased the wheat board's own account, or vice versa. But the loss to the government in the final analysis does not alter one cent. My right hon. friend knows this, and no one knows it better than he does.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so. That is exactly the opposite to what I am trying to make clear.

Mr. CRERAR: My right hon. friend certainly has not succeeded in making himself very clear to the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, the committee is all right.

Mr. CRERAR: Let us go a step further. My right hon. friend has criticized in this house the policy followed by the present wheat board and initiated by this government. Now—

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. CRERAR: I think the committee can hear me. What was that policy? When we came into office we found ourselves with over 200,000,000 bushels of wheat in the hands of cooperative wheat producers, upon which wheat the government had given a guarantee. As a matter of fact, the carry-over on the 1935 crop at the first of August was over 214,000,000 bushels. On top of that we had the crop produced in 1935. If my right hon. friend had been in office and this business had been under his direction during the last seven months the probability is that we would still have the 200,000,000 or 225,000,000 bushels of wheat. Why? Because whenever the market went up he or rather Mr. McFarland would have raised his price still higher. That is precisely the policy that was followed in the past, and the facts prove it. That is the reason the wheat was not sold. Furthermore, why does this loss amount to the figure mentioned here?

I will give my right hon. friend and the committee some further information on that. He takes the price in May, 1935, and he says that May wheat on May 31, 1935, was 79 and some fraction cents. Then he says, "Why do you fix it at 84⅝ cents?" But the carrying charges account for the difference in that period alone—more than that. But—

Mr. BENNETT: Not one-thirteenth of a cent a bushel.

Mr. CRERAR: With interest and insurance on top of that. But in addition, if I remember correctly, the price for wheat was fixed on September 6 at 87½ cents. Now, will my right hon. friend tell us why his government and why Mr. McFarland, the then chairman of the wheat board, and at the same time manager of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, acting in a dual capacity—

Mr. BENNETT: He had retired from that.

Mr. CRERAR: No; he was still manager of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited after he was appointed chairman of the wheat board.

Mr. BENNETT: He says not.

Mr. CRERAR: Well he was, and—

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): How did he handle any wheat?

Mr. CRERAR: That leads to another point. Why did Mr. McFarland in his capacity as manager of the Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, on a bank account guaranteed by the government of which my right hon. friend was the head, buy over 10,000,000 bushels of wheat in the market, in the wheat pit in Winnipeg, at a price above 87½ cents, after the price was fixed?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is obvious. It was given the other day.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, the answer is obvious. The only reason he did it was that he thought wheat was going up in price, and I assume my right hon. friend supported him in that view, because he probably thought wheat was going to a dollar a bushel.

Mr. BENNETT: Did he? Well, he did not. He did not, because an effort was made to fix the price at a dollar, and it failed.

Mr. CRERAR: The price was fixed at 87½ cents, and after it was fixed at that price why did Mr. McFarland buy 10,000,000 more bushels at a price as high as 94 cents, not from the farmers, but right in the pit in Winnipeg? He bought the future months; why did he do so?

Mr. BENNETT: He sold it, at any rate.

Mr. CRERAR: Was it necessary, after the price was fixed at 87½ cents to stabilize the market, by buying wheat at as high as 94 cents a bushel?

Mr. BENNETT: Of course Mr. McFaland was ill and could not attend to give the evidence for himself; I do not know.

Mr. CRERAR: But there are the facts.

Mr. BENNETT: They are not the facts, as he understands them.

Mr. CRERAR: The facts are simple, and clearly indicate the whole course of the transaction.

Mr. BENNETT: What has it to do with the $15,000,000?

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, the ex-Secretary of State, would not agree with it. I do not know that he would know very much about it at the time, but I am perfectly certain he would not agree with it. I am sure the hon. member for Yale would not agree, nor the hon. member for York South.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, they all did, as a matter of fact,—if that will do you any good.

Mr. CRERAR: But those are the facts.

Mr. BENNETT: Those are not the facts.

Mr. CRERAR: They are.

Mr. BENNETT: No. Mr. McFarland did not buy that wheat for the purposes given and under the circumstances noted. That is his statement to me, at any rate.

Mr. CRERAR: Then why did he buy it?

Mr. BENNETT: He can answer that.

Mr. CRERAR: It could not have been for stabilization purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: It was the only machinery that was available for that purpose.

Mr. CRERAR: My right hon. friend talks about fixing the loss. Every bushel of wheat that Mr. McFarland bought after the price was fixed, some of it as high as 93 cents a bushel, is in that account shown as a loss. And that loss was established on December 2. My right hon. friend made a great deal of play about including this in the accounts submitted by the Minister of Finance to the house. I say to the committee that the Minister of Finance would have been lacking in his elementary duties to this country if he had not included it.

Mr. BENNETT: Do not shake your fist so hard; you may hit the Minister of Finance.

Mr. CRERAR: This wheat taken over from the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited is no longer for the account of the farmers. This wheat, as soon as it was taken over, became the property of the Canadian government, through the Canadian wheat board, and it was operated through their account. If the price went up the Canadian government would make a profit, and if the price went down the government would make a loss. Does my right hon. friend or any member of this house argue for a moment that when there was a known loss in the wheat which was taken over, that loss should not have been disclosed to parliament and to the country?

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, but the loss has not yet been established.

Mr. CRERAR: It was established.

Mr. BENNETT: Not until the last bushel is sold.

Mr. CRERAR: My right hon. friend says, "Let us wait and see; the market may go up."

Mr. BENNETT: No, no, no; it is a question of realization of the security.

Mr. CRERAR: The loss was established when the wheat was taken over. If my right hon. friend is buying wheat—

Mr. BENNETT: He never bought a bushel.

Mr. CRERAR: All right. But this is the situation: The Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited had this wheat; the government had guaranteed the bank account and were responsible for every cent of it.

Mr. BENNETT: Against ultimate loss.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; but when it was taken over it became the property of the government, because it was not the property of the government under the guarantee when the wheat producers had it.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; it was pledged to the bank as security for the loan.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but it was not the property of the government; it was the property of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited.

Mr. BENNETT: The property of the banks, under section 87 of the Bank Act.

Mr. CRERAR: It became the property of the government, and there was a definite loss at the time it was taken over. Does my right hon. friend or any other hon. member say that that loss should not have been disclosed?

Mr. BENNETT: Of course not.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall not detain the committee at further length, but I must say that the Minister of Finance would have been entirely lacking in his duty to the house if he had not disclosed those figures. I hope the predictions of my right hon. friend may come true—or possibly they were only hopes. I hope that something may happen to save the country from a greater loss; I hope he is right. But I greatly fear that he may be wrong, and that the loss ultimately will be a great deal more than $15,000,000, the amount for which the Minister of Finance has provided.

Mr. BENNETT: The last sentence covers the whole of it. You are anticipating by this legislation a loss that has not been established, and it cannot be known until there has been a liquidation, and the securities realized upon. That is my contention; that is my objection.

Mr. EULER: I am not going to debate the matter at length, but before proceeding with what I have to say may I observe that I cannot understand the attitude of the leader of the opposition when he states that you cannot fix losses until a liquidation has taken place.

Mr. BENNETT: Ultimate losses.

Mr. EULER: I wonder where that would carry the government, if we are going to decide that we cannot estimate losses until we have reached the ultimate selling out of all the wheat we had. You may go on for years and years; surely the country has some right to know the value of a commodity which they have taken over or guaranteed, and surely they should know from time to time what the loss has been—because it is a real loss—unless, indeed, this government takes the attitude taken by the previous government and fixes values which did not exist, as they did in the case of some insurance companies.

This seems to me the reasonable way to look at the matter: There was a change upon the formation of the wheat board and the purchase of the wheat by the government of Canada under the administration of my right hon. friend from the cooperative producers. That is the vital point. We were no longer guarantors to the bank for the loss, or the ultimate loss, as my right hon. friend says; we were the owners of that wheat. My right hon. friend often invokes what he says are business principles. Surely, when a business man buys something he has a right to put on his books an estimate of the value which is actually possessed by the commodity when he takes it over.

Mr. BENNETT: It was merely a novation; the bank still took the wheat as security.

Mr. EULER: Yes, but my hon. friend knows perfectly well that the wheat was purchased. It was his own government that bought the wheat, that passed the order in council for the purchase of the wheat, which afterwards was taken over by the present government. Yes; there was an absolute change in the situation; whereas prior to that we were the guarantors only to the banks on behalf of the cooperatives, if I might call them such, when the wheat board took charge the situation was changed. Shortly after that my right hon. friend passed an order in council under which the government of Canada purchased the wheat that was in the possession of the cooperatives.

Mr. BENNETT: No; we guaranteed the wheat board, and they substituted themselves for the cooperatives. That is what took place.

Mr. EULER: I never like to use harsh terms, but I think that is pretty much of a quibble and hardly worthy of my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is the fact.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend will not deny that to-day the government of Canada is the owner of what is left of that wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: It is pledged to the bank.

Mr. EULER: Yes, but we are the owners of that wheat, and the wheat board is merely representing the government of Canada as its agent. My right hon. friend knows that perfectly well. I will say this further. It was about time, especially when we became the owners of the wheat, that the people of this country knew what they had lost on the basis of what wheat was worth at that time, and I will say this—

Mr. BENNETT: But those figures were all given in the committee last year.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend says that the wheat board, or the government if he prefers it that way—and I should like him to give attention to this, because I think it is a point worth listening to—forced the cooperative wheat producers to hand over their wheat to us. As a matter of fact my right hon. friend had bought that wheat and we were merely asking for delivery of it under the terms of the order in council. We assured them that their rights were not going to be prejudiced in any way, as to what they should receive; whether it would be the $8,000,000 my right hon. friend voted or whether it would be the $6,000,000 they later received, they were not going to be prejudiced. The point was that we had to have that wheat because the wheat board were selling the wheat; they were supposed to sell wheat; we wanted them to sell wheat and it could not be sold unless that wheat was delivered by the people from whom my right hon. friend himself had made arrangements to purchase it.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister allow me to ask a question?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: They needed the wheat to sell, and they sold it. They sold it at an increase of three, four and five cents a bushel during the next two weeks; yet here we have an appropriation providing for a loss of $15,000,000 in order that Mr. Murray may get credit for a profit for the wheat board. That is all.

Mr. EULER: If wheat had happened to go down in price—

Mr. BENNETT: But it did not.

Mr. EULER: I am sure my right hon. friend does not credit even this government with sufficient omniscience to see in advance that wheat was going to increase four or five cents a bushel, because it did not.

Just in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, this is what I really rose to say, and it is with reference to the charges made my right hon. friend with regard to Mr. Murray, the present chairman of the wheat board. What the right hon. gentleman said was neither generous nor just. In the speech he delivered in this connection earlier in the session the statements he made about Mr. Murray, and he is raising the point himself—

Mr. BENNETT: And they were proved to the hilt.

Mr. EULER: The statements he made or the charges that he made, if they were charges, were not borne out by the evidence which was submitted to that committee, as my right hon. friend very well knows.

Mr. BENNETT: I say they were, and that is the difference between us.

Mr. EULER: To-day my right hon. friend makes the charge that Mr. Murray was responsible for forcing the cooperatives, from whom my right hon. friend had purchased the wheat, to hand over that wheat. I want to say to him that anything that was done with regard to the taking over of that wheat was not done on the initiation of Mr. Murray at all. He was not in Ottawa. The wheat committee of the cabinet met from day to day, and that wheat committee is entirely responsible for what took place. Mr. Murray has no blame whatsoever coming to him. In fact, if I may say so in conclusion, I think this country owes Mr. Murray a debt of gratitude for changing a situation that was almost ruinous to the people of this country into one that holds at least a certain degree of hope.

Mr. BENNETT: There are two or three words I am not going to let pass unchallenged. Mr. Murray swore that, in Ottawa, he helped to prepare the statement of the grain exchange presented last year to the select committee in June and July.

Mr. EULER: What has that to do with forcing the cooperatives to hand over the wheat?

Mr. BENNETT: He swore that he helped to prepare that statement. The hon. gentleman has referred to what I said about Mr. Murray in a previous speech. I said that he was the representative of the grain exchange interests. My hon. friend objects to that, but I proved my statement from the mouth of Mr. Murray himself. Now, in his anxiety to show success and a profit, he is to get credit for the sales of wheat he bought at 84⅝ cents on the second of the month and sold on the ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth for as much as 90 cents a bushel. That is the story, and in some instances those were contracts in wheat. Instead of those being treated as they were realized upon, as one would expect, they were treated in the other way, with the result indicated.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend has absolutely no ground for stating that it was Mr. Murray who forced us to call upon the cooperatives to hand over their wheat to the government. That is the responsibility of the wheat committee of the cabinet.

Mr. BENNETT: He said under oath that he had to have the wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I think in fairness to the chairman of the wheat board and in reply to some of the remarks that have been made by the right hon. leader of the opposition for the purpose, I assume, of indicating to this committee and to the country in general that there is some political virus behind the activities of the government in connection with the handling of wheat, there are one or two things that ought to be said. I have in my hand the second and final report of the special committee dealing with wheat that met during the present session. I notice that the report states:

Mr. Euler, from the special committee on the marketing of wheat and other grains, presented the unanimous second and final report of the said committee—

The report continues:

Pursuant to the resolution of the House of Commons of March 18, 1936, your committee held ten sessions and heard and examined under oath three witnesses, namely,—

Mr. A. E. Darby, secretary, Winnipeg Grain Exchange.

Mr. F. O. Fowler, manager, Winnipeg Grain and Produce Exchange Clearing Association.

Mr. J. R. Murray, chief commissioner, The Canadian Wheat Board, Winnipeg, Man.

Mr. Darby described the constitution and membership of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange and the handling of grain from the producer to the exporter.

Mr. Fowler stated the functions, rules and regulations of the Winnipeg Grain and Produce Exchange Clearing Association.

Mr. Murray, chief commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, explained fully the operations of the board since its appointment on December 3, 1935.

The committee says that the board was appointed on December 3, 1935.

The report continues:

He was examined closely and at length on the operations of the wheat board since the latter took office in December until the end of January, 1936, with particular reference to the following,—

(a) To what extent, if any, the board had favoured exporters of grain and Canadian millers in the sales policy it had adopted.

(b) To what extent, if any, speculative interests alleged to be short in the Winnipeg market had been permitted to cover their transactions in the large sales made in the month of December, 1935, immediately following the higher price fixed by the Argentine government for Argentine wheat.

After a full examination of Mr. Murray and the records placed by him at the disposal of the committee, we are of the opinion that the course taken by the board in the marketing of wheat was consistent with the intention of parliament in enacting the Wheat Board Act of 1935, and with the policy of the government to reduce the wheat surplus to reasonable proportions.

What I should like to recall to this committee is that Mr. Murray was before the committee during the greater part of the time it was considering these matters and arriving at that unanimous decision. The leader of the opposition was a member of the committee. I think anyone who reads the evidence given by the chairman of the wheat board before that committee, in answer to questions put to him by the leader of the opposition, will agree that there is no reason whatsoever for the inferences that have been drawn by the leader of the opposition this afternoon from the investigations of the committee. To say the least, the chairman of the wheat board demonstrated to the committee and to everyone who has read his evidence, that he was quite capable of taking care of himself while in the hands of the leader of the opposition, and also quite capable of handling the wheat of the people of western Canada. I think he is capable of handling himself while in the hands of the leader of the opposition because of the fact that the latter took occasion, when the chairman of the wheat board had no opportunity of replying to his questions or of appearing on the floor of this house to defend himself, of making upon the chairman of the wheat board attacks which the right hon. gentleman did not make when he was face to face with him in the committee.

My right hon. friend refers to what has happened in connection with wheat and states that back in 1933, in the midst of the month of July, his government could have sold wheat through the then wheat stabilizer, Mr. McFarland, at a profit of $38,000,000 to the farmers of western Canada. I should like to ask him why he did not sell the wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that it could have been sold. I stated that on that basis, it represented that profit, just as on the basis of the market price on December 2, it represented the loss which the minister now has.

Mr. GARDINER: We started in at the beginning of July with 69,000,000 bushels of wheat. During the first half of the month, to July 17, that was reduced to 42,000,000 bushels. Wheat was then selling at 95 cents per bushel, whereas it had previously been selling at the beginning of July at 72 cents. In the intervening period the amount of wheat had been reduced from about 69,000,000 bushels down to 42,000,000 bushels. Immediately following that wheat started to go down, but the gentleman who was then in charge of the handling of wheat bought back until by July 22, he had some 66,000,000 bushels again in his possession. In other words, he did what the leader of the opposition says the present chairman of the wheat board should have done during the two weeks in December last after he was first in charge of the wheat. After having sold wheat at a good price to someone else, as when wheat started to go down on the July market two weeks before the new crop was coming in, he went back into the market in 1933 and bought wheat at a price higher than that at which his other wheat had been previously sold.

Anyone who is going to do business like that in connection with the wheat of Canada is not wanted by the present government of this country. At present we are following the policy of trying to get rid of the wheat with which this country was loaded during the time the present leader of the opposition was in charge of the government of Canada. We are not doing this for political purposes; we are not following the policy followed by the government of the leader of the opposition, which was indicated to this house when I placed on Hansard at page 1640 the McFarland operations in connection with wheat from 1930 to 1935. What will be found in the first column of the table which I then placed on Hansard? It will be found that they started their operations with a considerable volume of wheat. This table deals with the crop years which run from August 1 to July 31. We find that on August 31, 1932, they had entirely disposed of their wheat and had the whole amount in the form of contracts to the extent of 76,000,000 bushels. What happened during 1932? They left no wheat in that account; they carried contracts in full. What happened through 1933? They left no wheat in that account; they carried it entirely in contracts. In January, 1934; no wheat, all contracts. In February, no wheat, all contracts. In March, they took 1,000,000 bushels into the account. In April they took 2,000,000 bushels into the account. In May they took 19,000,000 bushels into the account. If hon. members will follow the prices on the opposite side of the page they will find that they were going up during May and the early part of June, 1934.

An election was going on in the province of Saskatchewan at that time and this wheat was being passed into an account which had been carried in the form of contracts right through the previous two and one half years. We come to June, 1934, when 4,000,000 bushels were taken into the account. They then get out of it again and by the end of August they have 72,000,000 bushels in contracts and they are out of wheat. They remained out of wheat, having only 287,000 bushels in April, 1935. Then they came back in to the extent of 29,000,000 bushels in April, 51,000,000 bushels in May, 66,000,000 bushels in July and 72,000,000 bushels in August. The price of wheat has been going up until it is 81¾ cents per bushel. In September, 1935, it rose to 90 cents per bushel.

That was just when we were passing through the last federal election. That is how that gentleman manipulated the price of wheat during those four years for the purpose of indicating to the people of this country that some great profit was going to be made through the transactions of the government in wheat. The present government has no intention of trying to manipulate wheat prices in this country in the interests of any political party. The present government has the intention of placing wheat in the form of bread on every table on which it is possible to place it in Europe, more particularly in the British isles. By placing it there we hope to teach the people of the world to eat Canadian wheat. We intend to carry on these transactions in such a way as to keep a constant flow of wheat going from the wheat fields of western Canada to the tables of Europe, disposing of the wheat in the interests of the farmers and not in the interests of any political party in this country.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Item agreed to.

To provide for payment to certain chartered banks of the amount due by Canadian Co-operative Wheat Producers, Limited, to the said banks in respect of losses resulting from transactions in oats, the repayment of such sums being guaranteed by the governor in council, including interest thereon, $174,383.34.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this item include any wheat handled by the province of Saskatchewan?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported.

To this bill the Clerk of the Senate, by command of the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General did thereupon say:

In His Majesty's name, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General thanks his loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this bill.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

After which the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the first session of the eighteenth parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

In relieving you of your duties, I congratulate you upon the care and attention given the many far-reaching measures submitted for your consideration. Your labours have been arduous and exacting; they have, however, served to complete, almost in its entirety, the extensive program outlined in my speech at the opening of parliament.

The trade agreement concluded on Armistice day, 1935, between Canada and the United States of America, received your early approval, and its provisions have now been in force for some time. Legislation has been passed implementing the undertakings of the agreement and of the settlement of the trade dispute with Japan. Substantial reductions have been made in the rates of duty on implements of production in the agricultural industry, and on machinery in other basic industries, as well as on articles of domestic consumption. The pronounced increase of our trade during recent months is evidence of the beneficial effects of the government's fiscal policies. My ministers are continuing their efforts to expand trade with other countries.

Comprehensive measures have been enacted to effect a nation-wide cooperative effort to overcome conditions created by the long-continued existence of unprecedented unemployment, and to effect a more complete supervision of the expenditure of funds for purposes of relief. The National Employment Commission has been appointed, and has entered upon its duties. Appropriations have been made for projects to provide work, and to assist the provinces in the granting of direct relief. The government has been authorized to enter into agreements to expand industrial employment. Special provision has been made to supply work for single homeless men in relief camps, and the camps will be closed on July the first.

Provision has been made for aiding in the reestablishment of needy fishermen and for expanding the sale of Canadian fisheries products at home and in foreign markets.

The Bank of Canada Act has been revised so as to give to the government effective control of the central bank as well as a predominant interest in its ownership.

Existing legislation respecting the Canadian National Railways has been amended so as to provide for the appointment of a board of directors in a manner which will serve to afford a greater measure of governmental authority and responsibility to parliament.

Radio broadcasting in Canada has been made the subject of inquiry by a special committee of the House of Commons. The committee's recommendations have been embodied in legislation which provides for the carrying on of a national broadcasting service in Canada under a broadcasting corporation having complete control over all forms of broadcasting, whether public or private.

Provision has been made for the reorganization and consolidation of important departments and branches of the public service. The consolidation of certain existing departments into the Department of Mines and Resources and the Department of Transport, and the coordination of the administration of the national harbours, will greatly further the ends of efficiency and economy.

The royal commission appointed to inquire into conditions in the textile industry is continuing its investigation, and a royal commission has been appointed to conduct an investigation respecting the importation and distribution of anthracite coal.

The War Veterans Allowance Act has been amended to provide for special consideration to veterans having attained the age of fifty-five. A Veterans Assistance Commission Act has been passed with a view to securing more general employment of returned soldiers. Amendments have been made to the Pensions Act to simplify procedure and expedite the hearing of claims.

Amendments to the criminal code have been made, including the repeal of section 98, relating to unlawful associations.

Other important measures have been enacted.

The several opinions of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada touching the validity, in whole or in part, of a number of measures enacted at the sessions of parliament in 1934 and 1935, have been received within the past few days, and are being carefully studied by my ministers and by the law officers of the crown.

My ministers have given continuous thought to the serious international situation. They have sought to support by all appropriate and practicable means the establishment of a world order based on justice and equity. At the forthcoming meetings of the Assembly of the League of Nations to be held at Geneva at the end of the present month, and in September, the representatives of Canada will seek, in cooperation with other delegates, to further in the most effective way the aims and ideals of the league.

His Majesty the King has graciously consented to unveil, on July the twenty-sixth, the memorial on Vimy Ridge, erected in commemoration of the valour and sacrifice of the Canadian soldiers who fought during the great war. The acceptance by the King of the invitation of His Majesty's Canadian ministers, and by the President of the French Republic of the Canadian government's invitation to be present on this occasion has been deeply appreciated.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the provision which you have made for the public service.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The many important measures enacted at the present session, the first of the eighteenth parliament of Canada, constitute, I believe, a substantial contribution towards national recovery.

In taking leave of you at this time, I pray that the blessing of Divine Providence may rest upon your labours.

This concluded the first session of the eighteenth parliament.
