that as the office had been abolished there was no office to which the former employee could render service and therefore he could not maintain a claim. The question of contractual rights they disregarded for the moment, saying they would leave it for further consideration. But they referred to the Australian case—I do not carry the name in my mind, but I think one of the parties was Stroud. That case had to do with a very important matter, the question of the right of one who has paid into the superannuation fund not to have his position destroyed without his being able to claim the benefits that accrued to him by reason of that statute. And to say that he holds office during pleasure I am sure the minister will see is at variance with the provisions of the Superannuation Act and the Civil Service Act. That does not apply to other than those who hold office under the Civil Service Act, but under that act they have acquired vested rights—perhaps that is not the accurate legal term, but it carries my meaning to the minister—which cannot be terminated at pleasure.

For instance, there is the age question. A moment ago the minister referred to the fact that when a civil servant reaches the age of sixty-five he may retire, but when he reaches the age of seventy, unless special steps are taken to protect his position, he must retire. As this clause reads you could eliminate a deputy minister on the assumption that he holds office during pleasure, and that applies to the directors too. It is true that that was so until there were civil service and superannuation acts, but I must repeat that the effect of the combination of the two is to create a right which is not terminable at pleasure. It must be terminable in accordance with the terms and provisions of the statute in that behalf. That overcomes the very point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. As it stands to-day, unless something is done the question raised a minute ago in connection with reaching the ages of sixty-five or seventy does not arise at all. Notwithstanding this, the employment of anyone could be terminated. The law has intervened to prevent that, and I do direct attention to the fact that in drafting the bill it has been overlooked.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my right hon. friend that the Department of Justice carefully reviewed the entire drafting of the measure, and the section in question was inserted deliberately. It would seem that the preceding words were sufficient. They are "shall be appointed or employed in the manner authorized by law." Surely that covers it.

Mr. BENNETT: From what is my right hon. friend reading?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: From subsection 3 of section 4.

Mr. BENNETT: But that subsection is limited in application to officers, clerks and employees. At present I am talking about directors and deputy ministers who pay into the superannuation fund. I noticed the words to which my right hon. friend has directed attention.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it has always been recognized that when a deputy minister receives his appointment from the crown it is the prerogative of the crown to have the position terminated at any time it considers necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: There was a time when they did not pay into the superannuation fund. I shall cite the case. Mr. Sifton desired to get rid of the then deputy minister of the interior. Certain questions arose, and I think if the Prime Minister will look up the correspondence he will then become aware of the circumstances to which I have referred. The declaration of law is that it is the prerogative of the crown to dismiss at pleasure any servant, military or civil. That is the whole principle which underlies our system. But where there is a statutory provision—and in this case there is created a statutory right—to superannuation, to which the crown itself contributes every year with respect to every officer, as distinguished from the minister himself, it is proper to say that the minister holds office during pleasure for he does not contribute to such superannuation fund. Other officers who pay into the superannuation fund acquire rights upon such payments being made, and the crown recognizes it by making contributions to that fund. Therefore that constitutes a contract, and is the distinction between the Australian case and the Reilly case, as was pointed out in the judgment of the court. I shall be glad to give the minister the reference to which I have referred.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have the Reilly case before me.

Mr. BENNETT: The Australian case referred to is Gould v. Stuart.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And is reported in 1896 appeal cases.

Mr. BENNETT: Have I made my point clear to the Prime Minister, namely that there is a vested right accrued by reason of the payment in of money to the fund? It would be all right if it were not for the fact that the minister has said he proposes to make his choice from within the class that has acquired the right. Having acquired the right it cannot be taken from them at the pleasure of the crown, if there is a provision in the statute dealing with the situation. There is provision in the statute as to age, one a discretion which may be exercised by the servant and the other a right to termination by the crown. It is automatic termination by the crown when he reaches that age, unless action is taken to extend it. There are cases of that kind in the estimates, as is known, and other cases appearing in the record. A servant who had reached the age of seventy-two or seventy-three was released from such service on the ground that a certificate could not be given that his services were indispensable to the department. The Civil Service Act covering this situation, as it does, you can no longer use the words "during pleasure." I believe I can satisfy the minister upon the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would it not be correct to say that any rights acquired by virtue of any statute and which were forfeited by the termination of a position would constitute a ground for compensation?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And it should be done. But that is a very different thing from assuming that once an appointment is made the appointee acquires the right to office for an indefinite term simply because some statute either compels or permits him to be associated with the crown in making a contribution towards a fund, such as the superannuation fund.

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister is quite correct when he states that it affords a ground for compensation. But it also deprives the crown of the right to dismiss at pleasure, because the basis of the claim for compensation is a breach of contract; that is the whole point in it. The headnote in the case of Gould v. Stuart states this:

> The crown has by law, whether in England or New South Wales, power to dismiss at pleasure either its civil or military officer, a condition to that effect being an implied term of the contract of service except where it is otherwise expressly provided:—
> But held, that certain provisions of the New South Wales Civil Service Act of 1884, being manifestly intended for the protection and benefit of the officer, are inconsistent with such a condition, and consequently restrict the power of the crown in that respect.

The judgment of the court I remember very well, because when the Reilly case was under consideration it came up. It reads as follows:

> It is the law in New South Wales as well as in this country that in a contract for service under the crown, civil as well as military, there is, except in certain cases where it is otherwise provided by law, imported into the contract a condition that the crown has the power to dismiss at its pleasure: Dunn v. Reg. (1); De Dohse v. Reg. (2) The question then to be determined is, Has the Civil Service Act, 1884, made an exception to this rule? Part I of the act provides for the classification of officers according to their salaries, the increase of salaries, and the appointment of a civil service board. Part II provides for the examination, appointment, and promotion of candidates for admission to the service. Part V for superannuation allowances, in which according to s. 48 an officer is not entitled to a superannuation allowance until he has served fifteen years. Part VI for the creation of a civil service superannuation fund, to which every officer is made to contribute by a deduction of four per cent from his salary. Sections 10 and 49, which were referred to in the argument for the appelant, are not applicable to the present case. Section 10 provides for the services of an officer being dispensed with in consequence of the abolition of his office or of any departmental change and not from any fault on his part; and section 49 to any officer not entitled to a superannuation allowance whose services may be dispensed with through no fault of his own, or who may be compelled through infirmity of body or mind to leave the service, giving power to the governor to grant a gratuity to him. The provisions in part III are the most material in the present case. Section 32 provides for the suspension of any officer who in the opinion of the minister or of any officer authorized by him to investigate any matters or accounts pending a report shall have committed any act which appears to him to justify suspension; but if the suspension is not made by the minister, the officer making it is immediately to lay before the minister a report stating his reasons for the suspension, and the minister may either confirm it or restore the officer to his office. Then section 33 enacts that if the minister orders or confirms the suspension he shall report the same to the governor, who, after calling on the officer to shew cause or make explanation, may remove the suspension, or according to the nature of the offence dismiss the officer from the service, or reduce him to a lower class therein or to a lower salary within his class, or deprive him of such future annual increase as he would otherwise have been entitled to receive or any part thereof during any specified time, or punish him by fine not exceeding £50; provided that the governor before deciding may direct the board, or appoint one or more persons to inquire into the matter, with authority to receive evidence and to summon and examine witnesses on oath. Section 34 provides for punishment by fine not exceeding £10 of an officer who is negligent or careless in the discharge of his duties; section 35 for the summary dismissal of any officer convicted of felony or any infamous offence, and the forfeiture of his office by becoming bankrupt or applying to take the benefit of an insolvent act, or making an assignment for the benefit of his creditors; and section 37 for fine, suspension, or dismissal in case of dishonourable conduct or intemperance. These provisions, which are manifestly intended for the protection and benefit of the officer, are inconsistent with importing into the contract of service the term that the crown may put an end to it at its pleasure. In that case they would be superfluous, useless, and delusive. That is, in their Lordship's opinion, an exceptional case, in which it has been deemed for the public good that a civil service should be established under certain regulations with some qualification of the members of it, and that some restriction should be imposed on the power of the crown to dismiss them.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the Supreme Court and to dismiss the appeal.

That act of New South Wales in terms is not unlike our own. It provides, as does ours, for the creation of a superannuation fund, for payments into it, and for the methods that have to be pursued for the elimination of any person from the public service. For instance, section 55 of our act provides that if a member of the civil service is guilty of political activities during an election, he or she thereby forfeits his or her position and becomes subject to the punitive powers of the statute itself. There are other similar sections. One section deals with the question of age, the time when retirement is permissive and when retirement becomes obligatory. There are other provisions with respect to the termination of service in consequence of bodily or mental infirmities. These matters indicate how clearly our statute, in terms like all other civil service acts, recognizes that the pleasure of the crown shall not be exercised where appointments are made under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. As this bill now stands before the committee, to my mind at any rate, it is quite clear that the crown is still retaining the right to terminate the employment either of a deputy minister or of a director. However, I was going to say that there is a special exception with respect to subsection 3 of section 4.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is the wording of our statute different from the wording used in other statutes with reference to deputy ministers?

Mr. BENNETT: I was sending out for the statute in order to satisfy myself on that point. When you come to subsection 3 of section 4 you find these words:

Such other officers, clerks and employees as are necessary for the proper conduct of the business of the department shall be appointed or employed in the manner authorized by law and shall hold office during pleasure.

That should read "according to the provisions of the Civil Service Act and shall hold office in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act." That is the real truth about that. Sir Richard Couch, in the judgment from which I have just read, I think states the position of the civil servants in this country, as well as of those in New South Wales, as clearly as it is possible to state it—if they conduct themselves with that measure of propriety which the statute provides for, their services cannot be dispensed with at the caprice of successive ministers or at the pleasure of the crown. Sir Richard Couch has said that their position is one that involves an exception being made to the application of that doctrine.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I read in the explanatory note that this subsection is in the usual form. I have no objection to looking further into the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: But the Minister of Justice sees what I mean about subsection 3?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: They are slightly inconsistent.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Subsection 3 is in the usual form.

Mr. BENNETT: It certainly is not in the usual form in which we have passed such clauses.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is what it says, but I am quite willing to look into the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Justice will recall that we had quite a considerable debate on one occasion in connection with a certain bill, the title of which I do not recall at the moment. At that time we provided that the provisions of the Civil Service Act should apply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps this section could stand.

Mr. NEILL: I have no doubt that this reorganization will effect a very great economy, and I believe it will result in improved efficiency, but I am also afraid that it will mean the dismissal of a large number of employees, probably more than 1,000. If this happens the government and the minister are going to be very unpopular in certain circles. I congratulate the government and the minister upon having the courage to do this at this time, and I congratulate the government and the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Howe) upon carrying out the reorganization of the harbour boards, an equally politically unpopular move. However, I am certain that that move will be of benefit to the country at large. I am sorry the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) is not in his place, because I should like again to urge the necessity of cutting out some of the dry rot and superfluities in his department. I am quite sure that if that were done it would result in greater efficiency and much economy. The fear has been expressed that these released men will be thrown upon the street, and I should like to ask the minister how many of them will be taken care of under the provisions of the Superannuation Act.

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot state the number at the moment. However, I know there are several who have reached the age of superannuation. Except in a few cases, these positions have not been filled for several months as we realized that when this consolidation took place we would probably have a superfluous number of employees. It is impossible for me to state at the moment just what reduction there will be in the staff of the new department as against the corresponding staffs in the other departments which are being merged. I can only say to my hon. friend that we propose to deal with this matter in the manner I have already suggested. The last thing on earth I desire to do is to work hardship on anyone who has been in the service for a number of years and has rendered faithful service during that period.

Mr. NEILL: That is not the point. I was under the impression that the large majority of civil servants in Ottawa were contributors to the superannuation fund and that if they put in ten years' service they were entitled to superannuation. Is it not a fact that the great majority will be eligible for superannuation?

Mr. CRERAR: Will receive superannuation if they retire?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; I think that is true.

Mr. HEAPS: The question of superannuation has just come up. Is it intended to superannuate any of the employees affected by this amalgamation?

Mr. CRERAR: At present I cannot answer that definitely.

Mr. HEAPS: It is evident that some of the employees of the department will find themselves out of work when this amalgamation takes place. If I understand the superannuation act correctly, those persons who have been less than ten years in the service and have been paying into the superannuation fund are not entitled to receive back from that fund any of the moneys they have paid in. In the event of certain employees being no longer required, I am wondering whether some exception should not be made with respect to paying them back the money that they have paid into the fund.

Mr. CRERAR: I regret that I cannot give information on the point the hon. gentleman has raised. Whether there is a limit of time within which superannuation becomes effective, I cannot say.

Mr. BENNETT: There is.

Mr. HEAPS: I am under the impression that if a person pays into the fund for a period of less than ten years and is dismissed or retires he is not entitled to receive back any of the moneys he may have paid into the fund.

Mr. CRERAR: That, as I understand it, is only if he is dismissed for cause.

Mr. HEAPS: I believe it applies to all employees.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 3 of the Civil Service Superannuation Act reads:

> This part applies to every person who becomes a civil servant after the 19th day of July, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four, and to such other civil servants as elect under the provisions of any of the other parts of this act to become contributors.

Section 6 provides:

> Except as hereinafter otherwise provided the superannuation allowance mentioned in the next preceding section shall be one-fiftieth of the average salary received by the contributor during the last ten years of his service multiplied by the number of years of his service, not, however, exceeding thirty-five years.

Then there is a provision as to how the calculation is to be made. Section 7 then provides:

> If a contributor becomes disabled or otherwise incapable of performing the duties of his office, or if his office is abolished, and if he is ineligible by reason of age or length of service for a superannuation or retiring allowance under this act, the governor in council may grant him a gratuity not exceeding one month's pay for each year of his service; or, if he is required to retire on marriage, a gratuity not exceeding the amount of his contributions made under this act without interest.

Then there is provision with regard to gratuities to widows, mothers and so on.

Mr. HEAPS: Suppose a person has paid into the fund for a period of years and is retired from the service. Is there no provision for returning the moneys paid in?

Mr. BENNETT: The whole basis of the fund is that there shall be appreciation to it by reason of the fact that people have paid in and left. Suppose I have a policy in an insurance company and do not pay the premium after a certain length of time: no one suggests that I can get my money back unless I have a contract. That is one of the factors which assist companies in paying claims, because the cost of carrying after five years is commensurate with the money paid in. One of the factors which add to the superannuation fund is these payments that cannot be handed back. There were half a dozen cases of that kind which we had to explain at some length, and with much unpleasantness.

Mr. HEAPS: Then a person who has paid in for seven or eight years might be retired by the government as a result of amalgamation of departments and would not be entitled to a refund of moneys paid in.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a special case, abolition of office.

Mr. HEAPS: Then the point is cleared up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The provision which the leader of the opposition has read makes it clear that, where there is ground the governor in council may grant a gratuity to meet a case of that kind. And that is the general practice.

Mr. HEAPS: I assume that the general practice will follow in the case of amalgamation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely.

Mr. HEAPS: Where individuals may be affected?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I would point out that as regards deputy ministers the language of the Civil Service Act is the very same.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it is. I have it before me.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As regards other employees, section 20 has the words "and shall be during pleasure." Then section 52, with regard to dismissals, provides:

> Subject to the provisions of section 3 of this act, nothing herein contained shall impair the power of the governor in council to remove or dismiss any deputy head, officer, clerk or employee, but no such deputy head, officer, clerk or employee, whose appointment is of a permanent nature, shall be removed from office except by authority of the governor in council.

The authority exists, therefore, in virtue of the general law. The exception in section 3 merely mentions the commissioners of the civil service commission. I think that on the whole it is exactly the same wording.

Mr. BENNETT: The language is the same, but I submit that there has been no amendment of the statute, as there should have been when the Civil Service Act assumed its present form, because as pointed out in the judgment which I have read from New South Wales, the usual common law provision no longer obtains for the reason that by statute we have provided for this very contingency. However I am not going to argue the matter further. As the Prime Minister has indicated, the governor in council may grant:

> (i) who has attained the age of sixty-five years, an annual superannuation allowance to the amount specified in section six of this act, or
> (ii) who before attaining the age of sixty-five years becomes disabled or otherwise incapable of performing the duties of his office, or who retires from the civil service by reason of the abolition of his office, an annual retiring allowance equal to the superannuation allowance to which he would have been entitled if he had attained the age of sixty-five years at the date of such disability or retirement.

In other words, the very contingency to which reference is made is provided for by the statute. That is abundantly clear.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there any special reference to contributors who have been less than ten years in the service?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. If they have been less than ten years in the service they have to be dealt with in a special way.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will there be a special director who will have general jurisdiction over the development of resources?

Mr. CRERAR: There will probably be several. There will be a director of mines, which is one of the great resources; there may be a director of parks, which is another great resource, and there will be a director of Indian affairs. I do not know that the Indian administration can be described exactly as a resource. Then there are lands, forests and water powers.

Mr. BENNETT: Very few lands and forests, though.

Mr. CRERAR: Not a great deal. We have some, for instance, like the Petawawa forest reserve and others.

Mr. MacNICOL: What I had in mind was that under the former organization of the Department of Interior there was a branch set up specially to develop industry in this country. The minister does not appear to be familiar with this branch, and perhaps I should further explain.

In the course of making investigations as to the development of industry and discussing the matter with various industrial boards, the Toronto industrial commission, the Welland industrial commission and others, I learned from the directors of several of these boards that they had been helped considerably by a branch of the Department of Interior called, I am not sure that I have just the right name but I think it was the resources branch. One of these directors informed me that this particular branch of the Department of the Interior was more responsible than any other agency for the development in Canada of rayon, cellophane and allied industries.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid they were boosting for a job.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps they were. Nevertheless if that is a fact, there is a branch of the department which can render considerable service in Canada in providing employment. In the course of the development of the resources branch of the department, which is now going to be under the minister, a great number of discoveries will be made throughout the country, new finds, new minerals, something new that can be manufactured, and if these discoveries could be presented to industrial boards like the Toronto industrial commission or the Montreal industrial commission, if Montreal has one, or the Welland industrial commission, or the Hamilton industrial commission, perhaps some new industries could be started. But if capital is not made conversant with discoveries of that kind, new industries cannot be started in consequence. It appears to me that if this particular branch of the department were developed to the limit, much new employment could be given to Canadians. All I have in mind is that there is an opportunity in the development of the resources branch of this proposed department to create new employment; certainly that is something which is greatly required in this country, and they could do it by bringing to the attention of manufacturers and investors, or groups of such men, the possibilities contained in such finds. If the industrial commissioners who informed me were correct—and I keep in mind what the right hon. leader of the opposition suggested—and if the resources branch of the Department of the Interior has done good work in bringing to their attention information whereby the development of industry in this dominion has been encouraged, then undoubtedly there is an opportunity to provide more employment in Canada by bringing to the notice of those interested the advantages of developing any new finds which the resources branch may discover. I am convinced that an opportunity exists there, and I urge the minister to develop this particular branch to the limit.

Mr. CRERAR: I think my hon. friend has reference to the work carried on by the forest products laboratories, which carry on quite extensive research work as to the uses that may be made of different woods. They have, so far as my information goes, rendered very useful service to various branches of industry associated with forest products.

Mr. BENNETT: That is largely a testing laboratory, though.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but it does investigational work. It is not the intention to do away with that. That work will be carried on. In fact, all the work carried on by the various departments will be carried on in the future, but we hope by organization to operate on a more economical basis, and, I trust, probably a more efficient basis, because, of course, one probably can never reach the maximum of efficiency.

Mr. McCANN: Does not the work outlined by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) fall within the province of the national research council?

Mr. CRERAR: It has been carried on for years by the Department of the Interior, and I am informed that more recently it has been carried on more or less in conjunction with the work which is being done by the national research council.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in Montreal.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. The leader of the opposition raised the point, when the estimates were under consideration, that there might be a further coordination, indeed a merging, of this work with that of the research council. I am not in a position at the moment to say how advisable or inadvisable that might be. All I can do is to assure my hon. friend from Davenport that there is no intention to abandon that work.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Organization of the department.

Mr. CRERAR: I have an amendment to move, Mr. Chairman, to section 7, as follows:

That in line 25, after the word "department" the following words be inserted, "and the classification of positions therein"; and that in line 28, after the word "department," the following words be inserted, "and the classification of positions therein including the establishment of rates of compensation for each class of position thereunder."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say, Mr. Chairman, that the proposed amendment is being inserted because of a suggestion made only to-day by the Department of Justice upon further reviewing the measure. The memorandum of the deputy minister states:

There may be some doubt as to the power of the governor in council to provide for the classification of the service in each department on the immediate organization thereof in view of the fact that the word "organization" may be restricted in its meaning to that as used in the Civil Service Act, and in order to remove this doubt it is suggested that the bill be amended in committee.

Mr. BENNETT: I was wondering whether it were necessary to add, "notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think this amendment will cover it.

Mr. BENNETT: I think perhaps it would.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Department, minister and deputy minister substituted.

Mr. BENNETT: Might it not be desirable in subsection 2 of section 9 to say that the officer in charge of the branch of Indian Affairs may discharge all duties that have heretofore been discharged by the deputy superintendent general of Indian Affairs? I see that this has been provided for in one way, but perhaps the minister will recall that this official is called the deputy superintendent general of Indian Affairs, and it struck me as I read this section that it might be desirable to insert those words. Of course the minister will exercise his own view as to that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is a deputy minister just the same, is he not?

Mr. BENNETT: He has only the rank; he is referred to as the deputy superintendent general of Indian Affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the note on the opposite page explains the matter.

Mr. CRERAR: As I understand it, subsection 2 of section 9 simply vests in the director who shall have charge of Indian Affairs the powers now vested in the deputy superintendent general.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. The only question I was raising was whether or not this is an adequate expression of that intention.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My right hon. friend suggests that we should replace the words "deputy minister" in line 37 on page 3 of the bill by the words "deputy superintendent general of Indian Affairs"?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; that was my view.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that would be better.

Mr. CRERAR: Then I move, seconded by the Minister of Justice, that in line 37 on page 3 the words "deputy superintendent general" be substituted for the words "deputy minister."

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—Territories and crown lands.

Mr. STIRLING: Were not these lands under the control of the Department of the Interior?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Then why particularly refer to them, after section 5? All those things which were previously under the Minister of the Interior now come under the Minister of Mines and Resources. Why mention these particularly?

Mr. BENNETT: Section 5 refers to powers and duties, and this section refers to physical property.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister be good enough to tell me the population of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon at the present time?

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid I have not that information before me at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister put it on Hansard the other evening at my request.

Mr. CRERAR: My recollection is that the population of the Northwest Territories is about six thousand and that of the Yukon—

Mrs. BLACK: Not quite five thousand.

Section agreed to.

Section 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Coming into force.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not sure that it would not be desirable for the minister to have in this measure a provision that on proclamation the whole or parts of the statute may come into force. Once the statute is proclaimed there might be some difficulty in administration in respect of some of these branches, whereas if the minister brought the statute into effect by proclamation in respect to appointments and some other sections he might be able at a later date to deal with the question of directors. He does not want a hiatus between the time the statute is proclaimed and the time it is actually in effect. It will be recalled that we did that only the other evening in connection with another measure.

Mr. CRERAR: I think that is a good suggestion. I move, seconded by the Minister of Justice, that this section be amended in line 15 on page 4 of the bill to read as follows:

This act in whole or in part shall come into force upon a date or dates to be fixed—

And so forth.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 80, respecting the Department of Transport.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Department of Transport.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggested that the name of this department should more appropriately be that of communications, for reasons which I think are apparent in section 5, but I am not going to do more than say I still believe that term would be more indicative of its real functions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In speaking on the resolution on which the bill is based I drew attention to my right hon. friend's preference for the use of the word "communications," but the government's view is that "communications" relates rather to the transmitting of information than to the transporting of persons or commodities which is the function of transportation in its different forms. Communications would apply to such services as telephones, telegraphs and the postal service, but the word "transport" signifies rather the conveyance and transport of commodities or persons. As airways and highways and railways and waterways are largely for the purpose of the transport of commodities and persons it is considered that the word "transport" is more appropriate.

Also I might point out that a similar department in Great Britain is known as the Department of Transport.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I am familiar with that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And the reasons which governed there in the selection of the designation to be given this department of the public service seem to be equally applicable here.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—Governor in council may make regulations.

Mr. BENNETT: I find it difficult to understand why in the old statute the word "ascertain" was used or is a correct word to use in connection with tolls. The section says "other works under the management or control of the minister, and for the ascertaining and collection of the tolls, dues and revenues thereon." That is taken from the old statute, but I cannot see how "ascertaining" is applicable. It should be "fixing." How can the governor in council "ascertain" the tolls except by fixing them as provided by statute? The minister of transport now makes a recommendation for the fixing of the tolls. The word "ascertaining" is in the original wording but I cannot think it is apt.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The reason for retaining it is because it was in the old section.

Mr. BENNETT: But is that a good reason?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no particular objection to changing it, but it has been deemed advisable to hold to the old language.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There must be some reason for it.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend is more of a Conservative than I am.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If we are to change something I want to know why.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister must fix the tolls; there will be no "ascertaining."

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Organization of the department.

Mr. HOWE: There is an amendment required, exactly similar to that made in the previous bill.

Mr. CRERAR: I move:

That in clause 8, page 2, line 41, after the word "department" the following words be inserted:—

"and the classification of positions therein," and in line 44 after the word "transport" the following words be inserted:—

"and the classification of the positions therein, including the establishment of rates of compensation for each class of position thereunder."

Mr. BENNETT: What I said with respect to a previous bill applies with equal force to this. In previous statutes we have provided for a condition that has been modified by the enactment of three statutes, the Civil Service Act, the Civil Service Insurance Act and the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and the language should be modified to meet the new conditions. But I leave that for the moment. The only point I wish to make is: Have we the minister's assurance that in this measure, as in the Department of the Interior bill, all positions mentioned are to be filled from within the service as it now exists? That, I think, is provided for, but I want to be clear that that is the understanding.

Mr. HOWE: I am glad to give that assurance. In fact I am advised that under the wording of the clause it is necessarily so.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I believe.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 9—Officer to perform duties under act or contract.

Mr. FINN: I believe this is one of the most important bills that has been introduced, because it involves the merging of several departments, namely the Department of Railways and Canals, the Department of Marine, the branch of civil aviation and the radio branch. I have not had an opportunity to make a close study of the bill, but I should like to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the minister who is to administer the measure must do so in different departments. I understand there will be a special board to deal with harbours, a condition which has arisen out of the centralization of authority in Ottawa instead of decentralization in various ports. In the second place the bill gives the Minister of Railways and Canals, who is to be known as the Minister of Transport, control over the railways of Canada, and a section of railway in the United States running between Chicago and Detroit. Further, it places under his jurisdiction a piece of railway in Canada which is not part of the Canadian National railway system, namely the Intercolonial railway. The Canadian National Railways is a corporation, a specific entity in itself. A fair, broad interpretation of the measure shows that there will be an appointment of seven gentlemen of whom one is to be president and one is to be chairman of the board. My understanding is that those officers will be named, and that the remaining five will serve under them.

The minister has been asked whether in his administration he will follow the example set by the two Conservative administrations which preceded the one headed by the present leader of the opposition, namely, whether he will adopt a process of decentralization. He was asked whether directors would be appointed to represent each province. The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, now Conservative leader in the Senate, at that time stated clearly and specifically that the representation of the various provinces by men who were competent to sit as directors constituted the best kind of management. Such representation would entail nine members, in addition to the president and the chairman of the board. I asked the minister, further, whether or not in the appointment of directors consideration would be had for territorial divisions. In my view it is impossible for gentlemen sitting at Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Halifax, or any other single point, to follow developments and to note the improvements necessary in the various ports, and to realize the significance of the recommendation in the report of Sir Alexander Gibb to the effect that port managers should be appointed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member seems to be speaking with reference more particularly to certain provisions of the railway act. May I point out that this is a different measure, and provides only for the consolidation of existing departments. The situation to which the hon. member refers will not be affected one way or the other by the measure now under consideration. Possibly my hon. friend would not mind reserving any further observations he may have to make until we come to a discussion of the appropriate railway bill.

Mr. FINN: With all due deference to the Prime Minister, may I say that the minister of transport derives his authority from the present measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, he already has authority, as Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. FINN: Under the act passed in 1933 control of the railways is taken out of the hands of the Minister of Railways and Canals and put in the hands of three trustees.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This bill has nothing to do with that.

Mr. FINN: I may be a bit hazy about the matter, but I do not think I am.

Mr. HEAPS: Carried.

Mr. FINN: My hon. friend says, "carried"; if he wishes to be carried he will find someone outside who will assist him. I am looking for light. I have no desire to delay the progress of the bill, but if hon. members will examine it they will find that the Minister of Railways and Canals will now become minister of transport and will have under his control railways and canals, Canadian National Railways and the administration of the Department of Marine and the branch of civil aviation, and radio. If it is the wish of the Prime Minister that the matter be discussed under the other measure, I would have no objection, but if the other measure does not offer an opportunity to discuss this subject I must ask the Prime Minister to permit a full discussion, so that we shall not be up against a condition whereby—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid the object sought to be served by my interruption is no longer possible as it is now six o'clock. When we reassemble, the hon. member may have all the latitude he wishes.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

DOMESTIC FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher) (for Mr. Chevrier, Ottawa East) moved the second reading of Bill No. 85, to incorporate Domestic Finance Corporation.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the government I rise to oppose the second reading of this bill to incorporate this small loan company. The house will remember that on the statute books there is legislation dealing with small loans generally, and it is the opinion of the government that this legislation does not adequately control the rates of interest which companies of this class may charge. During this session a committee of the senate has been investigating the matter of small loans, with, I believe, the object of recommending to the government constructive amendments to the general legislation governing small loan companies. My information is that the committee of the other house has reached certain conclusions which, I must say, are not adequate from the standpoint of the government. So far as I can understand, the conclusions reached by the senate committee in reality involve an increase in the rates of interest which may be charged by these small loan companies. I must be fair and say that these conclusions do not involve increases all along the line, but according to the best calculation that could be made by departmental officials, it would indicate that the increases would involve about forty per cent of the loans at present outstanding and payable to the companies which fall within the purview of the small loans' legislation.

The government holds the view that in these times of declining interest rates it is doubtful wisdom for parliament to incorporate more companies empowered to charge these high rates of interest. It is true that the general legislation enacted a few sessions ago endeavoured to set maximum rates and it is natural that the companies incorporated by parliament should in their advertising attach some importance to that fact. The impression has gone abroad, among certain sections of the public at all events, that parliament, by the general legislation now on the statute books, has authorized the charging of the maximum rates. I know that such was not the intention, and for this, among other reasons, the government was gratified to see the study being given to this matter by a committee of the other house. However, for the reasons I have indicated, the government cannot accept the solution proposed by that committee.

It is evident, Mr. Speaker, that this matter of interest rates and the conditions applying to small loans must again engage the attention of parliament. It is the intention of the government to initiate, between now and the next session of parliament, a further examination of the matter with a view to amending the existing general legislation. In the meantime, I must oppose the second reading of the bill now before the house which, to summarize, provides for effective annual rates of interest ranging from 24½ per cent up to 94 per cent. I am sure that the house will regard such rates as excessive. It is true that in the general legislation now governing the matter the rates are expressed in terms of monthly rates, but there are various other charges, such as chattel mortgages and so forth, which operate to add to the annual interest charge or the monthly interest charge which the borrower has to pay. In connection with this bill and the one that follows, the government suggests that the house should reject them at this session on the principle that we should not incorporate any more companies of this kind until the general legislation can be brought more into harmony with present day conditions, so far as the cost of money is concerned.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the minister opposing this sort of bill at the first session of a new parliament. Ninety per cent of these loans are made to industrial workers who are charged as high as 120 per cent. Not even by the widest stretch of the imagination could anyone say that these bills are for the general advantage of Canada. They are purely provincial. These companies came to parliament ten years ago. They took themselves out of the Companies Act; they took themselves out of the Usury Act and out of the Interest Act; they got private bills put through and then they went back home and held up the industrial workers. I am opposed to permitting interest rates of 40, 50, 60, 70, 80 and 90 per cent.

I happened to be in a building in which one of these loan companies is located and I heard eight or ten poor women complaining about what they had to pay. The riding which I represent is overrun by these shark loan companies and I wish to protest against this particular type of legislation. The senate has proposed interest rates of two per cent per month, but 24 per cent per annum is too much. These companies not only charge exorbitant rates, but make the applicant take out chattel and other kinds of mortgages. This type of loan has been criticized by the county judges in the division courts of Ontario. I wonder how these bills got through parliament, and it is time parliament stopped this sort of thing. Farmers and fishermen are provided with loans at low rates, but the industrial worker who makes up fifty per cent of the people of this country has to depend upon this type of company for a loan, instead of a government loan. The industrial worker should be given reasonable rates of interest just as the farmer and the fisherman were under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

I am glad to hear the minister oppose these bills. This legislation was enacted for the first time ten years ago when the present government was in office. These shark loan companies should never have been incorporated. They do not have them in England where the government is trying to help the poor man. We should put a stop to them in Canada and then we shall not be bothered any more with them in this parliament.

Motion negatived.

ATLANTIC LOAN AND FINANCE COMPANY

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East) moved the second reading of Bill No. 86, to incorporate Atlantic Loan and Finance Corporation.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the remarks I made on the previous bill have not the same application to this one, which seeks to join two companies now holding provincial charters in Nova Scotia and doing business in that province. Section 5(b) of the bill indicates that the rates of interest to be charged are lower than those authorized in the general legislation adopted by parliament in the session of 1934. Pending the revision of the existing legislation I would not have the same objection to this bill as I have to the former one. The terms of this bill are much more moderate, though not as moderate in my opinion as they should be under the terms of general legislation. At any rate the same objection does not apply to this bill, though it does apply to the next one on the order paper.

Mr. BENNETT: Wherein does this differ from the other?

Mr. DUNNING: Section 5(b) (i) provides that the rate of interest on loans less than $350 shall be two per cent per month. For loans of $350 and upwards the Money Lenders Act will apply and the charge will be limited to twelve per cent per annum. The provisions of this bill are much to be preferred to the provisions in the other bills for the reasons above indicated. The rate of two per cent per month is less than that being charged now by all operating companies for loans less than $350.

While I do not advocate the bill, I am indicating that because it falls within the scope of existing legislation I have not the same objection to it as I had to the former bill.

Mr. BENNETT: So does the other one. Whether we like it or not, the statute passed in 1934 brought the others under control. The interest rate was controlled.

Mr. DUNNING: These people are voluntarily asking for less than the law provides.

Motion negatived.

UNITED CREDIT ASSOCIATION

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Spadina) moved the second reading of Bill No. 87, to incorporate the United Credit Association.

He said: With all that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has said with reference to high rates of interest I thoroughly agree, and I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). But the minister's refusal to allow the incorporation of this company merely creates a monopoly for the existing companies, who will continue to charge the very rates proposed in this bill. Moreover, the legislation which is now being considered by the senate committee will apply to all companies that have received or that will hereafter receive incorporation from this parliament. In other words, if the senate and this house approve the recommendations of that committee they will apply to all companies now or hereafter to be incorporated. If this company is incorporated now and the government comes to the conclusion that the rates of interest recommended by the senate committee or by the committee of this house should apply, then they do apply to this company as well as to the five other companies. I wish to point out, however, that it is certainly not solving the problem to leave the five companies now operating to charge the very same rates of interest proposed to be charged by this company if incorporated, while refusing to allow the new concern to enter the business.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): With all that my hon. friend has said I agree. As I indicated with respect to the former bill, it is rather with a view to preventing the further extension of this evil that I take the attitude I have taken.

Mr. FACTOR: Why not apply it to the other companies?

Mr. DUNNING: I had hoped, as I indicated, that the study which was being made in another place would enable the matter to be dealt with at this session. It is now quite evident that this cannot be done. I admit that the action taken to-night is not constructive, especially having regard to the fact that the small loaning institution has a place and serves a purpose with respect to the needs of the industrial worker. In fact, I believe that one of the most capable studies of that subject, made by the Russell Sage Foundation of New York, opens up a very useful field of investigation for anyone who, like myself, is appalled at the rates of interest charged. The study which is being made of this subject by the Superintendent of Insurance, a very capable actuary on whose judgment in these matters committees of the house have placed a great deal of reliance in the past, indicates not only that these rates are too high but also that the business of small loans is relatively by far more profitable net than any other type of financial business in the country. It indicates the need for a careful study by parliament of the means to be taken properly to regulate this business. I am sorry to say that it has been impossible for me during this session to give this subject the time and attention which it merits. I relied upon receiving from another place something which would be helpful, but that apparently has not occurred. We can only look forward to dealing with the situation effectively at another session, in the meantime preventing the further spread of the evil by refusing to pass bills incorporating more companies to do business along these lines. Certainly the house, having been unwilling to pass Bill No. 86, cannot consistently vote for the one now under consideration.

Mr. NEILL: Will the rejection of this bill prevent these people from going to the provinces and getting provincial charters?

Mr. DUNNING: I am glad my hon. friend raises the point. It is difficult for federal legislation to deal adequately with this problem. Many such companies are incorporated provincially under the aegis of provincial law, to do business within the provinces and in accordance with provincial charters. As to the constitutional aspect of the matter, that I am not competent to discuss at the moment, but I know a number of provincially incorporated companies are doing business. The reason I spoke favourably with respect to Bill No. 86 was that it had the effect of bringing two provincial companies under federal jurisdiction and therefore within the scope of legislation enacted by this parliament. However the house has seen fit to turn down even Bill No. 86, and that being the case, I do not think there is any argument in support of the bill now before us.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): The wording of this bill is exactly the same as that of the first two. This company proposes to operate in Winnipeg. If these people want a charter, let them go to the Manitoba legislature. The head office is to be in Winnipeg and the incorporators are David Slater, real estate agent, Gilmour F. Schoales, insurance agent, and Patrick Herman McNulty, surgeon. Well, by the time the surgeon operates on the industrial worker the rate will be about 50 to 300 per cent, because there are a good many foreigners in parts of Winnipeg. That is the trouble. These companies operate to some degree among the foreign population and the rates that are charged should not be allowed. This bill proposes to take the company out of the federal Interest Act, out of the federal act with regard to usury, out of the federal Companies Act, and to give them a charter from this parliament for what is mostly a purely municipal business in Winnipeg. I doubt whether the company will lend money outside Winnipeg, and the rates are prohibitive. This is the first session of this parliament and we should put our foot down on this sort of thing from the start. If these people want a charter, let them go to the provincial legislature.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I suggest to the minister the advisability, not merely of studying the Russell Sage book on this subject, but when he is preparing further legislation, of giving careful attention to the question of fostering credit unions, some of which are being successfully worked in our own country both in Quebec and in Nova Scotia. That is much more nearly in keeping with our needs here than the American experiment.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): When similar measures were before the house in 1934, I directed attention to the studies of the Russell Sage Foundation. I referred to a book that dealt with the matter at some length. I had no idea at that time of the extent to which the loan companies were serving, shall I say, a fairly useful purpose in the United States. But interest rates have so fallen since 1934 that a rate which then looked like a reasonable maximum one, now seems almost ridiculous to contemplate. In view of what was said by the hon. gentleman who is promoting this bill, I think the government would still have time to amend the statute as we did in 1934, and to reduce the maximum rate from 2½ to 1½ per cent per month or whatever figure the minister might consider reasonable under the circumstances.

Mr. DUNNING: That is my difficulty, lack of study.

Mr. BENNETT: Then for a year at least this would accomplish the amount of good that control over existing companies would bring about, because we at that time passed legislation affecting existing companies and others thereafter to be created. This bill provides for a low annual interest rate, but the implications lead to conclusions that are far from reasonable.

It occurs to me that there is much force in the arguments presented by the hon. gentleman in charge of the bill, and therefore I simply suggest that it might be desirable for the government to contemplate a short section dealing with what should be the maximum rate until such time as new legislation is enacted. Such a section would be very easy and simple to deal with. It is not true that the provinces have very much control over this matter because under item 19 of section 91 of the British North America Act exclusive jurisdiction with respect to interest rests with this parliament, and legislating on interest rates we have been able to control to a very great extent the whole situation. That is the reason we are here in parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: The legislation of 1934 does not control provincial companies.

Mr. BENNETT: No; but the general usury act and the other acts that we have relating to interest control all interest transactions, and no province can deal with the question of interest rates as such because they are solely under our control under item 19 of section 91 of the British North America Act. Under these circumstances it occurred to me, and I would at least make the suggestion, that a short section would be all that would be required to deal with the matter while the minister is contemplating the legislation he may hereafter introduce. The difficulty at the moment is that with interest rates as low as they are it is not easy to determine what is a reasonable maximum rate. I quite realize that.

Mr. DUNNING: I really have not sufficient information on which to base an opinion.

Mr. BENNETT: One might take the views of the officials of the insurance department in that regard.

Mr. DUNNING: The rates suggested are too high for me.

Mr. BENNETT: I realize the difficulty, but on the other hand there is much force in the contention that otherwise for a year at least there is given a wider licence than heretofore prevailed for the necessitous to be dealt with, as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has suggested, on the basis of man's necessity being man's opportunity, and the terrible necessity of some persons has sometimes offered the opportunity for exploitation and for—there is a word which is not elegant but which describes the situation—gouging to an extent which would otherwise be impossible. I think the bill must fall with the others.

Motion negatived.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

PAYMENT OF FINES AND PENALTIES BY INSTALMENTS

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Church for the second reading of Bill No. 5, an act to amend the criminal code (fines and penalties).

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I just wish to ask the Minister of Justice a question. The debate on this motion was adjourned in March so that the minister might consult the attorneys general of the provinces. As I have said, this bill is an exact copy of the law of England. I was wondering whether the minister intends to include the amendments proposed by this bill with the other amendments he has in view when his general bill amending the criminal code is brought down.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have communicated with the various attorneys general about this bill and have received their replies, and I shall be pleased to communicate them along with my own views when the bill amending the criminal code is before the house. It will be introduced this week and given a second reading, I hope, next week.

Order stands.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 80, respecting the Department of Transport—Mr. Mackenzie King—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 9—Officer to perform duties under act or contract.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock I was making some references to Bill No. 80, creating a Department of Transport, as introduced by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. I have no desire to prevent the committee or the house from going ahead with this legislation, but the Prime Minister indicated that there was another bill called the railway act, and I know of no such act that is before the house except the Railway Act of Canada, passed in 1919. As the bill now before us relates to transportation, perhaps the Minister of Railways will be able to indicate which bill the Prime Minister referred to as the railway bill. Is it the act of 1919, which is a general act dealing with all railway matters, or is it the act dealing with the creation of the railway commission? I tried to look it up during the recess and I failed to accomplish two things, either to find the bill or to have something to eat. If the minister would indicate the particular bill the Prime Minister had in mind I should be in a better position to form a judgment.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member may discuss the matter he has in mind on the railway estimates or on the bill which went into committee this afternoon and which will come before the committee of the whole at the next sitting of the house.

Mr. FINN: Which bill is that?

Mr. HOWE: The bill for a railway from Rouyn to Senneterre.

Mr. FINN: I should like to say to the hon. minister that this particular piece of railway of which he speaks is very much like that oriental railway in the province of Quebec. Perhaps my hon. friend the minister would tell me how it would be possible for me, after this bill has been passed, to discuss the questions that are involved in the bill and to bring forward any amendments I may have to suggest. That is a somersault I have never been able to make. In all kindness I would ask the minister to tell me on what other bill we could intelligently discuss certain provisions of this Bill No. 80, which is now before the committee for consideration.

Mr. HOWE: I do not think this bill provides a suitable opportunity for the discussion of the questions my hon. friend has in mind, for the reason that it does not change any existing situation at all. It simply groups in one department various powers now exercised by the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Marine. I should say that the hon. member could very well discuss the point he has in mind at the moment, on any railway legislation that may be brought down this session or on the railway estimates.

Mr. FINN: This is the point that strikes me: We have two classes of railways coming under the minister under this bill. One is the Canadian National system, which is a company, and the other is the Intercolonial, which was given to the maritime provinces under section 145 of the British North America

Act. I find that subsequently there was passed in this house a bill which said that the Intercolonial railway included not only the road from Halifax to Montreal but also some included lines in the province of Quebec, and were put around the necks of the people of the maritimes.

Mr. HOWE: I dislike to interrupt my hon. friend, but I feel that he is out of order. May I suggest that as yet we have not passed the appropriation under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, and I should think that would be a splendid time to discuss this matter.

Mr. FINN: That may provide a splendid opportunity to discuss it but my point is that under this bill my hon. friend, as Minister of Transport, takes over control of the Department of Railways and Canals, which has jurisdiction over the Canadian National Railways, through a board of directors. I want to be open and above board with hon. gentlemen in this house, with the right hon. the Prime Minister and with the Minister of Railways. I am not satisfied, in fact I am far from satisfied, with the condition of the Intercolonial railway to-day. As I said once before in this house this session—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must inform the hon. member for Halifax that he is out of order.

Mr. FINN: For what reason?

The CHAIRMAN: We are now on Bill No. 80, respecting the Department of Transport. The Minister of Railways has intimated to the hon. member for Halifax that the matter the hon. gentleman wishes to discuss may be brought up when the railway estimates are under consideration or when the house considers a certain bill having to do with the proposed construction of a branch line. Therefore I must tell the hon. member for Halifax that he must confine his remarks to the bill under discussion and not go on with regard to something which is not relevant.

Mr. FINN: With all due deference to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I say that I am within the four corners of Bill No. 80. If you will look at section 2 of the bill, it will be seen that this section takes the place of the Department of Railways and Canals Act.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member for Halifax that we are on section 9 of Bill No. 80, and if he desires to make some remarks he must confine himself to this section of the bill; otherwise he will be out of order.

Shall section 9 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Section agreed to.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Coming into force.

Mr. FINN: I do not propose to be put off by all the "carrieds" or "Carrie Nations'" of some hon. members. I have a place in this house; I have a privilege and a right, which I propose to exercise. That is what I came here for, and when I am not able to do that I shall go home. I understand that we are on section 10.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member for Halifax but while he is here he must comply with the rules of the house. In acting as he is the hon. gentleman is not conforming to the rules, and he is out of order.

Mr. FINN: I have not started.

The CHAIRMAN: Sections 10 and 11 have passed.

Mr. FINN: I should like to ask you, Mr. Chairman, when they passed. I thought we were on section 9 when the house took recess.

Mr. HOWE: I have an amendment to section 11.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Railways moves that section 11 be amended by inserting after the word "act" in line 38 the words "in whole or in part" and by inserting after the word "date" in the same line the words "or dates."

Mr. FINN: I should like to ask the minister for an explanation as to what that means.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of this amendment is to provide that the act may be proclaimed either in whole or in part. It is felt that in the organization of the department circumstances may arise which will make it desirable to proclaim one part of the act and not another, and this makes provision for that to be done.

Mr. FINN: Then, Mr. Chairman, I think I am perfectly in order under this amendment which has been proposed by the minister. This bill deals with the Canadian National system and also with the government owned road, the Intercolonial railway. It might be the desire of the minister or of the government to deal with one part, the Canadian National, and not to deal with the other part, the Intercolonial.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FINN: I should like to ask how I am out of order. The Minister of Railways has submitted an amendment in which he divides this bill up; one part may become operative and the other not. I have a right to assume that it may be the part dealing with the "Intercolonial" that does not become operative; therefore, under this amendment I have a right to discuss the Intercolonial. If I am out of order I should like to know why, and under what rule.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to ask the minister this question. Before this legislation is proclaimed, under the present administration of the Department of Railways, which of course is still operative under the existing law, does the department recognize any difference between the Intercolonial railway and the Canadian National railway system?

Mr. HOWE: There is a difference in the matter of property. The property of the Intercolonial is vested in the crown, and all transfers of property, leases, et cetera, must be signed by the Minister of Railways. Otherwise there is no difference. The operation of the Intercolonial has been turned over to the Canadian National.

Mr. STEVENS: Under what act?

Mr. FINN: The Railway Act of 1919.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it under the Canadian National Railways Act that the Intercolonial railway was turned over to the Canadian National for operation?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, the Canadian National Railways Act of 1919.

Mr. FINN: The Railway Act of 1919 came into effect in 1922. It specifically stated that when the Grand Trunk in the United States was turned over, the Intercolonial should come under the jurisdiction of the railway commission and be subject to the same rates as applied to all other railway companies in Canada. The Railway Act of 1919 was brought into effect in 1922, and as far as I have read it—and I have read it often and critically—I cannot find any provision in the act that the Canadian National railway management shall operate the Intercolonial. If there were any such provision, it would be absolutely in conflict with section 145 of The British North America Act, and that act cannot be repealed by implication; therefore the provisions of that section stand. The Intercolonial is vested in the Crown and is to be operated by the Minister of Railways and Canals in the interests of and for the benefit of the maritime provinces. I think it was in 1932 or 1933 an act was passed in which it was declared that the Intercolonial railway shall extend from Halifax and Sydney to Montreal. But to-day it is cut off at Rivière du Loup going west and the rest of the road is operated under the central division or eastern lines from Montreal or Toronto.

I have no desire whatever to retard the progress of this bill, but the people of the maritime provinces have some rights, if I desired to protest for a moment I would quote the words of the late Sir Charles Tupper in his memoirs written by himself in which he said that if Nova Scotia went out of confederation we were going to deny ourselves that great destiny which was ahead of us. He pictured the flow of traffic from the orient and said that the port of Halifax would become a forest of masts. If it seceded, it would be better that we were picked up and hurled behind the Rocky mountains. If we are to be picked up and hurled there I do not know who is going to catch us, but I hope before that happens I shall be under the sod and shall not have to go along.

It is in no spirit of carping criticism that I say this, but I have always felt very strongly on this subject. I have always felt that a great wrong has been done to the maritime provinces in regard to the Intercolonial, and I know of no better time than the present that the committee or this house and parliament should make up its mind whether or not we are going to be left in the middle of the lake so to speak, with no oars to row ashore, because they cut us off at Rivière du Loup and put the rest of the road in what they call the eastern lines. I want to see the Intercolonial railway operated as it was under the Prime Minister's predecessor, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and under Hon. A. G. Blair and Hon. H. R. Emmerson, a through road from Halifax to Montreal, splendidly equipped and the pride of the people of the maritime provinces. We are not denying anything to the west, but I think there is no more opportune time than the present, when a new board is being set up and the whole management is to be changed, for us to find out exactly where we stand in reference to the Intercolonial railway. If the Minister of Railways will say to me that if a good case can be made out, as I believe it can, he will give it careful consideration, and that subject to the decision of the house a bill shall be introduced subsequently to deal with the Intercolonial railway separately and apart from the Canadian National railways system, this legislation can go through. To save expense I believe the Intercolonial should be operated by the Canadian National management, but we should have, as we are supposed to have to-day, an Atlantic local manager. Mr. Appleton in Moncton is a vice-president and is supposed to be local Atlantic manager, but he has no more control over the Atlantic division than the Minister of Railways has to-day over the whole system. Mr. D. E. Galloway of Montreal or Toronto is in control of the eastern lines. I have had letters from home asking me how it is that we are charged with over $5,000,000 deficit, for that deficit is not on the Intercolonial railway. Part of it is on two lines of about 210 miles, in the province of Quebec, that never was a part of the Intercolonial and is not to-day except for operating purposes.

If this matter can be cleared up later I do not wish to retard this or any other legislation. I know hon. gentlemen want to get home, and so do I, but any person who comes to this parliament and whose first desire is to get home rather than stay here and attend to his duties should be left at home and should not have been sent here at all. That is what I conceive to be the duty of public representatives and that is the course which I have always tried to follow, and which I shall continue to follow until the people cease to follow me. So, if I can get some assurance from my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, I would feel better. I do not sleep very well, and if I get this assurance it may help me to sleep better to-night.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BANK OF CANADA

MAJORITY CONTROL BY GOVERNMENT OF CAPITAL STOCK AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS

The house resumed from Monday, June 8, consideration in committee of Bill No. 82, to amend the Bank of Canada Act—Mr. Dunning —Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 6—Directors.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Before proceeding to the consideration of section 9 of the original act may I say that the government has given consideration to the suggestion made yesterday by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) to the effect that a larger number of directors should be appointed by the government than is provided in the draft of the bill. The government has considered the matter, and as a result I shall ask my colleague to move an amendment to section 6 of the bill which involves a redrafting of the whole section. The purpose of the amendment is simply that of changing the number of directors appointed by the government from four to six. The other provisions of the section are amended in conformity with that change. The change ensures absolute control by the government even under the contingencies imagined by the hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. McGEER: What is the change in the votes? Are the six directors to have two votes each?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, for the length of time necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move the following amendment:

That the bill be amended by striking out section six thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"6. Section nine of the said act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

Directors

9. (1) The following persons shall be directors of the bank:

(i) directors holding office at the date of the coming into force of this subsection, who shall continue as directors until the expiration of their several terms of office;

(ii) six directors to be appointed by the holder of the class "B" shares of the bank, with the approval of the governor in council, to hold office as follows: two until the annual general meeting in 1940; two until the annual general meeting in 1941; and two until the annual general meeting in 1942;

(iii) one director to be elected by the holders of the class "A" shares of the bank at the annual general meeting in 1940, to hold office for a term of two years;

(iv) two directors to be elected by the holders of the class "A" shares of the bank at the annual general meeting in 1941, to hold office for terms of two years and three years respectively;

(v) directors, each of whom shall hold office for a term of three years, to be elected by the holders of the class "A" shares of the bank, one at the annual general meeting in 1942 and one at each annual general meeting thereafter;

(vi) directors, each of whom shall hold office for a term of three years, to be appointed by the holder of the class "B" shares of the bank, with the approval of the governor in council, two as of the day of the annual general meeting in 1940, and two as of the day of each annual general meeting thereafter.

Vacancies

(2) In the event of a vacancy amongst the directors elected by the class "A" shareholders, the board shall appoint a qualified person to hold office until the next annual general meeting, when the shareholders shall elect a person to fill the vacancy for the remainder of the term: Provided, however, that no director in office at the date of the coming into force of this subsection shall be so replaced if there are three or more directors elected by shareholders in office.

(3) In the event of a vacancy amongst the directors appointed by the holder of the class "B" shares of the bank, the holder of the said shares shall, with the approval of the governor in council, appoint a qualified person to hold office for the remainder of the term.

Number of votes

(4) In the transaction of the business of the bank, each director shall have one vote: Provided, however, that prior to the annual general meeting in 1940 each of the directors appointed by the holder of the class "B" shares of the bank shall be entitled to two votes.

Reelection and reappointment

(5) The directors shall on the expiration of their terms of office be eligible for reelection or reappointment."

Mr. McGEER: The amendment does not change the general principle I was discussing at the close of the last sitting of the committee. At that time I dealt with the fundamental principle that the control of the bank should be directed to dominate, namely the issue of currency and credit in terms of public need.

By the amendment the government is given control over the board of directors, but unfortunately the directors do not control the bank. In proof of that fact I should like to draw the attention of the committee to certain provisions in the Bank of Canada Act. First I direct the attention of hon. members to section 8, which states that the governor, deputy governor and assistant deputy governor shall each be appointed as in the act provided for a term of several years. They are to be appointed by the governor in council. The actual clauses of the act which define and establish the control of the affairs of the bank are sections 13 and 14, the first of which reads as follows:

13. (1) There shall be an executive committee of the board, consisting of the governor, the deputy governor and one director selected by the board.

Then subsection 3 provides:

14. No action or decision of the board of directors, or of the executive committee, shall have any effect unless the same is concurred in by the governor, or in his absence or incapacity, the deputy governor.

As a matter of fact, these sections place the actual control of the administration of the bank's affairs in the hands of the executive committee, two of whom are appointed by governor in council, and who hold office at the will of parliament. Parliament could dismiss them by amending the act, or by repealing the act, just as has been done in connection with the trustees of the Canadian National Railways.

It does not matter how many members there are on the board of directors, the board of directors have nothing whatever to say about the administration of the affairs of the bank unless what they suggest is concurred in by the governor, who along with the deputy governor, is under the control of parliament because parliament may dismiss or remove them from office. They form the majority of an executive committee which today has full control over the administration of the bank's affairs. They are superior to the board of directors and, consequently, the board of directors is not a group of men the majority of whom can dominate or control the affairs of the bank. A majority of the board of directors appointed by the governments' shareholders means absolutely nothing.

During the course of my remarks yesterday the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) asked this question: What would you do with the $724,000,000 that the Bank of Canada now has the power under the act to issue; would you issue that money as a means of putting people to work? In answer to that, I should like to say that if proper control were established in the Bank of Canada it should be such control that the government, the Bank of Canada, the chartered banks and the financial institutions could get together to create the means of financing those sound public works, national, provincial and municipal, which would be the means of eliminating unemployment and putting people to work at work that is needed to be done. Of course, you would not use the legal tender currency of the Bank of Canada; you would be able to make arrangements with the chartered banks and the financial institutions by which short term treasury bills at minimum cost would be issued to carry on this work.

It may be said that it is impossible to do that, but I want to point out that that is exactly what is being done by the federal reserve board in the United States. A great deal of the money which has been used to put people in that country to work has been simply the credit of the member banks of the United States federal reserve system which has been issued for the use of the government as loans bearing interest rates as low as one-tenth of one per cent. I quite agree that the federal reserve system is far from perfection. I do not suggest for one moment that the mere fact that under the act, with the reserves of gold that the Bank of Canada has available, a sufficient number of Bank of Canada bills to support upwards of $7,000,000,000 of bank credit can be issued, would afford a complete panacea for all the social and economic and political ills of the Dominion of Canada. What I do say is that we have the necessary credit machinery now established and if it can be controlled so that currency and credit can be issued in terms of public need, there would be no necessity for the terrible conditions which now exist in Montreal, for the bankrupt conditions now continuing in Alberta and for the plight of our cities from one end of this dominion to the other.

The reason why the government should establish complete ownership of and control over the Bank of Canada is simply because it is not a bank of issue solely for the service of the chartered banks. It should be established as a bank of issue and as a national bank serving the public interests nationally, provincially and municipally, through which bank issues of public money and public credit for expenditure by national, provincial and municipal governments could be brought under proper and regulated control. We do not need to go to the senate or to the British parliament for an amendment to the British North America Act in order to establish a system under which coordination, regulation and control of public expenditures by all political executives throughout the Dominion of Canada could be brought within the control of the national authority.

There is one other matter which I should like to mention, a matter which has been raised time and again. If we issue through our Bank of Canada the money necessary to finance, without the appalling interest costs that public moneys now have to pay, what would happen to our international exchange? How could that be sustained? I hope I appreciate that when one advocates a substantial change in an existing system, he should have some authority which is recognized as one speaking with knowledge. In this regard, I think the statement of Mr. Beaudry Leman, who was once President of the Canadian Bankers' Association and who is the head of one of our largest French Canadian banks, the Banque Canadienne Nationale, should be accepted. This gentleman filed a report which was not in concurrence with the reports of the English members of the Macmillan commission. Mr. Leman said:

> Certain features of the suggested constitution of a central bank for Canada, should one be established ultimately, appear unacceptable and do not afford sufficient safeguards in regard to currency and monetary matters: (a) In addition to minor objections to a number of clauses, notably to clause No. 8, which fails to differentiate between the ratio of deposits to be made in the central bank in respect of notice deposits on the one hand, and of demand deposits on the other, I do take strong exception to clause No. 13, which states that: "The bank should maintain a proportion of 25 per cent in gold and foreign exchange against its outstanding note issue and sight liabilities." This clause makes no provision for the holding by the bank of a minimum amount of gold, or of a minimum percentage of gold against liabilities, nor does it even provide that the foreign exchange held by the bank should be convertible into gold. It will be argued that the governors and directors of the central bank would exercise their authority with prudence, skill and discretion, and that, in practice, sufficient gold would be held in reserve, and that a judicious choice would be made of the foreign exchange held by the central bank. The clause appears all the more surprising at a time when no one can have forgotten what befell the sterling, French franc and United States dollar exchange. Shall the currency of Canada be exposed to the uncertainties which might arise from possible errors of judgment on the part of the central bank? Can we be so sanguine as to hope that those who will guide the central bank and determine its policies will be men of such calibre that they will be at all times above human frailty, and will outclass in ability and foresight the bankers now at the head of the oldest and most powerful central banking institutions in the world? (b) Paragraph No. 207 of our report acknowledges that the state "must necessarily retain ultimate sovereignty in matters affecting the currency," and I find it difficult to reconcile this fundamental consideration with the power proposed to be given to the central bank under clause No. 13. Surely the parliament of Canada would not confer upon any organization, much less one privately owned, the right, implied in this clause, to strip this country bare of every ounce or dollar of gold and ship it abroad, holding in exchange, as the sole backing of the currency of Canada and as the bulk of its cash reserves, a claim on some inconvertible outside or foreign currency.
> The mere suggestion that such a situation might develop would be more than enough to wreck the credit standing of this country and undermine the confidence which long years of faithful and sound banking have brought to Canadian institutions both public and private.

I read that for this reason. Here we have from the pen of one of Canada's outstanding bankers a statement condemning the methods, the practices and the securities which exist for the stabilizing of our international exchange under the present Bank of Canada Act. In Great Britain they did not rely, or they found it impossible to rely upon the Bank of England for the stabilization of the pound sterling after the collapse of 1931. When the stabilization fund was set up it was not set up in the Bank of England. The fund was administered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the power of the nation was given in an inflationary issue of sterling totalling $1,750,000,000. That power was given to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to go into the money markets of the world to maintain the value of the pound sterling as a function of the British government. In that regard the same gentleman, Mr. Leman, has this to say:

It is difficult to conceive how and to what extent, under present conditions, a monetary system can be placed beyond political influence. In Great Britain, the government, and not the Bank of England, provided the funds to establish and operate the "equalization fund" in which some seventeen hundred millions of dollars are now involved; in the United States the provisions of the statutes governing the activities of the federal reserve banks have been profoundly altered, this year, to conform with the policies and exigencies of the government of the United States; in France, only last year, parliament voted some ninety millions of dollars to guarantee the losses sustained by the Bank of France in pursuance of the instructions issued by the government of France to the effect that credit balances were not to be withdrawn from Great Britain; these instances of what is happening in the wealthiest and most powerful countries in the world, each provided with a central bank, should offer sufficient evidence as to what must inevitably happen in countries of lesser financial importance.

What has happened since Mr. Leman as a member of the Royal Commission on Banking and Currency issued this statement? Great Britain has maintained successfully the operation of the stabilization fund, which Mr. Winston Churchill, in the British House of Commons, the other day described as "the secret processes" that had successfully taken the place of the very kind of system which has been set up in the Bank of Canada. What has happened in the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Churchill did not say that.

Mr. McGEER: He did not say that they were secret processes?

Mr. DUNNING: He did not say that it was the same system.

Mr. McGEER: I am saying that.

Mr. DUNNING: Let us understand that.

Mr. McGEER: I do not want to have any confusion between what I say and what Mr. Churchill says; I think I made that clear. He said that they were secret processes.

Mr. DUNNING: So are our own stabilization operations.

Mr. McGEER: I understood the other day, when the leader of the opposition asked the Minister of Finance whether the provisions and powers contained in the stabilization legislation passed a year ago had been put into operation by proclamation, that the answer was, "No; they are not in operation yet."

Mr. DUNNING: That is quite right.

[Mr. McGeer.]

Mr. McGEER: Then you are operating under the Bank of Canada unless you are doing something yourself. Of course, I do not profess to know what secret processes are going on in Canada any more than I profess to know what secret processes are going on in England, but I know that in the United States the federal reserve bank has nothing to do with the stabilization fund. It is a function of the Treasury department conducted by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, as a personal duty and a personal obligation. When you come to the question whether or not you can maintain the internal economy of the country by managing your domestic currency without interfering with the value of the buying power of your unit of exchange in world markets, I think you come to the question whether or not you can manage your domestic currency from a central bank like the Bank of Canada and your international buying power in world markets as a direct function of the government itself through the Department of Finance, with nothing more than those connecting links that exist and must of necessity exist between the Department of Finance in all its activities and the Bank of Canada. But let me say further that when it comes to the question of maintaining the international value of the unit of exchange it is less a monetary matter than it is a trade matter. If our government, as the government of Great Britain has done, can successfully set up the means of regulating its international trade, its transactions in international credit and currency, its transactions in tourist trade, so that we can maintain a balance or something close to a balance of trade internationally, then we shall have no difficulty in maintaining the value of our Canadian dollar in those countries with which we intend to trade. But those who confuse domestic currency—that is, silver coins or copper coins or nickel coins and paper currencies such as silver certificates or bank notes or bank deposits transferable by cheque—with international currency, are developing in their minds a difficulty and a hindrance to internal prosperity and progress which really does not exist. There are two real problems; one is international exchange and the buying power of our unit of exchange abroad, and the other is putting into circulation the domestic currency and credit that will permit our people to produce and distribute wealth in their own service, and producing surpluses which they can use in exchange with people in foreign lands for the things that will make for a higher standard of living of our people in our own country. What I am putting forward is not new.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGEER: Well, it is not new as far as other countries are concerned but it has yet to be adopted in Canada. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George asked me what I would do if I were Prime Minister of Canada. One of the first things I would do would be to convert the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to some of the things that are now fairly current. For instance, one of the first acts would be to get a full appreciation of what the British Macmillan report meant when it said to the British government in 1913, in section 280:

> The monetary system of this country must be a managed system. It is not advisable, or indeed practicable, to regard our monetary system as an automatic system grinding out the right result by the operation of natural forces aided by a few maxims of general application and some well worn rules of thumb. The major objectives of a sound monetary policy—for example, the maintenance of the parity of the foreign exchanges without unnecessary disturbance to domestic business, the avoidance of the credit cycle, and the stability of the price level—cannot be attained except by the constant exercise of knowledge, judgment and authority, by individuals placed in a position of unchallengeable independence, with great resources and every technical advice at their disposition.

I think we have, in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, an exceptionally fine group of fairly well trained men who, with the limited resources at their disposal, are able to present a remarkable but not by any means complete picture whereby it is possible for us to see where we are going in this Dominion of Canada. But when we have statements presented as we did in the budget that with our sales of gold abroad we had approximately a favourable balance of trade of $435,000,000, one wonders why this nation should have shipped abroad to exchange for the non-convertible paper currency of a foreign nation or a non-convertible bank deposit the monetary gold reserves and resources of our own nation. The two do not work together. Either we shipped that gold abroad foolishly or we had to ship it abroad because we did not have available foreign paper currencies convertible into American money with which to liquidate the obligations that were currently due during the year in which the gold payments were made. I do not think there is anybody in this country who can say whether our adverse balance of trade was not more, and considerably more, last year than $200,000,000, and when we shipped that gold abroad we shipped it abroad as at least an indication of the minimum of our foreign unfavourable balance of trade.

I do not know all that must be done but I believe that we should make some attempt to set up a monetary system with wide control under which we can balance not only the national budget but provincial budgets and municipal budgets as well because I do not think it is going to accomplish very much to balance the national budget if provincial and municipal governments are going to continue to face bankruptcy. I think budgets should be balanced and I also think debts should be properly serviced. I believe that we should command the respect of the financial communities and the lenders, but I also believe that we should respect the confidence of the taxpayer. If we can hold the confidence of lenders only by sacrificing the wealth of taxpayers through confiscatory taxation, then I am afraid the confidence of the lenders is going to be of very little value to this nation.

I believe, in addition, that we should be able to finance the construction of those things which will add to the national revenue. I believe that our great tourist resources in the maritime provinces, in Quebec, in Ontario and in the west should be developed as a means of inducing Americans to exchange for Canadian goods and services American dollars, and in addition, I believe that we should be able to finance the development of our resources and the maintenance of law and order so that those in the United States and elsewhere who can afford to live in a country in which they would prefer to bring up their families will come to Canada and settle and bring their wealth to us.

That is one way in which I believe we can meet a foreign exchange situation that will always confront the Dominion of Canada. The moment we get prosperous one of our most difficult problems in international exchange is going to be how to prevent our Canadians in such times from going south of the line in the winter time and to the attractions which the Americans present and spending more of Canadian currency in the American tourist trade than the American tourists are spending with us. I do not believe that the Americans should be exploited, but I do feel there is much we can do in the way of an intelligent administration of currency and credit to put our own people to work developing honest attractions that will bring about a movement northward in the summer time that will affect our movement southward in the winter. In that way I believe we can use the national currency and credit to increase the security of the unit of exchange abroad.

More than that. I believe that we must rehabilitate our railroad systems. We cannot afford to allow the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railway systems to operate in competition with the magnificent roads that are operating now in the United States without assisting our railways to bring their road beds, their equipment and their time schedules up to the transcontinental standards now in operation south of the line. These things can all be done. We can do what New Zealand is doing. New Zealand has now gone forward, after years of bonusing and building up her foreign trade in butter, to set up an agricultural governmental institution wherein all of her agricultural products are going to be taken over at a price, and then are going to be bartered for the things which the government of New Zealand feels it can secure for the benefit of the people of that country. We cannot progress in Canada unless we are prepared to raise the standard of living of the farmers of western Canada to the same level that obtains for our governmental employees and for the people in our cities and industrial communities.

Yes, these things can be done, but they require a great deal of work, a great deal of courage, and a great deal of attention, and attempts to bring them about will not be perfect at their inception. While I am quite aware that monetary reform is not the whole answer; that it is merely one step, I do suggest, however, that if a properly constituted national bank were created that would operate as a public utility issuing currency and credit in terms of public need, many of the political, economic and social problems which now seem to be insurmountable would, I believe, fall well within the limits of practical administration.

We should I agree, assume that because certain institutions have been sanctified in the past they should be changed only with care and caution, but I think, now that we are well advanced into the new era, what we are asking the government to do in making the Bank of Canada a national institution is only what other nations have found by experience to be a sound and necessary thing to do. If I can read reports at all I think the principle of public ownership for the Bank of Canada was recommended by Mr. Leman, Sir Thomas White and Mr. Brownlee who constituted a majority of the Canadian Macmillan Commission. That is so because the cost of public finance must be reduced through the issue of currency as a state function. That conclusion is in line with the following passage of the English Macmillan report:

The greatest difficulty, however, which we foresee is the fulfilment of the second task, namely, to remedy the shortage of definitely sound borrowers for the purpose of new enterprise. The vicious circle is complete. The decline of new enterprise has reacted adversely on profits and prices, and the low level of profits and prices stands in the way of new enterprise. It is for this reason that some of us think that in the domestic field it may be necessary to invoke governmental enterprise to break the vicious circle. In the international field measures of an analogous kind would have to take a somewhat different form. In this case also the vicious circle is complete. The unwillingness to lend, coupled with the frequently unwise use of borrowed funds, has destroyed the credit of borrowers, which reinforces the unwillingness to lend. In many cases, no single creditor is ready to take the risk which is absolutely required in the interest of creditors as a whole, since this report was written.

In Great Britain they have gone into public spending; in the United States and Australia they have also gone into public spending, and as a result confidence has been restored and private enterprise is again beginning to move. If we had the courage to take over the Bank of Canada and to put the necessary medium of exchange into circulation through the proper employment of men engaged in public works, social services and public enterprises, we shall soon find that we have restored the circulation of consumers' buying power and created an effective demand which will inspire private enterprise to go to work. But until we do that we are going to slough along, picking up only the crumbs that fall from the tables of other countries where expansion and public work is going forward, and doing nothing to secure for our own people those great benefits which have come to the people of other nations through governmental action.

I do not for one moment think the tasks are simple, but I do think there is plenty of reason now for parliament to set up the machinery and to engage the best, most competent men available to carry out the work parliament wishes to see done; that is, to put the people to work creating and distributing wealth, so that the cultural heritage of mankind can be placed on a higher standard than it enjoys to-day. I think every man in this chamber is imbued with that desire just as much as I am, possibly, in some cases, even more, and that is why I say that this is the paramount political issue of to-day. It is above party politics and calls upon men of all parties, in the commons, in the senate, and in business, to unite to stabilize our finance so that our social and economic security may be restored.

Now let me say this: I know it is easy to say, "Oh, I don't know anything about finance.

It is above me. It is a highly complex problem. It is an academic issue." I think many are beginning to realize that Keynes of Cambridge has performed a great service to the academic world by writing his book A General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money.

Mr. BENNETT: He goes back, in terms, on all his previous opinions.

Mr. DUNNING: And says so.

Mr. McGEER: That is what I say; we have to abandon some of the opinions of the past and adjust ourselves to the necessities of the twentieth century. I do not think we should hope to have the same economic system and the same monetary system serving the needs of the twentieth century that worked in the days of the ox cart, of hand labour and of the crinoline skirt.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend surely forgets that John Maynard Keynes, to my certain knowledge, has been writing authoritatively on these subjects each year. He did not start with the days of the ox cart; he has been gradually developing and instructing his readers, of whom I am one and my hon. friend is another, all in the twentieth century. In the book to which my hon. friend refers Keynes says he knows it is completely out of line with all that he has formerly taught us. I have no objection to a man changing his mind, but surely if we are to look for light and leadership from my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard to-day we do not expect that the day after to-morrow he will be telling us something definitely contrary to the opinions expressed to-day, and still expecting us to regard him as progressive and sound because he has done so. I am not criticizing Keynes, but I am saying that a teacher who changes virtually overnight in some of his cardinal teachings, I would hesitate to quote personally as an authority to-day as readily as I would before I read that book, and I say this without derogating at all from his right to change his mind. I am referring rather to his reliability as a teacher either yesterday or to-day.

Mr. McGEER: I should like to say, now that the Minister of Finance has assumed the right to criticize John Maynard Keynes, that John Maynard Keynes, as monetary adviser of the British government at Versailles, had the courage to resign because at that time he said the impositions that the allied governments were exacting from Germany contained the fruits of future disaster and the seeds of another war.

Mr. DUNNING: And the hon. member and I agreed with him.

Mr. McGEER: And he wrote his book The Economic Consequences of the Peace. Do not let any man of ordinary position stand up and say that Keynes is a teacher who changes his mind from day to day, because by his writings and his work John Maynard Keynes has earned the respect of the British people from one end of the empire to the other, and by his service to humanity he has earned the respect of every man who believes that government should work towards the furtherance of human happiness. I have been a student of Keynes for a great many years in a humble and possibly a loose and inadequate way, but I defy any man to say that from 1918 on John Maynard Keynes has ever changed his views as to the necessity of a managed currency. He may have said this: "I have changed my views with regard to some of my theories on employment and interest," but his fundamental conclusions have been growing and confirming his stand which is set out in the Macmillan report in this declaration for the establishment of a managed currency administered by men of unchallengable independence equipped with every available facility. Notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance or the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) may think of John Maynard Keynes, I still hold to the view that he has made a great contribution to economic study in his book A General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money.

Mr. DUNNING: I agree; I said so.

Mr. McGEER: This is what he says:

> —professional economists ... were apparently unmoved by the lack of correspondence between the results of their theory and the facts of observation;—a discrepancy which the ordinary man has not failed to observe, with the result of his growing unwillingness to accord to economists that measure of respect which he gives to other groups of scientists whose theoretical results are confirmed by observation when they are applied to the facts.
> The celebrated optimism of traditional economists ... who having left this world for the cultivation of their gardens, teach that all is for the best in the best of all possible worlds provided we will let well enough alone, is also to be traced, I think, to their having neglected to take account the dragon prosperity which can be exercised by an insufficiency of effective demand.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must inform the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. McGEER: Well, I can finish my remarks on the other sections of the bill, but I should like to complete them on this section.

Mr. DUNNING: Another hon. member has a right to the floor if he wants it.

Mr. McGEER: Very well; I can conclude on some other section.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): In speaking on this Bank of Canada bill the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard brought in the chartered banks to a great extent and gave some figures in respect to them that are not correct. On page 3331 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

I have checked the figures and I find that in 1934, on a capital investment of $144,000,000, the banks made an actual profit of $18,000,000 which figures out roughly to twelve per cent—not bad for a depression year.

In the first place the hon. member has not added the rest account to the capital. Instead of $144,000,000 invested it was $276,000,000, a difference of some forty-eight per cent. Then, where he said that the banks made an actual profit of $18,000,000, that is before deducting the taxes and other things which had to come out of it, so that the actual return on that capital investment, instead of being, as he states, some twelve per cent, is only some four and a half per cent.

Then he goes on to say:

... profit was paid out by the Bank of Montreal at the rate of eight per cent.... The other banks ranged from six per cent to twelve per cent, but the average stood at about twelve per cent.

How could figures from six to twelve average twelve? So the hon. member is wrong in that respect. Then he goes on to say:

—then they put aside as rest account an amount almost as great.

That is referring to the year 1934. But in fact none of the banks put any amount in the rest account at all; they have not put anything into rest or reserve for several years. In fact they have lost some of their reserves during these years of stress. Surely we are entitled to have a fair report about these banks.

Then the hon. member goes on to say:

Last year, in 1935, their profits were a little better, and the preliminary dividend paid by the Bank of Montreal in the first quarter of this year, 1936, is, I believe, four per cent.

Well, to be accurate, it was two per cent, or rather 3·75 per cent per annum on the total capital employed, rest and reserve. It might be said that the rest is not part of the capital, but it was largely provided by the shareholders as part of the capital of the banks. In many cases they issued their stock at a premium of 100 per cent and added that premium to their rest. So that sum was mostly provided by the stockholders.

It is, therefore, fair to correct the hon. member's figures in these respects; that is instead of $144,000,000 being the capital invested they had $276,000,000, a mistake on the part of the hon. member of some forty-eight per cent. When he referred to the banks having made $18,000,000 profit he figured that before taking off taxes, pension fund and other deductions, a mistake there of some thirty per cent. When he says that the dividend figures range from six to twelve per cent and calls that an average of twelve per cent he makes a mistake of some twenty-five per cent. When he says that they put aside as rest account an amount almost as great, the fact is that they did not put anything aside for rest account, so there he makes a mistake beyond measurement in percentage. When he says that the Bank of Montreal in the first quarter of 1936 paid four per cent when they paid only two per cent or rather at the rate of 3·75 per cent per annum on their actual capital he made another mistake of some fifty per cent. So in those few lines we find five mistakes, on the average fifty per cent wrong. If in respect to other things which he has stated before this committee the hon. member is as wrong as in these to which I have called attention, how much dependence can this committee place upon his statements?

We know that the chartered banks have been the bulwark of the financial system of this country, and they should be treated fairly. They are regulated by this parliament, and surely it is unfair that a wrong impression should be given about their earnings, which earnings are as small as is safe under the conditions under which they operate. I think it is only fair that these corrections should be put upon Hansard, because I have looked up the figures from the bank returns and I assure my hon. friend that they are in accordance with the facts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The amendment before us may be some slight improvement, but I submit that it will not enable the Bank of Canada to perform the functions which the Bank of Canada should perform. Again I believe that the government in introducing a measure of this kind is not keeping faith with the electorate who sent them to power. Reference has already been made in this parliament to the address of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the night of the general election, October 14, 1935. On that occasion he said:

The election is an endorsation of the Liberal view that credit is a public matter not of interest to bankers only but of direct concern to every citizen.

I heartily concur in the latter part of that statement. I hoped that that might be the Liberal view. But under this legislation credit does not become a public matter; credit still remains under private control. We shall never have credit fully a public matter until the government of this country is prepared to take over not merely the central bank but the chartered banks as well. However I quite admit that a properly constituted and controlled central bank may have a very great effect in the control of credit. We argued for such a bank years ago. Two years ago when the Conservative government introduced the Bank of Canada Act we supported it, not because we liked the private control, which we believed the act maintained, but because we believed in the principle of a central bank and we thought the Bank of Canada Act was one step in the right direction. The Liberals at that time refused to have anything to do with the central bank as then constituted; they criticized it most severely, put themselves on record as opposed to it and pleaded for a publicly controlled bank. Yet now they introduce legislation which, as I said when the resolution was under discussion, does not implement the statements that were made on behalf of the Liberal party from one end of this country to the other. I repeat: On the eve of an election the Prime Minister said that credit is a public matter. The legislation now before us and the directorate we are setting up does not ensure that even the control of credit will be a public matter. We are setting up a private bank or, if we may so describe it, a hybrid institution, half public and half private.

The present Prime Minister went on to say:

> It is a verdict against a privately owned and controlled central bank.

Undoubtedly, as it has existed so far, the bank has been privately owned and controlled, but I suggest that the bank we are to have after this measure is passed will not be publicly owned and controlled. It is not fair to permit the impression to go out that we believe the bank which we shall have as a result of this bill is going to merit that designation, or that in this legislation the government is making good its pledges to the people.

I propose to vote for the measure; what else can I do? It may be a slight improvement over what we had before. We believed that the setting up of a central bank, even as it existed previously, was an improvement on no central bank. However this measure is not what we are after. As I shall try to point out later in my observations, this bank in my judgment will not fulfil the function a central bank ought to fulfil.

The Prime Minister said:

> It is a verdict in favour of a properly constituted national bank to perform the functions of rediscount and the control of currency issue considered in terms of public need.

There is nothing in this legislation, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), which would seem to suggest that the bank is to be given control in order that it may function in terms of public need. That is a point which ought to be driven home upon the people of Canada. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> There can be no mistaking the demand for a restoration to the government of Canada of control over credit and currency issue.

It is for government control over credit and currency issue that a good many of us have been pleading for years. But this measure does not give it. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) cannot say that this measure gives government control over credit and currency issue. In this instance the government passes over its control to another body, on which it is merely represented. That is not government control. Only recently in railway matters we have got rid of a board of trustees in order that we may more effectively bring the railways under public control, and to do that we are now setting up a board of directors. Even under the new arrangement the railway does not come immediately and directly under departmental control. This Liberal government protested against the old arrangement in railway matters in that such an arrangement set up a body the government could not control. Now, in the present instance, in this central bank legislation, the government is setting up another body which it does not control. There is no use blinking that fact; the government does not control the Bank of Canada. It simply has certain representatives on the board.

Mr. DUNNING: Then, who does control it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The government does not control it; the government has certain representatives on the board, and the minister is now offering an amendment so that the government may have more control. But surely this measure does not carry out the idea the Prime Minister had in mind when he made the statements I have read.

Mr. DUNNING: Would the hon. member answer a question?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wish I could be allowed to go on.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish to know who does control the bank.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister said:

> There can be no mistaking the demand for a restoration to the government of Canada of control over credit and currency issue.

This measure does not restore to the government control over credit or the issue of currency; there is no doubt about that. Even the Minister of Finance would not say that the government is issuing credit.

Mr. DUNNING: The government is controlling it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister's statement refers to issuing. We have witnessed just now a first-class example of the way in which we play around words. The right hon. gentleman refers to credit and currency issue, not control. I take it that the issue of currency ought never to be given to any other body. Some years ago we had one dollar and two dollar bills on which appeared the king's head, and we had five dollar and ten dollar bills and higher on which appeared the heads of the presidents of the various banks which issued paper money. I said that I hoped the time would come when the king's head would be placed on every piece of money issued in Canada. But we are not putting the king's head on the Bank of Canada bills; we are putting on them the head of the president of the Bank of Canada. The money is not issued by the government. In fact, the impression has been given that it would not be safe to entrust a government with issuing its own currency. I am not saying whether or not that is so, but I say that immediately after the election the Prime Minister said:

> There can be no mistaking the demand for a restoration to the government of Canada of control over credit and currency issue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the meaning and significance of the word "restoration"?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will leave the Prime Minister to answer that question. He is an adept at giving definitions. Perhaps he would answer it to-night. He proceeds:

> As the campaign proceeded, the issue of control, by the people, of all functions of government, through their representatives in parliament, and not by any other power, became increasingly clear.

One of the functions of government is that of issuing money. According to the Prime Minister that function was to be in the hands of parliament. It is not placed in the hands of parliament by this legislation. I would have been content if we had set up a board directly under control of parliament, but we have not done that. The Prime Minister concludes:

> The electorate has declared that a responsible ministry, not organized finance and international money power, is to control in all matters of state.

Well, he may reply that under this measure there is control by the responsible ministry, but he shares that control with the financial powers. As I study this legislation—and I have been trying to read something of the history of central banks—I believe that a central bank can perform its functions only as it is independent of business pressure. We know how the present board of directors of the Bank of Canada was selected. The chamber of commerce put up a slate. It is quite true there was a wide distribution of the shares, but as everybody knows shareholders cannot be got together easily, and for that reason the chamber of commerce put over a slate on which business men predominated. It may be said that we have a farmer on the board; yes, but he does not act as a farmers' representative. As my colleague points out, many of the directors were strictly financial people directly concerned in other financial matters.

If I understand aright, one of the main functions of a central bank is to maintain general price levels. It can do that more or less by restricting or expanding credit. The central bank is required to do the very thing that is unpopular at a given time. It must expand when there is a tendency to contract, and it must contract when there is overexpansion. Do we think it is possible for men trained in business, and having outside business interests, to perform that function? I believe that is one of the weaknesses of the old board. We did not get an independent board, but rather a board of business men who looked at the matter from a financial standpoint.

We now have provision for some government appointees. I cannot say who will be appointed, but if I were a betting man I would be willing to wager quite a sum that we would have the same class of people put on the board to represent the government. That has been the history in the past, whether Conservatives or Liberals were in power. We shall have financial men put on that board. Of course, there will be one or two others to give colour to the idea that it represents all classes, but it will be a board essentially dominated by the present financial interests. Just recently we had the nationalization of the central bank of Denmark. The legislation by which that bank was nationalized provided that no directors might be directors or managers of any private undertaking. Just let me put this to the Prime Minister: If he wants his board, poorly instituted as it is, to be thoroughly free from business influences, will he place on this board no one who is connected with private undertakings? Dare he do that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say at once to my hon. friend I do not believe that every man who has to do with private business is dishonest and dishonourable. I believe that most men who are in business and who are successful owe a great deal of their success to their probity and integrity. I resent altogether the idea that because a man is in private interests, he is not to be trusted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the Prime Minister just hold himself for a minute?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; it is my hon. friend who should hold himself.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall not permit the Prime Minister to try to put words into my mouth or to put ideas into my speech which never were contemplated. The Prime Minister stated that he resents my statement; he speaks on behalf of the financial people. Well, he can resent my statement all he likes, but that is not what I am talking about.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not speaking on behalf of the financial people. My hon. friend directed a remark to me to the effect that I would not dare to have a board upon which there was no one connected with private business.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said that I resented the idea that one dealing with private interests was necessarily dishonest.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not my implication, and it never was. I do not for one minute hold that all men in private enterprise are crooks or anything of the kind. I can well agree with the Prime Minister that a great many of them are actuated by very high motives. I am not suggesting anything else and the Prime Minister is not going to divert me from my argument. I do say, and I have felt for a long time, that directors of chartered banks ought not to be interested in other private concerns. That is my opinion with regard to that phase of the question. I taught school out in the west forty years ago and I can remember the instance of a man who had timberland and who was delivering wood to the school, who was not eligible as a trustee. The idea was not that all men who teamed wood were cranks or crooks; the idea was that if a man was to be independent as a trustee he ought not to be mixed up with many other things. That idea is carried out in a great many departments of public life. I should like to see the time come when a man could not be a director of a chartered bank when he was director of a number of other private concerns. That is all. I am not attacking the probity of these men, but at the same time I do not think they are angels. I do not think they are exempt from the weakness of other human beings.

I come now to the directorate of this central bank. This directorate ought to be able on occasion, and especially at a time of crisis, to go directly counter to prevailing financial opinion. A board of directors selected from those who are interested in financial undertakings is not likely to do that. That is all I am trying to say and the Prime Minister need not try to divert me. I said with regard to the bank of Denmark, that in that legislation the directors of the new bank were not to be directors or managers of any private undertaking. I said to the Prime Minister—and I say it again—that I could not imagine his putting such legislation upon the statute books of Canada.

I believe that the issuance of currency and the control of credit should be a state function. I agree largely with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), although I do not know that I can follow him in all details. When he was speaking yesterday the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) asked him whether he thought he could create something of value out of nothing. That was another of those little remarks which are thrown in and which may so easily mislead the public. I should like to quote from an address made by the hon. member before the Canadian Club in Toronto on November 13, 1933, when he was Secretary of State. This is contained in a pamphlet entitled The Depression, Its Monetary Problems. I should like to answer the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George with his own words. He said:

> The prevalent conception that bank deposits may only be created by actual deposits of specie, or its equivalent in dominion notes or foreign exchange, is quite erroneous.

I think that is what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was trying to say. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George gave certain figures as of that date three years ago, and went on to say:

> The credit extended by the Canadian banks is secured in less than one-fourth part by the capital and surplus of the banks, but largely by the good faith, property, administrative efficiency and business capacity of the customers to whom such loans are made.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Minister of Finance says that that is right, and I believe that he is in sympathy with a good deal of it. The former Secretary of State continued:

The aggregate of these loans, by which the bulk of all deposits are created, largely represents advances of credit made by the banks to their customers.

That is the very thing which many of us seem to find it so difficult to get into our heads. Every loan creates a deposit. Again and again it has been said on the floor of this chamber that the banks are simply lending out savings deposits. The word "savings" is not always used, but the idea is that the loans are deposits—real money—placed at the disposal of the banks by their customers. The hon. gentleman continued:

In more modern times the invention and adoption of the cheque system has effected a radical revolution in monetary policy. The cheque has now largely usurped the function of metallic coins and government notes as currency.

After reviewing some monetary history, he went on to say:

The result is that, in modern practice, seventy to eighty per cent of the aggregate of all deposits, shown in the Canadian bank returns, represent in reality the amount of loans made by the banks and then outstanding.

In order that there might be no mistake about his meaning, he said later on:

The cheque system, which has been developed, enables the banks to create—

"Create" was the word he used.

—money without the issue of their printed notes.

Last night the hon. member suggested that only the creator could create something out of nothing, but in that case he used the very word "create." He continued:

But the cheque system, which now prevails, enables the banks, as I have stated, to create credit money at will for many hundreds of millions of dollars in excess of their note issues. $1,428,000,000 of such credit money was issued and outstanding on September 30 last. In comparison with this bank credit money, the amount of all other money in circulation is quite insignificant.

One more paragraph of the same kind:

The fact remains, however, that the banks now have an almost complete monopoly of the credit facilities of the country. They may restrict or extend credit at will within the limitations which I have mentioned; and the question has arisen whether the control of credit should continue to be exercised in the sole discretion of the directors and officials of the banks.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Without going into the theory of the matter, I think I will just leave that statement of the former Secretary of State to speak for itself. In brief, what is the situation that we have before us? In the Bank of Canada, it has been pretty clearly recognized, there is no need of capital, and yet this government is proceeding to extend the capital of the bank. Under the present arrangements a few shareholders—that is, few in comparison with all the citizens of Canada—are given certain guaranteed profits. I do not know why it is that a few people should have 4½ per cent while, if I want to put my savings into one of the chartered banks to-day, I can receive only 1½ per cent. A comparatively few favoured people who are in that happy position can have guaranteed profits. Further, the business interests are able, as I have said, to elect a slate of directors, and they will have a very considerable influence, I fancy, on the new board, though I agree to a considerable extent with the hon. member (Mr. McGeer) that the directors may not be as important as the executive committee. In any case, the business interests, it seems to me, will be dominant in the new set-up, and this strikes me as a surrender of the sovereignty of government in that field. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was speaking of what had been accomplished in various countries by utilizing money to supply the needs of the people. I should like to read one or two paragraphs from an interesting article that appeared in the May-June number of International Affairs, which most hon. members know is the organ of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. The article is by the Right Hon. Lord Passfield, on Soviet Communism, Its Present Position and Prospects. Dealing with currency matters, he says, at page 403:

To the bolsheviks, currency, whether in the form of money or of bank credit, is merely an inanimate slave of the community, or shall we say a tool, like the immense park of hundreds of thousands of tractors, available for use here or there on the quarter of a million collective or state farms. The tool dictates nothing. It is merely an expedient for giving freedom of choice to all the several consumers and producers, as an alternative to supplying them all with definite rations, whether they like them or not. Hence currency is created, just as are postage stamps, to whatever extent is found to be required for the purpose of the people, quite without influence on the projected aggregate total of commodities and services, or of the amount of trade. As prices are, for the most part, fixed by the various organs of government, and fixed not on cost alone but on a whole range of considerations of public benefit, an increase or a decrease of currency has no effect on these prices. If the currency seems, at any moment, to be inconveniently deficient, more is provided by a stroke of the pen. If there seems to be more in circulation than is comfortable, the issue of further paper roubles or bank credit is suspended, or, by means of propaganda for an internal loan, essentially a voluntary determent of the expenditure of wages or other incomes, a large block of currency is withdrawn from circulation. The monetary quantity of currency in circulation has absolutely no influence on the aggregate volume of employment or of consumption, or on the quantity or kind of production that is planned and undertaken. Moreover, by the simple expedient of prohibiting any import or export of Soviet currency, which accordingly never passes the frontier in either direction, and by making all foreign trade, including the import or export of gold and silver, a government monopoly, all the complications of international rates of exchange are avoided.

A little later on he says:

Low prices of manufactures abroad exert no influence on prices in the U.S.S.R., they are only an advantage to the soviet commissar for foreign trade, and not a disadvantage to the soviet producer, whose earnings remain unchanged whatever may be the commodities that it suits the soviet union to purchase abroad or to export in order to pay for its purchases. What future bolshevik students will say, when one day they turn over the hundreds of thousands of books and pamphlets about currency that cumber the British Museum, I simply cannot imagine.

I give that simply because of the remarkable development which has taken place in Russia. Soviet Russia after the war was a poverty stricken country. After the revolution they had practically no equipment for producing at least any of their heavier commodities. Everything had been disorganized by war and revolution. They obtained practically no outside credit, or very little. They were able to get a little, and for that they had to pay dearly by the export of commodities at a very low rate. But by some means or another—I do not profess to know how it was done—in the last ten years they have built up a wonderfully productive machine. I am not going to read any further from this article but I would commend it to the members of the committee. That Lord Passfield is a very careful investigator is well recognized by all students of economics. Well, what Russia did, they did with very little outside credit; and they are proceeding in an increasing degree to supply the material needs of their very large population.

Now, I ask, why it is that we cannot utilize our currency and credit in some such manner as they have done in Russia in supplying the needs of the people? Again and again through these years we have considered in this house the matter of currency and credit and we still hold to the old theory. I cannot say that I follow the theories of my friends to the left. I for one do not believe that we shall get out of the woods simply by printing more money. That is not what I am after; I do not think that is what is involved in monetary reform. But I say that our present system is piling up debt upon debt which we cannot pay. Our present system is failing to function in the interests of the masses of the people, and under those circumstances it seems to me that this parliament ought to listen to the plea which has been made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and not pass through these particular pieces of legislation without considering the more fundamental problems involved. With regard to the bill that is before us, I am not allowed to move an amendment; I do not see how I can under the ruling given the other day. I have either to reject the bill or to vote for it. I suppose the only thing I can do under these circumstances is to vote for it, but I am absolutely dissatisfied with what the government has done in bringing in a measure of this kind. I do not think it is going to secure for the people of Canada what might be secured by a properly constituted and controlled central bank.

Mr. TURGEON: The hon. member says that he will vote for this amending legislation because it is at least an improvement on the present act. Will he tell the committee in what respects he considers it an improvement on the present act?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suppose the government is getting a little more control; it is a little bit nearer a government bank. Of course, to be perfectly frank, so long as there are in the seats of government people who believe in the present financial system and take their policies, as in my judgment they do, from the financiers, I do not know that it makes very much difference whether we have a government bank or not.

Mr. TURGEON: But the improvement is in the degree of government control.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am going to make one of my two minute speeches. I dislike this particular method of increasing government control. To me the issuing of fifty-one per cent of new stock, and an increase in the board, an additional four members to be appointed by the government, or, according to the amendment, six, smacks of big, and possibly what we have come to call, slick business methods. I do not think it is anything like as straightforward as buying out the original shares would have been, and when I remember the speed with which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) rose in his place in committee to try to head off the then member for Macleod in his attempt to move in committee for a government owned bank, it is really funny. I remember the zeal of the Liberals in castigating the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and others who voted with him in supporting the central bank bill as brought down by the Conservative government then in power. Why, this country simply rang with the condemnation of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members for not voting for public ownership like the righteous Liberal party did. As a matter of fact, at that time, while I understood the motives of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and those associated with him, I did not support the central bank bill, not because I did not think it better than what we had, but because it was not all we wanted to have and I felt that the only way I could protest against the bill as it was was to vote against it. But what I felt about that bill was exactly what my colleagues in the southeast corner felt at that time.

What I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence is: Where is now all his zeal for a publicly owned bank? I remember how hard he worked at that time, and it does seems strange that he should have so completely changed his mind.

I think it would have been better to buy out all the original shares but, to express myself exactly, we never needed to sell shares of the central bank. Did anyone ever hear of anybody drilling for a well with the hope of striking a spring and then pouring down into the well five million gallons of water that it might mix with the spring water before it was drawn up again, or did anyone ever hear of anybody opening up a coal mine and then taking down five million tons of coal to bring it back up again? The business of the central bank was to create currency and credit. and for the life of me I have never been able to see why we have to go to the trouble of getting money to start with. But then, of course, I am not supposed to understand finance; it is so evidently a very deep subject.

I do not wonder that the Liberal government feel a bit jittery on this question, since this bill falls so far short of the promises they so definitely made during the campaign; then, too, the private members behind the government are not feeling comfortable about the matter as is evident to anybody who has had experience in parliament or has ever seen one before. I think the Finance minister, and the Prime Minister as well, must know by now that their followers are not content with this bill, and for the very good reason that the bill is not what the party definitely promised. So I feel that I am standing for the principle by which I stood before when I say that I shall vote against this bill, not because it is not slightly better, but because I dislike the way in which it is being made better, and because I feel that it falls short of the promises which were made by the Liberal government during the campaign and that it is a betrayal of the confidence of the electorate.

Mr. McGEER: Mr. Chairman, if I might repeat the remarks which I had to make on Keynes' book I should like to quote a paragraph which should commend itself to every student of this problem. He continues his reference to academical schools of economy by saying:

> Our criticism of the accepted classical theory of economics has consisted not so much in finding logical flaws in its analysis as in pointing out that its tacit assumptions are seldom or never satisfied, with the result that it cannot solve the economic problems of the actual world.

That is exactly our problem to-day. In other words, while we are going ahead with an assumed increase in the government's control over the Bank of Canada, we are doing this by changing a board of directors that really does not exercise actual control over the administration of the bank's affairs. In other words, we are continuing the Bank of Canada as it was set up by the leader of the opposition and by the government that he led in the last House of Commons. There is no fundamental change in the Bank of Canada, or in the methods under which it is going to operate, or in the control that is actually exercised by the executive committee with which his legislation vested the absolute control of the bank.

Mr. BENNETT: The governor in council comes in at that point.

Mr. McGEER: I do not think the governor in council can dismiss the governor or the deputy governor—

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. McGEER: The governor in council can appoint them, but under the act they are appointed to hold office for seven years

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking about the veto power.

Mr. McGEER: The only veto power that comes in is an extension of the veto power in the governor in council over the acts of the governor of the bank. If the governor of the bank refuses to agree in the decision of the executive committee—

Mr. DUNNING: Or the board.

Mr. McGEER: —or the board, then he must report that to the governor in council, but the only power the governor in council then has is to affirm or deny the action of the governor of the bank. The governor in council cannot, under any section of the act that I know of, say to the governor of the bank, you must do this, and make the governor of the bank carry it out. It is not within the power of the governor in council to say to the governor of the bank: Here is the policy of parliament to which we wish you to conform, and you must carry this out. But they can, under the present act, after calling parliament together and saying that the governor will not carry out the wishes of parliament, ask parliament to dismiss the governor and then they can put in a new governor who will carry out their policy. The board of directors of the bank have nothing more to say in the administration of the bank's affairs than the shareholders who own the stock of a company have in the administration of its affairs, and that is absolutely nothing. The board of directors is purely a group of men who sit in at the board and confirm very largely what the executive committee has done, because they are never in a position to do otherwise.

Now with reference to the suggestion as to what should be done, I think possibly we may find some instance in which Keynes may have changed his conclusions. I do not think however that he has ever changed any conclusions that he has held upon fundamental principles of monetary policy. He says:

> The outstanding faults of the economic society in which we live are its failure to provide for full employment and its arbitrary and inequitable distribution of wealth and incomes.

He goes on to the question of creating an effective demand so that the available supply may be absorbed, and then he deals with the rate of interest and says that the rate of interest is bound to come down. He says:

> The justification for a moderately high rate of interest has been found hitherto in the necessity of providing a sufficient inducement to save. But we have shown that the extent of effective saving is necessarily determined by the scale of investment and that the scale of investment is promoted by a low rate of interest.
> There can be no doubt that this criterion will lead to a much lower rates of interest than has ruled hitherto; and, so far as one can guess at the schedules of the marginal efficiency of capital corresponding to increasing amounts of capital, the rate of interest is likely to fall steadily.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be observed that he uses the word "guess."

Mr. McGEER: No one can tell for certain what is going to happen in the future. He goes on to say:

> But whilst there may be intrinsic reasons for the scarcity of land, there are no intrinsic reasons for the scarcity of capital.

And certainly the actions of Russia, Japan, the Roosevelt administration and Great Britain, prove that that is true. He goes on to say:

> An intrinsic reason for such scarcity, in the sense of a genuine sacrifice which could only be called forth by the offer of a reward in the shape of interest, would not exist, in the long run—

—If, as he says in another section in the book, a central bank is created.

Mr. DUNNING: I think my hon. friend should quote that exactly.

Mr. McGEER: I shall be very glad to do so:

> There can be no doubt that this criterion will lead to a much lower rate of interest than has ruled hitherto and, so far as one can guess at the schedules of the marginal efficiency of capital corresponding to increasing amounts of capital, the rate of interest is likely to fall steadily, if it should be practicable to maintain conditions of more or less continuous full employment—

How does he say you are going to maintain conditions of more or less continuous full employment? He deals with that in a very trite, Keynes' way of argument:

> Unemployment develops, that is to say, because people want the moon; men cannot be employed when the object of desire (i.e. money) is something which cannot be produced and the demand for which cannot be readily choked off. There is no remedy but to persuade the public——that money can be created simply through a central bank.

I may be wrong; I may be presuming a great deal to offer a suggestion as to what this book really contains, because I think it is a book written not for men like myself or for the public but very largely for classical economists who have academic training. But he has pointed out certain things to the classical economists with academic training, whom we have long followed in their teachings. I think Ricardo and Pigou of recent times probably have had more influence upon the political economy of Great Britain than political leaders have exercised. We have accepted the teachings of Ricardo. In this book Keynes comes forward to change the academic and classical economist into one who forces himself to make his theories find the sanction of actual experience, to make his theories stand up under the test of practical political experience. In other words Keynes has taken what we call unorthodox economy and put it into this book in a classical version.

Mr. BENNETT: He says that the book is largely written for economists.

Mr. McGEER: I think so. I have read it and studied it, and I am trying to give what I think is a layman's interpretation of its practical value and application. I do not know that one needs to stress the point that the Macmillan commission agreed upon unanimously, namely that the creation of currency and credit, the issue of currency and credit, the regulation of prices, the stabilization of production and all those factors that must be taken into consideration as well as money, must come under the control of men of unchallengeable independence. I agree that it is easy to say that our bank directors should be men of business experience; that is true. But they should be men of unchallengeable independence, having no other interest than the well-being of the community at large.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the hon. gentleman answer a question? How does he reconcile that with government control?

Mr. McGEER: The government control I should like to see established is something like the government control that we exercise over the supreme court. We would not think of allowing the members of our county courts, our provincial supreme courts or the Supreme Court of Canada to have any other interest during their active service than the well-being of the public and the nation.

Mr. BENNETT: But they frequently decide against the government.

Mr. McGEER: There is no question as to that, but it is only in the determination of issues in accordance with the laws which are established. It cannot be helped that the government and the supreme court may conflict, as has occurred recently in the United States, but there is no reason why the course followed by the government of Canada could not have been followed by the government of the United States, so that the questions would have been sent to the Supreme Court of the United States for determination before being acted upon by the government.

Mr. BENNETT: Their constitution forbids that.

Mr. McGEER: But they could change their constitution in that regard, and in the light of the experience of the past year possibly the necessity of working out some arrangement by which the supreme court and the government of the United States can work in harmony will be recognized and such an arrangement will be developed. In any event we have not that situation in the Dominion of Canada. I think it is extremely rare that there has been any suggestion that the interpretations of our laws were violations of the general spirit of democratic government as we have it in this house. I do not think we have ever had any criticisms as to that. I quite appreciate that the board of directors of the Bank of Canada have no easy task, but what I say is that there is no reason for believing that such a board of a publicly owned bank and the government cannot work together in circulating and in regulating the circulation of the medium of exchange which constitutes the economic blood stream of our whole social order. Just because these problems are difficult is no reason for not undertaking them, and when there is opportunity for us to take another step forward, if it is necessary to change stagnation in business into activity, unemployment into employment and to advance the standard of living and the spread of culture, it is well worth the risk.

I may be criticized for expressing my views so keenly, but in connection with this great subject I feel that every man in public life should be at least willing to study this question, to formulate some definite ideas and to bring them into the council chamber of the nation for discussion. It is not necessary that they be adopted; even if they only promote intelligent discussion and intelligent pursuit of information that will lead to some effective solution of the great problems which governments have before them, it will be worth while. This, I think, is the greatest political issue and the greatest economic problem before us for solution, and until we solve it we cannot find the way to that social and economic security which we are all anxious to see everyone enjoy. The right hon. Prime Minister has said:

> ... once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile. Those are strong words; they constitute a strong argument, and they are words of which this house ought to take full acount before it is too late.

Again, during the same debate, the right hon. gentleman said:

> The hon. member for Vancouver Centre has referred already to what I said when speaking in this house on February 27, 1933, in outlining the position of the Liberal party on the central bank. I should like to read again the words quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. Referring to the control of credit and stating the position of the party with respect to the control of credit, I said:

"The Liberal party believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need. A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian pepole; and also to deal with the problems of international commerce and exchange."

I desire to direct special attention to the words: "a properly constituted national central bank." Also:

To perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need.

Note that the Prime Minister said, "in terms of public need," not private gain.

The acknowledgment of the Prime Minister that the sovereignty of parliament and democracy is dependent upon the recognition that the issue of currency and credit is the most conspicuous and sacred responsibility of government constitutes a clear repudiation of the views of orthodox finance and classical economy which have prevailed in British countries during the last one hundred years.

The statement of the leader of the Liberal party should be recognized as the outstanding economic pronouncement made during the depression. I have formed this conclusion because I think that in the brief statement which I have quoted he was able clearly to define the primary cause of the economic disturbance and to indicate in specific terms the basis upon which may be developed a practical and enduring remedy.

Now, the fact that I have spoken strongly upon this issue does not mean that I am a rebel, or that I am inconsistent with the ideals or the practical workings of the Liberal party. I have formed my own ideas on this great public issue. I advocated them before the banking and commerce committee and was given a delightful welcome by the Liberal members of that committee when I came from Vancouver to appear before it. When I accepted a Liberal nomination I did so reserving to myself the right to stand upon the floor of this house and advocate monetary reform as a non-partisan issue in which all should join and cooperate to find a solution of our financial and economic problems. I am not downhearted because the government in this first session have not gone as far as I would like to see them go. But I would have been false to my constituents if I had not stood up in my place here and done exactly what I promised to do if I was elected. I say this to the government: You have started on the problem of setting up for the Canadian people a properly constituted bank. This is only the first session. With what is going to happen in the United States in the next few years, with what has happened in Great Britain, in South Africa, in New Zealand and in Australia, this government can and, I am confident, will go forward, in its own perhaps cautious way, less active than I think it ought to be, but nevertheless it will fulfil the promise and the philosophy which is expressed in the quotation from the Prime Minister's statement I have read and upon which the Liberal party went to the electors. I hope we shall be able in the next election to go to the country with the same statement, not as a promise then but as a pledge fulfilled.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I would prefer to ask the indulgence of the committee, that I might move the adjournment of this debate, rather than enter upon the discussion of such an important matter with only fifteen minutes available.

Mr. DUNNING: Could we carry this section and my hon. friend speak on a later section? I do not think my hon. friend could possibly be more out of order than the discussion has been at times this evening. If he made his speech on the section relating to the governor's veto or anything else I think there would be no objection in view of the latitude that has been permitted. I should like to have this amended section carried if I could, and I shall leave any opportunity to my hon. friend that he desires.

Mr. BENNETT: There was a point made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) with respect to the executive committee that I think the minister should not overlook. There is no doubt that the policy of the bank is determined by the activities of the executive committee. Not the day to day operation, but the carrying into effect of the policy of the bank is more or less entirely under the direction of the executive committee which consists of the permanent officials plus one director. If the government believe, as I think they should not, that they can accomplish more with this bank under government control than otherwise—and I use the words "government control" in the sense in which I propose to make some observations later about it from our experience—then it is clear that that one director should be of a class "B" designation. That is perfectly obvious. If he happened to be a class "A" director, representing private interests—I use the term in a broad sense—as distinguished from the "B" class representing the public or government interest, it is perfectly obvious that if the plan which the government has outlined is to be carried out, that director should be a representative of that class, although the government have anticipated that point to some extent by providing that if the governor vetoes action that may be taken by the executive committee he reports the matter to the governor in council. But he may not veto the action; he may approve it, and that creates an entirely different situation. I mention this; it is not a matter of importance to me, but it is a suggestion which occurs to me and which is accentuated by what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard in dealing with the question of the executive committee and its relation to the bank. In reality, as far as the bank is concerned, at the moment or in the future, its operations are determined by three men, namely the governor, the deputy governor and a director, who constitute the executive committee. The governor is the chairman of the board; it is quite clear that under this statute he becomes the permanent chairman of the board, and the reason given is that very reason. When that is done you have a situation that, I think, is not quite consistent with the declared purpose of the government. If it is intended to carry into effect the logical result of the policy indicated, this director should be designated as being a class "B" director.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, I do not quite agree with the definition of the function of the executive committee as stated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and some others. I might point out, with regard to the suggestion he now makes, that the modus operandi is covered by the amending bill now under discussion for the reason that the third member of the executive committee is elected by the board. Being elected by the board he would in the nature of things be a representative of and satisfactory to the majority of that board, who will be government appointees.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not follow.

Mr. DUNNING: But I should point out that under the executive committee arrangement at present existing the Deputy Minister of Finance is also present, although without a vote, thus ensuring that the Minister of Finance is made familiar with any vital matters which may be under consideration by the executive committee. My difference of view from that of the leader of the opposition rather rests upon this point. I do not take it that the power given the executive committee, of conducting the bank's business between the meetings of the board of directors involves that between the meetings of the board the executive committee can go contrary to the declared policy of the board. Such a position is unthinkable. If it arose it would speedily bring about a conflict between the different sections of the board, and the line of division would not necessarily follow the line of appointment. A difference of view might quite honestly arise between one government appointed director and another, because I am not supposing for a moment that the government can or should get men on this board merely as rubber stamps for the Minister of Finance. Indeed, the Minister of Finance or the government cannot possibly at all times give detailed consideration to the managing of those great functions which are demanded of those who would be intimately concerned with the bank as directors. If it were possible there would be no need at all for the board. Why not say that the governor in council shall do this, that and the other thing? What is the reason for the delegation of governmental functions? Why, one of the great difficulties with which governments are faced to-day is the multiplicity of matters with which governments as such must deal.

Mr. McGEER: How many times did the board—

Mr. DUNNING: I should like to complete this point. I was referring to the growing multiplicity of matters with which the governor in council must deal as taxing the physical and nervous capacity of every man who serves in government.

Mr. BENNETT: For five years I heard that as a joke.

Mr. DUNNING: Some might regard it as a joke.

Mr. BENNETT: For five years the hon. member's party did.

Mr. DUNNING: No man who has endeavoured to carry out those responsibilities in recent times can possibly regard them as a joke.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the hon. member's party did for five years.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not believe the Liberal party did anything of the sort.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it did, and worse than that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the leader of the opposition whether, when he was holding the office I now hold, I did not extend towards him every sort of consideration any opponent could possibly give to another?

Mr. BENNETT: I answer unhesitatingly, and I carry public opinion with me, when I say, No! No!! No!!!

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My gosh!

Mr. BENNETT: It was the talk of the country, from one end to the other. You gave all the embarrassment possible, and personal attacks on top of that.

Mr. DUNNING: Unfortunately I was not here. I am trying to discuss what to me is a question of fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hansard will show the facts.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; Hansard will show them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And the public has a memory.

Mr. BENNETT: "Dictator" and every other name under heaven was used.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend thanked me in this house repeatedly.

Mr. BENNETT: Look at the records and you will find that it was very seldom any thanks were given, and those occasions were so seldom that they called forth thanks because they were in such contrast with the usual conduct.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish to thank the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard for having graciously allowed me to continue my remarks.

Mr. BENNETT: It is something to laugh at.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend even expressed his thanks over the radio.

Mr. BENNETT: His thanks over the radio had nothing to do with that. All you have to do is to look at the record in Hansard. Look at the attacks, the type of them, the frequency of them, and the personal attacks on top of them.

Mr. McGEER: We are surely discussing the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: And now the minister talks about the governor in council, and the strain upon the members of the government, when it has been in office for only a few months, as against those who for five years endeavoured to conduct the business of this country.

Mr. DUNNING: I made no reference to this government.

Mr. BENNETT: It was to this government.

Mr. DUNNING: I spoke about the governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is talking about his own experience.

Mr. DUNNING: May I be allowed to speak? I might as well embark a little myself. The right hon. gentleman attracts the lightning to himself by the manner in which he is now treating me. I made no reference to him at all. The reference I made was to the functions of government as at present constituted, and the ever-increasing weight of responsibility which rests upon the governor general in council—meaning the government of the day—and a responsibility which I do not hesitate for a moment to say is fully up to the physical and nervous capacity of any man occupying a position in any government, under these conditions. The constant multiplication of functions is due to a change which has come about in the conception of governmental functions. They have been constantly widening for the last twenty years, and indeed I am one who thinks one of the problems we shall have to face in the not distant future is the problem of adjustment, and an adjustment which will in some manner be consistent with our system of responsible government. It will have to be an adjustment of the load in a way which will ensure that members of governments will at least have time to think about the things they are supposed to deal with. I am thinking of any government under present conditions.

Here we undertake as a state responsibility a larger measure of concern with and control over the vital functions of currency and credit. Is it possible to put that function directly into the hands of members of the government, and expect them to discharge it, along with their other functions? Any thinking man must recognize that men must be set apart to execute these functions for the state. That is what we are trying to do in the present bill. We are trying to ensure that those men shall be men who have the confidence of the government of the day. We do not mean that they will be rubber stamps to express in every thought and action the views of the government. In the nature of things if they are the kind of men who must run to the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister to ask what shall be done in connection with every day to day function of banking, the government might just as well try to discharge the function through its own corporate entity. We must have men in whom the government has confidence, from the point of view of knowledge held by the government respecting the general views of the individual with respect to policy. There must be knowledge on the part of the government that the individual holds views with respect to the matter he is to administer which are in harmony with the views of the government, and that his conduct will at all times be assured on major matters. That is the attitude I take of the executive functions. But I also hold the opinion, in contradiction of those expressed in other quarters, that the executive committee of the bank cannot continue to carry out between sessions of the board of governors or board of directors policies contrary to the expressed views of that board of directors. If that were attempted, I believe an utterly impossible situation would be created.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. McGEER: May I ask one question?

Mr. BENNETT: It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. McGEER: In the Canadian Macmillan report one of the primary functions of the central bank is that the government—

Mr. BENNETT: It is eleven o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes; it is eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—LOANS AND GUARANTEES

Mr. POULIOT:

1. On what date did the general manager of the Bank of Montreal notify the Prime Minister's office that the banks had advanced $35,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the guarantee of the letter signed by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister, and dated May 31, 1933?

2. On what date was an order in council passed to ratify said guarantee given by the said Right Hon. R. B. Bennett?

3. When and where was it made public for the first time?

Mr. POULIOT:

Did the statement made by the Secretary of State on June 3, 1936 (Hansard, p. 3349), that sessional paper No. 150-E, "a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Canadian government and any of the Canadian banks regarding the guarantee given for the loan of $60,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway," was tabled on March 19, 1934, by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister, and not by the then Secretary of State, indicate prima facie that no other department than the Prime Minister's had exchanged correspondence in that connection with any of the Canadian banks?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled herewith.

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Referring to sessional paper No. 150-E of 1934, are the original letters, sent to the Prime Minister or the Acting Prime Minister by the following gentlemen: (1) Mr. W. A. Bog, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, June 7, 1933; August 17, 1933; September 25, 1933; (2) Mr. Jackson Dodds, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, September 2, 1933; November 28, 1933; December 5, 1933; (3) Sir Charles B. Gordon, president of the Bank of Montreal, December 1, 1933, on file in the Prime Minister's office and have they always been on file in that office since they have been received by that office?

2. Were those letters of an official and public nature?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled herewith.

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Referring to sessional paper No. 150-D of March 19, 1934, "copy of all correspondence between government of Canada and Canadian Pacific Railway in regard to guarantee given by the government for a loan of $60,000,000 to Canadian Pacific Railway," which contained (a) one letter from the then Prime Minister to W. H. Curle, Esq., K.C., general counsel of the Canadian Pacific Railway, dated November 3, 1933, and (b) a "list of payments made in discharge of maturing obligations since May 31, 1933, as mentioned in letter of November 28, 1933, from Jackson Dodds, Esq., general manager of the Bank of Montreal, to the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, P.C., K.C., Prime Minister of Canada," from May 31, 1933, to October 23, 1935, was there any other correspondence exchanged between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with regard to the said guarantee?

LOAN OF $750,000,000

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada and also for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada and for public works and general purposes.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF AND ASSISTANCE ACT, 1936, TO ASSIST PROVINCES IN RESPECT OF RELIEF EXPENDITURES

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend section four of the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, being chapter fifteen of the statutes of 1936, to empower the governor in council to grant financial assistance to any province by way of loan, advance or guarantee to an amount not exceeding the amount payable by the province for its share of the cost of unemployment relief and undertakings during February and March, 1936, and under any agreement between the dominion and the province entered into under the authority of the said act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING SLUM CLEARANCE AND HOUSING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I draw the attention of the government to to-day's Mail and Empire, in which it is reported that St. James' Cathedral has presented fifteen acres of land to the city of Toronto for the purposes of a slum clearance housing plan. I ask the government whether any legislation is to be brought down this session for slum clearance and reconstruction under which this offer may be dealt with.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have already indicated to the house the extent of the legislation which it is proposed to bring down at this session, and it does not include legislation of the kind mentioned by my hon. friend. The subject is one which by legislation of this session has already been referred for consideration to the national employment commission.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

EMPLOYMENT OF MEN FOR MAINTENANCE OF WAY WORK AT BELLEVILLE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Howe) to a matter which I consider to be of some importance. From a source which I have always found reliable I have been advised that the Canadian National Railways are taking on additional men for maintenance of way work at Belleville, and that every person employed has had to produce a certificate of good standing in the local Liberal association. I ask the minister to look into the matter for the purpose of satisfying himself whether that is or is not true. I think it is highly desirable that he should satisfy himself concerning it one way or the other, as reports to this effect have been circulated.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, this is a most extraordinary charge. I have kept a very close eye on these matters and I have never heard of a case of that kind. I may say further that if I find that the statement of the right hon. gentleman is correct, steps will be taken.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you.

BANK OF CANADA

MAJORITY CONTROL BY GOVERNMENT OF CAPITAL STOCK AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 82, to amend the Bank of Canada Act—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 6—Directors.

Mr. CAHAN: I am sure the house has enjoyed the several addresses given by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer). They indicate that for some time he has made a study, more or less careful, of the pronouncements of leading economic authorities; he must have given a great deal of time to a collection of the statutes dealing with coinage and other matters relating to monetary policy, and he has coloured his addresses with an eloquence and profusion of language, in some cases extravagant language, but such as those members who were present have thoroughly enjoyed. The results, however, clearly show that during the course of his addresses he has succeeded to a certain degree in convincing himself that his original addresses were based upon entirely erroneous deductions. I suggest that the magnitude of his researches has not left him time for due reflection, and that, as the months go by, after the activities which he must undertake in connection with the centenary celebrations at Vancouver are over, if he will retire to some quiet place where he can again reflect upon the data which he has collected, we shall have next session expressions from him which will be in accord with the sane and sound standards of economic policy. For instance, the hon. gentleman suggested in an address on June 8 that the government of Canada by appropriate legislative enactment had created some millions of dollars of currency by imposing its stamp upon certain bronze and silver coins. The hon. gentleman suggested that if he had a million dollars in bronze coins marked as cents he would be able to change it into current coin of the realm and use it for certain purposes. He stated:

> Mr. McGeer: A five cent nickel coin containing seventy grains of nickel has a bullion value of about three mills, but by law it is, given a money value of fifty mills. A one cent bronze coin has a bullion value of less than one mill, but parliament, by law, gives it a money value of ten mills. There is nothing behind or supporting the money value that the coin possesses, and it is not convertible into anything. Once a government issues it, it goes into circulation as the media of exchange of the nation and functions to serve all the purposes of money and all the purposes of legal tender money, up to the point it is made legal tender money.
> Mr. Cahan: But for petty cash only.
> Mr. McGeer: It does not make any difference whether or not it is petty cash; if you had a million dollars worth of copper cents you would have a million dollars.
> Mr. Cahan: That is just where you are wrong; you would not.
> Mr. McGeer: I would be very glad to take them from my hon. friend if he would give them to me. I would very soon convert the million dollars worth of copper coins in my possession into a million dollars worth of bank money.

Upon reflection, however, and perhaps upon further examination of the statute, the hon. gentleman found that copper coin in cents was legal tender to the extent of only twenty-five cents in any single transaction. I have made a computation, and I find that if the hon. gentleman were possessed of a million dollars in bronze cents, and by active endeavour on his part in the course of a day he secured a hundred different persons who were willing to accept twenty-five cents in copper coins, the disposition of his million dollars as legal tender would require forty thousand days or something like one hundred years. So, after reflection, in his second address the hon. gentleman no longer emphasized that particular contention.

Mr. McGEER: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not going to allow interruptions for the present, if you please. The hon. gentleman will have another forty minutes shortly.

Mr. McGEER: I was very glad to extend that privilege to the hon. gentleman when I was speaking.

Mr. CAHAN: I would have no particular objection to interruptions by the hon. gentleman, but this is a more serious matter than he seems to contemplate. Again, in the course of the discussion the hon. gentleman suggested that the bank note issue, the dominion note issue or the Bank of Canada note issue, could be reasonably well extended to the amount of $724,000,000, and that this amount of legal tender could be used for important public services. I asked him how he would use it:

Mr. Cahan: Supposing the hon. member were Prime Minister; supposing he had complete control of the currency and were czar and dictator of Canada, what would he do with the money?
Mr. McGeer: I would put the people to work.
Mr. Cahan: With what?
Mr. McGeer: With that money.
Mr. Cahan: You would pay out that money in wages?

At that time I understood, though perhaps I was wrong, that this was the contention of the hon. gentleman, but when he resumed his address on the following day he suggested that he was not really advocating an increase in the dominion note issue or in the Bank of Canada note issue for the purpose of paying out that income in wages. He said:

During the course of my remarks yesterday the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) asked this question: What would you do with the $724,000,000 that the Bank of Canada now has the power under the act to issue; would you issue that money as a means of putting people to work?

Then in answer, made after due reflection during the intervening twenty-four hours, he said:

In answer to that, I should like to say that if proper control were established in the Bank of Canada it should be such control that the government, the Bank of Canada, the chartered banks and the financial institutions could get together to create the means of financing those sound public works, national, provincial and municipal, which would be the means of eliminating unemployment and putting people to work at work that is needed to be done. Of course, you would not use the legal tender currency of the Bank of Canada; you would be able to make arrangements with the chartered banks and the financial institutions by which short term treasury bills at minimum cost would be issued to carry on this work.

I ask the hon. gentleman to consider the budget statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). At page 20 of the pamphlet which has been issued containing that speech he will find that that is the policy which previous governments and this government have followed to a certain extent. He will find that as of the date when that speech was made there were outstanding $125,000,000 in treasury bills at interest of from ·999 per cent to 1·15 per cent, which $125,000,000 had been or was being used in connection with the public services of Canada.

During the election campaign, whether or not the hon. gentleman was correctly reported, he made speeches which led me at least, from the newspaper reports, to assume that he was advocating a further issue of dominion notes or of Bank of Canada notes, and that the extra issues should be used for the public services of Canada. From that I assumed, perhaps improperly, that he was advocating simply a measure of inflation. I find now, however, that all that has been repudiated by the hon. gentleman in the statement I have just read and that in a few hours he has converted himself to a comparatively sane and sound position with regard to monetary policy.

Mr. McGEER: Without desiring to interrupt, Mr. Chairman, I might say that the statements I made in this house were the statements I made on the platform, and I give my hon. friend my assurance that there has been no change in my position.

Mr. CAHAN: Well I must accept that statement. But I suggest that any hon. member who quietly reads the first address which the hon. gentleman made in committee on the resolution introducing this bill, and the later addresses which he made, will see that the hon. gentleman, perhaps subconsciously, unknown to himself, has converted himself by his own eloquent addresses to a saner point of view.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) also referred last evening to an address which I made before the Canadian Club in Toronto on November 13, 1933, and which, I believe, was republished by that club. That address was delivered prior to the issue of the report of the Royal Commission on Banking and Currency in Canada. I was endeavouring in that address to state to a public gathering of the Canadian club what were the issues which were then being considered by the royal commission, and the possibilities of definite decisions thereon in one way or the other. As a matter of fact I regarded that address as of so slight importance that I did not retain a printed copy of it, but this morning I ascertained that a copy could be procured from the library of parliament, and that copy I have procured and now have in my hand. I do not wish to retract anything which I said on that occasion.

It was a sincere expression of opinion, and I do not think anything has occurred to cause me to reform the opinions which I then expressed. But I say this—and I say it not only to the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth) but to the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore)—that they will never get very far by merely making scrap-books of petty extracts from speeches delivered either by members of this house or by others who are delivering lectures or addresses, or from books on economic policy. If they would reflect upon the data which they accumulate, and form their own opinions therefrom, I am sure their expressions of opinion would be more influential not only in this house but upon the whole body politic.

Credit is the warp and woof of the commercial and industrial life of Canada. But credit is not limited to banking credit. I remember in the country village in which I was born and brought up the grocer at the crossroads gave credit to those who went to his store to purchase supplies. Sometimes that credit was extended beyond a month or even two months. In the towns to which I had access the country merchants, whether wholesale or retail, gave credit to those in whom they had confidence, having regard not only to their financial resources but to their general reliability. Credit was extended by the country store. Credit was again extended from the stores in the country town. Credit was extended by the manufacturer. Credit was extended by the wholesale dealer. If hon. gentlemen wish to pursue the inquiry; if they will take the annual financial statements of the large number of manufacturing establishments, wholesale merchants and others who are doing business throughout Canada, and look at the amount of their accounts and bills receivable, they will ascertain that entirely outside of banking credit there are tens of millions of dollars of credit outstanding. And this credit is of great advantage not only to the general public, the purchaser, the consumer, but also to those middlemen who stand between the manufacturer and the wholesale dealer and the consuming public. That credit rests upon personal confidence, and I suggest that that credit should not be restricted or restrained by governmental action.

There is also bank credit. Now I am not a banker; I know little about banking except having been at times legal adviser to banks. But a bank has, as the foundation for its credit, its capital, its reserves and its deposits.

Mr. HEAPS: And at times the government.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, I am not dealing which that phase; I am dealing with banks.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. HEAPS: But it is a very important phase.

Mr. CAHAN: In times gone by I have gone day by day to consult with the executive officers of a great banking institution. They looked with great care upon the amount of loans or advances of credit made from day to day. As against the loans or advances they kept a careful eye, first, on their time deposits, because those could be withdrawn only on notice, and, second, a more careful view of their demand deposits, because they realized that if in making loans or advances they exceeded the limit and consequently in any single hour of the day they were not in a position to liquidate the cheques drawn upon accounts at their bank, that meant the closing of the bank, and that meant utter failure and disaster. So a close examination had to be made from day to day to ascertain whether the bank was really solvent in the sense of being able to meet demand liabilities upon presentation.

Mr. BENNETT: That was the trouble with the Merchants Bank of Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes; I was all through the Merchants Bank of Canada disaster. That shows the necessity of keeping such careful supervision over liabilities and of limiting bank credits. We had an illustration of that necessity in the fact that in the three years ending December, 1932, over five thousand banks in the neighbouring republic failed, destroying credits of over $3,000,000,000. And even after the bank moratorium was set up in the United States in March, 1933, a total of 1,307 banks failed to obtain licences permitting them to reopen, and $2,700,000,000 of bank deposits were thus either destroyed or tied up indefinitely.

That shows the caution with which banks have to deal with banking credits. If the hon. gentleman who read so many extracts from my address had done me the credit of reading further he would have found this passage:

> But in fact the banks have not an unlimited power of creating credit in the form of bank loans, which may be drawn upon by their customers' cheques. Their dependence upon public confidence is so vital to their solvency that in actual practice they invite disaster whenever they make loans which are not accompanied by satisfactory guarantees for their repayment. If the banks are to maintain their solvency they dare not make loans or advances unless they have reasonable confidence that they will be repaid in due time.

That is an essential feature of banking practice which must be constantly regarded if a bank is to be protected against insolvency.

There were some passages of that address I should like some hon. members to consider, and if I can procure a copy I think I shall send one gratuitously to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

Mr. McGEER: The hon. member does not need to do that, because I have already read and studied it very carefully, and I think a great deal of it.

Mr. CAHAN: Thank you very much, indeed. I was then dealing with the questions under consideration by the royal commission, without the slightest idea as to what the findings of that commission would eventually be. May I read what I said at that time:

I cannot predict the course that the parliament of Canada will ultimately adopt. I am merely seeking to state the issue for your consideration, for ultimately the people of Canada must render the official decision. I am convinced, nevertheless, that parliament will not approve of the unlimited issue of dominion notes for the purpose of defraying expenses of government. That kind of inflation would inevitably lead to national insolvency. It is true that anything is currency which the parliament or government of a country chooses to make legal tender, or that the people of the country are willing to accept as currency, such as bank notes, cheques or bills of exchange. But when currency is known to be increasing in volume every day, people are prone to mistrust it. They rush to get rid of it, spend it on something—anything they can buy. Up goes the rate of circulation, and prices rise by an amount corresponding both to the increase in the volume of currency and the increase in its rate of circulation. The value of the currency depreciates in the proportion that prices of commodities increase.

As the mark depreciated in Germany, sellers refused to accept marks. Retail trades closed their businesses at particular hours of the day, and then on particular days of the week, and then closed entirely. The catastrophe of the currency developed into a catastrophe of the food and other supplies, which was worse than the worst periods of the war. Thrift becomes an act of monumental improvidence when the currency is rapidly depreciating every day, and the spendthrift is recognized as the one prudent man in the family.

Of Germany an eminent writer says that one son could invest his inheritance in gilt-edged stock and lose it all, while his brother could squander his share on champagne, and sell the empty bottles for more marks than the original inheritance. Interest meant nothing. What was the use of earning ten per cent or fifty per cent per annum on your money, when the purchasing power of your mark could fall by ninety per cent in a single month. Extreme inflation means a fool's paradise for the rich, and grinding poverty and hardship for all other classes of society. When everyone rushes off to spend his money as soon as he receives it, when every manufacturer knows that bricks, mortar, machinery and goods are the one safe repository for his profits, and when every investor finds that ordinary shares alone are comparatively safe, a false volume of business and a false scale of values are inevitably created. The manufacturer soon finds that factories and machinery are no good to him without working capital and credit, when there is no money or credit left. The investor finds that the ordinary shares, which he thought safe, are of no value to him without dividends, and the working-man finds that no liquid capital means for him no possibility of obtaining work at any wage.

The catastrophe culminated in Germany in 1924 when its currency was converted and stabilized on the basis of one trillion of inflated Rentenmarks into one gold Reichmark. In the meantime all public and private indebtedness had been completely liquidated by payments made in inflated marks and thus forever obliterated. I am convinced that the people of Canada will never decide to pursue the same rapid descent to the hades of social, industrial and commercial ruin.

My mind was incited to these reflections and to the making of these remarks by having been in Germany for some weeks in 1930 when the Bruening government was in office, at which time I was instructed by the privy council to adjust a large number of outstanding war liabilities between the government of Canada and that of Germany. I saw on the public streets men, apparently of the most intellectual classes, who were in a state of sordid misery. Some of them were asking for alms along the streets. I inquired of one of the officials with whom I came into daily contact as to the meaning of the condition of these men, and he said that the inflation of the mark had wiped out the entire accumulations of what were known as the middle classes of Germany. Some of the men whose faces he recognized had been scientists of high standing; others had been professors and teachers in the universities and colleges; others were men ranking high in the medical and other scientific professions. These men were reduced to beggary by the inflation which took place.

There was very little humour in the situation I saw from the time I landed in Berlin until I left some weeks later. I was received with every courtesy by those holding the highest official positions, but I do not think I saw a smile on the face of a man, woman or child. Although he may not have intended to be humorous one of the officials with a twinkle in his eye said, by way of explanation for the disaster, "You know that we had printing presses and engraving machinery, and we happened to have a supply of paper suitable for engraving." He told me that when the rentenmark depreciated so rapidly those people working in government engraving and printing offices refused to accept it as payment. He told me further that before the final catastrophe arrangements were made to print rentenmarks for a week, and at the end of that time, on the Saturday afternoon, the entire product of rentenmarks was divided between the government and the workers. The workers took half of the entire production to satisfy their demands for wages and salary.

There can be no doubt that a catastrophe such as overtook that country, and such as has overtaken other countries would be induced in Canada by an unlimited issue of our dominion currency under government supervision. I had on one occasion a peculiar experience in Mexico. I arrived in that country in the nineties just after there had been a great depreciation in the value of their peso. A short time before my arrival the Mexican peso was the equivalent of a dollar in United States currency, but a sudden depreciation in the value of silver had brought their peso down to about forty cents not only in their own country but on the foreign exchange market. People whom I met in their homes, because I had letters of introduction to some cultured people, were all complaining of how prices had risen so high in so short a time. The price had increased two and a half times for everything which was imported from abroad and for a number of things which were manufactured and produced at home, and which were the essentials of life. These people were quite unconscious of the reason. I soon ascertained that the real reason was that the value of their peso, formerly the equivalent of one dollar in gold, had been reduced to forty cents in gold. To me, who was paying my way at the hotels and throughout the country with United States bills, the rates seemed very reasonable indeed, but for them there had been an increase of two and a half times the normal prices which they had been accustomed to pay.

Take another instance which came to my attention not long ago. I remember in my youthful days, when Nova Scotia was sending large quantities of fish products to Brazil, there was a time, if I remember correctly, when the Brazilian rei was the equivalent of one-half cent of American or Canadian money, and a milrei, or a thousand reis, represented $5 of American or Canadian money. I had occasion to have something to do with Brazil in 1889, and then I found that the value of the milrei, owing to inflation by the use of paper currency, had been reduced from $5 to $2.70 of our money. Inflation has kept on, and less than six months ago when I was in Brazil I found that the milrei, which was formerly $5, had decreased in value to six cents or six and a half cents, showing that once you enter upon that road to economic hades the descent is very rapid indeed.

Therefore, in discussing this matter at Toronto, I was very anxious indeed to impress upon that audience that the indiscriminate use of dominion notes, which were then the current notes, must result in disaster to this country. In discussing the Finance Act I then stated:

> At the outbreak of the war, the enactment by parliament of the Finance Act made a fundamental change in the monetary system and in the banking practice of Canada, which proved to be of great utility during the stress and strain of war and during the period of reconstruction that thereafter ensued. This act is now administered by the Finance minister and four other ministers of the crown—

That was in the autumn of 1933:

> —who constitute the treasury board, of which the Deputy Minister of Finance is secretary. The Finance Act provides for a reserve of legal tender currency, which may be utilized by the chartered banks in times when there are exceptional demands for credit, or when other emergent conditions arise. But the recent financial depression has induced many to believe that the provisions of that act are not adequate for certain national needs. An agitation has arisen in favour of creating a central banking institution in which shall be vested the functions now exercised under the provisions of that act by a committee of the government.

I went on to say:

> It is also suggested that this proposed new central institution, should be vested with adequate authority to centralize in itself the gold reserves of the country; to control the issue and disposition of dominion notes, the coinage and issue of metallic currency and also to take such measures as may from time to time be deemed expedient to supervise and to advise the government with respect to the general monetary policy of the country.

I am no financial expert but as a member of this house, and particularly after becoming a member of this house, I took a special interest in the administration of the Finance Act which had been passed in 1914, and which was brought into force simply by proclamation so as to mitigate the difficulties arising from war, invasion, riot or insurrection. In 1919 the act of 1914 was continued in force until two years after the conclusion of peace. In 1923 the previous Liberal government, upon the termination of the act of 1914, introduced, through Mr. Fielding, then Finance minister, the Finance Act of 1923, which now appears as chapter 70 of the revised statutes. Part II of that act authorized the treasury board, consisting, as I said, of the Finance minister and four other members of the government of the day, to exercise very wide powers with respect to making advances of dominion notes to the chartered banks of Canada. Then an episode occurred of which we on the opposition side of the house from 1926 to 1930 said very little by way of criticism, and perhaps we were in error in not voicing more strenuously at that time our confirmed opinions.

Canada, under the late Mr. Robb as Finance minister, returned to the gold standard in 1926, but in 1928, when Mr. Robb was still Finance minister, certain obligations of the dominion became due in the city of New York, and without endeavouring to obtain the sale of a sufficient number of dominion government securities to take up the obligations then falling due, Mr. Robb undertook, I assume by authority of the governor in council, to export $40,000,000 of the country's gold reserves to pay off these government obligations then maturing in New York. Then, to replenish the deficiency in the dominion's cash reserves, he issued a corresponding amount of dominion notes. The result was this—and I am not saying this by way of criticism of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), but it is one of the reasons why I became so favourable to the creation of a Bank of Canada, which would take the place of the treasury board, nor in criticism of his government or of any government which might happen to be in their place—that the amount of dominion notes issued under the Finance Act rose from $200,000,000 in September, 1929, to $285,000,000 in November, an increase of 42½ per cent, as compared with the normal post-war seasonal increase of 20 per cent. To that was due to an extent which cannot be fully estimated the stock exchange activities that finally resulted in 1929 in such disastrous failure and ruin, bringing disaster and loss to the extent of many billions of dollars to Canadians from one end of the country to the other and leading to numerous suicides and deaths. That abnormal credit inflation was financed by an increase in dominion notes, which permitted an undue expansion of dominion note issue and a corresponding increase in the cash reserve of the chartered banks, an increase which was not required at the time for the ordinary financing of domestic trade and industry, and an increase which, to secure its employment, went to finance the stock exchanges of Canada and of New York. I am not pressing that by way of recrimination, but I say that if a different policy had been pursued the disaster, if it could not have been wholly precluded, in view of American and other influences, would certainly have been mitigated to a very considerable extent. From that day I have not felt favourable to the continuing of the administration of dominion note issue under a committee of the privy council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my hon. friend does not wish to leave the impression that that one transaction was responsible for the financial crash of some years ago. It is due to the memory of the late Minister of Finance that this should be made clear. In so far as the transaction referred to had any effect at all, it was but one of a great many transactions.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so, and if I have not made that clear I wish to do so now. But it was, so far as Canada was concerned, a very important and material incident. It had this effect, however, that I felt, and I am sure that the former Prime Minister, the right hon. member for Calgary West (Br. Bennett) and other members of the late government felt, in view of that and other incidents which were occurring, which placed the committee of the privy council under undue pressure, that they were not by their experience in financial matters able to deal with the matter with the utmost competence. It induced them to favour the institution of a Bank of Canada which would take the place of the treasury board in relation to those matters connected with coinage, currency and dominion note issues. Therefore I was very much in favour of the creation of the Bank of Canada and the passing of the Bank of Canada Act. I had nothing to do with it except that I was one of a number of colleagues who were consulted with regard to its terms, and I fancy that perhaps some of the drafting which doubtless was more or less defective may have been due to my efforts at the time. I was pleased indeed when the then leader of the opposition and some of those associated with him quite warmly approved the passing of the Bank of Canada Act, although criticizing incidentally some of its features. To me it does not matter very much whether a certain percentage of the stock of the Bank of Canada, to the extent of $5,000,000, is held by private parties, or whether the government undertakes the acquisition of all of the outstanding shares, or whether on the other hand it undertakes to issue $5,100,000 more so as to give the government a preponderance of ownership. In the discussions to which I was a party it was suggested that the ownership of shares by private persons would give to a large number of people throughout the length and breadth of Canada more than a passing interest—

The CHAIRMAN: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he has spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall say a word or two so as to enable the hon. gentleman to continue. I have spoken and he may therefore now continue.

Mr. CAHAN: Thank you. It was felt that giving these shareholders an interest and the right to elect a certain number of the directors would bring to the assistance of the government the advice of a number of qualified business men throughout Canada whose knowledge of business and trade, of commerce and manufacturing, would be of advantage not only to the board but to the government, for whom the board would act in an advisory capacity. Furthermore, it seemed to me that under the previous act the government did have control and very effective control of the administration of the Bank of Canada. The government have seen fit to propose amendments which will bring the Bank of Canada perhaps to a great degree under their control, and to that I offer no strong objection. I say, however, that what is necessary is that the government should be to a certain extent protected against temporary emotional and passionate demands of its supporters and others for large increases of dominion notes and the use of such increases for purposes other than as a medium of exchange for the conduct of the commercial and business enterprises of the country. The government will be under pressure. May I speak frankly? This question of monetary policy cuts athwart both sides of the house. It is really so important that it may become at an early date the most important issue before the people of Canada. Therefore men on either side of the house who take a conservative view, not in a political sense, but a conservative and perhaps traditional view, must be prepared to advocate what they believe to be sound and sane national policies with regard to monetary matters, whether it cuts athwart their own political party or the political party of the other side. The chief hope I have is that those who are making and have made very extreme addresses and very strong appeals throughout the country for an extension of the dominion note issue and an inflation of our currency, may be convinced, as I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has been convinced to a certain extent by careful reading and, what is still more necessary, continuous and lengthy reflection upon the actual facts.

May I be permitted to state what I believe to be the result of an indiscriminate issue of dominion currency? Suppose you issue it and pay it out for construction of public works or for similar purposes, where does it go?

[Mr. Cahan.]

Nobody carries round in his pockets dominion notes to any extent. Nobody keeps them in his private till. They are simply accumulated day by day and placed in the bank by way of deposit for safekeeping and, possibly, in order to secure a return, if it is a savings deposit, of one and a half to two and a half per cent, according to the prevailing rate. The banks are compelled to use these deposits, and such use leads inevitably to a disastrous inflation. Furthermore it leads to a depression in the value of our currency even in domestic mercantile transactions. I do not see why we should conceal the fact that, when we of the late government found ourselves confronted with enormous liabilities payable from month to month in the United States of America, we were in some degree gratified to find that the United States, by presidential decree, had increased the value of gold so that one dollar of the currency of the United States was reduced to a value of about fifty-nine or sixty cents in gold. I do not think there is any doubt but that, in view of our relations with the United States, in view of the absolute necessity of maintaining, so far as we could, profitable trade relations with that country, Great Britain and continental European countries, we did deliberately act so as to make a corresponding reduction in the value of the Canadian gold dollar, reducing it to a value of fifty-nine or sixty cents. We were compelled by necessity to do that to preserve the national integrity of this dominion and to promote its ordinary trade and commercial transactions with those other countries to which I have alluded. But let us see what was the result. For instance, I have $25,000 of life insurance that I took as a young man. With just a little more, it will be all that my family will have to depend upon when, some day, I am suddenly blotted out. But that $25,000 of life insurance, for which I paid in gold or the equivalent of gold, is now worth in international currency forty per cent less than it was; in other words it is worth $15,000, although during my whole life it has ever been one of my objects to leave at least that specified amount of life insurance for my wife and those dependent upon me.

Now, the same result must occur to a still greater extent if this government permits itself to be influenced by political considerations or by political agitation to inflate still further the Canadian dollar. The government needs all the protection that it can throw about itself and it needs the full support of every member of this house, whether on this side or on the government side, who is anxious to preserve so far as possible a sane and sound monetary policy. Such an inflation as that proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard would, in my opinion—and I think I can give some arguments in support of that opinion—reduce the value of the Canadian dollar to a few cents. It would reduce in like manner the value of all our savings, whether represented by savings deposits, by life insurance, or by the holdings of dominion, provincial or municipal bonds or other interest bearing securities. It would in like manner reduce all salaries, wages and pensions, while increasing the nominal cost of the necessities of life. Such a reduction would in like manner reduce the endowments of all religious, educational and charitable institutions, all pension funds and the funds of all workmen's compensation boards, all the funds of trustees, executors and guardians which are held in trust for widows, children or other dependents. What is perhaps the worst of all, it would reduce in like proportion by a covert and indirect method all salaries and wages and all sources of income, and, if carried to the extreme, place four-fifths of our people, who are now employed, on government relief or other relief or other forms of charity for the time such depression prevailed.

Less than a year ago I went personally for my own information to the Department of Finance and obtained statistical returns which showed that, including ordinary life policies, industrial group insurance and fraternal benefit policies, there were, last autumn, 6,540,000 life policies in force in Canada, including those under dominion licence only, representing a gross amount of $5,560,000,000 of life insurance exclusive of policies issued under provincial licences, the latter amounting to $190,590,000, and the net liability which had accrued under those policies in autumn of last year amounted to approximately $2,000,000,000. Of course the same person may hold more than one policy; but, on being interviewed and making an examination of such data as was available, the insurance branch of the Finance department estimated that at least one half of the adult population of Canada, both men and women, then held one or more policies of insurance on their lives for the benefit of those who were dependent upon them respectively and who were likely to survive their decease.

Mr. DUNNING: That is now regarded as a very conservative estimate.

Mr. McGEER: Do I understand the hon. gentleman aright that this would all be caused by reducing the rate of interest to three per cent?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not talking about the rate of interest. My hon. friend knows better than that.

Mr. McGEER: I do not follow the argument. I have been trying to follow it.

Mr. CAHAN: It is an inflation of our dominion note issue that I am dealing with.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Who has suggested any inflation?

Mr. LAWSON: That is your policy. You do not recognize it.

Mr. CAHAN: Who has suggested it? The proposed inflation of the note issue of the Bank of Canada by $621,000,000 to an aggregate of $721,000,000, and the use of those notes for the construction of public works, would inevitably reduce the value of every dollar, if not utterly wipe out every dollar of value in these life insurance policies.

Mr. McGEER: I should like to put on record now a correction of that statement. I made no suggestion—

Mr. CAHAN: I am not talking to my hon. friend. He is not all Canada; he does not represent all the radical views that are expressed.

Mr. McGEER: I am rising to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard may not interrupt the hon. member who has the floor without obtaining permission.

Mr. CAHAN: At that moment I was not referring to the hon. gentleman at all.

Mr. McGEER: I am sorry, but what I understood the hon. gentleman to say was that I had proposed an increase in the note issue to $724,000,000, which is not so.

Mr. CAHAN: Upon further examination I find that, excluding bank deposits payable on demand and including only savings deposits such as bank deposits payable upon notice, dominion government savings bank deposits, post office savings bank deposits and other savings deposits in the loan and trust companies including the present value of dominion government annuities, at the present time in Canada there are approximately five million savings deposits representing an aggregate of $1,700,000,000 of the savings of industry and thrift in this country. I am suggesting again, and I hold very strong views with regard to it—and I think my opinions are sound and sane—that the undue and unrestricted inflation of our currency to the amount suggested, $724,000,000 of dominion notes or corresponding Bank of Canada notes, would reduce or almost completely wipe out these credits. I think then, after seventy years of life, having been born and bred in the country and knowing something of country life, to which I have maintained a distinct and affectionate attachment, of what misery, disaster and ruin will be brought upon so many millions of our people if we endorse such an unlimited issue of our currency.

I should like to read one extract from the work of James W. Angell, The Recovery of Germany, which I think will be found in the library, in which he gives a vivid picture of the dire results of the indiscriminate issue of irredeemable paper currency in Germany. I quote:

> The group which suffered most from the inflation ... was the group which was ... least able to defend itself; the middle classes among the town dwellers.... Composed largely of people with small fixed incomes, such as salaried officials and clerks, recipients of pensions, and little investors living on interest and rent—of whom the latter group were hit especially hard by the government control of city rentals—they were precisely the group most exposed to the evil consequences of currency depreciation, while they lacked both the knowledge and the opportunity to combat it. Their savings disappeared (and) their pensions and annuities melted away.... Hundreds of thousands of educated men and women, too old or feeble or untrained to earn their own living, were abruptly faced with starvation. Many died. The others, passing from day to day without hope, survived only by the sacrifice of treasured books, furniture, jewelry, and all their saleable possessions, and at the end by domestic and foreign charity. Their history is one of the most genuinely pitiful chapters in all the war and post-war tragedy.

I am not here to defend capitalism. Men who control large amounts of capital have made many errors of judgment and mistakes, though not all, I believe, to promote merely selfish interests. On the other hand capitalism is the system the world has had for a thousand years. It is largely responsible for all the material progress that modern civilization has hitherto made. It has been developed by individual initiative, enterprise and courage. It ensures a large measure of individual ownership and safeguards private property. It provides practically all civil employment exclusive of governmental and municipal services. It pays salaries and wages for labour and interest and dividends for thrift and saving. And it is the accretions of the savings of the industrious and thrifty that make up the capital with which our railways, canals, hospitals, homes, churches and colleges, as well as our public utilities of all descriptions, have been constructed and with which our industries, great and small, are built up and operated. I do not believe we could have attained the state of organized civilization which we at present enjoy except under a capitalistic system, which, like all other human systems, has no doubt exhibited human frailties. But the ruthless dissipation and destruction of these savings by unrestricted inflation of our currency would, I am clear in my own belief, impoverish Canada for at least two or three of our future generations.

In addition to those who are advocating inflation by means of indiscriminate issues of dominion currency we have in this house a number of gentlemen who advocate a social credit program, which, as nearly as I can ascertain by listening carefully to their exposition of that program in this house, proposes to distribute what is called purchasing power to all citizens, old or young, to the extent of their individual requirements. The advocates of that system in this house explain, as nearly as I can understand them, that the purchasing power so freely to be distributed to individuals will make possible the acquisition by these individual recipients of all the goods and services they may require to satisfy their individual needs. Nevertheless I would remind them that mere purchasing power is without utility unless goods and services are available for purchase. It is admitted that these goods and services can be produced or provided only by work, either intellectual or physical, or usually work that is both intellectual and physical. But when purchasing power, whatever it means, whether it be an indiscriminate expansion of the dominion note issue or of other note issues, is freely distributed without work, I ask, who then will furnish the work necessary for the production of the required goods and services?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Who said it was to be without work?

Mr. CAHAN: Well, I read in the press not long ago of someone—perhaps he was one of the supporters of the hon. gentleman—who said that if his wife and six children and himself were each to receive the monthly apportionment suggested to be issued under the social credit scheme, there would be no necessity for his working.

Mr. LANDERYOU: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not going to enter into a discussion. I suggest that a successful solution of the problems propounded by the advocates of social credit must await the successful solution of another problem which has engaged the attention of the world for centuries, namely the problem of effecting perpetual motion without the expenditure of energy. Twenty centuries or more of our history have clearly shown that a free distribution of purchasing power which may be utilized for the acquisition of sufficient goods and services to supply the needs of the people cannot be made by any government unless that government arbitrarily reserves and exercises the right to conscript all labour, allots to each man and to each woman the special work for which each is deemed to be best qualified, and then by arbitrary force compels each to perform his allotted task. That I think is a proposition which is thoroughly vindicated by history. In Russia, and more recently in Germany and Italy, governments have apportioned such available work to individuals as they deemed expedient, but they have compelled the performance of such work by the persons designated for each branch of the common service. I suggest to my hon. friend that if any government in Canada, even a prospective social credit government, should attempt to organize in Canada a new slave state, and so carry into effect the forcible conscription of labour and an arbitrary allotment to all citizens of the special form of labour to be undertaken and performed by them respectively, I have sufficient confidence in the natural desire of our people for individual personal liberty to believe that such a government would thereby inevitably ensure a condition under which their individual heads would speedily adorn the lamp posts of this capital city.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What about your "work for relief" proposals now?

Mr. CAHAN: The ever changing conditions of our industrial and social system must necessitate corresponding changes in public laws and the regulations which control human activities. But in these times, just as we are emerging from years of extreme depression, the government and parliament should take special care not to postpone, and certainly not to preclude, the recovery of our economic stability by the wilful destruction of our banking and monetary system, or by unnecessarily restricting the freedom of individual and business initiative, or by precluding the adoption of such efficient industrial methods as are not subversive of the general public interest. The fabric of our civilization is woven out of strands of every kind and colour, but no substitute can be found for the individual initiative and the sound judgment of those who have slowly and laboriously by long training and experience developed their capacity for service to their fellow men. The struggle for existence cannot be wholly eliminated. Life is work, and work is now and will ever be necessary to procure the essentials of life. The ideal world cannot be acquired, and the ideal life cannot be attained on any easy terms, and mere existence does not postulate or imply the right to exist at the expense of the community as a whole. The sick, the infirm and the feeble-minded must ever be the concern and care of the whole community, but those of us who have health and strength must each personally assume the responsibility of acquiring, by careful training and preparation, individual efficiency in whatever work is available if society is to be maintained on the basis of individual liberty and individual responsibility. The responsibility for maintaining the economic growth and development of this country and for the improvement and betterment of social conditions rests largely upon the shoulders of our business men, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) stated a few days ago, especially those engaged in finance, industry and commerce.

On the other hand I ask this committee to remember that mere opportunist and ill-considered legislation and excessive government interference, such as has been proposed I think by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, can serve only to restrict the normal growth and development which otherwise is inevitable. Skilled manual labourers have been the builders of the foundations of our present civilization, and one cause of the delay in the revival of industrial activity is that we have failed to educate and train our youth to the performance of those services which are essential to the welfare of the whole community. Nevertheless the solution of the problem of unemployment depends largely upon the development of leadership and the inculcation of the spirit of independence and self-reliance, as well as upon the recognition by all leaders in industry and business of their personal responsibility for providing employment for their less qualified fellow men.

This old world has witnessed many recurring periods of business depression, but even in more modern history conditions in England after the close of the Napoleonic wars and in the United States after the close of the civil war were worse than those we have recently experienced. But always there has been recovery. At the close of the United States civil war I recall as a child of a fairly well-to-do family never even seeing white bread for two or three years, simply because we had been getting our flour from the middle states and those sources were prohibited to us. We did not use sugar, but for sweets depended on molasses from the West Indies, because the United States with its large markets was taking practically everything that could be supplied. We lived on oatmeal porridge and rye bread and other wholesome products of the field, and I think we raised as strong and vigorous a race of boys and girls as was ever raised in this country. Although the standards of life, as compared with the standards of to-day, were somewhat low, there was no lack of family good cheer and happiness and the enjoyment of those simple homely pleasures which are characteristic of the small rural community.

Things are going to be better. I read what I can in the modern engineering journals, and I am convinced there is lying dormant a wealth of scientific knowledge and achievement which will soon release for the benefit of mankind powerful physical forces of incredible utility. I believe we are now at the commencement of another period of unprecedented material progress and prosperity in which new inventions will give an increasing impetus to all forms of human activity. The creative activities of mankind will soon again have full play. The heights to be attained under the financial conditions in prospect may be fully measured by the depression of the abyss from which we are gradually arising. The government may be assured that in connection with this measure we do not wish to detract from government control and government authority, but what we urge upon the administration is that in perfecting as they deem best the measure now before the committee they should protect themselves from sudden ebullitions of popular feeling and from the extreme demands of political or partisan supporters. Canada, its safety, its prosperity and the happiness of its people are largely at the present time, and doubtless will be for some years to come, in the hands of the Prime Minister and his colleagues. I for one say—and in my statement I believe I voice the expression of opinion of the leader of the opposition and those about me—that to all sane and sound measures placed before us dealing with the financial and economic life of the people of Canada we are anxious to give reasonable and hearty support.

Mr. HILL: In fairness to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), may I say that I take responsibility for the criticism of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Clark) with reference to the statement by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard to the effect that the Bank of Montreal had paid a quarterly dividend of four per cent. I read it in one of the financial sheets and passed it to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard causing him to make the statement. I believe the article in the publication referred to the total payment up to date for this year, which amounted to four per cent for the half year.

While speaking, may I say that I believe every hon. member appreciates the contributions which have been made by hon. members speaking to the bill. The information given to the committee has been valuable, and that given by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who has made a long and careful study of the subject, has been particularly valuable. I think all members of the committee appreciate the contribution he has made.

Mr. McGEER: I do not think I would be performing my duty properly if I were to permit to go unchallenged some of the statements of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). His argument is of the type that avoids facts, that deals with false premises, and that continues to support a system which thinking people know must be changed.

I shall deal with his first argument in which he attempted to show that my conclusions were not based upon sound reasoning or logic. He took my point, namely that if I had a million dollars in copper money I would have no difficulty in converting it into a million dollars of bank money. In an effort to prove that that was absurd and that copper money had no value and could not be created by parliament as money, he developed the specious argument that to convert it into money I would have to divide it into twenty-five cent transactions, and go about the country getting persons to accept twenty-five cents in copper money, before I could have full legal tender money. The folly of that argument is evident when we appreciate that our newspaper issues are now sold in terms of copper cents. In Canada and the United States the vast bulk of the entire newspaper production is sold in terms of copper cents. In our large department stores the practice of inducing sales by breaking common term money, such as a dollar, to ninety-nine cents, and fifty cents to forty-nine cents, has induced an enormous use of copper money. I want to ask any hon. member this question: If a newspaper proprietor accumulated $1,000 in copper money from the day to day sales of his newspaper, would he have any difficulty in having that $1,000 accepted on his deposit slip as part of his money deposited with the bank on a certain day, against which deposit he could issue cheques? Of course he would not. Copper money to-day, meeting modern conditions of trade, forms a definite and realistic part of the media of exchange with which the bulk of our business is actually transacted. The idea of having to convert copper money into full legal tender money, or bank note currency, by finding people who will accept twenty-five cents as full legal tender money is an indication of the absurdity of the kind of argument resorted to by those who, rightly or wrongly, will stand by the old system, irrespective of whether governments are impotent and millions in destitution and in misery stand in breadlines.

Now I come to the other argument, one which has been commonly used as an answer to any man who suggests a program of sound monetary reform, namely: Look at what happened in Germany. Yes, for a minute let us see what happened in Germany. Germany, faced with the imposition of an appalling and impossible load of international debts payable in gold deliberately resorted to a program of inflation, for the purpose of liquidating her internal debts and maintaining an outward appearance of solvency, so that the things which were in pawn, the Saar and the Ruhr, might at some future date be returned to Germany without the payment of her international debts. Do we think for one moment that the printing presses ran themselves, or that to get the results they were seeking they had to print mark notes not in terms of tens, hundreds, thousands or millions, but by the carload, and by elevating the denominations to trillions? This was a possible use of inflation that could be resorted to as a means of liquidating debts within the country. An appalling program of inflation was pursued by Lenin who, in his Proletariat Revolution said that, from his point of view, the one thing which would make a success of a proletarian revolution was the destruction of the money power of the bourgeois and the aristocrat. By inflation he destroyed the value of the Russian rouble and proceeded to rebuild upon a basis of managed currency a scheme of civilization that repudiated the ideas of capitalism and inaugurated a plan of Marxian communism. Whether or not we like their ideas of political economy or political freedom, in Russia they have been able to finance the most enormous program of industrialization, the greatest program of national education and the greatest program of war preparation, through managed currency, that has ever been put forward by the people of any nation. Japan has done the same thing.

Of course it is very easy to drift away from a real argument and to place the proposals of your opponents upon a false premise. For that reason the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George proceeded to state that I had declared we should inflate the dominion note issue up to $724,000,000. I said no such thing. What I did say was that under the legislation passed by this parliament, with $181,000,000 of gold reserves the Bank of Canada had enough reserves to create an issue of $724,000,000 and still be within the limits of safety as set by parliament itself. I said again that under banking practice as set forth by the Macmillan committee this was a sufficient legal tender issue to support $7,240,000,000 of bank credit. That was not my opinion of what should be or could be; it was merely a statement of what under to-day's conditions parliament and banking practice have fixed as a limit for a medium of exchange—

Mr. DUNNING: I rise not to differ from the hon. gentleman but to point out, if he wishes his figures to be correct, that the twenty-five per cent relates not only to currency but to deposits as well. His figure therefore would need to be corrected by that difference.

Mr. McGEER: In any event there would be no difficulty in accumulating more gold if it was necessary.

Mr. DUNNING: But if my hon. friend likes to use correct figures—

Mr. McGEER: Yes, and I thank the minister for his statement. I was using that merely as an illustration, and not as a statement of what I thought should be done. The point I wish to make is this. No one suggests for one moment that this country needs or would be justified in putting in issue any such figure as $7,000,000,000 of bank credit. What I do say is that within the limits of our gold reserves and our gold production, of our legal tender currency and our practice of creating an effective bank credit transferable by cheque deposit type of currency, there is more money available than is necessary to finance the government without a disastrous imposition of taxation.

I want to refer to one other point. It is very easy to refer to American banks as a proof that our banks are sounder, but I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if that is altogether a safe or a proper comparison to make. Our banking system was modelled after the British banking system and was established in 1867. In other words, ever since Canada has been a confederation the Department of Finance has been the central department of issue around which our banks could revolve. At all times the minister of finance and the treasury board had the power to authorize the issue of dominion notes to supply the banks of Canada with money. In the United States a very different system was inaugurated. There you had national banks and state banks, and the national banks were not allowed to maintain a branch system. Consequently you had all across the United States individualism rather than collectivism in banking. That had its weaknesses and its failures, but cities like Portland, Seattle, San Francisco, Los Angeles and others through the middle west have found great advantage and secured much benefit from the fact that local banking institutions were established throughout the United States. When the crash came, as it was bound to come when confidence was lost, a great number of the banks went broke because they could not supply the legal tender cash which their depositors demanded.

Following 1844, when the British banking system was being developed, Great Britain had 640 banks, but the number gradually fell through bankruptcies and mergers until to-day in Great Britain there are only 40 banks, and the big five do the bulk of the banking business. In the United States long before the collapse came and before the federal reserve system was set up, which is in many respects similar to the British banking system, we in Canada and in Great Britain had gone through that period of bankruptcy which followed the establishment of the federal reserve system in the United States in 1914. I think probably one thing might be said which constitutes a unique distinction and would be endorsed from the experience of thousands of business men in the Dominion of Canada. I think they will agree with me that in the United States it was a case of the people breaking the banks, but in the Dominion of Canada it has been more a case of the banks breaking the people. That is really the situation that exists.

I was interested in the hon. member's refutation of the Keynes' theory that a low rate of interest induces investment and creates employment, because I understood from him that if we were to reduce rates of interest by increasing the use of national currency and by organizing at a low rate bank credit money, we would wreck the whole structure, bring down employment, reduce savings, and as a result impose hardships and restrictions on everybody. I wonder if that is borne out by the facts.

In 1920 we had dominion notes in issue to the amount of $176,000,000, and we had bank note currency in issue to the extent of $228,000,000, a total currency issue, dominion and bank notes authorized by parliament, of $404,000,000. Then came the trouble. Deflation started; since then the $404,000,000 has been reduced to $224,000,000; steadily after 1920, notwithstanding the rise in activity up to 1929, the process of money deflation continued, right up to the end of 1935. Who can deny, in the face of the prosperity we were enjoying in 1923, 1924 and 1925, with a large volume of money in issue—practically fifty per cent more than was in issue during the period of 1930 to 1935—that the results prove that with a decline in the volume of money in issue the very conditions the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George predicts are brought about? Where is the value of your home now? Where is the value of your investment? Where is the value of your securities? Where is the value of your investments in stocks such as the Canadian Pacific Railway or a thousand and one others? With a steady decline in the volume of money in circulation, ruination spread throughout business; unemployment came, and hungry men, women and children appeared and were saved from starvation only by the deliberate act of the national government which came to the rescue of provincial and municipal governments and put some $750,000,000 into circulation to take care of humanity.

When I hear arguments of the kind we have had to listen to to-day applauded by hon. members of this house, I fear for the future of the people of the Dominion of Canada. The time has come when men have got to deal, not in specious arguments that start nowhere and end behind where they started, but with a constructive program.

One would think from the argument of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St George that one should be judged in his work as a public man through the limited reports that come out in the newspapers. I do not blame the newspapers for publishing what has been published with reference to myself, nor do I apologize for the tactics that I have employed. I know there is a place for cold, deliberate and studied debate, but I know there is another place for the kind of argument that arouses public opinion, and when men are out trying to arouse public opinion to change institutions that have the sanction of time, the tactics that need to be employed for this purpose are the tactics that command attention. I have done my best to arouse public opinion in the way I thought it could be aroused. But I went a little further than that and wrote a book setting forth the views I hold. I put it into circulation presenting and elucidating the program of managed currency and planned economy which I offer and which is very different from the kind of program that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George attributed to me today. I pointed out that the fundamental institutions making up a program under which the ideas I have might be carried out by government consist of : (1) the mint; (2) a national banking system; (3) a scheme of scientific taxation; (4) a department of economic regulation and control; and, (5) a department of international trade and credit control. As far as I know, no one who believes in the school of thought I believe in has ever suggested that a mere inflation of currency or the mere pouring out of money or giving money to people for nothing will do anything but harm. But to put into circulation an adequate volume of the medium of exchange, which will sustain good government and ordered progress, is just as essential to human advancement as the putting into an irrigation system of the proper quantity of water is to the success of production on such land. Of course, I have had some very nice things said about me and some other things as well; and sometimes when I hear members like the hon. gentleman from St. Lawrence-St. George speaking I am reminded of the fellow who went to a Masonic lodge banquet where he received an illuminated address. It was too much for him and he drank well but not wisely. When he got home that night he tucked his shoes under his arm and opened the front door and was astounded to see his wife at the head of the stairs. After she had told him in no uncertain terms what she thought about him he said, "Yes, my dear; that is what you think about me; but"—drawing this illuminated address out of his pocket—"I want you to read what the world thinks about me." I wish to call attention to one or two things which I think rather offset the belittling references to myself made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. On September 15 of this year I was pleased to receive this letter:

Dear Mr. McGeer:

Your book reached me in the crowded weeks before my departure from Canterbury and I laid it by to read on board. A storm during the earlier part of our voyage prevented me from reading it until now, but as I at length read it, I rejoice greatly at so clear and courageous a statement.

You are proving indeed a tower of strength in the crusade against an engineered poverty and against the essentially godless rule of finance.

May God prosper your work.

Yours very sincerely and gratefully,
Hewlett Johnson,
Dean of Canterbury.

That English church dignitary not only holds a high place in the Church of England but is a distinguished engineer and a man who has a right to the respect of those whose minds run in scientific channels. From the premier of Ontario I have received this communication:

I am quite in agreement with your policy with regard to governmental finance.

Of course, I do not know whether Liberal members in this house respect the great work which the Premier of Ontario has done, but the day will come when it will be respected. I do not think that letter was written idly or carelessly or without some good reason in his mind for writing it. I have another letter from one who wrote a book on money in 1894, and who has been proven to have had the prescience almost of divine authority—Arthur Kitson. In 1894 he told of the troubles that were bound to overtake the world if it continued on the gold standard, because, as he said, it creates debts and makes it impossible for men to pay them. With the dawn of the twentieth century, he said, the nature of the world's activities would show whether or not men would abandon or continue a system that was bound to end in war, revolution and destruction. Well, the twentieth century came and the chaos that Kitson predicted has been here ever since. After I had appeared before the banking and commerce committee he received a copy of my evidence and writing to me he said:

I have just been reading your evidence before the committee on banking, and I wish to congratulate you and tell you how sincerely I appreciate the many points you have made. It reads to me like one of the finest addresses ever delivered on the currency and banking question. I am anxious to get a dozen copies of this if I can for distribution among our leaders. Would to God we had a McGeer in our House of Commons! There is not a single member here who can deliver a reasoned address on the true science of money. If you have not sent my friend Leigh of the London Chamber of Commerce a copy, I will lend him mine.

I am hurrying to get the post.

Sincerely yours,
Arthur Kitson.

From John Maynard Keynes I have received a letter which I prize highly. He says:

Dear Mr. McGeer:

Thank you very much for your letter and its enclosure. I am delighted to see the lines on which you are trying to promote sensible ideas in Canada. I could not say that I agree in every particular, but with many of your leading points, I am, as you will have expected, in complete sympathy.

Your exploit as regards reading my "Treatise on Money" should certainly deserve a word of appreciation from the author. I am asking my publisher to send you, as a small recognition of it, a copy of a forthcoming book of mine—a collected volume of essays.

Yours very truly,
J. M. Keynes.

This may seem funny to some hon. gentlemen, but in the work I have been trying to do these words of appreciation, coming from that wide field, gave help and encouragement and they lead me to believe that I need not be worried about men who talk in the language that came this afternoon from the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I made a speech in this house a little while ago—

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Take it as read.

Mr. McGEER: I think it would probably be just as well if it were not read because it would be wasted on men like you. The speeches I make do require a little intelligence and tolerance and sympathy to be appreciated. But it was appreciated, and incidentally I can tell my hon. friend that it was read somewhere, for I happen to have a letter signed by the chairman of the United States Senate committee on banking and commerce, Duncan U. Fletcher. He says:

My Dear Mr. McGeer:

I deeply appreciate your favour of May 19 and wish to assure you it was indeed a privilege for me to have the opportunity to introduce extracts from your recent address into the Congressional Record.

Due to your extraordinary interest in and enthusiasm for what this administration has been doing, as well as monetary matters in general, I have thought it likely that you would be interested in the enclosed copy of an article I have prepared on "The Fight for the Control of Credit." This article will appear in the convention edition of the Philadelphia Record at the time of the holding of the Democratic convention in that city.

With every assurance of my highest esteem, I am,

Very sincerely yours,
Duncan U. Fletcher.

That is from Duncan U. Fletcher. When men holding the positions of those whose letters I have read have seen fit to write me in these terms, I suggest that it must have been as the result of some effort on my part and some work done that was worthy of something more than sneers, worthy of something more than jeers; now if there is any duty that members elected to this house have to perform it is to apply whatever intelligence and capacity they have to the understanding of problems that can be solved, so that a greater measure of social and economic security, a greater measure of human contentment and happiness may be brought to the human family from time to time. I firmly believe that His Holiness the Pope was right when he declared that the cause of destitution and war, of strife and misery, is largely to be found in the mismanagement of money, due to the fact that currency and credit are under the control of a few men who think more in terms of earning interest than in terms of advancing human well being. As long as I am in this house and have breath to speak, Mr. Chairman, I will speak as I have spoken, urging the government to secure the cooperation of the opposition and to enlist the support of the Senate, appealing to the government to move forward to the control of currency and credit issue as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility in a constitutional democracy.

Mr. HAYHURST: I do not intend to make a lengthy speech, but I should like to refute some of the arguments on this subject that have been placed upon Hansard. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) that many of those who have studied the books of the orthodox economists fail to realize that this is a new day, that the law of to-day is "to change," and that, as Maynard Keynes has had occasion to change his mind and his economics, so have many other men and women of the past generation and so have many who are growing up in our present civilization; they are forced to change their minds because of our modern conditions. I believe that the views of Maynard Keynes are wrong in some respects. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) was wondering who would furnish work, and when, in reading the books of Maynard Keynes, I noted his opinion that the sole subject of our thinking, economically speaking, should be the provision of employment, I felt he had missed the crux of the present great change in the circumstances of our lives.

While I have plenty of material here I am not going to quote from any of it because I prefer to tell the committee of the experience I have passed through as a farmer. You, Mr. Chairman, as a farmer must know that our farmers to-day, with modern machinery, can produce thousands of bushels of any kind of grain where formerly they produced hundreds. The question is not now one of providing work; it is one arising from the great and plentiful production of a scientific age, and what we require is a financial system which will adapt itself to this new era of ample power and productive capacity. So, when Maynard Keynes said that work was the essential objective, he missed the point. Some people think that the group with which I am associated are decrying work. That is not so. I enjoy work, I enjoy life, and I know that the boys and girls of to-day who are going through our universities are looking to a better age in which they can use their intelligence and abilities to develop the future scientifically. The trouble to-day is that along with our scientific development we proceed to sabotage some of the finest of our machinery in order that we may remain in an age of scarcity. Yet the fact is evident that we are facing a new time, that the age of scarcity is behind us and the age of plenty is at hand—which is also, we believe, an age of social security. Therefore the crucial question is not a matter of work. I am sure Maynard Keynes would not assume that because he had eliminated employment in his home it would be necessary for him to build another home where he could keep all the servants at work just as they formerly were. Yet that is much the same as the suggestion that is heard from the Clydebank, in Great Britain: "Let us build another supership for our majestic commercial fleet, one that will supersede the Queen Mary." What is the idea behind that? Merely that of providing work, whether the supership will pay or not. That supership could be produced, because the machines are there and the men are there. So if it can be produced, why not produce it? The trouble is that progress is retarded by men of limited vision who read and believe the old economics instead of taking them with a grain of salt as we have been forced to do.

Conditions have forced us to realize that this new age has falsified much of the old economics. We do not decry skill in human endeavour; it represents wealth just as much as the farmer's wheat or the baker's bread. The economic difficulties of the present time are largely due to a lack of occupational opportunities for which our young men and young women have spent so much time in preparing themselves. Do you not think with me, Mr. Chairman, that it is a tragedy that they should have their hopes frustrated and their enthusiasm shattered because there is no work for them to do? We believe we must have a financial system which will pay our people whether they work or not. I know this may sound ridiculous. At the same time, in order to remove the spectre of poverty and starvation which confronts us, it is necessary to have a keener intelligence in respect of monetary matters to grasp the problems that are before us. Most of the suicides, due to the monetary troubles which afflict so many people, and to which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George referred, are due to what is essentially a lack of freedom from which individuals are suffering because they have not the tickets to purchase the necessary food and clothing they require.

I do not desire to weary the committee with an outline of our philosophy, but I hope it will be realized how different conditions are from those which prevailed when we were boys. Then the life in our communities was largely self-contained. We had the village blacksmith, the tailor, the shoemaker; these workers lived in small cottages, frequently with a few acres attached, and a cow and a few pigs to help them over periods of depression. To-day those classes of people are practically non-existent. There are hardly any blacksmiths in the villages; they have moved to the cities to work in factories, where they can produce goods more efficiently than they could under conditions of individual hand labour.

It is not necessary to go into this at length. I merely wish to appeal to your reason to recognize that we must change because the times have changed; we must reorganize the financial system because the times demand it. At the present time the financial system practically rules the affairs of government. We contend that the government should entirely rule the financial system, and so make credit available. That does not mean inflation; our system of social credit, which so many people sneer at, is that credit should be written in bank books in proportion to the amount of goods produced, and there would be a direct relation at all times between credit and currency and production. I feel that we must work together. Probably many hon. members feel that we in this corner are directly opposed to the present system. That is not so, except with regard to the control of finance. We are individualists. We believe that capitalism will still exist under our system, because individual initiative and skill are not going to be diminished or decreased. We are going to endeavour to increase them, by giving our young boys and girls greater opportunities for education, by permitting them to continue their courses at the universities in order to make themselves more efficient as producers in this new world of potential prosperity.

Someone asks: Who will furnish the work? Why, that is the trouble; there is not enough work to go around. If in western Canada we are producing ten times the quantity of wheat per man that we produced in our fathers' days, how can we expect to continue the old policy of work and wages as the old laissez-faire economists would have us do? When the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) spoke about his perpetual motion machine I thought he missed the point entirely. Our point is that debt is perpetual. We are living under a debt creating system and we believe that we should issue credit and currency in order to finance the productive capacity of mankind instead of building up a debt creating system by borrowing more money or lending out money at interest rates. We believe the government should take control of that money.

While I am speaking of interest rates there is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the government. Interest rates on mortgages in western Canada—and I know the same situation exists in eastern Canada, are entirely too high. The wages of money are out of all proportion to the wages of man. Too often have we heard the cry, "Give us this day our daily work." I think it is time we went back to the old prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread." The fact is that the wages of money in western Canada are entirely too high in proportion to the amount of work, or the lack of work, that is done by money. We agree that credit, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) said, rests upon our ability to produce, our character, our judgment, our reputation and so on. Personally I borrow money at the banks and I have no particular objection to the banking system as it has been conducted in the past. But the fact is that to-day we are facing a new age of such tremendous potential production that we must change our banking system entirely. So, if the government would accept our suggestion, we would make the government sovereign over the production of credit and currency.

I should like to know just what is the policy of this government as compared with the policy of the government it superseded. It is apparent to me, whether or not it is apparent to other hon. members, that money should not be a commodity, to be traded in and juggled in all world financial dealings for profit. I believe it should be for the convenience of production, and the government should control the entire production of credit and currency. Naturally we wish to raise the standard of living of our people, and we propose to do so by giving the people a dividend out of the surplus production. This dividend, at which so many people smile, is based upon the production of goods. We do not wish to create a class of lazy people who will not produce real wealth. A nation that will not produce real wealth naturally will deteriorate. We realize that the farmers of western Canada and the manufacturers of eastern Canada can produce far more real goods to-day than ever before in our history, and if we had the proper machinery we would naturally reduce the man power necessary to look after those machines. That is perfectly true in the west and I know it is also true in the factories. Some of the finest machines that have been developed in the last few years have been bought up by the financiers in order to remove them from the market, so that these new labour saving devices will not be used. That is strange to me. The other day I had a letter from my brother, who lives in Bradford, England. In the factory in which he was working they refused to instal an automatic machine to look after the weavers, because it would put fifty men out of work and the city of Bradford wondered what they would do with those men. That is a problem facing us, and we might as well put the cards on the table and stop sneering about these problems.

I recognize that my philosophy may not be the one which will bring about a solution of our problem. I am a humble student of economics, and if anyone can show me a better philosophy I am willing to accept it. I am sorry the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is not in the committee at the moment; I should like to get his pamphlet and read it over, and if there is anything worth while in it I shall certainly add it to my philosophy. I have read the books of Ricardo, Adam Smith, Mills and other great economists. They lived in a different age, and the financial system of that time was probably suited to that age, but those who have eyes to see realize that the power age in which we live to-day has revolutionized the productive capacity of mankind. If that is a fact, as we believe it is, why not accept it and abolish the slavery and drudgery that exist?

I can go to my own home town, in order to show what we are up against, without reading from books. This is an actual incident. Our city fathers thought it would be a wise plan to bring in a machine, a caterpillar tractor, with scoops behind an elevator and with fingers on the scoops, that would go through gravel and dig a ditch twelve feet deep for a new sewage system. That machine crawled along slowly, but it did a tremendous amount of work and only two men were required to look after it. Then the city fathers said, "What are we going to do? Shall we pay the poor people the dole or shall we give them work?" They decided on the work and wages policy, sent the machine back to Edmonton and put the poor people back in the ditch. So the next morning one could see these fellows digging deep in the ditch in the muck and mire, and they were asking me for suitable clothes because some were fairly well dressed, their shoes and clothing not being suitable for work in the ditch. That is the situation. Was it a wise move for that mayor and council to send the machine away and put those people at that work? Is that ennobling work? Is it the kind of thing to put these people at, improperly clothed, so that they would catch cold, or would it be better to use the machine? All over western Canada one can see tractors behind barbed wire fences; the farmers cannot use them because they have no money to buy gasoline, so they go back to horses, and many horses have been starved during the winter for want of proper attention and care. When we have gone forward in civilization we hate to go backward again. We hate to go back to the horse after having used the motor car and the tractor, and from the horse we hate to go back to the oxen. But if the aim is to produce less wheat we had better go back to the oxen and the single plough instead of the tractor with ten ploughs behind it.

The fact is that we are in a new age; we must realize that. Instead of giving these people the dole we must just give them a dividend. We suggest giving everyone a dividend, not to make fish of one and flesh of another. If one man happens to be receiving dividends to the extent of $50,000 and another man receiving nothing, we give them both dividends just the same. If the other likes to return the dividend to the state, well and good. We do not want to take away dividends from anyone; that is the beauty of these new economics. Even Maynard Keynes, after starting out to decry the old system of economics and proving our economics, at the end tries to go back to his policy of work and wages. That shows that although Maynard Keynes is writing for a group of professors, whereas I have spent most of my time toiling on the land, I can see his fallacies better than some of the professors because they in the universities are so far removed from real life. I am speaking this afternoon from real life, not from books. I could talk all night from these books that I have at hand; I have read all the books that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) referred to regarding Kitson and so on. I believe Kitson probably hit the nail on the head in regard to the gold standard when he said that gold is a symbol of hatred in the world. We believe that as a backing for money gold is a symbol of hatred. It is a begetter of war. If you sow hatred between nations because one grabs more than another, you are sowing war and will reap war. The people of Ontario and Quebec have not felt the depression to the full as others have, because they have so many gold mines in the northern part of those provinces, as we heard yesterday afternoon, and so much of their surplus labour goes to those mines. But is it wiser to produce gold from the ground; is it really a better commodity than wheat? Is it better that those who have invested largely in the gold mines of this country should receive such handsome rewards while those who have invested in land receive a poor pittance?

That is the story I have to tell the committee. I feel that the farmers are being enslaved to-day because they cannot pay the high rates of interest demanded by the mortgage companies of eastern Canada. In closing I should like again to say that I hope the Minister of Finance in his sound judgment makes the government sovereign over the control of credit and currency, and that credit and currency will be issued, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard suggested, in terms of public need. Of course that may be considered a very wide statement. We think that you must have a national credit account and issue currency against the amount of real wealth produced in this dominion. Then you would have something upon which to base your currency and there would be no inflation, as so many hon. members have suggested.

I am sorry for having spoken at such length; I intended to say only a few things to elucidate some of our philosophy. There is so much that might be said about it but I do not wish at this time to trespass further on the indulgence of the committee. Therefore I take my seat hoping that some of the things we have said from this corner will be heard with some degree of assurance that we have studied this subject. We feel that something along the lines which we are suggesting is the only solution. I have yet to hear of any better solution from any other part of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the word "registered" should be added in section 6, so that it reads "registered holder." It now reads:

(ii) four directors to be appointed by the holder of the class "B" shares . .

The words generally used throughout the act are "registered holder" as descriptive of a person who is a shareholder in the bank. The word "registered" should be added here if we are to maintain a certain measure of uniformity. Section 7 says, "the registered holder of ten class 'A' shares." "Registered holder" is the correct term from the drafting standpoint.

Mr. DUNNING: It would be "registered holder" of class "B" shares as well as of class "A"?

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. DUNNING: We shall have to go through it—

Mr. BENNETT: It is just a simple matter.

Mr. DUNNING: —so that the word "registered" may be inserted before the word "holder" wherever it appears in the whole section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I so move.

Mr. BENNETT: When the word "shareholder" is used you do not have to say "registered shareholder," but when you say "registered holder" in one place you should carry the term all the way through.

Mr. DUNNING: If we can get an amendment which will enable the correction to be made it can then be made as indicated.

Amendments agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Qualifications.

Mr. HEAPS: I believe the minister was to make some statement in regard to the method of electing directors. He said early in the proceedings that he would have some remarks to make in connection with the method of appointing directors from the private shareholders.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not remember the statement to which my hon. friend refers. Obviously by the amendment only one will be elected each year. My hon. friend will understand how much that simplifies the matter. Only one is to be elected, and so far as the representative character of the directors is concerned may I say that that matter will be largely in the hands of the government, through the provisions passed in section 6. I take it that the shareholders, like any other shareholders, will be free to elect whom they wish and that in its appointees the government must take care of the representative factor contemplated by the original act and still contemplated in the amendment.

Mr. HEAPS: I am speaking of the directors who would be elected by the private shareholders of the bank.

Mr. DUNNING: Only one each year.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister will recall that when the bill was before us on a previous occasion he made reference to the fact that the chamber of commerce had elected their slate, and he said that the change in the measure would obviate conditions of that kind recurring.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: I wonder whether the minister had anything in mind at the time he made that observation.

Mr. DUNNING: Only that the system we are here setting up involves that only one director is elected in each year, together with the fact that occupational and other aspects can and should be taken care of by the government in connection with its appointees. These shareholders will vote for a director in the same manner as would any other shareholders.

Mr. BENNETT: Except that there is a limitation as to their proxy.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; through the Minister of Finance they may vote by proxy. But there would be no necessity for a slate when only one is to be elected. It is quite obvious the problem disappears.

Mr. HEAPS: But the same propaganda as was carried on a couple of years ago could be duplicated, even only one director is appointed.

Mr. DUNNING: Anybody has a right to put out propaganda in favour of the election of a particular person.

Mr. BENNETT: Of any shareholder.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, of any shareholder.

Mr. KINLEY: That chamber of commerce angle is a bad one.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not expressing my views. The hon. member will see that the problem does not arise by reason of the change we have made in the section which has just passed the committee. If the organization to which the hon. member belongs wishes to do so, it may spread all the propaganda it desires among private shareholders in favour of the election of a particular man, because only one needs to be elected by the shareholders.

Mr. KINLEY: It will not work with one.

Mr. DUNNING: No, and that is my point.

Mr. HEAPS: One is to be elected by the dominion at large; is that right?

Mr. DUNNING: By all the private shareholders of the bank.

Mr. MacNICOL: Now that the opinion of the directors, or whatever they are called, who are to be elected by the ordinary rank and file of the people, is to be of so little value, in view of the fact that the government will totally dominate the board, may I ask the minister if in his opinion men of outstanding capacity in any class will offer their services on the board.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no doubt about it. To be a member of the board of the Bank of Canada will, doubtless, be esteemed a great honour by any individual selected. I have no doubt about that, at all.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there any limitation as to the persons who may be directors representing private shareholders?

Mr. DUNNING: The limitations are contained in the section now under consideration. Section 7 of the bill, which deals with section 10 of the act, states that such person is to be a registered holder of ten shares. The section is as follows:

> No person shall be elected or appointed, or shall continue to hold office as a director who—
> (a) is not a British subject ordinarily resident in Canada; or > (b) is employed in any capacity in the public service of Canada or of any province of Canada, or holds any office or position for which any salary or other remuneration is payable out of public moneys; or > (c) has reached the age of seventy-five years.

There is provision for removal from office in case of incapacity. That is the provision in the original act, and it is carried forward into this bill. I omitted to say that such person shall not be a shareholder in a chartered bank.

Mr. STIRLING: With reference to the choice of the one director who is to be elected by the shareholders, did I understand the minister to say that the government would have a say in such selection?

Mr. DUNNING: No, except in so far as private shareholders may send their proxies to the Minister of Finance, as is provided in the original act.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that a few days ago the minister was unfair in his description of the election of directors of the bank. The chamber of commerce might not properly have done what they did, but they carried on a propaganda which any one could carry on and which, in fact, others did carry on. The only point was that they put forward a whole slate, rather than concentrate on one person. The minister described it as a fiasco; I heard him say it.

Mr. DUNNING: Not as a fiasco.

Mr. BENNETT: I never heard of a corporation which had eleven or twelve thousand shareholders expressing its will to the extent it was expressed by the shareholders of the bank in connection with the selection of directors; I never have known it done in this country. Usually a few men have proxies covering the whole matter, and it is just a matter of form. The chamber of commerce took the position of issuing propaganda, and carried it on to an extent which I think was most undesirable. It is needless to say that the government was not a party to it, in any sense. But who could prevent the chamber of commerce doing this? Who could prevent their issuing propaganda? But when you remember that eleven thousand people voted—possibly the deputy minister could give the correct number—

Mr. DUNNING: It is twelve thousand.

Mr. BENNETT: When you consider that that number voted, you realize it is an extraordinary thing to describe as a fiasco. I thought it was a strong statement.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend is correct; I did use the word "fiasco," when I referred to the fiasco which took place at the time of the first election of directors. However I did not intend to cast any reflection upon the right of any party to organize such propaganda, and I cast no reflection upon the methods of the chamber of commerce. So far as I am concerned, that is all past.

Mr. HANSELL: Can the minister throw any light on the term "diversified occupations" as it appears in subsection 2?

Mr. BENNETT: That was the whole point of the election.

Mr. HANSELL: I recognize that any director must have some knowledge of finance and banking. I wonder whether the thought in the minister's mind was that the directors would bring to the board some knowledge of industries, as well.

Mr. DUNNING: Those words appear in the original act, and they are not being changed. The intent at the time the measure was enacted was that stated by the hon. member, namely that the various broad divisions of industry might have a voice on the board of the bank. Certainly it is the intention of the government that that shall be done.

Mr. BENNETT: One was an agriculturist from western Canada; as a matter of fact, if I am correctly informed, he was a rancher.

Mr. DUNNING: A farmer-rancher.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and the other interests were represented. The hon. member is not aware of the fact, apparently, that the first election proceeded on the principle that men of diversified occupations and interests should be represented. I am sure the minister could indicate the interests represented.

Mr. DUNNING: The designations shown here—I do not know how they were arrived at, I suppose they were stated by the candidates themselves—are, representing primary industry, Mr. Wright, who has been referred to as a western farmer and rancher; Mr. Bradshaw, "other occupations."

Mr. HEAPS: What is he? Is he in other occupations?

Mr. DUNNING: I merely give the designation here stated. Mr. Bradshaw represents "other occupations" than primary or manufacturing industry; Mr. Black, of Hamilton, manufacturing industry; Mr. McKean, of Halifax, primary industry—he is a lumberman; Mr. Magor, manufacturing; Mr. Beaubien, of Montreal, and Mr. Woodward, of Vancouver, are stated to represent "other occupations" than primary or manufacturing industry. I can follow now the designations. Primary industry apparently has two representatives, one lumberman, and one farmer and rancher; manufacturing has two representatives, and "other occupations" have three representatives on the present board.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the minister state that in any real sense these men are representatives of these industries? They are engaged in these industries; that is all that can be said. It was a slate that was put over by the chamber of commerce.

Mr. DUNNING: That has been discussed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But the minister still persists in saying that they represent these industries.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not saying anything about them. I was simply answering a question and stating the designations given by these people themselves.

Mr. HEAPS: These people were all elected; the chamber of commerce undertook to try to influence the shareholders of the bank to elect this slate, and they succeeded. That is all there was to it.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend is going to make any extended remarks, perhaps he will permit me to say there is a desire to report progress in order that there may be an opportunity to present a report of a committee before six o'clock.

Mr. HEAPS: I shall not be a minute. A shareholder or director of a chartered bank is not entitled to become a director under the new set-up.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: He never was.

Mr. HEAPS: The old act provided the same thing, but is there much difference between them and men who have large financial holdings in other financial institutions, like Mr. Bradshaw, for instance? I give that as a concrete example, although I do not like to mention names. It seems to me there is really not very much difference between the position of a man who may be a shareholder in a bank and that of a man holding a large interest in other financial institutions. It is practically the same thing.

Progress reported.

PENSIONS AND SOLDIERS' PROBLEMS

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I would move, with the consent of the house, that we revert to the order for motions, so that the Minister of Pensions and National Health may present a report from the committee on pensions and soldiers' problems.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) presented the third report, also the fourth and final report, of the special committee on pensions and returned soldiers' problems, together with a copy of the minutes of proceedings.

He said: I should like to give notice that I shall move concurrence in the final report of the committee on Friday next, if this will serve as a notice of motion. The report will be printed in the votes and proceedings.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 5.58 p.m.

Thursday, June 11, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Fourth report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. McPhee.

Fourth and final report of the special committee on elections and franchise acts—Mr. Bothwell.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald) presented the third report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in two of the reports that have been presented reference is made to the printing of certain documents. My memory is that some years ago the house provided for a special committee to consider what documents should be printed in the journals of the house, and as these recommendations contravene the provisions of that standing rule I suggest that some little consideration be given the matter before action is taken. At times every committee has the idea that it is highly desirable that the result of its deliberations should be printed, though I am bound to say that on careful consideration it does not always follow that an independent body reviewing those results would hold the same opinion. It was because of the vast expenditure that occurred in times past that the provision to which I refer was made. Under the circumstances I think it might be well that all these matters should stand before concurrence is asked, so that they may appear upon the order paper to-morrow and it may be clear just what is involved.

Motion stands.

WHEAT AND OTHER GRAINS

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) presented the second, final and unanimous report of the special committee appointed to investigate and report upon the marketing of wheat and other grains and upon all matters pertaining thereto, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The report was not read, and I think the motion should stand.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS, (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, the report was not read. Personally I have not the faintest idea as to what is in it, and it seems to me at least we should have the ordinary rule carried out and the report read before we are asked to concur in it.

Mr. EULER: I quite appreciate the justice of the remarks of my hon. friends. In explanation I might say that the report was unanimous; there was no dissent by any member of the committee. I took it for granted that the report would be read when it was presented to the house, but some hon. members asked that it be taken as read. In the circumstances I am quite prepared to let the motion stand and move concurrence tomorrow.

Motion stands.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 96, to amend the criminal code.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to amend twenty-two sections of the criminal code. Ten of the amendments relate to crimes and offences in a general way, and the other twelve relate to procedure.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 97, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

He said: When the Combines Investigation Act was amended at the last session of parliament it was provided that not only evidence given orally but also any documents produced in a preliminary investigation might not be used in subsequent criminal proceedings. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to restore the act in this particular to what it was prior to the amendment of last year, so that documents which are produced in the course of an investigation will not be exempted from use in criminal proceedings.

There is one other minor amendment, the substitution of the word "or" for "and" in reference to the penalty. In the act as it now stands the clause reads "fine and imprisonment," which is clearly an error.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TORONTO POST OFFICE

WAGE RATES FOR PART TIME WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott). I have received complaints in connection with the Toronto post office, some of them from men who formerly worked full time there—married men, some of them soldiers, some with families, getting only $5, $6, $8 and $10 a week. Would the hon. gentleman please look into these complaints? I have sent him a letter and I will send him some more.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): My hon. friend was good enough to intimate to me that he intended to ask this question. The number of men employed on part time work, to whom he refers, depends of course upon the volume of mail at the peak load. That is usually about five o'clock in the afternoon, and it lasts for varying periods, according to the volume each day, from perhaps two to three hours. They are paid forty-five cents an hour for whatever time they work. They are appointed by the civil service commission, and returned soldiers have the preference.

BANK OF CANADA

MAJORITY CONTROL BY GOVERNMENT OF CAPITAL STOCK AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 10, consideration in committee of Bill No. 82, to amend the Bank of Canada Act—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on clause 8.

Sections 8 and 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Capital.

Mr. BENNETT: What knowledge has the government or the minister as to the ability of the bank to employ advantageously this additional capital? Obviously it is not asked for by the bank; it is unnecessary for it to have the additional capital to carry on its business. The general view was that the government proposed, in the light of the statements made by the Prime Minister when in opposition, and by others, to acquire the outstanding capital stock of the bank, $5,000,000. This creation of an additional $5,100,000 doubles the capital of the bank. There has been no suggestion that there was any shortage of the capital necessary to enable the bank to carry on its business.

I should like to ask the minister on what basis he found it desirable to increase the capital of this institution in order to attain the ends he has in view. I cannot but think that the general conception of what was meant by the statements made was that the bank's capital of $5,000,000 was to be taken over by the crown. Of course many people believed that the bank was to be a publicly operated institution, run as a department of government, and would be available for the discount of bills and for public credit for all those who desired to do business with it. That is the conception which many people formed, in opposition to the views expressed by ourselves at that time. The important thing is, on what basis does the government suggest that it was desirable to have another $5,100,000 capital for this institution?

Mr. DUNNING: The answer is very simple. To justify control by the government majority, and the appointment by the government of the majority of the board of directors, it was deemed desirable that a majority of the capital stock should be acquired by the government.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will at once admit that it is competent for the bill to provide that out of the seven directors to be elected four shall be named by the government, and that the shareholders elect only three. There was never any difficulty about that. For instance it is provided at the moment that the Deputy Minister of Finance shall sit on the board but not vote; the governor is not a director, neither is the deputy governor, but he becomes a member of the board. There never has been any difficulty with respect to this parliament by appropriate action providing that the governor in council may appoint four directors out of the seven. It was not necessary to increase the capital stock to accomplish that end. The power of parliament to take that action is unquestioned, and is best evidenced by the fact that the governor and deputy governor are members of the board but not directors of the bank. All that is necessary is to provide that four persons be named by the government to be directors of the institution. To double the capital stock and add $100,000 more to accomplish that strikes me as a very strange anomaly, because it is provided that these same people, holding $5,100,000 worth of stock, cannot vote at shareholders' meetings for the election of directors. The capital stock is now $10,100,000 and only $5,000,000 can vote to elect directors. The other $5,100,000 must remain silent and not vote, because the government proposes to appoint four directors with eight votes. If that is not putting the cart before the horse, I cannot understand the ordinary significance of a transaction of this kind. Here it is provided that you double the capital of the bank and then add another $100,000, and the minister says that doing that will give the government control of the directors. The government does not propose to acquire the outstanding capital stock, as they have a right to do, in the same way as they would acquire a piece of land or any other commodity they might wish to possess—either by appropriation proceedings, by arbitrations or by reference to the exchequer court to fix the value and take them over. No; to accomplish the desired end the government has said: "We are going to increase the capital stock by doubling it and adding $100,000 more to it, and then we will not give them a vote." These four directors need not be men who possess the qualifications of holders of class "A" shares; they are merely named without any powers, and the government has no power to participate in the election of the three that are to be elected. I must confess I do not understand it.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a consequential amendment which I shall ask the Prime Minister to move. My right hon. friend has suggested the word "registered" should precede the word "holder." That becomes necessary in this section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move:

That section 10 of the bill be amended by inserting the word "registered" before the word "holder" at line 10 on page 5 of the bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: There is another question I should like to ask, since I succeeded in getting no answer to the last one. What effect will this have upon the dividends on class "A" shares? The section states:

The class "B" shares issued to the minister hereunder shall carry with them the same rights and obligations as class "A" shares of the capital of the bank, except that the holder thereof shall not be entitled to vote at the election of directors.

That is the class of share that is to be issued to the crown. It has no voting power, but it has all the rights and other obligations of shareholders. What they are I should like to know. The next question is: What effect is it contemplated those will have upon the dividend policy of the institution with respect to class "A" shares, and will "A" shares and "B" shares both be entitled to receive, as I assume they will, the four and a half per cent dividend? Will the use of this additional capital, the $5,100,000, in any sense, in view of the knowledge the government must possess in the matter, affect the dividend payments on the "A" shares?

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to dividends, my right hon. friend is correct when he says that the "B" shares and "A" shares will rank alike. As far as my knowledge and information goes, the expectation of the "A" shares in regard to dividend will not be impaired by what is done here.

Mr. HEAPS: How will this capital be raised?

Mr. DUNNING: It will be part of our general financial operations to raise money and to invest it in this manner.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the government borrow the money to buy these shares?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, when a condition of deficit exists the government must borrow money for any expenditures in excess of its revenues, and of course this is an expenditure. I would point out to my hon. friend, however, that in connection with this matter, viewed purely as an investment, the rate of interest payable upon the shares is a little greater than the present cost of money to the federal government.

Mr. HEAPS: Would it not be as well if the government made a bookkeeping entry? Would it not be the same thing?

Mr. DUNNING: Probably my hon. friend is a more expert bookkeeper than I am.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not a bookkeeper at all.

Mr. DUNNING: I could not do it just in that way. That is the only answer I can make.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it not a fact that in this transaction the government are going to obtain majority control of the shares of the Bank of Canada? It would be interesting to know how this money by which they are going to obtain majority control will be raised. The government has a right to create money, and I think in this particular matter the logical procedure on the part of the government would be to buy out the existing shareholders. Evidently they have not thought fit to do that. They want a bank partly privately and partly publicly owned. All I am trying to ascertain is by what method the government will raise the money to obtain control of the Bank of Canada, which at present they do not possess.

Mr. DUNNING: There is in Canada what is known as the consolidated revenue fund, which, by law, represents all the money going into the treasury, from whatever source. In this instance we have an investment which will yield a certain return. The provision at page 5 of the bill indicates that the minister may pay for the shares acquired out of the consolidated revenue fund. That increases the dominion's investment account by that amount of money. It is not merely a bookkeeping entry; it is an investment, and one which will yield more than or at least as much as the money costs. I cannot tell my hon. friend precisely what will be the cost of any particular sum of money out of the consolidated revenue fund. I cannot do that, because the borrowing operations of the government cover a great variety of requirements at a great variety of periods. At the present time, for instance, there are outstanding something like $120,000,000 of three months treasury bills, in respect of which the effective rate is below one per cent per annum, but there are also outstanding issues of securities with varying terms. If my hon. friend were to ask me what rate I would be paying and what terms I would be offering two or three months from now I could not tell him; I would have to endeavour to make the best possible arrangement under the financial conditions then prevailing, which might be more favourable to short term and less favourable to long term, or the reverse of that. Matters of this kind require continuous close attention, study and determination in the light of circumstances prevailing at the time money is secured to replenish the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. HEAPS: Then, is it the intention of the minister to borrow money to obtain this $5,100,000 worth of shares in the Bank of Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: At the moment I can answer my hon. friend in this way: We do not require to.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, no answer such as that can be regarded as satisfactory.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry if it cannot. I have answered it to the best of my knowledge. My right hon. friend might probably do better; he may try.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say the irritability of the minister does not enhance his reputation or assist in the passage of his bill.

Mr. DUNNING: No?

Mr. BENNETT: We have a right to ask certain questions with respect to the matter.

Mr. DUNNING: But you are not a schoolmaster.

Mr. BENNETT: No, probably not. If the Minister of Finance thinks that is a clever observation—

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think it is clever.

Mr. BENNETT: —he is quite welcome to receive any benefit he wishes to receive from it. I can only say to him that his answer is not adequate; that is all. I propose to ask him further questions upon it.

Mr. DUNNING: That is quite all right.

Mr. BENNETT: As I have a right to do.

Mr. DUNNING: Absolutely.

Mr. BENNETT: His irritability will not assist him in passing his bill, and neither will his cheap observations of the character to which I have just listened.

Mr. DUNNING: Nor your schoolmaster tactics.

Mr. BENNETT: I am addressing the Chair. There are no such tactics as those assumed by the minister. I am desirous of obtaining information, and that information I propose to get. Here is a bank created by the parliament of Canada, with a capital of $5,000,000. It pays 4½ per cent on that investment. Its capital is being doubled now, without any request from the bank or suggestion that it found itself short of capital, and the minister said that the reason for it was the desire to obtain control for the government of the institution. Instead of proceeding to expropriate the shares, as he has the right to do, and as normally would be done, by taking the proper steps to expropriate $5,000,000 of shares, and have their value fixed by the exchequer court or by arbitration, the minister increased the capital of the bank by $5,100,000, making the total capital $10,100,000, and the statute says that the money necessary to pay for them shall be paid out of consolidated revenue. It does not leave it a question of option, but says they "shall" be paid for out of the consolidated revenue fund. We know from the statement made by the finance minister on the budget that this country has made no provision for that payment. Therefore the money must be borrowed, and the very proper question was asked, whether or not it would be borrowed. To that question the minister replied that if we had to pay it now we would not have to borrow, which means that there is $5,000,000 in the treasury that might be used for that purpose. That was no answer to the question. The question was, will this money have to be borrowed? The minister clothed his answer in many words, as to its being an investment. It is an investment in the bank, and according to the statement made by the minister on the budget—and certainly the revenues of the country so far as customs are concerned have not increased beyond his expectations—the money will have to be borrowed.

The point I was endeavouring to make was why we should proceed by this method to risk our ability to pay what we promised to pay with respect to the "A" class of shares, by doubling the capital and borrowing the money, and running the risk of leaving in the hands of the bank, not in the hands of the government, an investment of $10,000,000 upon which 4½ per cent interest is to be paid. What we really have done by this bill is to provide for borrowing $5,100,000 of money, and handing it over to the bank to invest in such a way as we hope will bring us a net return of 4½ per cent. That is the situation as far as I can see it. That may be the tactics of a schoolmaster, as the minister says, but I am endeavouring to be enlightened, and I would like to have some further information on that point. I never have been able since I saw the bill to understand why any government found it necessary to double the capital of the bank for the purpose of being able to name four directors with two votes each. The only thing that need be done is to expropriate the $5,000,000 of shares outstanding. That was even discussed in this chamber on one occasion; the now Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) made some references to that method when discussing the report that came from the banking committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I moved an amendment in committee to that effect.

Mr. BENNETT: That is my memory of it, but I have not turned it up during the present debate, and therefore I speak only in general terms. The fact is that what we have done by this bill is to place in the hands of the Bank of Canada $10,000,000 instead of $5,000,000, upon which we are to pay 4½ per cent interest, and we are to borrow $5,000,000 of that additional capital, instead of taking the ordinary precaution that would be taken by business men of expropriating the shares as they would in the case of land or any other property they might desire.

When the present Minister of Finance was Minister of Railways, or perhaps he was then Minister of Finance, he filed a plan that expropriated to the crown large properties in the city of Montreal. The same steps by appropriate legislation could be taken here, and the government could even have named four directors without any expropriation proceedings at all. Therefore I find it difficult to understand the necessity of doubling the capital, on the one hand, and of borrowing, as we must if the budget expectations are realized, the money for the purpose of enabling the bank to have an additional $5,000,000 to invest—because that additional amount is not required for the purposes of the bank—and, on the other hand, the necessity of maintaining the payment of a dividend of 4½ per cent on the entire $10,000,000, when if additional money were required by the bank for temporary purposes it could be borrowed for less than one per cent, according to the statement just made by the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, if I am clear as to the question—and I am not precisely clear—it is why the government did not proceed by way of expropriation of the existing shares; and that question was related to the other one, how would the money be raised? If the government had proceeded by way of expropriation of the existing shares, obviously money would be required for that purpose, and so I think that disposes of the question between those two methods.

With respect to the other point, the government believed that ownership normally in this country is represented by authority and control, and that it would be fairer to everybody concerned for the government to be an investor along with the other investors if it proposed to take control of the institution. That is to say, the government takes control of the institution not by force majeure but by an actual investment by the country in excess of the investment of private investors, thus justifying the government in assuming complete control of the institution by majority control and ownership.

Mr. QUELCH: This bill will give the government greater control over the bank's policy, and therefore when we vote on this bill we will be voting on the question whether we are in favour of the government being given greater control. In view of that fact, could the minister tell us briefly what the policy of the government will be in the matter, whether it will differ materially from the present policy, and if so in what way?

Mr. DUNNING: I think I attempted, Mr. Chairman, in the address I made on the resolution preceding the bill to outline the factors which enter into considerations such as those now expressed by my hon. friend. I can tell him quite frankly that in justice to the great interests of the people which must be served in this matter I should be doing them a disservice if to-day I indicated to this House of Commons what the present policy of the bank is with respect to its day to day transactions. I should be doing those great interests a disservice if I indicated what the policy of the government would be in connection with the major policies of the bank. If, for instance, just as an illustration, I indicated that it was the policy of the government, and therefore the policy of the bank, steadily to expand the volume of currency and credit, such statement by me from this place would be taken by everyone as an invitation to speculate in commodities and stocks because there would be the maximum possible assurance of a rising price level, depending upon the extent to which that policy was followed. There must be from day to day, from week to week and from month to month, by the experts in the employ of the bank, by the executive board of the bank, and particularly by the governor and deputy governor, and communicated to the Minister of Finance from time to time in order that he may be informed, continuous study of all the factors that have to do with the economics of this country in so far as they can be affected by monetary policy. I am not one of those who believe that monetary policy is the only factor in the economic welfare of the people. Many tend to exaggerate its importance, but at the same time I do not want to minimize its importance. When we have, as we have in Canada to-day, a managed currency, managed by the Bank of Canada, which obviously becomes a definite instrument of government policy, that materially increases the responsibility with regard to a declaration of policy. I can say in broad terms that I should regard a policy of deflation as utterly out of the question under the conditions which prevail to-day, but as to the extent to which any policy opposed to deflation may be applied, it must be a question of continuous study of all the factors entering into the problem on the part of those who are trained to assess their value and their effect, along with other factors, upon the economic life of the nation. I do not think I should be asked to go further than that in this matter.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was going to raise another point. Do I understand that any other powers than are to be found in clause 13 of this bill amending the principal act are conferred anywhere in this bill? If so—

Mr. DUNNING: What section?

Mr. COLDWELL: Section 13.

Mr. DUNNING: We are not there yet.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, but that point was raised. The question of power and policy was brought up and I could find nothing in the act other than this section dealing with the powers or policy of the bank. Consequently—

Mr. DUNNING: Has my hon. friend read, not the amending bill, but the act itself?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, I have; but we are discussing new policies. Is there anything giving the bank a wider policy now—anything wider than is to be found in the old act?

Mr. DUNNING: Not with regard to the matters about which the hon. gentleman was asking.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the answer made by the minister, I have only to point out that it was not necessary even to expropriate the $5,000,000, because $3,000,000 would have secured control of the bank—sixty per cent. The statement made by the minister that we in this country have a conception of ownership such as he has indicated does not apply to myself. But again, I may be entirely wrong. If anyone should tell me that the right of ownership to a share of stock in a joint stock company was such as the minister has suggested, then he would have to overrule several decisions of the courts of this country. Minorities have rights in joint stock companies, and no majority holder of shares, whoever he may be, even the crown itself, can exercise his rights in such a way as to impair the rights of the minority. The decisions of the courts are clear on that point, so long as they act within the sphere of their rights. All that was necessary was to expropriate fifty-one per cent, or, as I suggest, sixty per cent of the $5,000,000 of shares, representing $3,000,000, and a single section would have given the government the right to acquire by expropriation or negotiation, at a price that might be agreed upon, the sixty per cent of shares in the concern. And having acquired them they would then have the power to elect the four of the directors. But, as brutally put by the minister, the ownership of an interest in a joint stock company being of the type that he has indicated, I think there is some question about it. But once more, that may be merely the schoolmaster's view and not that of one who has knowledge of the subject.

Mr. DUNNING: It is the lawyer talking now.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is one who is trying to lecture the minister and who is performing the functions of the schoolmaster—perhaps that is the minister's belief. I have not been able however, nor am I yet able, notwithstanding the explanation given, to understand why the doubling of the shares of this bank was done in that way, when we know that $5,000,000 is not necessary for any purpose of the bank; and the minister has declared the reason why it was done. What I have never been able to understand, since the minister made his statement when he introduced the bill, is why the acquisition of sixty per cent of the shares of the bank would not have served the purpose. To assert the holders of shares in the bank had a misconception or a misunderstanding of their position is entirely beside the question. They all knew that they had made an investment that would give a four and a half per cent return, and they knew that the bank was under the control of the government, indirectly and not directly. What is changed is the method or form by which that control is being effected; and to increase these shares by borrowing an additional $5,100,000 to put in the hands of the bank to endeavour to secure the whole $10,000,000 at four and a half per cent, when money can be borrowed at as low as less than one per cent—that is, short term money, treasury bills—is something that I have never been able to understand. The minister's statement is that this is the policy of the government, and that has always been a complete answer, to say that it is what the government wishes to do.

Mr. GRAY: They were forewarned.

Mr. BENNETT: Forewarned?

Mr. GRAY: Yes, by the present government when in opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has now strengthened the argument I was making. The existing shareholders were forewarned that their shares might be taken away by expropriation. But that is not what the government did, and that is exactly the point. As the Minister of National Defence has said, he moved an amendment that indicated what the opposition's views were, and as the hon. member (Mr. Gray) now says, they were forewarned that their shares might be expropriated. That made a good case for expropriation and destroys the case now made for borrowing an additional $5,000,000 to hand to the bank for the purpose of investment, when it is admitted that the bank does not require additional capital to carry on its functions.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Transfer or disposal of shares carried in excess of fifty or by person ineligible.

Mr. BENNETT: The only change is the use of the words "class A"?

Mr. DUNNING: It is consequential, entirely.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Commencement of business.

Mr. DUNNING: This is no longer required.

Mr. BENNETT: Once more I find it difficult to understand why this provision should be taken out of the act. The act was to provide for the incorporation of a bank, and this is one of the most important sections of all, because it provided that the bank should come into being whenever the capital stock had been subscribed and payment made. That has happened now, but the section is being taken out of the act. Speaking once more as schoolmaster, I find it extremely difficult to understand why, after you have passed an act that incorporates a bank, you take from it the section that has to do with its right to carry on. It has never been done at all at any time.

Mr. GRAY: It is an entity now; it has been created.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but when you look at the statute hereafter you will find that there is nothing left to show that that was done.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 20, which is being repealed, reads:

(1) Whenever the capital stock of the bank has been subscribed and payment in money made to the amount of twelve dollars and fifty cents per share, or such larger amount as the minister determines, the minister, when authorized by the governor in council, may issue a certificate authorizing the bank to commence business on a date to be fixed therein.

(2) The bank shall not issue notes or otherwise engage in business until the date fixed in such certificate except to do what is necessary or advisable to enable it to commence business on the said date.

What we did was to take a number of the officials and make them provisional directors, and they carried out all the antecedent prerequisites of a corporate organization to enable the bank to function; and this section is one of the conditions prerequisite to its functioning. Now it is being taken out of the statute so that when you refer to the consolidation of the Bank of Canada Act you will find this section gone and no section providing in any way for what is in that section provided for. It is always customary to leave in a statute everything that has to do with the organization of an institution. If anyone other than I were saying this, it would be regarded almost as an axiom that you would never do such a thing. However, I am not endeavouring to lecture the minister with respect to it; if I were to use the harsh word that is in my mind with respect to it, it would but do justice to the occasion. It is almost absurd to think that this section should be taken out—absurd, that is, to any practising lawyer.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my right hon. friend like me to tell him why it was taken out?

Mr. BENNETT: I should be glad to hear the explanation.

Mr. DUNNING: As a matter of fact no question of policy at all is involved in the repeal of the section. The lawyers of the Department of Justice indicated to the Department of Finance that the section was no longer necessary, and for that reason it is being removed. They did suggest, and we have already passed a provision back on page 2 of the bill, that "The bank is and shall continue to be a body politic and corporate." The advice I have from the legal advisers, to whom I must listen, is that that section is no longer required. My right hon. friend may be right, but when I come to a bill amending another act and have advice from the law officers of the crown that a section of the original act is entirely unnecessary, I follow that advice. That is the reason and the only reason why it is taken out.

Mr. BENNETT: There is just one question that my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has put to me. What authority is there in this act to carry on business at all?

Mr. DUNNING: "The bank is and shall continue to be a body politic and corporate."

Mr. BENNETT: That does not answer the question.

Mr. DUNNING: And the remaining powers of the bank are stated in various sections.

Mr. WHITE: What harm will be done by leaving section 20 in the act?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not wish to get into a legal argument. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is my legal adviser; he can handle it.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the section carried?

Mr. BENNETT: I protest against this being repealed.

Mr. WHITE: Why not leave it in? No harm will be done.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no harm in it any way.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Exchange.

Mr. STEVENS: I have been waiting patiently until we should come to section 13, which is, if I may use the expression, the operative clause of the act. I have not been very much concerned about the change in the set-up of the bank, for the very simple reason that the directorate, whether it consists of seven or fifteen or any other number, amounts to very little because no action of the directors can override the decision and the will of the governor or, in his absence, the deputy governor; and that is virtually the situation. I mention that because I was not much concerned about this discussion as to the change in the set-up of the bank. I do not think very much change has been made, except in form. What does concern me was contained in a question asked a few moments ago by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), regarding the matter of policy. The minister replied that in his opinion it would be inimical to the best interests of the bank and the country for him to enlarge in a statement on what the policy of the government or of the newly government-controlled organization, the Bank of Canada, would be.

I asked the minister when we were on the resolution—I think, in ample time—if on the second reading of the bill he would be prepared to make a statement with respect to that matter. No statement was made on the second reading, and no discussion at all occurred. Now, while I respect the delicacy of the situation, and, perhaps, the difficulty the minister finds himself in, I submit to him and to the committee that if we are sincere in what we are doing to give effect to what was said regarding this matter in the speech from the throne, and if we are to have confidence in the declarations of members of the government, including the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, who have spoken on this matter, we must recognize that the government is taking new and definite control of this bank. That is the only excuse for the presence of the bill. I still question the adequacy, shall I say, of the method, but that has been adopted by a majority of the house, and I bow to the will of the majority. If therefore the government is stepping into this picture in a new way, exercising what it claims to be adequate authority, and, as the speech from the throne says, taking effective control of the bank, I submit the committee is certainly entitled to a larger measure of confidence from the government as to its intentions in the future. In his reply to the hon. member for Acadia the minister used an adjective with which I agree; he said he would not make any statement regarding the "day to day" operations of the bank. It would be ridiculous to suggest that the minister or any officer of the bank or other person should make a public statement as to the detailed or day to day routine operations of the bank. Now on the question of broad policy—

Mr. DUNNING: What phase of it?

Mr. STEVENS: That is the object of my remarks, though perhaps it will take a few paragraphs to state it; as to the broad policy of the bank I think the committee is entitled to a greater measure of confidence from the government.

In order that I may not be considered presumptuous in making the suggestion I shall read a few extracts from the speech of the governor at the first annual meeting, on February 25, 1936, of the shareholders of the Bank of Canada. I pause to make the statement that the country and the bank are fortunate in having as governor and deputy governor of the bank two gentlemen who without question are clothed with ability and experience quite adequate for the positions they hold, and it is my opinion that during the time the bank has been in operation, within the limits of their powers, and, I might add, the policy behind the bank's operations, these gentlemen have discharged their duties in a manner commendable to themselves and commensurate with the task they undertook. Further, the bank has been in operation only a little more than a year, so that I am not expecting to see any very startling results up to the present. I think the experience we have had indicates that the central bank in its initial stages has been reasonably satisfactory, but I also believe, as the government, too, must have in mind, that we have now come to a stage in the development of the central bank where a larger measure of public interest in the institution should obtain. It is upon that assumption that I proceed with my remarks, and quote from the address of the governor. I hope the minister will note the language, in view of the fact that we are requesting him to give us some information as to the government's attitude and policy. The governor says:

> A policy of cheap and abundant money is the orthodox contribution of a banking system toward recovery from a depression.

That is a very singular statement. We are still in a depression. Unemployment is still rampant throughout the country. We are still confronted with many problems—fundamental problems, in my opinion—regarding the causes of the depression, and I submit we have not yet directed sufficient attention to the removal of those fundamental causes. So that when the governor of the Bank of Canada makes a statement of that kind, parliament at least should take more than ordinary notice of it. I repeat it:

A policy of cheap and abundant money is the orthodox contribution of a banking system towards recovery from a depression. Such a policy undoubtedly contributes, firstly, to a relaxation of the pressure to liquidate and, secondly, to a recovery of business and to the reestablishment of government finances, which are sure to be adversely affected at such times through relief expenditures and other unavoidable commitments; but if the policy is pursued too far the situation may become unmanageable when a revival develops.

Without indulging for the moment in any speculation as to what should be done or to what extent the government should use the resources and services of the bank in a contribution towards recovery from the depression, I cite this paragraph as indicative of what must have been in the mind of the governor of the bank, and it is more or less a challenge at this time for a statement by the government of the country, which is now assuming control of the bank, as to what is its attitude. I know of no place, Mr. Chairman, where this should be stated other than in this house; this is the place.

Mr. DUNNING: I thought I said it a few minutes ago.

Mr. STEVENS: While I recognize that the minister feels he is in a delicate position, that delicate position cannot excuse him from taking the house into his confidence to the fullest extent possible, if necessary even to the point of having a private session of the house, which has been done under conditions not more serious than those obtaining in Canada at the present time. Since I have been a member of the house we have had on at least two occasions, I think, secret sessions. I am not suggesting that this should be done; I am prepared to have any discussion of this kind wide open, but I do say the minister cannot shield himself behind the statement that if he were to make any declaration on the subject it might prejudice the interests of the bank or of the country.

That is one statement I wish to direct to his attention. Then on the next page the governor makes a further statement, referring to advisory functions. I pause at this point to suggest that apparently the governor considered his duties largely advisory, but it must be remembered that this assumption was based upon the act as it was originally passed and the bank as it was originally organized. According to the speech from the throne and the declarations of the Prime Minister, however, we are making a change in that situation, and the government now is to control the bank. In other words all the statements made by members of the government during the election campaign and in their criticisms of the original act two years ago, as well as the inference contained in the speech from the throne, indicate that they were not satisfied with the organization as it was originally introduced. Therefore I am justified in assuming that while the governor may have taken the position that his chief function was an advisory one in his relation to the government, if we are to be logical something must be added to this advisory function now. In that respect the governor has this to say:

Nevertheless, we have every inducement to be impartial. Advice must often, perhaps usually, be the chief form of assistance which we can render to the governments of Canada, inasmuch as our necessary concern for the cash basis does not permit us to make large advances of a kind which we cannot offset if that policy were requisite. It should not be inferred, however, that we are unable to furnish temporary accommodation at appropriate times.

The suggestion that occurs to me, from the language I have just quoted, is that under the old organization the governor of the bank considered that it was his duty to be extremely careful as to the extent he might go in regard to advances to the government or, as he says, in furnishing temporary accommodation; that he must be restricted because under the old set-up he conceived his duty to be largely of an advisory character.

Now I turn to another more practical and to my mind very much more vital part of the address, which I think is peculiarly appropriate to this particular section. Before I read it I will invite the committee to observe that section 13 amends the original provision that gave the bank power to do certain things, or in other words very largely defined the functions of the bank. I am not going into a detailed analysis of those functions; I merely invite the committee to consider the facts as they are outlined in that section. It will serve my purpose to cite just a few of these clauses. Paragraph (d) indicates that the bank may buy and sell securities issued or guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada, and now an amendment has been introduced changing the former limitation.

Mr. DUNNING: Expanding it.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, amending it and expanding it. Under the amendment the bank may buy and sell securities issued or guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada of any province, but at no time shall it hold such securities having a par value in excess of fifty per cent of its outstanding note issue and deposit liabilities. I pause there to draw to the attention of the committee a circumstance that has developed in recent years. Within the last few years, I might say during the years of the depression, the chartered banks of Canada have been called upon to acquire an ever-increasing quantity of dominion and provincial government securities. I thought I had under my hand an exact statement of the amounts, but I think I can quote them from memory. About six years ago government securities held by the chartered banks of Canada totalled in the neighbourhood of $350,000,000. A reference to the last monthly bank statement will show that to-day the chartered banks of Canada hold approximately $1,350,000,000 of such securities. In other words the public securities held by the banks in their portfolios to-day total approximately a billion dollars more than they did some six years ago.

Without debating for the moment whether that is sound or unsound, whether it is good or bad, I say it is a major factor that ought to engage the attention of parliament. My own opinion, which I offer with some hesitancy, is that it is unfair to the chartered banks, the commercial banks of Canada, to ask them to carry such a tremendous quantity of government securities. And this is where I come to a suggestion as to what in my opinion should be a directing policy of the government in its position as controller of this Bank of Canada. It should be the policy of the dominion government to relieve the chartered banks, as rapidly as is consistent with sound finance, of a measure of that burden. I agree with the minister that some of these are delicate matters that should not be recklessly debated, and I do not intend to give utterance to any extreme views with regard to them, but I call attention to the fact which I have cited, one which I think challenges the consideration of the government and of the Bank of Canada and in my opinion should engage the attention of parliament.

Then, paragraph (f) provides that the bank may:

> ... buy and sell securities issued by the United Kingdom or the United States of America, having a muturity exceeding six months from the date of acquisition by the bank, but the bank shall at no time hold such securities of a par value in excess of twenty-five per cent of the amount of the paid up capital of the bank.

I am not going to discuss that; I merely cite it as one of the powers of the bank. The importance of it will appear when I read from the speech of the governor.

The next clause is of very great importance. Before reading it may I make this statement. We have set up what we call a central bank; we are enlarging the government control of that bank. It is a fair assumption that it is the intention of the government to use that bank in much the same way as other countries have used similar institutions, otherwise there is no sense in all that we are doing. When the commercial banks acquired this huge quantity of public securities it necessarily followed that their resources for commercial business were curtailed. I know the answer to that; I notice the minister shakes his head. The answer is that there is abundance of resources in the banks for all loans. I am not going to enter to-day into a discussion of that. But I say that taking the situation as we now have it, having regard to the tremendous increase of government securities in the hands of the chartered banks, we are justified in assuming that their capacity for commercial loans has been somewhat curtailed.

Paragraph (g) reads as follows: The bank may—

> ... buy and sell or rediscount bills of exchange and promissory notes endorsed by a chartered bank drawn or issued in connection with the production or marketing of goods, wares and merchandise as defined in The Bank Act, excepting those mentioned in paragraph (h) of this subsection, and having a maturity not exceeding ninety days, excluding days of grace, from the date of acquisition by the bank.

Before that paragraph passes I think the committee should consider whether sufficient latitude is permitted to the Bank of Canada in the powers of rediscount therein granted. Again I say it is a question of opinion, but I invite the minister and the committee to give consideration to that feature, because this is one of the powers which will enable the bank to enhance greatly the powers of the chartered banks in the discount market.

I wish now to read what the governor of the bank had to say on the subject to which that subparagraph relates. I quote from his speech of February 25. The heading is "Treasury Bill Market."

> It is universally recognized that a central bank is hampered in its operations where an active bill market does not exist. Few countries, however, have the bill market they would like. Under present conditions a fairly satisfactory market can be established, if there is a sufficient volume of treasury bills, if there is a good institutional distribution of these, and, in particular, if it is the commercial banks' policy to hold treasury bills as their secondary reserve. The mere existence of a central bank at once widens and strengthens the market for first class bills, since the central bank itself will be a large holder and will engage in purchases and sales in pursuance of its open market policy, and for other reasons. In so doing, it is likely to have the effect of steadying the rate. The Bank of Canada can, I feel, claim that it has been of assistance in both these respects.

Canada has been handicapped, as the governor points out, by the absence of a fairly extensive bill market. We have not and cannot expect to have a bill market such as they have in London or New York, but the government can greatly assist if its policy is gradually to extend the bill market in Canada. The government could very well declare, without in the slightest degree impairing the present banking situation, or without any danger of encouraging wild speculation, as the minister puts it, that its policy will be not only to encourage the establishment of a bill market but to do everything in its power in cooperation with the Bank of Canada to secure the use of all the facilities that can exist in Canada for the encouragement of the buying and selling of bills. I shall not go into an analysis of the practice elsewhere, but I assume it is known to all that, for instance, in London a bill of sixty days or three or four months may pass through a dozen different hands during the period of its currency. I have seen bills that were endorsed so often that they had to stick on additional paper on which to write the endorsements. That is an active bill market; and a very small margin of profit, running to three or four decimals, is sufficient for the purposes of such a market. Nothing of the kind exists in Canada, but I can readily see how there could be built up in Canada an active bill market not only for government bills but also for commercial bills such as those indicated here. That leads me to suggest that possibly it might have been better if in this section the term of maturity had been made four months instead of ninety days.

Mr. DUNNING: The next section covers certain classes.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but not the ordinary class.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes—"(p) do any other banking business—" There is provision for up to one hundred and eighty days with respect to paper connected with the production or marketing of products of agriculture, the forest, the quarry and mine, or the sea, lakes and rivers.

Mr. STEVENS: I am glad the minister mentioned that, because I intended to refer to it. These, however, are what are known as active commercial bills dealt with in section (g) to which I have referred. The reason there was an enlargement of time in respect to the class of bills to which the minister refers was this: Take for instance live stock. It was found it was not possible to merchandise live stock within ninety days. Frequently those who were handling live stock on credit through the banks found that they were forced to liquidate prior to the time that the stock was fit to sell. Your market might on a certain day or certain week or weeks be so low that it would be unprofitable to market. And so it was found that so far as live stock and some other products of that class were concerned a larger period should obtain. However I am speaking of rediscount, bills of exchange, promissory notes and the like. They are more along the line of what might be called ordinary commercial paper. I suggest therefore that the minister would be quite within his rights and would not in any way jeopardize the interests of the bank or of the country if he made clear to the house what is to be the attitude of the government in regard to these and indeed other matters which in my opinion are vital to the operation of the Bank of Canada and its relation to the government and the problems of the country.

Another point I might very properly raise has reference to the production of gold. In this connection I shall give the figures for the last seven years. The production of fine ounces of gold for each year during the period 1929 to 1935 was as follows:

	Fine ounces
1929	2,238,452
1930	1,079,504
1931	2,344,281
1932	2,653,326
1933	2,789,285
1934	3,160,390
1935	2,871,845
Total	17,137,083

Canada is one of the largest producers of gold; I believe it is now in second place, although in the last year or two Russia has challenged our position in that respect. However it is safe to say that in the production of gold we are one of the first three countries. The question which occurs to me is this: What is to be the government's policy as to its control of the Bank of Canada in regard to the holding of a larger quantity of gold? In the disposal of gold what form or general policy will be adopted? If we are simply to take gold and use it as a commodity, exporting it as it is produced to the markets in New York and London, and occasionally in Paris, are we exhausting our possibilities under a system of finance operating through the Bank of Canada? The question might be asked: Has the government considered the advisability of retaining in Canada a larger portion of gold produced?—because I find that the export of gold in the seven year period I have indicated almost equals the total production. Although I have not the figures under my hand, may I say that by checking I found that the export of gold practically equalled the production. Is it advisable to consider increasing Canada's reserve of gold and under existing laws making use of that reserve? I am quite aware that there is a distinct cleavage of opinion, but I do submit to the minister that with respect to these matters to which I have referred, and perhaps other matters to which I have not had time to refer, he might reasonably give the house a statement of government policy. While, I repeat, I respect the minister's sense of delicacy in dealing with these matters, surely if the government of Canada is to acquire and exercise control over the Bank of Canada, parliament has a right to know at least the broad general lines of policy of that bank operating through the new control, namely the government of Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I had not in mind quite the class of question the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has raised. I do not think the hon. member who asked the question about the broad policy to be adopted had in mind the matters to which the hon. member for Kootenay East has referred. I did not make note of his various questions as he proceeded to speak, because I expected each one would be the last, and up to a certain point I had succeeded in keeping his remarks in my mind. If in replying I do not cover all the points, perhaps the hon. member will come to my assistance. I had prepared some observations which I intended to use in reply to questions addressed to me a few days ago by the hon. member, and perhaps at this time it might be well to give expression to them.

The process of affecting our price level by monetary action is not nearly as simple as some would have us believe. Under certain conditions the price level will rise even if there is some decrease in the amount of cash in the country. Under other circumstances the price level will fall even though the cash is increased. Because of the introduction of greater weight, for the time being, of some other factors, conditions change from day to day. So that a policy in regard to cash which is proper in May may not be proper in June, even if the goal towards which we wish to move remains the same.

I believe it would be incorrect and improper for me to indicate my personal opinions or to appear to voice the opinion of the government with regard to the objective which we should attempt to attain in the matter of the price level, or to indicate by what monetary policy I thought that objective should be attained. Such an indication would give individuals an opportunity to anticipate any action which might be taken, and to reap a profit and in fact would be a far more serious indiscretion than advance information on the budget. May I invite the attention of the hon. member who asked the question to the fact that by creating uncertainty and apprehension we might interfere with or at least impede the realization of any desired objective. As a matter of fact, to a certain extent that has occurred in the United States, due to announcements in advance of objectives. Immediately upon an announcement being made, forces were started in motion which tended to impede the very desirable objective it was sought to attain. I think however it is quite in order for me to say that any suggestion that a deflationary policy is being pursued is incorrect, and any suggestion that a deflationary policy should be pursued is contrary to common sense. The views in regard to price levels which have been embodied in the declaration of more than one conference, so far as I am aware are still held in this and other leading countries of the world. My hon. friend may recall that in speaking on the resolution preceding the bill I made certain statements as to the functions and duties of the bank. In so far as those words indicate a policy, I shall repeat them. At that time I stated that when a boom is under way and getting out of hand it is the duty of the bank to put on the brakes by restricting credit, thus tending to cause a decline of prices, and to slow down the whole tempo of business and speculative activity. Conversely, in a time of depression, it is the duty of the bank to bring influences to bear in order to extend credit, thus tending to raise prices and quicken the tempo of business activity. The only criticism I make of my own words is that they might be taken to indicate that I share the views of those who believe that monetary policy is all important as an influence upon the economic life of a country and its people. I stated earlier this afternoon that I do not believe that. It is one of the major factors, it is true. Its importance changes from time to time, having regard to the weight for the moment of other factors. There are periods when it is all important; there are other periods when it is of no importance at all, temporarily at all events.

With respect to the specific question of my hon. friend, which I think was the major question he asked, as to a treasury bill market, certainly the information contained in the weekly statements of the bank and in the report of the governor at the annual meeting, to which my hon. friend referred, indicate the increasing extent to which the government is making available treasury bills, and with the avowed purpose, as the governor has stated in his report, of building up that kind of market in Canada. The bank has the powers indicated by my hon. friend in paragraph (g) of the present act—not the present bill—with respect to the rediscounting of bills of exchange, and so forth. But my hon. friend will appreciate, I think, that the very fact that the banks are at present such large holders of the gilt-edged securities of the Dominion of Canada and its provinces operates to prevent the necessity on their part of presenting bills to the Bank of Canada for rediscount. Quite obviously they can secure necessary cash, if they wish to do so, by the much simpler expedient of depositing their dominion government securities. In a time of greatly increased business activity I hope, and I agree with my hon. friend in believing that it would be a good thing, for the development of an active bill market in Canada, but one must remember that not merely the Bank of Canada is required to accomplish that end.

Mr. STEVENS: No one would suggest that.

Mr. DUNNING: A knowledge of and an interest in a bill market is necessary on the part of a great many individuals and corporations. I am gratified to be able to say to the house that in recent issues of treasury bills investment by other than banks of sums of varying amounts is growing, thus indicating an appreciation of the value of a short term bill market on the part of those who have idle funds and are content to take the very lowest rate of interest for short term money. I do not think any amendment of paragraph (g) as suggested by the hon. member for Kootenay East is necessary at the present time, for the reason that the chartered banks up to now are not finding it necessary to use paragraph (g) or paragraph (h) for the purpose of rediscounting trade paper with the Bank of Canada.

My hon. friend raised some other question—

Mr. STEVENS: The question of gold.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, gold. My hon. friend suggests that the government should consider increasing the volume of gold held within the country by the Bank of Canada. He did not suggest what advantage it would be to Canada to increase the gold holdings, and quite frankly I have been unable to convince myself that any advantage could accrue to the people of Canada at the present time from an increase in the gold holdings by the Bank of Canada on behalf of the people of Canada. I cannot see any advantage. I do not say that international situations might not change and become such as to make it appear wise to increase our gold holdings, but at the present time I consider them adequate; in fact the best good of the country is served by exporting gold as a commodity to the extent it is being exported, rather than increasing the country's gold reserves. I cannot think of any practical good which would immediately follow such an increase.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the minister to make a little clearer one statement? He suggested, if I heard him aright, that it would not be wise for this government to give to parliament its financial policy.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to have that made clearer. The minister suggested that were certain announcements made the government might be prevented from accomplishing the purpose it had in view, that there might be profiteering on the part of some who had advance knowledge; and the minister compared it with the evils of a leak in the budget. I can understand that it does not do to have a leak in the budget proposals, but after all the government does come down to the house and announce its budget. There comes a time when it has to announce its policy. Do I understand from the minister that it is too dangerous for the government to announce its policy in regard to inflation, deflation or reflation, if you like to call it that? The minister suggests that the government is not in favour of a policy of deflation, but surely there comes a time when parliament ought to know what the government's policy is, in a general way at least, in regard to financial affairs.

Mr. DUNNING: This is not a matter of financial affairs.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, financial policy. I wish the minister would explain it a little, because otherwise it puts the government in the position of being very autocratic. A short time ago the Prime Minister said that we must not have any information in regard to the government's policy in international affairs, and now if another member of the government takes the position that parliament must not be given very much information with regard to monetary affairs—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have never made the statement that the house should not have information on international affairs. What I did say was that there were times and seasons for all things, and that the time to consider international problems would come a little later on in the session. I think subsequent events have borne out the wisdom of that attitude.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Without going into that matter to-day, at least there were times and seasons a few weeks ago when the Prime Minister did not care to give to parliament the attitude of the government on international affairs, and what I would like to get at now is this: Can the minister tell us what would be the appropriate time for parliament to be informed with regard to the general financial policy of this government?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend confuses terms so much that it is very difficult to answer him. The financial policy of the government with relation to the handling of governmental affairs and governmental business is and has been before the house, but what my hon. friend means, I think, is: What is the policy of the government in regard to affecting conditions in this country through the control of the Bank of Canada. Is not that what he means?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is what I call financial or monetary policy.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a wide difference between the two meanings. However, I will attempt once more to indicate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I am confused, having given some thought to this matter for fifteen years, then many people in this country may easily be confused by the minister's statement.

Mr. DUNNING: I quite admit that. It is easy to understand how confusion may arise from information given by a layman—one who nevertheless has attempted over a period of a number of years to understand the subject, as I think my hon. friend himself has done—when experts who are constantly at his disposal themselves find it necessary to engage in much debate and study in order that they may be certain, if that is possible, that the conclusions of to-day shall be the conclusions of to-morrow. It is much easier to be on the other side of the fence than on the administrative side; it is much easier to be on the showman's side, declaiming—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think anything I have said merits a lecture from the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: I was thinking of something entirely different.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know what the minister's reference is to the showman's side. I simply asked a straight question, wishing the minister to explain a little more fully.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend please accept my most abject apology. I had no reference to him, and I should not have made the reference in speaking. I hope he will accept that explanation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite.

Mr. DUNNING: I had in mind something entirely different and was about to go on to another point. My words would have explained themselves in a moment, but I shall not go further along that line. I want to try to satisfy, if I can, my hon. friend and to assert as plainly as I can that this government has nothing whatsoever to conceal in this matter. So far as the revelation of governmental policy with respect to the Bank of Canada is concerned, the policy is revealed, to those who study, by the weekly statements of the bank itself and by the annual statement of the governor of the bank, from which my hon. friend from Kootenay East was quoting so copiously a few moments ago. There are certain policies that can be revealed only by the event, and this is one of them. Why is that? A few moments ago I tried to show how the revealing in advance of an objective to be attained, through the management of currency, remember, lets loose forces which defeat the objective sought. Now, why is that? The answer is very simple. Immediately the objective is announced, if it be an objective of a higher price level, let us say, what happens? I possibly should not have compared it in respect of seriousness with a budget leak, because by comparing it with that I might be understood to be comparing it in character with a budget leak. It is an entirely different thing. I was comparing it in respect of seriousness; it is very much more serious because it advertises to everybody the advisability of following a certain course whereby a profit would be guaranteed by that announced policy. That has happened in some countries. My hon. friend, who has studied the matter, knows there are many instances in which that is so. It is in connection with policy of that description that I say we cannot make any announcement. I went as far as I could when I said that the policy of the bank and of the government is certainly not deflationary. I think parliament has every right to ask at this time, under the conditions which prevail and have prevailed during the depression, that our faces should be set against deflation. That would be the unanimous opinion of the house. But the extent to which we go in the other direction is inherent in this whole policy of managed currency under which we are now operating through the medium of the central bank under government control and must be, as I have indicated several times, a matter of day to day and week to week study by experts, and constant consultation. To set an objective in a broad way would be, I believe, utterly to defeat the attainment of it because of forces which it would automatically let loose, and I hope that no one takes this as an indication that the government intends to follow a policy of inflation, because that would be untrue.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): To what extent is the bank implicated in the purchase of silver? It appears to have made, in the ten months of operation, a very serious loss, amounting to nearly $500,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Subsection 4 of section 26 reads—and this is what parliament instructed the bank to do; it answers the question my hon. friend asks:

(4) The bank shall during the years 1935, 1936 and 1937 purchase and hold newly-mined Canadian silver as and when required so to do by the minister but the bank shall never be required to purchase more than 1,671,802 fine ounces in any year.

My hon. friend may know that there was a silver convention and an agreement among the nations with respect to silver. Under that arrangement Canada assumed certain obligations, and by section 26 of the act the Bank of Canada became the operative agent in the matter of carrying out Canada's commitments under the international convention. The loss to which my hon. friend refers is, of course, the difference, as at the end of the bank's fiscal year, between the value at that time and the cost of the silver which the bank holds under this section.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): That seems to be an operation of the government and not properly of the bank.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend might debate that, but I suggest that perhaps I have helped in the discussion getting out of order. We are not on that section.

Mr. QUELCH: We are interested in the question of ownership only inasmuch as it affects the policy of the bank. I quite agree with what the minister has said regarding deflation and inflation, and I am myself opposed to either. But I quite realize that there is a very wide divergence of opinion as to what exactly is meant by either of these two terms. The government will be taking over a greater control of the issue of currency and credit, and I would ask the minister this question. I do not think it will embarrass the government in any way, and undoubtedly an answer would go a long way towards restoring confidence in industry at the present time. What will be the basis for determining the amount of money that should be in circulation at any given time? Mr. Jackson Dodds stated before the banking and commerce committee that there should be enough money in circulation to buy the goods which are moving. I do not think the minister would agree with that statement; I hope not. There should be enough money in circulation to buy the goods which are available for distribution and which the people need.

Mr. DUNNING: What does my hon. friend mean by money?

Mr. QUELCH: Effective purchasing power. I am not referring to deposits not available for the moving of goods.

Mr. DUNNING: But what does my hon. friend mean by money?

Mr. QUELCH: Credit and currency in circulation.

Mr. DUNNING: Including chequing?

Mr. QUELCH: Certainly. To go a little further. Would the minister agree that, if possible, there should be sufficient money in circulation to pay the total prices of ultimate products which are available for distribution and needed by the people? That would not necessarily entail inflation in any sense of the word. Would the minister agree with that?

Mr. DUNNING: The statement is so very general that I doubt whether I could agree or disagree. The criteria set up are not to my mind complete criteria, and in some respects they go beyond what would be necessary. Certainly they are too vague for me to answer the question.

Mr. QUELCH: The general principle, then?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not recognize any general principle in my hon. friend's question. I am trying to understand the question. The hon. gentleman sets up as one criterion the needs of the people. Was not that one of them?

Mr. QUELCH: Would the minister agree that there should be enough money in circulation at any given time to pay the total prices of ultimate goods available for distribution? It stands to reason that if there is not enough money in circulation to buy the total factory products available for distribution, this would necessitate industry curtailing its output, thus causing more unemployment.

Mr. DUNNING: A great variety of factors enter into that question. My hon. friend speaks of total goods as if that were something static. Our business of production, distribution and consumption is not static but dynamic. Certain classes of goods are, in the nature of things, stored for periods. They are not immediately required but are required later on. As I say, there is such a variety of factors as to make it impossible for me to answer yes or no to my hon. friend's question. I cannot see that he is setting up a standard which is a practical standard for me to answer yes or no, with respect to the volume of currency; there are so many modifications of his generalization as to make yes or no an impossible answer.

Mr. BENNETT: There are three or four questions that I should like to direct attention to with respect to this particular clause. The clause, as it is proposed to amend it, indicates perhaps more clearly than any other the desirability of a new institution having an opportunity to demonstrate its usefulness before drastic amendments are made either in its powers or in the exercise of its ordinary functions. This bank has been in existence for a short time, and during that period it has given an excellent account of itself. It has had time to issue only one annual statement which has been published, and that statement has been referred to during the progress of the discussion this afternoon. Among other functions which the government imposed upon the bank was that of acquiring the silver which had been purchased under the provisions of the silver convention. The loss to which the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) referred could not under any circumstances be a loss if the silver were utilized for coining purposes, for the profit upon coining would be more than equal to any loss that could occur by reason of the difference between the price at which the silver was bought and the price to which it had fallen; that difference is substantially less than the profit accruing to the government from the coinage of silver, as indicated the other day by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer). But, as regards the question of the note issue of the bank, it will be observed that by section 13 it is now proposed to expand the powers of the bank by providing that it may—

Its note issue at the date of the last annual statement, that is December 31, 1935, was roughly $100,000,000, plus its deposit liabilities, which on that particular date happened to be about $200,000,000, and the half of the two would make altogether, roughly $150,000,000. That is, the bank shall at no time hold such securities having a par value in excess of $150,000,000 on the 31st day of December, 1935—

... nor shall the bank at any time hold such securities maturing more than ten years from the date of acquisition of a par value in excess of three times the amount of the paid-up capital and rest fund of the bank.

The rest fund is $173,000—one can eliminate that for the present—and three times the present paid-up capital would be, roughly speaking, $30,000,000. I suggest to the committee that that departure from the provisions of the statute, to which great consideration was given, is one which might bring about great disaster to the bank if the powers were exercised, and I am one of those who hold that it is not desirable to clothe a new institution with powers unless we expect them to be used. As the statute stood before this amendment was suggested, it contained all the powers that, in my judgment, could reasonably be conferred upon the bank, having regard to later conditions which obtain or are likely to obtain in this country during any period of time that we can anticipate. The provision, therefore, with respect to investments should have some more adequate explanation than we have had so far. I do not know why it is thought desirable by the government to change that condition, to have the acquisition of securities of a certain type, namely those of the provinces and of the dominion, based upon some relation to the outstanding note issue and deposit liabilities, for I frankly fail to see the relation between the two, and to say that the bank shall at no time hold such securities which have a par value in excess of, as I have said, practically speaking, in terms of the last annual statement and of the new capital, $150,000,000. On December 31 last the bank held dominion securities amounting in all to $114,000,000; fifty per cent of its note issue at that time was $50,000,000, and fifty per cent of its deposit liabilities at that time would be another $100,000,000, making altogether a total of $150,000,000. But at that time the dominion banks had on deposit $18,000,000, and the chartered banks had their reserves deposited with the bank to the extent of $181,000,000.

That is the position as shown by the statement, and I should like the minister to explain why it has been thought desirable, after but one annual statement has been issued by the institution, to modify in the manner indicated the provisions of this paragraph (d) of section 13.

There is another point, which has been alluded to by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens)—he mentioned it the other day but he did not develop it—and which I had proposed to speak about at some length. I am clearly of opinion that this bank should acquire a greater holding of gold, and if I were asked the reason why, I would, as a schoolmaster, refer to the explanation given by the minister himself on the page opposite page 6 of the bill as printed:

> This enlargement of the bank's power to hold securities with a maturity exceeding two years is necessary, partly because of the deletion of the words "exclusive of securities transferred to the bank under paragraph (c) of subsection three of section twenty-five," and partly because during the course of the next ten years the chartered banks will lose the right to issue approximately $100,000,000 of bank notes and the Bank of Canada's note issue will be expanded correspondingly. Other things being equal, the Bank of Canada must acquire an additional $100,000,000 in assets as an offset. In view of the scarcity of short term securities it would not be practicable to restrict the bank to the purchase of securities maturing within two years.

That calls for but two observations. One is that the development in this country of a market for short term securities—the bill market, as it is familiarly known in England, or more particularly, in Lombard street—can come about only through this bank participating largely in the first instance in these operations. Second, the bank has power to issue four dollars in paper currency as against every dollar of gold that is held as coverage. Would it not occur to most people that, by acquiring another $50,00,000 or $75,000,000 of gold and paying for it with Canadian legal tenders, the bank would be enabled to take care of any situation which might develop, instead of having recourse to the provisions suggested in the accompanying note? If the bank is to function in the manner indicated, according to the powers which we have conferred upon it, not by this act but by another act, namely in the issuing of paper money—using the colloquial term one hears on the street—if it exercises those powers to the extent that in another statute we have provided, it must acquire the gold coverage to enable it to do so, and gold coverage acquired at $35 an ounce to the extent of an additional $75,000,000, or even $50,000,000, would confer upon the bank a power of issue that is limited only by the provisions of the statute.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: The bank has that power now.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I am speaking about.

Mr. DUNNING: I mean, it has the gold now.

Mr. BENNETT: I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for his information, but I may inform him I am quite well aware of that fact. I thank him for his generous exposition of his own knowledge for the purpose of assisting me, but I am already aware of that fact. Being aware of that fact, I am merely pointing out that it may be advisable to add to the gold reserves of the bank for the purpose I have indicated, and in that event the bank would accomplish that purpose without much difficulty.

At the appropriate time, when this section was under consideration, I intended to say that I was wholly in accord with what was said as a mere suggestion the other day by the hon. member for Kootenay East. I had intended to elaborate upon it, but I shall not take time to do so now. I think, however, the acquisition of an additional $50,000,000 of gold at this time would serve a very useful purpose. It would keep in Canada that much bullion which would be available for the purposes provided by the act, and at the same time the purchase of that gold would release in this dominion that amount of money in Bank of Canada bills, what is colloquially called paper money. If the Bank of Canada acquired a thousand ounces of gold it would pay $35,000 in Bank of Canada paper money or bills which, as hon. members have said so frequently in the house constitute legal tender in this country. Inasmuch as the government has complete control over the matter and no gold can be sold outside Canada unless a licence is issued for its export, while I do not suggest that it is desirable to acquire a very large quantity of gold at this particular moment or that, I do suggest that we should be constantly accumulating gold, for what was said yesterday by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) is something which is not very frequently discussed.

The export from this country of $40,000,000 of our gold reserves by a former Minister of Finance had a most detrimental effect upon our whole financial structure. That, I think, is admitted by people who are students of the situation within or without Canada. So seriously did we regard the matter, Mr. Chairman, that at a caucus of the party with which I was then associated in opposition I asked members of my party not to make any reference to the matter at all, because I believed that it would not be in the interests of Canada that certain possibilities, which as a matter of fact later became actualities, should be developed. It was found that certain people outside the country took action, which I think it was well understood would be taken by certain astute gentlemen, and it was because we had incurred a risk, which risk had been realized by others, that we suggested that in the public interest nothing further should be said about the matter. Nevertheless, because of that action we were $40,000,000 of gold coin short in this country, and when I say "short" I mean that $40,000,000 of gold was utilized for the purpose of discharging a New York liability, which action lessened to that extent the amount of gold reserve held in this country. That could never be made up; as a matter of fact, in the early succeeding days after England went off the gold standard there was a diminution in our supply of gold coin and bullion until we could take the necessary action under the relief act to regulate the export of gold and provide that it should not be shipped out of Canada except under licence. For it must not be forgotten that Canadian banks, with head offices in Canada, are doing business in many countries. In the very nature of things the branches near at hand may depend upon the free movement of gold from the head office to meet any situation that may suddenly arise. When that right of free movement is changed it becomes necessary to consider every transaction in the light of meeting the difficulties that may arise in the country in which the bank may have the particular branch.

We had to deal with that question when we provided for the revaluation of gold coin at the time we took over the gold from the banks, and we provided that a certain portion of that gold should be treated as gold which was held for foreign reserves, using the word "foreign" as meaning all reserves or liabilities external to Canada. Under those circumstances I have thought, perhaps improperly, that we should add to our store of gold for the purpose not only of meeting the situation that must arise during the next few years in connection with the retirement of the paper money issued by the bank, but also of replenishing our stock of gold to something beyond the amount we held after there had been a diminution in our stock through the shipment of $40,000,000 of gold to New York. It is true that the revaluation of gold has increased the amount that appears after the dollar sign in the annual report of the bank. It is true also that we conferred upon the bank certain stabilizing powers with the profit which accrued through the revaluation from $20.67 to the current market rate on gold prevailing at the time the changes were made. The act itself was never proclaimed, but in the annual report of the bank "other assets" appear at the very substantial sum of over $3,250,000 and "liabilities not otherwise disclosed" amount to something over $2,000,000. So I assume that there has been a utilization, to some extent, of the profit that does not appear in the balance sheet except under the two items I have mentioned. Of that, of course, I have no knowledge except such as might be derived from the reading of an ordinary balance sheet.

Those three points, therefore, I suggest should be considered: First, the question of silver, to which reference has been made, and which I think takes care of itself; second, the question as to investments, which I think, calls for some wider explanation than we have received. In the drafting of that section originally great care was exercised lest we should provide a credit condition which would be injurious to the bank itself, and the restrictions imposed were of a double character. First, we had regard to the fact that the bank now holds a substantial quantity of Canadian securities as assurance against its guarantee or liability when it took over the Dominion of Canada notes. The exact figure I do not carry in my mind, but it amounts to several millions of dollars of Canadian securities held by the Bank of Canada for the purpose of indemnifying it against any liability which may attach by reason of it having assumed the obligations of the Dominion of Canada in connection with what we used to call the old dominion legal tender, or the note issue of the dominion itself. That expansion of power I find it a little difficult to understand; certainly the enlargement of the power for the reasons given is hardly sound finance, because it involves the acquisition of securities for the purpose of taking care of this additional note issue when the effective and profitable way would be to acquire gold when it carries with it a right of issue such as that mentioned in the other statute to which I have referred. And with respect to the acquisition of gold, without developing the subject at greater length, I think by reference to leading authorities I could give good reasons why we should gradually increase our holding. I shall not say more, because I do not desire to trespass too greatly upon the time of the committee in this regard.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, Mr. Chairman, the observations and views of my right hon. friend with regard to the reasons which should actuate the bank and the government to increase the gold reserve I shall study carefully and bring to the attention of those whose business it is to advise me and consult with me on those matters. With all due deference I cannot agree at the moment with my right hon. friend's reasoning, because the acquisition of more gold would be the acquisition of something that is unproductive—

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: —whereas the method here provided is one which at least produces some activity. While saying that however, and speaking particularly to my hon. friend who applauded just now, might I say that I would not wish to convey any idea that the government do not believe in the necessity of maintaining adequate gold coverage. There may be different views as to what is adequate, but I may point out that at present the gold coverage is in the neighbourhood of sixty per cent of the outstanding currency and deposit liabilities. That, of course, is in excess of the minimum requirement agreed upon at the world economic conference, which minimum was twenty-five per cent. As to the wisdom of increasing our present sixty per cent margin in anticipation of the events to which the leader of the opposition referred, that is a matter for consideration. At the moment I cannot see the wisdom of doing as he suggests, but that does not mean that reflection and study may not bring me into agreement with the leader of the opposition in the matter.

With regard to the amendment to the section under discussion, it was prepared after serious consideration by and with the officers of the bank, who believe that this increase in relation to the powers of the bank to hold long term securities is the wisest manner of meeting a situation which will develop as the notes of the chartered banks are gradually, under the law, replaced by Bank of Canada bills. At the moment the increased power given may be summarized in this way, that at present the bank holds $130,000,000 of such securities. Under the amendment, so long as the liabilities of the bank remain the same, the increase would be $20,000,000. The limit of the power would be $150,000,000. My right hon. friend has some question in his mind about the yardstick which is used, that is the liabilities of the bank, the note issue and deposit liabilities, or in the other instance three times the amount of the paid-up capital and rest fund of the bank. That is debatable; I admit that at once, but the best judgment of those who have studied the matter and are advising me is that this section is necessary in the light of their present experience and that it should be passed, and can be adopted with safety.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: The greatest failure of a chartered bank in modern days arose from its disproportionate holding of long term obligations and its inability to meet the cheques drawn upon it in the clearing house on Monday morning. In the drafting of the original section, which was done without reference to the bank itself, but only with reference to those who had the well-being of the institution solely at heart, it was thought that the curtailment of the powers to the extent indicated was the best possible assurance against the acquisition of what might become not readily negotiable long term securities.

To leave that question for the moment—for if those charged with the responsibility for administration have convinced the minister that the change is desirable, obviously any further observations are unnecessary—there was a statement made—to which an hon. gentleman responded "hear, hear"—that gold would be unproductive. Now, there is nothing that the bank could hold which would be quite so productive.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I doubt it.

Mr. BENNETT: Why? Under the provisions of our issuing act, when the bank has acquired $1,000 worth of gold it may issue paper up to $4,000. If anything is more productive than that I should like to know what it is. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) predicated a considerable part of his argument yesterday upon parliament exercising those powers. But an issue of paper money, to use the colloquial term, covered by gold, is regulated by international agreement whereby the government would hold not less than twenty-five per cent of metallic coverage in gold as against the issue of paper. That was the minimum. It is true that at the moment we have sixty per cent coverage, but when I am asked to accede to the explanation given on the opposite page of this section that it is proposed to acquire long term securities to enable the Bank of Canada to provide paper money for the chartered banks to the extent of $100,000,000, I am bound to say that my intelligence refuses to accede to that test, because by the acquisition of exactly $25,000,000 of gold, paid for by legal tender, for which the bank now has money in hand, it could at once discharge the obligation of $100,000,000 to the chartered banks. Or even if forty per cent were applied, which is the usual rule, and regarded as a high margin of safety—between forty and fifty per cent has been regarded as high, and ours is very high for reasons that under present conditions are obvious to everyone—the bank could still do this. The explanation given in the bill does not call for more than a passing observation because it is so wholly inadequate to the matter in hand; it carries its own refutation.

Another matter having to do with this very question was mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay East, and is one which, I think, is seriously engaging the attention of every Canadian who follows the monthly statements of the banks. We have the banks of this country owning much over a billion dollars worth of securities of the dominion and the provinces. The amount has been increased by nearly a billion during the last few years. In the very nature of things this central bank must discharge an ever-increasing responsibility, if there is an improvement in commercial conditions, for the simple and obvious reason that the chartered banks cannot provide money for their customers and at the same time have it locked up in long term securities. The answer may be made that the chartered banks can take the securities to the Bank of Canada and obtain from that bank sufficient money to enable them to meet the requirements of their customers. That is a perfectly legitimate answer. But every thoughtful man realizes, and those outside this country realize, that it is placing too heavy a strain on the financial structure of this country to compel the chartered banks—and it almost amounts to compulsion—to acquire with their depositors' moneys and their own capital so large a sum of the country's securities. The provision that we have made to relieve them of the strain through the obtaining of money from the Bank of Canada on the deposit of these bonds will create a situation which will result in an agitation of the very kind to which this committee has listened during the past few days, and such an agitation in the very nature of things will be successful. It is for that reason that I view with some degree, not of apprehension, which is an old and hackneyed expression, or alarm, but of more than casual curiosity, what may be the result of these matters being carried on in the way in which they are.

I think the question of inducing other commercial institutions than the banks to buy short term treasury bills is but an indication in this country of lack of confidence in commercial ventures, that is brought about by two things, one being the fact that the chartered banks are no longer willing to pay a reasonable rate of interest on what may be called current deposits of their customers. The result, of course, has been that commercial enterprises having in hand $100,000, or more, and sometimes less than that, make bids for treasury bills which mature in the succeeding two or three months, because they will not require money to pay dividend until after that time. In the meantime they would thus procure a sum of money by way of interest which would be in excess of what they would receive from the chartered banks. But that in itself has a restrictive effect upon the usefulness of chartered banks in connection with the commercial life of a country, for to the extent to which they are deprived of deposits which they formerly had available, and to the extent to which that money is utilized in the manner indicated, their ability to meet the demands of their commercial customers is lessened. However, as was pointed out a few days ago, that question has not arisen, because the chartered banks have on hand a substantial sum of money for which they cannot at this time find reasonable and profitable employment. Hence it is that from an examination of the annual report of the Bank of Canada it will be observed that, so far as I can see, at that time there was not a single dollar advanced by that bank by way of rediscount or by way of advances made on the security of the bonds of the country to any of the chartered banks. That is the position as far as indicated, although it may be that one of those items covers some advances, though I think not.

The position is that no advances were made, because lack of effective demand on the chartered banks for loans by commercial enterprises has resulted in those banks having a surplus of funds which they have utilized in the acquisition of securities to the enormous extent of over a billion dollars. Speaking not as a schoolmaster I would say that in my opinion that is not a useful or desirable condition in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: I agree with the latter observations of the right hon. gentleman, and in case any incorrect impressions may go out from this chamber may I say that my right hon. friend's observations regarding the holdings of stock did not deal with what I had said. I said that if further gold were purchased under present conditions and deposited in the vaults it would be unproductive, and I was referring to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition that we purchase further gold. Of course gold can be made productive in the manner indicated by my right hon. friend, but the fact is that we do not require to issue further currency against our gold holdings, as we already hold such a large excess over the internationally accepted minimum. So any further acquisition of gold, so far as immediate conditions are concerned, would be unproductive; and it is in that sense I use the term.

With respect to my right hon. friend's remarks regarding long term securities I would point out that respecting the ten year securities the only change from the existing law is the addition of the words "and rest fund of the bank." That is the only addition with respect to long term securities. The other provisions apply to securities of less than ten years duration.

Mr. BENNETT: But the two go together.

Mr. DUNNING: They must be combined, of course.

Section agreed to.

Section 14 agreed to.

On section 15—Denominations.

The CHAIRMAN: Is section 15 carried?

Mr. BENNETT: No. I wonder why this disputatious matter should have been thrown into the cauldron of politics at this particular time. Nothing has given me more concern than to find this provision in the bill at this time, having regard to the very difficult conditions under which we live. I do not propose to refer to the political side of the matter, and at this time I speak only for myself. It is not a matter which I regard as in any sense affecting those associated with me as a party. I have said quite freely that they may take any view they consider desirable. But speaking as a Canadian with as tolerant a point of view as any man in this chamber, and yielding to no man in my tolerance and my regard for the views and attitude of mind of every other Canadian, I find it difficult to understand why this question is now being precipitated into the debates of this chamber.

A short time ago we made a trial of what I thought was a not unreasonable suggestion, namely that all persons in Canada of French origin who so desired could obtain bills of the Bank of Canada printed or engraved in the French language. That in itself was a concession. It was admitted by everyone that it was a concession. My view is that very great changes, from the purely constitutional view, have been brought about by the tolerance, good will and kindly thought and appreciation of Canadians of one class who were content to accommodate themselves to the views of others. But when we enact in a statute that every bank bill in Canada shall be engraved in two languages we have created a situation which will involve in every session of parliament an effort being made to repeal.

That will happen as regularly as the sessions come; I am speaking as a result of experience. I must accept a large measure of responsibility for the provision of the law as it now stands. That provision stated that notes in either the English or the French language shall be available as required. I can point out only that the most strenuous supporters of the rights of our fellow French-Canadian citizens, as expressed by, for instance, the late Senator Belcourt, both in writing and in oral argument, rest upon the assumption that where an ethical group occupied a position in a country such as Canada before confederation or, in fact, before it became a part of the British empire, there was a common law right that they should speak their own tongue and be able to understand the business they had to transact written in their own language. The contention thus made is one which has found substantial agreement in the tolerant minds of their Anglo-Saxon fellow citizens, or those of other descent.

Let us look at the situation. The constitution deals with it in one way. But if I were in the province of Quebec to-day, before dissolution of the legislature, and I were to receive the orders of the day, I would not receive that document or the journals printed in the two languages side by side; I would have to take my choice. I would have freedom of choice. My fellow-member of French descent receives his orders of the day printed in French; my fellow-member speaking the English language and of British descent receives his in the English language.

In this parliament what is the position with respect to the statutes and journals? I am discussing a bill. I walk to the table and take from it a bill printed in either English or French. But the bill is not printed in columns, one English and the other French. I take my choice, exercise my freedom of action. I have conceded, because the statute so provides, the right of my fellow-citizen who clings, as Senator Belcourt pointed out in one of his addresses, to his own language. He selects from that table his French copy; I, my English. The orders of the day, which we have before us for this day, are printed in both languages. My French fellow-member has in his hands Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day, but he is using a document which is printed in French. I happen at the moment to be using one printed in English. I exercise my right; he exercises his. He chooses the one printed in French; I choose the one printed in English. The statutes are in exactly the same position.

But we have gone further. In a spirit of tolerance and mutual good will, when we celebrated the anniversary of the founding of our confederation we placed on the stamps that were issued the word "postes" as a gesture, as an expression of good will, not because the law permitted it or required it—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Nor prohibited it.

Mr. BENNETT: Nor, as my hon. friend says, prohibited it, not that the law either asked for it or prohibited it, not that the law contemplated it one way or the other; I think that is a fair way to put it. But as a gesture of good will towards our fellow-citizens of French descent we have the word "postes." Upon the van that picks up the mail in this city there are the words, "Bureau de Postes." There is no justification in law for this, or any prohibition against it. It represents a spirit of tolerance and good will, and a desire to make concessions and undertakings in order that friction may disappear and harmony prevail among the peoples of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If that is the case, why not follow it in this bill?

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what I am speaking of at the moment; that is exactly my point. In the bills we followed that course. We provided for freedom of choice on the part of those who wished to have their money printed in French, and for the first time in the history of this country as a gesture of good will and from a desire for a spirit of harmony we extended, not that privilege, not that right, but that gesture of good will in connection with our paper money so that a choice might be made by those who desired it to be printed in French as against those who desired to have it printed in English. I may say that even that concession brought about much criticism, and I should like to point out to this committee that the criticism went so far that in some cases we received letters with a mutilated bill, protesting, in language that I shall not repeat, against this action being taken. My answer in all instances such as that was this, that we had during a long series of years, in a spirit of the utmost good will and from a desire to conciliate differences and promote harmony, provided that a choice should be exercised by our fellow-Canadians of French origin and those of other origins, and that they might have bills, paper currency, printed in the language they desired, as their fellow-Canadians speaking other tongues might have bills printed in English. That freedom of choice was greatly resented in some quarters, and strong protests with respect to it were made to me personally from time to time. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are to be told that this gesture is to go to the extent of having all paper money issued by the Bank of Canada printed in English and French; that each language shall appear upon the bill. Is that quite fair?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that quite fair?

Mr. VIEN: Why not?

Mr. BENNETT: Why not? For this reason—

Mr. VIEN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: For this reason, that freedom of choice is all that was asked heretofore by our fellow-Canadians. Mr. Fielding, when the matter was put to him with respect to bank notes, met it by saying that he saw no way at the moment of dealing with it, and succeeding governments managed not to deal with it. When we did deal with the Bank of Canada we extended the principle of choice. That is, I repeat again, my fellow-Canadian citizens speaking the French tongue and of French descent would have in their possession bills, paper money, which was printed or engraved in the French language, and equally, English-speaking citizens of British descent could have in their hands and in their pockets bills engraved or printed in the English language.

Let us go a step further. The majority have the rights which are provided by statute; the minority have the rights which are provided by statute, from a purely constitutional and legal standpoint. From a purely legal and constitutional standpoint we deal with only a limited number of matters. We deal with the province of Quebec; we deal with this parliament; we deal with official documents that have to do with this parliament; and if these bank notes were documents which had to be dealt with under the provisions that relate to the papers and documents placed on the table of this house they would be printed in English and French, but both languages would not be on the same document. That cannot be gainsaid. It is within the sight and within the knowledge of every member of the committee.

Now I put this to my friends who have pressed this so strongly: In the light of the development of a spirit of amity and good will, a tolerance and a desire for harmony, many concessions have been made. These concessions will continue to be made. There has been resentment expressed here and there, but in the main the general spirit of tolerance has prevailed. Nevertheless, if any minority in any country has endeavoured to press its will upon the majority, where it is a matter of freedom of choice, there has always been one result, and the minority itself has suffered from that result.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend one question?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Speaking of freedom of choice, is there any freedom of choice on the part of individuals as respects money in circulation as to their desire to have a bill which is printed in English or a bill which is printed in French unless the bills are bilingual?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is just the point exactly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In circulation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Bills in circulation.

Mr. BENNETT: Circulation is not the question. The question in the first instance is—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My question was relating to freedom of choice when money is in circulation as legal tender.

Mr. BENNETT: So far as legal tender is concerned, we have provided that, if required, the money from the issuing power shall be printed in either English or French. What happens after has never been a matter for parliament or the legislature. Those who have followed, as many hon. members have, the judgments of the courts which dealt with the long struggle that originated in this city with respect to educational matters in Ontario, will get a clearer conception of what I am pointing out than they would otherwise obtain. Here we have endeavoured to provide a reasonable compromise; for it is unfair and incorrect to say that this is a bilingual country. The courts have said repeatedly that this is a country in which there are two official languages. The late Senator Belcourt pointed that out in one of his arguments, and I do not think there is any answer to it. There are two official languages in Canada, but this is not a bilingual country.

Mr. MARTIN: What is the difference?

Mr. BENNETT: The difference is so obvious that I know my hon. friend does not require an answer. There is a limitation with respect to the one and not to the other. The official language is provided for by section 133 of the British North America Act. That deals with constitutional rights, and the right creates the official language. But when you come to the question of official bilingualism you find that it does not exist. In this country, I repeat, we have two languages. I am not unmindful of the fact that during the last ten years there has been great agitation in some parts of Canada in connection with this matter, and it has been urged that it should be dealt with as is now proposed. I am not unmindful of the fact that it has been made the football of politicians, and that is the reason I am refraining from making any political observations regarding this matter. I do not propose to do so however great may be the provocation. I point out, however, to my fellow countrymen who are of French origin and speak the French language that those who will take the evidence of history for what it may be worth—and it is fairly important—will find that wherever the granting of a privilege or a concession by a majority has by the minority been crystallized into a right, resulting in a pushing of the demand beyond those moderate and reasonable boundaries that have marked the maintenance of harmonious relations between majorities and minorities, the consequence has been harmful to the minority. I plead, uselessly I admit, with the government not to do this thing at this time. We have at the moment great differences in this country, differences which we all deplore, differences the outcome of which we are fearful of, differences which threaten the very fabric of our confederation. Why not give a fair trial to what now is on the statute books? It has been there only a year; why not give it a trial? Why not let the demand for a change come about by that gradual process which would ensure that those who are most affected, namely, the majority, who are of British descent and speak the English language, will feel, as they do not now feel, the desire to do something further in a spirit of amity and good will? Why not do that? Why force this at the present time upon the people of this country? Why force it through parliament with the government's majority? Why do that? I cannot understand it, because this step that was taken in the Bank of Canada Act was a step further in advance, so far as my fellow Canadians of French origin are concerned, than any step which has been taken since confederation. It gave them the opportunity which, as I have pointed out, is the basis of all arguments that have been made to secure their bills, currency, from the bank printed in French as well as in English.

Now, to say that the will of the minority shall prevail over the will of the majority of the people of Canada is to create as dangerous a condition as it is possible to create. I am not a prophet, but I venture to suggest that this provision will create such a situation that every session will see a demand for its repeal. Just as regularly as the session comes someone will rise in his place and move for leave to introduce a bill to repeal it. I say that in the light of the experience which came to the former government between the date of the passing of this statute and the time we left office. I say it seriously to my fellow Canadians. It has nothing at all to do with my relations to party. I have told my friends, as I repeat, friends having business with me in matters connected with the party, that my view has nothing to do with the party view or with the view they hold. I am giving, however, my own experience from the time we placed this provision on the statute books until the moment we left office, and I know whereof I speak. I say, in the best of good feeling and most seriously to my hon. friends: Do not do this thing. Do not do it now. I say that in view of communications which came to me personally, some abusive, some insulting, none commendatory. They indicated a condition in this dominion which I did not think existed. But if it brought about a resentment so great, criticism as harsh as that to which I have referred, because we provided for a free choice of language, either French or English, what will the situation be when we compel the majority to accept the decision that ultimately all the paper money of this country shall appear in the two languages? That is the issue. Never in my time have I been so much moved in my desire to prevent what I know will result from this action, and I am not guessing about it. It is a conviction in my heart of what is inevitable, from communications I have received, and from statements made to me. I know we are doing something that we shall deeply regret. I see that you are looking at me, Mr. Chairman; it is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to say a word or two about this particular section, inasmuch as I mentioned the matter in connection with the second reading of the bill. The history of the world, in my opinion, has been the history of minorities, but the history of Canada has been the history of compromises. Majorities seem to have no rights and can get nowhere in this country. The principle of compromise was effected by confederation, section 133, on the bilingual question, and was distinctly set out in the British North America Act, and there has been no change in this respect in any of the decennial revisions of the bank acts that we have had from 1867 down to the introduction of this section 15. The law distinctly sets out what are the rights of minorities to the French language; they are governed by the British North America Act. Confederation was a compromise. I have a great admiration for the qualities of the French nation, for all they did in the great war. The untold privations and human sufferings, the trials and tribulations, the anguish and suffering they endured for the good of humanity will stand in the future among the brightest pages of the most sublime patriotism in the history of the world. As I say, confederation was a compromise on this question. What was that compromise? It will be found in section 133 of the British North America Act, and the end of it was to be there without any extension, as follows:

> 133. Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.
> The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

My views on the second reading of this bill will be found in Hansard of June 2.

We had no banking legislation in this country, from 1867 on, other than in accordance with the provision for the revision of the bank acts every ten years which was silent on that point. Section 60 of the Bank Act on note circulation is more or less overridden by this new provision contained in section 15 of the present bill. For all these years we have been getting along very well together, and I might point out that there was no objection when the banks, for their own purposes, and purely as a banking measure in certain communities which were largely French, made a certain issue of bilingual notes according to the population and the business done at those branches. Had I been here I would have opposed that concession then. But now it is proposed to write that into the law of Canada and make legal all notes in French of the Bank of Canada. There is only one way to go about this thing if it is to be done legally. I contend that section 15 of this bill is a violation of the letter and spirit of confederation as set out in section 133 of the British North America Act. Indeed there is no doubt about it. Section 133 lays down the law. Section 15 of this bill, I contend, is unconstitutional, and I am opposed to any extension of the principle it involves and of any compromise already made, but I believe the proper way for those who support this measure to go about the matter is to apply for an amendment of section 133 of the British North America Act, and then by way of the Bank of Canada Act, and I am opposed to any such amendment. I might point out that since the law was passed we have had the following innovations: one, federal blue book issued in two languages; two, our postal stamps were changed bilingually; three, bilingualism has secured a foothold even in the Ontario public school system, and a concession or compromise was permitted to allow a few notes in French for the use of branches in Quebec, in practice. And now parliament, by section 15 of this bill, is asked to issue notes in the French and English language. You cannot compromise on a great public principle. No doubt one side of a ten dollar note of this bank will be French and the other side will be English.

My stand on this matter is that I am absolutely opposed to any extension of the British North America Act along these lines. I have not an ounce of bigotry. I speak in this parliament sincerely and honestly what I conscientiously believe to be the truth and the whole truth, and I never change my views. I support principles, and they are fixed and admit of no compromise.

In conclusion, I contend that this section is against the spirit and letter of the British North America Act and the purposes of the fathers of confederation; everything that was done by them along these lines we are now going to undo. The matter came up in 1934 in connection with a French bill, before the banking and commerce committee, and this parliament laid down that section 133 was the law. The various finance ministers since confederation at every decennial revision of the bank acts were opposed to any change in the direction of introducing a bilingual note, until section 15 of the Bank of Canada bill was here introduced. The Liberal party headed by Mr. Fielding was opposed to a bilingual bank note, and various finance ministers on both sides since confederation took the same stand; they were absolutely against the principle of this bilingual section. It is going to lead to untold confusion in connection with the circulation of these notes, some of them internationally. Further, there is no demand for such legislation. The matter was not discussed in the last election. I never heard it mentioned anywhere in Ontario. I know the views of the people of Ontario. This note circulation clause of the Bank of Canada bill is copied from section 60 of the consolidated act of 1934 regarding banks and banking; the principle of that section is copied into the Bank of Canada bill with the bilingual feature added. I am not speaking for all the people of Ontario, but I believe I speak for some of the people of Ontario who are opposed to any bilingual extension of the British North America Act along the lines indicated, especially when it is recalled that Mr. Fielding, a former Liberal finance minister, and the banking and commerce committee a few years ago took a very strong stand against any innovations or changes to make bilingual notes legal tender. The Prime Minister last Thursday night laid down a rule for minorities which he expressed in the following words:

> The principle I am laying down is that there is no minority which is superior to the majority when that majority is the people of the country as a whole; and the people of the country as a whole have sent this present House of Commons to legislate.

They did not send this House of Commons to legislate to change the British North America Act and to have bilingual notes foisted on the people over their heads, and to upset the views held by all the finance ministers since confederation. I wish to protest against this dangerous change. It was never discussed in the constituency I represent. I have always argued sincerely and honestly along these lines; I shall continue to do so, and I believe I am taking the right stand in strongly opposing this innovation that is getting into our banking system, in the way I referred to it on the second reading of the bill on Tuesday, June 2. We have the Macmillan report; it is silent on this bilingual question. The various commissions took it for granted that this matter had been settled at confederation forever. I would have opposed any recent concession had I been here, and if necessary alone. I refer to the Royal Commission on Banking and Currency; I see there no reference whatever to bilingualism in their report. I have read the report three times; I studied the findings and the dissenting judgments given by one or more of the commissioners, and examined the index, and I could find no reference to or suggestion of any demand for bilingual notes in Canada. Why not leave things alone? As matters stand, those who need bilingual notes can get them at the French branches by applying to the branch office of the various chartered banks. I have consulted four or five bankers and they all tell me that there is no necessity for this bill; it is more of a political bill for political purposes than it is a banking or economic bill. For that reason I am strongly opposed to it, and I believe the people of Ontario and the English-speaking majority are strongly opposed to it and to any extension under confederation of section 133 of the British North America Act, which was a contract made with the people of the old provinces of Canada. To any extension of that principle I am strongly opposed, and I will vote and speak against it at every stage of this bill, because it is against the letter and spirit of confederation.

Mr. TUCKER (Translation): Mr. Chairman, as a mark of my high regard for my Canadian fellow citizens of French origin, I wish to say a few words, as well as I can, in their own language.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. TUCKER (Translation): I only wish I could speak French with the same fluency as our French Canadian members speak English. Since parliament has assembled most of them have delivered splendid addresses in English. I should like to return the compliment, if I could.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. TUCKER: One of the things which makes me proud to be a Canadian is that I believe that in Canada we have gone farther than any other people in rising above racial and religious prejudices.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. TUCKER (Translation): In the constituency of Rosthern, which it is my privilege to represent in this house, there are large numbers of people belonging to various races who all have become excellent Canadian citizens. Rarely does one hear any mention there of religion or race. A man is accepted for what he is—a good citizen or a bad one. I look forward to the day when that spirit will prevail throughout Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

On my way back from the war, I beheld, when passing through the city of Quebec, a sight the recollection of which always gives me deep pleasure. On the battlefield of the Plains of Abraham, Canadian citizens have erected a single monument to the leaders of the English and French armies, Wolfe and Montcalm, who both fought and fell there. This is typical of the feeling of the Canadian people.

We are just as proud of Montcalm as of Wolfe. They are two of the great heroes in our national history.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. TUCKER (Translation): In concluding these few remarks in French, may I express the wish that the spirit in which we honour these two heroes may continue to grow in Canada so that we may work together, irrespective of race or creed, to make of Canada a land worthy of our heroic forebears whatever their origin, who were the pioneers of our country.

I will support this particular section of the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the few remarks I intend to make, I wish to congratulate and thank my hon. friend from Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) for the kind words he has just uttered. He spoke as a true Canadian! I hope and trust that the views he has expressed will grow and spread throughout the Dominion of Canada.

(Text) I shall try to make my few remarks in answer to the speech of my right hon. friend this afternoon as moderate as I can, and I must congratulate the right hon. gentleman on the moderation of the language he used in discussing this matter. I shall even say that I believe my right hon. friend to be sincere, but he is desperately and dangerously wrong in the sentiments he has expressed. My right hon. friend is sorry that this matter is being, as he said, precipitated into the political field. Will he pardon me if I say that he is the man who is precipitating this matter into the political field? I shall even say that I am sorry my right hon. friend said that he expects this matter will come up at every session in the future, and that there will be motions for repeal, and so on. These words, coming from him, are almost a threat; at the least they are an invitation to do the very thing which he deplores.

I do not believe this will happen. If you look at the matter, Mr. Chairman, I think it is very simple. Before this Bank of Canada Act was introduced by my right hon. friend there were banks in Canada issuing their bills in both languages. The Banque Canadienne Nationale has branches not only in the province of Quebec but all over Canada; the Banque Provinciale du Canada has branches not only in the province of Quebec but throughout Canada, and the notes of those two banks are and always have been bilingual. I have in my pocket a five dollar bill of that type, but I shall not show it in these dangerous times. The parliament of Canada has taken away from these various banking institutions the right to issue notes. Under the act as it stands this is to be done gradually, but in a few years there will be in this country no other bank notes in Canada than those of the Bank of Canada. I ask every fair-minded man in this committee whether it is right that the French population of this dominion, who have always had their bank notes printed in their own language, should be deprived of that right by the parliament of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: You are not deprived of it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am coming to that, and probably that is the very reason why my right hon. friend and his government did what they did. That was not a concession, as my right hon. friend has said so many times. I come back to that word "concession," which I do not like. We are not conceded the right to live or to breathe the air of this country. We have that right. It was not a concession. There always have been bilingual bank notes in Canada, as my good friend from St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White) said the other day in his fine Canadian language. He showed that even before confederation there were these bilingual bank notes, and my good friend, who is as broad-minded as they make them, said that he was in favour of the change proposed by this bill. But mind you, Mr. Chairman, there was something else to justify making it compulsory that there be notes in both languages. Under section 133 of the British North America Act both languages are official in this parliament in the federal courts and in the courts of the province of Quebec. These bank notes are legal tender. As such they will be deposited in the federal courts and in the courts of Quebec where both languages have a right to exist. Surely it is right that these bank notes should be in both languages. I said in 1934, when I proposed the very amendment which is now embodied in this bill, that I was congratulating my right hon. friend on recognizing and acknowledging that this was to be done. What I was criticizing at the time, and what I criticize to-day in his attitude, is the method by which it was done. The moment you concede the thing should be done I cannot understand why there should be two opinions about the right method.

My right hon. friend speaks of the rights of the majority. First, let me tell him he is wrong in assuming to himself the right of speaking for the majority. In this house a majority of the English-speaking population of Canada is represented on your right, Mr. Chairman, and there is also a majority of the French-speaking population represented on your right. In what way could the rights of the majority be infringed by this amendment? I tell my hon. friends on this side of the house or on the other side, when anybody in Canada, whether during an election campaign or otherwise, blames them for the stand they are going to take in this matter, to ask those who criticize them if they prefer to have a bank note all in French if they are English-speaking, or all in English if they are French-speaking, or to have their own language on one side and the other language on the other side. After all, the bank notes issued under my right hon. friend's legislation are legal tender everywhere in Canada. You can pay a $10 debt in Ontario or Saskatchewan with a $10 bank note in French; no one can refuse it. But would not any man be better pleased to have a note with his own language that he can read on one side of it, if he cannot read the other side? I repeat that I cannot find any ground for the objections which are being set forth against this proposal. They are absurd.

In other countries there are some wise people too. I challenge anyone in this committee or elsewhere to show me a bank note of a country in which the language conditions are as they are in Canada, which bank note is not bilingual or even trilingual. Take Belgium; the bank notes there are printed in French and Flemish; in Switzerland there are three languages on the bank notes, French, German and Italian, and it is not so bad after all. In our commonwealth of nations there is South Africa where they have the same condition as in Canada, the bank notes are in Dutch and English. In the Irish Free State they have the two languages of the country on the bank notes. In no country of the world have they two sets of notes, one set in one language and the other set in the other language. Why should we have this stupid thing in this fine Canada of ours? I cannot believe that there are people in my country who are so narrow as not to see that it is better to have a bilingual bank note than to have two issues, one in English and one in French.

My right hon. friend says that under our constitution there must be two different sorts of documents. It has always been so, he said; you have the documents of the house in French and English, giving you the right of selection. If you prefer them in French you take the French, or if you prefer the English you take the English. This is so as a matter of convenience, because the document is less bulky, and for considerations of that kind. But is it so because of the constitution? I have under my hand the rules of this parliament as issued from time to time since confederation. The first book of rules was issued in 1868, and in it one sees exactly what my right hon. friend said is not done in Canada. From the beginning they had one page in French and the alternate page in English, throughout the book. I have the books of 1876, showing exactly the same thing, and in 1896 the same thing. Since then it has been thought more advisable to have one book all in French and another all in English. But this was done not because of the law of the land, not because of any constitutional provision, but merely as a matter of convenience. I have before me similar books from the Irish Free State.

Let me say also how awkward it is for the banks to have to keep two sets of bank notes in their various branches where they have customers who ask for French notes or for English notes. To do so complicates the business of the banks for no good reason whatsoever.

Now, let me refer to what my hon. friend said, and dwelt upon for quite some time, that Canada has two official languages but is not bilingual. My hon. friend the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) asked him a question which he disregarded but which was very proper. May I read to my right hon. friend the words of a man who has left his mark on the history of Canada, a man who was the leader of the party which is now led by my right hon. friend. Let me read to my right hon. friend the words of the greatest Conservative leader of all time in Canada, Sir John A. Macdonald, and I shall ask my right hon. friend to compare the words of that great leader with those the right hon. gentleman uttered this afternoon. Those words are found in the debates of the House of Commons for 1890, column 745:

> I have no accord with the desire expressed in some quarters that by any mode whatever there should be an attempt made to oppress the one language or to render it inferior to the other; I believe that would be impossible if it were tried, and it would be foolish and wicked if it were possible. The statement that has been made so often that this is a conquered country is a propos de rien. Whether it was conquered or ceded, we have a constitution now under which all British subjects are in a position of absolute equality, having equal rights of every kind—of language, of religion, of property and of person. There is no paramount race in this country; there is no conquered race in this country; we are all British subjects, and those who are not English are none the less British subjects on that account.

I commend those words to every Canadian in this year 1936. They are as true to-day as they were at that time. I note with pride that my hon. friends opposite are laying wreaths at the base of the monument to Sir John A. Macdonald in Kingston. All I wish is that his ideas may grow and germinate in this Canada of ours, and that all those who claim that they are his disciples; that they learned their political views and ideas from what he taught them in days gone by, may adhere to the views he then expressed, and stand by the principles which he said should prevail in all the Canadian provinces.

I believe I might be permitted to relate an incident in my life. Some years ago I had the honour to represent Canada on the assembly of the League of Nations in Geneva. At that time a question of minorities which had been annexed to other countries after the treaty of Versailles was being discussed and debated. One gentleman, a prominent delegate in the assembly and at that time president of the confederation of Switzerland, Monsieur Motta, said this to the delegates of the world there assembled:

> In Switzerland we have no minority problem. We are three races living here side by side. I belong to the race which is less populous, namely the Italian race. One of the two other languages I do not speak. I have been elected twice as president of this republic, even by men whose language I do not know. We have no minority question; we are all equal. No person in Switzerland believes that there is one controlling or dominating race or language, and I cannot see why those problems are discussed in other countries constituted as is Switzerland.

I wish that in Canada there may be no minority problem and that we should all act towards, live with and treat others as Canadians, purely and simply.

I will tell my right hon. friend that at this time in my own province I have read speeches made by young people who advocate the separation of Quebec from confederation, and the creation of a new French country. They claim that they cannot have their rights recognized in the Canadian federation. They are wrong; I have told everybody that they are wrong. From my seat in this house to-night I tell them that they are wrong. Even if their plans were carried out they could not achieve what we have achieved in confederation in building up a great free country. The same advice I give to those who think that people of my race should form a party of their own, and should not join one or the other of the great parties which divide public opinion in Canada. They, too, are wrong. Let us adhere to that party the prevailing ideas and principles of which are nearer to those held by us. It is desirable that no political party should be based on racial lines. The view which is sometimes expressed reminds me of the Roman Emperor

Caligula who used to say that he wished that all the Romans would have only one head so that he might cut them off with one stroke. I do not think that is desirable for any minority or any part of a country.

We should continue as we are. We should plead with our friends, our brethren from the other provinces in Canada, to join hands and hearts for the greater development of our country. My right hon. friend has pleaded with me; I plead with him when I say that I do not think it is wrong on the part of those people who speak my language to want to have bank notes with words in their language appearing thereon. I do not think that is wrong. Surely I cannot be branded as a narrow-minded nationalist. When I came to this house I could not speak a word of English; that was many years ago. Had I shared the views of some of my fellow-citizens in Canada I would not have undertaken the drudgery of acquiring that little knowledge I have of a language which at that time was so strange to me. It meant work to acquire that language. I thought I was acting as a good Canadian when I undertook to study it. Surely my hon. friends from my native province who are sitting here to-night are in the same position. It cannot be asked that they be considered only as people who are having concessions handed to them, as my right hon. friend has said. I plead with him not to use that word "concessions" any more either here, or anywhere else in Canada. We do not want any concessions. We do not need any concessions. We do not ask even privileges, we ask simply the right to live as we have lived. There are nine generations of my family buried in this country. I do not need concessions in Canada or anywhere else, and I believe no man or woman in Canada will accuse us of asking too much when we ask what is embodied in this amendment to the Bank of Canada Act.

Mr. HOWARD: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the wonderful speech delivered by our good friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), I hesitate to speak. On the other hand, as an English-speaking Canadian I should like to express my opinion on this subject because I took a stand upon it in the banking and commerce committee when the former government introduced its legislation dealing with the Bank of Canada.

I do not think that in this Canada of ours we should be going backwards, nor do I think any member of this house or any of the people of this country wish that. I have in my hand a piece of money coined in 1837.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

On one side is engraved "Province du Bas Canada—deux sous," and on the other side "Bank token—one penny," and the coin carries the coat of arms of the city of Montreal back in 1837.

I have another one before me, and on one side of it are the words "Province du Bas Canada—deux sous"; and on the other side "Bank token—one penny." This coin also carries the coat of arms of the city of Montreal, and is dated 1837.

I have before me another one, and on one side appear the words "Province du Bas Canada—un sou," and on the other side "Bank token—halfpenny, 1837." This also carries the coat of arms of the city of Montreal.

Another coin I hold in my hand has on one side the words "Lower Canada," in English, and on the other side in French "Un sou, 1837, Agriculture Bas Canada."

I have before me another coin, and on one side appear the words in English, "Quebec bank token, halfpenny," and on the other side in French, "Province du Canada, 1 sou, 1852," and bearing the coat of arms of the city of Quebec.

Another coin I have in my hand has on one side the words in French, "Province du Canada, deux sous"; and on the other side in English, "Quebec bank token, 1 penny, 1852."

When you go into other countries you find that in Belgium, for instance, the coinage is printed in French and in Flemish; in Japan you find an entirely different situation from Canada as to nationalities; yet the Japanese currency is printed in both the English and the Japanese languages. I find the two languages on this Japanese coin, one yen, and its English equivalent.

In China there are many languages, and their coins nearly all carry the English language as well as the Chinese.

In German West Africa, where we find German, Arabic and Dutch people, we find two languages printed on their coins.

On the coinage of British North Borneo we find the English and Bornese languages used.

In East India the coins are printed in both English and Hindustani. In India itself, where they have four principal languages, and in several other countries we find about the same principle carried out in the coinage.

But here we are to-night in the parliament of Canada making almost an issue of the use of the French and English languages on the paper currency of Canada, and after what I have said, Mr. Chairman, of the practice in other countries I am, to say the least, very much surprised at the discussion that has taken place on this clause. I considered my French-Canadian fellow-citizens as heirs and joint heirs with me in the development of this country of ours. I consider them neither my inferiors nor my superiors, and all I ask is that we go forward hand in hand together to develop and make this Canada of ours what we all wish it to be. Some people may think this is a very small matter, some may think it is a large matter; but I would say that nothing is too small to create animosities and hard feelings which may prove a very serious hindrance in the development of this country.

May I give to my English-speaking fellow-members an outstanding example of how the two great races in this country can get along together in amity? In the city of Sherbrooke, in the county of Sherbrooke, back in 1881, the first French-Canadian mayor was elected for the city. At that time the population of the city of Sherbrooke was very largely English-speaking Canadians, about eighty per cent English to twenty per cent French-Canadian. In the municipal council there was one French-Canadian and all the rest were English-Canadians; yet with a council so overwhelmingly English a French-Canadian mayor was elected for the city. What has been the result of that act of equality and of generosity, not of any concession, which was the term used by the leader of the opposition? The result was that two years later an English mayor was elected, and when his term had expired a French-Canadian mayor was again elected. To-day the city of Sherbrooke is eighty per cent French-Canadian and twenty per cent English-Canadian, but that same tradition has been carried down through all the years, an English-speaking mayor for two years and then a French-Canadian mayor for two years. I quote that example because it shows the sense of justice and fair play that has animated the two great races in this country in the city of Sherbrooke since 1881, and I hope the practice which has prevailed ever since will always continue.

I shall not delay the committee further beyond giving one more example along the same line. Only two years ago a French-Canadian mayor of the city of Sherbrooke who had filled his two-year term of office, in view of the change in populations, decided that he would seek a second term. A great discussion took place, and finally an English-speaking citizen ran against the French-Canadian mayor whose term of office had expired, and to the honour of the citizens of Sherbrooke, when the ballots were counted in every single French polling division in the city a majority was given to the English-speaking mayor, showing the great sense of justice and fair play that animates our people. That is the reason why I am so keen that we do not call this "concessions." Our French-speaking fellow-citizens do not want concessions, and so in conclusion I would say: Let us play the game fairly and squarely; let us join hands one with the other whether French or English-speaking; let us have bilingual currency in this country of ours and show that we want to play the game fairly regardless of race, religion or nationality.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is not a matter on which I wish to speak at any length, Mr. Chairman, but in case there is a vote I wish to place my own personal position before the committee.

Two years ago when the legislation setting up the Bank of Canada was before the house the bill was reported from the committee and at the last moment there was introduced an amendment, as I recall it, along the lines of the clause now before us. I voted against that amendment, not so much on the merits of the case, I must confess, but because I resented an amendment of that kind being introduced at the last moment when it could not be adequately discussed and because it was dealing with a matter that was so likely to arouse a good deal of discussion and perhaps bitterness.

I must say that as between the two plans, the one of having a bilingual currency and the other of having two sets of notes, as at present, my judgment is that the bilingual currency is preferable, and for that reason I personally shall have to support the legislation as it is before us to-night, even though I voted against an amendment along this line previously introduced. And yet, in saying that, I regret that the government has seen fit to make the change at this time. I listened to and was very greatly impressed, as we all were, by the eloquent speech of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). But I do not think that in matters of this kind the question can be settled simply as one of right or wrong; it is much more complicated than that. The English-speaking people of Ontario, or at least a great many of them, start from one set of premises; the French-speaking people and even the English who reside in Quebec start from an altogether different set of premises, and there is no point at which these two sets of arguments meet. After all, the problem resolves itself largely into a conflict of fundamental ideas which people hold to most tenaciously. I think there was something in what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said, though I regret his use of the word "concessions," that unless we are very careful in Canada we may easily introduce matters which will prove very inflammable indeed, and for my part I would say that our French-Canadian friends will have to exercise just a little bit of care not to be too aggressive in pushing their particular point of view, just as I feel very strongly that the English speaking-population have sometimes been prejudiced with regard to these matters of language and so on. For my part it is a matter of indifference whether we have bills printed in both languages or not; it is not important at all from my standpoint. I say, however, that if we are going to carry out the spirit for which the Minister of Justice pleads we shall have to recognize a little more clearly than we do the point of view of others in Canada and not to press too aggressively our own viewpoint. I know that is a little vague and it is an ideal which it is very difficult to attain, but I felt that to-night I ought to give my own point of view. That some of my colleagues may not think as I do merely emphasizes the fact that such questions provoke personal reactions and that a good deal depends upon how we weight this or that factor in the problem.

Mr. DUNNING: Naturally, a number of considerations were in the mind of the government in dealing with this matter and in drafting this particular section. I take the view that the question of principle, in so far as there is a principle, was adopted in the year 1934 by the parliament which preceded this one, but the principle was applied in a manner calculated, as experience has proved, to produce rather than to allay the kind of friction to which reference has been made. There is a marked difference between printing separately in each language the routine proceedings of this house—which any one of us may accept or reject—and printing separately in each language legal tender which passes from hand to hand. We have plenty of evidence of the objection to the present method. Frequently protests come to me, as my right hon. friend admitted they came to him, from English-speaking parts of Canada. Why? Because French bills had turned up there. There is no means whereby the turning up of English bills in Quebec or of French bills in other parts of Canada can be prevented, and there is complaint on that score. I say that a more intelligent method of dealing with the matter is to put both languages on the same bill. The parliament and the government of Canada during the course of many years have recognized the desirability of this method in matters of currency. For example, I have in my hand a Canadian postal note, the kind of postal note that has circulated in Canada these many years, printed in both languages on its face. I have before me a Canadian postal money order circulated in these terms in Canada these many years, printed in both languages.

I have personal reason to know that prejudice can be aroused by these documents. I am one of those who have suffered politically because of my belief in this matter. In 1930 the candidate supporting my right hon. friend made the most, and in the most public manner, of what is called the French language issue and promised without qualification that if his party were returned to power French on these postal notes and post office orders would be removed. This did not happen. But I say that if we were right in 1934 in providing for French separately in connection with currency we ought consistently at the same time to have provided for separate English and French postal notes and postal money orders.

Now, with regard to the purely practical aspect, may I point out that the method at present in use is expensive to the bank. It involves two separate sets of plates for every note. If that can be reduced to one, there is a saving of $29,000 in connection with any new note. The existence of the two different sets of notes involves, of course, separate sorting of the stock and the turn-over. Think of it—and the turn-over. Although the demand for French notes is experienced chiefly in Quebec and Ontario, it is necessary to keep a stock of both at all the agencies of the Bank of Canada right across the country, because we are required to make the notes available in either language throughout the dominion. The need to sort the notes as they are paid in nearly doubles the labour of sorting in the important agency of Montreal and considerably increases it in Ottawa and Toronto. This is indeed the chief extra cost which is incurred. Both English and French banks tend to pay into the central bank notes which do not suit their requirements as to language, and it therefore follows that the total receipts and reissues of notes are greatly increased above what would normally be the case if the notes were bilingual. It is my opinion that the cost of the work of sorting the notes of a single type would be much less than half the cost now involved. The existence of two kinds of notes also involves a double set of books with respect to the currency issue, and, of course, larger space in vaults, which is not possibly a material factor. In connection with expense, it is bound to increase steadily by reason of the diminution of the chartered banks' issue. Expenses due to the present system will necessarily increase steadily. In connection with the sorting alone I believe it is fair to say that between $9,000 and $10,000 per annum could be saved by the substitution of a single note for each denomination in the place of the two which are now issued. There are other considerations of a minor kind, but in the main this is, I submit, the proper thing to do. It is the practical application of the principle which the parliament of Canada accepted in 1934.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 16—Gold and securities to be turned over to bank.

Mr. BENNETT: I have to remark that here, again, the draftsman has departed from the usual rule, for anyone picking up the statute after it has been amended by this committee will find it difficult to discover how the Bank of Canada came into being at all, having regard to the disappearance of the section that deals with the certificate, and now the government is eliminating from the record the provisions that deal with the bank assuming the liability it did with respect to dominion notes and the turning over of the gold which the bank held. I am only going to point out, that in no previous statute which I can recall that had to do with the creation of even an ordinary corporation did the sections which had to deal with the antecedent conditions of its coming into being disappear because certain amendments were made. I content myself with making that observation.

Mr. DUNNING: I think my right hon. friend has a point there. Even I as a layman can see that the retaining of a proviso which relates to a non-existent section in so far as the statute is concerned after it is amended does appear to be an error. Perhaps the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will be good enough to move that section 16 of the bill be struck out.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it may be necessary to maintain it because of certain changes which were made in another section. It will be recalled that, in the power which is now conferred upon the bank to acquire securities, reference is no longer made to excluding the securities that were given to the bank to ensure it against loss in connection with its assumption of the obligation connected with the issue of dominion notes, and the two sections, of course, have a close relation the one to the other. This old section 16 was the one which enabled the Bank of Canada to take over the gold held by the country as well as by the chartered banks, and which enabled the new bank to receive from the crown, that is from the dominion, certain securities bearing rate at three per cent per annum for the purpose of being an effective and efficient guarantee against loss on the part of the bank because it had assumed responsibility for the note issue by the Dominion of Canada. If we repeal, as we are doing, subsections three, five and six, and then say—

> Provided that the authority to pay the principal of and interest on securities issued to the bank under the aforesaid subsections three and six shall continue.

—six and three both being repealed, we certainly have a condition to which even I, in my capacity as schoolmaster, might direct attention.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Suppose we cancel section 16 altogether.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the suggestion.

Mr. BENNETT: All right; I think you will find some more difficulties.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, my right hon. friend can see difficulties I—

Mr. BENNETT: I have no intention of obtruding them on the notice of those who have no desire to see them.

Mr. DUNNING: I was accepting what I thought was a valuable suggestion by my right hon. friend, and proposing that section 16 of the bill might be struck out. As I understand it, that would have the effect of leaving in the act the subsections noted in small print on the opposite page. I am trying to find out what difficulty would be created by leaving them in the act, but inasmuch as they relate to what shall be done on the day on which the bank shall be authorized to commence business—that is the whole point, I think—I thought my right hon. friend would look at it in his capacity as a lawyer.

Mr. BENNETT: He has no advice to offer. I have been endeavouring, Mr. Chairman, to present suggestions which I hoped would be helpful. Having had them designated in the form they were, I address myself to the chair and leave myself entirely in the hands of the committee.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Reserve defined.

Mr. REID: Before that section is carried there are some matters I should like to speak about, and it is my intention to move an amendment to section 26 of the act. It will be remembered that last year and again this year I introduced into the house a bill to amend the Bank of Canada Act in respect of the remonetization or greater use of silver. On both those occasions this bill was thrown out by the Speaker as not being in order, but on both occasions only fifty per cent of the proposed measure was criticized by the Speaker. The particular matter I have in mind this evening is in connection with subsection 4 of section 26, which is the clause relating to the agreement signed by Canada in London, in 1933. The present clause in the bill reads thus:

(4) The bank shall during the years 1935, 1936 and 1937 purchase and hold newly-mined Canadian silver as and when required so to do by the minister, but the bank shall never be required to purchase more than 1,671,802 fine ounces in any year.

In my opinion this should not have been placed in the Bank of Canada Act at all. This was in accordance with an agreement signed in London in 1933, when, I believe, some twenty-six countries attended. At that gathering a resolution introduced by the United States for the greater use and the adoption of silver was finally disposed of by certain nations agreeing to do certain things within the next few years. The United States, Canada, Australia, Mexico and Peru agreed to purchase between them 35,000,000 ounces of silver during the years 1935, 1936 and 1937, and other countries, including India and Spain, agreed not to sell over a certain amount of silver during those same years. This was introduced into the house, and, as I said, should have been in a special bill and not have been placed in the Bank of Canada Act. Of the 35,000,000 ounces, the United States agreed to purchase 24,421,410 ounces; Canada agreed, as I have pointed out, to purchase 1,671,802 ounces, and the other countries I have mentioned agreed to purchase the balance. Briefly, that is the history of the London conference agreement, but I want to draw particular attention to one word in the Bank of Canada Act which I do not believe exists in any other statute of this country, and that is the word "never." It says in the Bank of Canada Act that the bank shall "never" during those years purchase more than that.

Mr. DUNNING: It does not say "never."

Mr. REID: The act says that the bank shall "never" during the years mentioned be required to purchase more than 1,671,802 ounces. When the matter was before the house I endeavoured to have that word "never" taken out. I asked for an explanation, and I think it is pertinent to the amendment I am offering to read the remarks of the then Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) as they appear at page 4262 of Hansard for June 25, 1934:

The word "never" is probably an undesirable word to use in a statute, but it was put in this bill for a definite purpose, namely to prevent false hopes being created in the hearts of those who might be concerned. During the currency of the world's agreement it will be observed by the hon. gentleman that everything depends upon the agreement being kept. And India, being the key to the situation and having agreed as she did agree, we have added these words to indicate what our position will be, because we will have more silver than we will know just what to do with.

Right there, Mr. Chairman, the right hon. gentleman was in error in stating that we would have more silver than we would know what to do with. In the mint at that time they had between three and four million ounces of silver which was being used for the issuing of coins, but at that time none had been purchased under the agreement. During the past few days we have heard a great deal about living in the days of ox carts, but I wonder how many members realize that in spite of the up to dateness of our so-called monetary system in connection with the issuing of cheques and credit, the faith of the people of the world still clings to the precious metals. When I mentioned that of silver I want to point out that sixty per cent of the population of the entire world still use silver in their everyday transactions and still look upon it as real wealth.

I realize, in advocating this change, that most people fear that the printing press will be turned on, but in the short time I am going to take up I am going to try to show that we have here something that will act as a kind of a brake and a stabilizer, if I can use that word, against the issuing of unlimited paper money. Confidence is the one thing the people must have in their currency if we are to carry on without panic or disaster, and we must also have discernible limitations. I am going to endeavour to show that silver is one of those discernible limitations, and I maintain that we should add it to gold in connection with the further issue of paper currency.

The present valuation of our gold, which is roughly $180,000,000, has been brought about by the action of the United States, which raised the price from $20.67 per ounce to, roughly $35 per ounce. In this country we are getting the benefit of that action. No one can say how long that arbitrary value will remain; it may drop or rise again to-morrow. I listened with a great deal of attention to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) when he spoke of uncontrolled inflation and mentioned what happened in Germany. I should like to point out to the hon. gentleman that the value of the United States dollar in the markets of the world has not been reduced by the issuance of millions of paper silver certificates. It is true that when gold was revalued at $35 an ounce the dollar dropped to about sixty cents, but after the issuance of silver certificates by the United States the value remains at about the same figure. The policy of the United States is worth noting. They have undertaken by statute to purchase silver until the silver reserve amounts to twenty-five per cent of the gold held by that country, and they are paying for the silver without going to the banks and borrowing money on which interest must be paid. It must be borne in mind that the silver certificates, one of which I hold in my hand, are just as valuable as the Canadian dollar, if not more valuable. On its face the silver certificate says, "one dollar in silver payable to the bearer on demand," while if one looks at our bills one finds that all one can do is to exchange one piece of paper for another. So, if it comes to having something tangible, the United States dollar may have the edge on ours, and in a case of a panic it might be in greater demand because it is backed by a precious metal.

What has Canada done in regard to silver? I should like to point out, first, that Canada is the third largest producer of silver in the world, with the United States the leading nation. In 1935 Canada produced 10,000,000 ounces of silver, so this country has a great deal to gain by recognizing this metal. We are trying to extend our trade with the United States, but in my opinion we slapped the United States in the face when we inserted the word "never" in this act, saying that we were not going to raise false hopes in the hearts of people with regard to silver. It may be that no leadership is going to come out of Europe and that by turning to the orient and South America the United States is going to take the lead in the Pacific as far as trading is concerned. If so her silver policy will play an important part. To carry out her policy she will still have to buy well over a billion ounces of silver, and I may say that at the moment she is buying practically all the newly-mined silver produced in Canada. Last year I believe the United States made a profit of some $19,000,000 on the newly-mined Canadian silver. When the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, (Mr. McGeer) was speaking the other evening he endeavoured to outline the profit that was accruing to this country in regard to silver and the silver dollar. He was not quite correct, nor was the Minister of Finance correct when he stated that we were making no such profit. My information comes from the master of the mint, and it may interest many hon. members to learn that on every silver dollar issued we make a profit of between sixty and seventy cents.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a gross profit.

Mr. REID: Yes. So far we have issued approximately $500,000 in silver, and on every one hundred thousand silver dollars issued by the mint this country makes a profit of between sixty and seventy thousand dollars.

Mr. DUNNING: Net or gross?

Mr. REID: Gross. As has been pointed out, in Canada silver coins are eight-tenths fine, and there are three-fifths of an ounce in each dollar. Each ounce contains 480 grains. If the silver in our dollar were pure each dollar would contain 360 grains, but it is only ·800 fine. Until 1921 our silver coins were ·925 fine, but in 1921 the act was changed and we reduced the percentage of silver in our coins until now they are ·800 fine. So a silver dollar actually contains only 288 grains or six-tenths of an ounce of silver. If silver is bought on the world market at forty cents an ounce, as it has been bought at times, the actual cost of the silver dollar is only twenty-four cents. But, irrespective of the price of silver, every ounce of silver minted makes $1.60 in coin, so that if an ounce of silver costs forty cents there is a gross profit of $1.20 on every ounce minted.

At one time this country produced as high as 30,000,000 ounces of silver a year. In 1910 there were produced 32,869,264 ounces, and it might interest the committee to know that there were at that time engaged in the industry approximately 15,000 men. Last year the production was not as great; we produced only some 16,000,000 ounces, and there were engaged in the industry only some 1,500 men. To-day we are looking for employment for our people, and right here is something which we can produce in abundance and which is in world demand. Here we have in our hills, especially in British Columbia, a product which is in demand in most countries of the world and will certainly be in demand in most countries of the world for some time to come by our neighbour to the south, which country has to buy well over a billion ounces if they fulfil their agreement or statutory requirements. Of course our bankers do not like that idea, as we would be making money or currency without any interest and naturally they would be against that. Those who trade in money are the ones who grow rich; the others grow poor, and the United States, by giving the lead in silver may well, as I say, become the leading trader in the orient and Pacific countries. We at least should have supported the United States in her silver buying policy.

Many countries to-day are turning to silver. One notices when a panic takes place, as has taken place in France, that the first thing the people do is to get hold of either gold or silver and hide it or take it out of the country. Some day there may be in the world a perfect system under which all business can be done with paper money, but until that time comes we have to do business with the world as other countries want us to do it. I repeat: There are over 1,200,000,000 people in the world who use silver or live in silver using countries. It may be said that we might disrupt the world if we went on a silver basis. I realize that if the economic affairs of a country are changed too quickly, this might lead to confusion, but I noticed the other day in this connection that experts are now claiming that if Great Britain paid her debt now to the United States this might create havoc in that country. It is questionable, of course, whether that debt will ever be paid. I am advocating, however, that greater consideration should be given to this silver question. The trade of the world, it should be noted, can be paid for in only two ways, either in goods or in some currency acceptable to the country which is selling the goods. It was when barriers were raised by each country against others, and countries were forced off gold, that the tragic circumstances of unemployment with its consequent distress which we have witnessed during the past few years took place. There is not enough gold in the world to finance the world's trade. Three countries practically control it all. I believe the United States is up against the financiers of the old world, who are endeavouring to cling to the gold fetish, but it may well be that the United States by her silver policy will compel those nations to come back to the old system and again use silver along with gold. In Canada we could well use all our silver. The leader of the opposition this afternoon talked about gold going out of this country, pointing out that it might be well to keep that gold here—

Mr. BENNETT: Some of it.

Mr. REID: —and issue $50,000,000 in paper against it. He indicated that the $50,000,000 in paper put into circulation would be good for the country. I quite agree. But he could have gone a little further. We could do the same with our silver, and perhaps do even better with our silver than we are doing with our gold. The United States is paying its miners 64½ cents an ounce for newly-mined silver. I wonder how many in this committee know or care what the United States is doing in regard to that. I am going to state it and ask hon. members why we in this country cannot do the same thing. In the United States the miner can take 5,000 ounces of newly-mined silver to the mint, which keeps 2,500 ounces and mints the rest into silver dollars. Two thousand five hundred ounces of silver make close to $3,500, so the miner takes $3,500 new, shiny silver dollars back for his 5,000 ounces of silver. That nets him a price of approximately 64½ cents an ounce. We in this country could do the same thing. Either we could issue silver certificates for our silver output or we could issue partly silver dollars and partly silver certificates. If silver certificates were issued we would have a backing to our currency which cost this country little more than the cost of the paper. I should like to hear the minister say why we could not or should not do that in Canada. Oh, yes, we may be told perhaps that putting more paper into circulation will not help. But I know that in 1921 the total paper money in circulation was $464,444,000 and the trade of the country was over $2,000,000,000. The trade of the country last year was well over $1,000,000,000, but our total note circulation, according to the figures I have, was $209,864,870. If that amount of note circulation was required in 1921 to do the business of the country, surely we could issue more paper currency, even to an equal amount, without causing any havoc or distress or bringing about a crisis by undermining the value of our dollar in the markets of the world. I maintain that we could. If we backed our currency with at least one-quarter in silver as the United States are doing, I believe we would more readily hold the confidence of the people, if not strengthen it, and, after all, confidence must be maintained, especially in regard to currency.

Now I am coming to the amendment that I have to offer, because that is what I am interested in at the moment, as well, of course as in advocating silver. The Bank of Canada Act, section 25, subsection 3, provides that:

> On the day on which the bank is authorized to commence business the minister shall transfer to the bank—
> (a) gold held by the minister for redemption of dominion notes;
> (b) silver held by the minister for redemption of dominion notes valued at the market price of the fine silver content thereof.

When that was enacted we had no silver held for redemption of dominion notes. The only silver we had was the silver in the mint.

Mr. BENNETT: Did we not have silver in the vaults?

Mr. REID: The information I have is that there was none in the vaults; that all the silver was held in the mint. There may have been some held in the vaults for the mint.

Mr. BENNETT: Part of it had been purchased as far back as the time of Sir Henry Drayton as Minister of Finance, shortly after the war. I was wondering if the hon. member was saying that the amount which was included in the vaults of the Department of Finance was there for the mint, because it was all to go there ultimately.

Mr. REID: It was held for the mint by the Minister of Finance, but it was held for coinage purposes. There was no silver held at that time for the redemption of dominion notes. That did not come about until we procured it under the London agreement. Subsection 2 (a) refers to silver bullion received under the next preceding section. There was no silver held for the redemption of notes, so no silver could be taken over under the bank reserve.

I am proposing an amendment to take out the word "never" and to make the amount mentioned in the London agreement, namely 1,671,802 fine ounces the minimum amount instead of the maximum amount as at present. I move in amendment:

That subsection 4 of section 26 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

(4) The bank shall purchase and hold newly-mined Canadian silver as and when required so to do by the minister, provided that during the years 1935, 1936 and 1937 the bank shall be required to purchase and hold not less than 1,671,802 fine ounces in any year.

Before the amendment is put I should like to say one word more. I know the statement will be made that the bank is not prohibited from purchasing silver, but if hon. members will read the act as it stands to-day I think they will agree that this is a prohibitory clause, and that the bank cannot purchase unless the minister says so. When we examine the present clause we find it states that the bank shall during the years 1935, 1936 and 1937, purchase and hold newly-mined Canadian silver as and when required so to do by the minister. Stopping at that point one would conclude that the minister could order the bank to purchase more silver. Then, if one reads the balance he will find that the act actually prohibits or precludes the minister from ordering the bank to purchase more, because it states that the bank "shall never be required" by the minister to purchase more than 1,671,802 fine ounces. My amendment does not interfere with the first paragraph; it permits the minister to purchase silver as and when he requires to do so, and it makes the London agreement amount the minimum rather than, as at present, the maximum. This will be at least a gesture towards our neighbour to the south who is endeavouring to cut a new path and to bring about, if possible, stabilization of world currency, if I may use that expression. I would ask the minister's very favourable consideration of that which I have now placed before the committee.

Mr. DUNNING: The change involved in the amendment is that the minister's power to require the bank to purchase newly-mined silver is extended indefinitely. By the subsection now existing the minister's power extends to the years 1935, 1936 and 1937, the language of the statute being:

The bank shall during the years 1935, 1936 and 1937 purchase and hold newly-mined Canadian silver as and when required so to do by the minister ...

And for the time being I shall stop at that point. The amendment is that:

The bank shall purchase and hold newly-mined silver as and when required so to by the minister—

Without any limitation on the minister's power to require the bank so to do to the three years involved under the present law. Then, the proviso is changed, because the law as it stands at present is:

... the bank shall never be required to purchase more than 1,671,802 fine ounces in any year.

The amendment is:

... provided that during the years 1935, 1936 and 1937 the bank shall be required to purchase and hold not less than 1,671,802 fine ounces in any one year.

I am inclined to the view that on both these counts the amendment is out of order. The first suggestion enlarges the minister's power to require beyond the year 1937, and the change from "never be required to purchase and hold not less than" to "shall be required to purchase and hold not less than," is out of order as a measure which could be introduced only by a member of the government and with the approval of his excellency.

Mr. REID: Before the question is put, may I say that I am sorry the minister has taken that attitude. When I put my views before the house on a previous occasion this part of the proposed change was never touched upon. Exception was taken to the first part. It was pointed out that no member could introduce legislation involving an expenditure of money. I contend that it looks now very much like quibbling on words. I am endeavouring to give the minister power, but I am still permitting the Bank of Canada in the years 1935, 1936 and 1937, to purchase 1,671,802 fine ounces of silver. That is the real gist of the amendment. At the present time the bank cannot purchase one ounce more, and if hon. members will take the trouble to look at the last statement of the Bank of Canada they will find that it has only two years' supply on hand. She cannot purchase more because of the prohibitory clause in the Bank of Canada Act, and to-day we are allowing our silver to cross the line, where the United States are making millions of dollars out of it. We shall before long find ourselves on the short end of the stick, if some action is not taken. If the amendment is not worded correctly, perhaps the minister would word it in a manner which would take it outside the prohibitory rule.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, while you are considering the point of order on the main question involved, may I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the present act merely puts a limit upon the amount of silver which the minister may require the bank to purchase. It does not mean that the bank of its own volition could not acquire a larger amount of silver. Paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 21 of the act empowers the bank to buy and sell gold, silver, nickel and bronze coin and gold and silver bullion. The limitation in the section of the act now under discussion is simply a limitation upon the minister's power to require the bank to do so and so. I point out that under another section of the act the bank has power to acquire silver. The limitation in this instance is upon the minister's power to require the bank to do so.

I cannot say anything further on the point, but possibly I might be permitted to give some general information on the silver situation as it applies to the Bank of Canada. It must be remembered that silver is a commodity subject to fluctuation, and indeed wide fluctuation in price. Last year the price of silver fluctuated from less than forty-five cents to about eighty cents per fine ounce.

Even the very small holdings of the Bank of Canada resulted in a loss of $489,368 to the bank between March 11 and December 31 of last year. The dominion government, of course, through the Royal Canadian Mint, and not the Bank of Canada, is the coinage authority of the country. The dominion government is at all times prepared to coin and make available to the public such supplies of silver coins as the public demand will absorb. Last year the silver dollar was issued for the first time, and so far 428,200 of these coins have been put into circulation. The 1936 silver dollar is now being coined; so far 205,200 of these coins have been put into circulation and the government has undertaken to coin as many silver dollars as the public will absorb. I should add that the Royal Canadian Mint has on hand a stock of silver bullion amounting to approximately 3,000,000 fine ounces, which, based upon the average for the last ten years, is sufficient to take care of our normal coinage requirements for about ten years. That information I thought the committee should have with respect to the present coinage situation.

Mr. BENNETT: I wish to answer just one point that was raised by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) who directed attention to the fact that I pointed out last year that we did not know what to do with silver on hand. As a matter of fact we had practically ten years' supply of silver on hand. That is what I meant to say, and we did not know what to do with it because, with the demand being as it was, we could not usefully coin it into dollars, quarters and dimes. That is the reason for the observation I then made. I had the same information on the subject as the Minister of Finance has given to the committee. I have thought—and I supported the thought by such action as we could take—of increasing the use of the silver dollar. There is in British Columbia an organization that has been urging very strongly the issuing in increasing numbers of the silver dollars. The special silver dollar that was issued last year met with a very considerable demand, but unfortunately not for currency purposes. Very few of these dollars were used, as a matter of fact, in the ordinary commercial channels, but they were put away as souvenirs. The coinage of a new dollar this year to the extent of $200,000 must add something to the circulation of silver dollars, but for some reason best known perhaps to those who are familiar with the psychological resentment against having heavy pieces of coin in one's pocket, the silver dollar except among the Chinese and others from the orient has not had a very wide circulation. As a matter of fact, I have never personally received in this country in recent years a silver dollar in change.

I think the hon. gentleman overlooked the fact that under what he was good enough to refer to as the London agreement there was a purchase of silver prior to the Bank of Canada Act coming into force, and the provision in the Bank of Canada Act that the bank should be the agent for the minister in acquiring the silver for those three years was introduced so that the bank authorities, those who had to deal with gold and silver bullion, should themselves make the purchases rather than the minister. I say that to the hon. gentleman because there was some silver that had been acquired by the Minister of Finance under the London agreement and that was available for redemption purposes. That was what was meant by that provision of the section to which the hon. gentleman has referred. As to the larger question, of course, I have nothing to say.

Mr. REID: I should like to add just one word, and to ask the Minister of Finance two questions. I should like to know definitely if the bank is now empowered to buy or could buy all the silver it wanted.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no question of that, as I understand the law.

Mr. REID: If we are just going to put out silver dollars we shall never make any great headway. When I think of British Columbia and all its idle silver mines, which could put thousands of our people to work as they were at work in 1910, when 15,000 were employed in the silver mines; when I think that we could take over the product of those mines and pay for it without any cost to the country and strengthen the confidence of our people for they would know that behind the issuance of the silver certificates would be a precious metal which had an intrinsic market value apart from any monetary value placed upon it, and in view of the fact that the United States is going ahead and will purchase more than one billion ounces of newly-mined silver at the world market price, I think we could well consider what could be done in this country by taking our newly-mined silver at a guaranteed price and, as I said, without any cost to us at all. If we are looking forward to putting our people at work, this is one way in which we can do it, and it may be that the United States is giving a lead to the world. I believe she is bucking the gold bloc of financiers who are determined to keep the world on the gold basis. There are only three countries in the world to-day which have the gold to trade with, and the trade of the world has in consequence become stagnant. This is a question which the people can understand. It is as old as the hills, and as long as the people have faith in precious metals, as they have at the present time, we should look to our mines, take the silver we have and issue silver money or currency without cost to the government.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of what the hon. gentleman said in the earlier part of his observations respecting the attitude taken at the time the bill was introduced, I would point out that he has overlooked one fact, and that is that in 1910 India had not been put upon the gold standard, and silver then had a value in India, from the standpoint of acquisition, which it does not now possess. The Indian situation is the one that complicates the whole question of silver. The accumulations of silver in India, as I pointed out in 1934, when the bill was in the form in which it was, are very large, and it was because India agreed to the terms of the London convention that it became effective at all. The hon. gentleman will remember that Senator Pittman is the great protagonist of the silver theory in the United States, and he was chairman of the committee that brought about the signature of the London agreement, but to do so he had to effect an arrangement with India, which arrangement was based upon certain restrictions that are indicated in the agreement which was tabled.

There is one other question apart altogether from the Indian situation, and that is that the policy resorted to by the United States has perhaps fallen down—perhaps that is not an unfair way to put it—because the price of silver, which was as high, I think, as eighty cents an ounce, certainly somewhere over seventy cents within the last fifteen months, has now dropped until it has reached the figure of, I think, twenty-two pence an ounce in London, and the price in America is the world price. That is the reason that in 1934 the provisions in the act were as they are. It will be recalled by the hon. member that the first function which the bank possesses is to buy and sell gold and silver bullion. That is one of its general powers. This was, so far as we are concerned, merely a matter of convenience when we put it into the statute to enable the Bank of Canada to discharge a duty which, under the agreement, rested upon the Minister of Finance.

The CHAIRMAN: I quote from Bourinot, 4th edition, page 407, chapter 13:

> No cases can be found of any private member in the Canadian commons receiving the authority of the crown, through a minister, to propose a motion involving the expenditure of public money. No principle is better understood than the constitutional obligation that rests upon the executive government, of alone initiating measures imposing charges upon the public exchequer. On one occasion, in the English commons the consent of the crown was given to certain formal resolutions proposed by a private member with reference to charges in courts of law to be defrayed out of the consolidated fund. It was thought, however, that any resolution placing a charge on the consolidated fund should be moved by a minister of the crown, and the more regular procedure was thereupon carried out. It was distinctly affirmed, however, that the member who proposed the motion involving the charge was within his right when he had the sanction of the crown, but it was generally admitted at the same time that it was better, as a matter of policy, that the proposition should emanate from a responsible adviser of the sovereign.

Under section 17 of the bill the minister is restricted in the purchase of silver, but in this amendment there is no restriction. I therefore rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister will now explain the reasons why the changes have been made with respect to foreign exchanges which the bank may hold.

Mr. DUNNING: I can add very little to the explanation opposite the section in the bill. From the standpoint of administration the amendments are meant to make clear the intention of the original paragraph:

> Under the old wording the "balances" held in the central banks mentioned might be balances in any currency. The new wording restricts the balances held as reserves to balances held in the form of pounds sterling, United States of America dollars and currencies which by law or in fact are convertible on demand into exportable gold.

The same change is made in regard to bills of exchange.

Mr. BENNETT: I really cannot understand how the author of the note can speak with such authority as to the intention in connection with this matter. It was quite the opposite so far as I am concerned. We were giving power to this bank to hold exchanges that were exchangeable in law and in fact for exportable gold. That was the whole point, and we did not restrict them to the limitations now imposed. The section provided:

> (b) foreign exchange, which shall mean—
> (i) balances with the Bank of England, the Bank for International Settlements, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and a central bank in any country whose currency by law and in fact is convertible on demand at a fixed price into exportable gold.

That was done with malice aforethought, so to speak. It was intended that if it were desirable in the public interest to acquire either Belgian or Holland exchange, that might be done; especially was that true with respect to Holland exchange at that time. The effect of the amendment is that the definition of foreign exchanges is limited to balances in pounds sterling. I have some little difficulty about that, because some of the Scandinavian countries have so arranged their monetary system as, to use the colloquial language of the street, to tie themselves to the pound. It may be that the limitations at the end will remedy any difficulty in that regard, because it says:

> —which by law and in fact are convertible on demand at a fixed price into exportable gold held in the Bank of England, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, the Bank for International Settlements or a central bank in any country the currency of which is convertible as hereinbefore described.

What is the difference between the two? That is my difficulty. It turns the sentence around, but at the end of it it meets the difficulty to which I refer. When the hon. gentleman says that it was the intention of parliament to do so and so, I point out that the new section also provides for foreign exchange of the "central bank in any country the currency of which is convertible as hereinbefore described." It no longer applies to Belgium, but it certainly does to Holland, and that is what the original statute provided for, namely, any exchange that was convertible by law and in fact into exportable gold. There is, for instance, a limitation as to the minimum quantity that can be drawn. I believe that in some countries it is the equivalent of $4,000, and it is drawn in bullion and not in coin. But it is in law and in fact convertible into exportable gold. Reading the two sections, I should like to know, as a matter of information, just what the difference is.

Mr. DUNNING: I am advised that under the section as it stands it would have been possible to hold a balance in the Bank of England in terms of Chinese yen or of Brazilian milreis. The intention of the amendment is to make it clear that the balances must be in pounds sterling, United States of America dollars and currencies which by law and in fact are convertible on demand, and so on.

Mr. BENNETT: If there is any doubt about it I cannot see it. However I do not want to stand in the way.

On section 18—Inspection.

Mr. DUNNING: This explains itself.

Mr. BENNETT: I doubt the desirability of the inspector general of chartered banks being the man. He is a servant of the chartered banks and is paid by them. It must not be forgotten that he is paid by the chartered banks.

Mr. DUNNING: He is not their servant.

Mr. BENNETT: He is not their servant in the sense that they can tell him what to do, but he is their servant in the sense that they provide the money to pay him. I do not think this section as it stands, entrusting that power to the inspector general —and I speak in the light of experience—is desirable, because it is the very thing which, in fact, I consider undesirable, inasmuch as it places the destiny of that phase of banking operations entirely in the hands of one who is paid by the chartered banks themselves. That I regard as very unsound, in the light of the experience I had when I was in the Department of Finance.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know what the experience in question was, but I may point out that the original section was:

> For the purpose of this section the bank may authorize the inspector general of banks or one of its own officers ...

And so on.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that.

Mr. DUNNING: If there is any serious idea that the inspector general of banks, on the ground that the banks are required to pay him, is in any sense not the servant of the minister and subject to the minister's instructions, then I should prefer to change that provision, but it seems that, as a matter of convenience in determining that the return required by subsection 2 of this section is correct, in connection with the inspector general's normal duties, it is more convenient for him to do this work than for anyone else to do it; and making it a requirement instead of being optional on the part of the central bank that the inspector general shall do it, clarifies the situation completely in that regard. I frankly confess that I had not thought of the point raised by my right hon. friend, that the fact that the inspector general of banks is appointed by the chartered banks involves in any sense a responsibility on the part of the inspector general to the chartered banks. The requirements of the law is that the chartered banks shall pay, but the law also provides that he is an officer of the Department of Finance and takes his instructions from the minister.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask what way he is paid, whether by fees charged for his services, or amongst the banks themselves by arrangement, or how?

Mr. DUNNING: The expenses of his office are made by law a charge upon the chartered banks, and they are assessed for the cost.

Mr. BENNETT: Paid by the banks through the Canadian Bankers' Association as a matter of convenience, I think. This question engaged the attention of the late government, and the inspector general was put forward as being a suitable person, but we did not leave it at that; we provided that one of the officers of the Department of Finance might be required to make inspections. I well recall the appointment.

Mr. DUNNING: One of the officers of the bank, not of the Department of Finance.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, of the central bank. He now becomes an officer of the crown. This officer of the central bank has to make the investigation, and the investigation is one of very considerable importance. Personally, if I had to do it over again, I would eliminate the clause which provides for the inspector general to make the investigation, and would provide that it should be done by an officer of the bank, and I may say, in the light of more mature knowledge, that the provision for the appointment of an inspector general is wholly useless, being in practice without value. I well remember when Mr. Robb dealt with the matter in the way he did. I was not then in the house. I think it was nothing more than a bit of window-dressing. My considered opinion is that it serves no purpose and is wholly without value.

Section 19 agreed to.

On section 20—Appointment of auditors.

Mr. BENNETT: This is an extraordinary section. It takes away from the shareholders the right to appoint the auditors and vests it in the governor in council, which, I think, is highly undesirable. Inasmuch as the Minister of Finance is made a shareholder for all purposes except one, and that one the election of directors, and that the ordinary right of shareholders still obtains with respect to class "A" shareholders, the appointment of the auditor should come from the shareholders and not from the governor in council. I can conceive of nothing that would be less calculated to inspire confidence than a set-up of that kind, by which the governor general in council is to name the auditors. That matter also was discussed considerably in committee. The auditors for the present year have been appointed; it is provided that the governor in council shall make the appointment not later than January 31 in each year. This year the auditors have been appointed by the shareholders in accordance with the provisions of the law. I take it that this section would not be applicable until next year; then, when the shareholders meet, as they will, to deal with the report of the governor and the directors of the bank, they should be asked, I submit, to appoint the auditor, and the list or panel from which they shall make their choice is limited to the type of men who are auditors of chartered banks. Is it quite right to say that the governor in council shall name the auditors when you still continue to provide ownership with respect to class "A" shares, and class "B" shares, you have said, shall have all the rights and privileges which are incidental to ownership of shares except one, namely the right to vote for the election of directors? Should not the shareholders and not the governor in council elect the auditors?

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend is quite correct. There is no intention of changing the auditors selected last January, but it is thought that, having regard to the completely changed set-up and to the government control, the appointment of auditors should be the function of the governor general in council in such a case. It is a difference of view so far as my right hon. friend and I are concerned, but the government has considered the matter and desires to appoint the auditors of the bank, subject to the limitations contained in the section, which are that the auditor must be eligible to be appointed as the auditor of a chartered bank, and no person shall be eligible for appointment if he or any member of his firm has been auditor for two successive years during the three next preceding years. Provision is there for the changing of auditors in order that the audit shall not become stereotyped in character or get into a rut, but it is thought that the power to appoint should be vested in the governor general in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course there is no function exercised by shareholders that has been more jealously guarded and more determinedly held than the right of shareholders to elect auditors. Directors have at times endeavoured to exercise that power, but the right of shareholders to determine who shall audit the accounts has been conceded, I think, in practically every case nowadays. It will be recalled that when Mr. McLeod of the Bank of Nova Scotia first set up the claim that there should be an independent audit of the banks, the banks objected to it and said that it was impossible to do it, but ultimately the right of the shareholders prevailed, and the banks are now subject to an independent audit. In the section we passed this afternoon we provided that shares issued to the minister shall carry with them the same rights and obligations as class "A" of the capital of the bank except that the holders shall not be entitled to vote at the election of directors. I am quite content to leave the section as it is, but never before in my time has the governor in council been clothed so frequently with the powers of parliament. If you take the statutes and read over, as I shall do presently, the number of cases in which this has been done, you will find that the governor in council is appearing more frequently than in any set of statutes we have passed in recent years. We are now taking away from the shareholders the right to elect their auditors and putting it into the hands of the governor in council, which cannot but be the very negation of modern practice with respect to banks.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. DUNNING: At the next sitting of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the bill should be reprinted, in view of the very substantial changes that have been made in it in connection with the set-up, and of the fact that we were not favoured with having them in the votes and proceedings antecedently to their being moved; they have appeared only from time to time. The bill will have to be reprinted for the senate, anyway. It might be desirable to reprint the bill; I should think it could be done to-night without any great difficulty, and I think this would expedite business in the senate as well. There are two sections in particular that, I believe, should be reprinted as a whole.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The bill will be reprinted, and we shall not proceed with it to-morrow.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED BRANCH LINE FROM SENNETERRE TO ROUYN, QUEBEC

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways) moved the second reading of Bill No. 90, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from Senneterre to Rouyn, in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOWE moved that the bill be referred to the special select committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The minister will remember that the final report of one of the railway committees has been made. Is it intended to refer this bill to the special committee that had to deal with the Canadian National Railways or the ordinary railway committee?

Mr. HOWE: I should have said the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR EXPENDITURE, INDEBTEDNESS AND THE REFUNDING OF MATURING OBLIGATIONS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 84, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1936.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the bill to which we have just given second reading and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines contemplates an expenditure of approximately $6,000,000 for the construction of a branch line, which is to be a capital charge of the Canadian National Railways. This bill traverses the same ground in part, namely in paragraph (b) of section 2, which reads:

> Construction and betterments, including coordinations; acquisition of real or personal property, and working capital, not exceeding $2,500,000.

Then the section proceeds:

> Provided, however, that for such purposes the aggregate principal amount at any one time outstanding of the notes which the national company is hereby authorized to issue from time to time shall not exceed the sum of $9,959,000, being the total of the items hereinbefore set out.

That makes it perfectly clear that unless some provision is made to deal with the additional expenditure this statute will be inconsistent with the provisions of the previous statute which it is proposed to pass. In other words, when that statute has been passed, authorizing this construction, the two statutes will be inconsistent, because the maximum that can be issued by the railway company during the year is provided by this statute. That maximum is now to be increased by nearly $6,000,000, and there should be a corresponding entry made in at least one of the two statutes.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that while the branch line bill to which reference has been made calls for a total expenditure of some $6,000,000, only a small portion of that amount will be spent this year. I think it will take most of the season to make the surveys. The railway estimates that considerably less than $1,000,000 will be involved this year.

Mr. BENNETT: That should be provided for in some way in this statute, I should think.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the previous bill is the usual one providing for the issue of securities with respect to a specific matter, and it does not affect this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Due to the rapidity with which the previous bill was passed I did not look that up, but I expected it to be so. This statute provides, however, that for such purposes, among those purposes being construction and betterments—> —the aggregate principal amount of any one time outstanding of the notes which the national company is hereby authorized to issue from time to time shall not exceed the sum of $9,959,000 ...

I was only suggesting that some general words should be added which would provide for this added expenditure. Possibly the other bill could be amended to read, "notwithstanding anything contained in the Canadian National Railways Loan Act of 1936" or something like that. I thought it well to point out that there is an inconsistency between the two bills.

Mr. DUNNING: Before the bill with respect to the construction of the branch line proceeds through its final stages, consideration can be given by the law officers to that point. My hon. friend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) will see that that is done.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

LOAN OF $750,000,000

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

> That the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the provisions of The Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada and also for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada and for public works and general purposes.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: The reason for the resolution now before the committee is to renew the general borrowing authority to the government. The last statute enacted in this connection, in 1934 or 1935, provided for an authority of $750,000,000. That sum will be exhausted by July of this year. Exhaustion is fairly rapid, partly by virtue of the use of treasury bills, which under the terms of this type of act increase the amount every time short term bills are issued, even for renewal of existing issues. The authority sought is similar to that which has been given on former occasions.

Mr. BENNETT: Were there provisions in respect to public works and general purposes in the last act?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not quite sure.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 98, to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT, 1934

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine) moved the second reading of Bill No. 53, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to point out that we must reserve certain rights as to the principle contained in the portion of the bill relating to sheltered waters. As long as our rights are reserved to discuss that in committee, I have no objection to proceeding with the second reading.

Mr. DUNNING: That is understood.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): I should like to ask the minister whether or not there can be discussed under this bill the question of the sale of the ten ships—nine now, as one has been lost—and the contract that has been entered into with the English company?

Mr. HOWE: This bill has to do with amending the Canada Shipping Act of 1934, and has nothing to do with the sale of the ships mentioned by my hon. friend, so I hardly think this would be the occasion to discuss that matter.

Mr. FINN: I might say that all I could hear of what was said was the word "shipping." I am satisfied that this bill has nothing to do with the matter I mentioned, as the minister says. But I could not hear; the articulation of some hon. members of the government is of such a kind that you cannot hear what is said and the only way you can find out is to rise to your feet. You do not make a mistake, but they think you do.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. CHURCH: This includes the great lakes. I had intended at this session to introduce a bill to place shipping on the lakes, which is in a precarious position, under the control of the board of railway commissioners. I understood the minister was going to bring down a bill. There exist on the lakes conditions which are not creditable. Men are working on these ships for a few cents an hour. Besides that, labour conditions are bad and in breach of the health laws of the provinces. I think the minister should give some undertaking that something will be done during the coming navigation season. What is shipping coming to? A number of the boats are tied up. There should be some regulation. We know that there were armed gunboats on lakes Ontario, Erie and Huron, in breach of the Rush-Bagot treaty, smuggling stuff into a friendly country. The shipping industry needs some government support to try to revive it. I hope that during the recess the minister may see fit to look into the working conditions on these lake boats.

Mr. BENNETT: This section is objectionable for a reason that has been frequently urged in this chamber. It gives the minister power to determine what are sheltered waters on the sea coasts of Canada. Such a power is not usually granted by any statute. It is a very important matter. Paragraph 55 of section 2 reads:

> "Minor waters of Canada" means all inland waters of Canada other than lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron (including Georgian bay), Superior and Winnipeg, and includes all bays, inlets and harbours of or on the said lakes and said Georgian bay.

It is now proposed to modify that by a new definition reading:

> "Minor waters of Canada" means all inland waters of Canada other than lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron (including Georgian bay), Superior and Winnipeg, and includes all bays, inlets and harbours of or on the said lakes and said Georgian bay, and such sheltered waters on the sea coasts of Canada as the minister may specify.

That is, it clothes one man with authority to decide what are minor waters of Canada, on both Atlantic and Pacific sea coasts, regardless of any other consideration. I think that is an intolerable condition, if I may use language which sounds harsh. It is intolerable that in a country such as this one man may be clothed with that power, having regard to the purpose for which it is to be exercised. The purpose is abundantly clear in the explanatory note, which reads:

> The object of this amendment is to give power to the minister to include under the expression "minor waters of Canada" as defined in the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, such waters on the coasts of Canada as he may consider comparable with the minor waters described in the said act. This will allow the masters of ships working in such waters to be men holding certificates for minor waters and in some cases temporary certificates. The only change in the paragraph is the addition of the words underlined.

The real crux is contained in this sentence:

> This will allow the masters of ships working in such waters to be men holding certificates for minor waters and in some cases temporary certificates.

In other words, the minister has the authority to determine whether or not a given bay or inlet on the coast of British Columbia or on the Atlantic coast of Canada is a minor water. The same would apply to Hudson bay. Assuming that he decides a certain body of water is a minor water, as he alone may determine, he then has the right to accede to the request made that a man holding a certificate for minor waters, one who is not a navigator at all in the broad sense in which the term is used in the Shipping Act, or a man holding a temporary certificate, may take command of a ship that sails to and fro in those waters.

To a substantial degree that would cover the coastal trade of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Quebec. As the paragraph now reads, without any limitation, it would cover the coastal trade on the Pacific coast. I protest against conferring such a power upon any man, however eminent he may be. So far as I know I have not seen any such power as is here contemplated conferred upon any minister. Just think what it means! One man is to determine that the inlets on the Pacific coast of British Columbia are minor waters. John Smith, a man with no certificate for deep water sailing, comes to the minister and says, "I have a minor water certificate. I am going to sail a ship and become master of a boat which has to do with trade in those waters." Or a man with a temporary certificate may approach a member or a supporter of the government, and that member or supporter may say, "Yes, I can fix you up," and in turn would say to the minister, "All you have to do is to declare that this is a minor water." The provision is supplemented that even with a temporary certificate one may operate a vessel in those waters, some of which are most dangerous. Nevertheless, that power is to be given. Had the former government attempted to do such a thing I believe I would have heard some hon. members now sitting in front of me speaking, from their then places in the house, about autocratic and dictatorial powers. This power does not cease to become that because it is exercised by a Liberal government; it is just as vicious in the one instance as in the other. To clothe one man with that authority is, I believe, a negation of the whole theory upon which the shipping act is based. After all, it deals with technical matters, with the lives as well as the problems of many people. When we clothe one man with authority to declare that a bay or an inlet on either the Atlantic or the Pacific coast is a minor water, and when in another section we confer upon him further power to clothe—putting it within the terms of the act—only reasonably qualified persons with power to be masters of ships going to and fro on those waters, the government are carrying their power to an extent which is not usual, and which I should assume very few men would seek to exercise.

Mr. HOWE: There is no sinister purpose behind the provision.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not suggest that there is.

Mr. HOWE: This is a power exercised by the secretary of commerce in the United States and by the board of trade in England. The effect of the act as drawn is that a man running a ferry across Burrard inlet is acting illegally because he has not deep sea papers. Similarly a man running a ferry at Sydney is acting illegally.

Mr. BENNETT: We have dealt with that in another section.

Mr. HOWE: Nevertheless it is a fact that a man navigating a vessel on Burrard inlet must have deep sea papers. Surely that is not the intention. In England the board of trade have similar regulations, but they refer to smooth waters, rather than inland waters. We have the anomaly that the St. Lawrence river at Father Point comes under the provisions of the minor waters regulations, despite the fact that at that point the river is thirty miles wide. Yet any inlet on our Atlantic or Pacific coasts, or any harbours thereof, is a major water, and a man going across is on the deep sea, according to the Canada Shipping Act.

Surely we are making only a necessary provision. As I say, one man will exercise power here, and by the law of the United States one man exercises power in that country. But they would not exercise it without obtaining the expert opinion of their shipping experts.

Mr. BENNETT: One man does not exercise this power in Great Britain, and any one familiar with the manner in which the board of trade exercises its power in this regard will realize that it has magnificent machinery to deal with the matter. I suggest that when the minister states that the condition in England is comparable with the exercise of power by one man he is making an unfair comparison. That is equally true with respect to the United States. The minister has said that the secretary of commerce can exercise a similar power, but I would say it would be almost as bad there as it is here.

When the minister speaks about deep sea navigators he forgets that we had an extensive discussion in this chamber when section 118 of the act was passed, at which time we discussed the "requirements for certificates of service as masters and mates." We declared that:

> Every British subject who (1) served as a master or mate of a foreign-going or home-trade sailing ship of over seventy-five tons, gross tonnage, before the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-one, for a full period of twelve months within ten years immediately preceding the date of his application for certificate of service—

—could be a master or mate. That subsection caused a great deal of discussion. It must not be forgotten that while we are an autonomous community exercising our rights to the full, so far as this parliament is concerned, nevertheless the shipping act stands in a position different from that of other legislation of this house. Representatives of one government under the same premiership as the present one, and those of the successor to that government endeavoured so far as possible to secure uniformity in the shipping laws of the British empire.

I am objecting to the power being exercised by one man, whoever he may be. My objection has nothing to do with the present minister, but has to do with the question of power being exercised by a single individual.

Mr. HOWE: We are not departing from English practice. All powers of the British board of trade are concentrated in the chairman of the board. The other members simply advise. The chairman of the British board of trade, the secretary of commerce in the United States and the Minister of Transport in Canada have the same power, in their own territories.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the president of the board of trade in England.

Mr. NEILL: There is one point the leader of the opposition has not appreciated. In 1934, when the shipping act was being amended, I was one who again and again begged the then Minister of Marine, the Hon. Mr. Duranleau, to permit the bill to go before the committee dealing with marine and shipping matters. It was a large bill, indeed, one of the largest ever placed before the house. The minister would not accede to my suggestion, but expressed his determination to jam it through in committee of the whole house, where no adequate debate could take place among those familiar with the subject. The result was that there were surprisingly few blunders that have to be corrected this year, but this is one of them.

The leader of the opposition states that this is a technical matter and he does not like to see the power placed in the hands of the minister, but just because it is a technical matter it will be dealt with not by the minister alone but by his experts, men who from long years of experience out on the coast as inspectors, surveyors, and in positions of that kind are in a position to judge, men whose reputation and livelihood are at stake and who are not going to allow themselves to be used for any political purposes the minister might have for the moment. The minister cannot possibly make the decision himself in these matters because it is of so technical a character.

Mr. BENNETT: He is the man who does it just the same.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, in the same way that he does a great many other things, on the advice of his responsible officers.

The situation was this. It is a dual one. It was not altogether the fault of the last act, but the situation was this. Under the act that was in force before the act of 1934 the minister had power to grant what were called temporary certificates, and it was highly desirable that he should do so. The leader of the opposition talked about an intolerable position, but there has been an intolerable position created by our failure to adjust these things in the act of 1934. In the act prior to 1934 the minister was not given power, although we thought he was, to give temporary certificates, the character of which I shall deal with in a moment. For many, many years, partly from laissez-faire or a desire not to open the act, it was always interpreted that the minister had that power under that section, and for many years the practice was for the minister to grant these temporary certificates. In the act of 1934 we more or less copied the same language, but the act was not to come into force until it was proclaimed. Then in virtue of that, as the act was not proclaimed, we kept on working under the old act subsequently to that date, under which we thought the minister had the power, and which in practice he had for many years. Then some smart man in the department perhaps took it to the Justice department and suddenly discovered what was very palpable, that the wording of the old act in no way justified the minister granting any temporary certificates at all, and those who were entitled to them were then left utterly up in the air. The result was that the order went out that no more would be granted. The act of 1934 did not help it any, and this is an attempt to remedy that situation.

Now I speak of the necessity of these things. Perhaps the leader of the opposition has the picture in his mind of some man who has very little marine knowledge taking a big steamer through some narrow passage, but that is not the picture at all.

Mr. BENNETT: No; that is not what I have in mind.

Mr. NEILL: Picture a bay, a mile and a half across, and somebody taking an eighteen foot launch across. It goes just above the five ton limit. If it is under five tons he can put forty people into it, and go to Jamaica, and there is no one to say him nay, but if it is over five tons, and therefore a larger and more comfortable, bigger engined and safer boat, but especially a safer boat—and a great deal depends, not upon the length of the boat, but upon the housing on it—then according to the act of 1934 he must have a certificate that would entitle him to take the boat through the Panama canal if he wished. He cannot afford to get a ticket like that; he cannot afford a master's certificate, and therefore the public are greatly inconvenienced because they do want to get across this bay. The result is this, and I have seen it happen more than once: He cannot afford a master's certificate; he cannot afford to hire a man with a master's ticket, and so he says: I shall have to cut down the boat so that it comes just to 4·99 tons, just under the five ton limit, and then he can take all the people that he can crowd on board, in utter defiance of all rules of safety. There were some rules about having a life belt for each person, but he did not need to know anything about running a boat or about the rules of the road or anything of that kind. You may say: Why didn't he go and get a master's certificate or get a man with a master's certificate? Well, the work won't stand that, and if they have to do that it simply means that they will fall back on a smaller boat under five tons, where there are no restrictions and much less safety.

I understand that the department has in contemplation—I forget whether it is provided in this act or in the regulations—that these men who are applying for temporary certificates shall have some reasonable qualifications. They will have to pass a test for sight and hearing, know the rules of the road and the elementary rules of signalling, which will make it reasonably safe. For my part I infinitely prefer to cross these comparatively sheltered waters, or semi-sheltered, waters in a boat that is run by a man who has not much deep sea knowledge but who does know the waters. That is the all-important thing. A man with the deep sea knowledge to take a boat from here to China has not the knowledge of the local waters that the local man has, and that is why it is desirable to give a temporary certificate, renewable from year to year, to the man with local knowledge, because local knowledge is infinitely more valuable for the purpose than the deep sea knowledge that would enable a man to take the Queen Mary to England.

I remember on one occasion being stormbound up the coast. Something had happened to the steamer; I think the propeller had dropped off, and I proposed to go down by means of Indian canoe. There was a bishop stranded in the same way, and having a kindly feeling for the cloth I offered to take him along, but, no, he would go on his own. I started off next morning with the Indians I had selected, and went half way on my journey; then I discharged those Indians and took on another bunch for the remainder of the distance, some fifty miles, local Indians who would know the local currents and how to navigate the local waters, and as a result I succeeded in getting home in two or three days. The bishop, strong in his religious convictions, took a bunch of Indians and they went all the way through, but not having the local knowledge required for the latter part of the journey they upset in running across a current coming out of some side river, and the bishop would have been drowned if it had not been for somebody coming along with a launch. I mention that only as an illustration. One Indian was just as good as another, and possibly the bishop's bunch was better than mine spiritually, but they had not the local knowledge that brought me safely home—I hope for the advantage of Canada. It is the local knowledge that counts. Give me a man who can run an engine and has the local knowledge of the waters, a man who can pass a test for sight, hearing, colour, and elementary signalling, and he will not endanger the lives of anybody. That is what I want to impress on the leader of the opposition, that the very fact that we can get these men with temporary certificates makes it so much safer to travel. Otherwise we are compelled to go in a boat that measures 4·99 tons where there are no restrictions whatever. It is really an advantage. There is no danger of their exceeding what is reasonable, because a government employee whose job depends upon his vigilance will see to it that no one who is not entitled receives a ticket to cross unsafe waters; for if any accident happens both his reputation and his job are gone. I admit that as the leader of the opposition put it, it would seem that too great a power was being placed in the hands of the minister. But this is once that we can trust it to him, not because of his personality but because in the very nature of things, this being a technical matter, he will get technical advice and see that a wise use is made of the regulations.

Mr. FINN: No one in this house or outside it knows exactly where we stand in connection with the shipping laws of Canada. There is a shipping act which has been passed but which has not yet been proclaimed; it is to be proclaimed in August next. This is an amendment to an act which is supposed to be on the statute books, the Canada Shipping Act of 1934. Would one be right in assuming that the act has been proclaimed? I have looked at the sections at the back of the bill and I do not see anything about the proclamation, so that I would gather from that fact that the act is already in force.

Mr. HOWE: No; the act has not been proclaimed.

Mr. FINN: This act of 1934 has not been proclaimed?

Mr. HOWE: No; but it is the intention to proclaim it as of August 1 of this year.

Mr. FINN: I submit, then, that the amendment which has been offered by the minister is not valid. The act has not been proclaimed; it is not law, and therefore it cannot be amended, because you cannot amend an act that is not in force unless it is specifically stated that you are amending an act which is to be proclaimed. This amendment presupposes that the act is already on the statute books, but as a matter of fact the act is not on the statute books in so far as its being operative is concerned. It has no force and effect and—I speak subject to correction—I do not think we can amend something that is not an act but merely an enactment which will be proclaimed in August. Perhaps the law officers of the crown will be able to inform me whether or not the point I take is correct.

Mr. HOWE: I took the question up seriously with the law officers of the crown and they assured me that an act is an act from the time it is enacted, whether it is operative or not. The act is part of the statutes of Canada and can be amended.

Mr. FINN: Then, if it is an act, it must be in force.

Mr. HOWE: No, not necessarily.

Mr. FINN: If it is not in force it is not an act; it is merely something that is on the statute books. If it is of no force or effect it is not an act and cannot be until it is proclaimed. I submit, therefore, that you are amending something that is not an act, as we understand that word, that is, an enactment which is operative as a law of the country. However, if the law officers of the crown have so advised, then the responsibility rests with them. This is a voluminous act, and it seems to me that the proper thing to have done was to amend the interpretation clause, setting out what these waters in question are. What is the number of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN: Number 53.

Mr. FINN: In the interpretation clause of the act there will be found a definition of every term used: "foreign voyage," "home trade voyage," "home trade ships," and so on. Then we come to the minor waters of Canada, which means all inland waters of Canada other than lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron, including Georgian bay, Superior and Winnipeg, and all bays, inlets and harbours of or on the said lakes and Georgian bay.

The CHAIRMAN: It is eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, June 12, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): In the absence of the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir), who is chairman of the committee, I move that the third report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BILL TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF AUDITORS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 99, respecting the appointment of auditors for National Railways.

He said: Mr. Speaker, under the terms of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act the auditors for the Canadian National Railways are appointed annually by a joint address of both houses of parliament. We are following the usual procedure in that regard.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 71, to amend the customs tariff.

He said: The bill as amended by the Senate is unchanged in sense, but certain minor changes have been made.

Mr. CAHAN: Can the minister tell us on what date these amendments appeared in the votes and proceedings?

Mr. ILSLEY: June 5. The bill as passed by the House of Commons had appended to it no schedules. The items in the tariff that were changed appeared in the sections of the bill. For instance in section 4 there was a long list of tariff items, and in two later sections there were also lists of tariff items. The Senate thought it preferable to take the lists of items out of the respective sections and append them to the bill as schedules, and they have amended the bill accordingly.

There is also one correction of what is obviously a misprint in section 3. The word "thereof" should be "therefor," and that change has been made. I therefore move:

That the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 71, sent up from the House of Commons, intituled "An Act to amend the Customs Tariff," be agreed to, and that the said bill be further amended in consequence of the said amendments as follows:

(1) That the schedule or lists entitled by Senate schedule A. schedule B, schedule C, be transferred to the end of the bill, after section 7 thereof;

(2) That section 7 of the bill be amended, on line 4 of page 19, by striking out the words "preceding sections," and substituting therefor the words "schedules hereto."

These amendments do not alter in any way the sense of the bill.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 76, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

He said: The amendments made by the senate have not changed the sense of the bill.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: On what day did they appear in the votes and proceedings?

Mr. ILSLEY: June 11. The amendments are simply to take the schedules out of the sections and place them at the end of the act. I therefore move:

That the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 76, intituled "An Act to amend the Special War Revenue Act," sent up from the House of Commons, be agreed to, and that the said bill be further amended in consequence of the said amendments as follows:

(1) That clause 18 of the bill (on page 19) be amended by inserting in line 2 of the said clause immediately after the word "act," the words "and the schedule hereto."

The law officers inform me that it is technically necessary to make this further amendment.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 77, to amend the Excise Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Schedule amended.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does this bill follow exactly the resolutions as they were passed by the house? If there are any changes or additions, will the minister give an explanation?

Mr. DUNNING: Offhand I do not know of any change. I will just make sure.

Mr. STEVENS: Clause 1 includes the schedule. For the purpose of clarifying the matter in my own mind I should like to ask a question. The line underlined on page 2 indicates that spirits distilled from wine shall be subject to no duty of excise. Then just below, in subsection 2, definition of Canadian brandy, it says:

... shall be deemed to be Canadian brandy and shall be dutiable accordingly.

Spirits distilled from wine in Canada is Canadian brandy, is it not? How, then, can you say that spirits distilled from wine, which I think may be described as brandy, shall be subject to no duty, and then in the next clause provide that Canadian brandy shall be dutiable? To me it seems an inconsistency, but it may be due to my lack of knowledge.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is only when spirits distilled from wine are used for a particular purpose that they are subject to no duty of excise; that is when they are used in fortifying wine.

Mr. BARBER: During the discussion of the tariff item the question of alcohol for use in the manufacture of patent and proprietary medicines and for druggists' use generally was spoken of. The regulations set the minimum at five gallons. Representations have been made to me that it would be appreciated by the smaller druggists throughout the country if the minimum could be changed to two gallons. I think the minister said at the time he would take that into consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would still be prepared to give consideration to that suggestion. Whether it can be done this session or not is another matter.

Mr. BARBER: That of course will not help much. I thought it was a question of regulation outside of the act. It just means that many of the smaller druggists, who do not care to carry in stock five gallons at a time, would be benefited. It would be of advantage both to the department and to those who use this product in manufacturing that they be permitted to secure the smaller quantity. I understood the minister to say it was a matter of regulation.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a matter not of regulation but of legislation.

Mr. BARBER: Where does it appear that it is limited to five gallons?

[Sir George Perley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: It is in the main act; that which appears in the bill is merely the schedule.

Mr. DUNNING: Replying to the hon. member for Argenteuil as to the extent to which this bill follows the resolution in committee of ways and means, may I say that I have now examined it and find that with the exception of the provision for Canadian brandy when used for fortifying wine, it follows exactly.

Mr. COLDWELL: In connection with the freedom from duty of spirits used for fortifying wine, I suppose a matter of revenue is involved. But I should like to bring before the minister another point of view, namely that spirits used in fortifying wine and imported free of duty can be used to make a potent intoxicating liquor to be sold at a comparatively low price. Many of the criticisms now being made about drinking among our young people can be traced to the use of fortified wine. In my opinion anything which tends to lessen the price of this particular kind of liquor is a moral danger, if I may put it that way. In the province from which I come it was suggested a year or two ago that the wine might be sold in the beer parlours. Fortunately the objection was so great that the suggestion was not adopted.

Mr. DUNNING: The representations made by the grape growers are to the effect that the making of spirits out of what is known as sick wine is a necessity to prevent great wastage in the grape growing and wine producing industry. It is represented to us very strongly, and I believe with some force, that the suggestion here made involves the removal of a definite discrimination against the grape grower with respect to this use of his product. I believe it has very little bearing upon the use of spirits for fortification purposes, inasmuch as they are used for that purpose in any event. At the present time sick wine would become more largely a waste product, from the point of view of the industry, if it could not be used for fortifying purposes in the place of other fortifying elements.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I suggest that paragraph (ii) on page 2 should be changed to read "shall be subject to no duty or excise" instead of "no duty of excise."

Mr. DUNNING: I believe "of excise" is correct.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. POULIOT: Before you report the bill, Mr. Chairman, may I direct the attention of the committee to something most extraordinary. Very often it is impossible for the comptroller of the treasury to check the revenue from each tax. In connection with some taxes the Department of National Revenue, both excise and customs branches, have difficulty in indicating the amounts derived therefrom. That is very extraordinary. It seems to me there could be a way of informing people about it. Each tax brings in a certain definite amount, and any person asking for the amount derived from a certain tax should be able to get that information. The condition is unbelievable, but I could bring the attention of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue to several returns I got last year in which there were certificates from excise and customs commissioners to the effect that they were unable to state the exact amount of one tax for several years. That is a most interesting situation, because it related to the taxation imposed by that super-genius in financial matters, the ex-Prime Minister. He was born in finance, he sweats finance and he knew everything about it. He wanted to have a special way to inform people about finance in Canada, and it was impossible for his ministers to tell the exact amount derived from certain sources of taxation. Therefore may I bring your attention and that of the committee to the importance of knowing how much the government can get from one source of taxation. It can be done, and I hope it will be done. I ask the ministers of finance and national revenue to take note of what I have said in order that they may inform the country as to the revenue derived from each taxation.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 97, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The reason for the amendment is set forth in a communication I received some time ago from Mr. Sedgewick, chief commissioner of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission. I think it well to put the communication on record. It is as follows:

Dominion Trade and Industry Commission
Canada

Ottawa, May the 6th, 1936.

Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, P.C., Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

My Dear Prime Minister:—

I have observed that in your statement to the house of the business to come before it this session you mentioned a possible amendment to the Combines Investigation Act. I have frequently discussed the matter of amendments with Mr. McGregor and there are a number of amendments which, in our opinion, would be advisable but we feel that there is one which is a necessity if any investigations are to be made under the Combines Investigation Act. In my opinion it would be absolutely unsafe to go on with an investigation—at least an investigation which might be expected to result in a criminal prosecution—without an amendment to section 24 of the act. This section was amended in the dying days of the last session in the Senate and the House of Commons concurred in the amendment, very possibly without having had any real opportunity to consider it. In the result, documents which the investigator, under the Combines Investigation Act, might require to have produced to him in his investigation would be privileged and not admissible against the offender in a subsequent prosecution if section 24 remains in its present position. The section as it stands now is as follows:

"24. No person shall be excused from attending and giving evidence and producing books, papers, or records, in obedience to the order of the commission, on the ground that the oral evidence or documents required of him may tend to criminate him or subject him to any proceeding or penalty, but no such evidence or documents so required shall be used or receivable against such person in any criminal proceedings thereafter instituted against him, other than a prosecution for perjury in giving evidence upon such investigation, inquiry, cause or proceeding. 1923, c. 9, s. 18; R.S., 1927, c. 26, s. 24; 1935, c. 54, s. 17."

If your memory will carry you back to the Combines Investigation Act when it was introduced in 1923, you will perhaps recall that the corresponding section as the act was drafted was in substantially the form of section 24 as it now exists but as the bill was going through the house you had the section amended to strike out the words "or documents," as it appears now in line six of section 24, and inserted the word "oral" before "evidence," which latter word is now the first word in the sixth line.

I am quite satisfied in my own mind that the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission —of which I am Chief Commissioner—would not risk having an investigator require the production of any documents until this act is amended.

I hope it may not be considered presumption on my part to say the amendment suggested is indispensable to a proper administration of the Combines Investigation Act.

Yours faithfully,

George H. Sedgewick,
Chief Commissioner.

As indicated in the communication just read, there are other amendments to the Combines Act which will be necessary, but the government has thought it advisable to reserve them for a subsequent session. This amendment quite evidently is imperative.

LOAN OF $750,000,000

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 98, to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BENNETT: How much remains unexhausted under existing legislation?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the exact figure in mind. Last night I stated that it was expected to carry us until about July. Some time during the month of July, in consequence of treasury bill issues, the present authority will be exhausted.

UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF AND ASSISTANCE ACT, 1936, TO ASSIST PROVINCES IN RESPECT OF RELIEF EXPENDITURES

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend section four of The Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, being chapter fifteen of the statutes of 1936, to empower the governor in council to grant financial assistance to any province by way of loan, advance or guarantee to an amount not exceeding the amount payable by the province for its share of the cost of unemployment relief and undertakings during February and March, 1936, and under any agreement between the dominion and the province entered into under the authority of the said act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, when bill No. 19, the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, was drafted, it was proposed to obtain from parliament authority for the governor in council to grant, where necessary, financial assistance to any province by way of loan, advance or guarantee, of a total amount not in excess of the total amount payable by the dominion to such province under any agreement entered into under the authority of the act. The assistance was thought at that time to be sufficient to meet the relief requirements of the various provinces, and consequently section 4 of the act was so worded.

However, in the case of one or two of the western provinces no arrangement had been made at the expiry date of the Relief Act, 1935, for financing their relief requirements for February and March and applications to the dominion for assistance for those months were received too late to be dealt with under that authority. I may say that the requests were in connection with loans that were naturally subsequent to expenditures for relief and, therefore, the applications for loans for those particular months arrived at a date following the expiry of the Relief Act, 1935 In addition, representations have been made that the provincial share of relief outlays in some cases exceeded the total amount payable by the dominion under agreements entered into under the authority of the act. For these reasons it is considered necessary to establish a new criterion, as it were, for loans to be made to the provinces for relief purposes. Under the bill which will be founded upon this resolution there will be an amendment of section 4 only of the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936. As proposed in this resolution, the dominion will be empowered to grant financial assistance where necessary to any province of its share of expenditures for relief and relief undertakings during February and March 1936, and under any agreement which may be entered into under the authority of the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936.

Mr. HEAPS: While we are discussing this question of unemployment, could the minister tell the committee the unemployment situation at the present time? How many are on relief this year as compared to the number on relief last year?

Mr. ROGERS: According to the latest figures, which are preliminary figures and therefore subject to possible rectification, the total number in receipt of relief during the month of April, 1936, was 1,357,704, while the total number in receipt of relief in the month of April last year was 1,432,516. I can give my hon. friend the complete breakdown of that figure if he wishes it, but there has been a decrease in the number receiving relief of something less than 100,000.

Mr. BARBER: Can the minister give us the total cost of relief in April this year as compared with April of last year?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information before me at the present time, but when the bill is in committee I shall be very glad to supply it. The dominion grants in aid to the provinces were increased by 75 per cent in December of last year, as my hon. friend is aware, and there was a reduction of 15 per cent at the beginning of April of this year.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not want to pursue the unemployment question at this time, and I shall accept the suggestion of the minister that it be discussed when the bill is in committee. I should like the minister to give a résumé of the steps which the government are taking to cope with the unemployment situation. According to the figures given by the minister it would appear that the number on relief is about the same as it was last year. After all a reduction of approximately 100,000 persons is infinitesimal, having in mind the general unemployment situation. I think this committee, as well as the country, has a right to know what measures are contemplated by the government to deal with the very pressing and grave situation with which we are faced.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister will inform us whether or not the securing of larger sums by parliamentary action is for the months of February and March only, or are additional months included as well?

Mr. ROGERS: I am informed that the reference to the months of February and March arises from the circumstances which I explained a moment ago. So far as I am aware, the applications for loans covering expenditures for last year are confined to the months of February and March. My right hon. friend is aware that these loans are made not through the Department of Labour but through the Department of Finance. I think my colleague the Minister of Finance will confirm what I have just said in that regard.

Mr. DUNNING: The applications for those months from certain provinces were not in prior to the expiry of the previous authority.

Mr. BENNETT: What supervision will this dominion parliament or the government of Canada have over the expenditures provided for under the agreements made under the authority of the act? Since we were dealing with this legislation before I have had occasion to follow up the question which I then raised as to the supervision which the government was exercising. I pointed out that the government had removed from office one who had been sent by the Department of Finance to check over the expenditures in Saskatchewan. I find that certain relief expenditures in that province are under the control of a disbarred lawyer who was guilty of embezzling trust funds. That would hardly be a highly desirable person to have in charge of the expenditure of moneys which we have to pay.

Mr. ROGERS: Would my right hon. friend care to name the official in question?

Mr. BENNETT: I prefer not to mention a man's name.

Mr. ROGERS: Is my right hon. friend suggesting that he is an employee of the dominion government or of the Department of Labour?

Mr. BENNETT: I said he was in charge of expenditures in the province of Saskatchewan. Two others who are employed in connection with this matter are disbarred members of the legal profession. In another case recently the appointment was made to an important position of one who had embezzled tax funds in a nearby county. I mention these matters with some hesitancy, but it is my duty to do so in view of the fact that I did make inquiries when this legislation was before the house. I mentioned the necessity for a rigid check being continued, because the former Minister of Finance, Mr. Rhodes, had found it desirable. He did so, but the man in charge was removed. We now have additional accounts for the months of February and March and I should like to know from what provinces they come and what the total expenditures are to which we are now asked to make an additional contribution.

Mr. DUNNING: As I said a moment ago, certain provinces did not get in—

Mr. BENNETT: I asked what provinces.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall come to that in a moment, if my right hon. friend will allow me to make my statement. As I explained, certain provinces did not get in their applications for February and March prior to the expiry of the previously existing authority. By detail, the province of British Columbia has applied for loans of $435,000 and $460,000 covering the provincial share of direct relief for the months of February and March. Applications for these loans were received too late to be dealt with under the previous authority. Manitoba submitted an application for a loan of $205,000 covering March expenditures. This application was received too late to be dealt with under the Relief Act, 1935. In the cases of Saskatchewan and Alberta, authority was obtained under the Relief Act, 1935, to grant loans covering their share of direct relief up to March 31, 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: What sums were actually paid to Saskatchewan under the order in council? The orders in council passed with respect to Saskatchewan and Alberta were orders in council that contemplated expenditures being made, and I directed attention to it at the time. How far we had jurisdiction under the Relief Act to make advances to be accounted for I am not now discussing. At one time, certainly, the law officers thought that there was no power under the act to make advances to be accounted for under the provision with which we are now dealing, although there was power to make it for certain purposes. The question I am now asking is this: What were the expenditures in the months of February and March in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and what is the comparison of the expenditures given for British Columbia and Manitoba, $435,000 and $460,000, with the same months the year before?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not that information at hand but I shall be glad to give it when the bill is in committee. With regard to the officials in question, so far as I know there were no officials of the federal government in Saskatchewan of the class described by my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: I pointed out that the Department of Finance had found it desirable and in the public interest necessary to have officials check up the expenditures that were being made under provincial auspices in order that we might not be called upon to pay more money than we should. With respect to farm labour, with the best efforts that could be made at the time the services of the gentlemen in question were dispensed with, there could not be discovered within a thousand all the persons that were supposed to be receiving these farm placement advances to which the minister referred when we were discussing this matter. Subsequently the matter could not be pursued for the reason that they were withdrawn; but it is quite clear that in some instances sons in the home were receiving the benefits of this act. Whether or not that was strictly within the terms of the act, I am not now expressing any opinion. Other instances of that kind developed. I did suggest to the Minister of Labour the desirability of some check being exercised with respect to that matter, and I should like to know whether one is being made.

Mr. ROGERS: Hon. members will recall that when this matter was brought up before by the leader of the opposition he was good enough to suggest that a suitable opportunity for giving him the information respecting Saskatchewan might be afforded when the estimates of the Department of Labour were before the house. I made the necessary examination and have the report as to the particular question which he had in mind. I am bound to say that to the best of my recollection the only official under the Department of Finance in the province of Saskatchewan was sent there originally for the purpose of dealing with a special accountable advance of $9,000,000, but I shall have the full report available and shall be glad to give the substance of it to the house when the bill is in committee.

Mr. BENNETT: This bill was not on the order paper and we had not contemplated that a bill that had been passed would be amended so shortly afterwards. It is an unusual course but one that is sometimes resorted to. Do I understand that no sum is to be mentioned at all and that the governor in council is to have control over unlimited funds in this regard?

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend will no doubt recall that when disarmament was under consideration at Geneva some years ago a distinction was drawn between qualitative and quantitative limitations. One may fairly say that we are inserting here a qualitative limitation upon the amount of loans that may be made by the dominion government. Under the former legislation there was no such distinction. Under the legislation now proposed, we are limited to the amount which the province may pay as its share of direct relief. We did consider very carefully the feasibility of introducing a quantitative limitation, but I am quite sure that my right hon. friend, from his own close acquaintance with the administration of relief during the last few years, will understand that there were difficulties, formidable difficulties, in the way of carrying out that objective. But we have introduced a qualitative limitation which is not to be found in the relief acts of previous years.

Mr. BENNETT: The comparison which the hon. gentleman has instituted between disarmament and this particular matter has of course some striking features. Is the federal treasury to be disarmed for the purpose of enabling raids upon it to be carried out successfully? I judged from what the hon. gentleman said on a previous occasion that it was to safeguard the federal treasury against the attacks that might be made against it that he had provided it with such heavy armament that there was no doubt the defence would be complete. I judge from what he says now, having regard to the analogy he has sought to make, that he has concluded that his armament is entirely too heavy and that he must dispense with some of his heavier artillery and some of his guns with a view to facilitating the approach of the enemy. That is the only conclusion one can draw from the observations he has made. The blank cheque does not cease to be a blank cheque because there is an ultimate restriction placed upon it. When the hon. gentleman said that my own close knowledge of the situation was sufficient to induce me to believe that the matter was a difficult one to deal with, I can only say that is quite true. But I hardly expected to have the recognition of it come from the source from which it does; that was wholly unexpected. It is an occasion for gratification to think that it took an amendment to a bill passed this session to enable the hon. gentleman to make the discovery, and I trust that as he proceeds in the administration of the department he will have some sympathy with those who were charged with responsibility on a previous occasion; and more numerous will be the instances in which he will realize that the policies which were followed by them were policies to which he himself has given and is giving adherence. The limitation placed upon armament is of course, shall I say, somewhat elastic because it leaves the expenditure with the province. Surely it would be possible to arrive at an amount not exceeding so much money in view of the known experience of, say, the four years during which one had fairly complete knowledge of what was being done by the various provinces. Would it not be possible to have such a sum, not exceeding so many millions of dollars? Would that not have been a quantitative restriction upon the amount, which would have been perhaps very valuable armament for the federal treasury as against the attacks to which the hon. gentleman has referred? And possibly the amount named would have to be such as to make it undoubted that it would meet the requirements of the situation. It will be remembered that during one of the years we did place first of all a quantitative restriction and that latterly, owing to the attitude taken by the then opposition, there was a limitation placed upon the amount that might be used for relief by the dominion.

Mr. ROGERS: But none upon loans.

Mr. BENNETT: The amount that might be advanced.

Mr. ROGERS: But no restriction upon loans.

Mr. BENNETT: No restriction with respect to loans but with respect to money that might be used, by way of loans or otherwise, for the particular purpose of direct relief. In other words, the particulars were always given by the provinces of the purposes for which they required loans, and a limitation was placed at the instance of the then opposition upon the amount that might be made available by the treasury for direct relief.

Mr. ROGERS: Does my right hon. friend suggest that there was a restriction upon the power of the dominion to lend to the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: No, certainly not, but there was a restriction placed upon the amount that might be utilized for a given purpose. Doubtless the hon. gentleman has the various acts before him in pamphlet form. I cannot recall whether it was in 1933 or 1934, but if he will look it up he will see what the limitation was. There was no limitation placed upon the power to lend to the provinces, but in every event the Minister of Finance inquired as to what sums of money were to be utilized for specific purposes, and it will be recalled that there was that limitation placed upon direct relief expenditures to which I have referred.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry I was not in the house a few moments ago, due to my presence being required elsewhere, but I understand that the leader of the opposition had some criticism to make as to the administration of relief in the province of Saskatchewan, and in connection with certain officials there. There were, of course, a considerable number of persons engaged in the administration of relief in Saskatchewan, and in fairness to them I think any criticism of the kind that I understand was made should include the names of the persons referred to. I suggest that the leader of the opposition name the persons to whom he had reference.

Mr. BENNETT: I mentioned one person and said he was a disbarred member of the legal profession, and that he had been guilty of embezzling funds. Originally I had intended to mention the name, but I thought it might be unfair to that individual to do so. The government have seen fit to place him in a position of importance, and as far as the government is concerned I have no hesitancy about it.

Mr. DUNNING: This government?

Mr. BENNETT: No, the Saskatchewan government.

Mr. GARDINER: At what time?

Mr. BENNETT: I could not give the time, but it was since we were discussing this bill. Whether or not he is there to-day I cannot say. However, I will bring down the letter and the details of the charge at the time he was disbarred, and if it is thought desirable, though I think it is perhaps questionable, I shall be glad to give the name to the house or to the minister or to anyone who may desire it. Whether or not it should be placed upon Hansard I cannot say. When the bill is in committee I shall leave myself in the judgment of the house in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: What was the nature of the position held by the gentleman?

Mr. BENNETT: In connection with the administration of relief.

Mr. GARDINER: Out in the country or at the head office?

Mr. BENNETT: My memory is that he was in a position of some considerable authority, that he was not an ordinary administrator out in the country, that he had come into Regina and was administering from there. I will have the letter with me and will give those particulars when the bill is in committee.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that three persons were referred to.

Mr. BENNETT: There were two others who were also members of the legal profession and who, according to my information, were also in the same unfortunate position.

Mr. COLDWELL: Probably the matters to which I am going to refer should be discussed a little later but I am raising one or two points now in order that the minister may have the information at hand when we are in committee. I am quite troubled because of the intimations I am receiving from various parts of Canada with regard to the dissatisfaction that exists, particularly among the young men who were inmates of the camps—first, intimations from men themselves, and, second, intimations from people in cities where these men are assembling and congregating. I happen to know that in some cities quite a number of these men are endeavouring to get along by seeking assistance from persons on the street, and in that connection a situation is developing which may cause this country a great deal of difficulty unless it is looked into very carefully.

There is another feature to which I should like to refer. Various types of work are being paid for at various rates. A moment ago one matter in connection with Saskatchewan was brought to the attention of the committee. To-day I received a letter from a district in my constituency where young men are engaged in the planting of trees. They are paid twenty cents an hour for a ten hour day. Young men working on the railways receive twenty-five cents an hour for a ten hour day and work beside men regularly employed who are receiving higher rates of pay. The condition, it seems to me, is one upon which this house should be fully informed, so that when we return to various parts of Canada we may discuss it with some intelligence and knowledge. Consequently I raise these points now so that when further questions in regard to them are raised, as undoubtedly they will be at the proper time, the minister may have the information before him.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be very glad indeed to discuss the matter referred to by my hon. friend. I might say, however, that information with respect to men who have left relief camps should be examined with care and a realization that some at least in the relief camps were unwilling to accept the employment that was made available. I can say also that work has been offered to all those who were in relief camps at the time of the announcement that provision was to be made for special maintenance work upon the railways. All those who have left the relief camps without accepting railway work have done so of their own accord. There was no compulsion upon them to leave, except as the projects themselves were completed. Many have left of their own volition. As to the further reference of my hon. friend, in regard to men working beside each other and receiving different rates of pay, I suggest that he could go into almost any factory in this country and find artisans working side by side at different scales of pay, because they are doing different kinds of work. I think I can assure the hon. gentleman that with respect to the extra gang work on the railways, if some are receiving higher pay than others it is because they are in positions of supervision.

Mr. MacINNIS: While we are dealing with this matter of the men on railway work, Mr. Chairman, for a considerable time I have been asking that the agreement between the railway department or the labour department, whichever it is, be tabled. I have asked for it, but up to the present it has not been produced. I made inquiries to-day but was unable to obtain any information. In order that we may deal with these complaints intelligently I think we should have this agreement before us. It should be before members of this house in order that we may consider it before prorogation and know under what conditions work is being offered to these men. I hope the minister will try to have that agreement for us when this bill comes up for second reading.

Mr. BENNETT: I have just a further word to add. Probably the minister is not in a position to speak of this matter to-day, but it is well to give him notice so that when the bill is in committee he may be able to give us the information that is in his possession or can be secured with regard to the matter I mentioned to the Minister of Railways and Canals the other day. I find that the Minister of Labour is charged with the responsibility in connection with the work on the railways. Am I now correct about that? I was informed that it was his department that looked after the employment of these men on the maintenance of way.

Mr. ROGERS: I think perhaps a true statement of the situation would be this: The camps were conducted by the Department of National Defence and remained under the effective administration of that department. The Department of Labour has acted rather for the purpose of demobilizing the inmates of the camps. The Department of Railways and Canals arranged, with the railway systems, the agreement under which the Department of Labour was to supply ten thousand men from the relief camps as conducted by the Department of National Defence. It has been a task which has involved close and continuous cooperation between the Department of National Defence, the Department of Labour and the Department of Railways. The agreement was executed by the proper officials of the Department of Railways with the officials of the railway company.

Mr. BENNETT: Then my first understanding is correct, that the actual paying of the men, their distribution, and the determining of the kind of work they are to do, will be done under the direction and supervision of the Department of Railways.

Mr. ROGERS: The payment of wages is to be by the railway company, but under the supervision of the Department of Railways. As my right hon. friend will recall, the particular item in the relief estimates which dealt with that matter was in the estimates of the Department of Railways.

Mr. BENNETT: That was my original understanding, but I was told later that the Department of Labour was carrying on part of the supervision. I see now from what the minister has said that the supervision of his department was in regard to getting the men out on the right of way.

Mr. ROGERS: The transference.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, from the camps. I think that has been made abundantly clear. I confirm what the minister said as to having been advised from many quarters that a number who were unwilling to work left the employment to which they had been taken on the right of way of the railway, and that was true particularly in western Canada. I wonder if the minister will be in a position to give any figures in respect to that when the bill is under consideration—not that it is so much a matter that will affect the legislation, but as indicative of the general conditions that prevail. He might then be in a position to indicate also what wages are being paid the various classes of labour engaged on the railway. He told us the other day that he thought the agreement was being concluded. When we get into committee on the bill I take it the agreements will be available for examination.

Mr. ROGERS: I am sure the agreements will be available. As I have explained to the committee, they are between the Department of Railways and the railway company.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I suggest, in view of the remarks of the leader of the opposition, that the minister might also bring down some information in regard to the conditions under which the men who were sent out were expected to work, which possibly had some bearing on the reasons for their leaving. I have particularly in mind the Cherry Creek camp, fifteen miles west of Kamloops in British Columbia. If the conditions were as stated to me—and the men who told me their story, I may say, were men who last summer did not participate in the relief trek, and who were regarded as good and reliable men in the camp; I checked up on them—it might be well to look into the conditions under which the railways are employing some of the men, and I mention this one camp particularly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is another matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. When the federal government grants relief to provinces there ought to be some greater check on the action of the provinces, some assurance that the people who are in need will receive an adequate scale of relief. The provinces seem to leave the matter to the municipalities; in some municipalities at least the scales of relief are very low, and sometimes certain classes are discriminated against. I had a case the other day—if my memory serves me correctly it was from a town in western Ontario—in which relief was refused to one or two young people in the home because the mother was in receipt of old age pension. The old age pension originally of course was a matter of dominion legislation. I think it comes under the administration of the Minister of Finance as far as this government is concerned. I know the detailed administration is by the provinces. Certainly when we passed that legislation some years ago the idea was that the old people would be entitled to the benefit of that pension for themselves. In this case a poor old woman's pension was diminished on account of her having to keep one of her sons who otherwise would have gone on relief. I think in such cases the dominion government ought to insist that the purpose of the old age pension legislation be carried out, and that the giving of relief be on a scale adequate to the maintenance of something like a decent standard of living. I know there are difficulties, but some of us get a great many complaints of this kind, and I think the dominion government should insist on adequate standards and a better system of relief than prevails in some municipalities.

Mr. McGREGOR: Has the minister had any application from the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway for help along the same?

Mr. ROGERS: I have received no formal application myself. I take it that what my hon. friend desires to know is whether the government have received such an application. It is possible that my colleague the Minister of Railways would be able to answer.

Mr. HOWE: No application came to my office from the T. and N.O.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rogers thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 100, to amend the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT, 1934

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 78, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1934.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. CAHAN: I should like the Secretary of State to inform me with accuracy as to whether this bill applies solely to by-elections. It is my understanding that this bill amends the Dominion Elections Act, 1934, only in respect of by-elections which may be held pending the general revision of the act.

Mr. RINFRET: I can give the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George complete assurance that this amendment applies only to by-elections, and I believe section 2 makes that perfectly clear. Earlier in the session I introduced a bill to postpone the annual revision of the closed lists. The house agreed to that bill, but it was also agreed that if the special committee dealing with the elections and franchise acts was not in a position to report and recommend the adoption of a general act at the present session, we would make provision either to revise or to prepare lists for by-elections. The present bill, and Bill No. 81, which I hope may be considered in a few minutes, are for that purpose and for that only. They apply solely to by-elections which may be held before general amendments may be made to the act.

Mr. LAWSON: Do I understand the minister to say there is another bill to be considered concurrently with this one?

Mr. RINFRET: Yes. The hon. member is aware that we have two electoral acts, namely the Dominion Elections Act and the Dominion Franchise Act. Although they are separate enactments they are applied together, and we are making amendments to both. In both cases, however, they are to be applicable only to by-elections.

Mr. LAWSON: Why did we not consider Bill No. 81 before considering the present one?

Mr. CAHAN: I believe consideration of the bill would be facilitated if I were permitted to refer to certain sections before they are called; otherwise the interrelation of the sections is such that one might have difficulty in following the amendments.

Mr. RINFRET: I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN: With the consent of the committee, the hon. member may proceed.

Mr. CAHAN: I shall not delay consideration of the measure. Section 3 refers to the supplying of copies of lists of electors and the supplying of election material, all of which is dependent upon the provision appearing at the bottom of page 2 of the bill. Paragraph (D) (4) is as follows:

(4) If the polling division is urban, the returning officer shall prepare from the geographical list of electors a separate list for each polling station established therein. The list shall be divided numerically according to the consecutive number given to each voter on the printed list of electors so that approximately an equal number of electors will be allotted to each polling station necessarily established in such polling division.

By looking at the opposite page hon. members will see that for the geographical list there is substituted another list prepared alphabetically. I wish to oppose any substitution for the geographical list. I cannot deal with the conditions obtaining in any other city; my intimate knowledge is confined to conditions in one electoral district of one city, but I do say that the geographical list as prepared and used at the polls in each polling division has to a very large extent prevented frauds. Further it has prevented impersonation. I have no hesitation in saying that in times past in the city of Montreal impersonation has been carried to an extent not known in any other city in Canada. Although I do not speak from personal knowledge, I know that following one election in which I took part an examination of the returns disclosed, to the satisfaction of competent men reviewing the situation, that at least a thousand impersonations had been carried out in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. That is a condition of affairs against which every possible protective provision should be enacted.

The adoption of the geographical list enables an inspection of the list to determine who are registered for each particular building or apartment house. For instance, in one of my elections, before the geographical list was adopted, an unfortunate circumstance arose in connection with an eminent clergyman, one of the most respected of the Catholic clergy of Montreal. He had provided for a hostel for young men from outside the city attending universities in Montreal. It was an enterprise which was most advantageous for parents in the country who are sending their sons either to Catholic or to Protestant schools, because in law and in scientific departments many Catholic students attended McGill university as well as the university of Montreal. When the names are on the list and classified according to letter, without considerable research it is difficult to ascertain what names appear for a particular address. In one of my elections through careful investigation we sifted out the facts and found that for this residence for students attending the universities fifty-six names had been added to the list, and they were names of persons who had not been known as residents in that place. When names are registered geographically such frauds are easily perceived, and the proper oath may be administered to the applicants for voting as they appear.

I should dislike very much to see the geographical list abandoned, either at the polls or in the preparation of the lists. Enumerators proceeding along the street can easily prepare their returns in geographical sequence, because they enter one house after the other, and turn in the names in that order. If the change at the bottom of page 2 and the top of page 3 of the bill means that the geographic list is to be abandoned or limited in any way, I am very much opposed to it.

Mr. RINFRET: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should also avail myself, like the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) of the privilege of saying a few words, dealing with the bill generally.

I wish to remind the committee, in the first place, that this and the other bill have been prepared by the special committee appointed for the purpose, and their report was a unanimous one. I know that my hon. friend never had it in his mind to suggest anything else. I think we are all agreed that we have only one purpose, and that is to provide proper amendments to the act in order that by-elections may be carried on in an orderly manner. The chairman of the special committee sitting beside me, the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) may also have something to say on the bill.

These amendments are intended solely for by-elections, but I do not think I misrepresent the idea that was in the minds of certain members of the committee when I say that in order to save time and give expression to some of their views on elections generally they have taken this occasion to introduce in both bills two or three features which were not necessarily urgent for the purpose of holding by-elections.

The objection to the act of 1934, if it had remained as it stood, was that we were afraid a general revision would be very costly and would achieve little purpose because the electors would not avail themselves of the opportunity of revision if no special election were in view in their particular constituency. At the same time the committee did not recommend local revision where a by-election is to take place. It has recommended the preparation of new lists, and in making such recommendation the committee has had in view the saving of time. That is why in certain clauses of the bill changes have been made, to save time and facilitate matters.

I might also point out that the committee has recommended a couple of changes in Bill No. 78, which we are now considering. One restores in rural polling divisions the right of an elector whose name does not appear on the list to present himself at the poll and take oath and vote. That right did exist under former electoral acts. The other change does away with the absentee vote.

As to the particular section to which my hon. friend referred, again I wish to say that the idea that seems to have actuated the committee was to facilitate the preparation of special lists for by-elections. I have notes here on that particular section which indicate that in this case the change has been made for the convenience of election officials, and it will be noted that it will apply only to cases in which there are two or more polling stations in the same polling division. That is to say, if in a certain polling division the number of electors is too large to have it kept single, and it is necessary to divide it in two, then it is provided by this amendment that a list may be prepared in a numerical way, doing away with the more complicated system of having both numerical and geographical lists. I do not think there can be much objection to that. It will apply only in exceptional cases where subdivisions must be established by the electoral officer in one polling division, but it does not do away, if I understand the amendment correctly, with the former method of preparing lists in polling divisions at large.

Mr. CAHAN: Let me say to my hon. friend that I can deal from personal knowledge only with St. Lawrence-St. George. In that district nearly every polling division has to be divided into subdivisions for the purpose of polling, but that does not necessitate any doing away with the preparation of the lists according to streets and numbers. The procedure which is followed under the existing law is that the lists are prepared street by street, with each number in sequence. What is the number that may be permitted for the poll? Is it three hundred?

Mr. RINFRET: I think it is three hundred.

Mr. CAHAN: If it runs over three hundred, all that the official has to do is to post up a notice and say that the names on the list from such and such down to such and such, perhaps half way down the list, will vote in polling booth No. 1; and the others will vote in polling booth No. 2, and almost invariably polling booths No. 1 and No. 2 are in the same building, on either side of the hall of entry. But if you do away with the preparation of the lists of names according to the geographical sequence, you facilitate fraud in the constituencies of which I know, to an extent that has not prevailed in recent elections. It is monstrous that impersonation should be possible under any election act to the extent to which it has prevailed in some of the constituencies of which I know. It is not for me to go into local affairs, but the preparation of the geographical list prevented in the constituency of which I know the recurrence of frauds perpetrated under the local list—

Mr. BENNETT: Does this amendment take that away?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I might draw the hon. member's attention to the provision in the amendment to the Franchise Act, Bill No. 81. We still make up the geographical list in the same way as the list was prepared under the original bill.

Mr. CAHAN: But what do you do with it?

Mr. BOTHWELL: It is sent to the returning officer. I will read the section:

Rule 3.—On a day to be fixed by the commissioner and notified to them by the Registrar of Electors, the enumerators shall prepare a complete list of all the names, addresses, and occupations of the persons who are qualified as electors and who are resident in the polling division (or part thereof)) for which they have been appointed. Such list shall be prepared in all urban polling divisions in geographical order, that is, by streets, roads and avenues, as in Form No. 7. The enumerators shall also prepare in like form a sufficient number of copies of such list to comply with Rule 5.

I am reading from the amending franchise bill.

Mr. CAHAN: That is Bill No. 81. Read from Bill No. 78, the one we are considering. That geographical list is not the list used at the polling.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Section 3 (D) provides:

If the polling division is urban, the returning officer shall prepare from the geographical list of electors a separate list for each polling station established therein.

He has to take that from the geographical list.

Mr. CAHAN: He has not to prepare a separate list. There is no reason in the world why he should do it. The geographical list is there; it is printed, and all he has to do is as he has done in the preceding elections, say that those on the list, from such a number down to such a number in a certain polling division will go into No. 1 booth to vote.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Does this section change that? It is not the intention to change it.

Mr. CAHAN: In other words, the list which you prepare from the enumerators is a geographical list, and that is the list for the elections at the present time. Here you say that although you have gone to the expense of preparing a geographical list for the purpose of voting in any polling station, which has to be subdivided into two or three polling booths, a new list shall be prepared. Instead of saving money, it seems to me that new expenditures will have to be made and that the new list will have to be renumbered. The result is that it will be almost impossible for the officials at the polling booth to keep a careful count of those who are entitled to vote and their places of residence, as registered. We are not eliminating any expenditure. At the bottom of page 2 you provide for striking out subsections 4 and 6 of section 33 of the present act, and for making substitutions therefor. I suggest that there is no need to strike out those subsections when you have the other section in the Franchise Act providing for a geographical list. If it is thought that that should be amended, let us amend it. I do not know whether the chairman of this committee represents a rural or an urban riding.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Rural.

Mr. CAHAN: I can quite realize that the hon. member would not appreciate the difficulties with which we are confronted in urban districts.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Some members of the committee represented urban ridings.

Mr. CAHAN: Did they come from Montreal?

Mr. BOTHWELL: One member did.

Mr. CAHAN: In view of the conditions which prevailed in the city of Montreal I cannot understand why any urban representative should ask for a change. I do not think any representative from the city of Montreal can stand in his place and say, so far as the preparation of the lists and the administration of the electoral acts were concerned during the last general elections, they were not administered with a propriety and exactitude and fairness unprecedented in the recent electoral history of that city. Why break down these barriers to fraud and misrepresentation?

Mr. RINFRET: If I thought that that section would have the effect that my hon. friend thinks it will have, I would not endorse it. I hope the committee understands my position. This bill was not prepared by myself or by the officials of my department; it has been recommended unanimously by a committee of the house consisting of both urban and rural members from all parties. I must say that I fail to see in this section the danger pointed out by my hon. friend. We are discussing this bill in somewhat piecemeal fashion, but let me point out that the lists will be prepared—

Mr. BENNETT: Geographically.

Mr. RINFRET: In geographical order. Where the lists are prepared and at the last moment, perhaps a few days before nomination, the returning officer finds that in a certain polling division he has more than the required number of electors, he is allowed by this section to prepare a numerical list for that subdivision or polling station. My hon. friend says that in his constituency that procedure would be pretty general, but I believe in most of our city ridings this would not happen more than about once in forty or fifty polling divisions.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not agree with that.

Mr. RINFRET: Section 3 provides for the preparation of special lists for a by-election. The committee has recommended that a polling division shall be the polling division adopted on the occasion of the dominion general elections held on October 14, 1935. A writ is issued and lists are prepared according to the polling divisions which obtained at the last general election. The enumerators do their work and lists are prepared a few days before nomination day. The returning officers have to subdivide a certain number of polling stations. I disagree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George as to the number of stations in connection with which this would be necessary. From my experience I believe this will happen in only a few cases. In order to save time the returning officer can prepare numerical lists for voting. I cannot see any danger in procedure such as that, because it will be only exceptional. I believe that the committee in submitting this bill and the one that follows had in mind the fact that it might be preferable to make this experiment in a by-election to incorporating the changes in the general act when it is revised. This is not my proposal; it is a proposal unanimously recommended by a committee composed of members from all sides of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Like my colleague, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), I had some doubt about this, but I think if one reads it carefully he will see that the geographical list obtains.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so, in the first preparation.

Mr. BENNETT: First of all we have provided that the same polling divisions shall obtain in a by-election as obtained in the last general election. That is number one; that is settled. Second, the Franchise Act provides for the preparation of lists, and it follows the same provision with respect to geographical locations as were followed in 1935. I thought there was some doubt about that, but it is clear beyond peradventure. We come now to the next point about which we had some doubt. The returning officer, whose duty is defined by the statute, receives the list. Some confusion arose, at least in my mind, as between a polling station and a polling division. The polling division has not been changed from what it was in 1935, but the polling station may be. It states on page 3 of the bill:

> The list shall be divided numerically according to the consecutive number given to each voter on the printed list of electors so that approximately an equal number of electors will be allotted to each polling station necessarily established in such polling division.

That is, there may be 300 in a division and the effort of the returning officer may be to divide that into two stations of 150 each, or into three stations of 100 each. On the opposite page appear the details as to how the list is made up by the franchise officer. The geographical conditions of the Franchise Act are continued and have not been changed. I think that is fairly clear. At first I had some doubt about it, but I think it is clear.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Mr. MacNICOL: May I give an explanation of this section? I had some part in drafting it and to me it is clear. It is the same procedure that was followed in the last general election. The lists are prepared, and where there are more than 300 names at any poll the returning officer divides it in two. In my own riding, if I remember rightly, there were 131 polls, but on election day the returning officer, finding over 60 of these polls with more than 300 names, divided each of these in two. On page 28 of the franchise bill we find a sample page of a voters' list. In many of the polling subdivisions in my riding there were over 400 names and the lists were divided as on page 28. If we take that as an example, that page has only 50 names. If the allotment per poll were 50 instead of 300, and if the returning officer followed the procedure of the last election, dividing the poll in two, each poll would have 25.

Mr. RINFRET: I can clear that up in a moment. This is only a sample, and it is not intended to apply to 50 names. Fifty have been given merely as an illustration, but the list would contain many more names than that.

Mr. MacNICOL: The list may have anywhere from 300 to 500 names. It is provided that if the polling substation is urban the returning officer shall follow the geographical list. There is no intention of changing from the present geographical method; that remains in the act. He has to prepare a separate list for each polling subdivision and these shall be divided numerically. That is the way it was done the last time; I do not see any change.

Mr. RINFRET: I appreciate the fact that to have the general aspect of both pieces of legislation it might have been advisable to do what we have been doing so far. But we are not only going from one section to another but from one bill to the other. Perhaps now that we have discussed the general principle the chairman will call the sections one by one. This discussion has taken place on section 1, the short title, which I suppose carries.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Amendments to apply in the case of by-elections.

Mr. RINFRET: Section 2 provides that all amendments in this bill, the provisions of the general act, "are not amended, repealed or otherwise affected by the provisions of this act except in so far as the holding of by-elections is concerned."

Section agreed to.

On section 3—By-elections.

Mr. RINFRET: This section provides that the polling divisions shall be those established for the last general election. Paragraph (B) permits the transfer of lists and copies of lists from the franchise officer to the returning officer without the necessity of sending them to the central office in Ottawa. That is to save time in remote parts of the country. Paragraph (C) proposes some minor changes in order to make the general act apply to by-elections. Paragraph (D)(4) is the one we have been discussing, and I understand it has been agreed to. Paragraph (E) does away with the disposition which was necessary in the general act and which should not apply in by-elections, the provision whereby, when an elector moved from one constituency to another, if he were not qualified to vote in the new one he would retain his right to vote in the constituency he had just left. In by-elections, the committee has suggested, no one should be qualified to be on the list unless he has resided three months in the polling division where the by-election is held. Paragraph (F) re-establishes the principle whereby in rural constituencies an elector who is not on the list may come to the poll and be vouched for, a note being made that he is entitled to vote. Paragraph (G) strikes out all the sections with respect to the absentee vote. The committee did not regard it as having been a great success, but no matter what opinion one may have on that point I think we can all agree that there should not be absentee votes in a by-election. Paragraph (H) modifies four different forms so as to make them applicable to the purposes of this bill.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think that the explanations given by the minister are altogether satisfactory. What I am insisting on is that the list of voters for each polling station, which is used by the officials at that polling station, shall be a geographical list. In the elections which were held in some of the cities at the last general election I should think that at least sixty out of ninety polling divisions were found to include a larger number than three hundred, which I believe is the limit, and therefore a division was necessary. No separate list was prepared in a different numerical order, but the deputy returning officer took the printed list and counted down to half of that list and then gave the first half to a polling station which he called polling booth "A" and the other half to another polling station which he called polling booth "B," which were both usually in the same building. But the geographical sequence of the names was continued for each list so dealt with and no separate printing nor separate typewriting for the urban district was necessary at any time. Paragraph (D) on page 2 reads:

> If the polling division is urban, the returning officer shall prepare from the geographical list of electors a separate list for each polling station established therein.

What I wish to make clear is that such list shall be prepared geographically and divided numerically according to the consecutive numbers given to each voter on the printed geographical list. From the time the first list is made up in geographical order to the time of polling, the list prepared for the officer in each polling booth should be geographical. Otherwise it is impossible to protect the polls. If my hon. friend is prepared to admit that this list shall be prepared geographically and then divided numerically according to the consecutive numbers in that printed list, I am content.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Perhaps I might explain. At page 36 of the Franchise Act the geographical list is dealt with, and every voter gets a number on that list. The voters are numbered consecutively. When it comes to dividing that list as between polling stations the returning officer simply takes the first half of the list, we shall say—

Mr. CAHAN: That is what he should do.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That is exactly what is intended by this section.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, we took particular pains in the sections which are being repealed to show that this subdivision must be made in such a way that when divided the lists would be geographical. Now you have struck that out. If you will make it clear that this list so divided shall be a geographical list and divided numerically according to the printed geographical list, I am content, but to leave it in doubt—

Mr. BOTHWELL: I do not think there is any doubt.

Mr. RINFRET: Perhaps my hon. friend will agree to this proposal: This bill applies only to by-elections, and for all we know there might not be one by-election in an urban centre during the year. The committee was unanimous in recommending these amendments, and I may say that the chief electoral officer informed me that this would mean a considerable saving of time, as well as being a much simpler way of dealing with the matter. There might be very few polling stations, perhaps none, where this would apply during the coming year. My hon. friend has registered his protest. It is possible that the committee may have overlooked his point, but I believe the committee went into these questions pretty carefully, and these amendments were recommended unanimously. My hon. friend differs in opinion with the committee. Why not try this out? As I say, it will apply only in exceptional cases; it is intended to save time, and it has been recommended not by one party but by representatives of all parties. I should be averse to making any alterations of such a kind in a bill which has been unanimously recommended by representatives of all sides of the house. Of course my hon. friend has a perfect right and is quite in order to discuss every section of the bill, but apparently his views on this point, though strong, are to some extent personal. He has registered his protest and made his remarks, and now perhaps the committee will agree to pass the bill as it has been recommended. If we find that there is actually any point to my hon. friend's remarks, when the committee deals with the general act next year they may pay heed to the representations which have been made this afternoon.

Mr. CAHAN: If the statement made by the hon. member for Swift Current, who was chairman of that committee, is correct, then my suggestion simply makes very clear the purpose and intent of the committee which prepared this amendment. There is no doubt about that. I am not urging any change in the intent and purpose of this amendment as stated by the chairman of the committee, and therefore I do not feel that in pressing for a clarification of these two lines I am attempting to disparage the deliberate judgment of the committee. I have no such intention. The hon. gentleman says that he proposes to save some expense by not carrying out my suggestion. There is no possibility of saving expense—

Mr. RINFRET: I said that time would be saved.

Mr. CAHAN: There is no possibility of saving time if the view of the hon. member for Swift Current, in which I concur, is correct. But if I find a meaning different from that expressed by the chairman as being the will and opinion of the committee, why not clarify these two lines in order to make it clear that this separate list also shall be a geographical list and that the geographical order shall be followed? The hon. gentleman says that this is a personal matter with me. I am simply giving my experience. It is not personal. As a matter of fact, if my personal ambitions are carried out probably the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of contesting a by-election in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George under this very provision. But I have seen in past elections, so much of fraud and impersonation which is utterly disgraceful to the electoral system of this country, that all I desire is to see this clause clarified so that hereafter there may be no opportunity for fraud of that kind. If it is made clear that this list for each polling booth is to be a geographical list, numbered consecutively according to the geographical list first prepared, I shall accept it, but I think I might fairly ask to have this line amended in order to make that perfectly clear.

The CHAIRMAN: My record shows that sections 1, 2 and 3 have been passed.

Mr. RINFRET: That is true.

Mr. CAHAN: Section 3 has not been passed.

Mr. RINFRET: I did go from one section to another, but I shall not press that objection at all. In passing may I be permitted to say that although we seem to disagree upon this minor point I hope this bill will never be needed for a by-election in St. Lawrence-St. George. I consider my hon. friend one of the most distinguished members of this parliament, and certainly we want him here right along.

Mr. CAHAN: What I do say and ask is this: It is only fair, if there is any doubt in this connection, that the purpose and intent of the committee should be carried into effect by the express words used. You would need to put in only one word, I think. If you would make it clear that the separate list for each polling section is to be prepared as printed geographically, that is all I ask. That polling list for each polling station should show on its face that it is prepared geographically, in the order of the streets and numbers. If you make that clear, I am content.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I think it is as clear now as it possibly can be. I am sure that was the intention of the committee. The list must be prepared by streets, and each name as it appears must be numbered. If the polling division contains more than three hundred voters then the proper officer will make the list. But he must make it in numerical order. Suppose we have Bay street containing eight names, he will have to take those eight, and take Bronson avenue with fifteen, and so on until he gets 300. If there is a remainder of 100 or 150, he must take them in their numerical order, which must be the geographical order too.

Mr. STEWART: As a member of the committee, I wish to assure this committee that we endeavoured to preserve the geographical feature of the list, believing it had value. I think the matter may be clarified by looking at page 36 of Bill No. 81, in which will be found the geographical feature and the numerical feature as well. In subdividing you just go on down to the number you subdivide, which does not destroy the geographical feature.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. CAHAN: Well, I object to reporting the bill, because the point to which I have referred should be made clear, and to my mind it is not. If the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. Cameron) had been through as much trouble as I have, if he woke up next day after an election to find that a thousand impersonations over which he had no control, had taken place in his district, he would feel differently about the matter.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I assure the hon. member that if I thought for a moment this was not sufficiently clear I would agree with him. I do not wish to see any impersonation. It cannot be done unless the officer fails to do his duty.

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest that by changing one word you could make it clear; in the third line of page 3, which reads:

The list shall be divided numerically according to the consecutive number given to each voter on the printed list ...

If the word "geographical" were inserted—

Mr. MacNICOL: The printed list itself is geographical.

Mr. RINFRET: If the change is made the section becomes useless, because it was intended not to do that. At the same time if we can clarify the matter and satisfy my hon. friend, as long as the members of the committee do not disagree I shall not offer any further opposition.

Mr. CAHAN: Then I move that the word "printed" in the third line on page 3 be struck out and the word "geographical" inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Why not just add the word "geographical" after the word "printed"?

Mr. CAHAN: I am content.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Then I move:

That the word "geographical" be inserted after the word "printed" in line 3 page 3.

Mr. RINFRET: I will accept that amendment if everyone will agree on that.

Mr. NEILL: Should it not be before the word "printed"?

Mr. CAHAN: No, after the word "printed."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT, 1934

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 81, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act (Dominion by-elections).

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2.

Mr. BENNETT: This includes many paragraphs. Perhaps we had better take the first one.

Mr. RINFRET: Yes; we had better take them one by one.

On paragraph (a).

Mr. RINFRET: This does away with a section in the general act which would have no meaning in this by-election act.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (B).—Qualifications.

Mr. BENNETT: I see a little trouble with this paragraph. Paragraph (c) reads:

(c) has been ordinarily resident in Canada for at least twelve months and was ordinarily resident in the electoral district in which the pending by-election is to be held not less than three months before the date of the issue of the writ of such by-election—

How can we say that?

—and has continued to be ordinarily resident therein until polling day.

He might know about the polling day, but could not know he would remain at that particular spot until such time as the by-election is held. Is there not a contradiction in this instance. How can we say that he has continued to remain resident until polling day when his name goes on the list three months before polling day.

Mr. RINFRET: My right hon. friend is right in his contention. I understand he does not object to the principle.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. RINFRET: His objection is to these words?

—and has continued to be ordinarily resident therein until polling day.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. RINFRET: I think the right hon. gentleman is right.

Mr. BENNETT: The paragraph does not make good sense, in its present form.

Mr. RINFRET: Of course it was printed and prepared strictly in accordance with the recommendations.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand that.

Mr. RINFRET: I am inclined to think that the last line should be stricken out.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The only explanation I can give of the peculiar wording is that in rural districts a man may vote, although his name is not on the list. He can be vouched for. It was apparently with the idea of covering that situation that this particular wording was used. I must admit, however, that it seems awkward.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the section might be permitted to stand until we have discussed other paragraphs. Members of the committee and the minister would have a chance to look into the matter.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall paragraph B stand?

Mr. NEILL: Before we let it stand may I say that the period of three months is too long. First, we have three months before the issue of the writ, and a time after that which is very often as long as sixty days, making five months. In a place where there is a large floating population—and I have in mind the logging camps in my constituency—an unfair situation is created. It means that large numbers will be disfranchised. Prior to the act passed in 1935, a period of sixty days before the date of election was provided. That was considered a reasonable and fair time. But if we make it three months before the issue of the writ I suggest the period is too long, and many people will be disfranchised.

Mr. RINFRET: I believe the committee considered that it should not depart too much from the act of 1934, in which the period of three months is indicated. Of course at the time of a general election, if an elector cannot qualify in one constituency he does in another. In this instance the special provision is that unless he has resided at a certain place three months before the issuing of the writ in the constituency where the by-election is held, he is not qualified to vote. I think there is some wisdom in not drifting too far from the general act, except as to adapting it to by-elections. Evidently that is the reason the three months' qualification has been retained. Possibly when the general act is drafted the qualification as to residence might be modified, but I should not like to recommend that we make a change in respect of by-elections when a different circumstance would exist in the general act. May I point out that inasmuch as time will be saved between the date of the issuing of the writ and nomination day, to a certain extent the qualification period will be reduced.

Mr. NEILL: The point may not be of such great importance in by-elections, and I assume the act will be redrafted before another general election.

Mr. BENNETT: The bill refers only to by-elections.

Mr. NEILL: But the principle is the same. If the committee saw fit to adopt a three months period in connection with by-elections, it would probably adopt the same provision with respect to general elections.

Mr. BOTHWELL: No.

Mr. NEILL: The minister said that he did not wish to get away from the spirit and word of the 1934 act. I have met many people in British Columbia who think the further we get away from the spirit of it, the better.

Mr. BOTHWELL: In considering the by-elections bill the committee endeavoured so far as possible to adopt all the provisions of the original act. It was not the intention in any particular to change that act. Those changes will be made at another time, if they are deemed advisable. Possibly there will be a general revision next year, or at some later period. However, in the present instance we have endeavoured to provide for by-elections, and so far as possible to adopt the provisions to the original act.

Mr. RINFRET: May I point out that we have just passed a bill in which there is a similar provision. The clause under discussion corresponds with one we have already passed, and I suggest that we should not drift away from a decision we have made.

Paragraph (B) stands.

On paragraph (C), part II (14)—Registration material.

Mr. RINFRET: This paragraph covers the whole preparation of the list.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It is the same as section 14 of the original act.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph (C), part II (15)—Notice and form.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change, I take it, in any of these?

Mr. RINFRET: No, except as to adaptation.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand that.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph (C), part II (16)—Commencement of registration.

Mr. MacNICOL: The change there is that there are to be enumerators in rural ridings; am I correct?

Mr. RINFRET: And they are to be appointed in the same way.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph (D), part IV (32)—Right of appeal.

Mr. RINFRET: Under the Dominion Franchise Act, 1934, there was an appeal to a judge from any decision of a registrar of electors sitting as a revising officer, but only the judge himself could hear and determine the appeal, and as there was no need for haste, a time for hearing convenient to the judge could be appointed. It was found that this procedure might be inconvenient in the matter of a by-election, so provision has been made that if the judge cannot himself hear the appeal within five days limited therefor, he may appoint a barrister of not less than ten years' standing to hear the appeal in his stead. Section 32 of the act is altered to make room for that provision.

Mr. CAHAN: I believe that is a wise provision, in any case. I found in the revision in the St. Lawrence-St. George constituency enumerators attested that within one moving period there were 5,300 changes, and of that number all but 1,800 were either dead, beyond doubt, or had removed to other electoral districts in which they were entitled to be registered. In a city like Montreal, where the apartment houses are so numerous and so many apartments contain so many residents, the changes run into thousands on October and May moving days, and it is impossible for the chief justice in such an event to hear all the appeals which may be made from either side. I think that provision for the appointment of some barrister to represent him may be a very useful one, although I would rather have a judge to represent the chief justice, but otherwise to have a barrister of reputable standing would facilitate the appeals very greatly.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it not be well if we had some description of the barrister other than ten years' service at the bar. The judge should appoint an impartial barrister, not a barrister actively interested with one party or the other in connection with the election. That would be very bad. Some adjective could be inserted that would indicate the type of barrister, other than simply to say a barrister of ten years' standing.

The CHAIRMAN: We are still on clause 2.

Mr. BENNETT: What subparagraph deals with the judge, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. RINFRET: It is on page 21, subparagraph 4, reading:

> In the event of the judge being for any reason unable himself to hear and determine the appeal within five days after the notice of the appeal given he may nominate and appoint in writing a barrister of not less than ten years' standing and resident within the electoral district to hear and determine the appeal within the said five days.

Do I understand my right hon. friend to suggest a judge instead of a barrister?

Mr. BENNETT: No; I am only suggesting that some word might be used before the word "barrister." My hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) suggests an independent barrister of not less than ten years' standing. Perhaps we should say a practising barrister or an independent practising barrister.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I hardly think the word "independent" would be descriptive.

Mr. BENNETT: No; there is a difficulty about that. Should it not be in any event a practising barrister?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Of course, that was really the intention. We understood it would be a practising barrister. I imagine that the judge in appointing a barrister of ten years' standing would appoint someone who was qualified for the position.

Mr. BENNETT: Judges as well as the rest of us are deceived at times.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It might be advisable to say a practising barrister.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that would be better.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the word "practising" be inserted before the word "barrister" in line 14 on page 21 of the bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph (E) (39)—Liability of revising officer.

Mr. RINFRET: In the schedule we have passed it is provided that the registrar, instead of doing the whole revision himself, may appoint revising officers so that the work may be done in a parallel way in order to save time. Paragraph 39 substitutes, wherever necessary, the words "revising officer" for the words "registrar of electors." It is merely a clerical amendment.

Paragraph agreed to.

Mr. RINFRET: Has paragraph 39 been carried, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

On paragraph (E) (46)—King's Printer to print lists.

Mr. RINFRET: This provides for the printing of lists in urban centres. The committee has recommended that in a by-election it may not be necessary to print the lists in rural sections.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph (F) agreed to.

On paragraph (G) (53)—Vote under Canada Temperance Act.

Mr. RINFRET: This is a special disposition. It covers the Canada Temperance Act, an act for taking local option in certain parts of the country. This used to be under the chief electoral officer, and this amendment brings it under the dominion franchise commissioner. It has seldom been used, as my hon. friends know, but the committee has recommended that it be placed under the dominion franchise commissioner.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph (H) (54)—Dominion Franchise Act not affected by this act.

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot think that paragraph 54 is a very sound one as it reads. It says:

[Mr. Bothwell.]

The provisions of The Dominion Franchise Act, 1934, are not amended, repealed or otherwise affected by the provisions of this act, except in so far as the preparation and revision of lists of electors to be used at dominion by-elections, and matters incidental thereto, are concerned.

Should we not put it the other way?

Mr. BOTHWELL: As a matter of fact, we did not have that paragraph in at all. We thought the first paragraph made the matter amply clear, but objection was raised to our particular wording, and that paragraph was inserted by the law officers of the crown.

Mr. BENNETT: I think my hon. friend will agree that it is a pretty poor paragraph as it stands. It says:

The provisions of the Dominion Franchise Act, 1934, are not amended, repealed or otherwise affected by the provisions of this act, except in so far as the preparation and revision of lists of electors to be used at dominion by-elections, and matters incidental thereto, are concerned.

Mr. RINFRET: I must admit I was surprised to find it there. A plebiscite under the Canada Temperance Act might be incorporated with a by-election at the same time. If there is any objection, personally I would not insist on the retention of the section.

Mr. BENNETT: What you want to say is that the provision of the Dominion Franchise Act, 1934, except as amended by this bill, shall remain in full force and effect.

Mr. POWER: That is all we want. There is no necessity for saying any more.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I think that is all that is necessary there. I am not taking any responsibility for this particular paragraph.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the hon. member move an amendment then?

Mr. BOTHWELL: We have to consider clause 4. It might be well to redraft that.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. RINFRET: You mean 53 and 54?

Mr. BENNETT: That could stand until you redraft the one with which we are going to deal.

Mr. RINFRET: We might let that stand.

The CHAIRMAN: Paragraph (B) of section 2 will stand.

Mr. BENNETT: That can stand and the other matter can be fixed up during recess.

Paragraph stands.

On paragraph 55—Bringing into force.

Mr. RINFRET: I can explain that. It was thought that this bill might come before the house at a time when a by-election was pending. In that event we would have proposed to bring the measure into force only on a certain date. I would suggest an amendment to delete those words.

Mr. BENNETT: Paragraph 55 will be deleted.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I move that on page 24, line 27, the following words be deleted, "this act shall not come into force until."

Amendment agreed to.

On paragraph (I).

Mr. RINFRET: Paragraph (I) strikes out certain forms and substitutes others therefor.

Mr. BENNETT: That will be a new paragraph 55?

Mr. RINFRET: Paragraph 55 would have been part of paragraph (H). Paragraph (I) strikes out certain forms and substitutes others therefor to conform with these amendments. I do not suppose the committee desires to go through these forms. I understand that one section is to stand, so perhaps we could move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The forms have been gone through carefully. We appointed a subcommittee of legal men to go through them and we endeavoured to bring them into line.

Mr. CAHAN: Could the hon. member state generally any important changes which have been made?

Mr. BOTHWELL: The only important change is in connection with the voters in rural areas who are vouched for.

Mr. STIRLING: Swearing in.

Mr. BENNETT: A neighbour has to come who knows the voter.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The forms are practically the same.

Paragraph agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I think you had better ask for leave to sit again this day in view of what the minister has said.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 101, to incorporate the Order of Italo-Canadians—Mr. Denis.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT, 1934

The house resumed from Thursday June 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 53, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934—Mr. Howe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister appreciates the fact that this creates a difficult situation. This bill confers upon him the powers which I mentioned yesterday and, taken in conjunction with the other provisions of the act, places him in the invidious position of having to decide for or against the applications which he will receive for the declaration of certain areas as sheltered waters. Not that that in itself is so very important, but it lays the foundation for the application for temporary certificates for navigation. It is not the thing itself; it is what the thing lays the foundation for. Another section provides for an extension for five years of the time mentioned in the act for the qualifying for a certificate. Then there is a provision providing for temporary certificates to be based upon the right to navigate in sheltered waters, which waters are declared to be sheltered by reason of the action taken by the minister. The minister has said that certain action is taken in other places with respect to that and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has said that it applies only to ships of small tonnage. The new bill refers to ships of tonnage larger than five tons; in fact temporary certificates may be issued in connection with ships as large as twenty tons. What has been said with respect to small vessels under the control of those who have local knowledge, of course is true. However, sometimes that knowledge is not unlike that of the man who undertook to take a large ship up a narrow river. The master of the ship said to the pilot, "You have a very intimate knowledge of this river?" The pilot said, "Yes, I know all the sand-bars in it; this is one now." Just then the ship struck a sand-bar. This lays the foundation for great abuse, and it is my duty to point it out. I know the minister, in view of what he said yesterday, will not care to adopt the only remedy.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine): Mr. Chairman, I quite appreciate that the Minister of Marine is being given very great power, but I really see no alternative. In fact, I think very few people understand the power that the Minister of Marine has in this case. For instance, all the inspectors in Canada can declare a ship to be unseaworthy, and the minister can declare it to be seaworthy. The minister has the power of licensing everyone that has to do with the sea.

Mr. BENNETT: And suspending.

Mr. HOWE: And suspending. As I see it, this matter of minor waters must be regularized. For the last twenty-seven years we have been administering a great number of harbours on the east and west coasts as minor waters without a vestige of authority for so doing. For instance, on the British Columbia coast we have Burrard inlet, east of the First Narrows, and the northeast arm of Quatsino sound inside Limestone island, and the eastern channel, Barclay sound. On the Atlantic coast there are some twenty harbours and waters of various kinds which have been administered as minor waters, although by every law in the statute books they are major waters and can be navigated only by mariners having deep sea certificates. In both England and the United States this same authority is vested in one man, and if my right hon. friend could suggest a better way for Canada we should be glad to consider it. Through a curious anomaly the lighthouse board, a board of departmental officials, have authority under the law to declare certain coastal waters minor waters for the purpose of administering the life saving act. But there is no authority whatever for declaring coastal waters minor waters for the main purpose of the Canada Shipping Act. The only purpose of this clause is to correct an anomaly in the act, and I think we are doing this in the only practical way.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister and the committee are losing sight of the real reason why very great care should be taken in a measure of this kind, namely, the safety of passengers carried on ships. Apart from that, the matter is a comparatively insignificant one. I do not know whether I can make myself clear, because there are many technicalities involved which I am not qualified to discuss. But the point I wish to make is that for the purpose of meeting the convenience of the owner of a small boat operating in an enclosed water, certainly, in my opinion at any rate, we ought not to give this sweeping power to the minister to declare an area a sheltered water. I say that for this reason. The only criticism which the owner of a small boat has is that if he wants to carry passengers he must have a certified officer if his boat weighs more than five tons. If it weighs 4·99 tons he may carry thirty or forty passengers. Both these conditions are wrong. It does not make it any safer for passengers, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) pointed out, if the boat is 4·99 tons than if it is five tons. As the hon. gentleman suggested, the owner might remove some of the upper structure so as to bring the boat within the required measurement. In my opinion the measurement of the boat should not be the basis upon which the owner should be allowed to carry passengers. That is the first point I make, and the second point is that we certainly should not make it possible for an individual to carry passengers on a boat, which at present he cannot do, simply by declaring that he is operating in minor waters. I shall use the very citation which the minister gave last night and to which he has referred to-day, namely, Burrard inlet. Burrard inlet, stretching from the First Narrows some twenty-five miles into the north arm and into the head of the inlet, is one of the most important seaways in this country. I do not believe there is a port in Canada, not even Montreal, through which a larger number of deep sea vessels pass during the year. For seven months of the year there may be more vessels in some of the other ports, but I mean throughout the year. These deep sea vessels go through the narrows, operating in the first two or three miles of the harbour, now described as minor waters. Deep sea vessels, and particularly coastal vessels that operate like passenger trains on fixed schedules, come in by the dozen every day and operate in that harbour very often in a fog, when the only direction for vessels is the signal given by blowing the whistle. Yet we are allowing persons who have no master's certificate, no deep sea experience, very little knowledge of deep sea signalling or navigation, to carry passengers, provided their boats are under five tons. Under this proposal, because this area is declared to comprise minor waters, the owner of a boat under five tons may be allowed to carry passengers, though the area is highly dangerous.

Mr. NEILL: With a certificate.

Mr. STEVENS: Not necessarily, if the area is declared, as this amendment makes it, a minor water. If it is a minor water he may carry passengers. What I am driving at is this: Above everything else we ought to safeguard the lives of people, and if a man has a boat and wishes to carry passengers he ought at least to undertake the responsibility of having a certified officer on board. The owner of a small boat may know the waters well; he operates here and there along the coast; and on a holiday he wishes to carry a few passengers and cannot do so. The argument may be that he knows more about handling that little boat than anybody else. Usually that class of boat is used for roustabout purposes at logging camps or round a cannery or some small settlement in an inlet, and for such purposes, carrying a little freight, it is perfectly satisfactory. But the moment the owner wants to carry passengers even, as suggested by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni, across the inlet, I do not care under what conditions, we cannot be too careful in seeing to it that such a person is licensed only under such terms as shall ensure the maximum of safety and efficiency. That is the reason I question this method.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman overlooks section 122 of the shipping act.

Mr. STEVENS: I suggest to the minister, therefore, that whether or not he drops the words with regard to sheltered waters to be specified by him—and I think they should be dropped—we should specify more clearly the conditions under which any ship may carry passengers, whether it be a vessel of fifteen tons or over, or five tons or under. There have been tragic accidents in years gone by, partly through inexperience. While it is all very well to say that there are many men who have masters' certificates, though they have not been at sea, although that sounds well, there are those who may operate their vessels recklessly, and I submit that recklessness should not be allowed in the carrying of passengers, no matter whether the waters are declared minor or otherwise.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT, 1934

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 53, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934—Mr. Howe—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. STEVENS: At six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I was practically through what I had to say. I should like to remind the minister, however, of the point I was making, namely that taking power to declare certain waters on the coasts of Canada as minor waters, such power being vested in the minister, was not the proper basis upon which the whole problem should be considered. I had pointed out that in my opinion the attention of the committee and of the minister and his officials should be focussed upon the fact that the carriage of passengers is really the crucial point. I am aware that under section 122 of the main act provision is made for temporary certificates to be issued to individuals in charge of vessels not over twenty tons and not carrying more than twelve passengers. But in my opinion that does not meet the case. An excellent suggestion has been made by the Canadian Merchant Service Guild in Vancouver. They say that these small boats could be classed as ferries, and that one of the qualifications for a certificate for a man operating a ferry under fifteen tons should be that the applicant has had at least twelve months' service on a coasting or ocean-going vessel under a certificated master, so assuring that he has had some experience and training. Now, that is a limited request. A man who operates a small ferry in minor waters, which minor waters, to take Burrard inlet as an illustration, may be daily traversed by dozens of coastwise and deep sea ships, in fog or stormy conditions or where tidal currents prevail—a man operating a ferry under such conditions should at least have a working acquaintance with coastwise or deep sea practice.

That approach to the question is, to my mind, the correct one. I would plead with the minister earnestly not to take it amiss that we suggest that this is perhaps the wrong way of dealing with these minor waters. It is no reflection upon him to say so. As he said himself this afternoon, ministers are sometimes clothed with extraordinary authority, but it is generally understood that they exercise only that authority on competent advice. He very properly says—and I appreciate it—that he has no idea of using that power in any reckless way. No one suggests that at all. But in my opinion it will not meet the situation which is in the mind of those who are urging this amendment. So I conclude with just these observations: first, it is unwise to leave the naming of minor waters wide open in that way. I think there should be greater restrictions in that respect. If possible it should be a statutory matter. The other point, which to my mind is much more important, is that in regard to the complaints or requests of those who operate casually what we may call small boats in what they allege to be minor waters, their case should be considered only or chiefly in the light of the safety of passengers. I appreciated the words of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) the other evening and I am quite well acquainted with the circumstances which I think he had in mind, in the remoter sections of the Pacific coast, with its innumerable inlets. Men who unquestionably are well skilled in handling boats may occasionally get an opportunity to carry pasengers. While I have a great deal of sympathy with the suggestion that men of that type should be assisted in every way, nevertheless I lay this down as extremely important, that the question of safety must be kept in mind. I can easily understand how a man who might operate one of these small boats in freighting, roustabout work, in the language of the trade, might be quite efficient in that, and he takes his own chances, but it is a different matter when a man of that type is entrusted with the lives of ten or twenty or thirty passengers. I find myself very strongly of the opinion that the suggestion of the Canadian Merchant Service Guild should be given very careful consideration.

My hon. friend spoke of his experience with the Indians in canoes. It is, I think, forty years ago that I was largely responsible for navigating a small vessel for four or five hundred miles up the coast. We got along very well; there were four or five of us on board; we went hither and thither without charts or much equipment of that kind, but no one could argue that the fact that a person acquires in that way a knowledge of the coast and of the general handling of a boat, qualifies him to have the responsibility of carrying passengers in such a boat. It is from that angle that I have presented these arguments, and request the minister to give consideration to the suggestions of the Canadian Merchant Service Guild as well as my own.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister tell the committee what the requirements are for a certificate of competency for a master of a steamship in minor waters?

Mr. HOWE: A certificate of competency is based chiefly upon experience. A master must have some years of service; he must have good eyesight, knowledge of the rules of the road, knowledge of steamships generally, and elementary knowledge of navigation.

Mr. GREEN: That is required in minor waters?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. There seems to be an impression—I think the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has it—that no certificate is required for minor waters. I assure the hon. member that there is a very rigid certificate for minor waters. Provision is made for temporary certificates, but I am informed that in the history of the department only five temporary certificates for minor waters have ever been granted on the coasts. The matter that the hon. member for Kootenay East is speaking of is the regulations, which have nothing to do with this section, because the department can make the regulations anything they like, independently of this section.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not wish to delay the committee, but surely the minister cannot mean what he says. He says that the department can make the regulations anything they like. They can make the regulations only subject to the provisions and powers in the act; they cannot make the regulations anything they like.

One word more before I cease pressing this point. It is obvious that there is not the slightest intention on the part of the minister to give any attention to it, because he did not even deign to answer me—

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend did not bring up anything new. We have all these representations.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so. I am just going to say this and then I am through. I believe that when we are studying an act of this kind in committee of the whole house, at the least we owe it to the people of this country to give reasonable consideration to their views. I may be all wrong, but I say that all persons—I do not care who they are or where they come from—who represent the people of this country and have some knowledge of the situation, are entitled to the courtesy of consideration. That is all I have to say to the minister.

Mr. HOWE: The representations made by the hon. member were duly received by the department. I assume he received a copy of the letter I have in my hand. They were fully considered by the technical officers, and I will say this for the technical officers of the Department of Marine: I think they constitute one of the finest branches of the service. My hon. friend says that it is not possible to regulate. I assure him that minor waters could be made anything the department officials recommended for the approval of the governor in council. This bill has nothing to do with regulations in connection with minor waters. It simply corrects a practice which has been established for the last twenty-three years of illegally operating in certain coastal waters under minor waters regulations. It is, in my opinion, a very necessary part of the act.

Mr. MacNEIL: How are the waters east of Prospect point in Burrard inlet classified?

Mr. HOWE: As I say, for the last twenty-three years the practice of the department has been to operate under minor water regulations.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does that permit the issuance of temporary certificates to masters or mates on vessels navigating those waters? May they have temporary certificates with qualifications lower than would be necessary in home trade waters.

Mr. HOWE: The qualifications are to some extent less than those required for open waters. A man cannot take a ship across the Pacific on a certificate which would be suitable for his operations in Burrard inlet. As I say, only five temporary certificates have been granted for the Pacific coast.

Mr. MacNEIL: My chief interest is in the ferries operating from Vancouver to North Vancouver, and through the First Narrows to West Vancouver. The minister must appreciate that the navigation of those waters is extremely dangerous, particularly in foggy weather. We must assure the travelling public that men in charge of such vessels have the highest qualifications. I should like to have some assurance from the minister that the most rigid and highest possible standard of qualifications will be maintained in issuing certificates to masters and mates in such vessels. May I point out that because of the dangers of navigation through the First Narrows it would seem quite as important to have well qualified mates as to have masters with those high qualifications. Particularly is that so when they are confronted with the extraordinary conditions of navigation which face them in the First Narrows in time of fog.

Mr. HOWE: I assure the hon. member that those qualifications will be observed.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister considered whether or not it might be preferable to use the expression "smooth waters" instead of "sheltered waters." After all, this question is of vital importance to us on the Pacific coast, because most of the mainland coast might be considered as sheltered by Vancouver island or the Queen Charlotte islands. Then, we have very large inlets, which are really great arms of the sea. I think the expression "sheltered waters" is too wide. "Smooth waters" would be much better. I suggest that this provision is particularly important as it applies to the waters around the city of Vancouver, because there are many thousands of people travelling on those waters. The situation is quite different from that in Comox-Alberni where people will know those operators who understand boats and those who do not. On the other hand many people will be carried as passengers on the ferries operating around Vancouver, believing that they are protected by government regulations and are being transported by duly qualified men. I would suggest using the expression "smooth waters" instead of "sheltered waters," and considering the possibility of deleting the word "inlets." It is a really serious question on the Pacific coast.

Mr. HOWE: It makes no difference what we call them. We declare what they are by law. In England it is the practice to call them smooth waters, while in Canada and in the United States it is customary to call them minor waters. But they are neither one nor the other unless they are so declared by departmental regulations. It does not matter whether they are sheltered or not; if they are declared sheltered by the department, they come under those regulations.

Mr. GREEN: Then, it is not the intention of the minister to declare as sheltered waters the large inlets on the Pacific coast?

Mr. HOWE: No, not at all.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have in mind a matter which should be considered in connection with this bill. To a great extent the Canada Shipping Act has been copied from the British Shipping Act, but there is a great difference between Canadian shipping and British shipping. The British Isles are in the middle of the Atlantic ocean—

Mr. BARBER: When were they moved?

Mr. POULIOT: They are not in the middle, but they are in the Atlantic ocean.

In Canada we have an entirely different situation, because we have inland navigation. For these reasons amendments concerning minor waters are of great importance. A certificate is required from captains, and in the issuance of such certificates the experience of the captain in matters of navigation should be the chief concern. When it is proved satisfactorily that a man has been in charge of a boat in such minor waters of Canada for several years, and he has shown his competence as a captain, I do not see why his certificate should be refused on technical grounds.

There is another point to consider, something which in my mind is just as important as the competence of the captain in charge of the ship. My point is that in inland waters where navigation takes place there should be lights on all wharves. May I bring anew to the attention of the minister the following facts: One of those minor waters of Canada is lake Témiscouata, a body of water twenty-seven miles long and a mile and a quarter wide. On the lake there are five wharves, and back of it, in the back country there are many settlements. To reach those settlements one must cross the lake, first from Cabano to Squatteck, and, second, from Notre Dame du Lac to St. Juste du Lac. In connection with the latter point there are two wharves, one being at St. Juste du Lac and the other at Route Centrale. Navigation is more difficult because there are no lights on those wharves. So much money is expended by the government that I suggest lights should be put on those wharves to facilitate navigation at night. I see the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) in his seat. He is familiar with the geography of that part of the country, and I say to him that if the government is ready to spend a lot of money for delivering mail in the winter time to people who live far away, I do not see why there should not be better facilities for those people who have to cross the lake. As I said previously, there are two ferry services, one between Cabano and Squatteck for the settlement of Squatteck and for people in other settlements east of Squatteck in both Témiscouata and Rimouski constituencies. The nearest doctors are at Cabano, Notre Dame du Lac and St. Louis, west and north of lake Témiscouata. They have to cross the lake to reach those people, and at the present time there are no lights on any of those wharves. When I asked the minister to see to it that lights should be put there, his answer was that nobody would have accepted the position of wharfinger last year. There is a very good reason for that, and it is because all the traffic there is done by the settlers, who carry away all their products at once and leave nothing on the wharf. They cannot pay any wharfage charges at all, and no remuneration can be expected from that wharf because the storage amounts to nothing. May I ask the minister if he will kindly see to it that lights are put on those wharves at the expense of the Department of Marine in order to facilitate navigation in minor waters like lake Témiscouata?

May I also say to the minister that the same thing can be said of the channel between Notre Dame de l'Isle Verte and the mainland. There are not enough lights on the wharves at Isle Verte and none at Notre Dame de l'Isle Verte. It is an island on which there are several people; in fact, there is a parish, and the people are engaged in fishing. There are two wharves, the eastern and western wharves, at Notre Dame de l'Isle Verte, and there are very small lights. There should be lights across also. In conclusion, may I ask the minister to see to it that lights are put on all those wharves which serve inland navigation?

Mr. MacNEIL: I hesitate to take up any more time of the committee, but I wish to impress upon the minister that this is a matter of vital importance to many people along the north shore of Burrard inlet, and we feel that some greater measure of protection should be given to the travelling public no matter what the size of the vessel may be.

We are particularly vitally concerned as to how these waters may be classified. The minister was good enough to give me some information, but I am still not clear about the matter. He states that these waters must be actually sheltered. That term may be applicable to the waters further north, but not to Burrard inlet, and particularly the waters adjacent to the First Narrows, where there are the dangers of heavy seas, congested sea-going traffic, and fog. The minister also states that it could reasonably be said that Vancouver harbour east of Prospect point—

Mr. HOWE: Will my hon. friend permit me to interrupt? I had forgotten where Point Atkinson was. Only that part of Burrard inlet east of the First Narrows, is considered sheltered waters, so my hon. friend may disregard the part outside the First Narrows.

Mr. MacNEIL: Reference has been made to the Canadian Merchant Service Guild. I know the members of this guild. It is comprised largely of the deck officers of coastal vessels and ferries plying in and out of the harbour of Vancouver, the very men who are most familiar with the hazards of navigation in that area and who have to take the risk of meeting other craft in charge of inexperienced masters. I think the evidence submitted by this guild should not be disregarded, however expert a knowledge the technical officers of the department may possess. The guild say in their statement to the minister:

We desire to bring to your attention that under the provisions of such an act all the coast of British Columbia, with the exception of a few comparatively short reaches, could be classed as minor waters, which would leave the way open to abuses which could be far-reaching and very dangerous to the sea-borne travelling public; in fact, it could be construed in such a manner that the whole effect of the Shipping Act relating to the qualifications and experience necessary to operate coasting vessels would be nullified.

Undoubtedly the act would be administered while the present local officials and administration are in office more in accordance with the intent than the letter of the act, but we think that now is the time to protect and safeguard the future and if possible avoid an undesirable precedent.

You can readily see that, under the provisions of the proposed amendment, Bill 53, the inlets which might, or might not, be classed as minor waters would depend on the opinion of the minister in office, and as it is not likely that successive ministers would always hold the same opinion in this regard, certain inlets might be classed for a period as "minor" and again as "coastal" waters, with the result that there would be detrimental confusion, and it would create continued controversy, with the resultant annoyance to the department officials and all other interested parties.

As a case in point, the harbour of Vancouver, for some unknown reason, was illegally declared a minor inland water about twenty years ago, with the result that this automatically entitled men, whose experience on board a vessel might have been confined almost exclusively to collecting fares, to obtain minor water certificates and to take charge of passenger vessels carrying sometimes as many as five hundred passengers per trip, plying across waters where there is continually a heavy traffic of all kinds of craft, including many ocean liners and fast coastal vessels, under which conditions we consider the highest qualifications and experience is essential.

We do not think it is necessary to elaborate on the seriousness of such a situation in the event of an emergency, such as a collision, and the importance of proper training and experience where the lives of passengers are at stake.

Another view we take is that as long as a person or company complies with the letter of the law, they could successfully contest any action taken to prevent them from so operating.

We strongly urge that paragraph one of Bill 53 be withdrawn, as we consider it dangerous, for the reason that it could be construed to permit men without the necessary experience in these coastal waters to operate large passenger vessels almost anywhere on this coast.

It appears to us that the reason for the proposal to have "sheltered arms of the sea" classed as "minor" waters is to overcome the difficulty of providing for certificates for small vessels carrying passengers and mail in some of our inlets. It seems to us that this has been, or could be, taken care of through the fact that it is proposed to create a new class of certificate for "steamship licensed as a ferry." Subsection F, paragraph 3, Bill 53.

These small boats could be classed as ferries and the rules could provide for certificates valid for ferries of over fifteen gross tons and for ferries under fifteen gross tons, respectively.

They go on to say:

We are firmly of the opinion that only responsible and experienced persons should be allowed to be in charge of a vessel carrying passengers for hire or gain, no matter how small the vessel may be, as it is known that a number of these boats measured to register 4·90 to 4·99 gross tons frequently have as many as forty, or even more, passengers on board, crossing dangerous waters, in charge of only one youth employed by the owners of these vessels to act in the dual capacity of master and engineer. These youths apparently do not understand the risks they are taking, and it is safe to say, seldom have even a rudimentary knowledge of the rules of the road, nor could they be expected to handle an emergent condition such as a collision, or sinking as a result of overloading or stress of weather. Under the present laws such a person has nothing to lose and is not responsible to any marine authority.

We think that our suggestion that a certificate be provided for vessels of fifteen or twenty gross tons and under is the solution to this heretofore difficult matter, and should not work a hardship on anyone, while at the same time it would provide reasonable protection for the men, women and scores of children who often use this class of craft for transportation, sometimes over a distance of twenty miles, or more, across treacherous waters, they apparently having little or no understanding of the danger.

I submit that evidence coming from this source should be given great weight. I know the members of the guild have given this legislation and their brief their very earnest consideration, and are anxious to serve only the public interest and the public safety in this matter. I should add, in conclusion, that there is no longer any difficulty in securing certificated masters of the required standard and qualifications for work of this kind. Plenty of them are available for employment. I see no reason why this classification should apply in such a way as to lower the qualifications of masters or mates in charge of passenger carrying vessels.

Mr. NEILL: I had not intended again to take part in this debate, but I really cannot allow some of the statements that have been made to go on the record without protest. We all know of the guild referred to by the hon. members and it would seem that either they do not understand the situation or else they are making a very ex parte statement. The association to which the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) referred is an association of masters and mates. The members of this guild are quite naturally and properly looking after their own interests. Their interests are to see that a master and a mate are on every boat that goes out of a harbour on any occasion, but I do not know that we all look at this matter from their point of view. This will not mean that there will be more of them employed; it means that there will be fewer of them employed. That seems a broad statement to make, but it will work out like this: The law is and always has been that any vessel up to five tons does not require any certificated officer; anyone can take it out. Several of these small boats serve points where a man or a woman going to market wants to cross with three dozen eggs or something like that. Such a traffic will not stand a certificated master and mate. What would happen? They will get a boat of 4·9 tons and jam it full with all the people they can get on. The new provisions in the bill are intended to help to preserve the safety of life because men will be encouraged to use larger boats. I have heard men say that if it were possible to get a temporary certificate for a boat larger than five tons, they would build a bigger and safer boat with more powerful engines. Men will be encouraged to go after these temporary certificates and then they will be able to run larger and safer boats.

The hon. member has referred to a boy who usually takes up tickets being placed in charge of a boat carrying 500 passengers. Section 123 of the act describes who shall get temporary certificates, and it states that they shall be limited to people in charge of a boat carrying twelve passengers or under. That is what the section says, but 500 passengers has a much more pathetic sound. It is also limited to boats of twenty tons, not 8,000 tons. As the minister says, these boats are not going to be entrusted to someone who knows nothing but the taking up of tickets. The regulations call for an eye test, a hearing test, a colour blindness test, a knowledge of the rules of the road and some knowledge of signals.

Much has been said about the necessity of having a navigator to handle a boat in fogs, that there should be a man in charge capable of taking the boat anywhere in this hemisphere. During the war a lot of men from the Pacific coast served on the merchant ships taking troops to the old country. It was remarked by British seamen, than whom there are no finer or more expert in the world, how these men from the Pacific coast were able to find their way in total darkness. This was done by what is known as catching the echo. They would blow their whistle and then they could tell from how long it took the echo to come back just where they were. Apparently this method is not studied on the other side and it was considered to be a very remarkable thing.

During the last campaign I had occasion to travel some fifteen miles at night in a fog so dense that I would have preferred to stay where I was. However I was very anxious to get away and the fog was so thick that when we had got ten yards from a wharf where there was a steamer of perhaps 9,000 tons, very brightly lighted, we could not see it. The man in charge of the boat upon which I was travelling probably did not have a master's ticket, but he knew every yard, so to speak, of those waters. He carried us along in good time without slackening speed except when there was danger of running into fishing nets. In a fog as bad as anything I have ever seen on the coast he landed us at the exact place we wanted to land. He was able to do this because he was familiar with this echo system. He could catch the echo and he knew when he had reached a certain place. He could make a turn when he should make a turn. That sort of local knowledge is worth far more than the ability to shoot the sun. When you are crossing a bay five miles in width you do not need to be able to shoot the sun.

The minister has told us that this practice has been in use for twenty-seven years and that at the present time there are not more than five temporary certificates on the Pacific coast. Apparently this practice has been going on illegally under a misapprehension, and it is now proposed to make the thing legal. I do not think there is any real danger such as has been suggested. The same men who have prescribed these regulations for inland or safe waters during all these years will presumably continue along the same lines. If we are going to be so fussy about these things, let us devote ourselves to something more practicable. Under section 133 of the act, a pleasure yacht does not need any master or mate. Any millionaire can put on a white cap with gold braid on it and call himself a captain. He very soon promotes himself to commodore. He can take his friends aboard and can sink the whole lot of them without any restriction whatever. He can ram a fishing boat or any other boat, but because his boat is a pleasure yacht he does not need to be a qualified captain. It does not matter whether his boat is five tons or 500 tons, he is free to go where he likes and do anything he likes. He does not need to have even a boatswain on board. We might better deal with these questions instead of these other petty matters.

I can assure hon. members that instead of having certificated masters and mates on these boats making these short trips, they will not use boats of any size at all. They will be forced to use boats of 4·9 tons, and I know from personal experience that that size of boat is very uncomfortable when the water is a little rough. I give full credence to the good intentions of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) and the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). I have the greatest regard for this particular guild and I have fought their battles in this house when I thought they were right. However, they are looking at things very much from their own point of view and I am sure they will not be deprived of any means of livelihood by this amendment. It will only give the travelling public a safer means of travel.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention of the minister to use temporary certificates, or will he make the men who operate these boats in minor waters get proper certificates under the act? Apparently there is quite a difference in the test which they have to pass. If they will all be working under temporary certificates, that would not seem to be a very sound practice.

Mr. HOWE: I am sure the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) was arguing on the principle that they had to get ordinary certificates. As I say, only five temporary certificates have been granted on the Pacific coast.

Mr. GREEN: It is not the minister's intention to grant a lot of temporary certificates?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. MacNEIL: What qualifications will be required for mates? We have had some serious accidents around the First Narrows at Vancouver and I think it is very important that there should be efficient mates.

Mr. HOWE: Boats navigating through the First Narrows at Vancouver must carry masters and mates with deep sea certificates. They must have at least home trade certificates, which is an entirely different matter from a minor water certificate. In future a man with a minor water certificate could not go through the First Narrows at Vancouver without breaking the law.

Mr. MacNEIL: What qualifications would be required for mates on the ferries operating from Vancouver to North Vancouver across Burrard inlet?

Mr. HOWE: Practically the same regulations that I have described. That is, they must have their sight and hearing tested; they must know the rules of the road; they must have an elementary knowledge of seamanship and must have had a course in reading the compass. In addition, the examiners of the department pay particular attention to licences with regard to ferries on minor waters. They are reluctant to give any man a licence for a ferry unless he is very well qualified.

Mr. MacNEIL: Am I right in assuming that the qualifications required of these men are lower than those required of men serving as mates on ships in home trade waters?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNEIL: I do not wish to take issue with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, particularly with reference to navigation in waters within his constituency. I have reference to conditions in and around the harbour of Vancouver, where men in navigating through a fog must not only utilize the echo signal system but have an expert knowledge of navigation and be able to find their way by compass reckoning and have an accurate knowledge of the charts and tidal conditions for that area. It is with particular reference to waters in and adjacent to Vancouver that we are concerned.

Mr. MacINNIS: There has been considerable discussion on this point. I think the minister should give serious consideration to the matter before the bill passes—

Mr. HOWE: If I may interrupt the hon. gentleman, perhaps I can shorten the discussion. My hon. friend from Vancouver North described exactly the knowledge which men in these different categories are required to have. The difference is that the man with the home trade certificate must have greater knowledge than one holding a minor waters certificate. He must use the sextant to shoot the sun, and must have much of the knowledge that a deep sea certificate calls for. Surely it is not necessary to shoot the sun in crossing an inlet.

Mr. MacNEIL: We have had some accidents that have caused us some alarm even in the North Vancouver ferry service.

Mr. MacINNIS: If the minister will turn to the hon. gentleman just behind him he will give the information with regard to the difficulties of navigating in the entrance and in the harbour of Vancouver. Last year there was an accident in the First Narrows. One of the West Vancouver ferry boats was sunk and life was lost.

Mr. HOWE: They did not have the minor waters certificate.

Mr. MacINNIS: Were the certificates they had higher than those of minor officers?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, home trade certificates.

Mr. MacINNIS: This section leaves very wide powers in the hands of the minister. As the Canadian Merchant Service Guild pointed out, while these powers may be very well administered we have had difficulties in this regard before and may have difficulties again. I would give a great deal of consideration to the recommendation made by the Canadian Merchant Service Guild for the reason that, in connection with the amendments which are before us in this bill, this is the only point with respect to which they suggest there should be a change. They say very wisely that the rest of the bill could be allowed to pass without serious discussion and we could wait and see how it worked out, but that considering there is a principle involved here this should not be allowed to pass in its present form. I submit that the minister should give some attention to this matter, for it is of considerable importance.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Grades of certificates of competency.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In order to bring the bill into conformity with the reprinted copy I move that the bill be amended by the insertion of a clause to be numbered clause 3, substituting for clause 3 in the present bill the following:

3. Paragraph (b) of subsection one of section one hundred and thirteen of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"(b) Ships solely employed in fishing, and other ships principally engaged in fishing not exceeding one hundred and fifty tons gross tonnage, not carrying passengers, and employed on the waters within the area within which a home trade voyage may be made."

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister will explain what it means.

Mr. HOWE: This means that fishing boats are exempt. This allows the fishing boats to do a little freighting in the off season.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. BENNETT: Not passengers?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Requirements for certificates of service as masters and mates.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In conformity with the reprinted bill I move that the bill be amended by substituting, for the present clause 4, clause 3 in the present bill, reading:

4. Subsection four of section one hundred and fifteen of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"(4) In the other grades certificates may be granted for the following classes:—

(a) Steamship;
(b) Cargo steamship;
(c) Tug;
(d) Sailing ship;
(e) Fore-and-aft rigged sailing ship;
(f) Steamship licensed as a ferry."

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Requirements for certificates of service as masters of certain non-passengers steamships.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In conformity with the reprinted bill, I move that there be substituted for the present clause 5 the following:

5. Paragraph (b) of section one hundred and sixteen of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"(b) The holder of a home trade certificate, on waters within the limits of home trade, provided that the minister may, in his discretion, authorize the holder of such certificate to act as master or mate, as the case may be, of a sailing ship or a sailing ship fitted with auxiliary power, making voyages from places on the Atlantic coast of Canada to places in the West Indies."

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister not think that the government is going rather far in this? Let it be remembered that this is a standard act. Perhaps I might recite briefly the history of the act. The general form of it was settled by the preceding administration. We employed counsel and drafted a bill which I took to England. I asked that the advisers of the crown on the shipping side go into it and make such suggestions as they thought would be helpful to us. This is a section the value of which we are destroying, leaving it to the minister to exercise a discretion that never, never was intended should be exercised. I shall not go into the matter at length beyond saying this. There are two forms of certificates in the statutes. One is a certificate of competency, which is a man's ticket obtained by service and examination. The other, as will be observed, is not a ticket of competency; it is a temporary certificate known as a certificate of service. That depends upon his having served a period of time during a preceding number of years in a capacity for which he now seeks to obtain a certificate, but he has to undergo an examination.

Mr. HOWE: May I interrupt my right hon. friend for a moment; I think he is on the wrong section.

Mr. BENNETT: No. What the minister is doing is amending section 116. No notice was given of this. It is not in the bill; it is not in the votes and proceedings, and it vitally affects—

Mr. HOWE: We are inserting this in place of another section 116; that section comes in later on.

Mr. BENNETT: But the section the minister is inserting in its place is an entirely different one.

Mr. HOWE: But we have the old section 116 in there as well.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly; I have section 116 before me, providing for the rights of holders of certificates. There are the four certificates, foreign-going, home trade, inland water and minor waters certificates. I was out of the chamber for a moment, but when we were dealing with the preceding section I was going to point out to the minister that there is nothing with reference to the physical ability of the man, his ability to see and to observe colours and signals. Surely that is of first consideration, but I notice that it is not in the bill. This is not a reflection upon the minister, of course—

Mr. HOWE: It is in the regulations.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point exactly; it is in the regulations, but the other factors that are in the statute cannot be modified by ministerial regulations. Doubtful cases of this sort sometimes warrant the old maxim that bad cases make bad law, and cases of hardship sometimes make very bad administration, especially in a democracy. The point I am making at the moment in this connection, however, is that we should not go too far in our endeavour to meet cases that come to our attention. You cannot generalize in order to meet particular cases. I know that two years ago, when we passed this statute, cases were urged upon us, and we felt that when we provided for a man having satisfactory service for a period of one year during the ten years prior to 1931, we were going as far as we could within reason. I notice that in the new section the date has been made January 1, 1936. In other words, if at any time since January 1, 1926, the man is able to prove that he has been a year in any of the several classes of service mentioned; if he has certificates,—issued under the regulations but not under the statute,—as to sobriety when he has been on board, as to satisfactory vision and ability to discern and read signals, and if he passes the prescribed examination he may get a certificate of service, which is not one of competency. It does not permit him, fortunately, under some of the sections, to be in charge of vessels that have to do with passengers, except in a very limited sense. Without following the matter up at any greater length for the time being, I suggest that we are going rather a long distance by placing in the hands of the minister a discretion which I think he himself would be the first to wish he did not possess. This is a new provision, as my hon. friend beside me notes, as far as the discretion is concerned.

Mr. HOWE: I might say that there is always a little hardship in changing regulations. Today the possessor of a home trade certificate can go as far south as the fortieth parallel, which takes him well down in South America. We are changing the law and limiting him now to voyages as far south as cape Hatteras. It has been represented to us that there are not more than about five boats that make occasional trips to the West Indies which would be concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: What class of boats?

Mr. HOWE: Sailing boats, or boats carrying sails and auxiliary powers. It is a temporary situation, and in order to avoid hardship in those few instances we felt that for the time being they should not be cut off overnight.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Load line ships.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have an amendment to this section.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver) that Bill No. 53 be amended by substituting, for the present section 6, section 4 in the present bill, reading as follows:

6. The first seven lines of section one hundred and eighteen of the said act are repealed and the following are substituted therefor:—

"118. Every British subject who—

(1) served as a master or mate of a foreign-going or home trade sailing ship of over seventy-five tons, gross tonnage, before the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-six, for a full period of twelve months within ten years immediately preceding the date of his application for a certificate of service;"

Mr. BENNETT: That is just as it is now in the statute?

Mr. HOWE: The only change is the year, bringing it up to date. It has been brought up to date from time to time. I think the first year inserted was 1870, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. BENNETT: But the former act made it 1931. I have not had time to satisfy myself on the point, but I think that is done throughout the empire. I think that matter should be looked into, because it will be remembered that the statute was not passed until 1934, and we made the date January 1, 1931. I had an impression that this provision, 1931, prevailed in other countries as well as our own. We did not make it January 1, 1934; we made it 1931. That was the year from which the time was counted. As the matter stands now, we have added greatly to our numbers having added five years, or half the originally specified period. We are now going back to 1926 as the year; we are therefore conferring a right which the original statute had no intention of conferring when the limit was made the first day of January, 1931.

Mr. HOWE: May I point out to my right hon. friend that the section says "prior to."

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, of course; ten years prior to that.

Mr. HOWE: The nearer the date the more expert the man; would that not be so? I am told that the explanation for 1931 having been inserted in the act of 1934 is that that date was carried over from the act as last revised. In other words, it was carried into the 1934 act more or less in error. It should have been brought up to date in 1934, because it has been the custom of the department to advance the date by revising the act from time to time.

Mr. BENNETT: If it has no universal application I am satisfied.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Application of load line provisions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have an amendment to section 7, to make it conform to the reprinted bill.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver) that Bill No. 53 be amended by substituting, for the present section 7, section 5 in the present bill, reading as follows:

[The Chairman.]

7. The said act is further amended by inserting after section one hundred and eighteen the following section:—

"118a. Every British subject who—

(a) served as a master of a home-trade sailing ship of over seventy-five tons, gross tonnage, or steamship of over ten tons, gross tonnage, or served as a master of an inland waters or minor waters sailing ship of over twenty tons, gross tonage, or steamship of over ten tons, gross tonnage, before the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-six, for a full period of twelve months within the ten years immediately preceding the date of his application for a certificate of service;

(b) produces satisfactory evidence of his sobriety, experience, ability and general good conduct on board ship; and

(c) passes the prescribed examination;

shall be entitled, on payment of the prescribed fee, and according to the waters served in, to either a home-trade, inland waters or minor waters certificate of service as master of a steamship of over ten tons, gross tonnage, and not exceeding one hundred and fifty tons, gross tonnage, and not carrying passengers. Such certificate shall not be valid on tugs."

Mr. BENNETT: I direct the minister's attention to the fact that this is an entirely new section, and introduces an entirely new principle with respect to this particular class of ship. But its safety lies in the fact that it precludes the handling of passengers, on the one hand, and tugboats on the other. Nevertheless I put this to the minister as a suggestion; if I were practising my profession and had a man whose physical condition might not be very good, I would compel the issue of a certificate if he had passed the examination and had these other qualifications, for in the section there is not a single reference to a regulation. It prescribes the conditions precedent to his obtaining the certificate—of service, not of competency—and there is no mention of physical condition.

Mr. NEILL: It says that he must pass an examination.

Mr. BENNETT: But it does not say physical examination. The examination is a prescribed examination. I feel quite certain, because there are authorities on the point, that where conditions are laid down in a statute and there has been compliance with them, the man's rights have accrued. This does not safeguard the minister, neither does the other section, and it is perhaps responsible for some of the difficulties that have arisen. It is no good to point out that the regulations may be made in this way or that; these are the conditions laid down by which a man gets a certificate of service, and if he has complied with them he is entitled to the certificate. I suggest that something further should be added, such as "and complies with the regulations of the department"; that he passes the prescribed examination and otherwise complies with the regulations—are they regulations of the minister?—the regulations, whatever they are.

I have said all I intend to say; it is a matter of indifference to me.

Mr. HOWE: If my right hon. friend will look at page 118 of the 1934 act he will find that is taken over without change.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that; it is bad in that act too. That is what made it clear to me that the act as it stands does not contemplate regulations entering into the matter; it is purely compliance with conditions, and upon the fulfilment of those conditions the right accrues. It is because the minister has been advised that the regulations govern that we should say "and complies with the regulations of—" I do not know whose they are.

Mr. REID: In this new section, where it says, "such certificates shall not be valid on tugs," does that mean that if a man serves on a tugboat that service does not count for a certificate as master or mate?

Mr. HOWE: There is no certificate of service for a tug. He must have other qualifications than the fact that he has been running on tugs.

Mr. REID: What is going to happen? We have large tugs in the Fraser river, and the men are very competent, after years of service and navigation.

Mr. HOWE: Surely they have certificates.

Mr. REID: Not necessarily; they may start as deck hands.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Certain ships exempted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have an amendment to clause 8. I move:

That Bill No. 53 be amended by inserting in place of the present clause 8 a clause reading as follows:—

8. Paragraph (b) of subsection one of section one hundred and twenty-two of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"(b) a steamship of not more than thirty-five tons, gross tonnage, employed in fishing operations (including the carrying of fishermen, their wives and children, and fish and fishing supplies used in connection with their operations) plying within specified limits on the inland waters of Canada or on waters on the sea coasts of Canada."

Mr. BENNETT: That, Mr. Chairman, of course confers upon the minister the right to issue a temporary certificate based upon experience and knowledge, but it does not prescribe any method by which the minister is to satisfy himself concerning that. Now we are extending it beyond its reasonable limits by applying it to the sea coast waters of Canada. We observe that it involves the lives of passengers, because the wife and children of the fisherman can be carried in the ship. It is a pretty loose sort of certificate, based upon experience and knowledge. It reminds me of the method once reported by a distinguished minister of the crown who went up to be admitted to the bar of Ontario. He was met at the station by the treasurer of the law society who on the way up asked him, "What do you know about the laws of Ontario?" The minister replied, "Nothing at all," with a few more genial words. The treasurer said, "That satisfies me that I can certify that you possess the requisite knowledge to be admitted."

The minister will experience just that sort of thing. The certificate is excessively loose, and inland waters are defined as all these little series of lakes, from Superior and Michigan down to St. Peter's.

Mr. HOWE: That was in the old act.

Mr. BENNETT: Does my hon. friend mean the one before 1934? It was not in the 1934 act.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; we have simply added the words "on the waters of the sea coasts of Canada."

Mr. BENNETT: It is a vastly different thing to deal with the seaboard of the Atlantic or Pacific ocean, and from permitting passengers to be carried, namely, the family.

Mr. HOWE: They carry them anyway.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly the reason I prefer not to give the sanction of the law to the practice. In the one instance the minister will be charged with dereliction of duty; in the other he simply says: They violated the statute and are the authors of their own injury.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 9—If not propelled by steam power.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have an amendment to section 9.

Mr. HOWE: I may say in explanation, in connection with sections 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13, that we asked the Department of Justice to help us straighten out the legal position regarding penalties to pilots. There was a difficulty that there was no provision permitting the disciplining of a pilot by the pilotage authorities. They found the provisions regarding pilots very badly worded so we straightened out all the pertinent sections at the same time. There are no material changes except that the department is allowed to discipline pilots for minor offences, as they do at present.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move:

That Bill No. 53 be amended by inserting in place of the present clause 8 a clause reading as follows:—

9. Paragraph (f) of section three hundred and nineteen of the said act is amended by adding the following:—

"and without restricting the generality of the foregoing make regulations with respect to every licensed pilot or apprentice pilot who, either within or without the district for which he is licensed,—

(i) lends his licence; or

(ii) acts as pilot or apprentice pilot whilst suspended; or

(iii) acts as pilot or apprentice pilot while under the influence of intoxicating liquor or narcotic drugs, while on duty or about to go on duty; or

(iv) is guilty of insubordination, misbehaviour, or malingering, or who pilots a vessel beyond the limits of the pilotage district without the consent of the pilotage authority; or

(v) refuses or delays, when not prevented by illness or other reasonable cause, proof of which to the satisfaction of the pilotage authority shall lie on him, to take charge of any ship within the limits of his licence, upon the signal for a pilot being made by such ship, or upon being required so to do by the master, owner, agent or consignee thereof, or by any officer of the pilotage authority of the district for which such pilot is licensed, or by any chief officer of customs; or

(vi) refuses, when requested by the master to conduct the ship on board of which he is into any port or place into which he is licensed to conduct the same, except on reasonable ground of danger to the ship; or

(vii) quits the ship which he has undertaken to pilot, before the service for which he was hired has been performed, without the consent of the master."

Mr. BENNETT: This will not modify the obligations imposed by the pilotage authority to act by by-law. The by-law is to be approved by the governor in council, and this extends the powers. This does not permit the simple procedure of making regulations in the sense of just making them; it must be by by-law. The section contains this expression, "shall, within its district, have power from time to time, by by-law confirmed by the governor in council." If that is perfectly clear, I have no objection.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I do not wish to delay the committee, but I belong to that school of thought which abhors the process of putting the burden of proof on the accused.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member has defended too many prisoners.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I suggest that paragraph (v) should not contain this expression, "proof of which to the satisfaction of the pilotage authority shall lie on him."

Mr. HOWE: There is no change in that wording.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I understand that, but a custom has grown up through which we have adopted the French criminal law. It is an easy process to put a man in the dock and say to him; You are guilty, prove yourself innocent.

Mr. HOWE: Who could prove a pilot was ill, except the pilot himself.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): There are many cases mentioned, in addition to illness. The section refers to "other reasonable cause," and other offences are enumerated. They are run together, separated only by the word "or." The proof is put on the pilot. The good old British fashion is that if you charge a man with a wrong you must prove it. In these cases, however, we shift the burden, and this is a process which seems to have become very popular not only in this parliament, but in the legislatures. I protest against it.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—Duties of courts, et cetera, re British ships not registered in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move:

That section 10 of the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

10. Paragraph (g) of section three hundred and nineteen of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

(g) "make rules for punishing any breach of any regulation made pursuant to the provisions of this section by penalty or by the withdrawal or suspension of the licence or certificate of the person guilty of such breach and notwithstanding anything contained in any other provision of this act, impose, recover and enforce any such punishment."

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister look at the proposed new section, and then turn his attention to section 11, and the proposed new section 320. The same power is therein conferred, namely,—

Every pilotage authority may, by by-law made according to the provisions of this part of this act, provide for the imposition of a fine not exceeding in any case Two hundred dollars for the breach of such by-law, and may further so provide that suspension or dismissal at the discretion of the pilotage authority may ensue.

That refers to the dismissal of the man himself. The early part of the new section 10

(g) is merely a repetition of what occurs in section 320 as rewritten, but deals with the certificate that the pilot must render on dismissal. But in both cases the by-law is essential. I think there is some contradiction in terms. Section 320 covers the situation in all cases, except with respect to individual pilots' licences.

Mr. HOWE: We found the earlier act much involved, and we left it to the law officers of the crown to straighten out.

Mr. BENNETT: Then, if this is what they gave you, they will have to take the responsibility.

Mr. NEILL: This is the principle I objected to last year in connection with another bill. In this instance we are handing over authority to make penalties and to create offences to some body which is not legislative in character. Apparently they have not even to be O.-K'd by the governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; they have to be approved by the governor in council.

Mr. NEILL: Presumably the pilotage authorities are pilots. They may have no legal training and may not have the best training to draw up regulations and make penalties. Like my hon. friend next to me, I object to handing over to some other body a wide-open door authority to create offences and to impose penalties.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that the pilotage authority is the minister.

Mr. NEILL: I thought it was a local body in the provinces.

Mr. HOWE: No; it is the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: But with respect to section 319 it is a local pilotage authority.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; but the pilotage authority for Canada is the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, for Canada.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11—Repeal.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move:

That section 11 of the bill be deleted, and the following substituted therefor:

11. Section three hundred and twenty of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"320. Every pilotage authority may, by by-law made according to the provisions of this part of this act, provide for the imposition of a fine not exceeding in any case two hundred dollars for the breach of such by-law, and may further so provide that suspension or dismissal at the discretion of the pilotage authority may ensue."

Mr. BENNETT: Has the proposed section 320 been generally agreed upon by the mercantile nations of the world?

Mr. HOWE: That is my understanding. There has been no change in the act of 1934. This is simply to sort it out and make it more readable.

Mr. BENNETT: In this instance we are putting on a limitation of $200. Section 355 states:

A pilot deprived of his licence or suspended or condemned to pay a penalty for having caused damage to a ship shall not be entitled to any pilotage dues if the amount of such damage is equal to or exceeds that of such dues, or, if it is less, to more than the excess of the amount of such dues over that of such damage.

We are now placing a limitation upon the liability for damages. I have only this to say about it—and by the way, was this the opinion of the Department of Justice?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Because the inference is that this section which sets the measure of damages which may accrue is ultra vires, unless it is said to be ancillary to the exercise of shipping and pilotage. However, if the Department of Justice has made the ruling, I cannot say anything.

Mr. HOWE: There is a section in the British act which limits liabilities to $500; we have made it $300.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course they have no division of jurisdiction such as we have here.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 12—Coming into force.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move, Mr. Chairman, an amendment to section 12 to make it conform with the reprinted bill, as follows:

12. Section three hundred and fifty-five of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:—

"(2) No pilot shall be personally liable in pecuniary damages beyond the amount of three hundred dollars for any damage or loss occasioned by his neglect or want of skill."

Mr. BENNETT: I doubt our ability to do this.

Mr. HOWE: We had a case a short time ago where a pilot was sued for $3,000 damages, and had it not been for the fact that negligence was not proved the pilot would have been made to pay far more, of course, than he could afford. I think a man working for moderate fees should not put his entire fortune in jeopardy every time he acts as pilot.

Mr. BENNETT: I have some doubt about parliament having the power to enact this clause as it deals with property and civil rights. Undoubtedly, if it is ancillary to the powers relating to shipping, we would have the power, but when you say that the measure of damages shall be restricted by this parliament in a civil action brought under provincial jurisdiction where the legislature has complete control over matters of this kind, I think it would be difficult to say that it is ancillary to the powers relating to shipping.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I agree entirely with the leader of the opposition. I do not think it is competent for this parliament in this section to limit the amount of damages in case of damage or loss occasioned by a pilot's neglect or want of skill. I am quite convinced that it is entirely beyond the jurisdiction of this parliament to make that inroad upon "property and civil rights," and besides that, I think it is an unfair limitation. In section 11 you provide by the new section 320 for a maximum fine of $200 for a breach of an ordinary by-law, and it seems to me entirely disproportionate to say that the maximum amount to which any pilot shall be liable for damages occasioned by his want of skill or negligence should be limited to $300. I do not believe that you can put a limit on it at all because, as the leader of the opposition has pointed out, it is not necessary for the purpose of properly administering your authority in regard to shipping.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move, Mr. Chairman, that, to conform with the reprinted bill, section 13 be added as follows:

13. Subsection one of section three hundred and sixty-one of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"361. (1) Every licensed pilot or apprentice pilot who, either within or without the district for which he is licensed,

(a) commits any fraud or offence in respect of the revenues of Customs or Excise, or the laws relating thereto; or

(b) is in any way directly or indirectly concerned in any corrupt practices relating to ships, their tackle, cargoes, crews or passengers, or to persons in distress at sea or by shipwreck, or to their moneys, goods or chattels; or

(c) employs or causes to be employed on behalf of any ship of which he has the charge, any ship, boat, anchor, cable, or other store, matter or thing, beyond what is necessary for the service of such ship, with the intent to enhance the expenses of pilotage for his own gain, or for the gain of any other person; or

(d) upon being signalled or required, attempts to make any special bargain for salvage; or

[Mr. Howe.]

(e) unnecessarily cuts or slips, or causes to be cut or slipped any cable belonging to any ship;

shall be liable to a fine not exceeding two hundred dollars, and, in the event of a conviction, the proper pilotage authority may suspend or cancel the pilot's licence.

Mr. BENNETT: The new words are "in the event of a conviction the proper pilotage authority may suspend or cancel the pilot's licence."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is right.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I understood from the minister a few minutes ago that the pilotage authority is the minister, but there is also a local pilot authority. Is it the practice in any of the ports where we have a pilotage authority to dispense with apprentice pilots?

Mr. HOWE: We have apprentice pilots nearly everywhere. There is authority to admit apprentices when required, but steps have to be taken to see that there are not too many pilots.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): There are no apprentice pilots in the port of Sydney; at least I am assured there are not.

Mr. HOWE: they could have them if they were required.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I think there are no apprentice pilots permitted by regulation or by-law in Sydney harbour, and I was wondering why that regulation should exist.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister was in unconscious error with respect to the pilotage authority. Pilotage authority is defined by paragraph 70 of the interpretation clause of the Canada Shipping Act, as follows:

"Pilotage authority" means any existing pilotage authority and any persons authorized by the governor in council to appoint or licence pilots or fix or alter rates of pilotage; if the pilotage authority is the Minister of Marine, it includes the Deputy Minister of Marine.

The minister is not in all cases the pilotage authority. In many cases he is, but not on the St. Lawrence. They have one of their own, according to my recollection.

Mr. POWER: Two of their own, at Montreal and Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: They are separate. The minister is the pilotage authority in some other sections of the country but not in all. I cannot speak of the Pacific coast, but my memory is that he is not the pilotage authority there.

Mr. HOWE: At least I sign the licences for all pilots on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move, Mr. Chairman, that to conform with the reprinted bill, section 14 be added as follows:

14. Subsections one and two of section four hundred and twenty-three of the said act are repealed and the following are substituted therefor:—

"423. (1) For the purposes of this part of this act relating to load lines, ships of one hundred and fifty tons, gross tonnage, and upwards, which carry cargo or passengers between any place in Canada and any place not in Canada, or between any places not in Canada, which are not by subsections two or three of this section exempted from the provisions of this part of this act relating to load lines, shall hereafter be referred to as load line ships, and load line ships belonging to countries to which the load line convention applies shall hereafter be referred to as load line convention ships.

(2) The provisions of this part of this act relating to load lines shall not apply to ships engaged solely in fishing or subject to the provisions of section four hundred and twenty-three A of this act to ships making voyages between Canada and the United States of America on any lakes or rivers."

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder if the minister upon reflection does not think this is a rather improper thing to do. You are doing away with the load line, which is Plimsoll's line, in connection with the carrying of passengers between ports in Canada and the United States and between one port in Canada and another. You have to read the two sections together:

423. (1) For the purposes of this part of this act relating to load lines, ships of one hundred and fifty tons, gross tonnage, and upwards, which carry cargo or passengers between any place in Canada and any place not in Canada, or between any places not in Canada, which are not by subsections two or three of this section exempted from the provisions of this part of this act relating to load lines, shall hereafter be referred to as load line ships, and load line ships belonging to countries to which the load line convention applies shall hereafter be referred to as load line convention ships.

Then:

(2) The provisions of this part of this act relating to load lines shall not apply to ships engaged solely in fishing—

That was the law, and always has been:

—or subject to the provisions of section four hundred and twenty-three A of this act to ships making voyages between Canada and the United States of America on any lakes or rivers.

Then follows a description. This contemplates these boats carrying passengers, and the abrogation of the rule with respect to the load line I feel quite certain would not be living up to the obligations that have been accepted by the other nations of the British commonwealth in matters of this kind. Apart from that, if the minister will look at this section and then at the succeeding one, he will see that it permits regulations to be made, and the part which I think we should consider a little more carefully is this:

"423a. (1) Subject to the provisions of this section the provisions of sections four hundred and twenty-three to four hundred and forty-three, both inclusive, of this act, in so far as they are applicable, shall have effect in respect of ships of one hundred and fifty tons, gross tonnage, and upwards, which carry cargo or passengers on voyages from any place in Canada to any other place in Canada or between Canada and the United States of America on any lakes or rivers: Provided that the provisions of subsections one and two of section four hundred and twenty-five of this act shall apply to a ship constructed after the thirtieth day of June nineteen hundred and thirty-six . . .

We can leave that, but these are the words that indicate what the conditions are:

—and provided that the governor in council may on such conditions as he thinks fit exempt from the provisions of this section ships plying on such voyages if he is satisfied that the sheltered nature and conditions of the voyages make it unreasonable or impracticable to apply the provisions of this section to ships so plying.

That is asking the minister to undertake a responsibility which I think no minister would be anxious to discharge. On the next page we have the conditions under which the recommendations are to be made and definitions of "salt water," "proceed to sea," and other definitions and regulations. The subsection with reference to local load line certificates reads:

A local load line certificate in lieu of a load line convention certificate provided for in subsection one of section four hundred and twenty-eight of this act shall be issued for the purposes of ships coming within the provisions of this section. Such local load line certificates shall be issued under like conditions as load line convention certificates are issued.

It is only my duty to point out that this is a very great departure from the general rule with reference to load line convention certificates that ships plying between Canadian and United States ports and carrying passengers and cargo have been compelled heretofore to observe. The mark made upon these ships is not of the same type as is made upon what are known as deep sea ships, but the certificate is of the same kind and is determined in the same manner. I should like to know just who asked for this change. Perhaps the minister could give us some indication of that and we might be able to have a fairer appreciation of things.

Mr. HOWE: I think my right hon. friend is quite mistaken about the purpose of this section. Section 14 is merely to clarify the old act. This section reads in part:

—which carry cargo or passengers between any place in Canada and any place not in Canada.

The old act was indefinite. The purpose of the change is to provide that a boat, say, coming from the United States to Canada must also have this line.

Mr. BENNETT: We cannot compel American boats to put on Plimsoll lines but we can refuse to clear them from our ports unless they have them.

Mr. HOWE: We are making sure that they have them when they come back.

Mr. BENNETT: We have no jurisdiction when they get their clearance from an American port, but when they reach our ports they cannot clear again unless they have a certificate as to the load line. It must be conceded that this parliament cannot confer jurisdiction over an American ship in Seattle, but it can confer jurisdiction over that ship once she is tied up at our docks. We can refuse to give her clearance to leave our port unless she has complied with our regulations with respect to load line.

Mr. HOWE: I want to make it quite clear that this bill refers to Canadian boats. Should a Canadian boat go to an American port, we want to make it perfectly clear that before it leaves that American port for a Canadian port it must comply with the same load line regulation. That was not clear under the old act and the purpose of this amendment is to make it clear.

Mr. BENNETT: For a British ship.

Mr. HOWE: Or a Canadian ship.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has not the federal government of the United States recently enacted load line regulations that go to some extent further than ours?

Mr. HOWE: I am told that ours is a little stiffer than the load line law adopted by the Americans to apply to the inland waters.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that, to conform with the reprinted bill, section 15 be added as follows:

15. The said act is further amended by inserting after section four hundred and twenty-three a new section as section four hundred and twenty-three A, as follows:

"423a. (1) Subject to the provisions of this section the provisions of sections four hundred and twenty-three, both inclusive, of this act, in so far as they are applicable, shall have effect in respect of ships of one hundred and fifty tons, gross tonnage, and upwards, which carry cargo or passengers on voyages from any place in Canada to any other place in Canada or between Canada and the United States of America on any lakes or rivers: Provided that the provisions of subsections one and two of section four hundred and twenty-five of this Act shall apply to a ship constructed after the thirtieth day of June nineteen hundred and thirty-six and a ship constructed before the first day of July nineteen hundred and thirty-six, respectively; and provided that the governor in council may on such conditions as he thinks fit exempt from the provisions of this section ships plying on such yoyages if he is satisfied that the sheltered nature and conditions of the voyages make it unreasonable or impracticable to apply the provisions of this section to ships so plying.

(2) The governor in council may, in respect of ships employed in making such voyages on lakes or rivers, by regulation,—

(a) make aplicable to such ships in lieu of the load line rules such rules as in his opinion may be safe having due regard to all the circumstances;

(b) make special provision for ships not registered in Canada and which are not marked with load lines.

(3) For the purposes of this section the expressions, "salt water" and "proceed to sea," shall, in respect of ships employed solely in making voyages on lakes or rivers, have the following meanings:—

(a) "salt water" where used in this part of this act shall mean the water in which the ship is actually floating.

(b) "proceed to sea" where used in this part of this act, shall mean proceding from one place to another place.

(4) A local load line certificate in lieu of a load line convention certificate provided for in subsection one of section four hundred and twenty-eight of this act shall be issued for the purposes of ships coming within the provisions of this section. Such local load line certificates shall be issued under like conditions as load line convention certificates are issued."

Mr. BENNETT: This is an entirely new section in the form in which it now appears. I wonder if the minister will not agree with me that to place upon the minister the responsibility of lives in the way in which this section does is a responsibility that should not be placed upon any minister. The section reads:

—and provided that the governor in council may on such conditions as he thinks fit exempt from the provisions of this section ships plying on such voyages if he is satisfied that the sheltered nature and conditions of the voyages make it unreasonable or impracticable to apply the provisions of this section to ships so plying.

Subsection 3 reads:

For the purposes of this section the expressions, "salt water" and "proceed to sea," shall, in respect of ships employed solely in making voyages on lakes or rivers, have the following meanings:

Subsection 4 deals with the issuing of a local load line certificate. For the past few years the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has been directing attention to what happens almost every year on the great lakes towards the close of navigation. In many instances these ships proceed to sea in an overloaded condition, and now we are going to say that this may be done legally if the minister satisfies himself that the sheltered nature of the voyage and other conditions are satisfactory.

Mr. HOWE: This is taken from the 1934 act.

Mr. BENNETT: The whole of it?

Mr. HOWE: Entirely.

Mr. BENNETT: I looked at it, but I shall look again.

Mr. HOWE: It will be found on page 1700.

Mr. BENNETT: If it is, that does not make it any better; it makes it worse. This section is new.

Mr. HOWE: This is taken from the international convention and it is in the old act.

Mr. BENNETT: The act reads:

> The governor in council may, on such conditions as he thinks fit, exempt from the provisions of this part of this act relating to load lines,—
> (a) Any ship plying on international voyages between the near neighbouring places of two or more countries, if the governor in council and the governments of those countries are satisfied that the sheltered nature and conditions of the voyages make it unreasonable or impracticable to apply the provisions of this part of this act relating to load lines to ships so plying, and
> (b) Any ship plying on any other voyage between near neighbouring places if the governor in council is satisfied as aforesaid.

That is a vastly different thing from this section. If the minister thinks that the acceptance of this responsibility by the governor in council is adequate, I am not going to do any more than direct attention to the matter.

Mr. NEILL: I should like an explanation as to the dates mentioned in this section. I do not understand about a ship being built after June 30 and before July 1 of the same year; what does that mean?

Mr. HOWE: A ship built before June 30 is considered as an existing ship, while one built after that date would be a new ship. There is to be no exemption whatever for new ships from the load line provisions, but there are exemptions in certain cases for existing ships.

Mr. NEILL: This section states that the provisions of subsections 1 and 2 of section 425 shall apply to a ship constructed after June 30, 1936, and a ship constructed before July 1, 1936. You will not build many ships between June 30 and July 1.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) does not want this amendment to carry. Look at what it says:

> Provided that the provisions of subsections one and two of section four hundred and twenty-five of this act shall apply to a ship constructed after the thirtieth day of June nineteen hundred and thirty-six and a ship constructed before the first day of July nineteen hundred and thirty-six, respectively.

That means that it applies to ships constructed both before and after June 30; it applies to all ships.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that the only change is in the date. In the old act it was 1932 and we have changed it to 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: What does the minister mean by the old act?

Mr. HOWE: Section 425 of the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, reads:

> No load line convention ship registered in Canada, being a ship constructed after the thirtieth day of June, nineteen hundred and thirty-two, shall proceed to sea unless—
> (a) the ship has been surveyed by a steamship inspector in accordance with the load line rules; and
> (b) the ship complies with the conditions of assignment: and
> (c) the ship is marked on each side with a mark (hereafter in this act referred to as a "deck-line") indicating the position of the uppermost complete deck as defined by the load line rules, and with marks (hereafter in this act referred to as "load lines") indicating the several maximum depths to which the ship can be safely loaded in various circumstances prescribed by the load line rules.

Mr. BENNETT: Who is responsible for urging this section?

Mr. HOWE: It is simply being brought up to date.

Mr. BENNETT: It is far more than that; there is a substantive change in the law.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose is to make the load lines applicable to the great lakes and to the coastal trade. It was not possible to do this without discriminating against our own people until the American government did it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The proviso reads:

> Provided that the provisions of subsections 1 and 2 of section 425 of this act shall apply to a ship constructed after the thirtieth day of June, 1936, and a ship constructed before the first day of July, 1936, respectively.

That is to say, it shall apply to all ships, to those constructed after the thirtieth of June and to those constructed before the first of July. In other words, they are both exactly the same, and there are two statements about the thirtieth of June and the first of July which are identical. There is some mistake in the wording, because as it stands it does not make sense.

Mr. BENNETT: What happened is that in the transcription of this a line has been left out: "Provided that the provisions of subsections 1 and 2 of section 425 of this act shall apply" to a ship constructed before the thirtieth day of June, 1936, and not to a ship constructed after the first day of July, 1936. That is what the minister said, in the light of the paragraph that has gone before. What you are doing is to make an exception in section 423A. Now you are adding a new section 423A. The minister explained a moment ago that we had made an arrangement with the United States, they having adopted an act generally similar, and that certainly clears up one difficulty. But it does not clear up the whole of it. The new section reads:

Subject to the provisions of this section, the provisions of sections 423 to 443, both inclusive, of this act, in so far as they are applicable, shall have effect in respect of ships of 150 tons, gross tonnage, and upwards, which carry cargo or passengers on voyages from any place in Canada to any other place in Canada or between Canada and the United States of America on any lakes or rivers.

That meets the difficulty to which the minister referred.

Provided that the provisions of subsections 1 and 2 of section 425 of this act—

That is to say, subsections 1 and 2, to which reference has been made:

No load line convention ship registered in Canada, being a ship constructed after the thirtieth day of June, 1932—

It is now made 1936.

—shall proceed to sea unless—

That is, unless certain conditions are fulfilled. That is clear up to that point, and that is what the minister intended to say. The section states that the provisions of the two subsections in question shall apply to a ship constructed after the thirtieth day of June, 1936, and a ship constructed before the first day of July, 1936, respectively. "After the thirtieth day of June" and "before the first day of July" are the same thing.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I do not think there is any need for the two; you can make the dead line anywhere and cover both.

[Sir George Perley.]

Mr. HOWE: My officers have gone into the question in great detail and they assure me that the section is all right and that unless it reads as it stands it will not work.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Subsection 1 of section 425 applies to any ship constructed after the thirtieth day of June, and subsection 2 applies to any ship constructed before the first day of July, so that both subsections 1 and 2 apply to the same ships.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The word "respectively" applies to the different subsections.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 425 provides that no load line convention ship registered in Canada, constructed after the thirtieth day of June, shall proceed to sea unless certain conditions have been complied with, and subsection 2 provides that no load line convention ship registered in Canada, constructed before the first day of July, shall proceed to sea except under certain conditions. All you have to do is to put them both in; but you have merged them into one and made them unintelligible.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The word respectively makes it clear.

Mr. BENNETT: You have ships divided sharply into two classes, those constructed after June 30 this year, which may go to sea under certain conditions that are set out in the statute, and those constructed before the first day of July, which may go to sea under certain other conditions mentioned. Whoever drafted this thought he would take a short cut and save words, but in my judgment it is absolutely senseless.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that the bill be amended by adding section 16 as follows:

16. Subsections one and two of section four hundred and seventy-six of the said act are repealed and the following are substituted therefor:—

"476. (1) Subject to the provisions of subsection two of this section steamships in excess of five tons, gross tonnage, and not in excess of one hundred and fifty tons, gross tonnage, which are not passenger steamships, shall be exempt from the provisions of this part of this act relating to annual inspection, and in lieu thereof shall be inspected every fourth year: Provided that such steamships, if propelled by steam, shall, in addition to such inspection every fourth year, be subject to inspection of their boilers and life saving equipment annually in like manner and as if they were steamships in excess of one hundred and fifty tons gross tonnage.

(2) Steamships not in excess of fifteen tons, gross tonnage, which are not passenger steamships, shall be exempt from inspection, except that such steamships, if propelled by steam, shall be subject to inspection of their boilers and life saving equipment as provided for in subsection one of this section."

Section agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that the bill be amended by adding the following as section 17:

17. Subsection four of section four hundred and seventy-six of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"(4) In respect of steamships not propelled by steam the provisions of this section shall not have effect, in the case of steamships in excess of forty tons, gross tonnage, until two years after the date of the coming into force of this part of this act, in the case of steamships in excess of twenty-five and not in excess of forty tons, gross tonnage, until three years after such date, and, in the case of steamships not in excess of twenty-five tons, gross tonnage, until four years after such date."

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister say why section 476 appears in this form?

Mr. HOWE: It is purely a matter of mechanics. There are over 7,000 boats of that class, of which 5,000 are on the Pacific coast. It has been decided that the only practical way to inspect them is to divide them into classes and bring in a certain number each year. In that way it will be possible to inspect them every four years where it is not possible to do so every year.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that the bill be amended by inserting the following as section 18:

18. Subsection one of section seven hundred of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor: —

"700. (1) Every fine paid by a licensed pilot or apprentice pilot, for an offence against the provisions of part VI of this act, or a breach of any rule, regulation or by-law made thereunder, or breach of any rule, regulation or by-law made by any pilotage authority prior to the coming into force of this act, shall be paid into and form part of the pilot fund of the pilotage district in which the offence or breach is committed."

Mr. HOWE: This simply puts in a sentence that was left out of the old act.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that the bill be amended by adding the following as section 19:

19. Subsection one of section seven hundred and ten of the said act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

"710. (1) Where by any enactment, before or after the coming into force of this act, the parliament of any part of His Majesty's dominions other than Canada shall have provided or shall provide, in terms which extend to ships registered in that part whilst they are in Canada or before or after they have been in Canada, or whilst they are at sea, with relation to any matter touching or concerning such ships, their owners, masters or crews, or any thereof, that any court, officer of a ship belonging to His Majesty, registrar of British ships, officer of customs, shipping master or other officer or functionary in or of Canada may or shall execute any request, exercise any right or authority or perform any duty or act with relation to such ships, their owners, masters or crews, or any thereof, such court, officer of a ship belonging to His Majesty, registrar of British ships, officer of customs, shipping master or other officer or functionary in or of Canada may and shall so execute, have such right or authority and so perform as if such enactment were by this act enacted."

Mr. BENNETT: The explanation given for this section, Mr. Chairman, would seem to indicate that it contemplates legislation being enacted by other parts of His Majesty's dominions. What is the real explanation of the section, in practice, into which we are putting these new words? I have been following it as carefully as possible. Has this come about by reason of the new legislation in Great Britain and Australia?

Mr. HOWE: The previous wording of the act made it refer only to future legislation. It has been reworded so that it refers to past and future legislation.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that the bill be amended by inserting the following as section 20:

20. The thirteenth schedule of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following:

"R.S. c. 195, Radiotelegraph Act, section 4 (b) (e) (g) and (l); Sections 6, 7, 9 (2) and 11;
in so far as they concern the establishing, installing or working of radiotelegraph equipment in ship stations."

Mr. BENNETT: What is the change in this section?

Mr. HOWE: This section was inadvertently left out of the other act. It should have been there.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that the bill be amended by inserting the following as section 21:

21. This act, except section fifteen thereof, shall come into force on a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette, and the said section fifteen shall not come into force until a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. BENNETT: Why is section 15 not being brought into force? Does that mean section 15 of the general act or section 15 of this act? Section 15 of this act deals with the registry of ships, and I should like to be clear on that point.

Mr. HOWE: This is simply to allow us a little more time to put the mechanics at work in order to enforce the load line provisions, on the great lakes only.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman should put it the other way—so as not to enforce the load line provisions. That is what the section says.

Section agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a third time?

Mr. HOWE: As there are very few amendments I would ask unanimous consent to move third reading now, and I so move.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it should reach another place as rapidly as possible.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

VETERANS' ASSISTANCE COMMISSION

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Heatlth) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 28, to assist towards the employment of former members of the forces.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Sections 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Duties of commission.

Mr. MARSHALL: Mr. Chairman, to me, as to all hon. members of the committee, this is the most important of the three bills which deal with the problems of the returned men. This problem forms a very large part of the entire problem of unemployment; if we can solve one I believe we can solve the other, although I am not suggesting for a moment that the problem can be solved in its entirety. As we all know, many returned men would never seek pensions, never seek hospitalization, never seek assistance of any sort if it were not for the fact that the cards of life have been stacked against them. They played the game to the best of their ability, but through the peculiar trend of economic conditions are now the losers, and find themselves to a certain extent on the economic scrap heap. I have known of men who left Canada to fight for England in the Boer war; to-day they are nearing the end of life's trail, but because they lived a few years too soon they were ineligible to take part in the war of 1914-18 and to-day are faced with poverty and starvation; yet they do not come under this act. It is, of course, very true that Canada has no responsibility towards these men. But they are good Canadians nevertheless, and I hope the Minister of Pensions will intercede very strongly on their behalf with the British Minister of Pensions when a favourable opportunity presents itself.

Then, again, there are men who served during the war of 1914-18 who were discharged as medically unfit; they went on farms; they have fought weeds, grasshoppers, drought, hail, and low prices, and to-day they are broken in health. They are a splendid class of citizens, and I think their problem should have the careful consideration of this commission.

One thing I find it difficult to understand is the reason for so many commissions being appointed by the present government. Ottawa has always been known as Ottawa the beautiful, but I think it will soon be known as the city of commissions. Really I think we are drifting into government by commission rather than government by executive council. In 1932 the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking to a resolution regarding the Salary Deduction Act, said:

> I think we might well forego immediately the carrying out of some of the investigations that are being held at public expense.

I am wondering if he referred to commissions. However, we of this party are not offering any serious objection to this commission. We feel that this commission will be beneficial to the returned men. We feel that it differs from the regular type of commission, in that it has been given a definite mandate. It has been given a definite sum of money, approximately half a million dollars, and it is hoped that it will try out some project or projects, on a small scale perhaps, and at the end of twelve months show us a small working model of one of these plans. The members of this commission, by the nature of their appointment, can be very practical, while the other commission, the national employment commission, will have to be more or less theoretical. We hope that this half million dollars will not be squandered upon some silly experiment, but will be utilized on projects which will be really beneficial.

Finally I would urge upon the chairman of the commission that when he feels like making a peroration in public he refrain from copying the chairman of the national employment commission. This gentleman in his first public utterance said:

Our government believes, and the national employment commission believes, that Canadians are ready to move out of this atmosphere of doubt and criticism. More, that they are prepared to take their part in a nationwide cooperative effort to face squarely the problems before us, and to make such sacrifices as will bring about their solution.

I want to stress that word "sacrifice." When I read that I thought there are very few sacrifices that the people of western Canada can make to-day. I felt like saying to the chairman of that commission, who is reputed to be a very rich man: "Go thou and do likewise."

For the next twelve months we shall watch with interest the work of the commission. We shall endeavour to refrain from criticizing, for we know they have a most difficult task and one that will tax their ingenuity and ability to the utmost.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Might it not be well to fix a period of time within which this statute should be in force, in view of the fact that we have an employment commission? This bill refers to investigations only; the commission is not intended to do more than investigate, apparently, although one section seems to indicate that its powers can be greater than that. It deals with men who are not Canadians, men connected with other forces. Under those circumstances might it not be well to provide that this measure shall expire on a given date? I make that suggestion to the minister.

Mr. POWER: Section 3 states that they "shall be appointed by the governor in council, and shall hold office for one year; provided that the governor in council may, on the recommendation of the minister, extend the tenure of office of the commissioners for a period of six months." In any event the amount of money voted to provide for the expenses of the commission is $500,000. That amount appears in the supplementary estimates, and it expires on March 31.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It could not be longer than eighteen months.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not quite the correct way to put it. The act may continue, because the powers exercised by the commission may be extended by the minister. At the end of a year the commission would go out of office, but the act would still be in force. The governor in council may extend it another six months, but the act would still continue at the end of six months, and would be administered by the minister. Would it not be well to say that the act shall expire on January 1, 1938?

Mr. POWER: The safeguard there is that the moneys provided will expire on March 31 of the next year, and in order for the operation of the act to continue it would be necessary to vote more money. I think that is the strongest safeguard we could have.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid not.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 26, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Number of members.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the minister please explain the significance of this section?

Mr. POWER: For the purpose of cleaning up as expeditiously as possible the many claims which are now pending it was thought advisable to ask the authority of parliament to name five additional ad hoc commissioners who would hold office for a year or less.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: In addition to the twelve?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Residence.

Mr. LAWSON: Is this in pursuance of the recommendations of the committee?

Mr. POWER: The bill as it now appears is a reprint as it passed the committee. The original bill is altogether changed and modified, and for the benefit of the house the committee ordered a reprint. The report on the bill was unanimous.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it the intention that these commissioners shall travel, or will the seventeen of them sit in Ottawa?

Mr. POWER: There will be some modification of the present system. It will be seen from section 3 that the chairman shall reside in Ottawa, and that the other commissioners shall reside at such places as the chairman may from time to time direct. It is proposed that the commissioners shall be divided among different districts. For instance, there will be two quorums in Toronto, so that they may get the work cleaned up. There will be a quorum on the Pacific coast. It will obviate the expense to which commissioners have been put of travelling from Ottawa to the Pacific coast or to Nova Scotia.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Jurisdiction of commission.

Mr. MacLENNAN: I do not know whether my observations should be made at this point, but I wish to say one or two things about an instance which came to my attention, and I am suggesting that some provision should be made against such contingencies. The soldier I have in mind went overseas and performed the duties of a soldier in France. After being gassed or wounded he came back and was not in receipt of a pension. In order to seek a livelihood he went to the United States, in which country he died not long ago. In order to prevent his being buried in a pauper's grave certain friends of his in my constituency borrowed the money to defray expenses of his burial. I have written the minister stating these facts and he replies that there is no provision whereby the friends of a soldier, once he has been buried, may obtain any money from the last post fund. In this instance a friend borrowed the money —and I know this, because I endorsed the note—in order to prevent the soldier's burial in a pauper's grave. Now the minister says, "Oh, he is buried; we cannot touch it." I am asking the minister if he could reimburse the friend who had no legal obligation to bury the soldier. I am just wondering why a person who spends money in this way should not be reimbursed, and if he is not I wonder why the last post fund was created. It will not do for the minister to say that there may be abuses. In the particular instance I have cited I really do not see why some provision could not be made. I am fully aware of the overreaching of certain people because they were soldiers overseas, but I think the particular instance I have mentioned should not be barred.

Mr. POWER: I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the instance mentioned by my hon. friend from Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLennan) would not in any event come up under this legislation. As he is well aware, the last post fund is a fund which is not directly under the control of the government. A large number of very generous citizens have devoted their time and have raised large sums of money for the purpose of seeing to it that no ex-member of the forces is unable to find proper burial. This fund is operated under certain regulations, and I am glad to say that we have been able to make arrangements for the burial of our soldiers in the United States, which hitherto has not been possible. I had an instance some years ago similar to that mentioned by my hon. friend, and I was unable to obtain repayment of the amount which had been expended on the burial of that soldier. Perhaps, if that matter could be looked into and pressure brought to bear on the last post fund, something might possibly be done, but I hardly think we could do it under the Pension Act.

Mr. MacLENNAN: I wanted to bring the instance before the minister to see if something could not be done, for I am sure if he were seized of the facts he would be sympathetic because in this instance they really could not afford to borrow the money to bury this soldier. Possibly some rule prevents anything being done in this instance, but sometimes rules are very illogical, and on this occasion the rule was not very logical. If this man were above ground he would be buried by the last post fund, but the moment he goes underneath the ground he does not come under the fund.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Subsection 2 of section 5 provides that if a pension has been improperly given, but not as a result of fraud or misrepresentation, and if a veteran has been receiving the pension for not less than five years, it will not be cancelled if the commission considers that cancellation would result in hardship. What is the reason for this new provision? Of course, cancellation of a pension would always result in hardship after a man has been receiving it, and it seems to me extraordinary that simply because a man has been receiving a pension improperly for any reason at all, he should continue to receive it when it is found out that he ought never to have had it.

Mr. POWER: In the early days of the work of the pension commission the number of claims that came in was, as one can readily understand, very great. They were dealing with hundreds of claims, in fact, a hundred applications a day, away back in 1919 and 1920, and it can be readily understood that in some instances it was impossible to give them proper consideration.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Certainly.

Mr. POWER: Persons have been in receipt of a pension possibly ever since that time, and then owing to some accident or perhaps some review it was found that the pension was awarded and paid in error. Some instances which would have involved very considerable hardship were brought to the attention of the committee by the chairman of the commission himself. He felt that in some instances he could not cancel awards which had been made through error, and in order to make it quite clear that where undue hardship might ensue from cancellations, the commission would have discretion to continue the payment, and also to legalize the action of the chairman, the committee thought it was the proper thing to do to insert this amendment in the act. It is a departure, I quite admit, from ordinary legislation, but it must be remembered that this is remedial and beneficial legislation passed with the intent of bringing the greatest possible measure of justice to the ex-soldiers and their dependents, and it was thought that a provision such as this should be recommended to parliament.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Have there not been instances where a veteran has been found to be receiving a pension larger than he was entitled to, receiving perhaps forty dollars a month when he should have received only twenty, and when the facts were ascertained has not a certain amount been deducted from his pension each month until the overpayment had been returned to the government? Have there not been such instances?

Mr. POWER: I think it is well known to hon. members that within the last two or three years there has been a large number of reviews of pensions and pension assessments, and a number of pensions have been decreased, but in no case of that kind was reimbursement required from the applicant. There have been claims, and quite a large number, for reimbursement when the payment had been received through fraud, but not when it was due to an error or when there had been an overassessment.

Mr. MacNEIL: In the first line of page 4 of the reprinted bill has the word "five" been substituted for "ten"?

Mr. POWER: Yes; in the reprinted bill it is five years.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I am not rising to raise any objection to this clause, but I would like to say something about instances of real hardship that have come under my own observation quite frequently of men who had undoubtedly served overseas and quite evidently sustained disabilities, but who through some error on the part of the soldier or some officer would be found disentitled to pension. Where there was some error or mistake on the part of the soldier or some officer, the soldier would be found to be disentitled to any pension. The rules have been carried out very strictly against a number of men known to me personally. If those who are entitled to pension but who do not come within the provisions of the law were treated with the same leniency as is contemplated by this section to be shown to men who are paid too much, I think this would remove a great deal of the dissatisfaction among soldiers. Within the week I had a letter from a man who served through the war. He was in the big drive of 1918 and came home badly wounded and suffered considerable hardship in the hospital in Halifax. I know he is not exaggerating his condition, but he is getting only a miserably small pension because of what I believe was a faulty examination in the early history of his application. To my mind that is a clear case of underpayment, but I cannot find any such lenient treatment as seems to be exhibited to those who are paid too much.

Mr. STIRLING: As a result of the revision to which the minister has just referred, was there not a considerable number of instances where the pensions were stopped, not where pensions had been fraudulently granted but where they had been granted by mistake?

Mr. POWER: Yes; there was a considerable number.

Mr. STIRLING: This revision having taken place in 1934, those pensioners have not received their pensions, but where the discovery is made in 1936 and subsequent years, they will continue to get their pensions.

Mr. BENNETT: I know of a large number of instances in which pension was discontinued because of error in the application and I think there were instances in which the money was returned. I only want to ask the minister if it is clear that in no case where a pension was awarded by error had there been any return of money to the department. If that is so, then that difficulty is cleared up. I cannot help but refer to the point raised by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). I am sure that the result will be that applications will be made to continue these men on the pension list. That will be the inevitable result of this legislation.

Mr. POWER: I do not think they could come under this legislation, but I recognize that there is a possibility of such claims being made. Those instances were not brought to the attention of the committee. We did not deal with them, but perhaps that is no excuse for not taking them up at this time. Had the members of the committee been aware that there was any considerable number of claims, such as those mentioned by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), perhaps provision would have been made for them.

Mr. NEILL: Does the minister say that he is advised that in no instance has there been a claim made for the repayment of pension?

Mr. POWER: In no instances of overpayment in error.

Mr. NEILL: There have been claims made for repayment?

Mr. POWER: Not in instances of error; there have been claims made in instances of fraudulent misrepresentation.

Mr. NEILL: But where it was done innocently?

Mr. POWER: I am informed, no.

Mr. NEILL: That is different from my information. There are quite a few instances within my knowledge, many of which arose in connection with the claim of a wife who could not produce the death certificate of her husband.

Mr. POWER: We are now entering into another subject altogether, the so-called disputed marriage cases. In a large number of these, where the wives were asked for marriage certificates, it was found that there had been no marriage. Payment should never have been made, but that was not an error of judgment on the part of the commission that awarded the pension; it was just a matter of misrepresentation, although perhaps in good faith. In certain instances good faith was shown, such as a remarriage in the anticipation of a divorce which had not yet taken place. In nearly all such instances the commission awarded pension, and in others repayment of moneys overpaid was not asked. I think there are some sixty odd cases remaining for disposal out of a total of 800. Most of them have been definitely settled.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

On section 7—Four members.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the minister explain the reason for adding another member to the appeal court?

Mr. POWER: Representations were made by certain ex-soldier organizations that the appeal court was giving a too strict and too narrow interpretation to the law. As my right hon. friend knows, this court is composed of two lawyers and a former judge of the supreme court. It was thought that the presence on the board of a man familiar with medical questions might be of some assistance to the board and might serve to mitigate what was considered to be undue severity on the part of the board. Perhaps this does not refer to this particular section, but I should like to say a word or two about this appeal court. This court has had a very difficult task to perform. When cases reach them they have been before the pension commission. Sometimes a case may have been considered time and time again by the commission before being sent to the court. In most instances when a case does reach the appeal court it is very difficult of decision in favour of the applicant. As is well known, there has been throughout the country considerable criticism of the appeal court, and it was felt that if a member of the medical profession were placed on the court he might be in a position to understand better the medical questions which are very often the principal factors in arriving at a decision.

Mr. NEILL: Is it permissible to ask who the minister proposes to appoint to the court?

Mr. POWER: I have been too busy trying to get this legislation through and discussing matters with members of the committee to consider the appointment which will follow the passing of this bill.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What will happen in a court of four when they are divided?

Mr. POWER: Only three can serve at one time. There will be a spare member of the court. Section 67, subsection 1 reads:

> Any two members of the court shall constitute a quorum and may lawfully hear and dispose of any appeal brought before the court.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On section 11—When disability pension act not to be awarded.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that the section be amended by substituting the figures 1940 for 1938 in the last line.

Mr. POWER: This is to make it conform with the first part of the subsection.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be remembered that in England—I heard the Minister of Pensions himself say so—they attributed the success of their operations entirely to the fact that having arrived at a period they stuck to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With certain exceptions.

Mr. BENNETT: We have changed it in every parliament.

Mr. POWER: I believe that from 1919 the date has been changed at least five times, and in 1930 the time limits were removed altogether, so that every man who had had a claim, whether it had been passed upon or not, whether he had been debarred or not, was allowed to make a new application and put in a new claim. They have had six years in which to put these claims before the commission.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what made the duty of the appeal court so difficult.

Mr. POWER: Exactly.

Mr. NEILL: It must be remembered that in Britain while they had a fixed date, they were always ready to consider any applications—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was left to the discretion of the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Which he seldom exercised.

Mr. NEILL: Paragraph (b) has a proviso:

Provided always that the appeal division may, in its discretion, with respect to this class, grant leave to have the application entertained after the first day of January, 1938.

It is now 1940. What is the significance of this?

Mr. POWER: The commission has the discretion to grant leave. Unless a dead line were put in, every claim would be entertained. Now, a claim can be entertained only after leave is obtained from the commission.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 12—In case of relief or retroactive increase.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Exactly what does this mean?

Mr. POWER: This is to provide for the case where there has been a payment of relief to a person who afterwards obtains retroactive award of pension. It is proposed to take some of that money to cover the amount paid in relief.

Mr. BENNETT: In practice that is done now?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is what I thought the intention was, but I fail to see that the wording conveys clearly that understanding. I suppose it has been carefully considered.

Mr. POWER: The wording has been carefully considered and very much discussed.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Pension continued for minor children on death of wife.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is the only clause that relates to section 22 of the bill. Some time ago I called the attention of the minister to the fact that there were a few instances of returned soldiers having no children of their own, who had adopted foster children. There is no clarification by the amendment, but I am again urging that subsection 4, which gives the commission discretionary power in the awarding of pensions in respect of any children entitled, in the opinion of the commission, to be maintained by a member of the forces in respect of whom pension is claimed, shall be liberally interpreted to include such instances, and particularly in regard to education. I know of several men who, having no children of their own, adopted foster children and the foster children have been debarred from the grant to aid them in obtaining education.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Restoration to pension.

Mr. BENNETT: This may involve retroactive payment.

Mr. POWER: For six months.

Section agreed to.

Section 15 to 28 inclusive agreed to.

On section 29—Section nineteen of chapter forty-five of the statutes of 1932-33 is repealed.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What is the section repealed?

Mr. POWER: It appears on the other page. This is really reenacted, with some small changes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is covered by preceding clauses in the act.

Section agreed to.

Sections 30 and 31 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister have the bill consolidated, for the convenience of the public?

Mr. POWER: I am informed that that is always done.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Monday, June 15, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Third report of the standing committee on industrial and international relations—Mr. McIntosh.

NATIONAL PARKS

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT IN NOVA SCOTIA AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 102, respecting the establishment of a national park in each of the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

He said: The purpose of the bill is to establish parks in the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Under the Parks Act legislation of this kind is necessary. When the estimates were under consideration there was some discussion concerning the proposed national parks. There are practically no details in the bill to explain, beyond the fact that in Nova Scotia the park will be in the northern end of Cape Breton Island, while in Prince Edward Island the exact location has not yet been definitely established. There is a choice among three or four sites, and it is expected a decision will be made shortly.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, QUEBEC

2. If so, on what date, and by whom?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.

2. Under date of June 9, 1936, Jos. L. Boulanger, Esq., Deputy Minister of Highways for the province of Quebec, forwarded to the honourable the Minister of Railways and Canals a copy of executive order of the Province of Quebec No. 1630, approved by the Lieutenant Governor on June 5, 1936, which redesignates the route of the Trans-Canada highway in the lower part of the province. A copy of the correspondence in this regard is as follows:

Ottawa, June 10, 1936.

Dear Mr. Cote:

I have before me a copy of the Montreal Gazette, of Saturday, June 6, in which appears a press item from the Gazette Staff Correspondent, Mr. Abel Vineberg, under the caption, "Trans-Canada highway extended 117 miles towards Gaspe region," which states that an order in council was approved on the 5th instant by His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec in virtue of which the Trans-Canada highway within that province is lengthened by a distance of 117 miles and follows a new route from that designated by previous orders in council.

In our agreements with the various provinces in the dominion the trans-Canada has been defined as "a continuous route connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces as may be designated by the province and approved by the dominion." You might by reference to the agreement between the dominion and the province of Quebec of the 26th July, 1933, corroborate this. In accordance with this understanding orders in council have been passed by various provinces designating routes within each province to constitute a continuous highway across Canada.

For your information I enclose copies of the following:

(1) Order of the 15th August, 1931, of the executive council for the province of New Brunswick;

(2) Order of the 1st October, 1931, of the executive council for the province of Quebec;

(3) Order of the 7th June, 1933, of the executive council for the province of Quebec;

(4) Order of the 24th March, 1933, of the executive council for the province of Quebec;

(5) Order of the 26th August, 1931, of the executive Council for the province of Ontario;

(6) Order of the 23rd November, 1932, of the executive council for the province of Ontario.

These orders in council, you will note, meet with the dominion's requirements in regard to the forming of a continuous route as between provinces. If the newspaper report appearing in the Montreal Gazette on Saturday, June 6, 1936, is correct the altered route will not meet with this requirement inasmuch as the terminus of the route in the province of Quebec will be Matapedia while that in the province of New Brunswick will be on Highway No. 2 at a point near St. Jacques.

It is noted further that in the projects submitted by the province of Quebec towards which federal assistance is sought under any agreements which may be entered into between the dominion and the province under the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, are the following which are on the newly designated portion of the Trans-Canada highway from Rivière du Loup to Matapedia:

"No. 7—Preliminary works and construction of a 'low cost' paving on highway No. 10 from Rivière du Loup to Cacouna. 4·2 miles. 50 per cent of $75,583.41.

"No. 8—Improvement to curve on highway No. 10 in the municipality of Ste. Cecile du Bic. 50 per cent of $4,000.

Also the following bridges:

County and municipality	River	Location	Value of the works up to April 1, 1937
Matane, Ste-Angelle de Merici	Metis	Rimouski-Matapedia	$23,100
Matapedia Saindon	Riv. Noire	Rimouski-Matapedia	11,300
Rimouski, St. Fabien	Cap a L'Orignal	Levis-Rimouski	20,000

I would much appreciate receiving from you definite information regarding the correctness or otherwise of the above referred to newspaper item and a copy of the order in council if such has been passed.

Yours very truly,
W. M. Dickson,
Deputy Minister.

The Honourable Emile Cote,
Minister of Roads,
Quebec, P.Q.

The Honourable the Minister of Public Works reports for the information of the committee of the executive council:

That he has received a request from the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, Prime Minister of Canada, that the right-of-way of the Trans-Canada Highway through the province of New Brunswick be definitely designated;

The Honourable the Minister of Public Works now recommends that the route of the Trans-Canada Highway through the province of New Brunswick be definitely fixed and designated as the route ordinarily known as route No. 2 and generally described as follows:—

[Mr. Rogers.]

"Beginning at a point from the boundary line between the province of Quebec and the province of New Brunswick where the main trunk highway route No. 2 intersects the said boundary line of the western side of the Madawaska river; thence following the main trunk highway on the west side of Madawaska river to Edmundston; thence along the eastern side of the St. John river to Grand Falls; thence along the western side of the St. John river to Andover crossing St. John river to Perth; thence down east side of St. John river to Hartland; thence down west side of St. John river through Woodstock, Fredericton, Oromocto, Gagetown, Westfield to St. John; thence from St. John through Sussex, Moncton and Sackville to the Nova Scotia boundary near Aulac." This route shown as route No. 2 on the attached map.

And the committee of council concurring in said report and recommendation,

It is accordingly so ordered.

Certified passed.

Ontario

Executive Council Office

Copy of an order in council, approved by The Honourable the Administrator of the Government of the Province of Ontario, dated the 26th day of August, A.D. 1931.

The committee of council have had under consideration the report of the Honourable the Minister of Lands and Forests, dated August 26th, 1931, wherein he states that the government of the Dominion of Canada have signified their intention of joining with the provinces in the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway as a national road and have agreed to make contributions to the construction of the said highway by the provinces;

Whereas the route of the said Trans-Canada Highway across the province of Ontario has been fixed by the province as to parts thereof and surveys are now in progress so as to obtain the necessary information to enable the Government of the Province of Ontario to designate the route of the balance of the said road;

And whereas it is desirable to designate by order in council such parts of the route of the said road as are ascertained so that work may proceed thereon promptly.

The Minister, therefore, recommends that the route of the proposed Trans-Canada Highway in Northern Otnario be designated as follows:

Section 1. Commencing at the northerly or westerly boundary of the Town of Pembroke in the County of Renfrew, and there connecting with Highway No. 17 of the King's Highway System of the Province of Ontario, and following the valley of the Ottawa River on a relocation of the existing road easterly and northerly on the south shore of the said Ottawa River to the Town of Mattawa, and thence westerly on a new survey to the easterly limit of the City of North Bay in the District of Nipissing, and Section 2. Commencing at the westerly boundary of the town of Schreiber in the District of Thunder Bay and thence westerly following the northerly shore of Lake Superior to the Village of Nipigon, thence southwesterly to the Cities of Port Arthur and Fort William, and thence westerly through Upsala, Dryden and Kenora to a point 23·11 chains south from Mile Post 24 on the Interprovincial Boundary between the Province of Ontario and the Province of Manitoba and there connecting with the Trans-Canada Highway now being constructed by the Province of Manitoba.

The Minister further recommends that the Minister in charge of the Department of Northern Development be given authority to continue the survey and reconnaissance now being made to ascertain the most desirable route for the Trans-Canada Highway between the said City of North Bay and the Town of Schreiber, and upon the completion of the said survey to make a recommendation to Council as to the route of the said Trans-Canada Highway in the said territory.

The committee of council concur in the recommendation of the Honourable the Minister of Lands and Forests, and advise that the same be acted on.

Certified,

C. F. Bulmer,
Clerk, Executive Council.

Ontario

Executive Council Office

Copy of an order in council approved by The Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor, dated the 23rd day of November, A.D. 1932.

Upon consideration of the report of the Honourable the Minister of Highways wherein he states that by an order in council dated the 25th day of September, A.D. 1931, the route of the Trans-Canada Highway was designated from Ottawa easterly to the Quebec border, following King's Highway Number 17;

Whereas the Province of Quebec is desirous of having this link in the Trans-Canada Highway designated along the north shore of the Ottawa River within the Province of Quebec;

And whereas it would appear that a reasonable compromise between the original plan of the Ontario government and of the Quebec government should be adopted.

The Honourable the Minister of Highways recommends that the order in council passed on the 25th day of September, A.D. 1931, be repealed, and that the route of the proposed Trans-Canada Highway in eastern Ontario be designated as follows:

Commencing at the Perley Bridge in the Village of Hawkesbury and continuing westerly on King's Highway Number 17 in the province of Ontario through the towns of Hawkesbury and Rockland to the city of Ottawa; thence continuing in a westerly direction on King's Highway Number 17 through the Village of Carp, the towns of Arnprior and Renfrew, via the village of Cobden, to the town of Pembroke, with such deviations as may be necessary to permit of improvement of the said road.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the Prime Minister indicate on what day the estimates for the Department of External Affairs will be brought down?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to proceed with the various bills on the order paper before taking up further estimates. I do not give that as an order to be followed too rigidly, but it is our desire at as early a stage in this week as possible to get over to the Senate as much in the way of legislation as we can. I see no reason why the item to which the hon. member refers should not be among the very first to be considered when we reach a further consideration of estimates. Possibly Thursday at the latest might be fixed as a suitable day, if that is agreeable, and I hope that perhaps Wednesday may be arranged.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT, 1934

The house resumed from Friday, June 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 81, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act (dominion by-elections)—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Sanderson in the chair).

On section 2—Qualifications.

Mr. RINFRET: Mr. Chairman, when we dealt with this bill the other day the leader of the opposition suggested that we let stand subparagraph (c) of paragraph (B) of section 2, which deals with the qualifications of the voter, and in the last lines of which appear the words "and has continued to be ordinarily resident therein until polling day." The right hon. gentleman very properly pointed out that this condition could not be foreseen. Evidently the intention was to cover the case of the rural voter who can always present himself at the poll at the last moment, but that case is already covered by the Dominion Elections Act. There seems to be no purpose in having this provision here, and I would ask the chairman of the special committee to move to strike out those words.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I move:

That section 2, subsection (b), paragraph (c), be amended by striking out the word "before" in the twenty-first line of the page and substituting therefor the words "immediately preceding"; and by deleting therefrom the following words, "and has continued to be ordinarily resident therein until polling day."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RINFRET: The leader of the opposition also directed our attention to paragraph (H) on page 24 of the bill. Evidently it is a useless section because the case is already covered by the first lines of section 2, which says that this bill applies only to by-elections. Why it was repeated here we were not able to find out, and I will ask the chairman of the special committee to move that it be removed.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I move, Mr. Chairman, that subsection (H) on page 24 of the bill be deleted.

Mr. BENNETT: Will that quite cover the situation? You see, you are retaining part of section 55. Is (I) dealt with separately? The whole of (H) comes out?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Section 55 was struck out at the last sitting, and section 54 is now completely struck out.

Mr. RINFRET: Mr. Chairman, the point made by the right hon. gentleman is that the letter (I) will now be replaced by (H).

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BILL TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF AUDITORS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 99, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Auditors appointed.

Mr. BENNETT: The only point I find it difficult to understand, Mr. Chairman, is that the act says that the auditors shall be appointed by resolution. There is no objection to proceeding by way of a bill, but it was originally intended that a resolution of both houses would be all that was necessary to appoint auditors.

The other point to which I would direct attention is that practically six months of the year have gone; presumably, as was the case on the other occasion, there has been a continuous audit by the present auditors, and some provision should be made to compensate them for their services during that period of time if they have, as I believe they have, continued the audit of the company's books during the last six months. It is now the middle of June. I intended to look up over the week-end the statute that appointed the Clarkson firm as auditors. I have not it beside me at the moment but I will look it up.

Mr. HOWE: It has been the practice to pass a bill for the appointment of the auditors. The difficulty is that the act says there shall be a resolution of parliament, and unfortunately there is no such thing.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes there is.

Mr. HOWE: A resolution of parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A resolution of both houses of parliament but not of parliament.

Mr. CAHAN: A resolution of parliament is a resolution of both houses.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The crown is part of parliament.

Mr. CAHAN: A resolution of parliament has usually been construed to mean a joint resolution by both the Commons and Senate. I think such a resolution would fulfil the requirements of the statute.

Mr. HOWE: The previous government as well as the present government found that the only practical method of complying with the act was to pass a bill. We have been so advised by the Department of Justice. As far as compensation is concerned, there has been no work done in 1936 relative to the accounts for that year. There was some work in preparing the annual report for 1935, but it has been thoroughly understood that no work shall be done until the appointment is made. While it is a continuing audit, I am told that usually no work is done until the last half of the year.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a misprint in the next to the last line. There is a word spelled "thf" which no doubt should be "the."

Section agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. CAHAN: If the Prime Minister will look at section 17 of the British North America Act I think he will find it conclusive with regard to the matter in controversy between us. This section reads:

> There shall be one parliament for Canada, consisting of the queen, an upper house styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, parliament consists of the three, the Sovereign, the Senate, and the Commons.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 83, to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Salaries of judges of Supreme Court of Ontario.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I informed the minister when we were discussing the resolution in committee that I thought, as I still do, that the necessity for increasing the personnel of the high court in Ontario would disappear if those who had attained a condition which rendered it impossible for them to discharge their duties as they should were to resign their positions. I hold that opinion very strongly. I trust that the reports which have appeared in the newspapers as to the purpose of this legislation are not accurate and that there is some real necessity for this bill beyond political needs. After carefully considering the matter, I do not think it would serve any useful purpose to go through the various provinces and name those whom it is quite apparent should retire.

I would point out that we endeavoured to meet the situation some years ago by offering a bill to the house providing for retirement at seventy-five years. However, the Senate thought it undesirable that a change should be made without conditions, and the bill did not pass. The Minister of Justice of to-day took the view that some provision should be made to safeguard the interests of those who were affected by the legislation, to which my answer then was, and now is, that there is an implied condition in the appointment of a man to the bench that he shall be reasonably efficient for the purposes for which he is appointed, and if through physical or mental disability he is unable to discharge those duties, he has forfeited his position and should resign. The present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is responsible for the provision that ultimately found its place in the statute books. For the reasons which he gave the other day, and which I believe are cogent reasons, it is very undesirable to have a commission appointed to inquire into the physical or mental condition of those who hold judicial office. Such a procedure would be calculated to drag the judiciary into a certain measure of contempt. Having regard to what I consider to be the larger phase of the question, namely, the public interest, I shall refrain from making any criticism beyond saying that I do feel it is almost an intolerable condition in a country such as this that there should be men willing to accept positions on the implied condition that they will be able to continue to discharge their duties and who, despite the fact that they are not—even on their own admission—continue to hold office and draw the emoluments of their positions. I shall be much censured for making these observations by those who belong to that favoured class, the judiciary, but that is not going to deter me in any sense from discharging what I conceive to be my duty.

Had it not been that the bill to which I referred was destroyed in the Senate, the necessary arrangements would have been made and it would have been unnecessary to appoint these two judges. If every man was functioning according to the implied condition of his appointment, it would be wholly unnecessary that there should be any additions made to this court. There will be incurred an annual expense of $18,000, in addition to travelling expenses, which need not be incurred were the duties of office discharged to the extent to which I believe there is an implied undertaking that they should be.

I repeat that I make these observations with some reluctance. I believe that the larger public interest should induce me to refrain from going into details. I indicated the other day that I would give much thought to this matter. I have, and I have concluded that the larger public interest is more important than the interest of the individuals in question. There would appear to be a seeming unwillingness on the part of these men to realize their obligations to the public in the same way as they compel litigants appearing before them to recognize their obligations. If an action were brought by a trained and skilled man to recover his salary, if it could be proven that he was in either the physical or the mental condition of some members of the courts, he could not recover, and it would be the duty of those who now continue to hold office to decide that he could not recover on the ground that he had not fulfilled that condition of special knowledge and fitness which is the very essence of the appointment. That is all I have to say.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): With some, even most, of the points raised by my right hon. friend when this matter was before the committee on the resolution that preceded the bill, and with what he has just said, I agree. But I think the question presents itself to us in this simple way. The legislature of Ontario, in the exercise of its undoubted jurisdiction, and for reasons which I think are valid, has increased by two the number of judges in the high court, trial division, of that province. Are there any reasons for our refusing to implement the wish of the province in the matter, even if some of us think that possibly, by some other arrangement with regard to the superannuation of old judges or in some other way, these two additional judges might be done without? Can we tell the province of Ontario that we refuse to implement their legislation, which they have the right to pass, because we have not yet made up our minds as to what we ought to do with respect to judges who have reached old age or are afflicted with some physical infirmity that prevents them from doing all that they could do on the bench previously?

In the first place, what the province says is that it wants two additional judges for the trial division. I do not think the condition my right hon. friend mentions applies to the trial division of Ontario, according to information given me by members of parliament who are practising law in that province. There are at the present time eleven judges in the trial division. As I said on the resolution, two of them cannot work very well on the ordinary business of the court for the reason that one of them is working continuously on the board under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, devoting all his time thereto, while the other is engaged entirely on bankruptcy matters demanding the whole of his time. Then we have increased the work of the judges in Ontario. Two years ago we increased it by handing over to them the adjudication of matrimonial cases and I understand that, notwithstanding what was said here at the time—that this new method would result in a diminution of divorces—divorce cases have as a matter of fact vastly increased since this law was passed, and a great part of the time of the judges is taken up with these cases.

Now that the attorney general of Ontario has given his reasons to the legislature, which they find to be valid, may I repeat, just for the purpose of giving information to the committee, certain facts with respect to the courts.

There are forty-seven county and district towns—that is, outside the city of Toronto—where at least two courts a year and in many cases four are held. In the majority of cases the duration of the court is about one week. In Sandwich, Hamilton, London and Ottawa the jury courts, of which there are two each year, usually last for at least three weeks and the non-jury courts, of which there are two each year, also usually last for at least two weeks. In some of the other county and district towns to which a judge is assigned for one week it often happens that a longer period than a week is required to dispose of the cases that are ready for trial. A weekly court is also held at London and Ottawa on Saturday morning, and this necessitates a judge going to each of these cities every Saturday.

In the city of Toronto a jury court sits three times each year and is usually engaged about eight weeks. At each of such sittings it usually happens that some of the civil cases are not dealt with and it is necessary that they stand over until the next court. The non-jury court at Toronto is a continuous court and sits the year round except for the period of court vacation. In this court the work is particularly heavy and in an effort to reduce the list to a size which will permit the hearing of cases within a reasonable time after they have been set down, it has been necessary for some years now to have two courts sitting. The Toronto weekly court, in which most of the time of the court is devoted to the hearing of motions, sits continuously the year round except for the court vacation periods, and the court usually lasts the better part of a day, five days a week. Then the questions of bankruptcy and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act are dealt with.

I believe that the duty of this parliament and my duty as Minister of Justice is to see that the administration of justice in Ontario should be carried out reasonably, and those who have the responsibility there are those who know whether or not we should proceed in the way provided for in this bill. As to the other question, which arises incidentally—and I know my right hon. friend has this in mind—there is in two or three provinces more than room for improvement in view of the conditions that exist there. But as my right hon. friend knows, I have given this matter a good deal of attention, and I am inclined to agree with the members of the Canadian Bar Association, who have been specially charged with the investigation of this matter and who recommend that we should revert to the condition that existed before the amendment of 1920 and permit judges who have reached the age of seventy-five and who have been for a stated number of years on the bench—twenty years—to retire with the salary which they received on the bench. This was changed in 1920. The committee of the Canadian Bar Association favour this change. They suggest that we might require judges who have retired under such a provision to serve in emergency cases, or when there is need of their services, at the request of the chief justice of their court, and that they should retain their rank in the judiciary.

There is much to commend this to the favourable consideration of parliament. I have said that I am inclined to favour it. I submitted the matter to my colleagues, and, while I do not want to betray any secrets, I may say they thought that this is no time for increases of pensions or things of that kind, and in my private conversations with my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) I learn he also thinks that this would have no chance of getting through parliament at the present time. Possibly that is so. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) not only suggested but almost sought to impose upon us the necessity of adopting the drastic method he advised; he accused all the ministers of justice of lack of moral courage in not having taken advantage of a provision in the statute under which, if it is believed that a judge is not physically fit to do his work, an investigation may be held, a regular trial at which witnesses may be heard, and on a report being made accordingly, the judge in question would cease to receive any salary. I do not think this would increase the dignity of the bench and enhance respect for the courts.

When my hon. friend said that it was while I was Minister of Justice that this provision was put on the statutes, I did not remember it, and I investigated the matter. I found that it was done in 1922 when Sir Lomer Gouin was Minister of Justice, and he was responsible for it in a peculiar way. There had been amendments to the Judges Acts, and when they were being discussed by the other house it was Senator Barnard who moved that amendment, and he was supported by members of that house who were strong opponents of the government. At the time, as my hon. friend knows, the party which now sits on this side of the house was in power, but very little so in the senate, as is the case at the present time. However, when the amendment came back to the house the then Minister of Justice merely said that he had no objection to it. That hardly supports the view of my hon. friend that this is my work, or even that of the government of the time.

Mr. CAHAN: I was not pressing that point. I was just trying to recollect.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): However, that has never been applied up to the present time. Of course in the provisions of the law affecting county court judges there is a stipulation of this kind, although not so drastic, of which advantage has been taken. I myself recommended a few years ago an investigation in Manitoba, but I must say that before I did it I had received an application from the bar association of that province, and it was because complaints were officially placed before the Department of Justice that this extraordinary method was adopted. I think I may say that if either the Canadian Bar Association or the bar association of any province—because they know the facts better than anybody else—would officially ask for action as provided for in the section mentioned by my hon. friend, I would deem it my duty to take the necessary proceedings. But as it is, could the Minister of Justice act proprio motu or merely because he hears rumours and because certain newspapers have published some reports? It would be a very dangerous thing to do, and if the judge concerned had been in years gone by an opponent of the party in power, possibly the minister would be accused of having his actions dictated by political considerations. We must leave the bench absolutely outside of any possible suspicions about politics, and especially so with regard to any action that could be taken by the Department of Justice with regard to judges. A law could be made, as it applies to the Supreme Court of Canada and the federal courts, so that when a judge reaches a certain age he has to leave the bench. My hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George objects to age being taken into consideration. He says that in some cases old men are better than young men. I agree with him—

Mr. CAHAN: I was objecting to age being the sole consideration.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): —but I think the exceptions confirm the rule and that is being done in other countries. My right hon. friend was right when he said the other day that seventy-two years had been recommended as the age limit by the commissioners in England who considered that question. As a matter of fact at the present time county court judges are retired at seventy-two years of age, but there is a provision that if the Justice department considers their services could still be utilized, their term of office may be prolonged from year to year. I do not approve of the department intervening in the matter; I think retirement should be provided for without the executive having anything to do with making the decision. However, all that will have to be considered and will have to be dealt with. I do not like the drastic section of the Judges Act which was placed in the statutes in 1922 and which has never been acted upon. But we must do something to prevent possible abuses, and if my right hon. friend is correct—and I think he is—there are certain abuses. I submit, however, that this is only incidental to the present bill; we are merely asked to give effect to the statutes of Ontario, and they have the right to ask us so to do.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was entirely right in saying he was not the author of the provision in the statute of 1922. If anything I said would indicate that he was, I knew better, because I took the trouble to follow it up. It was introduced in the other chamber, as he suggested, and it came to this chamber and was accepted by the Commons. The present Minister of Justice was then, if I remember, Minister of Marine.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, I was a sailor at the time.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, he has been in stormy seas since. This statute, being a statute of the province of Ontario, is being acted upon with greater celerity than usual. It was late in April when the statute increasing the bench by two was passed, and during my short time in parliament I have seen a year or more go by without any action being taken by the federal authority to implement an increase, for economic or other reasons. I remember one occasion when no provision was made for quite a considerable time, on the theory that there was really no necessity for the increase. I had thought that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act would not be permanent and would not engage a judge's entire working hours for very long. In respect to bankruptcy, the registrar really does most of the work, but the judge must take certain steps because he does the final act.

I quite agree also that the discussion with respect to the tenure of office is but incidental to this question. I brought it up because there might be no other opportunity except on the estimates to refer to it, and I thought it well to refer to it. The answer I make to my hon. friend, and I am sure he had had it in mind—it was in the mind of those with whom I have discussed it—is that to provide at this time that all judges of a certain age should receive full pay would have the effect at once of inducing all those who had been superannuated and had attained that age to demand equal treatment, and I have not seen any answer that I could reasonably make to that request. I did look into the matter very carefully during the time we were in office, and I gathered from discussions that I had in various parts of the country that there was a general feeling that to undertake to increase pensions of the judiciary at this time would be an impolitic thing to do. I should be sorry if my hon. friend should conclude that I suggested he could not put the amendment to the Judges Act through if he so desired, for his majority is ample for that purpose. What I did mean to convey was that I do not think it carries the general approval of the country or of parliament, for reasons that I need not discuss. The very suggestion of members of the judiciary holding on and continuing in office when they must know of their own limitations is an effort to induce parliament to do something under duress, if I may use that word—wrongly in that sense, perhaps—but under compulsion or of necessity. To be compelled by that method to provide pensions would not be a nice thing for this parliament, and would be resented I think by many people in every part of the country.

I was not able to look up the royal commission which investigated the matter in England; I am glad the hon. gentleman has done so, because my memory was that the age of retirement recommended was seventy-two or seventy-three, I was not sure which.

I should like to refer briefly to one point to which the minister directed attention, namely the ability to utilize the services of those who have retired but who are in good health. In England a retired judge frequently goes down at Christmas to help out in the divorce, admiralty and probate divisions. The late Lord Mersey used to do it frequently, helping the courts to dispose of arrears before the Christmas vacation. But in this country where you have the double jurisdiction there is that difficulty. The dominion would have to provide that they should be paid no salary beyond their retiring allowance. Clearly the province could not confer jurisdiction upon a retired judge to act, and clearly we would have to amend our statute to provide for it. There are grave complications. The matter was looked into once by a minister of justice and by one of the officials of the Department of Justice, and no conclusion was arrived at. I favour the proposal, and if the minister could work out any plan by which retired judges might be enabled to render service as judges through cooperative action on the part of the provinces and the dominion, I think it would be very desirable and would serve a useful purpose, permitting the attorneys general, with the aid perhaps of the Minister of Justice, to call upon a retired judge in times of stress to render further service without the payment of any further compensation than travelling expenses. Certainly in England where they have the unitary system, it is feasible, but under the complex system of the provinces determining the number of judges and the dominion providing their salaries it might require joint legislative action.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no doubt about it.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the Minister of Justice give the committee information as to the number of judges in each province who are appointed by the federal government?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In Ontario in the high court there will be, when this bill becomes law and is acted upon, twenty-one judges. In Nova Scotia there are 8—chief justice, judge in equity, judge in divorce, and 5 puisne judges. In New Brunswick there are 8 judges of the high court.

Mr. BENNETT: The judge in divorce is also a judge in the same manner?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, I include him. In Manitoba there are 11 judges; in British Columbia, 11; in Saskatchewan, 12; in Alberta, 11 judges of the high court. There are 3 in Prince Edward Island, and there is one in the Yukon territory. I will come to Quebec in a moment.

In addition to these there are the county court judges, who are also appointed by the federal government. In Ontario there are authorized—I do not say they are all appointed, but almost all—75 judges of the county and district courts. In Nova Scotia there are 7 county court judges; in New Brunswick, 6; in Manitoba, 9 and one junior county court judge. In British Columbia there are 14 judges and junior judges; in Prince Edward Island there are 3. In Saskatchewan there are 18 district court judges, and in Alberta, 12.

In Quebec the high court judges do most of the work that is assigned to the county court judges; there are no county court judges in Quebec. There are 12 judges of the court of king's bench as the appeal court, and there are 37 judges of the superior court. There are no other judges appointed in the province of Quebec by the federal government.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not a smaller court?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, I should mention the circuit court of the district of Montreal.

Mr. CAHAN: Which is similar to the county court.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes; there are 4 judges, consisting of a senior judge and three other judges. The senior judge is paid $8,000 per annum and the three others are paid $7,000 per annum. Those judges are sitting in addition to the high court judges of the province of Quebec.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it a fact that there are only forty-nine judges appointed by the federal government in the province of Quebec?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes; there are magistrates appointed by the provincial government.

Mr. HEAPS: How is there such a wide discrepancy between Quebec and Ontario?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Because the systems are altogether different. In Quebec there are no county court judges, while Ontario has a large number of them. But as the hon. member will have noticed, there are less high court judges in Ontario than in Quebec. There are only twenty-one high court judges in Ontario and there are thirty-seven in the trial division of the superior court in Quebec, plus twelve appeal court judges.

Mr. HEAPS: As a layman the fact which appeals to me is that in Ontario there are ninety-six judges while in Quebec there are only forty-nine. I assume those forty-nine judges must be doing the same work as the ninety-six in Ontario.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Except that in Quebec judges are appointed by the province to deal with smaller cases which are considered by county court judges in Ontario. Secondly, I do not believe there is a very great discrepancy in the matter of expense, because the high court judges are paid $9,000 and the county court judges $5,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What is the expense per capita as compared to Great Britain?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I cannot answer immediately, but I could have someone figure it out for the hon. member.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the minister know how many judges there are in Great Britain?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have not the figures before me.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have heard criticism by lawyers and others as to the cost of the judiciary in Canada as compared with that of other countries. It seems to me an increase in the number of judges in Ontario, while requested by the province, is an example which should not be followed by other provinces. In view of the criticisms one hears I think hon. members might be given further information with regard to the relative costs of the judiciaries in the various parts of the British commonwealth.

Mr. HEAPS: The figures the minister has given would seem to indicate that the bill before the house is not essential. If there are almost twice as many judges in Ontario as there are in Quebec there would seem to be no valid reason for increasing the number. However, I suppose Ontario has asked for the change, and the minister has very obligingly acceded to the request of the provincial government—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, not the provincial government—the legislature of Ontario.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, I may be slightly in error. I can understand that legislatures will be quite willing to make all possible requests of the federal government if they believe it will always foot the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: (Quebec East): That will not happen.

Mr. HEAPS: They may make other suggestions, too. When that time comes I do not suppose the government will be quite as willing to accede to the requests of legislatures as they are in this particular instance.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I will keep the hon. member's observations in mind.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 89, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1929.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Summary trials.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is an amendment requested by the council of social welfare. Under the criminal code all prosecutions for offences by juvenile delinquents are proscribed after six months. Under a certain section of the act there is provision for the prosecution of one who passed the age of eighteen after committing an offence, and whose offence was not discovered until more than six months after that time. This is to provide that when a person is prosecuted for an offence committed while he was a juvenile, and which has been discovered subsequently, the six months proscription will not apply.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Adults liable who contribute to delinquency.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Section 2 is simply to correct a mistake in the statute enacted last year, at which time the subsections were eliminated by mistake, and the amendment did not apply to them. This section is to reinstate them in the law.

DAIRY INDUSTRY ACT

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 56, to amend the Dairy Industry Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Sale of butter.

Mr STEWART: The minister might explain the general purpose of the clause and just why this change is being made.

Mr. GARDINER: Section 1 amends subsection 3 of section 6 of the Dairy Industry Act. Subsection 3 of section 6 of the act reads:

No person shall sell, offer or have in his possession for sale,
(a) any butter moulded or cut into prints, blocks, squares or pats ...

That subsection is repealed, and the subclause that is being substituted for it by this bill makes this change only, that instead of confining the size of prints to quarter pounds, half pounds, one pound and two pounds, it makes it possible to have them in any multiple of a pound. The chief reason for the change is that it is customary in British Columbia and in other places to sell butter in three pound prints, and under the present law that is not legal.

Mr. STEWART: There is a line underlined at the end of paragraph (a). Is that new?

Mr. GARDINER: That is just a rewording of the language of the old act. The words in the old act were "as sold by farmers" and the amending words are "manufactured by individual farmers and sold by them." The butter must be made by the farmers as well as sold by them.

Mr. STEWART: Were any representations made by the dairy council or other agricultural interests asking for these amendments?

Mr. GARDINER: Representations were made, I am not sure whether by the dairy council or not, asking for these amendments, and the department considered them in the interests of the dairy industry, particularly in British Columbia.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Cheese.

Mr. STEWART: What is the reason for this change?

Mr. GARDINER: The reason for this has to do with the recommendations that were made by the price spreads commission last year. One of their suggestions, which has been discussed at some length, was to the effect that we should have prints of cheese made in multiples of a pound rather than in sizes of, say, five ounces, six and a half ounces or seven and a half ounces. This amendment provides that the prints must be put up in either multiples of a pound or in divisions of a pound, such as a quarter of a pound, or half a pound. It is one of the suggestions that was made in connection with the inquiry by the price spreads commission of the sizes of packages offered to the public for sale.

Mr. STEWART: But the individual farmer may sell cheese in any way he likes?

Mr. GARDINER: A phrase similar to the one used at the end of the previous subsection is contained here, "but nothing in this subsection shall be held to apply to cheese of indiscriminate weight manufactured by individual farmers and sold by them." That is, home-made cheese is not subject to this legislation.

Mr. CAHAN: What is the meaning of "indiscriminate" weight?

Mr. GARDINER: It can be any weight at all; it is not confined to multiples or divisions of a pound, if made and sold by a farmer.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROVISION FOR NATIONAL BROADCASTING SERVICE AND REPEAL OF ACT OF 1932

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the constitution of a corporation to be known as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the purpose of carrying on a national broadcasting service in Canada in the place and stead of the present Canadian radio broadcasting commission, to provide for honorariums, remuneration, salaries and other expenses incidental thereto, to authorize the governor in council to make certain advances for purposes therein mentioned, and to repeal the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, there are some features of the report made by the special committee that dealt with the radio question to which I should like to direct attention. The report was a unanimous one. It contemplates the creation of a corporation similar to the British Broadcasting Corporation. I do not think the committee realized the difference between conditions in Great Britain and here. In the first phase of its report the committee recommend:

That in the opinion of your committee radio broadcasting could be best conducted by a general manager.

In 1934 the radio committee made the same recommendation; there is nothing new about that. That is the experience of Great Britain, where they are carrying on their broadcasting through a corporation with a general manager. He is a very eminent man, a scholar, an Oxford man possessing wide administrative experience. In this country he would be regarded as an extremely high type of official. He was drawn from the great reservoir that they have in Great Britain from which to draw men of this type for public service, and he has rendered conspicuous service to his country in the position which he holds. But when you come to appoint a general manager in Canada you find many difficulties in the way. I am not going to do more than point out that as far back as 1934 certain recommendations were made but were not acted upon because we realized, after the closest inquiry, that you cannot say that because a given condition in Great Britain assures certain results, different conditions in Canada will make the same results possible.

The report of the committee contemplates a condition exactly opposite to that which prevails in Great Britain. There are no such things as private broadcasting stations in Great Britain; all the broadcasting stations are under the sole control of the corporation, of which Sir John Reith is general manager. Owing to lack of funds, our organization was not able to build stations. It had to utilize, by leases and other arrangements, the existing facilities for the purpose of carrying out its undertaking. There was a constant endeavour on the part of private interests to secure licences for new stations. Under the existing law, the responsibility of deciding whether or not a new station shall be licensed rests with the commission and its technical officers; under the conditions that the committee reports upon, it will be left to someone in the Department of Transport, now the Department of Marine. I may say to the minister at once that that means disaster to the broadcasting undertaking in this country.

We know—it is not merely guessing—that very large numbers of people are constantly seeking licences for broadcasting stations. If the political department—I use the word in its broad sense—is to deal with these applications, an inevitable result will follow. Hon. members of this committee must know that applications were refused by the commission, because part of the basis of the complaints against the commission was that it would not continue to grant licences. All you have to do is grant enough licences and you destroy the public character of Canadian broadcasting. At the moment we have secured the ownership of this facility, or utility, or whatever you may call it, in the people of Canada, and we have ensured it against destruction by private interests, but the private interests have been very vigilant. They have been watchful of their own interests and have determined that if it is within their power, this facility is not to function as a public enterprise. They have determined fairly and legitimately, so far as that is concerned, to destroy this publicly owned facility. Their idea is that it should be in the hands of private enterprise. The two or three great enterprises across the line have watched with increasing anxiety the operations of this publicly owned facility. They do not desire that their privately owned enterprises should be regarded merely as tentative experiments; they wish to continue as a privately owned enterprise and not be merged in a publicly owned and controlled broadcasting system such as we have in this country.

I point this out because if broadcasting in Canada is to be in the hands of a corporation, and that is what the report of the committee recommends, then you will have to ensure its continuance and life. If a department of government is to determine whether or not additional licences shall be issued for private stations, I say again that will mean the end of our publicly owned radio broadcasting facilities. If the minister will look into the matter under present conditions, he will have no difficulty in realizing why I say this.

One step further. When the former government brought this broadcasting enterprise into being as a publicly owned facility, it had first of all to take up with the United States the question of channels. This was an international side of the matter which had to be considered, and there were many difficulties that had to be dealt with. They were fairly successfully overcome, but private interests were constantly demanding that their facilities should be used. The existing channels were in the hands of private interests in all parts of the country, except possibly in British Columbia which was not adequately covered. The newspapers had facilities of their own, private interests had facilities of their own, and the result was that the commission, being without adequate funds, was compelled to make the best arrangements possible for the purpose of carrying on to the extent of its ability in broadcasting throughout the dominion.

I do not agree with the general tenor of the report of the committee with regard to the operations of the commission. It is human because it is composed of individuals. It had to meet an extraordinary situation. Without money, and limited to the revenues from licences, it had to provide coverage from Great Britain to Vancouver. Notwithstanding the terms in which the report of the special committee refers to the result of its efforts, in countries other than Canada this experiment has been regarded as very successful under the circumstances. It is not encouraging to those who devoted their time to this matter, who laboured as they did and brought about results which were noted very highly in other countries, to find a committee of the House of Commons investigating their efforts and speaking of them in the terms in which they did. Undoubtedly mistakes were made, but I do not think anyone can deny that mistakes would be made in the bringing into being of a commission such as this. The commission was faced with difficulties in connection with complaints as to interference. There was a clashing in channels and there was also interference from the large powerful stations across the line.

The programs that were put upon the air reflected some measure of credit upon the Canadian enterprise. We could not expect that 11,000,000 people would be able to provide facilities comparable to those at the disposition of the two or three great private enterprises in the United States. Having made the election that we did, that is, to create a publicly owned enterprise, we would be manifestly unfair to attach too much criticism to the fact that in the judgment of some it does not compare favourably with the high powered stations in another country built up at the cost of millions of dollars. The temptation merely to copy slavishly the method adopted in another country for the purpose of operating this facility is very great, and the minister will find that conditions are quite different both as to ownership of facilities and as to the attitude of mind of the public to the facility, to advertising and advertisers and to the general situation. For instance, it is well known that facilities have been established in countries across the channel for the purpose of advertising in Great Britain and Ireland. That is well known. We have had many problems in connection with advertising. We have had very acute problems in connection with the language used on the radio—complaints from western Canada on the one hand, and on the other complaints from eastern Canada—and the endeavour to navigate through a very difficult channel and through very stormy waters the ship that was launched under such conditions has not been an easy task.

I can only say to the minister, without going into the matter in further detail, that if the question of licences is to be determined by a political body, namely, the government or any department of government rather than by the corporation itself, then the corporation is destined to be supplanted in its public operations by private enterprises, because in the very nature of things we have not provided the money to carry on the kind of organization one would like to carry on. We increased the licence fee to two dollars, with much complaint and criticism, in order that the commission might have larger funds at its disposal. In its report the committee suggests that the government may lend money to the commission for the purpose of enabling it to provide facilities. The minister knows what difficulties will be encountered there. It is better to provide in the estimates for a loan to them so that they will be free as a corporation to spend it, than to leave them in a position where they will have to make application for the purpose of securing loans; for then there will enter into the question the many factors that have brought disaster to many of our enterprises of a public character, and it will certainly not enure to the benefit of this institution if we are to maintain it as it now is, a publicly owned facility operating for the people at no cost at the present time except the licence fee of two dollars. No country in the world that I know of, except some smaller European countries, is placed in a more difficult position than ourselves. You have great and powerful stations in New York, in Cincinnati and on the Pacific slope; and when the words have been projected into the air—they no longer say the ether—when they have been projected into space they go north as well as south, and you tune in your radio and hear what is being said. There is no way of controlling it adequately, and that is why some people have unfavourably compared our operations with those of the great republic. The multiplication of privately owned stations under any circumstances will be detrimental to the interests of this publicly owned facility, whether it be held and operated by the commission or by a corporation; and the essential limitation that has been imposed upon this undertaking by reason of our geographical position and lack of means has not made it possible to carry on in the way in which one would have liked. But I should like my fellow Canadians to think that the opinions expressed in other parts of the world as to what we have been able to do reflect credit at least upon Canada and Canadians and do not deserve unrestrained criticism, as will be found in some parts of the report to which I refer.

Mr. HOWE: Radio broadcasting in Canada has been studied by one royal commission and three parliamentary committees, and these four reports agree on the broad principles that must govern us. That is to say, the aim of broadcasting should be a complete coverage by government facilities and the present situation demands complete control over all forms of broadcasting whether public or private. These conditions are being maintained in the present bill. There is no question whatsoever as to whether this bill is the last word in radio broadcasting. The government believes, however, having in mind the reports of these various committees, that the bill does represent the consensus of opinion as to the next step to be taken. We know that many conditions affecting radio broadcasting at the present time are unsatisfactory. I assume that more mail comes into my office protesting against various phases of broadcasting than against any other matter with which my department has to deal. Many of these complaints are frivolous; nevertheless the volume and general character indicate that there is something lacking in the present situation.

This bill follows very closely the report of the committee, and I believe that had the earlier legislation conformed more nearly to the reports of the royal commission and of the parliamentary committee that preceded the introduction of that legislation, perhaps we should not have wandered afield in our attempt to reach the ultimate goal. My right hon. friend has mentioned the fact that this gives power to the minister to licence private broadcasting stations. The minister has that power to-day; it is inherent in the Radiotelegraph Act of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: No; it rests with the commission now.

Mr. HOWE: On the advice of the commission.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, exactly.

Mr. HOWE: But after the minister receives the advice of the commission he has the power to issue the licence or not, and he has been known in my time to exercise that power. The only action I have taken in that regard is to refuse recommendations of the commission in the direction of issuing two additional broadcasting licences.

[Mr. Bennett.]

We have in Canada, as those familiar with radio matters agree, far too many private licences to-day for stations of small power, and the result is that the channels of communication are becoming very much involved. It is almost impossible to find a clear channel for a station of high power such as is needed to hold our place against the high powered stations across the line and particularly in Mexico, and in my opinion very serious consideration must be given to straightening out the situation that has been caused by the granting of so many licences to small powered stations. That is one of the most serious problems to be considered.

Mr. BENNETT: The first commission contemplated that.

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say what was contemplated, but my observation leads me to believe that very little was done; in fact, the situation has become worse. That is my personal opinion, based on what I have seen since I took over control of the department which is responsible for this matter. I think the control of broadcasting is inherent in the government everywhere. Even in Great Britain the British Broadcasting Corporation does not determine the allocation of channels.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a monopoly.

Mr. HOWE: Of course they have a monopoly; nevertheless the power to allocate channels is vested in the Post Office Department under their radiotelegraph act. Similarly in the United States the power is vested in the government through an act of congress. This is logically a function of government in that the channels are arranged by government negotiations. It will be remembered that all the governments interested in telegraphs met at Madrid some few years ago and worked out the allocation of free channels between the various countries. I think there is no particular occasion for criticism, but this can be discussed when the clauses are before us in committee, and I assure my right hon. friend that the government is not committed to the exact method set out in the bill; it is quite willing to consider modifications. All I wish to point out is that the government has always had that power and has always exercised it, but under the last act it was bound to receive, if not to accept, the recommendation of the commission.

I do not know that anything further need be said at this time. The bill can be more effectively discussed when it is before us. I think everyone in Canada realizes the difficulty of the situation. The very limited funds at the disposal of the commission are a great restriction. We collect and turn over to the commission roughly about a million and a half dollars a year. In Great Britain about ten times that amount is collected; in Australia also, a country with a smaller population than Canada, the amount is larger. It seems to me fairly well fixed in everyone's mind that a fee of two dollars is about all that can be expected.

Mr. BENNETT: All the traffic will stand.

Mr. HOWE: All the traffic will bear. That of course is one great limitation. Then we have the tremendous cost of wire charges to cover the country from coast to coast. Further, we have a situation which is perhaps peculiar to this country, arising from the competition of high powered stations to the south of us broadcasting expensive programs which naturally invite comparison with ours. Considering the amount of the expenditure for programs, I think we have very little to be ashamed of at the moment. My feeling is that we have done extraordinarily well with the funds that have been made available. But I have not the slightest doubt that the committee have reported a program which should be adopted in Canada. As we know, the former act has not been satisfactory; it has been amended from time to time to permit it to operate. There are some features that are quite unworkable without amending legislation, and I sincerely commend the bill to the study of the members of the house in order that it may be discussed on second reading.

Mr. CAHAN: I was a member of the committee which considered radio matters. I regret that I received no notice of the meeting of the committee at which the report was prepared until I found it in my post office box in the afternoon after the committee had closed its proceedings; but that would have made, perhaps, very little difference.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to make an interruption?

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN: One member of the committee was asked to communicate with the hon. gentleman in respect of his personal attendance. We were advised that he had communicated with you and that you had said you had to go to Montreal.

Mr. CAHAN: What happened was that he did communicate with me at a time when I was on my feet and discussing an important matter before this house, and he suggested, supposing it were adjourned until the evening—this was on a Friday, if I remember correctly—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Chairman, if I may interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. member allow me a moment to state my case? As a matter of fact, under the circumstances I could not attend as I was discussing another measure in the house, and afterwards, in the evening, I found a notice in my box which I had not received beforehand. But I am not complaining about that, except to state that I was not present when this report was placed before the committee. If I had been, I should have endeavoured to secure the insertion of a reference to certain matters which I regard as important.

First, from sitting on that committee I found little by way of criticism of or reproach against the existing commission. I think the chairman of that commission, Mr. Charlesworth, is a gentleman of high culture, of literary experience and artistic taste, and a very useful member of a commission or board such as this. The impression I received was that he had not had experience in administering business affairs to the extent necessary to enable him to look carefully after the financial administration of the commission. I heard nothing by way of evidence which cast any reproach upon Colonel Steel, who is regarded not only in this country but also in the neighbouring republic as one of the most eminent men connected with radio transmission work. I think if I had been present when the report was drawn up I would have suggested leaving out certain references to the political broadcasting. I admit that a certain script was placed before me of one broadcasting of the so-called Sage broadcast, which contained two references to the then leader of the opposition and the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) which I regard as uncalled for and tending toward defamation. There is no doubt in my mind, having been through it, that the investigation into a certain hydro electric power matter indicated that there had been an effort at organized corruption the like of which had never before been known in this country, and I should not have been surprised if, in making a political broadcast, either speakers on the platform or those who were preparing the script for a broadcast such as this should have made some reference to it. As a matter of fact I did not hear on any public platform any reference to the Beauharnois matter. I say further, while I am dealing with it, that I went through the evidence in the Beauharnois investigation and I heard what was said before the committee and what was said outside of the committee, and I did not hear of any evidence which cast any reflection upon the personal honour and integrity of the present Prime Minister, who then also was Prime Minister. That is clear in my mind, and I deprecate any such reference as was made in the Sage script.

But in dealing with defamation over the radio, hon. members know as well as I do that the practice was not confined to the propagandists of any one political party. There were sent to me examples which on their face appeared to be extreme defamation and which had been sponsored either by the Liberal party or by individual members of that party. I refrained from placing them before the committee because I thought that was not a proper matter for inquiry under the circumstances. For instance, one related to the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), with whom I have had grave differences of opinion on political matters relating to his retirement from the late government. Nevertheless it would be very difficult to justify to me the radio propaganda which was directed by the Liberal party against him and his personal reputation and personal conduct. I believe that such matters should be eliminated from political discussion at election time or otherwise. So I should like to have had just a little different reference in this respect to political broadcasts. But I do not think the personnel of the commission were shown to be responsible either for the defamation by Liberal propagandists or for the defamation by Conservative propagandists which came over the radio at certain times. I listened myself to certain addresses delivered in the province of Quebec by some of my political opponents, which caused me to smile with contempt, but I think if they were stenographically reported they could not but be deemed defamatory, and I believe that the commission, if continued as a commission, would certainly have taken these matters under their consideration, because prior to the general election, at the suggestion of the then government, a by-law was adopted by the commission prohibiting political propaganda of a defamatory character.

I do not think much is to be gained by the new legislation. All that was desirable could have been attained by a few slight amendments to the present statute and by the appointment of a business manager to deal exclusively with financial and business operations. It is perhaps not to be expected that Mr. Charlesworth would be thoroughly competent and qualified for the financial part of the work, but I think the work he and his associates have done since they were appointed, the difficulties they have overcome and the problems they have solved entitle them to high commendation and praise from this parliament and from the public in general. After listening to the witnesses and having read the report I have a slight suspicion that perhaps there is rather a political aim to be served by this proposed bill than to have material and satisfactory remedies provided for the existing defects. However I am not going to oppose the measure but shall let it go through. Perhaps in the course of a year or two—

Mr. HOWE: There will be lots of graft and corruption!

Mr. CAHAN: I am not talking in this instance about graft and corruption. There may be some of that, despite the honest efforts of the hon. gentleman, but I am suggesting that although he may have received numerous complaints with regard to the present commission, complaints will be just as numerous and far more pungent and critical in the future than those he has received in the past. You cannot please all the Canadian public with a publicly owned operated and controlled radio service. There will be dissatisfaction. But what I do say, having listened in, as it were, for the last two or three years, is that I think a splendid advance has been made, and that to-day the public is more satisfied with the radio commission service than it had been before we undertook government control of radio.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: As chairman of the special committee to inquire into radio broadcasting in Canada, it is perhaps proper that at this time I should offer a few remarks on this resolution. In the first place may I answer the criticism of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) in connection with his absence from the meeting—

Mr. CAHAN: I am not criticizing at all, but simply stating the fact.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: If the hon. gentleman will allow me to make my statement. The clerk of the committee put the notice into the mail box of every member of the committee the evening prior to the final meeting to prepare the report and present it to the house, and if my hon. friend did not receive that notice it must be either that he did not go to his mail box or else the notice was mislaid by him. But even if he did not receive the notice, I, as chairman, made an effort to have the hon. member attend that meeting. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) was asked to try to locate the hon. member, but at the time we were not able to locate him. I am not making any criticism, but I want to make it clear that the members of the committee made every effort to have every member of that committee at that final meeting before our report was prepared for presentation to the house.

May I say that it was one of the great privileges which I have enjoyed since I have been in public life to be chairman of this committee. Hon. members from all parties showed me every courtesy, and made my work light, because they did most of it. I think the aim of every member of the committee was to try to improve radio broadcasting in Canada. There was no other object. At the same time, we had an order of reference from the House of Commons, which we were obliged to follow. We were instructed to do certain things. When my hon. friend criticizes the clause which relates to the Mr. Sage broadcasts, he had the same privilege as every other member of the committee; there was no limit to our investigation. Let me read one or two lines from the order of reference:

> Also to inquire into the extent to which there has been any abuse of broadcasting privileges, either for political or advertising purposes, and to advise as to what principles should govern the regulations or control thereof.

So that we had to investigate any abuses concerning political broadcasting as we were ordered to do so. My hon. friend had the same privilege as any other member of the committee; if he knew of any abuses, political or otherwise, it was for him to bring them before the committee.

Now I wish to answer briefly one or two criticisms made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). But before I do that may I say, Mr. Chairman, that the committee had before them the report of the Aird commission which made an extensive study of radio broadcasting in practically every country of the world and reported to the government of the day. We had also the evidence taken by the special committee in 1932, also the evidence taken by the special committee in 1934, and the evidence taken at the sittings of the committee this year. So that the committee, in arriving at their conclusions, had before them plenty of evidence on which they based the recommendations contained in the report, which recommendations, I am given to understand, will be embodied in a bill when this resolution is passed. Not only that, but this year we made an extensive inquiry. May I add that a great number of public bodies were anxious to make their presentations to the committee. They had made special studies of radio broadcasting not only in Canada but in all other countries. Not only did they appear personally, but they prepared and presented to the committee extensive briefs. Representatives appeared in person in readiness to give members of the committee any explanation they might desire concerning the contents of the briefs presented. These bodies went to the trouble of preparing and presenting the briefs without any cost to the committee, and without pay for the work they had done. It is most gratifying to note that the people who appeared before us were prepared to do that. Their only object seemed to be that of giving better radio broadcasting in Canada.

As I stated previously we had before us the Aird report and the evidence taken in 1932 and 1934. Further, we had the recommendations made in 1934, which were not embodied in legislation. May I mention briefly the names of a few bodies which appeared before the committee. We had the Canadian Press, supported by Mr. J. F. B. Livesay, general manager, and Mr. E. Norman Smith, vice-president; Mr. Paul Coffey, representing the Young Men's Canadian Club; Mr. S. P. Dunlop, president of the Montreal Federation of Musicians, supported by Mr. W. M. Murdock, who represented the Canadian locals of the American Federation of Musicians; Mr. Alan B. Plaunt, honorary secretary of the Canadian Radio League, an organization composed of practical men throughout the dominion, men who have made a real study of radio broadcasting in Canada They had as their purpose giving Canada the best possible radio broadcasts under the circumstances. Then, we had Mr. Brooke Claxton, counsel for the Canadian Radio league, who appeared with Mr. Plaunt. We had the Reverend Father H. St. Denis, Professor of Philosophy at Ottawa university; Mr. Herbert Moore, of New York, president of the Transradio service, who lodged some charges against the Canadian Press. We had Mr. E. A. Weir, formerly with the Canadian radio commission; Mr. C. M. Pasmore of the MacLaren Advertising Company, Limited, Toronto; Mr. Glen Bannerman, of the Association of Canadian Advertisers; Mr. J. A. MacLaren, of the Canadian Association of Advertising Agencies; Mr. Harry Sedgwick, chairman of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters; Mr. W. T. Burford, representing the All Canadian Congress of Labour; Mr. R. W. Ashcroft, former general manager of the Trans-Canada Broadcasting Company; Hon. W. J. Major, Attorney General and Minister of Telephones and Telegraphs for the province of Manitoba, who also represented the telephone systems of the three western provinces. May I add that the publicly owned telephone system in Manitoba owns broadcasting station CKY, the most powerful station in Canada, and another one at Brandon. We had the Hon. J. L. Ralston, representing the Trans-Canada telephone system; Rev. H. L. Haslam, of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia.

In addition, many briefs were presented unaccompanied by witnesses. We received hundreds of letters containing requests, criticisms of and praise for the radio commission. All those were placed before the committee. In presenting a concrete report I believe the committee should be commended. I do not believe the report of any special committee has received more favourable comment from the newspapers of Canada. I do not intend to weary this committee by quoting lengthy comments, although I have before me comments from newspapers of all political shades. They seem to agree that the unanimous report as presented to the house is satisfactory to Canadian listeners and to people generally who believe in a national broadcasting system in Canada. A comment from the Ottawa Journal of May 28, is as follows.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no desire to interrupt the hon. member but—

The CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. member speaking to a point of order?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member is acting in a manner contrary to the rules of the house when he reads from editorial comments which might influence the passage of legislation. I am quite in sympathy with the presentation of the chairman of the committee, but from the standpoint of the rules of the house I believe I should not agree to the reading of editorial comments from newspapers when we remember that on occasions the chairman of the committee has tried to refuse us permission to read news items.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And the hon. member protested violently.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am sorry the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has raised the point, because I was pretty certain nobody else would. I think these comments could be placed on the record, but if the committee does not wish me to do so I shall refrain from doing so. I do not want to break any rules. However, as I did want to read them, I shall simply read one or two paragraphs:

The report of the committee—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This matter has been brought up year after year, and while I am not a stickler for points of order, I suggest that in the present instance the hon. member is making a recital of newspaper opinion.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I shall not read them; I shall follow the rules.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is correct in the position he takes, and I must ask the hon. member for Provencher to follow the rules of the committee.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I shall obey the rules. I suggest, however, that if hon. members would read these editorials they would be bound to conclude that the unanimous report presented by the committee has been well received from coast to coast by almost all newspapers in Canada.

What is the situation in regard to radio broadcasting in this country? There are three systems which we may accept as guides. We have the system followed by the British Broadcasting Corporation in England; we have the Australian system and we have that followed in the United States. To my mind none of them is applicable in Canada, but in attempting to give our radio listeners that which they should have we may get something and gain some advantage from all of them.

Broadcasting in Great Britain is an absolute monopoly conducted by the British Broadcasting Corporation. That corporation has a board consisting of five governors appointed by the government, and its actual operations are carried out under the supervision of a general manager. It operates fifteen stations and derives its revenue from licence fees collected from the public, and from proceeds derived from publications issued by the corporation. Last year the gross revenue of the British Broadcasting Corporation amounted to £2,472,000. There are no private stations in England, nor is advertising allowed in the radio broadcasts of that country. However, evidence was submitted to the committee which indicated that $10,000,000 was spent in France, Germany and Ireland by advertisers broadcasting to the English public. The British people are losing that revenue through prohibiting advertising over the radio. But the British Broadcasting Corporation are in the advertising business themselves through publications, and they solicit advertisements all over Great Britain for their publications.

In Australia broadcasting is done both by government and private stations. There is a main chain of fourteen government stations extending across the country, and there are sixty-four private stations. The programs of the government stations are handled by the Australian Radio Commission, a corporation with a board of five commissioners, operating through a general manager. The actual technical operation of the government broadcasting stations is in the hands of the Australian Postmaster General, who also exercises complete control over the licensing and operation of all private stations. The activities of the corporation in Australia are limited to the production and presentation of programs. The number of licences issued last year in Australia was 721,852, and the revenue accruing therefrom amounted to £405,000.

In the United States all broadcasting stations are private. The federal commission shows 630 private broadcasting stations as being licensed last year. Radio sets do not have to pay a licence fee in that country, and the estimated number of sets last year in the United States was about 21,000,000.

So there are those three systems, none of which would be applicable to Canada, but it is the opinion of the committee that we can get something from each of them to improve radio broadcasting in this country.

I do not think the report of the radio committee or the legislation to be based upon the resolution now before us is going to be the last thing in radio in Canada. Science is progressing so fast that television might be in operation to-morrow, or in the near future, and I do not think either the parliament of Canada or the members of the House of Commons can say that the legislation which is introduced to-day will necessarily be able to take care of radio broadcasting next year or three or four years from now, because science is moving so fast that conditions are changing almost overnight.

What was the situation in 1932 when the present radio act was brought into being? We had sixty-nine broadcasting stations in Canada, there being sixty-two private commercial stations and seven amateur stations. To-day there are in this country eighty-one broadcasting stations, seventy-five of which are long wave broadcasting stations and six short wave broadcasting stations. They are divided geographically as follows: Northwest Territories, Department of the Interior, one station, 50 watts; in British Columbia, eleven privately owned and one commission station; in the western provinces the stations are all privately owned—and I might say in passing that Manitoba telephone system owns CKY in Winnipeg—in Ontario, twenty-three privately owned and four commission stations; in Quebec, eight privately owned and three commission stations; in the maritime provinces, all privately owned.

We started in 1932, when the present radio commission was brought into being, with sixty-nine private broadcasting stations and none nationally owned, and we find ourselves in 1936 with eighty-one broadcasting stations, seventy-three of which are private broadcasting stations as compared with sixty-nine in 1932. So I do not think the radio commission has made a great deal of headway in nationalizing radio broadcasting in Canada. There have been many difficulties, and I do not want to throw too much blame on the commission, but at the same time that is the situation to-day. Undoubtedly the commission has been handicapped by lack of funds. The total expenses of the radio commission for the fiscal year 1935-36 amounted in round figures to $1,702,000, divided as follows: salaries, $233,000; administration, $80,000; operation of stations, $91,000; new construction, $85,000; technical apparatus, $23,000; national network, $680,000; programs, $502,000; contingencies, $4,000. The radio commission and the present set-up have found themselves probably without enough money to nationalize the whole radio broadcasting system or to make any progress in nationalization.

The committee also found that many parts of Canada lack coverage, and people who were paying licence fees and were getting no reception had a right to complain. The committee, in making its recommendation that the radio corporation should be allowed to borrow $500,000 from the treasury, took care to see that coverage be supplied to these outlying districts.

Coming back to some of the criticisms of the right hon. leader of the opposition about our comments on the radio commission, and putting into the hands of the Minister of Marine control of the granting of licences, wave lengths, channels and things of that description, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we had very good grounds for making the recommendations we did. The Aird report of 1929 tells exactly what they wanted done, and in our report we embodied a clause contained in the Aird report, concerning that phase. We also gave the minister or the department protection because the minister cannot grant licences without first obtaining the consent of the corporation; so, as far as the criticism of the right hon. leader of the opposition is concerned, I think the report recommends proper safeguards in that connection.

In regard to the criticism of the commission itself, I do not want to go into details of the evidence which was presented before the committee. I do not think it is the proper thing to do, but there is plenty of evidence contained in the minutes of proceedings of the different meetings of the committee to prove that there was a lack of understanding and a lack of cooperation between the members of the commission. May I give just one example to make my point? And I am making no criticism of who got the contract or who did not. The radio commission entered into a contract for wire line network which involved an expenditure, under the contract, of $375,000, and which in the total aggregated an expenditure of $526,000. That contract was signed without the chairman of the commission knowing anything about it. Not only that, the contract was signed almost nine months before the contract which then existed expired. A few days after the contract was signed the chairman of the radio commission wrote a letter saying that it would be impossible to enter into a new contract as the one which already existed did not expire until April, 1936. If my right hon. friend were chairman of the commission and a contract were being entered into which involved that amount of expenditure, I am sure he would know what was in the contract before it was signed.

I am just about finished, Mr. Chairman, as I do not want to make any long speeches at this stage of the game. The committee refrained from making many specific recommendations because we wanted to leave the new body free in any administrative action they might take. However, the committee did make a specific recommendation with regard to future political broadcasting. I do not think there is any doubt but that the Canadian people were fed up with the broadcasting during the last election. There was too much broadcasting and I am sure the different parties spent money for broadcasting which could have been spent elsewhere to better advantage. The committee recommended that dramatized political broadcasts be prohibited. I think everyone is in favour of that recommendation, even the political parties that put out dramatized broadcasts during the last election.

Another recommendation was that full sponsorship of all political broadcasts be required. I think that is very necessary. Political broadcasts were put out during the last election without any sponsorship, and these broadcasts were sent out from the stations of the Canadian commission. I think every political broadcast should be sponsored by a party so that the people may know who is doing the broadcasting. There should not be any deception of the public. There is no doubt that during the last election certain dramatized broadcasts were sent out from the stations of the radio commissions with the idea of deceiving the public into thinking they were dramatic productions. The public were deceived into listening to what they thought was drama, but which was nothing but a political broadcast. Another recommendation was:

> That the limitation and distribution of time for political broadcasts be under the complete control of the corporation, whose duty it shall be to assign time on an equitable basis between all parties and rival candidates.
> That no political broadcasts be allowed on an election day or during two days immediately preceding same.

Those are the only specific recommendations which were made. I want to thank the members of the committee who honoured me by making me chairman. If the bill which will follow this resolution embodies the main recommendations of this report, I believe radio broadcasting in Canada will be making progress, not only from the standpoint of the listeners but from the national standpoint.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 103, respecting broadcasting.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 75, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Company rate of tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister could give the committee some idea as to what will be involved by way of increased revenue under paragraphs C and D.

Mr. ILSLEY: This section provides for the new rates of tax on corporations. The general rate on corporations is increased from 13½ per cent to 15 per cent, and in the case of consolidated returns the increase is from 15 per cent to 17 per cent. It is estimated that these increases will yield about $4,500,000 to $5,000,000 additional revenue.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Rate on "non-resident-owned investment corporations."

Mr. BENNETT: As I understand it, the effect of this amendment will be that companies engaged in financial operations in this country and owned outside will compete with companies that are owned in Canada by Canadians and will pay just half the tax. That is the position as I see it. Perhaps I have a wrong impression. Will the minister give some explanation?

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps a word on the object in addition to what was said in the budget address is in order at this stage, and I shall admit at the outset that this is a very complicated matter which calls for considerably more legal knowledge than I have. I can say at once that the object is to produce more revenue from the class of companies embraced within the next few sections. It is estimated, as closely as the officials can estimate it, that approximately $1,000,000 of additional revenue should be involved in the changes provided. The object is partly to reverse the taxation instituted, I believe, in 1933 whereby dividends paid out by certain companies were taxable, thus differing in principle from income tax in general, which is a tax upon income coming in. At that time there were difficulties which I can appreciate, difficulties in the form of surpluses accumulated prior to the time the taxation of 1933 came into force. These difficulties still exist, because many of these companies do not pay out their surpluses in the form of dividends but allow them to accumulate. It is thought better to inaugurate taxation based upon income rather than to rely upon being able, at some unknown date in the future, to tax, as provided for in the existing law, the disbursement of surplus. Surpluses tend to accumulate year by year, in many cases reaching very substantial sums, and there is at least some difficulty when we contemplate the possibility of such companies being able to get out at some stage without paying a tax upon their disbursements in the form of dividends. I shall not attempt to discuss the legal possibilities in that regard. It will perhaps be sufficient at this stage to say that it must be remembered that some of these corporations have no assets in Canada, nothing which can be attached here, and the sums involved are considerable. For that reason the government is of the view that it would be far better to tax the revenue of such companies as it comes in rather than to rely upon receiving taxation from them as they pay out that revenue, now or in the future, in the form of dividends.

It may be asked: Why halve the normal corporation tax rate? The present rate of taxation on some companies, in so far as they are taxed under the present law, is 5 per cent when they pay out their dividends. As to making the tax half the normal corporation rate, the reason is, of course, as I indicated in committee of ways and means, our desire not to drive these corporations out but to make them pay revenue to the dominion treasury. Obviously, if we taxed them too highly from their own point of view, being international they could move anywhere and they would undoubtedly move out. I am of the opinion that if we attempted to charge the normal Canadian corporation tax all such companies would vanish from our midst and consequently be non-taxable. Indeed, representations are made to me that the rate of taxation proposed in the bill will have the effect of driving some of them elsewhere. Be that as it may, after listening to all the representations on the subject, we believe that this is fair taxation and should not involve the companies in question moving out, but should result in a substantial increase in revenue to the federal treasury from this source.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister must be in error in assuming that such companies have no assets in this country that we can get control of, for this is the definition on page 2 of the bill:

> "Non-resident-owned-investment corporation" means a company incorporated in Canada, at least ninety-five per centum of the aggregate value of whose issued shares and all of whose bonds, debentures and other securities or evidences of funded indebtedness are beneficially owned by persons who are non-residents of Canada or are owned or held by trustees for the benefit of non-resident persons....

And so on. And the income arises:

> (i) from the ownership of or the trading or dealing in bonds, stocks or shares, debentures, mortgages, hypothecs, bills, notes or other similar property, or any interest therein;
> (ii) from the lending of money with or without security, or by way of rent, annuity, royalty, interest or dividend;
> (iii) from or by virtue of any right, title or interest in or to any estate or trust.

Obviously the corporation has assets in Canada, and obviously the assets arise from the fact that it is domiciled in Canada, because it must be incorporated in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: It need not have assets here.

Mr. BENNETT: It might have assets outside this country, but it is a company over which we have control because it is incorporated under our companies act, either federal or provincial; and once the parliament of Canada is seized of jurisdiction with respect to a company incorporated under our law, I should think it might deal with that company's assets, even though they were outside the country, by being able to deal with the corporate existence of the enterprise. I did know of a British company incorporated in Prince Edward Island. It would be difficult to say, with respect to trading within the limits prescribed by sections 1, 2 and 3, that this parliament would have no control over it at all, because in the very nature of things, for taxing purposes, I think we could easily relate ourselves to its assets. The point is that, as a matter of fact, it does compete with existing organizations which are paying 15 per cent tax in Canada. I am not unmindful of the difficulties with regard to the whole question. The former Minister of Finance initiated this form of taxation and he was at once inundated with protests. It was indicated that it would be injurious to the invitation of additional capital to come to this country seeking investment. But if it is to seek investment as a trading corporation in Canada, then its position should not be vastly different from that of other companies doing business in this country. If, on the other hand, it does not do that and its assets are in some other country, then this form of taxation should secure more revenue for Canada than the other method. But there should be a clear distinction between the two. If the corporation uses one of the large trust companies for the purpose of holding $10,000,000, and accumulates dividends without parting with them, it is obvious it is not paying taxation. If, however, this method is pursued, then 7½ per cent of its income is affected, which would be a much larger sum than could possibly be secured through a 5 per cent tax on dividends, for in many instances these companies permit their dividends to accumulate.

I was under the impression, however, that there was in our taxation act a provision by which dividends that accumulate in the way of rest or reserve or surplus are liable to taxation if they are not declared. That is so with respect to our own domestic companies, in any event. There was inserted in our law a provision whereby our companies could not escape taxation by accumulations in that way, although in 1930, of course, they were allowed to make a distribution of their surplus, and did so, without paying any taxes, from which situation we have not yet entirely recovered. But I was given to understand that the law as suggested by the departmental officials was ample to cover that situation, and that when certain contingencies happened the tax would be imposed. But as the section reads now, it was put to me a few days ago that what we are doing, after all, is saying that a firm of Canadians engaged in the same classes of business as defined in this statute in the last three clauses of paragraph (p) would pay 15 per cent on their income as an income tax, and that the shareholders would pay their appropriate income tax on the dividend they received, whatever that might be, whereas this enterprise incorporated in Canada, with shareholders of whom at least ninety-five per cent were resident outside Canada, would not pay any tax as the law stood, that is until the present amendment was made, except five per cent on the dividend as declared. That is as I understood the matter at that time. Such a corporation now has to pay 7½ per cent on the money which comes in by way of income in competition with other companies that are engaged in exactly the same class of business. Only the management in the one case is employed by people who reside outside Canada, and the management in the other case is employed by shareholders who reside in Canada and are shareholders of a corporation incorporated in Canada. That is the statement as it was put to me, and I want to be sure whether it is correct—it looks to me as though it is correct—namely, that when this company accumulates income, its head office being in Canada and its income being referable to that head office, and it has an income of $100,000, it pays $7,500 in taxes, whereas next door is a company engaged in exactly the same kind of business, with an income of $100,000, from which $15,000 is taken in taxes. I must say, after looking at the statute this afternoon and listening to what has been said, that seems a fair statement of the case, and it is that question which I desire to have answered in order that I may be informed and be in a position correctly to answer the inquiry which was made of me.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall attempt to make some explanation of that apparent discrimination.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, is it correct? That is the first question.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not without a great deal of qualification. For instance, let us take what we call an ordinary financial corporation whose shares are not owned wholly by non-residents. That company, if its assets are partly in Canada and partly outside Canada, is taxed at the rate of 15 per cent, but some of its income is exempt entirely from taxation. For instance, that part of its income which is derived from dividends of Canadian companies which themselves have paid income tax is exempt entirely from taxation.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. ILSLEY: And then with regard to the income which it derives from foreign sources, from foreign securities, this government does not get the whole 15 per cent upon the entire income of the corporation; it is obliged to give a credit of the tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Of the tax the corporation pays abroad?

Mr. ILSLEY: Paid abroad; so that it is impossible to say just what tax this government obtains from that corporation without knowing where its share holdings are and knowing in what securities it has invested. The provisions of the legislation are designed to reduce to a very small compass the number of cases in which there would be any discrimination whatever.

Mr. BENNETT: It might happen; probably it would not.

Mr ILSLEY: It might happen. I could quote an extreme case in which there would be discrimination, but in most instances there would not be any real discrimination with regard to taxation between the ordinary financial corporation and the proposed non-resident-owned investment corporation.

Mr. BETTS: I preface my remarks by saying that I do not wish to hold up the business of the committee, but inasmuch as this bill was handed to us only about an hour ago I wonder whether we could call it six o'clock, as I should like to have a chance to read the bill before anything more is carried.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not on our files this afternoon. We received it only a few minutes ago.

Mr. HEAPS: One minute to six.

Mr. DUNNING: You can object.

Mr. HEAPS: I have the right to object.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: At six o'clock we were on clause 2.

Mr. BENNETT: What has been the revenue that we have received under clause 4(k)?

Mr. ILSLEY: The amount received for the fiscal year 1935-36 from the five per cent dividend tax is $7,207,600.

Mr. CAHAN: As far as I can follow these changes I commend them as a good experiment, but I think it is purely an experiment, which will have to be reconsidered possibly at a later date. I think the department is perhaps going to the extreme, to such an extreme as may induce a number of these companies to change their incorporation and remove themselves entirely from Canadian jurisdiction. Nevertheless I can understand that an experiment should be tried, and at the end of a year or two the department may be compelled to reconsider the matter, from the point of view of revenue.

Mr. DUNNING: I should have indicated that our consideration of this matter is to some extent affected by the provisions of other countries, notably Great Britain. It will probably be remembered that the Chancellor of the Exchequer there gave certain intimations in his budget speech in reference to taxing people who, from his point of view, were not paying the tax which he thought they should pay to the British exchequer. That, of course, has a bearing upon what we do in Canada. I think there is much force in what my hon. friend says; it is a matter which we must be prepared to deal with from year to year in the light of experience and also in the light of what other countries are doing.

Mr. CAHAN: Of course the Chancellor of the British Exchequer is looking at the matter from an entirely different point of view from that from which we approach the study of the question. He undoubtedly is trying to find ways and means of increasing his collection of taxes from British subjects domiciled in Great Britain. We are attempting to increase our collection from those domiciled not only in Great Britain, but in France, the United States and other countries, who make use of a Canadian corporation to control the assets vested in such a corporation whose stockholders are not resident in this country.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the minister sure that the sum collected is over $7,000,000? That represents a distribution of nearly $150,000,000 disbursed by these companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: $7,207,600 is correct. This is the amount of tax collected not only on dividends sent abroad to shareholders of what are called 4(k) companies, but also on all dividends sent abroad to shareholders of Canadian companies, whether ordinary industrial or financial corporations or companies owned wholly abroad.

Mr. DUNNING: The collections under this section were not so much as that.

Mr. CAHAN: What the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) had in mind is: Can you distinguish now between the revenue received from 4(k) companies and the revenues received from foreign resident shareholders of Canadian companies?

Mr. DUNNING: No; we cannot do that. It all comes under the five per cent tax in our returns.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Non-resident-owned investment corporation.

Mr. BETTS: I should like some help in connection with this clause. I am trying to ascertain the position of a company, under paragraph (p), as to which over ninety-five per cent of the stock is owned outside Canada, and whose gross income is derived from the ownership of stock. It is really a holding company. As I understand the definition of non-resident-owned investment corporation, such a company would be subject to a certain tax by, I think, section 9. But I find it impossible to reconcile that definition in paragraph (p) with the terms of section 4. Paragraph (i) of section 4(k) exempts certain corporations, among others a corporation "whose business operations are of an industrial, mining, commercial, public utility or public service nature, and are carried on entirely outside of Canada, either directly or through subsidiary or affiliated companies." That, I take it, would be the position of the company of which I speak.

Mr. ILSLEY: Non-resident-owned?

Mr. BETTS: Yes. I say it is possible to imagine a corporation which could fall under both those definitions.

Mr. CAHAN: Under either.

Mr. BETTS: Yes; put it that way, under either.

Mr. DUNNING: Under paragraph (p), as is indicated, the ownership must be at least ninety-five per cent outside Canada. That provision is simply to make allowance for directors' qualifying shares, and small holdings such as that. Also, the investment itself must be entirely outside Canada. Under section 4, which we have not yet reached, would come companies such as the Brazilian Traction, if there is no objection to my naming one. At the present time it is a 4(k) company in the sense that it is a Canadian holding company, the whole of whose assets and operations are outside Canada. It would qualify under section 4, but not under section 2.

Mr. BETTS: I do not see why it would not fall under paragraph 2 (p), and then be subject to a tax, because reading down in paragraph (p) I find:

... the gross income of which is derived from one or more of the following sources—

From the ownership of stock, and so on.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is right about that. He has in mind a holding company incorporated in Canada whose shares are shares in an industrial company carrying on business abroad; is that what the hon. member means?

Mr. BETTS: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand the hon. member has that type of company in mind, and he says that holding company—

Mr. BETTS: No; whose shares are their own shares. They do not own the shares of another corporation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I did not follow the hon. member, but I tried to do so when he was making his objection. I could see some validity in what he said, namely that if there were incorporated in Canada a company which held the shares of an industrial company the assets of which were abroad, then that company might come within the definition of a non-resident-owned investment corporation, and might also come within the definition of 4 (k) (i), because it would be a company whose operations are of an industrial nature, and 4 (k) (i) includes wholly owned subsidiary companies which are engaged solely in the transaction of business outside Canada. In the case of a company coming within both definitions, such company would have a right to elect as to whether it would be treated as a 4 (k) company or as a 2 (p) company. The right of election is provided for in another section of the bill.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it not clear that under paragraph (p) we are dealing with a non-resident-owned investment corporation?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: That is not an operating company.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. CAHAN: Brazilian Traction, Mexican Light and Power and Barcelona—there is a whole list of them—are not investment corporations within the meaning of paragraph (p); they are companies which are incorporated in this country and which are actually operating in foreign countries. That makes a clear distinction. It may be possible that one company may be found running near to both lines, but that is the clear distinction in the type of company which comes under one or the other of these two provisions.

Mr. DUNNING: The ownership of shares also provides another distinction, in a practical way, although it is possible to visualize a situation in which the ownership of shares would not be a factor in the decision, because to come under paragraph (p) a company like Brazilian could not qualify because ninety-five per cent of its stock is not owned outside Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The company described by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George could be only a 4 (k) company for reasons stated by the Minister of Finance, and also because it is an industrial company. It is carrying on industrial operations.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. BETTS: Would it not be desirable to make it clear that 3 (p) companies do not include any 4 (k) companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: They may include some 4 (k) companies, and therefore the right of election is given in a later section of the bill.

Mr. CAHAN: The man who pays the tax has the right to elect.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Business and assets situate abroad.

Mr. BENNETT: It is hard to think that any company coming within 2 (p) would come within this clause, because 2 (p) companies have to derive their incomes from (i) (ii) and (iii) of paragraph (p), whereas 4 (k) companies are industrial mining, commercial, public utility and public service companies gaining their revenue from their operations either directly or through subsidiaries.

Is $100 an ample filing fee in cases like this? Two of the companies that have been mentioned are incorporated by the parliament of Canada, and have all the protection which can be given to them. They pay $100 towards revenue.

Mr. DUNNING: That is a point worthy of consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: The fee has not been changed?

Mr. DUNNING: There has been no change, but I think the point is worthy of consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the sections 19 and 22A that are added? I notice the words are "except as hereinafter provided by sections 19 and 22A."

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 19 is in the act at the present time.

Mr. CAHAN: It provides for distribution and winding up.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; section 22A deals with the taxable income of a non-resident-owned investment corporation.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Non-resident-owned investment corporation elects.

Mr. BETTS: What is the tax upon income set out in paragraph E of the first schedule of the act? I cannot find it.

Mr. DUNNING: One-half of the corporate rate.

Mr. BETTS: Is it in the act?

Mr. DUNNING: In section 2 of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: It is found in this bill, section 2.

Mr. BETTS: How does a company which falls under 4 (k) elect to pay a $100 filing fee only? I understood the minister to say that that right was available to a company falling under 4 (k).

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Companies which have been 4 (k) companies heretofore may qualify for admission to the class of non-resident-owned investment corporations, if they so desire. They have a right to elect to become non-resident-owned investment corporations, and to be so treated. That is provided for in this section. They may elect within such time effective from such date and in such manner as may be prescribed by regulations.

Mr. BENNETT: I can understand the variability with respect to the other factors, but to say, "in respect of periods after the coming into force of this subsection," seems to present some difficulty. It looks like variable fees. That is the only observation I have to make about it.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course, the idea of putting that language into the law is in order to deal with a situation where election takes place part way during the taxation period. A company may go along for one year under one section, and then, some time during the following year, may elect to come under the other. Provision will have to be made whereby the minister will determine just when that election shall become effective.

Mr. BENNETT: The election must remain effective for the whole taxation period, one year, must it not? But, as the section reads, a company might elect one way for some months and then another way for the remaining months of the period. It is not desirable to have any election made except for the accounting period for which taxation is imposed, namely, the fiscal year, is it?

Mr. CAHAN: The accounting years of many of these companies do not correspond.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. BETTS: On this question of election I may be stupid, but I can still visualize a situation in which, to turn back to section 3, paragraph (p):

—a company incorporated in Canada, at least ninety-five per centum of the aggregate value of whose issued shares and all of whose bonds, debentures and other securities or evidences of funded indebtedness are beneficially owned by persons who are non-residents of Canada—

And whose gross income is derived from the ownership of stock. Now that might be a 4(k) company.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BETTS: At least, if it wants to be a 4(k) company. Now, how does it elect? Where does it get the power to elect?

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not need to elect.

Mr. BETTS: Suppose somebody comes along and says: You are a non-resident-owned investment corporation. What then?

Mr. ILSLEY: If it is a 4(k) company within the definition of 4(k) companies, it is taxed as a 4(k) company. In order to be taxed as a non-resident-owned investment corporation it must elect.

Mr. BETTS: But my point is that it can fall within either the 2(p) or 4(k) definition by fulfilling these conditions which we find in 2(p), because they apply as well to the one as to the other.

Mr. ILSLEY: That company is a 4(k) company under the law, but it may move out of that class into the other class, the non-resident-owned investment corporation class, of its own volition by election if it can qualify as a non-resident-owned investment corporation. The hon. gentleman put this case. He said: Suppose somebody comes along and says: We have here a non-resident-owned investment corporation and we are going to tax it accordingly. But we cannot tax it accordingly unless the company itself elects to be a non-resident-owned investment corporation. Otherwise it has to be treated as a 4(k) company which it is under the law. The tax is not imposed on non-resident-owned investment corporations unless they elect to come under the provisions of section 6, which says:

A non-resident-owned investment corporation which elects ... shall not be liable to the tax provided for in subsection 2 of this section but shall pay a tax upon income at the rate set forth in paragraph E in the first schedule of this act.

Mr. BETTS: My difficulty is this. The minister says that the company which I just outlined to him is a 4(k) company, but as I read the definition of 2(p), the one definition would fit either one or the other class of companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be a 4(k) company. Certainly not all the companies that are non-resident-owned investment corporations would necessarily be 4(k) companies, but there might be a company which could elect to come within the 2(p) category, and if that were the case and the company did nothing, it would be taxed as a 4(k) company. That is to say, there would be no income tax; there would be a tax only on dividends. But if the company elected to be regarded as a non-resident-owned investment corporation, then the tax applicable to those companies would apply to it.

Mr. BETTS: I do not see why you should say it is of necessity a 4(k) company.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not. I am simply taking one that is a 4(k) company.

Mr. BETTS: I may be entirely wrong. I shall run over the definition I quoted before, and if the minister can tell me why that should be a 4(k) company more than a 3(p) corporation I shall be satisfied:

—a company incorporated in Canada, at least ninety-five per centum of the aggregate value of whose issued shares and all of whose bonds, debentures and other securities ... are beneficially owned by persons who are non-residents of Canada ... the gross income of which is derived from—

The ownership of stock. Now is that a 3(p) or a 4(k) company?

Mr. ILSLEY: It certainly is a 2(p) company; 2(p) is the proper number, not 3(p). But it may be a 4(k) company. It would be a 4(k) company when its assets and its business are all situated abroad, and when it is an industrial corporation, not an investment corporation. Then, being a 4(k) company, it is exempt from income tax, but there is a tax on the dividends remitted to its non-resident shareholders, who, in the instance cited, would be all its shareholders. That is the way it would be taxed. It would be exempt unless it elected to come within the other provision applicable to non-resident-owned investment corporations, in which event it would be taxed on income, and not on dividends. That might be either an advantage or a disadvantage; it is for the company to decide.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any doubt about the question of making more than one election a year? That is the point I put a moment ago. The words are, "from such date in respect of periods after the coming into force of this subsection and in such manner as may be prescribed by regulations hereunder." The company should not make more than one election in a year.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what occasion there would be to make more than one election.

Mr. BENNETT: Suppose the nature of the business changes. Suppose I make an election now; I call the directors together and make an election. Then, six months hence, by reason of changes in my investments and in the set-up of the business, I make another election. I do not think there should be more than one election in a given fiscal period. Is the section open to that construction? That is all I am asking.

Mr. CAHAN: Would it not effect all that the department has in mind to leave out the words "in respect of periods after the coming into force of this subsection," so that it would read:

A non-resident-owned-investment corporation which elects within such time, effective from such date and in such manner as may be prescribed by regulations hereunder.

Mr. BENNETT: I would suggest leaving in the words "after the coming into force of this subsection," and delete the words "in respect of periods."

Mr. ILSLEY: It is hard to consider all the implications of the suggestions. For the moment, I cannot think of any objection to what is being suggested. However I would observe that this matter can be regulated under the powers of the section; the minister has the power to make regulations which would prevent anything unworkable.

Mr. BENNETT: If you take out the words "in respect of periods," there would not be a possibility of difficulty and you would not impair the value of the section.

Mr. DUNNING: The suggestion is to take out just the words "in respect of periods"?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no objection.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move that the words "in" in line 30 and "respect of periods" in line 31 be struck out.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Five per cent tax on non-residents.

Mr. BENNETT: Would there be any harm in leaving out the words "or credited by"? Can a man escape the tax because it is credited and not paid to him?

Mr. ILSLEY: He might argue that he had not received it.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Payments in respect of rights to the use of works whether copyrighted or not.

Mr. BENNETT: This section reads, "sixty per centum of such payments shall not be subject to the tax under this section." Does that mean sixty per cent in every year in any particular case? If that is continued, it will amount to many times the value which attaches to a film.

Mr. DUNNING: It is the amortization of the cost.

Mr. BENNETT: If it is carried on for three or four years in respect to the same transaction you will have dealt generously with the owner.

Mr. ILSLEY: Films have a short life.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I suppose that is so.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Dividends of non-resident-owned investment corporations.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a most vital section and, if I am correctly informed, one that has caused a great deal of trouble. The following subsections are added:

Dividends paid or deemed to be paid by non-resident-owned investment corporations shall not be taxed under subsection 2 of this section, provided that there has been paid in respect of the income earned between the 1932 fiscal period and the fiscal period first taxed by reason of election under subsection four of section nine of this act, or in respect of dividends equal in amount to the said income, an amount of tax equal, in the aggregate, to five per centum of the said income.

What does "in the aggregate" mean? This is an annual tax.

Mr. DUNNING: There may be a combination of both.

Mr. BENNETT: This contemplates an election being made in the middle of the year and that is the reason why I asked my question. If the combination comes about by reason of the election, then part of the tax would be referable to the period before the election was made. As the tax is annual, you would have the year divided into two forms of taxation. That was one of the reasons I asked a question with respect to the preceding section.

Mr. DUNNING: Assume a case where small dividends are paid for a period and then an election is made, in the middle of the year or otherwise, to switch over to the other tax. The aggregate applies with respect to the tax from 1932 on. If there has been an escape from taxation, this provides the means of checking it up.

Mr. BENNETT: This is fixing 1932 as a base year?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The five per cent dividend tax was imposed in 1933.

Mr. DUNNING: This is the most difficult section there is.

Mr. CAHAN: Suppose that the tax in force did not apply to the extent of five per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: Because of no dividends being paid?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, from 1932 to 1936; we shall say from March 31, 1932, to March 31, 1936. Is it not an unjust exaction by indirect means to increase the aggregate tax payable by means of an enactment made in May or June, 1936?

Mr. DUNNING: Let us assume two cases, in one of which a dividend is paid each year and is taxed as a dividend, and in the other in which a dividend is earned and not paid, but in connection with which on a subsequent occasion an election is made to come under the other category. My hon. friend can see that we should not be putting a premium upon the holding back of dividends in order to escape taxation. The two cases would be treated alike by virtue of this section.

Mr. CAHAN: I can see the point where dividends have been wilfully withheld.

Mr. DUNNING: Many of these companies are really formed with the object of paying out their incomes in the form of dividends only to a very limited extent.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: As I read the subsection it provides that you shall not tax at the rate of 7½ per cent in the aggregate in any fiscal year when they have paid five per cent on what we consider as dividends; that is the fair way to put it?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not quite correct. The 7½ per cent tax is not correct; it is really a five per cent tax by reason of later provisions in the legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: By reason of deductions and allowances. Then I shall use another wording. A tax which amounts to one-half of the tax on the income of a normal company, as provided for by section 2, if an election is made is not to be imposed if between the 1932 fiscal period and the final period first taxed by reason of the election the aggregate tax as paid equals five per cent of the said income. But does this section make that clear? There is nothing to indicate that the aggregate in one year shall be that. Surely it does not mean the aggregate in four years should equal five per cent. Is that clear? That is the whole point to which I direct attention. The words "fiscal period" are quite clear: "In respect of the income earned between the 1932 fiscal period"—whatever time in that year it is—"and the fiscal period first taxed by reason of election." That may be 1936; it must be some time this year, after this act comes into force. Then the subsection reads: "Or in respect of dividends equal in amount of the said income, an amount of tax equal, in the aggregate"—for the fiscal period —"to five per centum of the said income," because it must be an annual tax. As this subsection stands, it is during the period of four years that the five per cent must be made up. That is not what the government intends; the government intends to make the aggregate payment equal to five per cent of the dividend taxed during the fiscal period, or per annum, we shall say for the sake of argument. Now, this does not do anything but make it five per cent of the aggregate for the period, and there must be added somewhere in the subsection the words, "equal, in the aggregate in any one year or fiscal period," to five per cent of the said income.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not seem to me to make any difference. We are speaking now of a period—

Mr. BENNETT: Which begins some time in 1932.

Mr. ILSLEY: Or at the end of 1932, the first of January, 1933. The normal case would be, perhaps, the first of January, 1933. Some time after the passing of this—

Mr. BENNETT: The first of July, 1936 say.

Mr. ILSLEY: —the first of July, 1936, there will be an election, and that election will relate to some fiscal period. It would probably relate to the calendar year 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, because it must be a period subsequent to the date of the coming into force of the act.

Mr. ILSLEY: The date of the election must be subsequent.

Mr. BENNETT: The date of the period also.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us say it is for the year 1936. We have to consider a period between these two dates and this will include the years 1933, 1934 and 1935.

Mr. CAHAN: Each year being a period.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Now this section provides that the crown shall receive a tax of five per cent on the income during those three years.

Mr. BENNETT: Per annum or per fiscal period, not on the aggregate of the three years.

Mr. ILSLEY: Five per cent per annum, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: But is that clear? That is the only point, and I am afraid it is not clear. The minister's observation is not quite accurate because the date is subsequent to the coming into force of the subsection; it must be subsequent to that. The election is one thing, but the date must be subsequent to the coming into force of the subsection. The only criticism I have to make is that the subsection as it stands does not make it clear that the aggregate of the tax of five per cent must be in any one fiscal period or year, whichever term you use. As the subsection reads now, it would be necessary to take only an aggregate of five per cent for the whole of the period that has elapsed from the date in 1932 to the date of the election.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it amounts to the same thing. Suppose the company earns $100,000 in each of the three years 1933, 1934 and 1935; that makes $300,000 the company has had that by way of income. We consider that we are entitled to five per cent of $300,000, and that is what the subsection provides.

Mr. CAHAN: But does it so provide? That is the point.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I have no doubt that is what it provides. It says:

> Provided that there has been paid in respect of the income earned between the 1932 fiscal period and the fiscal period first taxed by reason of election under subsection 4 of section 9 of this act, or in respect of dividends equal in amount to the said income, an amount of tax equal, in the aggregate, to 5 per centum of the said income.

So long as we get five per cent of what is earned by way of income during that period, that is all that matters.

Mr. CAHAN: "Said income" applies to the aggregate between the 1932 fiscal period and the date of the election?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not quite the general principle which has governed in connection with these taxing acts. We have dealt with the income as income for a fiscal period or year; we are now dealing with it for a period, namely, that period which will have elapsed from some time in 1932 to the date of the election, which must be some time subsequent to the date of this subsection 4 coming into operation. The method of computation the minister has made fairly clear, but it is a departure from the ordinary rule that governs, because it deprives us of a certain measure of interest which we should otherwise get. We take the sum total of the income instead of computing it for the separate years. As the law now stands, we should be entitled to say: Your income in 1933 was $100,000; we were then entitled to $5,000, and as you did not pay it we are entitled to interest for a period of two or three years.

Mr. ILSLEY: As the law stands we are not entitled to anything until the income is paid out by way of dividends.

Mr. BENNETT: But we are predicating it on that assumption. As a matter of fact, they kept the money back from us; it was a scheme they devised for the purpose of escaping taxation. We are now making it retroactive to 1932, which is the base year from which we start, because that is the time we began to tax non-resident dividends. Then we say we shall take five per cent from that starting point in 1932 up to the date of election being made under this section subsequent to the coming into force of the section of the law which provides for the election. It must be subsequent to that date. I was dealing with the tax as an annual contribution.

Mr. CAHAN: It is a nice question whether "said income" covers the aggregate.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the real force of subsection 13 of section 9?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are certain companies that redeem debentures or bonds and in that way remit to bondholders abroad very substantial sums of money.

Mr. BENNETT: But are we going to get them at home? Never mind the people abroad; what about the people at home? I think I know what the minister desires to accomplish, and it is a very desirable thing to accomplish. This is in connection with a scheme of financial reorganization whereby a non-interest bearing debenture is issued, and then it is redeemed, really a method of getting something out of the company which was earned by the company but which, as the law stood, escaped taxation. I think the former minister gave some attention to this. Probably officials of the department and the income tax commissioners have been trying to devise some plan to meet it. As I understand the matter, this subsection is prepared for that purpose; that is, if the tax has not been imposed and the companies have paid nothing, under the provisions of this subsection they shall pay an amount equal to five per cent of the said income. That is the story?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: I think that covers it.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I think so.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Trusts in favour of the same beneficiaries.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the necessity for that? That was to lessen the rate?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Trusts were set up to lessen the rate, but all the money really belonged to the person who created the trust.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Surplus distribution taxable.

Mr. BENNETT: In 1930, I think it was, we permitted the distribution of a surplus. Subsequently we passed a statute by which we hoped to tax that at some period of later distribution. Is that a fair way to put it? Now, what does this cover that was not then covered?

Surplus distribution taxable.

(1) On the winding up, discontinuance or reorganization of the business of any incorporated company, the distribution in any form of the property of the company shall be deemed to be the payment of a dividend to the extent that the company has on hand undistributed income.

[Mr. Bennett.]

That is, if the company has a surplus or rest which has been derived from operations, that would be undistributed income under this provision? Is that what is intended? I want to see if I have it clearly in my mind, because on the reorganization of a number of companies that has taken place in the last few years that question has always been put up to the commissioner of income tax, and I want to know exactly what this means.

Mr. ILSLEY: We did not intend by this to do anything except to carry on what has been done in the past. Subsection 1 is in the act at the present time. The proviso of the section is omitted and subsection 2 has been changed from subsection 2 of the act, but the object of subsection 1 is to tax surpluses when distributed as though they were income.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister understands that I have in mind the criticisms which have been made against certain reorganizations. The point I am trying to ascertain is whether or not, under this subsection as it reads, there can be any such thing as reorganization, where there has been an accumulated surplus derivable from operations and set up as reserve or rest on a reorganization of the business, without the payment of taxes. As the subsection now reads, I cannot see how that can be accomplished, but it has been done, and if there is no change in the law, I cannot see how they have escaped it.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change in the law in that regard. The only change is the dropping of the proviso which provides for the companies dealt with elsewhere. That is absolutely the only change with regard to subsection 1.

Mr. BENNETT: Then I cannot see where that is ever going to be operative.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Deductions not allowed.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): What is the point in deducting one-third of the dividends?

Mr. ILSLEY: At the present time the tax imposed upon dividends sent from this country to non-resident shareholders is five per cent of the dividend. A company whose assets and business are outside Canada would perhaps not elect to become a non-resident-owned investment corporation if by so doing it increased its tax substantially, from five per cent to 7½ per cent. The reason for providing that only two-thirds of the income derived from dividends of Canadian corporations shall be taxed is to equate the proposed income tax on 2(p) companies with the dividend tax on 4(k) companies. It really means, in respect of the income of the 2(p) companies derived from Canadian dividends, that the tax rate is the same as it has been in the past, except that it is imposed upon the income, not upon the dividend. If it is imposed upon the income we get it as soon as the income is earned; if it is imposed upon the dividend we may not get it for many years to come. It was felt desirable to transform this from a dividend tax into an income tax, and it is clear that if you raised it to 7½ per cent there would not be the election which we desire to bring about.

Mr. BENNETT: As I understand it, what the minister says is this: Arbitrarily we have said that, in order to adjust upon a basis of equity the relations between these two classes of companies, payment shall be made of the tax upon two-thirds of the aggregate dividend received by that class of company from Canadian companies. That is the story?

Mr. DUNNING: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: And that is the arbitrary determination by the officers of the department as to what they think will be a reasonable arrangement to effectuate equality of treatment. That is the story, is it?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the story.

Mr. BENNETT: I was a little curious as to how the government arrived at the two-thirds. As I understand the situation, the effort is, not to increase the toll taken from these companies, but to take it in a different form, because, they not having received the dividend we could not obtain it, but by taking it from income we receive it in a different form; and two-thirds of the dividend shall be treated as the whole dividend for the purpose of computing five per cent. Is that the story?

Mr. DUNNING: That is the story, yes, very clearly put.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Transfers in trust.

Mr. BENNETT: Are there any changes in this? The law at present is very clear; I cannot in my lifetime create a trust which permits the corpus of the trust to come back to me, and thus avoid taxation. That is the general rule. Now what does this effect?

(3) Where a person transfers property in trust and provides that the corpus of the trust shall revert either to the donor or to such persons as he might determine at a future date or where a trust provides that during the life-time of the donor no disposition or other dealing with the trust property shall be made without the consent, written or otherwise, of the donor, such person shall nevertheless be liable to be taxed on the income derived from the property transferred in trust or from property substituted therefor as if such transfer had not been made, unless the minister is satisfied that the contingencies expressed in the trust deed do not substantially affect what is in substance a bona fide gift and are not for the purpose of evading taxes on income imposed under this act.

The last part of that is new, is it not? As a matter of fact it does not need to be there at all as far as the law is concerned. Where a donor creates a trust and that trust leaves the corpus in his hands or subject to his disposition he still must pay taxes upon the income from it, because he has not effectually put it out of his control. This is to declare the law, I take it, in order that there may be no doubt about it. But the provision at the end I certainly do not think is desirable. It is very undesirable to say that the minister shall be satisfied about any contingency.

I think the officers of the department will say that the law has been thus administered. I have in mind a case in which a gentleman told me that he had undertaken to make a trust, but he discovered that he had endeavoured to maintain control over the disposition of the corpus and he was informed that the revenue from that must be taxable. In other words, to use the language of Lord Eldon that I have so frequently quoted, you cannot approbate and reprobate at the same time. You cannot say: It is my property now for my purposes, and belong to the trustee for another purpose. I do not like this idea of:

—unless the minister is satisfied that the contingencies expressed in the trust deed do not substantially affect what is in substance a bona fide gift and are not for the purpose of evading taxes.

I submit that that is very unsound. If it is a gift, it is a gift; if it is a trust, it is a trust. The minister should not be the one to decide whether or not the donor has correctly interpreted his own intentions.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I cannot argue that point exhaustively. As I understand it, there are certain transactions described in the early part of the section which are not necessarily regarded as non-gifts, that is, are not necessarily transactions which leave the subject matter of the transaction in the hands of the donor. Let me read the subsection:

Where a person transfers property in trust and provides that the corpus of the trust shall revert either to the donor or to such persons as he might determine at a future date—

Mr. BENNETT: We are familiar with that form of trust.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would not be allowed as a gift.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I think that is quite clear.

Mr. ILSLEY (reading):

—or where a trust provides that during the lifetime of the donor no disposition or other dealing with the trust property shall be made without the consent, written or otherwise, of the donor—

Mr. BENNETT: That is no gift, because he still retains the power of disposition.

Mr. ILSLEY (reading):

—such person shall nevertheless be liable to be taxed on the income derived from the property transferred in trust or from property substituted therefor as if such transfer had not been made—

Mr. BENNETT: I wish the minister would stop there. It cannot be a bona fide gift and a trust fund at the same time. I think if the minister strikes these words out he will find it will not be an invitation to those who have to administer the act to depart from what is the declared sense of the law. I just suggest it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps we could leave this section for the moment, and I shall be prepared to say a word about it a little later.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Have I made the point clear? As the minister has read the subsection, it is quite clear that it is divided into two classes. Neither can be called a gift. It is also clear that where the donor retains the powers of disposition, either directly or by reversion to him of the corpus, or to a person named by him, then he does not escape taxation. Why? Because the power of disposition remains with him. I think the minister is inviting trouble if he puts himself into the position where he can say: Oh, yes, it is true this was a trust deed, and all that sort of thing, but you want me to find that this is a bona fide gift. If it is a gift, there is never any trouble about realizing that it is not a trust, and the man knew it was not a trust when he started. This subjects the minister to pressure which should not be put upon him; it is unfair to him and to the administration of the legislation. I am trying to put myself in the minister's place; I would not want to be subject to that form of pressure, having people come to me and say: It is true it is a trust, but I want you to say it is all right.

Mr. DUNNING: Then section 13 stands for the moment.

Section stands.

On section 14—Interest and penalty.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the four per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: It is the penalty. There is a reduction in both.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—One-third tax to be forwarded with return, balance within four months with interest.

Mr. BENNETT: Reverting to the latter part of section 14, I take it that this is intended to be applicable to the future, not only to this year. As it stands now it reads:

—shall be applicable only in respect of the tax payable on the income of the year 1935—

Surely that is not what is intended to be said.

Mr. ILSLEY: At the present time the tax is payable in four instalments. The first instalment is due April 30, and they continue from that date.

Mr. BENNETT: The rate of interest was six per cent and will be made five per cent; the penalty was four per cent and we are going to make it three per cent. But it is only one word to which I am directing the minister's attention. The end of the section says that it shall apply "only in respect of the tax payable on the income of the year 1935." If we say that it shall be applicable in respect of the tax payable on the income for the year 1935, and the fiscal period ending therein and thereafter, that is all we need to say until such time as we again amend it.

Mr. DUNNING: Section 15 considered in conjunction with section 14 clarifies the matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: Paragraphs 48 and 49 provide for payment by four instalments. I shall read them:

48. Every person liable to pay any tax under this act shall send with the return of the income upon which such tax is payable not less than one-quarter of the amount of such tax, and may pay the balance if any, of such tax, in not more than three equal bi-monthly instalments thereafter, together with interest at the rate of six per centum per annum upon each instalment from the last day prescribed for making such return to the time payment is made.

Paragraph 49 prescribes the penalty for short payment. Payment in four instalments is provided for in paragraphs 48 and 49. By a later section in the bill we propose to make the tax payable not in four but in two instalments. Therefore sections 48 and 49 as now existing in the act will apply only this year, and when we amend those sections we amend them for this year only. Later we substitute two other sections for them, providing for payment of income tax in two instalments instead of four.

Mr. DUNNING: Section 15 clarifies the matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: If we were not to leave the word "only" in the section, we would be in a bad way. By this measure we provide for the payment of two instalments, and by section 14 we would be providing for the payment of four instalments.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister could have answered by saying that it is not intended that section 14 shall apply other than this year. I was simply asking whether the word "only" was used inadvertently, because clearly five per cent is to be the rate hereafter, and three per cent the penalty. It is not necessary to put in the word "only." But the minister has said that this is a separate thing standing by itself, and that therefore the word "only" should be there.

As regards section 15 is it desirable in these days of slow recovery to accelerate in that way the payment of income tax? Frankly, my observations would lead me to believe that with provincial taxes in most of the provinces the burden has become rather onerous, and to make instalments payable three in this year, and two in following years, is going to impose a heavy burden on a great many people.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are making a concession to the taxpayer by reducing the rate of interest he must pay and another concession by reducing the rate of penalty, when he does not pay as he should pay. Instead of ten per cent he will be charged only eight per cent, and then the taxpayer is asked to do something for us, namely to pay his tax before the end of August, and to make his payments in two instalments instead of four. In this way we shall reduce the overhead and make less work. We shall save a great deal in administration costs because at the present time there are endless interest computations necessitated by these numerous payment dates.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid most taxpayers do not regard the concession as comparable with the increased burden.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Interest.

Mr. BENNETT: I think this is pretty hard, but it is not for me to say.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Agreements with provincial governments.

Mr. BENNETT: What do we get for doing this? Have we any agreement with Ontario in connection with collecting the income tax for that province?

Mr. ILSLEY: The agreement with Ontario is not yet signed, but it is prepared and the terms have been orally agreed upon.

Mr. BENNETT: Does it mean that we get a collection fee for the service we render?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, we do.

Section agreed to.

Section 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Exemption from gift tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it correct that this applies only to gifts of capital? It cannot apply to gifts of any kind, because a man pays his tax on his income. If I give away a thousand dollars surely I cannot have a gift tax on it.

Mr. DUNNING: The present gift tax applies to gifts whether they come from capital or income.

Mr. BENNETT: The tax is bad enough as it is.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the way in which it has been administered so far; regardless of source, from either capital or income, it has so far been taxed. To some extent this is a relaxation.

Mr. BENNETT: I was told not. A man pays his tax at a certain rate, and he gives away a thousand dollars for some deserving purpose, possibly not to a charity, but for educational purposes; surely that should not be taxed. That would be absurd. The purpose of the act when it was put on the statute books was to prevent the distribution of capital under the guise of gifts, but the law was never meant to interfere with income; a man can do what he likes with his income after he pays his tax. No person ever thought of imposing a tax on the gifts a man made out of his income.

Mr. ILSLEY: His freedom from all taxes on that does not depend upon whether it is taken out of his income; it depends upon whether it comes within the exemptions set out in the act.

Mr. BENNETT: The exemptions do not touch it.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have added another one. The exemptions are in section 88 of the act. I do not know that I need read them all. If he made a gift of one thousand dollars it would be exempt under this section.

Mr. BENNETT: I mean outside exemptions, altogether. I never have heard it suggested until this minute that it covered gifts made out of income, which had paid a high tax. Nobody ever thought of doing it until this minute. Look at the absurdity of it. I speak feelingly about it. You pay a thousand dollars to some youngster who is trying to get through university. You have already paid on that amount your income tax of, let us say for the sake of argument, at least thirty per cent, and now somebody says that you must pay a gift tax as well on that thousand dollars. The whole purpose of the gift tax was to meet the situation created by the distribution of capital by those who were endeavouring to escape taxation by making family gifts, as was the case in the United States. But in the United States they never thought of imposing a tax on gifts made out of income. I have made inquiries about the matter, and if this is to be the law, it will necessitate revision of my taxation account, at any rate. I have never heard of anything of the sort, and certainly as far as I know it has never been so interpreted in this country. It would be absurd if it were so, and the sooner it is ended the better. Every time I give away a quarter on the street to a chap to get something to eat, do I have to keep an account of that because I give it out of my income, on which I have already paid income tax amounting to from thirty to fifty per cent? The reason for the gift tax was so clear. I remember when the gift tax was brought down by the minister. We followed the course that had been taken by the United States where fortunes were being distributed to escape taxation by the donor dividing his fortune among his family before death. There were three events that were challenged by the taxing authority. There was, first, the creation of a trust. If the trust completely severed the donor from his property, it was not taxable. If the donor still retained disposition of the corpus, it was taxable. People got over that by making outright gifts of $100,000 or $200,000 or $300,000, and that transferred the property and ended the matter. We followed, for the purpose of dealing with that very situation. The minister had in mind a particular case which had arisen. Suppose I gave $100 to the Red Cross; that is a charity and therefore is exempt from taxation. But suppose I give $100 to someone I have never seen, who desires to complete his education in Saskatchewan. Must I pay, in addition to the tax I have paid on that as part of my income, a gift tax as well?

Mr. NEILL: Surely not in addition.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the situation exactly. That is the absurdity of it.

Mr. NEILL: Is it not rather that you are not allowed to deduct that; you cannot claim it as an exemption?

Mr. BENNETT: No. They want me to pay a gift tax on it in addition.

Mr. ILSLEY: The commissioner of income tax advises me that no inquiry is made as to whether the gift is made out of income or principal, and in all the cases put by the right hon. gentleman he would be exempt because the gifts he enumerated are among the exemptions.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: The thousand dollars—

Mr. BENNETT: No; the thousand dollars has long since gone, and so has the payment to charity. They tax the gifts made out of my income. The authorities have advised me that gifts for education and matters of that kind cannot be taxed.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an exemption.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is a limited exemption. I am talking of sums that far exceed the exemption. Surely it is not suggested in this country that, after having paid the present high rates of income taxes, if you give away money for any purpose in the world that is not covered by section 88, you have to pay a gift tax when the money comes out of your income.

Mr. NEILL: It is ridiculous.

Mr. BENNETT: Not only ridiculous, but the statute never meant that.

Mr. DUNNING: Section 88, as it stands, does not appear to carry the meaning my right hon. friend says:

> Save as herein otherwise provided, there shall be assessed and paid upon the transfer in any year by any individual residing or ordinarily resident in Canada of any property (whether situate within or outside of Canada) transferred by way of gift or donation a tax payable by such individual at the rate applicable in respect of the aggregate value of all the property so transferred during the year by such individual under the following schedule.

Then the schedule is set out.

Mr. BENNETT: That is just what it means—"property" transferred during the year. That does not mean a man's income; it means his property.

Mr. DUNNING: Subsection 2 provides:

The tax so imposed shall apply whether the transfer is in trust or otherwise, or direct or indirect, or whether the property is real or personal, tangible or intangible, and shall extend to gifts made by personal corporations.

Then comes the date payable, the donor being personally liable, the assessment, and application of the provisions of the act, and then the exemptions. But the commissioner advises me that certainly there has been no distinction whatever made from the point of view of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: Nobody ever thought of taxing gifts from income. Think of the effect of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How long has this been in operation?

Mr. BENNETT: The minister brought it in last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has it had time to operate yet?

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes. Not only has it operated but the question became acute in a discussion I had only a few days ago. It is an invitation to leave this country quickly, and to give away no money. That is the main thing. It is a great invitation not to give anything to anybody, and the sooner you end it the better. A person pays a tax on the high rising scale of income taxes that we have in this act, and then you say that if a man with any surplus income gives anything away to a needy person he must pay a gift tax of eight per cent on what he gives away. Surely that was not ever intended to be the law of Canada. It certainly was not the intention of the former minister when he introduced the tax, or of parliament when it passed it. I recall vividly the circumstances that gave rise to its coming into operation. What is more, this will mean that people will have to revise their whole accounting arrangements because everybody is giving away money from time to time, I hope, to the extent of his ability, and he never thinks, because he gives it out of his income, therefore it is subject to a gift tax. Nobody has ever suggested this to me before. It seems so absurd. Where a man has a large fortune and gives away $100,000 to this member of his family, $100,000 to another, and so on, to escape taxation—that is what the statute was passed for. I can only say with respect to the people who have been trying to give away a little money—and I think I have been one—that this will necessitate a revision of my own position and that of many other people in this country who have endeavoured to help the poor, and have never asked exemption for so doing. I do not want to talk about my own affairs, but during the last year I have helped in education in every province of this dominion, I have aided young people, some of whom I have never seen, and as long as the money came out of my income I did not think it was taxable; neither did the former minister who brought in the gift tax. It has always been assumed that the gift tax referred only to a distribution of capital; that when capital was distributed it was taxable.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): As I heard that section read by the finance minister, I certainly think it bears the interpretation which the minister is contending for. I would like to suggest to the leader of the opposition that there is a rule which settles the will of parliament. It is not what is in people's minds but what parliament says in black and white, and what is written in the section says that the gift is taxable even if it comes out of income.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think that was ever intended.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I believe it was not intended, and I think the section should be corrected. But that is the way it reads.

Mr. BENNETT: I warrant that there is not a man in either chamber of this parliament who has any such idea.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I do not believe it is right.

Mr. ESLING: If one chooses to give away a piece of revenue producing real estate after he has paid income tax and municipal tax, is he then to be taxed on the gift which he has given away outright? I can cite such a case. I have had a piece of property in Calgary for twenty-five years which does not even pay the taxes. If I want to give it away for nothing shall I be taxed?

Mr. ILSLEY: The tax would be very small.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the principle.

Mr. ILSLEY: That gift undoubtedly would come within the exemptions.

Mr. ESLING: It is to an individual.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the amendments now proposed, a gift not exceeding $1,000 to any individual would be exempt.

Mr. ESLING: There might be other gifts a man would like to make.

Mr. DUNNING: So long as they do not exceed $1,000 to any one individual, he can give away as many as he likes under the amendment now proposed. The separate gifts would not be taxable provided they were under $1,000. That is the change being proposed here.

Mr. BENNETT: It is absurd.

Mr. DUNNING: We are at least improving the situation a little.

Mr. BENNETT: As far as I am concerned, not a bit.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I think the whole thing should be repealed.

Mr. ESLING: Suppose the value is more than $1,000 and you want to give away a piece of revenue producing property; in the computation of your income tax, your tax would be reduced, whereas the one to whom you give the property must make a return. It looks to me as though the tax is being doubled.

Mr. ILSLEY: The donee may be in a lower tax category than the donor, and in that way the income tax might be reduced.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the minister will not say that there has ever been anyone who has paid a gift tax on a gift made out of income. Certainly I never heard of such a thing until I heard it in this committee tonight. Money taken out of the income of a man who has paid his income tax and surtax is now to be taxed. This will mean that people will not give away any money. I do not think the section was ever intended for any such purpose. I was not in the chamber when the section passed and I do not know how this came about. The provision was intended to prevent the distribution of property in order to remove incomes from the higher brackets, which might run as high as sixty or seventy per cent and get it down to a lower and more desirable bracket. A man might transfer two or three hundred thousand dollars to a wife or to daughters or sons and thus reduce his income and bring it down to a lower bracket. But now the government says that we are going to be taxed for giving away a little money after we have paid our income taxes, both federal and provincial. Certainly that cannot be the intention of parliament. Certainly parliament would never have passed the section over my say-so if I had known that was the interpretation to be placed upon it. This is just one of those sort of things which makes one wonder what it is all about. If in an economic depression one wants to become as generous as possible and give as much as he can, after he has paid high taxes, both federal and provincial, he is to be taxed because he makes a gift! A man is in difficulty; he writes you a letter and you send him $500 which you know you will never get back. This is a gift as far as you are concerned.

Mr. DUNNING: To each individual, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a tax on a gift out of income; it puts people in a very difficult position who have been dealing honestly with their income tax.

Mr. NEILL: Most of the debate this evening has been far above my head, being a lawyers' debate on legal technicalities, but even my lay mind can grasp this situation. Years and years ago the government of the day conceived it to be a good idea to encourage people to give money for charitable purposes. They inserted a clause in the law providing income tax exemptions on such gifts up to ten per cent. These exemptions were to be obtained on the production of receipt to show that you had contributed to charitable institutions and so on. A broad interpretation was placed upon the section, the idea being to encourage people to make such contributions. We are now placing a direct tax upon generosity.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not correct; the tax now exists; we are modifying it.

Mr. NEILL: We passed a bad section last year, but the principle is absolutely wrong to penalize a person with generous motives, who gives money away. Certainly if this section means anything at all, it is in the direction of discouraging that kind of thing. I think we shall make ourselves a laughing stock if we pass legislation like this.

Mr. BENNETT: It certainly never was intended by parliament that there should be a tax on gifts out of income.

Mr. ILSLEY: I might have been able to make a better defence of this legislation if I had had some notice of it. We are improving the legislation by degrees. With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), gifts or contributions to charitable organizations or educational institutions in Canada, when operated exclusively as such and not for the benefit, profit or gain of any person, member or shareholder, are exempt from the gift tax. By this proposed legislation, any number of gifts of $1,000 each are to be exempt from the gift tax, and over and above that, $4,000 in gifts is exempt from the gift tax. There are a number of other exemptions, but when we get out of the exemptions, gifts are taxable. No inquiry is made as to whether these gifts are made out of capital or out of income. I could see great administrative difficulty in making such an inquiry necessary. For instance, a man might claim that certain expenditures had been made out of his capital as his income had been used up, and who is to say whether he is right? At any rate, we are administering the law as we found it and as it stands, and I am not prepared at the moment to try to draft an amendment to place before the committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the intention might be found in the budget speech last year of the former Minister of Finance Mr. Rhodes. At page 1986 of Hansard of 1935, Mr. Rhodes is reported as follows:

> Finally, it is proposed to levy a tax on gifts. This form of tax, adopted by many countries, is being imposed primarily to operate as a deterrent to transfers of property by gift, chiefly within family groups which would have the effect of reducing personal income to lower brackets and thus securing income tax assessment at rates lower than would otherwise be applicable. It is particularly expedient to introduce this measure at this time in view of the higher rates of taxation provided for in the new surtax on investment income. Not only should this tax put our income tax structure on a more secure foundation but also it should operate in a like manner with regard to succession and inheritance taxes levied by the provinces.
> The rates at which gifts are to be taxed are as follows.

Then the list is given. I call attention particularly to this:

> The tax shall not apply to gifts between husband and wife, nor to gifts to minors, as under the present act the donor in such cases continues to be taxed on the income from the property so transferred.

Mr. BENNETT. Yes; that makes the case complete.

Mr. DUNNING: He goes on:

> Certain classes of gifts are to remain free from tax such as, for example, gifts made for charitable, religious, educational, scientific or literary purposes, or to the dominion, any province or political subdivision thereof for public purposes. Furthermore, gifts in the aggregate not exceeding $1,000 a year are to be free from tax.

I have not the later discussion in committee of ways and means; that will be in a furthur volume of Hansard. Certainly, however, the administration of that section so far, under the government of my right hon. friend and under this government, has not contemplated a distinction as to whether the gift came from capital or income, so far as the donor is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: For the obvious reason that no one has paid tax on gifts from income in this country, so far as I know.

Mr. DUNNING: I may tell my right hon. friend that I myself had some difficulty in deciding what I should return because of the existence of that provision.

Mr. BENNETT: As it stands now the government should at least give some consideration to it, for it never was intended to dry up the sources of gifts in this country. As it stands now, I must try to keep a record of the number of ten dollar gifts I make.

Mr. DUNNING: No, because the exemption is large enough to cover that.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but that applies to gifts not exceeding $1,000. After making his return and paying a tax on that basis, if the donor gives away money out of his income he will have to pay seven or eight per cent. This puts Canada in a class by itself; no other country so far as I can ascertain has thought of doing such a thing. Certainly, if my information is correct, this is not the situation in England, and they tax gifts, as do the United States. The minister referred to the case where capital is given away for the purpose of getting into a lower bracket. In that case there is a tax. But giving income away does not get you into a lower bracket unless you convert the income into capital; you spend your income and that is the end of it. I can only say that it is a desperate situation if it is as the minister suggests. The late government never had any intention of doing any such thing.

Mr. DUNNING: But the statute is there.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the explanation in the statute itself makes it clear. It was never intended to tax gifts out of income.

Mr. DUNNING: If it was clear before then it is still clear.

Mr. BENNETT: But the question has arisen now, it has been suggested that the law is not clear.

Mr. DUNNING: If the intention of the statute is as my right hon. friend suggests, and if it can be so construed, then the amendment is not changing the intention of the last parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: But the law should be clarified now if there is any question about it.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): The speech of the former Minister of Finance is not a rule for interpreting the statute.

Mr. DUNNING: Only as to intention.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): But his interpretation makes it clear that he had no idea that income was taxable. I think the legislation should be clarified. Once the taxpayer makes his return showing his income, on which income he will pay his tax, he should not have to account for any gifts which he may make during the year out of that income. He makes his return and pays his tax.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the clause should carry. At the same time, it is clear that this does not touch the operative section out of which this trouble has arisen. If language means anything, the language of the former Minister of Finance meant that gifts from income are not taxable; that is as clear as any man can put it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I read entirely the other way the language of the Minister of Finance of last year.

Mr. BENNETT: He spoke of a man trying to get out of one bracket into another by giving away capital. But now we are discussing the gift tax.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What he said was:

> The tax shall not apply to gifts between husband and wife, nor to gifts to minors, as under the present act the donor in such cases continues to be taxed on the income from the property so transferred.

Therefore the income tax does not apply under the exemptions made by the minister last year with respect to the gift tax, the inference being strong that it applies to those not exempted.

Mr. BENNETT: But read the first statement made by the former minister when he said that he proposed to impose the gift tax.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This was what he said:

> Finally, it is proposed to levy a tax on gifts. This form of tax, adopted by many countries, is being imposed primarily to operate as a deterrent to transfers of property by gift, chiefly within family groups which would have the effect of reducing personal income to lower brackets and thus securing income tax assessment at rates lower than would otherwise be applicable. It is particularly expedient to introduce this measure at this time in view of the higher rates of taxation provided for in the new surtax on investment income. Not only should this tax put our income tax structure on a more secure foundation but also it should operate in a like manner with regard to succession and inheritance taxes levied by the provinces.

Then comes the crucial point where he makes specific exemptions from the gift tax:

> The tax shall not apply to gifts between husband and wife, nor to gifts to minors, as under the present act the donor in such cases continues to be taxed on the income from the property so transferred.

He is making a special exemption, with reference to exemptions under the gift tax, leaving the obvious inference that in all other cases income is taxable.

Mr. BENNETT: But the hon. gentleman uses "income" in a wrong sense. There is no tax on gifts between husband and wife. The husband has an income of $50,000 and hands $25,000 to his wife. Somebody else takes $25,000 and gives it away in ten and twenty dollar lots, and he has to pay the tax. That is not what was intended. There is no question of exemption with respect to husband and wife, because it dealt with income.

Mr. DUNNING: In committee of ways and means last year there was a little discussion which to some extent clarifies the intention further. After making an explanation in response to a plea by Mr. Coote to have the exemption raised a little, the then Minister of Finance said, as reported in Hansard, volume 4, 1935:

> Mr. Rhodes: Mr. Chairman, we did make inquiry with respect to this tax, which is in operation in other countries. The nearest example is to be found in the United States. The object of the tax is obvious; it is to prevent an individual with an income which would bear a very heavy income tax from escaping that tax by handing over to certain relatives, perhaps to his immediate family, a physical volume of securities, for instance, which would have the effect of dividing his income among five or six persons.

Mr. BENNETT: Can you get anything clearer than that?

Mr. DUNNING (reading):

> These, paying individual income tax, would come under a lower bracket, being in receipt of a smaller income, and in the aggregate the income tax payable by these individuals would be nothing like the income tax that would be paid by the man under the higher bracket.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. DUNNING (reading):

It was to prevent that sort of thing, without the state securing some compensation by way of revenue, that this gift tax was imposed. The figure originally mentioned in the resolution was $1,000.

He is now speaking of the exemption.

That was raised, because we did not want to include in the category of gifts which were intended to be taxed, for the reasons I have just indicated, certain bona fide gifts by individuals to members of their families by way of an annual income, for example. There were certain cases of that. Inasmuch as the individual who gives, we will say, an annuity of $4,000 to a member of his family has paid an income tax upon that, the exchequer is not cheated. Possibly $5,000 might be a fairer figure; that is the figure set in the United States. I should be quite content to have it raised to $5,000, but I doubt if we would be wise in increasing the exemption beyond that figure. In that regard I am entirely in the judgment of the committee.

The intention there, so far as I can gather it, is certainly to tax income.

Mr. BENNETT: No, exactly the opposite. It cannot mean anything but just that, that there should be no tax upon distribution of income by gift. Why? Because, he says, the idea is to prevent men from giving away their property in such a way as to make the aggregate tax payable upon the income derived from it, by the persons to whom they give it, less than if they paid in the higher brackets. You could not make the case clearer than that to show that the tax refers to corpus only and not to income.

Mr. DUNNING: But in the further reference to exemption—

Mr. BENNETT: The exemptions only strengthen the case.

Mr. DUNNING: The figure originally mentioned, the former minister said, speaking of exemptions, was $1,000. That was raised——because we did not want to include in the category of gifts which were intended to be taxed, for the reasons I have just indicated, certain bona fide gifts by individuals to members of their families by way of an annual income, for example. There were certain cases of that. Inasmuch as the individual who gives, we will say, an annuity of $4,000 to a member of his family has paid an income tax upon that, the exchequer is not cheated. Possibly $5,000 might be a fairer figure—

And so on. To my mind the then minister on that occasion was certainly talking of a gift from income, and speaking of the exemption provision as one which would operate to prevent the individual being taxed twice on that amount.

Mr. BENNETT: Nothing can more clearly indicate that the minister had not in mind income than the reason he gave when the matter was first dealt with. The tax was a tax on gifts of principal which had the effect of reducing the income tax paid to the state upon a fortune. A man has $1,000,000 of income from his securities, and he wants to reduce that to $600,000. He gives securities to his children, just as the former minister says, until he reduces the income to that amount. Thereupon the tax that he pays is in the lower brackets of twenty and twenty-five per cent instead of sixty and seventy per cent. The others are in the low brackets as respects the sum total of taxes they pay, and as the former minister points out, the tax is less than the man would probably have paid as owner of all the property. I am not going to mention the particular case that the former minister had in mind when he was discussing that point, but nobody ever suggested seriously until I heard it here to-night that the income the man received was also to be taxable. The former minister said, "When a man provides an annuity of $4,000 for somebody we allow for that, because he has made a gift; he has set it aside and the income from it. He is not required to pay because it goes to that other person." To provide $4,000 or $5,000, $100,000 is set aside; that is quite common in this country; and because the former minister wanted to protect that sort of gift he said that he was not going to charge a gift tax on that transaction. That is all there is about the matter, but certainly from my standpoint it is incredible that any one should suggest it was ever the intention of the late government to impose a tax upon gifts made out of income. The hon. member talks about administration. It is as simple as one, two, three as far as administration is concerned. That bogey has been worked to death in this country. By the time we get down to a fair appreciation of what is involved, we shall realize that it will be disastrous to any man who is trying to do something to aid another. A thousand dollars is not any good. For instance, what about a man's election expenses? Suppose he helps a friend by giving him $5,000.

An hon. MEMBER: Too much.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us say it is too much. But even supposing it is, some of us have been known to have—

Mr. DUNNING: He could go to a thousand dollars a head, which would be more helpful.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the point. The candidate makes his return. Suppose a man pays in $5,000 to the fund in Queens county, Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DUNNING: Thank you.

Mr. BENNETT: Suppose he does that. Is he to pay eight per cent on that? Was it ever intended that the income thus used by him in his discretion should pay this tax? Surely the mere statement carries its refutation on its face. I know this much; it was never intended by the late government that it should be so. That is made clear by the explanation of the former minister which has just been read. I cannot speak with certainty, but it is not my understanding that such is the position in the United States, though they tax everything there, even the profits you make on the exchanges; here we do not. All the former minister was trying to do was to prevent a lessening of taxation by a distribution of the corpus of one's fortune. "I am going to take toll," he said, "out of that fortune as it is being disbursed by a man in his lifetime so that he may pay less taxes." As a matter of fact the practice of making distribution of the corpus of the estate was getting quite common in this country. I am greatly opposed to the section as it stands. I think the government should modify the principles of the law in that regard, because hitherto such has never been the intention of parliament; certainly I have not gone upon that assumption, nor has anyone else as far as I know.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the light of this discussion I think I should say that as far as I am concerned I would certainly consider an amendment, but not at this session. I have been trying to determine what sort of amendment would meet the case of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, it is easy.

Mr. ILSLEY: But certainly an exemption up to the amount of the taxpayer's income would not be proper.

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because in that event he would say that his personal expenditures, whether $50,000 or $100,000, were out of capital.

Mr. BENNETT: How could he?

Mr. ILSLEY: He would say that the gift was out of income. He could claim the exemption for the gift up to the amount of the income and then his other expenditures would be deemed in reduction of capital.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not understand that. I confess the genius of the minister's advisers is beyond me.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us think about that for a moment. The right hon. gentleman has not suggested anything.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I suggested that the law should be what was originally intended. There should be no tax except on capital distribution; that was all that ever was intended by this parliament or by the former minister who introduced the gift tax. The last extract read by the minister makes that quite clear.

Mr. ILSLEY: Suppose a gift of $100,000 comes to the attention of the department. The taxpayer says: That gift was out of income, because I have an income of $100,000. We say: But what about the other $100,000 that you spent on yourself and your wife and family and trips to Europe?

Mr. BENNETT: He can give it to his wife if he likes.

Mr. ILSLEY: He says: I have a right to use up my capital in trips to Europe if I like. The amendment I have proposed to-night is the only one I can think of at the moment. If he can deplete his capital, and claim exemption by saying it was out of income—

Mr. BENNETT: That could not last long.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman will say: You could make provision or regulations to prevent that. I think we could, but it will take some consideration. I shall give consideration to the matter for next session, but not for this.

Mr. BENNETT: But think of the inequity of the section as it stands. There is the former minister's statement of what he introduced the tax for, and now we are going exactly opposite to that. When he brought in that bill he said that he did it for a given purpose, and we are negativing that purpose by saying that we are going to tax every gift. As regards the illustration about going to Europe, of course that is not a deductible item, in any event. One can speak with certainty about some things, that is what he knows himself. I am not engaged any longer in the practice of my profession; therefore I pay my income tax on income from investments, except as to the salary which I receive here and the indemnity. The two together make a sum in excess of that which I am allowed to deduct. In other words the maximum income which I am supposed to earn is $14,000, is it not? The rest of it is subject to surtax. I pay the ordinary tax, and then on any sums in excess of $14,000 there is the surtax. I am allowed $1,000 exemption, being single, plus what the department may regard as being vouched for as charitable donations, under the law not exceeding ten per cent of the taxable income. Then there is the provincial tax which is on the amount of your income less the dominion tax. Now the government seeks to make it impossible for me to lower the brackets under which I pay. As the former minister says, that can be brought about only in one way, not by gift of income, but by gift of capital. Giving away all my income, to whomever I give it, and in whatever sums, does not change the bracket. The bracket can be changed only in one way, that is by the gift of capital, the corpus.

Mr. DUNNING: It could be changed for the next year by the gift of a large part of the income of this year.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I could not change the bracket in the least.

Mr. DUNNING: For the next year.

Mr. BENNETT: But the principal is still intact; that is the whole point. It is no use for the minister to suggest that the bracket can be changed in the way he indicates; it cannot be done. The cold-blooded fact is that my corpus has not changed between last year and this year. From that capital I have "X" income, and whatever I do with it cannot in any sense change the bracket. That is quite clear. That being so, that I cannot change the bracket by any gift of income, and the former minister having said that the purpose was to prevent a change of bracket, obviously there is only one way by which that can be prevented, that is by a tax on corpus. As regards the explanation given as to $1,000, $2,000, $3,000, $4,000, I could give the history of that. A man gives a bond of $1,000 as a birthday present to his child; no one suggests that is going to be taxed, whether he went to his safety deposit box and took $1,000 out and gave it or paid it out of income. But when he takes $100,000 or ten times $100,000, then there is to be a tax. But if he buys out of his income a $1,000 bond, that just adds to what the state gets. That is the odd part. Bear this in mind, that every time a man invests any part of his income as additional capital and thereby converts it into capital, the state wins. There are no longer any tax-exempt bonds; there will not be any to buy after 1937. Every time a man out of his income invests $5,000 he has added to his taxable income for next year, from which income the state takes its piece. But it is now said that if he gives away any part of his income, he incurs an additional burden of eight per cent in addition to the three kinds of tax he now pays, his income tax, the tax he pays the province and the surtax. Well, Mr. Rhodes, the ex-Minister of Finance, explained what he was doing; he was making it impossible for a man with a fortune to reduce his bracket rate of income tax by giving his capital to his family. If he gives it to his wife he does not escape; why? Because she gets the income and pays tax on it. It is not as though this was not done with exactitude; it was done with care. The language is clear. There is no doubt as to Mr. Rhodes' explanation, and if one reads the section as it stands, it must be applicable only to gifts of corpus or capital. It would be an almost intolerable situation to suggest that a gift of capital is not in a different position from a gift of income. To tax a gift of income is to impose a burden on those who are anxious to pay; if that is the theory, it will make more people want to leave this country than do now. One would be very much better off in England, although we talk about the high taxes there, than with the municipal, provincial and federal taxes we have here, and in addition a gift tax on everything a man gives away. How much of a man's income does anyone think he spends on himself? Three meals a day and a few clothes! A very small part. The rest of it finds its way into channels of commerce in some way; he gives it here and there and elsewhere; he incurs obligations; he goes into various ventures, and now he is told that if he uses that income in the way in which he desires he has to pay a gift tax on it. This is wholly at variance with what Mr. Rhodes had in mind. When I heard the last statement read by the minister it recalled it exactly as Mr. Rhodes put it; that is the whole foundation of that tax. To suggest that this was a tax against income is to do violence to anything any hon. member had in mind at the time the provision was passed; I am sure of that. I was not here; I was ill, as a matter of fact I never heard of it being discussed until it was mentioned the other day.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, this clause in any event would have to pass; whether the tax be on income or capital would not make any difference. But it afforded an opportunity for the discussion.

Mr. DUNNING: No; this is a modification of the bearing of it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is all.

On section 20—Exemption of metalliferous mines.

Mr. BENNETT: This is another illustration of the unfairness of it. Suppose a man's income is entirely derived from gold mines. Until last year he paid a tax on fifty per cent of the income, and that is all. If he gave away the other fifty per cent, he could pay the tax on it and still be better off than nowadays, whatever might be left to himself or whatever might be accumulated surplus. We changed this to thirty-three and a third per cent. Just see how it applies: First of all a man has a reduction of fifty per cent on his taxable income. The man's income as certified by the auditors is $10,000,000. After depletion is taken off and depreciation is allowed he has a net profit of $10,000,000. Fifteen per cent of that is $1,500,000. But instead of paying on the $10,000,000 you split it in two and make it $5,000,000. Then you pay 15 per cent on that, which makes $750,000. That is the tax. Now comes the distribution of $10,000,000, in part, because part of it is still kept for reserve and rest. They distribute the dividends to shareholders and the balance is profits. Do they pay income tax, as I do? No; they reduce by thirty-three and a third per cent that dividend cheque and pay income tax on that.

Mr. DUNNING: Twenty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: It was thirty-three and a third per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Not on dividends.

Mr. BENNETT: It was fifty per cent when we came into office.

Mr. DUNNING: You reduced it to twenty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: We reduced it to thirty-three and a third per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: For companies and twenty per cent for individuals.

Mr. BENNETT: When one begins to talk about allowances for depletion and depreciation, this should be in the statute itself I had intended to deal with it by statute. It is not right to have it left to the caprice of individuals. It should be settled and fixed by statute. At one time it was to be; then it was settled by regulation. I am not sure now whether it is by regulation or statute. The former minister had intended to provide for it by statute but whether it has been done or not I cannot say. The minister has the statute before him; would he state whether it is by regulation or statute?

Mr. ILSLEY: By regulation, and always has been.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right; it has been. In view of the fact we are undertaking to make a contract not to vary the tax for a given number of years it might be desirable that in the statute itself there should be stated just what is to be allowed for depletion. For when you read in the papers that the ore reserves are now good for fifty years, and that is put in the annual report, and you show that a rest is accumulated by which the company could in any event retire its common shares at their original cost, it is a little difficult to understand why they should be thus favoured beyond any other person. There was great trouble in the department for a long time in getting the depletion in connection with coal mines settled. In the United States they settled it in one way. They had great difficulty to get it settled in this country. The same applies to silver, platinum, nickel, copper and so on. Might it not be desirable that there should be a schedule indicating just what the allowance would be for depletion in the company's hands and in the hands of the dividend receiver?

On section 22—Taxation periods affected.

Mr. STEVENS: Section 22 refers to sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 16 of the act and it states that they shall be applicable to the income for the year 1935. It will be noted that in section 8 which is one of these, provision is made for the taxation of motion picture films, and an exemption of sixty per cent is allowed. But the practice in this and, I take it, in some other instances, is to remit royalties, or whatever the earnings may be, monthly or at short periods of time. Virtually all of that which occurred prior to the notification of the public that this was to be done had been remitted. Obviously an agent who could not possibly be expected to have anything like the resources of his principals could not bear the taxation, and could not collect it from his principals. I should like to ask the minister if that feature of it has been given consideration, and if those who have remitted the income to their principals in Great Britain, for instance, for British films or matters of that kind—I imagine musical copyrighted productions would be in the same position—will now be called upon to try to pay the tax for the 1935 year, which I submit in many many cases will be utterly impossible?

Mr. ILSLEY: I know that is the submission of certain persons who are affected by this provision. However, one has to know something about the whole background of the section in order to come to a conclusion as to what should be done. This is what happened in connection with motion picture films: In the past the companies have been paying a five per cent tax on ten per cent of the royalties or payments they have been remitting. The view of the department is that they have got off very lightly in the years gone by. I do not know that we would be justified in limiting this to the year 1936 and subsequent periods. It is true that the tax could not be deducted from the remittances of last year, but they can be paid now in respect of the remittances of last year. We have arrived at a reasonable tax concerning the justice of which there can be very little dispute, namely two per cent of all such royalties or payments. That is to be the rate, instead of five per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not criticizing the set-up. But may I put the matter to the minister in this way: While this is an income tax it is almost in the nature of a sales tax. If it were a sales tax and remittances were made for last year on goods sold and disposed of, we would not think of making it retroactive and applying it to invoices which had been issued. I imagine some of these remittances are made bi-monthly or monthly, at very short periods, and the transactions are ended. The minister has properly said that there was very light taxation in the past, but that was the law. We should not say: You have got off too easily, and therefore we shall come down on you with a heavy hand. That was the law.

Mr. ILSLEY: But our view was that there should have been a payment of five per cent on the whole thing, under the law as it stood. They have been paying five per cent on ten per cent, and were doing it through last year.

Mr. STEVENS: I think that is perfectly sound but it should be made applicable from the time the tax was announced in the budget, May 1. They could not possibly have known of it; the agent could not have retained the amount out of his remittances, and he will simply have to make it up in some way out of his own resources, which would not be fair. For instance, companies in the old country or in Germany or France, or wherever they may happen to be, certainly will not now pay a retroactive tax, and I earnestly suggest to the minister that in cases of that kind the tax should not be made applicable until the date it was announced, May 1.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are always objections to retroactive taxation, but it has been the practice here, ever since there have been amendments to the Income War Tax Act, to make the amendments, many of them at least, retroactive to the extent of the previous year. I do not think, therefore, that any more injustice will be done in this case than in the case of ordinary individuals. The view we have taken is that the five per cent is taxable on the whole remittance as the law stood. This now says that the five per cent is applicable only to forty per cent of the remittance. The companies claim that we should come to their point of view as regards last year and say that they should pay only five per cent on ten per cent of the remittance. We never concurred in their view that only ten per cent should be taxed. They want us not only to agree that that was the law but to confirm it now for last year. We have considered the matter and do not think we should do so.

Mr. STEVENS: While it is true that we have made the income tax retroactive or applied it to last year, that is quite normal because income tax returns for last year's income as a rule are not made until early this year. All I am asking in this case—I am not criticizing the rate of taxation proposed; I accept that—is that this tax, which is in the nature of a duty, should not be made applicable until the date the tax was announced, because the poor agent in this country, as far as I can see, is the one who will have to pay the tax. He having had a contract, and having fulfilled his contract and made his remittances, his company or his principals certainly would not think of returning to him the taxes for last year which now suddenly and unexpectedly become payable. I think the agent is the one who will have to bear the weight of this taxation. This is not something that is sweeping over a very wide field and for the future we could make clear what is taxable and impose the taxation, but in justice, fairness and equity to the agent I submit that the tax should not be applicable this year prior to May 1, the date when the budget came down.

Sections 23 and 24 agreed to.

On section 13—Transfers in trust.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, upon consideration I agree that the change suggested by the leader of the opposition should be made in this section, and I therefore move that all the words after the word "made" in line 41 of page 6 to the end of the subsection be struck out.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 20—Exemption of metalliferous mines.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say one word on section 89, which is a new section being added to the act by section 20 of this bill. I had intended to say something but we passed the section fairly quickly. Would it not be desirable to provide that the regulations shall be printed in the gazette? This is an extraordinary power which is being left to one man, and in view of the declared general policies of the administration I think it might be desirable that the regulations should be published in the gazette, and that notice should be given when the certificate issues. I do not wish to prolong the discussion in committee, but certainly in view of that power which is given, I think it would be desirable from the public standpoint, and from the standpoint of the minister himself, to have the regulations published in the gazette, and notice given when the certificate issues. Under the old law relating to the Interior department, when certain lands were alienated a certificate to that effect was issued, and I think a great deal of improvement may be effected in connection with the administration of the law if publicity is given as I suggest.

Mr. ILSLEY: Notice to whom?

Mr. BENNETT: Notice to the world in the gazette—notice is hereby given.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think publication in the gazette is reasonable, but I am just wondering whether it would not be sufficient if I gave an undertaking that notice will be published in the gazette.

Mr. BENNETT: The kind of notice I had reference to was such as was usually given under the Department of the Interior Act. For instance, under subsection 3 of section 89 you would say: Notice is hereby given that on July 1, 1937, a certificate was issued by the minister that a mine known as - - - - - - was deemed to have come into production from and after that date. That is what I mean. It is the old provision that had to do with publication in connection with any alienation of the public domain. In this case it is a question of lessening public taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not see that anybody is legitimately interested in that notice except the company. The public is likely to be misled by such a notice. I see no reason for publicity; on the other hand there are many objections against it. Speculators would say: The government has given a certificate that this mine has come into production. Now we do not know whether or not the mine is any good, but for our purposes we have come to the conclusion that it has come into production. That fact should not be paraded round the country as an invitation to persons to put their money into that mine; yet that is what might happen. I do not see what good it would do. The people interested in the notice are the people who will get the exemption, and we will tell them.

Mr. BENNETT: I would think it is far wider than that, but I shall not undertake to discuss it to-night. In any event the minister has to issue a certificate; I can move in the House of Commons to have it tabled, and therefore it follows that ultimately it may become a public document. I was suggesting that we follow the course which was pursued under our statutes in the early days with respect to the alienation of the public domain, when a certificate was published in the gazette with respect to lands in western Canada, mines, timber limits and matters of that sort. The gazette may not be the best place in the world to do it. But if any man has the duty cast upon him under the law, I submit that it is in the public interest that he discharge that duty involving the issuing of a certificate itself and publishing it in the gazette of the country, to the effect that notice is given; that pursuant to the provisions of section so-and-so a certificate has been issued that the mine has come into production. If the minister does not think well of the suggestion, I am quite content, but I think something of that sort would be in the interest of the minister as well as of the country.

UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF AND ASSISTANCE ACT, 1936, TO ASSIST PROVINCES IN RESPECT OF RELIEF EXPENDITURES

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 100, to amend the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: There was certain information the minister was to give.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, when the house was in committee on the resolution preceding this bill I gave an undertaking that at this stage I would give the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) certain information which he sought when the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, was before the house some weeks ago. His inquiry related to the adequacy of the federal supervision over relief expenditures in the western provinces, more particularly in Saskatchewan. He will correct me if I am mistaken in what I now say, but my impression was that he was concerned as to the adequacy of the supervision over expenditures under the farm placement scheme.

Mr. BENNETT: That was one of the questions.

Mr. ROGERS: Some question arose as to whether or not a representative of the dominion government had been asked to make a report under the farm placement scheme in the province of Saskatchewan. I may say that following that inquiry I secured information which I think will provide what the leader of the opposition had in mind. The facts of the matter are that Major Barnett was appointed to represent the Department of Finance in Saskatchewan in connection with the moneys advanced for relief in the drought area. That is to say, his duties related specifically to the accountable advance of $9,000,000 which was made for relief in the drought area. Major Barnett was appointed in November, 1934. Subsequently Mr. Burgess, whose name was also mentioned in the previous discussion, and certain other clerks were engaged to assist Major Barnett. When Major Barnett resigned, Mr. Burgess took his place in May, 1935. There was some trouble between the dominion government and the Saskatchewan government as to payments under the farm placement scheme, and there was a short period during which Major Barnett, acting for the dominion government, did assume responsibility for payments under the farm placement scheme. However, distribution was actually made from lists supplied by the province of Saskatchewan, the certificates of expenditure being signed by Major Barnett and countersigned by Mr. Symons, the resident auditor of the Department of Labour who has been in the service of the department since he was seconded from the income tax branch in November, 1931. While Major Barnett did supervise these expenditures during that brief period, there was no report made by him on the farm placement scheme in Saskatchewan. My right hon. friend will recall that that was one of the main points of his inquiry. I gathered that he was under the impression that a report had been made by Major Barnett or by Mr. Burgess with respect to expenditures under the farm placement scheme in Saskatchewan, but no such report was made to the Department of Labour.

Mr. HEAPS: I had hoped the minister would give a more extensive explanation of the general unemployment situation in the Dominion of Canada. I do not know whether he is prepared to give us any more information to-night than he did the other evening, but if he is, I shall be extremely glad.

Mr. ROGERS: On Friday evening the hon. member asked me if I was prepared to give a statement as to the number of those on relief in April of this year as compared with April of last year, or at any rate to give some comparison between the numbers on relief this year and last year. I gave him the preliminary figures for April of this year and the figures for April of last year, but I explained that the April figures were subject to correction. I may say that we now have available the preliminary figures for May of this year which can be compared with the figures for May of last year. The preliminary figures for May of this year indicate that there are 261,674 heads of families on relief, which figure includes 25,572 heads of families in the drought areas of the prairie provinces. Exclusive of the dried out areas the dependents and individual cases number 878,908. In the dried out areas there are 104,379 dependents and individual cases, and the total number on direct relief for the month of May is, therefore, 1,244,961 as compared with 1,277,464 in May, 1935, a reduction of 2·54 per cent. In addition, in May, 1936, there were 19,596 single homeless persons cared for as compared with 37,024 in May, 1935, a reduction of 47·07 per cent. There were employed on relief works at wages during May, 1936, 5,991 persons as compared with 12,330 in May, 1935, a reduction of 51·41 per cent. Including dependents, there were 18,295 individuals placed on the land under the relief settlement plan as compared with 18,097 last year. The number of persons placed under this plan, by the nature of the plan, will be larger with each succeeding year. These figures represent, I believe, the proportions of the relief problem at the present time as compared with last year, and obviously we have to consider the problem in a relative sense, using the figures of the preceding years as a measure of increase or decrease under the particular categories which I have given the committee. I take it that these are the figures which my hon. friend had in mind when he put his question to me some days ago.

Mr. BARBER: Is there any corresponding decrease in the cost of relief?

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister give the figures with regard to the work camps instituted in connection with the railways?

Mr. ROGERS: I propose to take that question up later. I have made a notation of several questions put to me when the resolution was under consideration, and I have the information. First of all I might answer the question put by the hon. member (Mr. Barber), who has asked as to the total cost of relief this year as compared with last year, taking corresponding months. The total cost including expenditures by municipalities, provinces and dominion for April, 1935, was $7,771,279. The preliminary report from the provinces for April, 1936, indicates an expenditure of $7,490,801, a reduction of 3·61 per cent. I am giving the total figures and not simply the grant in aid by the dominion to the provinces for relief purposes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Do the figures given for the dried out area in western Canada include those who receive seed and feed or only those who receive groceries, coal and clothing?

Mr. ROGERS: I am informed that the figures for the dried out areas apply to those actually in receipt of relief within that area.

Mr. DONNELLY: But what kind of relief —clothing or seed?

Mr. ROGERS: Shelter, food and clothing. I do not think the figures I have given include those who receive seed and fodder.

Mr. POULIOT: This bill provides that the governor in council may enter into agreements with corporations, partnerships or individuals engaged in industry respecting the expansion of industrial employment. The minister should be very careful in dealing with companies or individuals as mentioned in the bill. There is something quite interesting which I should like to bring to his attention; I refer to what was said by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) when he was a witness before the committee on banking and commerce in 1934. According to an answer given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on June 4, the leader of the opposition was not sworn as a witness. He said, at page 194 of the report:

> ... and thereupon Mr. Beatty presented me a memorandum which was marked "confidential," the substance of which was communicated to me verbally and which, in fact, if my memory serves me, I read to my colleagues.

[Mr. Barber.]

Evidently the memorandum was confidential, because this question was put:

> In the office of the Prime Minister or in any other department, is there a copy of the memorandum presented by Sir E. W. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister, about the dominion guarantee of the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and referred to by the latter in his evidence before the select standing committee of banking and commerce during the year 1934, at page 194 of the report.

The answer of the department, 171G, was threefold: No, nil, no information. It is not surprising that it is impossible to get a copy of the memorandum. Now we have the letter of May 31, 1933.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I submit that I am in order because I am discussing action taken by the then Prime Minister under relief measures, and this is a continuation of those relief measures. I submit, therefore, that I am perfectly in order in discussing the whole matter.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman has been in order so far.

Mr. BENNETT: It has nothing to do with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out, with all due respect to the leader of the opposition, that the bill provides that the governor in council may enter into agreements with corporations, partnerships or individuals engaged in industry respecting the expansion of industrial employment.

Mr. STEWART: So far as future agreements are concerned.

Mr. POULIOT: I just want to warn the minister so that history may not repeat itself. The Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) said on June 9 that it was impossible to find the carbon copy of the letter of guarantee of May 31, 1933, which was signed by the then Prime Minister on behalf of the Dominion of Canada. In return No. 171E from the Department of Finance this information is given:

> Nothing on record in the Department of Finance within the scope of the above mentioned order.

The Department of Railways and Canals is not concerned. So far as the Prime Minister's office is concerned, there is no information on the files of the office relating to this matter. So far as the privy council is concerned, there is no information. It was a letter which we may call of the vanishing kind. On May 31, 1933, the then Prime Minister was not Minister of Finance; the Minister of Finance was Hon. E. N. Rhodes, and the Minister of Railways and Canals was Hon. R. J. Manion, according to Hansard of May 27, 1936, page 3130. On June 3 I asked the following question:

1. From May 31, 1933, inclusive, until February 13, 1934, was a copy of the letter of guarantee, dated May 31, 1933, signed by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister, and addressed to Sir Charles Gordon, president of the Bank of Montreal, about the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, forwarded (a) to the Department of Finance; (b) to the Department of Railways and Canals, and (c) to any other department of the government.
2. If so, by whom, to whom, and on what date or dates?

The answer from all departments is also threefold: No, nil, no information. The question was also asked whether the then Prime Minister had asked for a ruling of the Department of Justice about the matter, and the answer from the Minister of Justice was that there was no record of the Department of Justice being asked to furnish such a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must inform the hon. member that he has been out of order for the last two or three minutes, because he is trying to connect with this last paragraph in the section something which in my judgment is not relevant. I would ask him to keep within the rules.

Mr. POULIOT: This bill is an act to amend The Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, and you will find that it is an embodiment of all previous acts on relief. This guarantee was given in virtue of the relief act and therefore it forms part of the whole subject, so that I am perfectly in order in discussing what was done under the previous acts, in view of the fact that the main legislation which we are now amending is a continuation of the legislation in virtue of which that guarantee was given. I hope that explanation is satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN: No; it is not quite satisfactory. All I ask my hon. friend to do is to confine his remarks to the bill now before the committee and not to introduce anything that is irrelevant.

Mr. POULIOT: According to this legislation the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) will be bound to give a certain guarantee. I ask him one thing on behalf of the country; it is, not to practise any illegal operation on the east block for the removal of the viscera of the office of the Prime Minister into another building. It is not possible, according to the numerous returns which have been tabled at the very table before which the minister sits, to get any information about the matter. I will not insist on it any more at this time, but I have a lot to say, and I will say it elsewhere.

I have one thing to say in conclusion. It is, that all that has been done has not been done in vain, because that loan was mentioned in this committee on April 27 of this year, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which prior to that time had paid only $12,000,000 on the capital of the loan, decided to pay, three days after that speech, on May 1, the total amount, both capital and interest, which was due. If what has been said did not serve any other purpose, it served at least to force the refunding of that loan. I hope that one document which is a state paper just as much as any paper can be, the guarantee of $60,000,000 on behalf of the dominion government, will, either as an exact copy or a carbon copy, remain on file. Why do we not have it now? It is because the then Prime Minister did not mind his own business, and was acting on behalf of all his ministers. In fact the few letters that were signed by the then Minister of Finance are still there, but they were signed after the order in council was passed, late in the fall. Therefore, sir, to be practical, I am sure that every minister will make a distinction between confidential and state papers. I had so much trouble, during the five years when the late government was in power, in getting some correspondence. I was told always that it was confidential. Here we have state papers which are therefore official and public, and they have vanished; it is impossible to get any trace of them. In England the thing would be decided by a court. In Canada we are more lenient. I cannot understand how such papers could have disappeared. It is impossible to find a trace of this document to which I refer, and the only copy which is on record in the Prime Minister's office is not a carbon copy of that famous and unforgettable letter; it is a copy of a return which has been tabled in this house.

Sir, the soil has been scratched. I attribute motives to no one, but I find it shameful to think that state papers which belong to this country have vanished. I cannot explain that, but the returns say so; the returns are official, and they will not disappear, because they will be locked in a room set apart for that purpose in the House of Commons. But the other papers belong just as much to the country. That is why I protest so strongly against their disappearance.

The CHAIRMAN: Is section 1 carried?

Mr. BENNETT: No, Mr. Chairman. In view of the observations that have been made by the hon. member (Mr. Pouliot) who has just taken his seat, I think it is very desirable to refer briefly to the matters to which he has alluded. It will be within the memory of this committee that the House of Commons standing committee heard witnesses with respect to this guarantee of $60,000,000 by the government of Canada. Departing from the general rule, I attended that committee, and I offered to be sworn, telling Colonel Ralston that if he desired to swear me I would be sworn. I gave my evidence, as did all witnesses before that committee, without being sworn, and on that occasion there were produced all the documents which had to do with this transaction. The letter to which reference has been made would naturally be in the hands of the addressee; that is where one would expect to find it. A copy of it was printed in the report which I have in my hands. Together with all the communications that passed, it will be found in the report of the banking and commerce committee. The Canadian Pacific Railway company paid $12,000,000 of the obligations, and this year retired the balance of it, $36,000,000, and the arrangement, that is the underwriting, was made, obviously, long before the matter was mentioned in this house. The guarantee was for a period of five years. I believe three of the years had expired when the payments were made in full. It was explained before the committee, not only by myself but by the president of the company, that the reason the order in council was not passed until the fall was because the president went to England hoping that he would be able to secure consent from the British authorities to sell his debenture stock upon the markets there. That permission was not forthcoming. On my return the order in council was prepared, and it has been frequently presented, in answer to a return of this house, and in the report of the committee on banking and commerce. I may add that the various letters which passed between Mr. Dodds and Sir George Perley are set out in this report of the committee on banking and commerce, from March 6, 1934 to June 14, 1934. In view of what has been said, since the member has made charges of illegality and wrongdoing and matters of that kind, I desire, in fairness to my colleagues as well as myself, to make a few observations, which I shall do at a later time, when we have again convened.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, the original letters from Mr. Dodds, Mr. Bog and Sir Charles Gordon are not there. Everything has vanished.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, June 16, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current) moved that the fourth and final report of the special committee on the elections and franchise acts, presented on June 11, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

GOLDFIELDS, SASKATCHEWAN

UNEMPLOYMENT RESULTING FROM INFLUX INTO MINING AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (Battleford North): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) in connection with Canada's youngest mining centre, Goldfields, on the eastern shore of Athabasca lake, which is in the North Battleford federal riding. The information received is to the effect that there is an influx of men into this young mining area, and the unemployment situation is serious. The report I have goes on to say that new arrivals are coming in daily, by boat and aeroplane, and already many are dependent on the charity of residents of the town and are eating and sleeping wherever they can. May I ask the Minister of Labour whether the government have been made aware of the unemployment situation there, either, indirectly through the medium of the province of Saskatchewan, or directly from the mining area of Goldfields; and if so, what action if any is contemplated.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Until I received this afternoon an intimation that this question was to be asked I had not been made aware of the situation referred to by my hon. friend. I am not certain what measures could be taken to arrest the movement into Goldfields, if the prospects are as attractive as suggested by my hon. friend, but I assure him that I shall look into the matter and take whatever measures may be possible.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO SECURING OF AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) whether the government propose to take any steps in the near future to secure amendments to the British North America Act, or some method by which the the British North America Act may be amended?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am afraid this matter will have to stand until another session.

COPYRIGHT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa East): I should like to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) whether the convention on copyright scheduled to meet in Brussels this fall will meet, and if not, when it will meet and where.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I am glad the hon. gentleman has put that question, because it gives me an opportunity to make a public statement on the matter for the information of the house and the country. We have received an official notice that the proposed international copyright conference, which was to be held on September 7 in Brussels, will not take place this year. The communication states that it will take place another year, but does not give further particulars.

BANK OF CANADA

MAJORITY CONTROL BY GOVERNMENT OF CAPITAL STOCK AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 82, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, this is such an important piece of legislation, perhaps one of the most important that has come before any parliament, that on this, the third reading, those of us who did not speak on it previously should I think take advantage of this last opportunity to express our views. I say it is important because, as has already been pointed out, it was an issue in the last election, and the people have looked to this piece of legislation, the new set-up of this bank, the change that was promised with some hope of relief from present economic conditions. During the election Liberal speakers throughout the ridings of this country told the people that if the Liberal party was returned to power the Bank of Canada would be nationalized, taken over by the government and operated in the interests of the people. I think one member, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), went so far as to say in a speech in Vancouver, that, in addition, the Liberal party if returned to power would proceed to issue new money, and he mentioned an amount something like $50,000,000. The provinces, the municipalities and the cities naturally looked upon this proposed change as affording relief from the financial conditions from which they were suffering. They expected that money would circulate more freely. I think that impression was general throughout the country, and that is the reason, Mr. Speaker, I consider this one of the most important pieces of legislation that has come before the house. My reply to these gentlemen who advocated government ownership was this: that to do so was very simple, that the Bank of Canada was set up following the recommendations of a royal commission, and that if any government found that it did not work in the best interests of the people, the set-up of the bank could easily be changed. If that change was to be nationalization of the bank by the government taking it over, that could be accomplished very simply by taking over the stock of the private shareholders.

I think we all agree that what we need is not new money in this country but a greater velocity in the circulation of money. But so far the policy of this government, which has been in office now for six months, has been to adopt measures which tend to block rather than to stimulate the circulation of money. For instance, the Minister of Finance the other day announced that a large loan had been floated, and we all know that a very fine return was offered to investors to come forward and invest in that loan, an interest rate of 3½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BARBER: I believe it was close to that; at all events it was a greater return than could be received from investments in industry to-day. That was one action that was taken by the government that tended to slow up industry. Then we have the eight per cent sales tax, the highest sales tax known in any country, and all you have to do to learn its effects, is to inquire in business circles, where you will find that it has tended to slow up the circulation of the dollar.

I wish to refer now to one particular section of the bill, section 15. I approach this with a full knowledge that it is a subject upon which harsh words have been spoken and one which has caused bitter feeling in different parts of this country, but I believe this is the place to discuss it, not in the little red schoolhouse or on the back lines. I shall say what I have to say with the greatest moderation because I do not think anyone can accuse me of being intolerant in such matters.

I have the greatest respect and the greatest regard for our friends the French speaking Canadians of this country. I do not think anyone has a greater respect for them. I have made many friends amongst them since being here, and I hope they will take the remarks I make to-day in the spirit in which they are made, with the greatest of moderation. I was pleased to hear an hon. member from a town in the province of Quebec tell us the other evening how splendidly the French speaking and English speaking people of his town get along together; how for a long time they elected alternately a French speaking and then an English speaking mayor. That is a wonderful spirit; it is the spirit we must have between the two great races in Canada if we are to make this country what it should be. But I could not figure out just what that had to do with the question of bilingual currency in the year 1936. I say to the members of this house, and I say it in all earnestness, knowing this country pretty well, that I see great danger in this particular section at this time, a time when our people are suffering perhaps as they have never suffered before from economic conditions. I believe that this section is the sowing of seed that is bound to grow into an issue in this country which will be perhaps more serious than anything that has happened since confederation, something that will not be in the interests of harmony between the two great races and that will not be in the best interests of the minority in this country.

Just look at the picture, for instance, of western Canada. In the province from which I come, British Columbia, the French speaking population is less than three per cent; in Alberta the French speaking population is less than six per cent; in Saskatchewan it is less than six per cent, and in Manitoba it is less than seven per cent. I think I will put this table of figures on Hansard. It is based on the 1931 census and comes from the bureau of statistics:

Province	Total population	French population	Per cent
Manitoba	700,139	47,039	6.7
Saskatchewan	921,785	50,700	5.5
Alberta	731,605	38,377	5.2
British Columbia	694,263	15,028	2.1

Total population of the four western provinces, 3,047,792; French-speaking population of the four western provinces, 151,144; French-speaking population of the four western provinces 4.9 per cent of the total.

That shows quite a different picture from the one given the other evening by an hon. member from one of the ridings in the province of Quebec, and I think it is something that should be taken into consideration very seriously by this house.

I want to make this one statement. I do not believe that in this whole world there is a more tolerant people than the English speaking people of Canada. They have tolerated, in the past—I am going to put it that way—bilingual postage stamps, issued without any authority of parliament. They have tolerated the forms that were referred to by the Minister of Finance the other night, issued without the authority of parliament. As some hon. gentlemen know, they have in many sections protested strenuously against French announcements over the radio, with the result that they have been moderated. No English speaking member has stood on his feet in this house and said that as this is not according to the constitution, it should be removed. No; it was tolerated. Now with the authority of parliament we are going to provide that this is a bilingual country, that we are to have bilingual currency in circulation throughout the country. I warn the government and hon. members of this house that that will not create the harmony and cooperation that we want to see between the two great races in Canada. I hope and trust it will never become a political issue, although it may be forced as an issue by the people.

I should like to quote from Hansard of 1905 in order to give a clear picture of how the Liberal party stood on this question. I refer to page 6026 of Hansard of May 21, 1905. The following questions were asked of Mr. Fielding, then Minister of Finance

1. Do any grave reasons of state exist that might prevent the Minister of Finance from having the dominion one dollar and two dollar notes or all other bank notes printed simultaneously in English and French?
2. Are they unaware in the finance department that the two languages are official in Canada?
3. Is it the intention of the Minister of Finance to rectify in the future this state of things by ordering that those bank notes be printed in both languages, English and French?

Mr. Fielding answered as follows:

There is nothing in the British North America Act or in any act of the parliament of Canada, which requires or contemplates the printing of dominion notes in two languages. The finance department has not contemplated the advisability of any departure from the practice which has existed under all governments from the beginning of confederation down to the present time.

That was the official statement of the Liberal party in 1905. When the present act was framed consideration was given by parliament to our French speaking Canadians for the first time in the history of this country. This act provides that notes of the Bank of Canada be printed in the French language as well as English. A large number of French speaking people live in the constituency which I have had the honour to represent for a number of years and I have never heard any objection on their part to receiving money printed in their own language. I do not think there has been any protest from the great masses of French speaking Canadians against money being printed in the French language. The provision in the present act has been working only about a year and it has not been given a chance.

The main argument of the minister is that it cost about $29,000 to print these bills in the French language. I have not heard any protest from any English speaking member of this house against the cost. Further, there has never been a protest from any English speaking member or from anyone else in Canada that I have heard of against the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars spent in printing the proceedings of this house and the publications of the different departments in the French language. That was provided for and there has been no complaint. There has been no objection to that from the English speaking people. Is this action going to return to us the $29,000? No, it means that we are going to spend at least another $29,000 to print the new money. I think even some hon. members to my left will agree that that money could be spent to greater advantage these days.

The people of the two great races are not demanding a new dollar; they are demanding that they be given the opportunity to earn a dollar. They are not particular whether that dollar is new; they are prepared to accept the dollars that have been provided. What they want is an opportunity to earn a dollar. The great army of the unemployed want work in order that they may earn a dollar. Merchants, business men, farmers and citizens generally throughout this country are in dire need of purchasing power through the circulation of more dollars. I say to hon. members of this house: Instead of bringing up an issue like this at the present time, the spending of money which the Minister of Finance has complained about, let us, as the representatives of the people of Canada unite in an effort to try to improve conditions by assisting Canadians from one end of this great country to the other. I say to the house that the bringing up of an issue of this kind and the forcing of bilingual currency upon the great majority of English speaking people is not in the best interests of Canada as a whole.

I want to make one last appeal to the individual members of the house because it is the individual members who should decide these matters. I hope it will never become a party question, but this is a question that is put up to every individual member. It is not a question of the rights of the minority or the rights of the majority; it is a matter which should be considered in the light of present day conditions. It has been stated that the printing of the French bills cost $29,000, therefore it stands to reason that we shall have to spend at least $29,000 more. Is that wise? That money might better be spent in some other way. There has been no protest from the great masses of French speaking Canadians against the issue of bills printed in French. This has come from a group or organization of which we have heard during the last five years. A determined effort has been made, irrespective of the wishes of Canadians as a whole, to force bilingualism on this country. The thin end of the wedge has been driven in. As I have stated already, we have the bilingual postage stamp, which has been tolerated, but I fear the great masses of English speaking people will not tolerate this. When people are in distress throughout the country we should direct our efforts to the improving of general conditions. I do not consider it too late to remedy this condition, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley):

That the said bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it by deleting therefrom section 15 thereof.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This matter was debated so fully on the second reading of the bill and the Liberal point of view was so ably presented by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that I hesitate to attempt to add anything to what has already been said. But the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Barber) have been such as, it seems to me, to require some further word in reply.

May I say at once that I take very strong exception to the view that because there is an English speaking majority in this country, that English majority lacks a sense of fair play towards the French minority, and that the English speaking majority—

Mr. BARBER: I said they always had.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My honourable friend may say they have always had, but he assumes that because there is an English speaking majority in this country the greater part of that majority wishes to have the bank notes of the country printed in English only and not in French.

Mr. BARBER: I said they should receive consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say to my hon. friend that there is as much justification for saying that the English speaking majority in Canada wish to have all the bank notes in this country printed in English only as there is for saying that the French minority wish to have all the bank notes printed in French only.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is just as much justification for the one view as for the other. My own view as a citizen of Canada is that there is no more chivalrous element of the population than the French Canadian, and as one of British descent I hesitate for my part to be less chivalrous towards that section of the population simply because it happens to be in the minority and I am one of the majority. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), speaking the other day, said that the majority of the people of this country wished to have money printed in the one language only.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I think he did. At any rate my right hon. friend said that the will of the majority was to have bank notes—

Mr. BENNETT: He did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not finished the sentence yet.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say that at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says he did not say what I am about to say before I have completed the statement.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman made enough of the statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend said that the will of the majority of the people of this country was not to have bilingual bank notes.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He did say that the will of the majority was—

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —to have Bank of Canada notes printed in English to a certain extent and to a certain extent in French, and—

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say that; Hansard will speak for itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At any rate the impression I received and, I believe, the impression that every member of the house, and the country received—

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —was that my right hon. friend meant that the will of the majority in Canada was the will of the English speaking portion of the population,—

Mr. BENNETT: He did say quite the opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and that the will of the English speaking majority was that there should not be bilingual notes.

Mr. BENNETT: I said no such thing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend made his denial both before and after I spoke; I think that ought to be sufficient.

Mr. BENNETT: If I am to be quoted, the language of Hansard governs with respect to what I said. If the Prime Minister will be good enough to refer to what I said there will be no difficulty, but to have him place his interpretation on my words, that I cannot tolerate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That assumed appeal to Hansard, as my right hon. friend knows, is a device in debate. He knows I do not happen to have before me at the moment the actual page of the debate. However, possibly some hon. member may be able to locate the reference before the debate is over. I do repeat that any assertion that the will of the majority of the people in this country is to be interpreted by my right hon. friend and those who sit behind him rather than by those who sit on this side of the house requires no refutation.

Mr. BENNETT: I distinctly said that I spoke for myself and not for those associated with me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In speaking for himself, my right hon. friend referred to the will of the majority.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He used those words.

Mr. BENNETT: He was speaking about something else entirely, and he did not say that he was speaking for the majority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall find his words before the discussion is over. At any rate, the point I wish to make is this. If this matter is to be decided by the will of the majority, then the government of the day has the right to express that will and is so expressing it in the legislation before the house. More than that, I will say that the will of the English speaking majority as expressed in this House of Commons, constituted as it is to-day, fresh from the people of Canada, will support bilingual notes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me tell my hon. friends that we will settle the matter by having a division on this motion, and we shall see whether the English speaking majority in this house favour bilingual notes or not. I think I may leave the matter at that.

An hon. MEMBER: Go to the people and see what they will do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the leader of the opposition, in speaking the other day, was right in laying a certain stress on freedom of choice. He mentioned two circumstances which should govern in the matter of a decision. One was that there should be freedom of choice with respect to the question whether a citizen wished to accept a document or bill in English or in French, and he said that the course which should be adopted was the one which would further, to the greatest extent, harmony and good will among the different elements in the country. He referred to the documents on the table of the House of Commons and said, "They are here, some in French and some in English. Hon. members may come and take whichever they please." Certainly they have real freedom of choice in that regard and can take which they please. But what freedom of choice has a citizen who is being paid a debt or wishes to settle an account or is receiving payment of an account—what freedom of choice has he as regards the acceptance of money that may be offered him if it happens to be in French or English as the case may be and he prefers the other denomination? The only freedom of choice is to see, whether he be English speaking or French speaking, that he be given a bill which is acceptable to him because of its clearness in reference to the denomination and other essential details. If the intention were to obliterate from the face of a bill the descriptive wording where in English or, on the other hand, to obliterate the descriptive wording where in French, there might be objection to a course of that kind. But where those of the English speaking part of the population are given the opportunity to obtain a bill with all essential details printed entirely in English, I cannot see what possible objection there can be to permitting on that same bill similar information in French for those who happen to be of French origin.

As to harmony and good will, surely an attitude of the kind which recognizes natural desires and needs is likely to promote a better feeling than an attitude of intolerance which will not permit anything of the sort. And here may I take very strong exception to what the hon. member for Fraser Valley has said with respect to toleration and his interpretation of it. My hon. friend said that the English speaking population of Canada had "tolerated" the issue of bilingual postage stamps and the use of postal notes in both languages. Why did he not go on and say that the English speaking members of the House of Commons "tolerate" their French speaking colleagues in this house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the same thing.

An hon. MEMBER: You are trying to make it up.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, work it up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends should see where their argument leads.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Every member of parliament of French descent has the same rights in this House of Commons as a member of parliament of English descent.

An hon. MEMBER: Whoever said he had not?

An hon. MEMBER: Who has disputed that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say he has. If he has, then he has the same rights with respect to everything over which this parliament has control in the matter of legislation. It is not a question of tolerating the presence of French Canadian members in the parliament of a country which has an English speaking majority, nor of tolerating bilingual stamps in a country which has an English speaking majority, nor of tolerating bilingual postal notes in a country which has an English speaking majority; it is a matter of fair play and justice by all who believe in justice and fair play. I believe the attitude of the people of Canada is one of tolerance, and not one of intolerance and bigotry, which is the attitude being exemplified by members on the other side.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The house has heard what the leader of the opposition has said as to the wrongful interpretation put upon his words. May I quote the following from a speech made by him in this house on June 11. It is to be found at page 3624 of Hansard:

> I point out, however, to my fellow countrymen who are of French origin and speak the French language that those who will take the evidence of history for what it may be worth —and it is fairly important—will find that wherever the granting of a privilege or a concession by a majority has by the minority been crystallized into a right, resulting in a pushing of the demand beyond those moderate and reasonable boundaries that have marked the maintenance of harmonious relations between majorities and minorities, the consequence has been harmful to the minority.

That is the first paragraph I desire to quote. I do so for the reason that it speaks about the granting of a privilege or a concession by a majority to a minority. I wish to say that any right which the French speaking portion of our country enjoy with respect to bilingual postal notes or to bilingual postage or anything else of the kind has not been in the nature of a concession or of a privilege conferred by parliament. It has been in the nature of a recognition of the full rights of Canadian citizenship.

My right hon. friend goes on to say:

> Why not let the demand for a change come about by that gradual process which would ensure that those who are most affected, namely, the majority, who are of British descent and speak the English language, will feel, as they do not now feel, the desire to do something further in a spirit of amity and good will?

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend by what right he claims to assert what is the will of the majority of the people of this country? I say my right hon. friend is mistaken in believing that he at any time represented in this matter the will of the majority—the English speaking majority—of the people of this country.

Going a step further, my right hon. friend says:

> Now, to say that the will of the minority shall prevail over the will of the majority of the people of Canada is to create as dangerous a condition as it is possible to create.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is that not exactly what I said when my right hon. friend interrupted me—?

Mr. BENNETT: As far from it as possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —both before and after my endeavour not to quote but to give the substance of his remarks and of his argument?

Mr. BENNETT: Entirely different.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me repeat:

> To say that the will of the minority shall prevail over the will of the majority of the people of Canada is to create as dangerous a condition as it is possible to create.

As to what is the will of the majority—the English speaking majority—I venture to say to the house that if every member of parliament who is of French descent should refrain from voting on this particular question, and the vote should be left entirely to those of British descent, the majority of those of British descent would favour the printing of bilingual notes rather than the adoption of the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite wish to have adopted. The vote when it is taken will show whether what I am now saying is true or not.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by affirming that in this matter the government is following the true tradition, so far as government in Canada is concerned, of fair play and the furtherance of good will and harmony among all races in this country, and in addition is furthering the Liberal tradition of due regard for the rights of minorities and tolerance in all matters pertaining to the state.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): In speaking to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber), which I second, I trust that I shall be considered moderate in my arguments; and I shall appeal to the house, not from the standpoint of partyism or of race or creed, but in a broadminded way, as any true Canadian citizen should.

When in 1935 the Bank of Canada came into being, certain definite functions were assigned to it. It is not necessary for me to review these at the present time; the matter was well debated on the resolution and when the bill was in committee. Suffice it to say that I think the act as constituted should have had a fair and reasonable trial, to ascertain whether the bank could perform the functions that were delegated to it. One of its powers was that of issuing separate notes, that is, notes in English and notes in French. I believe that last Friday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and to-day the hon. member for Fraser Valley, have made appeals for this system of issuing the currency as constituted under the act, and that it should have a fair chance to be tried out, to see what value it has, as it was no doubt a gesture of good will to the French speaking people. I think that suggestion was worthy of consideration. All hon. members who sat in the last parliament well remember the debate that took place when the bill was introduced last session. We recall the definite statement that was made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), then the leader of the opposition. We also all remember the discussions that took place during the campaign in September and October last, when the Liberal party, and in particular its leader, made definite promises to the people of Canada that if they were returned to power they would make certain changes in the act. These are the amendments that they now propose. Hon. members on the government side must surely have expected criticism of those amendments from this side, and especially from the extreme left hand corner. Some of them also may well have expected criticism from among their own members; and recently they have listened to very stinging criticism and condemnation from one of their own supporters, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer). I do not think any better language could have been used than was employed by him to describe the betrayal by the government of the people of Canada. I state what is known to all members of this house, that during the last campaign bilingual notes was not an issue; the matter was never discussed, even last session when the bill was before the house. In my opinion the government, by this amendment, is betraying the people of Canada just as much as it did by not going the full limit in some other respects as stated by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

It was stated when the bill was in committee that nothing should be done to raise the racial question, and that statement has been made to-day also. I do not believe any member of this house really wants to say anything that will raise any racial question at this time; far from it, but I think the interpretation the people of Canada will place on the speech delivered by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) last week and the speech delivered to-day by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will be that those two addresses will go a long way towards raising that racial question. We are all proud of this great confederation. Each province has made its contribution; both the English speaking and the French speaking Canadians have done their share, and the special consideration that was shown the French speaking people in having bills printed in English and French certainly was a gesture of good will designed to further consolidate our confederation. In his speech the Minister of Justice quoted from an address delivered by the great Conservative Prime Minister, the late Sir John A. Macdonald, in 1890 with regard to the use of the two languages. If I cared to take time to read that quotation I think hon. members would see that it had no reference at all to bilingual currency or for that matter currency of any kind. My reply to the Minister of Justice would be to quote from a speech delivered by one who, I think the Liberals will agree, was the greatest Liberal prime minister Canada has ever had, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I refer to a speech made seventeen years after the address by Sir John A. Macdonald to which reference has been made. In replying to an appeal made by Mr. Lavergne, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, according to Hansard for February 25, 1907, at page 3655:

But to affirm, as he does—

That is, Mr. Lavergne.

—that the French language should be used upon every occasion, and that every public document should be printed on one side in French and the other side in English, is, I think, going a little too far. For instance, I understand that my hon. friend wants bank notes to be printed either in French or in English. For my part I never yet saw an occasion when a bank note printed in English was not properly understood by the French people; and I am quite sure that a bank note printed in French would be understood by the English people to be exactly what it means.

That is exactly the condition we have at present under this act.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Would my hon. friend continue the quotation?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I am sorry I have not the volume of Hansard here. I could also quote from a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman himself a little later.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Will my hon. friend allow me one minute to insert what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity after I have finished. I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that this statement by Sir Wilfrid Laurier opposed the printing of notes in English and notes in French, and surely my hon. friend should follow the advice of his leader of that time. I have before me several quotations from Hansard from the speeches of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and other great leaders, including Sir Edward Blake, Sir Robert Borden and others, indicating that there never was any need for a bilingual bank note. But my hon. friend the Minister of Justice made a speech on May 10, 1916, appearing in Hansard for that year at page 3681. At that time he was supporting his leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and he established the fact that the use of the French language in Canada was not official anywhere prior to 1841. So I would suggest to my hon. friend that he look up some of the speeches he delivered in support of his great chieftain, in which he established that Canada was not bilingual and that there was nothing in our constitution establishing that situation.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I wish my hon. friend would read some of those speeches.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I have referred to one. Then the Minister of Justice referred to the situation in Switzerland and other foreign countries in reference to their use of bilingual currency. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) made an appeal for fair play irrespective of race and creed, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) referred to the fact that postal money orders were printed in both the official languages. I should like to use one argument to reply briefly to those three statements. I should like to direct the attention of the house to the situation we have in Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) has already referred to the percentage of French speaking people in the western provinces, but I should like to speak more particularly with regard to the situation in Saskatchewan.

In our province we have a foreign-born population naturalized Canadian citizens, foreign born and the children of foreign born parents. Our total population is about 992,000, of whom approximately 600,000 are included in the class of foreign born and the children of foreign born parents. These figures are taken from the last census returns, and can be found also in the Canada Year Book. I would remind the house also that in the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta we have large numbers of people of this class, which would bring the total in the three prairie provinces to the neighbourhood of one million people, or about one-tenth the total population of this dominion. These people are fine types of Canadian citizens, and right here I should like to pay my respects to them. I should say ninety-nine per cent of them are endeavouring to be fine, loyal Canadians. In my constituency there are some twelve languages spoken; there are towns in Qu'Appelle where the majority of the people are foreign born or in the class to which I am referring. I could take you to one town where most of the people are of German descent. There I could gather five hundred people of this class who can sing O Canada or God Save the King as well as any similar number that could be gathered in any part of Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: Why not?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Of course; that is just what we expect.

Mr. DUNNING: They were all born here.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Nearly half of them were foreign born.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They are permitted to sing the national anthem.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): These people naturally cannot understand the special considerations or gestures, call them what you will, that we are extending to the French speaking people from time to time, when our constitution does not provide for Canada to be a bilingual country. It was with difficulty last year that we explained the special privilege or gesture of good will that we extended by having the notes printed in English and French. There is no doubt that if this amendment passes we may before many years have a protest from this class of people, and a demand that they have some consideration for their native tongue. The debate that took place in the last parliament on the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) will be within the memory of many hon. members. Also we can well remember the debates that took place in 1935. Hon. members who were members of the banking and commerce committee that considered the bill in 1935 will remember the discussion that took place in that committee. It was purely as a gesture of good will that it was provided that the bank notes should be available in one or other of the two languages where required. This surely places French and English on an equality, as the Minister of Justice appealed for. There never has been a question in respect to equality. I am sure no hon. member can point to any debate that ever took place in this house and I cannot think of any since I have been in it that raised the question of equality. We have always been proud of the contribution made by the French speaking people to confederation. The wording of this bill however will do much to raise the racial question, of which we are all fearful. It presents more evidence of the possibility of raising the racial question than any other measure that has ever passed in this house.

In conclusion I plead with the Minister of Finance to endeavour to persuade the government not to press this amendment providing for bilingual notes. I hope I have dealt with the question in a spirit of fair play and in the manner of a true Canadian citizen. Certainly I am not one who wants to raise any racial question in Canada at the present time. I therefore second the amendment moved by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, that the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of striking out section 15.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I do not intend to give a silent vote on the third reading of this bill. When the order was called I had intended to oppose the Bank of Canada bill on general grounds, and if after this amendment is voted down anyone moves a six months' hoist of the whole bill I shall vote for that.

I was very much surprised to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the name of the Liberal party make the speech he did after the address he made in this house on the same legislation on June 22, 1934. In connection with the rights of minorities and majorities in this country we have reached this state of affairs, that a militant minority can coerce the majority. That is what we have come to under confederation to-day. The Prime Minister said in the House Commons a week ago last Thursday in connection with another bill:

> The principle I am laying down is that there is no minority which is superior to the majority, and that majority is the people of the country as a whole; and the people of the country as a whole have sent this present House of Commons to legislate.

Well, may I say in answer to the right hon. gentleman that this House of Commons was not sent by the people of this country to vote for this Bank of Canada bill, or for section 15 of it. The government had no mandate from Ontario for this bill. We are now in the sixty-ninth year of confederation. During that time successive governments, Liberal and Conservative, have presided over the affairs of Canada; various parliaments have been elected; there have been various prime ministers and ministers of finance, yet we in all that long time had to wait until 1936 for the first minister of finance to rise in this house and say that the bank bills of the dominion, namely dominion notes of one and two dollars, are to be printed in English and French and that French is to be placed on an equality with English throughout the dominion—something that the fathers of confederation never intended; a thing against the spirit and letter of confederation; something on which the people of this country have never had a chance to express an opinion.

As I have said, the history of the world is the history of minorities. The history of this country is the history of compromises. Confederation was a compromise. One compromise was regarding bilingualism, the use of French and English. These rights are set out in section 133 of the British North America Act, as follows:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.
> The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

That was a compromise and was to be a finality without any extensions. It was intended at that time that there should be no extension of the rights and privileges granted under section 133. Whether or not the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) or the Prime Minister thinks this is a political question, there is no doubt it is a political question, and whether they like it or not it is going to be a political question until it is settled right. No question is settled in this country until it is settled according to justice and according to the terms of confederation, and this thing is going to be open until it is settled, and the door is not closed yet by any means.

It is not my purpose to speak at length at this time, but I wish to register my protest. I do not speak for the Conservative party; I speak as a private member of parliament sent here to do his duty. Representing the constituency I do, I deem it my duty to oppose the third reading of this bill. I should not be doing my duty if I failed to oppose this two-faced Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde bill. This bill is not public ownership at all, it is something in the election which the Prime Minister and other members of the Liberal party promised the country if elected. There can be no control without ownership. The pledge given by the government for a publicly owned bank has not been fulfilled. It is a political bill much more than a banking or economic bill. It is called a bill to amend the Bank of Canada Act, but it might better be called a Barnum and Bailey bill; it is neither public ownership nor public control, for there is no control without total ownership. It does not amend the Bank of Canada act, but it makes a scrap of paper out of the Bank of Canada Act of 1934, and violates the principle of section 133 of the British North America Act, which I quoted.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier never would have sanctioned this bill. He always acted on this question with great prudence and diplomacy, but where is there evidence of prudence or diplomacy here? Was it ever discussed in the election campaign? No, not one word. My friends cannot show any such discussion from February 25, 1907, when the former member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) proposed a motion in this house for equality of treatment of the two languages, on which occasion Sir Wilfrid Laurier did express certain opinions. Sir Wilfrid Laurier stood here as Prime Minister. Mr. Fielding took the same stand for many years. Neither would ever propose such a bill as this or support it, or ever bring it up on the decennial revision of the Bank Act.

This bill offers no help in solving the social and economic problems of this country. There is no proposal in it to have a limited amount of controlled inflation up to fifty or a hundred million dollars to take care of the unemployed, to take care of a reconstruction, housing and slum clearance program, and dear knows it was badly needed this spring in the large cities so as to get people off the dole and back to work. There is nothing in this bill about that. It will make no improvement over the past in our economic conditions. A partly privately owned and partly publicly owned institution will get Canada nowhere if there is no control.

Regarding the inspection clause, we had a case the other day of a government official taking the interest on deposits and putting it in his pockets in spite of all the inspection.

This bank is a political bank; that is all it is and all it will become in time; nothing but a glorified Home bank. Wait till you see what happens. Wait till you see it next year. If it does not end up by being that, it will be no fault of the framers of the bill. The bill is a victory, no doubt, for the bankers' association and for St. James street and for the chartered banks. I can see the fine hand of these great interests in this bill, whether others can see it or not. I have studied this question and I can see it. These people have at last been successful in their efforts to cripple any effective central bank and to undo the good work already done.

Section 15 enables the letter and spirit of confederation to be made a scrap of paper; that is all it is. If the government want to give the minority these rights under confederation, let them do it in the proper legal way. Let them come in at the front door, not at the side door. Let them open and amend section 133 of the British North America Act, regarding the use of the French language instead of sliding this thing through in a minor bank act. Let them come in by the front door of the House of Commons and bring in a bill to amend the British North America Act, section 133, to extend the rights and privileges and prerogatives of the French language in this country.

The Minister of Justice says that the bilingual notes are necessary because they will be deposited in the courts of Quebec, and that these bank notes are legal tender. But, Mr. Speaker, the practice of the courts with reference to deposits is changing to marked cheques and certificates from trust companies; certified cheques are being used, and there are many other ways of depositing legal tender in the various official judicial offices of this country. For the Minister of Justice to use that as a leading argument, therefore, is only begging the question.

Section 15 is a victory for a militant minority, coercing a passive majority that is too proud to fight, too proud to stand up for its rights either in this house or out of it. We have a press, pulpit and legislature that is too proud to fight along the line of defending the rights and prerogatives of majorities. The recent investigation at Washington showed how the banks and big interests have been coercing the press of that country. Why do you see so little in the press, in the English speaking papers of this country, about section 15? Twenty-five years ago what a rebellion there would have been if a minority was going to saddle a majority along the lines that this bill does? The evidence at Washington that was given in the press showed how the banks and big interests and departmental stores in the United States had trammelled a free press, and had warned them that they would cut out their advertisements. We heard something about that even in Canada happening in the first days of this parliament. But for an able press, things would have been ten times worse than they are in this country, and I am here to endeavour to support and protect a free press from such attacks. It is all right to drive a coach and four through the British North America Act, as section 15 of this bill does, to please some people, but we cannot get a section of the British North America Act amended for the purpose of getting progress in this country, and getting the working class out of the strait-jacket which the British North America Act has put around them, and which the courts help to keep them in at times.

It is said that those who oppose section 15 are bringing this thing into politics. Did you ever hear anything like that in your life? Of course it is bound to be in politics and to stay in politics until it is repealed, and those who brought it into politics are hon. gentlemen opposite. They are the first ones in sixty-nine years who have proposed that these dominion notes—for that is all they are, these ones and twos and so forth under the old legislation—shall be printed in the two languages.

There was a provision made by section 24, subsection 4, of chapter 43 of the statutes of 1934, the Bank of Canada Act:

> The form and material of the notes shall be subject to approval by the minister: Provided that notes in either the English or the French language shall be available as required.

That worked out all right in practice. I was not a member of the house in 1934 when the Bank of Canada Act was passed, but at the same time it worked out all right in practice, and those who wanted notes in English or in French could get them at the different branches, but if I had been in the house at the time as a member I would have opposed even this concession.

As to what the Minister of Justice says about the notes being legal tender in the law courts, I was making inquiries of a number of people connected with the law courts and I find that there are many other ways of making deposits than by depositing actual five-dollar bills in the courts. The trust companies and banks and law societies have made a change.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is unworthy of Liberalism. This is not a bilingual country. Sir Wilfrid Laurier admitted it was not, and there have been decisions of the courts to the same effect. It is a country in which by section 133 of the British North America Act two languages are official. I want to congratulate the right hon. leader of the opposition upon rising in his place and speaking in the face of great opposition as he did the other day, as a statesman. I believe the words he spoke will prove in the years to come to have been proven prophecy. What he said will come true, and application made will be, session after session, to repeal section 15.

In my opinion we should never have had any provincial legislatures at all. They were the creation of the fathers of confederation for political and not economic purposes, and have been at the root of all the race and religious jealousies in Canada. They do not have them in Great Britain; their powers are limited in the United States, and the result is that in these countries they are one people without the racial and religious jealousies which this country has had. The leader of the opposition has been consistent. I have read his speech of June 22, 1934. The leader of this government sat in parliament as Prime Minister for nine years, from 1921 to 1930, and did he ever propose a section like this? No. It is only when he has a majority behind him of about 170 that he is ready to go over the heads of the electors. Did he tell them anything about this in the election? If he had said it in the election he would not have had five seats in the province of Ontario, because majorities, while they are sleepy and slow to assert their rights and privileges, once they are aroused are going to have something to say. Canada is not and never was a bilingual country. It is a country where the two languages are official languages, but the law courts have set out the length and depth and breadth of the two languages as defined in section 133 of the British North America Act. It is all very well to say that those who oppose this bill are doing so for political purposes. I say it is no use for the representatives of the majority to sit here and enact the part of a scarecrow, and allow a false face to be put on them by this bill. A false face is being put upon the majority of the people of this country with an inscription in one language on one side of our bills and an inscription in another language on the other side. It will be just like a patent medicine advertisement which is printed in both languages, or a racing tip or other things of this sort. Those who vote for this bill vote for bilingualism for posterity, to-day and forever.

This particular legislation will be here forever. Those who vote for this bill are voting that this country is to be a bilingual country by order of a militant minority. The people of Ontario are opposed to this, and I am opposed to it. Hon. members should act like men. They should stand by their principles and acquit themselves like men and be strong, say to certain of those hon. members who come from Ontario that they would not be here to-day if in the last election they had proposed a bill like this. Some hon. gentlemen come from western Ontario, some from northern Ontario and others from central Ontario, and I ask them to acquit themselves like men, to be free citizens and free members of parliament, to assert their rights and privileges as private members instead of sitting in their seats and allowing a coach and four to be driven through the principles of confederation by a militant minority for the first time in sixty-nine years.

May I say to hon. gentlemen that I would rather be defeated because of my principles, as I was in 1930 than to sit in this house and force bilingualism on the people of the province of Ontario over their heads and without their knowledge or consent. That is my answer to hon. gentlemen who are opposing what I have to say. There is no such thing as compromise in connection with a great principle; this thing permits of no compromise. The question cannot be settled until it is settled in the right way.

I see the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) in his seat. On many occasions his utterances are filled with common sense, and I refer hon. members to his remarks about the British North America Act, made the other night in connection with another bill. At that time he said he would go to another place and use his influence, and I hope he will go to another place immediately and use a little extra influence in connection with this matter. This bill is a credit to Ottawa, the headquarters of pacifism and pussyfooting. Ottawa never knows what the rest of the country is thinking. The only things militant I can see about Ottawa are the mosquitoes which infest this building.

I do not care whether I am here for a long time or a short time; I am ready always to stand by my principles. As long as I am here I intend to speak what I believe to be the truth, honestly, fairly and moderately. I am opposed to this legislation. I have always been opposed to the extension of this principle in this country. While I wear the party uniform—I will never be able to wear its plush—I will do my duty in the ranks, but it will be as a volunteer and not as a conscript. In conclusion, I want to congratulate that very able statesman, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) for the manner in which he opposed this bill the other night and for the words of wisdom which he uttered on that occasion. I believe that in the future those words will prove to be a force in this country and become proven prophecy.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of presenting new arguments in favour of this bill, nor do I intend to reply to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). I take this opportunity of congratulating the electors of that constituency upon the name of their constituency, and I sincerely hope that that name will have a future effect upon my hon. friend. In justice to my late revered leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I should like to finish the quotation started by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). It is quite possible that the hon. member's eyes did not go further along in the book in which the speech of Sir Wilfrid is reported. I should like anyone who reads the speech of my hon. friend to insert the following words, which follow immediately after those which he quoted:

> But I see no reason why a bank note should not be printed in French. Since we have been in office we have not had occasion to issue a new form of bank notes, we have taken the old form as we found it, we have continued the form of the old bank notes. I do not see any reason why, if we were to issue a new form, we should issue it in one language rather than another. But I would say to my hon. friend that it is far better that we should be conservative in these matters and not to change our forms every now and then. We should keep the old form when it contributes towards security and public convenience, and when it is well understood. I do not think there has been any change in the form of the English bank note for over a hundred years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friends say, "hear, hear," but they seem to forget that new circumstances have arisen. We are going to issue a new form of bank note. A new sovereign is now upon the throne and a new form of bank note will be issued by the Bank of Canada and not by the private banks, as formerly, when some were issued in English and some in French and English. The hon. member for Broadview also quoted Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and I should like to give the amendment moved at that time by Sir Wilfrid, which amendment embodies the policy of the Liberal party in 1907 and in 1936. This amendment reads:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following be substituted in place thereof: "the French language is, in fact, as well as by the constitution, on a footing of equality with the English language."

I have said that I do not want to repeat the arguments I presented the other day, but there is one thing I forgot to mention. The bank notes of Canada go to other countries—to the United States, to France and to continental countries. Do you think that a bank note all in French, as it is at the present time, circulated in France or Belgium or elsewhere, gives to the people of those countries a true picture of Canada? They would believe that Canada was altogether a French country. On the other hand if the bank note were all in English they would believe that it came from an entirely English country.

I have only this to say in conclusion. We have the privilege of speaking the two greatest languages in the world. When you go to Geneva you find in the League of Nations these two official languages spoken, and the Canadian delegates are proud to be there representing the only country in the world where the two official languages of that body, representing all the nations on the globe, are spoken. We are proud of our country. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, when these bank notes circulate throughout the world they will represent what Canada is, a country that was founded by French pioneers and later ceded to the British, a country where the descendants of these two great races succeeded in burying their differences and their difficulties and in uniting for the purpose of building a truly great nation. The people of this country are not afraid to let the world know that these two languages are spoken in Canada, languages of which anyone might well be proud; they are not afraid to let it be known that this condition exists in this dominion. As far as I am concerned, I cannot believe that any member of parliament or anybody in Canada could feel humiliated or would resent the fact that there were some French words on a Bank of Canada note.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): After listening to the discussion this afternoon and to the very eloquent address made in this chamber the other evening by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) I cannot help rising in my place to say a few words on this very important question. I do believe, however, that on this occasion the issues have been exaggerated beyond their true proportions. As a Canadian I should like to see every citizen able to speak both official languages. It is one of my own regrets that I am not able to speak French, but I trust that the generation that will follow me will not suffer from that deficiency. Anyone who listened to the speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon and listened particularly to the eloquent address of the Minister of Justice the other evening must have been moved by the fervent plea made for racial unity in Canada. With that sentiment of the Minister of Justice and those associated with him, I wish to join one hundred per cent. This country is made up of a great many racial minorities, and in my opinion if we treat those minorities even in a generous spirit, Canada as a whole will be more than amply repaid for making that gesture towards those who may be of foreign origin in the dominion. I think it would be a gross mistake if the house were to accept the suggestion which the amendment puts forward and delete from the bill the clause it now contains. For my part I intend to vote against the amendment.

May I say a word in another direction. Perhaps it is not necessary for me to remind the house that I belong to a very ancient race, a race whose history has been through the centuries a most painful one and who even at the present time are suffering intense persecution in different parts of the world. Those who belong to the same race as myself appreciate more than they can express in words the measure of justice and tolerance they have received under British rule. In regard to the matter now before us I do wish to express a sentiment that is rather different. There is at this time, unfortunately, particularly in the province of Quebec, a sentiment that is being expressed openly, both by word and in the newspapers, that has not merely the semblance of intolerance but also the idea of inflaming one race against the other, and I do feel, in view of the discussion that has taken place on the floor of the house this afternoon, and the eloquent plea made by the Minister of Justice the other evening on behalf of his French speaking compatriots, that perhaps that wave of anti-Semitism which to-day seems to be showing itself in certain quarters of Quebec will diminish if not entirely subside. An effort should be made to carry out the very ideas and principles enunciated here this afternoon by the Prime Minister and so feelingly discussed the other evening by the Minister of Justice. I do not think a condition of this kind ought to be tolerated in Canada. I feel somehow that if the leaders of public thought, both in the province of Quebec and in the dominion at large, would raise their voices in and out of parliament, as the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister have done, there might be established in Canada a better and more harmonious feeling among the component parts of the population.

These are about the only remarks I wish to make at the present time. I simply wish to make a plea for racial unity in Canada, so that all sections of the population may go forward and try to make Canada a country worthy not only of the present but also of future generations.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I believe the French Canadian people of Canada have by the British North America Act the right to use the French language. That right was recognized when the notes were printed, some in French and some in English, and each race was then free to use its own language. If the bank note is in both English and French then it may with some appearance of justice be argued that French is being forced upon the English. This might not be found in the best interests of Canada, and therefore, while I have all sympathy with my French Canadian fellows, I personally propose to vote for the amendment.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I listened with very great interest the other day not only to the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) but also to those of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). In my judgment the remarks of the leader of the opposition were much more moderate than those of the Minister of Justice, who began his speech with this sentence:

> I shall try to make my few remarks in answer to the speech of my right hon. friend this afternoon as moderate as I can.

An hon. MEMBER: They were.

Mr. MacNICOL: I cannot see any reason why the Minister of Justice had so to qualify his remarks. In a discussion of this kind there is no other word that should be used than "moderation." All our remarks have been made in a spirit of moderation; such observations as I have to make will be, I hope, in the same spirit.

I have as high a regard for Canadians who speak another language than English as I have for those who speak English only. As a Canadian I am proud that people from all nations of the earth come to this country and make good. Some of the second generation are able to carry off prizes for excellence in English over those whose ancestry is altogether British. I remember attending a few years ago a meeting held in Massey Hall, Toronto, where there attended those who had won their laurels in various provinces of Canada for making good speeches. The winner of the contest in Massey Hall was a child whose parents were Russian and could speak very little English. I congratulate all those of other races who are able to speak both English and their own tongue. I myself read French fairly well, and I can make a brief speech in French, although I have never tried to do so in the House of Commons.

An hon. MEMBER: Go to it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I give our French Canadian members credit for being able to stand on the floor of the house and speak in both languages.

When the Minister of Justice was speaking the other day he used rather provocative language. I cannot understand how some of the words he used can be regarded as words of moderation. He charged the right hon. leader of the opposition with the expression of "desperate" and "dangerous" sentiments. I will read his words:

> I shall even say that I believe my right hon. friend to be sincere, but he is desperately and dangerously wrong in the sentiments he has expressed.

Neither of these words is moderate. Then, proceeding with his argument, he used other words that I cannot term moderate, when he characterized anyone who might express sentiments opposed to section 15 of this bill as "absurd," "stupid," and "narrow." The words "dangerous" and "desperate" as applied to the right hon. leader of the opposition, and the words "stupid" or "absurd" or "narrow" if applied to myself or anyone else, are not moderate words.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They were not used in that sense.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Minister of Justice, in my humble opinion, did not make—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend knows I did not use the words in that sense. I said it was an absurd way of issuing the bank notes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I will quote the Minister of Justice again:

> I repeat that I cannot find any ground for the objections which are being set forth against this proposal. They are absurd.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is very strong language with which to qualify an honest statement of any other member. I am not at the moment defending or attacking the clause as printed; I am criticizing the speech of the Minister of Justice. A little further down he says:

Why should we have this stupid thing?

Further on he says:

I cannot believe that there are people in my country who are so narrow.

Again I say that the words "dangerous," "desperate," "absurd," "stupid," and "narrow," are not the right kind of words to describe the opinions of another hon. member.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Not with moderation.

Mr. MacNICOL: If these are moderate words, then if the Minister of Justice had really cut loose, the air in this chamber would have been blue.

I am not going to enter into a discussion of what was said by Sir John A. Macdonald or Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but I will go one step further than the Minister of Justice: I recommend that all hon. members read what both those gentlemen said. Both were great Canadians, and I believe also they were extremely moderate in their language and had the highest respect for Canadians of all other nationalities. I hope I may qualify in that same category.

I was interested in what the minister said about his people having been here for some nine generations. According to the history of my family, I have been told, two of my ancestors were here about eight generations ago and laid down their lives at Ticonderoga, defended by that very brilliant and gallant French commander, the Marquis of Montcalm; and the following year three of them were with Highland regiments at Quebec; Ticonderoga in 1758; Quebec in 1759—so that as a Canadian of long lineage I feel I can afford to be proud of my Canadianism.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear.

Mr. MacNICOL: In advancing his argument the Minister of Justice referred to three other countries in which there is bilingual money. Of course I always feel that other countries can do as they please. In developing his argument the minister said, as I understood him, that the conditions in those countries were approximately or largely the same as they are in Canada. I propose to give some particulars about each one of those countries, namely, Belgium, Switzerland, and South Africa. There are something over eight million people in Belgium, and they are all packed into a little over eleven thousand square miles. Rather more than three million speak German and somewhat less than three million speak French. A million speak both languages. Belgium could be packed into the small portion of Ontario extending from Toronto to Brockville, east and west, and from Toronto to the Severn river, north and south. The area is small, and the conditions in Belgium are not really comparable, as I shall endeavour to show a little later, with those of Canada.

Switzerland has an area of less than sixteen thousand square miles. Twenty-one per cent of its population is French, seventy-one per cent German, and seven per cent Italian. The government of their cantons is entirely different from our conditions in Canada; they are loosely held together, although they have been confederated a long time, and, as the minister said, they do print their bills in three languages. But the country is less than two hundred and fifty miles long and less than one hundred and thirty-five miles wide. In South Africa there are seven million coloured people, natives of Africa, and 1,400,000 whites, of whom, that is the whites, fifty-one per cent speak both languages—that is the Afrikander and the English. Twenty-five per cent are British who speak English only, and twenty-four per cent—plus the fraction in each case—speak only the Afrikander language. Conditions in these countries do not at all compare, along the lines to which I have alluded, with those that obtain in Canada, where we have a country 3,500 miles from east to west and 1,500 miles from north to south, part of it, of course, very sparsely settled; where people who speak English almost exclusively, reside in the main in eight of the provinces, and those who speak the French language are very largely in one province. Therefore conditions here are not the same as in the countries to which the minister has referred. For my part, I can read the bills whether they are printed in French or in both languages. I appreciate, too, some of the arguments that have been advanced by the Minister of Justice in this regard, but on the other hand I believe it would have been better to leave this matter where it was until it had received a fair trial.

Mr. THORSON: May I ask the hon. member whether he favours the present system of printing some of the bills in French and others in English?

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, that was passed by the government that brought in the bill; it became the law of the land, and I am in accord with the law of the land. If I were to recommend a change in that system I might go back to the method recommended by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but always having been actuated by the spirit of fair play I cannot answer that question in any other way. I repeat, however, that it would have been much better to leave the matter where it was. The previous government had to face this issue just as the present government are attempting to face it, and that issue having been settled it should not have been brought up again, at least not so soon. I doubt very much whether the government have had resolutions asking a change from the chambers of commerce or boards of trade of Vancouver, Halifax, Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg, Fort William, Windsor, London, Sarnia—where the distinguished whip comes from—Hamilton, Toronto, Belleville, Brockville, Kingston, Saint John, Charlottetown and such cities. If the government have had resolutions from these chambers of commerce or boards of trade asking that the act be amended, that might account for this action having been taken, but I do not believe that is the reason for it. I am convinced that the Minister of Justice is very largely, if not altogether, responsible for persuading, in his pleasant way, the other members of the cabinet to agree to this amendment, because it was the Minister of Justice who in 1934 moved an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act in terms similar to those now contained in this amending bill. So I believe the minister must take all the credit, or whatever else may be due, for any heat that may develop as a result of this amendment.

The other evening the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) said something about Japan and China having bilingual bills. The hon. member knows full well that the bills printed in two languages in China apply to Shanghai and Hongkong, that the bill circulated in the provinces of China, away from the coast, are printed entirely in Chinese. I cannot picture bills circulating in the city of Chengtu in the province of Szechwan, 2,800 miles up the Yangtze-Kiang river being in two languages, when there is only one race of people. Furthermore, according to my understanding on the Japanese bill there is just the word "yen." That is not an English word; it is an international word, and it appears on Japanese bills for the convenience of people of all nations. The word could be claimed as French, German or Czechoslovakian as easily as it could be claimed to be English. They do not have bilingual bills in the United States, where they have more Germans than anywhere else in the world outside of Germany. They do not have bilingual bills in France, where there are more Italians than anywhere else in the world except the United States and Italy. There are no bilingual bills in Great Britain, where there are many hundreds of thousands of people of many races. So I do not see just how that can be used as an argument.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I come back to where I began: In my opinion it would have been much better if the government had let this matter rest for a while and left the act as it was passed by the late government. In my humble opinion the previous government met the problem in a satisfactory way. Certainly if bills are to be printed in both languages for circulation in the other eight provinces the government will have to take the responsibility. I cannot say what will be the result, or whether there will be any result, but with others who have spoken I feel that, with the distress which prevails in the country and the difficulties that all of us are up against, as Canadians, it would have been much better to leave the provision as it was, and for that reason I shall vote against section 15 of the bill.

Mr. A. H. MITCHELL (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken I should like to say that there seems to be a great deal of excitement in the house this afternoon in regard to the language that is to appear on the currency of the Bank of Canada. It is very plain to me that on the face of the bill appears the words "The Bank of Canada will pay to the bearer on demand One Dollar." It does not matter to me whether that is written in French or in English, as long as the Bank of Canada is able to pay that one dollar. The concern, then, that I have about the matter is this: Has anyone attempted to receive payment of one dollar from the Bank of Canada and, if so, what does he get, whether the language on the bill says the dollar will be paid in English or in French? What does he get for his dollar?

I do not wish to add to what was said when the bill was in the committee stage, but I do think it is a sad commentary on the House of Commons that half a day has been spent on an argument as to what language is to appear on the money of the country, when the real point we should be considering is what this money really means, where it comes from, whether or not the Dominion of Canada is able to deliver goods and services to the value of one dollar, and matters of that kind. This appears to me very much like the blowing up of a political tempest, and I am not very much concerned about it. I can see the utility, however, of having both languages on our bills, therefore I will vote against the amendment.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, it is with some trepidation that I rise this afternoon to speak on this question. We have been sitting here for some five months, and during that period we have debated a number of very important issues. With the exception of one or two other occasions, however, not until to-day have I felt such a tense atmosphere as exists in the house this afternoon, and in my opinion that is a reflection upon the parliament of Canada.

I come from the province of Saskatchewan. My mind goes back to 1930 and a few years prior to that. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), when he introduced this measure into the house, referred feelingly to the campaign of 1930. I have every sympathy with him in such feelings. I took no part in the particular controversy at that time. But I want to point out that we in western Canada, fortunately, have emerged from the division upon racial and religious lines which existed then, a division fostered and kept alive, I believe, for political purposes. I regret exceedingly that this matter should have been injected into this new parliament at a time when what we need in Canada is unity of all our people, regardless of race or religion. To-day once again we are in danger of having the same kind of thing said and done throughout Canada as was said and done in the years to which I have referred. It is so easy to divert public attention from issues that are real and fundamental by dividing it upon lines that are unreal and not fundamental. The people of Canada are now facing tremendous problems. In this bill we have discussed only one phase of one important problem, namely the national ownership of the Bank of Canada. This house does not yet know, nor has it decided upon the policy to be followed by that bank in relation to currency and credit; but this afternoon, on the motion for third reading of this bill, instead of discussing that important matter we are spending our time in dividing the people on an issue which in my opinion is unreal. I would suggest this, that people in Canada who speak French are entitled to have a bank note which they understand, printed in their own language, and the people of the rest of Canada are entitled to demand a bill printed in their common tongue, the English language. If we are going to extend this principle indefinitely then I point out that in the province from which I come, as was stated by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), we have many nationalities. We have a very large percentage of Germans, some Poles, many Ukrainians, and in that province those people may possibly ask for the same privilege that is now being proposed in relation to another language. I know, of course, there is a difference.

Mr. BOUCHARD: They knew the position as to language when they came.

Mr. COLDWELL: The difference is that, written into our constitution, and quite properly so, there is a provision that the use of the two languages in certain documents and in certain matters and places is established in this country. But I point out that in this present matter we are simply placing in the hands of people who will not scruple to use it, a document that will be shown on many a public platform in Saskatchewan, and possibly in Manitoba and Alberta, with the probable result of very much the same sort of campaign as was conducted in western Canada in 1930. From my place in this house I say to the government and to the opposition that divisions along these lines are not only regrettable but reprehensible. I make this suggestion to the government; if we cannot agree, why not drop the language from the bill altogether? Why not print on the face of these bills the word "Canada" which is the name of our country in both languages, and with that word simply the numerals 1, 2, 5, or 10 and so on, and distinguish the bills by variation in colour and design? Then we end this controversy, a controversy which in my opinion is kept alive purely for political purposes. I am not accusing any member of the government or of the opposition of doing that at this time, but at least there is a strong suspicion among some hon. members in this corner of the house that there may be motives of that sort. Whether there be such motives or not, this division will be carried throughout the length and breadth of Canada. I am urging the house to face the real problems of the country, problems that are stupendous, problems of youth, problems of the aged, problems of western agriculture. Instead of spending our time in permitting the stirring up of race prejudice we should get down to a thorough consideration of the real problems that confront us.

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the subject of discussion lends itself very readily to acrimony in debate. Even the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) ordinarily so genial, in his speech upon this subject on Thursday last in this chamber, contributed as much heat as light to the consideration of the problem. I doubt very much whether it would have been possible for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in the length of time which he occupied in this chamber this afternoon, to choose words tending more to arouse emotion or more provocative of political and party division. The Prime Minister intimated, if I correctly interpreted his observations, that those who would oppose a bilingual bank bill were lacking in a sense of fair play. I cannot agree with that. In my youth I played games occasionally. I have always considered that one who played a game according to the rules was not lacking in a sense of fair play. But when someone proposes that the rules of the game should be amended I cannot appreciate the view that anyone who does not agree with such a proposal, and so opposes it, is lacking in a sense of fair play. I ask of him only that when the rule is amended he observe the rule.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): We shall see what the hon. member will do after this.

Mr. LAWSON: I may say to my hon. friend that I could answer him if I so desired, but I am going to ignore such interruptions because I am very anxious to express my thoughts on this matter without heat and without emotion. I think when the Prime Minister suggested that because some one used the word "toleration" or the expression "tolerating certain things which existed," that one might as well make it applicable to the French speaking members of the House of Commons, he indulged in the most specious sophistry. Any man in this country, no matter what his language or his native tongue may be, has a right, a constitutional right by law, to be a member of this House of Commons provided he is a British subject and complies with the other requirements of the law, and on that basis we all here accept all our fellow-members, not in toleration, but in welcome, even when they may disagree with us in our opinions.

I am anxious to place on record my thoughts on this subject, and I shall be sorry if, having done so, I should find myself classified in that category which the right hon. the Prime Minister described as those having an attitude of intolerance and bigotry. With much of what the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) said to-day I agree. I am one of those who, coming from a part of Ontario in which we rarely if ever hear the French language spoken, have gone to considerable trouble and effort to acquire some knowledge of that language. I, too, like the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) could write out and read in this chamber a speech in French, but by doing so, Mr. Speaker, I should lend neither wisdom to my thoughts nor eloquence to my tongue. Therefore I am going to endeavour to express my thoughts in my native tongue as dispassionately as I may.

The Minister of Justice took occasion to extend the quotation from Sir Wilfrid Laurier which had been quoted by some other member of the house. I possibly could also extend both by prefix and affix a quotation which was given by the Minister of Justice of the words of the great, revered leader of the Conservative party. The subject matter under discussion in 1890 was the question whether or not a provision which had been made allowing the use of the French language in the Northwest Territories should be repealed, and Mr. McCarthy of that day had moved for its repeal. Then Mr. Laurier made a strong political attack upon the government of the day, alleging in effect —I am not quoting him but I am giving the substance—that the Tories had always been opposed to the French people and the interests of the French people in this country, and it was on that occasion and replying to that speech that Sir John A. Macdonald said:

> I go a great way with my hon. friend in his remarks concerning the principle of this bill.

That is the bill which was before the house.

> I sympathize with his very natural feelings of indignation at much of the language that has been used in support of this measure now before the house.

Then he used the words quoted by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, and after using them said:

> But while I say so much, Mr. Speaker, I must regret that my hon. friend, perhaps yielding to the necessity of his position as a party leader, should have commenced his speech with some party attacks against the Tories.

Sir John A. Macdonald then went on to outline that there should be given to the people of the Northwest Territories the right of free choice, and ultimately there was proposed by Sir John Thompson, and voted on and supported and carried by the government of that day the following resolution in amendment of the proposal of Mr. McCarthy which I previously outlined:

That, on the contrary, this house declares its adherence to the said covenants, and its determination to resist any attempt to impair the same. That, at the same time, this house deems it expedient and proper, and not inconsistent with those covenants, that the legislative assembly of the Northwest Territories should receive from the parliament of Canada power to regulate—

Note this, Mr. Speaker:

—after the next general elections of the assembly the proceedings of the assembly and the manner of recording and publishing such proceedings.

To that principle of free choice if that is inherently a principle of the Conservative party as it was enunciated by its great leader, I subscribe.

In the course of this debate the statement was made that we have in this country two official languages but that Canada was not a bilingual country, and to that statement the Minister of Justice, and I think one other hon. member, took exception. I submit to you, sir, and this house, that the statement is absolutely accurate. When Canada was ceded to England in 1763 by the Treaty of Paris, Canada became a crown colony of England, and by virtue thereof English inherently for all purposes was an official language in this country. I shall not stop to outline the changes which came about by the Constitutional Act of 1791 and the Act of Union of 1840, but shall content myself with pointing out that by the constitution of this country, the British North America Act, by section 133 French was made an official language, an official language for all purposes prescribed by section 133 of that act, and with the limitations therein set out. Therefore, sir, I say to you that because the French language is limited and prescribed by section 133 of the British North America Act, Canada is not a bilingual country in the sense that both languages are official on exactly the same basis, and therefore there should be no room for objection to the statement which was made.

Another word was used, I think quite properly, to which apparently great exception was taken, namely the word "concession." When for any reason this parliament should see fit, either by its own substantive legislation or by request for amendment of the British North America Act, to extend the official use of the French language in this country, then I say that is a concession. Anything which confers a new right or an extended right upon the use of the French language in this country is a concession, and I submit that the word is a perfectly proper one to use and is not in the least offensive.

The minister, referring to this section 15, said that the matter was a very simple one, and he went on to outline the reason why. To me, in a way, the matter is a very simple one, and yet fortunately or unfortunately we seem to approach it from a quite different viewpoint, and our convictions in some respects seem to be diametrically opposed. The Minister of Justice proceeded to argue that prior to the enactment of the Bank of Canada Act the commercial banks had the right to issue notes or bills in the French language, the English language, or in French and English, and because by a process under the provisions of the Bank of Canada Act, the issuing authority becomes in time solely the Bank of Canada, therefore a right was being taken away from the French people.

I should like to point out that for many years the Dominion of Canada issued bills which were legal tender. The Minister of Justice gave an instance of a French-speaking man desiring to make legal tender, or to place money in court, and he could not obtain a bill in French which was legal tender with which to make that deposit. May I point out to my hon. friend that from confederation down to the date of the passing of the Bank of Canada Act in 1934, Canada printed one and two dollar bills, five hundred dollar bills and one thousand dollar bills, and one or two other denominations, which were the only legal tender in this country. Those bills were printed solely and only in the English language.

Speaking in regard to the same matter, my hon. friend said: We—and I assume he meant by that the French people of this country—are not conceded the right to live or to breathe the air of this country. I realize that that sentence was a metaphorical one, but it implied that this parliament or the English-speaking people of this country were attempting to take away from their French-speaking fellow-citizens some right which they now have. I want to point out that no attempt is being made to take away any right to the use of the French language as guaranteed by the British North America Act or any other act upon our statute books. We who resist merely say to you who are represented by the words of the minister, that the minority in this country shall not prescribe by law the kind of air which the majority are to breathe. I do not claim any right or privilege to speak for the majority of people in this country, but I do claim the right or privilege to speak for hundreds of thousands of people who have a viewpoint which I am going to endeavour to outline.

May I come back again for a moment to the word "concessions"? In 1934 when the central bank was formed there was—I hope this word will not be offensive but I use it for want of a better one—an agitation for bilingual currency. The arguments advanced at that time were that the French people in this dominion had been able to get notes in their own language from the commercial banks and, therefore, the bills of the new central bank should be printed in French. The same argument is advanced to-day by the Minister of Justice. The government of that day, in a spirit of compromise and out of consideration for our French-speaking fellow-Canadians, enacted that the central bank bills should be printed both in French and in English so that the citizens of this country could have a choice. To-day the very fact that that concession was granted is used as one of the strongest arguments why this parliament should provide for bilingual bills.

Nothing more clearly illustrates or justifies the viewpoint of so many English-speaking people in this country than the illustration I have just given, that the French speaking people are constantly on the aggressive to force on the English-speaking people the French language.

Mr. DUPUIS: I do not think the hon. gentleman should make that statement; he is too broad-minded.

Mr. LAWSON: I think it is fair enough. If my hon. friend will read my statement in Hansard I think he will find it is a very moderate and mild one. I am endeavouring to express the viewpoint of some of the English-speaking people in this country.

Mr. DUPUIS: All the prejudices, and they are sponsored by you.

Mr. LAWSON: I am not impressed by the economy argument advanced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). If economy in connection with this matter is a logical argument then it cuts both ways. If the Minister of Finance wants to effect some economies, I ask him to turn his eyes upon the Post Office Department. There he will find forms printed in both languages, just what it is proposed to do in connection with our bills. He will find bilingual forms and he will find identically the same forms printed exclusively in the French language. I am extremely doubtful if he will find the identical forms printed solely in the English language. I once tried to secure such a form. I am merely relating what I found out. If economy is a factor, why not effect economy in matters already existing?

[Mr. Lawson.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does my hon. friend not know that under an international convention postal notes are printed in both languages? The same situation exists in the United States and other countries.

Mr. LAWSON: May I say to the Minister of Justice that I was not referring to a post office order or a postal note. I cannot remember the number of the form at the moment, but I could give it to my hon. friend. This matter came to my attention because a returned soldier—I am not sure whether he lived in my constituency or in an adjoining one—had written to the Post Office Department at Ottawa for a particular form for some purpose, which at the moment will not come to my mind. He received a form printed exclusively in French and when he sent this back to the Post Office Department, he received a form printed in English and French. He complained about this and perhaps hon. members will say that he was bigoted or narrow-minded.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That happens every day in the province of Quebec.

Mr. LAWSON: I do not doubt it. At the moment I am not objecting to it; I am merely directing the attention of the Minister of Finance to a matter where he might apply his economy argument. In this house to-day, speaking on this very subject matter, some hon. member asked this question: By what right or law or sanction of this parliament are any of these forms bilingual? When that question is raised some may claim that one is asking for a Shylock's pound of flesh because one asks adherence to the terms of the British North America Act. But may I point out that I am not asking that there be taken away from the French people any right of language guaranteed them by our constitution. I stand here asking on behalf of my race that our rights under the constitution be not taken from us until such time as the French people of this country have, not forced by legislation, but persuaded, the English-speaking people of Canada that further changes should be made in connection with the right of user of the French language in this country.

In matters affecting race or creed I try to see the viewpoint of the other fellow. I fully realize the desire of all the French people in Canada to cling tenaciously to their language, and at the same time I know it is the aspiration of some of them to extend the use of their language throughout this dominion. I want the French people to realize that there are in Canada thousands of English-speaking people who resent the attempt to extend the use of the French language into their territory and to have it forced upon them by law—

Mr. DUPUIS: How many in the hon. member's constituency?

Mr. LAWSON: Judging by the last election, I should say about twelve thousand and some hundred of the total number of voters. Between these two extremes which I have outlined I believe there is in this country a large body of public opinion, the viewpoint of which I am trying to express to-day when I advocate adherence to the rights conferred upon majorities as well as minorities, as defined by the British North America Act, until such time as my fellow French-Canadian citizens have persuaded the English majority that further use of the French language would be beneficial. I am confident that only by such a course will ultimate harmony, good will and unity be promoted among all our people in Canada.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): I wish to say just a few words. I shall not take up much of the time of the house because it is getting near the end of the session and I have never yet been guilty of taking up more time than necessary. I wish to congratulate the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Lawson) upon his well reasoned argument against bilingual money. His speech was moderate and he handled the subject very capably. I endorse his views and am behind them. I am sorry I did not hear the address of my right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett) the other night, which I am told was a very good one, nor did I hear the speech, in supposedly moderate tones, of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) on that occasion. I was not in the house at the time. I did, however, note his tone this afternoon, and it was not as moderate as I should have expected from a man of his type. He talks about racial unity but what he preaches in this regard he does not practise very much, especially at election time in the province of Quebec. I do not believe that hon. gentlemen from Quebec are expressing the views of the innocent, good-thinking people of that province, any more than the Progressives in this house, when there were sixty-five of them, expressed the views of the people when they talked secession and advocated getting out of confederation. They were not at that time expressing the views of the west any more than the French-speaking members in this house express the views of the good French people of the province of Quebec. The trouble is that a few of the more educated people of Quebec, like the Minister of Justice and others, poison the minds of the innocent people of that province against our party, and there is always a war somewhere to create trouble and friction.

No one appreciates more than I do the hospitality of the French people; I have been among them and have been entertained by them in Montreal. Anything that I say now is rather more in their interests than in those of my own race in Ontario. I hate an argument of this kind, and while I do not know very much English and still less French I do know, from my experience in the business world and in this house, that a debate of this sort will create friction and result in lack of harmony in the country. I remember that on one occasion an hon. gentleman from the province of Quebec moved a resolution which I knew at the time would cause friction, and I appealed to him to withdraw it. I believe it was the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) who offered a resolution to the effect that no one but a bilinguist should hold a position in the civil service. What would that mean? It would mean that only someone who could speak French as well as English could get a job in the civil service. As far as I am concerned, there are two classes of people I shall not grant concessions to; the French are one, unless they make some concessions to us, because we want to be fair to them.

I do not want to take up the time of the house but I am utterly opposed to the change proposed in this bill. I do not see any reason why this government should attempt to change everything that a sane and sensible government put through in the last five years. They have attempted to change the British North America Act, the railway trustees, and now they are changing the Bank of Canada Act, making a mess of the whole thing. I am speaking not from a political point of view but from long training in the business world, and along that line I know as much as the ministers do. I honestly believe that it would be well to withdraw the proposal contained in this bill and, as my hon. friend, the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) who sits behind me has suggested, to take it out of the house and forget it. It is simply creating friction and bad racial feeling in the country, and that will be the result of the whole matter. Let me say further that if this goes on much longer I can warn the people in Quebec that they will probably suffer more than the other provinces, because I assume they do not want to be isolated, and that is just what they are talking themselves into. I would not have said a word but for the stream of abuse of those on this side which flowed from the Prime Minister. While I respect him as Prime Minister, I do not like the attempt he made this afternoon to play politics. He is trying to control the country by the French vote, but I say to him: You will not control the French vote very much longer because we will attempt to educate the French people to your tactics.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPENCE: Never mind your laughing. The time will come when you will not be able to pull the wool over the eyes of the French people of Quebec with a lot of politics as you have been doing in the last few years. See what has happened to your friend Taschereau; you will all get into the same difficulty. You have been doing this sort of thing too long. See what they did to the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, talking about blood dripping from his hands, and all that sort of stuff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh!

Mr. SPENCE: There is no "oh" about it; it was done every year I was in the house. Every time there was an election in the province of Quebec there was talk of a war somewhere, and men of a higher type and education polluted the minds of the French people to make them believe that the Conservative party was a warring party and that if they wanted their sons to go to war they should vote for the Conservative party. Do hon. members mean to tell me that is fair tactics; that it will create harmony and unity? I say no. We are having difficulties in Ontario and my hon. friends will create more difficulty between Ontario and Quebec. I say to them: If I were you I would change my tactics and play the game fairly so as to have unity in this country instead of disruption.

Let the hon. member over here who is laughing say just what he thinks. I do not believe I am saying anything out of the way. Everything I have stated is true, and I believe it absolutely. What the government is doing to-day is creating a lack of harmony which will never be suppressed, although the hon. minister put his case to the house in a very clever way. I am sorry I am not able to equal his performance. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) has also this afternoon delivered his address in a quiet and commendable way, entirely without bad feeling. He appealed for harmony, and I believe that is what we want. The same attitude was taken by the hon. member for Davenport and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). I have no ill feeling whatever against the French language; all I wish to say is: Please do not continue to ask concession after concession and never be satisfied.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I want for a few minutes to strike a new note—

Mr. EULER: A new bank note?

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): —and it will not be a bilingual note. I inveighed against the government when the Bank of Canada Act was first brought up. I did so, not on the question of bilingualism but because of the action of the government as to taking control of the shares of the bank, involving an expenditure of $5,100,000 to secure 51 per cent of the shares, when the same amount of money should have controlled the whole of the shares. The days that have passed have made me none the easier in my mind about the activity of the government in this respect. I find that practically all the provinces in their companies' acts permit the shareholder, when an enlargement of the capital is brought about, to have the first opportunity of obtaining pro rata of their share holdings in the new capital. The Dominion Bank Act, section 32 reads thus:

> The capital stock of the bank may be increased from time to time, by such percentage, or by such amount, as is determined upon by by-law passed by the shareholders at the annual general meeting, or at any special general meeting called for the purpose.

Section 33 contains the following:

> Any of the original unsubscribed capital stock, or of the increased stock of the bank, shall, at such time as the directors determine, be allotted to the then shareholders of the bank pro rata, at such price, not less than par, and on such terms as are fixed by the directors.

The Dominion Companies Act states:

> The directors of the company may, at any time after fifty per centum of the authorized capital stock of the company has been subscribed and ten per centum of such subscribed stock has been paid in, make a by-law for increasing the capital stock of the company to any amount which they consider requisite for the due carrying out of the objects of the company.
> No by-law for increasing the capital stock of the company, or for subdividing the shares, shall have any force or effect whatsoever, until it is sanctioned by at least two-thirds of the votes cast at a special general meeting of the shareholders of the company duly called for considering the same, and afterwards confirmed by supplementary letters patent.

So that, throughout the whole of the procedure of the government in these matters as it allows companies and individuals to express themselves, it has been conceded that existing shareholders have a right to take their pro rata holdings in any increase of capital. And again I inveigh against the government for their attitude in this regard. There is neither excuse nor reason for what they have done, and for that reason I was entirely prepared to vote against the bill.

But, Mr. Speaker, a much larger issue has been raised, and I find myself thrown high and dry, having been tossed about by the progress of this debate. I have tried to see this matter reasonably and broadly, and I have come to the conclusion that the only view to take is not necessarily the broad view but the long view. We are a country in progress. We are a country with two languages. We have two sets of ideas. We have two hopes; we are attempting to merge them. I can quite understand the desire of the French people to begin this merger by infusing themselves into the general purpose of our progress. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) spoke of the progress in South Africa, where, he said, approximately 51 per cent of the people spoke the two languages. He is talking of to-day, but he is not talking of the period after the Boer war. The situation has been entirely reversed, although in certain sections of the country I have heard the youth talking together very freely and using words, from both languages, so intermixed that one was puzzled to know whether the individuals talking were Dutchmen or Englishmen. The same thing will obtain in Canada if we can permit the proper fusion of the two races. But as long as we are kept apart by racial distinctions and racial ideas, and by little differences developed and engendered, we shall never produce in this dominion a true homogeneous nation.

For that reason I am in direct sympathy with this bill and, taking the two questions together, the one on which I feel very strongly the government has done wrong, and the other one on which I feel very strongly the government is unconsciously moving in the right direction, I feel compelled to say that I shall vote with the government on the question of this bill.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I had hoped to be spared further participation in this debate, but in view of the observations this afternoon of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the use of the word "bigotry" and other words equally offensive, I am compelled to make a few remarks. I indicated a few days ago that I speak only my own opinion and my own mind. I have not suggested to those associated with me that they should follow my course, but, holding certain convictions and believing as I do that the course taken by the previous administration is the one best calculated to advance the cause of amity and good will in Canada, knowing something as I do of the history of this country with respect to these matters, I urged as strongly, as dispassionately and as moderately as I could that the government give a longer period of time within which to ascertain whether the measures which were adopted in 1934, and which did not become effective for some months thereafter, were not those which in practice would be found satisfactory. I agree with what has been said by many members who have spoken in this house that we have a common purpose, a desire to create a homogeneous country, a desire out of diverse elements to produce a common nationality, a desire to make the name Canadian on this northern half of the north American continent representative of a personality, a nationality, a people. That can be done only by the union in spirit and in deed, in act and in purpose, of men and women of all nationalities.

When a few days ago the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) referred to the words of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, dealing with a matter to which I shall have to refer before I take my seat, the hon. gentleman quoted Sir John as saying that in this country there was no conquered people. Why, certainly that is true, Mr. Speaker. We have had generations come and go since 1759 and it would indeed be strange if in 1890, when Sir John was speaking, there should be any people that would refer to any other people in this country as a conquered people. Sir John said that since 1867 we had been British people, living under the protecting aegis of the British flag, as one dominion, and in that sense and in that regard what he said then is true to-day.

But, sir, there is something that we cannot forget, and it is that the facts of history endure. Not heaven itself can change the past. What has been, has been. There was a Treaty of Paris in 1763. There was a union of upper and lower Canada in 1840. There was an act of confederation in 1867. These are facts of history. They are not the notions of individuals; they are not things that can disappear because we wish to forget them. For good or ill they are the facts of history, just as other matters are facts of history. And as from all events in history there follow results, which we sometimes speak of as the implications of the events but which in the end are perhaps the controlling influences and factors in national life, so from these events to which I have referred there have flowed results which are embodied not only in the statutes of our country but in the very life of Canada itself.

Shortly after I accepted, at the hands of my party, its leadership, I went to Quebec. I travelled over large sections of that province. I addressed meetings in many parts of it, and no more kindly reception was ever given me than I received from my fellow-Canadian citizens in that province. And I told them, as frankly and as clearly as I could speak, that I realized the appeals which had been made to them. I realized, as the Minister of Justice so aptly said the other evening that in that province there was a class who believed that there had been some sacrifice of their rights and that within the confederation they could not work out the destiny they had contemplated for themselves and their people. I told them then, as I say here and now from my place as a member of this house, that their constitutional rights, the laws, customs and practices of the constitution, would be respected by me at whatever cost it might involve to me personally. I called upon them and appealed to them to respect the constitution as a document which was arrived at after much consideration, much toil and much travail by the great public men of that time, and as indicative of what might constitute a fair relationship between the two great races.

I never hesitated, sir, to make that as clear as, by language, I could convey it to those who heard me, and when the results of the election were known we had in that province at least a fair support. But no one could say that he had been elected by appeals made either to racial prejudices or to ancient animosities, to race or to religion, or upon other than the broad basis of those constitutional rights which are vouched for by a constitutional document and by that document guaranteed as the rights alike of minorities and majorities. And I have always regarded it as a matter of supreme satisfaction, Mr. Speaker, that the party to which I belong received from the electors of Quebec the measure of confidence which it did receive. I am not ignorant—because I do read the press of Quebec—of appeals that have been made looking toward, shall I say, the creation of another state, as the Minister of Justice said the other evening. I am not unmindful of that, but I agree with the hon. gentleman that it would be in the worst possible interests of those who would be affected that that should come about. And however much we may have cause to complain of the results of appeals that were made I have never complained, neither shall I to-day nor at any other time complain, of the result of the appeal to the electors in the province of Quebec in 1935. It was a significant circumstance that it should happen as it did. I have overlooked, as part of the incident of party warfare, the appeals that were made about the war in Egypt in 1930, or the war in Turkey. I do not think that represents the genius or thought of great leaders, but it does represent the action which may be taken, in the heat of an election, by those to whom victory is their chief duty and supreme concern, to appeal to those passions and prejudices which are found at times beneath the skin of any man and every man, whether he be Anglo-Saxon or French.

[Mr. Bennett.]

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

BANK OF CANADA

MAJORITY CONTROL BY GOVERNMENT OF CAPITAL STOCK AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Dunning for the third reading of Bill No. 82, to amend the Bank of Canada Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Barber.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, whatever complaints may have been made with respect to the course which I followed in other parts of Canada with respect to other Canadians, this at least will have to be admitted, that the position I took in the province of Quebec I took in every other province of confederation. At the outset of my leadership I made it clear that we would deal with all such problems on a national basis, because I realized that on more than one occasion the country had been torn asunder by what seemed to be small issues but which had most, shall I say, disastrous effects upon the efforts being made to build here a united Canada.

I wonder if hon. members of this chamber are aware of the fact that we have drawn our population in the western provinces from all quarters of the world. For instance, out of a total population, according to the last census, of 921,785 for the province of Saskatchewan, only 437,856 are of British origin. That in itself is reason why we should exercise the utmost care in dealing with problems of this kind. Aware of that fact, I fancy, as well as any other man in this country, and fully understanding the difficulty we were experiencing in welding into a harmonious whole the country west of the great lakes, to say nothing of the difficulties which obtained by reason of geographical conditions, I took the view that the constitution would be our guide. It has been the guide of the Conservative party since that date, and it was our guide during the days of Macdonald.

For instance, the other evening when the Minister of Justice was reading from the speech of Sir John A. Macdonald he might have gone further and read from that speech references Sir John made not only to conditions which then existed but to difficulties which he had experienced in his lifetime in dealing with this problem. Sir John had pointed out that he had met with opposition, and that to mould this country into a harmonious whole had been a most difficult task. After using the language to which the Minister of Justice referred the other evening Sir John A. Macdonald used these words:

> But while I say so much, Mr. Speaker, I must regret that my hon. friend, perhaps yielding to the necessity of his position as a party leader, should have commenced his speech with some party attacks against the Tories. My hon. friend felt constrained, I suppose, to make those allusions, which, in the circumstances of the case, I think were not altogether generous or altogether politic. The hon. gentleman spoke of the spirit of this bill being that of Toryism, utter Toryism, oppressive Toryism. Why, sir, if he looks at the history of England in modern days, I think he will find that most of the Liberal measures passed there have been passed, if not by Tories, by Conservatives. I think also, if he will look at the history of Canada, he will find at all events, that liberality towards the French-Canadian race was pretty much confined to the Conservative party. The hon. gentleman had to admit that while this bill was, as he affirmed, an evidence of utter Toryism, the exclusion of the Franch language, the injury done to the French people, the insult offered to them, came from a radical, the Earl of Durham. To be sure, my hon. friend said that Lord Durham was a radical who did not understand all about liberty. That is quite evident; and so great a radical was he that in order to get rid of him the English government sent him to this country to show us his Liberalism by attempting to deprive half the people of their right to use their own language. Ay, Mr. Speaker, and he succeeded in carrying out that effort; he succeeded in excluding the French language, and the measure was carried by a Liberal government in England. That was in 1840. The first government formed in Canada under that measure in 1841 was a confused government, where Liberals, and Tories, and officials were mixed up together. But, sir, in 1844 when there was a stand-up fight between Conservatives and Liberals, when the Conservatives ralied around Lord Metcalfe, and carried a majority; when the parliament met in Montreal in that year, with a Conservative majority, the whole of the French-Canadian race, with the exception, I think, of four, were in opposition to the government. I was then elected for the first time, and I sat in that parliament as a Tory, a supporter of Lord Metcalfe. In that parliament the French-Canadians were powerless; and yet, Mr. Speaker, what did that house do? Let me read to you a resolution that was passed, not by a Liberal or radical government, not by a parliament having sympathy with the French-Canadians exactly, but by a Conservative parliament elected, as was then alleged, in opposition to the interests of the province of Lower Canada; and yet passed, from a mere sense of justice, and without one single dissenting voice. Yes, from a mere sense of justice, the resolution was passed and the address was passed without one dissenting voice. I as a member of the young Tory party, was proud then to have the opportunity of pronouncing on that question. The yeas and nays were not taken because we were unanimous, but I was proud of having had a part, as a member of a great party, in the resolve to relieve our French-Canadian friends from the oppressive action of the Liberal government in England, at the instigation of the radical Earl Durham.

Then he quoted the address. From that day to this those who are familiar with the political history of Canada will have to admit that the position taken by the Conservative party has been consistent with the policy then outlined by Sir John A. Macdonald. It will be remembered that when confederation became an accomplished fact it followed two sets of resolutions, the London resolutions agreed to in 1866 and the Quebec resolutions agreed to in 1864. It is pertinent to keep in mind what those resolutions were, for when discussion took place as to what should be done with respect to language it will be remembered that that question was dealt with, and it will be within the memory of every hon. member familiar with the subject that in the resolution finally arrived at in 1864 these words appear as the forty-sixth of the Quebec resolutions agreed to on October 10, 1864:

Both the English and French languages may be employed in the general parliament and in its proceedings, and in the local legislature of lower Canada, and also in the federal courts and in the courts of lower Canada.

When the London conference was held, resolution No. 45 was passed reading as follows:

Both the English and French languages may be employed in the general parliament and in its proceedings, and in the local legislature of lower Canada, and also in the federal courts and in the courts of lower Canada.

When the British North America Act was drafted, after these resolutions had been laid before the colonial secretary of the day, the first set of resolutions having been signed by E. P. Taché, and the London resolutions having been signed by Sir George Cartier, it will be recalled that section 133 crystallized into legislative form the purport of these resolutions, and that is important to keep in mind because it has a direct bearing on everything that thereafter happened. Section 133 reads:

Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.

The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

In order to understand the full significance of that, it is important to recall what the situation was in 1840. I have referred to the Treaty of Paris of 1763, and after that the provision made by the parliament at Westminster for the government of Quebec need not be dwelt upon except to say that there were two provinces, upper and lower Canada, and in lower Canada you had one set of considerations, in upper Canada another.

But in 1840 we find that an enactment was passed which prohibited the further use of the French language in the united provinces, and I shall, in order that the record may be complete, point out and read what that provision was:

And be it enacted that from and after the said reunion of the said two provinces, all writs, proclamations, instruments for summoning and calling together the legislative council and legislative assembly of the province of Canada and for proroguing and dissolving the same, and all writs of summons and election, and all writs and public instruments whatsoever relating to the said legislative council and legislative assembly or either of them, and all returns to such writs and instruments, and all journals, entries, and written or printed proceedings of what nature soever of the said legislative council and legislative assembly and each of them respectively, and all written or printed proceedings and reports of committees of the said legislative council and legislative assembly respectively, shall be in the English language only: Provided always, that this enactment shall not be construed to prevent translated copies of any such documents being made, but no such copy shall be kept among the records of the legislative council or legislative assembly, or be deemed in any case to have the force of an original record.

That was the statute passed by the parliament at Westminster in 1840, and the incident to which Sir John A. Macdonald referred was the passing of the resolution that brought about the end of that condition. That was not, however, until 1848, so that from 1840 to 1848 the united provinces of upper and lower Canada were prohibited by law from using any language other than English, and translated copies of the records of proceedings in that legislature were not allowed to be kept as part of the official records. But in 1848 there was passed the Union Act Amendment Act, which provided:

Whereas by an act passed in the session of parliament held in the third and fourth years of Her Present Majesty, intituled "An act to reunite the provinces of upper and lower Canada, and for the government of Canada," it is amongst other things enacted that from and after the said reunion of the said two provinces, all writs, proclamations, instruments for summoning and calling together the legislative council and legislative assembly of the province of Canada, and for proroguing and dissolving the same, and all writs of summons and elections, and all writs and public instruments whatsoever relating to the said legislative council and legislative assembly, or either of them, and all returns to such writs and instruments, and all journals, entries, and written or printed proceedings, of what nature soever, of the said legislative council and legislative assembly, and of each of them respectively, and all written or printed proceedings and reports of committees of the said legislative council and legislative assembly respectively, shall be in the English language only: Provided always that the said enactment shall not be construed to prevent translated copies of any such documents being made, but no such copy should be kept among the records of the legislative council or legislative assembly, or be deemed in any case to have the force of an original record:

And whereas it is expedient to alter the law in this respect, in order that the legislature of the province of Canada, or the said legislative council and legislative assembly respectively, may have power to make such regulations herein as to them may seem advisable:

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the passing of this act so much of the said recited act as is hereinbefore recited shall be repealed.

That was in 1848.

Mr. DUPUIS: Who was the mover?

Mr. BENNETT: It was an act of the imperial parliament. I have not the name of the member of that house who had the matter in hand, but it could easily be obtained from the library if the hon. gentleman wishes.

In 1848, which, as will be seen, was nineteen years before confederation, there was a repeal of the statute which provided that the English language only should be the language to be used in the legislature of upper and lower Canada. Then followed the conferences to bring about the union of Canada, the union of the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, upper and lower Canada, and when they met together at Quebec in 1864 they passed the resolution to which I have referred embodying the views of the minority of that time as adequate for the defence of their rights. That was No. 46 of the Quebec resolutions passed in 1864. Then, when they went to London a few months later for the purpose of having the statute enacted or passed by the imperial parliament, the resolution which I have just read, No. 45, was arrived at, and that was regarded in the minds of Sir George Cartier and other great French-Canadians of that day as being adequate for the protection of their rights, their liberties, their language and other matters to which I shall presently refer.

Then we come to confederation, and the British North America Act, with section 133 embodying the provisions of resolution No. 45 of the London conference and resolution No. 46 of the Quebec conference, and any students of history who are interested and will look at the personnel of that distinguished gathering which met at Quebec and enacted these resolutions will have no difficulty in realizing that our French-Canadian citizens were ably represented there by men who reflected in every respect the genius of their race.

Then came the question of the consideration of this matter when Sir John A. Macdonald and those associated with him came back to Canada and asked the legislature to adopt confederation. At that time one of the very first questions suggested was one connected with language, and what do we find? We find that that question was raised by a distinguished Frenchman of his day who realized its importance and made no apology for having raised the issue. When section 133 was being referred to, the Hon. Mr. Evanturel —you will find this at page 943 of the Debates of Confederation—said:

I wish to put a question to the government. I acknowledge that if I confined myself to consulting my own ideas, I should not put this question; but I do so in order to meet the wishes of several of my friends, both within this house and beyond its precincts. Those friends have expressed alarm in relation to one of the causes of the resolutions, and have requested me to ask an explanation from the hon. attorney general for Upper Canada, as to the interpretation of that clause. I had therefore to ask him whether article 46 of the resolutions, which states that "both the English and French languages may be employed in the general parliament and in its proceedings, and in the local legislature of Lower Canada," is to be interpreted as placing the use of the two languages on an equal footing in the federal parliament? In stating the apprehensions entertained by certain persons on this subject —and I consider that it is a mark of patriotism on their part, and that their apprehensions may be legitimate—I hope the government will not impute to me any hostile intention, and will perceive that the course I adopt is in their interests, as it will give them an opportunity of dissipating the apprehensions in question.

That was approved by the house, for the words "hear, hear" appear after that statement. Sir John A. Macdonald then rose and said:

I have very great pleasure in answering the question put to me by my hon. friend from the county of Quebec. I may state that the meaning of one of the resolutions adopted by the conference is this, that the rights of the French Canadian members as to the status of their language in the federal legislature shall be precisely the same as they now are in the present legislature of Canada in every possible respect. I have still further pleasure in stating that the moment this was mentioned in conference, the members of the deputation from the lower provinces unanimously stated that it was right and just, and without one dissentient voice gave their adhesion to the reasonableness of the proposition that the status of the French language, as regards the procedure in parliament, the printing of measures, and everything of that kind, should be precisely the same as it is in this legislature.

After some further observation Mr. Dorion, later Sir Antoine, rose and said:

So that if, to-morrow, this legislature choose to vote that no other but the English language should be used in our proceedings, it might do so, and thereby forbid the use of the French language. There is, therefore, no guarantee for the continuance of the use of the language of the majority of the people of Lower Canada, but the will and the forbearance of the majority. And as the number of French members in the general legislature, under the proposed confederation, will be proportionately much smaller than it is in the present legislature, this ought to make hon. members consider what little chance there is for the continued use of their language in the federal legislature. This is the only observation I have to make on this subject, and it was suggested to me by the answer of the Hon. Attorney General West.

The attorney general, Sir John A. Macdonald, then rose and said:

I desire to say that I agree with my hon. friend that as it stands just now the majority governs; but in order to cure this, it was agreed at the conference to embody the provision in the Imperial Act. (Hear, hear.) This was proposed by the Canadian government, for fear an accident might arise subsequently, and it was assented to by the deputation from each province that the use of the French language should form one of the principles upon which the confederation should be established, and that its use, as at present, should be guaranteed by the Imperial Act. (Hear, hear.)

Thereupon, near the close of the debate, Sir George Cartier rose and said:

I will add to what has been stated by the hon. Attorney General for Upper Canada, in reply to the hon. member for the county of Quebec and the hon. member for Hochelaga, that it was also necessary to protect the English minorities in Lower Canada with respect to the use of their language, because in the local parliament of Lower Canada the majority will be composed of French Canadians. The members of the conference were desirous that it should not be in the power of that majority to decree the abolition of the use of the English language in the local legislature of Lower Canada, any more than it will be in the power of the federal legislature to do so with respect to the French language. I will also add that the use of both languages will be secured in the Imperial Act to be based on these resolutions. (Hear, hear.)

I said a moment ago that this discussion took place during the debates on confederation; I should have said that it took place after the resolutions had been submitted to the legislature and before the statute had in fact been passed. I think I have made clear what the conditions were that led up to the enactment of the British North America Act. I trust I have made clear to every hon. member of this house the circumstances under which section 133 became part of the constitution of Canada. It was enacted by the imperial parliament in furtherance of the resolutions arrived at both at Quebec and at London. The meaning to be attributed to that section is the meaning which was agreed upon in the legislature when the debates took place, as indicated, by Sir John A. Macdonald, the Hon. Mr. Evanturel, the late Sir Antoine Dorion and lastly by Sir George Cartier. These are the circumstances which led up to the enactment of this provision.

We inquire logically: How has that been interpreted by successive governments in Canada? It must be recalled that during the early days of this confederation Sir John A. Macdonald was Prime Minister until 1873; he and his government had control of the destinies of Canada until that year. From 1873 to 1878 we had Mr. Mackenzie and from 1878 to 1891 we had Sir John A. Macdonald, with successive Conservative administrations until 1896. From 1896 to 1911 we had a Liberal administration under the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It therefore becomes pertinent, nay, essential, that we should inquire as to the construction which parliament has placed upon that provision. If we can, by reference to the records or to the statements of public men of representative administrations, arrive at conclusions, they will be a help and a guide to assist us in discharging difficult and similar obligations and duties.

First of all, we find that we were admitting new provinces to the confederation. Only three years had elapsed until the Manitoba Act was passed. This is a very important act as it provided the conditions that would obtain in Manitoba with respect to the use of language. It will be remembered that in the statute creating that province special provision was made for the use of the French language. Some of my hon. friends seem to be unaware of that fact. They do not seem to realize that the Manitoba Act as passed in 1870 contained this provision, which will be found in the constitutional documents of Canada at page 69, and which reads:

Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the legislature, and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process, in or issuing from any court of Canada established under the British North America Act, 1867, or in or from all or any of the courts of the province. The acts of the legislature shall be printed and published in both those languages.

This was the constitutional legislation under which the Conservative government of that day brought the province of Manitoba into being. Bear in mind that that was in 1870, only three years after confederation became an actuality. This act was continued until circumstances to which I shall presently allude came into being.

The province of British Columbia was admitted into confederation in 1871, but no provision of a similar kind was included in its constitution. On the contrary, the address merely provided that the provisions of the British North America Act should prevail. That is all that may be said with respect to that. But an agitation grew up in western Canada. Why? I shall not answer that question. In 1890 the legislature of Manitoba, under Liberal leadership, enacted a statute which reads as follows:

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the legislative assembly of the province of Manitoba, enacts as follows:

1. Any statute or law to the contrary notwithstanding, the English language only shall be used in the records and journals of the house of assembly for the province of Manitoba, and in any pleadings or process in or issuing from any court in the province of Manitoba. The acts of the legislature of the province of Manitoba need only be printed and published in the English language.

2. This act shall only apply so far as this legislature has jurisdiction so to enact, and shall come into force on the day it is assented to.

What followed?

Mr. THORSON: Have there not always been very grave doubts as to the validity of that statute?

Mr. BENNETT: I am not discussing that phase of the matter. I am merely giving the historical view of the exact facts. I desire to remove my observations as far as possible from political considerations and to recite the facts just as they are, leaving them to speak for themselves. That was in 1890. There grew up at once an agitation on behalf of the minority, who felt that they had been deprived of privileges and rights that had been taken from them, an agitation that this legislation should be disallowed. There were presented to the government of the day petitions signed by leading citizens and members of parliament, by the Archbishop of St. Boniface and others, but the laws were left to their operation, and that statute, for whatever it may be worth, is part of the law of Manitoba to-day. It is not my duty or my business to express any opinion as to its validity; I must content myself with merely saying that there it is as part of the statute law of that province. As I say, that was in 1890. I did not go west until 1897, but I still recall that even seven years after the passing of that statute there were agitations in various parts of the west with respect to that law. But it survived and it is still, for whatever it may be worth, a part of the statute law of the province of Manitoba.

I have already dealt with British Columbia. When the two new provinces came into being, with respect to the question of language it was merely provided that the provisions of the British North America Act should apply, and there it rested. But in the meantime it was, of course, to be expected that in this parliament there would be many questions raised and many debates promoted for the purpose of discussing the situation, and in 1890 a debate took place upon the introduction of a bill by the late Dalton McCarthy in which he provided that the grant of powers given the Northwest Territories in 1877, which made provision for the use of both languages, should be maintained. Mr. McCarthy moved the first reading of a bill for the purpose of terminating those rights and privileges as defined in the act of 1877. It was at that time that there took place the debate to which the Minister of Justice referred the other evening, the debate in 1890. It was then that Sir John A. Macdonald made the observations to which the hon. gentleman referred, and those observations are as true and pertinent to-day as when Sir John Macdonald uttered them. There was no conquered race in 1890; there is none to-day. Successive generations have taken the place of the first generation that lived and had its being in the province of Quebec in 1763. But here we had, precipitated into the chamber in the old building, at the instance of Mr. McCarthy, a discussion with respect to language in the Northwest Territories. Finally, on the motion of Sir John Thompson, seconded by Sir Adolphe Chapleau, then Secretary of State, the matter was left to the choice of the people, the choice of the legislature, the choice of those who should take the place of the representatives of the people after the general election, freedom of choice, the right of self-determination. That was left, at the instance of Sir John Thompson, in his amendment, seconded by Sir Adolphe Chapleau, to the motion of Mr. McCarthy, as the proper determination of that issue; and those of us familiar with the history of Sir Adolphe Chapleau will not for a moment say that he had not a burning zeal for his countrymen and as great a desire to promote their fortunes and their interest as any man within the sound of my voice, no matter where he may come from. I repeat, that was in 1890.

We are all familiar with the difficulties that arose out of the so-called Manitoba school question; we all remember the passing by a Liberal administration of the school laws of Manitoba; we all recall the judgment of the privy council, and none of us can fail to remember that that court decided that the rights of minorities had been prejudicially affected. Nor will any deny that the Conservative party of that day staked its existence and lost upon fidelity to the constitution. What is more, so fair were the Canadian people in their attitude to that question that when the votes were counted it was found that ouside the province of Quebec the Conservative government had been maintained in its position. The majority of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, for a reason which need not now be discussed and which has never been explained, was a majority that depended upon the votes he succeeded in obtaining at that time in the province of Quebec. That was the position in 1896.

Now let us see what interpretation was placed upon the provisions of this law by others after that. We have, for instance, what was referred to this afternoon, and which seems to me to be fairly important. We have a question asked by Mr. Paquet on May 31, 1905, of the government of the day, presided over by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Minister of Finance of which was William Stevens Fielding, one of his most trusted lieutenants. I direct the attention of this chamber carefully to the words of the questions and answers given. Remember, I am giving a chronological record, and this was in 1905. The questions put to the government were these:

1. Do any grave reasons of state exist that might prevent the Minister of Finance from having the dominion one and two dollar notes or all other bank notes printed simultaneously in English and French?
2. Are they unaware in the Finance department that the two languages are official in Canada
3. Is it the intention of the Minister of Finance to rectify in the future this state of things by ordering that those bank notes be printed in the both languages, English and French?

To that the Hon. W. S. Fielding, Minister of Finance, replied:

There is nothing in the British North America Act or in any act of the parliament of Canada which requires or contemplates the printing of dominion notes in two languages. The Finance department has not contemplated the advisability of any departure from the practice which has existed under all governments from the beginning of confederation down to the present time.

Those questions and those answers will be found at page 6826 of Hansard of May 31, 1905. May I pause for a moment to direct the attention of my fellow-members of this chamber to the significance of that language. It was not necessary for Mr. Fielding to use, speaking as he was for the administration, the exact words he did; he could have answered the question very simply. But instead of that he said:

There is nothing in the British North America Act or in any act of the parliament of Canada which requires or contemplates the printing of dominion notes in two languages.

That is a complete answer by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government to the position which has been taken in this chamber and elsewhere with respect to this matter. There is nothing under the constitution; there is nothing in any act of parliament that either contemplates or provides for the printing of bank notes in the two languages.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is there anything that prevents it?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer to that is simple; in the absence of a provision for its authorization it is not authorized.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is very generous.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the answer made by Mr. Fielding. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, I am not for a moment putting my interpretation on anything; I am merely reading the record as it is chronologically. I am merely placing on Hansard my answer to the charge of bigotry hurled at me this afternoon by the Prime Minister of Canada. There are the questions and there are the answers. There is the interpretation of the constitution given directly in answer to questions which, as I say, need not have been answered in these terms but which were answered in the terms I have indicated.

But the matter did not end there. Obviously it would not. Those of us who knew the late Armand LaVergne and know Mr. Bourassa realized that in 1905 and years following, when they were members of this parliament, such a question would ultimately be raised. So a few years later the question was raised in this parliament. It was in 1905 that Mr. Fielding dealt with it as I have indicated. In 1907 the matter was again brought to the attention of parliament, and members of this house have referred to the matter on more than one occasion. In Hansard of that session, volume 2, there is a record of the discussion. The then hon. member for Nicolet, Mr. Devlin, had formerly been a member of the imperial House of Commons. Many of us in this chamber remember him; he was here when I came to the house in 1911. He referred to the fact that outside the British House of Commons speeches were not infrequently made in Welsh. He did not say so, but the fact is that speeches north of the Tweed are sometimes made in Gaelic.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why not?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, why not? And Mr. Devlin was referring to that fact.

Mr. McINTOSH: A sign of universal culture.

Mr. BENNETT: He then said, speaking of Canada—and I quote his words because he was a very precise gentleman:

Here the French language is official and recognized by all; consequently there is no occasion to fight in order to ensure its recognition.

That is on page 3653 of Hansard of 1907. It became essential, of course, that the leader of the government, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, should speak upon the question. Sir Wilfrid did not deliver a lengthy speech, but he dealt with this very issue, and in language that indicates clearly the interpretation which he placed upon the constitutional powers which had been conferred upon his fellow-citizens and upon the parliament of Canada. On February 25, as reported at page 3655 of Hansard of 1907, he used these words:

But to affirm, as he does, that the French language should be used upon every occasion, and that every public document should be printed on one side in French and the other side in English, is, I think, going a little too far. For instance, I understand that my hon. friend wants bank notes to be printed either in French or in English. For my part I never yet saw an occasion where a bank note printed in English was not properly understood by the French people; and I am quite sure that a bank note printed in French would be understood by the English people to be exactly what it means. But I see no reason why a bank note should not be printed in French. Since we have been in office we have not had occasion to issue a new form of bank notes, we have taken the old form as we found it, we have continued the form of the old bank notes. I do not see any reason why, if we were to issue a new form, we should issue it in one language rather than another. But I would say to my hon. friend that it is far better that we should be conservative in these matters and not to change our forms every now and then. We should keep the old form when it contributes towards security and public convenience, and when it is well understood. I do not think there has been any change in the form of the English bank note for over a hundred years.

At the close of his speech, when he moved the amendment to which reference was made this afternoon, he used these words:

But to come back to what I have already said, I do not insist for my part that the French language should be written and spoken everywhere. It is not necessary to use French where every one understands English. But obviously the French should be used when it is more convenient for the people. So far I am disposed to agree with my hon. friend. But I must protest against the idea that because bank notes are not printed in French as well as English, the French language is not on a footing of equality with the English.

That was in 1907, only four years before Sir Wilfrid Laurier went out of office. In the meantime the discussions had assumed a far wider range than was originally intended, and had spread to many parts of the country. I do not think for a moment that as a result of those discussions there was, outside of Quebec, any manifestation of a desire that the bank notes should be printed in French as well as in English. But as far as I can understand the matter, at that time there was no discussion in parliament at any great length, although the issue was raised incidentally on two or three other occasions.

There was an administrative matter that had to be dealt with, and the other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) referred to the election of 1930 and left the impression that he had heard his opponent make the statement that certain changes would take place in connection with the issue of money orders and postal notes. I have not received full details, but I am advised that the hon. gentleman and his opponent were never in a joint meeting during the campaign, and Mr. Turnbull says that no such language was used by him. What is more, he has written the Minister of Finance to that effect.

Mr. DUNNING: He has. And I have replied to him, too.

Mr. BENNETT: I should think so. I should think the hon. gentleman would be courteous enough to do that.

Mr. DUNNING: That was one of the major points in the campaign.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it was not. I shall now deal with the question of administration.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What about the Regina Star campaign?

Mr. BENNETT: Well, if it was raised in Saskatchewan it certainly did not equal the attempt that was made to carry on the war in Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Thank you for saying that.

Mr. BENNETT: It certainly did not. For I recall the dispatch that was sent to the newspaper La Presse; I spent much time and effort to find out who wrote it, from London, and I can tell the hon. gentleman, if he desires to know, who wrote that vicious dispatch.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The people of Quebec know about it. They will decide on what my right hon. friend says.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad to hear that, because I am to be deterred neither by threats nor by any other effort that may be made to prevent me from doing what I conceive to be my duty, and I am not in any sense influenced by the threats of the Minister of Justice. But I say to him that that dispatch about the "Nile voyageurs" and the efforts that were being made to utilize French-Canadians in an impending war—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What has that to do with this issue?

Mr. BENNETT: —which appeared in the newspaper La Presse from London was something that was disgraceful alike to the author and to those who circulated it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What has that to do with this question?

Mr. BENNETT: I have mentioned it because the minister interjected something with respect to the campaign.

I now deal with the administrative side of the post office, for I had occasion carefully to consider it during my term of office. The word "postes" first appeared upon Canadian postal stamps in 1927. It was on the historical and pictorial issues, and did not at that time have on it the engraving of the king's head. There were various engraved scenes. One was the fathers of confederation; another was the parliament buildings; there was one of Macdonald, one of Laurier, and one with a map of Canada. I took the trouble to satisfy myself as to when that first appeared upon a postage stamp. My information was that it was about the twenty-ninth day of June, 1927. Then came the question of the word appearing upon a postage stamp that carried the king's head. That first appeared on October 17, 1928. It was a green two cent stamp. The remainder were issued at a subsequent date. Then we had the great tercentenary stamps of 1908, which as a matter of courtesy were issued entirely in French. Now we come to the question of postal cards, post-cards so-called. The first bilingual post-cards were issued in January, 1912. It was a general issue. Protests came into the department of the Postmaster General from English provinces, and on December 16, 1917, Mr. Lemaire, who was then superintendent of the postal branch, on the authority of the Postmaster General, then Doctor Coulter, instructed that from December 17, 1917, bilingual cards were to be issued to Quebec and well known French communities elsewhere, and the others were to be in English. Then in the office at Ottawa bilingual post-cards were sold. Certain protests were made in 1919 and as a result we had a change by which, following the general practice, from 1923 on offices were divided into three classes, English, French and bilingual. To the English offices only English supplies were supposed to be sent; to the French offices French supplies were to be sent, and where there was a mixed population of English and French supplies in each language were sent in such proportions as were regarded as necessary to meet the requirements which might arise.

I am bound to say, Mr. Speaker, that I believe that system worked out satisfactorily, because it is still in effect. My inquiries a few months ago led me to believe—and I take it to be so yet—that as new offices came into being they were classified either as English, French or bilingual, and the supplies were dealt with accordingly. That is hardly true, however, with respect to money orders. Money orders are in international use, which obviates the necessity of having them printed separately in the two languages. Bilingual money orders have been in use and are in use at present; they have been bilingual in Quebec since 1881 and generally since the first day of July, 1882. Postal notes for domestic circulation have been bilingual since 1906, when they were introduced. As far as forms are concerned, they have been dealt with in the manner I have indicated, English for the English, French for the French, bilingual for communities where there were both French and English. Unfortunately, however—and at one time I was not sure that it was not done with purpose—sometimes French forms were circulated in English offices, and there was much trouble. Sometimes English forms were sent to French offices, and there was trouble; sometimes only English or French forms were circulated to offices listed as bilingual. Great difficulties were experienced, which caused much trouble. Letters were written to the newspapers, and matters of that sort.

That is the sort of thing which creates more disharmony than almost anything else of which I have knowledge. That sounds like a very small thing, yet in my mail to-day I received a letter from Toronto complaining of the fact that the notices enclosed, both in French, had been sent from Montreal to a Toronto merchant with respect to a communication which had been dealt with by the district office. That is a plain blunder, but that is one of the difficulties which make for disharmony. That is one of the things which have brought about a great deal of this unfortunate discussion. Someone has blundered. On more than one occasion while I was in office in this country I took the opportunity to impress upon our friends who were responsible for distribution that they should try to see that no such mistake occurred. I recall vividly a protest from a Scotsman residing in an outlying section who went to his office, one in which there were no French-speaking people, and received a communication in French. He was very much annoyed about it, and he made a great deal of noise about it. That is the sort of thing which should be prevented. That is that sort of thing which brings about the very difficulties to which I have alluded. Take the question of signs on post offices. They never have been welded together as one sign. There has been one sign "Post Office" and another "Bureau de Poste." The two signs have been used in bilingual offices, the French sign only in French offices and the English sign only in English offices. One of the difficulties that has arisen has been brought about by some officious person trying to see what could be done, I sometimes think, to make trouble, taking one of the French signs into an English community and putting it up on the post office. That has created difficulty; that has brought about trouble. I say, Mr. Speaker, that at times I almost felt that this was done purposely, but of course I could not say it was because there was no evidence to that effect. Undoubtedly, however, it is these small things that have been conducive to preventing the harmony, shall I say, that otherwise should and would exist. The general effort of the Post Office Department has been to regulate as far as possible the distribution of supplies in order to prevent such occurrences, and I think it behooves every member of this house to use his or her influence to the uttermost to ensure, if possible, that accidents such as these will not happen. They look small, I repeat; they seem insignificant, but, as has been pointed out in parliament on more than one occasion, such accidents have been the cause of much difficulty.

That was the condition with respect to administration in connection with the post office. There was an effort made to maintain the principle which was the foundation of the whole position, that there should be freedom of choice. That is, in the communities which were entirely French, on the basis of equality with their English-speaking fellow-Canadians they should have in their offices these forms and documents in their own tongue; the English should have their documents in their tongue, and in communities where there were both French and English they should have bilingual forms or documents. That, at least, has been the aim on the part of the post office authorities. Other branches of the public service were dealt with in the same way.

When Sir Wilfrid Laurier was speaking in 1907 he referred to the fact that we had bills printed in English and in French. He did not think it desirable or necessary that they should be printed in English on one side and in French on the other. I pointed out previously, as I do again, that the orders of the day, the bills and the proceedings of this house are open to the choice of the members of this chamber. A member can select whatever form he or she desires, an English form, a French form, a bill in the French language, a bill in the English language, the orders of the day in one language or the other. That is freedom of choice, of selection. That is the right that both Prime Ministers in days gone by, Sir John A. Macdonald, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, felt to be the proper way to deal with these problems so far as these conditions were concerned.

In 1934 we introduced into this parliament a bill dealing with a central bank, the Bank of Canada. That bill contemplated the creation of a bank which ultimately would be the only bank of issue. That is, by 1940, I think it is, the major part of the notes circulating in this country will be notes of the Bank of Canada. There will still be notes of the chartered banks circulating in Canada, but the bill provided, as the Minister of Justice pointed out, that these Bank of Canada notes should be legal tender, and there were other considerations which induced the then government to apply the principle that had been applied since 1867 and to afford to our fellow-citizens of French-Canadian origin an opportunity to obtain from the Bank of Canada notes printed and engraved in the French language. The statute provided that the Bank of Canada was always to have in stock, on hand, bills in both English and French so that they might be available as required. The vital words were "as required"; they should be there as required. They might not be required west of the lakes; they might be required only in small quantities or in small numbers. They might not be required to any great extent in the maritime provinces. They might be required in large numbers in New Brunswick, and very few might be required in Nova Scotia. They might be required in limited numbers in Prince Edward Island. But every branch of the Bank of Canada was in a position to meet the demands which would be made upon that bank for notes either in English or in French, as might be required. I repeat: The vital words were "as required."

I say that nothing could have been a fairer approximation to even-handed justice, as we proceeded with the interpretation of section 133 and other sections, bearing in mind what was said by Mr. Fielding, than to accord—and I use the word "accord" out of deference to the statement of my hon. friend—to our fellow-citizens of French origin the right to require notes of the Bank of Canada printed or engraved in the French language.

The Minister of Justice did not like my use of the word "concession." I did not use the word in any offensive sense; I used it in the sense in which one says, "I concede that point" or "I concede a point." And the parliament of Canada conceded the request that there should be afforded to fellow-Canadian citizens of French origin the right to obtain notes of the Bank of Canada engraved in the French language. That was conceding a point, and it was not using the word "concession" in any different sense from that of the word "forbearance" was used by Sir Antoine Dorion when he was discussing a question as to what might happen. The word was used not for the purpose of giving offence to the hon. member, but rather for the purpose of indicating that the government of the day was prepared to ask the parliament of Canada to concede the point. The point was the request that our fellow-Canadian citizens of French origin should be able, as required, to obtain notes printed or engraved in the French language.

The government of to-day takes the view that that should be ended. It has had but a short time in which to be tried. It was a distinct advance over the attitude taken by Mr. Fielding and it went even beyond the contemplations of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Certainly it was the greatest advance, so far as my hon. friends of French-Canadian origin are concerned, that had been made in Canada. For, as required, it gave them the right to receive from the Bank of Canada, or through the banks to receive from the Bank of Canada bills of that bank engraved in the French language.

The government of to-day through its Prime Minister and Minister of Justice says, "We have here a great majority; we represent a majority of the people of Canada; representing a majority of the people of Canada we propose to change all this and make a bilingual bill." I endeavoured to indicate what happened in western Canada in 1890, and in view of what has happened in this parliament the date is significant. I indicated what had happened with relation to the constitutional provision of the Manitoba Act of 1870, and I indicated, without repeating to-night what I said a few days ago, the protests that were made against the postal cards when they were made bilingual, and the action taken to try to placate, if you will, that position, and to bring about improved and harmonious relations between the two great peoples in this dominion. Although Mr. Fielding took the view that we should still cling to our English notes; although the notes of the Dominion of Canada were legal tender, and had always been legal tender, and although the ones, twos, hundreds, fifties, and thousand dollar bills were legal tender and the medium of exchange and settlement between bank clearing houses—although all this was so, the government of 1934 took the view that we would meet the requirements of our fellow-Canadian citizens of French origin by providing them, through every branch of the Bank of Canada, with bills engraved and printed in the French language. We took the view that to bring about the change to which I have directed attention we would not arouse the resentment which had arisen, out of the use of bilingual post cards, from the English speaking provinces.

We took the view that we would take every step possible to prevent that, by making it possible for the English-speaking provinces and those of English-speaking origin, and others, to receive English notes or notes engraved or printed in English, on the one hand, as against the requirements of their neighbours who have their notes printed or engraved in French. I wonder whether hon. members realize that that was not an easy step for a government to take? There were those who were opposed to that action. Notwithstanding the answer given by Mr. Fielding, the government of the day believed that it was desirable, in the interests of national solidarity and harmony between peoples, that we should provide those who were of French origin and extraction, if they so required and so desired, with notes printed or engraved in their language. It was the language of their childhood, the language they learned at their mothers' knees, and to meet their wishes we took this step.

At this point I must make it clear that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice were not quite fair when they suggested what they did with respect to majorities and minorities. They know perfectly well that what I was dealing with was the question of the majority of the population of this country being of British descent and the minority being of French descent, and that it is an axiom that where the will of the minority is imposed upon the majority, except by invitation, acquiescence or the assistance of that majority, the result has always been disharmony. There has been no exception to that. The evidence of history, whether we take that of Europe or other parts of the world, has indicated the truth of that statement, and when there is the evidence that we have as to the resentment of the majority in the English provinces against bilingual post-cards in the manner

I have indicated, it gives some true illustration of just why the action I have indicated was taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was taking exception not to the will of the majority as contrasted with the will of the minority, but to the right hon. gentleman saying that the will of the majority necessarily represented the point of view that he is putting forward.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not for a single minute so foolish as to say that I represent the will of the majority. I never endeavoured to say any such thing, but I endeavoured to indicate what my own convictions were. I have tried to make it clear in this chamber why I hold this view, and if any power of mine could induce my French-Canadian friends to realize the soundness of their present position I would sacrifice almost anything for the purpose of doing so, because I believe the step that is being taken is one which is injurious to them. That is my personal belief. I do not put forward that as a belief which the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Justice must accept, far from it. But this I do say: The government that sits yonder represents less than thirty-five out of every one hundred names on the voters' lists, according to a report issued the other day in one of the political science journals.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not thirty-five out of every hundred voting.

Mr. BENNETT: Less than thirty-five out of every hundred whose names are on the voters' lists.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But not thirty-five out of every hundred who voted.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not represent fifty per cent of the total vote. Let there be no confusion. I merely said that in a political science magazine there was a careful review of the situation and it showed that not thirty-five out of every hundred whose names are on the voters' lists of this country voted for the government of the day, but the government did obtain nearly half, not quite half, the votes that were cast. In 1930 the Liberal party polled 46·8 per cent of all the votes that were polled, and in 1935 it polled 46·2 per cent of all the votes that were polled.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is pretty consistent.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, consistent, but not with the results. I do not put the matter forward in that sense, nor would I have any of my fellow-members in this house for a moment think I ventured to assert that those who sit to the left of the Speaker represent the majority opinion of this country. I am only pointing out what my own conviction is with regard to this matter, and I do so without the slightest shade of ill will. I say that I yield in a sense of tolerance to no man in this house, but I arrive at conclusions from carefully analyzing the history of my country. When in 1934 we arrived at the conclusion that we should take the step we did, we believed that to impose the will of this parliament upon the majority of those who live west of the lakes would be fraught with the greatest danger to harmony and good will and to peaceful contacts between peoples in the development of Canada. I have tried to make that as clear as I can because it represents my considered personal opinion, but I have not endeavoured to press my opinion upon others. I have endeavoured in moderate terms, as contrasted with the words of abuse that were hurled at us to-day, to present the case historically as it is, chronologically as it is, and to ask the members of this house to vote accordingly. It is no good to ask because it is well foreseen what the result of the vote will be. But I place before them the position as it is, and each one in his own conscience must answer whether or not in a community that is overwhelmingly British the circulation of notes of that kind is not fraught with the gravest danger to harmony between races in other parts of Canada. In the very nature of things, as the agitation proceeds, it will grow as it did in 1890, and I wonder whether anyone would like to see again the conditions that were apparent in western Canada from 1896 to 1900. And remember, although the Conservative party risked its existence by remaining true to the constitution, it lost, but it has never had any regrets for having done so. I have never had any regrets for supporting the party in 1896 in the views which it took. I was a very young man then, and I supported the party because I believed that the best assurance of peaceful relations between the descendants of the two great races in this country is to be found in each giving to the other the least possible cause for offence. That is what I said. I use the word "offence" in no narrow sense. I could not help thinking, as I reviewed these matters in my own mind, as most other men have too, no doubt, of that great saying. "Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth." If by reason of imposing this bilingual bill upon the majority in the western provinces and in other parts of Canada you bring about the condition which, from what I have seen followed in 1890, I am certain must follow, knowing these things, realizing these things, understanding them, I say, sir, that I would be derelict to myself and my own self-respect if I did not say to my fellow-members of this house: I cannot do this thing because it will militate against harmony; it will be a factor in destroying the friendly and peaceful relations that should exist in the development of this great country, and at a time when never before was there such necessity for good will being manifest. I agree with what was said by one hon. member to-day, that the problems which will confront this country for the next two years should not be overshadowed by internecine strife, by divisions based upon racial differences.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where is it?

Mr. BENNETT: I say it should not be.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where is it?

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman goes home he will find it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not afraid of British Columbia on this.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that we should not have our united strength lessened by internecine strife.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Who is creating it?

Mr. BENNETT: When the other day the Minister of Finance said that if there was any principle in this measure it was the one we adopted last year, he thereby says: We are adopting a principle which the late government embodied in its legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that. Read what I said.

Mr. BENNETT: This is what the hon. gentleman said:

> Naturally, a number of considerations were in the mind of the government in dealing with this matter and in drafting this particular section. I take the view that the question of principle, in so far as there is a principle, was adopted in the year 1934 by the parliament which preceded this one, but the principle was applied in a manner calculated, as experience has proved, to produce rather than to allay the kind of friction to which reference has been made.

Therefore the minister says that the principle, if there is a principle—

Mr. DUNNING: Was settled in 1934.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: —was the one which the late government put on the statute books in 1934. But to-day I am being held up in the province of Quebec as the enemy of the French-Canadian. I have already received communications. I know what the propaganda is; I know the political nature of it. Read your journals; read the reports.

Mr. DUNNING: And read the Regina Star.

Mr. BENNETT: Those who cheer so loudly have probably never seen the Regina Star.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, yes, unfortunately.

Mr. BENNETT: If it says anything good of the Finance minister, that is probably the reason he wishes me to read it, but if it does it would be sadly lacking in discrimination to discern it.

At any rate, let me go further. The minister had one defence, the question of economy. A smaller argument could not be used in a great national issue. It was almost impossible to credit one's ears—

Mr. DUNNING: It was entirely subsidiary.

Mr. BENNETT: —when one heard that argument being put forward.

Mr. DUNNING: It was entirely subsidiary.

Mr. BENNETT: I find it difficult to understand why the minister does not know how to keep order. Perhaps you will inform him, Mr. Speaker, as to how it should be done. It is not the custom in this parliament for men to mutter under their breaths inaudible sayings when another hon. member has the floor.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend does not set a very good example in that regard.

Mr. BENNETT: It may be the minister has learned it from him. He says that he learns many things from the schoolmaster.

May I go further and say that that argument is unworthy of being dealt with except merely to say that the plates are there already prepared, and I think the magnified sorting of a few bills into $9,000 or $10,000 does not indicate very careful consideration by those who made the report. It is not such a tremendous task as one would be led to believe. However I realize that the Minister of Justice was right this afternoon when he said that in the very nature of things, with a new sovereign, new bills would have to be prepared.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was it not the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) who raised the question of cost?

Mr. BENNETT: No; that was raised by the minister; the hon. member was trying to answer him. The minister deals with the matter at some length at page 3632 of Hansard. The hon. member for York South was merely answering the question raised by the minister. I pass it by merely by saying that that argument is wholly unworthy of the importance of the question being considered.

I have nothing further to say except to remark that I greatly deprecate the effort made to create a political issue out of this matter. I deprecate greatly the language that was used in this house with respect to this question. Even though the language used at that time was strong, Sir Wilfrid Laurier took occasion to congratulate the house upon the character and type of the debate that had taken place. I have endeavoured not to consciously give offence to any man by anything I have said. I respect the opinions of others even more than I expect them to respect mine. I am not unmindful of the sentimental claims and arguments that influence so many of my fellow-Canadians, but it is sometimes desirable to consider problems of great importance, small though they may seem at the moment, in the light of what the experience of the past has taught us. Those familiar with the great events that have followed in English history, in French history or in the history of other nations on the continent realize that sometimes the start was very small but the result was devastating. Because I yield to no man in my anxiety to see this country grow and prosper and develop and knowing that I shall be made the target of much abuse, as has happened already, and misrepresentation, despite what has been said as to the principle having been adopted by the government last year, I would be recreant in my duty if I neglected the opportunity that devolves upon me in the position which I occupy to bring to the attention of my fellow-members the reasons that induced me to arrive at the conclusion which I have reached, free, I think, from bias and prejudice, and actuated only by the one earnest desire, the welfare, prosperity, peace and happiness of every citizen of Canada.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I feel that it is to be regretted profoundly that such an agitation has been created in this parliament on such a question. It leads one to believe that in reality we have not been making very much progress towards a better understanding among the nations of the world when we have such a discussion in the parliament of a nation of only nine million population. I find it strange that the distinguished gentleman who leads the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has found it necessary to make a second speech on this question. With all due respect to him and with all the profound consideration that I have for his personality, I do not believe he improved what he said the other day and I do not think he has said anything which would justify the position he has taken.

For an hour and a half he has entertained the House of Commons on the lack of authority that this government has to propose such legislation. He gave us a lecture on what was said by the framers of the constitution. He read extracts from the resolutions which preceded confederation. He did all this to establish the fact that we have no right to do what he himself did in 1934. If we are not entitled to French or bilingual notes, I ask my right hon. friend what his justification was for introducing the legislation he introduced in 1934 to provide for two issues of notes, one in French and one in English.

Reference has been made to the last election campaign. During that campaign we were told by supporters of the right hon. gentleman that what he had done for the French-Canadian was much greater than what had been done by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the members of the Liberal government in general. Those who were candidates in the last election or who followed the campaign in the province of Quebec know that my right hon. friend and his ministers proclaimed all over that territory that he had gone to a much greater length than any Liberal government would have gone. We are now informed by the right hon. gentleman that he did less and that it was intended to be less than what was proposed by the Liberals in 1934.

I do not like hearing my right hon. friend say that upon such things as forms issued in French by the Post Office Department depend the harmony of Canada. If the harmony which exists to-day among all the citizens of our country is not strong enough to stand the issuing of French forms by the Post Office Department in place of an English form, then it is not worth while being preserved.

It may be true that under the strict letter of the law we cannot claim this right, but in all British countries and in all British institutions there has always been something besides the strict interpretation of the law. Usages and customs many times change the cold letter of the law. It is the history of British institutions that the dead letter of the law has been modified or been given some life by usage and practices which have developed in parliaments as well as in other institutions in the British empire. It has been said that a concession has been made to the French people of Canada; the right hon. gentleman has said that he made a concession in 1934 when he authorized the printing of bills in French as well as in English. Even if it was a concession, even if it was a generous concession that he made at that time, are we not entitled to-day, by reason of our contribution to the life of Canada in what we have been trying to do to help to develop this country and to bring harmony, peace and good will among the Canadian people, to some recognition and to see occasionally the concessions granted us enlarged to some extent with a view to fostering a greater feeling of understanding among Canadian citizens? Even if it was a concession, I say that we were entitled to that concession; and when we speak here of such concessions I would only ask my English-speaking fellow-countrymen to pay a visit some time to the province of Quebec where they will see what the word "concession" means. They will see there how the minority of the province of Quebec has been treated by the French majority. There is no question such as this one being raised in Quebec on any issue; we are ready to co-operate with our English-speaking fellow-citizens of that province, and there is no question of limiting the rights of minorities, no question of trying to promote harmony through the curtailment of rights, no question of trying to promote harmony through the diminution of initiative. We are making concessions in that province and greater concessions than we are asking the parliament of Canada to grant in favour of the French in this country. One has only to read the history of Canada to be convinced of the concessions that we have been making and are still making. Forms printed in French may be sent accidentally to English sections of the country, but forms are printed in both languages. I may say that in Quebec we have had and still have high officers of the federal government who do not speak a word of French but who have to deal with the French population of that province. There is a greater limitation of our rights than is involved in the issue of a form in one language. We have stood for that condition for a number of years and we are still standing for it, not asking for the dismissal of English-speaking superior officers in all departments in the province of Quebec, officers who do not speak the French language. We are doing our part to bring about a better understanding among all the citizens of Canada, and I cannot believe that a bilingual note of the Bank of Canada is going to disturb the harmony which now exists. If we were to follow the law as it is at present and issue French notes, these notes would be legal tender and would have circulation in Ontario, and they would have to be accepted as legal tender by Ontario and by the provinces of the west. Is it a greater insult to have a bilingual bill presented to creditors in Ontario than to have entirely French bills given them, as might happen if we left the law as it stands now?

There is no danger of destroying the harmony that has existed among Canadian citizens. I had thought that our country was big enough to enable us to think of something else and to forget the small differences which have caused us so many difficulties in the past. I had thought that those difficulties had been removed and that there had grown up a better understanding of the points of view and the dispositions of the different sections of the country. Can we not in this year of grace 1936 look upon these problems in the British frame of mind instead of carrying into practice the old forgotten colonial spirit that existed long ago? I certainly thought the days of the colonial spirit had gone and we had reached a point where we could regard ourselves as all equal in this country without criticizing certain privileges, if you will, or certain concessions made to minorities. British institutions have been maintained throughout the world and England has kept its authority and power over the world not by restricting the liberties of people coming into the realm of the empire but by extending their liberties. The gospel of England has never been restriction, it has been the opposite, and it is by that bond of generosity and good will and the generous interpretation of statutes and treaties that England is to-day able to maintain its authority over so many countries in the civilized world. There are no races, no creeds, no colours in the British empire; there are human beings, whose well-being it has been the object of British institutions to further.

I hope that this little tempest will pass, and I sincerely regret that an amendment has been introduced at this stage of the legislation. The matter had been discussed very well in moderate terms by the leader of the opposition on the previous occasion. Why come forward on the third reading and raise a new issue, precipitating a full dress debate on this motion? As the leader of the opposition admitted, the bill is there and it is going to pass and become law because it is supported by the majority. It was supported on the second reading; it was supported in committee and after the third reading it will become law. Why then raise this issue by an amendment on the third reading? I hesitate to answer that question; with my limited knowledge of English I might incur the Speaker's displeasure. We should not look upon this country from the point of view of figures and numbers, from the point of view of majorities or minorities. We should look upon it as a whole and in that spirit which we are trying to foster in order to develop this wonderful land that is ours, the land called Canada. We should forget as much as possible the small difficulties of 1890. Let us forget the past; let the difficulties of 1890 be forgotten in 1936, when we are living in a new world. Let us forget all these small things and unite to bring about a better condition of things in Canada. We are fortunate enough to have in this country descendants of the two greatest races of the civilized world, the French and the English-speaking people of Canada. Let us be proud of that situation in which we are, and instead of fighting one another, instead of depriving one part of any of its privileges, if you will, or, if you prefer, of the concessions that have been made to it, let us unite in order to evoke the best that is in every one of our citizens, so that we may face the problems of the day and provide a greater measure of happiness for the people of Canada.

I am not ashamed of being of French descent; I do not propose to excuse myself for that. It is an accident of nature, which accident, I consider, is a happy one. I am as good a citizen as anyone who has been born a British subject, another accident of nature, and a happy one also. I have no apology to offer; I am here because my ancestors were here first. They were the first ones to open this country to civilization, the first ones who started to build up a big country in this new land. I wish to respect the laws of my country and the laws of the British empire. As a French-Canadian I have always been respectful of the laws under which we have been called upon by Providence to live. In the province of Quebec we have a law-abiding population, and we have done our share, with the gifts we got from old France, a country with which we have no connection to-day except for the mind and possibly for the heart; nationally speaking we have no connections with them. But we have inherited from that race certain gifts of which we are proud, and we are ready to apply them to the benefit of our country, to join with all other Canadian citizens to build up a happy and prosperous Canada. Let me ask in the name of harmony—not harmony through reduction of privileges, of concessions, or of advantages —that we work together in a spirit which will associate the gifts of the two races for the upbuilding of a better Canada. Let us forget, in these difficult times through which we are passing, our small differences; let us not be divided by small things.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, with many other members of this house I regret the general trend of this debate. I deplore any discussion at this time that may tend to accentuate racial differences or arouse racial prejudices. I have no political axe to grind; I have only a very earnest desire to stand shoulder to shoulder with my fellow countrymen who speak and love the French language in the advancement of the common welfare of all the Canadian people. I have very clearly in mind the war efforts of our country in the years 1914 to 1918. In the Canadian corps there was no distinction in service or in sacrifice on the ground of racial origin. We were all Canadians; French-Canadians and English-Canadians alike gained a rare appreciation of each other's qualities, courage and loyalty, and there was achieved there a united effort in the service of the common cause which transcended other considerations and which in a large measure established in Canada a true national consciousness. I earnestly submit that at this time we should strive to attain that same spirit, that same tolerance, as we face our common problems in this dominion to-day.

An important suggestion was made this afternoon during the course of the debate in this house. The suggestion, which was made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), offers a satisfactory basis of compromise, and it conforms to the practice followed in other countries where they have bilingual difficulties. It enables the issue of a note which is in every sense of the word Canadian and which cannot by any manner or means offer offence to any citizen of this country. I propose to advance the suggestion by way of amendment. I feel that it offers members of this house an opportunity to evince the sincerity of their desire to maintain national harmony at this time. I move, therefore, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) an amendment to the amendment:

That there be added to the amendment the following words:

"and that there be substituted therefor a section to provide that the notes of the several denominations shall be in distinctive colours and designs and bear thereon no words other than 'Canada,' the appropriate numeral or numerals, the proper signatures, the serial number, and the year of issue."

I appeal to the government to accept this amendment that we may avoid any cause for racial dissension at this time.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): As one of the new members of the house, I have had the privilege during this session of listening during the greater part of the time. I think I am probably in agreement with all those who have sat in the house for the first time in saying that many things during this present session have astonished us. Earlier in the session the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was pleased to refer to the legislature in which I and some other members of this house served before coming to the House of Commons, as a house in which some things happened which do not happen in the House of Commons. In reply to that I can only say that there are some things happening in the House of Commons that do not happen in the legislatures of the provinces, and one of the peculiar things that do happen in this house, and more particularly during this session, is that we have been compelled during fifty-two per cent of the time to sit and listen to the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons speaking to members of this house. I do not know just why the leader of the opposition thinks it is necessary for him to take so much of the time of this house. If anyone were to mention the name of one of the ships in the British navy, the leader of the opposition would proceed to recite the names of all the ships in the British navy. If anyone refers to any section in any act that has ever passed the House of Commons, then the leader of the opposition proceeds to read all the legislation on that point that has been passed since the House of Commons came into being. And if anyone suggests placing upon the bills that are issued by the Bank of Canada a few words of the French language, then the leader of the opposition finds it necessary to read us a lecture on the whole history of the Dominion of Canada. He might have gone back a little further, and have demonstrated to us why it is that people throughout the dominion feel as they do when members of his party raise the question which has been raised in the house this afternoon and this evening. If he were to go a little further back over the history of this country, he would find the reasons for the remarks that were made a few moments ago by the minister who spoke from this side of the house, with regard to the founding of the country in which we live. Anyone who has within his veins a drop of British blood is proud of the fact that following the disagreement between the British colonies and the British government it was the French-Canadians along the St. Lawrence who preserved this country for the empire. In building up the different dominions of the empire the spirit of British fair play has seen to it that those peoples who were there before the British came have been allowed to develop in their own way in order to enjoy the full benefit of the establishment of British institutions.

This afternoon and this evening we have listened to hon. gentlemen opposite deal with the situation as it has existed and as it exists at the present time in Canada. In their own way they have been attempting to place at the door of members on this side of the house responsibility for the issue they are attempting to raise in this country. This is not the first time members of the Conservative party in Canada have sought to raise the issue they are now attempting to create from one end of this country to the other. If I wanted to occupy the time the right hon. leader of the opposition occupies with this kind of thing I could take hon. members back over the whole history of the Dominion of Canada and show that every time the Conservatives have found themselves in opposition they have seen to it that within a very short time a cry has been raised similar to the one they are raising on the floor of this house to-day. I do not need to go back over the whole history of Canada in order to prove my point. I need go back only to 1919, when the Liberal convention was held. I would remind the house that at that time eight of the provinces of Canada had Liberal legislatures, which is the condition that exists in Canada at the present time. That was the situation that existed in Canada when we were meeting here in convention for the purpose of choosing a leader for the Liberal party. One has only to follow the activities of the Conservative party after they went into opposition in 1921, to realize that in this country to-day we have the same situation and are seeing the same tactics on the part of those who are opposing Liberals from one end of Canada to the other.

In 1922 our friends opposite set out to return themselves to power. That is the privilege of any party which finds itself in opposition, but they sought to do so by a method which has been followed by that party, when in opposition, ever since confederation. Every member of this house who comes from New Brunswick will recall the type of campaign that was put on there in order to drive my hon. friend, who now sits in this house representing a constituency in New Brunswick, from the premiership of that province. Everyone knows the type of organization that was introduced into this country from the United States for the purpose of putting on that sort of campaign. Everyone in this house who has followed political history for the last few years recalls that following that experience in New Brunswick they carried on the same campaign in British Columbia. When the leader of the opposition was interrupted to-night by a remark made by a member on this side of the house coming from British Columbia, it will be recalled that the right hon. gentleman's reply was: "He will find out when he goes back home." Why will he find out? Because, as my right hon. friend knows, in every Conservative committee room in Canada to-day the same type of campaign is being prepared under his leadership. And then, not satisfied—

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, that statement is absolutely false, and I want it withdrawn.

Mr. GARDINER: Then, Mr. Speaker, not satisfied with having introduced that type of campaign into the two provinces I mentioned, what did my right hon. friend do? After he had become leader of the Conservative party in 1927, he went into Saskatchewan and, if I am not wrongly informed, consulted men in that province in order to find out what could be done there. A few hours ago I noticed an hon. gentleman opposite shaking the tips of his fingers to picture a great Conservative leader with blood dripping from the ends of his fingers as a result of some things that were supposed to have been done to him by members on this side of the house. Well, I always thought the man who drove the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen from public life in this country at that time was the right hon. leader of the opposition in this house, and he did it in a convention in the city of Winnipeg in 1927.

Immediately after having committed that act—whether or not it was beneficial to the Conservative party or the country I do not know—what did he do next? He acquired a newspaper in Saskatchewan, importing the entire editorial staff from British Columbia and Alberta. He set up that paper in order to do the very thing he has started out to do to-day in this house.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, that statement is absolutely untrue. Mr. Campbell, who now manages the Edmonton Bulletin, established that newspaper—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think Mr. Campbell has made the statement very clearly that while he set up that paper he left it at the end of five years because his term of employment had expired.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not true.

Mr. GARDINER: I think my right hon. friend knows who his employer was and where the money came from that employed him.

Mr. BENNETT: He was not my employee.

Mr. SPENCE: What has that to do with the Bank of Canada Act?

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend asks what that has to do with the Bank of Canada Act. Well, after having listened to his speech and to the speeches of others of his party it seems to me that when we are speaking on the Bank of Canada we have a great deal of leeway.

We now come to 1928, when this newspaper was acquired by my right hon. friend or the friends of my right hon. friend, if he does not wish to take the credit himself. A campaign was put on of the most scurrilous kind ever put on anywhere in the Dominion of Canada. When my right hon. friend says that there was nothing in the nature of religious and racial discussion in connection with the campaign waged by the Conservative candidate in the city of Regina in 1930 against the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), all I can say is that the right hon. gentleman could not have been in Regina during that campaign. But I happen to know that he was there, and I happen to know that the reaction to the type of campaign which was organized in that province swept his party in Saskatchewan entirely into oblivion in the year 1935. Not a single man of the group who introduced the campaign of his party in the province in 1929, and continued it in 1930, was returned to the legislature in 1934. Everyone was wiped out. I was just a little more successful in the province of Saskatchewan in dealing with the Conservative party, than was the leader of the opposition now in this house when he was leader of the opposition in the province of Alberta. I do not know whether or not he understands what that means. At one time the present leader of the opposition in this house was leader of the opposition in the province of Alberta, and I understand he led it down to a point where he had only one Conservative follower. Well, I was leader of the Liberal opposition in the province of Saskatchewan and I led it until there was not a Conservative left in the legislature.

An hon. MEMBER: Little wonder!

Mr. GARDINER: I think that justifies me in stating that the leader of the opposition has not been quite as successful in eliminating Conservatives as I.

That brings me back to the point of saying that when we deal with questions like this, these hon. gentlemen opposite are starting in again to build up the same kind of campaign in the Dominion of Canada as they started in to build up back in 1922, following the formation of the Liberal government of that day. They carried on that campaign from one province to another, throughout Canada, until they had established Conservative governments in a majority of the provinces.

But immediately after they had established those governments by the process I have indicated the people began to take stock, and they found from experience that the only reason the Conservative party had used that kind of tactics was for the purpose of dragging a red herring across the trail, and to take the attention of the people away from the real policies for the solution of difficulties in Canada.

Mr. SPENCE: You know how to do that.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) means when he says that we should get back to the discussion of the real issues before the people of Canada, and that we should get back to a discussion of the problems confronting our people. I think the quickest way back to a discussion of those problems is to deal with matters my right hon. friend brings before the house from time to time, to deal with them in a manner which shows up the practice he and his party have followed during times they have been in opposition before, and to call the attention of the house and the country to the fact that if we are going to allow these old issues of sectionalism, language, racial bigotry and racial misunderstanding to be dragged across the trail every time a real issue is before the people of Canada, we shall never solve our problems.

At all times in Canada the Liberal party has stood for the consideration of questions of this kind on a much higher level than that upon which they have been considered by hon. members opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARDINER: Something has been said to-night about the postage stamp. My right hon. friend has been telling us how post office orders were brought into being in bilingual form, but he did not tell us that prior to the election of 1930 every effort was being made by his followers throughout the length and breadth of Canada to win the election on the bilingual publication of the very documents of which he has been speaking. I remember in our province his followers used to come into the school, take postage stamps, show them to the children and point out to them that on one side of the stamp appeared the word "postes" and on the other the word "postage," the one word is in French and the other in English, and they pointed out that they meant exactly the same thing. They used to say, "If we are going to have harmony in Canada you will have to get that word off the postage stamp." Well, Mr. Speaker, for the time being the people of Canada saw to it that a Conservative government was placed in power. I would ask hon. members to look at any postage stamps which were issued after hon. members opposite were in power for five years. Take a look at them! What will you see? You will see that the word "postes" is still on one side and the word "postage" is on the other, but you will also see that there is a change in the postage stamp; there is a "three" on it, instead of a "two." Why is there a "three" on it, instead of a "two"? For the very good reason that the kind of talk to which we have been listening from hon. members opposite is the kind which brings people to think in terms that have nothing to do with the solution of our problem, and that invite in this country the same spirit which has divided the European continent into small nations, which has brought about misunderstanding, which has been responsible for the building of navies and the maintenance of armies, and which has brought about mistrust, misunderstanding, wars, suffering, high taxation and everything that go hand in hand with the reactionary policies of an organization such as that which sits opposite to us.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the history of the development of political propaganda of the kind we find to-day in Ontario, the kind we find beginning to work its way across the prairie provinces, the kind we find moving down towards the maritime provinces, the kind voiced by men sitting on the opposite side of the house. Men who sat through the discussion of the resolution preceding the bill, who sat through the discussion on the second reading of the bill and the discussion in committee, then, when the bill is presented for third reading, do the unusual thing of moving an amendment of such a kind as will draw the attention of all the people of Canada to the issue they want to raise across the country.

It is all very well for the leader of the opposition to stand up at the end of his speech and to attempt to bring the house back to a position where hon. members and the people throughout the dominion may think he is just a harmless dove spreading his wings over this country, and that he has no wrong intentions whatever. I remember that at an earlier stage in the development of this session he wanted to attribute some wrong desire, some wrong intention or some political motive to any person who mentioned his name. It is surprising to find that the leader of the opposition has political motives, at all. Yes, that is surprising. He raises his voice here on occasion after occasion; when we speak of judges, he talks. When we speak of anything, he talks. But those of us who come from western Canada know something about his past record. I heard him say a few minutes ago that he came to the west in 1897. I went there just four years later. I am not very big yet, but I was a smaller boy then. I remember that one of the first things I learned after reaching western Canada was that there was a gentleman named Mr. R. B. Bennett who represented a constituency in the territorial legislature which met at Regina. You know, we used to hear some remarkable things about him even then. And when I hear him talking about judges, and the ages of judges, there comes to my mind some of the men he must have in his mind, some of the men with whom he was associated in his earlier days in the western part of Canada. Now that I have an opportunity to do so, may I say to the right hon. gentleman that his discussion of that matter was on all fours with his discussion of this one. It is affected by some of the experiences he has had along his political road. The judges of whom he was speaking in certain terms yesterday, while they are a little older than he, can still meet any issue that is raised and still give proper consideration to questions, and, I might add, a consideration which will stand investigation on a question like this to better advantage than the consideration which is given by the leader of the opposition. Some of these men whom I have in mind have stood with us as we stand on this side of the house on the question we have been discussing in connection with this bill, a question which brings up in our minds the thought that we should treat all the people who come to our shores in that same spirit with which British governments everywhere have treated these people.

I have in my hand a copy of the Saskatchewan Journals and Sessional Papers, from which I should like to read one or two extracts for the benefit of those who have not been in the west as long as the leader of the opposition and myself. This is one. It is a statement that was made at the time when the present Prime Minister of Canada first contested a constituency in the province of Saskatchewan, and it is taken from a Conservative paper published in the city of Toronto:

> The only candidate who could carry a typical Saskatchewan Liberal constituency against the Liberal candidate, Hon. W. L. M. King, or other anti-Conservative candidate would be the Kaiser, the Crown Prince or Hindenburg. And not one of the three was nominated in Prince Albert.

That is one statement that was got out by our friends opposite.

Mr. DUNNING: To promote harmony.

Mr. GARDINER: That was to promote harmony. There are one or two other things here that would probably give one an idea of the type of campaign waged in Saskatchewan by our Conservative friends. This is another statement made by a gentleman who was appointed to the bench by the leader of the opposition just before the last federal election:

> An insidious program for French and Roman Catholic political control is going on quietly but surely in Saskatchewan and the people are kept in ignorance of the true situation by the government and the press.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I am quoting from a news item which appeared in the Regina Star. It goes on:

> For a temporary political advantage, the Saskatchewan government has sacrificed the future of this province and has sown seeds which will bear fruit in discord and strife in generations yet unborn.

That was in 1929. That was before we returned in the province of Saskatchewan a government which had the support of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition in this house. That was before we had returned a government in this country in 1930 under the leadership of the present leader of the opposition. We have had five years since that time to think about this kind of thing. We have had five years to contemplate what position this country would be in under another five years of the rule either of the gentlemen who were returned under that kind of program in Saskatchewan or of the government which came into power in Canada in 1930 under the present leader of the opposition. And with what result? When the election came in Saskatchewan in 1934 his party was entirely wiped out, and as a result of the election for the federal house in 1935, we are sitting here on this side in such numbers that the group sitting opposite to the right of the Conservatives could take a vote with my friends who belong to the Conservative party and win. That it seems to me, is the answer to the kind of prophecy we had back in 1929 and 1930, and the people of Canada having had that experience, this generation is not very likely to fall for the kind of campaign which is now being supported by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition in the hope that he may again be returned to power before he reaches the age of some of those judges he has been talking about who should be retired.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is a home run.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken as I have to-night for the purpose of calling the attention of the house to the position into which this sort of discussion leads us, and to indicate to my hon. friends opposite that they are not doing a service to the Dominion of Canada by starting a discussion of the kind that has taken place in this house this afternoon. They may succeed in defeating an odd Liberal government in Canada, but, after all, that is only an incident in the history of the Dominion of Canada. We have found from experience that it is an incident which the people of Canada remember for a long time because they are reminded of it every time they look at their tax bills for the next five or ten years afterwards. While they do remember such an experience for a considerable length of time afterwards, the one thing that we as a House of Commons and that parliament as a whole should remember, is that we should try to follow the traditions of the British house and the traditions of the British empire in its relations to peoples in every part of the world.

Every time I look at the union jack I am reminded of the fact that the three crosses upon the flag signify one of the most important unions that has ever taken place among the peoples of the world, important not so much because of the numbers who were brought into the union through bringing together the people of England and Scotland and Ireland, but important because of the great influence which it has had upon nations throughout the world. That flag, Mr. Speaker, stands for a union of peoples whether or not their languages, customs and laws are the same.

I might be pardoned standing in this House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada for calling attention to this further fact, that we have a great country to the south of us. They, too, have a flag and that flag has thirteen stripes upon it. Each one of those stripes stands for one of the original British colonies on the north American continent that were the foundations upon which that nation has been built. But when you look into the field of blue in the corner of the flag you see forty-eight stars, where at first there were only thirteen. Every time a new state was formed a star was added to the corner until to-day those stars represent forty-eight states, all under one flag, with one literature, if you like, with one set of ideals, with one set of laws, with one common purpose inspiring their people. I could go on and indicate to you, sir, that there is a union of sentiments, a union of ideals, a union of peoples.

Someone said this afternoon that there are more Germans or people of German descent in the United States than anywhere else in the world except perhaps in Germany itself. Someone else might have said that the same is true of Italians; someone else might have said that the same is true of many other nationalities which have gathered under that flag. The very fact that it is true; that many peoples have gathered and been able to live together under one flag, with common customs, with one set of ideals, with one literature, and with a community of sentiment, makes it all the more important that we in building this great country on the northern half of this continent should unite our people with common ideals by exercising towards all people who were here before the British came that practice of British fair play which the British themselves have extended everywhere throughout the world.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, having seconded the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), I wish to take just one or two moments to explain my stand on this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question!

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask hon. members kindly to keep order.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I have no intention of taking up a great deal of time, but hon. members opposite make it very difficult to proceed. I think they should give me sufficient order so that I may say what I have to say and what I intend to say. I have listened so long and so patiently to emotional spasms about British fair play, I would appreciate a little of it from hon. members opposite. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker; I have no wish to descend to that sort of thing.

Speaking to this subamendment, I wanted merely to say that I have been amazed, amused and, I am afraid a little pained to see this house spending a day and a half discussing what to many people in Canada is a very trivial aspect of this bill. There are hundreds of people across the prairies to-day who would be very glad to get money, no matter in what language it was printed. I cannot help feeling that if hon. members had used as much energy and as much heat in getting money into the pockets of the people as they have used in worrying about the language in which the money will be printed, we would be a great deal further ahead than we are at the closing days of this session. Personally, I do not care in what language our bills are printed. Being a Scotsman, I am glad to get a dollar whether it is printed in Siamese or Chinese, provided I can buy something with it.

I want to say to the government that there are people in this country, particularly in western Canada, who possess prejudices and antipathies which are very easy to arouse. We feel that this is a good time to let well enough alone, to let sleeping dogs lie. We have heard a great many recriminations to-night about the 1929 and 1930 elections. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) hurled across the floor in some derision the name of the Regina Daily Star. I wonder if I could remind hon. gentlemen opposite of the fact that in 1929 the editor of the Regina Daily Star, Mr. J. S. Cowper, who wrote such bitter editorials against the use of the French language, was a former Liberal member of the British Columbia legislature. Last August this same gentleman ran as a Liberal candidate in Alberta, and I understand he is now editor of the Edmonton Bulletin. I do not cite these facts for any political reasons because I am not implicated; I cite them to show that this arousing of antipathies in western Canada on the basis of race and religion has not been confined to any one party.

Mr. TURGEON: What party was that paper supporting when those articles were written? Can you answer that question?

Mr. DOUGLAS: I have not a very high opinion of the manners or intelligence of hon. gentlemen who insist on interrupting while a speech is being made.

Mr. TURGEON: I am asking an honest question which the hon. member will not answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The hon. gentleman knows without my saying that I had nothing to do with the party which was supported by that paper at that time. I point out that the man who edited the articles was a Liberal prior to that time and is a Liberal again to-day. I point out that antipathies can be aroused again. It is because we would like to see elections in western Canada fought on economic issues rather than on racial prejudices that I am making this plea at this time. Hon. members from western Canada who sit opposite know as well as I do that it would not be very difficult to arouse in western Canada the same issues that were aroused in 1929 and 1930. It is because we do not want to see them aroused that we are asking the government to reconsider very carefully the step they are taking.

Of what use is it for the Minister of Justice to speak very eloquently about unity when the government places before this house something that will cause disunity in certain parts of Canada? Of what use is it for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to speak about good will and at the same time insert in this bill a clause that will cause ill will in certain corners of Canada? I believe in a homogeneous people. I want to see, as I believe every hon. member wants to see, amity and good will among the Canadian people. But we suggest that good will and homogeneity among the people of Canada can best be brought about at the present time by leaving well enough alone, by letting sleeping dogs lie.

Personally, I would favour carrying on as we are now doing, but as the government has refused to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber), the hon. member for Vancouver North and I are suggesting that the bills be printed to contain just the word "Canada" and the numeral, along with the signatures of the heads of the Bank of Canada. We believe that this would prevent much of the prejudice and antipathy that are bound to be aroused.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Hon. members say, "oh, oh," but they know perfectly well what happened in Saskatchewan. The venom and bitterness of the speech to-night of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) are typical of what we have had in Saskatchewan for many days and what we hope will pass away as time goes by. We want to deal with matters according to their worth; we want to deal with these issues as they ought to be dealt with, and that is why we are asking the house to accept this subamendment.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I crave the indulgence of the house for one or two minutes in order to show why we cannot accept the subamendment which has been moved. May I say, first, that I am surprised at the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). The group of which he is a member has always charged the other political parties with a lack of courage, but surely the proposal made is one that would seem to avoid or to evade the straight issue. They want Canada to adopt bank bills which would be entirely emasculated. I do not think a virile country like Canada should adopt such a bank bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister is in order in answering?

Mr. BENNETT: He can speak to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am speaking on the subamendment just a minute or two. This bill would be emaciated and colourless and I wonder whether it would be accepted at par. There is another matter to be considered. The bill as suggested by my hon. friends would not be a promise to pay to the bearer. My hon. friends would first have to amend the first subsection of section 24, which provides that these notes shall be payable to bearer on demand, and so forth. The mere name of Canada, without mentioning the bank, and the figures and the signatures, could not be considered as a promise to pay anything to anybody. Apart from that, there are other considerations. Of course, these bank notes must be made in such a way that counterfeiters could not easily exercise their activities, and there would be nothing easier than to counterfeit a note such as is suggested by my hon. friends.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Could they counterfeit the signature of the officials?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, I suppose not, but that is the only thing they could not do.

Mr. BENNETT: Obviously, the amendment to the amendment containing no promise to pay, it would be impossible to support it having regard to the other terms of the bill. However much one might desire some compromise of the difficulties, it is quite clear that this suggested amendment to the amendment would not result in a note of the bank being issued in accordance with the terms of the provisions of the act, there being no promise to pay.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question now is on the main motion.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are a few remarks I should like to make upon another aspect of this bill, and I desire to present an amendment, but as I see it is after eleven o'clock I assume I cannot go on to-night.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, June 17, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

First report of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament.—Mr. MacLean (Prince).

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford) moved that the recommendations contained in the third report of the standing committee on industrial and international relations, presented to the house on Monday, June 15, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

WHEAT AND OTHER GRAINS

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the second and final report of the special committee on the marketing of wheat and other grains, presented on Thursday, June 11, be concurred in.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word before the report presented by the special committee is concurred in, because the producers of western Canada may regard it as very brief. I think it is only fair to say to the public and to hon. members of this house who were not members of the committee that the committee were of the unanimous opinion that nothing should be done to injure or jeopardize the sale of our wheat and that nothing should be done to handicap the board in its selling operations. The evidence was somewhat confusing, but once the majority of the committee had decided that a royal commission should be set up to review the evidence taken and to carry on further investigation, it was felt that no useful purpose could be served by further discussion or by going into more detail with respect to the evidence.

It is true the report is brief. One paragraph in particular might be termed a majority and minority opinion. It states that there was no conclusive evidence that the board had protected speculative shorts, and it states also that the committee found no conclusive evidence on that point. I think this brief explanation in due to the public and I do not believe any useful purpose can be served by further reviewing the evidence. With this explanation, I am prepared to concur in the report.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two, having been a member of the committee appointed to investigate this particular question. I am glad that we brought in a unanimous report and that a further investigation is to be undertaken to find the best method of marketing our grain. May I take this opportunity to present a resolution passed by one of the farmer organizations in my constituency. It is typical of others that I have received. I received this particular one some months ago and have taken up the matter with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). The resolution reads:

> That whereas there being a guaranteed minimum price established for wheat, and no protection afforded coarse grains, we are of the opinion that unless there is a radical change in the coarse grain situation before seeding time 1936, there will be a very large increase in the acreage seeded to wheat.
> Therefore we the shareholders of this association strongly urge that the principles contained in section 14 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act be applied by which coarse grains may be brought under the operation of the Canadian wheat board.
> A. W. Hawker,
> Secretary,
> Oakville Elevator Association.

If I may be allowed a moment or two, I should like to say a word with regard to the grain situation. The people in the district from which I come and throughout the province of Manitoba realize the danger of overproduction in wheat and have been switching gradually to the growing of barley. The barley crop in western Canada is becoming increasingly important. If we could produce more barley and less wheat, I think all hon. members will agree that it would be in the interests not only of the farmers but of the whole of Canada. We can produce a splendid quality of barley in western Canada; all we require is a market for this grain. There has been considerable investigation with regard to the finding of markets for our barley. During recent years the government of Manitoba has endeavoured to find better markets for barley. Doctor Grant was appointed in 1929 to investigate the possibilities in this regard.

The British brewers made a survey of Canada with regard to the quality of barley grown here. They found that our barley was of a superior grade and could be used for malting purposes, but they also found that the best grades were being used by the Canadian and American brewers. They were getting only the poorer grades. They complained that the malting barley they were getting from the terminal elevators in Canada was mixed and unsuitable for malting purposes. They found that the 3 C.W. barley contained many weed seeds and frosted grains and other foreign matter which made it useless as a malting barley. The eastern Canadian farmers have declared that our 3 C.W. barley contains too many weed seeds. They do not want to buy this barley even for the purpose of hog feed. I should like to read an extract from an editorial which appeared in the Manitoba Tribune, as follows:

> British maltsters are not the only ones to complain. Speaking to the national barley committee this week in Toronto, Professor R. G. Knox, of the Guelph agricultural college, said that if western growers wanted a better eastern market they would have to send out a product free from weed seeds. "The great prevalence of weed seeds in western barley," he said, "was a serious handicap to its sale to Ontario hog raisers as feed.

What we want is another grade of barley, suitable for malting purposes, which will be stored in special bins in the terminal elevators where it will be available to foreign buyers and be guaranteed as suitable for malting purposes.

I should like to place on record a resolution passed by the Portage local of the United Farmers of Manitoba. I shall hurry with this, sir, as I know you do not expect any extended remarks at this time. It reads:

> Be it resolved whereas the descriptions and definitions of "statutory grades" of barley are reproduced in accordance with schedule one of the new Canada Grain Act on grades of barley, whereas the act reads "number three extra six row barley shall weigh 48 pounds and equal in value for malting purposes to O.A.C. '21," we find that many samples of malting varieties going forward for inspection only grade three C.W. on account of being under the weight of 48 pounds and whereas many cars being inspected that weigh 46 pounds to 47 pounds are graded three C.W. barley or lower according to weight, it is resolved at this meeting that a new grade of six row barley be established for malting barley that weighs between 46 and 48 pounds. We suggest a grade of 4 extra six row barley. Due to the fact that the existing spreads between three C.W. barley of malting variety and three extra six row barley of malting variety have been too wide during the past two years, running from 2 to 35 cents per bushel, with only one pound difference in the weight, it is therefore apparent that the malting companies have derived considerable values on malting barley under the weight of 48 pounds.
> Respectfully submitted to your government.

It is a well known fact that barley weighing less than 48 pounds to the bushel is being used by Canadian maltsters. Barley weighing 47 pounds is fit for the maltsters and is being used by Canadian maltsters at the present time, but simply because our regulations do not allow barley weighing less than 48 pounds to the bushel to be classed as six-row, we are losing a special market which would be available. This resolution therefore asks the government to give us a new grade between six-row and 3 C.W., weighing less than 48 pounds and guaranteeing a purer quality for the buyers overseas. I suggest that this barley be special binned on reaching the terminal elevators and not mixed with foreign matter as I have indicated in my remarks. I have taken the question up with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and he in turn has taken it up with the head of the grain commission, who has pointed out that the grain act will be completely overhauled next year when this matter will be taken into consideration. There is nothing to prevent the grain board from giving us the benefit of this new grade in order to take care of the 1936 crop, and for that reason I am on my feet, urging the government to see that this is undertaken.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Representing as I do a large grain producing constituency in western Canada, I wish to concur in the remarks just made by the preceding speakers, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), but particularly would I impress upon the government the fact that in western Canada there is a desire that the government shall make an unqualified pronouncement in favour of continuing a wheat board, and setting an adequate price for wheat and other grains. That is the issue which is engaging the minds of the producers of western Canada at the present time, and I hope this will be done at no far distant date.

Motion agreed to.

HAMILTON POSTAL SERVICE

DISMISSAL OF J. M. SEMMENS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. WILTON (Hamilton West): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) as to whether he can say why J. M. Semmens, who for the past twenty-four years has been in charge of a subpostal station located at 423 King street west, Hamilton, during which time there has never been a single complaint as to his efficiency—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WILTON: —was advised the day before yesterday—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WILTON: I am asking a direct question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is one that should be put on the order paper.

Mr. WILTON: It is a simple question and it is important that I should get an answer to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What is the question?

Mr. WILTON: I should like to know why this man was advised that he was dismissed from the service, the postal station having been transferred yesterday to Reynolds' drug store across the street, Mr. Reynolds having been appointed postmaster to replace Mr. Semmens.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): I think perhaps I can answer the question just as well now as ask that it stand as a notice. My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice that he would ask the question, and I may tell him that the change was made with a view to giving the patrons of that sub-post office improved service, including better accommodation and longer hours per day. The post office was formerly in a grocery store which closed at six o'clock in the evening and it has now been placed in a drug store that remains open until eleven.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I regret that the Minister of Fisheries is not in the house at the moment. Perhaps my hon. friend will allow the question to stand, to be answered to-morrow.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Arising out of that question, will the Minister of Justice state before the house prorogues whether it is the intention of the government to appeal the decisions of the court?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): If my hon. friend will restrain his eagerness, I think the first thing to do will be to read the reasons which have been given.

Mr. HEAPS: What I said was, would the minister be prepared to make a statement before the house prorogues.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I cannot say until I have seen the reasons for the decision.

VIMY PILGRIMAGE

On the orders of the day.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Two months ago I asked the government if they were prepared to consider sending all the returned soldier members of the House of Commons to the Vimy Ridge unveiling ceremony. The reply then given was that they would consider it. I should like to know whether they will favourably consider sending these returned men; there are not very many of them who could go. The Ontario legislature are sending all the soldiers in their house. We can afford to send a big delegation to the League of Nations; why not here?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There are some further supplementary estimates to be introduced, which will include an item relative to the pilgrimage to Vimy. At that time the government may attempt to give an answer on this matter to my hon. friend.

BANK OF CANADA

MAJORITY CONTROL BY GOVERNMENT OF CAPITAL STOCK AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 16, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Dunning for the third reading of Bill No. 82, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Yesterday the house spent the entire day in discussing what words should appear on the bank notes, or more properly speaking, what languages should appear on the bank notes. It seems to me there are other aspects of this legislation that are of immensely greater importance to the people of Canada, and which we are in danger of overlooking almost entirely. For some years we in our group have urged a government owned and controlled central bank; indeed we have gone so far as to urge the nationalization of our entire banking system. I admit frankly that unless the monetary policy is changed, government control of the central bank would not bring the desired results. I admit further that under this or any other government dominated by capitalist ideals no fundamental changes are likely. But I would urge that government control is a step at least in the right direction, and again, that a central bank controlled by the government would be necessary in order to carry out the policies which we in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation advocate.

It is not my purpose to-day to make any extended speech. Our position has been stated on the resolution and in the committee. May I summarize what we have tried to say? We believe that this central bank as constituted cannot perform the functions which a central bank should perform. We believe that this legislation is a surrendering of sovereignty in the monetary field. Whether the parliament of Canada ever had that sovereignty is, perhaps, a matter to be discussed; but in any case we have in the central bank a more powerful instrument than we have ever had before, and as we see it, this instrument is being given over into private hands and Canada cannot be sovereign in that monetary field under the existing arrangement. Again, this legislation grants special privileges and powers to a group of shareholders who constituted a very small proportion of the citizens of Canada. Further, this legislation does not, as we see it, implement the promises made by the Liberals during the election. Yesterday some of the Liberal members claimed that they had a mandate with regard to what language should be placed on government bills. I cannot see that they had any mandate with regard to that matter, because it was not generally discussed at the election, but I think they did have a mandate to carry out certain financial or monetary reforms. Undoubtedly all over the country many Liberals said that if their party were returned to power we should have a national central bank. I do not want to go over the field again. I want just to put that on record. In my judgment the general belief was that if the Liberals were returned to power we would have a nationally owned and controlled central bank. I do not believe this legislation gives us that.

So far there has not been an opportunity formally to place our position on record or to ascertain what support it has in this house. I attempted during the resolution stage to move an amendment, but it was ruled out of order. Possibly I could have moved on the second reading a resolution similar to that which I propose to move to-day. As a matter of fact the Speaker passed so quickly over the second reading that, although I was in the house and paying attention to the proceedings, I had not the opportunity to move my resolution. So I take this occasion to place our position on record.

As it has become almost the practice since the Liberals have been in power with such a large majority to challenge, as being out of order practically any motion that is made—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —I take this opportunity of reading the rule in this regard. I quote from Beauchesne, page 217, section 755:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

In my resolution I propose to express an opinion declaratory of a principle adverse to or differing from the principles, policy or provisions of this bill. I know this rule refers to the second reading—

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I rather imagined that would be said, so I should like to give another citation, paragraph 814 at page 230 of Beauchesne:

> On the third reading of a bill such amendments as have already been described in reference to a second reading may be proposed to the question for now reading the bill the third time.

In order to make quite sure—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the hon. gentleman please complete that paragraph?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so.

> A member may then move that the third reading take place "this day six months." The question for the third reading may be negatived, but as previously stated (in reference to the second reading) such a vote is not fatal to the bill.

In order to make sure that the clerk of the house, who is our authority, is on safe ground I should like to give one more authority that will meet the incipient objection that is in the mind of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie).

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We do not know what the amendment is as yet.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so; I am preparing the way.

Mr. DUNNING: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend is out of order right now, because he is not discussing the bill before the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am discussing the bill; I am presenting my reasons for moving my amendment at this time. I read from Bourinot at page 530, under the general heading Third Reading:

> Or the house may be asked, at this as at any other stage of a bill, to divide on a resolution relative to the principle of the whole measure.

My amendment has reference to the principle. The suggestion has been made that hon. members have not the amendment before them, so I shall be glad to read it at this stage:

> That the bill be not now read a third time, because it does not provide for complete government ownership of the Bank of Canada.

That is a clear statement of a principle adverse to or differing from the principle involved in the bill, and hon. members will now understand why I have given these citations from our recognized parliamentary authorities. I could have moved to refer this bill back to the committee of the whole, as we so frequently do, for further consideration or with instructions that the committee have power to do certain things, but I knew perfectly well that if we offered any fundamental changes in a bill affecting finance we would be confronted immediately with the old objection that no private member may move to alter the financial structure of a bill.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the house should not be deprived of its right of expressing an opinion. I recognize clearly that no private member may introduce an amendment involving increased expenditure. The amendment which I introduced at the resolution stage did not involve increased expenditure. That was conceded. It did involve taking over all the stock, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) made a great play on the fact that the bill provided for only the majority of the stock being taken over, although taking over all the stock would involve a lesser expenditure than taking over a majority of the stock.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. However, I will not discuss that now. To create a majority of the stock will involve the expenditure of $5,100,000; to take over all the stock would have involved an expenditure of only $5,000,000, at par.

Mr. DUNNING: I wonder if my hon. friend would permit a question. Is he aware of the fact that the new government in New Zealand, which he so frequently quotes and which has bought the stock of that bank, paid a great deal more than par for it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know it paid more but I am speaking of the par value, and further I am speaking regarding a point of order. The minister did not rely upon that particular point of order but found refuge in another, that since this bill in its original form had been approved by the governor general we could not make any alterations in it. Well, that seems to me to be carrying the powers of the governor general to an altogether unwarranted degree. However, it was on such grounds that my amendment was ruled out of order. I suggest now that, thanks to the wisdom of our ancestors or our predecessors in parliament, we may still express our opinions, unless indeed accepted rules are to be entirely disregarded.

We believe that this bill is designed to somewhat improve the situation; it looks in the direction of greater government control, and for that reason we propose to vote for the bill. I should like that to be understood. On the other hand we do not believe the bill goes far enough. I should like to point out that my amendment, if carried, will not kill the bill. There are always some timorous souls in the house who are afraid of what might happen if the bill were to be killed. I do not think there is any danger that the amendment will pass while the government have such a large majority, but these members think they should vote as though the amendment might carry and they fear that then the bill might be killed. Let me reassure them. If the amendment carries the bill is not killed: its passage is simply delayed. On that point I should like to direct attention to a rule appearing in May at page 392. May is here speaking of the second reading of a bill, though as I have said our authorities, both Beauchesne and Bourinot, state that what is true of the second reading is also true of the third reading. May says:

> It must be borne in mind, however, that the resolution, if agreed to, does not arrest the progress of the bill, the second reading of which may be moved on another occasion.
> The effect of such an amendment is merely to supersede the question for now reading the bill a second time;—

Let me note that the "now" is in italics.

> And the bill is left in the same position as if the question for now reading the bill a second time had been simply negatived or superseded by the previous question. The house refuses, on that particular day, to read the bill a second time, and gives its reasons for such refusal: but the bill is not otherwise disposed of. Such being the technical effect of a resolution, so carried, it need scarcely be said that its moral and political results vary according to the character and importance of the resolution itself, the support it has received, and the means there may be of meeting it, in the further progress of the bill.

It may be that I have adopted an unusual course in presenting these rules of order at this stage, but, as I said before, it has become almost a practice for the government to object to any amendment that may be moved from this side of the house. I think we are on sound ground in this instance. We are attempting to express our opinion by means provided by the rules of the house, the only means that I can see by which we as a minority group may put our opinion officially on record, and may ascertain, as I said earlier, what support we may have. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Heaps:

> That the bill be not now read a third time, because it does not provide for complete government ownership of the Bank of Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's amendment I think is out of order. In the first place it is a direct negative. The motion is that the bill be now read a third time. My hon. friend's amendment is that the bill be not now read a third time. If he does not wish the motion carried all he has to do is to vote against the third reading. The argumentative part of his amendment does not alter the fact that it is a direct negative; it gives a reason, but that does not affect the substantive part.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask if we are not on the order as to whether the bill be now read a third time?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, that is the motion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I have a perfect right to move that it be not now read a third time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The motion is not in order, unless my hon. friend adds to his amendment that the bill be read six months hence or other like words. I also think the amendment is out of order because it purports to present an alternative proposal, that is, complete government ownership. In that respect it differs, as was pointed out at a previous stage of the discussion, from the essential principle of the bill.

My hon. friend has quoted Beauchesne as authority two or three times. May I particularly point out that Beauchesne at page 126, citation 394, has the following:

A motion may be amended: (a) by leaving out certain words; (b) by leaving out certain words in order to insert other words; (c) by inserting or adding other words.

This motion of my hon. friend does not do any of those three things, therefore it is not in order as an amendment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker; I need not read again the passages which I have previously read. It is clearly provided that special reasons may be given for not now reading the bill. The authority the Prime Minister himself referred to, Beauchesne, page 217, citation 755, says:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, ...

Further, let me give one example of a number given by May, at page 393:

Where the resolution relates to a matter which is incidental to the legislation intended by the bill, such a resolution does not arrest its progress, provided the principle affirmed can be considered at a further stage. Thus, on the sixth May, 1872, on going into committee upon the education (Scotland) bill, a resolution was carried, affirming that instruction in the holy scriptures was an essential part of education and ought to be provided for in the bill. To give effect to this resolution, an amendment was moved in committee; the amendment was negatived; and thus the resolution of the house was practically reversed —a proceeding, however, in strict conformity with parliamentary usage.

There is a case in which it will be readily observed that the amendment was almost directly opposed to the principle of the bill, yet the amendment was carried, although afterwards the provisions of the amendment were not carried out. On the grounds stated by the Prime Minister I think there is every reason why this amendment should be regarded as in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do any other hon. members wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I add to what I have already given a citation from Beauchesne, page 127, section 400:

An amendment that is merely an expanded negative cannot be proposed by the chair.

This surely is an expanded negative if ever there was one.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We are dealing with the motion that the bill be now read, and a motion that it be not now read but be read three months or six months hence would be quite in order. Along the same lines, we find that at this same stage a member is given the privilege of stating a position, differing from the principle of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has not moved that it be read six months hence. He knew he was at liberty to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have listened to the arguments on both sides, and I am of the opinion that the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is not in order. I do not think it comes within the provisions of standing order 48, under which he refers to citation 394, to which the leader of the government has alluded, as well as to citation 400 on page 127. I therefore declare the amendment out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am afraid the only thing to do is to appeal against your honour's ruling. We must retain, if possible, some of the privileges and rights of this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I appeal against your honour's ruling.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

Mr. Dunning moves that Bill No. 82, an act to amend the Bank of Canada Act, be now read a third time. To which Mr. Woodsworth moves in amendment that the bill be not now read a third time, because it does not provide for complete government ownership of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: A point of order having been raised, the decision of the Speaker was that the said amendment was out of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) having appealed from said decision, the question is now Shall the said decision be sustained?

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the main motion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before this debate concludes I should like to deal with the allegation that the legislation which is before the house at the moment is not in full accord with the policies of the Liberal party as stated from time to time in its official pronouncements, and in particular as stated by myself to the electorate in the course of the recent election campaign. I purpose in making this statement to go back to the first pronouncement made by the Liberal party with respect to the necessity of establishing a central national bank, because at the time that announcement was made great care was taken to set forth in specific language exactly what the Liberal party regarded as a properly constituted national central bank.

The proposal I refer to was made in public for the first time at a meeting held at Seaforth during the by-election in South Huron in September of 1932. The Liberal party had prior to that time been giving much thought and consideration to the subject of monetary reform, and, as a first step to monetary reform, to the establishment of a central national bank. Speaking at Seaforth I made very clear what the Liberal party's views were in the matter. Up to that time there had been in Canada but little in the way of discussion of central banks, and it was necessary for that reason to inform the electorate more fully than otherwise would have been the case not only as to the Liberal party's policy in the matter, but also with respect to the functions which a central bank might be expected to discharge. I sought in what I said not unduly to raise expectations but rather to represent fully the possible services of an institution of the kind. Fortunately the speech which I made on that occasion was very fully reported in the Canadian papers, and much of it was reported in quotations. The London Advertiser of September 29, the day following that on which the speech was made, contained a lengthy account of the speech, and I make no apology at this moment for reading at some length extracts from the speeches delivered at that time and subsequently.

I drew attention, first of all, to the fact that Canada was one of the few countries of any importance in the world which had not a central bank of rediscount. I pointed out the reason, no doubt, was that we had an excellent banking system in Canada, and that having an excellent banking system we had not felt the necessity for this additional step as quickly perhaps as some other countries had felt it. But I also made it clear that excellent as was our system, or as we had considered it to be up to that time, there was room for modifications and reform and that the existing system had distinct and self-evident limitations which became more evident in times of depression. There had been much discussion at the time on the questions of interest and credit, and I pointed out that these questions had an intimate association with the problems which pertained to banking and currency. I said that political parties should have a definite policy with respect to matters of the kind. I then set forth the policy of the Liberal party with respect to a central national bank, in the following words:

> Without question, any reform that would serve to bring about a wider extension of credit, and a lowering of interest rates, would have to be brought about with the utmost caution, and made in the light of the widest experience. Fortunately, the latter is available, and the former, I think, may be expected in ample measure on the part of the people's representatives in Canada.
> Although the banks of the country are important institutions in directing the flow of capital into industry, the importance of banking in the everyday life of the citizens of the land lies primarily in the relationship between credit and prices. It requires no effort to show the importance in our everyday life of prices generally, what may be termed as the price level. If, other things being equal, prices are high, it may result in producers being tempted into uneconomic expansion; it means, also that the consumer's dollar will not stretch so far. On this point one needs only to recall the high cost of living days which existed during the war period. If prices are unduly low, the producer is affected, cessation of economic activity and unemployment may result, and all groups in the community may be seriously affected. This situation exists at the present time, and the distress of mankind is too real to require elaboration.
> Without going into the matter too fully, it may be said that the general level of prices depends upon money and credit; in other words, upon the purchasing power in existence to do the nation's business. When banks make loans they in general create credit—bank notes or deposits—which is used by their customers to make added purchases, and which results in added bidding for goods, services and securities. If this process of lending is carried far enough, prices are bid up, and every person feels the effect of this policy. If the banks follow the opposite policy, of reducing credit, the effect may be a fall in prices.
> Either of these processes may be carried on by commercial banks with the above-mentioned results, in perfect harmony with the banks' own interests, and with what appears to be the tenets of sound commercial banking. A bank's first duty is to its depositors and shareholders. Thus, it can be seen, that commercial banks may, in pursuit of their own interests, adopt practices which effect prejudicialy the interests of the great body of citizens of the country. Surely, from the national point of view, such a condition should not be permitted to continue. Such tremendous powers should, in the interests of the people as a whole, be in some manner placed under an agency of public or social control. The situation in Canada calls for some form of social control of credit or, in brief, credit control. That is, there is need for a public or semi-public agency which, without attempting to run the banks, may exercise a general supervision over the volume of credit. The matter of credit control has become too important in our economic system to be left to the administration of private business, even when that private business has developed traditions of public service.
> In a word, banking functions may be divided into two aspects. The first is the technique of carrying on the day-to-day business of banking, or what may be termed banking practice. The second is that of the social effects of banking action, which may be termed credit control. It may be said that Canadian bankers are exceptionally well trained in banking practice generally, and that in general they carry it on in an admirable manner. The stability of our banking institutions in the present period of distress is evidence of this. It remains true, however, that the present system does not adequately meet the second aspect, namely, the necessity for something in the way of credit control. This does not imply criticism of the banks in relation to their own immediate business, for it is unreasonable to ask that private profit-making institutions should assume the responsibility of credit control under present conditions. In fairness to the banks, the burden of this responsibility should not be placed upon or left with them.

A little further on in the address I said:

> I might say that something of the kind was found necessary and put into operation by the government through the Department of Finance at the beginning of the war. The banking structure was then altered by the enactment of the Finance Act, which gave the department authority to lend dominion notes to the banks. Thus the banks could obtain added cash reserves with which to extend more credit. These added cash reserves could be obtained within a few hours upon the deposit of approved securities with the department. This process of rediscounting had never existed before, and was initiated as an emergency measure. It made a very great change in the Canadian monetary structure. Previously, the banks alone had been responsible for credit control. Now they share it in part with the Department of Finance, which has the capacity to increase the banks' cash reserves, which are the ultimate basis of credit.

The events of the last few years indicate that somewhere between these two agencies this responsibility has tended to drop out of sight. The Finance Act was a sound measure, but Canada has now come to a financial stature where it is unreasonable to place this responsibility on profit-making institutions, or even on a trained civil service which has no experience in central banking practice.

If I recall aright my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George, (Mr. Cahan) speaking the other day, mentioned that he along with his colleagues in the late administration had had to do with the drafting of the present act, and that at the time the reason which above all others caused them to feel that a central national bank was necessary was that they did not believe that a trained civil service was adequate to discharge the duties which had been imposed upon them by the Finance Act. He and his colleagues felt that it was better to have an institution properly equipped in personnel and technique for important work of the kind. Well, it was not until 1934 that my hon. friends began drafting that measure. I am directing attention at the moment to the fact that it was in 1932 when the Liberal party stated that this was one of the reasons why a central national bank should be created and be created forthwith. Let me quote exactly what I said:

> The developments of the last few years in Canadian banking and exchange have demonstrated the seriousness of the present situation, and the fact that our present system is inadequate to carry the heavy load.

Please recall that this is the statement as made on behalf of the Liberal party in 1932.

> Clearly the time has come to give responsibility to a special institution and to round out the finance act into a complete enactment. The remedy for the present unsatisfactory state of affairs will be found, I believe, in large part, in the creation in Canada of a central bank of rediscount.

Then later on:

> Such an institution in Canada would, among other things, take over the monetary functions and responsibilities now exercised by the Department of Finance, because it would be a specialized institution with a trained personnel, it would be able to perform the functions of a central bank more efficiently than the department. This is no criticism of the Department of Finance, which is a very efficient service, but one which was not designed to deal with such monetary problems. A central bank, in handling rediscounting, would exercise its powers to give us the maximum of social control of credit for the general welfare of the nation.

I then spoke about certain international aspects of banking which a central national bank would be able to perform, and I concluded:

> This is the year when the Bank Act comes up for revision before parliament. It would appear to be the year in which this much needed reform should be instituted. It is a reform for which the Liberal party in parliament will press, and which will continue to constitute an important part of its policy.

In that statement is set forth very clearly the conception the Liberal party had of the functions which a central bank would perform. It sets forth what, when we advocated a national central bank, we meant by a properly constituted central bank. It makes very clear what is meant by social control and what is meant by the service of the public as contrasted with the service of private interests. The statement made at that time is one to which the Liberal party has adhered consistently in all discussions with respect to the Bank of Canada measure.

As I have said, the statement of policy just set forth was made on behalf of the Liberal, party by myself as its leader, at Seaforth, on September 29, 1932. Parliament was not yet in session but the session followed very shortly afterwards, and when the speech from the throne was being considered by this house I repeated much of what I had said at Seaforth and urged upon the government the importance of immediately taking steps to institute a central national bank. I have in my hand an extract from the debate on the address on October 10, 1932. It will be found at page 29 of Hansard of that year. At that time I said:

> I believe the Canadian banking system is as sound as any banking system in the world. I think there is no doubt that owing to the excellence of our banking system there has been less discussion on matters of banking in Canada than there has been in other countries. However, the Canadian banking system is not perfect; it has been framed, as have most businesses, with a view primarily to the interests of capital investors, the shareholders. The development of banking has been such that it has assumed increasingly a national aspect; the need has arisen for national control of credit, and that is a matter which in the interests of the banks themselves almost as much as in the interest of the country ought to be considered by parliament at the earliest possible date.

A little later on I said:

> One question which the banking committee should be exploring at this session is the advisability of establishing in Canada a central bank of re-discount. I suppose my right hon. friend will tell us that one of the departments of government already performs that function. During the period of the war, the Bank Act was amended to enable the Department of Finance to perform some such function but it is not a function that is properly carried on by a government department. What is needed is an institution which will be devoting its time exclusively to what will be expected of it in such an all-important matter as that of credit control.

That was the expression in this House of Commons of the Liberal party's view as made in the course of the debate on the address in the session of the fall of 1932. In February of the following year, I gave to this House of Commons a very clear statement of the party's position with respect to several important problems, among others the problem of banking and credit. At that time I set forth, in a series of statements, the policies of the Liberal party with reference to some immediate problems. It was on February 27, 1933, that I gave this statement of policy to the House of Commons, and I mentioned that the statement embodied not only the views of the Liberal members of parliament of both houses as agreed to in conference, but that it also represented the views of the National Liberal Federation of Canada, which body was representative of the various local Liberal organizations throughout the dominion. This was the official statement of the Liberal party of its policies with respect to the different matters referred to. Here are the exact words that appear in that statement, words which have been used by Liberal speakers everywhere, because this statement of policy was published by the National Liberal Federation and distributed broadcast. It was used publicly throughout Canada not only during the campaign but for two or three years prior thereto. They are words that have been quoted over and over again by myself as leader of the party and by members of the party speaking in different parts of the country. They appear under the heading "control of credit" and are as follows:

> The Liberal party believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need. A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people; and also to deal with problems of international commerce and exchange.

I submit that this statement is on all fours with what was said by myself at Seaforth in presenting the Liberal point of view with respect to what would constitute a properly constituted national central bank. There can be no doubt concerning what the party meant when it said that credit was a public matter not of interest to bankers only but of direct concern to the average citizen. It was referring to the public interest as a whole as contrasted with the private interests of bankers and individuals. That was generally understood and was always the point of view presented in debates which took place in this house and beyond its walls. Also the functions of rediscount and control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need. Every one understood what was meant by "considered in terms of public need."

Mr. MacINNIS: What does it mean?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It means exactly what it says, and what I said it meant at Seaforth. It does not mean what my hon. friend and some of his friends have been trying to make the public believe it means, namely that it is not the public need which the bank is to serve, but the private needs of individuals.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does it mean what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) says it means?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It means exactly what is stated here. My hon. friend who has just spoken and some of those who are associated with him have tried to have the people believe that the Liberal party had committed itself to a bank which was going to supply private individuals, with all the funds they require to satisfy their individual needs.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Oh, no.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, it was Liberal party speakers that did that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all. My hon. friend has done it. And may I point out at once what is going on at the present time by way of political propaganda, from quarters which probably hon. gentlemen in some parts of the house can tell me about. Since this debate commenced post cards by hundreds and I might say thousands have been coming in, all printed alike, mailed, some from Toronto, some from Montreal, and others from elsewhere, addressed to "Mackenzie King, Prime Minister, Ottawa," marked "personal" in print, and worded as follows:

Dear Sir,

As Prime Minister of this country I feel it is your duty to end unemployment immediately.

The tragic and demoralizing situation of the past seven years demand you take over the complete control of the finance of our country so that you may give useful employment to all without increasing the burden of taxation.

Mr. MacINNIS: It may be from the Young Liberal Association of Saskatoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It continues as follows:

By this means alone can you raise the standard of living and keep your election pledge.

If you have the courage to act, all Canada will stand behind you.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Hear, hear!"

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It comes from over there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think now we may see the source.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Does the Prime Minister say that it came from this quarter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I want to make clear is this. When I announced at Seaforth the Liberal policy with respect to the central national bank and gave the details I did, I was very careful not to seek to raise in the public mind expectations which would be wholly unwarranted and wholly unjustified and which could never be satisfied by any institution on this earth. I made it perfectly clear that when the Liberal party spoke of public need and of the banks serving that public need rather than private interests, my words were intended to convey precisely what I had set forth in explicit language as meant by that term. The impression some hon. gentlemen who are taking exception to the present legislation are seeking to convey is that the Liberal party has in some way led the people to believe that if we once get a central bank, every individual in the country is going to be financed out of this bank and there will be employment for all provided out of funds which this bank, by some mechanical process or other, will turn out. I want to make perfectly clear that that kind of thing has never been expressed by any person speaking with authority on behalf of the Liberal party, and I wish to say further that, as the leader of the Liberal party from the time I made the statement I did at Seaforth, in the debates in this house, upon the public platform, in the campaign and up to this moment, I have not only made clear what the Liberal party meant by the public need being met, but I have explicitly cautioned the public against believing that the bank would go any further than was indicated in the pronouncements as made.

This statement of policy as made in this house, as I have said, was on February 27, 1933. If I recollect aright, I was replying at the time to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), or I followed him in a speech setting forth the Liberal policy. He had advocated complete nationalization of all the banks in Canada. I took direct exception and said I would not be in favour of nationalizing all the banks in Canada. Neither this afternoon nor at any other time have I said that I was in favour of such nationalization. Yet this afternoon my hon. friend talked again about the nationalization of the central bank, and seeks to leave the impression that the Liberal party in some way had held that out as its objective with respect to the creation of a properly constituted central bank. In passing, may I say it is a rather curious thing that in 1934 when the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), then the Prime Minister, introduced and passed through this parliament a bill for a privately owned and privately controlled central bank, he was supported by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who voted for the 1934 bill this afternoon, when the Liberal party is inviting this house to change the constitution of the bank so as to make provision for a preponderantly public interest in the matter of ownership and effective control by the government, asks that the bill be not read again. Suppose his motion had not been ruled out of order and after a vote it had carried, what would have been the result? The result would have been that the right hon. leader of the opposition would have been the first to congratulate my hon. friend on having perpetuated the late government's privately owned and privately controlled bank.

Mr. CAHAN: May I be allowed to point out that certainly it is incorrect to say that the bank as at present constituted by statute is privately owned and privately controlled? To a certain extent it is privately owned, but I cannot understand how any person with a clear vision of the actual facts can say it is privately controlled.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is a speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, everyone in the house except my hon. friend and a few of those who are around him have criticized the present bank as being privately owned and privately controlled.

Mr. CAHAN: And it is an utterly erroneous criticism.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It does not appear to be so when it comes to effective control. I think my hon. friend is entitled to have it said that the governor and deputy governor have been appointed by the government of the day, but all the directors of the bank are appointed by those who are private shareholders except the deputy minister of finance who has not a vote.

Mr. CAHAN: And the governor has as effective control to-day, as he will have after the passing of this act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not control such as he has to-day. As a matter of fact the governor to-day has the power of veto, which veto is absolute. When the present bill passes the governor will have a veto, but once that veto is exercised it becomes the obligation of the governor to report the matter immediately to the Minister of Finance; it becomes the obligation of the Minister of Finance to report the matter immediately to the governor in council; and the governor in council may refuse to sanction the governors veto. So that under the legislation now before the house the last word is not with the governor of the bank but with the governor in council, which is the cabinet, which represents the House of Commons, and which in turn represents the people of this country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I ask the Prime Minister if he does not recognize that, had my amendment been regarded as in order, and had it been carried, it would not have delayed beyond one day the passage of the bill? My motion was that this bill be not now read. That was all. It might have been read to-morrow. That was all the amendment amounted to. It was the only way in which I could make a protest.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the bill had been defeated on the third reading it could not have been reintroduced this session.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not at all. I read the authorities. It did not affect the status of the bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend cannot deny the fact that in 1934 he voted for a bank of Canada which he believed to be privately owned and privately controlled. He cannot deny that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope the Prime Minister does not want to be unfair. It was that measure, rather than an entirely privately owned system, without any public control whatever. I said it was only a step in the right direction. I have never—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the Prime Minister allow me—?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend may go on.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I say that I have never charged the Liberals with having definitely committed themselves against a publicly owned and controlled bank or in favour of a privately owned bank? The Prime Minister knows the situation, and because we in this group want something more than either the Conservatives or the Liberals are prepared to give I do not think it is fair that we should be accused of being in favour of private ownership.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to enter into an argument with my hon. friend; I am simply pointing out the fact. When there was before this house a bill providing for the establishment of a bank which he himself regarded as privately owned and very largely privately controlled, my hon. friend voted for that bill. To-day, when there is before this house for third reading a bill which changes what is a privately owned bank into one in which the preponderant interest is public ownership and the control of which, instead of being partly private and partly public, is to be effectively public, the hon. gentleman introduces a motion that the bill be not read the third time, thereby killing the bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My motion was not that it be not read but that it be not read now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, now is the time to read it; now is the time it is before the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes; a big majority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me proceed a step further. I have said it was on February 27, 1933, that the Liberal party made the pronouncement it did in this House of Commons with respect to the creation of a properly constituted national central bank, as one of a series of policies it intended to fight for to the end of that parliament and to carry, if necessary, from parliament to the people. It continued to advocate these policies in this house, but it was not until July 31, 1933, that the government of the day accepted the view of the Liberal party that something in the nature of a national central bank was necessary. I should perhaps not say that they accepted it at that time, but rather that they accepted the view that it was necessary to inquire into the matter and to that end appointed a royal commission on banking and currency in Canada. The commission recommended the creation of a central national bank.

I hope I made clear the fact that it was the Liberal party which put forward in 1932, as a part of its program, the establishment of a properly constituted national central bank; that it was the Liberal party which advocated that policy in this House of Commons to the point that it became necessary for the then government to recognize the necessity of having the matter inquired into, which advocacy brought about the appointment of a royal commission; that the commission endorsed the view of the Liberal party of Canada, previously and continuously expressed, that there should be a national central bank. In the following year, 1934, as a consequence, there was introduced a bill for the creation of a national central bank.

The attitude of the Liberal party with respect to the functions the bank should discharge was set forth very clearly in the course of the discussion on that bill. Our position was stated in the course of debate time and again by myself as leader of the party. Hon. gentlemen know that within the ranks of a great political party, while there may be one general view on which all are united, there are shades of opinion which tend towards one extreme or the other. That is true of every great gathering of human beings, but the Liberal party in its pronouncements, in the terms I have read to the house, stood for the thing upon which it was possible for all to agree. In the course of debate it became necessary to expand our views a little, in particular with regard to the question of whether there should be any private directors on the board at all and with regard to the question of whether government ownership was an absolute essential for a properly constituted national central bank. I contend that there is no possible room for doubt as to the position then taken by the opposition having regard to what was said by myself in this house as leader of the party. I refer first to what was said on the second reading of the bill. This will be found in Hansard of March 8, 1935, where again I set forth the functions of a central bank as we had contended all along they should be:

> A central bank, as we view it, differs from other banks in that its function is primarily regulatory and controlling—and not commercial in the sense of being intended primarily for private profit or gain. In other words, the function of a central bank in the world of banking and finance, as we view it, is that of subordinating the special to the general interest or, to express the matter more concretely, that of subordinating the private interest in banking and credit to the public interest. In no sense should the bank be, or be permitted to become, a banker's bank. It is and ought to be a government bank, the government being representative of the interests of the country as a whole. Its main purpose is and should be to protect the public interest in banking and credit.

That was on the second reading of the measure. The other day my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) gave other quotations from some of the statements I made during the course of the discussion in this house. One of those quotations will be found in Hansard of June 1, 1936, as taken from page 4228 of the revised Hansard of 1934. This statement sets forth very clearly what was in the mind of the Liberal party. Addressing my right hon. friend, who was then Prime Minister, I said:

> The Prime Minister will notice that at the moment I am not suggesting the government should own the bank. I am not at the moment discussing the question of ownership at all. As I said last night, I think the question of ownership is debatable.

I said that at the beginning of the discussions; I said throughout the discussions and during the campaign, and I repeat it now: I think the question of ownership is debatable, for reasons which appear in what I have said repeatedly in this house. I do not think the question of effective control is debatable. I think if you have effective public control it matters relatively little where the ownership rests, but if you have not effective public control then ownership in full may be desirable should it prove to be the only way to acquire it. At the time, speaking of the importance of effective public control, I went on to say:

> I am however discussing the question of control of policy, and I do say that with respect to policies, whether they relate to trade, to shipping, to marketing, to finance, to defence, or to any other phase of a country's economy, those policies, if they are the expression of view of a government representative of the people, should be capable of being carried out without interference from any institution whatever, but rather with the sympathetic cooperation of all institutions. That is the only way in which in a country we can have either democratic or responsible government.

During the course of his speech in this house on June 1 the Minister of Finance made further reference to my remarks on June 22, 1934, when I gave my reasons for believing that there might be wisdom in having on a board of directors, even as representative of private interests, some men with special knowledge of the great commercial and financial interests of the country. Let me say this: For the life of me I cannot see why it should be assumed always that private interests and public interests are necessarily opposed to each other. I believe that in the long run it will be found that the thing which is most in the public interest ultimately will prove to be best for private interests. Take any of these great public utilities, street railways or the like; let them operate in any way other than that which tends best to serve the public interest and in their private interests they begin to suffer immediately. However there may be and undoubtedly there are times, and I have made that clear in what I have quoted from my speech at Seaforth, when private institutions may view matters exclusively from the point of view of the interests of their immediate shareholders and investors, and that the private interest may be contrary to the public interest. When such times come, and there is a conflict between private and public interest then at all such times the public interest should be made to prevail.

But there may also be times when those exercising or seeking to exercise control in the public interest may be mistaken in their views or the course they may wish to pursue. They may err in judgment, and if they do they make serious and grievous mistakes with regard to matters which affect the credit of the country as a whole and the interests private as well as public of all its citizens. I would ask the representatives of the people in this House of Commons whether on such occasions it is not in the public interest to have, if he can be found, some individual, associated if you like with private interests, who will be in a position to direct the attention of his colleagues, and through his colleagues or in other ways direct the attention of government and of parliament and of the public to what is an apparently mistaken course of procedure before it is taken and it is too late to remedy it? I say that in great transactions which affect the well-being of the industrial and financial and commercial life of the country, too much in the way of special knowledge cannot be obtained. I have sufficient faith in the power of truth of itself to believe that no man, whether representing private or public interests, can get anywhere with representations which he may make unless those representations have a substantial element of truth behind them. I said to my right hon. friend at the time we were discussing the matter of direction, because I thought he was one who had had experience with large business in a large way, that I thought he ought to be the first to appreciate the necessity of having check and countercheck in all matters of this kind. The situation was reversed at the time. I was pointing out the need of directors appointed to represent the public interest in addition to directors selected by private interests. I did so in the following words:

> I think my right hon. friend must agree that in these matters of large finance, check and counter check is wholly advisable. It is advisable in financial transactions of a limited size, and it is more necessary as well as advisable in those of considerable size. But here are financial transactions of the greatest magnitude conceivable, and check and counter check are imperative. I do think the directorate of the bank ought to be so formed that, whether the pressure is upon the bank from the government on the one side, or upon the government from the financial interests and through the bank on the other, there should be on the board of directors some one or more persons who will be quick to sense the situation, give the danger signal, and arouse the country to the pressure which is being brought to bear. There is the danger of a government bringing too much in the way of pressure to bear on a central bank. On the other hand, there is equal danger of the financial interests that are allied with the banks bringing influence to bear upon a government. There will be both these dangers always, and the only way in which that possibility can be lessened is by making sure that both powers, the money power and the power of government, are represented on a common board so that one or the other will be in a position to direct the attention of the people at large to the dangers which they may see developing in the affairs of an institution which is or ought to be a great national trust.

In the face of a statement of that kind, made in this parliament and recorded in Hansard, a volume which all hon. members of parliament know well, and which statement was there all through the general election campaign, how can anyone say that as leader of the Liberal party I stood for complete government ownership of the national bank? I made it repeatedly clear that I thought the question of ownership was debatable, but I went much further and pointed out wherein there would be a distinct advantage in having private interests as well as government interests represented on a board of a properly constituted national central bank, so long as care was taken to see that the effective control rested with the government through its nominees on the directorate and in other ways.

That is not the only statement which I made on this phase of the matter. On the third reading of the bill, when my right hon. friend had spoken and stated that we had said some things over and over again, I said I thought they needed to be said once more, as apparently up to that time they had not made any real impression on him. I then made quite clear my own position. Here are the words I used, as they appear in Hansard of 1934, at page 4361:

Speaking for myself, may I repeat that I can see wherein the question of public ownership of a state bank may well be a debatable question. I regard it as debatable for the reason that there is much to be said on both sides.

Then I gave the reasons. Here is one objection to complete public ownership of a central bank which I pointed out. I ask if it is not pertinent to much that is being said on monetary matters in our own country at this very time:

The objections that I see, so far as it can be named an objection, to public ownership of a central bank is that it may raise in the minds of the people of the country many expectations which may not be capable of ever being realized. Many will believe that because the state owns the central bank it will be able to meet each and every disorder that may arise in the country from any financial cause. We here all know that a state-owned institution any more than a privately-owned institution, will not be able to do anything of the kind. At the same time there would be occasioned the thought in the minds of many people that having set up a publicly-owned institution we had discovered a public remedy for all social and financial ills. I do not think it is advisable, or in the public interest at any time, for parliament to create in the minds of the people at large expectations which are not capable of being realized.

In the second place, I believe there is always a possible danger to the position of the state itself in the event of anything untoward happening to a bank which is owned by the state. There may quickly arise in the public mind confusion between what may be matter confined in its effects to the bank, and what may be assumed to concern the very life of the state itself. This may not happen so much within the bounds of the country where the situation may be known and understood as beyond its confines, and in the minds of peoples of other nations.

And I gave examples of how panics have arisen in the state because of the identification in the public mind of some government-owned institution with the state itself. I was most careful to point all this out, because I believed and do believe very firmly, that a government cannot be too careful, that any political party cannot be too careful, about raising in the public mind expectations which cannot be satisfied, or in any way claiming for an institution which has to do with the issue of money and currency, powers which it is well known in the last resort cannot be exercised in ways which some may be led to believe they can.

In the same speech I added:

I wish at this time to make clear the grounds upon which I personally have advocated the institution of a central bank and the grounds upon which the Liberal party has made the institution of a public bank part of its policy.

I then restated what I have read here from the statement of government policy as given in 1933, and when I came to certain words I emphasized them:

... to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need.

Following those words "in terms of public need," I said:

Note "in terms of public need" not possible private gain.

I was making very clear the contrast intended, making very clear at every stage in the discussion that there were certain distinct limitations upon a central bank, and that to create any false impression with regard to what the government, through an agency of this kind, could or might do was only working an injury to the people of the country.

May I conclude with this last reference, I wish to include it, because here I stated the issue between the then government and the Liberal party very clearly, and I stated it in terms of an issue. At page 4363 of Hansard of 1934 I am reported as follows:

That is the issue, as I see it, the crux of the whole situation—whether this parliament, representing the people of Canada, is to create a great financial institution which is to control the credit and currency of the country, place that institution in private hands, both as to ownership and control, hand over to this privately-owned and controlled institution many of the functions and powers which the government itself at the present time is exercising, part in large measure with what the government now possess in the way of control of credit, part with what it possesses at the present time in the matter of the right of issuing currency, and hand over gold reserves and securities which are at the present moment in its possession—all this to be handed over to an institution which is to be privately-owned and controlled, or whether the institution to which these rights, powers, possessions and privileges are to be given is to be subject to an effective measure of government control.

That, I think is a very serious situation, and there is no argument, it seems to me, which it is possible to bring forward that can really defend action of that kind on the part of this parliament. If it were of necessity a choice solely between the extreme of absolute government ownership and government control on the one hand, and on the other complete private ownership and private control, I could understand that there might be many who would find it difficult to decide one way or the other, there being no possibility of a middle course which would help to avoid what would be regarded as the dangers in either extreme. But there is a middle course, and it is that middle course which the government is apparently unwilling even to consider at the present time. That middle course would be to enable the government—

And I ask hon. members to see whether this legislation does not implement to the full what was there stated as the Liberal party's position:

—to appoint a certain number of directors, a number sufficient to give the government control of the central bank, directors who would not own shares but would represent the government, and who would sit along with the directors who were the nominees of those who owned the shares. Short of complete government ownership and control, could there be anything in the interests of all classes generally which obviously would serve the common interest better than that? One group of directors would be watching the actions of the bank from the point of view of investors, and the other group would be watching the actions of the bank from the point of view of the interests of the public at large; and these two in conference from day to day would undoubtedly be able to prevent many extreme actions being taken which might be contrary to the public interest, and they would also be able to bring about that unity and continuity, in the affairs of the bank which the Prime Minister regards as so all-important.

Those statements do not permit of any doubt as to their meaning. They are as clear-cut and frank as statements can possibly be. May I read this one further statement as presenting the major objection of the Liberal party to the Bank of Canada as it was being constituted by the then government?

The present legislation, establishing the Bank of Canada, is a definite step in the establishment of an imperial policy of finance, under which the financial destiny of Canada is placed under persons independent of parliament, who can maintain, through the Bank of England and the other central banks of empire nations, a definite and positive control of empire currency, credit and trade. That being the case, I feel very strongly that this measure ought to be reconsidered before we are asked to vote upon it.

The Bank of Canada, as constituted by this proposed enactment, will undoubtedly be the means of vesting in the Bank of England the management and control of Canada's foreign exchange and Canada's internal credit administration. As I said the other evening, once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile. Those are strong words; they constitute a strong argument, and they are words of which this house ought to take full account before it is too late.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that paragraph makes perfectly clear what I meant when I spoke about the control of currency issue and credit being the most conspicuous and sacred responsibility of government. I was speaking there of whether the great financial powers were to control in policies relating to finance, or whether the government of the day, responsible to the will of the people, was to control in the matter of giving effect to these policies. I said that as the act was then framed all control by parliament through its representatives was being wholly removed, and that what was necessary was to bring back that control and to see that it would be effectively exercised in the interests of the people.

I touched amongst other things upon the struggle that Mr. Gladstone had with the Bank of England, and showed how Mr. Gladstone himself had found the bank, instead of being a help to the government, was often an obstacle, and that he had to overcome difficulties with the bank before he could get his own government policies under way. I pointed out that what was necessary was that no institution, and least of all a great banking institution, should ever be created in this country with any such power, or be so constituted that it could be a force to oppose the will of the government of the day. I said that what was necessary was to get the central bank into a position where the government of the day would be in a position to control its policy. Speaking of my right hon. friend's measure as it was then I said:

That is exactly what the government proposes to see is done by this bill in its present form. In matters of finance it makes the bank supreme; it makes the bank the body that will determine the monetary policy of the country, that will have the power to enforce that policy and to resist any monetary policy that may run counter to it. This privately owned and privately controlled institution is to be permitted to do that. The government itself is not to be a substantive power.

It was that point of view which I presented so strongly to the electorate in the campaign when I asserted that if the Liberal party were returned to power the first thing we would seek to do would be to restore to the control of the government the powers which had existed under the Finance Act, and which had been taken away from the government and had been given to this privately owned and privately controlled institution. I said we would restore these powers to the government so that it could effectively control the bank, and that we would constitute the bank accordingly.

There have been a good many quotations from speeches made in the campaign. I have already referred to what was said in this House of Commons, and which being on the records of this house was available to all speakers in the campaign, if they wished to refer to the exact words of the leader of the Liberal party in setting out what the policy of the party was. There have been many references to press clippings and the like, but I notice that one reference has been significantly omitted, and it is the most important of all. The omission is also most significant.

In stating the policies of a government or a political party there is no way in which those policies can be more effectively and unmistakably stated than over the radio. It is not possible for a leader of a political party to make an address over the radio and have his address subsequently printed and distributed and then say that he did not make the pronouncement which was then made. I ask why it is that throughout the whole of this debate, in referring to what was the policy of the Liberal party as stated by the Liberal leader in the campaign, not a single member has quoted what was said by myself in presenting to the electorate over the radio the policy of the party in respect to currency and credit.

I have in my hand a copy of the addresses I delivered over the radio during the compaign, and I refer now to one which I claim is authoritative and authoritative above all others. It is the second radio address I delivered; it was delivered on August 2, 1935. It was an address of Liberal principles and policies, a statement of the Liberal party's position on present day problems. These are the words I used in setting forth the Liberal party's policy in the matter of the control of credit, and I ask again hon. gentlemen to say if in all particulars the pledge which was made over the radio is not being faithfully carried out to the letter in the legislation which is now before us. I said:

The Liberal party—

I began by repeating over the radio the statement which I had made in this House of Commons in 1933, and which at different times and in different places I continued to make throughout the country.

> The Liberal party believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue," considered in terms of public need. A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people; and also to deal with problems of international commerce and exchange.
> As a national central bank has been established by the present government since this statement of Liberal policy was issued, I feel it necessary to say here that the Bank of Canada as established is far from being the institution contemplated by the Liberal party. The Bank of Canada is, as more than one of our leading economists has said, of the fascist type. It is a private corporation, with power to control the volume of the country's credit. Let me repeat what I said in parliament in protesting against the surrender to a private institution of the state's control over the nation's currency and credit:
> "Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile."
> To regain for the nation what has been lost and to secure a properly constituted national central bank, will continue to be a first objective of Liberal effort.

There is the pledge which was given to the people of Canada over the radio by myself as the leader of the party. I say that every word and every line of that pledge is being literally and absolutely fulfilled in the legislation that is before us.

Let me now go one step further. Reference has been made to what I said to the public on the night of the great Liberal victory of the significance of the results. The statement which was subsequently issued in the form of a leaflet entitled the Voice of the People, was made on October 14, 1935. Here is what I said in reference to the central bank and the control of credit:

> The election is an endorsation of the Liberal view that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to every citizen. It is a verdict against a privately owned and controlled central bank, and in favour of a properly constituted national bank to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue considered in terms of public need. There can be no mistaking the demand for a restoration to the government of Canada of control over credit and currency issue. As the campaign proceeded, the issue of the control, by the people, of all functions of government, through their representatives in parliament, and not by any other power, became increasingly clear. The electorate has declared that a responsible ministry, not organized finance and international money power, is to control in all matters of state.

I ask if that statement in what it foreshadowed was not on all fours with the statements made during the days of the election, and whether that statement is not being literally and absolutely fulfilled in the legislation which is before us at the moment?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How can the Prime Minister say that the present bill contemplates control by the bank over credit?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the main function of the bank, to control the issuance of currency and credit. Referring the other day to this statement by myself, my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre said that it was an undertaking to have the government control credit and currency issue. He did not read the sentence as if the word "restoration," or the words "a restoration to the government," had any significance. He took care not to place any emphasis upon those words. I had pointed out in previous addresses that under the Finance Act the government of this country, through the Department of Finance, was controlling the issue of currency and credit, it was issuing currency and controlling credit, but that those functions had been taken away from the Department of Finance and given to this privately owned and privately controlled institution. I stated that until this control of credit and the issue of currency were restored to government—which is what we are doing now by this bill—and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and of democracy was idle and futile. I was stressing the importance of these functions being restored to government and discharged by the bank under public control as contrasted with being exercised by a privately owned and controlled institution. Why did I speak of the control of the issue of currency and credit as the most conspicuous and sacred responsibility? It is most conspicuous because without currency and credit there can be no trade or commerce in the land, and a country organized as a modern country is organized could not carry on its everyday business. It is a sacred responsibility because, unless great care and caution is taken with the way in which currency is issued and credit is controlled, a nation may be quickly brought to disaster.

Something was told the house the other day by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) of what he had witnessed in his visits to Germany and other countries of the effect of inflated currencies, not only upon those who had substantial incomes but upon the humblest in the land, upon the mechanics, the artisans, the peasant proprietors and all classes and upon their means of livelihood and standards of living. Where there is the power to issue currency and control credit, there is placed the power to bring a nation to disaster unless this power is carefully exercised as a sacred power. That word "sacred" is the only word that could be appropriately applied to it.

I think I have made very clear and brought up to date the position of the Liberal party as stated by myself as its leader. I challenge any hon. member of this house to find in any place any statement of mine which can be regarded as authoritative, which is at variance, in the slightest particular, with what I have read to this house this afternoon. It cannot be found as it does not exist. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson), acting as the financial critic of the opposition, undertook one afternoon not long ago to criticize this measure. In so doing he characterized it as a delusion and—I cannot at the moment think of the other word he used.

Mr. LAWSON: Subterfuge.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend had it off by heart—subterfuge and delusion.

Mr. LAWSON: That is why he did not stumble.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It might have been better for him if he had stumbled a little.

Mr. LAWSON: Possibly so, but harder to listen to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I read what my hon. friend said at the time. He said:

> I say to you, sir, and through you to the members of this committee and the people of this country, that having regard to the statements made by the present Prime Minister throughout the country during the election campaign when he asked the people for votes based on those statements, this measure is a subterfuge and a delusion, and out of the mouth of the present Prime Minister I shall attempt to prove that it is a breach of the pledge he gave to the people.

He then proceeded to quote from clippings from different papers. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said a day or two ago to one of the members of another group that it was inadvisable to proceed in the course of a debate with a scrap album of petty extracts from newspapers, but his own colleague, sitting only two seats from him, had his scrap-book beside him full of petty extracts from newspapers. He sought to make good use of them. I am going to read the extracts which my hon. friend cited, in order that the house may see whether what he quoted, in an effort to show that I was not thoroughly consistent with the position I had taken in this house and elsewhere all through the campaign, was at all at variance with what I have said and quoted this afternoon. What the hon. member for York South produced at the time represented the search of his entire party through the papers of the country to see what extracts might be discovered to use against the Liberal party at this time. Those extracts, it may be assumed, were the most vulnerable of any that could be found. He said:

First, I should like to refer to a report appearing in Ottawa Citizen of August 3, 1935, reporting a speech made by the present Prime Minister. I quote now what appeared in that newspaper in quotation marks, as being the words of the right hon. gentleman:

"The Liberal party stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank to perform the function of rediscounts and the control of currency issue considered in terms of public need."

Is that not exactly what I have just stated? Some hon. members then said, "hear, hear," and the hon. member for York South continued:

Keep right on. I will soon get to a point where you will not shout "hear, hear."

"Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile. To regain for the nation what has thus been lost will continue to be the first objective of Liberal effort."

That was followed by more "hear, hears." Is there anything contradictory there to what was said? Those are the exact words that were used in this house and in the previous statements. The hon. member then continued:

Again I quote from the Ottawa Citizen, this time of August 8, 1935—Mr. Mackenzie King speaking at Kingston; and again I give the words which the newspaper puts in quotation marks:

"He (Mr. Bennett) had taken the gold reserves from the federal treasury, the backing for the country's currency, and turned them over to a private corporation."

And as the right hon. gentleman travelled west he waxed even more eloquent in that regard, because I observe that according to a report appearing in the Vancouver Sun of September 30, 1935, he had this to say.

He was trying to leave the impression that because I was in Vancouver, where I knew that some of those who had taken an interest in monetary matters held extreme views, I was seeking, if you wish to put it that way, to cater to such extreme views. And what does he quote?

Criticizing Mr. Bennett's bank, he said it was owned and controlled by private stockholders. It had been given by the government $60,000,000 gold reserve and the vast number of securities held by the government from the private banks. These were the property of the people of Canada. To-day they belong to the private shareholders of the Bank of Canada, he said.

That is the quotation. Well, is it not true? The statement is there; is there any exception to be taken to it? But let us go further. The hon. gentleman said:

I turn to a report of a speech of the right hon. gentleman contained in the Vancouver Sun of September 30, 1935. I imagine most hon. members of this committee are familiar with the fact that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was pretty well in its stride in Vancouver, and is reported so to be in British Columbia.

As I say, seeking to create the impression that there were some who had extreme views to which I was catering. And what does he quote? He goes on:

Out there the right hon. gentleman had this to say:

"We believe that credit should be a social service to serve the needs of the people."

"Credit is not the concern of the bankers only but is of concern to you and me."

Credit is to-day controlled by the great international money power. The first step, then, is to establish a national central bank —not another private bank as has been done —but a government bank able to control credit according to the will of the government in matters of great national concern.

The Liberal party believes it is a public matter of direct concern to the average citizen to have a national bank to control currency and credit so that they may serve the public needs.

The first objective is to get back the control that was taken from us. The next is to see that the bank is made national in the truest sense of the word.

That was what I said, speaking to the Canadian Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in Vancouver. Is there one line there that contradicts the statement of policy given officially in this house and the statements of the party, with respect to that policy, as I have read them? Then he goes on, always by insinuation, seeking to leave the impression that something different was said in another place. He comes next to Calgary, where he finds most in evidence not the Canadian Cooperative Commonwealth Federation but the members of the Social Credit party. He directs attention to the fact that Calgary was the centre of social credit, and then he says:

Then the right hon. gentleman went to Alberta where the social credit group appears to have been in its stride. According to a report in the Calgary Daily Herald of October 1, 1935, the right hon. gentleman said.

Now listen to what I said there:

A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people, and also to deal with problems of international commerce and exchange.

Then he continued:

So far the leader of the social credit group might have been making the speech. The right hon. gentleman continued:

"That was a clear statement"—

He was referring to a statement he had made previously.

—"that what we wanted at Ottawa was a central bank, or wanted in Canada, was a central national bank which would enable private banks to be controlled by the central institution in a manner which would make credit be considered more from the point of public need, domestic requirements, social requirements, and the like, than from the point of view of the interests of capital investors and private bankers only."

Is not the objective as clear and plain as it can be in that statement? The difference is clearly indicated between a bank serving the interests of private investors and a bank which will serve public interests in the sense in which I have described them. I quote further from the hon. gentleman's remarks:

Then he went on.

"Then the government policy, if it were one of extension of credit, would be in a position to put that policy into effect"—

That must be a misprint, because I doubt whether the right hon. gentleman would have repeated the word "policy." I continue:

—"through having a central bank which would give more in the way of credit at the time when the need for more in the way of credit was uppermost. It would regulate credit in a manner which would serve the needs of the country, prevent excessive speculation on the one hand, and on the other hand help serve to increase the currency and the facilities for credit when need for increased currency and increased credit facilities were required."

And then this last touch, which I think is sublime.

Listen to the sublimity of it:

"We have in the federal field the great issue of monetary reform. I have merely indicated what I have thought was the first step, and if that first is not won then all our efforts at further financial reform so far as the federal field is concerned will be materially impaired."

Will anyone dispute that? Then he quotes further:

"Equality"—

Says the right hon. gentleman to the electors of Alberta.

—"if they are materially impaired it will have a very serious effect as far as I see it upon the efforts of any province to improve financial conditions there, so I hope when Monday fortnight comes you will think not only what is important to you locally and in a provincial way, but that you will think even more deeply of what is going to be of vital concern to our country with respect to our policy during the next five years."

That was a statement made in the province where social credit was being discussed on all sides. I ask hon. members from that province: Is there a word I said there which is different from what was said in this House of Commons by myself before the election took place? Then the hon. member for York South concluded with a reference to one other speech which he says was reported in the Vancouver Province of September 21. From that source he quoted me as follows:

Canada is faced with a great battle between the money power and the power of the people —a battle which will be waged in the next parliament. He pleaded for a sweeping Liberal majority in order to carry out his policy of public control of currency and credit, nationalization of the Bank of Canada and monetary reform.

With the word "parliament" the direct quotation ends.

Now this is the only place I have been able to find, in any report anywhere, where mention is made of the words "nationalization of the Bank of Canada." Those words appearing in the report were not mine; they are the reporter's own representation. I am not responsible for the words, and anyone who was present at Vancouver and heard the speech will know that I never used the word "nationalization" there, and I might add that I never used it at any time throughout the whole of the campaign in respect to political policy respecting the Bank of Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: Did the right hon. gentleman correct that statement in view of the serious nature of it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My recollection is that I did correct it. The hon. gentleman concluded:

He finished his observation by saying:

"Until the control and issue of currency and credit is restored to the government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and democracy is idle and futile."

These are the quotations which the hon. member for York South gave to the house the other day as a result of the researches of himself and others of his party through the files of the press containing the reports of a great political campaign.

Mr. LAWSON: I am reluctant to interrupt the right hon. gentleman, but I cannot allow him to impute to me something that is not correct. Anything I quoted I searched for and found myself in the press without assistance from others.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no doubt my hon. friend's search was very diligent. He said that he was proving, out of what he had discovered, that this present measure was a subterfuge and a delusion in the light of statements I had made. I say that the statements which my hon. friend quoted proved not only that I was consistent throughout but that the legislation before the house is a full implementation of what was said by myself as leader of the Liberal party of the party's policy.

I leave this matter now. I hope that the house will vote on the third reading of the measure, so that its records may show how members view a measure which seeks to restore to the government of Canada control of currency issue and of credit, taking back this control from a privately owned and privately controlled institution and placing it in the hands of a government institution of which the preponderating interest of ownership will be with the government, and over which the government will have effective control. Observe the extent to which that control goes. It is the control, not only of ownership in the preponderating interest, but of an effective directorate, and is the control of the government itself, which has the right to refuse to accept the veto of the governor of the bank where a difference arises with respect to any action of the directors. Speaking of effective control may I point out that, behind all which takes place by virtue of any power which the government itself may exercise and which the bank itself may attempt to exercise, there must be present at all times to the minds of all concerned the view this parliament is likely to take of whatever transaction is being reviewed. When this act gives to the governor in council power to review any action of the board, where there is a difference between the directors and the governor, and the governor's veto has been exercised, it means that the minute that difference is being discussed, those parties themselves must feel that the difference in question is so important and acute that it is advisable to bring the matter to the attention of the parliament of Canada in order to avoid some great mistake being made. I ask my friends, no matter to which party they belong, is not that in your interests and in mine? We here establish a government controlled central national bank. To-day it is in the control of a Liberal administration. If the Liberal administration, through pressure on the part of its followers or for any other of the alleged reasons that have been given, were capable of having its directors seek to exercise some power in the bank which is not wholly in the public interest, is it not in the interests of all other parties in this country to see that such a move, if at all possible, before it succeeds, is brought up for discussion here on the floor of parliament? When this act takes effect the bank will be under the control of the Liberal administration. It may be under the control of a Conservative administration at some later date.

Mr. MacNICOL: About four years hence.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: About four years hence? Then, I say, beware of what may take place four years hence, because then again you will have an effort made to have this bank restored to private ownership and private control. And if an effort is made to have public interests subordinated to private interests, is it not well that there should be an opportunity for this House of Commons and this parliament to know what is the difference of view between those directors who cannot see eye to eye with each other or with the governor, before some far-reaching mistake is made? Similarly I say to my hon. friends of the more radical groups—if I may use that term in its best sense—"Some day you hope to have control of this bank. This bank would then have on it your directors and others. Do you wish to have a bank in which there is to be no opportunity whatever of any possible difference of opinion with respect to the issue of credit and currency being made the subject of debate in this parliament and matters decided by a governor and directors other than your own before you have an opportunity of coming to parliament with power to legislate in a manner which will cause the bank to operate more in accordance with your views?" When we are legislating here we have to think not only of the government which may be in office at the moment but of all the changes that may come with time, changes which may come much more rapidly in times like the present than they have done at any preceding period in the history of the country.

I conclude with this one word. No men who have to do with the responsibilities of government, no men who have to do with what affects the lives and well being of the great masses of the people of this country can wish other than that, if any mistake is being made in connection with financial policy there shall be an opportunity to have the matter discussed on the floor of this house before that mistake takes effect. When hon. gentlemen opposite say it is not in the public interest to have, on a bank which is preponderantly publicly owned, and effectively publicly controlled, a few individuals with special knowledge—knowledge acquired, if you wish, from long business experience with private interests—who may differ if need be with colleagues whom they believe are about to take a wrong course, they belie, in my opinion, the very position that as an opposition they exercise in this house. I am one of those who believe that a government is all the better for having an opposition. The country is all the better for having a government and an opposition, for the reason that men who are absorbed in many great activities may not see all sides of a problem at the same time. Men do not see every angle and aspect of a question when they have a thousand and one different matters to discuss; and when they are determining policy, what is the consideration that, more than anything else, controls a ministry? First of all, their own sense of integrity and right; but secondly, what may be said on the floor of the House of Commons by their political opponents and how the country may view what is so said. In the last resort it is public opinion which controls, and it is in order to inform public opinion and to make public opinion effective as well as to establish an effective government control which will govern this bank in all its actions, that we have adopted the course we have in this legislation.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): It was not my intention to speak this afternoon, but after listening to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I could not refrain, on behalf of the little group with which I am associated, since certain of his observations were directed to this corner, from replying to some of the things he has said. First of all, I feel like congratulating myself—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: —for this reason, that apparently during the campaign which preceded the election last October, my judgment of the Prime Minister's pronouncements regarding this matter was accurate. I told the people of Saskatchewan and of western Canada, when I had the opportunity, that nowhere in the Liberal leader's pronouncements could be found any warranty for the statements which were being made that the Liberal party was committed to the policy of the nationalization of our banking and financial institutions.

An hon. MEMBER: Certainly not.

Mr. COLDWELL: And because I said that, it was alleged on more than one occasion that I was accusing the leader of the Liberal party and the Liberal party itself of practising something of a deceit upon the people of western Canada. Again and again at my meetings I was asked if I had not read the resolution which was moved by the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), on March 15, 1934, and which was supported by, I believe, every Liberal on that special committee of the House of Commons, and I was taken to task because I dared to suggest that there was something which was not clear, not above board, in relation to this matter. Moreover we have seen in recent days the Saskatchewan Liberal, a paper devoted, as it says, to the interests of the Liberal party, state very clearly and explicitly that there is disappointment in Saskatchewan with the bill which is now about to receive its third reading. May I add that, in introducing the remarks he made this afternoon, the Prime Minister did, perhaps unconsciously, an injustice to some of the men who have sat in this chamber. He said that prior to 1932 there was very little in the way of discussion about the central bank. Yet every year from 1921, when the first Labour member and the first little group of Progressives sat in this house, they brought before parliament again and again the question of a central bank of issue and rediscount, and as the days went on proceeded to develop that policy until it became one of complete nationalization. Those are matters of public record.

I am not going to refer to the speeches of the right hon. gentleman which have been quoted again and again in this house, nor shall I refer to the speeches of various members of the cabinet. In the present debate the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) has, I think, well expressed the opinion held by hundreds and thousands of people throughout this country, many thousands of whom voted for the Liberal party last October, namely that it was the intention that a Liberal government, when returned to power, would institute a central bank which would ensure to the people of Canada national ownership and national control of both currency and credit.

In the latter portion of the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister there was one observation that I was surprised to hear. He spoke of the present control of the Bank of Canada as a control of that bank by the Liberal government, and warned the people that subsequently it might be controlled by a Conservative government or by a Co-operative Commonwealth Federation government or some other sort of more radical government which might come in future. That is not my conception of either a nationalized bank or a bank that stands midway between private and national ownership. My conception is this: The government of the day ought to lay down, by and with the advice of parliament, the policies that shall be followed in relation to finance, money, currency and credit in this dominion. Then those men engaged or appointed by government should, to the best of their knowledge and ability, carry out those policies in the interests of the people of Canada, and they should do so whether there is in power a Liberal government, a Conservative government or a more radical government. Therefore I was surprised to hear that remark, which may have been made by the right hon. gentleman without intending it to be capable of the interpretation I placed upon it.

Now I should like to say that in my opinion this bill falls far short of what is really required. I have said that a national bank should carry out the policy communicated to it by the government of the day by and with the advice of parliament. Under the present act that is not the case. The Bank of Canada Act is restrictive in most of its sections and permissive to a limited degree in others. This afternoon mention was made of the bank in New Zealand. May I point out that section 10 of the new bank act of New Zealand, a copy of which I hold in my hand, states:

> It shall be the general function of the reserve bank, within the limits of its powers, to give effect as far as may be to the monetary policy of the government, as communicated to it from time to time by the Minister of Finance. For this purpose, and to the end that the economic and social welfare of New Zealand may be promoted and maintained, the bank shall regulate and control credit and currency in New Zealand, the transfer of moneys to or from New Zealand, and the disposal of moneys that are derived from the sale of any New Zealand products and for the time being are held overseas.

In other words the government of New Zealand has taken some effective steps at least to endeavour to deliver the producers of that dominion from the control of the international financiers whom the Prime Minister considers, according to one of the speeches to which he alluded this afternoon, responsible for a great many of the difficulties which exist in the world to-day.

As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to speak at any great length, but I want to make one point abundantly clear. I believe that this afternoon I speak not only for the little group with which I am associated but for many hundreds, probably thousands, of people who are associated with the party which elected the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada. I believe further that if the speech delivered by the Prime Minister this afternoon, explaining his many speeches made in this house and throughout the country, had been made prior to the election of October 14, 1935, there would not be as many hon. gentlemen sitting opposite as there are to-day. Again and again during that campaign I met men who said: "We are going to support the Liberal candidate because we believe that the government of Canada, if Liberal, will take over the banking system and give us national control of currency and credit." That inference was drawn, to a large extent, from what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who campaigned in the province of Saskatchewan. It was drawn also, if I may say so, from many quotations from the speeches of hon. gentlemen who campaigned in Saskatchewan in 1934. May I add that while it had nothing to do with the provincial government it was an effective campaign from the point of view of the provincial Liberal party in that province. A year later, those seeds then sown having flourished and produced fruit, that fruit was garnered by some of the hon. gentlemen who sit on the other side of this house. So I say that if the speech delivered by the right hon. gentleman this afternoon in this chamber had been made prior to October 14 last the Canadian people would have had a much clearer idea of exactly where the Liberal government of Canada was going to stand if elected.

There are one or two other little matters to which I should like to refer. I thought it was undignified on the part of the Prime Minister this afternoon to read that little postcard and, when some of us said "hear, hear" to the sentiments therein expressed, to look across and say "Now we see the source." I want to say to the Prime Minister that hon. gentlemen who sit in this corner of the house do not indulge in the sending of anonymous postcards.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are not anonymous; they are all signed.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then that just shows that the right hon. gentleman should have known that this group, or any other group in the house, was not responsible for sending those postcards. If they are signed the remark he made is all the more inexcusable. I received one of those postcards through the mail, in common with many other members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend could have hardly done so unless it was misdirected, because the address on all is printed and all are addressed to myself, and marked "personal." He might have received a similar card.

Mr. COLDWELL: The point I am endeavouring to make is that it was rather uncalled for to lead the house to believe that those postcards might have emanated from one of these groups.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say at once I did not wish to create that impression at all, and if what I said did create it I certainly withdraw it. But when I heard someone say, "hear, hear" to the sentiments expressed upon the card, I supposed it had, at any rate, their approval.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to accept the explanation in the spirit in which it is made. Now it is nearly six o'clock. In conclusion, I just say that I believe the government have made a mistake in setting up a bank of this description. To my mind there are only two methods of control of a central bank to be considered. One is private control, independent altogether of the government, and for which control the government could deny any responsibility. I do not believe that would be in the interest of the people of Canada. On the other hand I believe that a national central bank, established as such, ought to be owned and controlled by the people of Canada, so that parliament may exercise the fullest possible control, and the people of Canada can place upon the shoulders of the government, and the government can accept, the responsibility for the policies of that bank. Consequently, although we of this little group are glad to see a step taken in the direction in which we wish to go, and therefore shall vote for the third reading of the bill, nevertheless we believe that if the government are wise they will again consider, before parliament meets next year, taking complete ownership and control of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the third reading, and I suggest that you now call it six o'clock, as I shall take at least fifteen minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say that I have an arrangement made with the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) to allow him to proceed this evening with his legislation, because he is obliged to leave later. If my hon. friend will be so kind as to move the adjournment of the debate, we would like to take that other measure first. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) might then go on with the amendments to the criminal code. We shall take this measure up again to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Cahan the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCE ACT

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 27, to amend the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Powers of the board.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the modifications? I understand that this bill has been agreed to unanimously by the committee. Is that correct?

Mr. POWER: To one clause, clause 3, there was some reservation on the part of certain members of the committee who felt that perhaps this legislation did not go far enough in liberalizing the provisions of the War Veterans' Allowance Act. The report was unanimous with a reservation by certain members of the committee. Clauses 1 and 2 of the bill were passed unanimously.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—To whom allowances paid.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, I regret that I cannot agree with the minister on this section. I believe that he enjoys the confidence of the returned men of Canada; I know he has done good work for them over a period of many years, and I hope he will be spared to do the same for them for many years to come.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GREEN: Although I am a member of the opposition, it is my intention to cooperate with the minister in every way possible in dealing with the soldier problems as they arise from time to time during the life of this eighteenth parliament. However, on this particular section we have been obliged to agree to disagree. This is the section setting out the class of veterans who are eligible for assistance under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. In my opinion this is the most important section of the three bills, Nos. 26, 27, 28, which have been before the house at this session, dealing with soldier problems. I say that it is the most important section because it is the only one under which help can be given now, without any delay, to a considerable body of returned men who are burnt out, men who are really unemployable.

Bill No. 26, to amend the Pension Act, is of course important, because after all the pensioner will always be entitled to first consideration. His disabilities are directly attributable to service, and for that reason, I repeat, he is entitled to first consideration. However, Bill No. 26, as passed by this parliament, gives direct help only to a very limited group of pensioners and their dependents. The main object of Bill No. 26 was to simplify the administration of the Pension Act and to achieve a certain measure of finality. Speaking of finality, I believe that new problems will arise from time to time, and I do not think we can expect the Pension Act to stand without amendment because such new problems as they arise will have to be met by amendments to the act. So much for Bill No. 26.

Bill No. 28 is also important because it provides for the setting up of a veterans' assistance commission. We hope that eventually it will lead to the employment of a great many returned men who are at the present time out of work but who are employable. I wish to distinguish clearly in my remarks between the employable returned man and the unemployable returned man. I say that Bill No. 28 should be of assistance to the employable returned man who at the present time is out of work, but if the members of the committee will refer to Bill No. 28, section 6, they will see that the key words of that bill are "investigate and report," which means that no immediate result can be expected even for the employable returned man. The bill as I see it cannot be of assistance directly to the returned man who is unemployable.

To come to the third bill, Bill No. 27, which we are now considering, my submission is that it is the one bill of the three which will be of any help to the returned man who is unemployable. Speaking for myself alone, I am afraid that the particular section now before the committee, even as it has been amended, will not meet the need. In order to explain that statement, I must review the present provisions of the War Veterans' Allowance Act. It was passed in 1930 and has never been amended. The act was passed to benefit the front line man who is defined as a veteran who served in a theatre of actual war. Although there is also provision made for the small pensioner who did not serve in a theatre of actual war but served in England or Canada, the act was primarily intended to benefit the man who served in a theatre of actual war. A returned man must be without means to be eligible for the allowance; he is allowed an income of only $125 per annum if single; if he receives an income larger than that, the difference is taken away from his war veterans' allowance; if he is a married man he is allowed an income of $250 per annum, and in either case he is allowed an interest in his home of a value not over $2,000.

Practically all applicants for war veterans' allowance are returned men who are on relief or who are faced with the necessity of going on relief. I cannot make that point too clear. These men are being largely supported by the government at the present time. The War Veterans' Allowance Act was intended for the benefit of the pre-aged and burnt-out man, the man who is really unemployable. At the present time the allowance is paid to only two classes of veterans: first, those over sixty years of age and, second, those who are permanently unemployable by reason of physical or mental disability. A man may receive a maximum of $20 per month if single or $40 per month if married. No matter how many children he may have he cannot get more than $40 per month. This is not as much as a man could receive on relief in certain cities, but the evidence given before the pension committee was to the effect that the returned man preferred to be under the War Veterans' Allowance Act as he considered he could accept the benefits under that act and still hold his head high. This fact should be kept in mind by hon. members of this committee.

As I have said before, this act has been in force for six years without amendment, but experience has shown beyond question that there are many men under sixty years of age who cannot prove themselves to be permanently unemployable—I make no complaint with reference to those over sixty years of age—but there are many men under sixty years of ago who cannot prove themselves to be permanently unemployable and yet actually they are pre-aged and burnt out and really unemployable. This fact was admitted by the chairman of the war veterans' allowance committee when he appeared before the pension committee, and it was pointed out time and again by representatives of the soldier organizations. There can be no question that this class of returned men are not being provided for at the present time.

The soldier organizations had two suggestions to offer to remedy this defect. One suggestion was that the age limit of sixty years now in the act should be reduced to fifty-five years; in other words, that there should be a general lowering of the age limit from sixty years to fifty-five years. The other suggestion was that the definition "permanently unemployable" should be changed to "industrially unemployable" without any age limitation whatever. What section 3 of this bill does is to make a very restricted provision for the returned man between the ages of fifty-five and sixty years. This section sets up a new classification and if the bill is passed we shall then have a third group eligible for the war veterans' allowance defined as follows:

—or having served in a theatre of actual war, has attained the age of fifty-five years and is, in the opinion of the board, incapable of maintaining himself because of disability, pre-ageing and general unfitness.

The committee will notice that the qualifications necessary for a man to obtain an allowance under this new classification are that he must be between the ages of fifty-five and sixty years and be incapable of maintaining himself by reason of disability, pre-ageing and general unfitness. The word "or" is not used there; the man must be incapable by reason of all three, disability, pre-ageing and general unfitness. It will be noticed that a wide discretion is given to the board; an applicant does not get an allowance as a matter of right; the allowance is confined to veterans who served in a theatre of actual war and of course they must be without means.

My criticism is that this classification is too narrow as it overlooks the veteran below fifty-five years of age who is burnt out and unemployable. The only provision made for such a man is found in a recommendation in the report of the pension committee, which reads as follows:

Your committee also recommends that the veterans' assistance commission to be appointed under the provisions of Bill No. 28 make an investigation into the position of those veterans under the age of 55 years who are by reason of disability, pre-ageing and general unfitness, incapable of maintaining themselves.

This means that those unemployable veterans who are under fifty-five years of age will have to wait for a report from the veterans' assistance commission. No action can be taken until next year, and perhaps even later. In the meantime this class of returned men are on relief with the government paying most of the cost. They are competing in the labour market, sometimes with their own sons. If they are over fifty years of age there is very little chance that they will ever get work again. I suggest to the minister that the proper thing to do would be to provide for this group in the new classification. The range of the new classification is not wide enough to cover these cases. There should have been no age limit or at any rate the group should have included veterans aged from fifty to fifty-five years. If this change were made I believe there would be more chance of getting some permanency in the act and it would go a long way toward meeting the need which obviously is not met by this section.

I think a word should be said for the soldier representatives who appeared before the pension committee. Just a few days ago we saw in the newspapers that the American treasury was sending out truck loads of bonds to American veterans. In contrast there was not the slightest suggestion of high pressure methods being used by our Canadian soldier representatives when they appeared before the pension committee. They presented carefully prepared briefs in a business-like way and I think all members of the pension committee will agree that the representatives who appeared before them were a credit to the returned soldier body of Canada.

In conclusion, I should like to remind the committee of a fact sometimes forgotten. The great majority of returned men have been fortunate enough to fit themselves into the life of the nation; they are bearing their share of all burdens just as are their fellow-Canadians and they are asking nothing of the nation for themselves. But they do ask and ask most earnestly that their comrades who were disabled or who are burnt out should receive reasonable assistance and continued sympathy from the people of Canada.

Mr. NEILL: This section, to my ignorant layman's mind, constitutes two distinct conditions. One is that of the man who has attained the age of sixty, or if he is under that, apparently, because it says:

—or is, in the opinion of the board, permanently unemployable by reason of physical or mental disability.

And the word "veteran" means a man who has been in a theatre of war. So that the first part of the section is a continuation of the present condition. Then the alternative is:

—or having served in a theatre of actual war.

I do not think there is any necessity for this; if he is a veteran he must have served in a theatre of war.

Mr. POWER: The original act provided that the beneficiaries should be either those who had received pension or had served in a theatre of actual war, so that it was possible for a man who had served only in Canada or in England and had obtained a pension to come under the provisions of the War Veterans' Allowance Act. That is carried out in the first part of the section we are discussing. As regards the other point, persons who are now in receipt of pension and who do not comply with the conditions with respect to service in an actual theatre of war shall not be entitled to receive benefits under the act.

Mr. NEILL: Unless such a man has been in a theatre of actual war.

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: The other point is this. The alternative provision in the case of a man of the age of sixty is that he must be permanently unemployable, and that is a very difficult thing to prove because the board always trots out an elevator and says that if he is not able to do the work to which he has been accustomed all his life he can at any rate run an elevator. The fact that there is not an elevator within 200 miles makes no difference. The minister realizes, of course, that it is difficult to handle such a case. He is, therefore, going to improve matters so far as the man of fifty-five is concerned by making the requisite disability take the form of being incapable of maintaining himself because of disability, pre-ageing and general unfitness. I would rather have seen the word "or" inserted instead of "and" before the words "general unfitness." It appears to me that the man of fifty-five is in a preferential position to the man of sixty. If he is fifty-four he has to prove that he is permanently unemployable by reason of physical disability, but if he is fifty-five he can get past by proving general disability and pre-ageing. Preferential treatment is given to the man of fifty-five. Why not leave out the words "fifty-five" and let the man prove disability, pre-ageing and general unfitness, the age being below sixty? If that were done it would apply to men of fifty-four or fifty-two.

Mr. POWER: That is the point which was raised by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Green) who preceded my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni. The difference as between certain members of the committee was this. The majority of the members thought that since we were creating a special class it was very difficult for us to go below fifty-five. As a matter of fact, there is a potential number of 33,000 men who could apply as being between fifty-five and sixty, and if you bring the age limit down to fifty under the same circumstances there is a potential of 88,000, indicating, as my hon. friend recognizes, that soldiers are getting older as time goes on. In view of the fact that this was creating a new class it was thought well to experiment in it before embarking very largely upon any plan in this direction.

Mr. NEILL: The minister's explanation will no doubt be made public and I am glad of that because unfortunately it has appeared in the press that the age limit has been reduced to fifty-five absolutely, which is a mistake that is likely to cause a good deal of trouble. I took up with the minister personally—and I do not think there is any provision made for it—the case of the woman who takes the place of the wife under the Pension Act. Such a woman, whether daughter or sister, or a reasonably near relative, if she takes that care of the man, possibly a semi-disabled man, which a wife would take, will qualify for the military pension allotted to the wife. I know of a particularly sad case of a man not only totally bedridden but painfully so. He is utterly unable to help himself in any way and unfortunately, owing to the obscure nature of the doctor's diagnosis, he just misses getting a pension. It is an open question whether he has Kummel's disease or some other obscure disease. He is getting the war veteran's allowance, but he cannot move hand or foot without assistance. His daughter, a married woman with children, takes the place of a permanent attendant, but because she is his daughter and not his wife he gets only $20 a month, which is totally inadequate. There should be a helplessness allowance in such a case, or some provision should be made as in the Pension Act, in the case where a woman to all intents and purposes takes the place of a wife in looking after such a disabled veteran. The man should be allowed the extra $20 a month.

Mr. POWER: I know quite well that there is, both under the Pension Act and in connection with the War Veterans' Allowance Act, a very large number of cases that are really hard, deserving the utmost sympathy of every member of the house, but I believe there is an old adage that says that hard cases make bad law. It would be impossible by legislation to cover all the cases that are meritorious in themselves and that attract our sympathy.

Mr. NEILL: But there is precedent in this case.

Mr. POWER: When the War Veterans' Allowance Act was first introduced it was intended to look after soldiers only. It was only under pressure by members of the committee of that day that it was decided to look after the wives of ex-soldiers. This is a provision to take care of burnt-out ex-soldiers themselves. There has been a tendency ever since the act was passed to extend it to everybody, to children and adopted children, and to carry on the allowance for the wife after the beneficiary's death. As a matter of compromise and in order that something should be done for the wife, the law provided that she should receive an allowance for twelve months following her husband's death. Pressure is now being brought to bear to continue this during the lifetime of the wife, and doubtless after that there will be further pressure to continue it during the lifetime of the children. So far as I am concerned, I think this is good legislation. It has served its purpose; it has met with the approval of all sections of the country, and personally I should be very reluctant to change the principle upon which it was based.

Mr. NEILL: I entirely concede everything the minister has said with regard to the merits of the legislation; I think it is the best in the world. But I do not think he entirely answered the point I made. There is precedent for what I suggested. I am merely asking that the same principle be applied to the burnt-out man as to the military man, and I do not think the number of cases would be excessive. I believe there are very few. This legislation is said to be intended for the burnt-out man, who is unable to work; that is the general acceptation. But I am quoting a case—and there must be very few—of a man who is permanently and entirely bedridden, who cannot turn in his bed without assistance, and who has no wife to help him.

Mr. BENNETT: What is his age?

Mr. NEILL: He is under the age of sixty, but he is qualified because he is burnt out and unable to help himself, and ordinarily he would get $40, but because it is his daughter instead of his wife who is attending him she is unable to draw that allowance. We have a precedent under the military pensions regulations, so that to make provision for such a case would not start a new precedent, nor would it involve any great expense if the same conditions were to apply to such a case as apply to military cases. I would not have the minister think that in pressing him in this matter I fail to appreciate the benefits of this act. I think it is the best legislation of its kind in the world. I would not even ask at the moment that the age should be reduced to fifty. I think when that is done we should also reduce the old age pension age to sixty-five. But in the case I have mentioned, and in the very few isolated cases of the same kind that must occur—and the minister's officials will know how few they are—I ask that an allowance should be made for what is called total helplessness, and that where the man is drawing only $20, he should be given an extra $20 to help him pay an assistant.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to say a word about this particular section, as I come from a district called Broadview, referred to yesterday by the Minister of Justice. This is the riding which has such a broad point of view that it sent more troops to the front than did any other riding in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: Except Davenport.

Mr. CHURCH: I used to represent Northwest Toronto, in which was Christie Street hospital. My present riding has the most men who are affected by this particular clause and who are fifty-five years old being born in 1881, about four years before the northwest rebellion, when troops to the number of three battalions, composed to the extent of seventy-five per cent of Toronto men, went to the northwest to save this country from disintegration. The men who served in that campaign were treated disgracefully by this parliament. Many of them died without a pension. I was struck by the contrast when I was in Washington recently and saw how readily a bill was passed, involving hundreds of millions of dollars, for the benefit of former members of the American expeditionary force. Many who never saw the front lines. Yet, compared with the achievements of the troops who went from Canada, the accomplishments of the American army were small and insignificant.

I commend the work that has been done by this particular committee. It is glorious work, well done as far as it went. Consider what this country has done for some of the people who stayed at home. Take the DuPont corporation; think of the hundreds of millions of dollars which it made during the war and after. One of its Canadian officials, a man who did not go to the war, has been appointed chairman of the employment commission. I refer to Mr. Purvis, head of the DuPont in Canada. What did the returned men get as compared to him?

This particular bill refers to unemployment. Every day I see men who went to the front and served there in the battle for civilization, and it is humiliating to me, as one of those who presided over a great city during the war, to note the present condition of these men and their children in distress. I do not know what they would have done but for the Poppy Day fund and the women's organization connected with Christie Street hospital. I see the children of these veterans on the streets wearing second-hand clothing; I see the wives with second-hand baby carriages. Such things are a disgrace to the people of this country.

Once again I commend the good work that this committee has done. The present minister does not need to have sitting beside him a schoolmaster when he is passing the items of this bill; I can give him that credit, anyway. I note that the purpose of the amendment in section 3 is to provide that in specially meritorious cases, such as pre-ageing and general unfitness, a veteran may be classified as permanently unemployable on reaching the age of fifty-five instead of sixty, which is the age mentioned in the first part of section 4. I might remark for the benefit of the Minister of Justice that next Sunday there will be about 30,000 troops assembled in the Broadview riding, at Riverdale park for their annual service, but that is a broad place. I take a broad view when I am dealing with any question. But he promises in a bill to do something, and does nothing. These 30,000 men will meet in Riverdale park. I do not often go down there, because I never appeal to the soldier vote; I am not a soldier and so am not in a class to talk to the men who went to the front and gave service. But I see these men on the streets every day, and I visit their homes. Some of them, because of the way in which they are treated by the people of this country, cannot to-day send their children to high school.

Christie Street hospital was in my riding. When the war closed the military hospital was just a factory; this country put its wounded men into an old base hospital on Gerrard street, which as mayor of the city, I refused to allow to be used. It was not good enough for civilians, and was closed; why was it considered good enough to be occupied by men who served at the front? Some of them were supposed to be put into the Toronto gaol, but I said on behalf of the city that, by the grace of God, no man who had served in France and Flanders would ever be put into a Toronto gaol for one small breach of military regulations, and we refused them the use of this old building. I speak only as a civilian, but I see these men in Christie Street hospital, away on the top floor. Why should they be there, serving what amounts to a life sentence? For they are sentenced by this high court of parliament to a life sentence three or four floors up in the Christie Street hospital. I am not criticizing those who look after them, the nurses and others, for they are a wonderful lot of people.

Persons who are fifty-five years of age should be taken off the labour market altogether. In the meanwhile it seems to me that better jobs could be found for some of these men. All the jobs the returned soldiers in this country get are pick and shovel jobs. I am not criticizing the present government, or the minister, who served with a Toronto battalion at the front, and who is admired and respected by the ex-service men of Toronto. But I do not think the amendment goes half far enough, considering what these men have done, and what was done at Washington. The United States did not vote a few millions; as every banking house knows, the amount they granted runs into billions. Yet some of the men who are receiving this money never left their native shores. The 347th regiment of the United States army, which came from Seattle, went through Toronto. I saw other battalions also, some of them from the states and some never did a day's fighting; yet the men are getting pensions and allowances and need do no work after they are forty. They never fired a pinwheel, a firecracker or a sky-rocket on behalf of the President of the United States.

I desire to commend this section, although, when I consider what this dominion has wasted, in natural resources of soil and forest and mine, to American millionaires and their friends, I think the section does not go far enough. The farmers, the Ontario Drury government, gave away a whole principality half the size of Belgium, to an American millionaire, Mr. Backus.

When a returned soldier comes home, and is fifty-five years of age, do you think he is 100 per cent efficient? If the whole 245 members of the present House of Commons were transported to Belgium and France; if they had to sleep, with hardly anything to eat for three or four nights at a time, away below the ground, as the present able young minister and colleagues of his on both sides of the house had to do; if members went over there and suffered the privations and human tribulations and trials of every kind that these men went through, and then came back from the front with no better conditions facing their children than are experienced by many of our returned men to-day, they would realize the position of many men in my constituency. When the children go to high school, although the teachers, many of whom are returned soldiers, are friendly to them, they cannot afford any longer to pay their fees. The result is the boys of the family go to new Ontario, and are sent to gaol because they are vagrants. I brought in a bill and appealed to the House of Commons; yet not one member supported it.

I saw these conditions while I was an officer of the municipality for fourteen or fifteen years, and I see them now as a member of parliament. I do not care about the race or religion of these returned men; I am trying to help them. I have never seen anything like the suffering they and their families are undergoing at the present time. I have visited their homes; I have seen them in rags and in want. I do not know what they would do if it were not for the Poppy Day fund. Every day in the daily newspapers of Toronto I see advertisements asking for second-hand baby carriages, second-hand socks, second-hand shoes and second-hand clothing of all kinds. This is a disgrace to the people of this country. I want to commend the government, or rather the committee, for the work they have done, but when I see one of the DuPont crowd appointed as chairman of the employment commission and at the same time see the men walking around the streets of Toronto, I think this is a disgrace. The city of Toronto cannot carry the whole burden, as it has done in the past. To the 245 members of this House of Commons I say: Go to Christie Street hospital; see the rooms and wards up on the top floor, where the men never get a breath of fresh air. See the wifes and children of these veterans, some of them five and six years of age. I say that this is a disgrace to the people of Canada. We talk about sending a few men to the old country. Well, after spending about four and a half million dollars on the League of Nations, which gets nowhere, the government cannot afford to send thirty-five members of this house over to the reunion at Vimy Ridge. Vimy Ridge cost the city of Toronto 2,000 men and $2,000,000 in insurance which was carried on the men by the city. I started to help recruit the 75th battalion; it raised 16,000 men, of whom more than 1,200 fell at Vimy Ridge. I have visited the homes of some of the members of this battalion, and what I have seen there makes me ashamed to be a Canadian. Upon my word I am ashamed to be a member of the House of Commons of Canada when I see the conditions that exist in my constituency. I know of one case, a woman whose husband might have had a good job in this country to-day, an educated woman, who has to take in washing in order to support her small children who are attending a high school in my riding. I protest against that sort of thing.

I may talk too much sometimes; I hope all talk for this session will be over to-morrow at midnight, but I do not think we can talk too much about these matters. I knew the minister during and before the war, as a hockey player, and I want to thank him for what he has done. Both he and the young minister from British Columbia came to Christie Street hospital and saw the conditions that exist on the upper floor of that institution. I hope the Minister of Finance may find it possible to release a few thousand dollars in order to relieve the condition of these men who have been sentenced to life in an institution where there is not a breath of air and where the thermometer may stand at 96 or 97 degrees. If we gave these men full pay we could not begin to compensate them for what they have done and what they have gone through. What is the situation in the United States? There are generals and brigadier-generals around Washington getting full pensions though they never set foot in France. And colonels! They have about 367 colonels in Kentucky who have never fired anything more dangerous than a pinwheel, a firecracker or a sky-rocket, who have never been outside the United States and who also are drawing full pensions.

Mr. LAWSON: In reply to some questions asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) the minister outlined the qualifications required under the War Veterans' Allowance Act, and concluded by saying that the veteran must be one who served in a theatre of war. That statement causes me to rise in order to make it clear that this does not mean one who has served in a theatre of war but rather one whose unit has served in a theatre of war. When the War Veterans' Allowance Act first came before this house I was a comparatively new member, but I, like most members of the house of that time, when the act was passed containing the definition of a veteran, believed that a veteran was one who had served in a theatre of war.

The war veterans' allowance board, however, has ruled, in pursuance of an opinion given by the Justice department, that irrespective of whether the man himself served in the theatre of war and irrespective of whether or not he has all the other qualifications, he cannot receive a war veterans' allowance unless his unit served in a theatre of war.

I took occasion to lay before the committee one concrete case which I believe is illustrative of some twenty-five or thirty cases in this country. A man was assigned the job of non-commissioned conducting officer. His job was to conduct troops through the dangerous channels from the base in England to the place in France where they joined some other unit. The men who did that work were subjected to the hazards of war both by sea and on land just as much as those who served in almost any of the transport services. But because a man was attached to a unit which was situated in England, even though he may be qualified on all other grounds under this act, it is said that he cannot obtain a war veteran's allowance. I suggested to the committee that since that interpretation of the definition contained in the act seemed clearly contrary to the plain reading of the act, the necessary amendments should be made to clarify the situation. I see the committee has not seen fit to recommend such an amendment. As far as I am concerned I merely desire every member of this committee to realize that the definition in this act does not mean one who served in a theatre of war; under a ruling or interpretation by the Justice department, no matter what service a man rendered he is still out of luck unless his unit actually served in France, thus coming within the definition of service in a theatre of war.

Mr. POWER: The case presented by my hon. friend is quite familiar to me. As the hon. gentleman says, quite a number of claims —probably ten or fifteen—have been made for war veterans' allowance by men who went on a Cook's tour to France or served as conducting officers. The war veterans' allowance board consulted the Department of Justice some time in 1932, and the department ruled that such men, though they actually did set foot on the soil of France and under a strict interpretation of the definition of a theatre of actual war could be looked upon as having served in a theatre of actual war, could not be considered under the War Veterans' Allowance Act because they had not been attached to a unit situated in France.

The same ruling was given, I am informed by the militia department in connection with the medals which were issued to those who saw service in France and in connection with various other matters having reference to military service. If my hon. friend wants my opinion may I say that I would be glad to discuss this matter with the law officers of the crown. I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of the interpretation of the act given by the hon. member. But there was no amendment which we could make. As he himself has said, the act is quite clear. "Theatre of actual war" means in the case of military or air forces the zone of the allied armies on the continents of Europe, Asia and Africa. Well, the person on whose behalf my hon. friend speaks did serve in one of the armies of His Majesty in a zone of actual war on the continent of Europe. That is quite clear; there could be no argument about it. It would not have been possible to amend the act to cover it, because it is there in the act as I read it. But in this individual case there is a ruling, which I believe has been in existence since the war, that conducting officers, those who have been on Cook's tours and who just went around France to visit the trenches, were not to be considered as people who served in the theatre of actual war. I do not think it is within my jurisdiction or part of my duty as a minister to order the war veterans' allowance committee to issue an allowance. I would think I was acting in an arbitrary manner and in a manner parliament did not intend a minister to act if I were to take that duty upon myself.

Very properly, I believe, the chairman and members of the war veterans' allowance committee referred the disputed point to the Department of Justice. I have nothing further to say on the matter, except that we could not meet the hon. member by making an amendment. I could not meet him by issuing an instruction to the war veterans' allowance committee to accede to his wishes. I think he has a perfectly sound legal argument to make before the Department of Justice, and I wish him well when he makes his argument.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for York South has said that the section refers to a person whose unit served in France.

Mr. LAWSON: No, that is what the Department of Justice says it means.

Mr. NEILL: It says "any former member who served in a theatre of actual war."

Mr. LAWSON: Yes, but the Department of Justice says that it does not mean that. Hon. members will see the position into which we are getting at this time. My hon. friend, whom I shall refrain from commending as a lawyer —because at the moment he happens to agree with me—says that to him it is just as plain as it is to me that the law means what I say it means, and what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and any person who reads it must conclude it means. Here we have before parliament a responsible minister of the government who says: "Plainly that is what the law means, but I cannot instruct the Department of Justice not to thwart the law and to say that it is something other than parliament says it is. I cannot instruct the war veterans' allowance committee." I do not think any blame attaches to the board. Being confronted with a case they submitted it to the Department of Justice. They could not set themselves up as interpreters of the law and give to that law an interpretation different from that given by the Department of Justice.

I shall not take the time of the committee to deal with the statement made by the minister with respect to Cook's tours. If some other members will keep this debate going long enough to let me go to my office and get my files I could show the minister that the person to whom I was referring was not on a Cook's tour.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps the hon. member misunderstood me. I spoke about conducting officers and people who went on what we called Cook's tours. As my hon. friend must know, so that they would not return to Canada without having at least set foot in France and been in the front line, a large number of officers managed to arrange what were called Cook's tours. They spent a week or a few days with the battalion, and then returned home. If my hon. friend's interpretation of the act is accepted, then certainly those men would be entitled to war veterans' allowance and to the same military medals as those men who served in the front line. It must be remembered, too, that the conducting officers did not have an extremely dangerous job. In fact they had what might be called "cushy" jobs; I do not want a better one in the next war.

Mr. LAWSON: I want to say at the outset that I am very sorry if I misinterpreted the remarks of the minister, or if I said anything that would injure him—

Mr. POWER: No; you did not.

Mr. LAWSON: I may have misunderstood him. I want to say, however, that some of these non-commissioned conducting officers had just as hazardous occupations as many others who are drawing pensions, and I am not referring to the miserable pittance obtained under war veterans' allowance; I refer to pensions. Conducting officers did run a hazard, if they had to cross the English channel they were on a hazardous voyage. If they had to make trips from the landing point in France to the base line of action, they ran a hazard; they ran the hazard of shell fire, and the hazard of bombs from aeroplanes. I do not wish to get into a discussion of that kind, but I know of no way of preventing the Department of Justice from saying the law is what parliament says it is not, unless parliament changes the wording to make it so plain that the Department of Justice cannot possibly say that that is not what the statute means.

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to referring the case back to the Department of Justice, if my hon. friend so desires. I believe he himself discussed it with the law officers of the crown, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. LAWSON: No.

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to referring the case back for decision.

Mr. NEILL: As we are confronted with a situation wherein the Department of Justice has given a ruling which appears to be contrary to the spirit of the act—

Mr. POWER: I would not say it was contrary to the spirit of the act. Quite frankly I am willing to tell the committee I do not think it was ever the spirit of the act to have a condition whereby conducting officers would come under it, and I will take the responsibility for making that statement.

Mr. NEILL: The spirit of the act would certainly refer to those who served in the theatre of actual war. Could we not say, "who served in the theatre of actual war," and exclude those people, who, as the minister says, were on Cook's tours? We could make a provision whereby a trip to the lines not exceeding so many days would not count. Surely it is possible for us to frame a definition in such a way as to meet the objection of the Department of Justice and still be fair to the cases about which the hon. member for York South has spoken. That should be within the legal ability of the minister and his associates; surely they could draw up a section which would be proof against the opinion of the Department of Justice.

Mr. BENNETT: About how many men of sixty are now drawing those allowances, and what was the amount paid last year? With respect to the last point made may I say that I believe the difficulty lies in the word "served." The men to whom the hon. member for York South referred have not served in a theatre of actual war, within the meaning of the statute. They were there merely as conducting officers, or whatever they may be called, and therefore did not serve within the meaning of that word. Does not the Department of Justice say that?

Mr. POWER: The Department of Justice alleges that there must be attachment to a unit. On the other hand I shall have to say this to the hon. member for York South, that certain staff officers could not be said to be attached to units, and yet they no doubt would be qualified for a war veterans' allowance.

With respect to the first point raised by my right hon. friend may I say that there are altogether about 9,000 enjoying war veterans' allowances, and of that number about two-thirds are above the age of sixty and one-third below sixty.

Mr. BENNETT: Between fifty-five and sixty?

Mr. POWER: No. At the present time the act provides for those who are unable to maintain themselves and have passed the age of sixty. We assume that they are permanently unemployable if they have reached sixty.

Mr. BENNETT: That has been the law for over five years.

Mr. POWER: Since 1930. If they are below sixty years and can establish that they are permanently unemployable on account of mental or physical disability, they come under the act.

The present section which is being proposed to the committee creates a new class. The war veterans' allowance committee, in travelling throughout the country, found that there was a large number of men who were not quite sixty years of age and not quite physically unemployable. They are fairly well recognizable problem cases, and it is to cover these cases that we are introducing this amendment. It is for those over fifty-five years of age, most of them problem cases, who cannot obtain a doctor's certificate that they are permanently disabled. Most of these cases are approaching sixty; they are between fifty-five and sixty, and it was thought we should create a class between fifty-five and sixty years of age of those who were disabled, pre-aged, infirm, and who, while not quite permanently unemployable, yet were incapable of maintaining themselves. It was very difficult to express in legal language the thought that was in the mind of the members of the war veterans' allowance committee, but they were given a discretion to take in a certain number of men who undoubtedly should be looked after in some way.

My hon. friends who have spoken have suggested that we should take in all those down to fifty years of age. The average age of our soldiers is now approximately forty-seven, and to adopt that suggestion would really mean an unemployment relief measure. This act, I submit, was never intended as an unemployment relief measure for soldiers. It was an extension of the principle on which every government and every soldiers' committee has acted since these committees have been studying this question. The principle is that no one is entitled to a pension unless he has a disability which was incurred on or due to service. That is to say, disability due to service is the determining factor whether he shall get a pension or not.

Then, in 1930, it was found that there was a large number of men who could not possibly establish their right to pension, so this parliament established a species of presumption that they were over-aged, burnt out, and parliament made that age ten years less than that provided under the old age pension legislation. They said that a man of sixty who served in a theatre of actual war might be presumed, on account of the hardships he had undergone and on account of the life of the trenches, to be burnt out, and therefore they said that he would get an allowance. Then they said that if a man were permanently unemployable on account of some physical or mental disability which he could not trace to service, he too, if he were ill, if he were indigent, should be entitled to an allowance.

Now it has been found that the words "permanently unemployable" did not cover a sufficiently large number of men, and certain service associations and certain of my hon. friends felt that we should perhaps say "industrially unemployable." I think every hon. member will immediately understand that that means unemployment insurance; in other words, that would have taken in every soldier, every man who put on a uniform, the moment he became unemployed. I do not think that was ever the intention of parliament, and certainly it was not the intention of parliament when this act was introduced. We have gone a long way in saying that we would endeavour to take care of the problem cases.

I do not know that I should discuss the question of cost, but my right hon. friend has asked me certain questions. With respect to the number of persons who are now in the enjoyment of war veterans' allowance, those sixty years of age and over number 6,194, and the amount expended during the last fiscal year on that class was $1,892,672; under sixty years of age and permanently unemployable on account of physical disabilities, the number is 2,626, and the amount expended $887,599; making a total for the last fiscal year of 8,820 persons profiting by the allowance, at an expenditure of $2,780,271. We have asked the house—and the estimate has been passed—for an amount of $3,200,000 this year.

Under this new amendment we are asking that an amount of $200,000 be inserted in the supplementary estimates to cover the balance of the fiscal year, making it roughly $300,000 additional a year, taking in the class from fifty-five to sixty years of age. I have no means of knowing how much more it would be if we took in the class from fifty to sixty years of age, but I think it is at least fair to assume that there would be at least as many, and the proposal made by my hon. friends in that regard would add to the bill something like $600,000 a year. The total of war veterans' allowances is now accelerating at the rate of $400,000 a year, without the provisions of this amendment, and I am informed that the amount next year will be $650,000 more than it was last year. Perhaps the committee would be interested in getting some of the figures. The amount of war veterans' allowances paid in 1933 was $2,224,000; in 1934, $2,500,000; in 1935, $2,800,000; in 1936, $3,200,000; in 1937, $3,500,000. Now I jump to 1940, when the estimated amount will be $4,700,000; 1945, $6,300,000; 1950, $9,174,000; 1951, $10,090,000; 1955, $11,269,000; 1956, $11,602,000; 1957, $11,809,000, and in that year we would have reached the estimated peak of expenditure if no change was being made in the War Veterans' Allowance Act. Under this legislation we are accelerating the total amount paid by at least from $200,000 to $300,000 a year; the peak will probably be reached a great deal earlier, probably some time in the early 1950's, and I say that without having any figure before me. The amount which will be expended over a period of ten years will be considerable.

Had we accepted the proposal made by certain soldier organizations and others outside, that the age limit be reduced to fifty-five without any qualifications, within ten years the estimated additional expenditure would have been $25,974,000, and had we accepted the proposal to bring the age down to fifty, the estimated additional expenditure would have been $46,058,000. That is one of the reasons why it was not considered advisable to jump at once into a very large additional expenditure. Besides, the war veterans' assistance commission, if it is to accomplish anything—and I hope it will—will endeavour to find means of employment for the 30,000 to 40,000 ex-soldiers who are not now in receipt of a pension or in receipt of war veterans' allowance, but are entitled to some consideration on the part of the people of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That was mentioned in the Hyndman report.

Mr. POWER: My right hon. friend has mentioned the Hyndman report. As he knows, the Hyndman commission's report attracted a great deal of attention and a great deal of support throughout the country. The commission reported as follows:

> To enact that a man who is out of work at the age of 50 or 55 is permanently unemployable would be to depart from the intention of the act and would virtually convert any benefits under that act into general service pensions. A large majority of those who are under 60 years of age and who are out of work, are so situated because of economic and not physical conditions, and it is felt by your committee that the recommendations contained in this report will, in large measure, provide the temporary assistance requird by those for whom employment cannot readily be found, without branding them as unemployable for the rest of their lives.
> We have given very close and earnest consideration to all these requests, and are constrained to the view that it would be unwise to disturb the principle upon which the War Veterans' Allowance Act was based.

In view of the evidence given before this commission which carefully investigated the matter, I believe that anyone who has the real interests of the ex-soldier at heart—had I more time I might go into this more fully—will agree that the committee would be wise to go forward only one step in the direction in which it has gone at the present time. Possibly at some future date, should nothing else be done for the unemployed ex-soldier, the parliament of Canada may decide to depart from the principle which it has followed heretofore and to take on its shoulders the charge of all ex-service men in Canada who are not pensioners and who have no service disability. That will be the responsibility of government and of parliament when the time comes to frame such a policy. At the present time I do not feel that we have sufficient information before us and that public opinion has been sufficiently educated to take a step so far in a direction which I think will inevitably not be of benefit to the ex-service man.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister concluded that the word "domiciled" in the last line of section 3 is the word that adequately expresses what he has in mind? In law the word "domicile" means a combination of two factors, residence and intention. A man must have residence without any animus revertendi. I am not endeavouring to lecture the committee, but the use of this word is always dangerous because it involves great difficulty of proof. It has arisen so frequently in the courts that I wondered whether it was being used synonymously with "residence," or whether or not the minister had in mind the use of the complex term "domicile."

Mr. POWER: After a rather long and fairly checkered career in a sphere not so non-partisan as that in which we are now in connection with the elections act, I did learn a great deal about the word "domicile." I quite agree with my right hon. friend that that word does not mean residence, far from it, but I am informed that it was in the original act as it was passed in 1930 and is being interpreted by the committee as meaning ordinary residence.

Mr. BENNETT: It is very dangerous in case it gets into a court of law.

Mr. POWER: I quite agree.

Mr. MacNEIL: Mr. Chairman, I wish to express very briefly my concurrence in the views advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I join with him and other members of the committee in expressing appreciation of the sympathetic attitude shown by the minister to these problems throughout the entire proceedings of the pension committee. I do not wish to appear to be unduly critical of the section under discussion at the moment as I recognize its value in that it confers benefits upon a certain category of ex-service men. It is an important step towards the solution of an urgent problem. Nevertheless I urged throughout the proceedings of the committee —and I do so again—that this section in its present form does not adequately meet the situation as now defined.

I agree with the minister when he says that the underlying principle of this legislation should not be departed from at this time. I would hesitate to advocate any change that would convert the War Veterans' Allowance Act into an unemployment relief measure. This act was intended to meet the needs of ex-service men who have suffered a premature breakdown due to the hazard, strain and exposure undergone while on active service. While I recognize the value of the existing legislation, the fact is that men who have not attained the age of sixty years and who are in indigent circumstances cannot obtain the benefits of this legislation unless it can be demonstrated on medical evidence that they are permanently unemployable.

I believe the present classification is unduly restrictive. Before entitlement may be established under this section, a man must demonstrate that he is fifty-five, that he served in a theatre of actual war; that he is now incapable of maintaining himself by reason of disability, pre-ageing and general unfitness. In my opinion that seriously restricts the benefits of this section. I am glad the members of the committee, the minister and the chairman of the war veterans' allowance committee have found this formula. I think in the words "incapable of maintaining himself because of disability, pre-ageing and general unfitness" we have a safe formula which may be applied to other age groups without in any sense disturbing the principle of the act. I submit, as I have submitted on previous occasions, that the evidence given before the committee proved very clearly that there are a number of problem cases in the age groups below fifty-five years which should be provided for. I submit further that it is in the public interest, as well as in the interests of these men, that their needs should be met promptly. The more promptly they are met, the greater will be the possibility of some measure of rehabilitation. It should be borne in mind that when a man becomes employable the war veterans' allowance committee has the power to strike him off the list. I think we have a perfectly safe formula to deal with these cases. However exhaustive may be the inquiries of the war veterans' assistance committee, there are certain clearly defined categories of ex-service men who are uemployable to-day and for whom no provision has been made nor can otherwise be made.

I feel that the minister is unduly alarmed at the possibility of assuming additional responsibility. It has been suggested that the recruiting field for applications may be to some extent larger in the age group of fifty to fifty-five years than it is in the group of fifty-five to sixty years, but it was shown before the committee that the ratio of those who might qualify was considerably lower in the age groups below fifty-five years. I submit that this formula may be safely extended to other age groups below fifty-five years, and in all justice it should be done now. If it is thought reasonable to assume some responsibility with regard to those between fifty-five and sixty years of age, I think there is at least equal justice for our conferring upon the board discretionary power to deal with these cases of breakdown due to disability, pre-ageing and general unfitness in the case of men below fifty-five years of age. I think this discretion can safely be left with the board.

I feel it my duty to say a word in appreciation of the very capable administration that has been given this legislation during the last five or six years. I can testify personally as to the remarkable degree of confidence which the war veterans' allowance committee enjoys among ex-service men generally throughout Canada. While the opinion prevails that this amendment is all that should be undertaken at this time, I most earnestly hope that the act will be interpreted in such a way as to implement the recommendations of the committee. The phrase "permanently unemployable" should be interpreted in the broadest possible sense. I also hope that at the earliest possible moment the minister will secure from the veterans' assistance commission a special report dealing with the plight of those veterans who are incapable of maintaining themselves at this time and for whom no provision has been made in the amended bill.

Mr. BETTS: I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. members for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). They have expressed my views far better than I could do so myself and I shall not repeat what they have said. On the resolution leading up to this bill I gave it as my opinion that the dead line should be not fifty-five but fifty years. I held that opinion during the proceedings of the committee and towards the close of the committee's sittings I changed it and came to feel that perhaps that dead line should be swept away altogether. That is my present view. However, having regard to the assurance of the minister that the report of the veterans' assistance commission will be studied very carefully; that the work of that commission may provide for those who are not taken care of in the present legislation, and above all that the door is not closed and that this matter may be reconsidered, and having regard further to the expressed desire of a very considerable body of the men concerned, that no difference of opinion appear in the proceedings of the committee, I allowed my own personal views to fall into the background and concurred in the report of the committee. I feel very strongly that there will be men whose cases will not be met by the provisions of this bill, and if it turns out that they are not provided for by the veterans' assistance commission I wish to make it clear that in voting for this bill I am reserving the right to speak in their interests at another session of parliament.

Mr. STEWART: I think we are all in sympathy with the object of this legislation and with the method adopted to provide for a class of men who are very deserving and whom perhaps it is difficult to put into any well defined category. It is well recognized that laws should be as certain as possible, and the only objection to this section is the element of uncertainty in it. I sincerely hope, therefore, that the department will be able to make decisions which will clarify the situation and render it easy as a matter of administration for the department and for those who are interested in the returned men to decide whether they fall within the rulings of the department which will afford them relief. The main objection to the section is its uncertainty and the large number of cases which will remain in doubt and which will be subject from time to time to, shall I say, an arbitrary ruling of the department in each particular case.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not intend to prolong the debate; indeed I think it would be presumptuous of me to do so. As a member of the committee, however, and one who questioned clause 3, I should like to state that I heartily agree with what has been said by the members who have spoken in connection therewith. I understood the minister to say a moment ago that those between fifty-five and sixty would probably be about the same as those below fifty-five.

Mr. POWER: In number? No. I said that there were 33,000 potential applications between the ages of fifty-five and sixty, and 88,000 between fifty and sixty.

Mr. BROOKS: With reference to the cost, the minister said that it would cost $300,000—

Mr. POWER: At least.

Mr. BROOKS:—and he assumed it would cost as much again if the age limit were extended below fifty-five. That is the point. The cost to the country if those below fifty-five were included would be in the vicinity of $300,000. This does not seem to me an enormous amount, and it also occurs to me that since we are amending the act we should amend it in such a way as not to have any unfairness to any returned man. If there is a man below fifty-five who is incapable of maintaining himself by reason of disability, pre-ageing and general unfitness, that man has just as good a claim against the country as the man between fifty-five and sixty. It is for this reason that I agree with what has been said on this side, and I should have been very glad indeed if the section had been extended so as to include this very deserving class. As a member of the committee, I enjoyed its sittings very much. I got a splendid education in the problems of the returned man, in the Pension Act and the War Veterans' Allowance Act, and it was a great pleasure for me, as I know it must have been for other members of the committee, to work in conjunction with the Minister of Pensions.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Information from the bureau of statistics.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister consider changing in the second last line the word "thirty" to "twenty." If we leave it as it stands, thirty years, it means that we are carrying it back nearly forty years. It says "thirty years before the date of the application for such information." We know that a census was taken in 1901 and there was one in 1911, so that by 1940 it will have been thirty-nine years since the census concerning which information will be given. This question arises more often in connection with applications for old age pension, but it arises in this matter as well. You go to some illiterate man or old woman and say that the bureau of statistics will reveal his or her age. But in this case the census must have been taken more than thirty years before the date of the application for information. The first question the bureau will ask is: Where were you when the census was taken. The second question is: What was the name of the registrar or enumerator. An uneducated man who has been travelling around the country for the last forty years has only the vaguest idea where he was in 1901, and very often he will give the wrong place and the wrong name of the enumerator. I have had a good deal of experience in this regard and I know of people who are without pensions to-day because their records cannot be located. No doubt the census was taken but the man cannot remember; he has a failing memory or he suffers from lack of education. I cannot see that any harm or danger would arise by making it twenty years. It may be said that a man may have faked his age for the census returns, having had in view some provision of this sort. But thirty years back would take us to 1901 and twenty years would make it 1911, three years before the war. Surely no one will suggest that any man in 1911, three years before the war, gave his wrong age in order to qualify for a pension thirty years later. This provision is founded, I believe, on some old act of the bureau of statistics which says that no age shall be revealed, even to the owner himself, so to speak, unless it is thirty years prior. I think it is an absurd condition, and I would press on the minister to consider making that twenty years.

Mr. POWER: The only justification I can ascertain for thirty years is that it is the provision in respect of the old age pension.

Mr. NEILL: A very poor provision, then.

Mr. POWER: Apparently it has been working very satisfactorily for ten years. But, rather than delay the passage of this bill, I am quite willing to accede to the request of my hon. friend. If he will move the amendment, I shall accept it.

Mr. NEILL: I shall be very happy to move it. It will be a godsend to many members of this house who have to get these facts for the purpose of old age pensions as well as military pensions.

Mr. STEWART: This will not apply to old age pensions.

The CHAIRMAN: What is the amendment?

Mr. NEILL: To insert the word "twenty" instead of the word "thirty" in line 37.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED BRANCH LINE FROM SENNETERRE TO ROUYN

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 90, respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line from Senneterre to Rouyn, in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line described in schedule.

Mr. BENNETT: I observed from the press that the Canadian Pacific Railway's bill had fallen by the wayside when the legislature of Quebec was dissolved. Might it not be desirable, therefore, to discontinue this measure? It now serves no useful purpose. I wondered if that was what the minister had in mind. I think the information is accurate, to judge from what I saw in the press.

Mr. POWER: There is no doubt but that it is accurate.

Mr. BENNETT: Under these circumstances might it not be just as well if we did not proceed with this measure?

Mr. JACOBS: Might I point out to the right hon. gentleman that this government has not fallen by the wayside.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, under some circumstances the hon. gentleman, if we had his inmost thoughts, might say it was no fault of his. In view of what the minister said the other evening, that he did not intend to proceed with the project this year, now that this difficulty has been solved in the manner I have indicated, might it not be well to drop the measure?

Mr. POULIOT: The legislature has dissolved but the province is not dead.

Mr. HOWE: At the moment there is involved a matter of good faith. We certainly made representations to Quebec that we intended to build this line, and I think we can hardly change our minds because the other bill failed to pass. As a matter of fact this should not be considered as in any way an improper expenditure.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say "improper." I thought the minister said that he did not intend to go on with it this year.

Mr. HOWE: We had not intended to. It had been discussed earlier in the year, and we decided that in view of the financial position of the national railways we would put it off, even though it was recognized as a needed expenditure. But, having committed ourselves to building it, I think it now becomes a matter of good faith. We can hardly put ourselves into the position of having undertaken to prevent the success of another project, and acting the part of a dog in the manger.

Mr. CHURCH: I sat in this house nearly ten years ago when there was a discovery of gold in the Rouyn district. At the time Sir Henry Thornton was president of the Canadian National Railways. I was contending that that railroad should serve the territory, on the principle of public ownership, but the then head of the railway and his executives went to the railways and shipping committee and opposed any proposal along that line. The proposition was to allow the Temiskaming public ownership road to do something. The Canadian National Railways said that they would not do anything about the matter. Now they are ten years behind the times in connection with the policy of going into the district. If they had gone in ten years ago they could have built up the district. But no, they would rather go all over the prairie provinces and spend hundreds of millions of dollars on branch lines. I read in the house the other night on the second reading of the railway bill a list of those outrageous expenditures, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, on branch lines. Yet here is a territory which, had it been served by a public ownership road, would have done something for the mining industry. But the Canadian National did not want to go in there. True, part of it was on the Quebec border and part within Quebec, but the two railways sat tight and did nothing. I was told ten years ago by the then head of the Canadian National that I was proposing something ridiculous; that it would never pay the fixed charges. But they could build hundreds of miles of single and double track over country where certainly there was no prospect of paying fixed charges. Now, when the Rouyn territory is producing something, they want to go in there. No wonder public ownership in this country is a failure. I do not blame the present minister. He had nothing to do with the proposition. The fact remains that the proposal comes just about ten years too late.

Mr. COLDWELL: I note the minister said that he would regard not building this railway as something of a breach of faith. And I listened very carefully to the remarks of the last speaker. I should like to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that a number of districts here and there became settled owing to promises, direct and indirect, of railway facilities. The territory I have particularly in mind, containing a large settlement, is in the district known as Loon lake, north of St. Walburg. The people there have been expecting that the new government would complete this railway, and I am drawing the matter to the attention of the minister at this time.

Sections 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—Tenders.

Mr. HOWE: As reported by the committee, an amendment is necessary. Paragraph (b) of subsection 1 provides that tenders shall be called for the sale of the new securities. The functions of the central bank have obviated the desirability of that clause. The practice to-day is that the central bank shall market securities of this kind at current market prices. I will, therefore, ask my colleague to move an amendment to this clause.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver) that paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 7 be amended by striking out all the words in line 36 thereof and all the words after "not" in line 37 to the word "be" in line 38.

Mr. CAHAN: Once more I wish to make a protest against the adoption of these amendments to bills without notice having been given in advance. I sat in the house the other night when a government bill was proceeded with. Section after section was read to which amendments were proposed, some of them very important indeed. I do not believe that if we had the most intellectual membership more than one or two members could follow and understand the meaning of the amendments as they were read out. In the previous parliament these proposed amendments to government bills were published in the votes and proceedings the day before or at least on the day they were to be considered, but it is impossible to follow intelligently these amendments which are proposed in committee after the bill has been introduced.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that this particular amendment was considered by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and was adopted there after discussion. After all, it is rather a simple amendment; it has only the effect of striking out the provision that the securities to be issued by the railway will be sold by public tender. That is the full implication of the amendment. The reason, as I explained a moment ago, is that I believe it was the practice of the previous government, and certainly it is the practice of the present government, that issues of public securities and Canadian National securities should be marketed through the agency of the Bank of Canada, which has proven itself to be a very efficient agency for marketing securities of this kind. If my hon. friend has referred to the amendments to the shipping act, I may say that the bill was reprinted and distributed prior to the discussion.

Mr. CAHAN: They were not here; I sat in my seat without a copy. I wish to suggest that there is a proper way in which to bring such amendments to the attention of members of the house. Every morning I look in the votes and proceedings to ascertain what amendments are to be proposed by the government to important bills that have been introduced, and if the amendments proposed to the shipping bill were printed beforehand certainly they were not on my file. I sat here with other members about me and we did the best we could to listen to the reading of those amendments, but even if one had the intelligence of an angel of the skies it would have been impossible to follow those amendments as the chairman or the proposer read them. All I suggest is that we should follow a procedure which is according to the customs of the house. I am not opposing this amendment, but certainly it is important, and the very fact that it was adopted by a committee of the house indicates that there was ample opportunity to give notice of it in the votes and proceedings. After all, the decision of a special or standing committee of the house is not the decision of the house itself. Those who were not members of the committee should have ample opportunity to study these proposed amendments. I think I went through every section of the shipping act as it was introduced and tried to understand all the amendments proposed, but it was impossible to follow intelligently the amendments that were moved by the Minister of National Defence, who was assisting the Minister of Marine that day. We shall obviate a great deal of trouble in the courts if we follow the usual procedure.

Mr. HOWE: I must apologize to my hon. friend. I appreciate the help he has been to me, particularly in regard to the draftsmanship of these bills, but the matter to which he refers is a mistake to which I can hardly plead guilty. This amendment was made by a committee of which I am not a member, and in reporting the bill the committee should have reported the amendment. The bill was reported with an amendment, but the amendment was not printed in the votes and proceedings. In connection with the shipping bill, however, all the amendments were printed in ample time and I had assumed that they would be distributed. I thought hon. gentlemen opposite had them when the bill was under discussion, and I am very sorry if that was not the case.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty was that the distribution was delayed.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. STEWART: There is one point I desire to draw to the attention of the minister with respect to paragraph (d) of section 6. I understood the minister to say that these securities would be marketed through the Bank of Canada, but section 6 still provides:

> With respect to such securities, the governor in council may, subject to the provisions of this act, from time to time approve or decide,—
> (d) the terms and conditions of any sale, pledge or other disposition of the securities—

From that provision it would appear that the sale and distribution of these securities would be still under the control of the governor in council. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct. Of course, as far as terms and conditions of any sale are concerned, I think that necessarily must be in the hands of the governor in council. Such matters as the coupon rate and so on, and even the conditions of the sale by the Bank of Canada, I should think must be subject to approval by the governor in council. Usually the government and the bank officials consult together and decide on a rate; I know an order in council is always passed governing that.

Mr. BENNETT: All the steps antecedent to the sale of the securities are taken by the governor in council.

On the schedule.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the estimated cost of this road is very high, $60,000 per mile. In view of the stage of the session I shall not argue the point, but I think in itself that is an invitation to costly construction. According to my observation $60,000 is a tremendous cost per mile.

Mr. HOWE: I think that point is well taken but I may say that the framing of these bills rather invites an excessive estimate, in that after the final plans and estimates are made, if they exceed the cost set out in the estimate the line cannot be built. I think that perhaps $45,000 per mile would be a better estimate.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I had in mind.

UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF AND ASSISTANCE ACT, 1936, TO ASSIST PROVINCES IN RESPECT OF RELIEF EXPENDITURES

The house resumed, from Monday, June 15, consideration in committee of Bill No. 100, to amend the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

12739—244½

On section 1—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: When the house rose the other evening I was speaking to a matter that had been brought to the attention of the committee by an hon. member. I only desire to say that in view of the present date, if hon. members are interested in the matter I would refer them to the list of exhibits produced before the banking and commerce committee. At page 12 they will find that the various letters to which reference has been made were produced by the different witnesses. I attended before the committee and made a statement, which was not under oath, although I offered Colonel Ralston, if he so desired, to make the statement under oath. These documents which were produced came from the files I then had with me. Whether or not the printed documents were printed from the papers taken from the file, I am not sure. It was in the Prime Minister's office. I did not myself superintend the removal of my papers, but I am told that since there has been the office of the Prime Minister, the papers taken when I removed from office, were the same as taken by my predecessor. The present Prime Minister has said that that is so, so far as the removal of his own papers is concerned.

In so far as this matter is concerned, if any hon. member is interested and will look at page 12 he will find an index of all the letters to which reference is made, and they are printed in the report of the committee on banking and commerce. I have no control over the letters which were in the possession of the addressees. Presumably they are still in the possession of the addressees. But copies were produced so far as those letters are concerned. The suggestion that papers had been destroyed, hidden or taken away is negatived by the evidence to which I have made reference.

The hon. member to whom I have referred was permitted to make certain statements. Therefore I have found it necessary at least to direct attention to them, and if necessary I shall read the letters, to show that they are upon record, including the original orders in council. I explained at length in the testimony that was given that the pieces of paper which were used in the preparation of the final documents were not kept, and in accordance with the usual course of business men, in confirming figures the telephone was used.

There is only one further point to which I wish to refer, and that is the suggestion that anything wrong has been done. If it is the desire of any hon. member to lay a charge, I shall meet it. I shall always meet gladly any charge of any kind, touching my integrity, my probity or my sense of decency in connection with the documents with which I have to deal. If the minister has the same good fortune with respect to all the guarantees he gives as the late government had with respect to this guarantee I shall indeed be happy, for the $60,000,000 guaranteed to be paid within five years has been paid in full in three years, and the suggestion that the payment had anything to do with the observations made in this chamber is as wildly extravagant, untruthful and unwarranted as it is possible for any statement to be. For the underwriting in connection with the retirement of the final balance of the $60,000,000, as every hon. member who knows anything about the business must know, was arranged long before the matter was ever mentioned in this chamber.

In fairness to everyone connected with the late government and everyone who had to do with this transaction which was initiated under the circumstances disclosed in the evidence of the president of the Bank of Montreal, Sir Edward Beatty and myself, and closely examined by very eminent counsel, and having regard especially to the language used, I pointed out that there seemed to be a habit or a desire to make it appear that something was not as it should be on the part of many people. And so I said: "If anything further is desired to be said by any member of this committee, say it now, and do not say it after I am gone." I fully understood that was a very unusual course indeed for a Prime Minister to take, but I took it because of the circumstances to which I have alluded.

I make this statement because I think it is very important that there should be no misunderstanding with respect to the matter. The words will be found at page 209:

> Now gentlemen, do not be the least hesitant in asking me any questions, because I do not want you to go away and say that I have endeavoured to escape answering, so don't be hesitant, please.

And there being no further questions, I retired.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall read the questions and answers I received from this government. I shall not insist on what was said the other day; I shall go on with what is left, and it will be very short. There was a sitting of the council on May 31, 1933, the date the letter was signed by the then Prime Minister, although no order in council was passed on that date. A sitting of the council also took place on August 31, 1933, the date when the then acting Prime Minister, the hon. member for Argenteuil, corresponded with the Bank of Montreal and sent them a draft of an order in council, but no order in council was passed. This is on record in sessional paper 171P. Therefore, when the then Prime Minister and when the then acting Prime Minister corresponded with the banks there were sittings of the council, and they did not proceed with orders in council. This is one point.

Then in connection with the same day, August 31, 1933, this question was asked:

> 1. On August 31, 1933, was the then acting Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Sir George H. Perley, also acting Minister of Finance and Railways and Canals?
> 2. If not, who were the minister or ministers for those departments on that date

In reply it is stated that Sir George Perley was acting Minister of Finance, and the Hon. R. J. Manion, Minister of Railways and Canals.

Then I had this very curious answer as it appeared in Hansard at page 3130. The question was:

> When was the "draft of the proposed order in council regarding a loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company," refered to in a letter dated August 31, 1933, of the acting Prime Minister to the general manager of the Bank of Montreal (a) recommended to council; (b) prepared; (c) submitted to the council?

The answer was that it was recommended to council on November 28, 1933, prepared on November 28, 1933, and submitted to council on November 28, 1933. It was prepared and submitted to council six months after it was sent by the then acting Prime Minister to the bank.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, that is absolutely erroneous. The hon. member may be so ignorant of procedure in council that he may unwittingly make a mistake of that kind, but the order in council could not have been sent at the time he stated. Drafts of orders in council are prepared from time to time, and occasionally drafts of orders in council are submitted to the consideration of the third parties concerned where large financial interests are involved. But the inference which the hon. member draws is quite erroneous.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall tell the White Russian of the late soviet government that the words I used were those of the right hon. acting Prime Minister in his own letter, and if there was ignorance it is not mine. That is my only answer.

Sessional paper 171-A. Motion:

> For a copy of first recommendation to council for order in council regarding a loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, referred to in a letter dated August 31, 1933, of the acting Prime Minister to the general manager of the Bank of Montreal.

Answer by the Department of Finance:

Nothing on record in the Department of Finance within the scope of the above-mentioned order of the house.

Answer by the Prime Minister's office:

No information on files of Prime Minister's office.

Answer by the privy council office:

No information.

Session paper 171-K:

1. Was the letter dated August 31, 1933, and addressed to W. A. Bog, Esquire, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, about a "proposed order in council regarding a loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company,"—a copy of which has been tabled in sessional paper No. 150-E of 1934—signed by the Right Hon. Sir George H. Perley in his capacity as acting Prime Minister?
2. If so, was that letter a public and official document?
3. If so, was the "draft of the proposed order in council regarding a loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company" therein mentioned and attached to it, also a public and official document?
4. If so, were there original copies (a) of said letter; (b) of said draft of the proposed order in council always kept on file in the Prime Minister's office?
5. If not, why?

Answer from the office of the Prime Minister:

No information on the files of this office.

Sessional paper 171-N, June 12:

1. According to the record, was the "draft of the proposed order in council regarding a loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and forwarded by the acting Prime Minister to the general manager of the Bank of Montreal on August 31, 1933," submitted to the privy council before being sent outside of Ottawa?

Answer from the privy council, Finance, and the Prime Minister's office:

No information.

Mr. CAHAN: How could there be any information? The proceedings of the privy council are confidential, and each member takes an oath not to disclose what takes place in council. Recommendations that may be made to council are often amended and changed. I have made recommendations in my official capacity to council which might be considered by council and amendments suggested, and then if they affect other outside parties, material parts would be submitted to them because orders in council are in many cases contracts of vast importance, and sometimes there are more than two parties to these contracts. But there is no order in council until it is passed by council and approved by His Excellency the Governor General, and before that is done I have repeatedly seen cases where, through a period of weeks, suggested drafts or suggested recommendations on which the order in council, as finally passed, would be based, have been made and changed. These are not matters of public record, whether records of the present government or of preceding governments.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I shall answer the hon. gentleman in one word. If it was not a draft of an order in council, and by draft I mean a foetus of an order in council, let us say then that the acting Prime Minister has sent a blank cheque to the Bank of Montreal.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, I think all this discussion is entirely out of order, but when the hon. gentleman makes an attack on me in this way, all I can say is that this arrangement with the Bank of Montreal was made in good faith during the year 1933. The order in council was a difficult thing to draw in order to make sure that the public interests were conserved in every way possible. I think a draft recommendation to council, prepared and submitted for discussion with the banks who were interested in it, was revised and rewritten many times before it came before council to be passed as an order in council. The hon. member surely knows that very often it takes weeks preparing recommendations to council, and often many revisions and changes are made in order to get it in proper shape. But for him to suggest that there is anything improper in a draft recommendation—

Mr. POULIOT: I did not use the word "improper."

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Well then, if that is the case, what is this all about? For the hon. member to suggest that all the draft recommendations to council are available for people to get as public documents, well, he does not understand the way in which the business of government is conducted. An order in council speaks for itself, and the question of how long it took, how many changes were made in it, how many revisions were necessary in order to put it into proper shape, is a matter which is not on record at all. It has been the custom of governments always, so far as my knowledge goes, that all these papers and drafts, changes and erasures, and so on, are not kept on public files; many of them are not kept on any files at all afterwards. So that when the hon. gentleman is suggesting that there was anything unusual or anything strange about this proceeding he is entirely mistaken. I would ask him to make inquiries from the clerk of the privy council and find out how these things are managed, and then he will not get up in the house or in the committee when another bill is under consideration—it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this question is not in order anyway—and make the suggestion that anything improper was done in regard to this transaction.

Mr. POULIOT: It is most amusing, Mr. Chairman, to see the former ministers rising one after the other to give explanations. Both of them were out of order because they spoke without asking my consent. I am going to make my speech; I want to get through in a short time, and I am not to be interrupted by anyone. If we are to come to an easy understanding with regard to the word "draft," let us say as a matter of compromise that it was the kind of draft that occasioned the former ministers a cold in the head. Now I continue:

Sessional paper 171-F:

1. On what date did the general manager of the Bank of Montreal notify the Prime Minister's office that the banks had advanced $35,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the guarantee of the letter signed by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister, and dated May 31, 1933?
2. On what date was an order in council passed to rectify said guarantee given by the said Right Hon. R. B. Bennett?
3. When and where was it made public for the first time?

Answer from the privy council, and the Prime Minister's office:

No information.

Hansard, page 3349, reports this question and answer:

Mr. Pouliot:

From what department or departments, and when, did the Department of the Secretary of State receive the correspondence contained in sessional paper No. 150-E, tabled on March 19, 1934, in accordance with an order of the House of Commons, dated February 12, 1934, for a copy of all correspondence interchanged between the government of Canada, or one of any of its members, and one or any of the Canadian banks, in connection with the guarantee given by the government for the loan of $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. Rinfret:

The documents contained in the return tabled in the House of Commons on the 19th March, 1934, were not received in the Department of the Secretary of State. The return was tabled by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister.

Return 171H:

Did the statement made by the Secretary of State on June 3, 1936—

[Sir George Perley.]

That is the answer I have just read:

—(Hansard page 3349), that sessional paper No. 150-E, "a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Canadian government and any of the Canadian banks regarding the guarantee given for the loan of $60,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway," was tabled on March 19, 1934, by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister, and not by the then Secretary of State, indicate prima facie that no other department than the Prime Minister's had exchanged correspondence in that connection with any of the Canadian banks?

Answer by the Department of the Secretary of State:

Other than the copy of the correspondence tabled 9th June, 1936, by the Honourable the Minister of Finance, being a return to an order of the house of the 3rd June, 1936, and other than copies contained in sessional paper No. 150-E, tabled 19th March, 1934, by the then Prime Minister, the Department of the Secretary of State has no knowledge of any correspondence exchanged with any of the Canadian banks on the subject mentioned.

150-D reads:

Copy (a) of the document furnished W. H. Curle, Esquire, K.C., general counsel of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company (law department) to the then Prime Minister, and which was acknowledged by the letter on November 3, 1933, according to sessional paper No. 150-D of 1934, and (b) of the letter or memorandum from the said Mr. Curle to the said then Prime Minister and to which was attached said document.

According to return 171-R of June 10, the Prime Minister's office stated that there was no information regarding this matter on the files of that office. Return 171-J dealt with the following question:

1. Referring to sessional paper No. 150-D of March 19, 1934, "copy of all correspondence between government of Canada and Canadian Pacific Railway in regard to guarantee given by the government for a loan of $60,000,000 to Canadian Pacific Railway," which contained (a) one letter from the then Prime Minister to W. H. Curle, Esquire, K.C., general counsel of the Canadian Pacific Railway, dated November 3, 1933, and (b) a "list of payments made in discharge of maturing obligations since May 31, 1933, as mentioned in letter of 28th November, 1933, from Jackson Dodds, Esquire, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, to the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, P.C., K.C., Prime Minister of Canada," from May 31, 1933, to October 23, 1935, was there any other correspondence exchanged between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with regard to the said guarantee?
2. If so, from whom to whom and on what dates?
3. Was that correspondence of public or confidential nature?
4. Why were the letter and list above mentioned in paragraph 1 also tabled on the same day, March 19, 1934, in another return, sessional paper No. 150-E of 1934, "a copy of all correspondence exchanged between Canadian government and any of the Canadian banks regarding the guarantee given for the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway"?

5. Was the above mentioned list sent by Mr. Dodds to the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett apparently on November 28, 1933, to the same effect as the document acknowledged by the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett to Mr. Curle on November 3, 1933, and did it replace it in sessional paper No. 150-D of 1934?

6. Was the said return 150-D of 1934 tabled by the then Prime Minister or the then Secretary of State?

In answer to No. 6 the Secretary of State says that this was tabled by the then Prime Minister, but the office of the Prime Minister replies, "no information in the files of this office." Now I direct your attention to this most important question:

1. Referring to sessional paper No. 150-E of 1934, are the original letters, sent to the Prime Minister or the acting Prime Minister by the following gentlemen:

1. Mr. W. A. Bog, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, June 7, 1933; August 17, 1933; September 25, 1933;

2. Mr. Jackson Dodds, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, September 2, 1933; November 28, 1933; December 5, 1933;

3. Sir Charles B. Gordon, president of the Bank of Montreal, December 1, 1933, on file in the Prime Minister's office and have they always been on file in that office since they have been received by that office?

2. Were these letters of an official or public nature?

The office of the Prime Minister replied, "no information on the files of this office."

All these original letters received by the then Prime Minister or the then acting Prime Minister are the property of the state and no one should take them away from the department concerned. The right hon. gentleman answers that it is the tradition for the Prime Minister to take his files with him. All right, I agree with him, provided that the Prime Minister minds his own business and does not interfere with other departments. If these letters had been written by the Minister of Finance they would still be there, like other letters written by the Hon. Mr. Rhodes, which I shall mention in a minute. The Prime Minister interfered with the business of other departments and these letters were taken away, either to his office or elsewhere, when they belonged to the state. No one can deny that.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The bill under discussion has to do with an amendment to the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, and I respectfully submit that the conduct of the Prime Minister in 1934 has nothing whatever to do with either the principle or the letter of the bill under discussion. I could go a little further and say for myself that I entirely disapprove tactics of this kind.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, may I speak on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN: Not until I am through. A point of order has been raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. Cameron). I would remind hon. members of the committee that when this bill was before the committee, I think two days ago, the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) made some remarks. During the course of his remarks I called him to order as I thought he was out of order. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) replied to the hon. member but he had not finished. He had the right to the floor when this bill again came before the committee to-night. Section 1 of this bill reads in part:

> The governor in council may also enter into agreements with corporations, partnerships, or individuals engaged in industry respecting the expansion of industrial employment.

There was no point of order raised when the bill was before the committee the other evening.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, there was.

The CHAIRMAN: The right hon. gentleman said that he did not think the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata had any bearing on this matter. I disagreed with him and read this paragraph. I am still of the opinion that this discussion, unfortunate as it may be, would come under the terms of this section. I say to the hon. member for Témiscouata that if in my judgment any of his remarks are out of order, I shall immediately call him to order. I say to him that I hope in the remainder of his remarks he will keep quite within the rules of this house.

Mr. WILTON: I should like to ask your ruling as to whether the hon. member was not out of order a few moments ago when he insultingly referred to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) as a White Russian? I have never heard a more insulting remark in this house.

Mr. SPENCE: Why did not the Chairman hear that?

Mr. WILTON: I should like to have your ruling as to whether or not he was out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Wilton) should have raised his point of order at that time if he thought the speaker was out of order.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the duty of the chair to do that.

Mr. SPENCE: It was your duty to stop him.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. As I heard the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata, he did not apply them to any hon. member.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, he did, he named the member.

The CHAIRMAN: Not according to the way I heard it. Had he applied his remarks to any hon. member I would have immediately called him to order.

Mr. WILTON: May I explain—

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Hamilton West has the floor if he is rising to another point of order.

Mr. WILTON: On another point of order. What I want to point out is that at the time the remark was made it was made in reply to a remark of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. After that hon. member had spoken, the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) directed his remark to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: That is not a point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I suggest to the hon. member for Hamilton West that he read the rules of the house, first learning to read.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member should try to get some manners.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the limit in this house?

Mr. POULIOT: I have regard for the rules of the house, but whenever I say anything it hurts and we hear others—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Will the hon. member take his seat.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN: I quote standing order 41, concerning decorum in debate:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the royal family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof. No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

I direct the hon. member's attention particularly to these words:

> —nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof.

I would ask him to withdraw the last remark he made just prior to my reading this rule.

[Mr. Spence.]

Mr. POULIOT: Surely, I shall withdraw anything that is not in accordance with the rules of the house, and may I say it is not my remarks that may hurt some members; it is the truth.

Mr. CAHAN: On a point of privilege. The hon. member, as nearly as I could understand him, replied that what he said was true even though objection was taken to it. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the attitude and the conduct of the hon. gentleman, proceeding from day to day, are such that hon. members, in order to vindicate their personal integrity, will have to exercise their rights by force outside the chamber. If the hon. gentleman is to continue to make his insinuations against the moral character and the integrity of members of the former administration, I certainly say here and now that I would rather leave this chamber forever than submit to the personal taunts and the inaccurate statements of the hon. member for Témiscouata. It has come to the stage that, if he is to proceed in this manner, members can no longer tolerate it, and members will not tolerate it even if they have to resort to physical force.

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, I fear only God, and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has been dreaming. I say that he has had a nightmare.

171-S. Copy of all correspondence exchanged between the then Prime Minister or the then acting Prime Minister, on one hand, and any bank, banker, railway company or railway officer or official, from December 5, 1933, to October 23, 1935, inclusive, with regard to the dominion guarantee of the C.P.R. loan.

The answer from the Prime Minister's office is, "no information regarding this matter on the files of this office." The list mentioned by the leader of the opposition was published in the report of 1934. What happened to the correspondence which was exchanged between the previous government and the banks and the Canadian Pacific Railway from the time of the sittings of that committee to the time the hon. gentleman left office? Nothing is on record. It is hard to find a list of that correspondence in the book printed a year and a half before the hon. gentleman left office. And now I come to another point; I shall be brief—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: —and to the point. This is return 171-Q. It is a direct answer to what the leader of the opposition has just said, that the matter was decided on a long time ago and that the Canadian Pacific Railway was to refund that money. Possibly it may have been a long time ago, the same as the negotiations with the United States. But when I asked the leader of the opposition whether there had been any draft treaty with the United States under his administration his reply was, nothing of the sort, and nothing of the sort with regard to the complete refunding of the Canadian Pacific Railway loan by the bank and the guarantee by the dominion. This return, 171-Q, June 12, 1936, is as follows:

1. On June 20, 1934, was the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister, also acting Minister of Finance and acting Minister of Labour?

The answer is no.

2. If not, who were the minister or the ministers for those departments on that date?

The answer is, the Hon. Mr. Rhodes, Minister of Finance, and the Hon. Mr. Gordon, Minister of Labour.

3. On the same date, did the said Right Hon. R. B. Bennett submit a memorandum to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to recommend that consent be given on behalf of the dominion government to the surrender to the C.P.R. by the banks of one-fifth in the amount of the perpetual consolidated debenture stock of the railway company so held as security by such bank?

The answer is yes.

4. If so, by whom was it signed and on behalf of whom?

The answer is: "Signed by R.B.B. as Prime Minister, and for the Minister of Labour and Minister of Finance." The leader of the opposition was not signing that memorandum in his own capacity; he was signing it also for his colleagues, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour.

5. In the latter case, did the person who signed it have any authority to sign it on behalf of others?
6. If so, what was such authority?

The answer was: "Among the special prerogatives of the Prime Minister is that of making recommendations in any department of the government." That is true; but on the other hand, how is it that the Prime Minister is often appointed acting minister of other departments? The right hon. gentleman, now leader of the opposition, has been at the same time acting Minister of Labour and acting Minister of Finance.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No.

Mr. POULIOT: It was in the first special session and he was representing Senator Robertson, who was in the senate; he was at the same time Minister of Finance for more than a year; and I told him in this house that it was the first time the same man was representing capital and labour. He must remember that now, though he said no. His memory is not good; he means well but here his memory is all wrong.

7. Are ministers of the crown allowed to give powers of attorney to any one of their colleagues to act on their behalf in their official capacity as ministers of the crown?

The answer is no.

8. If so, what is the form of such powers of attorney and before whom are they passed?

The same answer, no.

9. Were there any powers of attorney attached to said memorandum?

The answer is no.

10. If so, from whom, to whom, and before whom were they passed?

The same answer, no.

11. Are there any initials on the first page of the said memorandum?

The answer is, yes.

12. If so, what are they and what do they mean?

I asked the hon. gentleman if his letter of May 31, 1933, was initialled by his colleagues. This memorandum bears a signature which is just as good as Stalin's or Mussolini's or other dictators. It is "R.B.B." on the first page of the memorandum.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that parliamentary, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: No; it is not parliamentary and I ask the hon. member to withdraw it. It is offensive.

Mr. POULIOT: Anything offensive I withdraw.

Mr. BAKER: Why keep on doing it?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must withdraw the words which I have ruled are offensive in reference to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, I abide by your ruling; I cannot do any better. I have forgotten what I said; I cannot repeat the words. I spoke very fast. But I abide by your ruling entirely.

The CHAIRMAN: That is not sufficient; I say to the hon. member that he must withdraw his words.

Mr. POULIOT: If your honour will be kind enough to tell me what I must withdraw I shall withdraw it at once.

The CHAIRMAN: The comparison to dictators. My hon. friend from Témiscouata knows very well what he said, and he can facilitate the work of the committee if he will keep within the rules and withdraw the remark unqualifiedly.

Mr. POULIOT: I accept your ruling and I withdraw anything not in accordance with the rules of the house.

13. Does it appear on the face of the said memorandum that it has been approved?

The answer is yes.

14. If so, by whom?

The answer given by the government is, "By the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett." This is the answer given by the government.

15. Was there in the form of agreement between the crown and the banks contained in P.C. 2490 of November 28, 1933, any provision to the same effect as the recommendation to council above mentioned in paragraph 3?

That is, with regard to the refunding. This is clear. The right hon. gentleman has said that it has been there for many years. The answer from the government is "no," and the fact is no. Nothing with regard to the refunding. Imagine those business men; they were giving a guarantee on behalf of Canada for a very large amount of money, and according to the answer given by the government, there was no provision for the refunding of it.

16. Did the House of Commons sit on June 20, 1934?

The answer is, "yes." We heard nothing of that, although we were sitting in the House of Commons on that date.

17. On what exact date did the then Prime Minister notify the railway company and the banks that such recommendation had been thus approved?

The answer is, "No information."

18. When was an order in council passed to ratify such recommendation?

Answer, "20th June, 1934." The order in council was passed the same day, but the House of Commons was not notified.

19. When and where was first public notice given of such order in council?

The reply was, "No information." And then a motion:

Copy of all correspondence between the Minister of Railways and Canals, from May 31, 1933, to October 23, 1935, and one or any of the Canadian banks or any railway company, in connection with the guarantee given by the government for the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

No. 171-D, answer of the Department of Railways and Canals: "No record in this department of any such correspondence."

[The Chairman.]

Now we take the Department of Finance, 171-C:

Copy of all correspondence between the Minister of Finance, from May 31, 1933, to October 23, 1935, and one or any of the Canadian banks or any railway company, in connection with the guarantee given by the government for the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

171-C. The only letters now on file in the Department of Finance with regard to this $60,000,000 loan until the last government left office are: First, letter from Sir Charles Gordon to Mr. Rhodes, December 9, 1933, sending eight agreements executed in duplicate by the eight banks; second, from Mr. Rhodes to Sir Charles Gordon, December 11, 1933, returning one copy each of the eight agreements which he had executed in duplicate; third, from the same to the same, December 12, 1933; fourth, acknowledgment by Sir Charles Gordon, December 13, 1935.

I tell the right hon. leader of the opposition that, if he had acted in the same fashion as the hon. Minister of Finance did, the letters that were written prior to that would be still on file in the Department of Finance.

Mark you, sir;

In the minutes and records of the privy council, did the signatures of the Honourable E. N. Rhodes, then Minister of Finance, and of the Honourable W. A. Gordon, then Minister of Labour, appear for the first time in matters pertaining to the dominion guarantee of the $60,000,000 C.P.R. loan in memorandum of November 28, 1933, to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, for P.C. 2490?

The answer of the privy council is, in return 171-0 of June 12: "Yes." It was the first time that the signature of the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Labour appeared with regard to that transaction.

Now, sir, there is only one matter left. It is with regard to the refunding of the whole thing. The right hon. leader of the opposition has spoken of "wildly extravagant statements" which were not warranted when I said that it was three days after the Canadian Pacific Railway loan was mentioned in the House of Commons by the member for Témiscouata that the whole amount, which was not then due, was paid by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I hope the right hon. leader of the opposition will open his ear and listen to this. It is on Hansard, June 10:

1. Did order in council P.C. 2490 of November 29, 1933, provide for any date of maturity for the repayment of the whole or any part of the $60,000,000 Canadian Pacific Railway loan which was guaranteed by the dominion government?

Answer: "Yes."

2. If so, what payment was to be made at each date of maturity?

Answer: "$35,000,000 due June 22, 1938, and $25,000,000 due December 1, 1938."

3. Was another arrangement in that connection made on June 20, 1934?

Answer: "Payment was made prior to the maturity dates referred to."

4. If so, what was it?

Answer: "Answered by 3."

5. What payments were made by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the banks (a) on the capital, and (b) on the interest; (1) in 1934, and (2) in 1935?

Answer: "(a) 1934—$12,000,000; 1935—none." It is surprising, because the right hon. gentleman was saying that all the time they mentioned the refunding of that loan, and while $12,000,000, one-fifth of the amount, was paid in 1934, there was nothing, according to the record, paid in 1935, the last year he was Prime Minister. The second question was answered: "No record."

6. Did the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company advise the Minister of Finance this year that arrangements had been made to pay off the balance of $36,000,000 on May 1, 1936?

Answer: "Yes." According to what the right hon. gentleman has said, the answer should have been "No."

7. If so, on what date?

Answer: "April 27, 1936." Exactly what I have said. It means that the date the Canadian Pacific Railway loan was mentioned in this house was the very same day the president of that company notified the government that the amount which was due, and even that part which had not yet matured, were to be paid three days later, on May 1. The last question was:

8. Was the Minister of Finance advised by the chartered banks that the principal amount of the loan together with interest thereon, had been paid on May 1st?

Answer: "Yes."

I shall say no more than that. The case is just as complete as it can be. The first time that the signatures of the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Labour appear is on November 28, 1933, on the memorandum, in spite of the fact that the letter of guarantee was given six months before, on May 31, 1933. Not only that. There are three or four letters in the Department of Finance which were written afterwards by the then Minister of Finance; there is no correspondence in the meantime except from the then acting Prime Minister and the Prime Minister himself.

I suffered so much some years ago, when I was called twice to order because I had said to the then Minister of Marine that public letters should not be changed into confidential letters, that I am very much surprised that the hon. member for Calgary West, who made so much fuss about the matter at the time, assumed on his own responsibility to take away with him letters that belonged to the state with regard to a guarantee of $60,000,000. That is all, sir.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, we of this side of the house and all those who form the official opposition have always accepted your rulings, I think, with very great respect indeed. Bill No. 100, which we are now discussing, does in one clause refer to agreements with corporations, but I call your attention to the fact that it says:

> The governor in council may also enter into agreements with corporations, partnerships, or individuals engaged in industry respecting the expansion of industrial employment.

We all know that the guarantee given to the Canadian Pacific Railway had nothing to do with a guarantee respecting the expansion of industrial employment. With that before my eyes, I nevertheless accepted your ruling and did not attempt to appeal therefrom. But I do say this—and I call your attention to it as the chairman of committees and the deputy speaker of this house—that recently certain questionable interjections in this house have become intolerable.

With respect to these questions that have been asked repeatedly with regard to the Canadian Pacific guarantee, every member of this house and every member of the present government who has knowledge of the facts knows that the guarantee was made in good faith; that it was absolutely above suspicion and that the liability has been repaid so that the treasury has not lost a single dollar on that account. I do not know exactly, but it may be and I believe was the case that there was confidential correspondence for a certain period relating to the proposed arrangements to be made with the banks, several of whom were concerned with this guarantee in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Confidential correspondence was carried on for a time with regard to these matters. But when official action was to be taken, a representation would be made by way of recommendation to His Excellency the Governor in Council, and on that recommendation an order in council would be framed and passed. The order in council which was so framed and passed is the official document completing the transaction, and the hon. member has no right to call for the confidential communications from day to day in which the final basis of the agreement was developed. I venture to say to the Minister of Finance that even since he came into office this time, and certainly when he was in office before, he had necessarily to have confidential correspondence with many persons interested in public affairs before he finally made his recommendations to council dealing with those matters which were definitely embodied in orders of His Excellency the Governor in Council.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, if the Prime Minister were here to-night I am sure he would concede that under an order in council which is passed at the inception of each successive administration the Prime Minister, by order of his colleagues, is given certain exceptional prerogative rights.

Mr. BENNETT: Attached to his commission.

Mr. DUNNING: That is so.

Mr. CAHAN: And for sixty years or more that order in council has been regarded as confidential. That order in council has never been brought down in this house, but it is an order in council passed by each government on assuming office, giving more or less in detail a statement of the rights and prerogative privileges which the Prime Minister's colleagues confer upon him. More than that, on one occasion I traced back each successive order in council, I think away back to the time of Sir John A. Macdonald, in order to ascertain certain facts which were important with respect to government action at that time. Each administration, with the exception of a slight difference in wording from time to time as new conditions arose, has followed exactly the same form in respect of that order in council. The Prime Minister, or whoever replied to the hon. gentleman, indicated to him that there was an order in council outstanding, the order in council constituting the Bennett administration, if I may so call it, which authorized the right hon. leader of the government of that day to act on behalf and in the name of his colleagues. It is impossible to carry on government unless some person has such authority in case of the temporary absence of some member of the government. That practice has continued to this day, and I suggest that it is quite improper to take from it any undue inference such as has been drawn by the hon. member for Témiscouata to-night.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Further, Mr. Chairman, I do say that I wish you, as chairman, would again consider and review these proceedings of to-night. I accepted your ruling. I did not appeal from it; I thought it better that we should have this tempest now than at another time. But such proceedings render the position of members of this house utterly intolerable, because they surpass the ordinary decencies of debate. When one becomes a member of this house we assume that he will conform to the ordinary dictates of decency and that he will act in a gentlemanly way, and it is with that in mind—

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege. I strongly object to the language of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. He is abusing his privileges as a member; he is abusing me, and therefore as a member of this house I strongly protest. The hon. gentleman is also imputing to me motives I never had and language I never used.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have only a few more words to add. We rely upon each other, that each will conduct himself as a gentleman in this house. That rule, when observed, ensures pleasant and amicable relations between members not only in the house but outside it. If any member is permitted to abuse our privileges, as I suggest the privileges of members have been abused by the hon. member for Témiscouata to-night, the result will be that members will reluctantly refuse to take part in debates in this house when the hon. member for Témiscouata is present, in order to protect themselves against vehement accusations of the nature which the hon. gentleman brings against other members. Or else we, as individual members, upon leaving this house, will have to resort to physical force in order to compel the hon. gentleman, when he is in the presence of other hon. gentlemen, to respect himself and to respect others with whom he comes into contact.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have an amendment to section 1, Mr. Chairman, which I move now in order that it may be printed for the next sitting of the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: I strongly protest against the imputations and insinuations of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, as much a gentleman as he is.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The amendment moved by the Minister of National Defence is that section 1 be amended by adding after the word "act" in line 20 the following:

as well as the amount for which the province may be obligated by way of loan in connection with the cost of any undertaking for which commitments were made under the Relief Act, 1935, and which may be continued under agreements entered into under authority of this act.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not want to delay the committee for more than two or three minutes, but I should like to speak to something that is relevant to the issue, in regard to agreements between the provinces and the corporations. I am not here to defend what was done by the previous government—

Mr. DUNNING: I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to interrupt for a moment. It is desired to move the committee up in order that a formal motion may be made before eleven o'clock, if my hon. friend would permit that to be done.

Mr. CHURCH: Very well.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended stands.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1936-37

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting further supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1937, was presented by the Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some days ago I gave an undertaking that on or not later than Thursday I would move that the house go into committee of supply in order that we might take up an item which has been reserved in the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, namely the item relating to Geneva, so that we might have a discussion on foreign affairs. I think it would perhaps serve a useful purpose if, at the outset, the discussion took place in a formal way, and if the debate were to be carried for a time at least with His Honour the Speaker in the chair. Subsequently we could go into committee for any detailed information hon. members may wish to have. If hon. members are agreeable to proceeding in that way I would ask for unanimous consent to move that the provision of standing order 28, respecting committee of supply, be suspended for Thursday, June 18 instant, the reason being that on Thursdays Mr. Speaker leaves the chair without question being put. If the motion is carried I would propose to-morrow, before Mr. Speaker leaves the chair, to make a statement of the government's position on matters of external affairs in which I believe hon. members are immediately interested, and we might proceed then with the debate in a formal manner. When the debate has continued for such time as hon. members may deem sufficient, the house could then go into committee and proceed to further discussion by question and answer. I think that procedure would probably prove to be in the interest of all, but my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition may have a different view about it. If so, I should be glad before putting the motion to hear what he has to say.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I am bound to say that I do entertain a different view. A motion to go into supply is not made to-morrow, and to suspend that rule for one particular purpose would be wholly improper, in my judgment, and certainly could be done only with the unanimous consent of the house. No notice being given of any such intention, inasmuch as it is an estimate for Geneva that is under consideration, the proper place for its consideration is in committee of supply when the chairman of committees is in the chair. I am sorry I do not see it as the right hon. gentleman has mentioned, but I conceive the proper manner to deal with it is the manner I have indicated, and not in the manner he has suggested.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of course that settles the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a difference of opinion; that is all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It requires unanimous consent. I had thought that by following the course I have suggested our discussion, having regard to the importance of the matters likely to be discussed, might be carried on in a more dignified and befitting manner than would otherwise be possible. However, I shall carry out the undertaking given, namely that to-morrow we would proceed in committee of supply with the consideration of the item concerning Geneva, at which time matters relating to external affairs may be discussed.

The government will be prepared to consider morning sittings any time hon. members may feel they would care to have them begin. But in this I do not wish to suggest a course which would not be wholly acceptable to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition or to any other hon. members of the house.

Therefore I shall leave it to the whips to indicate to the government what appear to be the wishes of hon. members in the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: Whatever the Prime Minister may consider most advisable in the public interest, I am quite prepared to meet, in that regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Thank you.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 18, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Fourth report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Weir.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING AND SATURDAY SITTINGS

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members may have noticed that in the votes and proceedings of yesterday I gave notice of the following motion:

That on Friday, the 19th instant, on Saturday, the 20th instant, and every sitting day and Saturday thereafter until the end of the session, the house shall meet at eleven o'clock in the morning, and that in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock p.m., there shall be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock p.m., and the order of business and procedure shall be the same on Saturday as on Friday.

I handed this notice to the clerk last evening, having had a word with the chief whip who in the interval had seen the whips of the other parties. I understand that the motion expresses the general view of hon. members. Such being the case, I would ask for unanimous consent for the adoption of the motion so that the order of procedure for tomorrow and Saturday may immediately be known.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put I should like to say a word or two with regard to the sittings of the house. For some time I have been thinking about this matter and it has occurred to me that we might change the hours during which the house sits. In Great Britain the house sits continuously from four o'clock on, and I was wondering if the Prime Minister or the government would consent to having a committee appointed next session to study this question and perhaps any rules which need revision. If the house would sit continuously from two o'clock until seven, it would mean five hours a day or twenty-five hours a week as against the twenty-seven hours a week that we now sit. I think we would actually get through our work more expeditiously than we do by sitting from three o'clock to six, and from eight o'clock to eleven.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that the government will be pleased to consider the suggestion he has made. If when the house resumes at a subsequent session it is the wish of hon. members that a committee be appointed to consider this and allied matters, there will be every disposition on the part of the government to grant the request.

Motion agreed to.

FREE FOREIGN TRADE ZONES

On the order:

First reading of Senate Bills—Bill No. 108 (Letter E2 of the Senate), intituled: "An Act to enable the establishment, operation and maintenance of free foreign trade zones."

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): I understand that the hon. member who was to move this bill, or rather to sponsor it, is not here. I should be glad to move the first reading of it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Stevens moves that Bill No. 108, to enable the establishment, operation and maintenance of free foreign trade zones, be read the first time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. STEVENS: The bill, as will be seen, originated in the senate. It provides for the establishment, operation and maintenance of free foreign trade zones, or what is known as the free port zone. It is not proper at this time to go into any lengthy explanation, but briefly it provides merely for the issuing by the government of a licence for the establishment of such a free port zone in any port in Canada. The bill does not come into operation except on proclamation, nor does it involve in any sense a charge upon the treasury.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) whether it is the intention of the government to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Board Act in such a way that borrowers who have paid interest on shares of the capital stock of the board from which they have received no benefit would be credited with the amount of such interest, as these shares were retired last year; also whether the government intends to retire the original loan to the Canadian farm loan board and to borrow at a lower rate of interest. By way of explanation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend was good enough to intimate that he was going to ask the question. With regard to the first part of it, it is of course a matter of government policy and cannot be indicated in advance. With respect to the second part I may assure him that the matter is now under consideration and study.

[Mr. Stevens.]

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE—CUSTOMS BULLETIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (East Kootenay): I wish to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) a question. Some weeks ago an order of the house was passed calling for the production of copies of certain bulletins issued. May I ask the minister whether it is possible to have that return brought down soon?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): I shall make inquiries and attempt to expedite the bringing down of the return.

SOCKEYE SALMON TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): I wish to repeat the question I directed to the government yesterday as to the present status of the Fraser river sockeye salmon treaty, in view of the announcement of ratification by the United States senate.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have in my hand the answer which I was going to read. I tried once or twice to rise so as to anticipate my hon. friend's question. The question he asked was:

> What is the present status of the Fraser river sockeye salmon treaty, in view of the announcement in to-day's press of ratification in the United States senate?

The answer is: The sockeye salmon convention, the second attempt to ensure the preservation of this important branch of the fishing industry, was signed in 1930 and approved by the Canadian parliament in the same year. Differences of opinion in the state of Washington prevented action by the United States until this year. This week it has been approved by the senate, subject to three reservations. The first of these reservations, providing that the commission is not to authorize fishing gear contrary to Canadian or state of Washington laws, presents no difficulty; the convention does not grant such power. The third, providing for an advisory committee of five from each country, representative of the various branches of the industry, is also quite consistent with the purpose of the convention. The second reservation, however, providing that the commission will not put into effect any order or regulation before its investigations have covered two cycles of salmon runs, or eight years, raises serious difficulty. It was of course understood that thorough investigation would precede any regulation of the actual fishing operations, but there is, in the opinion of those qualified to judge, no ground for anticipating that this would require anything like eight years, or more than half the fifteen years for which the convention runs. We therefore propose to discuss this question with the United States authorities, in the hope that some satisfactory solution of this point can be found and made effective next year

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): As a matter of personal explanation, may I say that one knows that "White Russians" are those who fought under General Wrangel in Russia. They fought the Bolsheviks; therefore "White Russian" is synonymous with anti-bolshevist.

BANK OF CANADA

MAJORITY CONTROL BY GOVERNMENT OF CAPITAL STOCK AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 17, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Dunning for the third reading of Bill No. 82, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Those who listened yesterday to the eloquent speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which was addressed I assume to his supporters in this house and to a great extent to his supporters in the country, must have felt the impress, as I often do in listening to him, of the strength of his emotional appeal. In fact, I could imagine, as he lay such stress upon the privately owned and privately controlled bank and sounded the changes upon it, as shown by the extracts from his speeches which he read, that he must have impressed particularly the people of the western country with the idea that the previous government had created a monster of such frightful mien as, described without being seen, was sufficient to create an intense hatred of the whole institution. Perhaps I might read one or two clauses of the report of the royal commission on banking and currency. First, at section 218 the commission reported:

> It is essential for the full and satisfactory working of a central bank, that it should have the sole right of issue of legal tender notes; it is essential that the central bank, as the financial adviser of the government, should in due course hold the various government accounts and carry out, on behalf of the government, all major financial transactions.

The royal commission emphasized the fact that the bank proposed to be created should be the financial adviser of the government. It was not suggested that the bank should control government policy; and as I proceed I think I may prove quite conclusively that the bank as created at present does not control or purport to control government policy in any large matters affecting the monetary interests of the country. At section 219 the commission reported:

> The functions discharged by a central bank being of such vital importance to the economic and financial life of a country, it is perhaps natural to ask whether they could not be adequately performed by some direct organ of government. It has in practice been found that a central bank can give most effective service to the community if it is free from the fear of interference for political ends in operating the delicate mechanism of the national monetary and financial machine. Certain statutory limitations have almost invariably been adopted in order to emphasize the national character of the bank. Thus, apart from the detailed provisions of the legislative act constituting a central bank, we may refer to the customary provision that the profits of the note issue should accrue, either directly or indirectly, to the state; that in most modern instances a limit is set to the profits which may be distributed to the shareholders; and lastly, that the state should have a final voice in the appointment of the governor and deputy governor and sometimes of certain of the directors. Within this legislative framework it has been found that there are preeminent advantages to the state in entrusting the special and highly technical functions of a central bank to a body not subject to the vicissitudes of political life.

Referring to the Finance Act of 1923, the commission say, at section 222:

> Finally, we may note that the powers of the Finance Act are entrusted to a board which is in effect a committee of the cabinet and are thus directly in political hands.

I understood the Prime Minister to suggest that, under the amendment which is now under consideration on the third reading, in his opinion parliament would revert to the same conditions as prevailed under the Finance Act, when the Minister of Finance and four other members of the administration of the day had control, and complete control, of the issue of dominion notes. But that must have been an oversight: perhaps I misunderstood what was stated.

Again, at section 232, the commission say:

> Obviously, the bank must work in close accord with the government in all that pertains to the external value of the country's currency, and if it were carrying out a national policy in this respect the bank must clearly have the support of the government in its foreign exchange operations.

Again, at section 235:

> We should perhaps sound a note of warning as to the degree to which such an institution could fulfil all the expectations that the public mind might attach to it. A central bank could not cure all the economic ills of Canada; it would not be a source of unlimited credit for all borrowers on all occasions; indeed its operations might as often be restrictive as expansive.

In the following section, 236, the report says:

236. On the other hand, its positive services would, we believe, be very considerable; it would substitute for the present undeveloped and anomalous system a more rational and unified control over the credit structure; it would provide a suitable instrument for the execution of a national policy—

I repeat:

—a suitable instrument for the execution of a national policy in regard to the external value of the currency; it would be increasingly a source of skilled financial advice for the dominion and possibly for the provincial governments; and, finally, it would provide a central body which could maintain relations with similar institutions in other countries, which find at present no counterpart in Canada with which to maintain contact.

There are other sections which might prove interesting. But I do not wish to take the time of the house except to refer to the fact that, under the Bank of Canada Act as at present existing, it is provided by section 5:

The bank shall be under the management of a board of directors composed of a governor, a deputy governor and seven directors. There may also be an assistant deputy governor who shall not as such be a member of the board.

Of course under that act the shareholders, who are private persons, elect the board of directors with the exception of the governor and deputy governor, who have a place on the board. Section 7 provides:

7. (1) The governor of the bank shall be the chief executive officer and shall on behalf of the board have the direction and control of the business of the bank, with authority to act in connection with the conduct of the business of the bank in all matters which are not by this act or by the by-laws of the bank specifically reserved to be done by the board or by the executive committee ...

Then section 8 makes provision with respect to the appointment of the governor, deputy governor and assistant deputy governor, and in subsection 5 of section 8 it is provided:

(5) The governor, deputy governor and assistant deputy governor shall each hold office for the aforesaid term during good behaviour.

In bringing down the amendment the finance minister very properly stated that the appointment of directors whose votes would outvote the directors selected by the shareholders would give the government a certain control at the meetings of the board of directors. But that suggestion implies that the directors hereafter proposed to be appointed by the governor in council will be subject to the direction of the governor in council, from the mere fact that they were so appointed by the governor in council, and therefore that the governor in council through the new board of directors will have a larger and an almost complete control over the operations of the bank. But I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that he has not laid sufficient emphasis upon the fact that the appointments of governor and deputy governor are made by the governor in council, that they hold office nominally for ten years but in fact during good behaviour, and that the clear, the established and the vital principle of the act is that the government, in so far as governmental control may be deemed necessary or expedient, will exert that control through the governor and the deputy governor, who are governmental appointees.

Then section 13 of the existing act, in which no change is being made, provides:

13. (1) There shall be an executive committee of the board, consisting of the governor, the deputy governor and one director selected by the board.

That is, two of the three members of the executive committee must always be governmental appointees. Then it provides for the deputy minister of finance being authorized to attend all board meetings in order that the Minister of Finance, and through him the government, may receive reports of the meetings and of the transactions at the meetings of directors. Subsection 3 of section 13 provides:

The executive committee, therefore, has executive control of the administrative affairs of the bank. It is possible that the report of the executive committee to the board might not meet with the approval of the board, but I suggest there is no provision in the act as it at present exists that the board could overrule the decisions in relation to administration which are arrived at by the executive committee, on which there are two governmental appointees. But to make the matter clear, section 14 was inserted, to provide:

No action or decision of the board of directors, or of the executive committee, shall have any effect unless the same is concurred in by the governor, or in his absence or incapacity by the deputy governor.

There was in that provision an implication that the board of directors selected, except as to two, by the shareholders of the central bank, who are private individuals, might discuss, might consider and might advise, but they could not by any decision overrule the decision of the two governmental appointees, the governor and deputy governor of the bank when sitting as a majority of the executive committee; because it is clear from the act itself, clear from the terms of the commission which proposed the bill in its present form almost verbatim, clear from the discussions which took place at the time, that the governor and deputy governor are appointed by the government and responsible to the government for carrying out all matters of importance in vital public policy which the government had adopted or announced.

Then, to make the matter clearer still, it was provided with regard to the by-laws of the bank in relation to dividends that dividends could only be paid out of profits and could only be paid from time to time at a rate not exceeding 4½ per cent as provided in by-laws which had been formulated and adopted. How were those by-laws made? By whom were they proposed, adopted and enforced? Section 43(1) provides:

> The governor in council shall make by-laws not repugnant to the provisions of this act with respect to—

I will leave out one intervening paragraph which is not important:

> (b) the transfer and transmission of shares;
> (c) the declaration and payment of dividends;

So that by-laws providing for the payment of dividends were by-laws to be made in the first instance by the governor in council. And then in order to interpret that provision of section 43(1) let me read section 31(g) of the Interpretation Act, chapter 1, revised statutes of Canada:

> If a power is conferred to make any rules, regulations or by-laws, the power shall be construed as including a power, exercisable in the like manner, and subject to the like consent and conditions, if any, to rescind, revoke, amend or vary the rules, regulations or by-laws and make others;

Therefore there continued to be under all circumstances a power in the governor in council to make, rescind, modify or reenact the by-laws under which this bank operated; but in order that there might be an ancillary power in the board of directors to initiate the making of by-laws or changes or modifications in the by-laws section 43(2) provided:

> The board may with the approval of the governor in council amend or repeal such by-laws or make others with respect to the matters mentioned in subsection one hereof.

And subsection 1 includes the subjects upon which by-laws may be made. So that we find that the by-laws governing the administration of the act, governing the transfer and transmission of shares, governing the declaration and payment of dividends, were first made by the governor in council, which still retained its right to amend or modify them; and even if the directors proposed by-laws these could be made only with the approval of the governor in council. In my opinion, therefore, and I do not desire at this moment to enter into any personal controversy with regard to it, this act as it at present exists constituted a bank whose stock was privately owned, it is true, but a bank which nevertheless in all matters of policy and administration was controlled by the governor in council through officers appointed by the governor in council who hold office only during good behaviour.

The present act also has a provision with regard to voting at general meetings of the bank, to the effect that no shareholder, either in person or by proxy, can vote more than fifty shares, excepting—and it is a very important exception—the Minister of Finance. The provision in effect is that those who do not attend the meeting but desire to vote by proxy must send their proxies to the Minister of Finance, which fact gives the Minister of Finance a very extensive control; for we all know that the great body of shareholders in banks and other companies, either public or private, send their proxies to the president or other officer of the company or corporation in order that he may vote for the absent shareholders. So that from first to last I think that this present bank is to a very large extent under governmental control.

How much more extensive control is given by the amending bill which we are now considering on the motion for third reading? This amending bill does provide for a larger number of directors. It does provide that at all times the directors who are appointed by the governor in council shall have and exercise a majority vote over the directors appointed by the private shareholders. The finance minister emphasized the fact, as I think he was entitled to do, that the appointment of these directors by the governor in council, and the appointment of two others sitting on the board of directors, namely the governor and the deputy governor, give the government a preponderance of influence and direction and control over the operations of the bank. It was never intended that a bank was to be set up which was to act as an independent oligarchy to control in matters of grave public policy. The very fact that the governor and deputy governor were to hold office during good behaviour emphasizes the contrary view. But in the amending act the conditions as to the executive committee consisting of the governor and deputy governor and one director of the board are still continued. The board is enlarged, it is true. It is no longer a wholly privately owned bank, but the present Prime Minister stated again and again that he did not regard that issue as vital. I have not had any consultation with the leader of the opposition, who was then Prime Minister, but as far as I can recall conversations with him he did not regard private ownership as absolutely vital. The whole question of ownership of shares was an open question, with a great deal to be said on both sides.

But now we have one change. Section 14 as I read it in the existing act says:

14. No action or decision of the board of directors, or of the executive committee, shall have any effect unless the same is concurred in by the governor, or in his absence or incapacity, by the deputy governor.

That, I submit, gave the government direct and complete control over the operations of the bank, in view of the fact that those officers hold office during pleasure. Furthermore, no governor or deputy governor appointed to such a high position would attempt by the exercise of any arbitrary power to defeat the government in a matter of public policy adopted by the government in respect to the management of that bank. The assets of the bank are not the assets of the company. On dissolution or otherwise, by provision of the existing act, the shareholders are entitled to receive only the par value of the shares for which they paid par. The whole intent of the act is that all the other assets of the bank, its gold reserve and its rest, are assets of the crown in the right of the government of Canada, in respect of which the shareholders have no ownership whatsoever. Furthermore, to accentuate the fact of government control, all the excess profits of the bank accrue to the government; and in the payment of dividends, such payments can be made only to the extent of four and a half per cent under the authority of by-laws which the government have adopted or enacted or which have been proposed by the board of directors with the approval of the government.

I do not wish the house or the country to run away with the idea, by reason of the eloquent and impressive way in which the Prime Minister in the discussions on the public platform, and yesterday in the discussions of this house, referred to a privately owned bank, that we of the late government were acting altogether foolishly and without due regard to the public interest in creating the institution with the powers and authority with which it is vested but which are always under the control of government nominees.

Section 14 of the old act, which I have just read, has been repealed and a new section adopted in committee as follows:

14. (1) the governor, or in the event of his absence or incapacity the deputy governor only, shall have power to veto any action or decision of the board of directors or of the executive committee, and if this veto power be exercised, the governor or deputy governor, as the case may be, shall within seven days inform the minister in writing of the circumstances and the minister shall submit the veto to the governor in council who may confirm or disallow the veto.

(2) any director or member of the executive committee may inform the minister in writing of his view of the action or decision in question, which view shall also be transmitted to the governor in council.

Dealing first with the executive committee:

The governor ... shall have power to veto any action or decision of the ... executive committee....

The executive committee is composed of the governor and deputy governor and one other member of the board. Such a contretemps as the governor having against him the deputy governor and the other member of the executive committee is not likely to arise. If it should arise it would be a dispute between two government nominees. It must be a dispute between the governor and the deputy governor with regard to some grave matter of public policy. And I see no objection, in view of the reorganization of the board, to the government having a final and decisive voice in respect to disputes between its own nominees. Furthermore, remember that a majority of the votes of the board, and after certain date a majority of the members of the board, will be government nominees, and there can be no decision by the board except one in which a majority of the board appointed by the government have a voice. This provides simply that in case of dispute in respect of a matter of public policy of grave concern between the government nominees appointed as members of the board and the governor, who is also appointed by the government, the matter shall be reported to the governor in council, who shall hear the terms and nature of the dispute, and give a decision thereon.

I wish to impress upon the Prime Minister what appears to me to be an indubitable fact, that the introduction of this new provision which is assumed by public acclaim to differentiate between the so-called privately owned and privately controlled bank on the one hand and the governmentally controlled bank on the other is only due to the incident that the government is now appointing two classes of its own nominees. The one class is appointed by the government and is undoubtedly removable by the government. I know of no provision of the law whereby an order in council appointing one of these gentlemen as a government appointee on the board may not be repealed and the appointee removed, and a new order in council passed authorizing some other nominee to fill the vacant position. So that what has now been introduced is simply a provision whereby in the event of a dispute or difficulty arising between one class and another of government nominees, the government reserves to itself the right to make a decision.

I am not disposed to enter into any discussion with the Prime Minister with respect to his public addresses. It is clear that even many of his own supporters took, from what I considered his undue emphasis with regard to the privately controlled bank, the idea that more sweeping changes were proposed. I congratulate him upon limiting the proposed changes to the extent they have been limited, and also upon the fact that he is not placing upon the shoulders of the Minister of Finance, an already overburdened minister, the direct supervision of the ordinary administration of the Bank of Canada. That would be too much of a burden to be borne by any member of any goverment. The Minister of Finance will find, if my presumption is correct, that under present conditions no man in public office in Canada, other than the Prime Minister—and I except him—has burdens, responsibilities and duties as great as those now imposed upon the Minister of Finance. Therefore I congratulate the government upon the fact that although they may differ from us as to names and nomenclature, the real facts indicate that to the same extent that the government had control, by the appointment of its nominees as directors and deputy directors it now retains control. But the government will have no more far-reaching, no more extensive or no more competent control than it exercised before the day this bill was introduced.

I do not wish to enter upon a political discussion, nor do I wish to create or even suggest any further difficulty between the Prime Minister and some of his supporters who have voiced extreme views. But I insist in deference to the leader of the opposition, to his well known views as I understood them, and to his colleagues who were engaged in and to some extent assisted in the drafting of this measure, that they are entitled at least to this explanation to the public of the real facts at issue.

Mr. NEEDHAM: May I ask the hon. member who has just taken his seat whether in his opinion the Bank of Canada was under the control of the government prior to the introduction of the present bill?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Then did the hon. member describe the government's policy when, speaking in Toronto, he said that about $32,000,000 had been withdrawn from circulation?

Mr. CAHAN: The address made in Toronto, to which the hon. member refers, was one made before the initiation by the government of a central bank policy. It was made before the royal commission had published its report. If my hon. friend wishes to have my personal views with regard to the address I delivered in Toronto I suggest that he call upon me some fine morning in my office, and I shall be prepared to enter into a discussion of it. But that is not now a matter of public policy; the policy of the late government was indicated by its actions just as that of the present government is indicated by its actions in dealing with the central bank.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, up to the present I have not taken any part in this debate, but on this occasion I wish to place on record very definitely the position taken by the small group of which I form a part. I do so particularly in view of a statement made yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and also because in British Columbia, and especially in the city of Vancouver, the Bank of Canada issue was one of the main points in the campaign of 1935. I believe I would be correct in saying that so far as Vancouver was concerned there were only two issues, namely, the policy of the Liberal party on the Bank of Canada, and the oriental question. In view of the discussion in the house two days ago, and the approval and loud applause of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) on every reference made to British justice, British fair play and British traditions, I am satisfied we shall have no more trouble with the oriental question.

Immediately upon the conclusion of the session in 1934 the same hon. member pointed out that the group in this corner of the house had supported the government in forcing upon the people a privately owned central bank. The facts of the matter are that we have always been in favour not only of a national bank but of the socialization of the financial institutions of Canada. While the Bank of Canada Act of 1934 was not everything that we would have liked it to be, we voted for it because it was a step in the direction in which we wanted to go. For the same reason we will vote for the amendments proposed by the present government.

Unlike my good friend the Minister of National Defence I am concerned with the legislation, not with the party that may be putting the legislation on the statute book. If the Conservative party brings in legislation of which I can approve, even in small part, I will support it. The minister would probably oppose it because the Liberals had not brought it in. On the other hand, if the Liberals bring in legislation of which we can approve, even though it does not go as far as we want it to go, we will support it. We are not satisfied with the present amendments any more than we were satisfied with the original act. But the principle has been adopted. After the act as passed in 1934 we pointed out that as the principle had been adopted, the legislation could be changed if any party in power saw fit to bring in the necessary amendments.

We are in favour of socialized banking or the socialization of the financial institutions of Canada. We are not in favour of these things because we wish to print money and give it to every individual who wants or needs it—we feel quite satisfied that that would only create another problem—we are in favour of these things because we want to use them to socialize the means of production within the country. Unless the people own the goods and services that are in the country they cannot get access to them by merely owning the bank. It is for these reasons that we are supporting the present amendments to the Bank of Canada Act, 1934.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have not made any observations on this bill since its introduction, for very obvious reasons, but after listening to the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), delivered yesterday, I think it is desirable that I should make some very brief observations upon the attitude which the present government assumed on the public platform during the election of last year when dealing with this question. First, in various parts of Canada which I visited I found that this bank had been held up as a privately owned bank. It was stated that, by contrast, it was to be a publicly owned bank. I agree with the Prime Minister when he says that he did not use the word "nationalized"; he did not use that word, so far as I know, but the effect of the words "publicly owned" upon the public mind was to induce the people to believe that the bank was to be nationalized.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

A publicly owned bank means a bank owned by the people. The bank created by the late government was a bank privately owned; the bank that will be in existence after this bill emerges from this parliament will be still a privately and publicly owned bank. It will not be a publicly owned bank. Therefore, the promise that this will be a publicly owned bank has not been honoured. There can be no gainsaying that.

Secondly, it was stated that it would be a publicly controlled bank and that currency would be issued in terms of public need. Of course that meant only one thing, and that one thing has not been accomplished by these amendments, and it is not proposed to accomplish it. Those of us who read the delightful utterances of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) recall the statements he made with respect to what this bank would be. I cannot help but think that his understanding of it was entirely different from the observations made by the Prime Minister yesterday. It may be that he did not properly appreciate what was meant. If he did not, is it any wonder that the ordinary, average elector looked upon it as somewhat different from the terms of the bill now before the house?

The next point that was made was that we would have, in effect, a publicly controlled bank. I cannot do more on that point than direct the attention of this house to the fact that the executive committee is the governing body of this organization, and the executive committee has not been modified or changed. Under the former act it consisted of the governor, the deputy governor and one director to be named by the board of directors. The deputy minister of finance was to attend, although he had no power of voting; he was to attend as the liaison officer between the government and the bank. When this bill is assented to in a few days it will perpetuate an executive committee consisting of the governor, the deputy governor and one director selected by the board of directors. The deputy minister of finance will still be the officer who relates the policy of the government to that of the bank. Therefore, there has been no change in the executive committee and the control of the organization from day to day is a control exercised by the executive committee. The board of directors will be able to meet but seldom, because the distances are great and they are scattered over the whole country.

The next point is the power of veto. It is perfectly clear that the governor in council has now assumed the power to veto. To veto what? To veto resolutions that may have been arrived at by the executive committee when there has been a difference. How can that difference arise? Remember, the committee consists of three members, two of whom are selected by the government while the third may be a government nominee. There being only three members, any differences that will arise must be, first, differences between the governor and the deputy governor on the one side and the director on the other. In that event the governor would not disallow it and the resolution would stand. In the other case it would be the deputy governor and the director against the governor, and in that event the governor in council would have to decide between its own governor and its deputy governor and director, who might or might not be a government nominee. Could anything be more ridiculous than the suggestion that an executive committee thus composed can ever run foul of the governor in council unless there is a conflict between those who are operating the bank and the government of the day, a division of opinion between the executive committee and the government itself? In that event the powers conferred by this bill will not have modified in any sense the provisions that now exist, except that the governor in council may exercise a veto with respect to differences where the governor is on one side, as I have said, and the deputy governor and the director are on the other side. The government will have to choose between the two.

It was said further in the course of the explanations given the public last year that this was a private bank, entrusted with the power of issuing money, and to which had been transferred the gold of the country to hold as security for the issue of the currency of Canada. All of this was true, but only partly true. It will be recalled that under the provisions of the statute creating the bank, the bank was made responsible for the issue of the paper currency which it took over. In addition, that responsibility was secured and assisted by the issue of Dominion of Canada bonds which were placed in the treasury of the Bank of Canada and which have been a vital factor, contributing as they do to the revenues from which the dividends are paid. Is there any change in that? No. The gold still belongs to this bank, owned partly by the people and partly by private shareholders. The paper money is still issued by the bank, owned partly by the people and partly by private shareholders. The liability of the bank for the Dominion of Canada notes still exists; it has not been changed. The guarantee given by the deposit of bonds in the dominion with the bank to secure its obligations still continues. There has been no change, none whatever. There still continues the relation between the bank and the private shareholders that existed when this bill was introduced into this house.

And lastly, upon that phase of it, it will be recalled that the present Minister of National Defence introduced in the banking committee, when the bill was under consideration, an amendment by which he proposed—and it struck me at the time it was a proposal that was in the minds of many hon. members—that the country, if it so desired, might secure the shares of the bank—secure them by taking them over at any time. This proposal was negatived by a vote in the committee—why? The answer is obvious. For this parliament had power, as it had in the case of the Grand Trunk Railway, to enact a statute to provide for the expropriation of these shares, for the taking over of the shares, and for the fixing of the value of the shares by arbitration or otherwise. That power rested with this parliament, and the Minister of National Defence will remember that the amendment he proposed was negatived for the very obvious reason that it was a declaration of a power which rests with this parliament, which has always rested and always will rest with it, the power on the part of parliament to enact legislation, if it so desires, to expropriate or compulsorily take any property which in the national interest it should possess. And when, during the progress of the election campaign, it was suggested that this should be a publicly owned bank, I took the trouble to point out to the people on more than one occasion—on many occasions in fact—that so far as the government was concerned its first view had been that these shares should belong to the Canadian people as a whole, publicly owned.

But having regard to what became apparent with respect to methods abroad, the invading of the privacy of governments and the insistence that patronage should be utilized in the creation officially of positions in the bank, I told the committee myself that we could not possibly undertake properly to create this bank if we as a nation undertook to hold the shares, that the pressure of all sorts of people for all kinds of positions was such that the bank itself must assume responsibility for its organization. And I pointed out, as I do now, the sort of pressure that was used: (a) geography; (b) rates; (c) religion; (d) politics, and, after all, sometimes, merit—not so often, but sometimes, merit. Now these differences pressed upon us so strongly that we believed that this bank could be properly organized only if it were done under the auspices of directors, the bank being privately owned; and that was the method we pursued. I told the banking committee that; I told the people of the country that; and I said that if after a fair trial it was found desirable that the bank should be owned by the people I would be the last man in the world to interpose any obstacle or to suggest any difficulty; because, if the people desired to follow the policy pursued in some countries instead of adopting the policy followed in other countries, if they preferred the policy followed in great nations rather than to adopt a new policy followed by a smaller number of countries, I was content. New Zealand was organizing its bank about the same time that we were, and adopted in the first instance the very idea that we did, namely, that the organization might be carried on best under private auspices; and then came the change of government and the same cry for public ownership, but not the same result, for they did one thing there that one would expect them to do if they were to make it publicly owned. They took over the shares.

I come now to the next point. The sum of $5,000,000 was the capital of this bank. In Australia it was pointed out that capital as such was unnecessary, inasmuch as a loan from the state was all that was essential to enable the bank to function; and the central bank in Australia carries on more than a central bank business: it carries on the general business of banking, having secured in the first instance, from the state itself, sufficient money for the purpose of enabling it to discharge its function. But it earned large profits, and these profits have now become the nucleus of its capital with respect to its general transactions of savings bank business. It well may be that the experience of nations is not of value in relation to financial matters, for each country has peculiar conditions which may possibly require different treatment from any other country in the world. But we did know, in the light of history, that the publicly owned central banks were few in number and that their success had not been greater than, if as great as, that of the privately owned institution. The circumstances connected with the coming into being of the Bank of England perhaps differentiate that institution from other central banks; but in Europe there are many central banks, and when it was suggested that the Liberal party was in the van of the movement for the creation of a central bank in Canada, I could not but think that the language used by those who sit to my left must have carried conviction, because we do recognize that in the early days immediately after the war—the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar) will recall this—those who sat to the extreme left then urged the creation of a central bank. Why? I am not referring to his party; I am speaking of the smaller group, notably Mr. William Irvine, if the hon. gentleman wishes me to mention any names.

Mr. CRERAR: I am speaking only from memory, but I think that if the right hon. gentleman will search the records of Hansard of 1921 and on for several years, he will find that suggestions for a central bank were not made at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not in the house and therefore I can speak only from what was said outside, but I do recall one man, Mr. Irvine, and another, Mr. Coote, urging that a reserve bank—I think at times he called it a reserve bank and at other times a central bank—be established.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The question was suggested in 1916 by Mr. W. F. Maclean.

Mr. BENNETT: I am familiar with that. I know that in 1916—it was before the Union government came into being—the late Mr. W. F. Maclean did urge the creation of a central bank at the same time that the question was engaging the attention of the United States authorities. But that was in passing rather than the urging of it as a matter of national policy, if I may differentiate between the two. It will also be recalled that at the Genoa conference the question of a central bank for all the nations of the world was discussed as a matter of international policy.

Leaving that, however, I merely desire to mention that the question of the establishment of a central bank engaged the attention of all the great international monetary conferences and of financial men in Canada, because the banks in Canada were opposed to it. There was never any doubt about it that, with one exception, the chartered banks, the managers and presidents, in Canada opposed the creation of a central bank. We might as well face that frankly. They did it openly without hesitancy or doubt; and the reasons were obvious. All one had to do was to look at the Finance Act and the Bank Act to realize why the president of any bank would be opposed to the creation of a central bank. So far as the late government was concerned its attention was very markedly directed to it by special circumstances apart altogether from, shall I say, the academic discussions about it—and I fancy they were academic discussions—by members of governments for a very long time in this country. When England went off the gold standard and the question of exchange became acute it was of course realized that all our exchange business was carried on through New York, and a special effort was made to discover any means whereby we might assist in creating some method of doing our exchange business with London. It was pointed out that our efforts were futile, having regard to the small volume of trade, relatively speaking, that we controlled, and which was, of course, the basis of the exchange values. Therefore to a very considerable extent we had to continue to rely upon the New York market. But the government made up its mind that a central bank was desirable. Before the commission was appointed it had already determined, as was pointed out in this house, that it was desirable we should have one. But there might be differences of opinion, and a commission was appointed consisting of many men who were well known in financial and other circles for their knowledge of the situation. We were fortunate in securing as chairman one who had discharged in Great Britain a very great function as chairman of a most important commission there. Those of us who were in the house from 1930 to 1935 will recall that the Minister of National Defence became so familiar with the Macmillan report that he could quote from it with perhaps more readiness than even from the bible, of which he is a good student. The Macmillan report became known to every member of the house, and it supported the project of the central bank.

The bank was organized on the basis I have indicated. As I frankly told the committee in 1933 when we were dealing with the matter, the idea we originally had in our minds was that the shares should be held by the state and that it should be publicly owned, but we saw so many difficulties in the way of organizing it that we thought the only way we could secure an organization that would not be a political one was to pursue the methods that we did. But we pointed out—not one of us, not only myself, but others as well—as regards the question whether it should be a publicly or a privately owned bank, that we knew what the experience of other nations had been, and we said that whatever the people desired to have in that regard we should be glad to see they had. But when the people were told that they were going to get a publicly owned bank they thought they would get a bank that was publicly owned; and the bank they are going to get now is not going to be a publicly owned bank. Of that there is no doubt. There is only one way that it could be done. The Minister of National Defence realized it when he was on the committee. He understood that we could achieve that end only by that same method, properly adjusted of course to meet the circumstances in taking the shares of the bank, as we employed with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway; or we might do it as we did with the shares of the Canadian National Railway, that is, acquire the shares and fix their value either by arbitration or by some other method—if thought desirable, by reference to the exchequer court.

It is said that these shares have changed values; that many people bought them at a higher value than that for which they were originally obtained, namely $50 a share. That sort of thing is true of any property. Look at the poor unfortunates who bought property at the townsite at Hudson bay; consider what they paid, and what they got after the present Minister of Finance, when Minister of Railways, had expropriated their rights. Observe their evidence in the exchequer court that they had paid thousands of dollars for that for which they were compensated in hundreds. It was a speculative movement. For the shares that were acquired $60 at the most was paid, and $60 represents an increase of twenty per cent over the original value. If the government was going to make the bank a publicly owned institution it was necessary to do only one thing, and that was to acquire the shares, unless indeed, as was suggested from some source, five million dollars was not sufficient to enable the bank to function and it was necessary to increase its capital. But the Minister of Finance has not so suggested, nor has any one on behalf of the bank. "We raise the capital to $10,100,000, and we put in the capital structure of the bank $5,100,000 more than it had, without any request from anyone but in order that a majority of the shares may be held by the state." That is the explanation that has been given—"a majority of the shares held by the state." That is accomplished, I say, by the method that has been stated, namely, the payment of $5,100,000 to the bank and the issue of a special class of shares which do not carry a vote for the purpose of electing directors, leaving still to the holders of the privately owned shares the right to elect directors, while the crown, owning the $5,100,000 worth of shares, appoints its directors. The number of directors that it is appointing will now be six in all, which of course will give control of the directorate, but it will not give control of the executive committee, which still consists of the two original nominees, the governor and the deputy governor, supplemented by one director who may be either appointed or elected, as the case may be.

So much for the capital stock and the way in which the matter has been dealt with. There is one other matter upon which I think a few words should be said. The Prime Minister referred to it yesterday. You will find it in his speeches—not only those delivered in this house—that currency should be issued by this bank in terms of public need. What do those words mean—"in terms of public need"? There was not a platform in western Canada that I visited where I was not told before the meeting, "You must deal with this question. You must be prepared to say that you are willing that the Bank of Canada should issue currency almost ad lib, to any extent that may be necessary for the public need." Well, heaven knows the public need is still here; it has not changed. But this bill does not confer any greater power for the issue of currency than the bank had before the hand of the present government touched it—not one change in the world. Then what do these words mean, the power to issue currency in terms of public need? What did they ever mean? They mean to-day not more, not less than they meant in 1930; for this parliament has not been asked to confer nor has it conferred upon the Bank of Canada wider powers to issue currency than the bank possessed under the original charter. Let there be no misunderstanding with respect to that. I wish that to sink firmly into the minds of the people when the Prime Minister says, "We have kept our promises by one hundred per cent." Currency, we were promised, would be issued in terms of public need. We have heard two or three hon. members speak about the public need, but I defy any member of this chamber to point out that there has been a single modification either for good or for ill, either adding to or subtracting from the powers conferred upon this bank when it came into being. Still stands metallic coverage, still stands the same percentage, still stands the same position with respect to legal tenders, still stands the same power of rediscount, still stand the same powers of transaction of business; no widening of powers, no increase in the ambit of its authority, no extension of jurisdiction, no power to issue currency to the extent of a single dollar in terms of public need beyond what it had when we created it in 1933. Where are the powers? I listened yesterday, expecting something of this kind might be pointed out, because I knew it was not to be found in the bank act; peradventure something now was to be done. But nothing of that sort has been done. Credit was a social service—I took down these words, so it is not necessary to turn back to Hansard—"and the great struggle was between the money power and the people." The money power and the people—that is the struggle the Prime Minister put before the people of Canada, and he was the stalwart champion going out with sword and shield to fight this money evil, remembering the Spartan mother's direction of old, "Return, my son, with your shield or upon it." He went about this country and said to the people: All I want to do is to fight this great money evil, to take part in this great struggle between the people and the money power. Well, they fought it all this session, and I have seen no signs of any change in the instruments with which this great fight was to be fought from what the situation was when he went to the people last year. Is there any change? They say: Yes, we have six more directors in the Bank of Canada; we have doubled its capital; the executive committee remains as it was, but we have given a veto to the governor in council to deny or affirm if the governor and deputy governor do not agree. And they say: Look what we have done—we are fighting the money power for the people. Is it not amusing?

Mr. MacNICOL: Worse than that.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend from Davenport says, "Worse than that." When the Prime Minister was referring to these matters and saying that credit was a social service I was wondering how much there is in this statute that was not there before; that is the question. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) pointed out the situation, and it was not very palatable to some members of this chamber. He said: "I took those words of the Prime Minister to mean just what the ordinary man would think they meant, namely, that currency was to issue in terms of public need and that credit was a social service. I thought that is what was meant, and I told the people that. I told them that a new heaven and a new earth was about to come, and I appealed for their support on that ground. I took the Prime Minister's words," he said, "to mean what the ordinary man would think they meant—currency in terms of public need, credit as a social service." Those are the words, Mr. Speaker, by which appeals were made to the people, and when two leading members of this house, men of first-rate mental power and grasp, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, saw fit to accept those words as meaning what the average man thought they meant, who can blame them?

I should just like to know, if an independent canvass were made of this chamber, how many members did not think that those words meant just what the average man thought they meant. I wonder how many members would disagree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Rosthern as to what they thought those words meant in October, 1935.

I confess that those with whom I came in contact, and I talked with many people, all said: Well, you are a sound money man. Sorry, we cannot have any more of it; it is a bad thing. What we must have is a new thing, currency issued in terms of public need and credit treated as a social service. And many of them, Mr. Speaker, fully believed they would be able to use those words to their own advantage—not for profit, but that they might be able better to deal with the pressing problems that confronted them. Will not any member sitting opposite me, will not nearly all of them say, that in the rural parts of Canada the words, currency in terms of public need and credit as a social service, were interpreted by those who heard them as meaning that they as individuals would experience those new conditions that come about by the greater circulation of money and the consequent improvement in the purchasing power of the masses of the people? That is what they thought.

I am going to be perfectly frank and say that the language of the Prime Minister is open to another interpretation, and in this connection I cannot but recall Mr. Keynes' last book, to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard referred. Mr. Keynes in his last book points out that he has taken a different view altogether from the view he took when he wrote his previous books, and that this last book is intended for economists and not for the average man, because he has to convince and convert the experts first, after which he hopes to be able to do something with the common people, the masses of the people. That is the way he puts it in his very interesting and amusing introduction, and if there can be anything humorous in economics I commend those few pages of Mr. Keynes' last book to those humorously inclined. I think the Prime Minister must have had exactly the same attitude of mind, and when you find as profound a mind as that of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and as close a student of economics and as industrious a member of his profession as the hon. member for Rosthern drawing the conclusions they did, one cannot but realize that after all the Prime Minister was talking to the elect; he let the masses draw any conclusion they desired, and the masses drew the conclusion that currency in terms of public need would be issued, which meant that dollar bills would flow more freely, there would be more paper money floating about the country, the printing presses would be more active and the engraver busier than he ever was before; that credit which was essential to the body politic would now be issued as a social service like the old age pensions or some other measure of social reform. That is what the ordinary individual believed, what the layman, as Mr. Keynes calls him, concluded. That is not what the elect, the economists, understood. But it is what the Minister of National Defence understood. He has a very profound mind, and I know of no student of monetary reform who has given more time to the subject or who has been better trained in a great university than he. He has the clannishness of the Scot, and the Macmillan report became to him the shorter catechism of political economy in this country. Believing all this, accepting it as he did, his utterances were in accordance with the general understanding of the man on the street, the masses of the people.

I listened to the Prime Minister yesterday, and I know there was no intention that this should be so understood. He did not intend the untutored man on the plains or the fisherman on the sea or the lumberman in the forests to understand any such thing. Far from it. He was hoping, as Mr. Keynes hoped, to be able to convince and convert the economists first, that currency issued in terms of public need meant just what it has always meant in this country—no change. Public need merely meant, in the language of one of those who preceded me, sufficient money to enable the issue to correspond with the demand. Interest was still to be paid in the same old way—no change. There was to be no change in the payment of the toll that is exacted for the use of capital. No change, but still currency was to be issued in terms of public need. There was no talk then of interest or of these various matters which we now know the government is still carrying on in the same way. No, Mr. Speaker, the unfortunate electors were made to believe by the fervency of great advocacy that there was to be a profound change, a new heaven and a new earth. A better day would dawn. The monetary problems that had so much agitated great minds during the centuries were now to be solved, and public credit was to be issued in terms of public need, which meant that everyone who needed a dollar would get it. That is the sense in which it was understood. And they believed it, which was unfortunate for us but very fortunate for those who sit opposite. But having believed it as they did, they can now look at this bill, and I defy any man to point out to me anything in this bill that changes the condition that existed heretofore. There it is. You have no change, but you have beautiful words, the words of the economist, of the political economist and the literary giants, all so mixed together as to make a perfect anaesthetic; being mixed together as a perfect anaesthetic they put the poor unfortunate elector to sleep, and they operated on him and he operated for them at the ballot box. Now he is awakening from his stupor; he looks round to see what the operation was; he learns that there was no operation worth while but that he had just been put to sleep with the promise of currency issued in terms of public need and credit as a social service.

I point these matters out, sir, because I feel that it is my duty to do so; in view of the effort made yesterday for so long a period of time, in a most interesting and, shall I say, to himself convincing speech of the Prime Minister, in which he made it quite apparent that there was no difficulty in squaring the circle—not the slightest in the world. All you have to do is to read sufficient extracts from newspapers and say: This is what we have done; we have done just what the newspapers said we would, and we have currency issued in terms of public need and credit as a social service. Well, having listened to the right hon. gentleman's advocacy of his consistency and of his one hundred per cent performance of the obligations undertaken, I have only to say that—alas and alack!—the meaning which he put upon his remarks should I think in fairness have been put into them when he was making them to the public. If he had explained just what I have said here; if he had said: Ladies and gentlemen, electors of Canada, when we have finished with the Bank of Canada Act we are going to double the bank's capital and appoint six directors, but we shall leave it just as it was with respect to the issue of currency and the discharge of the functions for which it was created; we are going to make it publicly owned by making it half private, except to the extent of $100,000, and half public,—if he had said that, I wonder how many who shared the general benefit from the language used by the Prime Minister during the election campaign would care to go back to their constituents, taking this bill in their hands, and truthfully tell the electors just the differences between the old act and the new. "Currency in terms of public need, credit a social service." In hoc signo vinces!

I have nothing further to say, Mr. Speaker, except that I congratulate the government. I congratulate the Minister of Finance upon the training which he has received during the last few years, which enables not only the minister himself but those who sit about him to realize that after all, stability, security, certainty, are the hallmarks of a sound financial policy. Although for a moment you may be led by beautiful phrases or by words capable of two meanings to conclude that you may have currency issued in terms of public need or credit as a social service, you cannot possibly do it and maintain the position which this country has made for itself as a country that has honoured its obligations in terms of its contracts, has paid its debts to the extent that it has been possible for it to do so, and has stood out among the nations of the world as a country poor but young, realizing that if we are to develop as a great power, a great people, we can do so only by attracting capital to our shores, unless we are prepared to adopt the view which my friends to the left maintain and advocate so well, namely a socialist state. We are not yet prepared to do that. But unless we are, then the government is to be congratulated upon maintaining the old standards and following the course that experience has mapped out as the only course that can be followed by any nation that does not desire to bring about an impossible situation with respect to its currency on the one hand or repudiation of its obligations on the other. To the extent that the government has followed the course of its predecessors, leaving the Bank of Canada Act unchanged in its essential features, making the privately owned institution part public and part private, but not changing the general provisions as to its policy with respect to currency, and leaving all the powers and functions of the bank untouched by the ruthless hand either of time or of extreme radicalism, I congratulate it and trust it goes forward to discharge the very onerous duties and responsibilities that during the next few months rest upon it, in a manner that will enable us at the end of that trying period to maintain our position and be able to say with pride and satisfaction that we have not used either the printing press or the engraver's art to issue currency to meet our pressing needs, or treated credit as a social service that can be had by anyone that asks for it. It cannot be done and this system maintained. When I hear my hon. friends to the left advocating a change of the system I appreciate their consistency; for they realize that unless the system is changed we must maintain the position which was taken by the late administration and which the present administration is continuing to follow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, there is just one correction which I should like to make in the statement made by my right hon. friend at the beginning of his speech. I did not like to interrupt at the time. The right hon. gentleman said I had spoken of a publicly owned and publicly controlled bank. I do not think he will find in any utterances of mine either in this house or beyond its walls advocacy of a publicly owned and publicly controlled bank. I took care to say on all occasions that the question of public ownership was debatable but the question of public control was not, and I spoke of a properly-constituted publicly controlled bank.

Mr. BENNETT: I quite appreciate the statement made by the Prime Minister. In the speech he made at Saskatoon, which place I reached the day after he had been there, that was the understanding of his speech, but obviously it was not an attempt to report the language verbatim. If the right hon. gentleman says he made no such statement of course I am glad to accept his statement. It does not change the force of the argument.

SUPPLY

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PROBLEMS ARISING OUT OF ITALO-ETHIOPIAN CONFLICT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Salaries and expenses of the office of the Canadian Advisory Officer, $32,500.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, in the statement I am about to make I shall seek to anticipate the questions which may be asked with reference to the important international matters to be discussed this afternoon. Having regard to the critical situation existing in Europe and other parts of the world, and to the possible interpretation which may be placed upon any observations made in the course of debate this afternoon, and especially because of the world significance of some of the matters we are about to consider, I shall make no apology for following somewhat closely the notes I have carefully prepared. I hope the committee will permit me to make my statement free of interruptions. I shall endeavour to say nothing which will necessitate interruption, and upon completion of the statement I shall be pleased to try to give such further information as hon. members may wish to have.

It has been contended that the government has not made clear its policy on the important problems, immediate and future, which have been raised by the outbreak and progress of the Italo-Ethiopian conflict. It is true that the government has declined to make a statement at some critical stages when a statement would be premature, and would complicate rather than advance a solution. I believe it will be generally conceded that the course of events in Europe has more than justified the government's attitude. It is undoubtedly essential that in parliament and outside of it there should be full and responsible discussion of the vital questions of Canada's relations to other states. There has not been sufficient discussion in the past. That has been due to our slow emergence from the colonial attitude of mind; our relative immunity from any serious danger of war on our own account; the real difficulties inherent in our preoccupation with the tremendous, absorbing and paramount tasks of achieving economic development and national unity, which with us take the place of the preoccupation with the fear of attack and the dreams of glory which beset older and more crowded countries; and the unparalleled complexity of our position as a member of the league, a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations and one of the nations of the American continent.

[Mr. Bennett.]

The situation is changing. Informed and serious consideration of Canada's external relations is being given by the press and by organized groups of citizens throughout the country. There is a much more realistic appreciation of our position than prevailed thirty years, even ten years ago. I cannot say that there has been a crystallization of opinion in any final or clear-cut form, but there is an increasing realization of the complexity of the problem and of the special Canadian factors involved.

So far as the general policy of the government in the present conflict is concerned, it has been made clear from the beginning. That policy was set forth definitely in the statement issued on October 29, within a week after the present administration assumed office. It is a policy by which we have abided and a policy to which we still adhere.

That statement set forth, first, the attitude which the government proposed to take on the immediate question of the application of sanctions to Italy, and second, the line of approach to the wider question of the aims and methods of the League of Nations. May I deal with each of these two questions in turn?

First, as to the immediate question. It was stated that while reserving consideration of the feasibility and desirability of making the league's central purpose the guarantee of the territorial status quo and the reliance upon force for the maintenance of peace—> —in the present instance, when an earnest effort is being made with wide support to test the feasibility of preventing or at least terminating war by the use of economic sanctions, and when there is no room for doubt as to where the responsibility rests for the outbreak of war, and having regard also to the position taken by Canada at the recent assembly, the Canadian government is prepared to cooperate fully in the endeavour.

It was further added that steps would be taken to secure the effective application of the economic sanctions proposed by the co-ordination committee, and that the Canadian government did not recognize any commitment binding Canada to apply military sanctions and that no such commitment could be made without the prior approval of the Canadian parliament.

I think that was a definite and clear statement of policy. How far has that policy been carried out?

First, "the effective application of the economic sanctions recommended by the co-ordination committee," representing all the members of the league which had concurred in finding Italy the aggressor. What were those sanctions? They were:

1. The prohibition of exports of arms and munitions to Italy.

2. The prohibition of the export to Italy of certain key products useful for the prosecution of war and controlled by members of the league, including transport animals, rubber, bauxite, aluminium, iron ore, manganese, chromium, nickel, tungsten, vanadium and tin.

3. The prohibition of all imports from Italy, except gold and silver coin and bullion, goods en route; later, books and newspapers; and later still, goods paid for though not shipped before October 19.

4. The prohibition of loans or credits to Italy.

These were the sanctions, and all the sanctions, which the league commitee recommended should be put into effect. All were put into effect by Canada at or before the time agreed upon, November 18. All are still in effect. All have been enforced strictly and effectively.

As some question has been raised as to whether the sanctions are actually being enforced, it may be well to state the facts briefly. Any doubt on that score is based, I think, on misunderstanding either as to what the recommendations as to sanctions actually were, or as to the actual facts of their application.

The first recommendation for the prohibition of the export of arms and munitions raised relatively few difficulties for Canada, as we produce these wares only in a very minor degree. There has been no indication of evasion.

The second recommendation, for prohibition of the export of certain key minerals, touched Canada more closely. We are the outstanding producer of nickel, one of the most important minerals included in the list, though it does not hold the decisive place which is sometimes attributed to it. Special care was therefore taken to ensure against not only direct but indirect shipment of Canadian nickel to prevent, in the words of the league committee, "any abnormal increase in the export of prohibited commodities by indirect routes."

The Department of National Revenue vigilantly checked direct export. As to indirect export, the fact is that practically all Canadian nickel bought by continental Europe is bought from Great Britain; London is the dominant centre in the metal trade for Europe. In 1935, for example, Canada sent 140,800 hundredweight of fine nickel to the United Kingdom and only 380 hundredweight direct to the continent of Europe. As a party to sanctions, the United Kingdom has of course been equally concerned with Canada in ensuring that no nickel should reach Italy after the export ban went into effect. The other important possible channel is the United States. The position in that regard is simplified by the fact that for some years the International Nickel Company has followed the practice of selling to consumers in the United States for their own use only; no nickel has been sold in the United States for export to other countries. The exports to and from the United States have been carefully followed; some nickel has been and is being exported from the United States to Italy, but the amount is not sufficiently large to constitute an appreciable evasion.

Some misunderstanding has also arisen in this case because of the mistaken notion that all exports were prohibited. This of course was not the case. There was no reason why wheat or codfish should not be exported, so far as the exporter was concerned. Our general export trade was of course affected by the retaliatory steps taken by Italy which endeavoured to find substitutes at home or to divert purchases to non-sanctionist countries. Aside from direct steps taken by the Italian authorities, the decreased purchasing power resulting from the inability to sell Italian goods abroad of course reduced Italy's power to buy abroad.

The third recommendation, prohibition of imports from Italy, was relatively simple to enforce, which was one of the reasons for its adoption. The recommendation in this respect has been fully and faithfully carried out. Some misunderstanding has arisen from two sources. First, certain exceptions were included in the recommendation, none of great importance, the chief being goods en route at the time the sanctions were applied, and goods paid for but not shipped before October 19, but as rigid care was taken to compel complete proof before goods of either category were admitted, the total was slight. Second, the ordinary statistics of importation give rise to misunderstanding. Our customs returns of imports do not comprise goods entering the country, but comprise goods passing through the customs, and consequently the returns show as "imports" goods which entered the country before sanctions were imposed, but not drawn from customs warehouse until some months later.

The fourth recommendation, the prohibition of loans and credits, like the first, created no special problem for Canada. The cooperation of banks and investment companies was early secured by the Minister of Finance. The recommendation, it may be noted, did not prohibit making payments due for goods or services, or the making of gifts.

In several cases inquiry was made as to the detailed procedure adopted by the United Kingdom and other countries. It cannot be denied that Canada has enforced the sanctions agreed upon as fully and effectively as any other country, and more so than a number of countries which agreed to sanctions "in principle."

As regards the proposals to add coal, iron and steel, and oil to the list of prohibited exports, it is not necessary to make any extended comment. The criticisms of the Canadian government's attitude on these proposals which were voiced in some quarters last December did not survive a clearer appreciation of what the Canadian government's attitude was and of the position taken by other countries. These commodities have not hitherto been included in the prohibited list for two reasons. In the early stages of the conflict, the prohibited exports were confined to articles which were substantially controlled by members of the league and trade in which therefore could not easly be diverted to non-sanctionist countries. When at a later stage their inclusion came up for review, a second consideration came into play, namely, whether their application would or would not lead to war. There is no inherent reason why these commodities should not be embargoed, why nickel or iron ore should be prohibited and steel or oil continue to be shipped. The difficulty arises from the inevitable dilemma which the application of sanctions presents: If moderate, they may fail to deter or halt the aggressor; if extreme, they may drive an aggressor to prefer the gamble of sudden battle to the prospect of slow strangulation. There is no blinking the fact that economic sanctions may lead to war. They mean the application of force. They are not mere commercial measures. They are in intention and reality a means of imposing the will of one nation or group upon another nation or group. In modern times they have always, in different forms, been an important part of the technique of war, from the Berlin decrees to the Trading with the Enemy Acts and the blockades of neutral countries in the great war. Whether they will progress into military measures is not necessarily within the control of the powers that impose them; that may depend on the calculation of advantage and disadvantage made by those against whom the test of will is directed.

In the present conflict, one of these commodities assumed critical importance. In modern military operations, with aviation and mechanized transport playing so decisive a role, a continuous supply of oil may be vital.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

How vital is a question in dispute; the authoritative inquiry made by the league expert committee resulted in the finding that if applied by all countries it would become fully effective in three or three and a half months, but that, if applied only by league members, the effect would be merely to render the purchase of petroleum more difficult and expensive. Whether the enforcement of an oil sanction would, in fact, have led to war is also in dispute; the Italian threats may or may not have been genuine. In any case they were sufficient to cause some great countries to conclude that enforcement of oil sanctions might invoke new wars or at least make impossible a peaceful settlement of the existing war.

During November, the European press were full of assertions that Canada was initiating and urging the imposition of an oil sanction. It became imperative to correct this serious misapprehension. The Canadian government had not urged the step in question. Further, it did not consider that Canada should initiate such a step: Canada had no special power, no special interest in the present conflict which would warrant such a pretentious gesture. It was not upon Canada, but upon countries nearer the conflict that the chief brunt of possible consequences would fall. This was made clear in the statement issued on December 2. This statement, of course, referred to the origin and not to the merits of the proposal. It was explicitly stated that the Canadian government would be prepared to consider, with other members of the league, any proposal for the revision of economic sanctions.

I may add that on two later occasions, in December and in March, when it was expected that the question of oil, coal and steel sanctions would come before the committee of eighteen, the Canadian government instructed its representative to concur in the proposal if generally supported.

As regards military sanctions, the position taken by the government was stated on October 29:

> The Canadian government at the same time desires to make it clear that it does not recognize any commitment binding Canada to adopt military sanctions, and that no such commitment could be made without the prior approval of the Canadian parliament.

The provision of article 16 of the covenant on the point is as follows:

> It shall be the duty of the council in such case—

That is, in case of a member of the league resorting to war in disregard of its covenant undertakings.

> —to recommend to the several governments concerned what effective military, naval or air force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

As a matter of fact, the council has not in the present instance recommended any military action by any member of the league. One member took, not military action, but military and naval precautions, but Great Britain's action in moving the home fleet into the Mediterranean was decided upon before sanctions were applied, and without any request from the council or members of the league, but as a result of Italy sending large bodies of troops to Libya, and other similar gestures.

In fact in the discussions between France and Great Britain which took place at the outset, there was no proposal to apply military sanctions, and this attitude was communicated to the Italian government. As the situation does not seem to be fully realized, I may take time to quote the concise statement made by Mr. Laval on December 28, as reported in the London Times; Mr. Laval's frank declaration is of interest further as indicating how decisions at Geneva are determined by the great powers there represented, as is doubtless in great measure inevitable. Mr. Laval declared:

> As early as September 10 I had, at Geneva, conversations with Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr. Eden. Conversations about what? We were certain that our first effort at conciliation had failed and that hostilities would soon begin. We were concerned to know how the mechanism of collective security would be put into action. Without waiting for an official sitting of the council, in that spirit of close collaboration which must always animate French and British ministers, we discussed and examined the grave situation which would be created for the world by the Italo-Abyssinian war.
> We at once agreed to avoid military sanctions, to adopt no measure of naval blockade, never to consider the closing of the Suez canal, in a word, to reject everything which might lead to war. We then considered what financial or economic sanctions we could adopt. I do not remember that there was any difficulty between us. We held our discussions, as may be imagined, on a basis of equality. We agreed in deciding that financial sanctions and an embargo on arms should first be submitted to a committee which did not yet exist, but which was created with the name of Committee of Coordination, and that other sanctions such as the refusal to buy and sell should be examined.
> What does article 16 of the covenant say? "The council will indicate to the governments concerned what effectives may be necessary to ensure respect for the undertakings of the league." Well, at no time has the council made such a communication. Never has that text been mentioned, and I even repeat that by common and unanimous agreement we set aside all military sanctions and those which could lead to them.

It should be understood that in this statement Mr. Laval was referring to the initial discussions.

I come now to the present position: A new situation has arisen with the occupation of the Ethiopian capital by Italian forces and the collapse of organized resistance. That event requires us to consider the question, Why has the league failed, thus far? In the first place the preservation of peace and of Ethiopian independence had been seriously jeopardized and compromised before the league took any action. The Ethiopian question in one form or another had been the subject of diplomatic controversy and negotiation between the three neighbouring great powers, France, Britain and Italy, for forty years. Spheres of influence were claimed by each power; and efforts made to harmonize their claims with one another and with the maintenance of Ethiopian political sovereignty. Italy, the latest comer, was particularly concerned. Late in 1934, a border conflict at Wal-Wal brought this special angle of the growing tension between Italy and Ethiopia before the council of the league. After bandying back and forth, Mr. Eden's persistence was largely responsible for its settlement, in an arbitral decision declaring neither party guilty. But the fundamental difficulty remained unsolved. It was not discussed by the three powers, Italy, France and Britain, when they met at Stresa in April, 1935. A few months previously France had agreed to recognize Italy's predominant right to economic expansion in Ethiopia, as Britain had done in 1926, but Mr. Laval contended that in neither case was there the slightest countenance for forced aggression. In spite of earnest efforts on the part of the British and French representatives in the summer of 1935, Italy persisted in its insistence upon a settlement by force of arms. The main issue did not come before the council until August, and even then its consideration was passed back and forth between the three powers and the league.

The three power conversations failed. In September the league assembly found the Ethiopian question deposited on its doorstep. By that time there were 250,000 Italian troops in East Africa, the Italian authorities had publicly committed themselves to military action, and the league's essential task of preventing war had become almost impossible. The suggestions for settlement offered by the committee of five were rejected by Italy, and on October 2 war broke out.

In the second place, the policy adopted after war had broken out has thus far proved inadequate to bring the war to an end or to save

Ethiopia. That policy, in brief, was to abstain from military sanctions and to apply a number of economic sanctions, in the hope that the cumulative effect of mild economic pressure by the league, hard fighting by Ethiopia, and heavy rains in Ethiopia would eventually compel the aggressor to desist. The rains were delayed; the resistance of Ethiopian troops and Ethiopian geography proved less adequate than the military experts had forecast. The courage and determination of the emperor and the individual bravery of his men were hampered by tribal dissension, by lack of modern equipment, particularly in the air, and by the decision of the army leaders to risk large scale battles rather than fall back on waiting tactics and guerilla warfare. The undoubted organizing and engineering skill shown by the Italian forces, their ruthless bombing from the air, and finally their recourse to the horrors of poison gas in violation of their pledged word, enabled them to break up organized Ethiopian resistance much more rapidly than had been anticipated.

In the meantime economic sanctions have undoubtedly been hampering Italy's war effort, restricting supplies and weakening her financial position. Possibly if Ethiopian resistance had been prolonged, the existing sanctions would have been adequate to turn the scale, whether toward peace in Africa or toward war in Europe, who can say? but they were not adequate under the actual circumstances. General agreement for more stringent and strangling economic sanctions has not been secured; military sanctions have not been proposed. It is now apparent this policy was not calculated to halt a strong and determined aggressor. As Mr. J. A. Spender puts it:

> If we strip the case of Italy and the league of the terminology in which it is commonly involved, is it not a very simple one? One resolute man who does not hesitate to make war has been matched against two opponents, one of whom said that he would not make war alone and the other of whom let it be known that he would not make war at all. What other conclusion could there have been to this method of proceeding than that which we have witnessed?

It is only fair to say that the reason was not fear of Italy, but fear of war, and war on a European scale, apprehension that the strain of economic insecurity, the reckless urgings of ambition or revenge, the tense and neurotic relations between state after state and its neighbours, the mounting armaments, would lead to a sudden flare of war in Europe if the spark fell from Africa. It may be that there was nothing in the European situation in December or in May which might not have been anticipated by statesmen close to the European scene when the existing sanctions policy was determined last September and October, but closer approach undoubtedly make the prospect more vivid and more deterring, particularly when the German government forced the Rhineland conflict upon the stage. In brief, collective bluffing cannot bring collective security, and under present conditions most countries have shown they are not prepared to make firm commitments beyond the range of their immediate interest.

What next? The question arises whether sanctions should be increased, continued at their present level, or discontinued. It is a question upon which there is wide divergence of opinion.

Those who urge they should be continued and increased, as for example by closing league ports and the Suez canal to Italian ships until such time as Italy agrees to make peace on terms consistent with her covenant pledges, contend in the first place, that the issue at stake is a great one, the preservation of the league and the system of collective security; and that if Italy is allowed to flout the league and annex Ethiopia, every aggressive great power will be encouraged to do likewise, every small state will be exposed to danger and unrest, and every people driven to fall back on armament and military alliances; and in the second place, that the risk is small, that Italy has been weakened by the financial strain, that the Ethiopian forces may reform and carry on guerilla warfare for years, and, in short, that there is still time to call the Italian bluff, and that it is safer to call it to-day than be faced with a more serious struggle with the aggressor of to-morrow.

Those who urge that sanctions should speedily be brought to an end, reply that the league is not at stake but a mistaken conception of league policy, and in any case article XVI was designed to save the victim rather than to punish the aggressor; that it would be the height of folly to risk an imminent war to-day in order to avert a hypothetical one to-morrow; that with the collapse of the Ethiopian government and Ethiopian armies, there is now no foundation on which to rebuild, no fulcrum on which to rest the lever; that the Italian economic condition is far from hopeless and her people united and flushed by success, and that with the Far East in motion, Palestine aflame, Austria torn by internal conflict and external propaganda, Germany watchfully waiting,

France distracted by internal difficulties, only doctrinaires would urge risking war to save a formula.

In a recent debate at Westminster the opposing views were clearly set forth. Mr. Dalton, for the Labour party—

> ... impressed upon the government the view of the members of the opposition that there was no justification whatever for the removal of the sanctions imposed on Italy by the League of Nations practically unanimously. The conscience of democracy in this and other nations would not accept that view. There was a strong case even now for increasing the sanctions by including oil and other commodities in the list. The economic and financial situation of Italy was not enviable. It was all very well for people in the capital to cheer a distant victory, but there was the matter of months to come, and we should look ahead and vindicate the already shaken policy of the collective system.

The other view was most forcibly expressed by Sir Austen Chamberlain, a former Foreign Secretary:

> In the early days of this struggle I said that for myself I had counted the cost and that I was prepared to go to all lengths with other powers, even to the use of military force.... But the circumstances have wholly and profoundly changed since then. What was the purpose of sanctions? Not in this case to attempt to prevent aggression, but to prevent aggression succeeding. They failed. They were to bring the war to an end and to stop bloodshed. They failed to bring the war to an end. It has been brought to an end by military means, by the conquest and complete subjugation of Abyssinia and the flight of the emperor. To ask at this moment, or to propose at this moment, to continue sanctions is a policy of equal danger and futility. I want to ask those who press this policy on the government, have they reckoned the cost and are they prepared for the price they will have to pay?

No indication was given at that time of the position of the government. To-day the British government has stated its position. As I came into the house this afternoon the Canadian Press were kind enough to hand me dispatches which have come setting forth particulars of the debate which has taken place in the British House of Commons to-day. It would be of interest I think for me at this moment to quote one or two paragraphs which appear in the press dispatches and which, will doubtless find their way into the evening papers.

> London, June 18.—Anthony Eden, Foreign Secretary, told the House of Commons to-day Great Britain would take the lead at Geneva for removing the League of Nations' sanctions against Italy. Mr. Eden said: "His Majesty's government, after mature consideration on advice which I, as foreign secretary, thought it my duty to give, has come to the conclusion there is no longer any utility in continuing these measures as a means of pressure on Italy."
> Mr. Eden recited the occasions upon which Great Britain had previously taken the lead in attempting to settle the Italo-Ethiopian war, and said that, since the league seemed to be perplexed, the British government considered it to be its duty to take the lead again.
>
> "No doubt it would be quite as easy for us not to do so and to follow somebody else," said Mr. Eden, "but I don't believe that is the right attitude for this country to take."
>
> He declared: "We have to admit that the purpose for which sanctions were imposed has not been realized."
>
> He added, he considered the situation in Ethiopia one "which nothing but military action from outside the country could possibly reverse."
>
> Then Mr. Eden demanded: "Is there any country, is there any section of opinion in this country, which is prepared to take such military action?"
> "If the league means to enforce an Ethiopian peace which the league can rightly approve, then the league must take action of the kind which must inevitably lead to war in the Mediterranean—and no man can say such a war can be confined to the Mediterranean."
> "I have no reason to think the league favours such a departure or such action, and no reason to suppose this country, on which the greatest burden of such a war must fall, desires it either."
> "The government," said Mr. Eden, "is actively studying the question of league reorganization but," he added, "it was felt wiser to leave the matter until the September league assembly."

That statement of the British position came in, as I have indicated, this afternoon. The new government of France has not yet had an opportunity of making its position known to the public.

I have summarized the conflicting points of view. The assembly which is to meet at Geneva the end of this month will be called upon to consider the extension or the removal of sanctions. It is desirable, in view of the fact that this session of parliament will shortly come to an end, that the position which the Canadian government propose to take should be stated now.

May I say, Mr. Chairman, in presenting this statement that the position which our government proposes to take is one which was determined in the cabinet some little time ago. It was a decision arrived at before we had any information as to what the British action would be in this matter. Our position was taken in the light of all circumstances as we were able to ascertain them, and with particular regard to Canada's position.

It is urged in some quarters that sanctions should be applied until the principle of collective security is vindicated and Italy agrees to make peace on a basis consistent with her covenant pledges. That could only mean applying sanctions until the aggressor is forced to withdraw and the independence of Ethiopia is restored. How could that end be achieved? It is clear that sanctions of the present order would not be adequate to attain it, now that Ethiopian resistance has practically collapsed. No half-way policy is possible at this stage. Six months or a year of continued ineffective economic pressure would be worse than useless. The end could be achieved only if the members of the league would definitely undertake to resort to whatever measure of compulsion, including war, would be found necessary to secure a speedy and certain compliance. Is there any likelihood that under the circumstances that exist to-day, alike in Europe and in Ethiopia, any appreciable number of the effective members of the league would give such commitments? It is clear there is not. Is there any certainty, if they did, that their objective would not soon be lost sight of in the very serious disturbances which might arise from other quarters? Entertaining this view, we do not consider that we would be warranted either in committing Canada to such a course, or in urging those members of the league upon whom the main burden and risk would fall, to undertake it, if they were not themselves convinced of its necessity. We believe there is no practical alternative for Canada at the approaching assembly of the league but to support the raising of sanctions, and our delegates will be instructed accordingly.

I come now to the concluding part of what I have to say, and which has relation particularly to the future of the league. Probably many of the members of this house have read an interesting speech delivered by Mr. Baldwin on the future of the league a week or so after the debate to which I have referred. The burden of his address was the value of the underlying ideals of the league, the experimental character of article 16 and the policy of sanctions, the necessity of re-examining that experiment in the light of experience and considering whether any changes were required in the covenant, whether automatic sanctions are practicable, and whether it will be possible to give the league the universality of membership its founders assumed.

That brings me to the question of our own attitude to the league in the future. It is not a subject upon which anyone can dogmatize. There are many points of view which may be taken to-day, and new factors, new experience, may require us in the years to come to revise the opinions of to-day. But it is a question which events have forced us to consider.

Here, again, may I say that the view of the government, in general terms, was expressed in our statement of October 29, and that experience since that time has not shown any reason for substantial alteration of that view.

In brief, it was then indicated that the government regarded the league as an essential instrument for peace; that there had been differences of opinion among league members from the beginning as to the means whereby peace could be secured; and that successive Canadian governments, without any appreciable public dissent, had opposed the view of Geneva as "an international war office," with the emphasis upon punishment rather than prevention. The statement concluded:

> It is also to be understood that the government's course in approving economic sanctions in this instance is not to be regarded as necessarily establishing a precedent for future action. In the future, as in the past, the government will be prepared to participate in the consideration of the most effective means of advancing the aims of the league through the adjustment of specific controversies, the lessening of the rivalries based upon exaggerated economic nationalism, the renewal of the effort to stem the rising tide of competitive armament, and such other policies as are appropriate for a country in the geographic and economic position of the dominion, and as will ensure unity and common consent in Canada as well as the advancement of peace abroad.

May I develop that view somewhat further? In the first place, we do not believe that isolation from interest in world affairs is possible for Canada. The world to-day is an interdependent world. No happening of any magnitude abroad is without its repercussions on our fortunes and our future. Canada, it is true, unlike many less fortunate countries, is not exposed to direct and imminent danger of attack and conquest by any country. We are fortunate both in our neighbours and in our lack of neighbours. It may be that this fortunate position is not due to any special virtue on our part, that it is an accident of geography and of history, but one has only to be in any European country a day to realize how relatively fortunate a position it is, and what folly it would be to throw it away. It is equally true, I should add, that if some countries have too much history, we have too much geography; we have the problems of rapid development of half a continent, the burden of building railways and roads to connect the far-flung provinces, the task of maintaining government over vast areas, and unity among sections thousands of miles apart, problems from which many older, developed, concentrated countries are relatively exempt. We have a real interest in the peace and prosperity of the world. Our climate and resources, our whole railway and economic structure, have made international trade essential for us, at least for many years to come. A great war abroad and, in lesser measure, the preparations for war, the rattling of the sword and the darkening of the sky with planes, may disturb our trade, endanger democracy, strain our relations with other lands.

We are concerned in external affairs, in the events beyond our border, and cannot cut ourselves off from contact with them. External affairs, for Canada, mean in overwhelming degree, our relations with the other members of the British commonwealth, particularly the United Kingdom, and with the United States. With other countries our commercial relations are increasing, and with France we have also an historic tie. This is surely obvious, but it is necessary to emphasize the obvious when men speak as if it were only in and through the League of Nations that we can take our part in international affairs. The league has a distinct place of its own, a long range importance, but our direct relations with Britain and the United States and other countries are of daily and vital import. We have made some progress in providing the machinery, the instruments, for carrying on these direct contacts. It is half a century since Sir John Macdonald established the high commissionership in London. It is just over a quarter century since Sir Wilfrid Laurier established the Department of External Affairs. The recent establishment of legations abroad and the receiving of legations here is now an accepted Canadian policy. Day to day experience makes it clear how imposible it would be to deal with our increasing and more urgent relations with other countries without these agencies of direct and immediate contact, these channels of responsible and friendly intercourse. When circumstances permit I trust it will be possible to carry further this proved experiment in the establishment of legations, and to widen the exchange of representatives with members of the British commonwealth.

But apart from these agencies of contact with individual countries, these means of dealing with specific issues of direct concern, there is a need for a more general organization, an international clearing house, an agency for collective discussion and collective settlement of the problems the nations have in common. We have such an organization to-day in the League of Nations. As someone has said, the league is the one great thing that came out of the war. If it did not exist, or if it went out of existence, it would be necessary to recreate it. The world is linked together materially and we have to devise political means to keep pace with the closer contacts and the more rapid changes of the new age. I may repeat that "the Canadian government regards the league as an indispensable agency for organizing and strengthening the forces of good will in the world, and for effecting the essential adjustment of conflicting national aims."

What are the objects of the League of Nations? They are best set forth in the preamble of the covenant itself:

> In order to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security,
>
> by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war,
>
> by the prescription of open, just and honourable relations between nations,
>
> by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among governments, > and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another.

There is, however, room for difference of opinion and need for discussion as to the means by which these ideals of the league may most effectively be advanced under actual conditions in the world, and as to what means are practicable and appropriate for Canada to adopt. Adherence to the league and to the promotion of security by collective action does not necessarily mean a commitment to the use of force, economic or military. There have been two opposing views as to the course the league should adopt. One view, which may be called the continental view, the contention of a number of European countries facing states from which they have acquired territory, has been consistently from 1919 to 1935, that the members of the league should commit themselves to definite and automatic use of force against an aggressor, or at least a European aggressor. The provisions of article 16, the proposals for an international or inter-allied military force, the proposals for an Anglo-American-French treaty to guard the Rhine, the draft treaty of mutual assistance of 1923, the Geneva protocol of 1924, the long discussions during the disarmament conferences, with the cry "security before disarmament," the proposal in 1935 that sanctions should be applied against a country which without having recourse to war had violated a treaty endangering the peace of Europe, these are only some of the expressions of that view.

The other view laid emphasis upon prevention rather than punishment, urged the peaceful remedy of grievances rather than making war upon a country resorting to war, questioned the readiness of European countries to give as well as to receive aid. It was on the whole the view of the countries of the British commonwealth and the Scandinavian states. It found expression in the assembly resolutions of 1921, watering down article 16, in the movement for the revision of article 10, in the opposition to the protocol of Geneva, in the contention that mutual disarmament was the best means of giving security, in the movement for conciliation and arbitration. It is well expressed in the reply of the British government in rejecting the Geneva protocol proposals in 1925:

> The fresh emphasis laid upon sanctions, the new occasions discovered for their employment, the elaboration of military procedure, insensibly suggest the idea that the vital business of the league is not so much to promote friendly cooperation and reasoned harmony in the management of international affairs, as to preserve peace by organizing war, and—it may be—war on the largest scale....
> And it certainly seems to His Majesty's government that anything which fosters the idea that the main business of the league is with war rather than with peace is likely to weaken it in its fundamental task of diminishing the causes of war, without making it in every respect a satisfactory instrument for organizing great military operations should the necessity for them be forced upon the world.

This has unquestionably been the attitude of Canada. I quote from our statement of October 29:

> As regards the means to the advancement of those (league) ends, successive Canadian governments have opposed the view that the league's central purpose should be to guarantee the territorial status quo and to rely upon force for the maintenance of peace.

The Anglo-American-French treaty of 1920 was so framed as to exclude the dominions. Canadian public men of both parties opposed or sought to remove the status quo guarantees of article 10. The Canadian government in 1925 rejected the protocol of Geneva because of "its rigid provisions for the application of economic and military sanctions in practically every future war." Canada and the other dominions did not adhere to the Locarno treaty reinforcing the guarantee of the Rhine border, just as Great Britain at that time refused to guarantee the Vistula. In responding to the invitation of the United States to become a signatory to the Briand-Kellogg pact, the Canadian government, in view of its discussion as to its bearing upon the covenant of the league, made the following statement in 1928.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I quote from the statement made in 1928 in connection with the Kellogg pact:

> The preeminent value of the league lies in its positive and preventive action. In bringing together periodically the representatives of fifty states, it builds up barriers against war by developing a spirit of conciliation, an acceptance of publicity in international affairs, a habit of cooperation in common ends, and a permanently available machinery for the adjustment of differences. It is true that the covenant also contemplates the application of sanctions in the event of a member state going to war, if in so doing it has broken the pledges of the covenant to seek a peaceful solution of disputes. Canada has always opposed any interpretation of the covenant which would involve the application of these sanctions automatically or by the decision of other states. It was on the initiative of Canada that the fourth assembly, with a single negative vote, accepted the interpretative resolution to which the Secretary of State of the United States recently referred, indicating that it is for the constitutional authorities of each state to determine in what degree it is bound to assure the execution of the obligations of this article by employment of its military forces.
> The question of sanctions has received further consideration by later assemblies. It is plain that the full realization of the ideal of joint economic or military pressure upon an outlaw power, upon which some of the founders of the league set great store, will require either an approach to the universality of the league contemplated when the covenant was being drawn, or an adjustment of the old rules of neutrality to meet the new conditions of cooperative defence.

In the light of the recent experience of the league and of the discussions in the United States during the past year on neutrality, this last sentence was a fairly good prophecy.

On the other hand, Canada participated in every league movement for extending the range and facilities for peaceful conciliation, such as the general act for the pacific settlement of international disputes, and the optional clause for extending the jurisdiction of the permanent court, taking the initiative among the members of the British commonwealth in proposing ratification of the latter measure. Successive Canadian governments supported the cause of disarmament throughout. Perhaps all members of the league should have taken a stronger stand at the fatal hour in 1933 when Germany's proposals for equality of armament were rejected, but it was on the countries which were heavily armed that the difficult responsibility rested, and if the wrong turning was taken, we must admit that hindsight is more common than foresight. We did something to aid the minorities protected by the peace treaties to secure a fair hearing. I do not say we have done enough at Geneva, that we were always as concerned as we might have been, or as strong in our advocacy of good causes as we and others might have been. There are obvious limitations to the amount of pressure a small and distant country, not primarily responsible for what may be the outcome of the league decisions, can apply. But at least, whatever government has been in power, we have, I think, aimed in the right direction.

There is undoubtedly much that is attractive and persuasive in the conception of a world united to prevent by force a breach of the peace by any aggressor. It has been stoutly contended that if all nations would undertake to make war upon an aggressor, and carried out that undertaking, war would never occur. That may well be, but unfortunately it is only a hypothetical argument; it bears no relation to the actualities of to-day It may be that eventually some such rule of law will be established in the international as has been established in the national field, or at least in those countries where law and the free expression of the people's will still prevail. But clearly that time has not yet come, and to pretend that it has is only to make for disillusionment and misdirected effort.

Two conditions are essential to the working of any such plan of universal compulsion. In the first place, there must be an overwhelming preponderance of power, economic and military, in the league as against any possible aggressor or combination of aggressors. Even economic pressure, if it is to be strangling enough to be effective against a strong nation, must be backed by a definite readiness, in the last resort, to have recourse to armed force. That is surely clear. That condition does not now exist. For one thing, the league is not the universal association anticipated by its founders when they dreamed of it imposing peace throughout the world. The United States, Germany, Japan, Brazil, are outside the fold. A league facing the abstention of some and the hostility of others of such powers clearly cannot operate as it might in other circumstances. In the second place, there must be the certainty that the members of this body will be ready to exercise that force when the occasion arises, regardless of where it arises or whether they have any direct interest in the quarrel. That condition again, does not exist. There are a few countries which have evidenced some measure of idealism in their approach to the question, but in most cases action has depended on a calculation of immediate interest. That was shown beyond doubt in the Manchurian and Chaco incidents. The league did not apply military or even economic sanctions in the Manchurian affair; its action was confined to a recommendation not to recognize the state of Manchukuo. In the Chaco war, between Bolivia and Paraguay, it did even less. That was not a minor conflict. It was a long and bloody war, dragging out for nearly three years, costing the lives of a hundred thousand men, bleeding and bankrupting both countries, and leading lately to the establishment of military dictatorships. It involved immensely more human suffering than the Ethiopian conflict. Yet the league never even attempted to determine the aggressor; after two years of warfare a league commission made recommendations for a settlement, which were rejected, and later still a futile embargo on arms was proposed. It is true the intervention of the league was complicated by local South American jealousies and rivalries, but this was an excuse rather than a reason for non-intervention; if the letter of article 16 applies anywhere, it certainly applied in the Chaco. In short, these disputes were far from Europe's shores; no direct national interests of other members of the league appeared to be concerned, or none commensurate with the effort and the risk of coercive action. There has been no firm ground any time in the past ten years for anticipating that the league would act otherwise in such cases.

Under such conditions it is clearly impossible for a country like Canada to make binding commitments to use economic force or military force. The league cannot operate as a one-way road. European states cannot throw overboard all obligation to action in Asia or America and expect other members of the league to accept obligations in European disputes. Occasions may arise where military action may become advisable or essential, but so far as Canada is concerned, that would be for the parliament of Canada to decide in the light of all the circumstances at the time. Automatic commitments to action in any and every part of the world have not been and, at the present stage of national development, will not be observed by the members of the league. Automatic commitments in restricted areas where direct interests are involved might be so observed, but such commitments, whatever name they go by, are often hard to distinguish from the old fashioned military alliance.

It is a matter of regret that the league is not now in a position to play the spectacular role of dictating peace to all the world. But admittedly it is not in that position or that mood. To act as if it were is merely to incur failure and recrimination, and to involve the risk of bringing on the very disaster it is the purpose of the league to avert.

But that does not mean that there is not a great part for the league to play. If it cannot become the international war office, neither need it become a mere debating society. It can emphasize the constructive side of its task. It is of great value to have at Geneva a world-wide organization where the machinery for conference and conciliation is always available, not having to be improvised in the midst of a crisis; where representatives of fifty countries meet periodically and come to have some appreciation of the difficulties and the mentality of other lands, and slowly develop the habit of working together on small tasks leading to greater; where, in spite of all the criticisms we often hear as to vaguely worded resolutions and hotel bedroom conversations, the statesmen of great countries are forced to come into the open and defend in public, before a world forum, the policies of their governments. It can press on to its task of disarmament, or at least to the halting of armaments. It can develop and apply the instruments of conciliation and of arbitration in settling specific disputes before they lead to open challenges and entrenched positions. It can provide a forum for the discussion of economic grievances. Much nonsense is talked to-day about the Haves and the Have Nots; the countries which are in trouble as regards raw materials are the countries that have them to sell, rather than those that have to buy. Canada, for example, has great resources, but she also has great burdens; we have incurred huge debts in seeking to stake out and develop and unify this widely scattered heritage; and incidentally, whereas many of the countries which complain of their unjust treatment have evaded the burden of internal debt by inflation and of external debt by repudiation, Canada has paid and continued to pay every obligation within and without the country.

We should inquire earnestly and seriously what can be done by joint action to remove at the root the political unrest, the economic insecurity, which is largely responsible for national rivalry and threats of war. We must of course keep a sense of proportion, realize the complexities of the problems of post-war Europe and pre-war Asia, the measure of knowledge, the measure of influence which Canada can bring to bear upon the solution of the racial strifes, the border disputes, the class antagonisms, the economic conflicts of distant continents. But inquire we should into any question, raw materials, population movements, labour conditions, that is felt as a grievance. There is one economic grievance, or rather difficulty, which nearly all share, the difficulty of finding markets, the contention that unless we sell we cannot buy. That is sound, and points to one sound policy all should seek to follow as a means to world appeasement—revival of two-way international trade, an increase in the total movement of goods, not the futile and fatal attempt to equate balances between every two countries, at constantly falling levels of total trade. Civilization will indeed be in jeopardy if governments tinker with symptoms and ignore causes, if we allow and encourage the disruptive forces to grow and confine our efforts to repression or punishment when the damage is done. Repression or construction, force or cooperation, the clash of tariffs and the appeal to force or the solution of the problems that underlie international rivalries —that is the choice before us.

It is a counsel of despair to assume that trade war or military conflict is inevitable, and to assume that all that can be done is to meet force by force. Particularly is it futile to expect that we can sow the seeds of economic nationalism and reap a harvest of peace and prosperity. It is a policy of organized scarcity, of deliberate sacrifice of the standards of living in pursuit of a security which it makes impossible by the antagonisms it creates. It is a policy which injects the state into every transaction between citizens of different countries and makes ordinary business an international struggle. Within the measure of our power, we must pursue the attempt to bring international trade gradually back to a sane basis, to lessen the throttling controls and barriers. If we can do so in any degree, we shall make one of the most direct and constructive contributions we can make to the peace and welfare of our own and other lands.

We must not despair of the league. The league has failed, but the league is not a failure. Christianity has failed time and again, but Christianity is not a failure. Rome was not built in a day, and imperial ambitions cannot be exorcised in fifteen years. After all, it is a very little while since we in the British empire ourselves completely reformed. In spite of all discouragements, in spite of the failure of premature efforts, the ideal of world peace is not only sound, it is the essential condition of the survival of civilization and human life itself. So far as Canada is concerned, there is no danger to our national unity and our economic recovery so serious as participation in a prolonged war. We must continue to work earnestly toward the ideal of world peace. To that end we must utilize constructively the League of Nations—that indispensable agency which the conscience of mankind fashioned on the morrow of the greatest international disaster of all time, and bequeathed to our own and future generations.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I must express my appreciation of the very carefully prepared statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). On the whole I find myself very largely in agreement with the concrete actions taken by the government and also with the ideals set forth by the Prime Minister. But I would point out that many of the decisions arrived at might be called after-the-event decisions. The policy of "wait and see" has so far proved successful, but we must not take it for granted that such a policy will always succeed. I am afraid that, alone, it may not keep us out of war. The government's decision with regard to the withdrawal of sanctions may have been arrived at some time ago, but it is perhaps characteristic that it was not announced until after the great nations had declared themselves.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman says that the announcement made by the government was not made until after the great nations had declared themselves. That is not true. If my hon. friend will kindly state what great nations have declared themselves, and when and where they did so, the record will be complete.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We know now the position of Great Britain; Mr. Litvinoff made a declaration a week or two ago, and according to the press the decision of the French government is now fairly well known.

An hon. MEMBER: What is it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am saying, according to the press. As to the future, I must submit that the government's policy is vague. The Prime Minister avoided, or at least did not mention, many problems that are inherent in the existing world situation. He did not attempt to indicate the implications of the general position he enunciated. Possibly—I say this in all sincerity—that is too much to expect from the responsible head of a government or from the leader of a party which comprises such diverse elements, but I think that someone should do this.

For a long time we in this house have taken very little interest in foreign affairs. The discussion of a new post office or of a wharf apparently really means more in this house than the discussion of some of these world-shaking events; yet the issue of peace and war is really involved in our foreign policy. The last war, according to a recent computation, cost Canada $4,341,488,904. Through the opportunity I now have in this chamber I would impress upon our Canadian public the disaster that war would mean to Canada and the disaster that it has meant to the world. According to some calculations quoted in Canadian Business of June, 1934, the amounts invested or rather squandered in the last war could have been utilized to create almost a new world. As estimated by Nicholas Murray Butler, who is far from being a radical agitator, the last war cost 30,000,000 lives and $400,000,000,000. He said:

> With that amount we could have built a $2,500 house with $1,000 worth of furniture and placed it on five acres of land worth $100 an acre, for every family in the United States, Canada, Australia, England, Wales, Ireland, Scotland, France, Belgium, Germany and Russia.... There would have been enough left to give each city of 20,000 inhabitants and over in all the countries named a $5,000,000 library and a $10,000,000 university. Out of the balance we could have set aside a sum at five per cent interest which would pay for all time a $1,000 yearly salary each for 125,000 teachers and 125,000 nurses. After having done all this we could still have bought up all of France and Belgium, everything that France and Belgium possessed in 1914: every home, factory, church, railroad, street car.

If these figures are anything like approximately correct, they bring home to us the frightful disaster the last war was; and as we contemplate these facts one might well fear lest another war might wipe out civilization. Our people do not realize the danger. I am not altogether blaming the government.

But one reason the people do not realize the seriousness of the situation is that we have not had the discussions which we might have had in this house. The government, even at this present session, delayed for nearly five months before stating its policy. The Prime Minister said that there was danger of our being colonial-minded, and that is a real danger. The tendency is for us slavishly to follow Great Britain. That constitutes a sort of inferiority complex which manifests itself in the idea that someone else must take the lead. I cannot see why someone else should always lead. The Prime Minister said recently that a very difficult situation confronts European statesmen at the present time. Why cannot we understand that it confronts the world and Canada and not merely European statesmen? The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), in the same connection, said that efforts must be made to uphold the hands of those who are endeavouring to maintain the peace of the world. Well, are we not members of the league, and why should we not have a responsibility in regard to stating what we believe? On the other hand, this inferiority complex manifests itself in the exaggerated idea that if we take any action it may upset the apple-cart. Only the other day the Prime Minister said:

> I ask my hon. friend to consider what the effect of a discussion in this parliament two months ago, one month ago, two weeks ago—

And the Prime Minister fairly shuddered! Then the leader of the opposition joined with him in the observations he made in this house. He said:

> Any observation that might be made in this house and which would embarrass an already embarrassed situation, would be, in my judgment at any rate not only unsound but calculated to retard rather than to assist the accomplishment and purposes of the end we have in view.

I really do not think Canada is as important as that, but I most firmly believe that Canada should be prepared to take her stand and express an opinion with regard to these matters. If the parliament at Westminster, so much nearer the scene of action, can discuss these matters as it has done from time to time, I cannot see why there should be any difficulty in the way of our discussing them in this country.

I suggest that we may as well concede to one another that we all want peace. We all love our country, and if some of us hold views and advocate policies that are not held and advocated by the majority in this house, I hope our arguments will not be met with cries of "coward," or "communist" or "anti-British" or "pro-German" or pro anything else. I admit that the situation is very, very complicated. Any of us who have tried to arrange our own thoughts cannot but have felt that. I think the Prime Minister is quite correct in his statement, and I sympathize with him when he says that we cannot be dogmatic with regard to many of these problems. It may even be very difficult to maintain a consistent position. Our policy must necessarily be contingent upon rapidly changing conditions.

I do not think I can make any greater contribution to-night than to present as briefly as possible some fundamental considerations that I hope no one will call merely academic.

I believe firmly that war is madness; that it settles nothing; that it creates serious trouble. I believe that we must approach the study of war with a scientific spirit and a scientific technique. War does not come by act of God; it does not come out of thin air. It is the result—and I think we are all coming to that view—of clearly defined and ascertainable causes. We recognize to-day a certain war psychology which is apt to get possession of any or all of us. Then there are undoubtedly certain economic factors, prominent among which are the gain that comes from private armaments, and economic nationalism. Just recently Mr. Harold Butler, Director of the International Labour office, speaking at the Twentieth Session at Geneva, 1936, had this to say:

> War is not caused only or mainly by lust for territory or booty or prestige. It is also caused by low standards of living, by the feeling of economic insecurity, by the desire for moral or social emancipation. The founders of the organization were right when they discerned an indissoluble connection between peace and social justice....
> There is now a vague awareness that territorial claims and armament programs are not the fundamental issues and that it is impossible to allay the international tension which they have created without striking deeper. They are not the causes of our present discontents but the symptoms. The roots are to be found in actual or threatened impoverishment, declining standards of life, insecurity for the future of themselves and their children which darkens the outlook of the present generation in so many countries. The remedy is not to be found then in political pacts or frontier rectifications or disarmament conferences alone. These methods have been tried and have failed because they did not touch the real source of the trouble. So nowadays we are beginning to talk of the abolition of trade restrictions, the distribution of raw materials, the stabilization of currencies, an international monetary agreement, the resumption of international lending, as things which are not merely required to promote economic recovery but which are indispensable to the future stability of the whole political structure.

Let me say further that I am perfectly convinced that if we want to have peace we must be prepared to pay the price of peace. That is not going to be a light price, but in contrast with the enormous costs of war we ought to consider ourselves fortunate indeed that we are in a position to pay it. Further, let me state the convictions of this group—

Mr. GRAY: If the hon. gentleman will permit a question, what does he mean by "the price of peace"?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not want to go into that at the moment. It would take me too long to outline a program. All I desire here is to indicate that we cannot get peace merely by wishing for it. We shall have to give up—as I shall urge a little later—older conceptions of our "sovereignty," the older ideal that we can go our own way without reference to the outside world, and so on. I say we have to pay the price of peace, and it is not a light price.

I believe, and our group believes, that war cannot be eliminated under the existing economic system. I shall not be thought to drag in a mere party slogan when I say I am convinced that capitalism means social injustice at home and it also means imperialism and militarism. In our modern complex industrial and social structure, I agree with the Prime Minister that no individual can live to himself and no nation can live unto itself. Self-sufficiency, independence, sovereignty, isolationism belong to the past. The world is becoming more and more integrated. The trouble is that our institutions and our ideals have not kept pace with the development which is taking place in the world around.

I find myself somewhat in a dilemma. Let me confess that as an individual I refuse to participate in or to assist in war, and yet I am a citizen of a country that still relies upon force, and as a public representative I must vote on alternative military policies. Under these conditions in the actual world of affairs one must try to hold to his own convictions and keep ultimate objectives in view, and yet advocate measures which are recognized as merely ameliorative. One must accept half a loaf, or even support procedures which, though repugnant to one's principles, represent a real advance in public welfare and public morals. For example, I am opposed to capital punishment, and yet, rather than see a woman's head nearly torn from her shoulders, as was done recently in Montreal, I would vote for the electric chair, for gas, or even, I think, for the axe! In a decently organized society we would not need a police force. In the present semi-barbarous civilization I prefer a police force to bandits and vigilantes. So, in international affairs, until war is actually and wholeheartedly repudiated as an instrument of international policy, an international police force under proper control, if indeed that is possible, might be preferable to world anarchy.

Lest somebody should set me down as an idealist let me talk for a little while as a hard-boiled realist. In my judgment it is the advocates of armaments who are the sentimentalists. They are living in the past. Armaments in the past have failed to give us security. Some other way must be found. It is the imperialists who are the sentimentalists. It is those who pin their faith to the league as now constituted who are the sentimentalists.

Let us consider realistically the defence of Canada. If we start with the assumption that Canada's first obligation is to her own citizens, our problem is: How can we save our next generation from annihilation? I submit, as I did on the defence estimates, that with our present military equipment or any which this country can support, Canada unassisted cannot defend herself against all comers. Fortunately she does not need to do so. The United States will not attack us, and under her Monroe doctrine the United States would protect us, not because of her interest in our welfare, but because of her interest in her own affairs. At the moment, then, I have a good deal of sympathy with the isolationist position, though I quite agree that it cannot ultimately save us. We are a part not only of North America but of the world.

A more difficult question is: What of our British empire connections? Personally I think highly of Great Britain. I am not sure but that spiritually I am more at home in England than in Canada. But I do not believe in modern imperialism, German imperialism, Japanese imperialism, French imperialism, or British imperialism.

Mr. REID: Or Russian imperialism?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, nor in Russian imperialism. I do not believe that Canada should be involved in British wars. The Prime Minister stated what I think is a very great truth when he said that imperialist ambitions cannot be exorcised in a day. But, if they are to be exorcised at all, we must take our part in striving not to let imperialism dominate the world to-day.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Are we not doing that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For that reason I made the suggestion the other day that I thought Canada, as a self-respecting nation, should now declare to Great Britain that we are determined that we shall reserve to ourselves the right to declare war or to make peace. I understand that we have the right to declare whether we shall participate by sending soldiers to the front, and so on, but if England is at war I believe that, according to international law, we might be said automatically to be at war, and our shipping and our coasts might be attacked. As I said the other day on the national defence estimates, the conduct of foreign relations being a matter governed by royal prerogative and not by statute was unaffected by the statute of Westminster. Canada has now full control over her own legislation but is without full control over the executive functions of her government. What is needed is to round out the control over her executive in the same way that the statute of Westminster rounded out her control over her own legislation. I went so far as to suggest—I shall not go into details to-night because I have not time—that in 1934 the Union of South Africa secured for herself precisely what Canada now lacks. In that year, by the Status of Union Act and the Royal Executive Functions and Seals Act, the union parliament declared that——the executive government of the union in regard to any aspect of domestic or external affairs as vested in the king, acting on the advice of his ministers of state for the union, and may be administered by His Majesty in person or by the governor general as his representative.

There were further provisions that make fairly clear that the Union of South Africa will be free to determine the question of peace or war on her own behalf.

The same is true of Ireland.

I am not concerned as to the particular way we do this, but I believe that we should make some sort of declaration of neutrality; that we should let Great Britain know now, not later on when she may become involved in some war, that she need not count us in. I recognize the difficult position of the government, but sooner or later that issue must be faced.

Now I come to our relation to the league. Collective security is a fine phrase. What does it mean? The league at first was a league of victors tied to the Versailles treaty. For a long time the league was dominated by France, and more recently it has been used by Great Britain. In no case has it been in any real sense an impartial instrument. In an article recently in the New Statesman and Nation, Mr. Brailsford had this to say:

This is not a league; it is a collection of governments, each retaining to the full its national sovereignty, each the sole judge of what armaments it requires. It has no central authority above these governments. Each chooses and pays as foreign minister a watchdog of its own national interests, and then we expect that this man, when he flies from his office to Geneva, will on the instant grow an international mind. A president and a standing international council elected on personal merit by the assembly might have given some hope for the evolution of a genuine league policy.

The fundamental idea of the league, that it can ensure peace by dealing with isolated disputes between its members, sprang from obsolete thinking. A "dispute" is commonly a sign of something awry in the structure of the world (distribution of population, raw materials, et cetera), that calls for general legislation and planning. But sovereignty (with the unanimity and domestic jurisdiction rules) stands in the way.

A league that failed to base its whole structure on economic cooperation was bound to disappoint. The best cement is not coercive sanctions, but economic benefits....

Again let me quote with approval the words of the Prime Minister this afternoon, "Collective bluffing cannot bring collective security." I cannot think that any of us have taken the league very seriously. Certainly the great powers have not. We talk of our obligations under the league, but one of those obligations is that of disarmament. I cannot get excited over the action that Germany has taken in entering the Rhineland. Germany disarmed conditionally. We of the allied side refused to adhere to our solemn obligations to disarm. Again we blame Italy for what she has done. I think Italy is blameworthy, but we ourselves have failed to keep other obligations to which we were bound under the league. Let me say that the removal of the causes of war or any real effort to do so has not been seriously attempted.

The fact is we have been thinking in terms of war. We have had quoted to us again and again article 10 or article 16 of the covenant. These have been emphasized but there has been little reference to article 19. It is all very well to talk of maintaining the status quo, which cannot be maintained in a fast changing world. It is all very well to impose sanctions, which it has been proven cannot very well be successfully imposed under the conditions which prevail to-day. What does article 19 of the covenant say?

The assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by members of the league of treaties which have become inapplicable and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace of the world.

That we have not observed. Let me point out, as I did a moment ago in answer to a question, that I believe in an effective world organization national sovereignty cannot be maintained. The giving up of sovereignty is going to be a pretty big price to pay, but I am firmly convinced that it must come to that. There is no use in our occupying a rather smug position, saying we are in favour of peace and blaming other nations for getting into a row in Europe or Asia when we are not willing to do our share, if it involves parting with some control over what we regard as our own affairs.

Let me pass to the Ethiopian situation. No one can condone the action of Italy, and yet may I point out that Italy was bribed to go into the war. Certain promises which Great Britain made were not kept, and whatever the Prime Minister may say about the nonsense that is being talked about the Haves and the Have Nots, I think there is a very real ground for complaint on the part of some of the lesser nations or those who have not early enough got into the great expansionist game.

Let me say further that Japan was as much an aggressor as Italy; I think that is undoubtedly true; and there was the trouble in the Chaco. In neither case did we intervene, and we were just as much breaking our solemn promises and obligations by failing to intervene in China or South America as we would have been had we failed to intervene in the Ethiopian affair. Let me point this out further. The other imperialist powers did very much the same thing a few years ago as Italy has done more recently. It may very well be that Italy used gas bombs. But Great Britain herself threw bombs, not gas bombs possibly, but threw bombs on unprotected villages in northern India and Afghanistan.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my hon. friend will permit me, do I understand him to say that Canada should have intervened in Manchuria and Chaco?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; I say the League of Nations.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I thought the hon. member said "we."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We were just as much bound to take consideration of the situation that existed when Japan became the aggressor as we were bound to take consideration of the situation that existed when Italy became the aggressor.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What does the hon. member suggest that Canada should have done?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Canada is a member of the league, and as far as the league has any responsibility we have to share it with the other members of the league. We imposed sanctions against Italy; we did not impose any sanctions against Japan.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The league did not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Nor did we. I think that interjection of the Minister of Justice illustrates one of the weaknesses we all have in dealing with the league, as though the league were something apart from ourselves.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): So is my hon. friend illustrating some of the weaknesses.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have a very strong suspicion that Great Britain would not have been so much interested in Ethiopia were it not for Egypt and the Sudan, and Suez and India. Further than that, while we talk of the failure of sanctions, we all recognize to-day that they were not adequate or their application prompt enough to be effective. I do not think there is any use in my discussing the question whether or not we should now retain sanctions, but I would say that if sanctions were ever justified then possibly their continuance was justified. The Prime Minister said what I was very glad to hear him say, that we have no commitments with regard to military sanctions, and we would have none without the prior consent of parliament. But he also said in another connection that economic sanctions might and would almost inevitably lead to war. Yet in spite of that Canada did actually join with others in the imposition of economic sanctions. It seems to me that there we got ourselves into a tangle from which I see no very clear way out. I am not here to assert that I see a way out, but I do say that, the old way having failed, we must find some new way.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, that is constructive!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, I am going to suggest one or two things.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Which is the new way?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am keeping my eye on the clock because my time is limited; I may have an opportunity at some later time to offer more detailed suggestions. But I reaffirm the position I took at the League of Nations meeting, last November I think it was, that without seeking to alter conditions, some of which I have described, I believe that sanctions might become worse than useless. Under the present set-up sanctions have failed.

What do we face to-day? Another armament race, in which even Great Britain is participating. Not many weeks ago Sir Thomas Inskip, British Minister of Defence, announced a vast armament proposal. We have before us the unsolved problem of Germany, involving among other things equality. The demand may be made for the return of her former colonies. Either this should be granted, or all colonial dependencies should be placed under a mandatory system, thus giving to all nations equal access to the sources of raw materials and markets. But to this kind of proposal we are apt to reply; What we have we hold. Now we are back again to the old European power politics. In this morning's Montreal Gazette I noticed this dispatch via the New York Times:

> In effect it was the beginning of a new British policy intended to use Italy as a counterweight against Germany in defence of the existing frontiers of Europe.

So it goes. We are back again into the same old war game.

The question then comes: Should we withdraw from the league? I think I would join with the Prime Minister in saying that we should stay with the league. But I say that in doing so we should deliberately set about to work for a new and better world organization than the league constitutes to-day. In the first place it seems to me that we must separate the treaty from the covenant. The treaty is an iniquitous one. As long as that treaty stands we are bound to have difficulty. In my judgment we ought to have a fundamental revision of the Versailles treaty. Someone asked for constructive suggestions; that is one which must have first place.

Mr. ILSLEY: How would the hon. member revise the treaty? It is easy to say that it should be revised, but how?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We are a member and can exercise our right to express an opinion and urge a point of view, and as far as I know Canada has never done that.

Now the Prime Minister says that our delegates are to be instructed to urge the cessation of sanctions. That is all very well, but it seems to me that that is a negative position, and we have to go further than that. I suggest among the things that we should do right away is the revision of treaties. Further than that, with regard to the covenant itself, I cannot quite see how we can go on acting as if we had fulfilled our obligations under the covenant or were prepared to fulfil them. Either we must withdraw wholly from the league, which is one alternative, and a good many of my friends believe that that is the course which should be followed, or on the other hand we should remain in the league under certain definite conditions, one of the conditions being that we should immediately proceed to do everything in our power to explore the possibilities of removing some of those conditions which must inevitably drive the nations to war.

Let me venture to make one more quotation from Butler, whom I regard as having a very real insight into the situation:

> Here again is proof that economic recovery is an impossible dream until the fear of another and more catastrophic collapse of the whole international political system has been dispelled. At the moment of writing Europe > once more stands at a turning point of its fate. The same may be true of Asia. Should another outbreak of violence occur in either region, the hopes of any real prosperity would be effectually destroyed for this generation, even if the present fabric of civilization survived. No doubt the underlying causes which have brought the world once more face to face with disaster are largely to be found in the deep-seated flaws in the economic structure....

May I pause here to say that when we advocate changes in the economic system we are doing so in part because we believe that is the only constructive way in which we can attain peace.

I continue the quotation from Mr. Butler:

> —the deep-seated flaws in the economic structure, which were created or intolerably aggravated by the world war. It is certainly true that the menace of a fresh outbreak cannot be conjured away unless a concerted effort is made to remove those flaws. Given a general will to seek that end, however, in a cooperative and constructive spirit, the task is not impossible, though no one would deny its immense difficulty. But without such a spirit, the outlook for the future is black indeed.
> We are perhaps passing through one of those fleeting psychological moments when a turn of phrase or an access of bold and farsighted resolution may alter the destinies of the human race for generations to come. It is a moment when statesmanship is called upon to rise to greater heights than at any time since 1914. If the occasion is allowed to slip, the discussion of economic and social progress may shortly become largely academic.

Some have asked, even in the course of this debate, what particular policies I would suggest. I do not think this is the moment to bring forward a detailed program. I have suggested for years past that at the opening of a parliament a committee should be appointed to consider definitely and deliberately the means by which we can attain peace. I have said that again and again, and as opportunities have arisen I have tried to bring certain constructive suggestions before the government. I believe if hon. members will look through Hansard for the last fifteen years they will not suggest that I have not endeavoured again and again to bring the urgency of the situation before the house and to offer constructive suggestions. We as a minority group cannot put any policy definitely into practice; we can only make suggestions. It is very decidedly the responsibility of the government to make statements such as the Prime Minister has made to-day, and, may I suggest to make such statements at the beginning and not at the end of a session. They should be made so that we can discuss them not merely in committee of the whole but in detail in small committees. That is the responsibility of the government.

While I believe the Prime Minister gave us an admirable survey of what has taken place in the last few years, he has not given us a very definite idea as to the policy of the government in connection with external affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member will possibly recall that at a very early stage of the session I took up the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. Upon that occasion all the items with the exception of the ones pertaining to Geneva were passed, and those were held over because hon. members seemed to feel that it was too early in the session to discuss these affairs, and that it would be better to hold over an item or two.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have forgotten the exact details in connection with the introduction of those estimates. I do know, however, that again and again they have been introduced in the dying days of sessions. Let me remind the Prime Minister that weeks have passed since I asked for a discussion of this kind, and the Prime Minister, backed by the leader of the opposition, has not seen fit to grant my request until two days before what we hope may be the closing of a session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Weeks had then passed since we first went into committee of supply on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall not argue with the Prime Minister; I am not here to quibble or to criticize the government in a nasty way. But I submit that it cannot fairly be suggested, as has been done by one or two members of the house, that I should to-night bring forward a long string of suggestions which I believe would solve the problems of the world. I am too well aware of the greatness of the problems. I am quite well aware of the difficulties faced by this or any government, under present circumstances, but I ask that the government carefully consider the suggestions I have made. In particular we must be willing to sacrifice much more of what lawyers describe as our sovereignty than hitherto we have given indication of doing.

Let me close by saying that I believe the primary considerations which should determine Canada's foreign policy are the promotion of the safety and welfare of the Canadian people, and the maintenance of the unity of Canada as a nation. I think no one recognizes more definitely than does the Prime Minister that anything like a war would split this nation from stem to stern. We ought to be on our guard against any such disaster. Personally I think Canada should declare her firm intention not to participate actively in any overseas conflict, whatever. Again, in order to avoid any misunderstanding arising between Canada and member states of the commonwealth, Canada should secure immediately from the appropriate imperial or commonwealth authorities full recognition of her right to declare neutrality in the event of another member state of the commonwealth being involved in war.

Let me say to my hon. friends across the way who interrupted me that if that is not a pretty far-reaching suggestion, then I should like to know what is. I admit that it has taken a good deal of political courage to make a suggestion of that kind. However I have ventured to say that that is my opinion, and that we should now take that action.

Finally I urge that the Canadian delegates to the league should be instructed not merely to give up any part in sanctions, but as provided for by article 19 of the covenant, further to press for a policy in which an effort will be made not simply to prevent aggression but to remove those causes of international friction which almost inevitably lead to war.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (East Essex) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, in rising for the first time to address the house, I feel conscious of my responsibility and trust that my remarks will meet with the approval of my constituents.

Mr. Chairman, as a new and humble member of this house, rising for the first time to speak, may I at the outset express my gratitude to the many distinguished and experienced members of the chamber for their courtesy and their encouragement. I sincerely trust that, having in mind my lack of experience in this house, anything I may say to-night will not be regarded by the government or by other distinguished members as presumption on my part.

I attribute my justification to speak to-night to an interest in and a study of the problems with which we are now faced. At the outset, may I say that in the light of the current situation and having in mind that he is the head of a government, in my view the statement of the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie King) was both complete and courageous, and will do much to clarify in the minds of our people the question now before the committee? I was pleased to hear him observe that parliament should be more concerned than seemingly it has been in the past with a discussion of these matters. I have said outside the chamber and I have written elsewhere, and in fairness to myself, I should repeat on this occasion that I think we pursue problems of a purely domestic kind, always assuming that they in themselves possess a measure of security. But in reality, sir, in the absence of some degree of settlement of the sort of problems we are now considering, we must realize that these purely domestic problems certainly cannot possess the security we attribute to them.

There is another reason why I suggest that we in this chamber should consider these problems more often, and possibly why more hon. members should display greater interest and desire to express themselves. My reason is this: As the Prime Minister has suggested, it is difficult to think one's way through these problems. One cannot be doctrinaire; one definitely cannot be dogmatic, and only tradition, together with long periods of study and some historical background, gives one a chance to arrive at a measure of solution. If that is so in the case of the individual, is it not much more so in the case of parliament?

In view of the present situation, is it impossible that we may be called upon sooner than we expect to give expression to policy or to make a decision which in the light of possibly inadequate discussion may amount to a hasty one. I trust the government will not regard my observations as presumptious when I suggest that our representations at Geneva and at international conferences generally can be more adequate if greater opportunity for preparation is given to those who represent us at these conferences. I suggest that in so far as possible delegates to the assembly and to these conferences generally should be appointed far enough ahead to give them a sufficient opportunity to study affairs so that they may adequately represent Canada at Geneva or elsewhere. I have another observation to make, one which is not new. What our delegates do at Geneva or elsewhere should be discussed in this house. I do not think the discussion of these matters should be left alone to committees of the house. I do not think such a procedure is fair to the nation or altogether fair to hon. members.

We have a Department of External Affairs, a department with which I have tried to keep in contact for some years. This department deserves the highest credit. It is manned by individuals who have trained themselves for their work and who are a credit to the service of this country. Under Doctor Skelton, a great scholar and a man who has endeared himself to everyone, this department is accomplishing much work. But I pause to make this slight criticism, and I know it will be received in the spirit in which it is made. Our administrators are so definitely occupied with domestic problems that it is not always possible for responsible ministers to give these matters the attention which I am sure they would like. Would it not be well to sectionalize or departmentalize this department, such as has been done with the State Department in the United States, the Foreign Office in Great Britain and in some of the smaller countries. There could be a Far Eastern section, a League of Nations section, a Canadian-United States section and so on. I do not make this suggestion by way of criticism; I make it because of the relations I have had with this department.

I come now to an important subject suggested by the Prime Minister, which arises out of the axiom with which we are all in agreement, that our main objective in going into the League of Nations was to keep out of war if we possibly could. We all felt that war does not achieve victory and we, along with other nations, were anxious to keep out of war. I should like to address a few remarks more especially to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Woodsworth). I do not doubt the sincerity of the hon. gentleman, but we must maintain some realism in connection with this whole situation. Canada must realize that a country of nine million people, three thousand miles from Europe is not in a position to give effect to measures to the same extent as European nations.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope the hon. gentleman will not put that out as my suggestion. I have not had the faintest idea of anything of the kind. I am afraid I have failed absolutely to make myself understood if the hon. member has gained that impression.

Mr. MARTIN: If I have misinterpreted the hon. gentleman, I wish to correct myself. But I do feel from his remarks that there were ambiguities which lent themselves to the interpretation I have just given to them. So far as an attitude towards war is concerned, Canada has had a fairly definite policy almost throughout her entire political history. On the occasion of our sending a contingent to South Africa, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> I claim for Canada this, that in the future Canada shall be at liberty to act or not to act, to interfere or not to interfere, to do just as she pleases, and that she shall reserve to herself the right to judge whether or not there is cause for her to act.

Sir Wilfrid gave expression to a thought which justifies the assertion that we have had continuity in our foreign policy in that particular. Then, as the Prime Minister indicated, although not as specifically as I should like, when we joined the League of Nations we made it clear that in respect of article 10 of the covenant, by which we were asked to guarantee the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league, there must be certain reservations. With the approval of all countries save Persia, we obtained the following reservation:

> It is in conformity with the spirit of article 10 that in event of the council considering it to be its duty to recommend the application of military measures in consequence of any aggression, or danger or threat of aggression, the council shall be bound to take into account more particularly the geographical situation and special condition of each state.

From the moment when we first became a member state in the family of states, in the then collective system, we made abundantly clear in so far as military sanctions were concerned, our position was one which would have to be dictated by our location on the surface of the globe.

It was been contended that this attitude is not really a reservation. If I remember rightly, the right hon. gentleman, who now leads the opposition in the upper house, took the view that we could not regard that reservation as properly interpretative of our position. It will be remembered that it was the same right hon. gentleman who gave authorship to the "ready aye ready" formula and later amended his view by declaring that before Canada should go into war, not parliament but the people through the agency of a plebiscite should decide whether or not we should take up arms.

When Germany entered the league she made a condition, precedent to her entrance, that in respect of military sanctions, her peculiar geographical position would always have to be borne in mind.

The Prime Minister indicated that Canadian policy in respect of war participation was clearly affirmed by our attitude regarding the Locarno treaty and the Geneva protocol of 1924. If there was any doubt about this continuity of attitude, our position at the imperial conference of 1923 in respect of the procedure to be followed in the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties, in so far as our relations with the other members of the empire were concerned, was made very clear. The right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the Prime Minister have given expression to similar points of view.

I do not think there can be any question about the correctness of the position, and I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has stated a real difficulty. But I believe this difficulty is one which the government is prepared to consider seriously at the proper time. In so far as our relations with Great Britain or the other members of the empire are concerned, our position with respect to war is constitutionally as follows: We are not obligated to participate in a war in which any one component part of the empire is involved. I think that position is clearly understood. But in respect of the recognition of that de facto status by other nations, the position is altogether different. As a matter of record, I feel it advisable to state here to-night the words uttered in this house by the Prime Minister when speaking on the Lausanne treaty in 1924. I think he has settled correctly, first, our constitutional position, that is to say Canada vis-a-vis the other parts of the empire, and our position in respect of the implications of international law. The Prime Minister said:

> There is a distinction to be drawn between the purely legal and technical position in which this dominion may be placed and the moral obligations which arise under treaties, depending upon the manner in which such treaties are entered into, upon the parties who are present, and the representative capacities in which they acted while negotiations were proceeding. Legally and technically Canada will be bound by the ratification of this treaty. In other words, speaking internationally, the whole British empire in relation to the rest of the world will stand as one when this treaty is ratified. But as respects the obligations arising out of the treaty itself, speaking now of inter-imperial obligations, this parliament, if regard is to be had to the representations which from the outset we have made to the British government, will in no way be bound by any obligation beyond that which parliament of its own volition recognizes as arising out of the situation.

That, I think, is the correct position. Now I suggest, not in any doctrinaire way, that the government consider—I do not think it is expedient to put the proposition in any other way at this time—the desirability, either by exchange of notes or by whatever constitutional process is deemed best suited, under the circumstances, of clearly bringing into consistency our constitutional position alongside the obligations that international law in this particular will impose.

The Prime Minister has stated to-night, to my mind, in as clear and facile a way as was possible under the circumstances, what Canada considers her position to be in relation to the collective system. I say "collective system" for want of a better phrase. We really have not a collective system; but I take it from what he has said—and in that I would fully concur—that we oppose the definition of "collective system" in the sense in which that term is understood, for instance, by the League of Nations Society in Great Britain, where there are considered to be three essentials as constituting the phrase "collective system."

The first is renunciation of war, and with that we agree. The second is machinery for the peaceful settlement of disputes, with which likewise we agree. But we disagree, I take it, with the third essential, namely, acceptance by its members of the obligations to enforce the law if need should arise. I do not think that events of the past few years can indicate anything but this, that if there is not any moral force behind the desire to establish world cooperation, then there is no hope of our having it. I do not believe it is possible to bring peace through armed effort, whether through the agency of economic effort or through the use of military force, and I make that statement for the simple reason that we cannot be expected—I hope my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre will understand the spirit in which I make this observation—to give up, in the endeavour to obtain peace, something which we cannot foresee is going to bring peace. Of course, we must give up sovereignty. The principle of federalism alone would serve as a proper agency of government in a world organization. But that presupposes a public opinion, on the part of governments and of people, which is more powerful than all the military or armed force possible. I mention that again for this reason. The leader of the opposition, speaking in Hamilton some weeks ago, made an observation which I may have misinterpreted—and if I have I hope he will correct me—an observation from which I concluded that if the existing collective system, such as it is, was to be preserved, force would have to be exercised in the effort to preserve it. I hardly think that is what he could have meant, because of private talks I have had with him, but I repeat that if force is the only agency it will be very difficult for Canada to contribute to it. We want a collective system; of course we do. We want world cooperation; of course we do. We want a league of nations, but a league of nations that will function, having in mind the realities of the moment. When Mr. Ferguson spoke at Geneva last September, he said:

> We hope that an honourable and peaceful solution of the Ethiopian controversy will yet be reached. If, unfortunately, this proves not to be the case, Canada will join with the other members of the league in considering how, by unanimous action, peace can be maintained.

With regard to that statement, one of the great scholars of political science in this country, Mr. Dafoe, observed, in Foreign Affairs for January of this year:

> Though the language was guarded—

[Mr. Martin.]

Referring to what Mr. Ferguson had said.

> —it was an acceptance by Canada of her obligations under the covenant. It brought within the range of probability the association of Canada with the other members of the league in the application of preventive or punitive sanctions.

I refer to these two observations for this reason. I believe that the true situation is not thus represented. Surely, as of that date, we were content to abide by the provisions of the covenant and to continue along with the other nations in the application of economic sanctions, but only to that extent. And if there was any doubt about it, the statement of the Prime Minister clearly indicates that our conception of the covenant from the beginning has been that, in so far as punitive measures in the purely military sense are concerned, that was never within our contemplation. And that position was even more consistent. I should like to have heard the Prime Minister to-day refer to a resolution he moved, in this very house I believe, in 1926, when he went even further than military sanctions and said that parliament would first of all have to pass upon economic sanctions. The situation as I see it is this: We all want peace; there is not a man in this house or in the country who does not want peace, and I believe that statement reflects public opinion generally. But peace desired and peace obtained are two different things. When we joined the league there were three assumptions, and these assumptions have been clearly set out by Mr. D. F. Malan, leader of the opposition in the South African parliament. By the way, speaking of the South African parliament and the parliaments of the empire generally, I have followed very closely the debates in these various dominion parliaments in the past year, and they have had ample discussion, particularly in Australia and very definitely in South Africa. Mr. D. F. Malan clearly interprets, as of last fall, a situation which, I think, is even more current to-day. On January 31, 1936, he said:

> In order to apply sanctions as they ought to be applied, three things were presupposed in the League of Nations covenant. First, it assumed that the league should be a world league, as it was originally intended to be. Secondly, it assumed that in similar circumstances sanctions would be applied in a similar way. Thirdly, it assumed that the league, not only in theory but in practice, would continue on a moral basis.

On a moral basis; not on a basis of punishment, but on a basis that the civilized people of the world want, that is to say, to have the decrees of the league made effective in the same sense that moral force permits the police power in any given community to exercise its proper function. The statement of the leader of the opposition in South Africa reflects pretty well, in my judgment, the views of this committee as I gather them from what has so far been said. They are based upon this conception. The two vulnerable clauses in the covenant of the League of Nations, articles 10 and 16, are not open to the interpretations which wild though well-meaning enthusiasts for the collective system have given to them. I believe that in respect of economic sanctions there was, as late as last week, an absolute obligation on our part to follow the decision of the council and the assembly to apply sanctions in a purely economic or financial sense. But since the speech of Mr. Neville Chamberlain, and certainly as of to-day, it would be the extremity of folly for a country like Canada, having but nine millions of people, separated from Europe by thousands of miles, having no direct regional or local interest, and in the face of the stand taken to-day by the foreign minister in Great Britain, to urge the continuance of sanctions. I stress that because, active as I have been in the League of Nations movement in this country and in the Institute of International Affairs, to-morrow I shall receive letters, as will other hon. members, complaining bitterly of the stand taken by us in this chamber. But I say to-day to persons who take that view that if they really believe the cause of peace is worth while, let them realize the realism of the moment. It would be, in my judgment, the greatest folly for the government of Canada to deliver to the nation any different kind of statement from the one the Prime Minister gave us to-day.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was asked a specific question. He pointed out what he thought were inconsistencies in our position. He was asked by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) for a concrete suggestion. I shall not say that I thought the question was altogether unfair, nor shall I say that the answer of the hon. member was altogether adequate or fair. I believe that it is possible to suggest something very constructive, and I venture humbly to suggest in general terms a program to which, I know, it may be difficult to attain, but which, having in mind the statement given to-day by the Prime Minister, might go a long way, if adopted by other members of the league, to improve the situation as we find it. I do not believe that, apart from minor matters, Canada has any cause for regrets. We have pursued our job, in so far as our international obligations are concerned, as best we were able to do under the circumstances. Our obligation is not that of the great powers. I am not prepared to say from my seat to-night that I am glad it has been necessary for Great Britain to take the stand she has taken. I am not prepared, in justice to my convictions, to say that I think the great powers could not have avoided this situation. I think there was a period when they might have applied measures which would have strengthened the league in its present position. But that is not Canada's part. When the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) gave this country a statement last fall intimating that our permanent advisory officer had acted contrary to instructions, I did not, I confess, at that time agree with that position. But it is only fair to say, in justice to the minister and to myself, that events have clearly shown that the attitude taken by the government on that occasion was correct. Why? Because a country in the north American sphere or region cannot hope, if Europe in her region is not prepared to do her share, to keep the European house in order. It simply is not practicable. But there were facts and circumstances which pro-league people like myself were not in a position to know at the time.

For the time being, in respect of our obligations as a member of the league, our position should be definitely that of an observer. I do not think that, having in mind the current situation, we should regard ourselves any longer as obligated to apply economic, and certainly not military, sanctions. I doubt very much if under the circumstances the government of the day would be justified in bringing to the attention of parliament for consideration the application of either of these two kinds of sanctions. But surely we have another obligation. Every individual in a community has a moral obligation to his community to strengthen it; and I believe that we in Canada, having expressed as we have done to-day our affirmation of the principles behind the League of Nations, should do something definite to make that organization a useful one within the limits which circumstances dictate. I would suggest a four-point program, expressed if you like in general terms. Time will not permit a discussion of them in detail, but they constitute in themselves a statement which, if it could be unanimously adopted and simultaneously put into effect, might fulfil the contemplated object.

First: Immediate removal of some of the economic and psychological causes of international tension. By that I do not want any one to think I am giving expression to socialism. We should establish effective machinery for the continuous treatment of these problems.

Second: Immediate revision of certain treaties and establishment of effective machinery for treaty revision in the future. The Minister of National Revenue asked the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre how he would revise treaties. In the first place, many of the treaties tending to be provocative of disturbances have been removed, some by denunciation and some by unilateral action. But there are some clauses, for instance, in the treaty of Peace, the guilt clause, that might be removed in order to placate the psychological difficulty which Germany experiences, and to do this would go a long way towards bringing peace. One also might consider by way of treaty revision the removal of the Anschluss clause to permit the union of Austria and Germany. I am not advising that, but I am just suggesting illustrations of what might be adopted. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was perfectly correct when he answered the Minister of National Revenue by saying that the way to revise was to proceed with revision. I know quite well that Canada, as a small power, is in no position to tell Europe to do this and do that. A distinguished member of this house, whose name I should not mention, said that, having represented Canada at Geneva at one time, he felt he was a very effective rubber stamp while sitting at the assembly of the League of Nations. That is pretty much at the moment our position as a nation, but there seems to be an obligation upon us to suggest a program which, simultaneously applied, might bring about a different kind of situation than the one now facing us.

Third—and this is important—immediate limitation of national armaments by international agreements, and signature of a convention providing for progressive further reductions in national armaments down to the point of abolition. There, again, we must confess a difficulty. We may be asked, what are we willing to contribute? One cannot deny the power of that response.

May I come to what I think is the most important suggestion in this humble program: Fourth, immediate strengthening of the power of the league to implement—not to enforce—its decisions and to effect observance of the agreements which its members have assumed as signatories of the covenant and of the convention for the reduction of armaments, due regard being paid to the necessity for regional differentiation of responsibility for taking such measures. May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the last is the important one. The league has proceeded until now on the basis, that once an aggressor appears, the act of aggression is to be stampeded by universal action. The Marquis of Lothian, I suppose, is the man perhaps closest to the present administration in Great Britain. He made the suggestion last November, having in mind what he thought were the evident weaknesses of the league, that the nations should divide themselves into regions, and that if a disturbance took place in one region any sanctions, military or economic, to be applied should be applied by the countries within that region. I am not saying that I altogether agree with him because I do not feel that I have given the matter the consideration I should have, but I suggest this, that in so far as Canada is concerned, that is definitely a consideration well worth bearing in mind.

That brings me to this point: Having in mind the policy of the good neighbour as enunciated by Mr. Roosevelt, is it not worth while for Canada now to consider taking part in the negative way that is thereby provided in the Pan-American Union? Is our region not North American as well as European? Have we not definite interests in the union of states on this continent, if alone for commercial reasons? I would suggest, while I see great difficulties in determining where the terminals of Great Britain's region would be, and while I am not at all anxious to disturb our relations with her, because that would be anything but a peaceful pursuit, that the government might well consider the advisability of taking part in the purely advisory conferences of the Pan-American Union. One cannot go through the deliberations of the Montevideo conference, where problems such as immigration and detailed problems of commerce were considered, without feeling the wisdom of this kind of suggestion. At any rate it is one that, I think, is deserving of consideration.

I have spoken longer than I intended. In the past few months I have found it very difficult to wade my way through this problem. In the last five years I have spoken all over this country on behalf of the League of Nations Society. I believed in the league as an instrument through which the peace of the world could be guaranteed, but in face of the realities of the moment one feels that one can pursue the cause of peace and at the same time be tremendously realistic. I suggest to hon. members that we have a contribution to make in this particular. If others outside this house consider it their obligation to pursue this matter, surely we have an obligation likewise. It is not so much a question of our willingness. We are torn between two convictions: the desire to build of Canada a great nation, with all that a healthy nationalism suggests, and on the other hand to try and build a healthy internationalism. For my part there is no conflict between the two. I believe that it is possible for us to build in Canada a nationalism in the truly great cultural sense, building a national personality, and at the same time in another sphere making a contribution toward world co-operation. Internationalism through nationalism should be our ideal. Having in mind the economic interdependence of nations, having in mind the impossibility, as the Prime Minister said, of maintaining a position of isolation in world affairs, there can be only one step forward, and that is toward world cooperation on truly realistic lines.

May I say, in conclusion, that whatever interest I have in this subject I owe to a great Spanish professor, Professor H. E. Senor Don Salvador de Madariaga, one of the greatest living thinkers, I suppose, along these lines, and I should like, if for no other reason than a purely sentimental one, to quote the last words of his Cobden Lecture for 1934, in which, speaking as a Spaniard and at the same time as a former official of the League of Nations, he said:

> The idea of war calls forth visions of activity; the idea of peace calls forth visions of quietude. But passive drifting leads to war, while peace can only be preserved by constant work which recreates it day by day. And the most difficult part of the work for peace is by no means the organization of world community activities, the setting up and working of international machinery, what might be described as "work outwards"; it is on the contrary the "work inwards," the conquering of ancient passions, fostered in and for another age, but still vigorous in our own times despite the changes in environment which make them obsolete and out of harmony with contemporary life. This effort is truly worthy of man and compares favourably with the exhilarating effects attributed to war by bellicose writers writing under the lee of peace. This then must be our Holy War—the war against war. Its main weapon, reason. Its battlefield, our own heart. Its victory, true peace.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Chairman, the people of Canada have been very much surprised at the secrecy and silence of the present government during the past four months as to the foreign policy of this country. We are supposed to be a separate country under the statute of Westminster. If we are, it is time for separatism.

What is the foreign policy of this country? We have three or four ships. I hold in my hand a return to an order of the house, and they are the Champlain, the Saguenay, the Skeena, the Vancouver and another boat. They have been on a tour of the north American continent, a joy ride, putting into harbours and having a good time, and that is the fleet which is to protect Canada's shores.

We are to-day in the unfortunate position of having a government in this country which, according to a return, No. 107, that was brought down, has spent on this so-called league $4,216,045.91 from 1920 to 1935. Where has the league got the people of this country? We are just as close to war as ever. If Mussolini, instead of going south to Africa, had gone west and come up the St. Lawrence, we should have known very shortly what collective security amounted to and what we owed the motherland and her fleet for protecting our shores. We do not contribute a cent to the British navy.

The people of this country have become sick and tired of the league as at present constituted because it has got us no place. It has been a flat failure. It is on the scrap heap to-day. The whole foreign policy of Great Britain is based on Locarno, which in turn was based on the treaty of Versailles, and to-day the league is in ruins. It is in retreat the world over. I have very strong convictions on this question. I believe Canada was placed in a humiliating position last December after the government had signed the covenant of the league for an offensive working together with the motherland and the nations composing the league. When we signed these minor oil sanctions against Italy, what happened? The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was out of the country and another member of the cabinet repudiated everything that was done. I have before me many newspapers from Vancouver to Halifax which protested against the humiliating position in which this dominion found itself. Canada is fast becoming known as the fair weather member of the British empire, as I see it. She declared for sanctions and then repudiated them. We became a contract breaker; by the league covenant, and Italy could have proceeded against us, as could the league, for not having complied with the covenants.

Nobody in this country wants war. In these days when dark clouds hang over the world, as I said on the budget debate, we should be grateful to the mother country for the British fleet which protects our shores and shipping on the seven seas and keeps open our shores. Disarmament to-day is the tyrant's opportunity as in the days of King John. It was the armed strength of the barons that made magna charta possible; it was unnecessary to use it, but it was there if needed. The British fleet is the only league of nations which this empire has to trust in to-day. I am not in favour of the present league; while it is run as it is, the quicker Canada gets out of it the better. You can have sanctions and pacts until you are black in the face, but if there is no way of enforcing them they are just a delusion and a snare. I am in favour of the league of nations of the British empire with the British fleet to protect our shores; that is the only collective security the world has to-day, God's greatest of secular gifts to humanity. Canada was first in the diamond jubilee procession in 1897 but has not contributed one ship to the fleet. We have had eighteen years of peace pacts, peace agreements, open diplomacy, but the result is nothing but utter failure, and Great Britain has been left carrying the bag. The British fleet was mobilized in the Mediterranean; she was the only nation willing to stand by the league when all others forsook it and fled. I believe that had Canada stood fast on oil sanctions and not weakened, British diplomacy would have been in a different position as far as Italy and Ethiopia were concerned. As far as I see it, before God, Great Britain stands to-day as the trustee for the peace of the world. She is the only nation that has the necessary force to support the league. The people should listen no longer in this country to the politicians and high priests of pacifism and separatism, who refuse to face the actual facts. Canada has no police force but the British fleet. The league has made a very poor showing in all major disputes, nothing but weak compromises, and has been nothing but an agency for diplomacy, with, certainly, no dependable security. The league is becoming a modern tower of Babel; it has dealt in platitudes, compromise and weak settlements. Selassie said: If you want to have security, join the league. Ethiopia thus had the slave owners join the league. What did this league do? For many years it saw these slave ships out on the Red sea, bound for Arabia, and did not a thing a stop them. It has also done nothing about the outbreaks in China. The league allowed five million slaves to be a pawn in Ethiopia and did nothing but talk about it. Abraham Lincoln had a much harder task, the Life of Lincoln shows, in regard to the slaves in the south, but he stopped slavery whereas the league did nothing.

What England needs at the present time is a George Canning to keep her out of these European quarrels. Canada should learn the lessons of recent events and trust to the British fleet to protect her shores. There will be a rude awakening in this country sooner or later. The people of Canada, as I said in the budget debate this year, are never going to allow Mr. General Election to become the admiral of the British fleet, or the commander-in-chief of the British forces. Before Mr. General Election could review his shock troops and open his ballot boxes, a foreign foe might sail up the St. Lawrance, blow up the citadel and bomb Ottawa and Montreal. Did you ever hear of England proposing a referendum in case of trouble? Is England going to hold a referendum before she sends her magnificent fleet to protect our shores? It shows the length to which the pacifists have gone in this country. Great Britain in the last fifteen years, owing to the folly of the pacifists, has almost surrendered her sea power and endangered her security. The result has been the collapse of the open diplomacy preached from the housetops by Woodrow Wilson.

Then the league has brought about a lot of bad blood between the nations of the world. It has indulged in a lot of hot air. These covenants were made only to be broken. It now remains for Hitler to take Austria. What has become of Canada's sanctions? Since the great war there has been over one hundred peace pacts and covenants between the powers of Europe, equal only to the tower of Babel of old. British foreign policy relied on Locarno and collective security and is now a mass of ruins. There are seven different treaties of Locarno. The politicians are responsible for the crucifixion of Abyssinia. You can sign peace pacts all you like, but if a treaty cannot be enforced it has no horse sense about it. The result is that the present League of Nations is in retreat and decay. We see the end of these gentleman's agreements; that is all they are. They are not binding, never intended to be binding. The world is back where it was in 1914; Europe is an armed camp and the pacts will be kept only as long as it is to the advantage of those who made them to do so. Pacts, covenants and contracts between nations are enforceable only by war; let Canada not forget that. She learned that lesson in 1914. The sooner we wake up to that fact the better. The King of Kings of Ethiopia stood by his country against great odds, against the civilized world, and we have as a result the league and Locarno in ruins. The structure that it was hoped would protect the people against the horrors of war is now a heap of ruins. And Mussolini carried on with impunity against a helpless people a ruthless, "gangster" war. Where was the church of God? What did the Christian church do in Italy, notwithstanding that Italy bombed hospitals, crucified women and children, bombed the Red Cross and used the worst form of poison gas? As was said by the Archbishop of Canterbury in the House of Lords, there was no Christian church in Italy to say one word against this contract breaker or breach of the usages of modern warfare.

As far as I am concerned, I think Canada was very much humiliated last December by the action of the government, after having agreed to sanctions. It was bound to participate in the action of the league. The government retreated and said that Canada's actions at Geneva in connection with oil sanctions was merely an expression of personal opinion, and did not represent the view of the federal government. I have before me the views of thirty newspapers on this, and one, the Telegram, said:

> The proud boast of Canada that she was the nation which took the initiative in signing the halibut treaty stands in contrast against the action of Canada in connection with the league and the operations of that body concerning Italy.

A few years ago a writer said in the Empire Review:

> The League of Nations has pledged its members not to recognize Manchukuo, and has thus committed them to hostility to Japan. Is the British government prepared, at the bidding of Geneva, to perpetuate the state of affairs which is detrimental to the true interests of Great Britain? England is more concerned with the far east than any other European power, and Japan is the other predominant power in that quarter of the globe. Peace in the east can only be preserved if Great Britain and Japan cooperate; it is Great Britain's friendship alone which will enable Japan's statesmen to guide her destinies along a safe path.

I agree with that, and we should have a policy in the Pacific and should never have abandoned the Singapore base. He says further:

> The plain course of the government was to recognize Manchukuo forthwith, and then come to an understanding with Japan. Whether we like it or not, she is the mistress of western Asia, and nothing we will do can weaken her position there. In these circumstances we must place the interests of peace before the wobbling of the league.

Possibly there may be future trouble in the Pacific; in such event where would we be? After the action taken by the League of Nations Japan is out, and no wonder. We know the Hon. Mr. Rowell has been a leader in matters respecting the league, and his observations made last January concerning the action of the acting Prime Minister were as follows:

> It is the clear and inescapable duty of every member of the league to impose this prohibition and to do so without delay. If they fail to do so, they will be violating their solemn international obligations and betraying the league and the cause of international justice. I regret that the government is not entitled to the credit of proposing the prohibition of the export of oil and other key materials.

These were the words by the Hon. N. W. Rowell, K.C., who has taken the strong stand that Canada violated its treaty. May I say that Canada's position is most humiliating to a great many people in this country. We should get out of the league, while the going is good. Since 1919 it has been nothing but an institution for the promotion of strife, ill feeling and mischief between nation and nation. It has failed like similar leagues in the past. Formed to prevent war, by its mistakes it has brought about war; instead of sticking to its last, it has meddled in every petty state's internal affairs about labour and capital, and its meddling has caused the world to be in a perpetual state of unrest. After fifteen years we see the utter failure of Woodrow Wilson's plan of open diplomacy. The league is now in flight.

Of the great powers, four, namely the United States, Germany, Russia and Japan are now outside. At the present time we have little more than England and France which won the war, with Italy in a position where she should be thrown out and France in a position where she is wavering in the league as run now. The withdrawal of Japan and Germany means that the smaller states will in future exercise more influence at Geneva, as they have been the principal cause of international unrest for the last ten years, this development is not reassuring.

This deplorable situation the league is now in is the result of three things: the quest of compromise rather than of justice, the persistent refusal to face facts, as it did re Japan, China and Ethiopia, and the absurd insistence upon the theoretical equality of all nations. The league has failed every time it has had to deal with a problem of the first importance. Unfortunately a confession on the part of the world's statesmen as to the failure of the league is most unlikely, and instead we shall probably have the decaying corpse of the new diplomacy poisoning the air for several years to come. As the late Lord Salisbury once wrote, "The commonest error in politics is sticking to the carcasses of dead policies." As a result, where is the league to-day?

Neither the United States nor Russia will join the league until they can secure for the peoples within their sphere of influence a weight in the league councils at least equal to that exercised by the nations of western Europe. Japan, again, will not rejoin the league until her demand for a far-eastern Monroe doctrine is accepted in principle. For our part we view with little more sympathy this scheme for five leagues of nations, loosely joined in a super-league, than we view the league as planned in 1919.

I am not opposed to the principles of the league; far from it. It should have been reorganized long ago in conjunction with the five great powers I have named. We can have no peace until those nations are in it. In Canada we have no foreign policy. The only policy we have is set out in some sections of the Militia Act of Canada, chapter 132 of the Revised Statutes of 1927. Section 63 is as follows:

63. The militia or any part thereof, or any officer or man thereof, may be called out for any military purpose other than drill or training, at such times and in such manner as is prescribed.

Then, section 64, respecting active service, states:

64. The governor in council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

And section 66:

66. Whenever the governor in council places the militia, or any part thereof, on active service, if parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall be issued for the meeting of parliament within fifteen days, and parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit and act in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

I may say that I am friendly towards the league. The suggestion I make here is that it should be reorganized and made more useful. It should include the United States, Germany, Russia and Japan. Without these nations it can be of no use; the covenant would be broken. We have had several Locarnos, as I have shown, and they have all been broken. We in Canada can rely upon no more such pacts or agreements as we have had with Italy and other countries, without the possibility of war.

Mr. HANSON: What is the hon. member reading?

Mr. CHURCH: In its present form the league is not useful, and we should not continue to spend money upon it. Pacifist speeches have been made. In this connection may I describe to hon. members a cartoon which I now hold in my hand, and which appeared originally last February in the Toronto Telegram. It is headed "Advance of Civilization," and under a picture depicting the terrible effects of modern warfare, these words are credited to Haile Selassie: "And they are raising funds in Toronto for the league of nations society, because it prevents war." They were raising funds when hospitals were being bombed, red cross depots being bombed, and men, women and children were being poisoned or crucified. That was done by Italy without protest from the Christian church of that country.

I have in my hand another cartoon—

Mr. HANSON: I think hon. members are entitled to know what the hon. member is reading.

Mr. CHURCH: This cartoon shows a picture of the Suez canal—

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask the hon. member for Broadview to state what he is reading.

Mr. CHURCH: From a cartoon I am discussing Canada's foreign policy. After waiting for months we have heard what our foreign policy is supposed to be and we find that we have not any. We are just going around in a circle; we have no foreign policy.

The CHAIRMAN: I should like the hon. member to state what he is reading.

Mr. CHURCH: I was just showing and reading a cartoon and the writing on it.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member for Broadview to confine his remarks more closely to the matter under discussion.

Mr. CHURCH: A few moments ago I was quoting from the Militia Act and I am now referring to a cartoon which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of October 22, 1935. The cartoon is a drawing of Haile Selassie, standing beside the Suez canal, with the League of Nations peace pledge in his hand, and with his eyes on a British battleship. His words are: "It's all right to be given this peace pledge, but I'd rather have Mr. Bull's battleships behind me than all the peace pledges on earth." I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, in my hurry I did not give the date. I shall send the two cartoons to you, sir.

The official records of the war show that as a result of it there were 10,000,000 dead, 20,000,000 wounded, 3,000,000 prisoners, 24,000,000 widows and orphans and 13,000,000 civilian dead.

The nations, notwithstanding the league covenants, are all quite ready to go behind one another's backs. Even the British empire broke the Locarno treaty and made a secret treaty with Germany. Every large power and country has done the same thing. They are ready to sign covenants with the league, but then they turn around and make secret pacts behind the back of the league. We permit the murdering of little children of Abyssinia. How can the Christian church condone the use of poison gas? There is no need of a league if the nations would agree to a moral code. The league as it exists at present is of no use unless it can enforce the covenants which are signed.

I admit that in non-political matters the league has done a lot of good, but as far as political matters are concerned, it has brought the British empire to the verge of war. The league has made many mistakes. I condemn the secrecy which has been carried on in this house. Has the public had no rights for the past eight months to information as to Canada's foreign policy? We have been refused this information. Why has this house been, so to speak, tongue-tied for the past four months? We should know what the foreign policy of this country is; we should realize how undefended Canada is while the rest of the world is an armed camp. We should get out of the league and give more time to our domestic problems. This secrecy with regard to foreign affairs has found Canada totally unprepared. The disinclination of all parties in this house to criticize the government or to have any discussion about league or foreign policies has had a most unfortunate result. The people have lost confidence in the whole organization. The prestige of the empire has been destroyed all along the line. There should be more publicity in this house given to our foreign affairs. This country is in a perilous condition. The public should be told what is going on.

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. Some of us who are not so fluent in the use of the English language have not been permitted to read speeches, but now the hon. member rises and reads his speech right through. Is he entitled to do that when we cannot?

Mr. CHURCH: I did not. If the hon. member wants to give his opinion, he can do so. I am giving just my own personal opinion. If the hon. member wants to make a speech later on, he can do so. I can tell him that the province from which he comes owes its protection to the British fleet. Notwithstanding all the peace pacts that have been signed, the British fleet is the real protection of the British empire. I do not believe the policy of the British government would have been what it was if the government of Canada had not taken the action it did last December and made a right-about-face with regard to the oil sanctions. There are a great many people in this country who, I know, will agree with that statement. This dominion was placed in a most humiliating position by the government of the day. If Canada does not want to keep step with the mother country, let us get out of the British empire. Under the terms of the statute of Westminster, we are practically out of the empire at the present time. We have been sitting here for four months and yet no hon. member will be able to go home and tell his constituents just what is the foreign policy of Canada. Canada must rely upon the protection of the British fleet.

Item agreed to.

Canada's contribution to the expenses of the League of Nations for 1936, including secretariat, international labour organization and permanent court of International Justice, $194,390.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, I propose to detain the committee but a very short time. First of all, I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the statement he gave this afternoon. I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) upon the address he has just delivered, which I think reflects very great credit upon his ability and studiousness in connection with matters which so deeply affect our country. I do not think any Canadian can look out upon the world at this time without some feeling of fear. That may seem to be a very strong statement, but I make it advisedly. The observations of public men of cabinet rank in Great Britain, as reported in the daily press, must be accepted at their face value. They say that the condition of the world to-day is as serious as it was in August, 1914. On the other hand, if we are to accept the refutation of those statements by those who are politically opposed to those who made them, this is but war-mongering. I cannot say that either view correctly describes the present situation, but no one who has followed the history of the world since August, 1914, can fail to be impressed with the very great difficulties that now confront the statesmen of the world.

We have the Far East situation, which is difficult to explain in a few words. Hundreds of millions of people scattered over one of the most ancient of the occupied communities of which we have any historical knowledge are without any effective central government. Encroachments have been made upon their territory by a highly organized and skilful people who have undertaken more or less the stabilizing of Asia. This in itself is a very remarkable achievement, but that it should be undertaken alone gives cause for consideration. That there is in a part of Asia a new government established under a new sovereign, but in reality under the protecting aegis of Japan, is in itself a significant situation. When one recalls what one reads from day to day of conditions in China, one has a real appreciation as to the situation in the Far East.

In Europe there is a situation which I sometimes think we Canadians cannot visualize unless we have seen something of it. It is almost impossible for a Canadian to think in terms of European conditions. I recall reading after the war a small volume by Sir John Marriott, who had long been a member of the British House of Commons, in which he referred to a great battle as having represented the hopes and aspirations of a people for centuries. Now it is almost incredible to us on this continent that a people could nurse a grievance, a resentment, an animosity over centuries of time and find the fulfilment of their hopes and aspirations in a battle fought in the early part of the twentieth century. Nevertheless, as the author pointed out, that was the case. You have differences that have arisen from old causes; you have differences that arise by reason of racial descent; you have differences that arise from national ambitions; you have a small area inhabited by people of one type and across the boundary you find people of another type; and when you go further you find still another, so that the whole of Europe consists of a large number of states, many of them small. No wonder that men have described the Balkans as the cockpit of war! No wonder that men have not expressed great surprise at the inability of statesmen to steer a course towards peace through all these troubled waters.

In Palestine to-night there is an extremely difficult situation. There is Great Britain with a mandate. There are the Arabs and the Jews, and according to the last reports what is practically war is being carried on, aided and abetted by the gold of a foreign power. All that is disturbing. Some of us remember the Austria before the war; some of us have been in Vienna since the war. Some of us recall the ancient glories of the dual monarchy and now contemplate its shrunken boundaries. The peace treaty makes special provision as to how Austria shall be dealt with, and the situation there has developed some of the latent animosities and certainly stimulated some of the ambitions of one of the nations of the world. Then there is Germany. We are all familiar with the terms of the treaty; this house ratified them. We recall the provisions with respect to disarmament, conditional in their character. We woke up one morning and in the newspapers read that the Rhineland was no longer a neutral area but that it had German troops in the barracks and at the bridge heads. Side by side with that there is the constant fear of France, the fear of a people who look for security because they know that for centuries there has been a territory in which have been fought great battles and which has passed from the control of one country to another, sometimes with a century intervening, sometimes with less, the peoples in that area being uncertain as to what will be the result of the discussions and negotiations that take place between the nations of the world and the representatives of the particular sovereignty under which they previously lived. Under these conditions it is impossible for Canadians living here in peace and amity with their neighbours to understand such a situation.

When I take the year book of the nations of the world and realize the millions of dollars that are being expended in armaments by small communities, sometimes inland countries building war ships because they happen to be able to reach the sea through an indirect method; when I see reflected in these vast expenditures the fears of the peoples, I understand more than ever that we in Canada cannot appreciate the situation. I am sure that none of us understands it; none of us is capable of understanding this sentiment, this terrible fear that oppresses the peoples of the smaller and even the larger communities in Europe. When the war ended we all, of course, hoped for better things, for better conditions; and with the idealism of the president of the United States, and the ideal realism of the great South African statesman, General Smuts, and the vision of a trained English statesman, the present Lord Cecil, all uniting together as they did to formulate a covenant of the League of Nations, with the assistance given them by statesmen from every part of the British empire and of the world, we naturally looked for something better. I can recall reading for the first time the covenant of the League of Nations, and I am sure there is not a member of the committee who did not hope that, as a result, we might realize some of our aspirations and our hopes in that regard. What were we aiming at? We were aiming at peace. That is the hope of the people and the goal of all our efforts—peace internationally, peace because democracies cannot survive unless they have peace and an opportunity to develop their institutions and their country. One of the conditions that appealed to me most strongly when I read the covenant was the provision dealing with disarmament and the abolition of conscription. I had always felt that if you continued to supply the means you would inevitably secure the result. You cannot train millions of men to be soldiers and arm them, providing munitions of war, building fortresses and supplying artillery, without inevitably reaping the result of such efforts, which is war. That is the evidence of the world's history. But we had hoped that things would change.

No sooner, however, than we had joined the League of Nations as one of the charter members, so to speak, with other commonwealths of the empire, than we learned that the greatest American nation that was interested in it, the United States of Americaa, was unable to implement its signature. The people of the United States would not permit that country to become part of the League of Nations. That was a blow to the League of Nations the result of which it is not easy to estimate. For my own part, I cannot but think that when that event took place and the United States withdrew from the League of Nations the league had received a very, very great injury from which it would be difficult indeed to recover. During the years that have passed since, the League of Nations has failed notably on four great occasions. It failed in connection with the difficulties of Japan's encroachment upon the Manchurian areas. It appointed a commisison and the commisison under Lord Lytton reported. The report, as we all know, was adverse to the action taken by Japan, and in the end Japan retired from the League of Nations. The League of Nations, as the Prime Minister pointed out this afternoon, was powerless, or if it was not powerless, at any rate it did nothing. That is the fair way to put it. And then there is the position that developed in the Chaco, down in South America, to which the Prime Minister made reference this afternoon. In South America were two republics engaged in mortal conflict. One might say, "Those are small countries. Surely the League of Nations should be able to do something with respect to that." Yet the truth is that all they did was to talk about commission. I can recall the discussion that took place at one time, I think it was in 1934. Thousands of men were killed, millions of money expended, and much territory devastated; yet the League of Nations did nothing to lessen the conflict or to apply in any sense the principles contained in the covenent.

More recently we had the Ethiopian difficulty. I shall not traverse that field again. In 1923 Ethiopia joined the League of Nations. The Dominion of Canada was a party to Ethiopia coming into the league; it was represented at the assembly. Ethiopia made promises that were satisfactory to the members of the league, and became a member with exactly the same status as a member as Canada or Australia or Great Britain or France or Brazil. Italy was one of the charter members of the league. The purpose of the league was to provide for, shall we say, an effort at negotiation before there should be war, and a solution of differences other than by force. What happened? Italy made war upon Ethiopia, and Ethiopia, a member of the league with Canada, with Italy, with Great Britain and with France, has been crushed by one of its fellow-members by the use of force, by bombs from the air and poison gases, in violation not only of the provisions of the covenant of the League of Nations but of the definite international agreement which we in this house accepted with respect to the methods by which war should be waged.

In the face of that, the first question Canadians ask themselves is: What is our obligation? I agree on this point with what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth)—and it is about the only thing he said with which I do agree—that our obligation is exactly the same as that of any other nation which is a member of the League of Nations. Here is the analogy. When individuals in a civilized country have differences they resort to a court of justice. The plaintiff or the complainant files his claim; the defendant files his defence and the case is adjudicated upon. That did not come about hastily. Those who have read Maine's History of our Institutions will derive, I believe, great pleasure and satisfaction from the writer's description of how slow was the development of the institutions which we have so far evolved for the settlement of disputes. If the world is as old as has been suggested recently by scientists, perhaps the progress of humanity individually has not been quite so rapid as to enable us to complain very seriously about the slow progress of nations.

At any rate it is clear that the evolution of the institutions by which men settled their differences through resort to courts came about slowly. The idea of an international court to which nations would attorn is a very old theory. This question of universal peace engaged the attention of far-seeing statesmen and wise philosophers many centuries ago, but the evolution of the plan under which international differences would be determined by an international court, a body of trained jurists, has been lower still. To settle differences between nations, how difficult the ideal, and how slow must be its realization! Yet we have such a court. I think it is one of the great triumphs of civilization that we have that court.

When we in this country were confronted with the question of how far we would go in the direction of judicial settlement of international troubles, we went the whole distance. Canada as a new country was prepared to have any differences of ours settled by a great international tribunal, or what at least amounts to it, because whether you say it is by a system of arbitration or by judicial process that you settle your differences is not at the moment important. But it was impossible by this international court to settle the differences between Italy and Ethiopia. Why? Because in this covenant that we call the covenant of the League of Nations we have provided that those who are guilty of a breach of it shall suffer certain consequences. If I have a difference with my neighbour and break a contract or bond that has been executed, I am liable for damages, and my property can be taken under an execution for the purpose of satisfying the judgment for damages obtained against me. But when you deal with nations you are dealing with an entirely different situation; how nations attorning to an international court or submitting to international arbitration may be able to settle their differences by judgments against them is an entirely different problem, because they may or may not obey the judgment, and there is no sheriff to levy execution. But we have provided what the punishment shall be; we sometimes call it punishment, though we call it a judgment if we are dealing with a civil matter between individuals. We provide that, as between nations, when one state violates its undertaking, its covenant, its promise, its agreement, there is a punishment. We have used the word "sanction;" first economic sanctions, and provision has been made for sanctions ultimately by force.

Early in the history of this covenant, after the United States had withdrawn, the late Judge Doherty pressed very strongly for a revision of the covenant because he felt it was not fair that under existent conditions it should continue in its present form. The government of my right hon. friend endeavoured to support the same thesis, but with some success only; the extent of that success was mentioned by my hon. friend from Essex East, and I shall not again refer to it. When Italy invaded Ethiopia it incurred the penalty attaching to a violation of a contract. That penalty, which we have been calling sanctions, involved economic pressure being exerted against Italy, and there were certain provisions that recourse might be had to force. We eliminated force at the very start. The right hon. gentleman was quite right when, in a statement made in October last year, he pointed out that the preceding government had tied his hands to some extent, because the statement made by Mr. Ferguson, representing the government of Canada, as read by the hon. member for Essex East, represented the view of the government of the day as to the position which Canada should take. In other words, when the nations of the world, represented by their validly constituted representatives, had concluded that Italy had violated the terms and conditions of the agreement to which it had become a party, and was the offender as against Ethiopia, then the consequences, this assembly of the League of Nations said, should be visited upon Italy, the aggressor, the offender, the covenant breaker. But the language used by Mr. Ferguson was language which said that Canada would join in unanimous action with the other countries, and that was in order that there might be unanimity in the action which was taken, as there was. When we agreed to sanctions later, after a committee had studied the matter, that was an effort on the part of civilized humanity to punish one of the parties to a contract which had broken its word, violated its contract and incurred, as it would have done had it been a private individual, liability for damages.

The character of sanctions is something that has to be settled by each of the communities which have to do with that matter. The Prime Minister this afternoon dwelt upon that feature of it, which is very important. We in this country took the only action which we could take, namely, that of enforcing these sanctions or this punishment against Italy in the manner and form provided for by the agreement made between Italy and the other nations of the world, our Canada being one of them, cutting off imports and exports, declining to supply money in any shape or form, bringing pressure to bear upon trade and lessening the opportunity of the Italian people to trade with us, and necessarily lessening the trade that we did with them. We were all agreed, after this small committee representing the whole had met, that there should be no military sanctions, so that question did not arise. I have always regretted the unfortunate incident that happened in connection with oil and Mr. Riddell. I have explained that before, and I am not going to do more than say that these things sometimes do happen, happen by accident rather than by design. It was not well that it should have happened as it did, and the comments of the press and of public men, of men of the political faith of the government, indicated that they did not approve what had thus happened.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They have changed their minds since.

Mr. BENNETT: Very few of them have.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They refuse to see, then.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly so. But to anticipate action and to say that the representative of this dominion should not have done so and so in a discussion which took place in a small committee was to give a wrong impression, unconsciously, to the peoples of the world; and when the great headlines in newspapers, not published in Canada, indicated the joy of Mussolini and Italy that Canada had taken a position which was in their judgment helpful to them, although in the end it was not, this left a wrong impression. Time, I think, has done much to cure that. It has done much to remove the false impression which was thus left upon the minds of the peoples of the world, but in removing that impression we passed through a phase which, speaking as a Canadian only, I wished we had not passed through. It left on the minds of the people of the world an impression which I should have preferred had not been left there, and which I believe did not represent the genius of the Canadian people or their hopes and aspirations with respect to this difficulty.

At any rate, what happened was that sanctions were imposed. Military sanctions were never suggested. In the end what occurred was this, and it could not be put more clearly than it was by the Prime Minister this afternoon when he stated that although Italy had hoped for success within a limited time, the other nations of the world believed that physical obstacles, plus other conditions, including a vigorous defence on the part of the Ethiopians, would have made success impossible within the period of time that was considered necessary. We must not forget that Napier of Magdala captured an Abyssinian fortress in a limited number of months, released his prisoner, and got the gold which was his aim, and it was thought that having regard to new conditions the expedition of Italy could be much more rapidly carried to a successful conclusion than in those earlier days. Events have shown that while it took a little longer, the Italians conducted a very sharp and vigorous campaign with the modern armaments at their disposal, and Ethiopia was crushed without making that defence which no nation in these days can make against highly developed armaments, especially in the air, and mechanized forces.

That being so, we have to decide two questions. The first one is very simple: Should we continue the sanctions or not? I have been greatly impressed by the attitude taken by General Hertzog. We are the premier dominion of the British empire. In South Africa Premier Hertzog has to deal with problems that we know nothing of. His position is entirely different from ours. At the moment, according to the press, he has expressed the idea that we should maintain sanctions. He believes it would be a very wrong thing for us not to do so, and I have been greatly impressed by reading the press reports, limited as they are, as to what his views on the subject have been. But if we withdraw, as England has said to-day she proposes to do, and as other nations have said they propose to do, from imposing sanctions against Italy, we undoubtedly have put a direct premium upon the violation of international agreements. There is no way by which we can escape that conclusion. We might as well face it frankly. We have said, once more in the language of the ancients, that might is right. One may have strong opinions regarding the Ethiopians; that has nothing to do with the matter. Ethiopia has been a member of the League of Nations since 1923. Italy has been a member since the inception of the league. Sanctions were properly placed in operation, and now Italy having succeeded in attaining her objective, having destroyed Ethiopia and set up and proclaimed supremacy over that country, declaring her king to be Emperor of Abyssinia, we are asked to say by the removal of sanctions that we acquiesce in that action.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the alternative?

Mr. BENNETT: I shall come to that in a moment. It means acquiescence; that is the unfortunate part of it, just as was said to-day in the House of Commons in England, by a member sitting on the opposite side of the chamber, according to the report to which the right hon. gentleman referred this afternoon. Whether we like it or not, are we to say that punishment shall cease because the offender has had the force and strength to win? That is what it means. In that event we lie down, and in the language of Mr. Eden this afternoon, recognize a failure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Britain could not do the whole of it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not for a moment suggesting that the maintenance of sanctions by Canada is going to change in any sense the situation in the world, but in view of the fact that one of our great dominions which has always been friendly to this one, has urged that sanctions be not dropped—I refer to General Hertzog—I cannot but think that we should pause and consider every angle of the situation, whether in the interests of this young democracy, this nation with none of the difficulties that exist in European countries, where we have nothing to confront us that they have there, we should not as a new country say: We will blaze a pathway for ourselves; we will say to the world that one of our associates with us has committed an action that is an act of war against Canada. For that is the language of the covenant. It is an act of war when we say that nation has done this thing. We as a new country are going to say to the older nations of the world in the very language that Canning used in days long since past, that it may well be that as the new members of the commonwealth, South Africa and Canada, can stand side by side, and say: We are not relaxing sanctions. We have no difficulties such as England has to deal with; we have no complicated situation such as France has; we have no international complications such as other nations in the league have. Might we not say—I am putting this only hypothetically—as a new country, a new people, blazing for ourselves a pathway among the nations of the world, that we stand with South Africa?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not unless we are prepared to back up our stand by military sanctions.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit of it, not a suggestion of military sanctions. The assembly said there should be none; that still stands. There has not been a suggestion from anyone that there should be military sanctions. The very first promulgation read by the Prime Minister this afternoon was sanctions other than military.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What would be the good of saying all this unless we were prepared to do this other thing?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: The good would be that which results every time from a nation indicating to the people of the world that it will not approve and acquiesce in high-handed disregard of international obligations by any country with which it is associated. That is the point. Are we serious in the position which we take, realizing that there is no obligation for military sanctions, that having been swept out at the very initiation of the discussion? Why should I, if I were a private individual, relax my execution that I have obtained in an action for damages against a man who has broken his contract with me because someone else thinks it desirable to remove their execution against the individual who has also violated his contract with them? Each one must be the judge of what is best for himself. In our desire to maintain peace —not to punish—we can best do it, in the language of General Hertzog, as reported in the press, by taking the position that we shall not, because other nations have done so, become parties to the relaxation of these sanctions which were established by joint action of the nations of the world. I put the question to this committee, because it is one which has given me much concern: Why should we take some action just because some other nation has? Why should we determine that we shall abandon sanctions because some other nation is about to do so?

An hon. MEMBER: Because Great Britain has.

Mr. BENNETT: If Great Britain abandoned sanctions Great Britain has good reasons. What reasons are there that we should do the same? Our peace is not disturbed; our shores are not invaded.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It would be entirely ineffective.

Mr. BENNETT: Not as far as Canada is concerned. It would lessen our trade; it would prevent Italy from receiving from us certain commodities that she otherwise would receive, but we should stand as an example to the world that a new democracy is blazing for itself a new pathway of rectitude in regard to a position which she had accepted under the League of Nations. That is what it would mean. One may say that that is absurd; that one nation does not count, especially on the north American continent. Ah, well, example is very great. We being a small power in numbers, without military equipment that could possibly be utilized in any prospect of war, whether on sea or on land or in the air, that was eliminated in the very first discussion which took place. Then why should we acquiesce when we have no complications in our national life such as the nations in Europe have?

That problem has given me much concern. I mention it to this committee because the government have taken a certain action. They say: We propose to relax and abandon sanctions. I am not complaining of the government taking that action; I am only pointing out what the alternative is. I have said that the problem gives me some concern personally, after reading General Hertzog's position. I am not saying for a moment that after weighing the pros and cons I might not, if situated similarly to this government, have had the same view. I am saying that to-night and for some days I have been thinking about the matter and my mind has been uncertain what course we should take. I am uncertain yet. Nothing said to-day has convinced me that it is a certainty that one should hold unhesitatingly. No cogent reasons have been given which induce me to believe that the economic sanctions imposed against a covenant breaker by the Dominion of Canada should be permitted to lapse because might is right. I am thinking a little of the fact that although black in colour, thousands of men and women have been ruthlessly destroyed with poison gas, bombs and artillery in violation of a distinct and positive understanding. And I cannot but remember that even in the life of nations there have been punitive expeditions for the purpose of making nations understand that such things should not take place, and of indicating the necessity for the maintenance in international relations of the sanctity of contracts made between nations and having to do with the life and liberty of peoples. I am not unmindful of all that.

The other point, which is the second one, to which the Prime Minister has not directed his attention yet, is the question of the recognition of the Italian proclamation under which Ethiopia becomes part of the empire of Italy. In the case of Manchuria and Japan we have not yet recognized Manchukuo. As far as we are concerned it is true that no sanctions were ever imposed by the league. But we have not recognized that new state. I already see in the press that Mussolini is not content now with the relaxation of sanctions but must have what is its complement, namely the recognition of Italian supremacy, Italian victory and the proclamation which makes Ethiopia part of the Italian empire. Well, the peace of the world, I suppose to some extent, depends upon that. We, this new democracy, are told again that we may be in the position of having to do what we did in the case of Manchukuo, that is, not recognize it, or we may be asked to recognize Italian supremacy. Now the first question we have answered. There may be a difference of opinion with respect to it. On balance the government may have taken the proper course under the circumstances; I have put the other alternative to this committee. On the second point, which will inevitably arise from the relaxation of sanctions, there must be a determination of the question whether or not we are going to recognize Italian supremacy in Ethiopia. To-morrow Ethiopia, according to the dictator of Italy, must become a part of Italy, and be so recognized by the nations of the world.

Those are the two problems that immediately confront us. One has been answered; the other will have to be answered shortly. I have no answer to the second because for the reasons which I have indicated my mind has been very uncertain as to the answer that should have been given to the first. I am not one who believes that in this country we should not be prepared to make for ourselves a pathway in international matters. I have never for a minute thought it impossible, although we are small in numbers and far removed from the great centres of warring conflict—because it practically amounts to that in Europe to-day—for this country to play an important part. But I have been one who believes that it is impossible for us to exercise that part in the way in which the older nations have; obviously we cannot do it. The reasons given this afternoon by the Prime Minister and by the hon. member for Essex East are conclusive of that point.

But there is a path which we may pursue. There is a way in which the influence and power of this dominion can be felt among the nations of the world. That power General Hertzog proposes his union shall exercise. He may for good reason change his mind. It may be that there will be reasons of state so impelling and compelling that he will. The same is true of Canada. But the place for Canada as the interpreter on this continent of the genius, the hope and the aspirations of the peoples of the world for peace, peace, peace, can never be realized unless we follow some course that will be to the peoples of the world an example of what a free people should do when they find that there has been a violation of undertakings by one of the ancient nations of the world.

I cannot get away from the fact that this possibly may involve the loss of a few dollars of trade, but it means more than that. It will always, as long as it continues, be an outstanding example to the peoples of the world of this attitude: Here we have a new land, a new people and a new democracy saying that when we sign a contract it means what it says and that those who violate it cannot openly do so and flaunt their victory in the eyes of the world without incurring at least the condemnation of a free people. That is the position I put to this committee.

There arises out of all this the question of the failure of the League of Nations to deal with the problems to which I have referred, its ineptness in dealing with the questions referred to by the hon. member for Essex East, its ineptness because, as he said, it is possible that if certain action had been taken at a certain date the results might have been different. I believe most men think that. Most thinking men are convinced that Mussolini thought he had a sort of tacit understanding which enabled him to proceed to extend his sphere of influence. It may have been that at the outset he did not contemplate a war of annihilation of the sovereignty of a people, but it evolved into that, with the results we now have.

Nevertheless while the league has failed—and it has—I think the Canadian people must first of all—and I hold this as strongly as I can hold any conviction—realize that the greatest assurance we have for the maintenance of our peace lies in the strengthening of every tie that binds the commonwealth of nations, the members of the British empire. That I believe firmly. I am confident that is so. And because I believe that, because I realize that and hold it strongly I still think that the League of Nations may, and I hope will, exercise a great and powerful influence upon the thought of the world.

The very fact that we find negotiation, conference and discussion among the representatives of fifty nations of the world is in itself the best assurance of understanding. There may and there will be differences, great differences, of opinion. But just as in this house in connection with non-political or non-partisan matters we may be able to arrive at conclusions after discussion, talk and negotiation which will result in the common good, and will mean an advancement towards perfection, so the representatives of the men and women from fifty states, and more, by the very fact that they do meet together, the very fact that they see each other, the very fact that they hear each other, the very fact that they shake hands, the very fact that they exchange points of view that you tell your troubles and he tells you his troubles acquire a fellow-feeling which they could not possibly get by reading history or newspapers. From such a conference much good must come.

If we remove the league entirely we have to ask what the result would be. That seems to be the other question we would have to ask. Conciliation would be gone; conferences would disappear and we would have no meeting together of the representatives of the peoples of the world. You cannot make the League of Nations a super-parliament or give it the power of a super-state, but it may still continue to be a medium through which the representatives of all peoples of the world can meet together. Of course this usefulness has been greatly lessened by reason of the fact that one of the leading members has withdrawn, two have withdrawn, three have withdrawn, four have withdrawn, and there is a threat of the withdrawal of the fifth. All these things lessen its possibilities for good.

Nevertheless I approve the vote for the maintenance of Canada's position at Geneva. I still believe it is worth spending the sum of money we spend. When I read, as every hon. member has read, that in a few hours at Vimy Ridge, where shortly a celebration and memorial services will be held, millions and millions of dollars went up in smoke and carried devastation and death to thousands of men, I ask myself to realize how small in comparison is the expenditure of a few hundreds of thousands of dollars for the League of Nations.

Why is the expenditure made? Its supreme purpose is that of peace, not punishment. Of course we have been told in scripture about those who cry, Peace, peace and there is no peace. Sometimes in these days we are reminded of that. This expenditure of a few hundred thousand dollars, but a fraction of the money our artillery used before Vimy Ridge, is surely warranted if for no other purpose than to indicate that the mind, attitude and purpose of the Canadian people are directed toward world peace.

I am not wholly in accord with the conclusions at which the government has arrived, because of the uncertainty created in my mind by reason of the attitude which has been taken in a most difficult part of the British empire by one of its great statesmen. But I know this, that the preservation of a certain form of strength in foreign policy is the best assurance this country can possibly have for its continued harmonious development. In Great Britain when that was departed from, a difficulty of the first order arose.

I am satisfied that the passing of this vote toward the maintenance of the league, although it may be shorn of great authority, will afford an opportunity for a measure of continued permanence in our foreign policy which would be otherwise lacking. I do not think it is fair to suggest that any Prime Minister in these days could outline a foreign policy for this country; it cannot be done. No other nation can outline in detail a foreign policy, except under very limited conditions. But we all can do this: We can recognize that we are one unit among the many units which constitute the world's nations, and as such we have a part to play not by force but by high example. We have not force; it would not be available from the Canadian people, in any event, unless out of a country vastly different from what this one is to-day.

But we have something more, we have a people young and virile, the inheritors of great traditions, believers in the right, and I am confident that if we so determine, by our example we can accomplish what Pitt said his country had done. He said: England has saved herself by her efforts; she may well save the world by her example. So, small in number, we here on the northern half of the north American continent, far removed from the climatic conditions enjoyed by many countries, a virile, young people, by the force of our example and the determination to show to the world that those who break their obligations and violate their covenants have become ostracised so far as dealing with the civilized peoples of the world are concerned, may be able to show the pathway to ultimate peace and happiness among, not only our own people, but the other peoples of the world.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince) moved that the recommendations contained in the first report of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament, presented to the house on Wednesday, June 17, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 96, to amend the criminal code.

He said: I intend to discuss this bill on the second reading because of the principle involved in its main provision, namely, the repeal of section 98 of the criminal code. The repeal of that section was in the platforms of all the political parties during the recent election campaign, except the one led by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett).

Mr. BENNETT: Except the one that got the fewest votes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This in itself is an indication of what the public feeling was with regard to this statute. If the vote is analyzed it is obvious that the repeal of that section has been recommended by a tremendous majority of the electorate of Canada, all those who elected members of parliament that do not sit as supporters of my right hon. friend. It was an issue everywhere. In my own province the candidates supporting the then government made it the main topic of their campaign. As a matter of fact, my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) and myself were represented as friends of the disorderly elements in Canada, and cartoons were profusely distributed, some of which I even showed to the house in the debate on the address. The repeal of section 98, I may add, was one of the planks of the Liberal party's platform, one of the fourteen points, and this is another instance of the redeeming of a pledge, which has given birth to the present bill.

May I first give to the house a brief history of this enactment. During the war, in Canada as well as in other countries engaged in the struggle, there were, under war measures acts here and elsewhere, special rules, special regulations and special orders which were in themselves infringements of the liberty of the citizen. I do not complain about that, because in times of war such measures have to be resorted to. But it must be done in such a way as to safeguard the liberties and the rights of private citizens. At all events, after the war was over, these enactments disappeared from the administration of other countries, but they were replaced in Canada in 1919 in section 98 of the criminal code. Hon. members will recall an agitation in Britain about that famous war time act called Dora—Defence of the Realm Act—which was finally repealed. The same thing happened everywhere. I call attention to some of the provisions of order in council P.C. 2384 of the Dominion of Canada, enacted under the War Measures Act.

Mr. CAHAN: Of what date, please?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This one is dated September 25, 1918. In this order in council the provisions of section 98 are recited almost word for word, but always with this qualification at the end of every section of the order, "while Canada is engaged in war." You find that in section (b) of the order in council, which speaks of associations or organizations the purpose of which is to bring about any governmental, political, industrial or economic change—almost identical with the phraseology of section 98, but with these additional words: "while Canada is engaged in war." You find the same thing in section 3—"any person who, while Canada is engaged in war, shall act or profess to act as an officer of any such unlawful association." Section 4 says that anyone who has "at any time since the beginning of the present war been a member," and so forth; and if it be proved that since the beginning of the war he "attended meetings of an unlawful association" and so forth. Then section 6 refers to anyone who knowingly permits a meeting in his building, and so forth. These are virtually the same provisions as are included in section 98, with the addition of clauses for the purpose of reaching those in Canada who would impede the success of the war or refuse to obey the military laws of Canada during the war, and things of that kind, which seem to have been put in the order for the purpose of getting at those who refused to submit to military service or to conscription. These of course have disappeared. The order in council was for two purposes, for military service and for the purpose mentioned in the present section 98.

In 1919, after the war, following the troubles that occurred in Winnipeg, the government of the day appointed a parliamentary committee to consider amendments to the criminal code, and that parliamentary committee brought in the report upon which section 98 was based. It has even been stated that this was unanimous. The former minister of justice, in the debate in this house in 1933, said that the report had been adopted by a majority of one. He even stated then that I was one of that majority, which was absolutely wrong, because I was not even a member of the committee. The late Hon. Charles Murphy was a member of that committee, and when the question was discussed in the House of Commons he spoke as follows—his words are in Hansard of 1919, page 3291:

> There was in the committee a very sharp division of opinion as to the necessity of amending the criminal code, and there was a further division of opinion whether, in the event of the committee being of opinion that the criminal code with reference to sedition and seditious propaganda should be amended —in view of the numerous strikes and the general unrest throughout the country—this was the proper time to make such a report to the house and to induce a discussion of matters that would inevitably be discussed by reason of that report and of any action that might follow the introduction of that report. It was on the latter ground principally—coupled with the fact that an opinion prevailed that the present criminal code was ample to cover the class of cases to which the attention of the committee was directed —that a portion of the committee, including myself, shared the view that this was not the proper time to introduce such a report as that, the adoption of which has now been moved by the Solicitor General.

However, section 98 was then enacted. Since then continuous attempts have been made for the repeal of that section. It is suggested occasionally, and it was suggested in the debate of 1933, that these applications come from disorderly elements. May I say that they come from all classes of the community, and more particularly from organized labour in Canada. The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada at every annual meeting has passed a resolution asking for the repeal of this section. While I was minister of the former government, whenever a delegation of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada met the government of the day, the request was urgently pressed that section 98 should be repealed. All the railway brotherhoods, such as the engineers and conductors, have been asking the same thing. No one was more persevering in that demand and more eloquent in presenting it than Mr. Tom Moore, who was then president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. Mr. Moore has, I believe, the confidence of everybody in Canada, including my right hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen opposite, who never missed an opportunity to appoint him to a responsible position where labour or social workers should be represented. I have myself presented to the house on four or five occasions a bill for the repeal of this section.

On two occasions the bills passed this house unanimously, and on the other occasions the debates were mild as regards the way they were conducted; but the bills were rejected by the other house.

What are the reasons for the repeal of section 98? First, we believe it is dangerous to perpetuate in peace time enactments which are war time measures and designed to meet special emergencies due to some extent to the natural panic which exists in time of war. The danger is mainly because of the precedent which it creates. If it can be done, if we can put aside the ordinary rules of law on a matter of this kind, why not put them aside on other matters as well? And this creates a precedent that might be harmful under other circumstances. There are things in that section which are not susceptible of defence. To say that the police may authorize any private citizen, on mere suspicion, to search my home or the home of anyone in Canada because they suspect they may find literature which is objectionable, is contrary to all principles of law the world over. It is mere suspicion. I think everyone will agree that the separation of powers is a necessary guarantee in the administration of justice. It is not right that the police, who are entrusted with the duty of carrying into execution the orders of the court, should become the court itself. The police are clothed with some judicial powers when they are permitted to authorize any private citizen to search premises for the purpose of finding literature. This cannot be defended.

This has given rise to many incidents which certainly cannot be considered as fair. In western Canada during the war under the provisions of a similar order in council people of foreign language saw their bibles confiscated because they were printed in a language which the police could not understand.

Mr. HEAPS: And bibles in the English language were confiscated also.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I did not know that, but it makes the matter so much worse. A man was arrested because he had in his possession a copy of Plato's Republic. In the United States, under a similar provision, a man was arrested because he had in his possession some literature that happened to have been written by Thomas Jefferson, who was one of the authors of the declaration of independence and later president of the United States. When the man told that to the officer who arrested him the officer replied, "Well, we will take care of you now and we will get that man Jefferson afterwards."

This shows the objection there is to a change of this kind in our legal system with regard to crimes. During the debate in 1933 I charged that this invasion of private homes had taken place during the course of that debate, and the then Minister of Justice agreed, but said it had happened only once. Well, once is too often; it should not have happened at all. If the provision was taken advantage of only once surely that is an additional reason for striking it out of the statute.

May I refer also to the presumption of guilt which appears here. A man is seen at a meeting of one of these so-called illegal associations, and he is presumed guilty. If he does not prove that he is not guilty he is liable to be sentenced to gaol for twenty years, and apart from that there are other objectionable features. It is prohibited, under possible penalty of twenty years, to import any book in which there may be something which defends revolution. Some people were afraid that the reading of a book in which the war of independence between England and the United States was justified would render them liable to imprisonment for twenty years under this section. I took the trouble to look up the legislation of a great many countries, and I did not find in any country provision for imprisonment for such a long period. Even under the war order in council the maximum penalty was five years, but because of that panic in 1919 a man who merely had a book in his possession might be sent to gaol for twenty years.

There is no sense of proportion in an enactment of this kind. I showed that provision to an eminent professor of law of the university of Paris only two months ago. He said to me, "This is a blot on the statutes of any land," and it is. We have said that we must protect ourselves against disorderly elements. I repeat what I have said many times before: We have in the criminal code, which is based on the common law of England, all the provisions which make English law and British justice sufficient to meet all emergencies. The common law relating to sedition is already in our criminal code and always has been. Section 133 says:

133. Seditious words are words expressive of a seditious intention.

2. A seditious libel is a libel expressive of a seditious intention.

3. A seditious conspiracy is an agreement between two or more persons to carry into execution a seditious intention.

Then section 134 states:

Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term of not more than twenty years—

That is the same as in England.

—who speaks any seditious words or publishes any seditious libel or is a party to any seditious conspiracy.

This crime of sedition has been discussed in Great Britain on many, many occasions. The commissioners who wrote the English draft code inserted a definition of some kind as to what constitutes sedition and what constitutes seditious words or seditious intentions. But after prolonged debate in the British parliament it was decided that it would be better to keep the word "sedition" not defined expressly but rather left there to meet all occasions and to apply to all cases where order is disturbed or where there may be danger in the land. When our own criminal code was enacted the same debate took place. There were some who wanted to define the offence of sedition more specifically but the parliament of Canada of that time, in its judgment, thought it better to follow the English practice and to remain with the common law operation in that regard.

May I read what constitutes sedition in the English and Empire Digest, 15th volume, at page 633:

An intention to excite ill-will between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects may be seditious intention; whether or not it is so in any particular case must be decided upon by the jury after taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case. Sedition embraces everything, whether by word, deed, or writing, which is calculated to disturb the tranquillity of the state, and lead ignorant persons to subvert the government and laws of the empire.

Where in a prosecution for uttering seditious words with intent to incite to riot, it is proved that previously to the happening of a riot, seditious words were spoken, it is a question for the jury whether or not such rioting was directly or indirectly attributable to the seditious words proved to have been spoken.

A meeting lawfully convened may become an unlawful meeting if during its course seditious words are spoken of such a nature as to produce a breach of the peace, and those who do anything to assist the speakers in producing upon the audience the natural effect of their words will be guilty of uttering seditious words as well as those who spoke the words.

Then at page 634:

Held: guilty of sedition and unlawful assembly; a speech urging the people to form themselves into unlawful associations, and inciting the insurrection, unlawful assemblies, breaches of the peace, and the forcible obstruction of the execution of the law is seditious, the circumstances of the time being such that the public peace is likely to be thereby endangered. A meeting convened to hear such a speech is an unlawful assembly so far as those are concerned who are parties to calling it or attending it for that purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: What court was that?

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is the King v. Jones (1848), 6 State Transactions, N.S., 783. But it is the same thing throughout the history of criminal law in England. There is a multiplicity of decisions to the same effect. In Halsbury's Laws of England, second edition, volume 9, sedition is defined at page 302:

Sedition is a misdemeanour at common law consisting of acts done, words spoken and published, or writings capable of being a libel published, in each case with a seditious intention.

Where the words are oral the offence is called the speaking of seditious words; where the words are written, the offence is called the publication of seditious libel; where two or more combine for the furtherance of a seditious intention the offence is called seditious conspiracy.

At page 303:

Every person is guilty of the common law misdemeanour of speaking seditious words—

And this applies to us.

—who speaks and published words with a seditious intention.

Every person is guilty of the common law misdeameanour of seditious libel who publishes matter contained in anything capable of being a libel, with a seditious intention.

There the punishment is fixed at not exceeding two years. What I find in those decisions is rather that in Great Britain it has to be something constituting an overt act, not merely an opinion which people might hold. It is not until it is transformed into an overt act which might be dangerous to the peace of the state that it becomes an offence. The principle in that regard cannot be better expressed than in the words of Thomas Erskine in his celebrated speech on the trial of Thomas Paine. He said:

His opinions were adverse to our system—but I maintain that opinion is free, and that conduct alone is amenable to the law.

May I also quote what Macaulay said in his Essays on Hallam:

To punish a man because he has committed a crime, or because he is believed, though unjustly, to have committed a crime, is not persecution. To punish a man because we infer from the nature of some doctrine which he holds, or from the conduct of other persons who hold the same doctrines with him, that he will commit a crime, is persecution, and is, in every case, foolish and wicked.

I wish I had with me the words of a court in India where seventy people were convicted for seditious conspiracy. The chief justice took the pains to say:

These men are not punished for their opinions; the are punished for the deeds and the actions which they committed.

Coming back to Great Britain, the only exception, if it is an exception, was in 1934 when a special act was passed called the Incitement to Disaffection Act. This applied only to propaganda to seduce members of His Majesty's forces from their duty or allegiance to His Majesty. It was specially provided therein that the possession of any document could not be held as a presumption of guilt. The crown or the prosecution had to establish the guilt of the accused persons. And yet this apparently inoffensive legislation was challenged in the House of Commons and even in the House of Lords during the session of 1934, and anyone who wishes to consult the debates of the British parliament will find that no question was so extensively discussed as this one. There was strong opposition to anything which was a change from ordinary laws, for instance with regard to search warrants, although there was nothing there which could be compared to section 98. Nobody could be authorized merely by the police to go and search the home, but it was then stated that it was the thin end of the wedge and against all principles of British justice that this should be done. I mention that just to show how strong the feeling is in Great Britain with regard to the liberties of the subject.

May I say here and now why I propose to add a few words to section 133. I do not think they are necessary, but it is merely to make it clearer that nobody can by words or writing preach the use of force to bring about governmental changes. I do it because in some of the judgments the courts seem to have required that it must be proved that the words or the teachings were strong enough to lead to disturbance of order and trouble. This is merely to make it absolutely clear that nobody should be allowed to teach the use of force to bring about change of government in Canada.

I have said that war regulations should not be converted into peace statutes. The order in council which I have quoted shows that the liberties of the citizens were infringed. In time of war this has to be done, but to do it in time of peace is a precedent which should not be created. Liberty is like the air; we appreciate its value more when we are deprived of it. To govern is to foresee. After all it is possible that there may come a government with views and ideals different from those entertained by hon. members opposite and by myself, and they could use the precedent so created to prevent the freedom of the people in other directions. I remember reading two years ago about a prominent socialist in the British parliament who sat on the extreme left of the movement —as a matter of fact he was expelled afterwards from the labour unions—who said he was in favour of the then very restrictive orders in council prompted by the government because they would be precedents to be used by a socialist government in England for the purpose of doing away with the supremacy of parliament. Precedents are dangerous, and if this thing could be done in the present instance, surely other governments could use the same methods in other instances. The citizens of Canada and those of Great Britain have the right to be free in their own homes. It has been stated often that an Englishman's home is his castle; even the king cannot enter there without due process of law. This condition must be preserved in Canada as well as in England.

I come now to another phase of the matter. Those who hold the views I hold on this question have been and are being charged with friendship towards the communistic element. I am not a friend of the communists, and those who say that know I am not. I abhor, I hate the teachings and ideals of communism. But I want to fight them in a successful way, and I believe the way to fight them successfully is by argument, by attempting to have social justice everywhere and sound policies of administration. In 1934 I had the honour of being invited to take part in an anti-communistic campaign in Montreal. Obviously those who were in charge of the social work had a little more confidence in me than some of my opponents seem to have. On that occasion I used this language, which I shall translate:

> To ensure our political stability as well as our economic stability, to victoriously repel the attacks of the trouble makers we must rely not so much on the criminal code, the officers of justice and the gaols as upon the personal dignity, the individual effort and the social cooperation which are the substance and soul of a free nation. The adepts of the strong manner to the contrary notwithstanding ideas, whether they are good or bad, cannot be killed with guns or machine guns. There must be an enlightened acceptation of the changes to make and the reforms to accomplish to take away the weapons which certain abuses and certain mistakes have placed in the hands of the enemies of order.

The Reverend Father Levesque, one of the most energetic social workers in Canada, spoke at the same meeting as follows:

> Indeed it is good, even necessary, to attack communism in the front line by unmasking its errors, stigmatizing its vices and unveiling its nefarious consequences. But far more sure is the old strategy which endeavours to block the progress of an evil, to suppress the causes which determine the birth of that evil and finally its development. Communism was born of the misery of the people, and if our people sink in misery we cannot prevent them from turning towards the apostles of Moscow, as though they were saviours. Thence the necessity of just and fair social reforms.

Sir, peace, prosperity, decent living conditions and religious and moral ideals will fight communism or wrong ideals with a greater degree of success than will concentration camps, arbitrary imprisonment and oppressive laws. A few days ago I was reading these words of an American university president:

No radical has ever been made in the United States by radical propaganda. The people who make radicals here are those who refuse to recognize the reality of change.

May I add that perhaps we are at fault in that regard, too, and that conditions which permit a small group of men to get together with a little sum of money, which with the help of privileges and of protective laws and insufficient social legislation became $15,000,000 after a few years, are productive of communism. Communism cannot implant itself in a country like Canada unless we refuse to give to our institutions a spirit of social economy and political justice. The Canadian labourer is not a communist. If he is given the choice he will always choose free labour, with a prospect of gain and his freedom, rather than being part of a huge mass where neither he nor his labour is free.

May I ask any fair-minded man in Canada whether section 98 has prevented any person from being a communist? I have been told there are some who claim they are communists because of section 98. But there is one patent fact: A man named Tim Buck was sent to gaol because of a breach of section 98. The government which enacted the legislation was responsible for his release after he had served only half his term. The first thing he did upon release was to hold meetings in Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa challenging any person to arrest him again and saying that he would continue the fight. What good did that do? As a matter of fact he ran for parliament. Did section 98 prevent communist candidates from appearing against other candidates in the last election? If the section is useless, why keep it? Laws that are not favoured by public opinion do not achieve any good, and as an instance of that I would refer to the late prohibition laws in some of the provinces. I never found as much antagonism on the part of Canadians to that legislation as I did when two years ago I took part in a debate at the University of Toronto conducted along parliamentary lines. The debaters were divided, as Conservatives and Liberals, and of course there were men who belonged to the communist, fabian and fascist groups. At the opening of the debate they were considered to be on my side. I was conducting the debate for Liberalism, with two young university students, and there were three university boys on the other side attacking Liberalism. One of my partners unfortunately said something that did not please my partners behind me who were not straight Liberals, and they rose and crossed the floor to the other side. I had to exert myself to get them back in order that we should have a majority vote, and we did have a majority in the end, but what struck me was the discussion on section 98, and the interest that all the university men there took in that provision. Nobody excused it. The Conservative debaters tried to fasten it on the Liberals and claimed that we were responsible for it, and I think it was so everywhere. How can you keep on the statutes a provision which is friendly to nobody and which everybody repudiates?

May I also call attention to this fact. Why should there be talk only of communists when it comes to this question? The fascists, the nazis in Germany, are just as violent when it comes to change of government as the communists. There is no question of that. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not in favour of the German or the Italian concentration camps any more than I am in favour of the Russian ones. They are all bad when it comes to preventing people from expressing their views. In those countries criticism of the head of the government is treason. Well, I would not like to have those conditions in Canada, and I think that we have in the criminal code, under the sedition sections, quite enough to meet the fascists and the nazis as well as the communists; for I include them all in my reprobation.

May I call attention, Mr. Speaker, to some who who do not like section 98? May I tell them they are also included in the hate of some people who are the protagonists of the strong methods. At the present time in the city of Detroit there is a new order called the Black Legion, which wants to have its ideas prevail by force everywhere, even to the extent of killing people, if necessary, and they want to do it not only to the communists but to the Catholics and the Jews as well. No, Mr. Speaker, liberty is the theory and the doctrine on which our nation has been based and predicated, and we must not do anything that will remove any guarantees we have that our citizens will not be subjected to any prosecution without the ordinary and due British process of law.

Benjamin Franklin said once, and I agree with this idea, that those who are ready to sacrifice liberty for the purpose of achieving some temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety. British justice, which holds every man innocent until he is proved guilty, is the surest safeguard against excesses, whether coming from communists or fascists, or an arbitrary dictatorship, whether from the left or from the right. We submit this legislation, Mr. Speaker, not because we sympathize with the revolutionaries but because we love and desire to protect the law abiding and the truth seeking citizens of this country.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as many members of this house know, this is a matter in which I have been for many years very keenly interested, and I must congratulate the government on having introduced a measure providing for the repeal of section 98 of the criminal code. I think perhaps I most admire the Liberals when they are pleading for political liberty; on those occasions they show themselves to the very best advantage.

Section 98 has been used particularly against the communists in Canada. Perhaps it is not necessary for me to say that I am not a member of the communist party, and that I do not agree with many of its principles and methods, but I do not believe in putting my political opponents in gaol. I do not believe in depriving any section of the community of their rights as Canadian citizens.

The outstanding case, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has said, in which this legislation was used, was that of the communists who were tried in Ontario. An appeal was taken, which was argued on February 13 and 14, 1932. The unanimous judgment of the court, upholding the conviction charges under section 98 of the criminal code, was delivered on February 19. The first part of the judgment deals with the legal argument advanced on the appeal as to the sufficiency of the indictment, and it then proceeds to deal with the evidence as follows—I quote one paragraph:

> The evidence proves that the communist party of Canada is a member of the Communist International of Russia and that instead of determining its own policies, purposes, teachings and aims, it adopted and adopts those of the Communist International, and, therefore, whatever are the policies, purposes, teachings and aims of the Communist International are also automatically those of the communist party of Canada.

I think it should be clearly recognized, as it has not been clearly recognized by the majority, that the communists in Toronto were not accused and were not convicted of any overt act of violence, nor were they accused or convicted of advocating violence. They were accused and convicted simply of belonging to a certain political organization, which was affiliated with an organization in Russia which did under certain circumstances advocate violence. That does not seem to be in harmony with the rights of the subject here in Canada. If mere affiliation is to be the basis, I wondered the other day when I read an advertisement in the Montreal Gazette of June 13, 1936, whether some other organizations might not be brought into this category. Here is an advertisement reading, Trips to the Soviet Union. Canadian Pacific, general representatives of Intourist, Inc. in Canada. I am not a lawyer but I am inclined to think that if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had a less prominent position in Canada it might under this legislation be very well charged with being in affiliation with the Intourist agency of Russia which in turn is a recognized agency of the soviet government. That is the kind of argument that was used in Ontario with regard to the communists.

But the effect of this kind of legislation does not stop here. I hold in my hand a pamphlet entitled Communism in Canada, by Superintendent F. J. Mead, reprinted by the anti-Communist League of Canada, Flinflon, Manitoba, with the permission of Major General Sir J. H. MacBrien, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I should like to know under what authority Major General Sir J. H. MacBrien permits—let me repeat that, permits—the publication of certain documents. And this document was used as campaign literature in the recent election in Manitoba. I was in Flinflon, and I may say that the whole community there is controlled by an American company, the manager of which is not a Canadian citizen; although he has been resident in Canada for some years he has never yet taken out Canadian citizenship, and yet on occasion he has presumed to say whether or not candidates for election to the dominion parliament shall or shall not hold meetings in that community. And we have this kind of literature published because presumably communism is an illegal organization in Canada—I take it the Ontario court judgment makes it illegal.

Think of the situation that results. As the Minister of Justice points out, it is nothing less than farcical. Communists belonging to an illegal organization have been running as candidates for parliament, as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) and my hon. friend from Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) know very well.

An hon. MEMBER: And lots of others.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, and lots of others all over the country. It is ridiculous that men should be declared criminals, that the communist party should be declared an illegal organization, and yet the government should permit them to run as candidates for parliament, openly to conduct a paper which can be found in the files of this library, and to hold meetings throughout the country. I say it is a farcical situation. I submit that if the communist party is illegal, then its papers, speeches and all that kind of thing should be considered illegal. But I venture to say that the government dare not press that point to its logical conclusion.

Let me give another instance of what this involves in practice. This came under my notice a few months ago. There was a small book shop in Montreal conducted by a Mr. Feigelman.

Mr. VIEN: The address?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have his personal address but that is immaterial; it is Montreal. He and his sister conducted this little book stall. He himself was an art student. On January 15, 1934, the police raided his shop under orders from Chief Louis Jargaille. His sister was in the shop. He states that quantities of books, magazines and newspapers were seized by the constables. When asked the reason, Constable Forget replied: "We are seizing all seditious literature under section 98 of the criminal code." The process of confiscation proceeded and copies of E. P. Oppenheim's books were seized. When asked why the latter were being taken one of the constables replied, "I don't read." This man and his sister appeared in court on January 16. Several other news dealers were arrested. They pleaded guilty under section 98 and were released on suspended sentence. This particular man Feigelman seemed to be more honest than the rest and he pleaded not guilty. He was expelled from the art school which he had been attending, and for a period between January 20 and October 17 he and his sister went through the monotonous procedure of frequently appearing in court, being compelled to close their shop for half days. At each appearance they pleaded not guilty and in each instance were remanded. The trial finally took place in the fall session of the king's bench, Mr. Justice Loranger being the judge.

An hon. MEMBER: A queer way of pronouncing these names.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, the pronunciation is bad; I quite recognize that. The result was that Feigelman was sentenced to one month in gaol, his sister being given suspended sentence. I should like to read a few sentences from the charge of Mr. Justice Loranger to the jury:

> We are here in Canada, inhabiting a Christian country, and we have been brought up in that way, and we have no need of those doctrines which are godless, such as communism and all such doctrines, which are spread before our youth, before our young men and girls.

Again:

> I read in one of the papers which have been filed here, La Vie Ouvrier, just one sentence which I will translate:
>
> "We must follow the teaching of Lenin, and particularly his teaching of state which he has shown us to be a good one ... follow his lesson as regards the materialistic war which we must transform into a civil war."
>
> Is that sedition or not? Trying to induce one class of people to war against another, and trying to put capital against the working classes?
>
> It has been decided by the court of appeal in Ontario, and you will have seen it in the papers, that these men of the Communist party have tried again and again to have this article removed from our criminal code by the parliament of Canada, but up to the present parliament has refused to strike out article 98 of the code, which is the protection of our people against such doctrines.

I am quite sure the Minister of Justice will appreciate that. Again:

> And this young girl, who seems to be intelligent, knew well these particular pamphlets concerning communism, and where they were, because the constable asked when he went in there for communistic papers, and she took him to the rear of the store and showed him a table and said "Here they are." She knew where they were, and if you or I had been there and had asked for communist literature, she knew where it was, and they were openly offering these to the people, and that is against the law.

What law, may I ask? I know of no such law. I ask the Minister of Justice if there is a law under which communist literature is prohibited. And yet this is how the judge charged the jury. Later he continued:

> It is for you to appreciate whether these books, papers, cards, etc. are of such a character as are forbidden by law.

And one other:

> On the other hand if you are convinced that the papers are of such a character as I have already said, and that they should not be published and circulated, it is your duty to say so. The court has nothing to do with that.

If those jurymen were at all like the ordinary jurymen I know, they would take that to mean, "Here you have some communist literature; all communist literature is bad; the communists are an ungodly party; we are a Christian country; if you think it is a bad thing to have this literature around, condemn these people." In my own words as a layman, that is practically what the charge to the jury meant, and the defendants were convicted. May I supplement the statement of the Minister of Justice by quoting the well known words of Lord Camden?

Where is the written law that gives any magistrate such a power?

He is referring to that of search.

I can safely answer, there is none, and therefore it is too much for us without authority to pronounce a practice legal which would be subversive of all the comforts of society.... If suspicion at large should be a ground of search, especially in the case of libels—

That is, seditious publications.

—whose home would be safe?

The minister has taken the responsibility of urging the repeal of this section, but unfortunately, in my judgment, what he gives with one hand he partly takes away with the other. When he previously introduced a bill of this kind he said:

We have already in the code sufficient protection in the matter of sedition.

And he referred to sections 87, unlawful assemblies; section 130, regarding sedition, oaths or engagements in societies; 132, against seditious words, libel and conspiracy; 135, against libel on foreign sovereigns; 136, against publishing false news. If we then had sufficient protection, as he said, in the criminal code, I ask him why it is necessary to strengthen the criminal code at this time. It seems to me that the proposed section 4 goes altogether too far. Let me read it:

Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the expression "seditious intention" everyone shall be presumed to have a seditious intention who publishes or circulates any writing, printing or document in which it is advocated, or who teaches or advocates the use, without the authority of law, of force, as a means of accomplishing any governmental change.

That is very sweeping indeed; it would rule out a very large proportion of the literature which we find on our library shelves to-day. If the minister really wished to carry out what he stated was his intention, he would at least add the words: "in Canada." He used those words when he presented the case; I do not know why he did not incorporate them into the section itself. A man might advocate change by force in Russia or in Italy and yet not advocate change by force in Canada. The provision as it stands is very wide indeed and lends itself to serious abuse. Let me read this passage:

No nation—

Mr. VIEN: Where from?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the hon. member first let me read it?

No nation ever became truly great save by successful sedition and revolution. The lamp and the torch and the tumult have overcome tyranny. The signature of King John was placed to the Magna Charta, wrenched from him by the nobles; revolution led King Charles to the block; the corn law riots—these were crimes against the law and seditions, but no one hangs his head in shame because of them. "Liberty, equality, fraternity," were no mere catchwords as in the French revolution, but the expression of the earnest striving for the substance that lies behind the words.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that under the proposed section such an article would be clearly seditious. Let me say that the statement was uttered by Mr. R. B. Graham, K.C., in proposing the toast to "England." Mr. Graham is a highly placed magistrate in my own city. Mr. Jackson Dodds, O.B.E., of the bankers' association, was in the chair. The occasion was the annual St. George's night dinner of the society over which the president, Mr. Jackson Dodds, presided, and music was furnished during and after the dinner by the regimental band of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry.

Mr. STEWART: What is the date of that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I cannot, unfortunately, give my hon. friend the date of the clipping, but it was—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —it was read into Hansard.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I understand it is against the rules of the house to quote from newspapers at any time. I believe—in fact I am sure—that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is reading clippings from a newspaper.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am reading from an item which originally appeared in the Manitoba Free Press. It is not an editorial; it is a news item.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The other night I was reading just two or three lines of an editorial in the Manitoba Free Press, but I was called to order.

Mr. DOUGLAS: A different thing altogether.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order: the objection, as is clearly recognized in the house, was taken to reading editorial matter that might influence the decision of the house. I am reading a news item that appeared some years ago in a Winnipeg paper and was reproduced in Hansard on May 26, 1931.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Speaker, I should like to have a ruling. The hon. gentleman's reading from a newspaper might have an influence on the fate of this bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suggest that the hon. member should have objected to the readings of the Prime Minister the other day, which occupied, I believe, fully half an hour. He read from newspapers. This is not against the recognized procedure of the house.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I was called to order because I was reading clippings from a newspaper, and the chairman ruled that I was out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member was reading editorials.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The hon. member is doing exactly the same as I did, and I think he should be ruled out of order.

Mr. VIEN: On the point of order, when the hon. member began to read a clipping that he desired to give to the house, I asked him what he was reading from. He objected to my interpolation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, no.

Mr. VIEN: Yes. He said, "wait"; he refused to give it. I should like to have your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on this point, that when an hon. member gets up in the house to quote from a document he should first tell us what he is reading from, so as to enable hon. gentlemen to rise in time to a point of order. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) is now being told by the hon. gentleman who had the floor that the objection was not raised in time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. VIEN: Well, Mr. Speaker, on the point of order I suggest that no member of this house should be allowed to quote anything without first stating what he is reading from.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order we might as well try to settle this rule once and for all. Paragraph 306 of Beauchesne says:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This does not do that.

[Mr. Wermenlinger.]

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Any time a member refers to or reads articles from newspapers, letters or communications emanating from outside the house which refer to, comment on or deny anything said by a member, or express any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house, he is out of order. What are proceedings within the house? If one looks through Beauchesne the only reference to proceedings within the house appears in paragraph 13, which reads:

> The proceedings of the houses (Senate and Commons) are governed by statutes, by rules and orders adopted by themselves, and by those usages which have grown up in the course of time and consequently become a part of their own practice or are derived from the common law of parliament by which they have consented to be guided in all matters of doubt.
> All "rules" are not "standing orders"; they may be sessional orders or merely precedents; but all "standing orders" are "rules."

That is to say, in my interpretation if an hon. member reads a newspaper article that does not refer to or comment on or deny anything said by a member, or that does not express any opinion reflecting on any proceeding within the house, he is in order, and I submit that we should have a clear understanding of that rule since it has created such an amount of discussion in this house.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as an old newspaper man I should like to say a word on this point of order which has been raised so often in the last few years. I remember very well, not only from my experience as a member of this house but also from my experience in the press gallery, that in the olden days this rule, which has been in the book for many years, was interpreted in a very broad way and no objection was taken to the reading of newspapers except when they did, precisely and strictly, come within the usages to which the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Chevrier) has just referred. During the last parliament, however—and I am not blaming the previous government for that—the Speaker and Deputy Speaker of that time suddenly became very strict in their interpretation of this rule, and the reading from newspapers was practically forbidden in all circumstances. I resent that, Mr. Speaker, because I still have a great fondness for the profession to which I belonged, and I believe that reading from newspapers should be forbidden only in exceptional cases. There are many good opinions expressed in the newspapers, sometimes even in the editorials, and I believe there are many newspaper men who are just as wise as, if not wiser than, we in the house.

At the same time I believe the same rule should be applied to all, and as this session is just about over I suggest that you should rule again as both your honour and the Deputy Speaker have ruled previously during the course of this session. There is no doubt that the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) is asking for fair play; he merely wants the rules to be obeyed, and desires that the hon. member who had the floor should be treated as the hon. member himself for Provencher was treated previously.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. RINFRET: I do not insist on that point; it is not mine. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that during the recess—and I would also ask my genial friend the clerk of the house to listen to me now—some study should be made of that point, because I maintain that during the last three or four years an interpretation has been given this rule having to do with the reading of newspapers in the house which is absolutely contrary to the custom that previously obtained for a great number of years.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has already read what he wanted to read I think this discussion is purely academic. I suggest that this matter of the right to read newspapers should be submitted to the same committee to which the proposal of my hon. friend for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) will be submitted next session, and that we proceed with the business of the house, since time is passing.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do any other hon. members wish to speak to the point of order? I do not think the point is well taken; I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) may continue to read the article. I do not think he is contravening the rule.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to point out that there are a great many writers and speakers who advocate or at least defend the use of force under certain circumstances, and they would readily come under this section. Several years ago someone prepared quite a long list of books of this kind. I do not intend to read the whole list, but I should like to mention a few. The Spanish Jesuit, Mariana, devotes an entire chapter of his De Rege et Regis Institutione to a defence of tyrannicide. A whole host of Huguenot writers preach rebellion as a religious duty in such works as Duplessis-Mornay's Defence of Liberty Against Tyrants, Beza's Rights of Magistrates Over Their Subjects, and the anonymous Whether it is Lawful for the People and the Nobility to Take up Arms. So does the Roman Catholic Rossaeus—probably the Bishop of Senlis—in The True Power of a Christian State. Buchannan, a Scots Presbyterian, follows suit in his De Jure Regni Apud Scotos. Milton contributes to the list no less than four works justifying the rebellion against Charles I—the two Defences of the People of England, Eikonoklastes, and The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates,—and Locke's Treatise of Civil Government is a defence of the "glorious revolution" of 1688. Any competent political scientist could no doubt produce at a moment's notice a similar index twice as long.

I come now to modern historical works. Macaulay's History of England is another attempt to justify the revolution of 1688. Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic and the Reverend J. N. Figgis' From Gerson to Grotius, contain glowing panegyrics on the revolt of the Netherlands against Spain. G. M. Trevelyan's England Under the Stuarts traces all our liberties to the revolt against Charles I. A. W. Tilby's British North America, Sir George Trevelyan's American Revolution, and George III and Charles Fox, Ramsay Muir's Short History of the British Commonwealth, Basil Williams' Life of Chatham, and the Cambridge History of the British Empire are all so incautious as to praise the American revolution.

It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is an extremely serious matter lightly to put on the statute books any legislation that might be used against certain sections of the community. I hold in my hand a book obtained from the library, where I gathered quite an armful descriptive of the doctrines and history of communism and fascism. This particular volume is typical; it is The Defence of Terrorism, by Leon Trotzky, from which I will read just a sentence or two:

> But the revolution does require of the revolutionary class that it should attain its end by all methods at its disposal—if necessary, by an armed rising; if required, by terrorism. A revolutionary class which has conquered power with arms in its hands is bound to, and will, suppress, rifle in hand, all attempts to tear the power out of its hands....
> In this sense, the Red Terror is not distinguishable from the armed insurrection, the direct continuation of which it represents. The state terror of a revolutionary class can be condemned "morally" only by a man who, as a principle, rejects (in words) every form of violence whatsoever—consequently, every war and every rising. For this one has to be merely and simply a hypocritical Quaker.

I do not in the slightest agree with the sentiments expressed by Trotzky, but my point is this, that under section 98 of the criminal code as it now stands, Mr. Hardy, who handed me this book, might be held guilty of belonging to an unlawful association, or at least of coming under the provisions of that section. But I am afraid that he could also be held guilty under the proposed new section, because this outstanding declaration from Trotzky which I have just read is being circulated by the librarians of this house. I think it is a very good thing that it is in the library, so that we may know what people are thinking. But it could come under the proposed section as I read it. No one suggests that we are going to arrest the librarians of this house, but if this same book were found in a little book store in Toronto or Montreal the operators of that store would come under the proposed subsection 4 of section 133. That is not as it should be.

I am glad that the Minister of Justice recognizes that a rule of this kind might work both ways. In a recent review of Social planning for Canada, a L.S.R. book, Mr. V. W. Bladen in the Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science has this to say:

> The writers surely underestimate the resistance likely to be put up by the owners of property and by all those who still hope to own property or are dependent on such owners. The fundamental assumptions of the writers are quite evidently based upon a conception of the capitalist class as nice quiet people anxious to cooperate in carrying out the will of the people.

Suppose by any stretch of the imagination that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation came into power with a mandate to carry out a socialist program, and suppose there were certain people highly placed, such as those described by the Minister of Justice, who made an investment of half a million dollars and in the course of some thirty years reaped a reward of something like $15,000,000. Supposing the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation undertook to deal effectively with a situation like that. Possibly there might be some resistance. There might be some at least who would advocate armed or forcible resistance. Under those circumstances they would come very definitely under this section. So that perhaps it might be well for this parliament not to go too far at this time. I remember the old scriptural motto: with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.

I do not think there is much more that I need say. It strikes me as very strange that this strengthening of section 133, subsection 4, should come from the Liberal party. I was looking the other day over some notes with regard to the trial of Joseph Howe in 1835, and this is what he was charged with in those days:

> The jurors of our Lord the King upon their oath present that Joseph Howe, late of Halifax in the county of Halifax, printer, being a wicked, seditious and ill-disposed person, and being a person of a most wicked and malicious temper and disposition....

That is taken from his speeches, volume 1, page 28. Nothing harsher could be said concerning those who to-day are regarded as radicals.

I go back now one hundred years to a time when in Ontario an agitator, an immigrant by the name of William Lyon Mackenzie, published a paper that had very harsh things to say about the government. This is a matter concerning which something is known by those of us who come from Ontario, hence we are coming into modern history. As a matter of fact my own people, at that time Wesleyans, stood with Egerton Ryerson against the rebels.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Shame!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It might interest my hon. friends to the right to know that I treasure my grandfather's sword with which he joined some of the loyal citizens who were armed in 1837 to keep William Lyon Mackenzie in order.

Mr. BENNETT: His descendant is not doing badly in that regard.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suggest that the reversals in judgment which history brings about warn us to consider carefully the legislation we propose to place on the statute book. Some of us may not altogether agree with the action taken by William Lyon Mackenzie in those days; we think that if he had been a little more patient he might have accomplished by peaceful means what he sought to accomplish by force. But in any case most of us are disposed to think that he did a great work. Does this kind of judgment apply simply to the past? Some of the great movements of history have been initiated by men who advocated force. I happen to be one who does not advocate force, either in the international or in the national sphere. I am very frequently condemned for taking that position. But it does seem to me passing strange that it remains for the Liberal party under the leadership of the grandson of William Lyon Mackenzie to put on the statute book this clause:

> ... everyone shall be presumed to have a seditious intention who publishes, or circulates any writing, printing, or document in which it is advocated, or who teaches or advocates, the use, without the authority of law, of force, as a means of accomplishing any governmental change.

Mr. BENNETT: Presumption of guilt.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would ask the minister to reconsider his decision. I have not spoken about Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If the leader of the opposition supports my hon. friend I would probably consider it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I recognize the fact that some of the old Rouges of Quebec look back upon those who advocated force as being among those who broke the tyranny of the old regime. I do not believe we should be lenient in our judgment of those who lived in the past and at the same time refuse to recognize the desperate plight which forces many to-day to use extreme language or advocate extreme measures.

I do not want any misapprehension; I believe in bringing about these changes by orderly and peaceful methods. That is the belief of the organization with which I am associated, but I am forced to protest against this kind of legislation which may be used against particular sections of the community.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has referred to an order in council passed in September, 1918. Whether for good or ill, I believe I drafted that order. Exceptional circumstances had arisen in Canada prior to the termination of actual fighting at the front. I was asked by the Canadian government to return from the United States, where I had been chairman of an executive in charge of about fifty factories manufacturing munitions for the Allies, a work which I had been requested by the British government to undertake. Those factories having been taken over by the United States government, after it entered the war, I was asked to take the position of director of public safety in Canada.

I believe I must have bundles of documents in my possession, among my souvenirs, disclosing that at that time sedition of the worst kind was being advocated throughout Canada, such advocacy being sustained through the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars which were being sent to Canada in part through Finland and in part from Germany through the United States. Secret printing presses had been established throughout the dominion for the publication of seditious documents. Within a few weeks I was able to ascertain the exact location of thirty or forty of these printing establishments which were secretly turning out seditious documents and circulating them throughout Canada, partly among the population of the west, whose maternal language is different from our own. Then, the printing presses were used partly for the output of seditious documents to be circulated elsewhere. For instance, there must be records in the Department of External Affairs showing that at one time the government of France made a protest to the government of Canada in which they stated that the Y.M.C.A. huts at or near the front, and certain other soldier aid societies, the work of which was being carried on chiefly by Canadian women in France, were circulating among French soldiers as they returned from the front the most seditious literature written in the French language, which was causing a great deal of irritation in the French army. We found that a public appeal had been made in Canada for literature to send to the soldiers at the front. Large packages of this seditious literature had been prepared by those carrying on the agitation in Canada; it had been sent to the Y.M.C.A. and to the soldiers' aid societies as literature suitable for circulation among soldiers near or returning from the front. Our societies were being used to circulate that literature among the French soldiers who were welcomed at Canadian Y.M.C.A. huts and canteens.

We found, too, that a large amount of alien money was being used for this purpose. And so finally in order to deal with it effectively under the War Measures Act the order in council, to which the Minister of Justice has referred, was passed. There was inserted the provision, of course, that it should continue in force only while Canada was engaged in war. The substantive statute under which the order in council was made was one of the war measures acts and therefore the period in which the order in council could be enforced was the duration of the war and until the final termination of war activities.

Reading section 98 as it now stands on the statute books one may have certain objections to some of the sections dealing with procedure. I suggest that the seizure of property on order of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police may be an exceptional measure at this time. I suggest that the right to search, as outlined in the section, may be more than ample, and should be reconsidered by parliament. If the Minister of Justice had made a reasonable redrafting of the section so as to conform with similar provisions in other laws I believe the modifications could be adopted by the members of the group to which I belong. But I do say that anyone who seeks to bring about any governmental, industrial or economic change within Canada by the use of force, violence or physical injury to person or property, or by threats of such injury, or who teaches, advocates, advises or defends the use of force, violence, terrorism or physical injury to property should be amenable to the law of Canada. In my opinion the continuance of democratic institutions in Canada depends upon the prohibition of such evil attempts to overturn any government in this country. If in due time the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation obtains a majority in Canada and in accordance with the will of the people forms a government, then certainly any body of the minority who might undertake by force or violence to put that government out of office, or by threat of violence to intimidate it from taking such action as the parliament of that day may desire to take, should become amenable to the criminal law of Canada. I feel profoundly with regard to that; we must protect democratic institutions in Canada, and if there are some provisions of procedure or otherwise in section 98 which should be amended, let us have an amendment of them, but let us preserve the main purpose and intent of the statute as expressed in section 98, subsection 1, and also in section 98, subsection 8. Now what the minister has done, in order to camouflage what purports to be a complete repeal of section 98, is to make an addition to section 133 dealing with sedition.

Let us consider the matter fairly. There is no codification of the criminal law in Great Britain, and the criminal law of Canada was the common law of Great Britain until 1892, when the Canadian criminal code was first drawn and enacted.

Mr. BENNETT: Plus statutory cases.

Mr. CAHAN: Plus statutory cases, and the code has been amended from time to time, but the common law of Great Britain applies so far as it is not repugnant to the criminal code of Canada. In England it has been felt impossible to codify and express in exact terms the common law of England in regard to sedition, and Sir John Thompson and those who engaged in 1892 in the work of preparing the criminal code of Canada also decided that such codification was impossible of accomplishment at that time. But in dealing with the advocacy and use of force to bring about governmental changes in Canada it has been deemed advisable, and I think it is advisable from the experiences we had in the early years after the termination of the war, to place on the statute book this section of the criminal code dealing with that particular crime. And it is there. I grant that if I were drafting this section again, in view of the present conditions, I would advise that the right of searches should be restricted and certain other procedure that is therein provided should be limited, but I believe that the main purpose and intent of the statute should be continued in force.

Although the Minister of Justice has gone a certain distance in amplifying section 133, so as to camouflage the results accruing from the repeal of section 98, I do not think he has gone sufficiently far, and I do not think the section which he proposes, section 4 of this bill, which adds a new subsection to section 133, is sufficiently broad or sufficiently comprehensive to prohibit the actual use of force for the purpose of overturning the government of the country. Therefore I think that prohibition not only of the advocacy of force and intimidation, but also of the use of force and intimidation, should be placed upon the statute book, whether in 98 or in section 133 is immaterial to me, but it should be there, and it should be expressed in language so clear and indubitable that any magistrate in a country district who is first called upon to investigate with regard to the application of this law will not have to search through a thousand cases and hundreds of decisions of the British courts to ascertain what the law of sedition really is. In accord with the purpose of parliament in codifying the law in 1892 we, in now amending it, should make clear that the use of force or the advocacy of force for the purpose of overturning the government of the country is made a criminal offence, in terms so clear that the ordinary justice of the peace and the magistrate of the country district will thoroughly understand the law. We should make the way for him so clear that even a man of ordinary intelligence could not err in the pursuit of that path.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): The new subsection 4 of section 133 as proposed by the bill before the house may well be characterized by that well known slang expression, "That is a mouthful"; and if two words are added to that one may say, "That is a mouthful of teeth," because subsection 4 of section 133 puts back into the criminal code a great deal of what has been taken out of it by the repeal of section 98.

I wish to associate myself with some of the remarks made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and also with some made by the former Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). I have spoken previously in support of section 98, having taken the opportunity on more than one occasion to express the view that a number of the subsections were unnecessarily severe. I had occasion to worry a little myself last summer in connection with section 98. When I returned from the United States, bringing with me a few expositions on communism, I felt a bit nervous and I went to see the deputy minister of justice, who, after looking wise for a moment or two and turning over the pages, assured me that I was within the law in bringing them into the country. The sections in that regard were unnecessarily severe and I felt that the onus of proof being on any one attending a meeting to show that he was not committing an unlawful act was perhaps a little strong, and also the subsection pertaining to owners of halls and people attending meetings. In the main, however, the whole section was a defence for those who believe in law and order and who are not disposed to advocate force or any other measure to upset the present governmental system.

I was amused at the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) pointing out to the minister so early that subsection 4 of section 133 might not be too popular, not only, I assume, with himself, but perhaps with his group. I propose to support the minister in putting in subsection 4 of section 133, but I would point out that all of those organizations which he had in mind this morning and to which he referred generally as having denounced the late government for maintaining section 98, will now howl their heads off against subsection 4 of section 133. A good many of the organizations did protest against section 98, and as one reads over the initials representing their names one cannot help thinking that they look like a lot of alphabet soup instead of the names of parties. We shall likely see them continue to do what they did before. Take, for instance, U.L.F.T.A., Ukrainian Labour-Farmers' Temple Association. I have no doubt they will protest against subsection 4 of section 133, and the N.U.W.A., National Unemployed Workers' Association, who have protested before, will likely protest again. The Workers' Ex-Service Men's League protested before and will undoubtedly protest again, and so will the U.F., the United Front, the C.L.D.L., the Canadian Labour Defence League, and the Y.C.L., the Young Communists' League. I hope the minister will not pay attention to their protests but will maintain subsection 4 of section 133.

During the last election all the candidates I came in contact with who opposed the Conservative party denounced section 98, making a bogey out of it, and reading into it much that is not there. They held it up as something to be feared. In my own riding the communist candidate was particularly loud in his attack upon section 98, but in due course he retired from the field, throwing his support over to my Cooperative Commonwealth Federation opponent. I am not charging the C.C.F.'ers with communism or anything of that sort. Since they have been sitting so close to the gentleman on their immediate right they have more or less got rid of such characteristics. But subsection 4 of section 133 does restore to the act practically all of what subsections 3, 4, 8 and 9 of section 98 contained. For instance, subsection 3 of the present section 98 pertains to speaking, writing and publishing seditious articles or words and subsection 4 refers to the distribution of literature of that description. Subsection 8 has to do with the printing, circulating and distributing of communistic or revolutionary literature or words, and subsection 9 again refers to circulation. If we read the new subsection 4 we shall find in it, in the main, those features I mentioned as being at present in subsections 3, 4, 8 and 9 of the present act. The proposed subsection 4 of section 133 reads:

> (4) Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the expression "seditious intention" everyone shall be presumed to have a seditious intention who publishes, or circulates any writing, printing or document in which it is advocated, or who teaches or advocates, the use, without the authority of law, of force, as a means of accomplishing any governmental change.

I propose to support that, because I feel that it will go a long way towards preserving law and order in this country.

The Minister of Justice more or less intimated that everyone in Canada, or that all organizations in Canada except the Conservatives were against section 98. Well, there were many people who were against section 98 but there were also many broad-minded people, not all Conservatives, who were in support of it; and none supported section 98 more strongly and brilliantly than did the late editor of the Toronto Globe, who in the last session of parliament frequently sat in the press gallery of this house. He took a very prominent part in defending section 98 against the attacks of the fellowship—I have forgotten the name of the organization—with which a number of the professors of Toronto university were associated.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Was that Mr. Anderson?

Mr. MacNICOL: I am now referring to the late Mr. Anderson. He took a very strong stand against the attitude of that fellowship, the full designation of which I have forgotten, and those associated with it who were denouncing what they regarded as interference with free speech and asking for the repeal of section 98. In view of what you, Mr. Speaker, said this morning I suppose I am in order in quoting some words from the Toronto Globe on January 16, 1931:

> This matter of "free speech" which is agitating the fellowship and has brought forth the protests of sixty-eight college professors is but a red herring across the trail.... The police have taken action to protect the community against the invasion of foreign propaganda, openly promoted to supplant Christianity by atheism. . . . Pages of evidence from soviet publications could be quoted to show how this propaganda is being advanced in all foreign countries, with the object, first, of causing trouble of every kind, and then of setting up a soviet administration.

The abolition of section 98, as it stood, would have permitted them to do that. Under subsection 4 of section 133 they will still be restrained. I continue to quote from this article:

> Call it "freedom of speech" or anything else, it is still Bolshevik propaganda, which has no place in an honest and upright country.... The communists seeking "freedom of speech" are the aggressors, trying to introduce here and elsewhere an alien cause by talk, text, and force of arms. It is not British, Canadian, or Christian. Why should red-blooded Canadians soft pedal and back away before their machinations? Why should they be asked to do so?

A well known paper in western Ontario, independent I believe in politics, namely the Woodstock Sentinel-Review, refers to this subject in an issue published during December, 1934. I am not going to quote the article, but it is a strong and intelligent pronouncement, entitled, Section 98 Necessary.

Something was said this morning about the labour organizations. One of our best known labour papers is the Labor Leader. It has a very wide circulation—I believe, about 30,000 to 40,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Where is it printed?

Mr. MacNICOL: It is printed in Toronto.

Mr. HEAPS: Nobody knows about it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, labour workmen know about it.

Mr. HEAPS: No, they don't.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacNICOL: And I myself know a good deal about working men, having worked with them for many years. This paper heads a very strong article, published in October, 1935, under the caption, Section 98 Must Stand. I admit these articles were written before the Minister of Justice introduced, in this present bill, subsection 4 of section 133, which, as I said at the beginning, puts back in the criminal code much of what section 98 contained.

Then the Lindsay Warder of November 14, 1935, quotes something that struck me very forcibly, a pronouncement made by the Rev. Father Bryans of Montreal.

> Father Bryans was addressing a meeting in Toronto last week and while he was in the city Father Lanphier had an interview with him on this question.

That is, on the question of the repeal of section 98.

> In answer to queries from Father Lanphier he emphatically stated that, in his opinion, ninety-five per cent of the agitation for the repeal of section 98 during the last campaign came from communists—

He is quite right in making that statement —or communist organizations and those of the great Liberal party who listen to the claptrap from those organizations.

> —or communist-inspired sources and that practically all of the propaganda in pamphlet form on this question that flooded the country was of "red" origin. Father Bryans also expressed his firm conviction that it would be a foolhardy, ill-advised and very dangerous move for the new government to make any move to remove this section of the criminal code.

Of course subsection 4 of section 133 puts back into the criminal code much that section 98 had in it, and I doubt whether, were these writers writing to-day, they would complain as strongly as they did in the articles I have quoted.

Then the Mail and Empire of February 21, 1936, has an article headed Section 98 of Criminal Code Protects the People. I have said, and it is worth emphasizing as frequently as possible, that subsection 4 of subsection 133 has the merit of putting back in the act much that was contained in section 98.

Subsection 1 of section 98 refers to unlawful associations. I have been wondering whether the people will have under subsection 4 of section 133 sufficient protection against the propaganda of what otherwise would be unlawful associations. One of the books to which I referred a few moments ago and concerning which I visited the office of the deputy minister of justice—entitled Why Communism?—gives a complete argument and outline of how to start revolution, not only in this country but also in the United States, and tells how it is being organized in many other countries. We read almost every day in the papers about troubles in France, in Belgium, in Spain, in Mexico, in Uruguay and other states as well as in a great number of cities. I am convinced that a great deal of that trouble is being organized by unlawful associations or associations that should be unlawful. On page 32 of this book I find these words:

> We communists say that there is only one way to abolish the capitalist state, and that is to smash it by force. To make communism possible the workers must take hold of the state machinery of capitalism and destroy it.

How are we going to prevent the publication of propaganda such as that? On page 33 I find these other poisonous words:

> The working class is placed in this capitalist society in a position where to live it must fight. This fight, to be effective, must be aimed not only at the capitalists but also at their state. And once the fight is effective enough it must inevitably lead to the smashing up of the state.

That is the objective—the smashing up of all states outside of Russia. And then another paragraph on page 33:

> Not much acumen is needed to realize that economic struggles can not remain purely economic. When you strike, when you form a picket line, the state in the shape of policemen and armed thugs rushes to the aid of the employers.

That is not very good language to use regarding the enforcement of law in civilized states. Then on page 51 we have this statement:

> We communists say it is the duty of the workers to fight against capitalist terror, against manifestations of fascism, against the oppression of other nations. We say it is in their interests to fight. We appeal to the class interests of the workers and the exploited masses of the population. Stand guard. Offer resistance to capitalist terror. Fight for your right to organize, to assemble, to strike. Break the capitalist dictatorial rules directed against you. Do not submit. Strike back. In unity is your strength.

I shall not read any more, but the book is full of these arguments on how to commence a revolution. They are subtle arguments and very appealing to those who care to fall for them. In the course of their argument they make a strenuous attack on organized labour. I am one of those who believe in organized labour. I am not a member of any labour organization but I have seen some of the good work that has been done by organized labour. Anyone who has had to do with thousands of men must have come in contact with the well known labour leaders, and I have always found them to be gentlemen of the first order, imbued with the best possible feelings towards labour generally, generous in their attitude and ready to cooperate and discuss matters. Here is what they have to say in a second book entitled Programme of the Communist International. They describe organized labour in this way:

> A cynically commercial, and imperialistic secular form of subjecting the proletariat to the ideological influence of the bourgeoisie is represented by contemporary "socialist" reformism. Taking its main gospel from the tablets of imperialist politics, its model to-day is the deliberately anti-socialist and openly counter-revolutionary "American Federation of Labour."

The American Federation of Labour has been a safeguarding influence, not only in connection with employment and better working conditions but also in regard to law and order in both the United States and Canada. As between the communists and the American Federation of Labour I certainly would support organized labour.

In conclusion I wish only to say that I support the action of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in putting back into the act many of the protective parts of section 98. He has inserted them in subsection 4 of section 133, and I congratulate him on having done so. I feel quite confident that he will be strong enough to resist the pressure that may be brought to bear on him by communistic and semi-communistic organizations to have these provisions repealed.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): I wish to make just a few observations in connection with this bill, Mr. Speaker, and to say a word or two in reply to the hon. member who has just taken his seat. In my opinion there is a great deal in common between the communist party and the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). They have both calmed down to such an extent that they are hardly recognizable. When you compare the speech just made by the hon. member for Davenport with the speeches he made in this house on the same subject a year or two ago you would hardly know it was the same member.

Mr. MacNICOL: We did not have the amendments to section 133 then.

Mr. HEAPS: And so it is with the communist party; since they wrote the articles from which my hon. friend has quoted their attitude has changed completely in regard to public matters. Anyone who reads what they publish to-day and observes their actions will hardly believe they are the same people of a year or two ago. May I point out to the hon. member for Davenport that to-day the communist party belong to and support the American Federation of Labour, so if my hon. friend says he is a supporter of that organization he is in pretty good company as far as the communist party are concerned.

I should like to make one other reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, who claimed there was a newspaper published in Toronto, called the Labor Leader, with a circulation of about thirty thousand. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have been in this country quite a number of years and have been associated with the labour movement for a long time. With the exception of a few people in Toronto hardly anyone knows anything about that newspaper. It is published now and then, as a rule on the eve of an election or when some important issue is being considered, and when an election campaign is in progress this newspaper is usually found to be supporting high tariffs and the Conservative party. Further than that, I would suggest that perhaps my hon. friend who has just taken his seat might know where the funds come from with which that newspaper is published; I do not know.

Now I desire to say a few words in regard to this bill. I am extremely glad that the government have seen fit to repeal section 98 of the criminal code. I do not think that section ever should have been placed on the statute books of this country. It has given power to the police which I do not think was ever warranted and which has not been contemplated in other parts of the British empire. The police have authority under section 98 to search premises without warrants or, as we say, without the due process of law. Why should the authorities, the police, be permitted to search a person's home or store and confiscate property without knowing, in some instances, what they are confiscating, without following the ordinary process of law? I do not think anyone in this house can defend a measure of that kind. When the raids took place throughout this country in 1919 I know the police went into homes without search warrants and took possession of whole libraries, which were not returned to the rightful and proper owners. A number of books were taken from my own home, books which could have been found in almost any library in Canada. I do not think there can be any justification for an act of that kind remaining on the statute books of the Dominion of Canada.

The word "sedition" is not and cannot be defined and is not defined in any of our statutes. It is an indefinable offence; as has been stated time and again in this house, sedition depends very largely upon the time and place the act is committed or the statement is made. When we look back over some of the things that the crown have claimed to be seditious within the last few years I think it must be agreed that a most ridiculous interpretation has been placed on section 98 of the criminal code. I should like to indicate what some people in Canada have said on which they have been charged with sedition:

> Woe unto them that decree unrighteous decrees, and that write grievousness which they have prescribed;
> To turn aside the needy from judgment, and to take away the right from the poor of my people, that widows may be their prey and that they may rob the fatherless.

The following words also were part of the charge against a person whose name I will mention in a moment:

> And they shall build houses and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them.
> They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat: for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands.

Those are quotations from the book of Isaiah, yet it was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who was accused of sedition in the courts of this country for quoting from the bible what I have just read. That was done under section 98 of the criminal code, and if it was done at that time it is quite possible it might be done again if the section remains.

Some of my hon. friends are timid about individuals using language which might be regarded as seditious. After all, who ultimately is the judge of what is seditious? Is it not for a jury to decide? Who is the final jury? Is it not the people of Canada? In 1919 a number of people in Winnipeg were charged with seditious utterances and seditious conspiracy and were convicted of that charge, yet immediately after their conviction they were returned by enormous majorities to the legislature of Manitoba. They were elected to that legislature while they were incarcerated in the gaols of that province. And the present mayor of Winnipeg, who has been elected for two terms by fairly large majorities, majorities representative of all the people of that city, is one who was sentenced to gaol for seditious conspiracy in 1920. The thing becomes ridiculous when a few people set themselves up as judges of the law and send people to gaol who after all represent the viewpoint and convictions of a majority of the people of any community.

It has been claimed by some that we should not allow certain statements to be made. There are, I think, no hon. members of this house who believe in the advocacy of physical force. I think we are all opposed to that. The very fact that we run candidates in elections, that we try through our limited means to bring the majority of people in Canada to our way of thinking, is in itself a vindication of our ideas on this question. But we do say that if you want to stop people from giving vent to seditious utterances the best way to do it is to remove the causes of dissatisfaction. At the present time there are a good many causes for people in this country to be dissatisfied, yet we find very little advocacy of force from any source, even from the communist party.

Ideas cannot be killed by force. If an idea is not worthwhile it will die, and ideas that are worthwhile will grow in spite of all opposition; for in the final analysis that which is right and logical is bound to come out on top. Ideas are like a seed planted in the ground. If the seed is good and it has the sunshine it will sprout and grow, perhaps into a beautiful flower; but if the seed is bad the same sunshine will kill it. Let all ideas come out into the open and I am satisfied that ultimately the logic and good sense of the people will determine what is right and what is wrong. If we try with any sedition laws to suppress freedom of speech it is a grievous mistake; consequently I am glad that the Minister of Justice and the government have taken the responsibility of doing away with section 98. But I regret to observe that while doing away with section 98, in which there are certain definitions as to what the authorities may do, they bring in a wide clause the interpretation of which is so indefinite and uncertain that I would ask the Minister of Justice at a later stage to state to the house whether he himself can give an interpretation of what the clause actually means.

The second line of the new clause reads:

... every one shall be presumed to have a seditious intention ...

Does that mean that a person who may be charged under this clause is presumed to be guilty?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, that depends entirely on the interpretation that is placed upon it by the judge. According to my understanding of the interpretation given to it even by lawyers, it is that the presumption of guilt is upon the accused instead of its being incumbent upon the prosecution to prove him guilty.

It is also unfortunate that "force" has not been more clearly defined. Again it is a question of interpretation. In 1920 a glance would have been interpreted by a judge in Manitoba as the use of force. I am wondering whether the law as we have it without this subsection 4 would not have been sufficient to cover the situation. There are quite a number of sections in the existing law that would take care of a person who advocates the use of force for the overthrow of government. It is a mistake to put into any act a clause such as this, so ambiguous and capable of being interpreted in so many different ways. Perhaps when we come to the committee stage the Minister of Justice will be good enough to give to the committee his interpretation of this particular section, because for myself, having at times listened to the interpretation of sedition by judges and lawyers, I have a feeling that if a person were brought before the courts of this country and charged under subsection 4 he would be likely to have as much difficulty in proving his innocence as he might have had under section 98.

Mr. H. E. WILTON (Hamilton West): Following the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), for whom I have a very high personal regard, I should like to make a few comments on what he said. The hon. member says he does not agree with all the policies of the communists—one noted his emphasis on the word "all." Personally I find it very hard to understand how any good Canadian citizen can agree with anything that the communist party stands for in Canada or elsewhere, a party whose chief aim and object is the overthrow of organized government and absolute disrespect for law and order.

It seems to me the only people who need to fear section 98 are those who are likely to break it. Reference was made by the hon. member who preceded me to a mayor who had been sentenced to gaol because of a breach of this section. I do not know why even a mayor should be exempt from the laws; if he breaks them he should be penalized. We do not make our laws only for the common man, or the man in a lower position, and there is no reason why we should exempt the mayor of any city.

Mr. HEAPS: He was not mayor at the time he was sentenced.

Mr. WILTON: You said so.

Mr. HEAPS: No.

Mr. WILTON: My knowledge of communistic effort has been extensive because I have come into close contact with it in public municipal life. Having watched its development over a period of two or three years I know something about the organization. I know they hold secret meetings in private homes; I know they are teaching their children to have no respect for law and order. They are advocating everything that is disrespectful to the social structure and laws of our country. When the police are not watching they distribute seditious literature, which is prepared for them in a basement headquarters within a stone's throw of Times square, New York. That literature is transmitted to them by some means throughout different parts of Canada where their efforts are concentrated. It is found on city streets in the mornings. They come out of their places like rats out of holes in the middle of the night, and distribute it throughout the cities. They post boys at factory gates to hand it to the workers, and they get away with it until they are caught by the police. Those are the people whom section 98 is designed to cover. No law abiding, self-respecting Canadian citizen need fear section 98. The communist party as I know it and as I have seen it operate are leeches on society in every manner, shape and form of which it is possible to conceive. They refuse to acknowledge allegiance to their king; they stand in groups in public places and refuse to remove their hats when the national anthem is sung; they bury their dead without religious rites, and they ignore everything that is decent and right in the laws of our land.

There is a tendency on the part of many good citizens to treat the communist agitation lightly. Some say, "Oh, why raise an agitation? They are not very strong; they cannot do much harm; perhaps it is better to leave them alone. Let them say what they like and do as they like; they will never be able to become the law makers of Canada or break the structure of our legal system. Why bother with them"? I feel keenly in this matter, and I urge that it is one to be considered seriously. It is a matter of much more serious import than the average Canadian realizes. Many years ago a man named Noah walked about on the face of the earth telling the people to come into his ark, that it was going to rain. He told them there was going to be a flood and that they would be drowned. They laughed at him and called him an old fool. When he began building the ark they gathered around and watched him, persisting in calling him an old fool. But when they were in water up to their necks, standing on the highest points they could reach, they realized the truth of Noah's statement.

[Mr. Wilton.]

Not many years ago a man named Lloyd George stood in his place in the British parliament and warned parliament against the war preparations of Germany which were being carried on under the very nose of that parliament. They laughed at Lloyd George; but when they were in mire and muck up to their knees, and when they stood in the blood of their fellow human beings, they realized that little Lloyd George had been telling them the truth.

The red movement in Canada is a menace which must be taken seriously, if we are to prevent the downfall of responsible government. No loyal Canadian wants to see the downfall of Canadian government; we prefer law, order and civilization. But we are heading for a downfall unless we treat the red menace seriously and do not choose to sit back and laugh at it. The red menace in Canada is not to be laughed at. People now living will live to see and realize its seriousness. There are those who say that red policies will never come in our time. I say they are coming in our time unless we are prepared to take the menace seriously.

Section 98 of the criminal code is in existence to take care of those who defy our law, who defy our social progress and who would tear down and wreck our civilization. I say to hon. members that the red movement is a menace within reach of us; it is something against which we must protect the public and our children, otherwise we may go through the same process as did the people in Noah's day.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Wilton) referred to Noah's invitation to the people of his day to come into the ark lest they be faced with chaos brought about by a flood, I could not help recalling what took place during the last election campaign. It was said that those who did not vote for the Liberal party would be faced with chaos.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): They took the warning this time, but they did not in Noah's time.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Let us interpret the word "chaos." It seems to me that chaos would indicate a chaotic state, and a chaotic state must necessarily be one in which there is terrorism. As I read the section I wonder why some who preached the doctrine to which I have referred were not prosecuted under it. Well, that did not happen. My point is that because of the ambiguity of the section and its multiplicity of words and expressions, it could be made applicable to almost any one or any condition, and I believe the government should be commended most highly upon repealing it. In my opinion it is a violation of private privileges. It seems to me to be in the nature of a warlike emergency, as was intimated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I do not think we are so much in danger of anything so terrible as some speakers would have us believe as to need the drastic warlike emergency measure contained in section 98. There is another thing that should be considered. The power is given to the police to appoint anyone to go into a private residence to confiscate literature. The home is the sacred possession of every citizen, and as this section now stands, homes may be invaded by outsiders on practically any excuse they may wish to present. This certainly needs repealing.

Paragraph 4 of section 98 refers to meetings. I am of the opinion that it would be hard to enter any meeting which in some way did not come under this section. This practically prohibits anyone advocating a change in the form of government. During the last election there was considerable cry for reform, especially monetary reform. Some very strong statements were made by all parties in connection with this. There were some very strong references by the Liberal party to the Conservative administration, and similar statements were made by the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation in regard to both the Liberals and the Conservatives. Social crediters had something to say about all the others, and I think it was coming to them. It is hard to tell just how serious all these statements might have been when considered in the light of section 98.

As I listened to the speeches this afternoon I was convinced that the purpose of this section was to get after the so-called communists. I should like to make it quite clear that this party is not associated in any manner or form with socialism of communism. That being so, we have nothing to fear from section 98, but our endeavour is to see that all citizens are treated fairly. One of the most essential things in a democratic country is freedom of speech. If we represent a policy which is so weak that it cannot stand the test of argument and fair debate, then I think it will automatically go down. It is the consensus of opinion that all these subjects should be debated from all angles. If this section is allowed to remain, I believe it will curtail the expression of opinion and thought. As the minister indicated not so long ago, a man should not be condemned for expressing an opinion, but he should be punished for deeds and acts. I do not think this is made clear in the legislation under review.

I did not intend to deal with this matter at any great length, because it has been gone over pretty thoroughly. But I think I should say something in view of the fact that I have received so many representations from different groups and organizations all over Alberta and in other parts of Canada. I have had complaints from labour organizations. I have attended the meetings of a great many labour organizations, and with the exception of one, held in Banff about a year ago, I never heard any indication whatever of violence. Reforms of one kind and another were advocated, but only on the one occasion did I hear anything that could be interpreted to be at all in the form of violence. I think this legislation could have been applied to that particular meeting. I have had representations from railway employees' organizations in different parts of Alberta, and I do not believe anyone can accuse those men of any criminal intent or anything of that kind. I have had them from farmers' organizations, and I have had them from individuals in every occupation.

After I read section 4 of the bill I went down to the library where I found a great many socialistic books. I read portions of them, some of which were similar to those referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The thought came to my mind that if this section were allowed to stand the library and all those associated with it would necessarily come under its provisions. The section refers to those who circulate such literature. Many of the news stands and those people who publish periodicals of different kinds would come under this section if a literal interpretation were put upon it.

Perhaps it might not be well to have this bill sent back to the committee to be reconsidered, but the minister should give some consideration to this section. I think the original intention of section 98 was to apply to any extreme acts, and perhaps insufficient consideration was given to the wording. With a little further thought it seems to me it could be changed to cover fully such actions as have been mentioned.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the character of the debate I feel I should make at least a few remarks. May I say at once that the maintenance of national liberty is dependent upon the restraint of individual liberty. That is a strange statement which at first may appear to be contradictory, but it is not. There can be no such thing as the maintenance of national liberty among the peoples of this country unless there is a restraint of individual liberty. Further, the extent to which the nation enjoys freedom and liberty depends upon the extent to which restraint is carried out. If the restraint is undue upon individual liberty, then there is resentment. On the other hand, if it is inadequate, liberty becomes licence. I do not think it can be gainsaid that that is a fair statement of the situation.

Further, the laws which thus restrain the individual liberty for the well being of the nation as a whole are enacted not for the law abiding citizen but as restraints upon citizens who would convert liberty into licence. We have a statute which was passed in 1919, some seventeen years ago, which is still in full force and efficiency. During the last few years it has been openly defied because under our jurisdiction the provinces must maintain criminal proceedings. The dominion can only take certain preliminary steps, and it rests with the attorneys general of the provinces to say whether or not the law shall be carried into effect.

In the midst of political disturbance and difference it frequently happens that men ally themselves to a particular course of action from which they find it exceedingly difficult to separate themselves when their better reason and stronger judgment tell them they should. I have read declarations with respect to section 98 on the part of those charged with responsibility, stating what course they would pursue, and I know perfectly well that in their saner and calmer moments those who made the declaration, if they were correctly reported, would have had no intention to aid and succour and abet those who had been openly defying the law. During the last few years we have had open expressions of defiance of the law. In the leading case to which reference was made this morning by the minister, namely, the Buck case, Chief Justice Mulock, speaking for the whole appellate division of the Ontario court, indicated that the opinion of that court was that what had transpired constituted an offence under the provisions of section 98. Let us see whether or not we have any adequate safeguards outside of that statute—I am talking about the substantive provisions of it. What does it indicate? May I answer that question by saying that it does not indicate anything that the people have been led to believe it does. There has been so much misrepresentation as to what this section means—because in the very nature of things it is somewhat longer than a statute intended to convey that meaning ordinarily would be—that I am sure there has been a great deal of misapprehension on the part of many people. First of all it aims at unlawful associations; and the Chief Justice of Ontario pointed out that we had in Canada determined, by the verdict of a jury as well as by the admissions made by those who were charged and who in some instances conducted their own defence, that it took its direction from another organization, which organization had its foundations and its home in a foreign land, and that it was part of the declared purpose of that organization to effectuate by force the ends intended or purposed. Notwithstanding what my opponents may say to the contrary, none of us for a single moment desire to restrict or curb liberty of speech. The address of Erskine, the advocate, is hardly conclusive as to the judicial interpretation of a statute. Erskine, the advocate, was one of the greatest of his time, but in arguing his case upon the evidence submitted to a jury it can hardly be contended that he is making declarations of high principles of law. In the advocacy of the so-called iniquities of section 98 men have been led to believe that it is much more harmful and restrictive than is necessary to maintain national liberty. Let us look at it for a moment:

> Any association, organization, society or corporation, whose professed purpose or one of whose purposes is to bring about any governmental, industrial or economic change within Canada by use of force, violence or physical injury to person or property, or by threats of such injury, or which teaches, advocates, advises or defends the use of force, violence, terrorism, or physical injury to person or property, or threats of such injury, in order to accomplish such change, or for any other purpose, or which shall by any means prosecute or pursue such purpose or professed purpose, or shall so teach, advocate, advise or defend, shall be an unlawful association.

I venture to think that in the quiet calm of his own home, if I were discussing the matter with any hon. member sitting opposite me who thinks differently than I do on large public questions, he would say, "I think it is a perfectly sound and proper thing, Mr. Bennett, that we should have this definition of unlawful assemblies or associations; and I agree with you, Mr. Bennett, that there should be a law against men carrying on, by association, efforts to destroy by force and violence and injury to persons the institutions of the country." I feel perfectly certain that my bitterest opponent opposite, in the quiet calm of a room discussing the matter, would agree that this is desirable—highly desirable.

The next section deals with a matter of procedure with which I am not in sympathy and never have been since the end of the war, because it provides for the seizing and forfeiture of property on the warrant of the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. That is not the general purpose of our law, to clothe an official with that authority under a special act of this significance. But what amused me was this. One would think that there were no such similar provisions in the laws of the country. What about gaming devices? What about houses of ill repute? What about the question of the right of police officers and chiefs of police to seize property, with or without a search warrant in some cases? What about the issue of warrants by magistrates, justices of the peace, and judges of county courts? All these things are provided for in the statute. To us some of them seem trifling because our attention has never been directed to them, but they have been there ever since we have endeavoured by statute to clarify the criminal common law since the days we started, in 1892, to codify the law consequent upon the report primarily of a British commission and the work of Sir James Fitzstephen. But leaving that out, I wonder whether hon. members would take the trouble to turn up the code and look at the sections with respect to search warrants, the right to enter a property and seize things, to arrest people, and matters of that kind. All this is so simple that we take it for granted and do not for a moment give thought to it when we are dealing with section 98.

Subsection 2 of section 98, to which I have just referred, is an extraordinary section, and my personal view would be that as a matter of procedure, in view of present conditions, it would be better if it were removed. But when we come to subsection 3, which relates to persons who act as officers of these unlawful associations, does anyone suggest that it is not desirable to have punitive power, so far as this country is concerned, with respect to them?—not so much for the purpose of punishing in the first instance as for the purpose of ensuring, by placing on the statute books this legislation restricting our individual liberty to that extent, that the nation as a whole may have that measure of liberty which is synonymous with our institutions. Then you go to the next: what constitutes evidence of membership in an association. That is a matter that is debatable. Whether or not these clauses are adequate, or whether we might not amplify them, as to what constitutes evidence that one is a member of an association, I will not further labour. But these provisions of that subsection indicate that if certain conditions exist there is a presumption that a man is a member of that association, a presumption that may be rebutted by cogent evidence.

Subsection 5 is only an amplification of what we have had as the law of the country for a very long time. If a man rents a house knowing that it is to be used for prostitution, he cannot recover rent. That is fairly clear and the reason is obvious. If he rents his house for the purpose of having it used as a gambling joint, he is in the same position, and we have merely said in this subsection that the owner of a building who knowingly permits meetings to be held in it for the promotion—the promotion, mark you—of the destruction of our institutions, by force and injury to people, makes himself liable. But he must have knowledge, and unless you can prove that he has knowledge there is no responsibility. In other words, it is the old story: If a man has knowledge of the fact that certain things are to be done, improperly or illegally, or that certain property of his is to be used for improper or illegal purposes, he cannot escape the result of his own acts, and we have here said that he should be liable.

Subsection 6, which also is a matter of procedure, provides for a search warrant being issued, and there is nothing in that subsection that derogates from the general principles with respect to the issue of search warrants. It is a statement of the conditions under which a search warrant may be issued for a given purpose.

There follow further provisions in clause 7 as to the procedure to be adopted. Then you pass into the realm of sedition, about which the minister was speaking this morning. Here we have provisions against the publication of seditious books and the circulation of books and newspapers, and obviously, if we are going to have these provisions, against the importation of such books and newspapers. The next clause deals with the duty of government employees, who have had brought to their attention evidences of the commission of the offences to which I have referred, to take immediate steps to remedy the conditions so far as it may be within their power so to do.

Apart only from the procedure indicated in the subclause to which I specially directed attention, is there anything in section 98 which reasonable citizens should desire to have removed? Is there in this chamber any reasonable citizen who will say: I am not prepared to make that sacrifice of my individual liberty for the preservation of the liberty of the state as a whole? That is the test. Is there a single individual sitting here who will say: It is not right that I should make this surrender of my unquestionable complete liberty for the purpose of advancing the interests of the nation and which I do in the manner that is indicated, by passing this statute? It is true that some of our friends connected with labour organizations at one time believed this section capable of being used against strikes, and I understand that a legal opinion was given that there was some question of that kind. I have always said, and I repeat, that if there were any doubt upon that point it could easily be removed, but for my own part I believe, and I think the law officers of the crown, that is the Department of Justice, were clear on the matter, that there is nothing therein contained that could be regarded, by any possible stretching of language, as capable of being utilized against those engaged in a strike which under our law is lawful.

The minister proposes to repeat the section in its entirety. If his purpose were to amend it along the lines I have suggested, or any lines that his judgment might indicate as being more desirable, I would not for a moment question it. But in these days is it desirable to repeal that section? Take this city of Ottawa. On the staff of Ottawa university is a very learned professor who has given a great deal of time to the investigation of this situation, and whose pamphlets are worth reading. I wonder if it is known to what extent there exists in this very city, according to evidence that is now available, if any hon. member desires to ascertain by investigation what the situation is, a condition to meet which certain associations are being promoted and men are giving of their money to combat to the best of their ability. In one or two parts of this city will be found what are known as friendship houses, which are endeavouring to improve the situation by bringing home an adequate appreciation of conditions to the minds of those who are filled with, shall I say, very extreme views as to the desirability of remedying by force present day conditions.

There would have been no progress in this world unless there had been freedom of speech, unless the ideas of men of broad vision had been communicated to their fellows. The communication of ideas which are advanced, extreme, radical, has never been restrained in this country unless the direct result has been that which is contemplated by sections 131 and 136 inclusive of our law, that is sedition. This morning the minister was speaking on the subject of sedition. As a matter of fact we have on our statute book to-day a law against seditious words, which are punishable by imprisonment up to two years. The minister complained that under section 98 the punishment is extreme. But the punishment is only what may be, not what has to be, and when you say that a man "may" be punished by imprisonment for twenty years you might just as well have said forty, as far as the section is concerned, because the discretion rests with the court, after a verdict of guilty has been found, as to what the measure of the punishment shall be. In the case of those to whom he alluded this morning the punishment, of course, was far removed from twenty years.

I am correcting only one thing the minister said during his remarks to-day. He said that Buck was released by the same government or kind of government that was responsible for this section. I believe on analysis he will find that that is not quite correct. What happened in Buck's case is an exemplification of the very principle to which I have referred, that one prisoner should not be treated differently from another because of the character of the offence for which he has been committed. Buck was committed under section 98. He was in the penitentiary. The report on his case was just the same as on a man who was convicted, let us say, for stealing. The report was of good conduct within the terms of the penitentiary regulations, and when a prisoner has served half his term, which is the usual time, whether the conviction be for theft or for any other offence, if the other conditions have been complied with, the executive power has the privilege, which under regulation is the general rule, of giving him a ticket of leave or permitting him to be released on parole. That was done with Buck. It was done for two reasons: one, because he came within the regulations; two, because if he had been treated differently from others it would at once have afforded an opportunity for those who desired to say, and who prepared themselves to say, by communications they sent to the government of the day, that we were treating this man differently from other prisoners and that we, the executive, were imposing upon him a punishment that was not imposed upon other prisoners lodged in the penitentiary who had earned for themselves a ticket of leave or release on parole. Unfortunately I happen to know that that is the attitude that was taken by those who had to deal with him in that respect.

Under these circumstances we ask ourselves whether a case has been made out for the repeal of the section, or for its revision. Along the lines indicated by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), embodying views which I think have been held by many of us for a long time, it may well be that the procedure could be improved, and that with regard to the power conferred upon the commissioner of the mounted police it could be said with great truth that in these days, a long time after the condition that existed in 1918 or 1919, a search warrant issued in the ordinary way would be ample protection of the people of the country as a whole.

There remains one other matter. In 1928 the same minister who is now Minister of Justice was dealing with this matter. I think he said that he had moved five or six times that the section should be repealed. At that time he proposed to restore the section which dealt with freedom of speech. He said, on April 23, 1928, page 2303 of Hansard:

> At the same time section 133 which existed at that time was repealed and I intend to move an amendment in order to reinsert section 133. This was done last year and in the years previously, and it is only due to a mistake that this bill did not contain that provision. I think the house will see that parliament obviously went too far in 1919 when the section which I am now going to read was repealed.

That section reads as follows:

> No one shall be deemed to have a seditious intention only because he intends in good faith,—
> (a) to show that His Majesty has been misled or mistaken in his measures; or > (b) to point out errors or defects in the government or constitution of the United Kingdom . . . ; or
> (c) to point out, in order to their removal, matters which are producing or have a tendency to produce feelings of hatred and ill-will between different classes of His Majesty's subjects.

If we look at the law as it now stands, Mr. Speaker, we find that since then there has been a change to some extent and that the sections dealing with seditious offences are sections 130 and following. Section 133a is now part of the criminal code of Canada, and in terms it is substantially the same as the amendments the Minister of Justice proposed to move in 1928. Section 133a reads:

> No one shall be deemed to have a seditious intention only because he intends in good faith,—
> (a) to show that His Majesty has been misled or mistaken in his measures; or,
> (b) to point out errors or defects in the government or constitution of the United Kingdom, or of any part of it, or of Canada or any province thereof, or in either house of parliament of the United Kingdom or of Canada, or in any legislature, or in the administration of justice; or to excite His Majesty's subjects to attempt to procure, by lawful means, the alteration of any matter in the state; or,
> (c) to point out, in order to their removal, matters which are producing or have a tendency to produce feelings of hatred and ill-will between different classes of His Majesty's subjects.

That is a part of the criminal law of Canada, and therefore it is unnecessary to reenact it. That was placed in our statutes in 1930. But the minister, no doubt intending to say, "I have repealed section 98 but I have enacted a provision that will be equally effective," proposes to provide for cases of sedition under the sections to which I have referred. I do not agree with the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) that under any circumstances this section can be regarded as equivalent to section 98, for section 98 does a great and useful purpose by defining unlawful associations and providing methods of dealing with them. Section 130 and the following sections deal only with seditious offences; that is the heading in the criminal code. After defining the various offences for which adequate punishment is provided we find the following words in section 133:

> Seditious words are words expressive of a seditious intention.
> 2. A seditious libel is a libel expressive of a seditious intention.
> 3. A seditious conspiracy is an agreement between two or more persons to carry into execution a seditious intention.

Now the minister proposes to add, as paragraph 4, these words:

> (4) Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the expression "seditious intention" everyone shall be presumed to have a seditious intention who publishes, or circulates any writing, printing or document in which it is advocated, or who teaches or advocates, the use, without the authority of law, of force, as a means of accomplishing any governmental change.

In other words by this proposed subsection we create a presumption that anyone who does what is indicated here is guilty of a seditious intention. That is, anyone who (1) publishes; (2) circulates (a) writing (b) printing or (c) a document in which it is advocated, or who teaches or advocates the use, without the authority of law, of force as a means of accomplishing any governmental change, shall be presumed to have a seditious intention. That, of course, is a rebuttable presumption but it places upon the man at once the onus of satisfying the court and jury, if there be a jury, that the intention which is presumed against him does not in fact exist. But that does not deal with the sections that have to do with unlawful associations. As was stated this morning, though not at length, by the former Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), these are illustrations but they do not constitute an all-embracing definition of sedition or of seditious offences. The common law of England is elastic and not rigid in that sense, and when the effort was made in Great Britain, as in Canada, to provide a definition for sedition or seditious offences it was felt that to endeavour to confine these offences within the narrowing boundaries of a definition would be against the best interests of the state. Therefore we have left the common law provisions as they are, but in at least several instances we have undertaken to indicate what are within that definition. We have not defined but we have said that certain offences fall within that definition, and those offences are indicated by the law.

In section 98 as it now stands we have provisions with respect to unlawful associations and the activities of officers of such associations which I do submit in all sincerity should not be repealed at this time, though one might desire to repeal some of the provisions that deal with procedure in that regard.

That is all, Mr. Speaker, that I desire to say with respect to the matter. I protest against this change in these days of uncertainty and unrest, knowing as I do the conditions right in this city and knowing of the activities that are going on and how much those activities have been modified, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) said this afternoon. Why have those activities been modified? Because of the arrangement recently made between Russia and France. Apparently, according to the information that has been given me, instructions have been issued that there must be a modification of the attitude of the Third International and those who spoke for certain interests in Russia, as indicated in the judgment of Chief Justice Mulock in the Buck case. That has been modified, and the reason is clearly apparent to everyone. But what assurance have we that that modification will continue? We have no assurance whatever, and the repeal of this legislation will be accepted by those who have been carrying on propaganda in this country so actively during the last four years as giving them added opportunities and greater scope for their seditious operations.

The finding, for instance, of the four judges in Saskatchewan should not be overlooked in this regard. That was a commission, certainly not friendly to the late administration by any stretch of the imagination; the conduct of the proceedings did not indicate any friendliness on the part of those responsible for it. But the finding of that commission—and I was surprised that they went as far as they did—made it perfectly clear that there existed a common purpose and that if necessary force was to be relied upon to accomplish certain ends. In the light of that fact; in the light of the conditions that exist in this city to-day, to my knowledge and the knowledge of many members of this house; in the light of what we read from day to day of the literature that is circulating and the secret gatherings and meetings that are held, is it desirable to leave this country without any provision to take the place of section 98, if you do not like it in its entirety, with nothing that will have a similar effect in dealing with unlawful associations and those who are associated in the creation and maintenance of such association?

Mr. ROGERS: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS: Does he believe that the penalties imposed by section 98 would be effective either to prevent or to arrest the growth of unlawful associations as defined by section 98?

Mr. BENNETT: I have not the slightest doubt that they have been and will continue to be, if they are allowed to continue on the statute book. I will agree at once if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) desires me to say that if I were drafting the statute I would not have set the penalty at a maximum of twenty years, but we know that penalties and sentences are wholly within the discretion of the judge who administers the sentence. I know also that in the case to which reference was made this morning the sentence was for a very much shorter period than the limit set by the statute. It does not follow, unless the statute says "not less than," that the sentence indicated has to be imposed. For instance, under the Post Office Act there is a very drastic provision which in some instances leaves no discretion to the court as to the sentence that must be given. But in this case it was left entirely free and in the discretion of the presiding judge to determine the punishment, the maximum being twenty years. As I said, it might just as well have been forty; for no judge would think it desirable to impose a sentence of twenty years for the offence in question. There is a disparity between the sentences under section 98 and those under the other sections of the act, but that cannot be taken to militate against its effectiveness.

When the minister asks whether I think the continuance of the section would have a salutary effect, I say yes, beyond peradventure. It is a matter of individual opinion. I may have drawn wrong conclusions from the manifestations of what I regard as seditious activities which have come to my notice. I may draw a stronger conclusion than my hon. friend the Minister of Labour would draw. That is a matter of individual opinion. But there is one thing that is not a question of opinion: are these efforts being made? Does there exist in this country any assembly or body of men and women who are urging upon their fellow citizens that force should be used for the purpose of accomplishing their end? The answer obviously must be in the affirmative. I will undertake to prove to the Minister of Justice this very night in this city, if he will give me time and come with me, that they exist. It may be that their force and effect has been overstated; about that there may be difference of opinion. There is a tendency on the part of some to exaggerate their importance. I am not doing one or the other; I am not minimizing, nor am I magnifying. I state the fact. Now, under these conditions, should we leave the Dominion of Canada in 1936 without any provision against that type of unlawful assembly and those who constitute its membership? That is the real issue. The proposed subsection 4 of 133 does not touch that. It merely says that one who does certain things is presumed to have a seditious intention. But that does not touch this question at all.

I regret that the minister has seen fit to make so sweeping a change. Had he at an earlier point in the session afforded an opportunity for a more complete discussion I have little doubt that hon. members of this house on every side would have been glad to cooperate with him to the full in endeavouring to provide in an intelligent way against what I think every hon. member will admit is an evil. And getting back to my original observation, if it is thought that the provisions are too drastic, if the restraints imposed upon the individual are greater than are necessary for the purpose of maintaining liberty in this nation, then we of course could take appropriate remedies to deal with that situation. If on the other hand the evil exists, then it is our duty to place such appropriate restrictions on the individual liberty of those who are threatening our institutions by force as will ensure to the body politic that measure of liberty the maintenance of which is essential if our civilization is to be preserved.

There are those who say it would be a good thing if that civilization were done away with, and force is the only way it can be accomplished. That is what they said in Russia. Those who deify Lenin and those who follow in his footsteps say: Unfortunately you will find there is only one way to deal with the situation, and that is by force. I recall the night that the report came out of the revolution in St. Petersburg. As I came out of the old museum building I happened to meet Sir Wilfrid Laurier and we stopped and discussed the matter for a moment. I pointed out that the last dispatches indicated that they had gone to the point of carving up the body of an old admiral into cubes and dropping them under the ice as food for the fishes. I always remember the answer he gave. He said: Yes, these excesses are similar to what happened in the days of the French revolution; the very excesses will in themselves bring about the inevitable reaction. We now know that the excesses have brought about a reaction. But the period of time that elapsed between the commission of the offences against—shall I say, using a mild term—the amenities of civilization, and the day that the reaction began, was so prolonged that the effect upon the world as a whole has not yet been measured. I am not fearful at the moment that we are going to have an uprising in this country which will bring about by force similar results; not for a moment. Neither do I desire in any sense to magnify the possible result. But I do desire to point out as strongly as is within my power that unless we make some provision against such unlawful assemblies and those who constitute the membership in them we have not taken the steps to restrain individual activities and individual liberty that are essential to the maintenance of our national liberty. That in my judgment is quite clear.

Of course I am not unmindful of the argument that prevails in some quarters: "Let the commons repeal it; there is another chamber." But I am not impressed with that argument. The evidence of history is that after the commons house of parliament has acted in a matter five or six times, or after a government which has come fresh from the people with a great majority has passed certain legislation, neither in England nor on the continent or elsewhere has there ever been manifest a desire on the part of another chamber differently constituted as to views upon public issues to take action sharply different from that taken by the commons. There has always been in second chambers that recognition, which is sometimes designated by harsh critics by another name, that recognition of the will of the people having asserted itself in a particular way, and the willingness to follow the pathway blazed by the commons.

I do not believe the Canadian people, if the question were submitted to them to-day by a plebiscite and they understood section

98, would desire to have it repealed. They would undoubtedly desire to have it modified, and I think along the lines I have suggested. I can do nothing with respect to the passage of this legislation. The government has announced that it proposes to repeal section 98. It has the power, and contends that it has the mandate to do so. I shall content myself with merely making this protest and asking the clerk at the table to record that the second reading of the bill was carried on division.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, before the bill is given second reading I should like to say a few words. First of all may I say that from observations made this afternoon by hon. members to my right I am more and more convinced of the similarity between the Conservative and communist minds. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Wilton) could not understand anyone supporting views advocated by communists. He seems to forget that soviet Russia, the only country which has made any approach to the communist state—and of course it is not communist; they admit they are neither communist nor socialist—and the only country about which one thinks when he hears a reference to communism, was invited by the nations of the world, at a time when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was representing Canada, to participate in the activities of the League of Nations. That is clear proof that even a communist state or representative may have something of value to offer at this time.

Shortly after the leader of the opposition made his now famous radio talks prior to the session of 1935 I made a statement which appeared in the press to the effect that I was glad the then prime minister was going to do some of the things we had advocated for so many years. For that announcement a vote of censure came from communist sources. I believe it is time we departed from such childish attitudes of mind.

In connection with this legislation we of this group find ourselves in much the same position as we have been when other legislation has been before us. I am convinced that the present measure is an improvement, despite the language of section 4 of the bill, which I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will find his way to amend before final passage of the measure. The repeal of section 98 is desirable. People will have less difficulty in giving expression to their thoughts, even in regard to our so-called institutions, without fear of being punished for so doing.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Beginning his observations the leader of the opposition said that the maintenance of liberty depends upon the restraint of individual liberty. That is true. To some extent the liberty of the mass depends upon the restraint of the liberty of the individual, and I am convinced that any government should, and must have sufficient powers to maintain order. But after I say that I must add that governments have functions in addition to that of the maintenance of order. They must find out why disorders arise, and must remove the cause not by repression but by making the necessary social and economic adjustments which will make disorder unnecessary. People do not become disorderly just for the mere joy of doing so. Of course some may, but I suggest the great majority do not. It is very difficult indeed to get people to act in an orderly fashion to remove an injustice in legal ways, let alone in a disorderly manner.

On various occasions in the debate reference has been made to Russia. That which took place in Russia was the inevitable thing which would take place in any country governed as Russia was governed. The masses in Russia had no other recourse, no other possibility of making changes except through the use of force. I shall read briefly from the works of an author for whom I have great regard. Lord Macaulay, in his essay on Milton, dealing with the situation in England during the civil war of 1649 makes a case analogous to the situation in Russia in 1917. He writes:

> Many evils, no doubt, were produced by the civil war. They were the price of our liberty.

Many evils undoubtedly followed the revolution in Russia, but is there anyone to-day who would want to put Russia back under the czars? There is not.

> Has the acquisition been worth the sacrifice? It is the nature of the Devil of tyranny to tear and rend the body which he leaves. Are the miseries of continued possession less horrible than the struggles of the tremendous exorcism?
> If it were possible that a people brought up under an intolerant and arbitrary system could subvert that system without acts of cruelty and folly, half the objections to despotic power would be removed. We should, in that case, be compelled to acknowledge that it at least produces no pernicious effects on the intellectual and moral character of a nation. We deplore the outrages which accompany revolutions. But the more violent the outrages, the more assured we feel that a revolution was necessary. The violence of those outrages will always be proportioned to the ferocity and ignorance of the pepole; and the ferocity and ignorance of the people will be proportioned to the oppression and degradation under which they have been accustomed to live. Thus it was in our civil war. The heads of the church and state reaped only that which they had sown. The government had prohibited free discussion; it had done its best to keep the people unacquainted with their duties and their rights. The retribution was just and natural.

Is that not an accurate picture of the situation which maintained in Russia prior to the revolution of 1917? If in Canada we wish to make changes orderly, as they must be made, then we shall have to seek the causes of disorders, and not try to repress them by unwise laws. Lord Macaulay continues:

If our rulers suffered from popular ignorance, it was because they had themselves taken away the key of knowledge. If they were assailed with blind fury, it was because they had exacted an equally blind submission. It is the character of such revolutions that we always see the worst of them at first. Till men have been sometime free, they know not how to use their freedom. The natives of wine countries are generally sober. In climates where wine is a rarity intemperance abounds.

And at a later point:

Ariosto tells a pretty story of a fairy, who, by some mysterious law of her nature, was condemned to appear at certain seasons in the form of a foul and poisonous snake. Those who injured her during the period of her disguise were forever excluded from participation in the blessings which she bestowed. But to those who, in spite of her loathsome aspect, pitied and protected her, she afterwards revealed herself in the beautiful and celestial form which was natural to her, accompanied their steps, granted all their wishes, filled their houses with wealth, made them happy in love and victorious in war. Such a spirit is liberty. At times she takes the form of a hateful reptile. She grovels, she hisses, she stings. But woe to those who in disgust shall venture to crush her! And happy are those who, having dared to receive her in her degraded and frightful shape, shall at length be rewarded by her in the time of her beauty and her glory!

I think it behooves hon. members to read those sentiments. In doing so they will realize that we can make progress only by continually seeking out the things that cause unrest. We have on our statute books a great many laws for the maintenance of order, but we have very few to prevent the exploitation of our people. We can make any law in this parliament to maintain order, but let us try to make a law that seeks to prevent the exploitation of the masses of the people and immediately the question of its constitutionality is raised. Immediately it is taken to the courts.

Mr. ROGERS: There is obviously a distinction between the two types of statute. No one has ever questioned the competence of the dominion parliament to deal with criminal law, but when we consider the other type of legislation to which the hon. member has referred, that is, social legislation, a considerable doubt as to competence has been entertained by the Department of Justice over a very long period of time.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is the very point I wish to make. If this parliament had been intent on bringing about a better social organization, more economic equality and more social justice, then long ago it would have had the necessary constitutional authority to pass the necessary social legislation.

Mr. ROGERS: By consultation with the provinces.

Mr. MacINNIS: By consultation with the provinces and by necessary changes in the constitution. Where there is a will there is a way, and these things can be done. What is the government going to do with the reform legislation passed last year which has been declared ultra vires? Is it going to let it go at that and say that nothing can be done about it? We will not get over these difficulties by increasing the military and police forces and building more penitentiaries. You can remove those conditions only by removing the social conditions which give them birth. I quote again from the same author:

There is only one cure for the evils which newly acquired freedom produces; and that cure is freedom. When a prisoner first leaves his cell he cannot bear the light of day; he is unable to discriminate colours, or recognize faces. But the remedy is, not to remand him into his dungeon, but to accustom him to the rays of the sun. The blaze of truth and liberty may at first dazzle and bewilder nations which have become half blind in the house of bondage. But let them gaze on, and they will soon be able to bear it. In a few years men learn to reason. The extreme violence of opinions subsides. Hostile theories correct each other. The scattered elements of truth cease to contend, and begin to coalesce. And at length a system of justice and order is educed out of the chaos.

Many politicians of our time—

This is about one hundred years ago, but the same is true to-day—

—are in the habit of laying it down as a self-evident proposition, that no people ought to be free till they are fit to use their freedom. The maxim is worthy of the fool in the old story, who resolved not to go into the water till he had learnt to swim. If men are to wait for liberty till they become wise and good in slavery, they may indeed wait forever.

If men are to continue to live under the exploitation and misery which obtain under present economic conditions without making a protest, they will surely wait forever. It is only by protesting and by drawing attention to these conditions that you can get parliaments and governments to act.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no limitation on that right.

Mr. MacINNIS: None whatsoever, but a person would almost think there was a limit because of how little of it has been done.

I do not want to occupy the time of the house in speaking further in this connection. I have not the necessary legal training with which to judge the value of the present bill. As I said in the beginning, I believe it is an improvement, but before the bill passes I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will find some way to define more clearly section 4. We will have so much accomplished, but it will not prevent our asking for more if more is necessary.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief in what I have to say. I support entirely the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) when he introduced this measure. I should like also to commend the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) for the very moderate tone of his contribution to this debate. I am opposed to the retention of section 98 in our criminal code on two grounds. In the first place, I think it constitutes, if not directly then by implication, a threat to the right of free association. In the second place, I think it has been demonstrated through the course of time that this section is neither effective nor necessary for the safety of the state.

Our democratic system and our democratic institutions are under attack the world over, and it ought to be the duty of every person to maintain our existing democratic institutions so far as it is within his power to do so. The continued existence of these democratic institutions depends upon the maintenance of certain fundamental and precious rights. These are the rights of freedom of thought and speech, freedom of religion and freedom of association and assembly. These are the springs of progress and reform; they constitute the most precious heritage that we have derived from Great Britain, which has always been the home of individual liberty. In recent years we have seen the devastating results of the dictatorships that have been set up in various parts of the world, with their destruction of free institutions and their negation and denial of personal liberty. We must resist every encroachment upon every one of these fundamental rights.

I think we are all agreed that freedom of speech is essential to progress. New ideas are necessary to reform. Our social system is far from perfect and we ought not to be too quick to find anything seditious or revolutionary in new ideas that may be advanced. Anyone who has read history knows that rebellion has often been the father of liberty, and that the rebel of yesterday is often the patriot of to-day. Indeed, the greatest reforms that have taken place have been the result of courageous attacks against existing institutions and what was then constituted authority. We ought to preserve in this chamber the right to criticize; we ought to preserve that right not only for ourselves but for every free citizen of this country, because freedom of opposition is essential to good government, just as essential as the government itself. Freedom of criticism outside this chamber is something that ought not to be curtailed in any way.

We have guaranteed freedom of religious thought and religious observance, and have gone a long way in this country to see that this great right is maintained. Yet there are people in Canada who would like to take away that right of religious freedom. Once you take away one right who can say when the next will disappear.

Perhaps the most valuable of the rights I have referred to is the right of free association, and it is because we feel that this right is threatened that we are opposed to the retention of section 98.

Mr. BENNETT: But the hon. gentleman would say that it would have to be association for a lawful purpose, would he not?

Mr. THORSON: It is difficult to draw the line as to what is meant by force. The threat to the right of free association may not perhaps be directly contained in section 98, but it is there by implication, and on the part of organized labour there has been a continuous desire ever since the enactment of the measure to bring about its repeal. It has been repugnant to organized labour, for they regard it as a threat to their right to organize. What would have been the position of the workmen of this country if the former attitude that existed towards trade unions had been maintained? It is not long since trade unions were regarded as illegal organizations and were opposed and resisted upon that ground, but I think there is now general agreement that perhaps the greatest influence there has been for the improvement of the condition of the workers of Canada and of other countries where they have organized has been the trade union. Trade unions involve in essence, if not directly then by implication a certain amount of force; for the right to organize carries with it the right to strike. We recognize the right of collective bargaining, and collective bargaining involves the right to strike under certain circumstances; while the right to strike may be technically the right not to work, there is involved in the right to strike an element of force, an element of mass action; workmen organize themselves into trade unions so that they may have the benefit and the value of the mass action that results from the unity of their forces. We now recognize trade unions; we no longer regard them as illegal associations We recognize the doctrine of collective bargaining; we recognize that it involves the right to strike. We have tried to devise legislation that will bring about conciliation between employer and employee under certain circumstances, preliminary to there being a strike.

Progress has always been a continuous struggle between opposing forces; when there is a struggle between opposing forces those forces that are not organized always lose in the contest with those forces that are organized. I should like to see various groups and classes in this country organize themselves for the preservation and maintenance of their rights, just as workers in Canada and in the old land have organized themselves into trade unions for the betterment of their condition. I believe that various classes of primary producers must organize if they are to see that their rights are properly maintained. I think there must be organizations of consumers in this dominion for the purpose of fighting the forces of monopoly that are themselves well organized. I would not like, therefore, to see retained in our statutes any law that threatens in any way the right of free association, which is the essence of the right to organize.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the hon. gentleman does not mean his statement just as he has said it, because that would mean unlawful associations. I think he must intend some limitation.

Mr. THORSON: I would allow the right of association, and would not wish to see any interference with that right. If any member of an association is guilty of a breach of the peace, the law of sedition and the general law of the country relating to the preservation of the peace will be sufficiently wide to cover his particular case. There are certain rights that we possess, such as the right of free speech and free association, rights that are so valuable—

Mr. BENNETT: But free speech is limited.

Mr. THORSON: Exactly. It is limited in the same way that the right of free association is limited when it comes to a question of the individual who breaks the law. The point I wish to make is that reforms can come only as a result of organized effort, and we ought not to put any obstacle in the way of those who seek to associate with one another for the prosecution of necessary reforms. When it comes to breaches of the peace and questions affecting the safety of the state, we have ample legislation to ensure our interests in that regard. I shall deal with that aspect of the matter in a moment.

I think it will be generally agreed that, so far as this subject is concerned, this is the mildest debate that has taken place in this house and that speakers throughout the debate have adopted a more moderate tone than in similar previous discussions. This legislation has passed the House of Commons, I believe, six times, and been rejected by the Senate. On a number of occasions in former debates the opposition to the repeal of section 98 was based upon the ground that the section had never been used and that, therefore, there was no harm in its retention. But it has recently been used.

In the course of this debate a good deal has been said about communism, and I should like to add a few words on the subject. In my opinion communism in this country is a bogey. I do not believe we need have any fear of it if we insist upon the maintenance of our individual rights and liberties. I also suggest that communism will never be put down by what may be described as the iron heel of ruthlessness; any attempt to suppress communism by force will strengthen communistic activities rather than weaken them, for martyrdom begets sympathy and it creates followers; that has been the history of such movements in the past and it has been our experience in recent years. The most effective course to follow in our combat with communism and the best weapon we can use is to remove the causes of discontent, for communistic leaders feed their followers upon discontent. The next best course is to bring communism right out into the open. I say to the right hon. leader of the opposition that the release of the communist leaders on parole was a more effective step towards the diminution of communistic strength than was their arrest and conviction. When they were arrested and convicted, the effect was to drive their activities underground. When they were released and were free to appear on every platform as leaders of communism, the people had an opportunity of listening to them and their activities were brought out into the open. We know the result at the last election. They had, I believe, eleven candidates in the field in the dominion. Nearly all of them lost their deposits; many of them got very few votes. I recall my own experience in meeting communistic activity in the constituency which I now represent. At the end of my speeches we had question time. At that time the communist agents were there; they followed me from place to place, particularly in those polls which had been strongly communistic. The people enjoyed immensely the questions and the answers that were given those questions. In polls where communistic activity had been strong, so strong in 1930 that the votes in such polls were almost solidly communistic, the people had been listening to communistic propaganda for the past five years, had heard the promises made by the communist leaders, had been examining what had been placed before them by the communists. At the last election support of communism almost disappeared, or if it did not disappear, it dwindled in many cases to negligible proportions. I think that indicates the best course to follow.

In my opinion the right hon. leader of the opposition made the best argument in support of the repeal of section 98 that could possibly be made when he said that the provincial authorities had refused to enforce it. The reason they did so is, no doubt, that public opinion was against the enforcement of the legislation. When a statute reaches the point where it no longer holds the support and approval of public opinion the time has come for its repeal.

Particular use has been made of the bogey of communism to frighten the people of Canada against the activities of communists, particularly in districts where the people are of foreign origin. While I am speaking on this subject I desire to say a few words on behalf of one class of foreign-born Canadians, the Ukrainians. There is a good deal of communistic activity among the Ukrainian people of this country, but nowhere is there fiercer opposition to the progress of communism than among the Ukrainian people. Their organizations are fighting it ceaselessly and are carrying on against it a more intense drive than anyone else. It is out in the open; in my opinion, there is no need to fear in the least the progress of communism so long as we maintain and insist upon our full rights of individual liberty and freedom. I would also point out that the main leaders of communistic activity in this dominion are not of foreign origin; they are of English or Scottish origin.

The danger of communism has been magnified particularly in the province of Quebec, where the Liberal party has been pictured as though it were in league with communism. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Nothing could be falser than the cartoon on this subject which was published widely in the province of Quebec, portraying the Liberal party as being the friend and the ally of communism. The principles of Liberalism are fundamentally different from those of communism.

Mr. THORSON (Translation): On this subject, sir, I wish to say a few words in French to my friends from the province of Quebec. They know that the great principle of Liberalism is individual liberty and that the Liberal party will safeguard the rights they hold sacred. The hon. members from the province of Quebec, whose speeches in this house I have listened to with pleasure, express themselves sometimes in French and sometimes in English. But when using the French language, they too often create the impression that the right to speak French in this house is the exclusive privilege of Canadians of French origin. I feel that I should protest against that claim because this right belongs to every hon. member of this house irrespective of his origin.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. THORSON: This is the first time that I venture to address this house in French, but, sir, when I endeavour to do so, I exercise a right which is as much mine as yours.

What are our most valuable rights? I think you will agree with me that they are freedom of speech, liberty of creed, and the right of free association. My hon. friends the members from the province of Quebec will allow me to tell them one thing: If you tolerate any encroachment on these rights, even on that of free association as was done in section 98 of the criminal code, the door will be wide open to attacks against other rights which you prize even more dearly. Who could then tell where such encroachments would stop? If you are careful to safeguard all individual rights, you will have no cause to fear the inroads of communism.

(Text) We are in even greater danger in this country, Mr. Chairman, of falling into fascism than of being overcome by communism. There may be some value in the philosophy underlying some of the teachings of communism, much as we may be opposed to the manner in which communism was sought to be established in Russia, but I can see no value in the fundamental philosophy of fascism. Men give up the struggle for democratic government when they lose faith in themselves. It is then that they want action. It is then that they demand strong men to carry on government. It is then that they are prepared to surrender their personal liberties. When men have reached that stage they are in a state of despair. I do not believe there is any need for despair. I believe that under our democratic system of government we can bring about necessary reforms if we give proper attention to them and if we allow full and free play to the force that we should derive from the full exercise of our rights of free speech, freedom of assembly and freedom of association.

We have now had section 98 in the criminal code for some seventeen years. The provincial authorities have ceased to enforce this section. Labour organizations are opposed to its retention. There are serious defects in many of the details of the section. It has not proved an effective means of combatting the advance of communism. It will not be an effective means of combatting the advance of fascism, nor is it necessary for the preservation of the state. We have ample other legislation for the purpose. If any member of any association or organization is guilty of endangering the state the general law is wide enough. Certain offences against the state are provided for by the law of treason. The general law of sedition is as wide as it is safe for such a law to be. It is elastic; its application depends upon circumstances. We have sedition generally; we have seditious libel and seditious conspiracy, all designed for certain circumstances and certain occasions. We have laws against riots, riotous assembly and unlawful assembly. I would say that the legislation we already have is quite sufficient for the preservation of the state without making any unnecessary encroachment upon fundamental rights which are essential to progress and reform.

For this reason, and for the reasons I have already mentioned, I feel that section 98 constitutes an unwarranted interference with the right of free association; that it has not been effective in accomplishing its purpose and that it is not necessary for the preservation of the state. I am very glad indeed to support the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in everything he said, and will support the second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Permits.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have an amendment to this section, which has been suggested by the attorney general of British Columbia. After the word "property" in the third line of page 3 the word "or" should be inserted, so that the section will read, "or for use in connection with his profession or occupation."

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is right. I was looking at this section the other day, and I thought the word "or" was lacking.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Seditious offences.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In order to clarify the language, as well as the meaning, of this section, I would add the words "within Canada" at the end of the section, which then would read, "any governmental change within Canada." I have found that in the United States that is the wording used, "against the government of the United States."

Mr. BENNETT: It will be recalled that the original section of the act provided for a case where efforts were made to destroy the constitued government of the united kingdom, or of Canada, or of any of the provinces. "Within Canada" is not quite as broad as that provision of the section, which was generally accepted as not being an unfair provision as far as that phase was concerned.

Mr. NEILL: Would this not very much weaken the possibility of conviction? All that would be needed would be for the seditious language to be in general terms; then the accused could plead: Oh, I was referring to any governmental change not in Canada, but in some other country. As long as he used such words as "overthrow the government," that is all right, so long as he did not say "overthrow the government of Canada." Even if the language used were related to a neighbouring friendly state I do not know whether we particularly want to give shelter to those who, perhaps just within the border, want to carry on an extensive propaganda against the government of a neighbouring state. But I particularly call the attention of the minister to this point; as long as they couch their seditious utterances in general languge could they not plead that this section did not apply, if it contains the words "within Canada"?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The language used will certainly serve to interpret the meaning. I really believe it is better to restrict the section in that way. If somebody talks about Haiti or some other country in distant parts of the world where there may be trouble, I do not see why our law should make that a crime. And as I said, the legislation of other countries contains a similar limitation; they restrict the scope of the provision to their own country.

Mr. BENNETT: The section I had in mind is section 133A:

No one shall be deemed to have a seditious intention only because he intends in goor faith—

(a) to show that His Majesty has been misled or mistaken in his measures; or

(b) to point out errors or defects in the government or constitution of the United Kingdom, or of any part of it, or of Canada or any province thereof, or in either house of parliament of the United Kingdom or of Canada, or in any legislature, or in the administration of justice; or to excite His Majesty's subjects to attempt to procure, by lawful means, the alteration of any matter in the state; or

(c) to point out, in order to their removal, matters which are producing or have a tendency to produce feelings of hatred and illwill between different classes of His Majesty's subjects.

I think there is a point to what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has said. It seems to me, having regard to our geographical position, that we are making matters a litle difficult, if we have some of the highly skilled persons with whom I came into contact during the last few years in dealing with the question. I shall not mention names, but they will say: Oh, I was not saying a word about Canada; I had not the slightest intention of saying anything about Canada; I am just saying that this is a rotten way to govern a country. That is exactly what they will do.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For many years England was an asylum for political refugees, from Italy, Austria, and was even used as a base from which they carried on their political propaganda. They were welcomed even by ministers of the government. For example, if anybody thought that Haile Selassie had been improperly put out of his kingdom I do not know why there might not be some people in this country or in England who might do something to assist in restoring him to his throne. I assume the Italians are now the de facto government of Ethiopia. I think the united kingdom can look after itself without our worrying about what some might say about what might happen in Great Britain, and as for the country near by, I was reading just a little while ago that book of Sinclair Lewis's, It Can't Happen Here. Some may recall that the nazi people, or some acting very much along nazi lines, are portrayed as having set up a gouvernment in the United States. In that story Canada is represented as being an asylum for those seeking to get away from the outrages that prevailed in the United States. If anything of that kind happened I do not know but what a good many of us would welcome such refugees, and it might be difficult to prevent them from carrying on political propaganda. Surely the whole purpose is to protect anything that may need protection here in Canada. As I said this morning, as the clause now stands it would mean that we would have to rule out of our libraries a great part of the histories now found there. It would mean that all except convinced pacifists would have a great deal of difficulty in expressing their opinions as to the possibilities of force.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is hardly a correct statement. But is there not some international law that creates an obligation upon us in this regard? The minister will no doubt recall that when there was organized in London a conspiracy against Napoleon III, considerable discussion arose, and it crosses my mind that the general rule of international law among friendly peoples is that those who are agitating against the destruction of an existing form of government in other countries shall not find opportunity to carry forward such propaganda in a friendly country.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is another section of the code which relates to offences against foreign sovereigns. There is a provision relating to His Majesty the King and his countries or dominions; there are sections 78, 79, 80 and 81. There is a section somewhere that makes it an offence to use offensive language towards sovereigns of other nations. But what I rise to say is that if we have nothing in the criminal code, the ordinary law would apply with regard to sedition. As the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) said this morning, anything under the common law which is not repugnant to any statute of Canada applies in this country. Everything which, under the common law, relates to seditious offences in Great Britain, applies to Canada, except when we have something which would be repugnant to it. I do not believe that this amendment was necessary at all, except to make the section clearer. As we say in the section, the provision has not the effect of limiting the generality of the meaning of the expression "seditious intention." Anything that is seditious outside this provision continues to be seditious. But when the offence is that of circulating or printing a document in which is advocated the use of force as a means to accomplish governmental change in Canada, we have a special offence for which provision is made in the amendment before us. But it has not the effect of taking away other seditious offences. For instance, reference was made to provincial legislatures. The provision in that regard will still exist. May I call the attention of the committee to the fact that in section 98, which is being repealed, the words "within Canada" are used. I want to repeal section 98, but I do not wish to replace it by something which will be more strict.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I believe the addition of the words "within Canada" serve to clarify and carry out the law. The criminal code expressly states that where we have not legislated by parliamentary enactment, the law of England as it stands to-day and as it stood at that time applies. If there are any omissions in a statute we still have the common law of England to fall back upon. It is my opinion that cases of sedition will not be tried before county magistrates as was suggested by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. They will be tried in courts before trained judges.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not say "tried"; I used the word "investigated."

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): There are other provisions in the criminal code which cover what should be our friendly relations with other countries. I do not think it is competent for us to legislate what is sedition in another country. In fact, I cannot recall the name of the case—if I had the memory of the leader of the opposition, I might do so—but I cited it within the year, and I remember that it dealt with a distinguished Frenchman who was tried in England for uttering seditious language against—

Mr. BENNETT: Napoleon III.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): The Frenchman was acquitted because it was held that he had the right of free speech in England. In defending him his counsel said, on behalf of the prisoner, that one of the greatest sights injured innocence could see was the prisoner in the box looking upon twelve jurymen of his country, of which country they were for that trial. Right nobly they maintained that tradition and the man was acquitted.

I believe the section covers all any person could ask for by way of protection against seditious utterances calculated to overthrow the government of Canada. One argument was made to the effect that by repealing section 98 we were weakening our law and offering an invitation to evilly disposed people to continue preaching seditious doctrines. May I remind those who make that argument that our law, even section 98, does not begin to compare with the law as it stood in Russia in 1917 or in France before the revolution. The laws of neither country, harsh as they were, in the slightest degree prevented the revolutions; on the contrary I believe they contributed largely to bringing them about.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Is section 4 as amended agreed to?

Mr. HEAPS: Would not the Minister of Justice be good enough to try even to a limited degree to give us some idea of what he means by the use of the words "everyone shall be presumed to have a seditious intention." This expression is causing a great deal of perturbation and even lawyers who have read it believe it could be interpreted widely. If the clause carries in its present form, unless we have some explanation from the Minister of Justice there may be placed upon the clause an interpretation which would place the presumption of guilt upon any person arrested for sedition. Then, possibly he would express his ideas upon the words dealing with the advocacy of force. The interpretation by some judges has been far from satisfactory, and when the clause was inserted in the present bill I was wondering whether the minister had in mind only physical force.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As to the first point raised may I say that in any prosecution it will be the duty of the prosecutor first to prove an overt act. The prosecutor will have to prove that the accused person has published or circulated a writing or document in which force is advocated, or that by words that person has incited the use of force. When this is done the seditious intention is presumed. Perhaps the wording might have been different, but first of all there will have to be proof that the accused person has advocated the use of force; he is not presumed to be guilty of having advocated force, until that has been proved. When such proof is offered, seditious intention will be presumed from the fact that he has committed the act. That places a different complexion upon the objection of the hon. member.

I know what the hon. member has in mind in connection with the second point he raises. My right hon. friend referred to a legal opinion offered by counsel for the labour organization, in which it was stated that the word "force" in section 98 might be interpreted as other than physical force. For instance, in strikes there would be picketing and that sort of thing. The reason this particular counsel held that opinion was that after the Winnipeg strike Mr. Justice Metcalfe said the prisoner had stated that he wanted to use force to obtain redress for labour, and that he was referring to the moral force employed by the labour organization during the strike. Surely that would not apply in this section; this applies only to governmental changes. The word "force" as it appears in this section means physical force only.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister indicate whether the words "publishes or circulates" would apply to a person who sells the article?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, it would.

Section as amended agreed to on division.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Nuisances.

Mr. CHURCH: I had intended moving an amendment to this clause, but I shall not do so. While I have no objection to the technical change being made in this case, I think something should be done about what are commonly known as common nuisances. There is one form of common nuisance which takes the form of night noises in our residential districts. During the recess I hope the minister will look into the amendment in the British laws to deal with this matter. There is nothing so hard on the human system as noises at night. There are many people in our asylums to-day who should not be there. They are there because of nervous disorders and diseases, in some cases brought about as a result of the depression. In the old country amendments of this kind are brought down in the first week of the session. I do not say that the minister is to blame, but I think these bills which refer to the liberties of the subject, should be brought down early in the session. Some of the officers of the department should look into the law with the idea of dealing with these noises at night.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I shall be pleased to consider my hon. friend's suggestion. I would be ready to extend the time, because it is at six o'clock in the morning that I suffer most.

Mr. BENNETT: I see only one difficulty in this section. How can you say that an offence under the criminal code is not a criminal offence?

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I see the point raised by my right hon. friend. Of course I am not responsible for this, as the section is already in the statute. Possibly this defect can be remedied in some other way.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Vagrancy.

Mr. CHURCH: I think this clause goes a little too far, so far as our young people are concerned. If the minister will look at the criminal code I think he will find that paragraph (a) of the vagrancy section will cover everything which it is sought to cover by this clause. I should like to say a word or two about the high school youths who go to northern Ontario. The other day I read in the house a letter which I had received from a reputable commercial traveller. This gentleman said that he had been at Kirkland Lake, which some of the members visited recently, and he had found many of these young boys stranded there and unable to get work. Many of them have been arrested in these places as vagrants. Paragraph (b) of section 238 of the code is being widened by the insertion of the word "or." These young people are ready to take any work they can get.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They do not come under this provision.

Mr. BENNETT: This helps them.

Mr. CHURCH: I had a letter from a clergyman there who tells me that many of these young people left home with the honest intention of getting work. Many of these mines use European labour to a large extent and there are no jobs for these young people. I think paragraph (a) of section 238 of the criminal code is sufficient so far as these single young people are concerned.

Mr. NEILL: Would the words "or family" refer to a man's wife and children or to his parents?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The words would refer to his wife and children.

Mr. NEILL: Only?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Possession of instruments or disguise.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to revert to clause 9. I believe that clause should be redrafted. The amendment is to add the words "or street, road, highway or other place." I know of three Toronto high school boys who belong to the baseball team but who took a friend's car.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Bill No. 109, for the relief of Albert Leonard Johnson.—Mr. Ross (Moose Jaw).

Bill No. 110, for the relief of Reva Marcus. —Mr. Factor.

Bill No. 111, for the relief of Ethel May Luckie Atkinson.—Mr. Factor.

Bill No. 112, for the relief of Edythe Mary Ross Brown.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 113, for the relief of Joseph Paul George Marcoux.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 114, for the relief of Adjutor St. Jean.—Mr. White.

THE ORDER OF ITALO-CANADIANS

The house in committee on Bill No. 101, to incorporate The Order of Italo-Canadians—Mr. Denis—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Sections 1 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not oppose this bill. No doubt this society exists for many good purposes, but it will be seen that the powers and the objects are all provincial. I do not see why this parliament should be asked to incorporate this society when it can get all its powers from the province. I think it is a mistake for parliament to interfere with property and civil rights in this way. As I say, I am not opposing the bill, but I think it is a mistake to follow such a course. The objects in view are almost entirely provincial, and in my opinion this is a matter for the province of Quebec.

Mr. RINFRET: I know of this society. It is in the city of Montreal and has had a provincial charter for a number of years. It merely wishes to extend its activities to other provinces. I do not think the fact that the powers are provincial is an objection. The senate went into the bill carefully and I commend it to the committee. The society is a very worthy one.

Mr. CHURCH: I have no doubt that the society does a good deal of commendable social work, but in my opinion it is very largely provincial.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

QUEBEC AND MONTMORENCY RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal) moved:

That the order of the house for the second reading of Bill No. 88 (letter O2 of the Senate), intituled: "An Act to incorporate Quebec and Montmorency Railway Company," be discharged, and the said bill be withdrawn.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in connection with this bill, I ask your permission and the permission of the house to withdraw it for this session. Evidently there has been some slight misunderstanding in connection with the bill and the object it has in view, and in order to allow those who are interested in securing the passage of this bill an opportunity to educate those who are at the present time, apparently, somewhat opposed to it, I would withdraw it for this session, and hope to have the privilege of reintroducing it at the next session.

Motion agreed to and bill withdrawn.

FREE FOREIGN TRADE ZONES

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East) moved the second reading of Bill No. 108, to enable the establishment, operation and maintenance of free foreign trade zones.

He said: This bill was introduced in the other chamber. The only reason I mention that is to shorten my own remarks, by saying that it was before a committee of the senate that examined into the matter very carefully and reported it unanimously, and it was forwarded to this house in due course.

A brief statement of the bill is to this effect, that it authorizes the government by licence to permit provinces, municipalities, or public agencies to establish in any suitable port of Canada what is known as a free port zone. Some had the idea that a free port meant a port free of charges. That, of course, is not correct at all. It simply means an area within a port where goods may be received without entry through customs and may there be reprocessed, manufactured altered in any way and reshipped by export or admitted to the country under the usual customs regulations. I suppose the most outstanding free port in the world is that of Hamburg. Many others have been established in various parts of the world. I believe it was nearly twenty-five years ago that I personally brought this question up in the house and on several occasions during the next ten years I suggested or urged the establishment of free port zones in Canada, but parliament prior to some years ago had not seen fit to approve. However the idea or the policy of free port zones has considerably progressed since those days, and there are many such zones established in various countries of the world, detailed information regarding which may be found in the printed evidence of the senate committee which has been distributed to all members of the house. The bill does not impose any charge on the state. It is a permissive measure authorizing the government to license these public agencies to establish such a free port zone if, when and as the government may decide. As section 19 of the bill reads:

> No provision of this act shall be read as imposing or intending to impose, directly, indirectly or consequentially, upon His Majesty or upon the public revenues of Canada any expenditure or expense—

And so on. So, without delaying the house at all, I would ask that the bill pass its second reading, and, I hope, pass at this session of the house.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): This bill is a very important measure; it has come to the House of Commons at a late stage in the session, and the government has not had an opportunity of considering it in all its implications. I have read the bill, and I have read some of the representations—very strong representations—made against the bill to the senate committee that considered it, but I do not propose to go to-night into the subject of its merits. It has manifestly come to us at so late a stage that we cannot consider it as we should consider a bill of this importance. I therefore, Mr. Speaker, beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 96, to amend the criminal code—Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. CHURCH: At six o'clock I was saying a few words about section 9.

[Mr. Stevens.]

The CHAIRMAN: I am in the judgment of the committee, but my recollection is that section 9 was passed and that we were at section 10.

Mr. CHURCH: No, Mr. Chairman. At six o'clock I was speaking on section 9. It could not have been carried. I was speaking when you rose.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is a mistake; the section carried; but I should be quite willing to let my hon. friend go back to section 9.

On section 9—Motor cars.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to be unfair. I am trying to put this bill through. Later on I propose to help the house a little to hurry along. I think this section is an improvement, but I hope that in the recess of parliament the minister will consider the position of first offenders in the matter of what I was referring to at six o'clock as joy-riding. I mentioned the case of three young people belonging to a baseball team. They took out for two or three hours the car of a gentleman who was connected with them, and on coming back they were arrested; under the present law they are liable to imprisonment for a year. They have never been in any trouble before. I suggest that during the recess of parliament this motor car question should be referred to the law officers of the crown and something done to take care of matters of this kind. I believe this bill should have come down in the early days of the session, because it is a law reform affecting the most important thing we have, the liberty of the subject. In the dying days of the session many of the lawyers have gone home, and this bill does not get the consideration it should. I hope in the recess the minister will look into the matter carefully.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have much sympathy with those who want to enjoy themselves in the way my hon. friend suggests, but if this section is not amended as provided in this bill those young people who, without any right, take motor cars for the purpose of joy-riding are liable to be charged with theft, which carries a much heavier penalty. On the whole I think it is better to make the amendment.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Possession of instruments of disguise.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have an amendment, inserting the word "vault-breaking" after the word "housebreaking" in line 27.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I move accordingly.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 11 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

On section 21—Defence of insanity.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not still a six man jury in Alberta? The number in Manitoba and Saskatchewan was reduced to six, and if the Alberta jury is still six in number I think that province should be mentioned also.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I know the law has been changed as far as Saskatchewan and Manitoba are concerned, but I could not say as to Alberta.

Mr. BENNETT: I am told that the number is still six in Alberta, so I think we had better add that province also.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am advised that there has been no change in Alberta.

Mr. BENNETT: Then Alberta should be included also, if there is a six man jury there. This question of the sanity or insanity of an accused who sets up the plea of insanity under the old section of the code was decided by a jury of twelve, which is the usual number. But if Alberta still has a jury of six this section should read, "or in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta or Manitoba by any six jurors." Otherwise you would leave Alberta with the twelve jurors trying an issue of insanity while in that province there is no provision for more than six jurors.

Mr. TUCKER: In Alberta all juries are and have been composed of six men. This amendment provides that if there is an insanity issue directed before the trial proceeds, it shall be tried by twelve jurors except in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. If you do not specifically include Alberta in this section it will, I think, be found that the insanity issue will have to be tried by twelve jurors in Alberta, because this is a special provision for the trial of an insanity issue before the accused is given in charge to a jury. Of course, after he is given in charge on the main issue, there would be no necessity for mentioning Alberta, because they have always had juries of six in that province. That point of course is covered elsewhere.

As far as I am concerned I should like to see twelve jurors try these issues in all provinces. I do not want to hold up the committee but I am very much against six man juries in criminal cases. Of course, if you are going to have a six man jury try the main issue, I suppose it is logical to have a six man jury try the insanity issue as well, but I think many lawyers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba now agree that the twelve man jury is the right jury to try people, charged with serious crimes, rather than a six man jury which really is not a jury at all under English law.

Mr. BENNETT: The other day the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Manitoba decided that a six man jury was valid.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, because the parliament of Canada had enacted that a six man jury should try cases in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. As far as I am concerned, however—and I think many lawyers in Saskatchewan would agree—a six man jury never should have been established for criminal cases. Most lawyers held the opinion that it was quite all right to establish six man juries for civil cases, but when this was done that was used as the basis for asking that a six man jury should be established for criminal cases. I believe the experience has been that when you cut your jury from twelve to six the tendency is towards trial by judge and no longer trial by judge and jury, because six men are more readily subject to the influence of the opinion of the judge. It will soon be commonly urged that since you have got down to six man juries the next step should be to do away with juries altogether and have trial by three judges sitting together. Personally I see no reason why, when citizens accused of a crime in the rest of Canada can demand that they shall not be found guilty except by a jury of twelve men, we in the west when so accused should be in the position of being liable to be found guilty by six men. Anyone can see that the chances of being found guilty unanimously, as must be the case in criminal matters, by a six man jury are practically double the chances of being found guilty by a twelve man jury. Ever since the beginning of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence the jury has been composed of twelve men, and personally I should like to see that practice brought back. I do not agree with the six man jury system for criminal cases. I hope the Minister of Justice will secure the opinions of some of the organized legal bodies in Saskatchewan and Manitoba during the next year or so, and I think he will find that the opinion of most lawyers is that in criminal cases we should go back to the twelve man jury.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I understand that this change, which was made under the former administration, was brought about at the request of the provincial authorities of both Saskatchewan and Manitoba. As far as Alberta is concerned, under the Alberta Act that province had the right to keep the jury procedure as it was in the old Northwest Territories, and that is still the case, so it does not come under the present section.

Mr. BENNETT: But will it not come under the present section?

As it is now it covers all Canada except Manitoba and Saskatchewan, in terms which are exact and precise:

If such issue is directed before the accused is given in charge to a jury for trial on the indictment, such issue shall be tried by any twelve jurors, or in the provinces of Saskatchewan or Manitoba by any six jurors.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course it was the same drafting before, and still Alberta was under special laws. But my right hon. friend is right when he says that as the section appears the whole of Canada except Manitoba and Saskatchewan would require twelve jurors. I am told by my officer that Alberta does not come under this section at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know how it is possible to legislate for all Canada and leave out one province.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I believe that all the provinces which are excepted could be named in this section. However I shall take that into consideration, and possibly next year we shall do as we have done this year, correct these little anomalies as they appear. We have corrected many this year, and I know some still remain. This appears to be one.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to delay the work of the committee, but I find it difficult to accommodate myself to this. Here is a section which reads as I have indicated; when a plea of insanity is set up, as seldom arises, the law of Alberta says there shall be six jurors. Counsel will say: No, it is provided by section 21 of a federal statute passed in 1936 that except in Saskatchewan and Manitoba the number shall be twelve.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I agree with my right hon. friend that it seems anomalous.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 21 carry?

Mr. BENNETT: No; it is either right or wrong. The minister says he agrees with me. Let us include Alberta; that is the short way to do it.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am afraid it will necessitate other changes. Alberta is dealt with—

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, under the Northwest Territories Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It looks strange but that is the position as it exists. If we change it, there may be no bad effect, but I would rather postpone this clause and see whether the matter could be dealt with in the way my right hon. friend suggests without interfering with some other clause.

Mr. BENNETT: Far be it from me to stand in the way of a minister of the crown.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I shall undertake to see whether this can be done, and, if so, have it done by the senate.

Section agreed to.

Section 22 agreed to.

On section 23—Commencement of act.

Mr. NEILL: Why the delay?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am informed that it is the usual practice to give notice to the various provinces of amendments to the criminal code.

Mr. CHURCH: Before the committee passes the bill I have the consent of the Minister of Justice to bring up an amendment. The amendments are set out in Bills Nos. 5 and 57. I did not discuss this on second reading because there was so much discussion. But these are two of the most important bills dealt with this session. The minister promised me that the bill would be given consideration and in the committee I could add Bills Nos. 5 and 57. Owing to the length of the session I do not wish to delay the committee more than four or five minutes.

Bill No. 57 relates to motor cars. We have spent considerable time discussing one clause of an act which concerns only eight or nine people in Canada, and here is Bill No. 57 which concerns the lives of nine thousand people who will be killed and of more thousands wounded, yet we stand still and do nothing. I would urge consideration of this bill. I do not believe many hon. members have ever seen it. The bill did not get the consideration it should have had. It relates to level crossings, driving under the influence of liquor; it proposes to stop racing and cutting in; it provides that a person having caused death shall not drive for two years, and for women jurors on the trial of a woman accused, and it deals with cases where a charge of manslaughter arises out of the operation of a motor vehicle, providing that there may be a conviction for culpable negligence, a jury to decide whether the accused is guilty or not guilty.

The other bill had to do with giving people time to pay fines. I propose to substitute for the present law the law of England, known as "time to pay."

I am not asking the committee to adopt these bills to-night, but I say that the country from coast to coast is crying out to this parliament to stop this slaughter on the highways. It is one of the crimes of this age. Some of us here may be knocked down by a motor car and not be able to come back next session. Transportation should be the means to an end, and not an end in itself. What I suggested early in the session was that we should have real law reform in this country. Constitutional, parliamentary, cabinet and law reform are among the most important matters before us. The minister told me that he would not oppose it if I added some of these amendments to the bill. He was most sympathetic in regard to this question. I ask him if he will be kind enough during the recess to have his law officers look into this question of death on the highway. Hundreds of thousands of people are killed every year all over the world. They do not get a chance; they are just sent to eternity in five seconds. Our law is away behind the times; it was made about the time the motor car came into use. The minister requested me to let the bill stand. Some hon. members want to discuss the bill.

If no action is taken this session I am going to continue to press this bill and I hope at the opening of next session a committee of both houses of parliament, as was the case in England, will be appointed to take up this question of law reform, death and accidents by motor cars, the terrible toll of life and the question of the level crossings, and bring the law up to date. In England by taking action they have reduced these accidents fifty per cent. I admit that this matter is partly in the control of the provinces, but the criminal law is federal. Some people driving motor cars are not fit to drive them. In these days a motor car or a motor truck is a death dealing instrument in the hands of those who do not know how to handle it. As evidence of that fact we need only read the lists of week end fatalities during the summer months. We could fill these 245 seats five times over with the people badly injured since the first of January in the city from which I come, and of that number there were twenty-four deaths.

I am asking the minister to give this matter careful consideration; he has promised to do that. I would ask that it be considered early in the next session and that a committee of both houses be appointed to see if we cannot get some relief from the great numbers of tragedies on our highways. Dear knows we are far enough behind the times as it is, and while I do not want to press the matter at this time—I would like to see prorogation come quickly; the house cannot close quickly enough for me—I should like to see something done. The minister told me that if I withdrew Bill No. 5 he would give it consideration. I am asking him to do so, because I do not want to see him knocked down, and in view of the speed with which motor cars pass this building it is possible that he could be. I would like to see him live a good many more years.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): So far as Bill No. 5 is concerned may I tell the hon. member I have communicated with the attorneys general of the provinces. Six of them have replied, and generally may I say that they are not in agreement with the delayed payment of fines suggested by the hon. member. Under section 739 of the criminal code, which deals with summary convictions, under the law magistrates have the discretion to allow a limited time for the payment of fines. That provision may be sufficient to meet most of the cases the hon. member has in mind. However I am prepared to give the matter full consideration during the recess and to discuss it again with him at the next session.

The other bill to which he has referred deals with an important matter, and it too will be fully considered. The hon. member would make it an offence to cross railway tracks without first having come to a stop, and having started again in low gear. There are many objections to the proposal. We have received strong objections from almost every automobile association including the Manitoba Motor League, the Canadian Automobile Association, the Hamilton Automobile Club and the Nova Scotia Motor League. They state that the provision would be unfair to motorists, particularly to visiting tourists, and would be impossible of enforcement. They claim, too, that the danger would be increased, because after starting their engines in low gear the motorists might have a tendency to stall their motors in the middle of railway tracks. However, it is a fact that in my own province of Quebec this is one of the traffic regulations, although it may not always be observed by motorists. I would hesitate at this time, however, to make it an offence not to abide by such a regulation.

The other proposal of the hon. member is to make it an offence for a driver to operate his motor car while under the influence of alcohol. The present law states that he shall not do so "while intoxicated." This proposal would involve an important change and would also involve difficulties in connection with the interpretation of the expression "while under the influence of liquor." If, by some magistrates, a man who has had one drink were ruled to be under the influence of liquor, such a law would be dangerous. Of course, when prohibition was in force in Canada conditions might have been different, but in these days the liquor traffic is legal, and one drink taken by a man who drives his car should not, according to the judgment of many, be considered a crime. I do not know whether my hon. friend has a chauffeur, but if such a law were enforced those people who can afford the services of a chauffeur would be in a better position than the poorer people who cannot afford chauffeurs and would have to abstain altogether from having even a drink of beer, when in charge of their motor cars. I believe it would be well to give this matter more consideration, and again I promise the hon. member that I shall be pleased to do so.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I beg the indulgence of the committee to revert to section 19. I am sorry I did not notice how drastic it was when it was passed.

An hon. MEMBER: You are too late.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Perhaps I am; but there are some lawyers in the house who will be kicking themselves when they go home if some change is not made. I refer to the fact that by section 19 it is made obligatory upon a person committed fourteen days before the sitting of the court to make his election within ten days of that sitting as to whether he is to be tried by a jury. I think that is a provision which is entirely too drastic in its scope and effect.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This change has been requested by eminent legal authorities in various provinces, and more particularly by the Attorney General of Nova Scotia. It is for the purpose of avoiding heavy expenditures by the crown and to compel the crown to summon witnesses and to submit the case to the grand jury. When a true bill is found the accused elects whether he will go before the district judge rather than before a jury. I think on the whole the change commends itself because the accused person will have all the time necessary to make his election, and the crown will not be compelled to incur heavy expenditures.

Mr. TUCKER: Might this also apply to a case where a person might elect for trial by a magistrate under part XVI of the code? Would he have to elect within the time specified in this measure? I have not had time to look the matter up. Can the minister tell me whether a person desiring to be tried by a magistrate under part XVI would be required to elect within the time specified in this section.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No; that would not apply; it would apply only to those who are on bail.

Mr. STEWART: Who are committed.

Mr. TUCKER: A provincial magistrate in Saskatchewan can try any case a district court or county court judge can try. I would like to know whether this would require an election ten days ahead in cases where prisoners desired to be tried by a magistrate, under part XVI.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): A man has to be committed or sent for trial.

Mr. TUCKER: After a person has had a preliminary inquiry in Saskatchewan and is committed for trial, he can then elect to be tried by a district court judge or by a magistrate under part XVI. I would like to know whether he must elect within the time specified in this section if he wishes to be tried by a magistrate.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This applies only to a case that comes before a jury. He has to make an election to go before a jury or to be tried by either a magistrate or a district court judge.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT, 1934

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 78, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1934.

He said: These amendments will be found on page 520 of the votes and proceedings. There are some slight changes made by the senate to conform with the amendments to the Dominion Franchise Act in connection with qualification of voters. These amendments have been submitted to the chief electoral officer and approved. The senate also suggests an amendment to the title of the bill, which would read "provide for dominion by-elections". I do not think there is any objection to that.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move:

That a message be sent to the senate acquainting their honours that this house disagrees with their amendments to Bill No. 17, an act respecting the National Harbours Board, for the following reasons:

1. Amendment 1 makes impossible reemployment of many officers and employees of present harbour boards who have long years of service, and in addition would seriously handicap the board in the conduct of its many competitive business operations.

2. Amendment 2 arises out of amendment 1, and is not otherwise required.

3. Amendment 3 proposes restrictions that serve no useful purpose and which are not presently imposed on other government services.

4. Amendment 5 is permissive only and confers on the board no new authority. The government holds the view that the step specified by this clause is not desirable at this moment.

Mr. NEILL: Where are these amendments to be found?

Mr. HOWE: In the votes and proceedings of Wednesday, June 17.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): These amendments are to be found in votes and proceedings commencing at page 468 and continuing to the middle of page 470. I do not think it will be necessary for me to go over these amendments in detail. We are prepared to accept nearly all the amendments; perhaps I should say we are prepared to accept all the amendments, with one qualification. It will be noted in the middle of page 470 that a clause A is added to the bill, which clause amends section 257 of the Customs Act in such a way as to impose a maximum penalty of one thousand dollars instead of a maximum penalty of two hundred dollars. That is acceptable, but the clause which was amended contained the minimum penalty of fifty dollars, which we regard as very important. The senate omits any minimum penalty. Therefore, I beg to move:

1. That with the exception of clause A, the amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 67, an act to amend the Customs Act be concurred in.

2. That with regard to clause A, that clause be amended by inserting therein immediately following the words "one thousand dollars" in the substituted section 257 the following words "and not less than fifty dollars."

Mr. NEILL: Would it not be advisable to say "not exceeding one thousand dollars?" Is that not the customary language used?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is the senate's amendment, and we are accepting it.

Mr. NEILL: Under this amendment a man would be fined one thousand dollars or nothing.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is quite possible that the hon. gentleman is right about that. We have taken it to mean not more than one thousand dollars and not less than fifty dollars. I think the hon. gentleman is right, but there are two views. I remember quite distinctly that sections of that kind are open to the construction that they mean not more than the amount mentioned. We shall either have to change that or to let it go through as it is.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): There are fifteen amendments made by the senate, most of which are very minor; but a few are of some importance. I move:

That a message be sent to the senate to acquaint their honours that this house agrees to their fifth, sixth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth amendments to Bill No. 75, an act to amend the Income War Tax Act, and disagrees to their first, second, third, fourth, seventh, eighth and ninth amendments for the following reasons:—

Because, respecting the first amendment, paragraphs C and D of the first schedule of the act are "enacted" by section two of chapter forty of the statutes of 1935, not reenacted. To "reenact" is to enact again in the same terms. These paragraphs were enacted by the act of 1935 in terms different from that of the repealed paragraphs.

Because, respecting the second amendment, the first schedule of the act is repealed in precise words by the act of 1932-33, and a new schedule "enacted." The schedule is, therefore, not "amended."

Because, respecting the third, fourth, eighth and ninth amendments, the reasons for disagreeing to the second amendment apply equally to these amendments, and further, because these changes would have the effect of substituting a new and incorrect method of drafting the enacting words in a clause of a bill, a method contrary to that which has constantly been followed up to the present time, and would further have the effect of disrupting the uniformity of our statutes.

Because, respecting the seventh amendment, the word "and" would be substituted for the word "or," which is already in the act, and the effect would be contrary to the desired intention of the section, which is that a company shall be liable for the tax "if it should fail to file the annual return or to pay the said filing fee," that is, the company shall be liable in either case.

And further, that this house, with respect to the fifteenth amendment made by the senate agree to their amendment with an amendment to their amendment as follows:—

For the words "of said subsection (8)" substitute the words "of this subsection," for the reason that the words "of said subsection (8)" would be part of subsection (8) itself. As the words are incorporated in the subsection, it is preferable to use the words "of this subsection"; and

That the clerk of the house do carry the said message to the senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROVISION FOR NATIONAL BROADCASTING SERVICE AND REPEAL OF ACT OF 1932

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine) moved the second reading of Bill No. 103, respecting broadcasting.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time. and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Corporation constituted.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to the use of the words "representation to the principal geographical divisions of Canada," does that mean the provinces?

Mr. HOWE: Not necessarily. For purposes of broadcasting we consider the geographical divisions tc be: 1. British Columbia; 2. the prairie provinces; 3. Ontario; 4. Quebec; 5. the maritime provinces.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—Objects of the corporation.

Mr. HOWE: Paragraph (i) seems to have no particular purpose and there has been some objection to it. It reads:

[Mr. Ilsley.]

(i) collect news relating to current events in any part of the world and in any manner that may be thought fit and to establish and subscribe to news agencies.

I have not given notice, but if there is no objection I would ask my colleague to move that this paragraph be struck out.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I move that the paragraph be struck out.

Mr. STEWART: What is the object of striking it out when it is only permissive? Is it desirable that a commission of this kind should have the power to do just what this paragraph outlines, not compelling them to do it? What were the objections?

Mr. HOWE: In this matter I am not too sure of anything, for I believe that we are all experimenting. If anyone thinks that the paragraph should remain; that it is valuable, I shall ask my colleague to withdraw his amendment. The paragraph was taken from the British Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. BENNETT: When Mr. Gladstone Murray was in this country the question was discussed with reference to the powers conferred on the British Broadcasting Corporation, and the committee will find those powers, practically in terms in this bill. He pointed out that considerable value attached to this provision, and in Great Britain it was a source of substantial revenue, if I remember aright. It is only permissive.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): If it is the wish of the committee I ask that the amendment be withdrawn.

Mrs. BLACK: May I say to the minister that as far as the Yukon is concerned the radio is almost entirely worthless. I assume this is the case because the station on the island or at Vancouver is not sufficiently strong to carry the wave lengths. It may interest hon. members to know that while we had an idea of the general result of the election, which we gathered from telegrams, we had no idea of the members and no idea of the enormous majority of the government. All the news we got during the campaign was from San Francisco. All the news we get from overseas comes either through Alaska or through San Francisco. It may be of some interest to the committee to know that when I came here during the early part of the session I asked my deskmate who Mr. Sage was; I had never heard his name before.

Mr. HOWE: In the sessions of the radio committee the fact was brought out that several parts of the dominion are in the same position as that described by my hon. friend, and it will be the purpose to extend existing facilities as rapidly as funds will permit. Unfortunately our funds are limited, but we are slowly improving.

Amendment withdrawn.

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Approval of governor in council necessary respecting certain expenditures and disposal of property.

Mr. BENNETT: Why is it thought desirable that this corporation shall be solely under the control of the government? We had hoped that broadcasting in Canada might be out of the hands of governments. An effort was made in that direction; indeed, I think it was an accomplished fact, and the commission acted without considering the political effects of its conduct. Section 9 states that the corporation shall not enter into any negotiations without the consent in writing of the minister. I can understand that in its application to governments, but with respect to other matters, on this other point, everything is under the control of the governor in council. In other words, this becomes a department of government, with all the political abuses that follow from making this public utility an arm of government. I object to this. I do not wish to take up too much time about it, but I must enter a protest against the way in which this is being done. It really means that the administration have taken this great utility—I might use that word—and placed it completely under the control of the government. Because, if they say they are going to appoint a general manager, what has that to do with the matter? He has to come and see the government before he does anything. That means that the policy of the government is to be the policy of this administrator, and I do not think any man can be secured who will put himself into a position where he has to be the tool of the government to do what he is told to do. One can understand this provision that the corporation shall not seek any concession from or enter into negotiations with any British or foreign government without having first obtained the consent in writing of the minister, because that is an exceptional matter. But when one comes to section 10:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in this act, the corporation shall not, unless the approval of the governor in council has first been obtained:—
> (a) enter into any agreement involving any expenditure in excess of $10,000.

That means that the government of this country is running the broadcast.

Mr. HOWE: I think the remarks of my right hon. friend are quite unfounded. Section 9 is taken holus-bolus from the British Broadcasting provision.

Mr. BENNETT: No. Just look at the bill.

Mr. HOWE: I shall read it in a moment. The purpose of it, I think, it quite obvious. Negotiations with other countries are conducted through the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. BENNETT: I said I quite understand that.

Mr. HOWE: Passing on to the second matter, that is simply a limitation on expenditures. As a matter of fact the late government imposed on the present commission a more stringent restriction than that.

Mr. BENNETT: Because we had not the money.

Mr. HOWE: The present commission cannot enter into a contract for more than $5,000 without the consent of the governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Because we had not the money.

Mr. HOWE: Well, we have no money now. The position is exactly the same.

Mr. BENNETT: The government can lend them some money.

Mr. HOWE: I challenge my right hon. friend to show in any paragraph of this measure that there is any more government control in this bill than there was in the last. As a matter of fact it will be found that in this bill there is more latitude for the corporation than there has been in the past three years.

Mr. BENNETT: I should be glad to accept the minister's—

Mr. HOWE: I accept the challenge, and ask the right hon. gentleman to prove, as we go along, the statement he has made.

Mr. BENNETT: The word "challenge" would seem to be a rather warlike expression on the part of so peaceful a minister, so near the end of the session. If he looks at section 16 he will see at once that the difference is that the governor in council has to provide the corporation with a working capital of $100,000. When the former commission came into being we were not able to do even that. That has been the trouble. The Canadian people have not realized that this limitation imposed upon the financial assistance which could be given the radio commission necessarily restricted its activities. But in the present case we are contemplating, with the working capital it receives from the government, it is going to be able to do many things, and those things are under the control of the government. The old commission did not have anything to function with. As it did not have anything to function with, conditions were against it creating liabilities.

Mr. HOWE: It had $1,700,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. It got those as advances in connection with licence fees. All the revenues of the commission have to go to the corporation. I am only pointing out that if the government provides it with capital and imposes limitations, that is an entirely different matter from not providing it with capital and imposing no limitations.

Mr. HOWE: I do not accept that as proving the point of my right hon. friend.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Acquisition of property.

Mr. DOUGLAS: There have been coming to me resolutions from many church groups throughout western Canada, and in particular from the province of Saskatchewan. Rather than occupy the time of the committee with observations of my own I shall read just one of these resolutions:

> This conference would strongly urge upon our federal parliament the adoption of legislation and regulations which will bring all radio broadcasting stations in Canada under definite unified control through its national commission or corporation, with a view to securing satisfactory restrictions upon the commercial use of our Canadian radio stations.
> We would further urge that every effort be made to improve the standard of quality in program broadcasts throughout the week, and that such Sunday broadcasts be encouraged as will strengthen and unify the moral and religious life of our nation. We urge also that commercial advertising, sports competitions, and political propaganda be banned from our Canadian radio stations on Sundays, in harmony with our Canadian ideals for one day in the week free from commercial interests and partizan political controversy.

I think that speaks for itself; it is hardly necessary to elaborate upon it. I draw it to the attention of the minister.

Section agreed to.

Sections 12 and 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Moneys received to be deposited in bank.

Mr. HOWE: Before this section carries I desire to point out a difference under this bill, as compared with the prior bill, in financing the corporation. Previously the corporation was financed by an appropriation of parliament which has amounted each year, I think, to $1,500,000. This bill provides that the fees collected for radio licences shall be paid to the radio corporation, and while an appropriation is being made this year to bridge the gap, in future appropriations of parliament will not be made. That being the case, I think we should amend this clause by striking out the words:

> and of the service to holders of private receiving licences in the suppression of interference from local electrical sources.

The net revenue from licence fees last year amounted to $1,490,000, and the cost of suppressing radio interference was about $180,000. Therefore, to let this clause stand without an amendment would mean that the revenues of the commission would be considerably curtailed.

Mr. BENNETT: They would be about $1,300,000.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I think there is much to be said for making the control of interference a function of the Department of Marine for the present, at least.

Mr. BENNETT: At the general expense.

Mr. HOWE: At the general expense, yes. Control of interference has to do with other than radio broadcasting. It has to do with the radiotelegraph and matters of that kind. It may be that in a year or two receipts from licence fees will create a larger fund and we may again be able to include this item, but I may point out that, in effect, the government has been paying this cost in previous years, and we think that until fees come in more largely we should continue to do so. An encouraging sign is that our collections to date in respect of licence fees this year are equal to those received to the end of September of last year, so people are evidently getting "licence-conscious."

Mr. BENNETT: What amount of the collections made was transferred to the commission last year?

Mr. HOWE: Parliament voted the commission $1,500,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Because the money went into the consolidated fund.

Mr. HOWE: The licence fees were paid into the consolidated fund. The net amount, that is the fees less the cost of collection, amounted to $1,490,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, that went over to the commission?

Mr. HOWE: No, that went to the receiver general. The vote to the commission was the vote of parliament in the amount of $1,500,000.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Has the minister or the commission ever taken into consideration that there should be a difference in licence fees between urban and rural parts of the country? In the first place, there is not the same interference to be looked after in the rural parts as there is in the urban parts. In the second place, people who have radios in the cities can hook them on to the ordinary electrical current, and it costs them very little to carry on with their sets, whereas people in the country have to buy costly batteries and have them recharged several times throughout the year in order to have the radios running on the farms. I think the department should take into consideration imposing a very low fee for radio in the rural parts of the country and a higher fee in the urban parts, because people with radios in urban centres have not anywhere near the cost to meet in running a radio that is involved to the people in the rural parts.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I think it should be noted that there is a misprint in the reference at the side of this section.

The CHAIRMAN: I understood the minister to say that there was an amendment.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I move that paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 14 be amended by striking out all the words after "administration" in the seventh line thereof, to the word "such" in the tenth line.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: Since we are on the subject of the suppression of interference, has the minister given any consideration to empowering his officials to force people who have machines which produce interference to have such machines adjusted? Sometimes a man, to save an expenditure of perhaps two or three dollars, will put the radios of a whole community out of business, and apparently there is no authority for these officers to do more than point out the situation. If the man chooses to be a hog and says, "Well, I don't care," there is no remedy. Surely it would be easy to give the officials some authority to force such people to remedy the difficulty. The cost involved might be limited in some way, but where the cost is only trivial the officials should have power to compel the person causing the interference to remedy the condition. I do not suggest that a man should be compelled to put in machines costing perhaps three or four hundred dollars, but where it is a case of pure hoggishness in order to save a trivial expenditure, such as installing a little gadget on a fan, for instance, it is not fair to the other people in the district to allow such a condition to continue.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will read section 23 he will say that we have taken fairly complete powers in that regard. I may say that while we had no power to enforce the act previously, according to the report of the commission out of some 16,000 investigations only in some twelve individual cases was there refusal to comply with the request of the department, which I think is a very good record. However, under section 23 we take complete power to enforce these regulations.

Mr. FAIR: Before this section is carried I should like to endorse the suggestion of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). I have heard quite a number of kicks since the licence fee was increased, and I know the cost of operating battery radios in the country is high. In many cases it is also inconvenient at times to have the batteries charged, because it must be remembered that many people using these battery radios may live as far as thirty miles from the place where the batteries are charged.

Mr. HOWE: There are two sides to every question, and I think there are decidedly two sides to this question. The cost of serving a radio set in the rural sections is tremendously higher than the cost in the more crowded sections. For instance, we have all the wire charges across the prairies to serve not many more people than we serve in the city of Montreal or the city of Toronto. So I think the matter will bear closer analysis than it has been given by my hon. friend.

On section 17—Advances for capital works not to exceed $500,000.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be difficult to find a similar section conferring such powers upon any other commission. In this case half a million dollars is to be made available to the corporation by and under the control of the governor in council, not the corporation.

Mr. HOWE: This is something entirely new, in order to allow the corporation to function properly. That is, they are allowed the privilege of borrowing not more than $500,000 to undertake a project which they could not have undertaken in any one year. The difficulty at present is that the construction of a new high powered station is out of the question because it is impossible to appropriate sufficient money in any one year. If the corporation can show the government that the revenues are such that over three, four or five years they will be able to amortize a loan of that kind, under this section they are able to borrow from the government sufficient funds to carry on such a capital expenditure. I hardly think that is restrictive.

Mr. BENNETT: But unfortunately section 17 does not say that, and that is why I direct attention to it; it is not in accordance with the recommendations of the committee. The section does not even say that the money is being loaned. It says that the governor in council may authorize the construction of the work, and——on the recommendation of the minister, may authorize the Minister of Finance to place to the credit of the corporation from any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund such sum or sums as may be necessary to carry out such construction, extension or improvement of capital works: provided that the total amount which may be so authorized for the said purposes shall not exceed five hundred thousand dollars.

(2) Such moneys so advanced shall bear such rate of interest and shall be amortized on such terms and conditions as may be fixed by the governor in council.

But the section does not say it is a loan. The money is just placed to the credit of the corporation, and subsequently provision is made for the interest rate and so on. Previously we were not in a financial situation to make any such provision, although such requests were made.

Mr. HOWE: What is the complaint of my right hon. friend? What is the restrictive feature?

Mr. BENNETT: I think there should be something to indicate that it is a loan.

Mr. FAIR: I do not see very much to the argument of the minister with regard to the cost of upkeep of the wires, because those wires have to be kept up for the cities, and the country gets just what the cities do not need.

On section 24—Recommendations regarding private stations to be made by corporation.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: There is an amendment to be moved to this section. I may say there has been a misunderstanding with regard to the situation. We have been accused in parliament and in the press of taking powers that the minister did not have previously, but I think hon. gentlemen who read the present bill will find that it is the same as the previous act, under which the minister made the decision after consulting with the broadcasting commission. In this case we are going a step further and requiring the approval of the governor in council, which I think is a very proper improvement.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I move that subsection 1 of section 24 be amended by adding after the words "it may deem fit" in line 45, the words: "The approval of the governor in council shall be obtained before any licence for any new private station is issued."

Mr. BENNETT: Does the early part still stand, the part reading:

The minister shall, before dealing with any application for licence to establish a new private station or for increase in power, change of channel, or change of location of any existing private station, or making any regulations or changes in regulations governing the activities of private stations, refer such application or regulation to the corporation—

Does that stand?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Then it goes on:

—and the corporation shall make such recommendations to the minister as it may deem fit.

Then what follows?

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment adds after the words "it may deem fit" in line 45, the following: "The approval of the governor in council shall be obtained before any licence for any new private station is issued."

COPYRIGHT AMENDMENT ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO FEES, CHARGES AND ROYALTIES, AND TO CONSTITUTE A COPYRIGHT APPEAL BOARD

The house in committee on Bill No. 55, to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Infringement of copyright.

Mr. RINFRET: I do not intend to deal at any great length with the bill, which has already been referred to on two different occasions during the course of the session. I merely wish to remind the committee that this bill deals solely with performing rights of musical compositions. In practice the different sections of the bill are consequent upon the inquiry conducted by Judge Parker, appointed by the former government to inquire into the business of the Canadian Performing Right Society.

The act of 1931 provided for a commissioner to make an inquiry into the fees charged by a society, holding a number of copyrights. The inquiry took place in 1935 and the report was handed to the government during October of that year.

By an additional bill also introduced by the former government in 1935 a stay of proceedings while the inquiry was going on, was enacted, and inasmuch as the legislation was made necessary to allow this government to give effect to the inquiry conducted by Judge Parker, therefore the stay of proceedings has been continued ever since. It is absolutely urgent that this parliament at this session give the Secretary of State, who is in charge of copyright, the proper authority to give effect to some of the proposals made by the commissioner.

The report, which I have tabled and which I am sure is in the hands of everyone interested in the bill, made several recommendations. I just want to point them out in the order in which they appear in the bill.

The first section deals with a definition of private profit. The second section deals with the filing of appeals and the appointment of an appeal board. Then a subsection is introduced to prevent factious and unwarranted legal proceedings, also the recommendation of the judge. The last two subsections give the Secretary of State authority to make an adjustment of fees from January, 1935, when the tariff of fees was filed by the performing right society, until the date the appeal board which is proposed to be instituted makes its first report. I do not wish at present to say any more, but come to the first clause which is for the consideration of the committee. This is as recommended by Judge Parker, a clearer and more complete definition of what constitutes a performance without private profit. In the act of 1931 it was provided that no infringement of copyright could take place in a performance without private profit, one for religious, educational or charitable purposes. In another subsection it was provided that that should also include any agricultural exhibition or fair held under dominion, provincial or municipal authority. It is proposed in this first section of the present bill to make a clearer definition of what is a performance without private profit.

I now draw the attention of the committee to the first subsection of section 1, the underlined words:

> Provided, further, that such performance shall be deemed to be given without private profit if the only fees which are paid are paid to individual performers and that no fees or commissions are paid to any promoter, producer or contractor for services in promoting or producing the performance.

That is concerning performances for religious, educational or charitable purposes. I want to make it very clear that we are not now proposing the principle that the performer might be paid while the owner of the copyright might not be paid. The question is that we are dealing with the small rights of performers. It often happens that in a charitable concert, or performances of a certain kind, you may have most of the performers performing gratuitously, but if there happens to be a performer who receives a consideration for his work then in cases which have appeared before the court some judges have had doubt as to the meaning of the legislation. It was also the opinion of the judge who held the inquiry that the intention of the legislation in 1931 in defining private profit regarded the profit of the performance as a whole, and not that of the individual performer.

As to the second subsection, dealing with agricultural exhibitions, we propose a similar definition. I must say that on that subsection hon. members from all provinces and from all directions have come to me suggesting a change, finding that the proposed subsection was not complete. Therefore I have been convinced by the representatives of the people in different provinces of the need to make that subsection even clearer, to include industrial exhibitions together with agricultural, and to make another change which has also been suggested, namely, that the performance shall be deemed to be given without private profit if only individual performers or their agents were paid, provided such fees are not dependent upon the attendance at an exhibition or fair. I shall ask my colleague to move the amendment in order that it may be before the committee. I could say more, but I shall give the right of way to hon. members who desire to present their views, and shall be prepared to give all information required.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I move:

That clause 1 of the bill be amended by striking out subsection (viii) and substituting the following:

The performance without private profit of any musical work at any agricultural, or agricultural and industrial exhibition or fair which receives a grant from or is held under dominion, provincial or municipal authority, provided that such performance shall be deemed to be given without private profit, if the only fees which are paid are paid to the individual performers or their agents, and provided further that such fees are not dependent upon the attendance at the exhibition or fair.

Mr. CAHAN: When the bill was before the house for second reading, and was passed without discussion, I believe it was understood that an opportunity would be given to discuss certain phases of it before this committee. As a former Secretary of State who had a great deal to do with the passing of the amending act of 1931, as being chairman of the committee of this house which on that occasion heard the evidence of all parties interested, and having presented to the late government an application for an order in council appointing Mr. Justice Parker as a commissioner to report upon the facts then existing, such order in council being No. 738 and dated March 22, 1935, I believe I should make certain explanations to the committee. The present bill has to do with a proposal that charges made by the performing right society of Canada for the performance of music which has been vested in the performing right society should be subject to the consideration of an independent tribunal which shall have the power to reduce excessive, exorbitant and inequitable rates.

The act of 1931 dealt with performing rights in musical copyrights only, and it dealt only with those musical copyrights which had been acquired by a society, association or company which carries on in Canada the business of acquiring copyrights for dramatico-musical or musical works, or of performing rights therein, and which deals with or in the issue or grant of licences for the performance in Canada of dramatico-musical works in which copyrights subsist.

So far as I am aware that act applies to one society only, namely The Canadian Performing Right Society. It is the only society in Canada which deals in the acquisition of musical copyrights. This society was organized in Canada by two other then existing societies, one being the British Performing Right Society and the other a society which is not incorporated but which subsists in the United States under the name of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers.

These two societies entered into an arrangement for the organization of the Canadian Performing Right Society Limited, whose charter was issued under the Dominion Companies Act in 1925 with a capital of 10,000 shares, 5,000 of which were owned and controlled by the American society and 5,000 owned and controlled by the British society, except four shares which were used to qualify the directors of the Canadian Performing Right Society Limited, and three shares which were used to qualify three directors representing the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers. When I entered the office of Secretary of State, the Canadian Performing Right Society Limited, as their officials stated to me, had acquired the performing rights in over 2,000,000 copyrighted musical works. Under the law as it then existed, in order that the Canadian Performing Right Society Limited might acquire legal title to these several millions of works it was represented to me by the officials of the British society, at a meeting in London, that the payment of a registration fee of one dollar in connection with the registration in Canada of the assignments of these works to the Canadian company would represent an outlay of between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000, an amount which they regarded as excessive. They asked for an amendment to the Canadian act which would obviate the necessity for such registration. Therefore, it was suggested to them by me that this performing right society should not be compelled to pay a registration fee for the registration of the several assignments of musical copyright made to the Canadian company, but that it should be permitted to file from time to time at the office of the Secretary of State lists of all dramatico-musical and musical works in respect of which said association, society or company claimed authority to issue or grant licences for performing rights, or to collect fees, charges or royalties for such performing rights in respect of the performance of such works in Canada.

When the bill, which was drafted in 1931, was being considered by a committee of the House of Commons, the Canadian Performing Right Society appeared and was represented by its officials and eminent counsel who welcomed the proposed change in the Canadian act to the effect that registration fees would no longer be required. But they opposed most vehemently the other provisions in the amendment which would compel the society to file lists of musical works in which it claimed copyright, and which would also compel them to file a list of the fees and
