House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Wednesday, May 27, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DISMISSAL OF OFFICIAL RECEIVERS

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle):

1. Have W. R. Kinsman, senior official receiver, province of Saskatchewan; Walter Burns, official receiver, Regina district; and James Paul, registrar of the board of review, been dismissed?
2. If so, were their services not satisfactory, and in what particular?
3. Have these positions been filled?
4. If so, by whom and on whose recommendation?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Yes.
2. A change was considered desirable in the public interest.
3. Yes.
4. Edwin Sneath, Edward Lovell and Charles W. Hoffman have been appointed pursuant to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act on the authority of the governor in council.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS—EMPLOYMENT OF STUDENTS

Mr. FERLAND:

1. Did the dominion government organize in 1935 a number of geological surveys under the direction of the Department of Mines?
2. How many students took part in these surveys last summer?
3. How many of such students, so employed, were French Canadians?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Yes.
2. Five hundred and forty-six.
3. Twenty-five. It might be added that in organizing geological field parties of the Department of Mines, it is the practice to employ students proceeding to a degree in geology or mining engineering and who have completed at least two years of their course. These appointments are made on merit and, on first employment, the recommendation of a member of the faculty of the university is a consideration when rating a candidate. In the French Canadian universities little emphasis is placed on geological or mining engineering courses, with the result that it is difficult to secure from them students qualified in these branches of learning.

ASSISTANT TO CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. Has the government appointed an assistant, to the chief electoral officer, and, if so, who was appointed, and at what salary?
2. Is he related to Alfred D. Stewart, the president of the West Ottawa Liberal Association, and, if so, what is the relationship?
3. How old is he?
4. Is he a married man?
5. Where does he live?
6. When did the position become vacant?
7. Is he a war veteran?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. (a) Yes. (b) Donald Stewart. (c) $3,120 per annum less five percent deduction under Salary Deduction Act.
2. (a) Yes. (b) Son.
3. Twenty-six years of age.
4. No.
5. 251 Clemow avenue, Ottawa.
6. July 1, 1927.
7. No.

MANYBERRIES, ALTA., POSTMASTER

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Who holds the position of postmaster at Manyberries, Alberta?
2. On whose recommendation did he obtain the appointment?
3. Is he a Canadian or imperial returned soldier?
4. How is he remunerated?
5. How much did his predecessor receive in the year 1934?
6. Who has the contract to carry mail from the station to the post office at Manyberries, Alberta?
7. How did he receive his appointment, by tender or otherwise?
8. Who recommended him?
9. How much does he receive for his services?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. R. M. Hedley.
2. Dr. F. W. Gershaw.
3. Imperial returned soldier.

REVISED EDITION

4. By percentage on post office revenue, based on scale governing all revenue post offices.

5. $1,036.38, out of which $36.38 was deducted under the statutory deduction act, leaving a net amount paid, $1,000 for fiscal year commencing 1st April, 1934.

6. Charles E. Burr.

7. By tender.

8. No recommendation.

9. $281.47.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—$60,000,000 LOAN

Mr. POULIOT:

When was the "draft of the proposed order in council regarding a loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company," referred to in a letter dated August 31, 1933, of the acting Prime Minister to the general manager of the Bank of Montreal (a) recommended to council; (b) prepared; (c) submitted to the council?

Mr. RINFRET: (a) 28th November, 1933; (b) 28th November, 1933; (c) 28th November, 1933.

Note: The word "drafted" is interpreted as referring to the recommendation to council signed by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour.

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Was the letter of guarantee of a $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway by the dominion government, dated May 31, 1933, signed by the then Prime Minister and addressed to Sir Charles Gordon, president of the Bank of Montreal, initialed by his colleagues?

2. If so, by whom, and when?

Mr. RINFRET: Nothing on file at present time; correspondence was tabled on March 13, 1934.

ACTING MINISTERS, MAY 31, 1933

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Was the then Prime Minister, acting Minister of Finance and Railways and Canals, on May 31, 1933?

2. If not, who were the minister or ministers for those departments on that date

Mr. RINFRET:

1. No.

2. Minister of Finance: Hon. E. N. Rhodes; Minister of Railways and Canals: Hon. R. J. Manion.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—$60,000,000 LOAN

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of first recommendation to council for order in council regarding a loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, referred to in a letter dated August 31, 1933, of the acting Prime Minister to the general manager of the Bank of Montreal.

[Mr. J. C. Elliott.]

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of joint reports, dated November 28, 1933, and June 20, 1934, from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour to the council with regard to the guarantee of a $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

NATIONAL HARBOURS

ACCIDENTS TO LONGSHOREMEN—INQUIRY AS TO LABOUR CONDITIONS AND INSPECTION OF APPARATUS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the minister who is about to become minister of transport, but possibly my question might be more properly directed to the ministry of marine. First, has the minister's attention been drawn to the fact that since the opening of navigation five men have been killed in Montreal in connection with the longshoring and storing of cargoes on ships? Inasmuch as the federal government has taken over the administration of harbours in Canada, have any steps been taken to investigate the causes of these accidents? Second, what conclusion has the Department of Marine arrived at with regard to the inspection of apparatus in harbours? This question has been before the department for some years, and the fact that five men were killed in the present year at the port of Montreal would seem to warrant the closest and most searching investigation both as to conditions surrounding labour in the harbour and as to adequate inspection of apparatus. Careful investigation should be made as to the various types of machinery used in this hazardous occupation. I am asking whether the minister's attention has been drawn to the matter.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, the longshoremen and the apparatus they use have nothing to do with the operation of the harbour. The longshoremen are employed by the ships; the apparatus they use is furnished either by the longshoremen or by the ships, and it is probably for that reason that the matter has not been brought to the attention of the department. I assume that in a matter of this kind the Minister of Labour would be the proper person to institute an investigation.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to thank the minister for his reply, but perhaps he will kindly follow what I am now going to ask and give me an answer to-morrow or at some later time. I am referring to the question not as it applies to the ministry of labour but more particularly from the standpoint of the inspection of the apparatus used. With all due respect to the minister and the answer he has given I suggest he will find that the Department of Marine has been interested in this matter for a good many years, and I believe, although I am not quite certain, that an inspector was appointed in Vancouver. I would ask the minister to look at it from an angle which is altogether apart from the question of labour conditions, and if he is not prepared to answer to-day he might give the matter further investigation and answer at some future time.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be very glad to consult the officers of the Department of Marine and try to have an answer to-morrow.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to ask a question along the same lines as that of the member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), but I was going to direct my question to the Minister of Labour. It is several days since I wrote calling his attention to the very unsatisfactory conditions that exist in the port of Vancouver, and I wonder if any action has been taken. May I suggest that if this does not come within the scope of the minister who is in charge of harbours it does come within the scope of the minister who has charge of shipping, because several years ago we had this matter up—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the Minister of Labour whether he can give us any information as to what can be done to safeguard these men's lives.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I did receive a letter from my hon. friend referring to conditions in Montreal. I do not recall having received a letter from him referring to conditions among the longshoremen in Vancouver.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Did I say Vancouver? I meant Montreal. I once worked in the port of Vancouver, and possibly that is why I made the slip.

Mr. ROGERS: I can only assure my hon. friend that I am looking into the matter and shall supply him with an answer as soon as possible.

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. member mistook Vancouver for Montreal he was a longshoreman.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPLICATION OF CANADIAN PACIFIC FOR PROVINCIAL CHARTER FOR ANGLIERS-NORANDA-CHIBOUGAMAU LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Railways respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway line into Quebec territory around lake Chibougamau. In view of the fact that Consolidated Smelters Lmited is a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, is there not, in the extension of a railway into lake Chibougamau region by the Canadian Pacific Railway, under subterfuge, as set forth recently in the proceedings of this house, a danger of making the whole of the mineral area served by such new railway, which in reality is a Canadian Pacific Railway line, dependent upon the wishes and plans of Consolidated Smelters Limited in that mining enterprise in the said area—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member ought to understand that he cannot make a speech in asking a question.

Mr. MAYBANK: If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, to put my question, I would ask whether such an extension would not be a danger to mining enterprise in that area and whether the government will take steps to try to prevent any such condition of vassalage of mining enterprises. The few words I spoke, sir, in leading up to my question were necessary by way of explaining the situation.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): I may say that so far as the conduct of my department is concerned none of the fears expressed by the hon. gentleman in his question will be realized.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

PROTEST AGAINST PROPOSED DISCONTINUANCE OF SASKATOON-UNITY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Railways based on a letter I have received from the mayor of Wilkie, Saskatchewan, protesting against a proposed change in the railway service from Saskatoon to Unity. The letter is to the effect that the Canadian Pacific Railway is dispensing with this service, and the mayor and council of Wilkie wish to protest against its being discontinued. Can the minister make a statement in the matter? I understand that the town of Wilkie has taken it up with the Minister of Railways and with the Minister of Agriculture. If the minister is not prepared to answer to-day, perhaps I may receive an answer to-morrow.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of this question only a few moments ago and have not had a chance to look into it, but to-morrow I will give the hon. member such information as is available.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILLS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask for unanimous consent to go into committee of supply for the purpose of voting further interim supply. Just before the house met I had an opportunity of speaking to the acting leader of the opposition (Sir George Perley), and if it is agreeable to the membership of the house generally to extend unanimous consent for the purpose I have indicated I shall move:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply.

It is about the end of the month, and the former interim supply is in many items about exhausted.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Speaker, speaking for myself and my confreres we have no objection whatever to this being done, but we wish to reserve as usual the right to discuss any of these items as we could have done if the vote had not been taken.

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1937, the sum of $17,658,106.65 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1937, the sum of $10,963,428.61 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 69, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1937.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. DUNNING moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 70, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1937.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As a matter of procedure I suggest that these are two separate bills and that we ought to go into committee separately on each bill. The first bill could be dealt with and then the minister could propose his second bill.

Mr. DUNNING: As a matter of procedure I introduced one bill, and I thought it would be convenient and would save the time of the house if I introduced the second one so that we could go into committee on both at the same time.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It is rather unusual to have two bills under consideration at the same time.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING moved the second reading of Bill No. 69.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. DUNNING moved the first reading of Bill No. 70, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1937.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Customs tariff—703. (a) Travellers' baggage, under regulations prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

(b) Goods valued at not more than $100 included in the baggage accompanying residents of Canada returning from abroad after an absence from Canada of not less than forty-eight hours and acquired by them for personal or household use or as souvenirs or gifts, but not bought on commission or as an accommodation for other persons or for sale, under regulations prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Provided that a resident of Canada shall not be entitled to the exemption herein granted within a period of four months from the date of the last exemption allowed, nor shall the exemption be allowed on alcoholic beverages in excess of one quart, or on tobacco in excess of fifty cigars, two hundred cigarettes and two pounds of manufactured tobacco.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: When the committee rose last evening there was under discussion the wording of this clause providing for exemption of $100 worth of goods entering this country under special circumstances. The committee had been considering the wording of the part referring to alcoholic beverages. I should like to ask the minister if further consideration has been given to the point which was raised in that regard.

Mr. ILSLEY: This item was given very careful consideration before the present wording was agreed upon, and from the best consideration we can give it we think the language should remain as it is.

Mr. CAHAN: Who agreed upon it? Will the minister explain?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the officers of the department and ourselves. I do not know that I understand the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister said that the item had been agreed upon. I simply wished to know who were the parties to the agreement. Just what does he mean when he says it had been agreed upon?

Mr. ILSLEY: I was not aware that I had said there was any agreement respecting it. I was answering a question asked by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), whether as a result of further consideration it was thought that any change should be made in the wording of the item, and I said that from the best consideration we could give it, we thought not.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister used the words "agreed upon."

Mr. DUNNING: He meant, in that sense.

Mr. CAHAN: The government has recently been holding conferences with representatives of the provinces. As this relates to a provincial matter, and as a provision of the item overrides and overrules the laws of the provinces, I was wondering whether the words "agreed upon" meant that the minister or members of the government had agreed upon such action with the provinces—

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. CAHAN: —which are particularly interested.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I cannot believe that it overrides or overrules the laws of the provinces. I do not think it is even an implied authorization of the importation of liquor. It is merely a limit upon the amount that can be imported, if any can be imported.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: But this purports to override the regulations of the provinces, does it not?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh, certainly. The way in which the item is framed permits and authorizes the importing under certain circumstances of a quart of liquor. Otherwise the suggestion is preposterous; and it should not be found in any statute of Canada. It is placed there, I assume, to carry out some understanding that was arrived at in the negotiation of the Canada-United States trade agreement, and it certainly authorizes, so far as the customs laws of this country are concerned, any individual Canadian returning from the United States to bring with him a quart of liquor. The Minister of Finance shakes his head. What other interpretation is to be given to it? It certainly is not a specious fraud. It is not intended for the mere evasion of some obligation the government has entered into with the government of the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: The government entered into no obligation with respect to this matter.

Mr. CAHAN: All it does is to permit, as far as the parliament of Canada can so authorize, the bringing in free of duty from the United States by Canadian tourists of one quart of liquor on certain occasions, although the possession of that liquor in every province of Canada is a criminal offence.

An hon. MEMBER: At the present time.

Mr. WHITE: I do not think we should quibble in a matter of this kind. There cannot be a shadow of doubt that under the dominion law, when the legislation now before the committee is on the statute book, a tourist can bring into Canada, so far as the legislation of this parliament is concerned, a quart of liquor from the United States. But the tourist having come into Canada, a provincial officer, finding in his possession this bottle of whisky, not purchased from a liquor commission store in the province in question, can proceed against that tourist, and certain dire consequences will follow. That statement is not open to contradiction, I submit, and that is the beginning and end of the matter as far as that phase of it is concerned.

Now there are two other points to which I would like to draw attention. Beyond question the trade agreement made by the government with the United States is going to become law. Whatever one on this side or that side of the house may think of its provisions, a majority of this house and I have no doubt a majority of the other house will pass that pact into law. Last night, as I understood him, the Minister of Finance stated that in the letters exchanged between Mr. Wrong, the chargé d'affaires at Washington, and Mr. Hull, I assume, the Secretary of State of the United States, there was an undertaking on the part of the Canadian government to introduce into the Canadian tariff an item relating to the privileges of tourists similar to the provision in the United States tariff. I have before me, as I think we all have, a printed copy of the letter, and I should like to draw attention to these words:

> I am further directed to state that the Canadian government propose to invite parliament to permit the entry free of duty and charges of incidental purchases by residents of Canada returning from the United States of America—and so on.

> —for such time as treatment substantially equivalent to that now in effect is accorded by the government of the United States of America to incidental purchases by residents of that country returning from Canada.

In connection with the words "treatment substantially equivalent" my contention is that the elimination of the language "not exceeding one quart" in respect of alcoholic liquors does not weaken or detract from equivalent reciprocal treatment to Canadians visiting the United States as compared with the treatment accorded American tourists returning from Canada. The quantity of liquor that will be brought in by tourists is a mere bagatelle; it is negligible; it is not going to affect the liquor trade or the revenue of any province. I do not think that aspect of it is worth a moment's consideration. But in my judgment we should give a great deal of consideration before passing a law that will have this effect, that when a Canadian returns from the United States with a bottle of whisky or a flask in his pocket or his suitcase, metaphorically speaking he will step into gaol when he reaches this country. I do not think that is fair. I think it is shameful on the part of the parliament of Canada to pass a law worded as this is, in the circumstances of the case. For the life of me I cannot see that the elimination of those words will be treated by the United States as being in any sense a violation of either the spirit or the letter of the trade agreement. Already, on the initiative of the government at the instance of the Minister of Finance, we have departed from the spirit of that agreement, though I will not say from the letter, in respect of two or three tariff items relating to commodities of considerable importance in connection with the trade of the two countries. This is not going to affect the trade of the two countries at all. I do not raise any argument upon that point, Mr. Chairman; I raise it entirely on the indecency of our action in exposing a Canadian returning from the United States to the penalties of provincial legislation.

One other point and I shall have finished; for I seldom inflict myself upon the committee. I do hope that when the Minister of National Revenue comes to frame his regulations relating to this matter he will take particular care to see that the returning tourist is required to produce receipted bills or proper invoices for such purchases as he may have made. Unless that is done there is a very considerable danger of smuggling being carried on by merchants in Canada. I would also direct the minister's attention to what he is already well aware of, that if the returning tourist makes a declaration that the goods he has purchased in the United States do not exceed $100 in value, and upon examination by the customs officer—who is required to examine those goods even though they be free of customs duty—the fact is disclosed that they are worth substantially more than $100, the goods are liable to seizure and forfeiture. It is therefore a protection for the tourist that he should be armed with proper invoices or receipted bills for such articles, other than mere trifles, as he may bring back with him from the United States. It is most desirable that this should be done in the interests of the business of Canada as well as for the protection of the revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the second point raised by the hon. gentleman I should like to say that the draft regulations do provide that invoices must be produced wherever possible.

With regard to the operation of this provision in reference to exemptions it may be of interest to the committee to know what the experience has been so far at an important frontier or border port. I have in mind the port of Fort Erie. The collector at Fort Erie has given me a brief statement outlining the experience at that port to date. From May 1 to May 24 inclusive at Fort Erie there were 443 exemptions to the amount of $12,042.58. On May 25 there were 465 exemptions to the value of $9,566.38. It will be remembered that May 25 was a holiday, the Monday following Sunday, May 24, and I am informed that about 3,200 Canadian cars entered through the port of Fort Erie on that day, but there were only 465 exemptions. I do not know how many persons there would be in a car, possibly three; so that the experience at Fort Erie would indicate that a very small proportion of those returning from the United States are claiming this exemption. If there were only one person in each car the proportion would be less than fifteen per cent. If there were three persons to each car the proportion would be about five per cent, and that was after a long week-end which included a holiday. Our experience at Fort Erie in connection with the claiming of the exemption shows that advantage will not be taken of it to any very great extent. The average of exemptions claimed to date at that port has been about $24, and I am informed that the experience there corresponds closely with that at other ports throughout Canada.

With regard to the provision respecting liquor may I point out that the United States has a similar one which, while not specifically mentioning liquor, permits the importation of Canadian liquor into that country to the extent of $100. The whole of the $100 worth of goods going into the United States may be liquor. But in the case of a prohibition state, state law would govern, and it would never be contended, as the hon. member has argued, that it would be an indecent thing for congress of the United States to enact a law limiting the exemption to $100. It would not be an indecent thing at all, but would be a provision stating simply that so far as the United States are concerned they do not propose to allow an exemption over $100 on liquor. If the law of a state prevented a person from having liquor in his possession in that state, then that would be the law to which the returning American tourist would have regard and which he would be obliged to respect.

For instance, we shall suppose that two of the provinces of Canada were next week to repeal their laws respecting the possession of small quantities of foreign intoxicating liquor. Would it still be indecent on our part to have this provision in the tariff, namely that an exemption of over one quart could not be claimed? When we provide for an exemption of $100 we say that such exemption shall not apply to liquor. We will not permit the Canadian tourist to bring in $100 worth of liquor, irrespective of provincial laws. We will permit him to bring in only one quart of liquor. This is not an authorization or invitation to any person to break a provincial law. If the provinces actually desire to maintain their present position—and I shall be very much surprised if they do, on account of the amount of liquor they sell to American tourists coming to Canada—then it will be illegal to bring liquor into Canada. But as I say, I shall be surprised if the provinces maintain that position.

Mr. STEVENS: Apart from the provision respecting exemptions for tourists, when an ordinary importer of liquor clears liquor at Montreal, Quebec or any other point, and provincial authorities have a law against the possession of such liquor, what does the importer have to do to bring himself within the ambit of provincial law? Would an individual tourist be called upon to take a course different from that followed by the ordinary importer?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no ordinary importer. The liquor commissions may import liquor, and there may be certain other classes of importers licensed to import liquor in bond; perhaps that would depend upon the law of the province. But there is no right on the part of the ordinary individual to import liquor, unless it is for sacramental or medicinal purposes.

Mr. WHITE: Do the words "alcoholic liquors" appear in the United States tariff item relating to the free entry of goods brought back to that country by American tourists?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. WHITE: Then why do we insert those words in this item?

Mr. ILSLEY: To restrict the free entry to a quart, so that $100 worth may not be brought in.

Mr. WHITE: If the provision were knocked out altogether the liquor could not come in.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but we do not want to do that, in case the provinces change their attitude.

Mr. WILTON: According to the figures quoted by the Minister of National Revenue it would appear that only a few hundred cars crossed from Canada into the United States over the holiday.

Mr. DUNNING: He did not say that.

Mr. WILTON: He referred to a few hundred cars.

Mr. ILSLEY: There were 3,200.

Mr. WILTON: Yes. I have a dispatch from Fort Erie which states:

The 24th of May movement was the heaviest on record here, however, it being estimated about 10,000 purely Canadian cars were handled.

Discussing this matter yesterday I referred to the cooperation of Buffalo business men with the railways in putting on cheap railway excursions out of Canada. Buffalo business concerns have advertised in Canadian newspapers in which they show bargains over the week-end. They induce Canadian people to go over and take advantage of the $100 exemption. An article from the Hamilton Spectator is as follows:

New customs regulations cause exodus to Buffalo.

Hundreds and hundreds of Hamilton people spent the holiday week end in Buffalo, N.Y., and spent thousands and thousands of Hamilton dollars. Many of these holiday trippers—the larger percentage of them, according to reliable reports—were taking advantage of the government's $100 exemption for a 48-hour stay and buying various commodities selling at a reputedly lower figure than the prices in Canadian stores.

T. H. & B. railway officials to-day stated that approximately 1,400 passengers had used their facilities over the week-end. These were in addition to the regular travellers. No estimate of the number who motored to Buffalo could possibly be given, but the number would, no doubt, be larger, than that going by rail.

Discussing the holiday exodus, several people who spent Sunday and Monday in the border city, remarked that it looked as though Hamilton had been transplanted temporarily. They had never seen so many familiar faces in a strange city at the same time, they said, and they were constantly meeting acquaintances in stores, theatres and restaurants.

An hon. MEMBER: They will come back.

Mr. WILTON: Yes, with their pockets empty, and the business men of Hamilton will lose that amount of business. That is the point I make. This is a dispatch from Fort Erie:

Canadian custom-excise officials at the frontier port of Fort Erie said to-day a large quantity of merchandise of a personal nature, such as boots, shoes, clothing etc., had been brought back by the thousands of Canadians who crossed the international border here during the week-end observing Victoria day across the line, and took advantage of the new law.

At the same time officials here further added an exact total of the amount so imported would not be available until late to-day when the large staff of men here had all turned in the official memoranda taken from tourists returning by boat, bridge and railway train.

The 24th of May movement was the heaviest on record here, however, it being estimated about ten thousand purely Canadian cars were handled.

According to those figures I would say that from the city of Hamilton alone not less than $7,000 or $8,000 of Hamilton money was spent in the city of Buffalo over the week-end, to the detriment of Hamilton business men. On Monday of this week I interviewed some of the business men of that city upon which occasion they told me that their Saturday business last week was less than it had been on the corresponding day in a number of years, due to the exodus of Hamilton people to the city of Buffalo to take advantage of the $100 exemption.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Do any of the Americans spend money in Hamilton?

Mr. WILTON: Oh, yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Has there been any objection?

Mr. WILTON: I am pointing out that we are doing business with American merchants to the detriment of Canadian merchants.

An hon. MEMBER: It works both ways.

Mr. DUNNING: May I say to the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Wilton) that no item in the budget has brought quite so much by way of commendation in correspondence as has this particular item. The great bulk of that commendation came from merchants stretching all the way from Halifax to Vancouver—I repeat, merchants. I shall go further and say that from the hon. member's own city of Hamilton we received commendation for this action on the part of the Canadian government. It is strange, if they thought they would lose money or be ruined, that they should write commending the instrument of their ruin. I am quite sure, if my hon. friend canvasses Hamilton, he will find that there are merchants in his own city—I can give him the names privately; I do not at the moment recall them, but I shall have them hunted up—who commend this provision.

With respect to the newspaper dispatches, which seem to be exaggerated a little in the light of the actual information for the very period concerned for which the Minister of National Revenue gave the figures a few moments ago, I would point out that only 465 of all that vast number of cars contained people who took advantage of the $100 exemption. The minister gave the figures and they showed that the average declaration was in the neighbourhood of $24 each. That was on an occasion when all the circumstances conspired to bring about the maximum use of the privilege, for the reason that May 25 was a holiday following a Sunday and a Saturday, which enabled people to take the maximum advantage of the forty-eight hour provision by travelling the short distance to Buffalo, and yet only 465 cars out of 3,200 contained people who took advantage of the $100 exemption on their return from Buffalo on May 25. These are the actual figures, and I submit that the circumstances then being such as to facilitate to the utmost the taking advantage of the privilege, we need not view the future with quite the alarm that my hon. friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Wilton) displays in connection with the matter.

Mr. WILTON: I would say in reply to the minister that it strikes me as very peculiar that a business man would commend something which directly tended to injure his business.

Mr. DUNNING: My point is that the merchants do not look at the matter in that light. They are wise enough.

Mr. WILTON: The minister says that letters have been received from Hamilton business men complimenting the government upon this $100 exemption. I realize that at least one Hamilton concern might possibly view it with favour by reason of being a branch of a Buffalo concern, and this privilege will simply be sending business into their own store at Buffalo. But I cannot imagine an honest-to-goodness Canadian business man who thinks of his own interests congratulating the government upon making a move which is going to take business away from business men in Canada. I repeat that I can quite understand a compliment of that kind coming to the government from one particular Hamilton store which is a branch of a large Buffalo concern.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Stormont): I do not wish to take up much of the time of the committee, but in fairness to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and following along the line of what has been said by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Wilton), I should like to quote from the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder. This is an independent paper, neither Liberal nor Conservative, and this is what it says about this very matter we are discussing:

Although traffic over the international bridge—

There is an international bridge over the St. Lawrence at Cornwall:

—here has been thirty per cent heavier in May to date than in the same period last year, only two Canadians out of hundreds crossing the border have claimed the new $100 exemption of duty on goods purchased in the United States. While customs officials could give no details, they said that neither applicant had brought in goods valued at more than $35. Both had been in the United States for a considerable time.

Now just to show what the merchants in that locality think of this provision, I quote this from the same newspaper:

Local merchants are not particularly worried over the effect of the new regulation. They have enjoyed a considerable revenue in recent years from United States residents buying in Canada, and feel that continuance of this trade will offset any loss of business caused by the reciprocal exemption. The majority agree that the provisions of the Canadian law give adequate protection against "flying shopping trips" over the border, which would do them greatest harm.

While I was at home over the week-end I took the trouble to ask the customs examiner just what the figures with reference to this privilege were since May 1, and I find that from the first to the twenty-ninth of May, 1,145 tourists crossed over the international bridge at Cornwall; seventeen of them took advantage of the exemption and brought with them $1,535 worth of goods, being $11.80 or practically $12 per head. So the harm as suggested by the hon. member for Hamilton West is actually not nearly as bad as one would think.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With regard to the point raised a few minutes ago regarding alcoholic beverages I heartily agree with the position taken by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White). It may very well be that from the strictly legal standpoint the minister may be right, but I do think this privilege is liable to cause a great many complications.

I cannot be as optimistic as some with regard to this provision being likely to lessen smuggling; in fact, I am inclined to think it will work the other way. There are many people who will buy articles for cousins and aunts and neighbours, and it will be much more difficult to prevent that kind of thing now than formerly. I think, as one of the other speakers said a little while ago, it is highly desirable that some sort of indication should be given in the way of receipts for the goods purchased, invoices and so on. But even that does not altogether meet the point, because a great many people will undoubtedly shop for their neighbours. I do not know how that can be easily overcome. People who will smuggle under present conditions will continue to smuggle, and perhaps be able to do it more extensively under this arrangement.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a $100 exemption.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, of course. I think that there are some very admirable features about the proposed arrangement, and if the minister is correct in saying that this is necessary in order to retain the American agreement, it is all to the good.

Further than that, it seems to me that it will furnish a very valuable lesson in what protection so-called really involves. If the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is right, that bringing back $100 worth of goods may in a great many cases cost this country $30 in revenue, I think that is a splendid bit of education for the public generally. The Canadian people will soon begin to understand how much it costs to live in Canada. They will begin to understand more clearly that, as its name indicates, the tariff is really a tax and a very heavy one, and this tax has been taken from us in the past without our being quite aware of it. Again, if, as the leader of the opposition suggests, half a million people by crossing the border and making their purchases in the United States can escape that tax on the purchase of $100 or $400 worth of goods they will soon begin to understand how heavy a tax the tariff has been on each individual and upon each family.

There is another advantage which, it seems to me, may counteract some of the disadvantages. When people come back having saved $30, we shall say, on a $100 purchase of goods, they will invest that $30 in the stores of Hamilton and elsewhere, and our Conservative friends will then begin to realize that there are some advantages in savings to the consumer by getting something like free trade established in this country. I do not know whether my Liberal friends had any sinister motive of putting over an educational campaign of that sort. In any case, I am inclined to think this may be a very good way to teach the people along the border the advantages of freer trade. On the other hand, may I point out a very serious danger in this proposal. It involves discriminatory taxation, or perhaps it would be more correct to say that it involves the discriminatory remission of taxation. If a man has a car or can secure the price of a railroad ticket and has a day or two of leisure, he can cross the border and return with $100 worth of goods.

Mr. DUNNING: He must have the $100.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, if he has the $100. He can bring back $100 worth of goods if he has the leisure to take the trip. He can do this four times a year. If he has four or five children he can load them into a car and bring back $400 or $500 worth of goods at a time.

Mr. DUNNING: If he has that much money.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so. I want to point out that a great many people have not the necessary $100 and have to stay at home; a great many people have not a car; a great many people, especially those living in districts remote from the boundary, cannot afford the price of a railroad ticket; then a great many people cannot possibly take advantage of this opportunity as they have not the leisure; they may have steady work and cannot spend several days in taking a trip to the United States. All these people will continue to be taxed and in the long run their taxes will probably be heavier because a few other people are exempted from taxation. It would seem to me that the suggestion thrown out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) contains something of merit. He suggested that every resident of Canada should be permitted to obtain $100 worth of goods free of duty. If a man with a car or the price of a railroad ticket and several days' leisure can do this, why should the same privilege not be given to other residents who have not these things? Why should these people not be permitted to send $100 orders to mail order houses in the United States? I can conceive that many people in northern Alberta or Saskatchewan would be very glad to be able to send such an order to a Chicago mail order house.

Mr. COLDWELL: Provided they have the $100.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be true. Anything up to $100, if you will; say $10.

Mr. DUNNING: Twenty-five dollars would do just as well.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was using the maximum; I said up to $100.

Mr. COLDWELL: Several families could pool together.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, they could do that. I suggest that this privilege is discriminating against those people who most need to have things a little easier. I realize the difficulties, if not the impossibilities in carrying out this suggestion, but there is another way in which it could be done—this amount of taxation could be remitted. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has suggested that the granting of this privilege might easily involve a loss of $50,000,000 to the dominion government. I do not know whether those figures are extravagant as his figures sometimes are, but he has made that computation. If half a million people might conceivably have taxes remitted to the extent of $50,000,000—

Mr. DUNNING: No, he did not say that; he said that they might import that amount.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I stand corrected. If half a million people can secure goods to the extent of $50,000,000 which, as the leader of the opposition suggested, would involve a remission of taxation amounting to twenty or thirty per cent, I do not see why a similar remission should not be made to the ten millions of people who do not cross the border. Of course the minister will say that this suggestion is perfectly absurd, but I want to point out—

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to hear the minister say that he has not said it. I hope he will give us some justification for putting on the statute books what I have termed discriminatory taxation, or more properly, discriminatory remission of taxation.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Remission of discriminatory taxation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is discrimination in favour of the man who owns a motor car or has the price of a railroad ticket and has the leisure. It means that people along the international boundary who have some wealth will be able to take advantage of this exemption, while people in the more remote districts who cannot afford to buy cars are to be penalized because of this exemption.

Mr. DUNNING: When my hon. friend refers to those who cannot afford cars surely he forgets that nearly everyone in Canada has a friend who owns a car. He rides in that friend's car and he goes on trips, sometimes across the border, in that friend's car. Surely it is an exaggeration, in the light of the experience of the population of Canada in travelling in each other's cars, to say that this exemption involves the buying of a car.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think the minister is pretty hard driven when he has to make a statement of that kind.

Mr. DUNNING: Is it true?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, it is not true.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like to know in what respect it is not true.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is a large number of people who do not own cars and who have no friends who own cars. I am afraid the minister has been living in certain circles during the last few years and has forgotten the actual conditions which prevail on the prairies and in many of the cities. There are large numbers of people in this country who have no cars and who have no friends who own cars; there are a great many people who cannot afford a railway trip and there are other classes of people who cannot afford the leisure to take a holiday across the border. Under these circumstances I should like the minister to justify discriminatory legislation of this kind.

Mr. WALSH: I have listened with much interest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and I think his remarks bear out that oft-repeated text from scripture, "To him that hath shall be given." I do not agree at all with his remarks, but I do agree with the observations of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). Naturally I do not care a great deal for this $100 exemption as it is going to do a great deal of harm to some of our merchants, but it is also going to do other people a great deal of good. We could sit here until midnight quoting from the various newspapers, giving our own side of the argument, and then we would all leave the chamber convinced that we were right and the other fellows were wrong; we would be nowhere.

There is one point I should like to emphasize in connection with this debate. I want to ask the minister to consider a suggestion in connection with alcoholic beverages. I am not one of the legal lights of the house, but I should like to ask the minister if there would be any objection to inserting in the item this phrase, "except in so far as it is in contravention of any provincial law governing the possession of alcoholic beverages." I think such a phrase would prevent people with lay minds from being misled. I believe that in this way we would overcome the difficulties which might face a person coming back with a quart of whisky who finds that he is contravening some provincial law. He would be duly warned and he would require no other warning than that given in the words I have suggested. I point that out to the minister because I feel that there is a danger as the item is worded at present, and it is a very real danger, probably more real than the Minister of National Revenue cares to believe. The Minister of National Revenue is legally trained and no doubt he can understand words of this kind better than the lay mind. If he would put in words such as I have suggested I am perfectly confident it would meet the wishes of a large number of members of this house who would not like to see a person misled by any statement that appears in our customs act.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): We have heard a good deal about this item from people speaking for merchants throughout Canada. With the people of Canada as a whole this item is, I believe, probably the most popular part of the budget, and I think the Minister of Finance should be highly commended for having included it in the trade treaty and in the budget. After all, we are not legislating here as a parliament merely for a few merchants in Canada; we are endeavouring to legislate for the people of Canada as a whole. If the people of Canada do not want to buy goods in the United States they will not buy them there, but if they go over and do want to buy goods there they should have the opportunity to do so.

In connection with the liquor question, the provision with respect to liquor going into the United States is this, I believe. Anyone entering the United States can take one quart of liquor free of duty and up to $100 worth provided he pays the excise duty on that quantity. As regards liquor brought into this country, we are limiting it to one quart. It is quite reasonable to suppose that any legislature sitting to-day might within the next week or two change its law in regard to liquor and allow the entry of liquor from other countries into that province, and I do not see why we should in our customs act prohibit people from bringing it in. They know the law in their own province and they must abide by it.

There is one other matter with regard to the $100 provision. Some have suggested that invoices should be provided for the customs department for everything that is brought back. That is not always convenient to tourists. They pick up little knicknacks, curios, here and there, and often the person who sells them has no form of invoice or bill; the goods are sold for cash to the tourist. When these people come back across the line our customs officials, I submit, should be as lenient as possible, provided the tourist is not trying to bring in more than $100 worth of goods. After all, the customs officials at the border are there to serve the people of the country. I must say that in any experience I have had going across the line I have found them very courteous as a general rule. But sometimes they are not so, and I suggest to the minister that it would be a good idea at this time to send out a circular letter to officials at all border points in Canada, urging that tourists coming into this country from the United States or Canadian tourists returning be shown every courtesy. The officials should not be too officious but should try to help tourists in every way possible, either our own people coming back or visitors from the United States. There are a great many more tourists coming to Canada from the United States than there are Canadians visiting that country, and the American tourists spend more here than Canadians do over there.

Mr. WILTON: With regard to this one quart of whisky, it seems to me that there is a lot of unnecessary worry. Canadians are generally supposed to be sensible people, and if any Canadian wants to buy a quart of Yankee whisky when he can get good Canadian whisky there is something wrong with him. As regards the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that so many people would have no money to take advantage of the concession, that problem is up to the government. It is for them to provide work so that Canadians will have money.

Mr. STEVENS: I would make one suggestion to the minister—he is seemingly in good humour and I will stretch it and make it two. In this item we are allowing tourists to bring in goods valued at $100 "included in the baggage accompanying" the tourist; and such goods, according to the language of the item, must have been acquired by the tourist either for personal or for household uses. Then in the proviso we refer particularly to liquor and tobacco, and these items are specifically limited. I suggest to the minister that a man might go over and buy fifty shirts, and I assume he could bring them in; they would be in his baggage. Under the tariff act, it is provided in section 16 that the minister may make regulations such as are deemed necessary for the carrying out of the provisions of that section and for the enforcement thereof. I suggest to the minister therefore that the latter part of the proviso might be dropped altogether and be dealt with in regulations that could be passed for the administration of this item. By regulation it is competent for the minister to say that a man shall not bring in fifty or one hundred or ninety shirts but only ten; it is proper for him to say that the returning tourist shall not bring in more than one quart of liquor or more than fifty cigars or more than one hundred cigarettes. I suggest that it would be far better to do this by regulation than to put it in the statute. The reason I asked the minister a question regarding other importers of liquor was this. It is clear that because of provincial laws no person or business concern can import liquor into Quebec or Ontario—possibly the same is true of other provinces—and there is something to be said for the argument that to incorporate in a statute of Canada a provision that a man may bring in up to a quart of whisky may be looked upon as action in direct contravention of provincial law. In my opinion it is not necessary to put it in the statute at all. The regulations could cover restrictions regarding liquor, tobacco, shirts, or any other article that might be brought in.

The other suggestion is this. I am subject to correction, but I understand that this exemption applies also to the sales tax.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it quite fair to the Canadian business concern near the boundary to impose upon it an 8 per cent sales tax and a 3 per cent excise tax—well, we will leave the excise tax out—a sales tax which is absolutely a revenue tax, and, under this exemption, allow persons returning from the United States to bring in goods on which no sales tax is imposed? The sales tax has nothing to do with customs; it is a revenue tax on goods made in the country as well as on goods imported. Would it not be reasonable and sound legislation to insist that those who bring in goods under this exemption should pay at least the sales tax? After all there is no sales tax on goods going into the United States. It will be recalled by hon. members that the United States congress has, over a number of years, considered the imposition of a sales tax. I think a group comprising some 150 members of congress came to Ottawa a few years ago to study the question, but so far as I know there is no federal sales tax in the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: There are sales taxes in some of the states.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, we have similar taxes. Montreal collects two per cent, and there are other taxes that might be cited. But I am talking about the balance between the two federal authorities. While I recognize all the difficulties attendant upon this item, I think in return for the advantage granted to United States citizens coming into this country and purchasing Canadian goods, the concession here made is justified so far as tariff exemption is concerned; at any rate it is a part of the agreement, so that there is no use discussing that feature of it. But it does seem to me we are going too far when we exempt imported articles from the eight per cent sales tax. I make two suggestions to the minister: first, that he delete the last five lines of the item and cover by regulation the provision regarding alcoholic beverages and tobacco; second, that goods given free entry under this item should not be exempt from sales tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: I thank the hon. member for his suggestions. I have been thinking them over as he has been speaking. I am afraid it would be impossible for us legally to make regulations limiting the amount of tobacco, cigars and cigarettes that should be brought in, in view of the wording of the first part of the item, because there would be nothing in the quantity or amount of the hundred dollars' worth of cigars, for example, or tobacco or cigarettes, to indicate that they were not for personal or household use or for souvenirs or gifts; and unless we also changed the first paragraph of the item, a person returning with $100 worth of cigars, cigarettes or tobacco would be legally entitled to the exemption regardless of any regulations which the minister might make. Therefore it is necessary that the proviso be added in order effectively to eliminate the exemption in the cases referred to. The illustration cited as to cigarettes and tobacco is, I think, different from that of shirts, as put by the hon. member. It is quite possible that the minister might have power to make a regulation limiting the number of shirts which a man might bring back with him as if the number were too large it would be obvious that they were not for his personal use, or even brought in as gifts to friends and the importation would then assume the dimensions of a commercial transaction.

Mr. STEVENS: That is precisely my argument.

Mr. ILSLEY: Of course it could be limited by regulation. In such a case a regulation may be made, though I am not saying that it will be made.

Mr. STEVENS: A quart of whisky is a fairly generous personal quantity.

Mr. ILSLEY: A quart?

Mr. STEVENS: Well, my hon. friend comes from Nova Scotia, where, I admit, it may not be.

Mr. WHITE: Did you ever give a party?

Mr. STEVENS: I appreciate my hon. friend's astonishment.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the sales tax, there seems to be what is in my opinion an unfounded assumption on the part of those who state that we are discriminating against our own manufacturers when we contemplate bringing in goods from the United States free of sales tax. Taxes are paid in other countries besides Canada. A short while ago I had occasion to look up the rate of taxation in the United States based upon the national income, and economists state that the rate of taxation, federal, state and municipal, on the national income of the United States, is, if I remember correctly, over nineteen per cent, according to the best estimates. The rate of taxation on the total national income in Canada is less than that; it is about eighteen per cent. These taxes of the United States find their way into and are reflected very largely in the prices of goods, and taxes are paid there just as they are paid here. It is not correct to say that these goods have not been subjected to any corresponding taxation in the United States and that therefore our producers are being discriminated against. There are certain commodities on which the tax is higher in Canada than it is in the United States, that is, in respect of a particular commodity; but that is not true in the aggregate. As the Minister of Finance has pointed out, on some commodities the rate of taxation in the United States is higher than it is in Canada. If we were to adopt the hon. member's suggestion we should be removing, say, fifteen per cent duty on certain articles and reimposing upon them an eight per cent tax.

Mr. STEVENS: Pardon me; all goods coming in now are subject to the eight per cent sales tax.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: What goods are not?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are many exemptions.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, not very many.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, a very large list of exemptions.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a long schedule of exemptions relating to a very large number of tariff items. But apart from that I am afraid it would be regarded as an evasion of our responsibilities if we were to impose a sales tax upon goods brought in under this provision. From an administrative standpoint it would not only surprise and startle a great many people but annoy them beyond measure if, particularly now that the sales tax is eight per cent, we were to impose an eight per cent sales tax upon goods exempted from duties by this item, when no such tax is imposed on goods going into the United States.

Mr. NEILL: I have received a number of letters, some of them from merchants, endorsing this item. Merchants at the coast appear somewhat to fear that if we refuse reciprocity with the United States in this matter at this time it may be used as a lever for Americans to remove the privilege they accord their citizens of bringing in from Canada one hundred dollars' worth of goods free of duty, a concession which has proved very profitable to our merchants at the coast. I notice that the minister has, very properly, put restrictions on the privilege—once in four months, in respect of a stay of forty-eight hours, and so on. Does he not think the item would be improved if he used the word "adult" residents? To allow children of tender years to bring in a hundred dollars' worth of goods is palpably open to an abuse of the spirit of the thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: That matter is under consideration in the department and by myself at the present time. To a very large extent I agree with the hon. gentleman. It would perhaps be an abuse of language to say that a child of five years has personal baggage. That baggage is the baggage of the parents.

Mr. WHITE: Or acquired by them.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, or acquired by them. What I have in mind is that an age limit, perhaps sixteen years, should be fixed. Below that age limit the articles will be deemed to be the baggage of the parents or the persons accompanying the children; above that age it will be considered to be the baggage of the children if it belongs to them.

Mr. CAHAN: It is difficult to trust to one's memory with regard to legal matters when one has been away from the practice of law for a number of years. But I was under the impression that, in order to safeguard the interests of provincial treasuries and the revenues derived through liquor commissions, this parliament at some stage passed ancillary legislation which made it illegal, for instance, to convey or transport from one province to another intoxicating liquor with the intention of evading the strict provisions of the provincial laws.

Mr. DUNNING: That is correct.

Mr. CAHAN: In the province of Quebec, for instance, if a citizen of Montreal desires to drink a certain kind of wine or a certain kind of whisky the only legal way in which he can do so is to purchase it from the liquor commission, if they have that class of goods on sale, or else request the liquor commission to import certain quantities of that class to be sold to the applicant upon arrival, for which the applicant will pay after it has been taken out of the customs. Is there not some such ancillary federal legislation at present in force?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, there is.

Mr. CAHAN: Has the minister considered whether the permission or authorization, because that is what is provided here, to import free of customs duty certain quantities of liquor into provinces in which the possession and consumption of that liquor would be a violation of provincial laws, might not also be a contravention of this ancillary Dominion legislation, concerning which my memory is not very clear at the moment?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is quite correct; there is a federal statute. If it is a violation of provincial law for the liquor to be in the possession of a person in the province it is a violation of the Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act for the person to import it into the province. But that does not change the problem a bit, as far as I can see. I have admitted throughout that it may be an illegal thing.

Mr. CAHAN: I have not that statute before me, and my mind is simply reverting to past years when I was consulted about that law which the minister says does exist. I ask the minister if there is an enactment which precludes importation by a private individual into a province where the sale of liquor is controlled by the provincial commission. If so, is it not a contravention of a federal statute as well as of a provincial statute which the minister proposes to assist, shall I say, by this permission contained in this clause? My mind is not clear, but it seems to me there is some inconsistency there which should be carefully considered.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, that has been carefully considered, and generally speaking the hon. gentleman is right. In answer to the question put to me previously I explained that there is a federal statute called the Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act, but the importation of liquor ceases to be illegal the moment possession of liquor in the province becomes legal under the provincial law.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. ILSLEY: And I am proceeding on the assumption, perhaps unfounded, that it will become legal in some of the provinces.

Mr. CAHAN: Then why not so frame your clause and in effect authorize free importation under these conditions through such ports of entry in such provinces as do authorize the possession by private individuals of liquor which has not been purchased from the provincial commission? I confess that in dealing with this matter from memory, concerning statutes which I have not been considering from day to day as a lawyer in practice does in his own law office, my mind is not clear in respect of it, but it does seem to me that this clause sanctions an inconsistent provision. Furthermore, and doubtless the hon. gentleman has dealt with the criminal law of the country since I have, is it not a violation of the criminal law of Canada to violate certain provincial statutes? I know the violation of a dominion statute constitutes an offence under the criminal code, and my impression is that the violation of certain provincial statutes is also an offence under the statute cited. In any event, if the federal statute to which the hon. gentleman has referred is to be violated by one who brings in a flask of liquor containing a quart, we will say, then he is permitting, authorizing, facilitating and inducing Canadians to violate a dominion statute the violation of which constitutes a criminal offence.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, I am not a lawyer, but as a practical man I have been listening to all this discussion and there seems to be no doubt that the wording with regard to alcoholic beverages is very misleading. The ordinary citizen would consider it an authorization to him to bring in a quart of whisky, and would consider that he could do so legally. The ordinary man does not know all the laws of the different provinces; in fact I do not think the lawyers know them all, and certainly I feel that an ordinary person returning to Canada and reading this provision would consider that he had authority to bring in a quart of whisky, without thinking anything at all about provincial statutes. Apparently the government have made up their minds to put through this provision exactly as it reads; that is what I gather from the discussion to-day, and if that is so, no one can stop them. I do think, however, that some action should be taken by the minister, in the public announcement he will make and also in the regulations, to draw the attention of the citizens of this country to the fact that they cannot bring this liquor into a province that has a law against it, notwithstanding the fact that it is so stated in this provision. I appeal to everyone in this committee if they do not agree that ninety-nine people out of a hundred reading this item would consider that it gave them authority to bring a quart of whisky into this country. As I say, if the government have made up their minds to put this through in this form we cannot stop them, but I think the minister should find some way of warning the people. The hon. member for Mount Royal suggested that this might be done by inserting certain words in this item, but I fancy that might be difficult. I think however the government should take steps to make it clear to the people of Canada that this is not an authority to bring whisky into a province where there is a provincial law against that procedure.

Mr. DUNNING: The right hon. gentleman has approached the matter from the practical standpoint. In endeavouring to do the same may I point out that the government is not simply being stubborn in the matter. This has been the subject of discussion and investigation since the note was first written to the United States, at the conclusion of the negotiation of the treaty. Also since the budget was brought down on May 1, now nearly a month ago, the actual wording has been in review, because it is generally known that the provision is of an experimental nature. As has been indicated, to a certain extent it will have to be dealt with by regulation, and we acknowledge there is a difficulty inherent in the feature mentioned by my right hon. friend and by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. The Minister of National Revenue is making arrangements to see to it that tourists are advised. Methods may vary from time to time, according to experience, but we do want to give this provision a trial under the present wording, because of the way in which that wording has been worked out and the consultations which have taken place in various quarters in regard to it. It is not, of course, like the laws of the Medes and Persians.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Would the government be in a position to make a change next session, if it were thought wise to do so?

Mr. DUNNING: Quite.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the minister give me the citation from the Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: I was going to give it to the hon. member. I would refer him to chapter 31 of the statutes of 1928, and particularly to section 2(a), the interpretation clause.

Mr. BARBER: I understand that a tourist arriving at a port of entry with $100 worth of goods is given exemption to the value of $100. He then cannot secure a further exemption for a period of four months. What about the tourist who arrives at a port with only $10 worth of goods? Should he receive another exemption within a period of four months? Does the provision refer to an exemption of $100 within four months?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no carry-over.

Mr. BARBER: That encourages the tourist to come back with $100 worth of goods.

Mr. DUNNING: I suppose you might put it that way, yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—802. Materials and parts as hereunder specified, when imported by manufacturers of umbrellas, parasols, sunshades, walking sticks or canes, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe, for use in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories:—

(a) Mounts, sticks, rods, ribs, runners, rings, caps, notches, tips, ferrules and assembled frames: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

(b) Umbrella-covering fabrics of a kind not made in Canada, whether or not specially treated but not further manufactured than with hemmed selvedges, when imported in lengths of not less than ten yards each, with or without natural selvedges: British preferential tariff, free; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to direct a question to the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: I have an amendment to move which may clarify the discussion at least in some degree. It will be noticed that previously materials for the manufacture of umbrellas were scattered through three items bearing widely differing rates. In drafting the item an effort was made to arrive at a fair rate applicable to all, but representations have been made since that time indicating that formerly a much larger proportion of the (a) section in the item came in under a 5 per cent intermediate tariff than came in under other items carrying a higher rate. It has been contended that the concessions granted on cloths and on portions of the frame would be to a greater or lesser extent offset by the increase in the rate on the components of the frame. That was not intended, of course. The intention was to help with respect to materials entering into the manufacture of umbrellas. The amending resolution which I shall ask my colleague to move changes to 5 per cent the rate of 10 per cent under the intermediate rate in section (a).

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That the rates of duties of customs set opposite tariff item 802(a) as introduced under resolution No. 5 on May 1, 1936, be amended to read as follows: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to bring a matter to the attention of the minister. The item in question deals with mounts, sticks, rods, ribs and so on, used in the manufacture of umbrellas. While the matter to which I shall refer does not come directly under the item, it has reference to an old item which included these articles. I am referring to shafts used in the manufacture of golf clubs.

Mr. DUNNING: This point arose the other evening in connection with the discussion of another matter; perhaps the hon. member was not in the house at the time. On that occasion I undertook to look into it, and if the facts were as stated I promised to bring in an item. We will deal with it immediately after finishing the regular schedule.

Mr. STEVENS: Very well; I shall wait until then.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is it correct to say that the purpose of the change is to facilitate the manufacture of umbrellas in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The companies manufacturing umbrellas have to import these parts, none of which are made in Canada.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—805. Materials to be used as adhesives in cementing together glass sheets, when imported by manufacturers of safety or non-shattered laminated glass, for use exclusively in the manufacture of such glass in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: Before we complete the schedule may I refer to the item I mentioned to the hon. member for Kootenay East. We will refer back to item 446c, which is not included in the items in the schedule before us. Hon. members will recall the discussion a few evenings ago when it was represented that the tariff on the completed golf stick was lower than the tariff on the shaft, a condition which was described as inequitable. I have looked into the matter and find that I cannot make it equitable because this is one of the items bound under the British trade agreement. However, it can be reduced under the intermediate to 25 per cent and still maintain the margin agreed upon at the empire conference. I shall ask my colleague to move the amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That schedule "A" to the customs tariff, as amended by resolution No. 5 of May 1, 1936, be further amended by deleting therefrom tariff item 446c and substituting therefor in said schedule "A" the following item, enumeration and rates of duty:

[Mr. Ilsley.]

446c. Golf shafts of seamless steel, coated or not, but not chromium plated: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, before leaving this schedule, I find, after checking up on Hansard and on the scroll, there is one item which Hansard records quite properly as carried, but which is not indicated on the scroll as having been carried. It is item 442 and was discussed thoroughly. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) asked me to hold it until he had had time to read it. The discussion continued until the leader of the opposition had had time to read the item, and he indicated no objection to it. There has been an error as between Hansard, on the one hand, and the scroll on the other, and I ask the indulgence of the committee to correct the scroll in that regard.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is all right.

Mr. REID: Might I appeal to the minister in connection with egg graders imported into this country? There is no classification for them, but fruit and vegetable graders come in free or at a duty of five per cent. Egg graders are an item affecting the poultry producers of British Columbia, and at present they carry a duty of thirty per cent, plus, of course, sales tax and excise tax. I am sorry that I did not have an opportunity to mention this matter earlier in the discussion as I was in attendance at one of the committees of the house, but I think egg graders should be placed on the same footing as fruit and vegetable graders.

Mr. DUNNING: They are, by item 409 (e).

Mr. CAHAN: Before passing to the next schedule I find that chapter 31 of the statutes of 1928, an act respecting interprovincial and international traffic in intoxicating liquors, makes it a criminal offence under the laws of Canada for any person entering Canada to bring in with him liquors in any quantity whatsoever except for the purposes set out in the act. Section 2 says:

2. In this act, unless the context otherwise requires,—

(a) "intoxicating liquor" means any liquor which is, by the law of the province for the time being in force, deemed to be intoxicating liquor, and which it is unlawful to sell or have in possession without a permit or other authority of the government of the province or any board, commission, officer or other governmental agency authorized to issue such permit or grant such authority;

(b) "province" means any province of Canada in which there is for the time being in force an act giving the government of the province, or any board, commission, officer or other governmental agency control over the sale of intoxicating liquor therein.

Section 3 says:

3. (1) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other act or law, no person shall import, send, take or transport, or cause to be imported, sent, taken or transported into any province from or out of any place within or without Canada, any intoxicating liquor, except such as has been purchased by or on behalf of, and which is consigned to His Majesty or the executive government of the province into which it is being imported, sent, taken or transported, or any board, commission, officer or other governmental agency which, by the law of the province, is vested with the right of selling intoxicating liquor.

There are very heavy penalties upon one who brings in liquors under those circumstances. There is for the first offence a penalty of not more than $200, and in default of payment imprisonment for a term of three months; for a second offence a penalty of not less than $200 and not more than $1,000, and in default of payment imprisonment for not less than three months and not more than six months, and for each subsequent offence imprisonment for not less than six months or not more than twelve months. Apparently in the latter case there is no option of a fine. I suggest that, when the minister publishes notice of the exemption which has passed the house this afternoon, he should place in print on the notice that any person who at the present time exercises the right of bringing in this liquor is violating a statute of the parliament of Canada, and that in retaining the liquor in his possession after he crosses the border he is violating a provincial statute, and that for violation of the federal statute he is liable to fine and imprisonment as I have stated.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to—

Mr. DUNNING: There is nothing before the committee, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STEVENS: Before the bill is introduced I would like to add one word of appeal to the minister, that he again consider the deletion of the words "on alcoholic beverages in excess of one quart," and deal with the matter by regulation. I believe that can be done, and it would cover the whole situation.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is nothing before the committee at the moment, Mr. Chairman, but the suggestion of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) will be considered. At present it seems to me there is a great deal of reason in his contention. Regarding the suggestion of the hon. member for Kootenay East, I do not like to say that we shall reconsider it, because I do not think reconsideration would lead to any change in the item. It has already been examined very carefully from a great many angles; we do not regard the inclusion of these words as an invitation to break either a federal or a provincial statute, and it is not to be regarded as such. This is not a repeal of the act respecting the importation of intoxicating liquors, and it is not and is not intended to be an overriding provision so far as provincial legislation is concerned, but it is a provision that in our opinion is desirable.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I would ask the minister—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I want to allow as wide a latitude as possible, but the committee is discussing an item that was passed ten minutes ago.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I quite agree that the item has been carried, Mr. Chairman, and I am not asking to have it changed. We can quite easily bring this matter up at some other stage of the bill. As I understand it, this item in the tariff act will not override that general law. Is that right?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

6. Resolved, that schedule B to the Customs Tariff, being chapter forty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, be amended by striking thereout tariff items 1030 and 1055, the enumerations of goods and the rates of drawback of customs duties set opposite to each of the said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of drawback of customs duties in said schedule B:—

Customs tariff—1011. Rhinestones, settings for rhinestones, metal spots and beads: when imported by manufacturers of dress trimmings and used exclusively in their own factories in the manufacture of dresses and dress trimmings: drawback, 99 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: Following that item, Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to deal with two situations which arise in connection with tubing. The present drawback provisions on lap welded tubing of iron and steel, not less than four inches in diameter, threaded or coupled, includes no provision for the couplings which are a necessary part of the pipe. The drawback to which I refer is available when the material is used in casing water, oil or natural gas wells or for the transmission of natural gas. A difficulty in administration has arisen because the word "coupling" does not appear in the item and it is intended to make it so apply. The same is true with respect to tubing over four inches in diameter. I will ask my colleague to move the amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move accordingly.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is this No. 1025?

Mr. DUNNING: This item does not appear in the printed list. It is a very simple thing and one which should not arouse any controversy.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: Before we pass on to the next item, I should like to refer to the striking out of item 1030. This covers a drawback of fifty per cent on the goods enumerated in tariff item 236, which refers to surgical dressings and so forth. What is the reason for the withdrawal or abandonment of the drawback privilege in connection with that item?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is one item ahead of me at the moment. I may tell him that it all comes back in the next item. If he will let us deal with item 1025, we shall then come to item 1030.

Customs tariff—1025. Hot rolled hexagon bars of Bessemer steel not being of greater value than four cents per pound: when used in the manufacture of cold drawn bars: drawback, 99 per cent.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is this a new item?

Mr. DUNNING: This is an entirely new drawback item which was suggested by the tariff board in connection with its report on the automotive industry.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1030. (a) Materials, n.o.p.: when used exclusively in the manufacture of articles enumerated in tariff item 236: drawback, 50 per cent.

(b) Woven fabrics, wholly of cotton, not bleached, mercerized nor coloured, weighing not more than seven and one-half pounds per one hundred square yards: when imported under the British preferential tariff and used exclusively in the manufacture of articles enumerated in tariff item 236: drawback, 99 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) was asking about the repeal of this item. The whole of item 1030 is reenacted and the new (b) section is included as a result of the tariff board inquiry into the textile industry. The new (b) section will apply only with respect to duties paid on imports under the British preferential tariff.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This clause is drafted exactly as suggested by the tariff board?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1052. Machinery, new or used, of a class or kind not made in Canada: When imported by manufacturers of automobiles and motor vehicles or of automobile and motor vehicle parts to be used in the production of such automobiles and motor vehicles or automobile and motor vehicle parts drawback, 99 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is an entirely new item put in as a consequence of the inquiry into the automotive industry. It provides for a ninety-nine per cent drawback on duties paid on machinery, whether new or used, of a class or kind not made in Canada, when imported by manufacturers of automobiles or automobile parts for use in the production of automobiles or parts.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): It seems to me that in connection with these drawbacks the whole principle of fixing the tariff is shown to be wrong. We make tariff regulations; then we come along and say they are not right and we shall allow a drawback. That is an admission that we have not done what is right; that by a drawback we are trying to rectify an error. I think we should always deal with the tariff scientifically. This is my objection to the reduction of duties on farm implements. We appointed a committee of this house to inquire into this matter and before that committee had brought down its report, we changed the tariff affecting these implements. I think this committee should inquire as to whether or not a change would affect employment and the rates of wages paid in this industry. I doubt if any hon. member knows whether these changes will have any effect upon those employed in the industry. I have sufficient confidence in the government and in the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to know that any wrong will be righted immediately.

Similarly with regard to the automotive industry, a reference was made to the tariff board. In Brantford is located a company known as the Canada Carriage and Body Company Limited, which makes bodies for motor buses. In this industry are employed the finest class of working men, both skilled and unskilled, to be found any place in the world. This company makes a motor bus body that compares favourably with any body made in any other part of the world. This company did not have an opportunity of appearing before the tariff board. When they found out that the tariff had been reduced they immediately made representations to the board and they were told that an advertisement had been inserted in the press to the effect that this matter was being referred to the tariff board. The motor bus body builders did not think they came within that classification and the chairman or some official of the board stated that representations would be heard from the manufacturers of motor bus bodies. They appeared before the board and an informal discussion occurred.

I am sure hon. members will be surprised to know that among those who advocated a reduction in the tariff on motor bus bodies was none other than the Toronto transportation commission. I contend that such action is most unfair and is certainly short-sighted on the part of the Toronto transportation commission, located in the city which is the home of the high priests of high protection. I am sorry that more members of the opposition from the queen city are not present this afternoon, but no doubt they feel that the conference they are attending is more vital to them than anything which might take place in this committee. However I must say that I do not believe hon. members from the queen city advocated a reduction in the tariff; I believe that was done by the Toronto transportation commission. Toronto is known as "Toronto the good," but I sometimes wonder what it is good for. Apparently it is good only for those things that are good for the city of Toronto.

Mr. FACTOR: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): There are some good men who have come out of Toronto. I am very serious about this. To think that an organization in Toronto should ask for a low tariff on goods which are made in the city of Brantford! Do they not care anything about the working man in Brantford? Do they not care so long as they get foreign motor buses to carry Canadian workingmen—and no doubt they put a union jack on the bus—to and from their work? I say that Toronto should have demanded Canadian buses made in Canada by Canadian workingmen to carry Canadian workingmen to and from their work. Toronto and every other city, whether in the east or in the west, must have a broader outlook if we are to solve our problems. We cannot simply seek, as apparently Toronto in this instance does, a low tariff on the commodities we do not produce and a high tariff on the commodities we do produce. We must look at industry as a whole, and I submit that no change should be made in the tariff structure unless we are sure that no workingman in any part of this dominion will be detrimentally affected thereby. We must not forget that the greatest problem in Canada to-day is still unemployment. There are three great problems we have to face—the railway problem, the debt problem, and unemployment. Suppose you solve the railway problem, and the only solutions I have heard are scrapping the railways or amalgamating them. Well, however you may solve that problem you still have unemployment on your hands, and probably on a greater scale than ever before. Then you have the debt problem. Suppose you solve that problem. Some suggest wiping out debts; others say that we should print money and pay our debts in that way. Do either one, and in the end you will still be faced with unemployment as great as ever. But if you solve the unemployment problem then the railway problem will largely take care of itself and so will the debt problem.

My admonition to all the members of the house is this: We must look at Canada as a whole. We must try to solve not only the problems of the west or of the east or of the city of Toronto but all the problems that call for solution throughout the country. We must try to do those things that are good for the workingmen of Brantford and for the farmers of Brantford, for the workingmen of Vancouver and for the farmers throughout the land. We must get away from provincialism, for if we do not we shall wreck the whole country. Some of us come here thinking our own little constituency is the greatest in the country. I still think my own is the greatest, but I do know this, that my constituency cannot live alone; and again I remind other hon. members that their constituencies cannot live to themselves if they destroy other parts of the country.

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps I am reading the item wrong, but did we not some years ago pass a statute forbidding the importation of used cars?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Would not these used cars come under the definition of machinery to be used in the production of cars or of parts?

Mr. DUNNING: This is with respect to machinery of manufacture, not to the car itself.

Mr. NEILL: Could it not be interpreted to include a carburetor?

Mr. DUNNING: No; the prohibition will rule in any case.

Mr. NEILL: If the prohibition rules, then we are in a position that is worse than the situation we have discussed all afternoon in connection with the conflict between a dominion and a provincial statute, because here we have two dominion provisions. I do not know how you will indicate the one that is to dominate, because they are both dominion.

Mr. DUNNING: I was stating a general principle when I said that the prohibition would rule, but I cannot admit that the prohibition against the importation of second-hand motor cars enters into any part of this item. This item deals with machinery for the manufacture of cars and not at all with the cars themselves or with parts of cars. And it is all of a class or kind not made in Canada.

Mr. NEILL: It is not very clear.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there any relation between this item and 1055, which has been deleted? That is a very large item.

Mr. DUNNING: Item 1055 was the old drawback item on automobile parts and it is taken care of now in the general tariff revision which has taken place consequent upon the tariff board's report. It is unnecessary now and has no relation to this item.

Mr. STEVENS: Has 1055 been deleted in consequence of the report of the tariff board?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Under this item as it reads could one not import a used engine, put it into a car in Canada and get the rebate?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It says, "to be used in the production of such automobiles." Would not the term "machinery" be broad enough to cover an engine?

Mr. DUNNING: No; and in any case an engine would be barred because engines are made in Canada.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister consider using the word "manufacture" instead of the word "production"? I can produce a car by buying a carburetor here and something else there, but I could not manufacture one.

Mr. DUNNING: That is rather splitting hairs, and I am afraid the same difficulty would be present in my hon. friend's mind if we used the word "manufacture." He could also manufacture a car by getting a carburetor here and something else elsewhere. This is exactly the wording the tariff board suggested for the item, which is distinctly a machinery item. And the words, "of a class or kind not made in Canada," would prevent my hon. friend from collecting parts of a car and putting them together.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1060. Paper of all kinds: when used by the publisher or printer in Canada in the production of periodical publications enjoying second-class mailing privileges: drawback, 50 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: I have an amendment to bring this into conformity with the corresponding tariff item as amended. The amendment is to add the following words:

The pages of which are regularly bound, wire-stitched or otherwise fastened together.

That will make the drawback item apply in conformity with the tariff item.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What is the object of this item?

Mr. DUNNING: It is to give the same relief to the publisher of magazines in Canada with respect to Canadian taxation, having regard to the competition to which he is now subject from American publications.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am not going to traverse the ground we went over the other night when my right hon. leader discussed this particular question, but I must put myself on record as not being in favour of doing this if it is going to reduce employment in Canada or take away work which we ought to do here in the manufacturing of our own paper. I realize that perhaps some of this paper cannot be made here, but we have now companies in Canada which manufacture very high grade qualities, and I think those companies should be encouraged. I do not want to do anything to hurt the publication of magazines. I was very sorry indeed that the regulations made by the former government imposing taxes on foreign magazines were removed by the present government. In my opinion we ought to be able to manufacture in this country papers of all kinds, and it is a great pity that steps are not taken to encourage such manufactures by our own people

Mr. DUNNING: After considering the matter very fully, I believe this degree of drawback represents a fair concession to the publishers without the danger to other Canadian industries which my hon. friend, like myself, would fear if it went too far. There has been a great deal of discussion about it ever since the Canada-United States treaty was made, and needless to say, various interests have various views. Each of them is actuated, of course, by regard for the thing he understands the best, which is the business in which he himself is engaged. I have endeavoured to give the matter every consideration. The government has discussed it on many occasions; representations from all quarters have been heard, and this represents what we regard as a fair adjustment under the situation now prevailing.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Mr. Ilsley:

That item 1060, as contained in resolution No. 6 of May 1, 1936, be amended by adding to the words "when used by the publisher or printer in Canada in the production of periodical publications enjoying second-class mailing privileges" the following phrase:—
"the pages of which are regularly bound, wire stitched, or otherwise fastened together."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I venture to make the suggestion that the government in this matter has not been over generous. I am not worried particularly about the point brought up by the right hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), who suggests that the paper companies are in danger from the extension of this small drawback. I have before me the record of the two largest companies in Canada making this class of paper, the Howard Smith Paper Company and Provincial Paper Mills Limited. Both these companies went through a process of expansion of their fixed charges by means of reorganization, in different years. On June 1, 1928, the Howard Smith Company went into its mill with total securities of $10,664,300, and, without increasing its actual assets, emerged a few days later with a capital of $14,400,621, an increase, which may be represented as not much more than pure water, of $3,736,321. By that process they increased the fixed charges of the company in the sum of $140,000 a year. The Provincial Paper Mills was not quite so strenuous, though it was bad enough in all conscience. It went into this process of expansion on May 1, 1927, with a capital of $6,550,000, and without increasing its assets emerged with $8,900,000, a total increase of $2,350,000. The combined increase amounted to $6,086,321 of capital, and the increased fixed charges by way of interest on bonds amounted to $377,000 per year.

Mr. DUNNING: What company was that?

Mr. DEACHMAN: I am talking about the two companies. I venture to suggest that two corporations which can afford to add to their fixed charges $377,000 in a single year without adding to their real assets will be able to withstand the measure of competition to which they will be subjected by this change in the budget.

In 1928 the drawback was extended to eighty per cent. At that particular period Canadian companies publishing magazines were able to use better paper. They increased their use of paper. The increase in the use of this classification went up more during the next three years than in any similar period of Canadian history. Nor were these paper companies at all seriously affected so far as their profits were concerned. The profit upon the individual ton they sold may have been less, but the increased tonnage enabled them to pay a larger dividend in 1930 than they did in 1928 or 1929, which were prosperous years, and they seemed to get along very well. But with the change when the drawback was withdrawn their profits and dividends fell, and they were no longer prosperous. The reason they were no longer prosperous, I shall be told, was that those were hard times. Quite true they were hard times, but they were hard times for the publishers in this country because they had to pay to the Howard Smith Paper Company and to the Provincial Paper Mills a price which was fixed by the tariff. There was published a few days ago in the newspapers of this city an open letter from the MacLean Publishing Company in which they stated that their paper cost them $312,600 a year. Then they said, "We were required to pay $66,162 more for our paper than our United States competitors." If you figure that out you will find that it amounts to approximately 21 per cent. These two corporations by this legislation, by the duty which they then enjoyed, were enabled to charge users of paper between 21 and 22 per cent more than they could have charged had they been on a free trade basis.

I ask you to consider this question. It is not only magazines, ordinarily so called, that are published in Canada. We have our farm press. The farm press has gone through very difficult times during the last few years. Farm purchasing power was gone. It has been a struggle to make a living. Not long ago two of the largest farm papers in western Canada amalgamated because they could not successfully maintain a separate existence. That amalgamation of these two separate papers was brought about by hard conditions induced by the high costs of raw material required in the manufacture of their products. The result of this amalgamation has been a big loss to the paper mills of Canada, a loss which they might have avoided under conditions of greater freedom. The farm press has been a powerful factor in maintaining the morale of the farmers of this country during a period of stress and strain. When you give relief as is being done here you are enabling the farm papers to exercise a tremendous national influence in the dominion. I suggest therefore that further relief should be given. There is no evidence in all the statements I have before me that any of these companies were suffering under the old drawback of eighty per cent.

I suggest there is something more that might very well be done. I suggest that the whole matter of the publishers and producers of paper might go before the tariff board during the coming year for further consideration in the hope that a larger measure of freedom might be extended to the publishers of this dominion and that we might get back near the basis we were on in 1928 and 1929 as far as the publishing business and the production of this class of paper are concerned. What do these people need? They are producing a relatively small quantity. They have difficulty in competing because they do not produce a sufficient quantity. Give the publishers a chance to develop; expand the market, and when that is done you will have a basis on which such companies can live and prosper. They will prosper not on a basis of inflation and the increase of stock values and bonded indebtedness, but rather as a result of a wider market for the product they have to sell.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: My hon. friend stresses the increase in capital of these companies, and I am with him in that regard. No one in this house dislikes more than I do the fianancing that went on in this country in connection with increases in capital and bonded indebtedness. I am entirely in accord with my hon. friend on that point, but I am thinking about the workmen; I am not considering the companies at all. They can look out for themselves, but the more paper we import into Canada, where we have the raw material, the less work there will be for our own people. That is the only thing in which I am interested.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I understand that in the publishing business for every dollar's worth of paper used there is five dollars spent in labour in other ways. Therefore the more paper we import at lower prices the more labour there will be used in the publishing business in Canada.

Item as amended agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Deachman.]

7. Resolved, that schedule C to the customs tariff, being chapter forty-four of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, be amended by adding thereto the following items:

Customs tariff—1218. Used or second-hand periodical publications:

Provided, that this item does not affect in any manner periodical publications:—

(a) Sent, gratis, to Canada for charitable purposes;

(b) Sent to persons in Canada as casual donations by friends abroad;

(c) Imported for personal or for institutional use, and not for resale;

(d) Imported by or for paper mills for use as stock in the manufacture of paper.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1219. Used or second-hand mattresses or materials therefrom:

Provided, that this item does not affect in any manner:

(a) Mattresses imported under tariff items 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, or under tourists' or travellers' vehicle permits;

(b) Materials from used or second-hand mattresses, when imported after having been cleaned and fumigated, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe, accompanied by such certificates as he may designate.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to suggest to the minister that the proviso in paragraph (b) be dropped. This privoso limits the application of the prohibition applying to mattresses; it permits materials from used or second hand mattresses to be imported after having been cleaned and fumigated, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe, accompanied by such certificates as he may designate. I suggest that this should not be allowed. If there is any type of material that is filthy, disgusting and unsanitary it is this class of material coming from used mattresses. I think many hon. members who are interested in the question of health will support me when I say that it is a disgusting practice to allow this type of material to come in, though unfortunately we have done so for some time past. I suggest to the minister that this proviso be struck out entirely, so as to provide a complete prohibition on the importation of used mattresses. I earnestly and strongly plead for that.

Mr. DUNNING: I wanted to do that, until I was shown how very easy it would be to evade the prohibition by shredding the dirty material and getting it in under various other items of the tariff, such as the rag and waste items. This morning, curiously enough, I received a protest against this prohibition from a firm who claim to be very reputable people and who clean up this material and use it in some way. I am not complying with that request, however. The point is that we felt it would be safer to deal with this material in this manner, by permitting it to come in if it has been cleaned and fumigated in such a way as to satisfy our health inspectors, than to put on a form of prohibition which I was told would not prohibit because of the ease with which the material could be brought in under some other item, though I agree entirely with what my hon. friend has said.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Under present regulations has not the Department of Agriculture some authority with regard to importations of this kind?

Mr. DUNNING: No, not in connection with industrial materials such as these.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: In connection with the possibility of disease?

Mr. DUNNING: That is so in connection with hay and straw and that sort of thing, but not in relation to human disease.

Mr. STEVENS: Animal health is adequately protected, but human health is not.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

WHITEWOOD, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle):

1. Were tenders received prior to the 1st of November, 1935, for the installing of an electric clock in the post office at Whitewood, Saskatchewan?
2. If so, what was the lowest figure quoted?
3. Who received the contract for installing the clock in the Whitewood post office?

2. If so, when are tenders to be opened?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.

2. On May 2, 1936, tender of Edward Wiseman, jeweller of Wolseley, at $635, was accepted.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM—WAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government if any inquiry is being made into the rates of wages paid to married men employed at the experimental form at Indian Head. I think it was on February 21 that I drew attention to this matter, and I understand that married men are still forced to maintain themselves on twenty-one cents an hour.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend may see, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not in his place at the moment, and he will not be back for a day or two. However, as soon as he returns I am sure he will be glad to give my hon. friend a reply.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) inquired as to the truth of a rumour in his constituency that the Canadian Pacific Railway contemplated discontinuing the service on their line between Saskatoon and Unity in Saskatchewan. Upon making inquiry I find that no application for discontinuance has been made to the board of railway commissioners, and the chief solicitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company advises me that he has no knowledge of an application of the kind.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I may say that that line is not in my constituency.

NATIONAL HARBOURS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine): Yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) directed a question to me with respect to fatalities which had occurred in the harbour of Montreal and requested that I investigate and reply. On inquiry I find that since the opening of navigation three longshoremen have been killed in the loading and unloading of ships in the harbour of Montreal. Two other men lost their lives by drowning one a sailor and the other a longshoreman who was proceeding along the docks after his work had been finished. It would appear that neither of these two men was engaged in the work of loading or unloading ships at the time he met his death. I may add that the Department of Marine employs a tackle inspector at the port of Montreal whose duty it is to safeguard as far as possible those employed in loading and unloading ships by inspecting the apparatus used for that purpose and by seeing that safe methods are employed.

It would not appear that the death of the three men killed while actually employed in loading or unloading a ship was due in any sense to defective apparatus. I would remind the house that fatal accidents are investigated by the coroner, and, in respect of each of the five cases mentioned, the verdict was accidental death. It is regrettable that in such a dangerous occupation as that of loading and unloading ships it seems to be impossible to avoid the occurrence of such accidents.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) addressed a question to me yesterday in connection with conditions affecting longshoremen in Montreal. I assume the information he was asking for has been given by my colleague, the Minister of Marine (Mr. Howe).

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to know whether the minister is going to take any further steps to see that accidents of this kind are avoided. I assume I cannot make a speech at this time, but I would ask whether any further steps are to be taken to safeguard the lives of these men.

Mr. ROGERS: A representative of the Department of Labour in Montreal was instructed to make an inquiry, and I shall see that the matter is brought to the attention of the proper authorities.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:—

1. That the corporation rate of tax shall be increased from thirteen and one-half per centum to fifteen per centum.

Paragraph agreed to.

2. That where a consolidation is permitted the corporation rate of tax shall be increased from fifteen per centum to seventeen per centum.

Mr. CAHAN: What section of the Income War Tax Act will be amended by this resolution?

Mr. DUNNING: Section 35.

Mr. CAHAN: This resolution applies solely and exclusively to consolidated returns of incomes of corporations as covered by subsection 3 of section 35?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: We are dealing with rather important matters, and in order that one may have some idea of the effect of these proposed changes, the proceedings should not be hurried. One should have an opportunity to look at the original section in order to appreciate the effect of the proposed amendment.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not hurrying things. I want to give all the time that is required, but I would remark to my hon. friend that the exact wording of this resolution has been in the votes and proceedings since the first day of May, and it was assumed that in the interval hon. members would have made up their minds as to what they desire to say about it. I am sorry to have given the impression of hurrying; I had no such intention.

Mr. CAHAN: I was not suggesting that the hon. gentleman was hurrying.

Mr. STEVENS: I may be derelict in my duty, but are we dealing with paragraph 3 of the resolution?

The CHAIRMAN: Paragraph 2.

Mr. STEVENS: If it is not too much trouble, would the chairman indicate what the paragraph is about when he calls the number?

The CHAIRMAN: Paragraph 2 reads:

That where a consolidation is permitted the corporation rate of tax shall be increased from fifteen per centum to seventeen per centum.

Paragraph agreed to.

3. That payment of the gift tax be made annually.

Mr. CAHAN: What section of the act deals with the gift tax?

Mr. DUNNING: Section 88. Considerable inconvenience arose out of the original wording of the gift tax provision. The tax was payable at the time the gift was made, but the rate of tax on the individual gift was determined by the total of the gifts during the year, so that the situation arose that a gift might be made early in the year and the tax paid upon it, and by virtue of subsequent gifts during the same year the rate of tax payable on the first gift would be increased. That was the difficulty. A yearly payment of the tax is provided for by the amendment, and that will eliminate uncertainty with regard to the rate of tax payable, since at the end of the year the exact annual amount will be known.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does that mean that if a gift is made the person making it has to pay a tax every year forever on that gift?

Mr. DUNNING: No, once for all time. The change is that in future, instead of paying the tax when he makes the gift, as the law now calls for, he will make payment at the end of the year on the whole of the gifts made during the year.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am prepared to admit that perhaps I do not know English as well as the man who drafted this, but to my mind the language does not convey that impression. It may be perfectly plain if some lawyer has so stated, but that is not the impression I got when I read it.

Mr. DUNNING: This is the resolution and not the bill.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: But I take it the bill follows the resolution.

Mr. DUNNING: I will watch the point to which my right hon. friend refers, but I have to depend pretty much on these lawyers when it comes to using language in such provisions. They will not allow me to use my own.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: When I write a sentence and there is some difference of opinion in my office among the members of the staff as to what it means, I change it so that there can be no doubt about it. That is a fairly good principle. I would ask another question. With regard to this gift tax I understand that there is a departmental decision or interpretation of the meaning of this section, as to exactly what a gift is. I find it a little difficult sometimes to understand it. I know that last year we passed it when we were in office, but all the same there is some doubt as to just what a gift is, though I know exactly what the purpose originally was. The intention was that people who divided their property and gave large portions of it to their children during their lifetime should not escape taxation, but I understand that if you make Christmas gifts in proportion to your means such gifts are not included for purposes of taxation. Is that correct?

Mr. DUNNING: The next resolution deals with that point. The one we have under consideration relates to the annual payment.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it clear from the statement of the Minister of Finance that the word "annually" refers simply to the aggregate of the gifts made during a single year, and that the payment is not to be repeated from year to year?

Mr. DUNNING: I can assure the committee of my own intention, and it is exactly that implied by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I will go further.

If the language of the resolution does not carry out that meaning, the draftsman concerned will be instructed with respect to the section of the bill which will be based upon the resolution, so that there shall be no doubt about it.

Mr. CAHAN: Here we are merely concerned with the intention.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and the intention is as has been stated.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I can only repeat that in my opinion the wording is at any rate doubtful and ought not to be left as it stands. It is open to two interpretations.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the information with regard to the gift tax taken from the dominion tax returns?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Paragraph agreed to.

4. That gifts to any one person which in the aggregate do not exceed one thousand dollars in the calendar year be exempt from the provisions of the gift tax.

Mr. DUNNING: This bears on the point raised by my right hon. friend from Argenteuil. In the past exemption from the gift tax has been granted on a yearly aggregate of gifts up to $4,000, and it has been urged that this exemption is not sufficiently high because it acts as a deterrent to charitable giving. The purpose of the gift tax is to deter transfers of property, chiefly between members of a family, made with the object of reducing the amount of income tax which would otherwise be payable, that is, by putting it in a lower rather than a higher income bracket. It is not the purpose of the tax to deter charitable giving; that was not the original intention. This change is designed to encourage persons who for charitable reasons make annual gifts to relatives, dependents, former employees and so on, and is in the same spirit as section 5 (j) of the Income War Tax Act, which allows a deduction up to ten per cent of the total income for gifts made to charitable institutions. The $4,000 exemption will be retained but will apply only to the aggregate of gifts which individually do not exceed $1,000. That is to say, gifts of $1,000 or less shall not be regarded as gifts for tax purposes. Let me amplify that. Under the Income War Tax Act as it stands one may claim exemption up to ten per cent of one's income in respect of charitable contributions made to recognized charitable organizations. Under the gift tax provision as it has stood up to the present, if a man in a similar spirit of charity was supporting former employees and relatives other than those in the exempted class he would nevertheless be taxed under the gift tax. It is thought that the spirit that prompted the house in 1930 to give recognition to gifts made to charitable organizations ought to be extended to cover the provisions of the gift tax in relation to gifts to individuals when the amount of such gifts does not exceed $1,000 in any one year.

Mr. CAHAN: A person may have dependents other than those mentioned in the act, as many of us have, and they may not be children or grandchildren. Few men reach an advanced age—

Mr. DUNNING: Or even middle age.

Mr. CAHAN —who have not others that are morally and perhaps legally dependent upon them, and it does seem to me that a person should be permitted to pay for the necessary support of those who are dependent upon him, according to his own status in life and their means. I understand from this that a so-called gift of a thousand dollars to a person who is dependent upon the giver—

Mr. DUNNING: Not necessarily even dependent.

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing now with dependents. I see quite a difference between my giving generally to charity and my giving to those who are dependent upon me, for whose support I am morally responsible. For instance, in the province of Quebec, as you know, the law is very wide with regard to the liability to dependent relatives, and "dependent relatives" are given a very wide interpretation under the civil code. But so long as the gift to a dependent does not exceed $1,000 in one year, this gift tax does not apply?

Mr. DUNNING: Right. Or will not.

Mr. CAHAN: Will not apply. But assume that gifts are made to a number of dependents; if the total of such gifts to dependents exceeds an aggregate of $4,000—?

Mr. DUNNING: No; the aggregate is immaterial so long as the gift is an individual one. My hon. friend has the privilege of supporting fifty if he likes.

Mr. CAHAN: That is what I desire to know.

Mr. DUNNING: At a thousand dollars a year, yes. The $4,000 exemption is apart from this feature altogether.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is that correct?—because under the present law it is $4,000 to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the amendment the $4,000 exemption will be apart altogether from the exemption relating to gifts to any one person of $1,000. If, as I suspect, my hon. friend has many more than four people to whom he feels he should contribute, he will be able to do so to the extent of not more than $1,000 in each case, and will not be taxed upon it. In addition to that he will have a general exemption of $4,000 in respect of what might be called general gifts. The object of the gift tax in the first place was very well stated by the right hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) when he said it was designed to prevent evasion of the income tax law by those who sought to make large gifts to relatives in order to bring their income tax into a lower bracket. That object is maintained. It has been in operation, I think, only one year, but in practice hardships have been demonstrated in connection with people who, while charitably minded, having a keen sense of their responsibilities towards former employees and distant relatives, are taxed on these charitable contributions. Now this is brought into line in general principle with the income tax law in relation to charitable contributions.

Mr. CAHAN: The tax in that case upon income remains as before?

Mr. DUNNING: Precisely.

Mr. CAHAN: And the additional tax on gifts will not apply in the cases which the finance minister has mentioned?

Mr. DUNNING: Right.

Paragraph agreed to.

5. That the rate of interest on unpaid instalments of tax be reduced from six per centum to five per centum.

Mr. CAHAN: No one can object to that.

Mr. COLDWELL: In connection with this particular paragraph I wish to comment briefly as I did in the course of the budget debate, with regard to people avoiding payment of income tax and therefore having, perhaps, unpaid instalments. Since I made some remarks on this matter in the House of Commons a great deal of information has come to me which I should be glad to pass along. I believe the Minister of Finance would be well advised to look into the whole matter of the incorporation of companies, particularly in Prince Edward Island. I am given to understand that at least one powerful trust company has an office in London and one in Charlottetown, and is engaged more or less in helping people to avoid payment of income tax both in Great Britain and in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, he is out of order on this item, but paragraph 9 of this resolution relates directly to the matter he is discussing.

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall be glad to discuss it there.

Paragraph agreed to.

6. That the penalty rate of interest in addition to the interest provided for in the foregoing resolution in respect of unpaid overdue tax be reduced from four per centum to three per centum.

Paragraph agreed to.

7. That a tax of five per centum be imposed at the source on payments by Canadian debtors to non-residents in respect of films whether copyrighted or not.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The minister might make some explanation of this.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; I have an amendment in addition. The tax applies to films. It is found, however, that all films used in Canada are not copyrighted, and the purpose of this amendment is to ensure that payments for the use of all films, whether copyrighted or not, shall be subject to the tax. But since the original resolution was tabled the film producing companies have made representations and have demonstrated that a five per cent tax on gross remittances, which is what this particular tax is, is quite inequitable, in that it takes no account of their expense of production, and also would be unduly high. As few of the producing companies are making more than five per cent gross, we would be taking all of the income by the tax. The most important item of cost is the amortization of the cost of the negative and positive prints. The cost allocated to the Canadian business is on the basis of the number of positive prints used in Canadian distribution by comparison with the total number of positive prints used in world distribution. Therefore I propose by way of amendment to provide for a rate of allowance of sixty per cent from gross remittances, which is taken to represent the amortization of the film cost. In effect therefore the tax becomes a two per cent tax on gross remittances instead of five per cent as provided by the terms of the resolution as tabled. I am quite impressed with the representations made, and it was demonstrated to the satisfaction of the officers of the department that the proposal as originally stated would have had the effect of taking the whole gross revenue of these corporations—in some cases, not in all—because of the peculiar nature of their business. At the same time we do think we should have some revenue from this source; hence this proposal, which I shall ask my colleague to move, providing that an allowance of sixty per cent of such payments may be made for the amortization of film costs.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move the amendment:

Provided that an allowance of sixty per cent of such payments may be made for amortization of film cost.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not wish to make formal objection, but I suggest to the minister that, in dealing with such an important statute as the Income War Tax Act, these proposed amendments might be printed in the votes and proceedings of the previous day. It is impossible, from an oral statement of the case, to form a clear and definite opinion as to the exact extent and application of a proposed amendment.

Mr. DUNNING: This gives me an opportunity to mention that, in connection with the one amendment which I regarded as important and complex, namely the amendment to paragraph 9, I handed that in and it is printed in the votes and proceedings of yesterday. As regards this one, I am sorry to say, interested parties were still making representations at this hour yesterday. In view of the fact that when everything is boiled down the explanation is a relatively simple one I thought probably the committee would accept my statement on it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I suppose the minister finds that representations do not cease until the section is finally passed through the house, and therefore it is often the last minute before he makes up his mind.

Mr. DUNNING: There are many people who were fairly sure that representations ceased to be of any use after the first day of May, and it is only in cases where it can be demonstrated that all the facts were not before the officers of the department that I even consented to receive delegations after that time. The life of the Minister of Finance is all but impossible during such a period, as I am sure my right hon. friend knows.

Mr. CAHAN: These are cases of extreme hardship.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. ESLING: I want to ask the Minister of Finance if this gross revenue represents the rentals which the Canadian theatres pay to the producers of films in the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: It is the gross revenue of the Canadian distributing agent that we are taxing.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. ESLING: And that Canadian is the agent for the films which are produced in the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

8. That any metalliferous mine that comes into production after the first day of May nineteen hundred and thirty-six and prior to the first day of January nineteen hundred and forty shall be exempt from income tax for the first three fiscal periods following the commencement of production;

The minister, under appropriate regulations, shall determine the date of commencement of production and the properties, new or old, that shall be determined as having come into production, having regard to the production of ore in reasonable commercial quantities, and shall issue a certificate accordingly.

Mr. CAHAN: This was mentioned in the budget speech, was it not?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I take it from reading this paragraph and after listening to the budget speech that the minister is not changing the taxation provision with regard to established mining companies. He is simply leaving them as they were, but by this change he is providing that a company coming into operation shall be exempt from that tax for three years.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change in the existing provisions of the law.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I wish to commend the minister for this action; it is a very good provision, and I think it will give encouragement to those who are seeking to develop paying mines to spend their money in that way. This will give such mines a chance to get on their feet afterwards, even when production is begun. Of course this provision of the law should be put into force very carefully.

Mr. HEAPS: I was just wondering, Mr. Chairman, if the minister could give the committee some idea as to how the term "reasonable commercial quantities" would be defined.

Mr. DUNNING: I will leave that to the administrative minister to answer.

Mr. ILSLEY: Of course the matter will have to receive careful consideration, but I would suggest that perhaps an appropriate point to regard a mine as being in commercial production would be when it has a net profit.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not dogmatize on that.

Mr. HEAPS: Would not the term "gross profits" be more appropriate?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps so. We shall have to consider that very carefully. I admit there may be some difficulty about it.

Paragraph agreed to.

9. That (a) an investment holding company all of whose shares (qualifying shares excepted) are held by non-resident persons shall not be afforded the exemption provided by paragraph (k) of section four of the act, but shall be subject to a tax equal to one-half of the prevailing corporate rate of tax imposed upon Canadian companies;

(b) the five per cent tax on dividends paid to such non-resident shareholders by such investment holding company shall not apply, except as hereinafter provided;

(c) in determining the taxable income of such investment holding company a deduction shall not be allowed in respect of any interest payments or of taxes paid abroad;

(d) any five per cent tax paid by such companies in nineteen hundred and thirty-five shall be allowed as a deduction from the tax otherwise payable in respect of the said year;

(e) to the extent that five per cent tax has not been incurred in respect of the earnings of nineteen hundred and thirty-three, nineteen hundred and thirty-four and nineteen hundred and thirty-five, the five per cent tax shall continue to be imposed until the undistributed accumulated earnings of the said years have been made subject to the said tax;

(f) paragraph (k) of section four of the act shall be amended to apply to industrial and commercial operating companies only;

Mr. DUNNING: In connection with this item, last evening I filed a proposed amended wording for paragraph 9 which appears in the votes and proceedings of this morning. The amended paragraph 9 is as follows:

9. That,—

(a) an investment holding company substantially all of whose shares are beneficially owned by non-resident persons shall if it so elects be subject to a tax equal to one-half of the prevailing corporate rate of tax imposed upon Canadian companies, provided however that income received from another such investment holding company, the income of which has been taxed as provided in this resolution, and one-third of the income received by way of dividend from Canadian companies which have been taxed at the prevailing corporate rate shall be exempt from tax;

(b) the five per cent tax imposed under section nine B of the act on dividends paid to such non-resident shareholders and on interest paid to non-resident persons by such investment holding company shall not apply except as hereinafter provided;

(c) in determining the taxable income of such investment holding company, a deduction shall not be allowed in respect of any interest payments and any deduction allowed in respect of taxes paid abroad shall not exceed one-third of the tax imposed by any enactment founded on the provisions of this resolution;

(d) any five per cent tax paid by such companies under section nine B of the act after the coming into force of any enactment founded on the provisions of this resolution otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (e) of this resolution shall be allowed as a deduction from the tax otherwise payable thereunder;

(e) to the extent that the five per cent tax imposed under section nine B of the act has not been incurred in respect of the earnings of nineteen hundred and thirty-three and nineteen hundred and thirty-four the five per cent tax shall continue to be imposed until the undistributed accumulated earnings of the said years have been made subject to the said tax;

(f) paragraph (k) of section four of the act shall be amended in such manner as to limit its application to industrial and commercial operating companies and to investment holding companies the shares of the capital stock of which have been offered for public subscription or are listed on any recognized stock exchange in Canada or elsewhere;

(g) the proviso to subsection one of section nineteen of the act shall be repealed.

This is an effort to deal with the situation of holding companies owned by non-residents of Canada and having no assets in Canada. The title "4 (k) companies" has come to be applied generally to all those companies which have taken advantage of paragraph (k) of section 4 of the Income War Tax Act. I need not read the paragraph, except to say that the qualification is the income of incorporated companies, except personal corporations, whose business is carried on and whose assets are situate entirely outside of Canada, and so on. This provision was placed in the act in 1918 to meet the case of certain industrial or commercial operating companies which were incorporated in Canada but which were carrying on business in foreign countries and which had their assets situated wholly outside of Canada. The provision, however, has been taken advantage of by two classes of companies for which it was not originally intended: First, personal holding companies incorporated in Canada to hold the assets of a foreign individual or a foreign individual and his immediate family, and second, financial or investment companies holding securities representing ownership of or interests in enterprises located in various countries of the world and whose own shares, frequently listed on one or more of the world's stock exchanges, are widely held by individuals in various countries. This latter class of companies chose to incorporate in Canada rather than in a number of other countries which were open to them because they found it advisable to do so in view of our laws and the political stability of this country.

Up to 1933 all "4 (k) companies" paid no tax under our income tax legislation. In 1933 a five per cent tax was imposed on interest or dividends paid by Canadian corporations to non-residents, the tax being deducted at the source. To the extent, therefore, that "4 (k) companies" distributed their income to non-residents a five per cent tax was paid following 1933. In practice this has meant that the publicly owned financial or investment companies, the international companies, that is, have been contributing five per cent to the treasury on their distributed earnings, while generally speaking the personal holding companies which allow income to accumulate have not paid any tax.

It is this latter class which is now being excluded by this amendment from section 4 (k). At the same time a new tax category is being established for non-resident owned investment holding companies with a tax rate of 7½ per cent; that is, one-half of the general corporation rate, under which these personal holding companies may elect to pay. Otherwise the full general corporation tax will apply. The publicly owned investment holding companies now in the 4 (k) category may remain there. However, they are not excluded from paying under the new category if they wish to carry on business and hold assets in Canada provided that they are entirely owned by non-residents. From the proposed amendment I think it may be said that three results will follow which should be regarded as desirable. One, personal holding companies will be excluded from using a category in the income tax act not intended for their use. Two, revenue will be increased by forcing these companies into the tax paying class. Three, under the new category investment holding companies will be able to invest in Canadian securities, which they could not do while remaining in category 4 (k) of the Income War Tax Act.

I do not know that I need go over in detail the various paragraphs of the resolution. I have endeavoured at this stage to give the purport and intention, to state what we are intending to accomplish by it. I think it answers the observation of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), except that one should say this: speaking as Minister of Finance I am not anxious to kick these people out of Canada; I am anxious that they should pay taxes to Canada. Up to the present they have paid taxes when they distributed their income. In the case of the rest of us who pay income tax, corporations and individuals, the levying of the tax depends not upon the distribution of the income, but upon the receipt of it. In future we intend that these companies shall pay tax on their income whether it is distributed or not.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. CAHAN: The minister is referring solely and exclusively to personal holding companies?

Mr. DUNNING: Personal holding companies, in that connection. With regard to what may be called the general international concerns which incorporate here for any one of a number of reasons, whose assets are all over the world, we are giving them an option. They will be paying 7½ per cent and we think it is not an unfair rate to charge under the circumstances.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the minister think he will hold them here if he increases the rate from 5 to 7½ per cent? I know of a number of such companies. Originally they were incorporated in Canada because of the security obtained under Canadian law. One large company of which I know was incorporated under the Canadian Companies Act after a conference of lawyers representing several international interests had examined the French law, the German law, and the United States law relating to the incorporation of companies. They preferred to seek Canadian incorporation because they felt that under the Canadian Companies Act there was greater security than there would be under certain foreign acts. Canada, therefore, was decided upon as the domicile of the proposed corporation. In so far as they declare and pay dividends to Canadians, if there are any Canadian shareholders, such dividends are entered by the recipients in their income tax returns, and therefore Canada obtains payment of the full amount of the tax. But in so far as such dividends are paid to holders of stock in the so-called international corporation who are resident abroad, they are compelled to-day to pay not only the five per cent, which is withheld from them at the source in Canada, but also the heavy income taxes which are assessed by the several countries in which they may be domiciled. That is, a shareholder of such a company living, say, in a South American state would pay first the five per cent which was withheld at the source in Canada, and then the income tax in Argentina, or Brazil, or in France, or Great Britain. That makes the compensation which is paid by these shareholders for such security as they may obtain under the Canadian Companies Act or other act of incorporation in Canada, very heavy indeed in many cases. I suggest it is all to the good that the government should encourage the organization of such companies in Canada, and it seems to me that five per cent is a pretty heavy tax. If I were practising again in the profession—as I hope to do as soon as parliament prorogues, because I must earn a living—

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear. I must try to retain the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CAHAN —I think I would advise such clients who had in view the organization of a Canadian company to reconsider their position. I can find for them other states under the British crown in which they could incorporate and avoid these taxes; they could avoid the payment of the five per cent and possibly other heavy income taxes as well. The minister is running near the margin.

Mr. DUNNING: With that I agree.

Mr. CAHAN: You are endangering the position, the citadel, it seems to me. I have great confidence in the astuteness of those who are administering the income tax in Canada. I have had something to do with them; they are very anxious to conserve the interests of the state and to ensure that the income tax is levied and paid. But we are getting very near the margin, and I think there will be fewer of these international companies incorporated in Canada hereafter under a 7½ per cent tax than there have been in times past.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister's statement meets the situation to which I have had reference to a degree, but not wholly. I understand that something of this sort is done: A dummy company is formed; securities are transferred to that company; the owner of the securities receives non-interest bearing debentures. Therefore he receives no income from the property which is transferred. The income from the property is outside Canada. It is reinvested in non-interest bearing debentures and is treated as capital appreciation—

Mr. DUNNING: Is this a Canadian corporation?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. When funds are required, a formal sale of debentures is put through, by the people who organized the companies originally, and the result is that all forms of taxation are escaped. That is the information I have, and I shall be glad subsequently to supply the minister with details.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be very glad indeed to get such details, but I point out that in one particular at least the situation cannot be quite as my hon. friend understands it, because certainly a company formed as he suggests would itself pay income tax on its income. The individuals owning that company could of course leave the company's income in the company and thus avoid personal income tax on receipts from the company, but offhand I cannot see how the company could escape taxation upon its own income. However, I shall be very glad indeed to get any information of that kind.

Mr. CAHAN: It is the duty and the privilege of this parliament to enact laws to conserve dominion income derivable under the income tax, but I do not think there is any responsibility upon members of this parliament to concern themselves regarding the collection of income tax in Great Britain or the United States or any other foreign country. Those countries are very astute in the enactment of income tax laws under which they can obtain to the last cent full payment of the taxes which they levy. It is our duty to concern ourselves with the income of Canadians and to obtain such proportion of their income as is required for the purposes of the treasury. I have no hesitation, looking at it either from the political or from the moral point of view, in leaving foreign countries and foreign legislatures to enact such legislation as they may deem advisable for the purpose of preserving or increasing their revenues through their own income tax laws. If my hon. friend who has just spoken and raised the question has studied the income tax law of Great Britain, for instance, he must have found that the British parliament is very astute in making provision for the collection to the utmost possible extent of revenue derivable from the income of people domiciled in the united kingdom. That is not a concern of ours.

As to the moral aspect, in the practice of my profession I often adhere to the moral precept of an eminent English judge who says that there is no immorality in escaping an income tax that is not legally imposed by the law of the country. If it is under British legislation the income tax has to be interpreted strictly, but if it does not apply then there is no obliquity in endeavouring to escape from a tax that is not properly and legally applied. So I think we should be astute in looking after the payment of income tax by Canadians domiciled in this country, and not so astute in looking after the payment of income tax to foreign countries by those resident in foreign countries.

The hon. gentleman stated that many people in this country escape paying income tax. I do not accept his statement. If he has to do with advising clients as to the application of the income tax law he will find that in no country—none at least with which I am acquainted—is the income tax more strictly applied and more carefully collected than it is in Canada at the present time, and few escape.

Mr. COLDWELL: It was not with that purpose in mind that I spoke, Mr. Chairman. My purpose was this: If we have large sums of British money in Canada that can be taxed but are not being taxed by Great Britain, then by all means let us tax them. If, on the other hand, Canadians who are making large sums in Canada are using the laws of another country to escape payment of income tax, as perhaps some of these British people are in transferring their funds elsewhere, then I think it cuts both ways. We should look after these sums of money that are sent out of Canada to escape the payment of income tax. I am glad that the Minister of Finance has brought down this amendment.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I tried to get in between the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I agree with much that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has said as to the taxation of Canadians, but when we confer upon a group of persons Canadian incorporation, do we not extend to that group the powers of an individual person? I assume therefore that corporations come within the scope of what the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was referring to when he said that we should concern ourselves with taxing Canadians. I take it that from the standpoint of the treasury of Canada for purposes of taxation these institutions are Canadian institutions, and I am concerned in taxing them—well, just sufficient so that they will not leave us. I put it frankly, just sufficient so they will not leave Canada, because we need the income tax which they pay.

I certainly join with my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St.George in commending the vigilance of the British income tax authorities and of the British parliament in relation to income tax. He spoke of doubts whether under heavier taxation imposed by this resolution there would not be a drifting away from Canada of this class of corporation. But there is another factor, rather than what we are doing here, which creates doubt in my mind. I have doubts as a result of the budget proposals of the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain in the British parliament just a few weeks ago in connection with which provision is made to tighten up to the very limit the British income tax provisions relating to outside investments of various kinds, among which I suspect are corporations such as those with which we are dealing. In fact, I am quite sure that portions of the budget resolutions in the British house are directed towards getting more revenue for the British treasury from classes of investments such as these. However, our law in this regard is not confined, of course, to companies owned by residents in Great Britain. There are many other countries whose citizens regard conditions in Canada as more stable than their own, and who, therefore, as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has indicated, incorporate in this country as a measure of safety.

Mr. CAHAN: In view of the possibility arising from month to month of war in these foreign countries.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. We have given this matter a great deal of study. It is a very complex one, and we have had, I think, most of the prominent lawyers who have been advising people with regard to these matters during the last few years up to see us about it. They have stayed with the job pretty steadily, and I can tell my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George that most of them agree with him that we are going too far. But gentlemen in his profession who represent clients who are trying to avoid increase of taxation always say so, and I believe they sincerely mean it, in opposing an increase in taxation. It is often represented to the Minister of Finance that if he does this thing he is more likely to lose instead of gain by it, and one must forgive a minister of finance if he takes statements from interested sources with a grain of salt. He may make a mistake; he may overdo it, but at least the judgment upon which he must rely is that of his officials and his own after examining and hearing all sides of the question. The amendment now proposed represents something of an easement from the original proposal, and that is deliberately done in order to avoid, as we think, the possibility of reducing rather than increasing the income to the treasury from this source.

Mr. CAHAN: I rather resent the suggestion of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry; I did not intend any reflection at all.

Mr. CAHAN: The representations which I made I made in view of my past experience as a lawyer. I tell the hon. gentleman that I would rather cut off the fingers of my left hand than knowingly misrepresent a case such as that to the finance minister or to either of his assistants.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite sure of it.

Mr. CAHAN: A lawyer who has respect for his own integrity must be perfectly fair in dealing with the officers of the Income Tax department, and I have found in the few cases in which I have had to deal with them that if everyone were absolutely frank and candid in disclosing the situation to them, it would be far better for all concerned. When I suggested that the increase from 5 to 7½ per cent may in the future preclude other companies from seeking Canadian incorporation under the same circumstances I was making representations in which I honestly believed. There may be some difficulty in companies already incorporated transferring their incorporation to another legislative jurisdiction, but I am confident that the minister has reached the limit when he increases the rate from five to seven and a half per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, what has been said by the previous speaker and others prompts me to say a word or two somewhat in reverse to what has been said this afternoon. For the last hour or two we have been discussing companies located in this country but owned by people who live abroad. I have in mind the fact that during comparatively recent years there has been a tendency for wealthy Canadian financiers to make their domiciles outside of the Dominion of Canada in order to escape taxation, particularly income taxation. I do not know whether the action suggested by the minister as having been taken in Great Britain can be taken in this regard, but I think something should be done to prevent people who have amassed fortunes in Canada from making their domiciles abroad in order to escape what I would call their fair share of taxation. I should like to know whether the minister has given consideration to this aspect of the matter and whether he thinks anything can be done. I realize the difficulties that lie in the path of any minister of finance who attempts to do anything along these lines, but I do believe that when a person has amassed a fortune here and then leaves the shores of this country for the purpose of creating a domicile in some other part of the empire or the world, there should be some regulations under which the minister would be able to obtain from such a person the share of taxation which I think he ought to pay.

Mr. CAHAN: We might do as they do in Germany. As soon as a German, particularly one who is an Israelite, seeks to leave the country with his property, he is clapped in gaol and his international movements are then rather restricted. Unless some such law were introduced in Canada I am afraid it would be found very difficult to prevent Canadians from leaving this country and procuring a domicile in another country.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not suggesting that we should prevent anyone from leaving the country. He cannot take his property away with him; if he owns stocks, bonds or shares, it is most difficult for him to get rid of his holdings. All I am suggesting is that where a man has commercial interests in this country and makes his domicile abroad, when he has free access to Canada he should at least pay his fair share of taxation. I am afraid that the analogy given by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) is a very poor one.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course my hon. friend would not expect me to advertise the methods which are taken to ensure that anyone properly chargeable with income tax shall not be able to evade it. I can say that we have endeavoured and will continue to endeavour to see that income derived in Canada is taxed as far as it is possible for us to locate it. I realize that that is a very broad statement. My hon. friend apparently thinks it is rather difficult for a man to take his wealth out of Canada with him. I shall not point out the various methods which are available for that purpose, but I know that any good lawyer could show him how wealth can be converted into what I might call portable forms. The method adopted by the German nation of holding a man's body, as indicated by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George renders it difficult for him to enjoy his wealth in some other country. Apart from that method, I doubt whether any really effective means of preventing the moving of certain forms of wealth can be devised. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) has touched upon a very real problem, one which concerns other countries probably more than it does Canada. It has been the subject of discussion among the nations at Geneva on more than one occasion, and to-day there is a greater measure of cooperation with regard to the administration of tax laws than there was in the past. I am making this general statement to assure my hon. friend that the government realizes the seriousness of the problem which he has presented.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand from the minister that apart from a personal holding company, which is a term we all understand, and apart from an investment holding company, the nature of which I understand, the 4(k) provision still stands?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I indicated that an investment holding company could come under 4(k) if it elected so to do.

Mr. CAHAN: The 4(k) provision, if I may refer to it in that way, will still apply, as before, to all companies which come within its description and which are not personal holding or investment holding companies?

Mr. DUNNING: Right.

Amendment agreed to.

10. That any enactment founded on the provisions of these resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force at the commencement of the calendar year nineteen hundred and thirty-five and to be applicable thereto and to fiscal periods ending therein and to all subsequent periods, except as otherwise provided.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think this is a suitable place for me to say a few words about the exemption allowed for minor children, in connection with which no change has been made. It has been represented to me that in these times of depression a great deal of hardship is caused through this exemption not operating after a child has reached the age of twenty-one years. The father has the benefit of the exemption during the minority of the child, but quite often the child is not able to get anything to do after he has reached the age of twenty-one. He still remains at home and must be supported by the father, and it has been represented to me that under such circumstances the exemption should be extended. I know there are many difficulties in the way of this being done, but I thought I would draw it to the attention of the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: Did the previous government consider it?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I was not the minister in charge of that department, and I do not remember. I realize there is a great deal of difficulty in the way, but I merely mention this in order to draw it to the attention of the government. I spoke to the minister personally about it, one day, and perhaps he can explain why this has not been done.

Mr. CAHAN: I should like also to suggest that consideration be given to this matter which is covered by section 5(i) of the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. DUNNING: It is the matter to which the hon. member for Argenteuil referred.

Mr. CAHAN: Only a few days ago a resident of Montreal in my own constituency, a man of a very high type indeed, whose revenues are somewhat limited, especially under present conditions, pointed out to me that he had grandchildren who were over twenty-one and who did not come within this qualification. Take the parent or grandparent whose grandson or whose child, reaching the age of twenty-one, can find no immediate employment, when it is deemed necessary to keep such child or grandchild at school or college in order that he may qualify for one of the technical professions or for technical employment. Any payment made to one over twenty-one under such circumstances is not exempt. I am convinced that in these days when incomes have been cut down many men find it almost impossible to keep sons or grandsons dependent upon them at college or university or other training schools. If an exception could be made in such a case, which would enable boys and sometimes girls who are over twenty-one to enjoy the favour of exemption, even to the extent of this small amount of $400, for such time or times as they were at school or college or any other school for technical training, it would be only fair and it would promote the desire of grandparents and parents to see their children and grandchildren qualify by special training for the work of life. I do not agree with many statements that have been made in this house that there is lack of employment in Canada for those who are fully qualified. That may be so in some of the rural districts and in the western part of the country, but I am sure that in a city like Montreal there are hundreds and even thousands of cases in which there is employment available for those who are qualified for the particular work.

Mr. HEAPS: What kind of work

Mr. CAHAN: The engineering, chemical and manufacturing trades find it absolutely impossible to procure a sufficient number of qualified young men at the present time, and never before in Canada has there been such a dearth of supply of qualified young men for such occupations. The fact is, there is great necessity in Canada for qualifying young men and women for the work of life. Many are not qualified, and by every expedient possible we are bringing in young men from other countries, who are thoroughly qualified, getting them in under every possible pretext, to fill the vocations which are open to such young men and women in the industrial life of Canada to-day. I submit that under the circumstances the minister might consider extending that exemption.

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to both pleas made by my two friends opposite, I would say that they are matters of revenue. Any addition to the exemptions is effective of course on the top level of the income. To a man paying a 45 per cent tax an additional exemption of $1,000 means just $450, because it is at the top of the schedule.

Mr. CAHAN: He is not the man I am thinking of.

Mr. DUNNING: Such a man would claim, I am sure, any exemption that might be extended to a particular class for which he could qualify by virtue of providing education or otherwise. Many representations are made with respect to exemptions from income tax, many of them very worthy indeed. I can only say that so far as this year at any rate is concerned I am not in a position to accept any amendments that will have the effect of reducing income to the treasury from this source, but I shall be glad to bear in mind, for consideration during the year, the representations that have been made, in the hope that there may be such an increase in prosperity in Canada as will enable me to have a little softer heart a year from now.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George made a statement which I think should not go unchallenged. He said that young men were being brought into the country from outside to fill positions here. He says there is a dearth of qualified young men in Canada to fill vacancies that occur, and that there are thousands of vacancies to be filled at the present time. Let me say this to him. If he knows of any vacancies in the engineering field or in any of the professions in Montreal or Quebec or anywhere in Ontario or in any other part of Canada I will undertake to find two efficient young Canadians to fill every such vacancy he may indicate. In fact I will go further; I should like him to suggest one hundred vacancies to-day in his own district which cannot be filled. As regards the statement about importing talent from other parts of the world, I hold that the young men of this country are just as capable as those that qualify anywhere else. We are turning out from our high schools and universities young men who are just as good as those in the United States and in some respects better. It is a reflection upon the young men of Canada to say that they are not capable of filling vacancies that occur here. If my hon. friend will supply me with a list of such vacancies in Canada I will see that they are filled on short notice.

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot accept the undertaking of the hon. gentleman, because I think it would be worthless. I think I know the situation as well as he does. For instance, the other day I had an application from a young man who had graduated in arts, I believe, and who had also graduated in engineering at McGill. He was anxious that I should assist him in securing a vocation. I asked him what income he wished. He thought that as he had spent so many years at McGill he could not engage himself at a lower income than $3,000 or $3,500 a year. I told him of another young man in whom I had interested myself, who had also graduated in arts at a university, and in engineering, I think at McGill, and who wished then to obtain an income. My advice to him was that, if he desired to prosecute the profession which he had in view, he should engage himself with a certain hydro-electric company in the construction which was then proceeding of a station and a transmission line. I told him he would receive probably no more than enough to pay for his overalls and his board until he learned from practical experience to apply the education he had been acquiring over a period of seven years at the university. He accepted my advice and went to that company for a year. He then was quite willing to go on. He found out that the practical experience which he was acquiring would probably be very useful to him, and he came to me again. I secured for him employment for a year, during which he got his board and his overalls, with the General Electric Company in their testing department at Schenectady, and he spent another year there at that meagre income. Then he found that in order to qualify himself to compete for positions which would be open to him he required something more, and I got him employment with a large company in Pittsburgh engaged in the production of steel and iron structures. So he went for another year to learn from practical experience something about the testing of iron and steel for constructional purposes; at the end of the three years he was qualified for a position, and his services were sought.

Some of the young men who are graduating from our colleges are willing to qualify themselves in some such way, but many of them have been brought up since the war without any feeling of responsibility or appreciation of the necessity of qualifying themselves by training and experience for positions such as those of which I have been speaking. Time and time again during the last year I have been told by those engaged in the large engineering and manufacturing trades that, for expert assistance for which they are willing to pay, the young men of Canada have not qualified themselves. From my own experience in dealing with young men I feel that that is true, and I venture to say to my hon. friend that in the past ten years I have probably come in personal contact with as many young men of that class as he has—in fact, with ten for every one that he has come in contact with, because, for certain reasons of my own, including my own bereavement in the war, I have given a very considerable part of my time to assisting young men to secure such positions and to inducing them to qualify themselves for vocations in which there are openings.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Numerous corporations have their fiscal year end between January 1 and April 1. Under the wording of the resolution is it possible that such corporations retroactively might be called upon to pay income tax for both 1934 and 1935?

Mr. DUNNING: The case to which my hon. friend refers is one which, of course, does represent a difficulty, because various corporations have various dates for the ending of their fiscal years. Consideration has been given to the matter, but I am afraid it would be quite impossible to make a change on that account without upsetting the whole system of revenue collection. When that fortunate day comes on which we are able to reduce the rate of income tax, of course the companies to which my hon. friend refers will benefit.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I suggest to the minister that he consider whether it is not about time for a revision or consolidation of the income tax laws in such a way that the ordinary person may have some idea what they all mean? I know there is an office consolidation, but it is not official, and I wonder whether it would be a very great task to have a statute passed which would cover all the different income tax acts and the changes and alterations that have been made from time to time.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be very glad to bring that to the attention of my colleagues, but not, of course, for action during the present session.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Oh, no.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 71, to amend the customs tariff.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Undervaluation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I take it that this is entirely in accordance with the resolutions that we have passed?

Mr. DUNNING: It is based entirely on the resolutions, yes.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Schedule A.

Mr. DUNNING: It has been called to my attention that, due to an error, one item has been missed in this schedule. I think the chairman has a note of it in his copy; it is properly recorded in Hansard and on the scroll but was missed in the printing of the bill. The section is 446c, which should appear on page 13.

Mr. CAHAN: Was that item passed?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Everything is regular about it except that it failed to get into the bill, and I should like to have it straightened out.

Section agreed to.

On section 6 (as printed)—Schedule B amended.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There does not seem to be any section 5 in the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: It will be necessary to renumber the sections for the final printing. Section 6 becomes section 5.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 and 8 (as printed, now sections 6 and 7) agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Militia services: Non-permanent active militia, $2,358,100.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, before we go on I should like to ask how many items in this department are still awaiting consideration.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): We have several yet to pass. Items 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75 and 76 are still to be discussed by the committee.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It is all right to go on with the estimates, but I want to ask that one of these items be left open for general discussion. Some of our members who are not here to-day would like an opportunity to discuss these matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be very glad indeed to accede to that request.

Item agreed to.

Permanent force, $5,546,700.

Mr. ESLING: Under this item I should like to refer to a matter with the details of which the minister is familiar, and I should like to know what interpretation is placed on the statutes by those who have the last word. In July, 1919, it may be recalled, the Militia Pension Act was amended reducing from twenty years to ten years the period within which a member of the permanent force could qualify for pension, but this 1919 amendment was not made retroactive. Consequently those who had served less than twenty years prior to July, 1919, could not participate in the benefits of that amendment. In 1928 the Militia Pension Act was again amended, making retroactive the 1919 amendment, in so far only as it applied to members of the permanent force who were wounded while on active service and who were discharged as unfit for further duty. Now, I want to take you back more than one and a half years. In September, 1934, some three or four cases were reviewed under the 1928 amendment. I wish to refer to one of these cases particularly, because it relates to a man in my constituency. First of all, the application naturally went to the minister, and by him it was referred to the branch of his department which had to deal with it. That branch reviewed the man's period of service and determined whether he came within the terms of the amendment. Then the application went to another branch for the purpose of ascertaining his overseas record, whether he was disabled and discharged as physically unfit. I cannot speak for others but his application I know was approved by those in charge of the Department of National Defence whose duty it was to review these claims as to term of service and activity overseas. It was then handed to the minister and approved by him. From the minister it went to council and thence to the treasury board. That was in September, 1934. By the treasury board it was returned to the Department of National Defence for further explanation. It is still somewhere, nobody knows where; but when the government changed it was found among the items of unfinished business, and the minister then referred it to the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice ruled that they could find nothing in the statute to serve as a basis for refusing the pension. Now, is the man entitled to his claim or not? It seems to have taken one and a half years to determine it. It is a statutory claim; the amendments of 1919 and 1928 are as plainly stated as it is possible to state them in the English or French language, and no definite reason seems to have been given anybody for not paying this claim. Furthermore this claimant received notice from the department that his case had been reviewed and submitted to the minister and that if approved he would receive his pension. What we would like to know is, by whom is it to be approved? Is the last word with the treasury board? The statute states clearly the terms and conditions under which the man is entitled to receive pension. You can well understand the anxiety of such claimants. The Department of Pensions disclaim responsibility, yet I think they have some responsibility, because the grounds upon which the man is entitled to receive pension are the fact of service overseas and his having been wounded; to that extent at any rate it has reference to the Department of Pensions. Here is a case in which the claim was approved by the minister's own officials, handed by the previous minister to the cabinet and passed on by the governor in council to the treasury board; then reviewed by the Department of Justice, which as I say found nothing in the act to serve as a basis for refusing the pension. The applicant seems to have fulfilled all the requirements of the Militia Pension Act, and I hope the minister will be able to tell us to-day who finally decides whether or not the man is to receive his pension.

Mr. STIRLING: Before the minister replies may I say in support of my hon. friend's contention that I remember this matter. In the short time in which I was Minister of National Defence it came before me twice. I sent it back twice, and I was never able to understand the grounds taken by the treasury board in declining to approve the application.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I must agree entirely with the observations made by the hon. members for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) and Yale (Mr. Stirling). This case came before me very shortly after I took charge of the department. I reviewed carefully what had been done. The hon. member for Yale as minister recommended this case. As a matter of fact there are three cases involved in the construction of the statute in this regard. As the hon. member for Kootenay West stated, as soon as I came into office I referred the whole matter to the Department of Justice for a ruling as to whether or not there is any statutory bar to granting this claim, and the reply was that there is none. The matter was then referred by me to the treasury board; it is now before the treasury board and the ultimate decision rests with them. I can assure the hon. member for Kootenay West that I shall continue to press for a decision in this matter, because I think the claim is well founded both in equity and in law.

Mr. ESLING: Perhaps the minister or someone on that side will tell us who in the treasury board does determine this. Is it one member or all the members of the board? It puts us in this position, that after the 245 members of the House of Commons and the 96 members of the Senate have passed an amendment to the statute, three or four ministers can say: "Well, that is all right, but we will not pay."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would rather not answer that question.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister be good enough to give the committee information as to the size of our permanent force at the present time, and what it is made up of?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does my hon. friend want just the military forces, or the entire scheme of all the defence forces? I will give the whole thing. The Royal Canadian navy—

Mr. HEAPS: Cut the navy out.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is the last thing that we intend to do. The standing on March 31, 1936, was as follows:

	Officers	Men	Total
Royal Canadian Navy	102	830	932
Permanent active militia	416	3,585	4,001
Royal Canadian air force	147	884	1,031
Royal Canadian naval reserve	43	148	191
Royal Canadian naval volunteer reserve	71	897	968
Non-permanent active militia (Dec. 31/35)	6,888	41,873	48,761
Non-permanent Royal Canadian air force	52	289	341
Total of all ranks and all services	7,719	48,506	56,225

Mr. HEAPS: What is the total number of officers and men in the permanent force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the permanent active militia, 416 officers and 3,585 men, or a total of 4,001 as of March 31, 1936.

An hon. MEMBER: Just where is this saving of $42,447 made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the general vote there is an increase, under administration, of $3,573; an increase, under training, of $9,000; a decrease, under maintenance, of $42,620; a decrease in the vote for general purposes of $12,400, making a net decrease of $42,447.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As this is the only militia item left perhaps it might be allowed to stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was going to have the vote on civil pensions stand on the understanding that anything at all concerning the department could be discussed on that vote.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That will answer the purpose, provided it is understood that the discussion can be general.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Absolutely.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Royal Military College, $368,400.

Mr. HEAPS: I assume this refers to the Royal Military College at Kingston. I think we ought to have information as to the number of cadets in training.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At the present time, 191, but facilities are provided for 200 cadets.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the minister give us some idea of how they are chosen for training purposes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand they are chosen on provincial submissions, so many from each province. If any province does not come up to its quota the full strength is made up from other sources.

Mr. HEAPS: How are the appointments made in the provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are applications, and selection is made by competition on the basis of merit.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, item 70 has passed but I heard the minister say that he had no objection to the discussion of matters affecting his department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am leaving one item over on which any matter concerning the Department of National Defence may be discussed.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister mind if I took five minutes of the time of the committee to bring before it some facts that do not seem to be well understood by the house or the committee? It is about the superannuation of some people who have been seconded from the Department of National Defence to other departments. According to a return to an order of the house, there are three men in that position, General McNaughton, who is now president of the research council, Colonel Vanier, who is in England in the office of the High Commissioner, and Colonel Steel, of notorious fame, in the radio commission. The reason why the case of these gentlemen is brought to the attention of the house and the committee is not because they have been transferred, but because they have been seconded or loaned by the Department of National Defence to other departments. In the Militia Act there is a provision by virtue of which members of the staff of the Department of National Defence may be seconded instead of being transferred to other departments. What is the reason for that? The "why" is most important in this discussion. In fact, in one return the "why" was asked but was not given, and another return in which the "why" was asked has not yet been tabled. Each one of these gentlemen because he has been seconded from the Department of National Defence, to some other department, is entitled to superannuation which is twice as much as that to which he would have been entitled if he had been simply transferred. I want to bring very clearly before the mind of every member of the committee and of the minister, who knows the matter perhaps better than anybody else, that the fact that these three gentlemen have been seconded or loaned from the Department of National Defence instead of being transferred entitles them to double pension.

Last year in June, before the matter was ripe, the question was brought up in this house by you, Mr. Chairman, and also by the member for Témiscouata. We asked for some information from the government about it, and as usual the late government was entirely dumb; no answer came out of the mouth of the former Prime Minister or his colleagues. To me it seems shameful that General McNaughton and Colonel Steel, who are both members of the so-called head and brain trust of the late government, should be entitled to a reward which is twice as much as the pension to which they would have been entitled had they been simply transferred instead of seconded from the Department of National Defence to any other department. I am strongly against that practice, and there is time yet for the Department of National Defence to bring these men back to that department and to superannuate them on the basis that would have applied if they had not been seconded. Is it not shameful to think that within six years General McNaughton will be entitled to twice as much pension as he would receive if he were retired now and were not brought back to the Department of National Defence? According to returns which have been tabled in the house General McNaughton has no office in the Department of National Defence, Colonel Steel has no office in the Department of National Defence, Colonel Vanier has no office in the Department of National Defence, but in spite of that, these people will take advantage of the fact that they passed through that department to receive twice as much for their superannuation in these days when salaries are cut by five per cent. I cannot conceive it, Mr. Chairman. Mind you, I have no grudge against General McNaughton, Colonel Steel or Colonel Vanier. I am discussing this question as a matter of principle, and I am doing it now because I believe that some members do not understand the situation. But it is very plain. It is explained in very easy language, the meaning of which can escape no one.

Moreover, I assume and I submit that General McNaughton is incompetent as chairman of the research council. Why? Because he taught physics in Montreal before the war he is now head of the scientific research council of Canada. Did he follow the scientific periodicals during the last twenty years? I wonder whether his job as chief of staff and whisperer to the ex-Prime Minister left him enough time, in order to keep himself posted on the subject of science, to read all the scientific publications that were published in all the countries of the world. Moreover, Colonel Steel has tried to hide himself behind others in the radio commission. He does not deserve a double superannuation, nor does General McNaughton. It is absurd to reward these two men for all the wrong they have done to this country thanks to their wrong advice to the late government. That is what I have to say about them. As regards Colonel Vanier, I have nothing more to say about him except that if he wants double superannuation, he should get it through a vote of parliament and not by the cellar door route. I respectfully ask the minister to consider the whole matter and see that McNaughton, Steel and Vanier are brought back to the Department of National Defence before they are superannuated.

Mr. HEAPS: I am told that it costs the government approximately $2,000 per annum for each person who enters this institution, the Royal Military College, and I should like to know what the country gets in return for this amount. Is any track kept of the young men after they leave the institution? Do they enter the institution for the purpose for which it is maintained, or do they take up other vocations than those for which it was created.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In my judgment, this is one of the finest investments of the Dominion of Canada. I do not think finer training is given in any other school in Canada. I visited the Royal Military College a few weeks ago and I believe they are carrying out one of the finest traditions of the dominion. The record of these boys in past years has been very encouraging and inspiring. They have gone into various professions and the surprising thing is that the majority of them have entered civilian life. Many have entered the various branches of the service in England and in this country, but in every case they have rendered valuable service to the development of the nation. In my judgment the Royal Military College is not only equal to any college of its kind in England or the United States, but superior to any similar college in the world.

Mr. HEAPS: I am glad to have the statement of the minister and I agree with much of what he has said, but one surprising piece of information he has given the committee is that a large percentage of these boys enter civilian life. In other words this college which is really for the purpose of training officers for the army is utilized for civilian purposes. That is one of the points I had in mind when I asked my previous question. If practically free training is given to a certain type of youth in this country, the same privilege ought to be extended to other people. I should like to know what training the boys receive in the college. I realize there is bound to be a certain amount of military training, but I understand that they receive instruction along other lines. Could the minister give the committee an idea of the training which they receive?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The cadets are trained along general educational lines although there is specialization in engineering development. Their training includes mathematics, civil engineering, surveying, physics, chemistry, French and English, and the discipline maintained is one of the most valuable features of the course. The gymnastic training and the outdoor exercises of all kinds undertaken by the cadets ensure their good health.

Mr. HEAPS: I understand that about fifty per cent go into the permanent forces.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I can give the figures.

Mr. HEAPS: For the last five years will be sufficient.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In 1929-30, twenty-three per cent of the cadets took commissions; in 1930-31, thirty per cent; in 1931-32, seventeen per cent; in 1932-33 forty-seven per cent; in 1933-34, thirty-five per cent, and in 1934-35, the last year for which figures are available, forty-nine per cent.

Item agreed to.

Aviation—Royal Canadian Air Force—expenses in connection with the general maintenance and training of the permanent and non-permanent active air force, and provision of facilities therefor, $4,130,000.

Mr. GREEN: Have any steps been taken to develop the air defences on the coasts of Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. That was one of the first problems before the department. As a matter of fact, the problem has been before the department for several years and certain plans were laid by my predecessor in office with reference to the study of coast defences, more particularly those in British Columbia. In the estimates for this year there is provision for increasing the air force accommodation at Jericho beach in Vancouver. There was projected by my predecessor in office and his advisers an amount of $375,000 for the development of hangars and aprons at Jericho beach. The engineers have investigated the situation and have made recommendations and it has been decided that the situation is quite safe for a considerable development. Provision is made for new hangar accommodation with probably some further development to be made in the future. That is the situation with reference to the air forces. There is also projected a certain development, which I shall not mention, with reference to our naval defences in the same province, but that is taken care of in the naval estimates.

Mr. GREEN: Are no further steps being taken to build up the air defences on the Pacific coast?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The air defences will be increased from time to time as funds are available. This year certain increases will be made at Vancouver and the ultimate plan is for a considerable increase in the air forces on the Pacific coast. Of course, the air force and naval expansion should go ahead concurrently, but I must admit that this is being done in a very modest way. However we are proceeding as fast as the economic resources at present available will permit us to proceed.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister give the committee some idea as to what the cost would be of establishing proper air defences on the Pacific coast?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is difficult for me to answer that question. It would depend entirely upon how far the government in power would go in a policy of expansion. It would depend also upon the technical advice received from the air force officers who must see that there is created in Canada, not a large air force, but an air force sufficient to look after the defence of the dominion. I could not say offhand how much money this would cost, but I say that we are alive to the situation. I think the increase in the air force estimates indicates our appreciation of the situation.

Mr. GREEN: I think the minister is to be commended for increasing the vote, but surely he should know what a complete defensive program would cost.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): According to the recommendations of the technical officers, which are largely confidential, it would cost considerably more than the amount provided in this year's estimates. Personally, I would like to see the vote this year larger than it is. However I believe we have taken a step in the right direction. This increase in the air force vote will provide for only three new aeroplanes, most of the increase being for new ground services, for equipment and for the maintenance of personnel which was made possible by the vote submitted by my predecessor. Only three new Blackburn Sharks are provided for in the air force vote of this year.

Mr. GREEN: Has Canada any modern fighting planes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): These three will be modern planes.

Mr. GREEN: But at the present time have we any really modern fighting planes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would say they are very much limited in number; some of the planes that have been in the possession of the air force have been condemned in recent months and recalled from service. That is one of the most serious features of the situation. We have, however, some modern fighting planes and we hope to obtain more. In the estimates this year there is provision for the replacement of some of the planes now in service, and that is where a large proportion of the vote has gone, namely, in overhauling and renewing some of the existing planes to make them efficient and modern.

Mr. GREEN: Have we any fighting planes that approach the modern British fighting planes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course these three new ones that are being provided for will be the most modern planes of their type.

Mr. GREEN: So that we shall have only three fighting planes in the whole of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Last year some fairly modern ones were obtained.

Mr. GREEN: How many of these have we?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): About ten.

Mr. GREEN: So that after this vote is expended our effective fighting air force will comprise only ten planes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would not admit that. We have overhauled existing planes and installed new engines in a great number of planes. If my hon. friend means the most modern planes in the world, what he says is largely true, for the economic resources of this country will not be equal for some years to anything like a real development in this direction. However, it is hoped now to provide as soon as we reasonably can a modest but effective air force for the dominion, a force such as is considered reasonable by the technical officers of the department.

Mr. GREEN: Does the air force get any fighting training such as artillery observation, army cooperation and other strictly military training?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, they do; they are getting progressively advanced modern training, and that is being increased from year to year.

Mr. GREEN: Do they not do considerable civil flying, such as mapping and work of that kind? What work does the air force do now?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The air force is divided into three departments. First, there is the Royal Canadian Air Force as such; second, there is the branch that carries on operations for departments such as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Public Works department, the Department of Indian Affairs, and the transportation of personnel making surveys in the northern parts of Canada; and third, there is civil aviation, which will be transferred, by a resolution now before the house, from the Defence department to the Transport department.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not a fact that very little of the time of the air force is spent in fighting training? They are really doing work that could be done by civil aviation, and that might promote the development of civil aviation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is true to some extent only. A large part of the training of the Royal Canadian Air Force is in flying hours, in the control of machines, and in the survey of territory, and that can be done either in serving the military side of the force or in connection with civil aviation. The same amount of training applies in both directions, and that is being carried out.

Mr. GREEN: Will this vote provide for an increase in the personnel of the permanent air force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, four officers and forty-four men in the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. GREEN: That is to be the total increase?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. Last year there was an increase for which sufficient provision was not made in the estimates a year ago. There is a carryover from that amount, and that added to the new personnel accounts for a considerable amount of the vote.

Mr. GREEN: What is the strength now of the non-permanent air force? Will this vote provide for any increase?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are fifty-two officers and two hundred and eighty-nine other ranks, or a total of three hundred and forty-one, as at March 31 of this year.

Mr. GREEN: Will there be an increase by reason of this vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The item of pay and allowances in this vote includes two additional airmen of the Royal Canadian Air Force, who are attached to the non-permanent air force, and two days' additional training of the non-permanent air force is provided for three squadrons. The figure is less by $19,800.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. GREEN: How many non-permanent squadrons are there, and have there been requests for more?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have No. 10 squadron, Toronto; No. 11 squadron, Vancouver; No. 12 squadron, Winnipeg; all army cooperation squadrons; No. 15 fighting squadron, Montreal; No. 18 bomber squadron, Montreal; No. 19 bomber squadron, Hamilton. There is a total of fifty-one officers and two hundred and ninety-one airmen as of April 30, 1936.

Mr. GREEN: Have there been requests from different cities for more squadrons.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, requests are coming in from time to time.

Mr. GREEN: How many have there been?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the short time I have been in the department there have been repeated requests.

Mr. GREEN: Is any provision being made to guard an empire air route that might traverse Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does my hon. friend mean the guarding of a civil aviation air route?

Mr. GREEN: I mean provision for an air force that could guard an air route across Canada. We hope some day to have an empire air route passing over Canada and we should surely provide some air defence for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I may tell my hon. friend frankly that that has not come before me as a matter of policy. I think, however, that the primary policy of any ministry of defence which may be in office must be with regard to the actual defence of our Canadian coasts, either for protection of neutrality or for any other necessary purpose. The matter suggested by the hon. gentleman has not come before me as one of policy.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently we have a very small air force. After all, we are a nation. Is there any reason why we should not build up an effective air force for defensive purposes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The best answer I can make is that this year there is an increase of $1,000,000 for that purpose. My judgment is that we should have a reasonably modest but effective air force in the dominion.

Item agreed to.

Civil government air operations — for preventive service and other air operations, $408,300.

Mr. GREEN: What is meant by preventive service?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That has reference to the work done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in connection with customs duties, rum-running, smuggling and any operations of that sort.

Mr. HEAPS: Do these people come under the control of the mounted police or are they under the Department of National Defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The actual operations are carried out by this branch of the Department of National Defence. Naturally requests come from various other departments; they estimate every year the necessities for the year and we proceed to carry out their requests as best we can.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the permanent number of airplanes employed by the department for this particular service?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my memory is correct, it is twenty-nine out of a total of 173 employed more or less for civil government air operations. We have a departmental committee consisting of some of the deputy ministers dealing with one of these items, and every year they make a recommendation to whoever is the minister, as to the amount necessary for service in the north. For the present year $100,000 was their recommendation for aerial surveys and their advice is generally acted upon, because they review the necessities in regard to surveys in the northern country, and that item is carried under this particular vote.

Mr. HEAPS: What does my hon. friend mean by "surveys"?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Topographic surveys mostly.

Mr. HEAPS: Do the mounted police force undertake topographic surveys?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is only one of the five departments of government which use these surveys. Another is the Department of Indian Affairs. The Department of Public Works used them for the transportation of personnel surveying the otherwise inaccessible portions of the northern country. As I say, I think these surveys are used by five departments of government. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police asked for $50,000 of this total vote.

Mr. HEAPS: Reverting to a certain extent to a previous item, may I ask the minister if he can give the committee the number of the personnel in the permanent force, the number in the non-permanent force, and the number of planes in both services?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Royal Canadian Air Force: in the permanent force, 147 officers, 884 men, total 1,031; in the non-permanent force, fifty-two officers and 289 men, or a total of 341. That is, as of the 31st March of the present year.

Mr. HEAPS: I understand that quite a large number of these men are not employed in aviation. They may be employed, for instance, in the stores, or what may be called ground work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister give the committee the number of qualified airmen in the service of the government, both in the permanent and the non-permanent forces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Generally speaking, the greater part of the numbers mentioned by me in reply to the hon. member are qualified as airmen, although my hon. friend is correct in saying that some of them are employed in ground service. In fact most of the other ranks are so employed. The officers are thoroughly qualified, and from time to time the men employed in either service go through periods of training. Speaking generally, possibly two-thirds have some air qualifications.

Mr. HEAPS: Do I understand from what the minister said that two-thirds of the men referred to in the figures he gave a few moments ago are qualified air pilots?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not qualified air pilots, but they have had some flying experience. Probably fifty per cent would be a more reasonable estimate.

Mr. GREEN: Is any provision made in these estimates for the establishment of a transatlantic or transpacific air service?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That comes up under the next item, civil aviation, and can be discussed then.

Mr. STIRLING: I think the inspectors placed about Canada come under this vote, do they not?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Next vote.

Mr. STIRLING: Not under civil government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, they come under civil aviation.

Mr. STIRLING: I judge from the decrease in this item that the other departments have made smaller requests for the use of air service than in previous years: is that so?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct in some cases.

Mr. HEAPS: May I turn for a moment to another aspect of this question? I have no doubt that the government have in their employment, in the branch the estimates of which are now under consideration, quite a number of qualified and experienced pilots and quite a large number of what I would call good planes of a kind that can do long distance flying. Has it ever been under the consideration of the department whether, in conjunction with the post office, air mail services could be established under the vote that we are now considering?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course that raises a definite question of policy. The experience of the country to the south of us has been very much against the suggestion of my hon. friend. I recall that some two years ago the United States endeavoured to establish the transportation of air mail by some of their government planes. The attempt was to some extent disastrous in its results, and as far as my knowledge goes it is not the intention of this government to establish such a service from directly government sources. The branch of civil aviation is being transferred from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Transport, thereby ensuring the essentially civil character of the civil aviation branch. This vote for civil government air operations is entirely civil, but the type of airplane used in many cases is a semi-military one. There is provision for four new planes in addition to the ones for purely air force purposes, and these four planes are of a type to which my hon. friend for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) referred a few moments ago, a type easily convertible for military purposes. The four are costing, I think, $240,000; that is $60,000 apiece.

Mr. HEAPS: If I remember correctly, conditions in the United States are entirely different from what we have in Canada. At the time an investigation took place in the United States with regard to the military branch of the government doing air mail work, there was already established a fairly substantial air mail service from other sources, and it was a question of one competing with the other. I think the United States government, in its wisdom or otherwise, decided that the transportation of air mail in that country should be left to private concerns.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct.

Mr. HEAPS: In this dominion we are in a wholly different position. Our physical layout is altogether different. We have practically no air mail service at all. When we send a letter by air mail to-day across the dominion, that letter has to go to the United States to be carried by their airplanes across the continent. If we post a letter in Ottawa to go to Vancouver by air mail, I assume it is sent there across the United States via Seattle. I wondered whether, as we have this military air service in Canada, greater use could not be made of it than is made at the present time. Of course, if conditions in this country were similar to those in the United States a couple of years ago, I could understand the contention of the Minister of National Defence having some justification, but at this time we have no air mail service at all in Canada, and if we have airplanes that will serve us for long distance flying between one area and another, I wondered whether those airplanes could not be used in some practical way in addition to the use that is being made of them at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course the question raised by my hon. friend is a matter of policy not yet determined, so I cannot give him an immediate reply.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister state what he himself favours?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe in the principle of collective wisdom, so I would not care to venture an opinion.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the minister afraid of individual wisdom?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Never.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not know whether the minister remembers that when Canada was interesting herself in mail flying some years ago, this was done entirely by contract. If I may express an opinion at the moment, it is that if and when we do return to mail carriage by air, it should be under contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Hear, hear.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has already referred to the fact that when the United States government took over the flying of mail for a certain period, for a certain reason it was none too successful, and I do not think there is any reason to suppose it would be more successful in this country. As it is we are none too well supplied with planes, and I should not like to see the time of these planes taken up for mail flying purposes. When we reach the next item, it will be interesting indeed for the minister, as he probably will, to give the committee figures with regard to the amount of flying that is done now. A considerable number of commercial companies are ready and only too willing to fly if they can get the work to do. Contracts are being taken by them, and, particularly with regard to the north country, they are there ready to do the work, so that a very great service could be rendered to Canada as a flying nation by encouraging the work of these aviation companies, because of the use that, under certain eventualities, we can make of the men and the planes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course my hon. friend will agree that the question whether air mail contracts are to be carried out by this service or by others will be a matter to be decided by the Post Office Department and the government generally, rather than a matter for the Department of National Defence.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation—expenses in connection with the control of civil aviation, airways, government and public airports and grants to aeroplane clubs, $1,262,800.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister elaborate a little on this item? I remember that some weeks ago, in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver South, the minister stated his expectation that a trans-Canada route would be in operation this year. I wonder whether he would elaborate that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. In this vote will be found an increase, under airways and airports, amounting to $532,722 and a decrease, in other items, amounting to $21,286, making a net increase of $511,436. With this amount it is intended, during the present year, to complete, practically, the Canadian airways route from Winnipeg to Vancouver. That means the restoration of the facilities in five airports which were more or less closed down in 1932 and the completion of thirteen new airports, making eighteen in all, between Winnipeg and Vancouver. The estimated cost of completing the Canadian airways route between Winnipeg and Halifax is $2,314,500, of which amount over $1,000,000 would be required for the construction of new airways and airports. So, by the end of the current year it is hoped that we shall have a modernly conditioned and equipped airway between Winnipeg and Vancouver, and it is reasonable to expect that the other portions will be proceeded with in due course.

Mr. STIRLING: Of the five plus thirteen airports to which my hon. friend refers, will they all have directional beacons?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, all of them, it is understood.

Mr. STIRLING: Ready for night flying?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MacNEIL: This is one appropriation which, in my opinion should be increased, and I am sadly disappointed that more generous provision should be made for the military branch, and in my judgment at the expense of the civil aviation branch. I am particularly interested in the encouragement that is being given by the department to the flying clubs across Canada, as to whether they are being given proper opportunities to develop technical skill in aviation. It seems to me that the departmental policies at the present time are open to criticism, because they consider in too great a degree obsolete military traditions and do not give sufficient consideration to matters that will be of primary importance should we become involved in war. If, as the minister states, it is the wish of the people that we should have adequate defence for Canada in the event of war I suggest that public money should be voted and administered in such a way as to provide adequate defence. If we consider the requirements of modern warfare I think we may safely say that the first essential is young men of the physical stamina required in time of war and properly trained physically, and undoubtedly the second consideration under present conditions would be adequate technical training.

In neither of these respects does the department assume any definite responsibility. Viewing the matter solely as a problem of defence I feel that we are far behind other countries in the consideration of these questions. During recent years, even during the years of the depression, I feel that ample provision has been made to permit of suitable steps being taken in these matters. I directed an inquiry to the ministry, in reply to which a return was tabled by the Minister of National Defence, and in which I asked what purchases of aircraft had been made during the period from October 23, 1935, to the date of the inquiry; if such purchases had been made; what types were secured, and if tenders were called for in all instances. I notice that under paragraph (d) the minister stated that from the Ottawa Car Manufacturing Company of this city the government purchased eight Avro Avian light aeroplanes, mark IV, powered with Genet engines, at $3,498 each, sales tax included. I wish to direct the attention of the minister to the fact that planes of this type were condemned as obsolete many years ago. I must admit that perhaps they are quite airworthy for the purpose of primary instruction, but I desire to point out that to supply equipment of this type to civil aviation clubs, under the regulations now existing, prevents the civil aviation clubs from modernizing their equipment for at least three years. I am open to correction if I am wrong in that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am afraid my hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. MacNEIL: I understand that if they accept a machine now they cannot secure another one for a period of three years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They generally request a specific plane, and I think I am right in saying that in every case these particular machines were desired by clubs. That is the information given me by the officials of my department.

Mr. MacNEIL: I would like to point out to the minister that men in civil aviation clubs with whom I am acquainted desire most earnestly to secure a type of plane that will enable them to secure instruction in blind flying. These planes obviously are not suited for that purpose, and clubs which accept planes of this type will not have an opportunity to secure more modern equipment for at least three years, so in that way they are precluded from keeping abreast of the technical requirements of modern aviation.

I should also like some information from the minister with regard to the report which is in circulation, and which has been confirmed in some degree, that these planes were condemned as obsolete many years ago and that they were offered for sale in 1926, I think, at a price much lower than that which has been paid by the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With reference to the last part of the question asked by my hon. friend, my information is that these planes were never condemned. Some of the worn out ones might have been condemned years ago but not because of any special scientific features of their construction. My information is that in every case the flying clubs, before the planes were supplied, were asked if they would be satisfied with this type of plane, and the answer was always in the affirmative.

[Mr. MacNeil.]

Mr. HEAPS: How old are these planes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I cannot tell my hon. friend.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) said that they were of the 1926 type. Is it true that they are ten years old?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that the type is fairly old, but the age of the machine is an entirely different matter. These may be the 1926 type; I do not know, but the age of the machine is an entirely different matter. It is a model of a former year constructed more recently.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know whether the hon. member for Vancouver North is correct, but he has stated that the same machines were offered for sale in 1926 at a lower price.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I could not speak as to that. I do not know.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the officials have that information?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My information is that they were built in 1928 or 1929.

Mr. HEAPS: Had they been in use before that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. HEAPS: Nobody but the government wanted them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the flying clubs wanted them; otherwise they would not have been obliged to take them.

Mr. MacNEIL: I think it is common knowledge that these machines have been in stock at the Ottawa Car Manufacturing Company since 1928 or 1929. They were condemned because of obsolescence, and they are a very slow type of machine, quite out of date and certainly not acceptable in any sense to the British war office, though they may be air-worthy and suitable for the purpose of elementary instruction. I am also informed that when these machines were sold to the government the fabric, struts and wooden parts were in such a state of deterioration that it was necessary for the Ottawa Car Manufacturing Company to replace them completely. As a matter of fact not all the planes have yet been delivered because of inability to furnish parts. The machines are so obsolete that the company in England which manufactured them has been unable to supply these parts. I suggest that the greatest care should be exercised, particularly in regard to the fabric and the wooden struts, to see that no deterioration has set in which might jeopardize the lives of instructors or pupils. I think if the minister refers to journals published in the interest of civil aviation, he will find these very planes, that were in stock for some time, advertised some years ago at a price considerably lower than that paid by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The information given me by my officials is quite different. These planes, before being placed in use, were overhauled, modernized and thoroughly inspected by competent inspectors. As far as I am concerned no representations were made to me by the Ottawa Car Company. I take my advice from officials of the department who are responsible and technically qualified in every way.

Mr. HEAPS: Have these planes all been delivered?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think so.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the statement correct that these same planes were offered for sale at lower prices several years ago?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I cannot say as to that because I was not in the department at that time. My information is that that is not the case, but I should not like to take the responsibility of stating that definitely, because I do not know.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would not press the minister to make that statement definitely now, but I would press him to look into the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will do so.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I understood the minister to say that this expenditure is on the air route from Winnipeg to the west.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Entirely?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, with possibly two exceptions. There are two improvements, one at Moncton, New Brunswick, and one at Dane, Ontario, in connection with this vote.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Is any provision being made for the proposed imperial air route?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This makes no provision for that; it is a matter of policy to be decided. There was, as my hon. friend knows, a conference last November and December in reference to that whole matter.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any provision in this estimate for the development of a transatlantic or transpacific air route?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There will be a small provision for radio and meteorological service in connection with the development of the route from Newfoundland to Montreal. It was part of the provisional agreement reached here last December between the departmental heads of Canada, the Irish Free State and the United Kingdom, that such would be provided for by Canada. That will be in the supplementary estimates; I do not think it has yet been brought down.

Mr. GREEN: What is the present position in regard to a transatlantic air route?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A provisional agreement has been arrived at between the countries I have mentioned. There was a conference of officials in Ottawa followed by a conference in Washington in conjunction with the officials of the United States government. Imperial Airways are going to commence immediately experimental flights across the Atlantic; I think equipment and preparations are being completed for them. It is estimated that the preparatory work will take approximately a year and that flying on a commercial basis cannot be undertaken before the beginning of 1938, when it may be assumed that we may have our trans-Canada system completed.

Mr. GREEN: How many civil air clubs are there now in Canada, and what is the position in regard to them? How does the government help them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are twenty-two. A grant of $5,000 is made to the flying association. As regards the clubs the sum of $100 will be granted to each club in respect of each member who qualifies as a private pilot, and the sum of $4 per flying hour up to a maximum of forty hours for each member continuing his training and qualifying for a commercial pilot's certificate. These clubs have a total membership of 2,400.

Mr. GREEN: Has the department made any move towards promoting research work in aviation? I understand that civil aviation is to be transferred to the new ministry of transport, but can the minister tell us what provision is made for research work in connection with civil aviation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The technical officers are continually in touch with all modern developments in flying not in this country only, but in other countries. The mere following up of what is being done nowadays is research work of the most extensive kind.

Mr. GREEN: Would that be under the Department of National Defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The technical officers will be with the Department of National Defence, but actual civil aviation will be under the department of transport.

Mr. STIRLING: How far has my hon. friend got in negotiations with Newfoundland and developments there in connection with transatlantic flight?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A delegate from Newfoundland was present at the conference to which I referred and took part in the discussions, and naturally they are cooperating in every way in reference to the development of transatlantic flight.

Mr. STIRLING: Is land set apart in Newfoundland for the purpose?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think so; I think the matter has all been surveyed.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Last year there was a conference in Newfoundland. Has there been one in Canada since then?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, last December, headed by Sir Donald Banks of the British civil service and several eminent aviation experts from the united kingdom, two delegates from Canada, one from Newfoundland, and three of our permanent officials They met here for about a week and drew up a provisional agreement which was to be ratified by various governments, and afterwards they went to Washington and consulted with the American officials with reference to cooperation with Pan-American Airways and Imperial Airways.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Who was the representative from the Irish Free State?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There were two. I regret that I cannot recall the names at the moment but I shall be glad to get them.

Mr. McCANN: Is there any provision in this appropriation for an airport in the county of Renfrew?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand there is no provision for an airport; there is provision for intermediate landing fields only.

Mr. McCANN: Will there be further expenditure on the present airport at Killaloe?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that will be completed.

Mr. McCANN: What is the amount likely to be expended upon it during the coming year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is difficult to assess that accurately for the reason that unemployment relief work on these projects is ceasing on July 1, and the work on that airport may have to be continued on a different basis.

Mr. McCANN: Has the property for a landing field been purchased or expropriated?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that it has been.

Mr. McCANN: Purchased or expropriated?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I cannot say which. I understand it has been acquired.

Mr. McCANN: When will that development take place?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Without being too definite, during the course of the present year, I assume.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BARBER: I wonder whether the minister could give us some particulars about airports or emergency landing fields in British Columbia. There were several under construction last year, directly under this department, one at Hope and one at Boothroyd. I would also like the minister to deal with the Chilliwack airport.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am quite familiar with the one at Chilliwack. There were certain difficulties in regard to that, with which I think my hon. friend is thoroughly familiar. A site was chosen by the former government I think, although I am not exactly sure about that, and certain difficulties arose with reference to the dyking charges. The whole situation was referred to the Department of Justice, which gave as a legal opinion that the virtual contract which had been entered into previously was not binding because the dyking charges in question had not been revealed by the owners of the property. No final determination has as yet been made in regard to that specific piece of property. The whole situation is quite open at the present moment, and the department is considering whether to accept the virtual contract that was entered into previously or whether to look for a new property in the vicinity of Chilliwack. I may say to my hon. friend that I shall be only too glad to receive from him any recommendations with reference to that site.

Mr. BARBER: I think the minister will recollect that I have discussed the matter with him. Since the difficulty developed I had an interview with these people when I was at home at Easter and they advised me that they had informed the official, who came there at the time and took the particulars, that there was a dyking charge. Apparently the owners considered that the person who bought it would continue to pay the charges just as the person who buys a piece of agricultural property continues to pay the taxes on it. It developed later, after the option was drawn up, that the dyking charge was in the form of a capital charge of $50 an acre. The purchase price plus dyking charges is very reasonable for 160 acres. The property is at the present time used as a landing field. It requires very little to complete it, and $150 an acre is very reasonable if you compare that with the cost of some other landing fields.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was just going to ask my hon. friend: Does he consider that with the added charges it is a reasonable price to pay for an airport?

Mr. BARBER: I think anybody would say that it is a reasonable price in comparison with that of others which have been purchased. The field is almost as level as the floor of this chamber. There are five or six planes using it now. The unfortunate thing about the matter is that this land is owned by a farmer, and had it not been for this purchase being in contemplation he would have broken the land this year and put in a crop, but he has held it. We are in hopes that something will be done.

There is another point about this matter which the minister, coming from the coast, will quite understand. At the time of the fogs on the coast the fog drops down within ten or twelve miles west of this airport, which was selected by the civil aviation authorities when they went through selecting landing fields on a direct route to Vancouver. The fog at certain times is so thick that it is impossible to drive or fly through it. The airmen strike the fog within ten or twelve miles west of this site which has been selected; when it is impossible to fly through they have to return to the landing field, and if this landing field were not there they would have to go back to Hope airport, about thirty miles further east; the landing fields are supposed to be thirty miles apart. I would strongly recommend the government to take over this airport which would cost very little to develop, and is being used by five or six airplanes to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend throws a new light on the situation. He states that the official of the department who was there was made familiar with these dyking charges. This is the first time that has been brought to my notice. In the option that was given at the time these dyking charges were not included. The whole question now is this: With these charges, is this a reasonable price for the airport? My hon. friend says that it is the best site available. The whole situation is absolutely open and the department will be glad to receive any recommendations. As I have already explained, the situation was, I was advised, that certain incidental liens or charges had not been disclosed by the owners, and when the matter was referred to the Justice department they declared that the contract was not valid.

Mr. BARBER: I understand that. I have a copy of the letter. The option expired in January.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, so I understand.

Mr. BARBER: I just wish to repeat that this site was chosen, I believe, by the officials of the air force branch of the department at the coast. They went over the line and considered this landing field to be on the direct route, and a natural landing field requiring very little work, and situated favourably east of the line where the fog breaks. When a farmer sells land to another farmer or anybody else and quotes a price of $100 an acre, he naturally expects that the purchaser will continue to pay the taxes on it, and the owners of this property told the official that there was a dyking tax and a municipal tax. They never considered it a capital charge, and I would have thought that the official would go into a little more detail with the provincial government. I know the minister is deeply interested in this landing field. It was chosen, not by the previous government—and I had no say in the matter—but by the officials of the department who picked out these landing fields.

Certainly the present situation is working a hardship on the men who own this landing field. They would have broken it up and put a crop in this year had it not been for this difficulty.

Mr. STIRLING: I should like to emphasize what my hon. friend from Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) has just said. The minister was not quite accurate in saying that the late government selected this site. I remember the incident quite well. It came to my desk in the ordinary routine of recommendations.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is what I meant to convey, of course.

Mr. STIRLING: I remember also in connection with it that the officials had been at some considerable trouble to find landing fields suitable from the point of view of position and also from the point of view of expense, because as the minister well knows that is a highly developed district, and it was not easy to get a piece of land suitable for the purpose, at a figure that the department could properly consider.

In connection with these airports to which the minister referred this afternoon, would he be good enough to give the committee the location of those west of Lethbridge and indicate which of them will have direction beacons?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will start with the Winnipeg field. Then there is Forrest, Broadview, Regina, Calgary, Coleman, Lethbridge, Red Deer, Edmonton, Medicine Hat, Maple Creek, Swift Current, Vancouver headquarters, Vancouver, Hope, Princeton, Oliver, Grand Forks, Kitchener and Cranbrook.

Mr. STIRLING: Could we take up Grand Forks for a moment? This port has been something of a pioneer in flying in the southern boundary country. It has been used for a great many years in the development of flying. It has been used by passenger planes from the south; I can remember one which was on its way to Alaska. That is a typical example of these ports, and I should like to know what technical officers would be resident here and at the other ports.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Perhaps I could give the personnel for all the western districts and the expenditures contemplated. The figures are as follows:

	Personnel	Expenditures
Calgary headquarters	6	$17,400
Calgary	2	14,370
Coleman	3	34,980
Lethbridge	5	14,140
Red Deer	3	11,140
Edmonton	2	14,340
Medicine Hat	2	8,900
Maple Creek	3	12,160
Swift Current	2	8,850
Vancouver headquarters	4	11,020
Vancouver	5	52,780
Hope	2	16,400
Princeton	3	32,000
Oliver	2	17,800
Grand Forks	3	32,200
Kitchener	2	13,900
Cranbrook	2	14,100

Mr. BARBER: Is that the total cost of the Hope airport?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is the cost of special wireless equipment to be installed and other relevant changes.

Mr. BARBER: Are any buildings to be erected there?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think there is some clearing and other work to be done, but that will come under another item.

Mr. BARBER: I understood hangars were to be erected.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think there is some clearing and grading to be done under another vote. This is purely for wireless services.

Mr. BARBER: I saw the field last Easter and I understood it was completed, but it was expected that some hangars would be constructed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Whether that can be done immediately I could not say, but of course such buildings will probably be essential to later developments.

Mr. BARBER: There will be some seeding needed and perhaps some cement runways. There is also the question of the emergency landing field at Boothroyd. Has the minister any particulars as to whether this is completed? This field is located just thirty miles east of Hope.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have not that information before me at the moment.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the work on these emergency landing fields located between the regular air ports still being carried on under unemployment relief?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That work will be carried on under relief until July 1, and then the government must decide what policy must be adopted, whether the work will be carried on by day labour or by contract.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Is Broadview an emergency landing field?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, an airport in the prairie district. The expenditure on wireless services at Broadview will be $8,710, and there will be a personnel of two.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention that the planes flying the trans-Canada airway are to be operated by the government or by private companies?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That will be a question of government policy to be determined.

Mr. GREEN: When may we expect a decision on that point? If private companies are to carry on this flying they will have to do considerable preparatory work. Apparently the western section of the airway is to be completed this fall.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That question must be decided within the next month or two. First, equipment must be prepared for long distance flights and pilots must be trained if the government is going to undertake these flights. If private companies are to conduct the flights they should have at least six months' notice, in my judgment, to get properly equipped. However, this question has not yet been decided.

Mr. GREEN: That is to be decided within the next month?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I hope so.

Mr. ESLING: The minister went from Grand Forks to Kitchener, and I take it for granted that Salmo field will be completed. There has already been expended upon this field something like $63,000, a larger amount than has been expended on almost any other field. I should like to ask the minister if the policy of this government is to be different from the policy of the former administration with reference to assistance to municipal air ports. There has been $63,000 expended on the Salmo airport and apparently it is not completed. The policy of the previous government with reference to assistance to municipal airports was to permit men to go from the relief camps to do this work. In the case of the Trail airport, this would have involved transportation of twelve miles both morning and evening as well as the erection of dining halls and other buildings. This would have cost the town far more than the assistance would have been worth.

I have referred already to the fact that Trail is entitled to more than ordinary recognition. This is practically the only field between Winnipeg and the coast where planes can obtain repairs. More than $25,000 worth of repairs was made at this field last year. It is the only field between Winnipeg and the coast where radio service is available to the arctic circle or any other part of Canada for twenty-four hours in the day. This field is on the direct line of the airway as well as being on both the Great Northern and the Canadian Pacific railway lines. Actually there is more export mail leaving Trail than there is leaving any industrial point in the dominion. I hope the government can see its way clear to changing its policy in order to provide a more direct method of betterment for these municipal airports.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I agree absolutely with my hon. friend's reference to the progressiveness of Trail, not only in connection with the facilities provided for flying but in connection with the officials of the Consolidated Mining & Smelting company who have done so much in the way of pioneer work. One of their officials recently received the McKee trans-Canada trophy for the greatest success in flying in the dominion. With regard to assistance for municipal airports, my information is that direct contributions have never been made. My information also is that the former government offered assistance to the Trail airport as an unemployment relief project, but that offer was not favourably considered. Again I say that I agree with my hon. friend that there are no more progressive facilities provided in Canada than those at Trail.

Mr. ESLING: The proposal was to bring men from a relief camp some twelve or fourteen miles from Trail, and the town would have had to provide living quarters.

Mr. BEAUBIER: There is a direction finding station ten miles north of Brandon at Forrest. It has not been operated recently. There is a civic airport at Brandon, located at the northern boundary of the city, and it has gone into receivership. The minister will have received a letter dated May 15, a copy of which I have, asking whether the government would consider taking over that airport. There are 187 acres as level as the floor of this chamber, with a hangar and a few other buildings, and that airport is well worth considering, for it is in the direct line of flight as you go west from Winnipeg. I should like to see it given some consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend is in the same position as the hon. member for Kootenay West. Brandon is just as progressive as Trail, but unfortunately is not on the direct route as laid out by the technical officers of the department. That route was laid out some time ago and was not under my auspices. However I can promise that every possible consideration will be given my hon. friend's representations.

Mr. BEAUBIER: Do I understand that it is the intention of the department to change that direction finding station north of Brandon? It is in the direct line of flight, this airport being seven miles to the south.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was not the intention, but I shall be glad to give the matter every possible consideration. A deviation of seven or eight miles in direction finding is material.

Mr. ESLING: Is it intended to finish the Trail landing field this year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that it is an intermediate landing field, and as far as I am aware it is not the policy to consider it in any other light.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Can the minister give me some particulars with respect to Broadview, which is an emergency landing field with beacon lights? It is a level piece of ground.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In addition to what I have mentioned, there is $750 for grading to be done there.

Mr. MacNEIL: Reverting to the discussion that took place before recess with regard to the purchase of aircraft equipment, I find in a return tabled by the minister that tenders were called for in connection with the following: two Fairchild machines; two Waco "S6" aircraft; one Stinson "SR-7B" aircraft. One Moth was purchased from de Havilland Aircraft Limited, Toronto; six fleet aircraft, from Fleet Aircraft of Canada Limited; eight Avro Avian planes from the Ottawa Car Manufacturing Company; two Fleet Trainor aircraft from Fleet Aircraft of Canada Limited and two Fairchild aircraft from Fairchild Aircraft of Canada. Why were not tenders called for in all instances for the purchase of new equipment, not including the purchase of secondhand equipment?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As regards airplanes, tenders are necessarily governed by the type of plane required, and the element of competition is not present in all cases. There might be one type of plane required for strictly military purposes, another type of plane for training purposes, which would be entirely different, and possibly a third type of plane for ordinary civil aviation or transportation purposes. I was under the impression that tenders were called for in every case but I am advised that that is not so, but the prices of all types of aircraft are known in the department.

Mr. MacNEIL: The fact that $4,130,000 has been voted for the Royal Canadian Air Force, an increase of $1,000,000 over last year's vote, and only $1,262,000 odd for civil aviation, an increase of only $511,406 over last year's vote, prompts me to make a few observations regarding what I consider a serious inconsistency. I find that during the years of depression this parliament has voted various sums exceeding in total $122,000,000, and it is interesting to contrast that with the contributions from the federal treasury for relief purposes, about which there has been so much criticism, amounting to $160,000,000. In my opinion all we have now as a result of that enormous expenditure by the department is what the officers of the force themselves describe as a bow and arrow army and a teakettle navy. As regards the aviation branch, something which is in the initial stage of development in Canada, I suggest that as far as possible we should avoid the mistakes which have been made in the past and see to it that this branch is not cluttered up with the obsolete traditions from which the military and naval branches have suffered in the past. We are asked again this year to vote, apart from the item now under consideration, some $25,000,000—and in that amount I include the votes for the various buildings and the votes made available for national defence through the supplementary estimates—all representing a substantial increase over the vote of last year. It seems to me that this should be subjected to the most rigid scrutiny. The minister has said that this appropriation is for purposes of defence, but I may say in this house—and my opinion is corroborated by many men with expert training in military matters—that this is simply a $25,000,000 cardboard front as far as defence purposes are concerned, a cardboard front behind which there operates to a large extent a social patronage racket.

When we come to aviation we find that civil aviation is sacrificed to the military branch, which is not competent to any degree to assume responsibility for the technical training of young men, and so far there has been no indication from the minister that the department is prepared to undertake technical training of the nature required. Surely any military expert will agree that under present conditions there is nothing more urgent than technical training, from the standpoint of defence, if the nation desires defence.

In the various aviation clubs across Canada we have a very efficient organization. The young men associated in these clubs, the minister will agree, are making a notable contribution to the development of aviation in Canada. Much of the important research work which is necessary is being conducted under the auspices of this organization, and as far as I can discover it is the one agency by means of which young men may find some opportunity to secure technical training and to keep abreast of developments in aviation in the world to-day. They are eagerly and enthusiastically taking advantage of that opportunity as far as they are permitted. From my personal experience the majority of the instructors attached to the flying clubs are rendering the country admirable service and doing whatever is possible, under the serious handicaps from which they suffer, to promote aviation in the way in which it should be promoted having regard to the development of our country.

In connection with the purchase of equipment I wish to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that the general staff of the department who decide this matter are apparently palming off on our flying clubs equipment that is so obsolete that if they accept it at the present time, under the regulations, as I understand, for at least three years they cannot possibly secure access to modern equipment or obtain instruction in blind flying and in the latest aids to aerial navigation which are now being brought out. This is a policy radically different from that which has been sponsored by the British air ministry. Let me refer again to this particular purchase of equipment indicated in the return I mentioned previously. These planes are described in an article in the current issue of Cavalcade. The eight planes are Avro Avians with Genet-Major engines:

> A type of light aeroplane that has not been built in Canada since 1929. Their motors are five cylinder 100-110 horsepower. Their speed is only 100 m.p.h. Their carrying capacity is 458 pounds.

Three years ago the last Mark IV Avians were washed out as obsolete by the Royal Canadian Air Force. This year the government of Canada has bought eight of the machines for issue to civilian flying clubs and paid $3,498 apiece for them. The Ottawa Car Manufacturing Company was the vendor. No tenders were asked. The Hon. T. P. Ahearn, who contributed substantially to the victory of Liberalism, is president of the Ottawa Car Manufacturing Company. I am not at the moment particularly interested in that angle, but I have before me an advertisement which appeared in the issue of March, 1933, of Canadian Aviation, and in which these same Avro Avians, I understand, were advertised at "a new low price record." The advertisement reads:

> The Avro Avian can now be purchased on the deferred payment plan and offers a saving to prospective aircraft owners never before equalled. Fifteen hundred dollars cash payment and you can own a new Avro Avian with Armstrong-Siddeley Genet-Major engine, 100-110 h.p. The balance you "pay as you fly" in twelve monthly instalments of $140 each.

The advertisement goes on to say that these planes are "completely modified."

> In every respect the purchaser of an Avian is the owner of one of the most up to date, Canadian-built, light aeroplanes suitable for training, sport and commercial use. Write for further particulars. Sole Canadian manufacturing and selling rights, Ottawa Car Manufacturing Co. Ltd., Ottawa, Canada.

The government paid the sum of $3,498. That, I submit, is not giving civil aviation the encouragement it deserves, particularly in view of the splendid record established in this branch by young men attached to flying clubs in this country. I feel that the government made a decidedly bad bargain. These machines were listed at a lower price in 1933 and intervening years. Surely they have not appreciated in value since that time. It is unquestionable that they are hopelessly outdated for purposes of aviation instruction at the present time; that they are obsolete from every point of view for such uses. Furthermore, the safety factor enters in, for if these machines have been in the stock of the Ottawa Car Manufacturing Company for seven, eight or nine years, having been purchased in the boom years when it was anticipated that there would be a remarkable development of aviation, it stands to reason that the wooden struts and the fabric in these machines must have deteriorated, and not even the most rigid inspection under the auspices of government inspectors can guarantee that they are airworthy for purposes of instruction. After all, machines used for these purposes stand considerable rough usage.

The point I particularly wish to stress is that these machines are obsolete, and in providing them for flying clubs—and there is no indication in the return tabled by the minister that anything but obsolete machines will be furnished to the flying clubs—the department is seriously handicapping this work. It is of little advantage to this country to vote large sums of money for the development of flying fields if the young men who are interested in the technical development of the industry are in this manner precluded from keeping abreast of modern technical requirements.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am afraid my hon. friend has got some inadequate information with reference to this whole matter. There were some Avians purchased. I think eight planes were obtained, some Fleets, also some de Havillands.

Mr. BENNETT: When were the eight bought?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): From January 1, 1935, to February 15, 1936. I have the whole list before me.

Mr. BENNETT: But when were the eight bought?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The eight were bought on February 7, eight Arvo Avians with Genet-Major engines, at a cost of $26,400.

Mr. BENNETT: How much apiece?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That would come to about $3,300 apiece.

Mr. BENNETT: The late government refused to buy them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That may be so, but I want to tell my hon. friend (Mr. MacNeil) that these planes were absolutely asked for in every case by light airplane clubs before they were issued, and my hon. friend's information in regard to their being obsolete is incorrect. They were reequipped, reconditioned and then examined by the technical officers of the department and, in every instance, pronounced by them to be perfect for flying purposes. When my hon. friend says that these machines are not adequate for training purposes he is not stating the facts. I cannot pit his judgment or my own against that of the inspectors of the department, who are qualified to pass upon such matters.

My hon. friend also said that civil aviation was being sacrificed to military aviation, and spoke about some other hon. gentleman's reference to a bow and arrow army and a teakettle navy. May I suggest that it does not help our situation in Canada for anyone to cast aspersions upon the nation's attempt to get something effective for the defence of this dominion. Some persons outside this house have made similar comments in various publications. I believe their intentions were honourable and sincere; that they were trying to mend matters, but to cast aspersions upon the adequacy of our forces is like trying to plunge a dagger in the back of this nation. As long as I am in charge of this department I am going to do the very best I can to fight for the dignity of the department and for its personnel in all three services, and I am going to strive as best I can, with my colleagues in this government, to see that the defence department of Canada gets a decent show in the next four years; that our navy gets a chance; that our air force get a chance, and that the personnel of our militia and our permanent force are also properly supported. I regret very much that my hon. friend thinks fit to cast continual aspersions upon the adequacy of the military aviation of this country. In our military aviation branch we have excellent men. In Canada we have men unsurpassed in the entire world. During the great war, as my hon. friend knows, Canada led the whole world on the battlefield; her soldiers blazed the name of Canada in immortal letters across the forefront of the world; and to-day some of them are still giving of their time, their knowledge and their enterprise to build up a creditable aviation service in this country. So I say that, no matter what our private opinions may be, we should strive to the best of our ability to support this work. There is nothing militaristic about it. We are trying to build up, not to tear down, aviation and in the naval and military branches, not for attacking purposes but purely for purposes of decent and honourable defence if an unfortunate necessity should ever arise. I must deny my hon. friend's suggestion that we are sacrificing civil aviation. For the first time in six or seven years we have increased very materially the vote for civil aviation. We are convinced that our policy is a progressive one, leading to the development of civil aviation and not sacrificing it for the sake of military aviation. I am surprised that my hon. friend, for whom I have a profound regard, should be continually making these attacks upon the defence forces of Canada, because I can tell him that every member of this government is as profoundly and sincerely attached to the processes of social reform and the advancement of the masses as he is. But at the same time this government is charged with the responsibility of looking after the defences of this nation, and so long as I am in charge of this department I am going to fight for the advancement and the maintenance of adequate defence forces in this dominion.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the item carried?

Mr. MacNEIL: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: In the defence which has been made by the minister, one point has not been explained. I have in my hand a copy of Canadian Aviation for March, 1933, and, as was stated by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), these same planes were advertised on the basis of a cash payment of $1,500 and $140 a month for twelve months, making a total price of $3,180. Now we find, three years later, that the planes, with three years' deterioration, are bought by the government of Canada at three or four hundred dollars more. That is one point which has not been explained. It has been stated that had an offer been made last year they could have been obtained for less than the price advertised in 1933.

I listened to the minister's impassioned defence of the department, and I listened also with a good deal of interest to what my colleague in this corner of the house said. On no occasion did he attack the men under the department. He was attacking certain things in connection with the department that should be brought to the attention of the government and the members of this house. As one who is interested in civil aviation and who has done a good deal of flying, I want to say that in my opinion if Canada is to develop flying men—and flying women for that matter—the equipment used should be modern, up to date, and in the best possible condition.

The point I wish to make is this, that an explanation has not been given as to why the dominion government paid this amount for planes three years after they were advertised for sale at lower prices. And may I say that in the advertisement which I hold in my hand it is definitely stated that these machines will be thoroughly modified to suit any requirements. The question is why the government of Canada bought planes built in 1928 and paid considerably more than the price for which they could have been bought three years ago by private individuals, singly and on a time payment basis. That is the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The answer is very simple: They were not the same planes. When completed, the planes were specially reconditioned, and therefore the price was different.

Mr. MacNEIL: I admire the eloquence with which the minister has defended the department, and I appreciate just as sincerely as he does the necessity of dealing with this problem in a rational, sane way, always having in mind possible eventualities. But I pointed to the fact that during the years of the depression we spent in excess of $122,000,000 for national defence, and we had a right to demand efficient methods of defence. If the people of this country desire that the government should prepare for war, for heaven's sake let us prepare for war and let us expend this money in the most efficient manner possible.

I have no apology to offer to the minister for begrudging every nickel that is taken from the starving unemployed and devoted to the purpose of national defence, but I know that in Canada we do not enjoy a scheme of national defence which is commensurate with the millions that are being spent, or shall I say squandered, for that purpose in this country. While the understanding of the minister may be as he has expressed it in this chamber, I cannot help thinking that his opinion is based upon what he has been told by the general staff, from whom he must take advice. I believe there are many ex-service men in Canada who will join with me in expressing some lack of confidence in some members of that staff, in that they have a desire to build up an elaborate organization, and no doubt have some very plausible reasons for the necessity of such an establishment.

I realize that I am introducing a grave question, but I do so in sincerity. I will ask the minister to consider the possibility of Canada having to play her part in a world war to-morrow, in conflict with some of the great powers of the world. One of the first requirements would be to find young men physically well developed. The late Sir Arthur Currie made that point time and time again, and I am not casting aspersions on the personnel of the Department of National Defence when I say that the department, following out-dated traditions, is entirely disregarding its responsibilities in this connection. One has only to inspect the various parades of the militia units and see the hollow-chested youths who are in the ranks of these parades to realize that they are not given the physical training necessary to make them fit for the emergency which I hope we may avoid. Another and still more urgent consideration, under the mechanized conditions of modern warfare, is that the young men should have technical training. Bayonet practice, which is very largely the instruction they are getting in these elaborate barracks we are building here and there across the country and in the training camps, is not giving them the technical training necessary in order that we may have men who understand how to take down and reassemble all the elaborate mechanical equipment that will be employed in the war which apparently is looming before us. I am not casting aspersions on the personnel of the department when I say that in clinging to these old traditions they are not assuming any responsibility in this vital regard, and I ask the minister where, at the moment of emergency, for purposes of defence, will he find young men with the necessary technical training.

I have no reverence for the halo of gold braid and red tabs that seems to hang around a military establishment, making it impossible for a layman to offer any sensible criticism. I have not forgotten the bitter experiences through which many of us went in 1914 and 1915 by reason of the ghastly and tragic mistakes made by the general staff, men who had occupied these comfortable offices for years and had not kept abreast of developments in military tactics. It is commonly stated that it was the man in the ranks, Tommy Atkins himself, who in a very practical way forced upon the attention of the general staff the fact that more practical methods were possible. If Heinie was in a hole over there and Tommy Atkins was in a hole over here he knew he could not reach Heinie with a bayonet, but if he filled a tin can with a little gun-cotton and a few rusty nails he could and did bomb Heinie out of that hole. So you can trace the development of these tactics to which the general staff was blind.

I am taking the minister on his own ground, that of national defence, and I am pointing out that the policy of the department as it has been conducted is not affording this country any reasonable assurance that for the money expended it is receiving adequate value in national defence. On my own responsibility I express the opinion that the present military establishment, because of the manner in which it is organized—with the non-permanent active militia split into some 443 units, for example—is not satisfactory. I say this criticism that has been offered by the president of the Canadian Infantry Association, for one, and by other men whose articles have recently appeared in Canadian periodicals, is justified because the mechanism is antiquated and could not possibly be equal to the emergency if we should be called upon to defend ourselves.

So I do not think the minister has any reason to take me to task for casting aspersions, nor do I think he has any right to suggest that I am stabbing Canada in the back when I criticize the existing system of national defence. I am quite as sincere and earnest about this matter as the minister is himself, and as a member of this house I think I have a perfect right to suggest that for this enormous expenditure, over $25,000,000 this year, the Canadian people have a right to demand full value by way of a defence organization.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I find my hon. friend strangely inconsistent. He is now advocating what I announced a few days ago as the policy of the Department of National Defence, the reorganization of the Canadian militia; that has been advocated by every defence association, infantry, artillery and the others in the Dominion of Canada. I find it difficult to understand the process of reasoning which criticizes a department that on the advice of specialists is trying to improve conditions, and at the same time moves to reduce the vote for that department by $1,000,000, as was done by the hon. gentleman in this house the other evening. Can anyone in this committee explain to me the logic of the reasoning of the hon. gentleman? He comes out now and says that he is in favour of a policy of mechanization and reorganization, a policy to which the department is pledged at the present time, but only a few days ago he voted to reduce the estimates of this department by $1,000,000, which would have crucified forever the militia forces of Canada. He was the gentleman who did that only the other afternoon in this house.

I want to explain to the committee, in regard to those who proffer advice to-day to this department, it does not matter whether it is under a Liberal or a Conservative government or even if it were Cooperative Commonwealth Federation government, that the technical officers of the department are as good as any men in the world. The specialists of the Department of National Defence are in touch with every process of military training in England and in every country in Europe. We are exchanging personnel with the very best equipped colleges in England. We know every process of mechanization, and the only reason we have not been able to carry out such processes in Canada is because we have not had the financial resources. Now we are trying to make a modest step forward, to improve conditions of mechanization and build up our defence forces; yet when we do that the very ones who would now reorganize them want to cut down the militia vote by one million dollars. That is the argument we hear. I tell my hon. friend that I have a great regard for him, but he is strangely inconsistent. He talks about hollow-chested youth and lack of physical training. Some of these hollow-chested youths showed themselves the finest Canadians we ever had. Some of these men in the unemployment camps to-day have been members of our militia battalions in Vancouver and other cities for many years and I have a most profound regard for them. They carry out their duties as Canadians, doing the best they can under difficult circumstances. That is what they are doing, what the officers are doing, what the department is doing and what this government intends to carry on.

Mr. STIRLING: Although I sit on the opposition side I should not like it to be thought that I in any way endorse the opinions expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). This is the third occasion on which I have heard him make statements which do not appear to me to be borne out by facts, and I speak with some little knowledge of the matter, having had the honour for a few months last year to occupy the position now occupied by the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member did well, too.

Mr. STIRLING: The hon. member for Vancouver North is, of course, entitled to his opinion. I have no doubt that in that opinion he may be supported by certain service men throughout Canada. You will always find that. But the charge that Canada has not received anything like the money's worth for what she has spent in the past few years is not, I think, true. It should never be forgotten that when the depression struck Canada, not only did it make it necessary for her to curtail expenditure, but she had to distribute most carefully the expenditure that she could make for such purposes as she deemed wise. In the Department of National Defence she naturally sought the advice and guidance of those technical officers in the department upon whom she had come to rely. As the minister has just pointed out, we are able to measure the ability and calibre of those permanent force officers by the fact that they are continually attending courses in Great Britain where they in turn are measured with the officers of the empire. We are satisfied, therefore, that the advice they give to the minister and the government of the day can well be followed. In those years of depression when the expenditures we were able to make were not nearly as much as we desired to make to keep the defence forces of Canada in the condition they should be kept in, we had to buy the technical apparatus required, and particularly to keep up in usable condition the properties dotted all over Canada in the various military districts. It was no easy matter to maintain buildings and structures throughout the dominion, and when the hon. member cites an expenditure of $25,000,000 this year he should remember that only a portion of that sum could go for the purpose of keeping our equipment up to date, because a very considerable part of it has to go for maintenance, repairs, and replacement of structures such as barracks and the like.

The minister has made a spirited defence of his department. I think I can bear out all he has said with regard to the way in which the department is now run. We were carrying on most of the things which he has continued on very much the same lines, and we shall watch the continuance of the minister if he carries on his department along those same lines.

Mr. HAMILTON: In view of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) I feel it my duty to say a few words on this occasion. I happen to have been one of those who went overseas in the ranks of the Canadian forces and served as a sergeant for some time; I have some knowledge of the training of the first contingent on Salisbury plain and then on to the front. It has also been my privilege since the war to be in command of one of the regiments. While I respect very much the viewpoint of the hon. member for Vancouver North, and believe he is sincere in what he has said, yet I think it is hardly fair to call in question the splendid efforts that so many young men of Canada are making to-day in joining the militia. If the training they are getting is not adequate to the day—and I think perhaps it is not—the minister has indicated the reason. I also think it strange that the hon. member for Vancouver North, in view of the attitude which is taken by those associated with him with reference to preparing for military defence, should question the present effort to bring our forces to such a measure of perfection as may be possible.

Remembering that the day may come when our Canadian youth may have to take part again in modern warfare, as they did in 1914, it is a serious matter to assume the responsibility of not making those men ready for that eventuality. It is easy to charge militarism, but I submit that there are few men who served in the front line overseas who are really possessed by any spirit of militarism in these matters. I unhesitatingly say that we owe an obligation to the youth of Canada to see that if the day ever comes that they again have to face the reality of actual warfare, they have officers and non-commissioned officers sufficiently trained that the men will not have to pay the penalty in physical suffering or with their lives for that lack of training. We owe it to youth to train them to understand the instruments of warfare which they may have to use. That cannot be learned in a day or a month. One of the essential things for fighting men is that degree of training which gives the discipline that holds when the moment of danger and strife comes, so that they then may act automatically, and be able to perform those things which without discipline they cannot perform. It is easy to say that this is advocating this, that and the other thing; I am not a member of the militia now, and have not been for some years, but in advocating this I do so with a view to the welfare of the boys themselves, because if the day of testing ever comes it will serve them well if they have some measure of preparedness and training in handling those instruments which they will have to handle and in conducting themselves in such a way as will save them under critical conditions.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I just want to inquire whether a master general of the ordnance has been appointed, who has been appointed, under what circumstances, whether or not he had been gazetted for retirement, and why he was brought back.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be very glad indeed to answer that question. The position of master general of ordnance was never abolished. It was vacated some years ago, and the duties of the office were divided between the quartermaster general and the chief of the general staff. Brigadier Caldwell, who is the present master general of the ordnance, was appointed on November 22, 1935, and by order in council the duties of that office were copied exactly word for word, I believe, from the duties of a similar office in the united kingdom.

Mr. BENNETT: But the office had expired in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will explain that. In the first place the office was never abolished.

Mr. BENNETT: The last appointment was when?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On November 22, 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: And General Morrison—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am coming to that. Appendix 6 of the King's Regulations and Orders, 1927, directs that the chief of the general staff and the quartermaster general shall perform the duties allotted to the master general of the ordnance, and then it says, "when the appointment is unfilled." Those words are in quotation marks taken from the language of the order in council.

In appointments, promotions and retirements of November 19, 1934, Brigadier T. V. Anderson was appointed quartermaster general vice Brigadier A. C. Caldwell, who vacates and proceeds on leave pending retirement to pension. Then the order in council says this "To draw pay and allowances to date of retirement to pension," and accordingly he was given ten months' leave of absence.

The situation is as follows: When I was entrusted with the responsibility of this department, I had some consultation with those who are responsible for the direction of policy. I found that in practically every other dominion of the empire they have taken steps to have what is termed in some countries a principal supply committee, a committee charged with the functions of surveying the industrial potentialities of the nation with reference to mobilization in case of trouble. While I agree with my right hon. friend that this position was not filled for several years, I considered that it was my duty to place the gentleman at duty. He was eminently qualified to survey the industrial potentialities of Canada, and to make a complete national industrial survey, and I am glad to say that substantial progress has already been made. His duties have been completely defined in an amendment to King's Regulations and Orders—

Mr. BENNETT: What date?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The duties are set forth in King's Regulations and Orders for the Canadian militia as amended by general order No. 12 of February 1, 1936. These are the duties as reclassified, following almost in toto, I am informed, the language of the appointment in Great Britain. In other words, the duties formerly carried out by the chief of the general staff and by the quartermaster general have been reassigned in this reclassification to the master general of the ordnance. My profound conviction is this, that there is nothing more necessary in the Dominion of Canada than the work which is being carried on in that office now. I found this—and I am certain that my predecessors found it also—that while the personnel of the militia, the air force, and the navy are splendid, the situation with reference to equipment is simply tragic. The duties of this officer are to survey the entire situation, the rifle situation, the situation with regard to all kinds of armament and all kinds of equipment, with reference to the necessity some day of the Dominion of Canada itself taking over the entire production of all equipment of arms in case there is national trouble, because I am a profound believer that private individuals and private firms should not be entrusted with the manufacture of armaments. I think some day Canada like other nations may be faced with that necessity, and the idea I had in mind in appointing the master general of the ordnance was to survey the industrial field of Canada, and in a humble and unpretentious way to prepare for what may eventually be a dire necessity in this dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid there is more heat than light in part of the minister's explanation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No heat at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I ask now: What was the age of the gentleman? He was retired in November, 1934, and expressed himself as delighted with the treatment he had received. He was on pay and allowances for ten months during which he did not report for duty. He was on leave; he was not working from November, 1934, was it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): February 1, 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: From February 1, 1935. He went on leave and he had ten months leave with pay and allowances. What was his pay?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The same as now, $7,500 a year.

Mr. BENNETT: That included the allowances?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; everything.

Mr. BENNETT: So he was on $7,500 a year for ten months without having any work to do?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He was entitled to that.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. What was his age?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think just nearing sixty-two, but I cannot say exactly.

Mr. BENNETT: I only point out that, after being on leave for ten months, he is now appointed to a position paying $7,500 a year after having had nine or ten months with pay and doing no work for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He was entitled to that.

Mr. BENNETT: He was gazetted for retirement; he was retired. The importance of this, Mr. Chairman, is because of the urgent necessity for economy which is urged by the government on several occasions. This gentleman was retired, I think it is fair to say, partly at his own desire, and he got his leave for ten months, to which he was entitled under regulations, at his full salary of $7,500. His pension was fixed, settled and determined, and his name will be found in the gazette of I do not know what date, but some time in 1934, I think, and his leave began to run from February through March, April, May, June, July, August, September—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Pension would not be authorized until retirement was complete.

Mr. BENNETT: It is provided by regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. BENNETT: Because if anything happens in the meantime you have to deal with it in another way. He had his pension provided under the law, towards which pension he had contributed like any other official, and then a few weeks before he would have gone out of office he is reappointed to this position. This creates a very strange precedent in this country. This man had accepted his retirement, was getting full pay and allowances for ten months, and would have gone on the pension list in a few weeks, and then he was appointed to an office that had not been filled for a period of nearly nine years. He was appointed in November, 1935, shortly after this government came into office, to the position of master general of the ordnance, a position that, according to my information, had not been filled since the late General Morrison died. Under such circumstances this involves a very strange departure from the ordinary rules that govern in cases of this kind, and raises the question of an official, once having been gazetted and accepted his leave—it is not as though he did not accept it—and having no work to do for nine months—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He had no alternative; he was retired.

Mr. BENNETT: He was quite satisfied to be retired. That is the story so far as I knew it at the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is not quite the story, I am sorry to say.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it not just a case of political jobbery?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, absolutely.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think there is any doubt of that in the mind of anyone who knows the story. The minister himself is not one who knows all about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I must say I am. I accept absolute and complete responsibility for this appointment. I make this statement to this committee: Not a single soul made a recommendation to me with reference to Brigadier Caldwell. I submit I have kept away from partisan considerations in considering the estimates of the Department of National Defence because I think this is the one department which should be kept absolutely free of partisan considerations. I regret very much that my right hon. friend, who made such a noble and inspiring speech in London last night, should attribute political motives to a man who is just trying to reorganize a service and do the best he can. I believe the retirement of Brigadier Caldwell was a mistake. It was done without his consent, but that was not the reason I took him back. I took him back because I realized the necessity of the reorganization of the industrial resources branch and I take complete and sole responsibility for the appointment. As a matter of fact, I am certain I have rendered a service to the Dominion of Canada and possibly future development will prove that I am right.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose there has never been a more disconcerting example of an injurious effect upon the service. Let me put to the minister what he would have said if he had been on this side of the house. Here is a man who was retired. He is gazetted as being retired. The order in council was passed in 1934 and he was entitled to ten months' full pay and allowances without service, having earned this. There is a change of government and the whole morale of the department is at once shot by this man being put back into a position which had been abolished since the death of General Morrison. That is the situation. What is more likely to have a serious effect upon the morale of that department? The minister says that I should not make these statements because I have an interest in these matters, but that is why I am making them. I cannot conceive of anything more calculated to make it at once apparent that the department is no longer being conducted on the basis of merit, but that it is being conducted on the basis of political pull.

Brigadier Caldwell's politics were well known. I am glad to hear the minister say that no one had anything to do with the appointment except himself because that places the responsibility where by law it belongs. This man received nine months' pay without doing anything for it, and I ask the minister: What is being done to offset such an example in the department? I say that the course pursued is injurious to the morale of the department. At the same time we hear of a police magistrate, Mr. Jimmy Douglas, being removed from office in the Northwest Territories, in the interests of economy, and someone in the Department of the Interior is to discharge his duties. That was done in the interest of economy. If an industrial survey were desired, such a survey had been partly made by the Department of Trade and Commerce in the census.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not of this nature.

Mr. BENNETT: I know all about the nature of this survey because it will be recalled that the United States undertook the same sort of inventory of their industrial resources. This matter has been brought to my attention by people in various parts of Canada. Has the money which this man got for no service at all been returned to the department? When he retires again will he be entitled to ten more months? He has had nine months so far without doing anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If he retired to-morrow, of course it would be at the discretion of the minister to decide whether he was entitled to that.

Mr. BENNETT: The order in council provides for that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That would be at the discretion of the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: He had been a long time in the service, and mark you, this is the odd part: he does not add to his pension as he had completed the maximum term of service. Just think what an example this is to the militia of the country! The hon. gentleman made a plea a moment ago for support and I endeavoured to assure him, as the former minister did, of our great willingness to assist. I wonder whether the minister read the article attributed to his secretary as correspondent of the Vancouver Sun stating what the minister was going to do to the brass hats?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): By whom?

Mr. BENNETT: The present private secretary of the minister, who was at one time the correspondent of the Vancouver Sun, Mr. Senior.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think that is incorrect; I think it was somebody else.

Mr. BENNETT: I read the article. He was the correspondent for the Vancouver Sun and he is now the minister's private secretary.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct, and a very good one.

Mr. BENNETT: About the time he assumed office this article appeared in the Vancouver Sun.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He was not the Ottawa correspondent of the Vancouver Sun.

Mr. BENNETT: He was here at one time doing special work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think so.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, I saw him and I saw his articles; do not make any mistake about that. I think if the minister will carry his mind back he will have no doubt about that. I wonder whether the minister saw that enlightening and inspiring article as to what he was going to do to the brass hats? The minister has been making a plea to-night for cooperation, but I think he should read that article which appeared in the Vancouver Sun from Ottawa, special, indicating what was going to happen to the brass hats about the time when, in the interests of this country, he appointed Brigadier Caldwell to this job which had not been filled for a long time. Brigadier Caldwell was over sixty-two years of age; he had served the maximum of time and had been gazetted as retired; he had received nine months' pay and allowances for not doing any work, and then he is appointed to this position paying $7,500. It is just this sort of thing that gives support to attacks such as that made to-night by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). It is things like this that spread all over the country. I have met men in every walk of life, men here and in the far west as well, who knew of it. This is regarded as nothing better than political jobbery, having regard to Brigadier Caldwell's well known political views.

During the time he was half out and half in, so to speak, when he was no longer an employee in the narrow sense of the term, when he did not need to go to work because he was on leave of absence with full pay and allowances, he had no illusions as to his being once more a private citizen. I am sure if the hon. gentleman will inquire into the expressions of his opinion he will find that they were not entirely complimentary to those who for the moment happen to administer the government of the country. If an investigation were held and his opinions were challenged, I think it would be found that there is a section in the act that comes perilously near to endangering his whole position. This is something I mention to the minister because I cannot but think he suddenly acquired a knowledge of the details of the personnel of the department from October to the early part of November which was really amazing, considering the difficulties he expressed in getting a complete appreciation of other details of perhaps greater importance. I mention that merely in passing. I bring this to the attention of the minister because in several other matters economy has been the plea. It seems to have been forgotten in this particular case, as it was in the appointment of an assistant in the electoral office. I merely say to the minister that the general view of those acquainted with the facts is that this is a bit of political jobbery. He assures us that nothing but the highest of motives and an earnest desire to serve the state synchronized with the possibilities of Brigadier Caldwell being available for the job, and that this synchronization brought about his reappointment to a position that had not been filled for nearly ten years; and it is now to be filled by one whose peculiar qualities are that he had been retired on nine months' retiring allowance and full pay.

I congratulate the minister upon his loyal exposition of the reasons that brought about the result, but I cannot give him a very strong recommendation for the judgment he has exercised. For I think he would have no difficulty in selecting at least half a dozen —and I think I could name them to him— who would be more sprightly and would be better qualified to discharge the duties to which the hon. gentleman has referred. I only mention that, because I have no desire to do more than get the explanation on record. It is useful for many purposes, among them as showing how spasmodic the love of economy is and that, like lightning, it does not seem to strike often in the same place. An old gentleman who served in this house very faithfully and efficiently, and to whom the usual courtesies might be extended by those who find themselves in power, is retired, in the name of economy, as a stipendiary magistrate in the Northwest Territories, while a boy is retired from the radio service because his father was a violent partisan—all this in the interests of economy. There was not much economy about this appointment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There will be in the end.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before we carry the last item, which has been held over, there are just a few general remarks I should like to make with regard to the Department of National Defence. My colleague from Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) has been charging obsolete equipment and obsolete methods, and I would go a little bit further than that and venture to suggest that war itself is an obsolete method of trying to settle international disputes. And for that reason, when these National Defence estimates are under consideration, we might at least once a year ask the more fundamental question as to what we are getting as a result of this enormous expenditure.

The minister has said that the policy of the department is not necessarily a policy that changes with a change of administration. That, I suggest, is really the trouble. We have inherited a military establishment and a theory of national defence and we have not stopped to examine the efficiency of that establishment or the soundness of the theory. In an article I read a short time ago in the Ottawa Journal, taken from the Financial Post, the writer states that the cost of the war has amounted to a grand total of $4,341,488,904. Now, that is the cost in dollars and cents, which, as the Minister of Finance confesses, is a major factor in our budgetary difficulties to-day; and none of us can estimate the cost in human wastage and the disorganization of society that has taken place.

Feeling this way some of us can hardly sit quietly year after year without at least uttering a protest against the continuance of a policy which is not bringing results. I know that some members of the house simply hurl at us the epithet "pacifist," and they think that this settles the matter. Well, I suppose it is easy for us to retort that they are militarists. But I do not know that this sort of thing gets us very far. I know we all want peace; that is taken for granted. But I suggest that we differ materially on the question as to how to attain peace, and under these circumstances those of us who have a theory other than that which is generally held by, I believe, the majority in this house, regard it as our duty to try to state our position.

We have heard it said to-night that there should be no party divisions in a matter of this kind. I suggest that in the days to come this matter of national defence, inextricably intertwined with the question of foreign policy, must become a political issue; there is no way out. Indeed, it should become a political issue because the people to-day are no longer united as to the efficiency of this method or attempted method of arriving at national security. We talk sometimes about fire protection. I can quite understand that it is all very well for us to come and talk about fire engines and ladders and hose and things of that sort; but if we are living in a city of jerrybuilt frame houses; if we have no proper wiring arrangements, no building inspection, it is manifest that though we maintain an efficient fire brigade and have finely equipped fire engines and all the rest of it, that will not prevent our city from burning down. We have to approach the matter in a far more scientific way. And so I want to ask this minister, as I have asked previous ministers, exactly what the policy of his department is.

The minister said not long ago at a meeting of the Canadian Artillery Association:

> In my mind there are two cardinal and guiding principles to be borne in mind when establishing a system of national defence. First, we must have defence forces sufficient to control subversive elements from within, and secondly, to repel attacks from without.

The other day in making his statement of policy—and I commend him for having done this—he made no reference whatever to this point which he regarded as of primary importance, namely, to take care of the subversive elements from within. I am not going into that matter to-night, but I point out once more that if we give our people a decent chance we shall not need very many policemen and we shall not need any military organization. I state that as my belief and the belief of a large number of people whom I am trying to represent.

We are to repel attacks from without, we are told. I am sometimes accused of being an idealist, but to-night I should like for a few minutes to be very practical indeed. I would ask the minister and the house whether we expect any European country to attack us. Would Germany attack us? Would Italy attack us? I do not think for a moment that the great United States to the south of us, with its Monroe doctrine, would permit anything of the kind. You may say: Well, but you are simply depending upon another nation. I am not particularly concerned with what the implications of all that kind of thing may be, but I submit that if we are thinking about some foe from Europe we are putting up a hypothesis which has no basis in fact. Do we expect Japan to attack us from the oriental side? I would say that there are many other countries nearer at hand upon which Japan might cast envious eyes. And again, the United States, with its Monroe doctrine, would not suffer any invasion of the north American continent.

Mr. REID: Do not be so sure of that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friend says "not so sure." I do not think so. I do not for a moment imagine that Japan would attack Canada.

Mr. McGREGOR: There might be a "scrap of paper."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so, and if a scrap of paper were involved I should like to know how that wonderful fleet we have is going to protect us. It is tommyrot to talk about a ship or two standing against the fleet of Japan.

Mr. HARTIGAN: We would have a few trained men, though.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I ask the minister whether we are prepared to defend ourselves against the Japanese fleet in the Pacific. What about the United States? Is the United States likely to attack us? I fancy United States financial interests have a great part of what is worth having in Canada, anyway, and they have secured it, not by means of military tactics but by way of financial penetration. But if they did want to attack us, does any sane man believe that we, with a small population of ten millions, could stand out against a population of 120 millions; that we, with this great army that we hear so much about, so splendidly equipped, would be able to hold out against the armies of the great republic to the south of us? The United States does not want to attack us; there is no doubt of that. Then against whom are we really arming? Are our defence forces to defend us against any possible enemy? Again I say, no. I think it was the minister who said the other day that we ought to have reasonable preparation for the defence of our country. Have we reasonable preparation to-day? I cannot think we have reasonable preparation whereby we can stand alone against any enemy that might attack us.

From another angle altogether than that which has been presented so far, I ask: Are we justified in spending these large amounts with the idea that they really give us security? The minister went on to say that we have certain League of Nations' commitments. I should like to know where we stand in that regard. I have asked the Prime Minister, and so far he has declined to tell the house what our commitments are, and whether or not there are any understandings.

Mr. HAMILTON: Does the hon. member want to start a war?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think it is a most extraordinary position for the government to take. Mr. J. M. Macdonnell recently had a letter in the London Times, in which he suggests that Canadians might be divided roughly into three groups with regard to foreign policy: those who believe in isolation or security through their position on the north American continent; those who still maintain pretty much the attitude that most people had in 1914, that is that we are an integral part of the empire and must rush to the empire's assistance; and those who place some reliance, at least, upon the League of Nations or cling to the idea of collective security. If we in Canada are so divided, is it not about time that the Canadian people knew at least where the government stands on this matter? I think it is. Before we go on passing these estimates from year to year we should know whether we are to have any commitments under the League of Nations. I do not believe that the majority of the young men of to-day are willing to join an expeditionary force organized by the League of Nations and risk their lives in Ethiopia or in some part of Europe or Asia. We may have, the minister says, as one of our obligations certain imperial commitments.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we ought to know from the government—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not understand the minister to say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have his words before me. I will look them up. He said that it might be necessary for us to send a force because of our position in the British empire.

Mr. BENNETT: About the British empire; that is another matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He said:

> The defence of Canada is concerned with four possible developments. In the first place there is the defence of our own coasts; second, the defence of our neutrality in the event of war between other nations; third, the possibility, which I hope is a very remote one, of Canada being compelled at any time to dispatch an expeditionary force in order to fulfil her obligations under the terms of the covenant of the league, and in the fourth place the possible dispatch of an expeditionary force consequent upon any contingent developments in relation to our position in the British commonwealth.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is no reference to our "imperial commitments."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the minister says that we have no commitments I am very glad indeed. If there are no formal commitments, at least he must have in mind certain obligations which we may have towards the British empire.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I say that the only obligations as far as I am aware are those arrived at at the imperial conference in 1926, whereunder each dominion of the empire is responsible for its own defence.

Mr. BENNETT: And discussions by the general staffs.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am delighted to have that statement by the minister. Then I think we come down to some obligations which we, as one of the dominions, might feel we owe to the British empire, or, as we commonly speak of it, to the motherland. Personally I have a very high regard for Great Britain. I think we owe Britain an enormous debt for our language and our literature, for our political institutions and our traditions. But I, for one, do not feel that we have any particular military obligations. Our burden of debt in this country has been incurred to no small extent because of our British connections. I do not want to weary the committee, but I happened to have my attention called only the other day to a rather outstanding statement by Mr. Sandford Fleming at the proceedings of the Imperial Federation Colonial Conference in 1887. We are struggling to-day under the burden of our railway debts. Mr. Sandford Fleming at that time made this statement, that the purpose of building the Canadian Pacific railway was to consolidate British interests on the western continent. He said:

> Their efforts have culminated in establishing across the widest part of North America a great national railway, destined, we believe, to become an essential factor in the defence and future prosperity of the empire.

He went on to mention a great many of the steps through which this had come about, and he said:

> There has been a continual solicitude on the part of the home government for the maintenance and extension of imperial interests in North America.

He also said that:

> Canada, in deference to imperial wishes and needs, has adopted the policy of establishing these great lines of communication, and that she has ... been impressed with the conviction that she was promoting the general interests of the empire, and contributing not a little towards its consolidation and defence.

[Mr. T. Mackenzie.]

He called attention to the peculiar incident that:

> The last rail had not been laid many days when a consignment of naval stores passed through to the station of the north Pacific fleet from Halifax.

And he commented:

> This one fact must be recognized as of striking significance, as it clearly shows the immense political value of the Canadian railway. This new line practically brings what was once the most remote naval station, in the most distant colony of the empire, within about two weeks of Portsmouth.

And he said:

> I only desire to draw attention to the fact that it is the outcome of a policy initiated by the home government, and continually pressed on Canada by the home government. This great imperial line of communication is the growth of half a century; it has been established by the Canadian people without cost to England. Even the expenditure made by the home government on the preliminary surveys for the line between the fortresses of Halifax and Quebec has been refunded. The railway across the continent has involved an expenditure of £48,000,000, of which about £24,000,000, the exact amount being £23,966,000, has been paid by the government of Canada in subsidies or without prospect of return.
> Canada does not ask to be relieved of any of the burdens she has assumed, she brings all her costly works as a contribution to the common defence, and she desires that they may be made available in the most advantageous manner to the empire.

He goes on to say that even the lines of ships that were being established on the Pacific were part of this general scheme, and he continues:

> It is obvious that a sufficient number of such ships for the two postal services across the Pacific, available as armed cruisers, would be of immense advantage in any emergency, while at ordinary times they would be actively engaged in the development of commerce.

I have ventured to give these quotations simply because some of us have constantly to listen to the reproach that Canada is not playing her part in the defence of the empire. Just from the standpoint of dollars and cents I venture to say that Canada has made very great contributions indeed. Our great debt is largely the result of our connection with the empire, and the last war did not come through any immediate interest that Canada had at that time in Europe, or in European affairs; we were drawn in because of the failure of the statesmen of Europe to put international affairs on a sound basis. As Lloyd George, I think it was, said, we simply bungled into the war. Now Great Britain, under the Baldwin government, seems committed to a policy of military expansion. It was only on February 27 last that Viscount Swindon, air minister in the House of Lords, said that the old policy of no war for ten years had been abandoned. When asked how soon war was expected he answered that the government hoped to be prepared in four years. I made that notation in February. Now we have a score of statements which would seem to indicate that it will be nothing like as long as that before we might have war.

I think it is high time that we asked what should be Canada's position in the event of hostilities breaking out in Europe. Are we to be prepared, as the minister would seem to suggest, to face the possibility that we might have to send an expeditionary force to the aid of Great Britain? Well, I do not want to fall down in an emergency, but I do not think we should let things go and allow Great Britain to become involved while depending in any way upon our activity, and then funk it at the last. I think those of us who believe that Canada should stay out of war should give a fair warning to Great Britain at this time that she may not expect any expeditionary force to be sent over from this country because there has been bungling in Europe. I think that ought to be said to Great Britain at once. Personally—and I do not intend to go into this matter at length—I think we should adopt the attitude that South Africa has taken, and the statute of Westminster should be supplemented by our claiming the prerogative of declaring war or peace on our own behalf.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does my hon. friend say that he would follow South Africa with regard to a policy of defence?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I was not saying that. I said that I thought we should follow the policy of South Africa and claim the prerogative for Canada as to whether or not Canada should be at war.

Mr. BENNETT: So we do. We cannot send a single man out of this country without the consent of parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quite well aware of that; I suppose that since the statute of Westminster was passed we have it entirely within our own hands as to whether or not we should send troops, but technically when Great Britain is at war Canada is at war. I think very few will deny that. I know I used to talk over that aspect of the situation with the late John S. Ewart, and many hon. members will recall Mr. Ewart's position in that regard. He seemed to think there might be a kind of personal union which might allow Great Britain to be at war while Canada remained at peace, but as far as I can ascertain that position is not altogether maintained by some of our leading authorities in international law.

I had not intended to take up this matter tonight, but since I have introduced it, I should like to mention one or two points along that line, from some notes I made some time ago. Since the passing of the statute of Westminster the dominion may make any laws it likes, regardless of whether they conflict with British laws or have effect outside the borders of Canada, provided only that they do not conflict with any limitations imposed by the British North America Act. The conduct of foreign relations, being a matter governed by royal prerogative and not by statute, was unaffected by the statute of Westminster. The governor general in Canada represents the king and exercises the royal prerogative by delegation for the purposes of the dominion government. His powers are set out in the letters patent and instructions which govern his office, to which have been added certain other powers by constitutional usage. The conduct of foreign relations, however, is not included in these powers. Every Canadian treaty above the level of a mere convention or trade treaty must be ratified personally by the king in London. To put the matter in a nutshell, Canada has now full control over her own legislation, but not full control over the executive functions of her government. What is needed is to round out her control over the executive function in the same way that the statute of Westminster rounded it out over the legislative function.

It has been suggested to me by some legal friends whom I have consulted that this might be done in one of two ways. In the first place new instructions might be issued to the governor general stating specifically that he had power to represent the king in every aspect of the domestic or external affairs of the dominion, such power to be exercised on the advice of his majesty's ministers in the dominion. In other words, Edward VIII might delegate the whole of the prerogative to the governor general instead of merely a portion, as at present. This simple act involves no legislation and no amendment of the British North America Act. At the same time it probably would be necessary to give the governor general a great seal to be affixed to all treaties and documents dealing with external affairs. Such a seal is now possessed by the governors general in both the Irish Free State and the Union of South Africa.

Mr. BENNETT: But not for use for those purposes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It has not been used for those purposes but it might be so used.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is another method. Since the passing of the statute of Westminster it is probably lawful for the parliament of Canada to pass a statute declaring that the royal prerogative over foreign affairs is vested in the governor general. The wide language used by the privy council in the case of British Coal Corporation v. The King, decided last summer, in which the dominion power to abolish appeals from Canadian courts in criminal matters was upheld, suggests, to use the words of Professor Berriedale Keith, in the Journal of Comparative Legislation, 1935, at page 274:

—that any royal prerogatives in respect of a dominion may under suitable legislation be controlled by that dominion.

There is no logical reason why, if dominion legislation can abolish the prerogative right of appeal to the foot of the throne, it cannot also declare that all prerogative powers in regard to external affairs relating to the dominion are henceforth to be executed by the governor general on the advice of his Canadian ministers.

The only question that may arise is whether such a dominion statute might conflict with section 9 of the British North America Act which reads:

The executive government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the queen.

Mr. BENNETT: It would run contrary to the preamble to the declaration of the statute of Westminster, too.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In view of the element of uncertainty in regard to method 2 above it might be best to employ method 1, namely issuance of new instructions. If such instructions were requested by the dominion government it would be difficult if not unconstitutional for a British government to refuse to issue them.

In 1934 the Union of South Africa secured for herself precisely what Canada now lacks; in that year, by the Status of Union Act and the Royal Executive Functions and Seals Act, the union parliament declared that:

"The executive government of the union in regard to any aspect of its domestic or external affairs is vested in the king, acting on the advice of his ministers of state for the union, and may be administered by His Majesty in person or by the governor general as his representative;"

They provided the governor general with a great seal and a royal signet, and they added the following provision:

[Mr. Bennett.]

"6. (1) Whenever for any reason the king's signature to any instrument requiring the king's sign manual cannot be obtained or whenever the delay involved in obtaining the king's signature to any such instrument in the ordinary course would, in the opinion of the governor general in council, either frustrate the object thereof, or unduly retard the dispatch of public business, the governor general shall, subject to such instructions as may from time to time, in that behalf, be given by the king on the advice of his ministers of state for the union, execute and sign such instrument on behalf of His Majesty, and an instrument so executed and signed by the governor general and countersigned by one of the king's ministers of the union shall be of the same force and effect as an instrument signed by the king."

The proposed step would therefore place Canada on terms of complete constitutional equality, not only with Great Britain, but with her sister dominions of South Africa and the Irish Free State.

This proposal might perhaps better have been made on the more general question of external affairs. But I have ventured to deal with it to-night because I feel that the outstanding weak spot in our relationship with Great Britain is the fact that if Great Britain were involved in war we might automatically be regarded by other nations as being at war. Our shipping might be attacked. Conceivably the United States might undertake to invade Canada. That is highly improbable of course, but I speak of the constitutional aspect. In that case Canada would simply be a second Belgium. I remember a strong Conservative saying to me several years ago that if any such contingency arose the only thing for Canada to do would be immediately to declare her independence. This gentleman was not only a Conservative, but a very strong imperialist. However, I think he viewed things in a practical way. Now I do not think that situation is fair to Great Britain. If Great Britain became involved in a European war I do not think it would be fair for us at the very last moment to say: We are not going in; we will stay out. Therefore I suggest that the government might take some action along this line and make very sure that Canada would not be forced into such a position.

I come back to this: It seems to me that the minister, if not to-night, then on some occasion in the not distant future, and if not the Minister of National Defence, then the government through the Prime Minister, should state to us definitely just what we are prepared or expected to do in case of emergency. Is this country prepared to send an expeditionary force to the help of the motherland? Is she prepared to go to the assistance of the League of Nations? I think we ought to know that.

Mr. BENNETT: She has said so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, if she has said so I think we ought to have it stated by the government at this time.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in the covenant.

Mr. JACOBS: Canada is a member of the league.

Mr. BENNETT: We cannot be in and out at the same time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A great many people at this time have declared that the league has failed and that Canada need not take her obligations seriously.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, yes. And if that is so I submit that in all fairness we should say so.

Mr. GOLDING: What is your position?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not concerned now with my own position, but I have no hesitation whatever in stating it in a general way. As far as the league is concerned I hope we shall have an opportunity of discussing it, and I say that the league has failed to this extent, in that it has followed up only certain parts of the covenant. Other parts of the covenant it has entirely neglected, and for that reason so far as I am concerned I do not propose simply to rush over to the military defence of the league when we have steadily refused to undertake to carry out our obligations under other clauses of the covenant. I think the whole treaty of Versailles needs to be revised, and the control of the league and even perhaps the formation of the league need to be fundamentally recast before it will assure for us the security and the peace for which it was designed.

In conclusion I say that we have no clear-cut obligations from the military standpoint which I think the large majority of Canadians are prepared to back up. If it comes to the defence of our own shores we alone are not in a position to hold off any and all comers. On the other hand, as I said at the beginning, I think we are secure in our position on this continent; my conviction is that we are a great deal safer without an army than with an army. That may be called a paradoxical statement; I do not think it is. Believing that from the bottom of my heart, I feel it my duty to put forward that point of view to-night. I think military defence offers no guarantee of security to this country. I am as anxious for peace as anyone. I hope no one will rise in his place and say that I am merely a wild idealist or that I am a coward because I oppose military expenditure. War is an obsolete method of securing peace and the sooner we begin to devise a better method and to carry our plans through at whatever cost may be involved, the better it will be for this country and for the world at large.

Mr. MacNEIL: I may be risking the displeasure of the committee in prolonging the discussion, but I see no reason why we should not scrutinize the enormous expenditures of the Department of National Defence with the same care and exactitude as we examine comparable amounts voted for social service. The minister and other hon. members have accused me of inconsistency. I stated my reasons very clearly for moving a reduction of the vote for the non-permanent militia. I was not criticizing the personnel, or at the moment the necessity of some measure of national defence. I stated that I was protesting against wasteful and misdirected expenditure. I reiterate what I said before, that if we are paying for national defence we have a right to expect efficient national defence. Sir John French visited Canada and inspected the Canadian militia and he said something that has the same force to-day as when he uttered it in 1910. He said:

> A sound system of organization is the cornerstone of all military efficiency.
> Unless this is based on a correct appreciation of the characteristics of the country and the requirements of modern war—

I emphasize that phrase.

> —waste of strength and resources will certainly result, and the people of the dominion will not get the best value for their money.

That is my point, practically the only point I made in this discussion, and one with which I am sure eminent men in military circles are bound to agree. But as my information has been challenged and it has been indicated that it is not generally accepted, I submit to this committee some evidence from gentlemen who have made a careful study of the question. I refer to an article appearing in Maclean's magazine of May 15, entitled "Our Bow-and-Arrow Army" written by Lieutenant Colonel George A. Drew, well known to many hon members of this house. Colonel Drew says in part:

> But in whatever light this expenditure be regarded, every Canadian is directly concerned with the results obtained, from the standpoint of national defence on the one hand and of national economy on the other.

For some reason that is not easy to understand, succeeding ministers of national defence have shown a marked disinclination to take the public fully into their confidence in regard to the organization and efficiency of our national defence forces.

Again he says:

It is time for the Canadian public to awake to the fact that the Canadian defence forces are inefficiently organized, are badly equipped, and have very little opportunity for carrying out training that would fit them for modern conditions of warfare.

That is his statement and it confirms the judgment I expressed previously, that under our military organization the men get very little opportunity for that training. My remarks were opened with a plea that the opportunities which occur in civil aviation should be more fully developed by the department, but I feel that they are cramped at the present time by the appropriations made for the military branch.

I would refer to an article appearing in the current issue of Cavalcade by Mr. Thomas Wayling, himself an ex-service man, under the heading, "We are too fat to fight," and the subheading, "In the great war, fifty-three regiments; in hard times 263 regiments," and I advance this to show that I am on sound ground in questioning the manner in which this expenditure is made because Mr. Wayling brings forward conclusively the argument that for less money we might have greater efficiency in national defence and make good in some degree the deficiency which, I feel, exists to a marked extent in our social services, which are starved to provide for the wasteful expenditure in this regard. Mr. Wayling says in part:

By the present disposition of the forces the Canadian army is too fat to fight—is hampered by an ill-fitting uniform.

Look at the fighting record of the great war, when about the middle of hostilities the dominion had 4,452 officers and 104,251 other ranks in France; a compact fighting machine.

To-day Canada has 5,531 officers and 37,153 other ranks. The permanent force numbers 411 officers and 3,098 other ranks, the rest are non-permanent active militia.

In France, in the midst of the most desperate struggle, one officer to every twenty-four men. To-day one officer to every seven men.

Too many officers, not enough men.

The reason: the bulky, obsolete, militia system. Canada is too fat to fight; her military defence forces are scattered in innumerable units, the multitude of which is the army's chief weakness.

And chief source of wasteful expense.

The headquarters staff costs over $96,000 a year in pay and allowances. And there are eleven district headquarters. In pay and allowances these headquarters staffs, chiefly officers, cost $227,226 in 1933-34. They spent $10,892 on travelling expenses. Then we put on cadet services that cost us $142,000 annually. The non-permanent active militia salaries at Ottawa totalled $25,339, the allowances to the active militia, $109,036, the annual drill cost, $1,181,468, the grants to associations, $93,183, the maintenance of military properties, $219,879, and salaries and wages, $340,926.

Canada had three divisions in the line and one in reserve in France with a reserve division in England. The Canadian corps included corps headquarters, four infantry divisions, and corps troops. Four infantry divisions means forty-eight battalions.

Then he gives a table of comparisons, then and now, as follows:

Then and now:

	1918	1936
Infantry units	48	126
Cavalry	2	36
Artillery	3	101

The multiplicity of units is the adipose tissue on Canada's fighting forces. The units shown in 1918 were actual fighting units up to strength; the present units are skeleton.

Military commentators declare the war was won by subaltern and other ranks. These were numerically strongest in the war days. The subalterns who were the back-bone of the Canadian corps are now in the minority and the men are few.

We have major-generals, brigadiers and colonels and other senior ranks far in excess of the establishment based on rank and file.

Every separate military unit means a headquarters and senior officers—

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask the hon. gentleman: Does he regard Mr. Wayling as an authority upon anything?

Mr. MacNEIL: On the facts.

Mr. BENNETT: Not even the facts.

Mr. MacNEIL: They may be confirmed by reference to the auditor general's report.

Mr. BENNETT: Those are the figures of expenditure only in the auditor general's report.

Mr. MacNEIL: Mr. Wayling's opinion, I submit, should be given weight, and his opinion as expressed in this article is upheld by many of those with military experience in Canada. He says:

Why should not Canada's military forces be stripped of all this surplus fat?

Given efficient cooperation and a sane, sensible policy they would build up out of the plethora of nondescript material, a small but workable service, creating one unified cohesive unit where half a dozen scratch battalions now exist.

Reorganization cannot long be delayed. There is too much overhead, too much waste. Parliament has time after time cut the military estimates but national defence has not cut its coat according to the diminishing pattern; rather has it snipped chunks off the larger pattern.

The military forces can be reorganized and the old traditions still retained.

I submit that there is conclusive evidence which may be gathered to show that this vast expenditure of public moneys could be directed into more useful channels for purposes of defence and training.

I conclude my remarks with a further reference to an accusation levelled at me by the minister, suggesting that I failed in admiration and appreciation of the voluntary services rendered by the militia. Some reference was made to hollow-chested youths, to some extent, in the militia. I suggest to the minister that if he has this reverence and admiration for these young men which he professes, the department should recognize some responsibility for their nourishment, housing and physical stamina, so that they may be more effectively utilized for purposes of national defence and the general development of the nation.

Mr. BENNETT: Although the hour is late there are some statements made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. MacNeil) that should not be permitted to remain on Hansard without at least some attention being paid to them. I can quite understand that the minister, having been held up by Mr. Wayling as a model of St. George about to engage in mortal combat with the dragon, might hesitate to controvert the declarations of Mr. Wayling, but I am sure that no member of this committee has a clearer appreciation of the unsoundness of the statement that has just been read than the member who has just taken his seat. To compare war conditions with militia conditions in Canada is an insult on the part of Mr. Wayling to the intelligence of the Canadian people. Just think for a moment what the position is. Why did the militia come into being? If one goes back to the days of Sir George Cartier, he will find the story of it. The Militia Act in essence was to extend to every part of Canada the opportunity for those who so desired to train and constitute a part of the active militia of the country, and that is the reason that it is scattered over every part of Canada.

Mr. Wayling suggests that in the war the regiments were at strength. Of course they were. That is the job of recruiting, the job ultimately of conscription, to maintain the units at strength. The reason the militia units are not at strength is obvious, and it may not be unattributable to just such discussions as have taken place in the house during the last few days, and to attacks such as that made by Mr. Wayling.

I put it to any member of this committee: What would you think if you were asked to compare the regiments of the Canadian army in France and England with the skeleton units that are scattered all over Canada, and then were asked to say that because there is only a skeleton unit of the militia forces in this country at the present time, therefore there is too much fat in it, the militia, and it should be cleaned out and cut down to the number at full strength that existed during the war. No one but Mr. Wayling would possibly have made an argument such as that. A columnist who is paid by the column always does that because it has to be padded up with a semblance of fact, a semblance of a semblance of fact. It is made to appeal to every possible kind of prejudice and passion in those who take a certain view with respect to a matter of this kind.

Our militia goes back to the days of Cartier. I believe he piloted the first Militia Act through this house. One section of that act has never been changed since the time it was put upon the statute books; that is the section with respect to the necessity of consultation by parliament before there could be any possible chance of Canada engaging in hostilities outside the defence of our own country. Why is it that we have a unit in Nova Scotia, another in New Brunswick and others in the different military districts throughout the country? Why have we one in Quebec? Why is it that on Sundays we get over the radio the music of the band under Captain Gagnon? Why is it that we have these military districts across Canada? Why is the minister, according to the daily press, establishing a new one here in Ottawa? This is done in order that in every section of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific there should exist the nucleus of some militia unit. It might be engineers; it might be artillery; it might be a machine gun corps; it might be a medical corps, it might be infantry or cavalry; they are all nuclei of units being maintained in the different sections.

Anyone who is familiar with the story of the enlistments in this country knows that the back-bone of all our efforts in 1914 was the militia. My hon. friend is so well informed that I would hesitate to express an opinion which would contravene his, but certainly the relations that existed between the efforts made under Lord Haldane to organize the territorials in England, which were so very successful, and the efforts made in this country were not wholly dissimilar. Certainly General Gwatkin, then Colonel Gwatkin, did an unostentatious service to this country. He remained in his office under protest when he desired to join his unit and go to France and Flanders. His work was of the first character and I can only say that when Mr. Wayling endeavours to compare non-comparable things he does a disservice to this country.

I would not have dealt with this article of his had not a reputable member of this house given it a certain measure of responsibility by quoting from it as though it were entitled to some authority. As a matter of fact the figures are taken from the auditor general's report. There is no doubt that these expenditures were made. I repeat again that the reason we have militia units scattered across Canada at Calgary, Regina, Edmonton, Vancouver and throughout Ontario, Nova Scotia, Quebec and New Brunswick is to provide the nucleus of an organization which will accommodate the wishes and desires of those who are anxious to take up training, to take the oath and enlist under the colours. It is for this reason that we have a unit in Hull, as well as others here in Ottawa. No one suggests that these units are to be kept at strength. It is true that in some cities they are maintained at strength because they provide a congenial means for young men to get together to have gymnastics and other forms of training, but in a broad and general way if a unit is one-third strength, that is all that is expected. The minister probably knows what the average is, but I think in a general way it will be around thirty-three and a third to forty per cent. I repeat that such a unit provides the nucleus around which clusters the voluntary effort of our Canadian youth who desire to subscribe to the oath and offer themselves if needs be for the defence of their country.

I refer to this article because it is unfair to our fellow-Canadians who are offering themselves for the defence of their country. I repeat that the whole policy of the territorials in Great Britain and our militia here is to maintain in every section of the country, even in the remotest, some skeleton organization that will permit of men enlisting for voluntary service. When that is understood is it not almost ungrateful of my hon. friend to give this article a degree of approval or approbation, an article that compares this condition with war conditions in France or Flanders? The mere statement is its own refutation. I take up the time of the committee because I think it is unfair that those who read this magazine—it has a circulation of 250,000 notwithstanding the great hardships it has endured and survived during the last five years—should have a misunderstanding of the real facts. A comparison of that kind is insulting to every person who understands facts.

There is one question which the minister has not cleared up to-night and in connection with which I should like to make some brief observations. This is with respect to the relations between our country and the other units of the British empire. In 1926 agreements were arrived at for the purpose, not of massing troops, but to make available to the different countries of the British empire information as to the best means of training or as to the type of armament that might be available or the best forms of mechanized effort that could be used. Communication of the information that came to the staff in Great Britain through their efforts was made to the staff in Canada, to the staff in Australia, to the small staff in New Zealand and to the staff in South Africa, so that in every part of this far-flung empire there might be the fullest possible information as to the latest development in the means of defence, in mechanized armament and in the use of the human element in the maintenance of the defences of the country. I understand that this has been going on steadily.

I happen to know, and those who are familiar with the literature of the day will recall, that the efforts made by Lord Haldane to develop a staff, based as he frankly said upon the German example, led to his being able, when he went back to the war office—this will be found in his autobiography and I daresay many hon. gentlemen have heard him say it himself—at the instance of Mr. Asquith, to call the appropriate official and ask him if any change had been made since he had last been there. When he found that no change had been made he was able to dispatch telegrams which brought about within a few hours the mobilization of what was known as the first expeditionary force, sometimes referred to as the Old Contemptibles.

My understanding is that that policy is maintained in this country so far as staff work is concerned. All information as to the use of mechanized armament together with the use of the human element is available to Canada in the fullest possible sense. There has been an exchange of views between the general staffs as to whether or not these matters could not be more publicly discussed, but the view of the general staff in Great Britain, as communicated to the staffs of the various overseas dominions, was that these were naturally confidential, and were communicated only for their guidance and assistance in matters of this kind.

The minister is carrying on the difficult work of endeavouring to modernize to the fullest possible extent, with a limited income, the defence forces of Canada. The late government was not possessed of sufficient money to enable it to do what it would have liked to do in that regard, and we said that financial conditions made this impossible. I am glad the minister has found it possible to expand his efforts. Just as they have forces in Norway and Sweden and even Denmark, and just as they have forces in Holland and in every country in the world, so there must be in this country the maintenance of some kind of force. I passed over to the minister a moment ago a volume just published by one of the leading pacifists in the English speaking world —using that word in the broad sense—the present Lord Davies, who in every part of the empire is known for his attitude on the question of peace. He points out that in the very nature of things force must be the concomitant of peace if you are to preserve peace, whether that force be a police force or force in any other form.

The minister referred to what I said last evening. I was pointing out that by universal consent, the result of study from the earliest dawn of history until the present day, there must be a combination of two factors to secure the life of a nation. One is the power to maintain itself, to enact laws and to enforce their administration; the other is, of course, liberty. There is no conflict between the two; rather, they are interdependent, one upon the other. So far as this item is concerned, it contemplates only one thing, namely, the maintenance at as high a degree of efficiency as possible of a voluntary force, together with a limited number of permanent militia. The purpose of this—I repeat it—is to ensure our being in a position if needs be to have at our hand such equipment as would enable us adequately to defend our country and its institutions; whether the attack against them comes from without or from within, the law contemplates that force being available for either end. There need be no doubt about that; and because that is so I could not do anything other than avail myself of this opportunity to controvert the statements made in the article to which reference has been made, which I saw reproduced some years ago in other terms and now stated again by Mr. Wayling. I mention his name because it has been brought in and utilized by one of our members as authority for a statement to which, it is suggested, some attention should be paid. I do not think there is a member of this committee who, having heard it, does not realize how unfair it is to every man associated with the militia of the country to institute a comparison between a voluntary organization in peace time and the highly efficient, highly trained and full strength units that were maintained during the war.

Mr. MacNEIL: The leader of the opposition has suggested that I have quoted a statement containing facts which possibly do not coincide with my personal views. I may assure him that I am attempting to express the opinion of a very large body of men of military experience who are sincerely interested in the development of our defence equipment and who have not a very high opinion of its present status and efficiency. There may be differences of opinion. I have no doubt the leader of the opposition, when Prime Minister, carefully scrutinized the expenditures of this department and endeavoured to assure himself as far as possible of the efficiency of the force. I am not questioning that in the least. But in the very nature of the circumstances, it was necessary for him to base his opinion upon reports of the general staff, and I would suggest that when he has an opportunity he should examine the force from the other angle, accompanied by some impartial military expert, to see to what extent it is efficient to meet the requirements of the situation to-day.

Now, in all fairness to Mr. Wayling, whose article has been brought under question, and which I quoted only in part, which was hardly fair to him, I should point out that in one paragraph he says:

> Why not eighty or eighty-five good, up-to-strength infantry regiments instead of one hundred and twenty-six struggling units?

Mr. BENNETT: Where would they be?

Mr. MacNEIL: In Canada.

> Take the famous old units and give them a real chance, absorbing the newer units and sharing the old traditions.

The point I am endeavouring to advance is that when I speak of the overhead and the bloated condition of the force at the present time, and point to the fact that there are too many senior officers in ratio to subalterns and men in the ranks, I am trying to show that the expenditure of this money, much of which is devoted to pay and allowances of senior officers, is not providing for the actual training of the men concerned in the degree that is claimed by the staff of the Department of National Defence. That is the whole point, and again I say that they are neglecting the technical training which is a vital requirement under the conditions of modern warfare.

Mr. BENNETT: I wish to correct a misapprehension on the part of the hon. member for Vancouver North. I was not reflecting for a moment on his sincerity, but I did say that no one knew better than he, because he has risked his life on more than one battlefield, that it would be unfair to compare units engaged in hostilities in France and Flanders or in training in England with the skeleton units scattered throughout this country. I was not questioning his sincerity, because, knowing his reputation and history, one would not do that in any event. But when Mr. Wayling talks about eighty-five battalions, how would you get them together? The travelling expenses involved in taking them from one section to another would make this impossible. No one would think of organizing eighty-five battalions as a voluntary militia force. I should like the hon. member for Vancouver North to appreciate the principle of the whole act, namely, that there should be in this dominion a skeleton round which could be built to full strength the unification that might be necessitated. To compare the number of officers and men in war time with the number of men in the militia, remembering that every one of the men received pay and allowances during the war, and that these are volunteers who are receiving nothing, not even the whole of their uniforms—well, one sees that there is a real distinction between the two. I agree with what the hon. member has said as to the care with which these items have been scrutinized by successive governments, and every prime minister has always been fearful about these expenditures. But if you rely upon men of known knowledge and check up that information with what is done in other countries, you cannot be very far wrong in endeavouring to maintain the principle that though there cannot be centralized and consolidated units, in every part opportunity should be given for voluntary effort finding expression through the militia of the country.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wish to say a word, prompted by a remark which has been made by the leader of the opposition, and which from time to time has been made by various speakers throughout the country. It is this, that our military forces are required to defend our institutions under the state from attack from without or from within.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the law is, I said.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say that, in emphasizing that particular feature of militia estimates, a great deal of colour is given to the propaganda which we hear from time to time that the economic and social changes which are coming will never be made in a constitutional manner and through our democratic institutions, but will be made through resort to force. I am opposed to the use of force to achieve an objective. I believe that in Canada, in common with other British countries, we maintain a civil police force for the maintenance of law and order. I also believe that one of the reasons why Great Britain has been spared in these recent years the turmoil which has occurred in some other European countries is because the British people have always taken that particular attitude.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the general strike?

Mr. COLDWELL: It is true that during the general strike in 1926 there was a military demonstration.

Mr. BENNETT: And naval.

Mr. COLDWELL: And a naval demonstration. But may I add this: the good sense of the British people at that time overcame the dangers of that demonstration. For example, in the town of Plymouth, not far from where I was born, the soldiers and the sailors who were paraded arranged a football match, I believe, with those who were engaged in the general strike. I do not think that in any other country in the world that kind of thing could have happened. But in Britain, from time immemorial, people have believed that military forces were not to be used to suppress their fellow citizens who had legitimate grievances. If the excuse for military preparations is the preservation of our institutions, of course that is a different matter. But, as one who is fundamentally opposed to the use of force, particularly in connection with the making of necessary social and economic changes, I wish to point out to the committee that a great deal of colour is lent, by statements such as those to which I have referred, to the propaganda of those who believe, quite conscientiously, that force will ultimately be involved. I believe that if we want to maintain law and order we should rely upon a purely civil police force and not attribute that as a duty of the militia or of the military branch of the services.

One other thing. I desire to support my hon. friend from Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) in regard to the dissatisfaction which he says exists among a good many men connected with the militia, and to make this contrast. I have before me the figures expended in relief during six years of depression, amounting to about $162,000,000 prior to May a year ago, and I also have before me a statement of the amount spent on militia and defence from 1929 to 1936, amounting to $122,000,000. What do I find? That practically for every four dollars spent to relieve distress, some three dollars were spent in military preparedness. These are astounding figures. Though, as is sometimes said, Canada faces a grave situation on account of expenditures on behalf of the unemployed and to relieve distress, we make military expenditures involving sums of money almost as large, even in these years of depression, as we make to relieve distress. I am in agreement with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that Canada's best defence at the present time is its defencelessness. I am not going to develop that thought, but in my opinion a country the size of Canada, with its diverse peoples and small population, is best defended if we rely upon our weakness physically and our goodwill as a good world neighbour, rather than attempt to ape the military powers of the European countries.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 77, to amend the Excise Act, 1934.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the tariff act through?

Mr. DUNNING: It is through.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 61, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into Committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Application to companies incorporated after 4th May, 1910.

Mr. DUNNING: The only amendment is the inclusion of the words "except as hereinafter otherwise provided" in both subsections.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Retroactive subsection.

Mr. BENNETT: I have some little doubt about this part of the bill. It is an exceptional exercise of power, as I pointed out the other day, to have parliament declare that a certain act has been in force since 1910. I can understand difficulties in connection with a particular session, that the date should relate back to the opening of the session or something like that, but I must say that I think this section goes—

Mr. DUNNING: Very far.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and further than I would care to go. If the minister has made up his mind that this is a proper exercise of power I am not going to say anything further about it, but these words seem to go very far:

> Every special act of the parliament of Canada passed after the 4th day of May, 1910, for the incorporation of a company . . . shall be read as if it contained the provisions hereinafter in this section set forth. . . .

That is, in the creation of a company it is said that since that date these provisions have applied. That seems to me to be most unfair. To say that it applies from to-day is simple, but to say that a corporation created in 1911 should have attached to it and to its officers responsibilities which then were non-existent from the standpoint of legislation is going a very long distance. Perhaps the minister might state the necessity for this. The note of explanation is not quite clear.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not really complete.

Mr. BENNETT: It is good as far as it goes, but I should like to know just what pressing necessity brings about a request that parliament should exercise a power so extraordinary. It is going back twenty-six years.

Mr. DUNNING: I must say that I had the same view when I first read this section; I held my breath and wondered at our learned brethren in another place proposing such a thing, but the explanation helps to some extent, in that the retroactive amendment in respect of companies incorporated since 1910 makes effective the provisions intended to be incorporated by references in the special acts of incorporation. All such companies have been incorporated under a model form of bill varied, however, in many cases to suit special circumstances affecting the company. The section of the act providing for the model bill did not contemplate an variations therefrom, and in the opinion of the parliamentary counsel of the senate the variations introduced in some special acts may have the effect of depriving the companies of the benefit of certain provisions of the act essential for the organization of the companies. The essential portion of the amendment is the insertion in section 5 of the act of the words, referring to the model bill, or in that form varied as such special act shall provide." Far be it from me to quarrel with the opinion of the parliamentary counsel of the senate that this retroactive amendment, so far from being restrictive, really removes doubts as to the powers of companies.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but the other side of the question is the phase in which I was interested, the imposition of responsibilities.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but of course in that connection we must take into account the words "or in that form varied as such special act shall provide."

Mr. BENNETT: In view of what the minister has said I can only repeat that this is a most extraordinary power.

Mr. DUNNING: It is.

Mr. BENNETT: The argument the minister has presented to the committee is perfectly sound. That is, if a company was compelled to be incorporated in accordance with the model bill, and was incorporated not in accordance with the terms of the model bill, it might well be, having regard to the language used, that if that company attempted to exercise powers other than those contained in the model bill there would be some difficulty. But the answer is that parliament is omnipotent, and parliament has seen fit in special cases to clothe companies with powers other than those mentioned in the model bill. It must be taken that parliament is at least fairly sensible in the exercise of its duties, so these words must be read in accordance with what has been said, as a first canon of construction, so as to give common sense to the general terms that were used. I appeal to my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott), who, according to report, is so soon to grace the judiciary; I am sure he will agree with me that parliament must be taken to express consistently a common sense view of the legislation. Here you have an act not strictly in accordance with the model act. Parliament passed that act, presumably with its eyes open.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course the words "or in that form varied as such special act shall provide" would come in there.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: Those are the new added words, and that is said to be retroactive for twenty-six years.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The opinion of the parliamentary counsel of the senate is that they make certain that the special act shall apply.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. I just put this case, and then I will not take up further time. If parliament saw fit to create by special act a company, and the powers conferred upon that company were less or more than those named in the model bill governing such companies, now to go back over a period of twenty-six years and say that the company shall be governed by the provisions of this act hereinafter mentioned is to do a most extraordinary thing. If the minister who is charged under the statute with responsibility for the administration of the insurance act thinks it is desirable, however, I am not going to labour the point at all.

Mr. DUNNING: I asked precisely the questions my right hon. friend has indicated, particularly from the point of view of retroactive legislation. Of course I was especially careful to ask if any institution could be prejudicially affected and the answer given to me was that the insurance companies were represented before the banking and commerce committee of the senate by an eminent counsel, in the person of Hon. N. W. Rowell, I believe, and that this was not questioned there by any of the companies. In fact I was assured that some of them asked for it, although I do not know why.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Annual meeting to be at the head office.

Mr. DUNNING: This is just relating one section to another.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Approval of bylaws by treasury board.

Mr. BENNETT: The approval of bylaws by the treasury board has been in force since the passing of the last insurance act some few years ago.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Although we did this I always doubted the advisability of it.

Mr. DUNNING: The value lies, I think, in a report from the superintendent of insurance, with respect to such bylaws, to the treasury board.

Mr. BENNETT: The point was not that. Ultimately the report of the treasury board goes to the governor in council. Just what point there is in putting the superintendent of insurance in between, I could never quite understand, because it is not like the administration of the treasury in the old country, where the treasury board stands for something entirely different from the one here. I suppose this is merely to connect the two sections.

Mr. DUNNING: That is all.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Lending funds.

Mr. DUNNING: Section 5 is for the purpose of making sure that the limits imposed by section 60 of the act on the investment in common stocks may not be effectively doubled by loans on such stocks, in addition to the amounts permitted to be invested therein.

Mr. BENNETT: That is at the instance of the superintendent of insurance?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Power to invest in stock of other insurance companies.

Mr. DUNNING: Section 6 simply contains the amendment contained in subsection 1 of the next preceding section.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think we should pass this one.

Mr. DUNNING: Section 60 imposes two limitations on investment in common stocks. The first limitation is that common stocks to be eligible for investment must have paid dividends of at least four per cent per annum or $4 per share per annum for seven years next preceding the date of investment, and that the investment in the stocks of any corporation shall not exceed thirty per cent of the total stocks issued. The limitations in this subsection have been in force since 1910.

The second limitation is contained in subsection 6 of section 60, and limits the percentage of the assets of any company which may be invested in common stocks to fifteen per cent. This limitation was first proposed in 1932.

Mr. BENNETT: We did it because of a specific case.

Mr. DUNNING: In the amendment of 1927 the limitation contained in subsection 1 of section 60 was overridden by an amendment to section 61 of the act to permit companies other than life insurance companies to invest a certain portion of their funds in the common stocks of other insurance companies, even if those stocks did not comply, as to dividends or as to the percentage of the total stocks invested in, with subsection 1 of section 60. The limitation now contained in section 6 of subsection 60 had not then been enacted, and therefore section 61 overrode all of section 60.

With the introduction in 1932 of the limitation now contained in subsection 6 of section 60, section 61 should have been amended to make it clear that subsection 6 was not also overridden by the amendment of 1927 to section 61. This, however, was not done, and the amendment now made by section 6 of the bill is to make it clear that section 61 overrides only subsection 1 of section 60 and not subsection 6 of section 60 as well.

Mr. BENNETT: Putting it shortly, the minister might have said that it simply provides that "notwithstanding anything herein contained an insurance company other than a life insurance company can buy shares in any other insurance company regardless of whether they have been paying dividends continuously or not."

Mr. DUNNING: Other than a life company.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, this does not touch a life company. If it did I would have no doubt that my duty is to oppose it. Having regard to the constant complaints that are being made about the centralization of power in the hands of a few, which often are wholly unsound, this does lend itself to support that argument, because it enables a fire insurance company or any other form of insurance company other than a life insurance company to acquire shares in any other kind of insurance company, life insurance or otherwise, notwithstanding the fact that it may not have paid dividends during the prescribed time.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend appreciates that there is no intention of changing what has been the law.

Mr. BENNETT: But as a matter of fact, as the law stands now, they cannot do it.

Mr. DUNNING: Is it not rather a matter of doubt?

Mr. BENNETT: I would hardly put it in that way. I think parliament intended, judging from its temper at the time it passed the law, that they should not do it. I do not say that with any certainty. In 1932 I personally had to do with the matter; in 1934 the then Minister of Finance was dealing with it.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite willing to leave the bill in committee on that.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the last clause?

Mr. DUNNING: No; there are several more, but we have passed the controversial ones. I do not want to press something which should be given further consideration. Perhaps it would be well for me to confer further with the superintendent of insurance on that matter, although I am fairly clear what his object is.

Mr. BENNETT: I put this to the minister: A large and powerful fire insurance company knows that a life insurance company has not been paying dividends during the last few years, and that it has really been in some difficulty having regard to the great decrease in values of common stocks, so it conceives the happy plan of acquiring control of that enterprise. Under this section it could do so.

Mr. DUNNING: That is, a fire insurance company could.

Mr. BENNETT: A fire insurance company could acquire control of a life insurance company. As the law stands to-day, it could not do so. When this bill passes it would be possible for it to do so.

Mr. DUNNING: That was not my impression, but I should like to consult the legal authorities.

Mr. BENNETT: Mark you, a life insurance company could not do it, but a fire insurance company could acquire the shares of a life insurance company.

Mr. DUNNING: We might rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again on this bill.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Mr. VIEN presented the first report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT, 1934

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 78, to amend The Dominion Elections Act, 1934.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to provide for the taking of votes at dominion by-elections. It follows a bill passed previously at this session which postponed the annual revision of the list, and is to meet the representations of certain members of parliament that we were not providing for by-elections. I may add that the bill is in conformity with the recommendations of the special committee of the house. It is to be accompanied by a companion bill amending the Dominion Franchise Act, which must be preceded by a resolution, which resolution also appears on the order paper.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT, 1934

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Dominion Franchise Act, 1934, with respect to by-elections and to make provision for the appointment of enumerators and other necessary officers and for the preparation and printing of voters' lists and other necessary documents.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Judges Act to provide salaries for the Ontario appeal and high court judges as presently constituted; and further provide that when a vacancy occurs in the office of chief justice in appeal the office shall be abolished and the court shall thereafter consist of a chief justice and seven other judges.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932

The house resumed from Thursday, May 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 61, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 6—Power to invest in stocks of other insurance companies.

Mr. DUNNING: When the house rose last night we were discussing section 6 of this bill and I undertook to have the section further reviewed in order to make sure of its true effect. I have done so and am now able to advise the committee that under the section as it at present stands in the law a fire insurance company, having invested more than 15 per cent of its assets in common stocks, could under section 61 as it now stands invest further amounts in the common shares of another insurance company, even if those shares did not comply as to dividends with subsection 1 of section 60. This, it is believed, was not the original intention and even if it was it should be changed. The amendment will make it clear that the concession made by section 61 will not apply to any company which has already invested more than 15 per cent of its assets in common stocks. I think that answers the question raised by the leader of the opposition last evening in connection with this section.

Mr. BENNETT: I would hardly agree with the construction placed on the section as it stands, but that is unimportant; I cannot think that that is the meaning of it as it now stands. But why is subsection 2 added, "certain investments excepted"? It will be observed that this is a new section entirely and it provides that investments made after 1927 and before the first day of January of this year, under the provisions of so and so, shall not be deemed to be investments in common stocks within the meaning of subsections 6 and 7 of section 60. That brings it down to the first of this year and to all intents and purposes renders nugatory the provisions of the law in respect of common stocks since 1927 up to date.

Mr. DUNNING: The intention of subsection 2 is to avoid any interference with investments which have been made under the provisions of the act after 1927 down to date. I am advised they are very small, but in the absence of subsection 2 there would be very grave question as to how the companies would stand in relation to them.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—No power to form other companies.

Mr. DUNNING: This is purely a clerical correction.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Exemptions.

Mr. DUNNING: The same remark applies to this section.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Majority to reside in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: This applies to fraternal societies the same provisions that now apply to life insurance companies.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Valuation balance sheet to be sent to policyholders.

Mr. DUNNING: There are two changes, one clerical and one striking out the words "in Canada," so that policyholders outside Canada will receive information in the same manner as those within the country.

Mr. BENNETT: We call them policies and policyholders. In some instances fraternal organizations do not speak of policies but refer to them as certificates of membership. The section provides that every fraternal benefit society registered under this act shall, not later than the first day of June in each year, mail to each policyholder, and so on. Would "policyholder" in the definition be broad enough to cover a certificate holder in a fraternal society? My hon. friend might look at that to make sure. I think the definition is broad enough.

Mr. DUNNING: A policyholder means the legal holder for the time being of a policy in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not good enough. What is "policy"?

Mr. DUNNING: "Policy" means any written contract of insurance, whether contained in one or more documents, and in the case of insurance in a fraternal benefit society any contract of insurance, whether evidenced by a written document or not, and any certificate of membership relating in any way to insurance, including any annuity.

Mr. BENNETT: That is good enough.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Assets, minimum amount of.

Mr. DUNNING: The change is clerical.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—To retain assets in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: This is clerical.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—"Surplus" defined.

Mr. DUNNING: This is entirely clerical.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Companies other than life.

Mr. DUNNING: Entirely clerical.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Report to treasury board.

Mr. DUNNING: Change in one number only.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Penalty for transacting insurance without registration.

Mr. DUNNING: This section is for the purpose of bringing within the penalty section of the act dominion companies, incorporated for purposes other than the transaction of insurance business, which nevertheless do transact that business. The act heretofore has applied only to companies incorporated for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance, and it was never contemplated that any company not incorporated for that purpose, still less any company prohibited by its letters patent from transacting that business, would ever engage in it. Cases have arisen, however, where this has been done, and it is considered advisable to make such companies subject to the same penalty as now applies to a registered company which violates any provision of the act.

Mr. BENNETT: That would not extend, I take it, to commercial corporations that provide benefits for their employees who make contributions to it, supplemented by a contribution from the company. Sometimes they are in the habit of referring to the employees as being insured in the company. Of course a joint stock company cannot lawfully carry on insurance, and if a change were made against them under the provisions of this section with a view of imposing a penalty, they would at once plead that the Joint Stock Companies Act provided that they should not have those powers conferred upon them, and this section would be wholly illusory as far as the imposition of any penalty is concerned. You can put in the provision if you wish. It cannot have any effect.

Mr. DUNNING: I think my right hon. friend will remember some cases during the last two or three years where in the absence of penalty provisions they just simply go on and do it anyway.

Mr. BENNETT: But they cannot write insurance.

Mr. DUNNING: They do it.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but it is ultra vires.

Mr. DUNNING: The question is, what to do to them about it.

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is, cancel their charters under the Joint Stock Companies Act.

Mr. DUNNING: This action we are proposing to take to-day will make penalties available for that offence.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the law as it stands, the directors would be liable if they are doing business that is ultra vires.

Mr. DUNNING: The former Secretary of State is not in the house. I have here a letter from him to the former Minister of Finance in which he makes that very point, that no penalty accrues in such a case.

Mr. BENNETT: I know there is no penalty.

Mr. DUNNING: And he suggests in the letter that the proper method of dealing with it would be to create penalties under the insurance act which would apply in such cases. In fact, the whole situation arises out of one particular case—

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: —in western Canada, of which we found duplicates elsewhere, but not on so large a scale. The matter has been under consideration by the department of the Secretary of State from the standpoint of company incorporation and liability of directors, and by the Department of Insurance. The Department of Justice has also gone into the matter. I could read the letter, but I think I have fairly summarized it.

Mr. BENNETT: I think I know in a general way what it is. Perhaps I have not made my point clear. Obviously a company incorporated under the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies Act of Canada could not transact the business of life insurance; that is a prohibited business under the statute. Therefore, if a charge were brought against such a company alleging that it had been transacting life insurance business, the plea would be that it had no such power under its charter. That would be clear. That is the point, I think, that has not been made plain. Here is a recognition of a legal right which they do not possess. That is my point. Look at the section:

> Any company, or any other corporation incorporated under the laws of the Dominion of Canada or of the late province of Canada, or any fraternal society so incorporated, which, or any person who, acting on behalf of a company or such a corporation or society, transacts any class of insurance business in respect of which the company or such corporation or society is not registered under this act ...

That is a recognition of its right to do the business, which obviously it has not. It is under the statute a prohibited class of business, yet, being prohibited, we now recognize it for the purpose of punishing it. With all deference I say to the minister that that is a perfectly clear position. Now that the minister has brought it to my attention I do recall something of the matter to which he refers. But I never recognized for a moment the right of that company to carry on an insurance business.

Mr. DUNNING: We do not admit that we are doing so.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, but this says so. You say that any company which does this particular business is going to be punished. You cannot approbate and reprobate at the same time. My contention is that that is a prohibited business for a joint stock company. Being prohibited, obviously we cannot say: If you do the prohibited thing we are going to fine you under the insurance act. If the company goes beyond its charter it runs the risk of losing its charter, because what it does is ultra vires; the directors who transact the business are personally liable, and those who purport to receive the alleged benefits under it in fact receive none, because the business is not within the scope of the corporation. I do not think the section is happily drawn. It should be changed to read that any company "purporting" to transact the business, and so on, and refer it back to the provisions of the statute which makes it prohibited business. There is a general clause in the insurance act providing penalties for doing that which is prohibited by the act.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, this is prohibited by the act. The insurance act prohibits this class of company from doing that business. All joint stock companies are so prohibited. I think we should say "purporting to transact insurance business," rather than recognize that they are doing it. That, I think, is the usual custom in drafting legislation of this kind. In other words they are holding themselves out as entitled to do something which they have no legal right to do.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite so.

Mr. BENNETT: We are agreed as to that. But under the law as it stands there is a prohibition against their doing this thing under their charter. Therefore, it strikes me, all we have to do is to insert "purporting" to carry on business which they are not authorized to do; and we are going to punish them in this way rather than the other. That is all.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course my right hon. friend understands that they are not a company within the definition of this act.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly I do.

Mr. DUNNING: A corporation, within the definition of this act, means any corporation incorporated for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance.

Mr. BENNETT: That is my whole point.

Mr. DUNNING: The point is a legal one, and, again speaking with deference as a layman, when I get a report which has run the gauntlet of the department of the Secretary of State and the lawyers who have to do with company law, who suggest that with regard to this practice it is far better to amend the insurance act than to amend the companies act; when, having got that, the superintendent of insurance takes the matter up with the Department of Justice, and all the lawyers who have anything to do with it there suggest this course, what is a poor lay minister of finance to do?

Mr. BENNETT: Do what his advisers tell him.

Mr. DUNNING: He can do very little else under the circumstances. The advice is legal advice, advice from the Deputy Minister of Justice:

> In reply to your letter of the 2nd instant, I may say that it does not appear that proceedings could be taken successfully under either the Companies Act or the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, in this case, and it may be somewhat doubtful if the letters patent of the above association could be cancelled if proceedings to that effect were taken.
> In view of the above circumstances, it is suggested that section 111 of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, as enacted by section 32 of chapter 27 of the statutes of 1934, be amended to cover a company which was not incorporated for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance, and if this amendment is approved, then it would be probably advisable to also amend section 142, as enacted by chapter 27 of 1934, and section 58 of the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932, as enacted by section 28 of chapter 36 of the statutes of 1934. If you approve of these amendments, I would suggest that they be included in two new bills, and for this purpose, I herewith enclose drafts of such bills.

Mr. BENNETT: These are not the sections referred to; they do not cover those two paragraphs.

Mr. DUNNING: But they do consist of the drafts sent for the purpose, enclosed with the letter I have just read.

Mr. BENNETT: They are not so numbered.

Mr. DUNNING: The numbers have been changed, of course.

Mr. BENNETT: But section 3, to which the letter referred, is another section. I still think, notwithstanding the opinion of the Department of Justice, that attention has not been directed to the point I am endeavouring to make. In connection with a companies act you will always find a disposition not to amend it along the lines that have been suggested in that communication, for reasons that are fairly obvious. The Department of State has certain obligations in connection with the granting of letters patent and there is always a desire to avoid as far as possible the determination antecedently of questions such as those now raised. I think in any event a writ of scire facias would cancel such letters patent, though I say that with diffidence because I have not looked it up. On the other hand, as far as this is concerned all the minister has to do is look at it. It reads:

> Any company, or any other corporation incorporated under the laws of the Dominion of Canada or of the late province of Canada, or any fraternal society so incorporated, which, or any person who, acting on behalf of a company or such a corporation or society, transacts any class of insurance business in respect of which the company or such corporation or society is not registered—

If you charge them with that before a magistrate they may say, "That is nonsense; we are not doing that at all. We have no power to do it. It is ultra vires of our incorporation, and you cannot punish us for that. That is an imaginary offence."

Mr. DUNNING: Would it not be a matter of fact?

Mr. BENNETT: But the question of fact is this: These people say, "This is not the kind of insurance you are talking about at all. We have no power to do that, and as we have no power to do it there can be no offence because we are not doing anything we have not power to do." The minister would not need to be a lawyer to raise that defence successfully before a magistrate.

Mr. DUNNING: But they advertise; they issue policies.

Mr. BENNETT: But of what?

Mr. DUNNING: Insurance.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister says that—

Mr. DUNNING: There is no doubt about it.

Mr. BENNETT: But the point is not entirely without authority. There are authorities on questions of ultra vires business. I am not going to do other than have the minister make the explanation and say that he is bound by the opinion of those whose duty it is to advise him, but the records of the courts have shown frequently—

Mr. DUNNING: One thing that does astonish me is that this point, if it has any force, escaped the eagle eye of the law officer of the senate. This bill came from the senate, and had a pretty thorough grilling before the senate banking and commerce committee, which includes a great many lawyers, I believe. My right hon. friend will forgive me if I prefer to stay with what I have now in the way of advice, under the circumstances.

Mr. BENNETT: I say the minister is bound to accept that opinion. I also point out to him, however, that ordinarily to pick up this section you would say it was to punish people who tried to carry on the business of insurance when they should not do so. I am only pointing out that if I were acting for the man thus charged I would simply say, "There cannot be any offence, because that is prohibited under our act of incorporation, and we are not doing anything more than we are permitted to do." Under our Companies Act these returns are made every year, and no one is charged with doing business that is ultra vires; but I am not raising the question. It is always well to remember what the minister said the other day, that there is nothing more uncertain than the ultimate determination of litigation. Sometimes it is determined by a point that has been raised without thought as to the effect or seriousness of it. I am not for a moment saying that the point is serious; I am only saying that when I read it I was struck with the thought that it was a situation that was rather anomalous, to charge a man with the commission of an offence when he says, "What I am doing cannot possibly be an offence for it is what I am forbidden to do under the statute, and I have been maintaining my position under the statute." Then you take another statute altogether, not related to the one under which he operates, and say he is carrying on the business of insurance.

Mr. DUNNING: It would be a pretty ingenious defence, at any rate, would it not?

Mr. BENNETT: I would not say that, but since the minister is bound to accept the opinion of his law officers, I have nothing further to say on the point.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Reserve liability for determining assets in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: There is only a clerical change here.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Classes of hazards covered by certificate.

Mr. BENNETT: When this bill was before the house some years ago I suggested, and I do so again, that it is very desirable not to risk the whole machinery of the department on the accuracy of referring to a particular section. It is much easier to say "the provisions of this act" than to name a particular section. Now we have before us sections which have taken up the time of two houses of parliament; which have been printed for the two houses of parliament; which have been repealed and reenacted, and what have we done? We have added three words here and perhaps only two words there. As I said to my colleagues at that time, although the draftsman did not think it desirable to follow my advice, all that it is necessary is to say is "notwithstanding anything contained in this act," and so on. That has been the usual way of drafting these bills. The moment you name a particular section and then amend by striking out a section and renumbering the rest you are up against that condition. I do think it is a waste of very excellent effort to have to check up these matters every session. It imposes too much of a burden upon the department.

Mr. DUNNING: It is likely also to lead to very serious complications in practice.

Mr. BENNETT: That was just what I said a moment ago. The minister will perhaps remember that we were confronted with that situation at one time, as the superintendent of insurance may recall. In the course of an endeavour to number the sections they became confused, and we had a very considerable amount of difficulty. It will be remembered that we were charged with grievous offences because we endeavoured to remedy the situation in a particular way.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—Additional requirements.

Mr. DUNNING: I think I should make an explanation here, because this is new. Section 19 makes it possible for the minister to require from provincial companies registered or to be registered under the dominion act an undertaking that they will comply with that section of the act respecting the division of participating profits between policyholders and shareholders. Up to 1932 provincial companies registered under the dominion act were subject to that provision, but since 1932 they have been exempt from it at least in respect of business written since that date. Should the undertaking now provided for be given and then violated the penalty will be the cancellation of the certificate of registration.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is highly desirable. I do not desire to engage in a discussion of the matter to-day, but the 25 per cent that has to be made available to policyholders in my judgment is entirely too low.

Mr. DUNNING: Ninety per cent, is it not?

Mr. BENNETT: No, I am talking about another matter. Not less than 25 per cent of the profits must be made available for the surplus of the policyholders until such time as that surplus reaches a certain definite point. That was one of the provisions we passed to-day. If my personal views were to prevail I would make it a much larger percentage.

Mr. DUNNING: That is in the case of fire insurance companies?

Mr. BENNETT: I am dealing with the sections we have passed to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not refer to it because it was merely correcting one of the section numbers.

Mr. BENNETT: What it did was to reenact the provision about the twenty-five per cent. The minister will find that:

(2) Subject to the payment of preferential dividends in accordance with subsection four of section ninety-nine of this act, until the surplus of the company shall equal or exceed the said liabilities in respect of all outstanding unmatured policies not reinsured, the company shall at the end of each year appropriate towards the surplus of such company at least twenty-five per centum of the profits of the company for the year last past.

Had I my way I think I would make that percentage larger, but I am quite conscious of the limitation imposed on the utilization of profits, ten per cent only being available for shareholders; that is, the shareholders' profits under the law as it now stands cannot be more than ten per cent of the profits earned. The law also goes further; there is a second branch—twenty-five per cent at least of the earned surplus must be appropriated to the policyholders.

Mr. DUNNING: That applies to fire insurance companies only.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is the complement of the provision with respect to shareholders' profits in life insurance companies. This provision in section 19 I think is not only highly desirable, but absolutely essential if we are to give provincial companies the status they would derive from having a certificate, because it would place other companies at a serious disadvantage if they were to be able to secure the certificate which had involved an attorning to our jurisdiction entirely in the one case and only partially in the other. In fact I thought it was done a year ago but apparently it was not.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): Has this bill any effect on Lloyd's?

Mr. DUNNING: No, they are not under this act at all.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY WATER

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine) moved the second reading of Bill No. 68, respecting the carriage of goods by water.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of this bill is to repeal the present Water-Carriage of Goods Act and replace it by a new statute which follows almost exactly the British carriage of goods by water act. The only differences between this and the British act are in such wording in the latter as is not applicable to Canada.

The British act was the outcome of the Brussels conference of 1922 when twenty-four maritime nations met there for the purpose of drafting a uniform carriage of goods by water act. Following this convention, Great Britain passed an act in 1924, and the United States some two months ago also passed an act which was modelled almost entirely on the British act. Canada was not a party to the Brussels convention, but by correspondence with Great Britain and the United States we have been committed for a year or two to pass legislation making our act uniform with the others.

In addition to the situation as affecting uniformity there are other reasons for passing this bill. The old carriage of goods by water act is rather vague and indefinite and has been the cause of a good deal of litigation, whereas the new act is very clear and definite. and since it has been in force in England the litigation under it has fallen to a minimum.

The necessity for change was made apparent particularly in connection with the decision in the Sarniadoc case, which was carried to the privy council. Since that case was decided shipping interests in Canada have had considerable doubt as to whether it would be possible for them to insure against risks that properly should be insurable. The clause in question is the clause in the old act that makes it a condition that the ship must be seaworthy in every respect.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 3 is the only section about which there has been any trouble.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The present act does not include lumber in the definition of goods, and it has been very difficult for lumber interests, particularly in British Columbia, to obtain marine insurance on lumber shipped to the old country. There was one case in which a ship left British Columbia with a part cargo of lumber and took on additional cargo at Newport News. The lumber was damaged in transit and the American shipper was able to recover the insurance whereas the Canadian shipper was not. This bill corrects that situation and includes lumber in the definition of goods.

The legislation will also relieve the coasting trade by making it possible to avoid making out a bill of lading in all cases. It allows a simpler contract in coastwise shipping. It also relieves the obligation of having to guarantee the weight of bulk cargoes where the weight is determined by a third party.

I think that covers the essential points. Other points will arise in committee, but I may say that we have had representations from almost every unit of the water carriers' interests in Canada and there has been no serious opposition whatever to the bill, although its contents have been known for some time. It seems an obvious piece of legislation and one that is very much required.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Rules relating to bills of lading.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask the minister if any representations have been made by the merchants' exchange or by boards of trade in connection with this bill?

Mr. HOWE: We had a letter from the Vancouver Merchants' Exchange, as I recall, asking for information about it. We sent them a copy of the bill some time ago and have heard nothing further from them, therefore we assume that silence gives consent. Several boards of trade have made representations but I am assured by the officers handling the correspondence that there has been no serious opposition to the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: An intimation was conveyed to me a few days ago that representations were desired from Vancouver, and thinking that this bill would come up soon I advised them to send forward promptly any representations they had to make. I notice that this bill got its first reading on the eighteenth of this month, only ten days ago, and that is rather a short time within which to send the legislation out to British Columbia and get it back, after study, with suitable comments. I want the minister to understand I am not raising objections to the bill, but I do feel that I should like to have had this information on hand before the bill was proceeded with further.

There is one other point. About two or three years ago, maybe longer, there was a dispute between the shippers and the carriers of goods. I recall part of the dispute, and it was based upon what is apparently being dealt with here; that is, the wide allowance of immunity that is extended to carriers of goods, and the difficulty of shippers in securing compensation through the courts. That was applicable not only to the carriage of goods by water act of Canada as it then stood, but also to the shipment of goods to the old country in carriers under the Water Carriage of Goods Act of Great Britain, upon which this new bill is modelled. While I am not desirous of hindering the passage of this legislation or of complaining about it, I should like to have had the opportunity of hearing from the Pacific coast and considering and presenting whatever representations they have to make.

Mr. HOWE: I am advised by my officers that yesterday we received representations from the Vancouver Merchants' Exchange with a strong recommendation that lumber should be included. We were able to advise them that lumber was included and hoped that the bill would satisfy them.

Mr. STEVENS: That I think would probably cover the situation. I certainly do not wish to interfere with the passing of the bill, but I am most anxious that this important section of the export trade should be adequately covered.

On section 3—Contract not to imply seaworthy ship.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister explain this section? Does it mean that there is no obligation upon the carrier to provide a seaworthy boat, and that if the stuff is lost he can say to the shipper, "That is your trouble"? What protection does the shipper have? He has no knowledge of the condition of the ship; he cannot go into that. What is his protection?

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will turn to paragraph 3 on the opposite page of the bill he will find an explanation of the obligation of the ship owner as to responsibility for the ship. If the accident occurs because of the unseaworthiness of the ship the ship owner is liable, but unseaworthiness cannot be pleaded unless the action arise because of that unseaworthiness.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, this is the only section upon which I wish to make a few observations. The minister knows that we in Canada have been very reluctant to pass this statute. It lessens very materially the burden of the ship owner. It represents the high point of the influence of shipping in Great Britain. The Brussels conference was the triumph of the great shipping interests over, shall I say, the agitation that commenced in the days of Plimsoll and was maintained with varying degrees of success until this final action was taken. Far be it from me to say it is absolutely unfair because that would not be the proper way in which to describe it. But in two or three particulars it very greatly changes our conception of responsibility on the part of the ship owner.

The minister will recall the circumstances that led to the enactment of the drastic legislation in connection with the seaworthiness of ships, ships in the fall of the year overladen, laden far beyond their proper depth, and going out to sea heavily insured, which finally culminated in that historic scene in the House of Commons when Mr. Plimsoll completely lost his head and was escorted out of the chamber in a desperate physical condition. But the result of the breakdown of Mr. Plimsoll was that Plimsoll's mark appears on every ship that leaves a British port. That of course has only to do with the depth to which the ship is loaded, and with conditions under which the seamen are provided with food and other necessities while on the articles of the vessel.

Section 3 of this bill says:

There shall not be implied in any contract for the carriage of goods by water to which the rules apply any absolute undertaking by the carrier of the goods to provide a seaworthy ship.

The law as it developed was that in all contracts for carriage there was an implied condition, and that implied condition was the basis upon which, on the one hand, the owners of the cargo relied for assurance of the ship being in a condition of seaworthiness to carry the cargo, and, on the other hand, the crews relied upon it, feeling that there was no risk of life involved so far as the seaworthiness of the vessel was concerned.

The minister has not forgotten the terrible disaster which happened off the United States coast to a southbound British ship or the serious loss of life involved in the disaster to a northbound ship which was destroyed by fire off the coast of New Jersey. The question of liability is always a question of fact, determined as it was in those days by the question of seaworthiness. But now we have the word "absolute" inserted. It still maintains the principle upon which the law was predicated, that is, there is an implied contract of seaworthiness but not of absolute seaworthiness. When the minister said that this lessened litigation, I would say that while it is true it has lessened litigation because the British commercial interests do not have recourse to litigation except where great principles are involved, but rely upon arbitration—the great interests of the city of London determine questions of this kind not by reference to the courts except where great principles are involved, when they have recourse to the House of Lords—yet it has always seemed to me that this is rather a dangerous section, and I shall content myself with making that statement of my position. When you have regard to the enormous amount of traffic that is handled on the inland seas of this country—I do not think it affects so much shipping from our great seaports because sooner or later the ship will have Plimsoll's mark and be subject to the survey of the board of trade; if she is insured by Lloyd's there will be a survey, and if she is insured by other companies there will be a survey and the question of seaworthiness will always be considered. But when you come to our great lakes and to the question of the loading of the ship and the transporting of cargoes in the fall it is another matter. The minister referred to the Sarniadoc case as an outstanding illustration of recent occurrence about which there was much litigation. We now have Canada engrafting upon its rules of law with respect to carriage a rule which says that the ship shall not be taken to be guaranteed to be absolutely seaworthy. The word "absolute" means of course just what it says. There was a condition that willy nilly the ship had to be in an implied seaworthy condition. Now you say there is no condition that a ship shall be absolutely seaworthy. I have a good enough opinion of my fellow countrymen and of all others who sail the great waters of the lakes to think that this is a dangerous thing.

Mr. NEILL: It does not say absolutely seaworthy.

Mr. BENNETT: The undertaking was implied and it now is no longer absolute. The undertaking is a condition attaching to the contract. It is an implied condition, but there is no longer an absolute undertaking as to seaworthiness.

Mr. NEILL: Would the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) explain the difference between an implied undertaking and an absolute undertaking? If I sign a note, that is an undertaking, and I cannot plead in court that it is not an absolute undertaking.

Mr. BENNETT: That is just the point I am endeavouring to make; that is just the difficulty to which I was referring when I brought the matter to the minister's attention. Certain rules are attached to the bill as a schedule and become part of the bill. Article I of these rules refers to what is a contract. There are questions in these rules which entirely change the existing law with respect to delivery as distinct from merely putting the cargo out on a wharf or a dock. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) asks me to explain the difference between an absolute undertaking and an undertaking. That is used purely in a legal sense. I speak subject to the views of other members of the profession in the chamber, but this is the explanation I would give: When you say that an implied condition attaches to a contract and that it is of an absolute character, you mean that the undertaking is subject to no possible qualification, but when you say it is not absolute, that means it may be qualified. The extent to which it may be qualified under these rules depends upon the considerations which we will speak of when we come to the rules. That is the distinction between an undertaking and an absolute undertaking. An absolute undertaking is an unqualified undertaking and means the assurance, as the hon. member said, that it is true. On the other hand, a mere undertaking may be subject to qualifications, if it is not expressed to be absolute.

Mr. KINLEY: But this section does not relieve the ship owner of all responsibility.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. HOWE: I think perhaps I can give an example. The laws require that a ship carrying bulk wheat must have shifting boards. For twenty-five years boats have been carrying bulk grain on the great lakes without shifting boards. A particular type of boat had been built for this purpose and in theory it was thought that shifting boards were not needed. In the Sarniadoc case the boat did not have shifting boards, and this was discovered from a chance remark of the captain that he had not done certain things because he was afraid his cargo would shift. Under this bill such a defence could not be offered.

On section 4—Documents of title subject to the rules.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I feel it is my duty to call attention to this section, which has caused a great deal of friction between shipper and carrier. In order properly to understand the section one must turn to article III of the schedule attached to the bill. Section 4 reads:

> Every bill of lading, or similar document of title issued in Canada which contains or is evidence of any contract to which the rules apply shall contain an express statement that it is to have effect subject to the provisions of the rules as applied by this act.

In paragraph 3 of article III we find one of the rules referred to in this section. I want to draw attention to this rule because I believe it is not fair to the shipper. It will be noted that this rule first refers to the receiving of the goods by the carrier, and it then goes on to indicate certain conditions. I invite the attention of the committee to the proviso at the bottom of the rule, and I ask hon. members to bear in mind that all these things apply after the goods have been received by the shipper. This proviso reads:

> Provided that no carrier, master or agent of the carrier, shall be bound to state or show in the bill of lading any marks, number, quantity, or weight which he has reasonable ground for suspecting not accurately to represent the goods actually received or which he has had no reasonable means of checking.

A shipment of goods consisting of miscellaneous packages may be delivered on a wharf and accepted by the carrier. These packages are marked in a certain way, which marks are shown on the bill of lading. The carrier, having accepted the goods, may then be asked to issue a bill of lading, which is usually done. After all this has been done, the carrier can then plead that he has reasonable doubts as to the accuracy of the marking of the goods. The marking of goods is sometimes quite complicated, especially when they are being shipped to foreign destinations, but under this rule the carrier can plead, and I believe it is done, that he does not think the goods are accurately marked, and the shipper is out of luck. I know this thing is very often the subject of dispute between shipper and carrier.

While I am quite willing to admit that the carriers should be given every reasonable protection, I do submit that this is a carriers' bill and not a shippers' or merchants' bill. This bill is modelled on the British act which has been notoriously a carriers' act. I am extremely doubtful as to the protection given to our Canadian shipper—that is all we are concerned about—as against the carriers. It will be noted that paragraph 4 of this rule reads:

> Such a bill of lading shall be prima facie evidence of the receipt by the carrier of the goods as therein described in accordance with paragraph 3(a), (b), and (c).

If any dispute or difficulty arises the carrier is able to plead that he has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the goods were not properly marked. This whole rule shows how well protected the carriers are. Paragraph 5 reads:

> The shipper shall be deemed to have guaranteed to the carrier the accuracy at the time of shipment of the marks, number, quantity, and weight, as furnished by him, and the shipper shall indemnify the carrier against all loss, damages, and expenses arising or resulting from inaccuracies in such particulars.

There is the other side of the story. You are not only imposing upon the shipper the obligation to be accurate in every particular regarding the marks, number, quantity, weight and so on, but you are laying upon him the penalty that if he makes an error of any kind he shall indemnify the carrier, notwithstanding that the carrier has checked the goods, received and accepted them. The point I am arguing is this. When the goods are brought to the ship's side and offered by the shipper for carriage, it is the duty of the owner of the ship or of his agents to check these goods and see that they are in proper form and in accordance with the documents. I am not suggesting that the shipper should be relieved of obligation, but I am protesting, and I know it has been a fruitful cause of dispute in years gone by, against the absolute indemnifying of the carrier against loss, and the protection of the carrier if there is any reasonable doubt, whereas the shipper seems to be lost sight of entirely.

I confess that had I known this was coming up to-day there is a great deal of documentation with respect to past disputes that might have been brought to the fore and cited. The subject has not been before me for two or three years and my memory is therefore rather hazy on these technical points; but I do recall some very trying cases that shippers have been confronted with, even under the old Canadian act, which was less drastic than this bill as regards the protection it afforded carriers. While I have a great admiration for British legislation, generally speaking, I cannot help realizing that the chief industry in Great Britain is the carriage of goods by water. The shipping interests there are overwhelming in their influence upon legislation in Great Britain. That however is not so in Canada, and I question very much whether this country would have gone as far as Great Britain did in connection with the water carriage of goods act. In saying that, I do not wish for a moment to suggest that we should not give adequate protection to carriers, but I think the Canadian parliament is largely on the opposite side of this question to the British parliament. The British parliament would naturally go a long way to protect British shipping, which predominates throughout the world, whereas we are shippers of goods. We are the owners of goods rather than the owners of ships. Consequently if the Canadian parliament wishes to take every precaution to protect the shipper of goods, we cannot expect an act modelled on the British act to provide these adequate safeguards. As I have pointed out, this particular section and the article in the rules based upon this section, would appear to me to be unreasonable in the extent of the protection or the immunity granted to the carriers.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend stresses England. I may remind him that twenty-four maritime nations have agreed to uniformity in this type of legislation. I was looking at the United States act, passed two months ago, after that country had watched the operations of the English act, and I find that in this respect it is exactly the same as the English act, and the same as this bill. The three contain identically the same clause. If Britain is a nation of carriers, I would point out to my hon. friend that in the United States, as in Canada, the shipment of goods predominates.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: The information offered by the minister is scarcely an answer to the point I have raised. As a matter of fact I differ from him, because in recent years the United States has been trying to rival Great Britain in the carriage of goods. It has made vast strides in that direction and it might well be that with the enormous amounts of money spent by the American government in building freighters and passenger ships, and with the enormous subsidies they have been granting shipping on the Atlantic and the Pacific, and in fact throughout the world, the American congress may have been influenced in this respect. I am not very much impressed by the statement that the Americans have adopted this precise clause. I was not aware of that fact; I knew they had been considering these matters but I was not aware that they had adopted this precise provision. In any case, it would not be an answer to the question I have raised as to the wisdom of going quite as far as we have gone. The minister has referred to the clause. I should like to know whether the rules in the United States are exactly the same as the rules here, because the rule is what governs the clause, or at any rate it governs the action that may be taken based upon the clause.

Mr. HOWE: The rules in both countries are identical. This is rather a large subject to debate, but it does not seem reasonable to me, if the carrier is given a package by the shipper and is not able to verify the contents and weight, that the responsibility should be his. The responsibility with regard to contents and weight should be on the shipper if the carrier delivers the package on the other side.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not what we are talking about; that is not the clause nor is it the rule. It is after he has received the goods, after he has had an opportunity to check them and measure them—it is all a matter of measurement—it is, after all, this that we are talking about. The clause which the minister is now referring to is another clause altogether. I believe it is section 7 or section 6 where, if there is a weight which is agreed to by a third party such as an elevator shipping wheat, the carrier has no responsibility for verifying the weight. Here however we are faced with something entirely different. I am sorry the minister does not seem inclined to make an explanation or to throw some light on the subject. I can only say that in my opinion this is not giving adequate consideration to the rights of shippers. That is all I have to say.

Mr. HOWE: I should be glad to elaborate, but we are passing this act for the sake of uniformity, having complied with the findings of the Brussels convention. It does not seem to me that we can change it.

Mr. STEVENS: Has a convention been entered into? I am not aware of any convention that obliges us to accept the British law in its entirety.

Mr. HOWE: We were not one of the twenty-four nations that agreed to it, but since then through correspondence with Great Britain and the United States, I am informed, we have committed ourselves to this bill. The United States passed their act on the understanding that we would fall in line. I do not know whether that is a legal commitment or not.

On section 7—Liability of owner of vessel.

Mr. BENNETT: Might it not be desirable, instead of numbering the sections, to obviate the necessity of subsequently passing a statute to overcome difficulties regarding changes that may be made in the numbering of sections in other parts of the act? This, as a matter of fact, is the Merchant Shipping Act, what now we call the Canada Shipping Act, which is being amended at this very session; and we had a similar case in connection with the insurance act. Might we not say, "Nothing in this act shall affect the operation of the Canada Shipping Act limiting liability of the owner of vessels as therein provided," rather than attempt to number the sections? I suggest that because of the difficulty we had with the insurance act; I am not urging it at all. Sometimes the numbers are altered by putting in a new section of the act and giving a number to it, and the changes are automatic.

Sections 8 and 9 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Johnston, Lake Centre): Shall the schedule carry?

Mr. BENNETT: The schedule should be taken up carefully, because, as far as we are concerned, it is really the whole of this act. It was the schedule that was discussed. The schedule represents the convention—that is the real fact of the matter—and the legislation is merely to give effect to the provisions of the rules. Since the minister began his explanation I have recalled something of the circumstances to which he refers. An effort was made by the maritime powers to get a universal bill of lading, one that would be adopted by all the maritime countries. It was found that Norwegians were large merchant shippers, the Germans before the war had an enormous amount of eastern shipping, the British also, and others; but we were not there, for a reason which I suppose is quite apparent—that we now have practically no shipping on the high seas. Our shipping is largely inland. It is a long time since the Brussels convention was held. It took place in what year?

Mr. HOWE: In 1922.

Mr. BENNETT: They succeeded in formulating this set of rules, and that is the real convention; the rest is legislation based on the rules, to give effect to them. There are three things to keep in mind as far as we are concerned. The charter of the ship is altogether a matter of contract between the owner of the ship and the shipper. We have nothing to do, as far as this bill is concerned, with the charter of the ship. But when it comes to the question of the contract for the carriage of the goods, and which by long custom we have called a bill of lading,—just what it says, the bill of what is laden into the ship—under our law both the shipper and the carrier have the right to tally what goes into the ship. The shipper delivers the goods within reach of the ship's tackle, and the ship keeps a tallyman or tallymen for the purpose of ascertaining what goes into the hold of the vessel. The point to which the hon. member for Kootenay East directed attention is one that has been the subject matter of much discussion. When I was a student at law I had cases in which the shipper signed his bill of lading under protest, and he drew up a formal notarial protest in which he claimed he had the right to protest against its being said there were so many standards of deals in the ship when as a matter of fact, according to his contention, there were not that number—or whatever the case might be. He therefore signed his bill of lading under protest and made his notarial protest. Now this is an endeavour to give effect to that rule of maritime law that the master, representing the owners of the ship, signs his bill of lading under protest, but the form whereby it is to be done is a very strange one, and I wondered at the language as it was being read:

> Provided that no carrier, master or agent of the carrier shall be bound to state or show in the bill of lading any marks, number, quantity, or weight which he has reasonable ground for suspecting not accurately to represent the goods actually received or which he has had no reasonable means of checking.

Another paragraph of the rules gives effect to the old common law rule that the owner of the ship checks or tallies what goes into the vessel. The captain is usually the man to do this, or he has one of his officers doing it. It seems strange to say that in lieu of the old form of signing his bill of lading under notarial protest he is to decline to sign that bill of lading by stating—going so far as to say, if he has reasonable ground for "suspecting"—it does not accurately represent the goods actually received. "Suspecting" is a strange word to use in a statute with respect to a contract. When the minister says this represents the rule that has been agreed upon, I suppose it is desirable that ninety-five per cent of the carrying business of the world should be subject to some general rule. We however are more concerned in shipping the goods by freight, by vessel, than we are in the position of the owner of the ship. In other words, we are shippers, not carriers. The United States did not pass this bill, I believe, until two years ago?

Mr. HOWE: Two months ago.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh. That explains something that I could not quite understand. If that happened only two months ago I quite appreciate the position, because the United States had declined up to a quite recent time to complete any arrangement by passing the legislation affected by this rule of Brussels. If they have done it now, I suppose it is because the carriers are becoming more important than the shippers, and they are able to influence congressional action, whereas in years gone by they certainly were not. At any rate, this being so, I quite understand the minister's position.

There is one thing I think he might do. It seems to me that in a country like this we should not bind ourselves to this three-day rule. We might modify at least that rule without affecting the general principle. There is no reason why the question of time should not be regulated by the necessities of each country rather than by any general rule. I refer to number six:

> Unless notice of loss or damage and the general nature of such loss or damage be given in writing to the carrier or his agent at the port of discharge before or at the time of the removal of the goods into the custody of the person entitled to delivery thereof under the contract of carriage, or, if the loss or damage be not apparent, within three days, such removal shall be prima facie evidence of the delivery by the carrier of the goods as described in the bill of lading.

As the law stood, at least under the ordinary rule governing sale of goods under contract, it was that a man had a reasonable time within which to inspect and reject or accept. The old rule in our Sale of Goods Act was "a reasonable time." Our old rule used to make delivery absolute. As it is now it is somewhat changed. The carrier hands the goods over, and when they are removed if within three days he does not get notice that there has been loss or damage, the claim to loss or damage is gone. There are certain types of goods, both coming into this country and departing from it, in respect of which it seems to me that three days may be too short a time in which to make it clear that the damage, although not apparent, is there. "Such removal shall be prima facie evidence of the delivery by the carrier of the goods as described in the bill of lading." In other words, he has complied with the bill of lading and delivered the goods safely under the conditions mentioned in the rule, unless within three days the person receiving them gives notice that there are now apparent conditions which make for loss or damage of the goods that he is receiving.

Mr. STIRLING: Why should it be any different in Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: Consider our position. First of all we have great frosts and the other difficulties that are incident to climatic conditions, so that what might be apparent in four days might not be apparent in three days with respect to the condition of goods. I do not think there is any point in regard to the arbitrary fixing of the period, but it appeared to me that three days was rather a short time. I recall a case which one always recalls in these matters, of a cargo of turkeys that went from eastern Canada to the west.

Mr. DUNNING: They move the other way now.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; the last five years brought that about. The carload was inspected and it was found that it had not been properly refrigerated so that apparently there was a loss. It was contended that the inspection and rejection had not taken place promptly and therefore the owner brought an action to recover the purchase price—at least the bank, as the holder of the bill of lading, brought the action, which failed. It struck me that the officers of the department would be able to tell the minister whether in a country such as this, where we have sudden extreme heat and cold and where we move cargoes so rapidly, this length of time was sufficient. For instance, suppose a cargo was accepted in Vancouver for shipment to Calgary and it made the journey in three days. When it arrived there, as soon as the consignee had an opportunity it was inspected and found to be not in good condition, attributable entirely to the voyage. In such a case one might say that three days might be too short a time.

I have no settled views on the matter, except that it struck me in that way. The whole series of rules, as I said in the beginning and as has been said by the hon. member for Kootenay East, is predicated upon the carrier receiving every consideration and the shipper being more or less at his mercy, subject of course to the terms of the rules. Probably it is better to have those rules in that form, so that they are uniform throughout the shipping world, than to rely upon the varying decisions that might be given if there were no uniformity. Every country has its own common law rules. We have rules in this country that are far more favourable to the shipper than these. The statute we are repealing is far more favourable to the shipper than the one we are now passing; it affords him a measure of protection which we do not now afford him. I have no doubt, as the minister has said, that the carriers are pleased to have this statute become part of the laws of this country, but I am afraid that the shipper is less vocal than the carrier because he is not organized, whereas the carrier is organized and speaks with authority and with a single voice when he attends a conference. The only surprise I felt was when the minister said the United States had passed a statute accepting these rules, because I knew that up to a few months ago they had not done so. Then when the minister told me it was only two months ago that this had been done, it removed the necessity for any further observations on my part. With our small shipping I think we were content to become a party to the general convention provided that in addition to the other countries the United States, our near neighbour, accepted it, and that had not been done when I was last familiar with the matter.

Mr. HOWE: As to the time limit, as I have said this is an attempt at uniformity, but as far as I can see there is no objection to a longer period, if my right hon. friend cares to move an amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: I was just asking if the minister had thought about it, because it struck me that three days might be a little too short a time. After all, in a country like this five days might not be too short or too long, but I am not definitely committed to anything.

Mr. HOWE: Three days is the uniform period.

Mr. BENNETT: Then I would hesitate to change it.

Mr. NEILL: I suppose I am only showing my ignorance in asking this question, but perhaps I can obtain some information. I revert to the section referred to by the right hon. leader of the opposition, the proviso at the end of paragraph 3 of article III of the schedule, which reads:

> Provided that no carrier ... shall be bound to state or show in the bill of lading any marks, number, quantity, or weight which he has reasonable ground for suspecting not accurately to represent the goods actually received ...

As the right hon. leader of the opposition has stated, this certainly seems to me to be a carriers' bill. Supposing I ship fifty gallons of whisky in a number of demijohns and the man says he suspects that my statement as to the quantity is incorrect. Does he only put down on the bill of lading "whisky"? In that case, when it reaches the other end and my consignee takes delivery, he is entirely at the mercy of the carrier. The carrier may have drunk half the whisky, and then he could say, "All we undertake to deliver was whisky, and you have received whisky." Surely there should be some provision for protecting the shipper; surely the carrier should say "so many demijohns said to contain so many gallons of whisky" or something like that. Apparently, if I am reading this aright, all he has to put down in that case is the article shipped; he is not bound to put down the number, quantity or weight. Would the minister explain that?

Mr. HOWE: I think it was explained by the right hon. leader of the opposition that it has always been possible to take a notarial statement casting doubt on the representations made as to the shipment. This is a similar provision. In other words, if you said there was whisky and the other man had some doubt about the quantity, if you still insisted that he take it for delivery I think perhaps he would say on the bill of lading "fifty demijohns full of liquid" or something like that. In other words, he has a right to refuse to put on the bill of lading something he does not believe is true, and I suppose you have your right to withdraw the shipment under those circumstances. I think that is the position.

Mr. NEILL: Then would the minister explain this other point in regard to the definition of goods, contained in paragraph (c) of the definition:

> "Goods" includes goods, wares, merchandise, and articles of every kind whatsoever, except live animals and cargo which by the nature of carriage is stated as being carried on deck and is so carried.

Why is that exception made? Within the last two or three years we passed an act by which large quantities of lumber might be carried on deck, so why should that lumber be exempt from the presumed benefits of this act? Since it is not defined as goods I assume it does not come under the act.

Mr. BENNETT: Lumber does come under this act but it did not come under the old act.

Mr. NEILL: This definition states:

... except live animals and cargo which by the contract of carriage is stated as being carried on deck and is so carried.

If it is carried on deck it does not count as goods.

Mr. HOWE: That is true. Lumber did not count as goods even if stored below deck under the previous carriage of goods act. Under this act it qualifies as goods if it is properly stowed, but if it is put on deck it is subject to special risks and does not come under the ordinary ship cargo insurance.

Mr. KINLEY: Mr. Chairman, from the very nature of it this legislation is intended for the future. The idea has been expressed that the act is extremely in favour of the carrier, and the hon. member for Kootenay East in particular said that we are not a carrying nation but a shipping nation, and therefore—

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say that; I said we were not a carrying nation in the sense that Great Britain is.

Mr. KINLEY: I quite accept what the hon. gentleman says, but it only emphasizes my point: I hope we do not accept the idea that we shall always be a shipping nation and not a carrying nation. We in the maritime provinces have some aspirations in regard to preserving to Canada the carrying of our goods upon the sea. It is our ambition that in the future we should become more of a carrying nation.

Mr. STIRLING: The explanatory note opposite article III reads:

It will be noted that the carrier is bound to exercise due diligence before and at the beginning of the voyage. The present Canadian statute (section 4) requires due diligence to be used to make and keep the ship seaworthy. It is not practical to require the owner to keep the vessel seaworthy and the wording of the British Act is desirable.

To one who is not particularly versed in shipping it seems an extraordinary statement that the ship owner is not required to keep the ship seaworthy.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. HOWE: While we will all agree that it is possible to make a ship seaworthy it may not be always possible to keep it seaworthy. In other words a ship may be technically unseaworthy as the result of a storm. It may be made seaworthy again after that, but I think the distinction there may be recognized.

I have a few amendments, chiefly typographical errors. On page 4, section 6, the word "damage" is misspelled, and an "a" should be inserted.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think that is necessary

Mr. STEVENS: We do not need an amendment for that.

Mr. RINFRET: I move:

That section 6 of article III be amended by substituting the word "damage" for "dmage" in the second line thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RINFRET: I move:

That subparagraph (b) of section 2 of article IV be amended by inserting the word "fault" after the word "actual" in the first line thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RINFRET: I move:

That subparagraph (q) of section 2 of article IV be amended by substituting the word "and" for the word "or" in the first line thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RINFRET: I move:

That article V be amended by inserting the words "and liabilities" after the word "responsibilities" in the third line thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: That sounds rather strange to me, to provide that a person shall surrender his liabilities. I should think they would be glad to surrender their liabilities at any time. Is that in accordance with the British act?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It was left out in the printing by mistake.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a surrender of responsibilities; it is an increase of them—a surrender of rights and immunities.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 67, to amend the Customs Act (Canadian waters).

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—"Officer."

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister be good enough to make a brief statement as to the general purpose of the bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a short bill, five sections in all. It is designed to strengthen the preventive work of the customs service. Section 1 defines "officer" as used in the Customs Act. Section 2 defines "Canadian waters" and "Canadian customs waters." Both these terms are new as far as I know. "Canadian waters," roughly speaking, comprise all the marine league, that is the waters included within the three mile limit, and "Canadian customs waters" the waters in the nine mile belt outside the three mile limit.

Mr. BENNETT: Why did they make it that rather than twelve miles?

Mr. ILSLEY: We would have to have some description. In the act being amended we referred to them as territorial waters of Canada, or some phrase which I do not just remember, which did apply to waters within the twelve mile limit. But His Majesty's government in Great Britain made representations that it was of some importance not to define territorial waters of Canada in that way. The powers to be exercised outside the marine league, outside of Canadian waters, so-called, are very limited powers.

Mr. BENNETT: Police powers, practically.

Mr. ILSLEY: Police powers, yes. Section 3 provides that certain vessels must carry manifests. Section 4 defines hovering, sets out the powers in respect of hovering vessels and contains other provisions relating to hovering. Section 5 repeals section 207 of the act. I hope that the brief explanation is sufficient for the purposes of the member for Kootenay East.

Mr. KINLEY: I assume this bill is for the purpose of the better enforcement of the Customs Act, that it concerns only Canadian shipping, and that the authority is over every Canadian ship within the twelve mile limit.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is scarcely correct. If the hon. gentleman will look at the bill he will find that vessels other than Canadian vessels are affected by its provisions.

Mr. BENNETT: For police purposes only.

Mr. ILSLEY: For police purposes only. This bill affects vessels registered in Canada and unregistered vessels owned by a person resident or domiciled in Canada and other vessels or classes of vessels specified or enumerated by proclamation of the governor in council. This third class of vessels would be vessels registered in countries other than Canada. But the bill does not assert jurisdiction over these vessels within the nine mile limit unless they are enumerated or specified by proclamation of the governor in council. It is anticipated that that will be dealt with by agreement. For instance Newfoundland vessels in the nine mile belt, outside the three-mile limit, will in all probability be specified or enumerated by proclamation of the governor in council as a class of vessels to which this act will apply.

Mr. KINLEY: By agreement.

Mr. ILSLEY: By agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland, and agreements of this nature will undoubtedly be made with many countries.

Mr. KINLEY: Have you now an agreement with Great Britain?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. KINLEY: The point that occurs to me is that vessels sailing out of Canada might change their registry to Barbados or Bermuda or the Jersey Islands. The Jersey Islands in the past have been a favourite place to register vessels. They have some peculiar sort of independence from Great Britain, and in days gone by to register a vessel in the Jersey Islands gave them almost absolute freedom. Now if this bill is enacted into law, will it cause a certain class of vessel to register in foreign countries and thus give them greater freedom than they would have if they were registered in Canada, although they may be owned in Canada only by mortgage or on shares?

Mr. ILSLEY: The control over vessels registered in foreign countries which is to be exerted in the nine mile belt outside of the marine league will be effective only if an agreement is made between this country and the country of registry of the vessels. Does that answer the question?

Mr. KINLEY: I understand that perfectly. But the point I want to make is that after all this is a very ineffective way of controlling the customs situation. It will not get you very far, will it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know why it should not. Canada will have complete jurisdiction over vessels in the three mile limit.

Mr. KINLEY: It always had.

Mr. ILSLEY: And will have the right of pursuit, which is dealt with in the bill. It will also have control over vessels registered in certain countries which make agreements with Canada when those vessels are outside the three mile limit.

Mr. NEILL: Will it not induce Canadian vessels to register in a foreign country that does not have an agreement with Great Britain in order to smuggle goods within the nine mile area without restraint by Canadian officers?

Mr. BENNETT: I think what the government has in mind is bringing vessels of a notorious character engaged in certain well known activities within the police powers of this act. If a proclamation were made following an agreement between this country and the country whose ships notoriously engage in illicit operations, such vessels would be subject to the punitive powers we have provided by our statute. Is not that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correctly stated.

Mr. NEILL: But the notorious vessels will take care not to register in countries with which you have an agreement.

Mr. ILSLEY: We believe no country will refuse to make an agreement.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—"Canadian waters."

Mr. ILSLEY: Since the bill was prepared it has been deemed advisable to strike out the words "and shall conform with," in lines twenty-eight and twenty-nine, so that it will read:

> Canadian waters shall not extend beyond the limits of exclusion recommended in the North Atlantic Fisheries Award,

And so on. That makes a difference in the meaning of the section, of course, but it really does not injure the section because in another part it is provided that a map or chart may be issued under the authority of and approved by the governor in council which shall be conclusive evidence of the due determination of such base lines, and Canadian waters shall not be defined on that map to extend beyond the limits of exclusion recommended in the North Atlantic fisheries award. There is a real reason for the subsection.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the addition of the extract from the award as a part of the bill is highly to be commended. It gives to those who read the bill immediate knowledge regarding a matter of some importance, namely, what the decision of the arbitrators was. It gives the information at once by looking at the statute, which I think is exceedingly desirable having regard to the technical character of the answer given to question V as set forth in the schedule.

Mr. DUNNING: I move the amendment accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I would have worded the paragraph a little differently and said "beyond the limits of exclusion recommended in the answer to question V," but I do not desire to suggest that my draft would be any better than that of the gentleman who drew this.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Master shall have manifest on board.

Mr. BENNETT: There is not much difference here except that this makes it obligatory. But most ships do carry manifests that give these particulars, as I understand it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Many ships carrying smuggled liquor do not carry manifests.

Mr. BENNETT: I realize that, but the manifest usually contains this information.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Application of section.

Mr. KINLEY: The minister said that there was no arrangement with Great Britain. I am puzzled about this because I believe that any good effect to be derived from this bill will be derived by arrangement with other countries. Otherwise, it will only drive ships from our shores until we do have such arrangements. England entered into a twelve mile arrangement with the United States, to which agreement we are a party. Would that not mean that at the present moment we have an arrangement with Great Britain as to the twelve mile limit?

Mr. ILSLEY: At the present time we have limited rights over vessels within the nine mile belt, but this section will give us the right to conclude arrangements with other countries by which we can exercise much more complete control than we can at the present time.

Mr. KINLEY: It will be recalled that the United States legislation called for an hour's sail from shore. England and the United States entered into an agreement to this effect; they were the primary signatories, but we were a party. A vessel might register at Bermuda or some other British possession and thus be exempt from the twelve mile limit regulations.

Mr. ILSLEY: That arrangement does not enable seizures to be made within twelve miles of Canada. It deals only with seizures within twelve miles of the American coast.

Mr. KINLEY: It was a one way agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will remember the circumstances. The Americans were imposing upon British ships a certain condition, namely, that they should not have in their possession any intoxicating liquors while in the United States during prohibition. The great steamship companies carrying passengers across the Atlantic were confronted with a serious situation and as a result Great Britain negotiated with the United States. The United States said that they must have the right within twelve miles of their shores to search and exercise police powers over ships flying the British flag. The price paid for that concession was the permission for British vessels to bring their liquors into American ports. Otherwise, it would have been very difficult for them to operate. The matter was all the subject of diplomatic correspondence and discussion before my time, but the counsel of the department could tell the minister the circumstances. The Cunard line took a very active part in this, and finally the British government secured the rights I have indicated, while they conceded the right to have searches made on their ships and police powers exercised within an hour's run or twelve miles from shore, within nine miles of what was known as the territorial three mile limit.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to suggest to the minister that it might be desirable in the interests of administration to provide that this act shall come into force on a date fixed by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette. If this legislation became effective immediately there would be no opportunity for the minister to discuss these matters with other countries and it struck me that his purposes might be better served if the act were to go into force on a date fixed by proclamation, in the same way as we did with the bill we just passed. The minister might also provide that this act shall come into force in whole or in part on proclamation. In practice it has been found very useful to proclaim one section when you could not proclaim the whole act. I make this suggestion only in the interests of effective administration.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman is a valuable one, especially the latter part with reference to the whole or part of the bill coming into force on proclamation. I shall ask my colleague to move such an amendment.

Mr. DUNNING: I move that there be added a new section 6 as follows:

This act in whole or in part shall come into force on a date or dates to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MacNEIL: I would direct the attention of the minister to an apparent misprint in the last word of rule 1 on page 7. This word should no doubt be "miles."

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct; it should be "miles."

Mr. DUNNING: No motion is needed to correct that.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Development of new parks—maritime provinces, $140,000.

Miscellaneous, $25,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister was going to give further information about the roads.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of the Interior): There is not a great deal I can add to the information I gave when the matter was under consideration on the last occasion. We have under negotiation now with the British Columbia government the question of an agreement definitely fixing the completion of what is known as the west leg of the Big Bend highway. It may be recalled by hon. members who were present when the item was last discussed that the arrangement to complete that portion of the trans-Canada highway was embodied in telegrams and letters which had been exchanged. We hope to reach an arrangement with the British Columbia government whereby we shall complete that part of the work within the next three or four years.

Mr. BENNETT: As long as that?

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly three years, with the understanding that the British Columbia government will take over the maintenance of each year's portion as it is completed. There have been some discussions with that government with respect to the road from Kingsgate into the park, and I hope we shall be able to conclude with them, by formal agreement, an arrangement whereby they will bear fifty per cent of the cost of dust-proofing that road, the federal government to put up the other fifty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Has that road from Kingsgate been standardized?

Mr. CRERAR: Not all of it. Part of it is now so constructed.

Mr. BENNETT: What distance is that?

Mr. CRERAR: About 150 miles, from Kingsgate to the park.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that; but how much has been standardized?

Mr. CRERAR: About twenty-four miles has been hard-surfaced, and about a third of the road is graded to standard. I have also had under discussion with the Alberta government the matter of assisting with what they describe as the blotter type of road. I believe that they constructed some mileage of that in Alberta between Waterton park and Calgary. If the arrangement is carried out it will probably involve a total expenditure of $75,000 on the part of the federal government by way of assistance. When that work is completed we shall have the circle from Waterton park right on to Calgary, Banff and Kingsgate, or the other way round, which will be dust-proof, and I believe it will be useful in attracting tourist traffic from the United States.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: What part of the park would the Kingsgate road strike?

Mr. CRERAR: The Kootenay national park, at Radium Hot Springs. I am not familiar with the geography of the place, but I trust that is the information my right hon. friend wants.

Mr. STIRLING: What view will the minister take of the suggestion made a year or two ago that a strip of land on the west leg of the Big Bend highway should be created a park?

Mr. CRERAR: I was not aware that such a suggestion had been made, but at the moment I do not see what particular bearing it would have. The road is in British Columbia, and after its completion it is the responsibility of British Columbia to maintain it. I assume they own the land, or the portion that is adjacent to the road. If the hon. member has in mind some particular reason why such a strip should be set aside, I am certainly not aware of any such suggestion.

Mr. STIRLING: I am not presently advocating it, but the suggestion certainly was made, I think in 1934. I heard it discussed. I hold certain views with regard to it which it is not necessary for me to express now if the minister is not contemplating carrying it out.

Mr. CRERAR: This is the first I have heard of it, but my deputy informs me that in 1934 there was some discussion on the basis of the federal government's completing the road and probably maintaining it in consideration of getting this particular strip to which the hon. member refers. What practical value a strip of land on either side of the road would be to the federal government I am not at the moment in a position to say.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the information the minister has given is that which the committee was asking for the other day, but I am disappointed to hear him say that it will take three or four years to complete the road to the coast because that will stand in the way of complete means of transport being afforded from the park to Vancouver. There is the old road, and I fancy that cars sometimes go through, though I doubt it. I thought, however, that the road would be completed in less than three years. I say that for this reason. The province of British Columbia entered into a contract to complete the road within a shorter period than that. That is the old contract under which we did some work up to a certain point, and they were to finish it. I am not sure of the exact date when it was to be finished. This is 1936 and it would probably be 1939 or 1940. Can the minister tell me the date of completion as given in the original contract?

Mr. CRERAR: We now hope it will be finished in the fall of 1939.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. It will now be 1939-40, which is a serious matter. If the road from Kingsgate is completed to Radium Hot Springs and made dust-proof, and the same with the road from Waterton park to Calgary, then there has been a certain amount of dust-proofing done between Calgary and Banff; the only other stretch would be from Waterton park to the United States boundary, and that has been put into fairly good shape. But it will take some time to complete the road from Kingsgate to Radium. Only twenty-four miles of it has been constructed, and the balance has not been graded. The territory is fairly difficult, while affording an excellent opportunity for relief work, which is what is contemplated under this expenditure. Therefore I think it is an admirable enterprise, provided an arrangement is made that will not create a precedent which will be embarrassing to the minister. As to the extent of the contribution, that does not make so much difference, because we must recognize that the road itself as far as the park, between Kingsgate and the park, is the property of the province of British Columbia, and not ours, and therefore we must not put ourselves in entire possession of provincial roads which belong to the crown in another relation, as the minister said the other day.

On another occasion I mentioned to the minister the matter of the completion of the road from Edmonton to Jasper along the line of the old Canadian Northern grade. The minister will recall that the city of Edmonton took up with the then president of the Canadian National the question of the acquisition for highway purposes of the abandoned right of way between west of Edmonton and Jasper park. The president was willing that this right of way should be acquired, but there were certain difficulties—very great difficulties, legally—from the standpoint of securing a good title or a lease for any great length of time. Finally the province expressed willingness to take the right of way and make the necessary changes and alterations to fit it for a highway. So far as I know that work has not been completed, and I suggest to the minister that it would be very helpful if something of the sort could be done, because otherwise it will continue to be difficult to get into Jasper from Edmonton. The present condition has interfered seriously with the movement of tourist traffic. If the road to Jasper is finished, and then the work upon the line from Jasper to Banff is completed, within a reasonable time there will be a fairly complete tourist highway, meeting the situation, if not as fully as one would like, at least in a moderate way having regard to our financial and other conditions.

Mr. CRERAR: I appreciate the importance of the point raised by the right hon. leader of the opposition. This arrangement with the British Columbia government regarding the Kingsgate-Kootenay park road will, if it is completed, constitute a definite agreement covering only that work, and for a specific purpose, also with the obligation upon the British Columbia government to maintain the road in that condition. That is the basis of the arrangement which we are trying to carry out.

Mr. BENNETT: And it is a relief undertaking.

Mr. CRERAR: And, of course, it is for the relief of unemployment. I venture to say that were it not for the calls of relief, a great many of these expenditures we are considering would not be undertaken. I know very little respecting the road from Edmonton to Jasper. That matter has not yet come before me. I believe representations have been made—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, by the board of trade.

Mr. CRERAR: —by the board of trade of Edmonton. Of course, in all these matters it is largely a question of money. I should like to finish the west leg of the Big Bend highway next summer, if that could be done. But when I bring these estimates, amounting to a good many hundreds of thousands of dollars, before a Finance minister who is rather stony-hearted when it comes to expenditures, I have to take that circumstance into account. If our revenues improve and the situation becomes brighter financially the road might be completed in a shorter period, but at the moment I should not care to give any undertaking that it will be completed before the time I have already mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: I mentioned the Jasper matter because it is one singularly within the jurisdiction of the federal government, having regard to the fact that the rails and ties have been removed from that section of the right of way west of Edmonton into Jasper, and I think a good deal could be done without too great an expenditure. This would certainly be helpful in getting into that park, because the road from Calgary to Edmonton is not too bad for motoring, and some steps have been taken to relieve it of the dust nuisance.

Mr. GREEN: Just what work is to be done this year on the Big Bend highway? We are very much interested in that, because it is the last gap in the western portion of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. CRERAR: I think I gave that information before. It is intended to spend about $400,000 on the west leg and $70,000 on the east leg, which expenditure, it is estimated, will complete the latter portion of the highway, including the bridge across the Columbia river.

Mr. GREEN: How much mileage will remain to be completed on the west leg?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that there are about seventy-two miles on the west leg yet to be completed, but that portion is expensive to construct. For instance, we had some slides on a portion of the work which has already been done this spring, and it was estimated that it would take a steam shovel two weeks to clear these mud slides off the road. I mention that merely to give an indication of the difficult nature of the country through which the road is being built. However I hope it will be completed within three years.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister mean that it will take three or four years to complete those seventy-nine miles of road, including the work that is to be done this year? This is important also to the prairie people, because it is their way of getting out to British Columbia, as well as our way of getting to the prairies.

Mr. NEILL: I know the matter has been brought to the attention of the department by public bodies and by myself, but I wonder whether the minister has considered the advisability of establishing a beach park in British Columbia? He has four parks in that province. They are all highly mountainous, with wild and rugged scenery, wild animals, big precipices, hairpin turns, and things like that; but to round off his program I suggest, and others have suggested, that he needs a park on a beach to which people could come, not only from California and the southern states, but from our own country. As times improve we get a considerable tourist trade from the prairies, and I know, from people whom I have met, that very many persons are ordered to leave the prairies and come to the coast, temporarily or permanently, to get away from the high altitude; it gets on their nerves, and causes a condition which medical men can explain better than I can. If those people can go to the coast for only a couple of months in the summer, spend their time at sea level, with a beach for the kiddies to play on, and enjoy themselves in a quiet way, without any great expense, this would be a tremendous advantage to persons in that condition who have a little money to spend. In my district—and though I am apparently speaking selfishly, I have no personal interest in the matter—there is an area which can be obtained for a mere trifle, having almost every advantage that can be named: a beautiful white beach with no stones on it, warmed by reason of the shallowness of the water and so made suitable for bathing, a beautiful park behind it, close to the public highway, with facilities for electric light almost on the ground, and with trout fishing in the neighbourhood which will provide recreation for adults. I believe it would be a good thing to round out the department's policy by acquiring such a park, and I should like the minister to promise at least to give the suggestion his consideration.

Mr. CRERAR: With respect to the matter mentioned by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), he has made representations to our parks branch for the establishment of a park of the kind to which he has referred. Any area for a park, of course, must be supplied by the provincial government. Under the act the federal government does not purchase or acquire such property; that is acquired and turned over by the provincial government to the federal government for park purposes. That would naturally be a prerequisite in this case. Then, again, there is the question of the amount of money that the federal government can spend year by year in park development all over the country. I think I mentioned to the committee previously—and, if not, I will do so now—that the total investment in parks in Canada is approximately $30,000,000.

With regard to the other point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South, the matter is not so much one of distance. The seventy-two miles would seem to be a comparatively short distance in order to complete the west leg, but the real question is the amount of money involved. It is estimated that it will cost $2,000,000 to construct that portion of the highway.

Mr. GREEN: That includes the $400,000 being voted this year?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, of course. If next year I can get a million and a half dollars to spend on that road I will spend that much money, but it must be borne in mind that certain expenditures have to be made in all these parks. There are roads leading into them; there are in the parks works that are partly completed, and it would be difficult to take the whole vote and spend it in one locality. The hon. member will appreciate the difficulties of a minister who would endeavour to do that. So I am afraid I shall have to ask him to be as patient as possible in connection with this matter, and we will complete the highway as soon as it is reasonably possible to do so.

Mr. GREEN: It may be that the burden is being placed on the wrong department. After all, this question goes much deeper than the national parks. This is one very sure and effective way of drawing the provinces of Canada closer together, and on that ground alone I think the government should see to it that the trans-Canada highway is completed without delay. Perhaps the expense should not be borne by the national parks branch, but certainly some department should see to it that this section of seventy-nine miles of road is completed right away.

Mr. CRERAR: The expense is not borne by the national parks branch, but that branch has the responsibility of building the road, so, of course, it gets the money to do the work. As far as the tourist business is concerned I might say that I understand the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have arranged a sort of land ferry for transporting cars across the base of the triangle formed by the big bend of the Columbia river, and it is possible for tourists to leave Vancouver, come as far as possible by road, load their cars onto the facilities provided by the Canadian Pacific and be transported to the road on the other side of the big bend.

Mr. GREEN: Of course the tragedy of that situation is that tourists will not travel that way. They will go by road through the United States, and Canada will lose that business.

Mr. CRERAR: We shall get it after a while.

Mr. NEILL: I quite realize that any park taken over by the dominion government would have to be offered to them free of charge. What I wanted, rather, was an indication from the minister that he would favourably regard such an offer and that he appreciated the value of having a beach park. The minister has spoken for quite a while this afternoon as to the various developments being carried on in connection with the interior parks; he has been throwing around sums like $75,000 as if they were mere bagatelles. There is a public road right into this particular park of which I speak, so the cost of developing the park would be practically nil. The electric line is within a few hundred feet, and nature has done everything else. All that needs to be done in connection with the park portion is to leave it alone, for the most part; it would require only a very small sum, perhaps two or three thousand dollars, to put up a number of cabins such as are common for the use of tourists, and even these could be made self-sustaining by the imposition of a small charge.

With regard to the accessibility of this park, a man and a woman with a car coming from the prairies, however poor their car might be, can cross on the ferry from Vancouver to Nanaimo for a dollar or two, and reach this park in three hours. They do not have to spend two or three days going down through the United States or over impossible roads to get to this park, and then face the necessity of retracing their steps to get home again. This park is thoroughly accessible and would be used to a great extent not only by people from the United States but also by our prairie people and by the residents of Victoria and Vancouver. It would be used particularly by people of the prairies who have to get to this low altitude from time to time because of their health. I meet many people who have come to the coast because they have been told by their doctors that they had to get to a lower altitude because of heart or nerve trouble. The cost would be absolutely a bagatelle. If the minister will give the offer favourable consideration I will guarantee to do the rest. We will deliver the park to him on a platter, and the expense of developing it would be practically nothing.

Mr. CRERAR: I am always glad to give consideration to any suggestion that may be made by my hon. friend. I have just had handed to me a brief memorandum, in which the point is raised that the area of this proposed park, which is 321 acres, might not be sufficient for a national park. Probably that matter could be adjusted if we were in a financial position to allow us to go ahead with it. That would depend upon financial conditions which at the moment we cannot foresee. We do not know what our revenue is going to be for the coming year. If it increases, as we hope it will, it may be possible to extend our parks operations. If conditions are such that we have to limit the expenditure of money, then I am sure my hon. friend will appreciate the significance of that fact.

Mr. NEILL: The area is small, but in a case of this kind it is quality we want rather than quantity. This particular park has a beach which I think is about a mile in length. A picnic was held there last year which was attended by five or six thousand people, and the beach could easily have held three times as many. There is no danger of its not being ample for the ordinary traffic that might be anticipated for quite a number of years to come.

Mr. BROOKS: It has been interesting to listen to the remarks of the minister in regard to these parks throughout Canada, especially the statement that $30,000,000 has been invested in the national parks in the different provinces. I was also interested to hear the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), with three or four parks in British Columbia already, asking for another. The other evening we were discussing a park in New Brunswick, and at that time the minister stated that the creation of a park in that province depended upon factors as to which I should not care to pass an opinion at the moment. I should like to ask the minister just what really are the factors which are holding up the creation of a park in New Brunswick. I was pleased to note a vote of $100,000 for a park in Nova Scotia. It is pleasing to know that the members from Nova Scotia have been able to sink any differences of opinion that they may have had, and to decide on a site for a park. The same is true of Prince Edward Island, but the people of New Brunswick would like to know what is holding up the development of a park in that province. If the minister can give me that information I shall be glad.

Mr. CRERAR: I think what I stated when the matter was before the committee previously was that a definite area had not yet been selected for park purposes in New Brunswick. An investigation was made by one of the officers of the parks branch, who examined several sites. I believe he recommended one particular site, but considerable objection was taken to that by certain interests within the province which did not think it suitable. When a site for a park is once determined, it is fixed for all time to come, and consequently I am sure the hon. member is impressed with the importance of having the selection wisely made. It is better to make haste slowly and make the best selection, rather than act hurriedly and get a location which perhaps for all time after one would regret. That is why no selection has been made definitely in New Brunswick.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Then, of course, there is another fact. The government of New Brunswick will have to deed over free this park area, so naturally the government of that province is interested. We hope to get further with the matter this year; we shall have further reports, and if circumstances warrant it we shall bring forward a recommendation next year for the establishment of a park in New Brunswick.

Mr. BROOKS: I thank the minister for his explanation, and I would like to ask if in Nova Scotia the provincial government has already deeded over the site.

Mr. CRERAR: The area has been selected in Nova Scotia. The Nova Scotia government had to acquire certain private lands, but they advise us that they expect to be able to turn over title of that park area to us within a short time, probably during the coming week.

Mr. MacNICOL: For a long time I have been interested in conservation work. I see one item in this estimate, namely, forest and game conservation works. I have been working for the past two days in connection with conservation for Ontario—

Mr. FINN: Of the party!

Mr. MacNICOL: —assisting in selecting the new premier-to-be of Ontario, when the provincial government next goes to the country, so if the minister has answered any questions in regard to this item I can look up in Hansard what he has said. If he has not, I shall be glad to have some explanation of it.

Mr. CRERAR: I think it was referred to when the matter was under consideration before. This item is to provide for telephone lines in some of the parks, and the making of trails and roads to facilitate the park wardens in getting over their territory and making contact with their central authorities as rapidly as possible. Some of these park areas, particularly at Banff and at Jasper, are very large. We are making every effort to conserve the game and the beauty of the parks. In the judgment of those responsible for the administration of the parks these amounts are necessary, and those responsible carry my judgment with them in that respect.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to this particular matter I desire to make some observations, which I will make when the bill in respect to the Nova Scotia park is before the committee. I find it a little difficult to accommodate myself to the view that one should be called and the other not. I suppose the minister thinks he is following the words of Scripture, "the one shall be taken, and the other left." Just why New Brunswick should be left and Nova Scotia taken I find it difficult to understand, except that when I look around on the Nova Scotia members, I realize that they are more insistent as supporters of the administration than are my New Brunswick colleagues in their attitude towards this matter.

Mr. CRERAR: I assure the right hon. leader of the opposition that he is quite mistaken. Of course I did not find any opposition to this park among hon. members from Nova Scotia. And I found a good deal of support from New Brunswick. But the fact is as I have stated. I have not the necessary information definitely to reach a judgment as to the best location in that province; that will have to be determined this summer. As I stated a moment ago, if our financial circumstances warrant—and I think perhaps they will—there will be provision for a park in New Brunswick next year.

Item agreed to.

Forest service—development of experimental stations and forestry research, $75,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this with regard to national parks only, or generally in Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: This is general.

Mr. STIRLING: Could the minister give us some information in regard to the disease which is attacking the tamarack?

Mr. CRERAR: We have quite a number of these forest experimental stations development of which was really started for us by the National Defence department in connection with the relief camps. That work, of course, is important, but probably it might not be undertaken now if a start had not already been made. The nature of the work is the study of the rate of growth and the conditions under which growth takes place, and generally the application of scientific principles to afforestation and reforestation.

Mr. STIRLING: Has this only sprung up consequent upon the relief work? I thought it existed long before.

Mr. CRERAR: Some of it is the completion of works already started at these stations under the relief administration.

Mr. BENNETT: But part of this work, such as the study of forestry conditions, was going on long years ago, as my hon. friend says. When, however, the natural resources were turned over to the provinces, and the remainder of the railway belt was handed over to British Columbia, there was not the same activitiy in that direction as there had been. The first effort was to establish the time of maturity with respect to many kinds of forest trees, for instance how long it took the spruce to grow to a point where it was marketable either for pulpwood or lumber. That work went on many years ago; the commission on conservation had something to say about it. Then, for the reasons I have mentioned, the matter fell into disuse.

Mr. CRERAR: All these stations, with the exception of the one at Petawawa, were established since 1930. They include Valcartier, Acadia, Duck Mountain and Kananaskis. This vote is to complete some buildings that are now partly completed; to complete the building of roads and generally to equip the stations to carry on their work.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): How far does this service extend? Does it relate to one province or more?

Mr. CRERAR: It covers all the provinces, although there is not a station in each province. There is one at Petawawa on the Ottawa river, about one hundred miles away; one at Acadia, New Brunswick; one at Valcartier, Quebec; one at Duck Mountain, Manitoba, to cover the prairie provinces, and one at Kananaskis on the east slope of the rockies.

Item agreed to.

Topographical and air surveys bureau—ground and aerial surveys and mapping, $20,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister explain this item? This cannot be the total vote for topographical surveys.

Mr. CRERAR: This is to assist in a survey of the boundary line between northern Ontario and Manitoba through an important mining area. The boundary line between Ontario and Manitoba is definitely established only as far as a point called Island Lake. We have offered to supply the umpire, and to assist in fixing the boundary line and to pay certain expenses. Then topographical survey work is to be done mapping areas where maps are required for development. The vote also covers the drawing and compiling of aerial maps of areas in which mineral development is taking place, and the making of base maps.

Mr. BENNETT: This item overlaps to some extent the work carried on by the Department of National Defence in mapping mineralized areas, does it not? I speak very frankly because I know my own difficulties over this duplication of work and the effort that was made to prevent duplication, something which is not easy to do. I suggest that this item will stand perhaps the minister's personal consideration and scrutiny because there is a tendency to duplicate effort. In the parks this should not be so because the mineral areas in them are so separate and distinct from mineral areas in any other part of Canada. We have imposed such restrictions in the parks as to working for minerals that it is a little difficult for me to understand why we should make more readily available knowledge which might encourage people to do what on the other hand we are taking steps to prevent.

Mr. CRERAR: This is not in the parks area.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but I am speaking about the parks. Certain work of that kind has been done; we find both the Department of Interior and the Department of National Defence doing the same work, and it is necessary to be very careful to avoid a duplication of effort.

Mr. CRERAR: I am aware of the difficulty the leader of the opposition has indicated, and in arranging this work I think every effort has been made to avoid duplication and to get the most useful and efficient results from the expenditure.

Mr. HEAPS: How many men does the department expect to employ on survey work this summer? I understand a large number of university students are to be engaged in survey work in the ensuing months. Can the minister give any information as to the number, and, second, has he had any difficulty in securing sufficient help for the class of work that has to be done?

Mr. CRERAR: I can assure my hon. friend that there has been no difficulty in getting sufficient help. But the point my hon. friend raises probably comes under a different vote in the mines branch, and when that vote is before the committee I shall be in a position to give him the information he seeks. This is a vote for the Topographical surveys branch of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. HANSON: What about topographical mapping in British Columbia this year?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not in a position to tell my hon. friend just where the work will be carried on in British Columbia, but there will be work carried on there to an expenditure of a little over $5,000.

Mr. HANSON: The reason I asked is because in that province there are areas which have not been linked up by survey mapping.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Water power and hydrometric bureau—international gauging station on the Columbia river near Birchbank, B.C., $10,375.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the United States government also subscribe to similar work?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, on their side of the international boundary. We do the work on the Canadian side, and they do it on the American side.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have they a survey station close to the international boundary, and have we one close to the international boundary?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that they have a station quite close to the international boundary. This work is carried on in cooperation with the United States government.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what prompted my question. I was wondering whether there were two stations close to the international boundary doing the same work.

Mr. CRERAR: I can assure my hon. friend that is not the case.

Mr. STIRLING: Will this supply a considerable quantity of work to those in need of relief?

Mr. CRERAR: This work will be done by contract. I am unable at the moment to say to how many persons it will afford relief.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 62, for the relief of Pedro Alfonso Baptista.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 63, for the relief of Louise Isabel Sutherland Chaplin.—Mr. Walsh.

Bill No. 64, for the relief of Clara Violetta Dodge Connolly.—Mr. Heaps.

Bill No. 65, for the relief of Marie Consuela Hill Montabone.—Mr. Bothwell.

Bill No. 66, for the relief of Lona Marie Vaughan Burnett Gravina.—Mr. White.

THOUSAND ISLANDS BRIDGE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 59, respecting Thousand Islands Bridge Company —Mr. Stewart—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to ask if this bill contains a provision with respect to fair wages. I do not want to delay the passage of the bill, but I want to say that in previous bills of this kind there has always been inserted a clause providing that fair wages shall be paid, as well as a clause providing for the purchase of goods in Canada. If there is no similar provision in this bill I think it should stand over.

Mr. BARBER: This bill was before the private bills committee; it was gone into by that committee and approved.

Mr. CRERAR: This bill was considered by the private bills committee and I understand it is the custom of the house to accept their report.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think we can always go on the assumption that because a bill has been reported from a committee we are bound ipso facto to accept the bill in toto. The minister will remember that when bills of a similar kind were before this house a clause providing for the payment of fair wages was inserted.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a general statute.

Mr. HEAPS: This is not public works; this is a private corporation. I do not think any harm would be done by having the bill stand over until Tuesday of next week in order that this omission might be rectified. I can assure the minister that a similar clause was inserted in previous bills.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member who is sponsoring this bill is not in the chamber to-night and we on this side have no objection to allowing the bill to stand until next Tuesday.

Progress reported.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 72, for the relief of Madeleine St. Clair Peacock Milroy.—Mr. Plaxton.

Bill No. 73, for the relief of Bella or Bessie Laurie Wozik, otherwise known as Bella or Bessie Laurie Rabinovitch.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 74, for the relief of Agnes Hannah Wright.—Mr. Heaps.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES

Projects already undertaken—for geological surveys and investigations in the Northwest Territories and elsewhere in Canada—including amount required to prepare, publish and distribute results of field investigations of 1935, $150,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What has been done so far under this item?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines): This is really the unexpended portion of the $1,000,000 vote of last year which was allowed to lapse at the end of March. It is to complete the preparation of data and the compilation and publication of reports.

Item agreed to.

Other projects—to continue geological surveys and investigations in the Northwest Territories and elsewhere in Canada, uncompleted in 1935, $200,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why is this item not taken in conjunction with the previous one?

Mr. CRERAR: The explanation is contained in the statement I made a moment ago. The first item is to complete the work which was undertaken last year under the special vote of $1,000,000 appropriated by parliament a year ago. The reports have not all been compiled. The preparation and compilation will have to be completed, and these reports, based upon the work done a year ago, have in the main to be published. The second vote is for geological surveys and investigations in the areas mentioned in the estimate, and that will be undertaken this year.

Mr. MacNICOL: It says, "uncompleted in 1935."

Mr. CRERAR: That is the field program which was undertaken in 1935, and which was not completed. According to the information supplied me, the work was mapped out in the field, covering very large areas, but it was not all completed. All the reports covering the work that was finished must of course be published, and that is why the first vote was required.

Mr. REID: Are surveys carried out in the coastal regions, in inlets and bays?

Mr. CRERAR: No; that is not covered by this vote. This has reference to the parties that explore the geology of the country in areas which are believed to be mineral-bearing.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have the appointments to the personnel of the geological survey parties which will be sent out this year been completed yet?

Mr. CRERAR: They have been practically completed. That is covered not only by this vote but also by the vote in the main estimates.

Item agreed to.

To assist in provision of transportation facilities into mining areas, $1,500,000.

Mr. BARBER: Can the minister give some particulars?

Mr. CRERAR: The purpose of this vote is, as stated, to assist in the provision of transportation facilities into mining areas. Within the last five years there has been a notable extension of prospecting, exploration work, and the development of new mines. In that period, for instance, mines have developed in the Great Bear lake area, away up on the rim of the arctic circle, where they are producing silver and radium. I believe there are three small mines operating in that area. Transportation costs amount to $140 a ton from the end of the railway at Waterways in northern Alberta. In the Central Patricia area there are two mines operating over 100 miles from the railway, producing gold to a value of approximately $250,000 a month. My information is that their freight costs from the railway line to their mines are about sixty dollars per ton. Instances of a similar kind could be multiplied, although perhaps not to the extent of the same cost as far as other mines are concerned. The purpose of this vote is to help reduce, where possible, those costs. It is also intended to use a part of it in opening up new areas. For instance, in British Columbia, north of Prince George, there is an area known as Manson Creek. Quite obviously it is out of the question to build a railroad into that area, but we propose to assist in the construction of a motor truck road to it that will enable the people who are operating there to bring in their supplies and to do their business more economically, from the point of view of freight costs, than they are doing at present. I expect that, as a result of this, there will be a stimulation of development in many areas of Canada.

We have not as yet quite determined how the vote will be divided so far as the provinces are concerned. I have discussed the matter with representatives from all the metal mining provinces and suggested to them that the provinces should put up one-third and ourselves two-thirds; that is, for every two dollars we put up the provinces put up one dollar; and they have agreed, without exception, to that suggestion. In the result there will be available altogether, between what the provinces supply and what the federal government is providing under this vote, something over two million dollars. In selecting the areas that will be assisted we have consulted with the provinces. We do not propose to spend any of this money in building roads to a prospect where some person thinks he has a mine; there must be reasonable evidence that there may be a mine there. In many cases we know the mines are there, because they are producing, and as far as one can judge now, some have a promising future. Approximately it will probably work out in this way, that British Columbia will get about $300,000 of this fund; Alberta, a comparatively small amount, because there is as yet no metal mining in that province, but there is some work to be done.

Mr. BENNETT: How much?

Mr. CRERAR: I said, a comparatively small amount. As yet there is so far as I know, no metal mining in Alberta. But the waterways into the great northern hinterland, pass through the northern part of Alberta to this area at lake Athabaska, where a mill is being established; to Great Slave lake, where drilling operations are going on, and then to the region up in the Great Bear lake area. Freight for each of these points is moving to Waterways at the end of the steel in Alberta, and by water transportation from there on. In many cases there are portages which are extensive, where freight has to be unloaded, and reloaded again after the portage is crossed. An examination is being made to see what assistance can be given there with a view of reducing the cost of transportation. That principle will apply all the way through. Manitoba will probably get between $260,000 and $270,000; Ontario, probably $325,000 to $400,000, and a somewhat smaller amount for Quebec. Roughly, that is the classification of this vote. I wish to make it clear to the committee that so far these arrangements are only tentative; they are not completed. I think the vote will be of considerable assistance. I hope a little later, when we come to our main estimates, to give the committee some information as to the development which has taken place in mining in Canada during recent years.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The minister has not mentioned Saskatchewan.

Mr. CRERAR: For Saskatchewan, I should say, probably about $80,000 to $90,000.

Mr. BARBER: This appears to be a relief vote; I suppose that is what it is. I understand that it is under relief measures or that the work is to be done along with relief measures. The minister said a minute ago that the provinces would contribute. I can quite understand that the Northwest Territories will not contribute. He stated that about $300,000 might go to British Columbia. How much will the provincial government be expected to contribute before the dominion undertakes any work in British Columbia?

Mr. CRERAR: One dollar for two, I said.

Mr. BARBER: $150,000?

Mr. CRERAR: They would put up approximately $150,000.

Mr. McCANN: Who has the actual administration of the money—the province or the federal government?

Mr. CRERAR: I should have explained that to the committee. We propose to make arrangements for the provinces to supervise the expenditure of the money. I certainly do not desire to set up any road building organization in the Department of Mines; neither does the Labour department wish to do that; but the matter will be worked out on the projects that are agreed upon between the provinces and the federal government. The federal government will reserve the right to inspect the work as it is progressing, and the payments will be made under agreement as the work is completed, or, possibly, as it progresses. That, I think, is the most economical manner in which to make the expenditure.

Mr. McCANN: Will the provinces determine the policy with reference to the locations?

Mr. CRERAR: I should say that they will be determined as a matter of agreement between the department of mines of each of the provinces and the federal Department of Mines. So far as I am aware the matter of doing the work will be under the highways department in each of the provinces.

Mr. McCANN: Will these projects be let by contract, or will they be done by day labour?

Mr. CRERAR: I should think in the main they would be let by contract. That point has not been discussed. There are some instances where it may be difficult to let them by contract. If you are clearing up the work on some portage, or building a small wharf on some water course, it may be difficult to get a contract placed for that particular work, but I should think that in the main the work will be done by contract.

Mr. McCANN: Will any of this appropriation go as a subsidy to aeroplane companies that are carrying freight?

Mr. CRERAR: That has not been contemplated and has not been suggested.

Mr. FAIR: Will the minister state approximately what amount will be allowed for Alberta?

Mr. CRERAR: At the moment I cannot give my hon. friend that information. It is difficult to get details of the work which requires to be done in Alberta, but it will be only in the northern part, in connection with cheapening as far as possible the means of transportation on these waterways.

Mr. BENNETT: No item in the estimates has caused more unfavourable discussion than this, for reasons that I think the minister must easily appreciate. In the first place, except in the Northwest Territories, any work done on a highway to improve transportation, means work done upon roads entirely under the control of the provinces. No federal money can be expended by the federal government on a provincial highway or transportation road or colonization road without the consent and approval of the provincial authorities. The principle that is to govern should not be unlike that which governed an appropriation of several million dollars for the construction of roads many years ago. That money was divided among the provinces on the basis of population. It will be recalled that at that time the senate insisted that this should be done, and on the part of the then Liberal opposition there was a great deal of discussion and, frankly, some opposition to the proposal to utilize federal money for the purpose of improving highways in provinces. That opposition was overcome by the method I have indicated, namely a division of the money on the basis of population. A standard type of road was agreed upon, and the work was done under the inspection and, shall we say, the general supervision of the late Mr. Campbell, who represented the federal power.

This is an appropriation of $1,500,000 to be expended on the improvement of transportation to mining claims in every part of Canada. There are still some mining claims left in Nova Scotia, for instance, in connection with some minerals other than coal that are being sought for there. The disaster about which we were all so much concerned recently had to do with an old gold mine that was being exploited. In New Brunswick there are still some mining claims left, though comparatively few. In Quebec there are the great northern areas where the general formation is similar to that of northern Ontario, and it is proposed to divert the same sum of money to each province for the improvement of transportation.

When I asked what principle was to govern, the minister said that the money would not be spent to improve transportation to what a man might think was a mine. But if geology is a science, as it is, and if the reports of those who have made surveys of the territory are worth attention, it should not be a case of what a man thinks. I had concluded that the minister would say that this money would be used to enable promising areas to be prospected, because if the mines have come into production they do not require much assistance in the construction of roads. By reason of the fact that mines are producing, they have ample money with which to provide transportation to the markets for their products; they have ample money with which to carry on their operations. That is not the case, however, with a great area which has been, shall I say, closely investigated by geologists in the manner in which that is done nowadays, and which is very interesting even to read about. When an area is regarded by geologists as being promising then it is of first importance to get diamond drills and other necessary equipment into that area, and in that case some expenditure is required to be made to enable transportation to be carried on.

From what has been said by the minister I gather that this is not what is intended. I repeat that a mine already in production does not require very much assistance. If it is producing every two or three days a block of gold worth $25,000, $30,000 or more, it does not require much help in order to provide transportation. I thought the minister was going to say that this money would be spent in order to encourage the development of the mineral areas. Certainly the amount of $1,000,000 which was appropriated by parliament last year to enable investigations to be undertaken had behind it the idea that we would become familiar with geological conditions and the extent to which work might be carried on in given areas for the purpose of securing valuable metals through the development that was to go forward. Until the minister spoke I had certainly concluded that this, in a sense, was to be supplementary to what was done last year, so that areas of promise would be made possible of development by reason of these expenditures, in cooperation with the provinces, to enable the transportation of supplies to be carried on. The hon. member for Renfrew South spoke of aeroplanes being used for the transportation of supplies. In the Northwest Territories, which are completely under the jurisdiction of this government, every dollar of this sum could be spent and still it would not meet the requirements, so difficult is transportation into that area.

The minister knows that we have spent a considerable sum of money in providing radio stations for the purpose of enabling news to be sent into and out of those areas, and although it has been very expensive we have endeavoured to do something in the Great Bear lake and Slave lake regions. Both of those mineral areas are in the Northwest Territories, if I am correctly informed, and I would think it desirable that as much money as possible should be spent there, where we have no province with which to cooperate or consult, where we own the highways and everything else. It occurred to me that the minister might say that a good deal of this money would be spent there, where any revenues, royalties or fees come to us and not to any province. We have supreme and complete control over that area, which contains pitchblende, copper and some promises of gold. I do not know that the gold deposits have been developed to any considerable extent, but certainly other minerals have been reported there. I was surprised at the small sum the minister mentioned as having in mind to be expended in the Northwest Territories. If he will look at Hansard to-morrow he will see that it would appear that this money is to be used on behalf of those who least require it and not in aid of those who most need it, and when I say that I mean those who as yet have not been able to demonstrate that a given area will be productive, those in territories that geology, which is a fairly exact science, has indicated might contain gold-bearing rock or quartz. It is in such territories that one would expect at least a good share of this money to be expended in order to make transportation feasible.

I have nothing to say with respect to the situation in Alberta. There is very little in the way of mineral deposits in southern Alberta, though, of course, in that province they have the fields where they have been prospecting for oil, which is almost as important as minerals from the standpoint of the immediate production of new wealth, and I suppose these petroleum products might, in a sense, be classed as mineral wealth. In the northern part of the province, however, bordering on the Northwest Territories, as the minister has said the waterways require some attention. I had hoped that in connection with those great Northwest Territories, where last year considerable geological work was done and where every promise was found of rich deposits of valuable minerals, the minister would say there is a duty devolving upon us, for we are both the province and the dominion as far as those territories are concerned. Wherever there is a possibility—and I do not want to use that word in too narrow a sense—or, we shall say, a geological probability of there being valuable mineral deposits, as far as we can we should use this money for the purpose of making it possible to have those deposits developed.

It would seem to me to be a very great mistake to leave entirely in the hands of the provinces the selection of those on whose behalf and for whose benefit this money should be expended. On the other hand, of course, we cannot expend any money in this way without the consent of the provinces; that is obvious, and therefore there must be cooperation between the provinces and the dominion. The extent to which that cooperation will be given will depend entirely, it seems to me, upon the view the provinces may take as to the desirability of this or that area being assisted in the way of transportation facilities. If an agreement cannot be reached, then I suggest that the money should be expended where I expected the minister would spend most of it, namely in the area where there is no province, no government except our own, nobody to receive any benefit except the people of Canada who derive the whole benefit, both in respect of any income the companies may secure and in royalties that may become payable on the minerals taken out. I cannot say that I congratulate the minister upon the method he proposes to adopt, because I cannot help thinking it will bring him a good deal of difficulty, and in the end the money will be frittered away without any corresponding advantage.

Mr. CRERAR: I think my right hon. friend need not have the fears that he has just expressed.

Mr. BENNETT: I have heard a good deal about this vote.

Mr. CRERAR: I have, too, heard a great deal that is favourable.

Mr. BENNETT: I have heard a great deal that is favourable for one or two people.

Mr. CRERAR: As far as the Northwest Territories are concerned, to get back to the Great Slave lake and Great Bear lake region, practically all the expenditure that has to be made in order to give transportation into those areas has to be made in Alberta.

Mr. BENNETT: You cross the boundary line and get to where you leave the river, and then you have to get to where the claims are located. On Great Bear lake you go by water.

Mr. CRERAR: For instance, on Great Slave lake, which is wholly in the territories, the mining claims that have been prospected and explored are on the north shore.

Mr. BENNETT: And that is so because prospectors cannot get into the other parts of the area at present by reason of bad transportation.

Mr. CRERAR: They get to lake Athabaska by the river from Fort McMurray. One of the chief difficulties of transportation into that north country is the stretch of river for six miles north of Fort McMurray. In low water the boats cannot get up to rail head. We do not propose to undertake any work this year by way of deepening the river.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not a small item in the main estimates for that?

Mr. CRERAR: There may be for investigation, but deepening the river would involve blasting rock out of the river bed. The solution of the problem is probably either a motor road for six miles from Fort McMurray to a point where the boats can take their freight—

Mr. BENNETT: Or an extension of the railway.

Mr. CRERAR: Or an extension of the railway.

Mr. BENNETT: Both expensive.

Mr. CRERAR: There is partly within the Northwest Territories one other portage on which some work will be done, and indeed some has been done. To-day a private company has the privilege of carrying freight over that portage.

Mr. BENNETT: They get how many cents a pound?

Mr. CRERAR: They get a good rate; I have forgotten what it is.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a very large figure.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course this is in the north country.

To come to another point, the assistance is not alone for mines that are developed. It may be a nice question to what extent a company producing, say gold, should pay the expense of providing the highway or railway to the mine. For instance, there are at present two mines working in the Central Patricia area. The likelihood is that within twelve months another mine will start operations; that is, steps will be taken to get in mill machinery and the equipment and accessories necessary for the successful operation of a mine. If the first mine there builds the road in, the second mine is at the mercy of the first. Consequently the highway should be in the nature of a public highway.

Mr. BENNETT: The province has control of that though.

Mr. CRERAR: Quite so. I fancy, however, that if the mine which commenced operations had the responsibility placed upon it of building the road, at a cost of, say, $100,000, it would not undertake that work unless it had some way of collecting tolls from others using the road. This brings up the question of the regulation of those tolls. That is largely a new principle in the development of the country. We are applying here a principle which has always been applied.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it not a very old one? Long before confederation they had toll roads.

Mr. CRERAR: This work will be done in conjunction with the provinces under agreements. My right hon. friend when he was Prime Minister made agreements with several of the provinces for work on roads. That was done, for instance, in Manitoba in 1935; there were definite agreements covering the work. That did not commit the federal government to the principle of building roads in Manitoba.

Mr. BENNETT: No; those were existing highways.

Mr. CRERAR: In some cases they were not.

Mr. BENNETT: All of them were, I think.

Mr. CRERAR: No. There were one or two cases where a road might be called a highway, but it was only a rough wagon road.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister mean the one in the park?

Mr. CRERAR: The one in the park and the one from Dauphin to Winnipegosis. The point I am making is that my right hon. friend adopted that principle. What we are doing is precisely the same thing. We go to the province and make an agreement in respect to a mining road, after we have mutually decided where one should be built. The province bears one-third of the cost; we bear two-thirds; they agree to maintain the road and to bear all the expense of engineering and supervision. That is to be covered by the agreement just the same as the Russell-Clear lake road in Manitoba a year ago, or the one from Dauphin to Winnipegosis.

Mr. BENNETT: Or the road running south.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. We are following under this vote precisely the same principle and the same practice as were followed then. Now the advisability, the wisdom of this expenditure might be questioned. Personally I think it will be money well spent. The increase in mineral production in recent years has been phenomenal. I shall give some figures on that when I come to the main estimates. What is expected from this vote, and what I think will certainly ensue, is a stimulation and aid to the development and production of a great deal of real wealth. That is the purpose. The problem of the expenditure of the money will be studied, is being studied with the provincial departments of mines. They canot say, as my right hon. friend hinted, where this money will be spent; that has to be agreed upon between the two governments. We shall use our best judgment in deciding where the expenditure will produce the best results. As far as the vote itself is concerned I have had a good deal of commendation for this step having been taken, and so far no criticism. The only criticism that I anticipated is that the vote is not nearly large enough. There are a great many cases where the people think they need assistance; many of them do need it, but broadly speaking what we propose to do is to spend the money so that in the years to come we shall get the greatest possible results from it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that my hon. friend the minister did not quite follow me. I am certainly fully aware of all the agreements made between provinces and the dominion, and I was not in any sense taking exception to the good example given by the late government being followed by the present administration, in this as in many other things. What I was endeavouring to direct attention to is that the principle adopted in determining what mines should receive the benefit of the vote is a principle with which I could hardly agree, because it does not touch what I conceive to be the general idea underlying the policy of the government in making this grant, namely, to secure further development, and the creation of more new wealth. I was suggesting that that result be brought about by utilizing the geological surveys and determining with the cooperation of the provinces what areas would likely be benefited by development; that is, where it would be probable that suitable returns and probably a mine would result from the efforts which might be made in that territory. I thought the money would be used in such areas rather than where established mines already exist. On the other hand, if this is merely for assisting the provinces to provide transportation to known mines, then, of course, it is nothing more or less than the application of the general principle that has been applied during the last three or four years with respect to such highways as the minister mentioned, such as there are, for instance, in Saskatchewan extending west, and in Alberta and other parts of the western provinces. My anxiety was to ascertain the general principle that was to govern. I was approaching the matter from the standpoint of the money being utilized to assist in the development of new areas and the production of new work rather than for the purpose of providing better transportation facilities in areas where it had already been demonstrated that satisfactory results had followed the efforts which had been made to establish mines. The latter view, of course, can be supported, but I had assumed the other view, that a province being unable to undertake an exploratory road, the dominion had said: We realize that any new wealth you develop will be to our benefit as well as to yours, and we shall therefore assist you in territory that our department and your own geologists believe to be promising. But, as I say, the view which the minister has put forward can be supported on the general principle that, wealth having been discovered, it is the duty of the state to endeavour to make it available. That is the general principle you would be following if you are going to use the money in territories already developed.

Mr. KIRK: The minister made no reference to any amount being set aside for Nova Scotia or the maritime provinces generally, and I was wondering whether it was his opinion that they did not need any assistance. In the county of Antigonish-Guysborough which I represent there has been considerable gold mining activity recently, and I have no doubt many companies there would be glad of assistance. The government that was in power in Ottawa started in 1928 and 1929 to build the Guysborough railway, which would have been of considerable assistance to the people there, but in 1931 the government under the present leader of the opposition did not see fit to continue the construction of that road. I would ask the minister if Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces generally will receive consideration under this vote.

Mr. CRERAR: Some consideration has been given to that question, but transportation costs to the mines in Nova Scotia to-day are relatively low, whereas in British Columbia, for example, there are mining areas that are from fifty to seventy-five or even one hundred miles away from a railway and are without roads, yet they are producing placer gold and have indicated that they can develop others. Obviously it is at just such points that assistance is needed rather than where transportation costs are at present relatively low. The same argument would apply to New Brunswick, where I understand there are no metal mines. I hope that one day there will be a revival of the gold mining industry in Nova Scotia. Without doubt the increase in the price of gold has helped the gold mining industry of that province. On the other hand, many of the mines to which I have referred to-night are large potential producers situated in favourable areas. I might mention again the Central Patricia region which affords a splendid illustration. Two mines there are now producing approximately one-quarter of a million dollars worth of gold a month, and it is costing them $60 a ton to get their freight in. Should either of those mines have a major break in its equipment it would be tied up for six months unless the replacements could be carried in by aeroplane. Conditions of that sort we are seeking to overcome, and if we could get a road into that region or assist in cheapening transportation costs into it, the likelihood is that within the next twelve or eighteen months there might be three or four more mines in that area. It is with the idea of stimulating such developments as rapidly as possible that this vote is placed before the committee.

Mr. DONNELLY: What about a mine that is a paying proposition? Does the government build a road into an area where there is a paying mine, or does the mine or the province put up a certain portion of the costs, or just what arrangement is made in building a road under those conditions? Is it built under the plan of two-thirds of the cost being met by the dominion government and one-third by the province, or do the mines themselves that are paying producers pay any portion of the cost of building the road?

Mr. CRERAR: It is not contemplated that the mines would pay any portion of the cost, because such mines have spent a great deal of money in providing present transportation facilities. I have in mind, for instance, a mine north of Port Arthur producing chromium ore. They have to transport that ore twenty-five miles to the railway. That mine supplies a great deal of freight to the Canadian National Railways every year, and the industry is still only in its infancy. Probably we shall provide $5,000 or $10,000 to help gravel their road.

Item agreed to.

Mines branch—for investigations of mineral resources and deposits; of the mining and metallurgical industries, and of mineral technology; wages, and expenses of testing and research laboratories; for publications, English and French; for purchase of books and instruments; for miscellaneous assistance and contingencies; and for investigations by the Dominion fuel board, including salaries and all other expenses, $250,000.

Mr. CRERAR: I think it might be interesting to the committee if I gave a survey—and I shall make it as brief as possible—of some of the facts that indicate the value of the mining industry to this country. It is interesting in an historical sense to note that the first suggestion for making a geological survey was made in Upper Canada about one hundred years ago, in 1836, and the motion asking that a small amount of money be appropriated for that survey was moved by a gentleman who afterwards acquired a great deal of publicity, William Lyon Mackenzie. In the political troubles which followed, prosecution of the work was lost sight of until after the union of Upper and Lower Canada, and then in 1841, as a result of suggestions made by the National Historical Society of Montreal and the Historical Society of Quebec, a resolution was passed appropriating £1,500 for the purpose of causing a geological survey to be made of the province of Canada. The expenditure of this money was entrusted to William Logan, who later became Sir William Logan, and who was for some years the head of the geological survey. Later on, in 1855, a further appropriation of $20,000 annually was made, and $8,000 was set aside for the publication of the results of Logan's explorations. It is an interesting fact to note that his work was so thoroughly done that where he reported favourable geological formations in areas in Ontario and Quebec our great metal mining development has since taken place.

Mr. BENNETT: And in British Columbia too, later on.

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Mr. CRERAR: That publication was given to the public in 1866, and along with it a geological map was published. However the mining industry did not attract a great deal of attention in Canada, and it was not until 1907 that the Geology and Mines Act was passed and a definite effort made to bring about development work. The work done by the mines department falls into four divisions. First, there is the geological survey, which covers the sending of survey parties to the field to search for favourable formations. Second, there is the ore dressing and metallurgical plant on the outskirts of the city. Third, there is the division for testing fuels, oils and coals. Fourth, there is the division of ceramics where a study is made in the use of the various clays to be found in Canada.

The work of the ore dressing plant particularly has attracted international attention. When the Ottawa conference was held in 1932 it was attended by the Premier of Southern Rhodesia. Southern Rhodesia has large mining possibilities, but the ores there are of a complex type and prior to that time they had been unsuccessful in discovering a proper method of treatment. As a result of inquiries made here and an examination of the ore dressing division of the mines branch, two tons of ore were shipped to Ottawa and the officers of the division worked out a treatment for the ore. Many of the mines in Canada have testified to the useful assistance given by this division. I mention this merely to indicate to the committee that the mines branch is performing a very useful service for the country.

If the committee would bear with me I should like to give a few figures indicating the growth of the mining industry in Canada. In 1901 the value of the metals produced in Canada was approximately $25,000,000. In 1935 this had grown to over $220,000,000. Of this latter figure, $116,000,000 was gold, $88,000,000 was base metals and the balance was made up of various precious metals, such as silver, platinum and other metals found in small quantities in some of our larger mines. It may be of interest to the committee to know that in January, February and March of this year our gold production exceeded the production of the corresponding months in 1935 by 17½ per cent. The total value of all mineral production in Canada in 1935 was $310,000,000.

The contribution made by the mining industry to the railways of Canada is considerable. I was surprised when I noticed a statement by the president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce in the annual report of that bank to the effect that the mining industry contributed practically one-third of the total freight handled by the Canadian railways in 1935. I had these figures checked and I found they were correct, according to the information in the possession of the bureau of statistics.

Mr. BENNETT: That is directly and indirectly.

Mr. CRERAR: That includes ores, coal, stone, gravel and everything that is classed as minerals in the records of the bureau. In 1935 the Noranda mine paid over $1,000,000 in freight. Ten years ago there was not one dollar's worth of freight originating in that area. Hudson, which is on the Canadian National Railways on the way to Winnipeg, produced no freight ten years ago, but in 1934 the freight receipts from Hudson totalled $232,000. In 1935 the freight receipts from Ilford on the Hudson Bay railway, 286 miles north of Le Pas, in the distant northern part of Manitoba, totalled $150,000. The freight receipts directly and indirectly from the Flin-Flon mine of the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company in northern Manitoba totalled $1,302,000 in 1935, Consolidated Smelters have contributed in freight payments an average of $4,000,000 per annum during the last ten years.

Mr. BENNETT: That would include ore from the Sullivan mine at Trail?

Mr. CRERAR: That is the total freight contribution of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

Mr. GREEN: Is that $4,000,000 per annum?

Mr. CRERAR: That is the yearly average for the last ten years. The International Nickel Company pay over $1,000,000 per month in wages. The Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company have paid over $76,000,000 in wages in the last ten years. Since 1911 the Hollinger mine has paid over $79,000,000 in wages. In 1935 the mining industry as a whole contributed $88,000,000 in wages.

In connection with supplies we find that in 1934 heavy mining machinery, practically all of Canadian origin, was purchased to the extent of $6,500,000. Purchases of lighter equipment, such as rock drills, pipes and fittings and so on, amounted to $3,250,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Did the minister say that was practically all Canadian production?

Mr. CRERAR: Practically all of Canadian origin. In fact, practically all mining supplies are of Canadian origin with the exception of certain chemicals which cannot be secured in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: Drills are now being made in Canada as a result of the tariff policy of the late government.

Mr. CRERAR: Electrical equipment to the extent of $2,125,000 was purchased. As an illustration of the value of this industry in another field, the mining region round Sudbury used over 40 million feet of lumber in 1935, and I am told that over eighty per cent of this came from British Columbia. In the way of foodstuffs the mining industry consumed last year 38,000,000 pounds of meats, 7,500,000 pounds of lard; 7,500,000 dozen eggs; 11,000,000 pounds of butter; 7,500,000 pounds of cheese; 760,000 sacks of flour; 114,000,000 pounds of potatoes, or 57,000 tons, and there were over 100,000 pounds of turkeys shipped from the western provinces into the Porcupine and Kirkland lake area.

I venture to say that very few people in Canada appreciate fully the very great heritage we have in the mineral wealth of the country. It extends practically from Labrador round the south shore of Hudson bay, swinging north to the arctic circle, east of the Mackenzie river; and so far as our geological information goes we may expect to find mineralized areas, some of them rich, over that vast extent of territory. I do not think it is an impossible dream that we can within the next five or ten years increase by fifty or probably seventy-five per cent our metal production in Canada, and I know of nothing that will contribute so much to placing this country in the way of permanent national recovery as the sound development of our mining industry. I apologize for taking up the time of the committee in supplying it with some of these facts, but I thought it might be of interest to hon. members in the consideration of these particular estimates.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am very much interested in what the minister has said. Most of his remarks were confined to the precious metals, but I should like to say a word in regard to the baser metals, particularly iron. The minister spoke of mineral development either having been recommended or having commenced in Ontario about 1836. The iron industry in Ontario commenced about 1815. I am not sure of the exact date, but I believe the first development took place near the west boundary of the present county of Lanark, though they did not begin to smelt there at that time. The first place in which iron ore was smelted in Ontario was at the ancient village—there is still a cluster of cottages in the locality—of Normandale, founded by one of the early pioneering families, Van Norman, of the province. I have always been interested in the iron industry, and for some time past I have been trying to dig into the early history of iron production in Ontario, which is not known to many people in Ontario, and certainly not to the people at large throughout Canada. It is not generally known that our first real iron industry in Ontario began at Normandale. The ore was what was known as bog ore. During the last couple of years I have covered the district many times and have been intending to get into touch with the Department of Mines to find out whether it is possible that there may still be some ore there, because at one time there was quite a pocket in the county of Norfolk, about seven miles north of the present site of Normandale. Later, after that ore became exhausted in Norfolk, a considerable pocket was found in the adjacent county of Elgin. Two others of our principal old pioneering families of Ontario were associated with this original Norfolk development of the iron industry in the province: a pioneer named Tillson, after whom the present Tillsonburg was named, in the riding of the hon. member for Oxford, and the Leonard family, who were also associated with the Van Normans, later established in London, where their descendants are still making the very good Leonard boilers. It is remarkable that at Normandale in those very early days, about 1820 or 1822 and prior to about 1848, they melted approximately 900 tons of iron a year, which they dug out of the swamps and bogs in that locality, a very fine iron. It was a soft iron and when smelted and poured it had to some extent the texture of what is now known as malleable iron; it would almost bend, and one characteristic was that it did not rust easily. Last summer I went into a wood just north of Normandale where I saw one of the old stoves made in Normandale, bearing the date 1845, and it had been in the farmer's back lot many years and showed no evidence of rust. I wonder if the department has ever made an investigation in that locality to see whether this ore is really extinct. The soil seems to me to be very much like the soil west of Duluth, where there are vast iron ore ranges.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

I have often thought, in connection with the development of iron ore in Ontario, that if Ontario ore is suitable—and I am going to speak now of the ore in the vicinity of Sudbury; I believe it is what is called the Atikokan range—and if the government would produce the iron by smelting the ore by means of electricity, seeing that there is ample power there, and then dispose of it to the iron foundries in the province at cost, on the same basis that the hydro electric commission of Ontario delivers power to the factories in the province, the government could not do better to develop the iron industry in the province. Though, as I believe, ore was first smelted in Canada a few miles north of Three Rivers, I do not think there is any doubt that the iron industry in quantity really began in Ontario. If there is iron in the province and it can be economically developed, it would be a considerable boon to the great iron industry of Ontario, which is our basic industry next to agriculture. Agriculture comes first and then iron. At the moment, so far as I remember, no iron is produced in the province, although many long years ago, away back in the 1820's, as I have said, in that little village of Normandale, on the shores of lake Erie, they smelted 900 tons of bog ore a year. I once saw in one of the Toronto newspapers the reproduction of an advertisement that appeared in 1830, indicating that 1,000 stoves had been received from the Normandale foundry. It is interesting to know that so long ago in this province we did smelt iron ore in a village that has passed away. Four hundred men were engaged in fabricating iron in that industry.

I am glad to endorse whatever the minister can do to develop mining. What he has said as regards the development of mines in this country, and their tremendous importance to Canada, is perfectly true, and it is all new money. If there is iron in Ontario, even in those places where it is now supposed to be extinct, and if iron can be produced in this province, the government should do whatever it can to assist in the development of the industry. It would result in a good deal of employment in Ontario factories.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): As my hon. friend from Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has told us something of the families originally settled in Normandale, I should like to inform him and the other members of the committee that the Van Normans came to the city of Brantford and associated themselves with the Watrous family, and the Watrous family established what was known as the Watrous Engine Works and is now known as Watrous Limited. I mention this that the committee may know that it is Watrous Limited of Brantford which manufactures a great deal of the mining machinery that is not now used in Norfolk, but is used in northern Ontario and all parts of Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: This afternoon I asked certain questions of the minister with reference to the number of persons likely to be employed as a result of this vote and other votes of a like kind. Perhaps the minister now has the information and can give it to the committee.

Mr. CRERAR: The total number of parties, as worked out to the present time by officers of the department, will be fifty-seven. There will be a total of 392 engaged in the work, or, including the chiefs of parties, 447.

Mr. HEAPS: I assume that most of the men who go on these parties will have had some technical training, probably in the universities. In spite of the fact that most of those young men will require a certain amount of training, has the minister had any difficulty in filling these vacancies?

Mr. CRERAR: No. I believe I intimated to my hon. friend this afternoon that there had not been any difficulty in filling the vacancies. These parties are staffed in the following way: There is a chief of the party. He has an assistant geologist, depending upon what particular field he is going to work in, and there are student assistants. These latter are selected from the various universities, from students who are taking up geology and mining engineering and are in their second, third or fourth year. They get their ratings through the civil service commission, and as a result of those ratings the commission give us a list from which the selections can be made. Then the selections are made on the ratings supplied by the commission. It is interesting to note, though it is not quite germane to the question my hon. friend has asked, that several of the universities of Canada are recognizing the importance of geological work and some of them are providing excellent courses. That is all to the good as far as this industry is concerned. I may be unduly optimistic, but I am of the opinion that, for the next ten or fifteen years at any rate, mining will be the large developing industry in this country. It is, if I may use the term, one of the coming industries for Canada during the next ten or fifteen years. We have to provide the technical men who are required, and it is a matter of satisfaction that bright young fellows are taking up the study of geology, mining engineering and electrical engineering. I have been told by some of the larger mining companies that they are experiencing some difficulty in getting technically trained men. The expansion of the industry in the last few years has been so rapid that the trained men graduating from the universities have had little difficulty in finding suitable work, and very often remunerative work, in this particular field of endeavour.

Mr. PERLEY: (Qu'Appelle): How many of these parties will go into northern Saskatchewan, and how many young men are being accepted from the university of Saskatchewan?

Mr. CRERAR: There will be seven parties out in Saskatchewan. I am unable to give my hon. friend information as to the latter part of his question, but I am informed that as far as possible students were taken from Saskatchewan university, in some cases students who graduated within the last few years and who are resident in Saskatchewan. So far as possible that method has been followed in staffing these parties.

Mr. GREEN: How many parties will there be in British Columbia, and in what parts of the province?

Mr. CRERAR: There will be ten geological parties and six topographical parties in British Columbia. It will be of interest to the committee to know that so far as Manitoba and British Columbia are concerned, under arrangements made, I think, at the time those provinces came into confederation the federal government has to carry on the geological survey work of those provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: That is in the British North America Act.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister say to which parts of British Columbia they are going?

Mr. CRERAR: There will be two parties in the Manson Creek area, that is about a hundred miles north and a little west of Prince George; there will be two parties in the Hazelton area; there will be another party working along the line of the Canadian National east of Prince Rupert; there is a party at Smithers; two parties in the Fort Fraser area; two parties in Keithley Creek and the Cariboo mountain; a party at Greenwood; a party at Tyaughton lake; two parties in the Nelson country, and another one in the Kettle river country.

Mr. BARBER: There are two items, 153 and 154. No. 153 does not, I take it, provide for field work; No. 154 provides for that. I notice that in each is included publications, purchase of books and instruments. Would the minister explain the difference in these two items?

Mr. CRERAR: We have really been discussing pretty much item 154.

Mr. BARBER: We are still on 153, I think.

Mr. CRERAR: Item 153 is for investigation of mineral resources and deposits, and so forth. It has to do largely with the investigational work that is done in the ore testing, ceramics and fuel-testing laboratories in Ottawa. This vote is to cover the expense incidental to that work, and also the purchase of equipment which may be necessary and the publications of the results of those investigations. I may say that we get requests from many parts of the world for these publications.

Mr. BARBER: The extra vote is to take care of that expense?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, vote No. 153 covers that.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the committee must be under a sense of obligation to the minister for the very frank and interesting statement he has made as to the development of our mining industry. I have read some of the addresses he made over the radio; I heard one of them, and I realize that the industry has become very important. But there are one or two observations I should like to make, not in any critical sense, but rather, I hope, in a way that will be helpful to the minister in dealing with some of the problems which he has to meet.

In the first place I think it highly undesirable that there should be duplication of effort. We have a national research bureau; we also have this research bureau for mines. And it must be remembered that outside the Northwest Territories we have not the remotest interest in these mines except as mining corporations may pay us taxes. There was a time when the crown in the right of the dominion had a direct interest in some of these mineral areas, but outside the Northwest Territories we now have none. One of the problems that every government in this country will have to face is the extent to which the federal power shall maintain facilities that are used by industries over which the provincial power has complete control in the matter of royalties and in the determination of the terms and conditions under which the industry shall be carried on. I found, as undoubtedly the minister has found, that the maintenance of this mines branch and this research bureau was in effect the maintenance of an organization which received its raw material entirely from outside,—I am eliminating the Northwest Territories for the moment—from provincial sources. When, not by the action of any province but solely because of economic conditions to which this country as a nation contributed, the price of gold went to $35 an ounce, and the suggestion was made that a portion of that increment between $20.67 and $35 should be paid into the national treasury, such a furore of opposition was created from one end of the country to the other on the part of the mining interests that I really thought it was an extremely unfair attitude to take. The nation and not the provinces had brought about the end by means of which these industries profited greatly. For example, they were able to use lower grade ore, that in days gone by they had abandoned, for the production of gold at $35 an ounce instead of $20.67, which was the former statutory value of it, and for which the dominion could continue to purchase gold if it so desired. Yet from their annual meetings they sent statements all over the world complaining to their shareholders that the dominion had taken a portion of this money, although it was a very small portion at that.

That brought to my mind as nothing else did the fact that here we were maintaining a research bureau at very substantial expense to dominion taxpayers; yet when an effort was made to secure a portion of the money that came to this industry by reason of national policies and the general economic structure of the nation a tremendous objection was made. Why, I used to receive letters from shareholders in the United States and other parts of the world complaining of the burden of taxation we imposed upon the gold mining industry of the country. That made me think then, as I now say to the minister: Why should we engage in research work? Why should the nation engage in that work when the matter is purely provincial? The province secures the royalties; the province controls the areas; the province owns the mines, as far as the crown is concerned. It is the crown in the right of the province, not in the right of the dominion.

The second point is that we are maintaining a research bureau of our own. Why should we maintain a second one for a specific particular kind of commodity? That was the second point, to which it was difficult for anyone to furnish an adequate answer. It is not as though our situation were similar to that of South Africa. I do not know whether the minister has had his attention directed to some of the reports of the great mining companies in South Africa, but I saw some a few days ago and put them to one side, intending to bring them here. There is a series of companies operating in the Rand in South Africa, and the taxes they pay to the state are so great that they bear a direct relation to the entire production of gold in that area. The Rand gold is extracted from quartz lying many hundreds, if not thousands, of feet below the surface. They have now completed their investigations, their diamond drill boring and so on, and they know that the Rand is capable of producing gold for a period of many years. Perhaps that gold production will continue well into the second century. That is why the other day South Africa paid off part of its national debt. That is why within a very short time South Africa will become a creditor nation. There has been a general disposition on the part of the proprietors of those mines, in Great Britain and elsewhere in the world, to complain as to the burden of taxation; yet they have paid handsomely and willingly.

I mention this because it has to do with the dominion engaging in research work in connection with this industry when we already have a research council, and in at least one of the provinces similar work is being done, though not to the same extent. I mention this to the minister lest in his enthusiasm for the mines he should forget that vast sums of money have been expended, at times when it was difficult to find money, and that it is no more than right that there should be some contribution back to the state in connection with that which belonged to the state and with which the state parted. The crown was trustee for all the people, and when the crown parted with any precious metal it did so on terms that involved the payment of a royalty of some kind. That always has been the law; that should be the law, and I assume it always will be the law. As trustee for all the people, not for a few of them, the crown has to distribute the burden as well as it can over those who are winning great rewards from the utilization of these resources which are vested in the crown as trustee for all the people.

Let me sum up that phase of the question by suggesting to the minister that he should investigate very closely the question of duplication and determine whether it is desirable, with respect to matters over which we have no control, to maintain research bureaux of this kind when we already have a great national research council which might do the work. That means that there is no coordination; that there is lack of effective, direct control over the whole enterprise; it means that one department, instead of making its contribution to the general research effort of the country, is maintaining its own organization for its own purposes. In the same way we have at Montreal a timber testing laboratory. It would be very difficult to justify that by any principle that could be thought of, since we have brought into being a general national research council.

Now we proceed to the second point to which I desire to direct attention, that is, that the influence which the winning of great mineral rewards has upon the nation as a whole is very subtle. I believe from what I have read that for every dollar which this country has taken out of mines it has probably put back two dollars, or perhaps five dollars; some put it as high as that. If hon. members ever took the trouble to think of the various mining stocks which they have owned at some time, I wonder how many have ever received any return from their expenditures? That has been going on all over the country. It is a dangerous thing to suggest that because, in some instances, there has been a certain measure of success, everybody is warranted in paying ten cents a share for the beautifully engraved certificate which, in the end, sometimes represents little or no value. I mention this because there are other branches of human endeavour of which we sometimes think too little, which produce very great rewards and much new wealth without the corresponding risk of loss of such vast sums as have been lost in mineral exploration in Canada. I should not care to repeat figures given to me by those who thought they were in a position to speak of the relationship of the expenditure to what we have been able to obtain—I am speaking now of the more precious metals, where the returns are great once you have returns, but where there have been so many failures—but I think the minister should keep that in mind, lest we too strongly emphasize one phase of our national economy.

Let me put this to the minister: What we are endeavouring to get is new wealth. Every new country desires to produce new wealth. The complement of that is that we desire to produce it as quickly as possible. That is the reason why vast sums are spent in endeavouring to find petroleum, because, when found, it brings immediate returns. And of course the same thing happened there; promoters immediately began to offer certificates. I am happy to say that I never did; I sold only one that I bought, though the temptation was very great; so I can speak on that point without any personal feeling. But this is the point; Petroleum, once it is found, brings immediate new wealth. Did hon. members ever think of the amount of time that must elapse from the moment a man kicks a piece of rock, picks it up, looks at it and thinks: There is evidence of a rich vein of gold, until the first gold brick comes from the area? Did hon. members ever think of the amount of money that has to be spent and the time that must elapse? On the other hand, if you happen to strike a pool of oil you get immediate returns.

But there is another side of the question. Take our wheat; wheat has become of tremendous importance in our national economy. Why? Because you sow it in the spring and reap the new wealth in the fall. The reaping of the new wealth in the fall meant that you had available within the period of a few months vast sums of money which represented the return from an effort made only a few months before. That is the distinction we must always keep in mind between the development of gold and mineral areas and the development of purely agricultural areas. Agricultural areas produce the new wealth almost at once; therefore agriculture must be the basic industry of a country such as this. Mineral development will produce new wealth, but sometimes you have to wait a long time for it. Unfortunately, also, it is a wasting asset, for whenever a ton of quartz is taken out of the ground, milled and the gold taken from it, it is so much waste material; it is gone forever, whereas the soil properly cared for by rotation of crops and the addition of fertilizer may continue to produce prolific crops for centuries. Those are the distinctions which I suggest the minister must keep in mind, because the change in the price of gold from $20 to $35 an ounce was a sudden one, and we are dependent upon that new price of gold for this abnormal development. There would never have been this enormous development but for the fact that what was formerly low grade ore has now become profitable. I mention this in order to suggest to the minister that we must never forget to maintain a proper balance. For instance, in an English journal the other day I read an article in which they quoted from the Minister of Mines, indicating that he thought the day of agriculture in Canada is about ended.

Mr. CRERAR: I never said that.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course the minister did not mean any such thing. I heard what he said and I saw it in print afterwards, but that is the construction that has been placed upon it, which indicates the absolute necessity of not putting too much emphasis upon any one particular industry in our economy. I say that the production of new wealth from mines and minerals has in the main been fraught with great uncertainty and the expenditure of vast sums of money and that the returns have very often been greatly delayed from the time the initial effort has been made. What kept this country solvent for twenty-five years is the fact that in that other branch of our national endeavour we had immediate returns of new wealth from the effort made during each year. Perhaps no one knows that better than the minister himself. I mention this fact merely because it is desirable that while we rejoice, as we all do, that our mineral production has increased from $25,000,000 to $222,000,000 in the period from 1901 to 1935—and it is a very great progress—at the same time all one has to do is to read Mr. Vaughan's life of the late Sir William Van Horne to realize that half a century ago when the first train of the Canadian Pacific railway reached Port Moody, no one was thinking that between the lakes and the mountains there was territory capable of producing new wealth to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars every year. Yet, for over a quarter of a century that territory was producing millions of dollars of new wealth year after year in the very year in which the effort was made. That has had the most significant influence upon our economic life of any single factor in our development, because never have so few people, as far as the ordinary history of the world is concerned, produced so much new wealth in a given time as has been produced within the last thirty years between the lakes and the mountains in this dominion. That, I think, is borne out by the statistics of world production.

I do not in any sense disparage the effort to assist in the development of our mineral resources; neither am I one who believes that because it is a wasting asset we should remember that we owe some obligation to posterity, because if we are right in our view there will be ample left for succeeding generations. But I am not unmindful of the fact that as I travelled over the Cariboo country I had pointed out to me localities where within the lifetime of men who were with me there had been considerable settlements and wealth had been produced by millions of dollars; yet that has all been abandoned, and the old Cariboo trail is but a memory of past greatness. All one has to do is to go to California and look upon the remnants of what was once a great industry there to realize that a wasting asset in our generation is after all, something to be thought of and considered when we are dealing with the question of the production of new wealth, for nothing is worse for the state as such, it has always seemed to me, than the spasmodic production of new wealth. That is the reason why agriculture is, and always will be, the basic industry of the country, and the difficulty with agriculture at the moment is to procure with extended production adequate markets. Even with the drought conditions we have had in the territory west of the lakes, agriculture is still the basic industry of Canada.

I am not saying this in any way of criticism of the minister or of the efforts he is making in developing the mining industry. I am simply observing that in order to maintain a proper balance one must never forget that great as is the mining industry and important as is the production of new wealth from that source, yet the greatest source of the production of new wealth in this country has been, during the twenty-five to thirty years of its greatest expansion, those vast agricultural lands between the lakes and the mountains, and notwithstanding anything that may be said to the contrary it is to agriculture we must look for the stable production of that new wealth which is essential for the continued steady development of this dominion and its economic life. If we undertake, I repeat, the duplication of existing facilities —and we are undertaking them without getting any thanks, getting nothing but complaints at what we secure by way of taxes from those who receive the benefits—I think we might consider the whole situation in the light of the factors which, I believe, are important at least in determining the policies we should pursue with respect to the development of mineral and other areas and industries of this country.

Mr. CRERAR: I find myself in agreement with practically all that my right hon. friend has said.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope the minister does not think he is wrong because he is in agreement with me.

Mr. CRERAR: No; once in a while both might be right. I certainly agree with what my right hon. friend has said as to the importance of agriculture in the country's economic life. No one who has studied its record can be blind to the fact that that great area in the prairie provinces which has suffered so severely in the last four or five years has in its time, as it will do again, produced a very great deal of new wealth.

Whether the research laboratories of the mines branch should be brought under the national research council is a matter of opinion.

Mr. BENNETT: It is.

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly the laboratories were established long before the research council, and established at a time when I believe scarcely a province had a department of mines. Whether they should be maintained separately might be debatable. But in the field of agriculture, the great basic industry of this dominion, the federal government has assumed the responsibility of establishing experimental farms in practically every province.

Mr. BENNETT: The constitution by section 94 provides for that.

Mr. CRERAR: I was not aware of that.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, my hon. friend was Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. CRERAR: I am not so familiar with the constitution as is my right hon. friend. At any rate this branch of the Department of Mines has been efficient in its work.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree.

Mr. CRERAR: Whether or not it should be put under the research council is a matter of opinion. I am informed by my deputy, who is a member of the research council, that the work of the council and of this branch of the Department of Mines is coordinated; there is cooperation between them, doubtless with the objective of getting the best results. So far as economy is concerned, I doubt whether very much would be saved by putting the mines branch under the research council.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will look at the report of the national research council and then look at the laboratories of the Department of Mines, he will see that there has been duplication. That is all I have to say.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not wish to see duplication that involves the unnecessary expenditure of public money. I appreciate what my right hon. friend has said about my enthusiasm for mines.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not a fault.

Mr. CRERAR: He was hardly putting it correctly. If he had spoken of my enthusiasm for mining development I would have agreed with him.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): We have heard several interesting discourses on mining and we must all be more enlightened than when we came into the house. There has been very little said that was of a controversial nature. There is one question, however, to which I wish to direct the attention of hon.

members, and that is with regard to taxation. Personally I cannot see why the mining industry should be singled out for this taxation.

Mr. BENNETT: What taxation does the hon. gentleman mean?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): I understood the right hon. leader of the opposition to say that he had received from the people interested in mining a number of complaints against the taxation which had been directed against mines.

Mr. BENNETT: No; against the tax on the difference between the statutory price for gold of $20.67 and $35. We did impose a tax upon the increment between $20.67 and $35, and there was keen criticism and a great deal of objection to it. That was the particular tax I was speaking of. I am sorry if I did not make myself clear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): I was just going to say that we had spent a great deal of money on agriculture, fishing, shipping and a great many other things, and that we had done more research for these other industries than we had done for mining. Apparently I misunderstood my right hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

Mines—salaries, $530,152.75; contingencies, $20,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What changes are there in this item?

Mr. CRERAR: There is an increase of two employees in the staff of the mines department, as will be noticed by the details on pages 87 and 88 of the estimates. The extra positions provided for are: one geologist, one assistant geologist, and one editor. Offsetting this, the salary of one stenographer, grade 2, has been dropped. Provisions has to be made for the three new positions as they were recreated early in the fall of 1935 as a consequence of the relaxation of staff control regulations by order in council of July 16, 1933, whereby effect could be given to acting promotions made at earlier dates. The increase of $9,994.57 in the vote is due, first, to the salaries of these three positions and, second, to the statutory increases that apply.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not going to deal with this at length because it would not be fair to do so in view of the fact that the government has been responsible for this department for only a few months. I have always been curious—I never got round to getting an adequate answer—as to why we should engage in the museum business without undertaking any real work with respect to the national museum. We have a palæobotanist; we have an invertebrate palæontologist; we have an archæologist and we have other "ologists;" we have our editors and our statisticians; I have found that we are endeavouring to maintain in each department a self-contained structure. In view of the union that is about to take place between the Department of Mines and other departments it struck me that this item in its present form was hardly an adequate expression of what it was hoped to do. This department is to be merged with other departments; other considerations will enter into its administration, and I can say now that the former Minister of Mines, Mr. Murphy, along with a group of officials in other departments, prepared a memorandum looking towards the union of this department with other departments and what might be effected in the way of reductions. I cannot say that everybody agreed to the reductions. If the minister will look at the list of 198 people on pages 87 and 88 of the estimates, I think he will have a clear understanding of what I mean.

Mr. CRERAR: I have looked at it.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no doubt the minister has looked at it. I certainly appreciate his feeling in that regard, but I suggest to him that the uniting of this department with other departments offers an admirable opportunity for the minister and his staff to take drastic steps in the way of the reform of what I regard as the tendency, not in this department alone but in all departments, to create a self-contained unit of the public service in each department. It was not easy to break this down and it has not been entirely broken down, but at some time or another it is bound to be. Take, for instance, the creation of assistant deputy ministers. There was about as much necessity for that position in this country as there is for a fifth wheel to a coach. Yet the minute one department had an assistant deputy minister, every other department wanted one. One department was not to be outdone by another and the result is that we have an assistant deputy minister in, I believe, every department of the public service.

Mr. REID: The government can hire but never fire.

Mr. BENNETT: The striking evidence during the last few weeks and months is hardly an adequate expression of that fact. I can only say that judging from what I have myself observed during the last few months. Probably the minister will say that they were but copying their predecessors in that regard. Be that as it may, I think there is room for a complete reorganization in that regard. The Department of Mines is an efficient department and I think it reflects great credit upon the deptuy head, but I think if you said to him, "Go and cut down that staff by twenty-five per cent," he would do so and have a more efficient organization than he has to-day.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

Topographical and air survey bureau—

From topographical and air surveys, compiling, drawing, printing and distributing, geographical base maps for all purposes, issuing technical instructions for air photography and reconnaissance, under supervision of committee on air surveys and base maps; land and mining claim surveys of all remaining dominion lands (Northwest Territories, dominion parks, ordnance lands); preparing electoral district maps; maintaining central office for indexing, filing and recording of survey notes and plans, and the distribution of maps, et cetera, $104,600.

Amount required to provide for the purchase of air photographs or negatives for adding to the national air photographic library, $5,000.

Amount required to pay the fees of the board of examiners for D.L.S., of the secretary and of the subexaminers and for travelling expenses, stationery, printing, rent of room and furniture, etc. (the fees of Messrs. F. H. Peters, W. M. Tobey and Harry Parry, members of the board and J. A. Coté, secretary, are to be paid out of this sum), $820.

To assist in printing the publications of the Canadian Institute of Surveying (formerly the Association of Dominion Lands Surveyors), $350—Total, $110,770.

Mr. STIRLING: Earlier in the evening the minister gave a description of certain survey parties which were being sent out in the various provinces. He was then dealing with the vote in the special supplementary estimates?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Could the minister give similar information in connection with this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: There is one large party in Quebec round Joliet. There is a large party in Ontario east of Sudbury, and two small observing parties in the Northwest Territories, north and east of Great Slave lake. That is the topographical and air survey work planned for this year.

Mr. STIRLING: Does that mean that no further air surveys will be made in order to get on with the air map of Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: The work is proceeding of the classification of all these air photographs that have been taken, and some additional ones are being taken this year by these particular parties. A considerable amount of that work has been done. So far as air mapping this year is concerned, we are endeavouring to direct it to the areas where it will be perhaps most immediately useful.

Mr. BENNETT: I would gather that the item of $5,000 is to be paid to the Department of National Defence for the photographs taken. That is to say, they do the work and the Department of the Interior purchases the photographs. Is that right?

Mr. CRERAR: Some of the provincial governments take air photographs which we can utilize in the collection that we are making, and this represents the amount that may be expended, or the estimate of the amount that will be required for the purchase of such air photographs. It simply supplements the photographic work that the department has already done.

Mr. STIRLING: Does that apply to Ontario only?

Mr. CRERAR: No, not Ontario only.

Mr. STIRLING: Photographs taken by the provinces?

Mr. CRERAR: I believe it is mainly in Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. MacNICOL: In northern Ontario?

Mr. BENNETT: Here again the question of duplication comes up. The Department of National Defence is taking photographs in connection with the development of its air service. So far as I know, the Department of the Interior has not at present any air force for the purpose of taking photographs.

Mr. CRERAR: We have no air force.

Mr. BENNETT: These aerial photographs are being taken by the Department of National Defence for the purpose of affording opportunities to men in training. That was what was intended—to afford opportunities to men in training to get experience in the air, taking photographs of the country over which they pass. But this item apparently is for the purpose of developing the survey work which they have done. As I remember, it was thought that this item would not continue to increase, and though apparently it is not increasing it is still over $100,000.

Mr. CRERAR: I understand that there is a coordinating committee and all these air surveys and pictures are correlated for the purpose of producing maps. I appreciate fully, I hope, the need of doing away with overlapping in the various government departments. I do not know that blame can be attached anywhere particularly—

Mr. BENNETT: I agree.

Mr. CRERAR: —because this condition has simply developed. I was surprised, when I endeavoured to make a brief survey of the numerous branches under my direction, to find that there were duplications. I shall not attempt to suggest why it happened in that particular way. I will say, however, that my earnest effort is going to be directed towards creating an efficient administrative unit, and from my experience in the past I maintain that where you have duplication of expense and duplication of effort you have not efficiency.

Mr. STIRLING: I think that in this case the coordinating committee set up for this purpose has been successful in its survey work and in cutting out duplication. It is all under the direction of that coordinating committee and each of the contributing departments fits into the scheme in accomplishing what the committee arranges.

Mr. CRERAR: That is largely true.

Item agreed to.

Geodetic Survey of Canada—
Control operations—precise levelling based on mean sea level, triangulation, geodetic astronomy and investigations—all basic for correlation of water areas, power developments, charts and maps and for the scientific study of the earth's crust, curvature, figure and dimensions. The above is the recognized basis of operations for federal and provincial departments, municipal authorities and engineering projects over the whole country, $134,600.
To recoup the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway Commission in connection with their claim for injury to John Hedin, $240—Total, $134,840.

Mr. CRERAR: I have a note with respect to geodetic survey, which is a little beyond my knowledge. I will read for the information of the committee this note with regard to the functions of the Geodetic Survey of Canada. They are:

To determine the geographical positions of horizontal control points throughout Canada by means of geodetic triangulation, geodetic traverse, geodetic astronomy and radio observations, all points being based on the North American datum.

If the members of the committee are any wiser after hearing that description of the functions of the geodetic survey—well, I simply congratulate them. What is a little more intelligible, to me at any rate, is the following:

To establish bench marks throughout Canada by means of precise level observations, whose elevations are based on mean sea level; and by collecting, correlating and adjusting the results of engineering levelling to place all elevations in Canada on the same sea level datum.

I understand that these are the means by which accurate surveys are made. I do not know that I can add anything to that.

Mr. BENNETT: Two years ago it was suggested that a new method of ascertaining these points might be followed with success, at not so great cost, in connection with the actual work. Of course, this necessitates actual travelling over the areas to fix the points, having regard to the conditions that prevail from the standpoint of the magnetic needle and matters of that sort, and higher mathematics must be had recourse to. The exact point is located by triangulation and the fixed stars, and a few factors of that sort, the method being the same by which Columbus steered his course to America. It is a highly complicated application of higher mathematics. A few years ago the matter was brought to the attention of the government and an effort was made to devise a new plan to lessen the expense, in view of modern scientific developments. I do not know how far it got, because at that time it was only in its infancy, and I do not suppose that anything further has been done. This method of geodetic survey has for its object a thoroughly legal and complete description of points in this country. It has been going on now for a very long time, I think little by little for a period of at least twenty-five to thirty years, and it will not be finished for another twenty-five or thirty years, if then. For instance, we have been settling the boundary between the United States and Canada, and as far as I know now there is at least ten years' work in sight before it is concluded. The point I desired to make was whether any success had been achieved in devising a less expensive way of doing the work. At the present time it is very costly.

Mr. REID: A few moments ago I asked the minister with regard to making surveys of the inlets and the bays of the Pacific coast of British Columbia. I am not sure whether this matter arises under this item, but I should like the information. What I have particularly to say is—and he can tell me if I am wrong—that I think more attention should be paid to the surveying of the Pacific coast. Hon. members will realize that when I tell them that the Japanese fishermen have better surveys, obtained from their own country, of our Pacific coast than we have in British Columbia. The Japanese fishermen using this coast have up to date maps of our coast. It is just about time we took note that we are very far behind in the making of surveys. Surely we should have modern surveys of our own coast line. It almost makes one hang one's head in shame to see these Japanese in possession of better maps than any that are available to us. I would ask the minister to look into the matter and see that more survey work is done so that our own people can have up to date maps of our bays and inlets going all the way from the United States boundary line to Alaska.

Mr. BENNETT: I might point out that that is under the Marine department. Hydrographic surveys have been going on steadily for a period of fifteen or twenty years, but the truth is that in the main we still rely upon the British admiralty charts for much of our, shall I say, authentic information in connection with the bays and inlets and harbours of the country, but we are making some progress. On the Pacific coast it has been slow. I am sorry to say that what the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has said is true. Another country can give us hydrographic maps of the west coast of British Columbia that are more complete than any we have available. Such as we have are, in the main, those that were completed for us by the British admiralty many years ago. Our own hydrographic work has been very, very slowly done. I think we have now a fairly complete map of Vancouver island and of that area on the west coast which runs from Vancouver harbour north to as far as Powell river, or somewhere in that locality, but beyond that, up towards Prince Rupert, I think there is nothing.

Mr. REID: Nothing done at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Except there is something in the Queen Charlotte area and up towards Prince Rupert, which was done in a preliminary sort of way when that ship, the name of which is probably known to the hon. member for New Westminster, spent a summer there before confederation in doing hydrographic work. Beyond that I fear little or nothing has been done.

Item agreed to.

International Boundary Commission — expenses connected with the maintenance in a state of effective demarcation of the international boundary, $29,200.

Mr. CRERAR: This is mainly in connection with the international boundary.

Mr. BENNETT: How far is that work done now? I am curious to know.

Mr. CRERAR: I am told that this is maintenance I understand the vote varies to some extent from year to year.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. But the line near where the Premier mine is situated—Alaska is on the other side—was completed about twelve or fifteen years ago. The line travelling east from British Columbia over the mountain areas and then along the plains has been all marked; I do not know how far this demarcation has been done in the east. I remember looking up the mountain side and seeing the clearing that had marked the boundary line as defined by the surveyors of that time. Of course the line has been there ever since the last arbitration took place in the far west, which was finally settled by the old emperor of Germany, but as I understand it this work takes care of the demarcation of the exact spot and the marking of the lines by proper cairns. The line was down in southern British Columbia, between there and the United States. I just wondered how far it had been completed in the way of permanent markings. I do not know.

Mr. CRERAR: I understand it is practically completed. There are a few places, such as my right hon. friend refers to, where matters are still under discussion as between the United States commissioners and the Canadian commissioners.

Mr. BENNETT: It is nothing very important.

Mr. CRERAR: That is so. The main part of the vote, however, is for the maintenance of the monuments that mark the international line.

Item agreed to.

Government of the Northwest Territories—salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the Northwest Territories Act and ordinances, Northwest Game Act and regulations, Eskimo affairs, Wood Buffalo park, reindeer industry, game preserves and sanctuaries, wolf bounties, exploration, investigation and development of natural resources, fire protection, construction and maintenance of buildings, schools, hospitals and roads, relief to destitute, maintenance and transportation of prisoners and insane patients, equipment and supplies, contingencies, et cetera, $187,700.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to mention the case of Mr. Douglas, the stipendiary magistrate in the Northwest Territories. It was said that he was removed from his position for the purposes of economy. He was appointed some years ago; I think he was in the house when the Minister of the Interior was here; and I noticed in the press that he was removed. I put a question on the order paper, and the reply was that he was removed because the duties had been taken over by somebody in the Department of the Interior, as a matter of economy. What official took over his duties?

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Douglas was removed from his position, or rather the position was discontinued and the duties assigned to Mr. Norquay. The two of them were under salary, and the duties discharged by Mr. Douglas, which I think were magisterial duties of a kind in the Northwest Territories—he lived in Edmonton—were taken over by Mr. Norquay. The reason as given to me is the one that was stated in the answer to the question.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, I have no doubt as to that.

Mr. CRERAR: I think the appointment was really under the Department of Justice, but the salary was paid by our department.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it might be well to ask the minister a few questions, in order that the public may understand how the administration of the Northwest Territories is carried on. Perhaps the minister would indicate how the Northwest Territories are governed at the present moment through the Department of the Interior, how its ordinances are enacted, how they receive the authority of law, with what subjects they deal, the general scheme of administration in connection with mining recorders, fishing regulations, policing, radio and other matters affecting the well-being of that enormous area. Perhaps the minister would indicate something as to the population, the number of white people who are supposed to be within the area and the number of Indians. It seems to me it would be helpful to have that on record, because nowadays many people are interested in the Northwest Territories, having regard to the mineral development that is taking place there.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know that I can give all the information my right hon. friend has suggested.

Mr. BENNETT: Many members of the house are new, and I thought they would like to know something about that vast area.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. CRERAR: I am, in a way, new too, as far as the Northwest Territories are concerned. On the basis of the 1931 census the total population is 9,723, of whom 1,007 were classed as white, 4,046 as Indians and 4,670 as Eskimos. I take it that the Eskimo population is largely an estimate; probably it was not made up by actual count, but at any rate the records available give the population as I have just stated it. The government is carried on by a council under the Minister of the Interior. There is a commissioner, a deputy commissioner and five councillors, appointed by the governor general in council. The commissioner in council has power to make ordinances for the government of the territory under the instructions of the governor general in council or the Minister of the Interior, respecting direct taxation within the territories in order to raise revenue, and so on; the establishment and tenure of territorial offices and the appointment of officials; maintenance of prisons; municipal institutions; licences; solemnization of marriage; property and civil rights; administration of justice and generally all matters of a local nature. That covers a considerable range. Fortunately the population is not very large, so the duties are not very heavy.

Mr. BENNETT: It is practically section 92 of the British North America Act applied to the Northwest Territories.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. That is vested in the federal authority.

Mr. HEAPS: Perhaps the minister might give the committee the total cost of the government of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. CRERAR: The vote for this year, covering the matters mentioned under the item we are discussing, is $187,700, which is a reduction of some $60,000 from last year.

Mr. HEAPS: But there are some other costs which should be added in order to give the total cost of government in the Northwest Territories, are there not?

Mr. CRERAR: This is all that comes under this department. There are other matters under other departments, such as the maintenance of the police, any public works that might be undertaken, and so on.

Mr. BENNETT: The radio.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, the radio which is under the Marine department, and so on.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Is there a similar system in the Yukon territory?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, to some extent similar.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no elective assembly in the Northwest Territories at the moment. Government is carried on by this council of seven members who sit in Ottawa and pass the ordinances to which reference has been made. Would the minister tell me how many people are receiving salaries in the Northwest Territories and what salaries they receive?

Mr. CRERAR: There are twelve in the head office at Ottawa, and the total salaries will be $14,364, according to the estimate, after allowing for the deduction of five per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: How many in the territories?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that there are two mining inspectors, two clerks and a number of medical officers.

Mr. BENNETT: Where are the mining inspectors now?

Mr. CRERAR: At Fort Smith and Cameron Bay. The medical officers are located at Fort Smith, Aklavik, Chesterfield, Pagnirtung, Resolution, Great Bear Lake, Fort Simpson and Good Hope. The last four are part-time officers.

Mr. BENNETT: Are there any other administrative officers? Of course the police come under another item.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. I think the only other senior official we have is the man in charge of the reindeer station.

Mr. BENNETT: Does any one of the seven governors of the Northwest Territories reside there? Either the chairman or the deputy chairman was there at one time. Is he still there?

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Cumming is at Fort Smith.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister would tell us about the reindeer now.

Mr. CRERAR: The herd has been safely delivered on the east side of the Mackenzie river after a journey from Alaska that occupied the better part of three years. The last report we had in August gave the number in the herd as 2,960.

Mr. STIRLING: As of what date?

Mr. CRERAR: At the round-up in August last.

Mr. BENNETT: How many left Alaska? I did know but I have forgotten.

Mr. CRERAR: About 3,000 left Alaska, and there were 2,370 delivered. Evidently there was some mortality on the way. I hope this reindeer herd will justify the high expectations that were held in regard to it when the enterprise was undertaken. It is necessary, I am informed, to maintain guards for the reindeer to prevent decimation by wolves and Eskimos. There is an assistant superintendent and several labourers. The total cost is estimated this year as $21,800, covering everything.

Mr. BENNETT: I think if the minister will look he will find that the arrangement is older than three years. I think Mr. Stewart, his predecessor in office, made the arrangement. At one time it was not quite certain whether they were going to be got over at all, but they were finally got over.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Some of them went back.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I think that is true; they fled from the wrath to come. They had heard of these Eskimos and Indians and wolves that the minister has been speaking of, and they went back. The $21,000 surely involves more than the mere keep and caring for the reindeer. We have got them safe now on this side of the Mackenzie river and now their lives are threatened by the wolves; we pay a bounty for killing wolves and we also take care of the Eskimo, so the problem is: What is going to happen to the reindeer? Santa Claus will perhaps come down with them.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, to be perfectly frank, I know very little about these reindeer. I believe I am correct in saying that certainly no responsibility can attach to my right hon. friend or his government.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, I was not speaking about that.

Mr. CRERAR: I think the intention was a very good one, and they may serve a very useful purpose. It seems to me that as the years pass the federal government is being pushed further and further into responsibility for looking after the native inhabitants of this country. From my brief experience in the department I imagine I can foresee that the government's responsibility to the Eskimo is likely to increase rather than to decrease.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is sound.

Mr. CRERAR: If we can provide them with means of subsistence I think it is good business, and when I reflect on the fact, which

I think I mentioned to the committee when the estimates of the Indian Affairs department were before it, that we paid out in relief last year about $900,000 for the care of Indians, I aim to create, if possible, conditions that will prevent the Eskimo from coming on relief. How far the reindeer will help in that direction remains to be seen.

Mr. BENNETT: If we do not try to civilize the Eskimos they will never be on relief.

Mr. HEAPS: It is only civilized people who are on relief.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the minister say whether the reindeer are staying put, or are they wandering?

Mr. CRERAR: They are herded.

Mr. STIRLING: The idea was that they should go into that area and spread, was it not?

Mr. CRERAR: They are under the care of herdsmen; they travel, I understand, over a considerable area in order to find pasturage. In the autumn they are rounded up into their winter quarters.

Mr. BENNETT: No; we set aside an area for them.

Mr. CRERAR: They are brought into winter quarters where the herbage is such that they can feed during the winter.

Mr. BENNETT: The whole reason the reindeer were brought into that area is to afford food for the Eskimo, because they can live under the conditions that prevail in that part of the world.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister know whether they are herded in the land they come from?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; I understand that the reindeer industry in Alaska is quite considerable. These reindeer were brought from Alaska; they were purchased from a corporation which was a large holder of reindeer in Alaska, and which, I understand, makes a business of shipping reindeer meat to points in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a Christmas delicacy sent to New York, and that sort of thing.

Item agreed to.

Government of the Yukon Territory—
Salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the territory, including surveys, $42,000.
Grant to the Yukon council for local purposes, the construction and maintenance of roads and such other expenditures as the commissioner is authorized to expend by and with the advice and consent of the council or any committee thereof; and the accounts with respect to such expenditure shall be subject to examination and audit by the auditor general as provided by section 22, chapter 215, revised statutes, 1927, $70,000—Total, $112,000.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In connection with the old claims filed in the Yukon many years ago, has any machinery been set up by the department or through the gold commissioner by which these claims can be cleared away? Back in 1897-98, when the rush was on, thousands of claims were staked in the Yukon, some of which were proved up and then abandoned, or the people who owned them are dead to-day or have thrown them up. But with the increased price of gold another move is now starting into that part of the country. If the titles of those old claims are not cleared up it will be impossible for people to file on them again. Has anything been done by the department to clear up the claims staked at that time so that the ground can be staked now by newcomers?

Mr. CRERAR: I think this is the first time this question has come to my attention.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one big company still operating.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes, the Treadgold company. But there are many thousands of claims that might be staked again.

Mr. BENNETT: I saw their report not long since; they apparently did not make much money last year.

Mr. CRERAR: The information given to me is that the owners of these claims in many instances have moved away; the larger companies have been acquiring them, I assume, by purchase, and they are being operated by these larger companies.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): But many claims that were staked there have been abandoned. The locators may have proved up or they may not, but as with certain oil leases, once claims are applied for and the fees paid they must go to public auction in order to be acquired by someone else.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the grants all contain provisions that certain operations have to be commenced within a given time, failure to do which empowers the crown to give notice cancelling the right, such as it is. The hon. member will perhaps remember the Polson case which went to the privy council, that decided the validity of the notice, since which time the department has been very particular to give the notice in the manner prescribed by law. Once the notice is given the claim is cancelled.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I have in mind that there will be many pieces of ground which the prospectors may want to stake again and on which there has been no notice given. It is impossible for such claims to be restaked unless these old titles are cleared away.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the Yukon council now have power to clear the titles.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think any difficulty should arise, because even if the owners have moved away these original claims are registered, and if a patent has been issued the authorities would not issue a new registration on a claim already held by someone else.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Many people went in to the Yukon as prospectors, staked claims, proved up on them and possibly did not have enough money to carry on, or did not feel that it was a good enough stake, but to-day with the different price of gold it might be a good enough stake. Now, if such a man has died leaving no heirs to take the claim over, there is a blank piece of ground that might be staked by another prospector, but under present conditions it cannot be staked. Is there no way of cleaning that up so that development can go on?

Mr. BENNETT: If a patent has issued, obviously the title to the property has passed to somebody else. If no patent has issued the claim may be terminated for non-working. There is either a grant or no grant. If there is a grant there is a patent; the property is dealt with as ordinary property because it belongs to the heirs, and we have no jurisdiction over it. If no patent has issued, there is nothing but a claim, which can be forfeited by reason of non-working, and it would then become available for restaking.

In view of the fact that it was not expected we should reach this item to-night, and as the hon. member for the Yukon (Mrs. Black) is not present and wishes to make some observations with respect to the item, perhaps the minister will let it stand.

Mr. CRERAR: Under the circumstances I shall be very glad to do so.

Item stands.

For a copy of the report of Price Waterhouse and Company, Union Trust building, Winnipeg, Manitoba, dated January 25, 1936, being an audit and a special review of the accounts of Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited in respect of their operations dealing with the crop of 1930 pools, including the stabilizing operations from September 1, 1930, to October 31, 1935.

GOVERNMENT HOLIDAYS

EFFECT UPON MEN EMPLOYED ON DAY LABOUR BASIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since it is a very great hardship for men employed on a day labour basis at an hourly rate of pay to be expected to forego a day's work, will the government consider the advisability, in making proclamation of a holiday for any purpose, of providing that such holiday shall be with pay? Otherwise the proceeding bears very heavily upon a certain section of the community.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker the government has not given special consideration to the point mentioned by my hon. friend beyond that which it has received at different times. We shall be glad however further to consider the suggestion.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CLAIMS OF FIRST AND SECOND GRAND TRUNK PREFERENCE SHAREHOLDERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): About six weeks ago I directed a question to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe) and to the government regarding the attitude that the government might take towards the first and second preference stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway and their claims, or alleged claims. It was pointed out at that time by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe) that the matter was before the privy council, and, to quote his words:

As far as I know the decision has not been handed down.

I am of the opinion that the matter is still sub judice.

The minister added that he would look into it. At that time the matter was before the privy council, but since then the privy council has rendered a decision, so that it is no longer sub judice. I should like to direct to the ministry and to the Minister of Railways in particular the questions I submitted previously: first, whether the claims advanced by the junior and senior preference stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway are receiving the attention of the government, and if so, what action is proposed in regard thereto; and second, would the government consider the advisability of submitting this matter to a committee of the house.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give me notice of these questions. His statement that the matter has been disposed of by the recent privy council decision is hardly correct. The Grand Trunk action was directed against the crown and also against the Canadian National Railways as successors to the former Grand Trunk. Two points were involved: one, that the names of the former shareholders should be put back on the registry and the name of the Minister of Finance removed as owner of the stocks, and two, an action for damages for having been deprived of the shares. Inferentially, the validity of the arbitration and acquisition was in question. The judgment held that the petitioners could not proceed against the crown in the matter at issue except by petition of right and the granting of a fiat. However, there was nothing to prevent their proceeding in an action for damages, if any, as against the Canadian National Railways as successors to the former Grand Trunk, and the matter is therefore still in litigation and thus sub judice.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister says the matter is still in litigation. What action is pending?

Mr. HOWE: The shareholders have been granted the right to take action against the Canadian National Railways for damages. That action can be begun at any time.

Mr. STEVENS: With all due respect, I submit that is not an action that is "at present pending."

CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY WATER

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine) moved the third reading of Bill No. 68, respecting the carriage of goods by water.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BANK OF CANADA

MAJORITY CONTROL BY GOVERNMENT OF CAPITAL STOCK AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Bank of Canada Act so as to increase the capital stock of the bank, to provide that certain shares thereof shall be purchased by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund in order to assure ownership of a majority of the shares by the government, to increase the number of directors, and to provide for election and appointment of directors in such manner as to assure voting control of the board by directors appointed by the government.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, this resolution precedes the introduction of a bill which will provide for certain important amendments to the Bank of Canada Act, in order to implement the announcement made in the speech from the throne that parliament would be asked to make such changes in the ownership and control of the Bank of Canada as may be necessary to give to the government a predominant interest in the ownership as well as effective control of the bank.

The bill which this resolution seeks authority to introduce provides among other things for two important and significant changes in the constitution of the Bank of Canada. These changes are: First, the issue of an additional $5,100,000 of capital stock of the bank, to be purchased by the Minister of Finance and held by him on behalf of the Dominion of Canada. This will ensure a predominance of public ownership in the shares of our central bank. Second, the appointment by the government of additional directors of the bank with sufficient voting power to give the government a majority control of the board of directors both immediately and permanently.

There are other changes of lesser importance in the bill to be introduced. Most of these are consequent upon the changes in the capital stock and in the directorate to which I have just referred, but others are being made to clear up ambiguities in the wording of the present act or to provide for changes which experience has shown to be desirable. I might call special attention to one other amendment, which provides that Bank of Canada notes in future will be bilingual instead of some being printed in the English language and some in the French language, as at present.

I should like now to discuss the factors which have led the government to propose amendments to the constitution of the bank providing for a predominant interest by the public in the ownership and also voting control of the bank. In the first place, the fundamental consideration is that the primary function of a central bank is to regulate the volume of currency and credit in use, and this is so vital a national function that it should not be left to the control of private interests. The issue of currency has always been regarded as a prerogative of the crown. It is true that in all modern countries during the growth and development of banking practice, the use of bank notes, and particularly of cheques drawn against bank deposits, has come largely to supplant in the business world the use of hand to hand currencies. The significance of this amazing development of bank credits as the chief form of purchasing power was not at first perceived, and it is only in comparatively recent times that governmental authorities and monetary experts—and indeed central bankers themselves—have come to realize that the primary function of a central bank was not to make loans to a necessitous government or to provide other banking services but rather to control the volume of credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation. Some of the leading central banks of the world, including the Bank of England, can trace their origin to the financial needs of a hard pressed sovereign of government. To-day such assistance to a government is regarded as an incidental function of rather minor importance, and one which must be subordinated to the major function of controlling credit and currency.

If in olden times it was considered essential for the sovereign to retain control over coinage, it is enormously more important to-day that sovereign governments should retain control over credit. Consider for a moment what the function means; read the preamble to the Bank of Canada Act:

> Whereas it is desirable to establish a central bank in Canada to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation, to control and protect the external value of the national monetary unit and to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and generally to promote the economic and financial welfare of the dominion. . . .

That is the preamble to the present Bank of Canada Act, and one may well ask whether it is appropriate that a privately controlled institution should control and protect the external value of the monetary unit. Is it not the government's function to determine what our monetary standard shall be; whether our dollar shall be 23·22 grains or 15 grains of fine gold; whether in these days we shall tie our dollar to the pound sterling or to the United States dollar or allow it to fluctuate half way between those two currencies. It may be said on behalf of the Bank of Canada that in performing this function the bank would merely endeavour to carry out what the national policy, that is, the government's policy, happened to be at the time. In other words, if the government went back on the gold standard at $35 an ounce it would be the task of the bank so to regulate the volume of credit in the country that our dollar would remain at par, fluctuating of course only within the gold points, in terms of other gold currencies. Or if we decided to tie up with sterling at a certain fixed rate it would be the task of the bank to buy and sell exchange in such a way as to maintain the pegged rate with the pound sterling. I am confident that this would be the way in which the bank under its present management would interpret its functions. But is this a sufficient assurance for the future? Is it not possible to conceive of a privately controlled central bank in conflict with the government, refusing to carry out the declared national policy? The only way by which such eventualities can be prevented is by assuring adequate government control of the bank.

Again: Is it appropriate for a government to leave to a privately controlled institution the stabilization functions which are contemplated by the preamble to the act which I have just read? The preamble contemplates that the Bank of Canada shall, by the appropriate mechanisms—chiefly open market operations and manipulation of the rediscount rate—set influences at work which will tend at times to expand credit and at other times to contract credit, with a view to securing a greater degree of stability in the level of production, trade and employment. In other words, when a boom is on the way and getting out of hand it will be the duty of the bank to put on the brakes, so to speak, by restricting credit, thus tending to cause a decline in prices and to slow down the whole tempo of business and speculative activity. Conversely, in a time of depression it will be the duty of the bank to bring influences to bear to expand credit, thus tending to raise prices and generally to quicken the tempo of business activity.

Surely it is not necessary to stress how important are such functions of the bank. If the bank can by monetary action do something to level off the peak of the boom and to fill in the valley of the depression; if it can, as the preamble to the act contemplates, "mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment," it will make an important contribution to the economic welfare of this country. But, mark you, it will be affecting the life and the income of every man, woman and child in the dominion, and it will be affecting various groups and individuals unequally. Changing price levels help some people, some industrial groups, some economic areas, but hurt others. One need only recall the different ways and the degrees to which debtors and creditors, wage earners, bondholders and stockholders, farmers and manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, and so on, were affected by the collapse of prices in 1929. Indeed the whole depression can be largely related to the fall in prices and the inequalities in various kinds of prices which resulted therefrom. These changes in price levels which bring so much loss to one group and gain to another are probably inevitable under our economic system, and the central bank should mitigate rather than aggravate them.

But the point is that for the first time in this country we have an institution which is charged with the function of regulating credit and currency, and which therefore will consciously and deliberately set influences to work which will affect the price level as well as the level of production, trade and employment. Surely this is too vital a function to leave in the hands of a privately controlled institution. If this function is to be performed at all it should only be by an institution under adequate government control. This is my main point, Mr. Chairman; in fact it is the sum and substance of the whole matter. The matter of credit and currency control is of such vital importance to the national welfare that there should remain no possible doubt as to where this prerogative and the final responsibility therefor should rest. The government therefore contend that the statutes of this country should place in the name of the dominion the predominant ownership of the Bank of Canada, and should assign to the government in the interests of all, the determining voice on the board of directors of the bank.

There are, however, a few other comments I wish to make in relation to certain arguments which apparently weighed with the late government which was responsible for giving the Bank of Canada its present constitution. On the second reading of the Bank of Canada bill in 1934 the then Minister of Finance, Hon. E. N. Rhodes, made use of the argument from historical experience. He pointed out that of thirty-six central banks in leading countries of the world, only six are wholly publicly owned, namely those of Australia, Bulgaria, Finland, Latvia, Russia and Sweden, whereas seventeen are wholly privately owned, namely Albania, Austria, Belgium, Danzig, Denmark, England, Esthonia, France, Germany, Italy, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland and India. All this may be true; in fact it is true, but its significance may easily be exaggerated. In the first place I should like the committee to note that in the constitution of seven other central banks, those of Czechoslovakia, Greece, Japan, Jugoslavia, Lithuania, Poland and Roumania, provision is made for partial government ownership and partial private ownership, while the central banks of Chile, Colombia and Peru are owned in part by the governments concerned, in part by private shareholders and in part by the private commercial banks. So that in sixteen out of the thirty-six central banks in Mr. Rhodes' list there is precedent for the action which we propose to take.

To complete the record it may be added that the federal reserve banks of the United States are wholly owned by the member banks, while the reserve bank of South Africa is a case of part private and part bank ownership.

In the second place it may be pointed out that the record of most if not all of the publicly controlled of the central banks is a highly creditable one. In fact we have to go, I believe, to the privately owned and controlled central banks to find some of the most glaring instances of unwise management and indeed of undue yielding to pressure from political administration.

In the third place we cannot place too much importance on the fact that central banks like the Bank of England and the Bank of France are privately owned. This fact may be explained by historical circumstances which are no longer relevant. Thus it was largely the credit needs of the state that led to the founding of the Bank of England in 1694 by William Paterson and a group of London merchants who were authorized to raise the capital of £1,200,000 to be loaned to the government, and were given certain banking privileges in exchange. The Bank of France was founded in 1800 by Napoleon, who gave government cooperation in the raising of the bank's capital of 30,000,000 francs and assigned to the bank the double task of restoring the completely disorganized public credit following the experience with the assignats, and meeting the credit demands of business. But it was only after a long history that those two banks gradually evolved and consciously recognized the credit regulating function which is to-day regarded as their primary function. One may venture to ask whether, if these two banks were being founded to-day, they would be organized as private institutions free from effective government control. The Bank of France is in fact subject to-day to a degree of such control.

Mr. BENNETT: So is the Bank of Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Finally, the matter of public ownership is in my opinion much less important than that of governmental control. If we study the constitution of central banks from this aspect we shall find ample precedent for the attempt which we are making to give the government adequate control over the Bank of Canada.

It is not possible or necessary to consider all the precedents. I wish however to draw attention to the constitution of a number of typical important central banks, and particularly to those in some of the other British dominions.

The Bank of England is of course not only privately owned, but also completely free from formal governmental control. The board, consisting of the governor, deputy governor and twenty-four directors, is elected annually by the shareholders. The English statute was passed at a time when individualism was the guiding doctrine in political and economic theory, and to have given the government control over the bank would have been in complete conflict with all the teachings of that day. Nevertheless, as Kisch and Elkin point out:

> There can be little doubt that in practice there is at all times close and continuous co-operation between the bank and the government, and in exceptional periods of stress there is even more than this.

The Reichsbank, the central bank of Germany, is under its present constitution the only other important instance of a leading central bank which, at least on paper is, independent of its central government. The original Reichsbank, which dates back to the founding of the German empire, was subject to a high degree of governmental control. The supervisory powers of the state were exercised by a board appointed by the emperor and the federal council—Bundersrat or Senate—whose chairman ex-officio was the imperial chancellor. The general management of the bank was entrusted to the chancellor, to whom the board of directors was subordinate. The members of the board were appointed by the emperor on the recommendation of the federal council.

Following upon the post-war inflation the Reichsbank was reorganized in 1924, and this reorganization was, to quote Kisch and Elkin:

> Part and parcel of a scheme for the payment of reparations and of the financial rehabilitation of Germany devised by foreign experts at a time when the financial policy of the German government was politically suspect and had proved to be economically unsound.

The act as a result shows a distrust of government influence which would probably not have been so manifest had the reorganization come from entirely within Germany, instead of partly from outside. In the case of the Bank of France the general council consists of the governor, two deputy governors, fifteen regents and three auditors. The regents and auditors are elected by the general assembly consisting of the two hundred largest shareholders, chosen from certain specified economic classes. The governor and deputy governors are appointed and removable by the President of France on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance. No decision of the general council may be executed unless it bears the signature of the governor. In the final analysis it is the government-appointed governor who directs all the bank's business and exercises the final power.

Mr. BENNETT: That is so here, too.

Mr. DUNNING: One might differ from my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: One cannot differ; it is so.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend's capacity for differing is infinite. Probably he would credit me with some capacity along the same line.

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking about what the statute says.

Mr. DUNNING: The Bank of Russia, as one would suspect, is a complete state bank managed by a board of directors appointed by the government and supervised by the People's Commissary of Finances. So also is the Bank of Finland, which carries on its business under the guarantee and supervision of the diet. The state owned central bank of Sweden is managed by a board of directors appointed by the king or the riksdag, the one director appointed by the king acting as the president of the bank, and these directors are responsible to the riksdag, its parliamentary committee on banking, and its auditors alone. In the case of Norway, the central bank is privately owned but the private shareholders have no control of the administration and no provision is made for general meetings. Three members of the board of directors and the members of the supervisory council are nominated by parliament, while the governor and vice governor are nominated by the king. In Spain the appointment of the members of the council has always required state approval, and since 1931 the council has included three government appointees, to represent the general interest of the national economy. The governor, who is executive head of the bank, is nominated by the government and is given power to suspend any decision of the council that he considers contrary to the laws and report it to the finance minister. The Swiss National Bank has a council of forty members, of which twenty-five including the president and vice president, are government appointees, nominated by the federal council.

But government control is not limited to the appointment of governors or of a proportion of the directors. Kisch and Elkin, the authorities on the structure and functioning of central banks, cite a number of instances where more direct supervision may be exercised by the state in certain circumstances. Thus in Italy the finance minister, in addition to supervising the note issue, may annul any decision of the general meeting of the administrative council which he considers contrary to the laws and statutes, acting on his own initiative or on the report of a government official designated by him to attend the meetings of these bodies. In the charters of a number of European central banks, including those of Austria, Poland, Greece, Hungary, Holland and Denmark, there is provision for the appointment of a government or royal commissioner, with supervisory powers. Generally the duties of these commissioners are limited to seeing that the bank's business is carried on in accordance with the law and statutes of the bank. On any disputed point, the commissioner has a suspensory veto until the matter is settled by agreement between the bank and the government. In Denmark, the finance ministry must be notified when the bank's managers wish to change the rate of discount; the minister is entitled to participate personally or by deputy in the discussion but without the right to vote. In Poland, the president of the bank, who is appointed by the president of the republic, has a right of suspensory veto in respect of decisions of the bank council which are, in his opinion, contrary to the laws of the country, the articles of association of the bank or the interests of the state. When he exercises this right of veto, the question is referred to the finance minister, and the contemplated action is not carried out if the president's veto is endorsed by the minister within three days.

In Czechoslovakia, a government commissioner, chosen from officials of the finance ministry, has the right of suspensory veto over any resolution of the bank's managerial bodies if they appear in conflict with the laws, statutes or state interests. Failing agreement between the bank and the government, the matter must be referred to a committee of arbitration. In Roumania, the government commissioner has the right of intervention in regard to any decision by the bank's executive which he considers inimical to state interests. In Japan, government control of the central bank goes to great lengths. Comptrollers acting under direction of the finance minister supervise all matters connected with the Bank of Japan. Wide powers of intervention are reserved to the government, and the decisions of the administrative board are subject, in various important instances, to government approval before they become effective. The bank's by-laws provide that "the government shall control all the operations of the bank and shall prevent not only any operation which conflicts with the act and by-laws, but also any measure that the government may deem disadvantageous to the state."

We may now turn to the central banks of the British dominions. Perhaps these have more lessons to teach Canada because of their comparatively recent establishment, their freedom from accidental developments due to war or other historical circumstances, and also of course the broad similarity of prevailing political and economic philosophies and conditions with those of our own country.

The oldest of these institutions is the Commonwealth Bank of Australia. Founded in 1912, this bank is wholly government owned and operates under government guarantee. The board consists of the governor and seven other directors, including the secretary to the treasury. The governor, deputy governor and directors are all appointed by the government.

The Reserve Bank of South Africa, organized in 1920, is owned in part by the commercial banks and in part by private shareholders. Its board consists of the governor and deputy governor, both appointed by the government, and of nine other directors of whom three are appointed by the government and six are elected by the shareholders.

The Reserve Bank of New Zealand, which commenced operations only a few months before the Bank of Canada, is a privately owned bank but with government representation on its board. The board consists of the governor, the deputy governor, the secretary to the treasury (without the power to vote), and seven other directors. As in the case of the Bank of Canada, the first governor and deputy governor are appointed by the government, while later governors and deputy governors are appointed by the government on the recommendation of the board of directors. Of the seven other directors three are government appointees, while the remaining four are elected by the shareholders, except the initial four who also were appointed by the government. It will thus be seen that the first board of this bank is entirely composed of government appointees. Under the present legislation, however, the board would ultimately consist of two governors approved by the government, the secretary to the treasury, three government appointed directors and four directors elected by shareholders. As hon. members of the committee are aware, the present government of New Zealand has announced its intention of introducing a greater measure of government control of the bank.

The constitution of the new Reserve Bank of India provides for a central board consisting of the governor, four government nominees representative of territorial, economic or agricultural interests, and eight directors elected from the elected members of the local boards of the five reserve banking areas in certain proportions. Deputy governors and one government official will also be on the central board but without voting rights. The central board can be superseded by another agency for direction of the bank's affairs under government orders, in the event of the bank failing to carry out any of the obligations imposed on it. The governor and deputy governors are appointed by the government, on advice of the central board.

It is of interest to note that government control extends farther in each of these empire central banks than at present in Canada, and in some cases, substantially farther.

So much for the argument based on history and the experience of other countries. The brief review which I have given should be sufficient to show that ample sound precedent exists for the amendments to the present Bank of Canada Act, now under consideration.

A second type of argument used by my predecessor in advocating the present constitution of the Bank of Canada was that based on the opinions of monetary experts or the resolutions passed by international conferences. I do not propose to call experts to rebut experts, although that would not be difficult to do. Someone has said that "where five economists are gathered together there will be found six opinions, and two of them will belong to Mr. Keynes." It is sufficient to say that the examples of government ownership and control of central banks which I have cited above must rest on adequate expert opinion and on the bedrock of experience of other countries and nations. However, considerable stress was laid on a resolution passed at the international financial conference held at Brussels in 1920, and reiterated in a later international conference, and it may be well to say a word with regard to that. The resolution is as follows:

Banks, and especially banks of issue, should be freed from political pressure and should be conducted solely on the lines of prudent finance.

It is desirable to consider the setting in which this resolution was drawn. It was passed just after the war at a time of monetary chaos and currency depreciation when central banks of many countries, whether government owned or government controlled or not, were still busy turning out paper money and inflating bank credit under the direction of their respective governments. The admonition which it gave against influences and against imprudent financing is a natural one and fully warranted under the circumstances then prevailing. But surely we do not need to be warned to-day of the utter folly of printing press methods of finance. I have already shown, I think, that the historical record shows no coincidence between the prudently versus imprudently managed central banks on the one hand and the privately owned and controlled versus government owned and controlled central banks on the other.

This brings me to the third argument of my predecessor, Hon. Mr. Rhodes, namely, the charge that a central bank under government control would be subject to political influence, to the pull and the pressure of this group or that, to political interference in its day to day operations, and to partisan influence in appointments. I might make two comments in regard to that argument.

In the first place there is a type of influence, using the word in its broadest and best sense, to which the Bank of Canada should be subject. I have already shown that the bank is required to perform one of the most important functions of government. The wise and efficient carrying out of that function is of vital concern to every citizen. Under some other form of government we might be content with a privately owned and controlled institution acting as a benevolent despot, answerable to no authority but itself, unresponsive to public opinion, giving the public not what they want but what the experts think is right for them. But that attitude is not possible in a democratic country. The bank may and should resist temporary gusts of public fancy, but in the long run it must show responsiveness to public opinion. In the long run the bank in the performance of a vital sovereign function must be responsible to the sovereign will expressed through governments. There cannot be two sovereigns in a single state. In that connection nothing I think could be clearer than the statement of the present Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), taken from Hansard of June 22, 1934, page 4227:

I want to make this fact clear: no one could have had the responsibility of being the head of an administration for any time without realizing all that it meant when one speaks of political pressure. I think I would be the first to sympathize with the Prime Minister in his desire so to frame an act that what is termed political pressure would not be permitted to interfere with the successful and independent working of a great financial institution. May I say we may give a wholly wrong meaning to the word "political" in speaking of political pressure. A political influence or point of view is not necessarily something that is contrary to the national interest; a political point of view is one which arises from an endeavour to give expression to public feeling and public opinion, and I submit that in all democratic countries public opinion is the one great factor for which all governments must have consideration. There are times when it is necessary and vital that every institution in the land should be subject to the public opinion of the nation, and this is always the case when it is expressed in a constitutional way in parliament. I do not believe powers should be given any institution that would enable it to put itself in a position of opposition to a government that has been entrusted with great responsibilities of enforcing particular policies.

In the same speech on the same day, Hansard, page 4228, the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) said:

What I should like to ask is: Are the institutions created by governments themselves to be made by their very constitutions so powerful that in the matter of national policies they can regard themselves as wholly beyond the direction of a government, where those policies are the result of the will of the people as expressed by their representatives in parliament? In no way could it be possible to have more clearly defined the difference between the right hon. gentleman opposite and myself. The Prime Minister will notice that at the moment, I am not suggesting the government should own the bank. I am not at the moment discussing the question of ownership, at all. As I said last night, I think the question of ownership is debatable. I am however discussing the question of control of policy, and I do say that with respect to policies, whether they relate to trade, to shipping, to marketing, to finance, to defence, or to any other phase of a country's economy, those policies, if they are the expression of view of a government representative of the people, should be capable of being carried out without interference from any institution whatever, but rather with the sympathetic cooperation of all institutions. That is the only way in which in a country we can have either democratic or responsible government.

In the second place, the criticism in so far as it relates to partisan interference in appointments and political interference in day to day operations, and in so far as it is meant to apply to the Bank of Canada, is wholly beside the point. No one proposes that the government should concern itself with minor appointments or with the routine of daily operations. The first governor and deputy governor are, in the present act and in the act as it will be amended, appointed by the governor in council; later appointments to these two positions will be made by the board of directors subject to the approval of the governor in council. I am sure no member of the committee need have any fear that such appointments will be subject to political pressure or to partisan influences. We may safely assume, in my opinion, that these two officials, who are the chief executive officers of the bank and responsible for its detailed, day to day administration, will be appointed on grounds of merit only, particularly with the safeguard provided by the act that they in future are to be nominated by the board of directors and approved by the governor in council.

There remain the government-appointed directors. The bill which it is proposed to introduce will provide for four such directors. For the next four years these government directors will have two votes each. If the government is to secure an immediate majority control of the board, this dual voting provision is necessary, because it is not intended to disturb the present elected directors, numbering seven, until their terms of office expire. As their terms of office expire, they will drop out and not be replaced, except that the private shareholders shall always have the right to elect three directors. After the annual general meeting in 1940 the board will consist of these three elected directors, four government-appointed directors (each with a single vote), the governor and deputy governor (both government-appointed or approved), and the Deputy Minister of Finance (without the power to vote).

This type of board, it is submitted, will achieve the objectives which the government desires without being open to the objections which have been directed against the constitution of the present board. It will, for instance, provide for a predominant interest by the government in the general administration of an institution which is charged with responsibility for performing a vital national function. It will not mean that the government will be concerned with the daily routine management of the bank, but rather that the government will be assured that the direction of the bank is in the hands of men in whose judgment it has confidence. Since the appointments of directors are for limited terms only, a long continuance of a policy that might conflict with the government's view becomes impossible.

Moreover, it will prevent the sort of fiasco which took place at the time of the first election of directors. It will be remembered that the act placed on the shareholders a task which in my opinion was exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, for them to carry out. Seven directors were to be elected by an unorganized group of over 12,000 shareholders scattered throughout the whole of Canada. Moreover, these directors were to be "selected from diversified occupations," and, while the act did not so state, it was essential in the national interest that they should also be reasonably representative of the various geographic sections of the country as well as of the two chief racial groups. What in fact happened, as you well know, was that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, an organized business group, intervened in the election and submitted a slate of nominees bearing its recommendation. The result was that every nominee on this slate was elected. Please understand that I am not criticizing the personnel of the present board of directors. On the contrary, I believe that the country is fortunate in securing the services of those now acting in this capacity. What I am pointing out, and criticizing most severely, is legislation which in practice permits a private business association in effect to name the directors of our central bank. That is, in my opinion, an intolerable situation.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not accurate.

Mr. DUNNING: We can debate it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not debatable. The answer is that 12,000 people voted.

Mr. DUNNING: That is, in my opinion, an intolerable situation, and the amendments which we propose will make it no longer possible. Under the proposed amendments the private shareholders will not have to elect more than one director in any one year and, having in mind the occupations and geographic sections represented by these directors, the government will be able to select its four appointed directors in such a manner as to provide a board which is reasonably representative of all the important national interests which the Bank of Canada has to serve.

It seems to me also that the presence on the board of two types of directors—those appointed by the government and those elected by the shareholders—will have distinct advantages. In developing this argument, I can do no better than quote from a statement made by the present Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, on June 22, 1934, in this house, on the second reading of the Bank of Canada bill. This statement appears on page 4228 of Hansard of that year, and reads:

I say that power of influence of governments and defiance of governments by the money power is being created by this act in the form in which it is at present, and the only way in which that possibility can be avoided is for the government to see to it that, on the board of directors who are to direct this institution, there are representatives of the government, who will not own any of the shares, but who will be the appointees of the government placed there solely to watch and safeguard the public interest. I think my right hon. friend must agree that in these matters of large finance, check and counter check is wholly advisable. It is advisable in financial transactions of a limited size, and it is more necessary as well as advisable in those of considerable size. But here are financial transactions of the greatest magnitude conceivable, and check and counter check are imperative. I do think the directorate of the bank ought to be so formed that, whether the pressure is upon the bank from the government on the one side, or upon the government from the financial interests and through the bank on the other, there should be on the board of directors some one or more persons who will be quick to sense the situation, give the danger signal, and arouse the country to the pressure which is being brought to bear. There is the danger of a government bringing too much in the way of pressure to bear on a central bank. On the other hand, there is equal danger of the financial interests that are allied with the banks bringing influence to bear upon a government. There will be both these dangers always, and the only way in which that possibility can be lessened is by making sure that both powers, the money power and the power of government, are represented on a common board so that one or the other will be in a position to direct the attention of the people at large to the dangers which they may see developing in the affairs of an institution which is or ought to be a great national trust.

As I have stated already, the amendments proposed are not such as to involve interference by the government in the daily routine administration of the bank, or the possibility of partisan influence in minor appointments. According to the act, the government, "shall be the chief executive officer and shall on behalf of the board have the direction and control of the business of the bank, with authority to act in connection with the conduct of the business in all matters which are not by this act or by the by-laws of the bank specifically reserved to be done by the board or by the executive committee, or by a meeting of shareholders."

Mr. BENNETT: What change is that from the present law?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change. I am just quoting the authority of the governor as I remember it. I have not the number of the section.

Mr. BENNETT: As I remember, that is the law as it now stands.

Mr. DUNNING: I am now coming to the change. I recited the powers of the governor in order to emphasize the change which is being made. The governor, or in his absence or incapacity, the deputy governor, moreover, is given the power of veto over any action or decision of the board or of the executive committee. That is the present law. This veto power of the governor we propose to retain, but an amendment will provide that the governor shall be required to submit a report in writing to the Minister of Finance within seven days after any veto is given. The minister is required to submit the veto to the governor in council, who may confirm or disallow. Dissenting members of the board or the executive committee may also submit in writing their views in regard to the action or decision which has been vetoed.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the extent of the modification of the present arrangement?

Mr. DUNNING: I have just stated it, the report to the minister and the power in the governor in council to disallow the veto. There is also the provision for the dissenting members of the board to submit in writing their views to the Minister of Finance for presentation to the government.

The effect of these provisions is to give the governor very wide powers over the management of the bank. In my opinion, this is as it should be. Central banking is a very technical matter and the management of the bank should be given as free a hand as possible in selection of personnel and general administration, provided that satisfactory safeguards exist for the protection of the national interest in matters of major policy.

That is about as far as I desire to go at this stage. I thought it best to open the discussion with a general statement of a fairly broad character in the hope that possibly the committee might see its way clear to pass the resolution and thus enable the bill to be submitted, at which stage it would be much more convenient to discuss the detailed provisions.

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): Mr. Chairman, the remarks which I have to make in connection with the bill, which is preceded by this resolution, I believe would be more applicable to the general principles outlined in the resolution than to any detailed discussion on the bill. As I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) speaking in support of the resolution, I was particularly struck with the number of times the words "predominate" and "predominantly" were used. During the long discussion which took place in this house when the central bank bill was before it in 1934, in the subsequent discussion, and during the election of 1935, it seems to me that those words were strangely lacking. I shall come back later to a discussion of that.

I listened with a great deal of interest and considerable profit to the outline given by the minister of the history of central banks of the world. For a moment or two I should like to review very briefly the history of our central bank in Canada. The minister pointed out the purposes of the central bank. I should like to summarize first what I consider to be the four primary purposes of a central bank: (1) to regulate internal credit; (2) to regulate the foreign exchanges; (3) to mitigate fluctuations in the level of production, trade, employment and prices as far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action; and (4) to give expert and impartial financial advice to the government of the day.

The time having come when it was deemed advisable to consider a central bank for Canada, a commission, commonly known as the Macmillan commission, was appointed. The commission reported, and from its report it became obvious that it would be beneficial to Canada to have a central bank. The question then for consideration by the government of that day was whether the bank to be set up should be a privately owned central bank or a nationally or publicly owned central bank. The Minister of Finance referred to the resolution passed in 1920, I think at Brussels. I call attention to the fact that in addition the government had before it the report of the international economic conference which was held at Genoa in 1922, from which I extract the following:

> Banks, and especially banks of issue, should be free from political pressure and should be conducted solely on lines of prudent finance.

In addition there was the report of the world monetary and economic conference, in 1933, to which Canada was a party. A short extract from its report is as follows:

> The conference considers it to be essential, in order to provide an international gold standard with the necessary mechanism for satisfactory working, that independent central banks with the requisite powers and freedom to carry out an appropriate currency and credit policy, should be created in such developed countries as have not at present an adequate central banking institution.

With these facts and others before it, the former government decided upon a policy which was crystallized in a bill to set up a central bank. I believe the then Minister of Finance, speaking in support of the measure, epitomized one of the strongest arguments which could be made in its favour when he said:

> Clearly, however, the bank should not be subject to dictation by the government for, at times, the exigencies of the people financed might not be wholly in harmony with the banking policies that might be considered wise and essential in the public interest.

I have said that the government determined upon a privately owned central bank, but I think it should be made clear that it was not a privately owned bank in the ordinary sense of the words "privately owned." This bank was subject to many limitations. For the moment I shall recall but three. One was that neither the commercial banks of the country nor any of their officers or servants or employees could be shareholders, nor could anyone be a shareholder in trust or on their behalf. Another limitation was that the dividends payable to shareholders should be limited to 4½ per cent. In other words, no matter how much profit the so-called privately owned central bank might make in any one year, only an amount equal to a 4½ per cent return on the capital invested could be paid to the private investors, the balance of the profits going to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada. It may be well in passing to point out that in the first ten months of the operation of the new central bank, after providing for the necessary rest and reserves and all other matters of the kind, there was paid into the consolidated revenue fund of the dominion as profit from the operation of the bank the sum of $346,184.33.

The third limitation to which I wish to call attention is that which provided a veto power to the governor of the central bank in respect of any matter of policy previously determined by the board of directors. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I invite your attention to the fact that you had represented on that bank that which the Minister of Finance to-day intimates is so desirable, namely a viewpoint not solely that of the government; combined with it, and more effective, because of the veto power, than the opinion of the privately elected directors, was the opinion of the governor of the bank, and by a combination of the two a balance was obtained. If for any reason the privately elected directors of the central bank should determine upon a policy with which the governor did not agree, that policy could not be put into effect. May we not assume that if the governor of the central bank was appointed by the government, as he now is, he would have the government viewpoint in respect of policy just as effectually as some director who may now be appointed by the government? And if he has, then he has a veto power in respect of the decision on matters of policy of the privately elected directors. With what result? That the ultimate supreme authority, namely this parliament, must decide on any matter of policy where the governor of the central bank and the privately elected directors were not ad idem. The only change you are making at this time is to give the governor in council power to set aside the veto of the governor of the central bank; in other words you are conferring upon executive authority another great power of the kind which hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in opposition, have been so wont to say should be exercised only by the parliament of Canada.

When this central bank bill was before parliament for discussion the then opposition, now the government, declared in favour of a policy of a nationally owned central bank, that is, a bank owned, operated and controlled by the government—no private shareholders, no privately elected directors; all appointed by the government. May I recall to the attention of this house the amendment moved by the present Minister of National Defence, then speaking as the responsible and accredited representative of the Liberal opposition, when the central bank bill was before this house in 1934. That amendment read:

> The capital shall be divided into shares of fifty dollars each, represented by share certificates, which shall be held by the minister, who shall subscribe for such shares, and payment for the same shall be made out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Speaking in support of that amendment the hon. gentleman said:

> I do submit, however, that to-day the sentiment of the people of Canada is in favour of absolute public ownership of the greatest asset, the greatest monopoly there is in the Dominion of Canada to-day, namely our national credit and currency.

Well, Mr. Chairman, what is the effect of this measure? Here we have introduced in parliament, I assume as a measure which is to give absolute public ownership of the greatest asset in Canada, the following resolution:

> . . . "it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Bank of Canada Act so as to". . .

First:

> . . . "increase the capital stock of the bank, to provide that certain shares thereof" . . .

A predominant number of shares—

. . . "shall be purchased by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund in order to assure ownership of a majority of the shares by the government" . . .

And second:

. . . "to increase the number of directors, and to provide for election and appointment of directors in such manner as to assure voting control of the board by directors appointed by the government."

The effect of the bill, as intimated by the Minister of Finance to-day, will be this: After the bill is carried by parliament and put into effect the minister will hold approximately one per cent more of the capital stock of this bank than is held by private shareholders and will have not one more member but one more vote upon the board of directors than the number of votes possessed by the privately elected directors.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is wrong there.

Mr. LAWSON: Well, let me see if I am wrong. I understand that we now have seven directors of the central bank, each one elected by the private shareholders, who for convenience I am calling privately elected directors. If I understood the Minister of Finance correctly this afternoon he said the government would immediately appoint four more directors, each of whom would have two votes. Twice four is eight; subtract seven from eight and you have one, so I say my statement, that the government will have one more vote upon the board of directors than the privately elected directors will have, is absolutely correct.

Mr. DUNNING: That simply is not so, and if my hon. friend will permit me to do so perhaps I should put this on Hansard now, so that there may be no later misunderstanding.

Mr. LAWSON: I shall be delighted to have the minister do so.

Mr. DUNNING: By the terms of the bill the relative voting strength on the board in each of the immediately succeeding years will be:

	Government	Private shareholders
1936-37	10	7
1937-38	10	7
1938-39	10	6
1939-40	10	4
1940-41 and thereafter	6	3

That will be the actual voting strength; therefore to say there will be a majority of one is an inaccurate statement.

Mr. LAWSON: Then as I understand it from the statement now made by the minister, my previous statement is correct. When this bill goes through parliament and becomes law, and you appoint your four directors, qua directors you will have one more vote than the privately elected directors.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not right either.

Mr. LAWSON: Just a moment. In order to get your ten votes you include and count as government votes those of the governor and deputy governor of the bank, who already are appointed by the government, who always have been appointed by the government under the privately owned central bank and whose votes shall be always counted as government votes, working on that principle. Now let us make no mistake. Qua the board of directors, when this bill goes through this parliament you will have one more vote on that board, increasing it, it is true, after a certain number of years, than have the privately elected directors.

Mr. DUNNING: I must differ entirely.

Mr. LAWSON: All right; my hon. friend has the privilege of differing. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask you. Where is the absolute public ownership moved for by the present Minister of National Defence on behalf of the Liberal opposition? Is it a case of absolute public ownership while in opposition and some form of compromise when in government? I say to you, sir, and through you to the members of this committee and the people of this country, that having regard to the statements made by the present Prime Minister throughout the country during the election campaign when he asked the people for votes based on those statements, this measure is a subterfuge and a delusion, and out of the mouth of the present Prime Minister I shall attempt to prove that it is a breach of the pledge he gave to the people. First I should like to refer to a report appearing in Ottawa Citizen of August 3, 1935, reporting a speech made by the present Prime Minister. I quote now what appeared in that newspaper in quotation marks, as being the words of the right hon. gentleman:

"The Liberal party stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank to perform the function of rediscounts and the control of currency issue considered in terms of public need."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAWSON: Keep right on. I will soon get to a point where you will not shout "hear, hear."

"Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile. To regain for the nation what has thus been lost will continue to be the first objective of Liberal effort."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear

Mr. LAWSON: Well, Mr. Chairman, does this measure restore to the government its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, the control and issue of currency and credit? Here we are to have a board of directors, one-half but one, to start with, elected by private interests—

Mr. DUNNING: That is not correct.

Mr. LAWSON: One-half plus one, to start with chosen by the government. I will add the governor and the deputy governor, chosen by the government, who are already in existence. Now let us assume that after the bill comes into effect there is an opinion as to the expansion of credit among the privately elected directors which is not the view of the publicly appointed directors, or vice versa. I ask, are the government-appointed directors to exercise any freedom of opinion, or are they not. If they are to exercise freedom of opinion then they cannot be carrying out the policy of this or any other particular government. But if their job is to carry out the policy of this government, then I ask, why the private directors and the private shareholders? Where is the government discharging "its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility"? If the board of directors of the bank is to obey the dictates of the government in office for the time being, then why not honestly and fearlessly stand by the policy which I hope to show was enunciated during the election campaign: "Give back to the private shareholders the money they put into this bank; get rid of the private directors." If we are to have complete and absolute government control, why not do it in the right way, and not by some measure which is more or less a compromise between contending factions?

I would like to direct the attention of the committee to the next utterance of the right hon. gentleman, the present Prime Minister, during the election campaign. Again I quote from the Ottawa Citizen, this time of August 8, 1935—Mr. Mackenzie King speaking at Kingston; and again I give the words which the newspaper puts in quotation marks:

"He (Mr. Bennett) had taken the gold reserves from the federal treasury, the backing for the country's currency, and turned them over to a private corporation."

And as the right hon. gentleman travelled west he waxed even more eloquent in that regard, because I observe that according to a report appearing in the Vancouver Sun of September 30, 1935, he had this to say:

Criticizing Mr. Bennett's bank, he said it was owned and controlled by private stockholders. It had been given by the government $60,000,000 gold reserve and the vast number of securities held by the government from the private banks. These were the property of the people of Canada. To-day they belong to the private shareholders of the Bank of Canada, he said.

Now let us see. This "Bennett bank," so-called by the leader of the government took the gold reserves and the securities from the treasury of Canada and did the iniquitous act of handing them over to private interests. May I ask the right hon. gentleman if in principle it is any less iniquitous for him to-day to leave half of them in the possession of private interests? Where is the difference?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are not leaving half of the reserves and securities in the possession of private interests; we are putting back the whole under public control.

Mr. LAWSON: Oh yes, he is. If I correctly understand the Minister of Finance he is now going to subscribe for $5,100,000 worth of stock in the bank. Already you have another $5,000,000 of private money represented by private shareholders. It does not require a lawyers' argument to convince any man who knows anything of business that if I hold half the stock of the company I own half of everything that company has.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): You are not going to own half.

Mr. LAWSON: When are you going to take out the private shareholders? There is not a suggestion of it in this resolution. If it was iniquitous to turn over that gold and those securities to the privately owned central bank, then at least it is half as iniquitous to leave half of it in the ownership of private persons. But, Mr. Chairman, the statement was not correct. I shall let the Prime Minister tell the committee whether or not he had knowledge as to the correctness of the statement.

I now turn to the report of the Bank of Canada at the first annual general meeting of shareholders, in which I read:

"The Bank of Canada opened its doors for business on March 11 last. On the date of opening we assumed responsibility for the redemption of all dominion notes issued and outstanding."

Not one word from the Prime Minister about "Bennett's bank" doing that. Continuing the report:

"To cover that liability, which then amounted to $185,455,439, the dominion government transferred to the bank the following assets:

Gold, valued at	$ 69,455,439
Silver, valued at	986,363
Dominion of Canada 3 per cent bonds maturing 1940 of a par value of	115,013,637
Total	$185,455,439"

In plain words, Mr. Chairman, the former government transferred to the central bank an amount exactly equal to the liabilities which they required the central bank to assume, and equal only so long as the bonds of Canada transferred were worth one hundred cents on the dollar.

Speaking on this same subject the right hon. gentleman again used a figure: he said "Bennett had"—he did not use the words "given away"—"Bennett had turned over to this central bank some $69,000,000 in gold." Well, Mr. Chairman, if you turn to the last page of the report of the Bank of Canada and look at its statement of assets and liabilities you will find that to-day instead of the amount turned over being $185,000,000, what is being left to the ownership of private interests is one-half of $307,655,151.86,—in other words the assets of the Bank of Canada—on the principle on which the right hon. gentleman proceeds, for which those private interests have subscribed the enormous sum of $5,000,000.

I should like to go a step further. Let me point out how the right hon. gentleman indicated he was going to discharge "the most conspicuous and sacred responsibility of government." I turn to a report of a speech of the right hon. gentleman contained in the Vancouver Sun of September 30, 1935. I imagine most hon. members of this committee are familiar with the fact that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was pretty well in its stride in Vancouver, and is reported so to be in British Columbia. Out there the right hon. gentleman had this to say:

"We believe that credit should be a social service to serve the needs of the people."

"Credit is not the concern of the bankers only but is of concern to you and me."

Credit is to-day controlled by the great international money power. The first step, then, is to establish a national central bank —not another private bank as has been done —but a government bank able to control credit according to the will of the government in matters of great national concern.

The Liberal party believes it is a public matter of direct concern to the average citizen to have a national bank to control currency and credit so that they may serve the public needs.

The first objective is to get back the control that was taken from us. The next is to see that the bank is made national in the truest sense of the word."

Now in fulfilment of that pledge and obligation the government headed by the right hon. gentleman brings forward this anaemic measure providing for a half nationally and half privately-owned central bank which is to discharge "the most conspicuous and sacred responsibilities of government."

Then the right hon. gentleman went to Alberta where the social credit group appears to have been in its stride. According to a report in the Calgary Daily Herald of October 1, 1935, the right hon. gentleman said:

"A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people, and also to deal with problems of international commerce and exchange."

So far the leader of the social credit group might have been making the speech. The right hon. gentleman continued:

"That was a clear statement"—

He was referring to a statement he had made previously.

—"that what we wanted at Ottawa was a central bank, or wanted in Canada, was a central national bank which would enable private banks to be controlled by the central institution in a manner which would make credit be considered more from the point of public need, domestic requirements, social requirements, and the like, than from the point of view of the interests of capital investors and private bankers only."

Then he went on.

"Then the government policy, if it were one of extension of credit, would be in a position to put that policy into effect"—

That must be a misprint, because I doubt whether the right hon. gentleman would have repeated the word "policy." I continue:

—"through having a central bank which would give more in the way of credit at the time when the need for more in the way of credit was uppermost. It would regulate credit in a manner which would serve the needs of the country, prevent excessive speculation on the one hand, and on the other hand help serve to increase the currency and the facilities for credit when need for increased currency and increased credit facilities were required."

And then this last touch, which I think is sublime.

"We have in the federal field the great issue of monetary reform. I have merely indicated what I have thought was the first step, and if that first is not won then all our efforts at further financial reform so far as the federal field is concerned will be materially impaired."

"Equally"—

Says the right hon. gentleman to the electors of Alberta.

—"if they are materially impaired it will have a very serious effect as far as I see it upon the efforts of any province to improve financial conditions there, so I hope when Monday fortnight comes you will think not only what is important to you locally and in a provincial way, but that you will think even more deeply of what is going to be of vital concern to our country with respect to our policy during the next five years."

I leave it to the judgment of hon. members of the committee and the people of the country whether the present proposal for a nationally owned central bank, which is neither meat nor fish, flesh nor fowl, is the first step in a great monetary reform in Canada.

I am not sure whether the right hon. gentleman went back to Vancouver, but in any event he made another speech which was fully reported in the Vancouver Province of September 21, 1935. In that speech he said:

"Canada is faced with a great battle between the money power and the power of the people —a battle which will be waged in the next parliament. He pleaded for a sweeping liberal majority in order to carry out his policy of public control of currency and credit, nationalization of the Bank of Canada and monetary reform."

I suppose monetary reform is to follow this half measure of nationalization. The right hon. gentleman went on to say:

The battle which would be fought in parliament would decide whether "we are going to have the money power bend to the will of the people."

He finished his observation by saying:

"Until the control and issue of currency and credit is restored to the government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and democracy is idle and futile."

Well, the people gave the right hon. gentleman a sweeping Liberal majority, and we are here to-day in the arena ready for the great monetary battle. The right hon. gentleman says he is the gladiator who will champion the cause of the people, that he recognizes the control of currency as the most conspicuous and sacred responsibility of government. But where is the money power with which he is going to do battle? It was the private interests which owned the central bank. Are those private interests, with which the right hon. gentleman was going to do battle, wiped out by this measure? Oh, no! I suggest he is a prudent man. Instead of having them do battle in the arena of parliament he compromises by saying, We will permit you to keep your stock in the central bank; we will continue to pay you four and a half per cent dividend, the maximum amount you can receive if the bank makes money; we will avoid pitched battle in parliament, and by your ownership of forty-nine per cent of the stock of the central bank you are still in possession of forty-nine per cent of the assets. Is it any wonder the electors of Canada were misled? And not only the electors; is it any wonder the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) believed he was supporting a party which had a policy embracing his ideas? How well I remember that gentleman coming as a new member to this parliament, with high hopes for the government he was supporting and with that great confidence and faith which led him to stand in his place and say:

"The government must have time to adopt policies which will enable them to provide the money before we can expect them to bring in such legislation."

Then, after proposing that the Bank of Canada should advance whatever money the country may need against dominion, municipal and provincial bonds, he said:

"I venture to stand in my place to-day and make these suggestions as a Liberal because our great leader has taken the attitude that people of all shades of opinion will be welcome within the ranks of the Liberal party."

Mr. Chairman, can you blame the hon. member for Rosthern for drawing any such conclusion in view of the utterances of his leader upon the stump in this country during the last campaign? But he still had faith, this hon. member for Rosthern, and several others like him in the Liberal fold in this house, because speaking later, at page 552 of Hansard for this session, he enunciated just what most of the electorate believed, that what the Liberal party was advocating was an absolute and complete nationally owned central bank, as stated by the Minister of National Defence in this house in 1934; because the hon. member for Rosthern stood up in his place this session and said, "I am one hundred per cent in favour of a one hundred per cent ownership and control of the Bank of Canada by the Canadian people through our government." No room for mistake in that; and then he finished up by saying: "That, in short, Mr. Speaker, is the view I think of at least fifty per cent of the Liberal voters in this country." I ask again, does this measure, half private, half public ownership, meet their views? Will the hon. gentleman and all the others like him who sit in the ranks of the Liberal party in this house get up on their feet in this discussion and tell us whether they believed that their leader was standing for a one hundred per cent publicly owned central bank when he came down here and enunciated his views and his theories? And will they tell us they consider that this measure is discharging "that most conspicuous and sacred responsibility" to which the right hon. gentleman so frequently referred when he was seeking the franchise of the people of this country?

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I must congratulate the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) on his very able speech. He has said many things that I had it in my own mind to say, and I do not need to repeat them. There are, however, certain aspects upon which he did not touch.

I would congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) upon his very clear statement, and also the government upon having taken a position that is in advance of that which now exists, namely, the banking policy of the Conservative party, and which also represents somewhat of an advance upon any definite position hitherto taken by the Liberal party. I say the latter although I recognize clearly that a number of members of the Liberal party have gone much further than this legislation goes.

It seems to me there are several questions with regard to public finance that have been before the people of this country. One is, should there be a central bank? For a long time both the old parties were very skeptical with regard to the necessity of a central bank, and even went so far as to denounce anything of that nature. The second is, how should this central bank be owned and controlled? It was on that point that we had a good deal of difference of opinion when the present act was introduced.

There is a third consideration upon which the old parties seem agreed, and on which we in this corner differ from both, and that is we favour the nationalization of our financial institutions, including both the central bank and the chartered banks. Again and again we have introduced resolutions along that line only to be defeated by a joint vote of both the two old parties.

May I call attention to the position that we in this corner have taken throughout the years? As early as 1923 I emphasized the monopolistic character of the banking system of this country, and I pointed out that by virtue of the private ownership of this monopoly, financial control and credit are used in disregard of social considerations, prices can be and are manipulated by the control of quantity purchasing power, and finally I said that we must find a remedy in the public control of currency and credit. You will find my speech in Hansard of 1923, page 4018.

In 1925 I ventured to bring forward this motion:

> That, in the opinion of this house, it is not in the interests of the country at large that the privilege of issuing currency and of controlling financial credit should be granted to private corporations.

When I listened to the finance minister to-day I began to feel that some of us in this corner had not altogether wasted our energies. In those days we had comparatively little support from those who now occupy the government benches or from those who now occupy the position of official opposition. We feel that the Minister of Finance is right when he recognizes the influence of public opinion. Undoubtedly public opinion has been driving the Liberal party.

In that same year, speaking of the quantity of money, after quoting Professor Taussig, I said:

> How is that regulated to-day? It is regulated by the banks. . . . They do so either directly through the giving or withholding of credit or in their control over government policy. . . . I urge that the large measures of control of currency and credit by private corporations now existing must not continue. It is not safe to leave such power in private, and shall I say, without offence, irresponsible hands, that is, in the hands of those without responsibility to the people at large.

I continued:

> Is it wise to leave this power in the hands of private individuals who can exercise their control in their own economic and political interests, disregarding the effect on the welfare of the general population? Why shouldn't the government democratically control this money situation rather than allow a group of a dozen men who are not responsible to our people to do so? We now have government supervision and inspection. We have had the advocacy of government guarantee of deposits. . . . From all over the country demands are coming in that the government should go much farther than it has in the past. Why not take the next step and effectively control our currency and credit?

The minister now says that that is necessary and he proposes this resolution as the forerunner of a bill which he thinks will make that possible. I might add that we in our group again and again moved resolutions for the establishment of a national system of banking. I myself introduced one in 1925 and down through the years we have tried to emphasize the need of a national banking system.

When the present act was up for discussion the Liberals were by no means certain of their position. They did unite to criticize the measure, but the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said it was rather debatable whether or not the bank should be publicly owned and controlled. Some of his followers had no such hesitation. It will be remembered that some of them came out very strongly for an absolutely publicly owned and publicly controlled bank. Hon. members will recall that famous amendment to the effect that the bank should be either publicly owned and privately controlled, privately owned and publicly controlled, or, publicly owned and publicly controlled. As it was considered that the mover of that resolution represented the Liberal party, I say that the government has been very vacillating and very temporizing. I was much interested in noting the position once taken by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). We find the following on page 453 of Hansard of 1935:

As the house knows very well, and as I think the country knows, though the people may just as well be reminded of the fact for fear of misrepresentation afterwards, we on this side of the house were last year almost entirely in favour of a publicly owned central bank, though we may not be inclined, at least now—I am speaking for myself—to go as far as the nationalization of the chartered banks of Canada.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce felt that Liberals were almost entirely in favour of a publicly owned central bank. I do not think there is the slightest doubt that the hon. member for York South is correct when he says that was the impression given by the majority of Liberal speakers during the last campaign. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is also reported on page 454 as follows:

I did not intend to take up so much of the time of the house and did so for only two reasons: first, the aspersion—and I think I may call it that, which was cast by the Prime Minister and again by the Minister of Finance upon the integrity and strength of character that ought to animate any government that has the interests of the people at heart, in suggesting that they could not properly and honestly administer the functions that naturally belong to a central bank. In the second place I want to put myself on record that I have not retreated and I do not think those on this side have retreated from the position we took last year that we are entirely in favour of a publicly owned and controlled central bank of Canada.

Surely that is a pretty clear statement. I said a few moments ago that I did not think the Liberal speakers gave the impression to the people that they were going to get any such legislation as this. On the contrary, the people generally understood that they were to have a thoroughgoing publicly owned and publicly controlled bank. In this connection I should like to quote from the Regina-Leader Post of May 18, which reports a meeting of the Young Liberal executive of Saskatoon, as follows:

Dealing specifically with the central bank question, the Young Liberal executive stressed that one of the chief planks in the platform on which the Liberal party was elected to power at Ottawa was the establishment of "a properly constituted national central bank of Canada to perform the function of rediscount and to control the issue of currency." Further, Mr. King in a statement following his election, had voiced the belief that the people of Canada had given an unmistakable verdict against a privately owned and privately controlled central bank.

The resolution reads:

Therefore, this executive of the Saskatoon Young Men's Liberal Club, expresses its disappointment with indication both in the speech from the throne and in the remarks of leading Liberals in parliament, that legislation to be brought down will modify only the present private ownership of the central bank instead of substituting a nationally owned central bank such as the public was given to understand would be done, and this executive, feeling that the honour of the Liberal party is involved, urges again that the government reconsider its action.

I submit that resolution of the Young Liberal party to the government. They feel that the honour of the Liberal party is at stake. There is no doubt whatever that the understanding of the Young Liberal party and of the majority of the people, not only of Saskatchewan but across the west, was that the present government was pledged to introduce thoroughgoing legislation providing for a publicly owned and publicly controlled national bank.

The question then really is whether this present legislation is fulfilling the pledges of the Liberal party. The minister stated to-day that the naming of the directors of the central bank by private individuals was intolerable, but I should like to ask him whether it is any better that the dividends of our central bank should go to private individuals. I cannot see that it is. If it is intolerable that the directors should be named by private individuals, why should it not be more intolerable that dividends to the extent of something like $225,000 should go to private individuals? I should like to ask the minister why he proposes this very awkward arrangement. Why could not the government have simply bought out the shareholders of the central bank? That has never been explained; it was not explained to-day by the minister. The best he can say is that he thinks there will be some advantage in having government directors to watch the private directors and in having private directors to watch the government directors. I submit that under that type of reasoning he might as well ask that half the people in the different departments be nominated by private individuals to watch the other departmental officials. Is that our idea of efficiency?

Mr. DUNNING: Something like this parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, no.

Mr. DUNNING: You are watching us.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is a good thing there are a few people to do it; I quite admit that. I do not think the minister will seriously say that this parliament at all corresponds with a board that has direction of the policy of a bank.

Mr. DUNNING: That is quite right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think Canada should have an out and out publicly owned and controlled bank, and for that reason I move the following amendment:

That the words after the word "act" ending with the word "bank" in line two of the resolution, be deleted.

That the word "certain" in line three, be deleted and the word "all" substituted therefor.

That the words "a majority of" in line 4, be deleted.

That the words "to increase the number of directors" in line 5, be deleted.

That the words "election and" in line 6, be deleted and the words "by directors appointed" in line 7, be deleted—

So that the amended resolution would read:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Bank of Canada Act to provide that all shares thereof shall be purchased by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund in order to assure ownership of the shares by the government, and to provide for appointment of directors in such manner as to assure control of the board by the government.

A situation such as confronts Canada recently confronted the government of New Zealand. In that country they did not take the vacillating and temporizing position which is being taken by the present government. They introduced a bill intituled An Act to amend the Reserve Bank of New Zealand Act. I should like to give the committee a few of the clauses of this bill.

Section 2 reads:

2. (1) On the commencement of this act all shares in the capital of the reserve bank shall be deemed to be cancelled, and thereupon the several registered shareholders of the bank, as on the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and thirty-six, shall, in respect of the shares held by them on that date, be entitled, at their option, to receive for every such share either the sum of six pounds five shillings in cash or a like amount in New Zealand government stock.

Subsection 3 reads:

(3) Any cash payable by the bank under the provisions of subsection one hereof shall be paid by the bank out of its funds.

Subsection 4 reads:

(4) All stock issued under subsection one hereof shall be created and issued subject to the following special conditions, namely:—

(a) It shall be redeemable at par either on the first day of April, nineteen hundred and forty-six, or, at the option of the registered holder, on any earlier date that may be fixed by him on giving to the registrar of stock not less than fourteen days' notice in writing of his intention to require redemption of such stock on the date so fixed;

(b) During the currency of such stock it shall bear interest at the rate of four per centum per annum, to be payable half-yearly, on the first day of April and the first day of October, in each and every year;

(c) No transfer of any such stock shall be registered and no stock certificates shall at any time be issued in respect thereof.

Another section which, I think, is of interest to us in Canada is section 4:

4. Notwithstanding the cancellation of its shares in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this act, the bank, on and after the commencement of this act, shall be and shall continue to be the same body corporate as that which was constituted by section seven of the principal act (being a body corporate with perpetual succession and a common seal, and being capable of holding real and personal property, of suing and being sued, and of doing and suffering all such other acts and things as bodies corporate may lawfully do and suffer).

Here are some miscellaneous amendments of existing acts:

10. (1) It shall be the general function of the reserve bank, within the limits of its powers, to give effect as far as may be to the monetary policy of the government, as communicated to it from time to time by the minister of finance. For this purpose, and to the end that the economic and social welfare of New Zealand may be promoted and maintained, the bank shall regulate and control credit and currency in New Zealand, the transfer of moneys to or from New Zealand, and the disposal of moneys that are derived from the sale of any New Zealand products and for the time being are held overseas.

(3) All regulations made under the authority of this section shall be laid before parliament within twenty-eight days after the making thereof if parliament is then in session, and if not, then within twenty-eight days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

In this New Zealand legislation we have an act which the government of this country might very well study with care, and which with certain modifications might be of great value to us.

In submitting the amendment which I have moved, we are simply trying to place before the committee what, it seems to us, would be the carrying out of the promises made at the last election by the Liberal party to the Canadian people, and what, it seems to us, is desirable if we are to have a thoroughgoing control of our currency and credit. I do not think anything short of that will answer the purpose or indeed constitute the setting up of a truly national bank.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There has been a great deal of contention, and justly so, in respect of this bill. In my opinion it is one of the most important measures which has come before this house, and for the life of me I cannot understand why it has been left until the end of the session. The closing days are about here now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It seems that everything that has been done in this house up to date has rested entirely upon this monetary question. Such momentous questions as pensions for the blind, relief of the unemployment situation, and public works inevitably revert to the problem of money; yet we allow this debate to be the last or one of the last matters brought up in the house. I think it is time that this subject should be taken up fully. I commend the other speakers, especially the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth) for their constructive ideas, because the true purpose of parliamentary debate is to provide constructive criticism.

I desire to make plain in the following language the position taken by the group with which I am associated, on the question of the nationalization of the central bank. We have no objection to the public ownership of this bank. However we realize that this is not a question of paramount importance. What is vital and necessary is a change of policy so that, first, an increase in our ability to create real wealth should be reflected by an increase in purchasing power; second, goods and services should be distributed to individuals in proportion to the capacity of the nation to produce such goods and services; and third, the control of policy is the most important factor, and our financial policy should be designed to serve industrial and national requirements. I think the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) should have no objection to a statement of that kind, because he has said on several occasions that the paramount question is control of policy; that he was not so sure as to the nationalization problem. I think that was referred to as a debatable question. We do not take quite that stand. It may or may not be debatable, but in our estimation that is not the question which is so vitally important. The important question is the control of policy; yet that is one of the points evaded in the resolution. Oh, yes, I know it indicates that some additional directors are to be placed on the board so as to obtain control, but twice in this house I have been told by the leaders of the two great parties that parliament was supreme in every sense of the word. So I ask you, Mr. Chairman, why it is necessary to buy or sell more shares or do anything like that in order to secure control of policy. Why can we not pass legislation here which will give us absolute control? We are not so much concerned with the management of the bank, though we would have no objection whatever if the government thought it necessary to make some change there. That is beside the point. If it is necessary, go ahead and do it; we would support any measure of that kind. But why in the world can we not, without buying or selling any more shares, pass legislation here in order to obtain complete control of the policy of the bank?

This banking question has been held up as a very mysterious affair, and down through the ages we have been taught to believe that it was something sacred, of which we should not speak at any great length. Another of the theories that have been propounded for many years is that there is and can be only so much sound money. I think everyone is now of the opinion that the so-called sound money theory has been pretty well washed out. Another of the old ideas was that if any more money were created by the government it would be unsound, but that private individuals, private banks, might go ahead and create as much as they saw fit and that would be quite sound. Then, for many years it was considered that the amount of money Canada should have should be regulated by the amount of gold in the country. That was the old gold standard. That theory has now been abandoned, and we believe that the test of the amount of money in circulation should be not only gold but the natural wealth or assets of the country as a whole. If you are going to base money upon something that is necessarily scarce, such as gold, naturally you will have scarce money at all times, and when you leave the issuance of this credit and currency in the care of a few individuals who are solely concerned with the idea of profit, you are bound to have a condition of depression such as we have to-day. So-called depressions are entirely artificial; so are periods of prosperity, because both depressions and periods of prosperity are controlled by the financiers. That is not a question of management; it is a question of the control of policy, and if in this house we devoted our energies more towards securing control of policy I think we would be doing a greater service to the country.

Another old theory, which I think has been well exploded, is that banks do not create money. They do create it, in every sense of the word. If we had control of policy, and if in this house we considered that the policy of allowing private individuals to create money should be changed, we could make that change without altering the daily routine of the technical part of banking operations. I believe we are all agreed that the banking industry is very efficiently managed. It is a carefully organized business, and we would not need to interfere at all with the technique of carrying on that business. All we are concerned with is the question of policy.

I do not wish to take up too much time, but at this point I think it would be well to quote a well known authority for what I have just said. This quotation has been given at other times, but I think it well worth putting on Hansard again to show that some of these old fallacies are outworn. I quote from the remarks of Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, chairman of the Midland Bank and a former chancellor of the British exchequer, and I do so because he is a recognized banker and financial authority. These are his words:

> I am afraid the ordinary citizen will not like to be told that the banks can and do create and destroy money. The amount of money in existence varies only with the action of the banks in increasing or decreasing deposits ... they who control the credit of a nation direct the policy of governments and hold in the hollow of their hands the destiny of the people.

I contend that such a statement made by a man of the standing of Mr. McKenna should carry a great deal of authority. He says that those who control the credit of a nation direct the policy of government, and that is the point with which we should be concerned. We in this corner believe that the government should take over the control of currency and credit, and until such time as that is done I do not think conditions will greatly improve. The old system is entirely outworn. From the very first it was a debt creating system, and until we change that system we shall have the same conditions existing in this country. As long as we allow these individuals to issue money which starts out as a debt owed by the nation I do not see how we are going to get anywhere. In my opinion money must be issued interest free or at least the necessary amount of money must be issued afterwards to take the place of interest. For instance, if you allow the banks to issue credit to the amount of $100 and at the end of the year 7 per cent interest is charged, that makes a total of $107 which the public is required to pay back. When it is remembered that only $100 was issued to start with can anyone tell me where the $7 interest is to come from?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): From the production of the land or the business.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But it has to be paid back in currency. The banks do not want your wheat. If they want wheat the farmers will give them any amount of it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Oh, no, they will not.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The banks would not take it. You give the farmers a fair price and they will give you the wheat, but that is beside the point. When you put a proposition like that up to the public and tell them that they must pay back $7 in currency which does not exist, it becomes an absurdity. It is a mathematical impossibility; it cannot be done. The policy is wrong and the policy must be changed. There is no other way out. If you like to call this resolution one step in that direction all well and good, but you must go further than that.

I was pleased that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) referred to some of the election promises. I intended to deal with those also, but I believe the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has covered that matter very well. As the hon. gentleman was quoting from the speech delivered by the Prime Minister in Alberta, in which speech he advised the people to vote Liberal if they wanted financial security, I just wondered whether the treatment received by Alberta was her punishment for not having voted Liberal. Perhaps that was the case, though I would not suggest it.

Mr. DUNNING: To what treatment is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am referring to the treatment of Alberta in regard to the loan.

Mr. DUNNING: From whom?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): From the dominion government.

Mr. DUNNING: Is my hon. friend speaking now for the province of Alberta?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No; I am just putting forward that question. Perhaps it will be answered better at the next election. The Liberals got one member in the last election; perhaps they will not get even one next time.

I would like to mention what I consider a properly constituted national bank. I do this in all sincerity; I do not wish to criticize; I desire to offer some suggestions that might be helpful. I do not think there can be any doubt what a nationally owned bank means; it means owned not fifty-one per cent, but one hundred per cent by the people. I believe everyone in Alberta, at least everywhere that I heard any Liberal speeches, understood that the bank was to be publicly owned, and there was no condition attached. One of the main election cries in Alberta was: Why do you want social credit? And by the way social credit is progressing in Alberta. Of course social credit promised monetary reform. The people were told by the Liberal party that they were to get a nationally owned bank. The Liberals said: Why do you want social credit? We are going to give you monetary reform.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What about the $25 a month?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And the Liberals got some support on that promise of monetary reform. But now when the people see the kind of monetary reform that is offered them they are going to be just as much disappointed in Alberta as in other parts of Canada.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What about the $25 a month?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Don't you worry about the $25.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): A lot of people in Alberta are worrying about it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Now I might refer again to the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) as reported in Hansard, at page 453. I will read only a section, as the hon. leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation referred to this, but I think it is worth while drawing it to the attention of the committee again:

> As the house knows very well, and as I think the country knows, though the people may just as well be reminded of the fact for fear of misrepresentation afterwards—

That is why I am reading it again:

> —we on this side of the house were last year almost entirely in favour of a publicly owned central bank....

Now there cannot be any doubt of that. I think the minister was quite right when he expressed that opinion. Surely that is what the people expected, and that is what some hon. members expected. The statement I have quoted shows that one of the ministers expected it. We had on this side another Liberal expecting it, when he said the other day, as reported in Hansard, that that was one of the main things he considered they were coming to Ottawa for. I believe, in all sincerity, the people are looking to the government to-day not to do that thing partly, not to take a small step in that direction, but to go ahead and do it as it should be done. If this is to be a publicly owned bank operated in the interests of the people one of the essentials is to cut out interest entirely.

If you wish to add something for overhead, with some technical means of recovering it, there would be no objection to that. That would be a nationally owned bank, in keeping with the election promises.

Another principle of a nationally owned bank would be that money should be issued on the real wealth of the people, instead of allowing a privately organized company, such as the chartered banks or the central bank, to issue money on their own behalf. One of the great evils in our financial system is allowing these individuals or corporations to monetize the real wealth of the people and create an utterly impossible situation for them to meet.

Another essential for a nationally owned bank is that as real wealth increases money should increase. It seems to me to be obvious that as wealth increases money should increase, but during the régime of privately owned banks the system has worked in just the opposite way; as wealth increased they feared for their loans, so they began to call in these loans and thus created the so-called depression. Money should increase as wealth increases; there should be a balanced equation there; purchasing power should at all times equal production, and until that situation is brought about I cannot see that we are going to get very far. Another point for a nationally owned bank is the absolute control of policy by legislation, not merely by buying shares. That seems to me to be paramount.

Now, may we consider for a moment what the advantages would be to the people of Canada by having a publicly controlled or national central bank. One of the first things that would occur is that it would restore the sovereignty over money to its rightful possessors, namely the people of Canada, through parliament. That is where the control of money should be. This would ensure the lastingness of political freedom. It would make possible the attainment of a just annual living wage for the worker and production at a profit for the farmer. That could be easily done with a properly nationalized bank. Confiscation of the honestly acquired property and savings of the people could be prevented, which is not the case under the present system. I think of some of the farmers, not only in Alberta, but in Ontario and all over the dominion, who toiled sixteen hours a day to get together a little bit of property and then were forced to lose it. As I say, properly constituted policy would prevent confiscation of the honestly acquired property and savings of the people. Again, it would ensure lasting peace among the nations, whose governments would be able to legislate independently of the intervention of money changers. The next thing it would do would be to make possible the real freedom of the press and the teaching of the truth in all schools, freed once and for all from the domination of the creators of money; and to ensure independence for industry, which to-day is dominated by finance. That would be one of the great boons. It would also rectify conditions for those who are finding themselves in difficulty in the primary industries. It would ensure equitable credit for all manufacturers who are willing to pay a just living wage for the production of good products, enabling every manufacturer to pay a just living wage annually, free from the competition necessitated by the private control of money. It would eliminate the existence of non-productive bonds, such as victory bonds, which originated in the borrowing of money for digging shell holes and killing soldiers. Money would be backed by real wealth, and, as I suggested a moment ago, as wealth increases so should money, and as wealth decreases so should money, but things which are not productive should not have an earning power.

I think one of the most important features is that it would lessen the burden of taxation. We hear cries everywhere about the increasing burden of taxation, mostly needed for the purpose of taking care of the interest on debt in one form or another, or to carry on public works or to provide pensions for the blind and so on. This would be eliminated to a great degree. It would devise suitable means to distribute purchasing power into the hands of the consumer. You may call that a national dividend, or anything else you wish; it might be put out in that form or another, but sooner or later we are bound to come to that.

If these suggestions are helpful and are carried out the result would mean absolute control of policy; you would not need ownership in any sense of the word but you would have control of policy.

Now hon. members might say that this cannot be done. Again I say that, because it already has been done to some extent, it could be done here in this country. I have before me an article under date of April 3, from a New Zealand newspaper. It reads as follows:

> The labour government of New Zealand introduced Thursday in the house of representatives a new reserve bank bill, providing for elimination of state capital and the transfer of the bank into an entirely state concern.
> The bill also provided for alterations in the machinery of the bank designed to make it more useful. Placing the bank under full state control was a platform of the labour government elected last November.
> Shareholders will receive the full market value of their shares, plus an accrued dividend of five shillings (about $1.20) a share.
> The bank will regulate and control credit and currency in New Zealand, transfer moneys to or from the island and control the disposal of moneys derived from the sale of any New Zealand products and which for the time being are held overseas.

If New Zealand can do that, why can we not do it? There seems to be no logical reason why we should not do that very thing. The Liberal government, if it did that, would be fulfilling only that which it promised to do for the people of Canada. I say that because I am positive people in this country are expecting the Liberal party to carry out their promises. No longer ago than this morning I received through the mail some editorial comments in The Saskatchewan Liberal of May 28, and from it I shall quote a few lines to show what the people are still expecting.

> In view of the disappointment manifest—

As I would like hon. members to take note of the observation, I shall repeat it:

> In view of the disappointment manifest in Liberal ranks in Saskatchewan over the decision of the King government not to eliminate private shareholders from the Bank of Canada, but instead, to take control of the bank by the issue of new majority stock to be owned by the government, it is of special interest to note that the new labour government of New Zealand is following the other plan of buying out the shareholders,—the plan which was thought by the rank and file would be followed in Canada.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Whose writing is that?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is a Liberal paper.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member is quoting it; who is writing in the Liberal paper?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not know.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): No, the hon. member does not know.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is an editorial headed:

> State Control of Banking and Currency in New Zealand.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yet the hon. member does not know who the writer was.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is from the Saskatchewan Liberal.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is it an extract from another paper?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No; get the paper and look it up. I know it is hard for the hon. member to believe that Liberals in Canada expect what I have read. The hon. member probably does not know anything about it, but the next time he comes before the electors he will know something about it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And a lot of others will know, too.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The editorial continues:

The shareholders' directors will remain in office for the balance of their terms, but the whole directorate, with the exception of the governor, Mr. Leslie Lefeaux late of the Bank of England, and the deputy governor, will be removable at the government's pleasure, and new appointments do not require the approval of the board. The latter, in fact, is to have only two general functions,—to carry out the government's policy and to offer advice, which may or may not be taken.

In that paragraph the policy is stated. We must follow a similar policy in Canada, if we wish to carry out the promises which were made. The writer continues:

It does not matter whether we pay interest or not.

That is the point I mentioned a minute ago, following which I heard laughter from hon. members opposite. I say, however, that that condition is bound to come. We cannot put a mathematical impossibility before the people and expect them to work it out when we cannot do it. To continue the quotation:

Interest we pay to our own institution is ours anyway. If money is issued into any compact area it tends to bring added purchasing power. If we leave there the ordinary money that could be raised by way of loan and then issue the other, we have added money, as the issue of the money results in new assets coming into being. In the ultimate it is not the money that matters.

Note these words:

In the ultimate, it is not the money that matters; we live on goods, not money.

They are the things which should give us greatest concern. So long as we produce them, we should consume them. I continue reading:

We might have mistakes as we go along, but if we can see the symptoms and bring them under control we will have a better dominion. We have got to build a new economy in this country.

And, to read one further quotation:

In the matter of the reform of the central bank, if the government is to control by a majority ownership of the stock, what sound argument can be advanced against complete ownership?

That is the question which great numbers of people across Canada are asking. If the government believes in control or ownership, why should it not go ahead and have complete ownership? That is what the majority of Liberals in this chamber expected; that is what we all expected. Why not go ahead and carry it out? I notice in the resolution the following words:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Bank of Canada Act so as to increase the capital stock of the bank.

Why is it necessary to increase the capital stock? New Zealand bought the stock of its bank outright, and if we follow a similar procedure it would cost us less money; in actual money we would pay less. Why do we take another course and go still further into debt when we could do the same as they have done and spend less money in doing it? I cannot follow the reasoning used by the government. Probably I have not the technical information, and yet I wonder why we could not do what the government of New Zealand is doing.

As one of the present ministers pointed out last year, he could see no objection to nationalization, provided we went one hundred per cent of the way. Further on in his speech he said that he did not see why it should take ten, twenty or fifty years to get from the chartered banks control of the issue of currency. He said, and rightly so, "Why not do it at one sitting of the house?"

Mr. DUNNING: Who said that?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) said it in 1935. Why not do it at once; why spread it over a number of years?

A moment ago I said that hon. members in this section of the house would have no objection to one hundred per cent nationalization of the central bank, and in that stand we are in accord with the majority of hon. members in the chamber, including Liberals. I believe that is the opinion they hold. To show what people in Canada and the majority of hon. members expect, may I quote from the report of the banking and commerce committee of March 6, 1934. These are the observations of Mr. Irvine who was a member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group in the last parliament.

I am quite in agreement with you there, that the bank should be government controlled in all instances.

That is the statement of a man from the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I want to say that every party would support a policy of this kind.

But the mere ownership by the government of a banking institution or any institution whatsoever will not in itself effect the cure we desire, that is my point.

I want the difference in policy, not a matter of administration, because all that we are doing if we go from a private corporation to the public, we have only altered the method of administration, we have not altered the policy, and what I want to get at is the essential difference in policy between what you propose and what is now being done.

I think that is what we are all concerned with. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), appearing before the banking and commerce committee in 1934, said, as reported at page 703 of the evidence:

I would not socialize your banks or take away your right to carry on a merchant banking business, if you wanted to.

There we have a Liberal member emphasizing the control of policy. I believe it was the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) who said the other day, and very justly, when the subject of nationalization was up, that the government could not go into business, and I think he was right. Why change that attitude now? What we desire is an absolute control of policy.

I should like to give one more quotation so as to make the position of the social credit party quite clear and to show that there would be no objection to doing anything of this nature. Major Douglas, speaking before the same banking and commerce committee, said:

So far as I have views, I am all in favour of letting the existing banks run the business. What is fundamentally at stake is the assumption that this monetization which the banks do undoubtedly carry on—the creation of purchasing power—is a creation of purchasing power in their own favour solely, and, as I see it, they do not want to turn it over to the government or hand it over to the public except on their own terms. The result of that assumption and that state of affairs is, that quite beyond all discussion, the assumption is made that all production belongs to the banks since they alone create the effective demand which will cause that production to be delivered, and they claim the ownership of the effective demand which they create.

As I look over the resolution once more, I see that it provides that certain shares shall be purchased by the Minister of Finance out of consolidated revenue fund in order to secure ownership of a majority of the shares by the government, and there is also to be an increase in the number of directors. I could not help wondering just what was in the minds of the government, if it was not to create a few more soft jobs for some people because if the banking business is not being run efficiently I do not know what business is. So far as management is concerned, banking is, beyond comparison, the most efficient business. Why, then, do we want to interfere with it? Why do we want more directors and to spend more public money?

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member will permit me it has been moved in amendment by Mr. Woodsworth:

That the words after the word "act" ending with the word "bank" in line two of the resolution, be deleted.

That the word "certain" in line three, be deleted and the word "all" substituted therefor.

That the words "a majority of" in line 4, be deleted.

That the words "to increase the number of directors" in line 5, be deleted.

That the words "election and" in line 6, be deleted and the words "by directors appointed" in line 7, be deleted.

So that the amended resolution would read:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Bank of Canada Act to provide that all shares thereof shall be purchased by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund in order to assure ownership of the shares by the government, and to provide for appointment of directors in such manner as to assure control of the board by the government.

May I say that I would like to look up the authorities and give a ruling to the committee at eight o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS: Before giving your ruling, Mr. Chairman, would you permit a discussion of the point of order, a discussion of the question whether the amendment is in order?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I understand it, the chairman said that he would have to consider the matter, and therefore I assume he is quite prepared to listen to argument before ruling. I was going to raise the point that the amendment is contrary to section 54 of the British North America Act, which reads as follows:

It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by a message of the governor general in the session in which such vote, resolution, address, or bill is proposed.

I draw attention to the words: not lawful for the House of Commons to pass any resolution for the appropriation of any revenue—I quote:

to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by a message of the governor general.

The house has before it a resolution of the Minister of Finance, a minister of the crown who preceded his resolution by a recommendation from His Excellency the Governor General, that a measure be introduced to ensure ownership of a majority of the shares of the Bank of Canada by the government. The purpose of the measure is not, as the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) pointed out a few moments ago, to acquire all the shares, which would amount to complete government ownership. That was the exception taken by the hon. member to the resolution.

My hon. friend's amendment is that the resolution should be amended to provide that all shares of the Bank of Canada shall be purchased by the Minister of Finance. Quite a different purpose. To be in order the amendment would have to be introduced in the house in the first instance in the form of a resolution by a minister of the crown and be recommended to the house by His Excellency the Governor General. May I draw attention to what May says, at page 461:

> The committee is not bound by the terms of the provisions which the ministers of the crown have inserted in the bill; and any member may propose to increase the grants specified in these clauses or to extend the application of the provisions of the bill, whatever may be the cost resulting therefrom, so long as the power conferred by the royal recommendation is not exceeded.

The question whether an additional expenditure is involved or not is not the point at issue in this case. It is a question whether the power conferred by the royal recommendation is being exceeded, and all that the royal recommendation has granted, as the hon. member for York South has pointed out, is power to purchase a majority of the shares, but not power to purchase all the shares. The hon. member's amendment is to purchase all the shares.

May I also cite May, 13th edition, at page 546:

> An amendment proposing to substitute for the resolution an argumentative justification for the refusal of that demand is out of order, as are also amendments proposed with a view to submitting an alternative scheme to that proposed with the royal recommendation.

The criticism of the government by those who are opposing this resolution as worded is that we have not adopted the alternative scheme which is being proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Inasmuch as the amendment proposes an alternative scheme, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is out of order.

Mr. HEAPS: May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you also look at paragraph 558 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was discussing whether or not the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) was in order, and apparently you had made up your mind that you were going to give a ruling at eight o'clock. I hope that your mind is not as yet made up. The Prime Minister tried to point out that the amendment was out of order because it conflicted with the recommendations made by the governor in council. I would point out that if that interpretation is to be placed upon the rules of the house, an amendment moved by any hon. member to any bill could be in order. Every amendment to a measure proposed by the government would always be ruled out of order on that ground alone. If your mind is not made up, Mr. Chairman, I should like you to look at paragraph 558 and 559 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, and apply those to the resolution of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). Paragraph 558 reads:

> Motions advocating public expenditure, or the imposition of a charge, if the motion be framed in sufficiently abstract or general terms, can be entertained and agreed to by the house. Resolutions of this nature are permissible because, having no operative effect, no grant is made or burthen imposed by their adoption.

Paragraph 559 reads:

> The constitutional principle which vests in the crown the sole responsibility of incurring national expenditure, forbids an increase by the commons of a sum demanded on behalf of the crown for the service of the state. This principle, however, is apparently disregarded when the recommendation of the crown is given to a resolution empowering the expenditure of public money which, framed in general terms, places no limitation on the amount of expenditure to be authorized by the resolution.

I claim that the resolution moved by the Minister of Finance does not state any specific amount. The resolution. reads:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Bank of Canada Act so as to increase the capital stock of the bank, to provide that certain shares thereof shall be purchased by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund in order to assure ownership of a majority of the shares by the government, to increase the number of directors, and to provide for election and appointment of directors in such manner as to assure voting control of the board by directors appointed by the government.

I claim that the amendment is exactly in accordance with paragraphs 558 and 559. May I go a little further than that? In the first place there is no actual increased expenditure implied by the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In fact, I would argue that actually it means a decrease. The government proposes an expenditure that would be equivalent to the value of about fifty-one per cent of the stock owned by the private shareholders of the present Bank of Canada. My hon. friend suggests that instead of the government taking funds and applying them to the purchase of new shares to number more than the total owned by private investors in the bank, these funds should be utilized for the purpose of buying up what would ultimately be the minority of the shareholders of the bank. In that way I claim the amendment actually means a decrease and not an increase in the expenditure proposed. Second, the amendment moved by my hon. friend is in exact conformity with paragraphs 558 and 559, and I respectfully submit that the amendment is absolutely in order.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a few remarks to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I merely wish to say that if this amendment is ruled out of order because of the reasons given by the Prime Minister in his observations prior to six o'clock, a precedent will be laid down that no member shall be permitted to suggest any amendment to or interfere in any way with a resolution introduced by the government and preceding a bill. If such a decision is made, I submit that it will be extremely serious. I appreciate the point raised by the Prime Minister, but I still believe it is covered by the rules. In addition to the paragraphs cited by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) I think attention should be directed to paragraph 555 of Beauchesne's Rules and Forms, which reads:

> No increase can be considered either of an existing, or of a new or temporary tax for the service of the year, except on the initiative of a minister acting on behalf of the crown.

Of course, that is a well known and well accepted rule. I now direct attention to paragraph 556, which reads:

> The house can make amendments which diminish the amount of reduction of taxation, or postpone the day when the reduction takes place, although the amendment may increase to that extent the charges proposed to be levied upon the people.

It may be argued that those rules refer to taxation, but after all the principle involved is this: It is not competent for a private member to introduce a measure which imposes a charge upon the public revenue. That is the broad principle. It does not matter whether that principle is applicable to estimates or to a bill of a specific kind involving the expenditure of public money. It may be argued—and I think this is the point raised by the Prime Minister—that inasmuch as this is a resolution preceding a bill introduced by the government, therefore it is not competent for a private member to move an amendment. But estimates are also resolutions submitted to His Excellency the Governor General in exactly the same way as was this resolution. Having received his approval, they are offered to the house for its approval. Although such a measure contains the express view of the government and has been submitted to His Excellency the Governor General, under the rules the house may make amendments as long as they do not offer or purport to increase the amount.

In this instance the resolution has been submitted in very general terms, as has been indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. The terms are broad; no specific amount is mentioned, nor is the exact manner in which the shares are to be acquired stated; the resolution simply says that it is expedient to bring in a measure so as to increase capital stock of the bank, to provide that certain shares thereof—it does not say what shares—shall be purchased by the Minister of Finance. I submit that the minister could very well argue, when this resolution and the bill to be founded upon it are passed, that he is empowered to buy all the shares of the Bank of Canada, the new issue and the old issue, if he so desires. Those being the general powers of the resolution, I do not see that an amendment suggesting a slight modification and limitation of the original motion should be regarded as out of order and not competent for a private member to move.

The Prime Minister has always been, very properly, a great champion of the rights of individual members of the house. I appeal to him that, before it is asked that this amendment should be ruled out of order, careful consideration should be given to the possible effect in the future of a precedent of this kind. I know he does not wish to lay down a rule of principle or practice that would curb the rights of private members. There have been occasions before in this session and previous ones when I have noticed the government taking an attitude towards members' amendments which I felt was probably unwarranted, and restrictive of what I believe to be the rights of private members. That is the feature I wish to emphasize, and while it would be most distasteful to me to differ from or challenge a ruling of the chair, I strongly urge a reconsideration of this matter and that, in view of the desire of, I think, every one in this house to preserve the rights of private members, this amendment be permitted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend said that he wished to direct his remarks particularly to me. May I say that I appreciate the manner in which he has done so, particularly his having said that I would not wish in any way to seek to curb the powers of private members with respect to any measure, because I favour as full powers as may be possible being given to every hon. member of the house. On the other hand, I think hon. members will agree that it is important to observe the rules of the house where they relate to the essentials of any particular course of proceeding. The question we are discussing at the moment does not relate so much to any additional expenditure involved by the amendment proposed but rather to the change it would effect in the purport of the original resolution. My contention is that the government cannot be chastised for something and at the same time be expected to support the very thing for which chastisement is being administered. My hon. friend the member for York South (Mr. Lawson), who this afternoon is apparently acting as financial critic on behalf of the opposition, directed his criticism against the Minister of Finance on the score that this resolution was not a resolution for complete government ownership of the bank. He said that, therefore, we were not implementing the pledges we made in the general election. Had I spoken immediately following my hon. friend, I would have thanked him for having made clear to the house—and I should like to do so now, and thank as well my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and other hon. members—for having brought out so clearly the entire consistency of the course which was followed by myself in the statements I made in the recent campaign and previously in the House of Commons with regard to the government's policy and position on this matter of a properly constituted Central National Bank.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me repeat what was said. Quotations were read by the Minister of Finance from speeches I delivered in this house, in which, speaking as leader of the party, I said that so far as I was concerned, it had always seemed to me that the question of government ownership was a debatable question, but that the question of government control was not debatable, that the control of the bank should be with the government and not with private interests.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: I did not direct a single criticism against the government regarding that phase of the matter. I spoke merely to the point of order, not to the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know. I am not finding fault with my hon. friend there. I am just giving the reason why I believe the amendment is out of order. It is because it provides something fundamentally different from what is intended by the resolution before the committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, it does not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me repeat, and I think hon. members will agree with this, that the Minister of Finance made it clear that in this house, speaking on this question, I stated over and over again that the question of government ownership was not the real question involved in the proper constitution of a national bank, that the essential thing was the control rather than the ownership. If we had not provided for the control, and effective control, on the part of the government, I would say that we were liable to be criticized for not having carried out what we stood for, both in this house and in the campaign.

Coming to the campaign, my hon. friend from York South read to us extracts from different papers in the country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not like to interrupt the Prime Minister, but are we on the point of order or not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, we are, and I am now dealing with my hon. friend's amendment, the very essence of it. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) read extracts from papers at Vancouver, at Calgary, and in other provinces to have it appear if possible that I was shading my remarks towards one view in one place and another view in another. But every extract he read made it perfectly clear that I had never varied in any particular from the position taken throughout on the importance of having government control, and in not stressing government ownership.

What is the essence of the resolution moved by the Minister of Finance? It is that there shall be given to him or the government power to purchase out of the consolidated revenue fund sufficient shares, for what purpose? To assume ownership by the government of a majority of the shares. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asks that that be amended so as to provide that all the shares of the Bank shall be purchased by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it not a question of degree?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not a question of degree, but of the difference between absolute ownership—

Mr. HEAPS —and majority ownership.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and majority ownership of the shares,—two different things. We are being criticized for accepting the latter. We are quite prepared to stand by what we have done. We believe it is sufficient. We believe it is in the public interest. When my hon. friend suggests that we should accept his amendment, he asks that we accept an alternative proposal this, as May has pointed out in the paragraph I cited, cannot be done by way of an amendment. This is an alternative proposal, it is not an amendment that is in order. It is a very clear alternative. I made no point whatever about my hon. friend's amendment involving a little more in the way of expenditure. I took care to give a citation which made it clear that there might be additional expenditure without an amendment being out of order. The citation I made will be found in May, page 461.

Mr. STEVENS: What edition is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is the twelfth edition.

> The committee is not bound by the terms of the provisions which the ministers of the crown have inserted in the bill, and any member may propose to increase the grants specified in these clauses or to extend the application of the provisions of the bill, whatever may be the cost resulting therefrom,—

But here is the essential condition:

> —so long as the power conferred by the royal recommendation is not exceeded.

Now the power conferred by the royal recommendation in this resolution limits the purchase of shares to a majority of shares. The amendment of my hon. friend exceeds the power which was granted by the royal recommendation, and that is why his amendment is out of order. There is this further citation from page 546; thirteenth edition.

> An amendment proposing to substitute for the resolution an argumentative justification for the refusal of that demand is out of order, as are also amendments proposed with a view to substituting an alternative scheme to that proposed with the royal recommendation.

In other words the royal recommendation with respect to all bills involving the payment of public moneys is necessary in order that at the very outset the purpose of a measure may be made clear, not merely the amount of the expenditure involved but also the purpose of the power that is being granted. All that was asked for in the royal recommendation was power to purchase a majority of the shares, not all the shares, and the amendment exceeds that power and offers an alternative scheme. For both these reasons I submit that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that where we have no specific rule it seems to me that we must go on analogy, and, as my hon. friend from Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) pointed out, the same principle underlies taxation, where we must have the recommendation of the governor general. In paragraph 569 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms we have what is possible with regard to taxation:

> No motion therefore can be made to impose a tax, save by a minister of the crown, unless such tax be in substitution, by way of equivalent. . . .

The inference there is very clearly that something may be substituted, even in the case of taxation. I submit that if this is true with regard to taxation it is equally true in regard to a matter of this kind. The Prime Minister concedes that there will be no additional expenditure involved, so we can leave that to one side. But he also says that the amendment I have proposed would take over all shares whereas the original resolution speaks of taking over only a majority of shares. Well, surely the Prime Minister recognizes that all the present shares will be less than the majority of the shares if this resolution is adopted. I do not think he can possibly press that point, because if we take over all the present shares we shall not have to take over as many shares as we would if we acquired a majority under the resolution of the Minister of Finance. It is ridiculous that my motion should be ruled out of order because it proposes to take over fewer shares than would have to be taken over under the resolution.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not the point.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is very decidedly the point the Prime Minister makes; that is one of his main points, and in any ruling that may be given by the chair I think that point should be answered.

The Prime Minister's main objection is that this alternative motion has not the recommendation of the governor general. May I point out what it would really amount to if this were declared out of order. Based upon this resolution a bill will be brought into the house. That bill must be founded upon this resolution; as I understand it the principle of the bill cannot be different from the principle of the resolution. It must be exactly the same, otherwise we would be disregarding the governor general; once we got the resolution through we would be introducing another idea altogether, another proposal. So if to-day it is ruled that we cannot introduce an amendment to the resolution it means that we cannot introduce an amendment to the bill, which would reduce this house to a nullity, a mere debating society.

That is a stronger position than was taken by the previous government in connection with the original bill setting up the Bank of Canada. Some of the older members will recall that we on this side—and I am still on the side I was on in those days—attempted to introduce an amendment on second reading. The Speaker of that time would not permit us to do so. I quote from page 4374 of Hansard of 1934:

Mr. Rhodes: That is the only principle. The point whether this bank should be publicly or privately owned as well as questions respecting the numerous other details incidental to the bill are matters of detail which can be dealt with by way of amendment in the regular course as we proceed in committee on banking and commerce, or in committee of the whole house, or upon motion on the third reading of the bill.

Notwithstanding this, when the third reading of the bill did come, we were prohibited from introducing any amendment. The Liberals, who were then in opposition, also tried to introduce an amendment, but we were both ruled out of order. That meant that we could not introduce any change on the second reading or on the third reading, and I submit that if the government presses this matter and upholds the principle that we cannot introduce an amendment of this kind it completely rules out the possibility of this house really having control of legislation. The Prime Minister emphasized the need of the government being consulted in this matter, and so on. Well, I can remember back in 1925 when the Prime Minister took the ground very strongly that the governor general could not interfere in any way with the decision of his ministers; that the decision of the ministers ought to be final. The Prime Minister took a strong stand on that occasion in connection with the position of the governor general. Now it would seem that he is switching round completely and saying that until the governor general consents to every detail of money legislation, this house is helpless. That is an impossible situation. Surely this parliament has rights, just as much as in those days the government had rights. I supported the government in those days; little did I think the time would come when that very government, appealing for support because of its Liberal principles, would attempt to deprive parliament of its right to control legislation. I protest against any decision which would take away those rights and powers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When my hon. friend speaks of depriving parliament of the rights it has in connection with legislation I hope he will not dispute that these rights are set out within the four corners of the British North America Act. At the moment I should like to direct the attention of the committee to one of the provisions of the British North America Act which is most specific with regard to matters of legislation. It is section 54 of the British North America Act, which reads as follows:

It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address, or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the governor general in the session in which such vote, resolution, address, or bill is proposed.

That is the situation. There has been no recommendation presented to this house by any minister of the crown carrying the recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General, in accordance with the terms of the constitution, which ask powers for the government to acquire all shares in order to obtain complete ownership of the Bank of Canada. There having been no such request made on the intiative of any minister of the crown on the recommendation of the governor general, I submit that it is impossible lawfully so to pass the resolution. The power requested by the resolution is less than that which is asked for by the amendment, and the bill is one pertaining to public expenditure.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I point out to the Prime Minister that the rights of parliament antedate the British North America Act. Our rights are very clearly set out in the clause that was read by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) where it says:

. . . if the motion be framed in sufficiently abstract or general terms, can be entertained, and agreed to by the house. Resolutions of this nature are permissible because, having no operative effect, no grant is made or burthen imposed by their adoption.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all right, if the resolution were sufficiently abstract, but my hon. friend's amendment is anything but abstract. It is to provide that "all shares thereof shall be purchased by the Minister of Finance." That is as concrete as anything can be. It is a concrete amendment, demanding that this house shall make provision to purchase all shares, to a resolution which asks only for permission to purchase a majority of the shares; an entirely different thing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A smaller number of shares.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says the house is losing its control of legislation. He seems to forget that he is not bound to accept this legislation of the government, he may vote against it if he wishes. He may also vote in support of it, or support an amendment which is in order. As long as he has the power to vote for or against a resolution or an amendment which is in order, he is not surrendering his right to exercise control in the matter of legislation. It is, however, absolutely essential, unless we are going to depart from rules that are fundamental, that we observe the rules laid down.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: "Take it or leave it."

Mr. STEVENS: The Prime Minister has invoked an argument which I was about to apply to himself. He says those who do not like this motion can vote against it. That is precisely what can be done with the amendment. What the Prime Minister is doing is confusing his rights and powers as a government with a majority to vote on something that is proposed with the right of a private member to introduce any amendment to such a resolution. Let me draw the attention of the committee to section 54 of the British North America Act:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address, or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the governor general. . . .

What does that mean? It means that this house cannot on its own initiative pass an appropriation of the public revenue. That has nothing at all to do with the question before us; it is not the point at issue. The point at issue is: Can this house, having received at the hands of the government a certain motion which has been submitted to His Excellency the Governor General, consider that motion and, if it deems it advisable, amend it? I submit that the adoption of the view of the Prime Minister would establish a precedent which would seriously curb the rights of hon. members and limit the usefulness of the House of Commons in the consideration of legislation. Section 54 of the British North America is not applicable to this instance at all.

I simply content myself with pointing this out, because certainly the question will have to come to an issue some day. This may not be a sufficiently important matter on which to bring it to an issue, but sooner or later the issue is bound to rise: Shall the members of this house, as members, have rights or shall they not? I warn the Prime Minister that the course he is pursuing amounts to this, that if a government, it does not matter what government, chooses to come to the house with a certain proposal, they can say, that is our proposal, we will not entertain any suggestions in regard to it. That would be a very dangerous precedent to establish.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Since my hon. friend has spoken on the point, may I quote what he said, speaking in this house on April 21, 1936, as reported at page 2051 of Hansard when a similar question was up. My hon. friend in reference to the harbours' bill then under discussion concluded by saying:

> The bill was preceded by the resolution, part of which I have read. It was submitted to His Excellency the Governor General, received his approval and was submitted to the house. Following that a bill was introduced to set up one harbour board. As I said before, there may be a question in my mind as to the advisability of that action, but in so far as the point of order is concerned may I suggest that it is raised upon the point that the amendment departs from the principle enunciated in the resolution which preceded the bill, and is indeed a definite alteration in the principle of the bill.

Exactly the same point.

Mr. STEVENS: But this amendment is not a departure from the principle.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh yes, it is.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I would ask the Prime Minister if he has not been confusing terms in his argument. Has he taken into consideration the fact that the amendment involves the purchase of five hundred thousand shares whereas the resolution involves the purchase of five hundred and one thoustand—or rather I should say that the amendment calls for the purchase of five million shares, whereas the resolution involves the purchase of five million one hundred thousand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was very careful to avoid discussing figures, for fear I might get tangled up just as has my hon. friend. I was careful to point out that the whole significance of the point of order lay in the fact that we could not have one principle governing at one time and another principle governing at another time, and that an amendment which altered the principle of the resolution was out of order, particularly if it related to a matter of public expenditure, which had not been brought to the attention of the house by a minister of the crown with the consent of His Excellency the Governor General in advance.

Mr. MITCHELL: The government is quite supreme in this matter—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; the house is.

Mr. MITCHELL: The government at the moment is protesting against or about to ask the chairman to rule out of order an amendment. This may be done, or it may not be done; we shall hear that shortly from the chairman. There have been good arguments presented on both sides of the matter, and I suggest that with the powerful majority the government have in the house, if they do not want to see the Bank of Canada Act amended as the amendment proposes, they allow the amendment to go to a vote. Or is there some reason why they do not want that to happen?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I make perfectly clear to my hon. friend, so that no insinuation may be allowed to pass, that part of the duty of the government is to see that the rules of the house are observed, and to draw the attention of hon. members to those rules. In this matter the government is not exercising any powers other than may be exercised by every hon. member of the House of Commons. My hon. friend has just as much power as I have in the matter of what shall be done in regard to this question, because it is one which affects the procedure and the rules of the House of Commons, and the House of Commons alone controls its rules and procedure, not the government.

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. gentleman quoted me a moment ago. I wish he had finished the quotation. Referring to whether this point of order was well taken, I said further:

> I do not believe it is advisable for the house always to accept a point of order raised in connection with a money bill, because I believe we are getting too much into the habit of ruling amendments out of order simply because a bill may refer to the expenditure of money. I suggest that a great deal of care should be exercised in curtailing the privileges of a member in that regard. On the other ground however I think the amendment unfortunately is out of order.

The point I was getting at then and what I am getting at now is that great caution should be exercised in the use of the power of a government with a majority—I am not saying that in any offensive way—in influencing the ruling out of order of amendments.

The CHAIRMAN: I may say to hon. members of the committee that since the committee rose at six o'clock I have given the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) very careful attention, and I have also listened attentively to the arguments advanced by all hon. members who have spoken since eight o'clock.

This is not a motion for appropriation of public moneys. It is a proposed resolution under standing order 60 for a charge upon the people to be voted upon another occasion and it is required in order that a bill to amend the Bank of Canada Act, a bill involving an expenditure, be introduced. The fundamental terms of the resolution submitted to the house with the governor general's recommendation, upon which this committee was appointed, cannot be amended. Amendments will be in order only if they fall within the terms of the resolution. May, 13th edition, page 546, says that the procedure in committees on money resolutions follows in principle the procedure of the committee of supply, and that amendments are out of order if they are proposed with a view to substituting an alternative scheme to that proposed with the royal recommendation. The point was decided by Mr. Whitley, then chairman of committees in the British House of Commons, on October 22, 1917. I therefore rule that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I regret that I must challenge your ruling.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

> In the course of the debate on the resolution respecting a measure to amend the Bank of Canada Act an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The chairman having ruled the amendment out of order, an appeal is made from the chairman's ruling.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the Chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

The house resumed consideration in committee of the proposed resolution with respect to the Bank of Canada—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the main motion.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Speaking to the main motion, I have already stated, Mr. Chairman, that we were not opposing the complete nationalization of the Bank of Canada, but rather that we were more in favour of complete government control, and judging by the Prime Minister's remarks a little while ago he also is in favour of that idea. The main point, so far as the Bank of Canada is concerned, is that we should have control. The means to be taken to secure that control is another question. The government proposes to issue enough new stock to get control. We contend that that is not necessary; that the government could get control outright by legislation. Control is the predominating question, and on this question that control is an essential factor I should like to quote from an authority, Reverend Charles E. Coughlin, to show how the central bank could control all other phases of banking. He has published a little book entitled Money, which deals with the subject in the form of question and answer, and while it has reference to the federal government in the United States it should be applicable to the federal government in this country. The first question is this:

1. Who should own all the local banks?

The answer to that is:

Local banks should be owned by privately owned corporations chartered by the respective states wherein they are located. The federal government should coin and regulate all money, but private banks should lend money owned by private citizens.

That brings out clearly that control should lie with the central bank, and that control can be secured by legislation. The next question is this:

2. Should these banks just described be controlled in any manner by the government?

That again brings up the question of government control. The answer to that question is:

Since these privately owned banks are state chartered, they should be controlled by the state.

For "state" read "dominion government." It goes on:

It should be the duty of the state government to set up equitable rules and regulations under which these banks must operate.

That is the point I wish to emphasize, that we in this parliament should secure control by means of legislation without the necessity of owning a single share. The next question is this:

3. With what kind of money would the banks do business?

The answer to that is:

These banks would do business only with United States—

Read "Canadian" for "United States":

—legal tender which private individuals or corporations actually brought to the banks.

I should now like to quote from a little pamphlet which I was amused to pick up in one of the banks the other day, and which is entitled, The Public and The Banks, by James Muir. It deals with some of the misleading ideas that are being broadcast to-day. It says:

You may be interested to learn that the banks operate nearly five million deposit accounts in Canada. Surely, when so much confidence has been shown in us, it is absolutely essential and obligatory that the banks should be keenly aware of their duties to these millions of people. All of which means that banks must be kept at all times in condition to meet, at a moment's notice, a depositor's request for his money.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to raise another point of order, but there is before the committee a specific matter which relates to the Bank of Canada and the control of credit by the Bank of Canada under conditions which will ensure the government having a predominant interest and control. I submit that the chartered banking system is not at issue on this resolution, and therefore such a discussion cannot be in order. I do not want to limit the discussion, but I would like to see it confined to the subject matter of the resolution rather than take in the broader field of the operation of the chartered banks which in no sense enters into either the resolution or the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I was just trying to draw a comparison.

The CHAIRMAN: The point raised by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is well taken and I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the resolution before the committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not wish to violate the rules of the house, but I was just trying to point out how these banks could be controlled by legislation through the central bank; that this all could be done by legislation. If that is ruled out of order, I will just dispense with it.

[Mr C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. STEVENS: On the same principle, I submit that a substantial portion of the speech made this afternoon by the Minister of Finance would be out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I am inclined to think the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) was also out of order.

Mr. STEVENS: I got my interjection in.

Mr. DUNNING: My remarks this afternoon bore at every stage directly and pointedly upon this resolution.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Chairman, you have ruled on the point of order and perhaps it will be difficult for me to make any observation. The ruling was made before any chance was offered to speak on the point of order. However I submit to the Minister of Finance that the debate on one of the most vital matters before the house this session should not be so limited that an hon. member cannot refer to the general system of banking when the Bank of Canada Act states that it is to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and generally to promote the economic and financial welfare of the dominion. This resolution is directed to an adjustment of the Bank of Canada Act to make that more possible. The hon. gentleman was referring in a general way to the control of credit, but on the suggestion of the Minister of Finance, he is ruled out of order. If that is to be the precedent, then there will be no possibility of an adequate discussion of this very important matter. In saying what I say now, I only say what I was going to say when I rose to speak on this resolution. I have no desire to criticize this resolution; I am going to wait until the bill comes down, but, good gracious, if we are to be curbed and circumscribed in this manner, there will be no possibility of discussing in this house legislation of this type. While I sympathize with the minister in his desire to get this resolution through—in a moment or two I shall have a few sentences to utter which will be uttered for the very purpose of assisting him to get it through—I am startled at the ruling just given. The hon. member is new to this house and he cannot have a complete knowledge of the rules, but he is abruptly ruled out of order, when I submit that he was distinctly in order. I do not wish to reflect on the ruling of the chair, but I must say that I do not think the debate should be circumscribed in this way.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member was quoting from a pamphlet which deals with the relations of the chartered banks to the deposits of their depositors.

Mr. STEVENS: Why not?

Mr. DUNNING: I submit that that is completely foreign to what we now have before us. I am quite familiar with the pamphlet from which the hon. gentleman was reading and I know that the further along he goes the more out of order he will be. I have every sympathy with new members, but I submit that a new member can best learn the rules by being told by the chairman when he is out of order. That is the way I had to learn them.

Mr. STEVENS: That is quite all right; it is a different thing to be kept in order by the chairman. I agree entirely with that, but I do not agree with the point upon which the ruling was made.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I think we are learning very fast the routine business of parliament and how parliament does business. I may say that my conception to-day is quite different from what it was when I first came to Ottawa, and it is changing all the time. I do not suppose I had better refer to that pamphlet again because apparently it is mostly all wrong. What I was trying to show by quoting from that pamphlet was how banking could be controlled entirely through legislation. All these misrepresentations that are being circulated could be rectified right here in this house.

I want to refer again to this resolution and the control of policy. During the election we heard a great cry about the wonderful monetary reforms which were to be brought about, how it was going to benefit the people if they voted Liberal and got these monetary reforms. As I pointed out a little while ago, one of the essential features of a nationally owned bank should be the reduction, or perhaps the complete elimination of interest rates. Not long ago I listened to some remarks by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl), and I should like to refer again to them. The hon. member was speaking about the principle which should be laid down by the government in this banking measure. He is reported at page 1835 of Hansard of April 6, as follows:

> Mr. Kuhl: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Is it necessary for the dominion government to go into debt for any public works projects, no matter to what extent?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: If I were to judge by the past, I should say that apparently it has not been thought so, because the public debt is pretty large as a consequence of many projects.
>
> Mr. Kuhl: Is it necessary?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I am inclined to think it is with respect to many projects, yes. Does my hon. friend think otherwise? If so, can he tell us how to escape debt if we go into unlimited expenditure?

I think that is one of the main principles which should be brought down in legislation. The government is going to get control by the purchase of additional shares; yet I doubt if there is to be any material change in policy. According to the Prime Minister, there would seem to be some truth in the rumour that we are still to borrow money from, I assume, the banks and go still further into debt. I tried to point out a while ago that the purpose of a nationally owned bank should be to reduce debt expenditures and thereby reduce taxation. It seems to me more evident as I go along that the point we should stress in parliament, as the Prime Minister said a moment ago, is a change of policy, and that policy should be brought down right now. As I look over the resolution I cannot see that by the proposed change the central bank is going to be anything more than a privately owned bank. We are to have the government in business, holding a majority of the shares. That is true enough; yet all the other obligations of this 49 per cent of shareholders will have to be met. It will be just a privately owned bank, with the government as one of the shareholders. The other 49 per cent must be paid their dividend according to the act, and the interest must be paid. The measure still permits, to a degree at least, the monetization of the real wealth of the people rather than having it controlled entirely by the government. One thing I notice is lacking. I may be called out of order for making this observation; nevertheless it seems to me to be in order; and it is, that in this Bank of Canada Act there is no mention whatever of the control of the chartered banks. I think one of the evils which required attention lay in the conduct of the chartered banks; there should be some control of them, and it should be provided for at once.

As I have said, one of the promises made by the Liberals during the election was a monetary change, and if I may be permitted to refer to Hansard, at page 1982, I will show the committee exactly what the people expected. It is contained in the speech of a Liberal who, I see, is not in his place to-day, but from whom I expected to hear a great deal on the bank question, because I listened to him on the platform in Alberta, and I expected that as a Liberal he would take a similar stand in this house. For some mysterious reason, however, he is not in the chamber to-day. This is what he said:

> Now, let me say one further word. The right hon. Prime Minister asked some member on the other side of the house what industries this government should take over. Well, speaking as a Liberal,—

I should like hon. members to note that.

> —I thought we came here to take over from the Bank of Canada the industry of manufacturing Canadian capital. I want to go further and say that until such time as we are prepared to vest in the government of this dominion the power to create, issue and regulate currency and credit in terms of public need, there will be no solution of either the tax, the debt or the unemployment problems in the Dominion of Canada.

Unless Liberals take heed to some of the suggestions that have been given them to-day and carry out some of the election promises they made all over the dominion not long ago, they are surely building a cross upon which they themselves will be crucified at the next election, if not before.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now that my hon. friend has concluded his remarks, may I say that the last of them were completely out of order. He was quoting from a previous debate in the present session, and that is against the rules of the house.

Mr. STEVENS: Which the right hon. gentleman did a few moments ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And he was out of order if he did, unless, as was the case, it was on a point of order.

Miss MACPHAIL: We shall soon not be able to debate at all.

Mr. STEVENS: As I intimated a few moments ago, it is not my intention to debate this resolution at any length. I wish, however, to address a request to the minister and to make one or two observations in connection with the resolution. Personally I am not very much concerned whether the Bank of Canada Act is amended or not. I do not think it requires amendment to enable the government and parliament to make very wide and extensive use of the powers of the present Bank of Canada as set forth in the existing statute. What is of importance, I believe, to this country is: what is the purpose behind it all? What is the intention of the government? What is this policy that is to be put into operation after the Bank of Canada Act has been amended? A few moments ago, when we were discussing the point of order, I read a section of the preamble of the act. Perhaps I might repeat that, merely to emphasize what I desire to request of the minister. The preamble of the existing act declares that the purpose of the act is, among other things:

> —to control and protect the external value of the national monetary unit and to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and generaly to promote the economic and financial welfare of the dominion.

That is an indication of the purpose of the creation of the Bank of Canada. It will still remain, I assume, as the general declaration of the purpose of the bank. I should like to ask the minister whether on the second reading of the bill to be founded upon this resolution he would be good enough to make a statement of the policy of the government, having in mind these broad declarations of intention as to the use of this bank, and having also in mind the needs of the country at the present time. It is my intention, when this bill comes forward for second reading, to discuss at greater length certain matters appertaining to it. One other request I make of the minister is this: Would he delay the second reading for, say three days to give us an opportunity to read the printed bill and give it a reasonable amount of study? I suggest this because the bill amending the Bank of Canada Act is, in my opinion, the most important piece of legislation suggested to the house this session, and it is not unreasonable, I think, to ask that we be given two or three days to study a bill which we have not yet seen.

While I am on my feet, and just to complete my observations, may I say that the minister, in presenting his resolution, made an excellent résumé of the functions of central banks, and the history of them in various countries. It is a most useful statement and one, I believe, that met with the approval of the house generally. But I suggest that on the second reading of the bill we are entitled to know the policy of the government. To the right hon. the Prime Minister I would say that I have no desire to drag in election speeches or election promises, because I recall a very eminent Liberal statesman quite a number of years ago saying in this house on one occasion that election promises were like the platform of a pullman car, made to get in on—

Mr. LAWSON: Something to get out on, too.

Mr. STEVENS: —and I have never forgotten that trite observation by a very eminent Liberal authority; consequently I am not inclined to hold the Prime Minister to task for utterances he may have made during the period of the election. If we can have a statement of the government's intention as to how they purpose using this reconstructed bank after the bill becomes law, it will be of value in the debate.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): At the outset I must object to the suggestion that the political morality of this country has sunk to the level indicated by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). So far as the Liberal party is concerned, as I understand its political platform, it is made for far more than to get in on.

Mr. STEVENS: I was merely quoting the statement of a very eminent Liberal statesman. The hon. member will find it in Hansard if he chooses to look it up.

Mr. TUCKER: The reason I referred to it was that I took it that the hon. member for Kootenay East quoted it with approval, and as far as I am concerned I want to repudiate it on behalf of the Liberal party, in so far as I may speak in a humble way for that party. Like the hon. member who has just spoken, I consider that the measure before the house is one of the most important that has come before parliament at this session. Like him I agree that it should be the wish and the will of this parliament to give all the time necessary to the discussion of this very important question.

It seems to me that as far as the Liberal party is concerned we take the attitude that we have, as it were, two main lines of attack on our present problems. The first is to lower the obstacles to trade in order that Canada may exchange her surplus products, of which she has no need, for the surplus products of other lands in order to increase the total amount of wealth available for distribution among the Canadian people. That is the primary policy of the Liberal party, the policy of freer trade among the nations of the world. The second line of attack has become increasingly important. It was enunciated by the leader of the Liberal party, the present Prime Minister, in this House of Commons on February 27, 1933, as follows:

> The Liberal party recognizes that the problem of distribution has become more important than that of production. It believes that personality is more sacred than property. In all its policies it has been guided by that principle, above everything else. It will continue to devote itself to finding ways and means of effecting a fair and just distribution of wealth with increasing regard to human need, to the furtherance of social justice and to the promotion of the common good.

As far as I am concerned, I consider that we have come to the point, in the words of that statement of policy, where the problem of the production of wealth within the country and its exchange with other countries is not as important as the problem of the distribution of that wealth among the people of Canada. So I take this attitude: We have spent many days on the very important problem of lowering the tariffs in order to increase the wealth available for distribution among our people, and we should be willing to go in great detail into what I regard as the first great approach to the problem of a more equitable distribution of our wealth among our people. I may be wrong, but as I see it this is the first important legislation to be brought down designed to make a definite attack upon that problem of the distribution of wealth. I think this government has gone very far, in its first session, in carrying out its promise to lower the tariff. In my opinion in this bill the government is going a considerable distance toward monetary reform.

Some hon. members who have spoken previously have suggested that this legislation does not go the full length of one hundred per cent ownership and control of the Bank of Canada. As far as I am concerned, if it were a question of government ownership or government control I should say that the important thing was government control. That is the all important thing, because, after all, when you consider the question of ownership you have at the same time to consider certain incidental rights. If you cut down those rights to the point where mere legal ownership carries no rights whatever, then your ownership practically vanishes, and it seems to me that as far as the shareholders of the Bank of Canada are concerned in all respects but one we are approaching that point. We are saying to them: "We will leave you the possession and ownership of your shares but we will take away from you the right to control the policy of the institution. We vest that right in a brand new set of people of whom you had no knowledge when you invested in those shares, and they can, if they wish, guide and direct the destinies of that institution without regard to your wishes. The only right we leave with you is the right to draw 4½ per cent per year in dividends if, under the guidance and control of that new body, the bank manages to earn such dividends." Therefore I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in effect we have taken over one hundred per cent control of this institution. We are taking actual ownership to the extent of fifty-one per cent, and by virtue of taking over complete control we have deprived the people who still retain the technical ownership of their shares, of most of the rights incidental to such ownership. So I take it that we have proceeded, to the extent of somewhere between seventy-five per cent and one hundred per cent, to assume complete ownership of the Bank of Canada.

As far as I am concerned I should like to make it clear that if in the first session of this parliament, having this bill before us with the ability to pass it through this house, hoping and expecting that it will go through both houses of parliament, we can proceed from seventy-five per cent to one hundred per cent along the road to complete ownership and control of the central bank, it seems to me that is something worth while, which should receive enthusiastic support in this house and throughout the country. I do not suggest that I would not have liked to see this bill provide for the government taking over every share owned by private interests. Personally I would have been gratified to have seen that, but I am not one of those who, because they cannot get their own way entirely, will not go seventy-five per cent of the way, which at the moment is as far as my fellows in the same party are prepared to go. After all, the only person in any country in the world, under any system of government, who can get his own way at all times is a man like Mussolini, and we want no Mussolinis in Canada. I do not fancy that any single member of parliament thinks he should have the rights that Mussolini has.

I should like to suggest to the Minister of Finance, however, that one of the rights we do leave these shareholders is the right to draw 4½ per cent on the money they have invested, and incidentally we have practically guaranteed that dividend. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) the leading financial critic of the opposition, suggested that when the gold was turned over to the Bank of Canada good value was given for it. I suggest that such was not the case, and that by virtue of that little deal the previous government absolutely guaranteed those shareholders earnings several times in excess of the dividend they are supposed to get. What did the government do? They turned over to that bank $69,000,000 of gold, in round figures, and $986,000 of silver, and they provided that for every dollar of gold held by the Bank of Canada it could issue $4 in printed paper money. So. by turning over to that bank $69,000,000 in gold, we put it within the power of that institution to print, in round figures, $277,821,000 of paper money, which we declared to be legal tender. But, the last government said, because the Bank of Canada has to redeem $185,000,000 worth of Dominion of Canada notes, in addition to the gold which we have given it, we are going to give it $115,000,000 in government bonds, bearing interest at 3 per cent, carrying an annual income of $3,450,000, payable in cash in 1940. In order, forsooth, that the Bank of Canada can redeem $185,000,000 worth of dominion government notes we have given them gold whereby they can issue legal tender to almost $100,000,000 more (than the amount they have to redeem); yet we have to give them our bonds on top of that. What kind of sound finance is that? It is costing the people of this country, by virtue of setting up the Bank of Canada, $3,450,000 annually until 1940, an out and out gift to the Bank of Canada, and we are going to hand them the money, $115,000,000, in 1940. There is the situation. By what manner of means can that be justified? If you went to the Bank of Canada to-day with a dominion government note and said: Under the Bank of Canada Act you must redeem that note; you have already been paid for it; what would they give you? They would give you another note, printed by themselves, issued against the gold they have already received from the government. And because they do that they are actually going to be paid $115,000,000 in 1940 and in the meantime be paid $3,450,000 annually. That means that we have guaranteed the Bank of Canada —they cannot possibly lose that much surely— an income of four and a half per cent to these people who have invested in that stock.

There are two points I suggest in regard to that. The first is that in my humble judgment the time has come that this dominion should not pay a bit more than one per cent for its money. And we should not perpetuate the condition of anybody drawing four and a half per cent as a result of government operations in finance. Some people who invested in Bank of Canada stock may take the attitude that the government should not cut down their rate of interest. In view of the fact that the banks to-day are paying depositors only one and a half per cent, when they formerly paid three per cent, if the banks have the right to cut down the rate of interest to the extent of fifty per cent, I suggest that we should cut down the rate of dividend payable on these shares to at least the same rate which the banks pay to their depositors. Then I would say to these shareholders: If any of you are not satisfied with one and a half per cent, we will take your shares over at the actual market value. I make that suggestion to the Minister of Finance as a fair and equitable arrangement. It is not a fair or equitable arrangement to put a charge on the people of this country of four and a half per cent on $5,000,000 indefinitely.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Is there a guarantee of four and a half per cent?

Mr. TUCKER: Well, I sought to show how it is guaranteed. If we actually pay the Bank of Canada $3,450,000 annually until 1940 and at that time actually hand over to them $115,000,000, having made that donation to these people who only put $5,000,000 into the proposition, if they cannot pay four and a half per cent during our lifetime they are not the clever people they were represented to be. It is a most amazing thing. We pay the Bank of Canada that amount of interest, and I know some people boast about the wonderful success that attended the operation of the Bank of Canada last year. According to their annual report, having drawn from us that amount in interest, they turned over to the receiver general of Canada, $346,000. It is true they transferred $173,000 to rest account. But apparently it took quite a bit to operate the central bank. I suggest that having given them those rights we should have absolute control of that institution.

One reason why I suggest that we should have absolute control of the Bank of Canada is in view of its power over the prices that prevail in the country. It is suggested in the preamble to the Bank of Canada Act that a properly constituted central bank will have an influence on price levels. Some people seem to have the idea that prices are pretty well governed by supply and demand and that monetary action has nothing to do with the level of prices. I suggest that we should take control of the central bank because I think it is very important to operate upon our general price level so that the burden of debt, of interest and of fixed charges in this country will be decreased. In western Canada—and the same is true in eastern Canada, but I speak of western Canada because I know something of conditions there—we have had the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act operating, and I do not think any board has worked harder or more sincerely or more anxiously to try to meet the difficulties of the farming community than the board of review and the different officers operating the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in Saskatchewan. But what has happened is this—I think I am in order, and perhaps I should justify myself before I am called to order—people went to western Canada, many from the old province of Ontario; they went out there thirty or forty years ago; they worked and their families worked and they saved. I know some hon. members suggest that the farmers have been extravagant; that they bought a Ford car perhaps, or after twenty years of work took a trip to California. But when a family in western Canada and their children worked and deprived themselves of what they needed for twenty or thirty years, were they not entitled to a cheap car and to possibly one trip away during that time? I submit that is not extravagance. I submit this—and every hon. member knows it is true—that there is no equal number of people on the face of the globe who in the same period of time have produced so much real wealth as the people living in western Canada. But what do we find to-day? We find that the majority of people in western Canada actually owe more than they own.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. TUCKER: I submit I am in order in this. It is proposed by the government to take over control of the Bank of Canada with a view to regulating the level of prices. I submit that we should take it over, and that we should use it to raise the level of prices in order to decrease the burden of debt, and I submit that I am absolutely in order when I ask the right to continue the debate as I am doing.

Miss MACPHAIL: Being a Liberal you will probably be able to do it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. TUCKER: I submit I am in order. If you rule me out of order I will gladly submit to your ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Southeast Grey is out of order with her remark. I should like to ask that it be withdrawn.

Miss MACPHAIL: May I point out that I am the member for Grey-Bruce.

The CHAIRMAN: Then I should like the hon. member for Grey-Bruce to withdraw her words.

Miss MACPHAIL: To withdraw what?

The CHAIRMAN: You know.

Miss MACPHAIL: I?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Miss MACPHAIL: No, I don't know. I simply stated that because the hon. member who spoke was a Liberal he would be able to continue.

The CHAIRMAN: It is a reflection upon the chair, and I should like to ask the hon. member to withdraw.

Miss MACPHAIL: I have no desire to cast any reflection on the chair. I cannot see how my remark does cast any reflection upon the chair, because a few minutes ago—

Mr. REID: I was stopped in my remarks.

Miss MACPHAIL: A few minutes ago the Minister of Finance stated that the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) was not in order, when he was quite evidently as near to being in order as the hon. member who was speaking when I made my remark. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) was saying that he hoped he would be allowed to continue, and I said that I thought he would, because he was a Liberal. But if the remark is offensive to the chair, I withdraw it.

Mr. REID: It is wrong, because I was stopped in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not wish to be insistent upon it, but I should like to ask the hon. member for Grey-Bruce to withdraw without any qualification.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, I think you ought to be fair to the hon. member who has just spoken. She withdrew her remarks, and gave satisfaction to the hon. member in question. I suggest that you should not insist upon a new kind of withdrawal.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think everybody should be ruled out of order as soon as he rises to speak. Is that a new procedure with which we will be faced?

The CHAIRMAN: I must insist that the hon. member for Grey-Bruce withdraw her remarks, without qualification.

Miss MACPHAIL: I now rise to say, then, that the hon. member will not be given special privilege because he is a Liberal. And in order that the chair may be pleased, I withdraw any statement I made which might be considered disrespectful to the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: Qualified again.

The CHAIRMAN: Proceed.

Mr. TUCKER: I do not wish to be out of order, but I have listened to debates concerning the tariff which were of great importance, and I must say that this debate which affects the burden of debt, of fixed charges, is of equal importance. I intend to argue that during the last year the Bank of Canada has not operated so as to effect a levelling upwards of prices. The level of prices has been left stationary. I intend to argue that it is time that we took control of the Bank of Canada in order that it may begin to operate as it was intended to. I do not intend to take more than a moment to speak concerning the debt of Canada.

The attitude of boards of review has been that if a person applying for adjustment did not receive what he considered reasonable he always had the right to go into bankruptcy. It was always considered that he should be ordered to pay a little more than he would have paid if he had gone into bankruptcy. In other words the situation has been that our farmers in western Canada have been ordered to pay all their assets would permit, and a little more because they are told: Well, if you went into bankruptcy you would not have to pay these unsecured debts, but as you are not doing that you should pay something extra. The result is that in spite of the operations of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act western Canada is now in a position—

The CHAIRMAN: I must insist that the hon. member confine his remarks to the resolution before the committee.

Mr. TUCKER: I would like to say that I did not participate in the budget debate, on the understanding that at some time I would be permitted to give an expression of my views on these matters. There was a definite understanding to that effect. If it comes down to that, I expect to have that right honoured.

The CHAIRMAN: I would say to the hon. member that he probably will have that chance, but not to-night under this discussion.

Mr. TUCKER: This is the time I would like to discuss these matters, and I do not see any particular reason why, when an arrangement is made, it should not be carried out. I am saying that it exists now, and in fairness to the people I represent I wish to claim the right to speak. If I cannot rely upon an undertaking that is given, henceforth when I think I should speak in justice to the people who sent me here, I will speak.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, the resolution is not carried yet. I just sat down to see if you had changed your ruling, but as apparently you do not intend to change it I shall continue.

I was arguing as to the necessity of the central bank being used to effect a levelling upwards of prices. That is one of the purposes for which I hope we are taking control of the bank. In connection with the fact that the central bank should operate on the level of prices I shall argue first of all that it is very important that it be government owned and controlled.

I have in my hand the report of the committee on finance and industry, known as the British Macmillan report. Paragraph 31 reads as follows:

> It follows that the functions of a central bank and the obligations resting upon it are of a very special character, calling for skill, experience and judgment of a kind different from those which must be possessed by commercial bankers. No banker can neglect the rules of prudence and of safety, but the object of a commercial banker is to make a profit. The situation of the Central Bank is such that it must often undertake operations which are not only not profitable, but result in losses. Its aim must be the safety of the financial system and the economic welfare of the country.

In view of the words in the British Macmillan report I argue that as the central bank must often undertake operations resulting in losses, the less profit interest there is involved which is inevitably concerned with losses on capital investment, the more likely are the best interests of the country to be served, and the less likely it is that too much consideration will be given to the earning of profits.

In connection with the purpose of a central bank I should like first of all to read from the resolutions passed at the imperial conference at Ottawa, and in connection therewith I shall read in the first place from the statement by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), the then Prime Minister, to the conference:

> Canada, like all other countries, has suffered severely from the calamitous fall in commodity prices. Since August, 1929, our index of wholesale prices has fallen 32 per cent and is now only 4 per cent above the pre-war level. This means that the dollar has increased in purchasing power by 48 per cent. As a result of this rapid and persistent decline in the general price level and the inevitable disparities created between different kinds of prices, normal business relationships have been disrupted, profit margins have disappeared in many cases, enterprise has been discouraged, unemployment has steadily increased, the fiscal problems of all our public bodies have been greatly aggravated, and the burden of fixed charges is exerting an almost intolerable pressure upon some of the strategic elements in our national economy.
> Interest charges represent the most important of the fixed or semi-rigid elements in our cost structure. If prices remain on their present level, such charges will constitute an intolerable or almost intolerable burden in many cases. Even if it can be borne, the fortuitous gain to the creditor of 40 to 48 per cent in general purchasing power above what he contracted for appears to be a grave injustice.

That was the situation as explained by the then leader of the Canadian delegation at the imperial conference as to the necessity of restoring the level of prices so that the burden of interest, debt and fixed charges would not be intolerable.

I should like to quote from the statement of the Right Hon. S. M. Bruce, leader of the Australian delegation at that conference, and I do so because I think it is very important that this country should be fully seized of the fact that we can by operating through the central bank restore, if we so desire, the level of prices, and in order that the Canadian people may know where to place the blame if the price level is left where it is and the burden of debt in its present intolerable load is left around the necks of our people. I wish to go into this with some considerable degree of care. As I said at the outset, the question of the tariff is important, but this question is equally important and the members of this parliament should in my opinion be prepared to give it their serious attention.

In passing, I regret that the right hon. leader of the opposition is not in his seat to-night. Young member as I am of this house I have given some study to the work he did following the Imperial Economic Conference, and particularly what he did along those lines in this country. After this statement was given to the Imperial Economic Conference by the present leader of the opposition, then Prime Minister, we find him coming back from the conference and expanding the actual currency of Canada by $53,000,000. He also put through a transaction whereby treasury bills were discounted with the banks, resulting in $35,000,000 more of currency being put into circulation. In other words, following the economic conference, the Prime Minister of Canada and his government put into circulation over $80,000,000 of new currency, and I submit that had he courageously continued to follow that policy the situation would be different to-day. Prices began to rise; farmers began to get more for their wheat and other products; people in the factories got more for what they had to sell, and business conditions generally were being restored through the placing in circulation of an adequate supply of money. I can show that by giving the rise in the level of prices if I have time. Having taken that action, instead of continuing in it, the then Prime Minister set up a privately owned central bank and gave them control of the situation, and since then, so far as I can see there has been not a thing done in the way of putting out more purchasing power. There has been, on the contrary, deflation, and it is time that we took control of the central bank to reverse that process. That is the question to which I wish to direct my remarks to-night, and which I submit should engage the attention of this house.

The Right Hon. Stanley Bruce, leader of the Australian delegation, said:

There is no question of greater interest to Australia at the present conference than that of action to bring about a higher price level and stability of exchange. Unless an increase in commodity prices can be achieved it is difficult to see how the present financial and economic system of the world can be maintained. In relation to this conference of British countries it is obvious that any reciprocal tariff arrangements that are arrived at can be of little benefit unless the paralysis of trade is stayed and the price level is raised.

The peoples of the world have shown remarkable patience in submitting to the severe adjustments already made. But they have not been enough. As to the further action needed, one school of thought maintains that the only way out is that we should go on reducing down to the point that will allow profitable production on the basis of the present price level. Another school maintains that it is impossible to bring about the necessary further reductions and that a solution can be found only by an increase in commodity prices and the stabilizing of exchange.

He goes on:

Australia subscribes to the second view.

I could read more as to the action that should be taken in the opinion of Mr. Bruce, but time will not permit.

I wish to quote now from the statement of Hon. N. C. Havenga, leader of the South African delegation:

We are all oppressed by the phenomenally low level of commodity prices. We all desire higher prices, but what we mean is not that cheapness, or in other words, plenty, is an economic evil, but that having made all our dispositions on the level of values of say 1928, we find that all our machinery is out of gear when we have to sell at the prices of 1932.

But must we act on the assumption that this state of affairs will continue indefinitely? What are the great economic factors in the world to-day?

We have plenty of commodities, and the power of producing much more if need be.

We have millions of people desiring those commodities but lacking in an effective demand for them. We have millions of money, seeking safe investment, and unwilling to assume the risk of carrying out its normal function, which is to link up the commodities with the people requiring them.

But we lack the gear-lever which will link up the machinery of production through universal joints to the differential of consumption which will set in motion the wheels of progress.

There Mr. Havenga puts his finger on what I submit our party had in mind when it said that the problem of distribution had become of more importance than that of production. That is a question to which I think every member of parliament should give the best possible attention.

I have quoted Mr. Havenga because nobody would suggest that he was identified with any party in this house. I should also like to quote a sentence or two from the statement of Sir Henry Strakosch, one of the delegates from India:

The fall in prices and the consequent process of economic disintegration has already reached so advanced a stage that there is no time to lose. If we are to avoid troubles far more acute and far more dangerous than those we have already experienced, quick and determined action is necessary.

I should like now to read the resolutions which were adopted at the imperial conference held in Ottawa in 1932, and I do so because they represent the considered judgment of the leading statesmen of the empire. I submit and urge that we should give some consideration to carrying out what these leading statesmen of the empire stated was necessary in order to restore a reasonable measure of economic adjustment for the peoples of the empire. This is from the first resolution:

A rise throughout the world in the general levels of wholesale prices is in the highest degree desirable. The evil of falling prices must be attacked by government and individual action in all its causes whether political, economic, financial or monetary.

There is a definite recommendation. A further resolution states:

In the monetary sphere the primary line of action towards a rise in prices should be the creation and maintenance, within the limits of sound finance, of such conditions as will assist in the revival of enterprise and trade.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not like to interrupt, but the hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. TUCKER: I think I should be allowed, Mr. Chairman, the time taken up in interruptions.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we have had a splendid example to-day on the part of the government of what the Japanese call "saving face," for no matter how much the Prime Minister may attempt to differentiate between public control and public ownership; no matter how much the government may care to indulge in verbal casuistry, the fact of the matter remains that the rank and file of the Liberal party both in the west and the east, but particularly in the west, were of the opinion that the Liberal party stood for a publicly owned and publicly controlled central bank.

An hon. MEMBER: Speak for yourself.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The hon. member says, to speak for myself, but I prefer to let the authorities speak. I should like to direct the attention of the committee to some things which speak more eloquently than I can. I have in my hand the report of the committee on banking and commerce which sat in 1934, and I quote from pages 88 and 89, in connection with the consideration of a motion presented by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) on March 15, as follows:

That before proceeding with the discussion, clause by clause, of Bill No. 19, an act to incorporate the Bank of Canada, the select standing committee on banking and commerce is of opinion that the proposed Bank of Canada should be owned and controlled by the Dominion of Canada and that the provisions of the said bill should be altered accordingly.

Those in favour were:

Messrs. Bothwell, Casgrain, Coote, Donnelly, Duff, Euler, Howard, Lapointe, Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), Power, Raymond, Sanderson and Spencer.

With the exception of Mr. Spencer and Mr. Coote, the rest were members of the Liberal party, some now being members of the cabinet. The motion which they supported was not only for control; it was that the central bank should be owned and controlled by the Dominion of Canada. I submit that if that was a good motion to make and support in 1934 with a Conservative government in power, it is a good motion to make and support in 1936, with a Liberal government in power. The gentlemen who supported that motion are saying nothing about it to-day. We must either assume that they supported it to embarrass the government of that day, or that they have since changed their minds with reference to the ownership and control of the Bank of Canada.

In Saskatchewan we have heard the opinions of members of the Liberal party as to a central bank. I hold in my hand the report of the Agricultural Credit Commission of that province, appointed in 1913. This report gives a very fine summary of conditions in the province at that time, when they were not good for the agriculturist. Those who signed that report were: J. H. Haslam, Charles A. Dunning and Edmund H. Oliver. After reviewing the conditions which existed, they made some very fine recommendations.

Mr. DUNNING: I am very proud of that report.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I think the Minister of Finance has good reason to be proud of it as it is a comprehensive document. Resolution No. 2 of the report is as follows:

That legislation be enacted to provide for the establishment of a cooperative mortgage association for the raising of funds on mortgage bonds and the granting of loans to farmers on mortgage security for approved agricultural productive or improvement purposes only; such legislation to embody the features hereinafter mentioned.

Without wearying the committee, I should like to quote recommendation No. 17, which reads:

That the Saskatchewan Cooperative Farm Mortgage Association establish as soon after its foundation as is feasible a bank with headquarters within the province to conduct a regular banking business both through branches of its own and, wherever possible, with and through the locals, and officers of the association.

As I read that I submit that the Minister of Finance has moved a long way from the position he then held.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am reminded of the lines of Dorothy Parker, who said:

When I was young and bold and strong,
Then right was right and wrong was wrong;
With plume on high and flag unfurled
I went forth to fight the world.
"Come out and fight, you dogs," said I,
And wept there was but once to die.

Now I am old, and good and bad
Are woven in a crazy plaid.
I sit and say "The world is so
And he is wise who lets it go.
A victory lost a victory won
The difference is so small, my son."
Thus inertia rides and riddles me,
The which is called philosophy.

An hon. gentleman opposite said that I should speak for myself, but I should like to give the stand of the Liberal party on this question. I have before me some of the campaign literature which was circulated in my constituency. For instance, I have the platform resolutions of the Saskatchewan Liberal party adopted at Moose Jaw, June 15-16, 1931. On page 5 I find the following:

Monetary and Banking Reform

The Liberal party, while recognizing that the monetary and banking system is a matter coming wholly within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, pledges itself:

1. To encourage and support the establishment of a central bank of rediscount under absolute government control, which central bank should issue all currency.
2. To advocate the granting to provincial and municipal governments of the right, upon deposit of sound securities, to apply direct to such central bank for currency, the same to be issued to such governments at cost or a minimum rate of interest.
3. To urge amendment of The Bank Act to provide for the imposition of a penalty on any bank charging more than the legal rate of interest stated in The Bank Act.
4. To urge that the Canadian dollar be brought to a parity with the British pound sterling.

Of course those were resolutions, but they were circulated among the people of Saskatchewan, who were given the impression that that was the policy of the Liberal party. I have before me another pamphlet which states at the back that the paragraphs therein have been extracted from the official report of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mackenzie King) speech in the House of Commons on February 27, 1933. Under the heading, "Control of credit," I find the following:

> The Liberal party believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need. A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people; and also to deal with problems of international commerce and exchange.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is wrong with that?

Mr. DOUGLAS: There is nothing wrong with it. What we are asking for now is legislation to implement that.

Mr. DUNNING: It is before the committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I have before me another one to which I do not think hon. members opposite will say, "hear, hear." This is headed, "Supplementary platform resolutions of the Saskatchewan Liberal party." They were adopted by the council of the party on January 9-11, 1934. This one states:

> Resolved, that this council of the Liberal party of Saskatchewan strongly objects to the capital for the proposed central bank being privately subscribed, and believes that the interests of the people of Canada can best be served by a central bank the capital of which is fully owned and controlled by the government.

I direct the attention of the committee to the words "fully owned." This resolution was circulated throughout the province and the people were given the impression that it constituted the policy and the program of the Liberal party. Not only were these resolutions passed by the rank and file of the Liberal party, but the same idea was encouraged by members of the Liberal party who were acting in a more official capacity. I remember in 1934 when the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) came into my riding and told the people that they were going to nationalize the Bank of Canada. Last year the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) came into our fair city, where we were very glad to greet him, and substantiated the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

That was true not only outside but inside the house. I am not going to read all the extracts that were cited this afternoon, but one phrase of the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Euler), now Minister of Trade and Commerce, is particularly notable. As reported at page 454 of Hansard of 1935 he made this statement:

> We are handing over all our own gold and all the gold of the chartered banks to this privately owned bank and the privilege of issuing currency, though not as much as they should have; moreover they have the control of credit in their hands. I for one do not think that power should remain in the hands of a privately owned bank.

Hon. Charles Stewart, then member for Edmonton West, as reported at page 463 of Hansard of the same year made a similar statement:

> We will stand, as the hon. member for North Waterloo has indicated, for public ownership and control of this central bank.

Of course, it may be said that these were expressions of private opinion. But the fact of the matter is that no attempt was made to tell the public that this was not what the party meant. These expressions were sent through the country broadcast, with the result that, although the Prime Minister may be perfectly correct in his differentiation between terms, there will be a great deal of disappointment in the rank and file of the Liberal party if the resolution as now drawn up is passed as the monetary policy of the government.

With reference to the Prime Minister himself I need hardly waste the time of the house —and I mean that in no derogatory sense— in quoting what most hon. members have already read. In the Vancouver Sun of September 30, 1935, appeared the following:

> Mr. Mackenzie King told Vancouver in the Arena, Saturday night, what the Liberal party stands for in this election.

Then there are enumerated ten items. I do not think it is necessary for me to read them; I will do so if the committee wishes; but number 3 deserves particular notice:

> Removal of barriers that prevent credit from serving needs of the people, primarily by nationalizing the central bank.

Number 10 is also very interesting, though, like the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) I may suspect myself to be out of order:

> Reduction or abolition of the sales tax on the necessaries of life.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS: May I point out that throughout this session of the house the same impression has persisted? The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) quoted this afternoon the hon. member for Rosthern. I am not going to do that; I think he has been quoted enough; all I will say is that I admire his courage and I trust it will not fail him. But I remember that the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) said, as reported at page 555 of Hansard of this year:

I think I can say, with equal accuracy, that the position of the Liberal party is well known as being in favour of a nationally owned and controlled bank.

Again the words "owned and controlled." He says:

I see before me my genial friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), and I am quite sure he will not disagree with that statement.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), speaking to the resolution of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asking for the nationalization of the central bank and the chartered banks, said:

If the mover would cut the tail of this resolution I would support it because, as the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) has said, we campaigned on the issue of a national bank, nationally owned and controlled, and as far as I am concerned I am prepared to put into effect the platform on which we went to the country.

Has the hon. Minister of Finance any objection?

Mr. DUNNING: I just remarked that it was out of order to quote from a previous debate in the same session.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I had a sneaking idea that I might be out of order; I watched the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson), a former cabinet minister, and I saw him quoting from Hansard, so I thought I must be right; then I saw the right hon. Prime Minister quoting from this year's Hansard, and I was sure I was right.

Mr. DUNNING: It was on a point of order.

Mr. DOUGLAS: But since a point of order is raised I will not read these extracts, except to say that there are extracts from speeches made by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill), and it will not hurt for me to state the pages at which they are reported, namely 611 and 613 of this year's unrevised Hansard, and to mention that in their statements they stated that they were elected because they campaigned for a publicly owned and publicly controlled bank.

Let us see what others said about the legislation being brought down by the government. This is taken from the Financial Post of March 21, 1936:

With the announcement of the government's legislation to "nationalize" the Bank of Canada, all danger of important change in the existing set-up of this institution evaporates.

To all practical purposes, the government's legislation is eyewash and it is a safe forecast that opposition groups, who believe in outright nationalization, will easily identify it as such.

I have no wish to labour this point. I am sure it is perfectly apparent to the committee that the Liberal party have, in Hansard, in committee, and in the country at large, given the impression—at least certain members have—

An hon. MEMBER: Ah.

Mr. DOUGLAS: —that their party stands for and is prepared to initiate a policy of a publicly owned and publicly controlled Bank of Canada. What I want to know is why those members who admit that they were elected on that program have had nothing to say to-day. I have been wondering about that for some time. I hope the solution is not to be found in an article which appeared in the Vancouver Province, April 27, 1936, written by Mr. Charles Bishop. I cannot vouch for the authenticity of this, but Mr. Bishop is noted across Canada as a journalist.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume my hon. friend knows that to read any articles from newspapers commenting on proceedings in the house is out of order. I draw his attention to that fact before I hear even what he has to say. If it is an article from the press that reflects upon the proceedings of this house or the words of any member of this house, it is out of order. I will give my hon. friend the citation:

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Mr. Chairman, I am sure you must be grateful for the valuable assistance you have had to-day. This article is not concerning the house, but concerning a caucus of one of the parties of the house. If you rule it out of order I will not read it. I have no wish to violate the rules of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Well, then, do not do it.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I will read it, and if you wish to stop me I am quite willing to stop.

The Canadian National and Bank of Canada bills will be contentious. Matters might be considerably facilitated if the government could select a day to bring down the bank bill when Messrs. McGeer and Tucker, the Liberal monetary reformers, happen to be absent from the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I think, however, Mr. Chairman, it is hardly necessary for me to read the quotation. The statement made by the hon. member for Rosthern to-night clarifies the issue considerably. The whole matter boils down to this, then, whether or not all that could be expected from a publicly owned and a publicly controlled bank can be secured through the legislation now being suggested by the Minister of Finance. In other words, if a central bank in which the majority of the shares are held by the government can give the same satisfaction as a publicly owned and publicly controlled central bank, then the people who supported the government on that basis ought to be satisfied. I submit that this will not be the case. The Minister of Finance presented this afternoon an excellent case for a public bank as opposed to a private bank. He pointed out very forcibly that the power of issuing currency and credit was too great to be left in the hands of a few private individuals, or he used words to that effect, and he will correct me if I am not quoting him exactly. Then I maintain that if this power is too great to be left in the hands of a group of private individuals it is also too great to be left in the hands of some individuals appointed by private interests and others appointed by the government.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not so intended.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Well, let us see. I turn to Hansard for 1934, at page 826. The Minister of Finance of that day, Mr. Rhodes, said:

> It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the exercise of these functions lies outside the power of any single commercial institution or group of commercial institutions. No purely profit-making institution operating in a competitive system can afford to place social interests before its own in regard to credit policy. This, I think, is obvious. Nor can the management of such a body be expected to regard the maintenance of the monetary standard, for example, as a duty prior to its obligations to the stockholders.

My contention is this: The suggestion of the Minister of Finance is that we should have a board of directors, seven of them private individuals now appointed by the shareholders and four with two votes each to be appointed by the government, or in other words a voting strength of eight to seven.

Mr. DUNNING: No, ten to seven and ultimately six to three. I gave that once before.

Mr. DOUGLAS: It means that if a time should come when there is a difference between the policy of the government and the policy of those interested in private banks, let us say, a difficult situation may be created. That is quite possible, because I notice in Hansard of February 22, 1934, that Mr. Irvine asked what would happen if there should be a clash between bank policy and government policy. Mr. Rhodes answered:

> Unquestionably the authority of the governor and the board of directors of the bank would prevail.

In other words it would seem to me that if enough of the directors appointed by the government could be persuaded to be of the same mind as those appointed by the shareholders there would be a situation in which the policy of the bank would not necessarily be in the interests of the people and the government of the Dominion of Canada. That is quite possible. I notice in the May, 1936, letter of the Royal Bank of Canada, this statement:

> Thus, experience gives a measure of proof to the contention which we have repeatedly put forward in these letters, that the violence of the recent depression was due primarily to a deflationary monetary policy and that recovery has been greatly aided by a reversal of that policy.

In the same letter I find this statement:

> The real initiative is with the central bank.

In other words with this board of directors lies very largely the welfare of the people of Canada, by reason of the fact that they control the flow of currency and credit which, to use a trite expression, is "the life-blood of the body politic." It seems to me that, if what the Minister of Finance said this afternoon is true—and I believe it is—that those powers are too great to be left in the hands of private individuals privately elected, it is not quite as great a menace, but almost as great, to leave part of that power in the hands of such individuals.

Mr. DUNNING: We do not leave any of the power. We leave the voice but no power.

Mr. DOUGLAS: We leave them a vote, and having shares naturally they possess part of the assets. What the Minister of Finance and the government are trying to do is to bring two contentious groups together, whose interests admittedly do not coincide, and they are trying to make them work in the same harness. The government are endeavouring to make the lion and the lamb lie down together, and it simply cannot be done. If it is done the probabilities are that the lamb will be inside the lion.

Mr. DUNNING: Which is the lion?

Mr. DOUGLAS: The Minister of Finance, in all probability.

Mr. DUNNING: And which is the lamb?

Mr. DOUGLAS: I would suggest that the lamb has been shorn so frequently that it can be picked out quite easily.

I do not wish to prolong the debate, so I simply suggest to the government that across the Dominion of Canada groups within the Liberal party, groups without the Liberal party and people sympathetic to the government are expressing these views. There was a quotation read this morning from the Saskatchewan Liberal. A resolution was read that was passed by a young Liberal club in Saskatoon, all to the same effect. So I ask the government to consider this matter very seriously. To pass the legislation as it is now presented to this house in my opinion will constitute one of the greatest breaches of public faith since confederation. The people of Canada are looking to the government to implement the promises they believe were made, namely to set up a central bank publicly owned and publicly controlled.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, I was asked by the hon. member sitting directly to my left how a central bank could affect the level of prices, and I told him I would explain later on. As far as may be humanly possible I like to be a man of my word, and I feel called upon to speak again in order to explain that point. In doing so I should like to quote from a very eminent banker, the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, who has been heard of before in this house. I need not give his record; I will simply quote him:

> Nothing in monetary practice is more certain than that contraction in the volume of money or even failure to secure an adequate increase tends both directly and indirectly to put a brake upon business of every kind and to produce the very troubles—unemployment, unremunerative commodity prices, unbalanced budgets and general depression—which have been apparent in almost every country in the world in the past four years. With expanding population and production we need some expansion in the supply of money or it will inevitably follow that consumption will not keep pace with production. There may in any circumstances be temporary maladjustment between production and consumption of individual commodities, but if the supply of money is adequate the price level of all commodities taken together will be kept approximately stable, and general consumption will be maintained. It follows, then, that the policy of the Bank of England is of the utmost concern to everyone, for no one escapes the effects of general depression and not one of us fails to benefit from sustained prosperity.

That is the way, in the opinion of one of the most eminent bankers in the world, in which the Bank of England operates to raise the level of prices and, as I said a few moments ago, since the Bank of Canada has been set up it has not been operating to raise the level of prices. I think this is sufficiently important to bring to the attention of this house; the Bank of Canada has not been so operating, and it is high time that the government took control of it and made it operate in that way.

Now I should like to quote the opinion of one of the leading statesmen of the British empire as to one of the causes of the present depression. I wish to read from the considered statement of the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain to the World Economic Conference which met in London in June, 1933. I read this in order to show that the depression with which we are struggling to-day was deliberately brought about by the financiers of England in order to get back on the gold standard. Probably this quotation is familiar to every member of this house, but I should like to read it again because there may be people who read Hansard to whom it may not be familiar; I think this is something that everyone from one end of Canada to the other should know:

> After the termination of the war, we in this country, taking, as it proved, too hopeful a view of world tendencies, set ourselves to restore the pre-war situation. We reestablished budgetary equilibrium and by a long and stern process of deflation we struggled to put sterling back to its pre-war gold parity: at the same time we made every effort to reestablish peaceful relations in Europe and to restore the international gold standard in the countries whose currencies had broken down. In the early part of 1925 Great Britain together with the British empire and certain other countries returned to the gold standard—

I wish hon. members to note that this was apparently decided on without consulting parliament. I mention that because it is time our people realized that these steps in the monetary field sometimes affect them a good deal more than things we spend weeks debating in parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend say that Great Britain returned to gold without consulting parliament?

Mr. TUCKER: I said that we returned to gold apparently without consulting parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: Who is "we"?

Mr. TUCKER: The people of Canada. I may be wrong in that.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is quite wrong.

Mr. TUCKER: When I read that Great Britain returned, with the rest of the empire, to gold, my mind went back to try to discover when parliament had ever authorized that, and I could not think of any time when it was even debated.

Mr. STEVENS: It never was.

Mr. TUCKER: That shows the importance of considering it now. Mr Chamberlain continues:

—and although in fact this step entailed further heavy sacrifices for our people in the shape of prolonged unemployment and depression for our industries—

In the face of that strong statement of the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain that the attempt to deflate, to return to gold, caused further unemployment and further depression to the people of England, can anyone say that this is not important? I ask hon. members to consider what significance that has for us in charting our course for the next four or five years. The question we have to decide is: Are we going to try to do what England did in 1925, try to deflate even more, or are we going to try to introduce an era of easy money and get back to a measure of prosperity?

I wish to read one or two further extracts from this statement to the World Economic Conference which, I think, merit our attention:

The inevitable result of the economic conditions that actually prevailed was to bring about a progressive appreciation of the value of gold, or in other words, a fall in the price of commodities. In certain industrial countries, such as Great Britain and Germany, unemployment became a serious problem.

I ask hon. members who are interested in the primary industries of Western Canada to consider this:

Even more drastic was the effect on countries engaged in primary production, since the fall in price of foodstuffs and raw materials far outstripped the fall in the price of manufactured articles. The situation in the primary producing countries was soon reflected in London as a result of our world-wide trading interests.

The return of England to the gold standard affected the grain farmer in western Canada; it affected the sheep grower in Austrlia, the man raising cattle in western Canada; it affected everyone. They did not know what had happened, but the bankers of England had decided to go back to gold, and every producer of primary products the world over suffered.

[Mr. Dunning.]

There is the statement to the British section of the World Economic Conference. It proceeds later:

It is essential to bring about recovery in the world level of wholesale commodity prices sufficient to yield an economic return to the producers of primary commodities and to restore equilibrium between costs and prices of production generally. It is clear that the present lack of equilibrium between prices and costs can only be remedied either by a further drastic reduction of wages and other costs and by widespread bankruptcies, or by a sufficient recovery in the level of wholesale prices.

That is something for members of parliament to decide: Are they in favour of restoration of the level of prices of say 1928, or are they in favour of further pressing down the primary producers of this country, further bankruptcies, further reductions in wages? It has been suggested to this house already that some wages are too high. Members of parliament have to face that issue. I will not take time to read from the May letter of the Royal Bank of Canada, but in that letter it is stated in so many words that Canada has to face that issue. Is it going in for further deflation or for a period of reflation and easy money and cheap, plentiful credit which will restore industry to the position that it held in 1920-29?

This statement by the British Chancellor continues:

In the opinion of the United Kingdom delegation an attempt to attain equilibrium by further large reductions of cost would be attended by intolerable suffering, and holds out no hope of success.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. TUCKER (reading):

No doubt it would be possible to restore equilibrium between prices and costs by reducing costs if only prices would remain steady. Under present conditions that does not happen but on the contrary an all round reduction in costs produces further deflationary effects on prices, so that costs and prices chase each other downwards without ever getting to equilibrium. Moreover, there is one all-important entity in each country which finds it peculiarly difficult to reduce its own costs—

I direct the attention of the Minister of Finance particularly to this:

—I mean the central government. Every finance minister in the world knows only too well how tremendously resistant public expenditure is to reduction, if only for the reason that so many of its obligations are fixed in terms of money. A policy of reducing costs and prices has the inevitable effect of very greatly reducing the national income with the consequence that in order to balance its accounts the government must take by taxation a larger and larger proportion of the income of the country. Sooner or later, usually sooner, this process is found to be intolerable, and countries bent on securing heavy reductions in costs and prices find that they have merely secured an unbalanced budget for which no practical cure can be found. In the view of the British delegation, therefore, a solution of our present difficulties must be found by means of a recovery in the wholesale price level.

I could go on and quote the opinions of people whose views must carry weight, but I do not intend to take the time to do that. I just wish to indicate that since the Bank of Canada was established we have not followed a policy of easy money; we have followed not a policy of reflation, as they call it in the United States, but rather the opposite.

I wish to give some figures for the consideration of the committee in reference to this. In 1929, in round figures, there was $301,000,000 of legal tender in Canada; in 1936 there was $165,000,000 of legal tender, a reduction of almost fifty per cent. There was also a decrease in bank notes. In 1929, in round figures, there was $142,000,000 worth of bank notes; in 1936, $123,000,000; a reduction of $19,000,000. More important than that, there was a reduction in the amount of credit given to industry, corporations and private individuals with which to carry on business. I am sure hon. members will be amazed, as I was, if they have not looked into this question, to learn that from 1929 to the present time the banks have contracted their loans to corporations and private individuals by the amount of $756,000,000, a contraction of loans to the business world in Canada of 45¼ per cent from 1929 to 1936. Is it any wonder that we have a depression with such a contraction of the actual money with which people do business? Mr. Jackson Dodds, speaking on November 14, 1935, said:

> From a low of $940,000,000 in January, 1926, these current loans steadily rose to $1,588,000,000, in October, 1929. That is an increase of $648,000,000 in forty-five months, or $14,400,000 per month.
> The decline from that high point has been much more gradual than the rise, for loans did not recede to $940,000,000 until July of this year, 1935, some sixty-nine months later. Although bank loans are necessarily made for short terms only, it is clear that the banks permitted borrowers to repay these excess loans slowly during a period of five and three-quarter years over 50 per cent longer than their expansion.

What I am trying to indicate is that by virtue of the attempt to bring England back on to gold in 1925, the price level started to topple; as a result banks all over the world began to draw in credit, and as they drew it in, prices toppled still further. It is high time that we took charge of the banking system which under private control has had such disastrous effects upon the whole civilized world, including Canada.

I wish to speak for a moment or so concerning the effect of the curtailment of purchasing power upon prices, and to bear out my observations I shall refer to an extract which contains the figures one would expect, having in mind the contraction in purchasing power. At page 462 of the Labour Gazette of Canada for May, 1936, I find this:

> In wholesale prices the index number calculated by the dominion bureau of statistics and based upon prices in 1926 as 100, again showed little change week by week during April as compared with March. This index number was 72·1 for the week ended May 1 as compared with 72·3 the preceding week, and 72·2 for the week ended March 27.

This is the point to which I direct particular attention of hon. members:

> On a monthly basis the figures for March, the latest available, are 72·4 as compared with 72·5 for April 1935; 71·3 for April 1934; 63·5 for February 1933, the lowest point in recent years.

It is to be noted that there is a rise from 1933 when the figure stood at 63·5 to 71·3 in April, 1934 and 72·5 in April, 1935, while it stood at 72·4 in March, 1936. In other words, in the last year there has been no gain in the price level. In 1930 it stood at 91·2; it was 98·14 in April of 1922; it was 164·3 in May, 1920, and 64 in April, 1914. These are the figures indicating the price levels as given by the bureau of statistics. When the circulation was increased by the $53,000,000 and the $35,000,000, there was a rise of ten points. During the last year that rise has been absent. On the contrary we have had a slight recession.

I should like now to refer to some prices with which some hon. members will be most familiar. Taking the 1926 price of vegetable products as 100 we find that in December, 1932, the figure stood at 50·1; December, 1933, 60·4; December, 1934, 66·7; December, 1935, 67, or an increase of three-tenths of one point. At that rate we are getting back pretty slowly to the 100 mark. Then, referring to animals and animal products, again taking the 1926 figure as 100, we find the figure for December, 1932, as 57·4; December, 1933, 63·7; December, 1934, 66·2, and December, 1935, 72·9. In the last year it would seem that in connection with animal products there has been a rise of slightly over six points, but we have still eighteen points to go to get back to the level of 1926.

To sum up, I submit that by control of the Bank of Canada, by the use of monetary action and by putting out the requisite amount of money we can affect the level of prices in Canada. The time has long since arrived when the government should take control of the Bank of Canada and without in any way dislocating our economic set-up, by careful monetary action restore the level of wholesale prices in accordance with the recommendations of the Imperial Economic Conference at Ottawa, and the British section of the World Economic Conference at London, and in accordance with the judgments of leading bankers who have made a study of the question.

It is time we broke away from the policy that the only way to create money is to save it. If every hon. member began saving and if we were to cut down consumption to the level adopted by Mr. Ghandi of India, who lives on a little rice and goat's milk and dresses in a loin cloth, our economic set-up would not last very long. It would tumble within six months.

Mr. DUNNING: We would all be raising goats.

Mr. TUCKER: We would not last long in our winter weather, anyway. I submit that our automobile and furniture factories would be closed. All business to the extent it prevails in Canada would be closed up, and yet the basis adopted by the orthodox economist is that we must save and thereby retain the old virtues of thrift and so on. Those old virtues were all right in days when the country was being opened up and when there was a real scarcity of goods, but the situation to-day is different with a plentiful supply of goods. Saving is not as a result so socially beneficial. I submit that we must use the central bank so that the level of prices may be raised, and so that people engaged in industry may have enough money to buy what they have produced.

I have not touched upon another point I suggested earlier in the session. In closing, may I indicate that since coming to this house and further studying monetary questions, with all the intelligence I can bring to bear, I am still of the opinion that in Canada we should support a government bank doing the governmental banking, and that we should set up a branch of the central bank to finance our governments. We should thereupon through it refinance our governmental debt. We could charge interest, if we wished, but such interest would come back to the people in profits of the government bank, thereby cutting down the tremendous burden our people shoulder at this time when they pay interest on their own credit. In this way we would divorce public finance from private finance. Private bankers would continue to do business with business men, but the rate of interest to private business would be cut down, because governments would not be competing with private business for credit from private banks. I submit that if the private banks can create credit, then our own bank, through a separate department, could create and loan the necessary credit needed to finance our government. In this way we could equate consumption and production and set the wheels of industry turning. As a people we have the greatest chance of any country to produce wealth. We have a people as industrious and skilled as any in the world. We have unparalleled natural resources; we have the factories necessary to produce the wealth, and having those opportunities I submit that it is up to us to use our ability as a people to produce the good things of life and make full use of them by distributing these good things among the people who need them. In other words, to come back to the last word in the Liberal fourteen points, distribution has become more important than production, and it is only just and proper that the Liberal party should bring this measure into parliament. Once we get control of the central bank I hope that it will be only a beginning, and that we shall go forward in the days to come striking off the shackles of economic insecurity from the people of Canada and restoring to them that security and happiness and economic well-being to which they as a people are entitled.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak to this resolution but it is now almost eleven o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): This resolution seeks to increase the bank's capital stock, and in such case to purchase the bank's shares in order to ensure a majority holding by the government; also to increase the number of directors and to ensure voting control by the government through its own elected directors. In other words, the resolution seeks to provide the government with the cheap and nasty methods of obtaining control of a successful business which are universally accepted as the peak of ingenious attainment of this object by big business interests. Because big business often uses the public and its employees as suckers is no reason why the government should do the same thing. These are strong words, and I will admit that I have cast my objection suddenly into the deep end of this matter when I might have approached it with a little more care and gradualness. But I believe the government will realize that I do this not with malice aforethought but to point the moral and adorn the tale more effectively.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, June 2, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

NEW DOMINION LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I notice in the press an item stating that the government proposes to put out a new loan. Perhaps the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) would like to give the house some particulars—if not to-day, to-morrow—regarding it.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I have not the details before me. They appear by advertisement in the press of Canada to-day. There are three maturities between now and the first of November for which it is designed to give an opportunity for exchange immediately if the holders are willing to take advantage of it; also $20,000,000 of new money is being asked for. Some of the issues maturing are short date, low interest issues, and one, if my memory serves me aright, is $79,000,000 of five per cent securities. The opportunity of exchange is being given on the basis of either four year bonds to yield to the purchaser 1·63 per cent or thirty year bonds to yield approximately 3·30 per cent. The short term issues for which the exchange is being offered are mostly in the hands of the banks. who, of course, require short term issues for their purposes, and it is hoped that they will be largely surrendered for the new short term issue of four year bonds.

Mr. LAWSON: Would the minister give the interest rate which is borne by the bonds that are being retired?

Mr. DUNNING: I am relying upon my memory: some are two per cent short term; the largest rate is five per cent, being a loan made in 1931. There is one other. the rate of which I cannot at the moment state definitely.

DOMINION HOUSING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) aware that applicants for loans in British Columbia under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, are now being advised that loans outside the limits of the city of Vancouver are not permitted by the Department of Finance? If so, is it possible for the minister to encourage the approval of loans in suitable suburban areas, such as West Vancouver?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend was good enough to speak to me about this matter. After looking into it, I can assure him that there is no departmental regulation which would prevent the granting of loans under the Dominion Housing Act outside the city of Vancouver, or for that matter, anywhere in Canada. The loan companies, of course, are the contributors or lenders of the major portion of the loans, as my hon. friend, who is familiar with the act, will know, and the decision as to whether a loan of their own money shall be made rests with them. At the same time the department is endeavouring, through cooperation with municipal authorities and others interested, together with the loan companies, to ensure the spreading of the benefits of the housing act as widely as possible. Everything the department can do to encourage loans in districts such as that mentioned by my hon. friend is being done and will continue to be done.

LOANS TO FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): May I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) or the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) if there is any indication that the moneys granted to subsidize or promote the fishing industry throughout the Dominion of Canada will be made available soon. I understand that regulations have not been adopted as yet, and that disposition of the money has been held in abeyance until such time as these regulations are passed by the governor in council. May I ask if that is likely to take place in the very near future so that the fishermen may obtain loans under the provisions of this measure?

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): In reply I may tell my hon. friend that the matter is still under consideration. Regulations are being worked out and will be made public shortly.

OTTAWA RESTAURANT EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). I have been advised that certain restaurants located in the city of Ottawa, whose employees up to the present have enjoyed one day off per week, have advised their employees that, with no increase in wages, they will be required to work seven days a week, with one day off every two weeks. I should like to know whether there are any steps the minister can take to investigate this situation, and, if he finds that such a condition does exist, whether there is anything he can do to remedy matters.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I shall be glad to take note of the statement of my hon. friend and have proper inquiries made.

PUBLIC WORKS CONSTRUCTION ACTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I should like to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) when I may expect the return ordered on February 20, about which I spoke to him in the house a few weeks ago.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I can only say to my hon. friend that I will again direct his question to the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), whose department is supplying part of that return.

EMPLOYMENT OF YOUTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the government. Two motions by private members, one by myself and the other by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), having to do with youth employment and reconstruction, were withdrawn on the promise that the government would consider what might be done. What has been the result of these studies; what action is going to be taken? It is nearly the dying days of the session, we hope, and I should like to ask the government what has become of this study, what has been studied and what is the result.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I can bring this up on a motion to go into supply and take up far more time than I am taking up now. I think when a member asks a question, he should have an answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister was about to reply to the hon. gentleman.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): In reply to my hon. friend I may say that provision was made under the national employment commission bill for the creation of an advisory committee which is to include two special committees, one of which is to address itself to the problem of youth employment. The national employment commission has been established, and we are considering with it the personnel of the advisory committee. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the government is by no means indifferent to the importance of the question he has raised, and the whole subject is receiving and will continue to receive careful attention.

Mr. CHURCH: May I say in reply to the minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: The minister talks and chatters at banquets. That is the sort of chatter that has been going all around the country.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for a Department of Mines, Resources and Colonization, to comprise the present departments of Interior, of Mines, of Immigration and Colonization, of Indian Affairs and the administration of the Northwest and Yukon Territories, and to provide also for the transfer from time to time to the minister of such existing or subsequently established boards, public bodies or services as may be assigned to him; and to provide further for the employment and transfer of such officers, clerks and employees at present employed in the departments of the government above mentioned as are necessary for the proper conduct of the department.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of the bill to be based on this resolution is, as indicated by the resolution, to organize in one department of the government, under the direction of a single minister, four existing departments and the several public services related thereto.

The policy of effecting, wherever possible, economies in the public service is one which is an aim of the present administration. The government believes that circumstances not only permit but necessitate, for purposes of efficiency as well as economy, the consolidation into a single department of the various departments mentioned in the resolution. The proposed consolidation is a part of the policy of reducing the cost of government as it existed at the time the present administration assumed office. When my right hon. friend the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) retired from office the cabinet was composed of twenty-one ministers in all, seventeen of whom were holding portfolios Under the present administration the number of ministers has been reduced to sixteen, fifteen of whom hold portfolios. This reduction has been effected by reducing the number of ministers without portfolio; by placing under the direction of one minister the Department of Railways and Canals and the Department of Marine and by abolishing the office of Solicitor General and assigning the functions of that office to the Attorney General and Minister of Justice.

The present bill will place under the direction of one minister of the crown, to be known as the Minister of Mines, Resources and Colonization, the departments of the Interior, Indian Affairs, Immigration and Colonization and Mines. During the past few years there has been a haphazard assignment—

(At this point Hon. W. E. Rowe, recently elected leader of the Conservative party in Ontario, entered the chamber).

May I pause, Mr. Speaker, personally to extend and to extend on behalf of all hon. members on this side of the house, and I believe with equal assurance on behalf of hon. members in all parts of the house, very warm congratulations to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) on his having been selected as leader of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario, and upon what his selection for that high and responsible position signifies of the confidence reposed in him by his fellow members of the Conservative party. I need scarcely add that I hope and believe there will be no necessity for his occupying the position of premier of the province, at least for a long time to come. I do, however, most sincerely congratulate him, and wish him long continued opportunity of useful public service.

I was saying that there had been in the past a more or less haphazard assignment of portfolios with respect to the different departments which I have mentioned. They will now be brought together into a single department. There was a time when, for a while, they were all under the one minister. Latterly, however, while the Department of the Interior and the Department of Indian Affairs were under the direction of one minister, the Department of Immigration and Colonization and the Department of Mines were under the direction of another minister, who happened also to be the Minister of Labour. There did not seem to be any special reason why the Department of Immigration and Colonization should have been combined with that of Labour, or for that matter why the Department of Mines should have been assigned at one time to one minister and at another, to another. There is, however, a strong reason, because of their related activities, why the Departments of Immigration and Colonization, Indian Affairs, the Interior and Mines should all be brought together into one department.

The present proposed consolidation accords with the policy followed when a Liberal administration was previously in office of consolidating departments the activities of which were correlated. In 1922, the different branches of the public service related to Defence were brought together into one department of National Defence. Previously there had been a Department of Militia and Defence. A separate branch of the public service known as the naval service was under the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. There was also the air service which came under the direction of an air board, a semi-autonomous organization attached to the department of the Secretary of State and later to the militia department. The chairman of the air board was the Minister of Defence. These three branches of the public service were, as I have said, brought in 1922 into a single department known as the Department of National Defence, and have since been administered by the one minister, the Minister of National Defence.

Similarly there was effected under the late Liberal administration a consolidation of all the revenue departments of the government. That consolidation had been previously begun in 1921 by the bringing together under one minister of the Department of Customs and what at that time was called the Department of Inland Revenue. The new department came to be known as the Department of Customs and Excise. The income tax however, was collected by the Department of Finance, as was also the case with the sales tax. In 1927 there was created the Department of National Revenue, under the direction of one minister, the Minister of National Revenue. The customs, excise, income tax, sales tax and other branches of the service that had to do with the collection of revenue were all brought into the one department of national revenue. There was in 1928 a consolidation of the Departments of Health and soldiers' civil reestablishment into the Department of Pensions and National Health. As hon. members will have observed, the resolution that appears next in order on the order paper provides for the consolidation into one department, to be known as the Department of Transport, of three departments that relate to transport, the Department of Railways and Canals, the Department of Marine, and the civil branch of the aviation service.

The historical sequence of the departments mentioned discloses how their relative importance has changed with the development of the country. A few years ago the Department of the Interior was a very large and important department of the government. It had to do with the administration of lands in the Northwest Territories as then constituted, which at the time of the creation of the department in 1873, comprised all that part of Canada lying west of the great lakes, excepting only the province of British Columbia and the original small province of Manitoba. It continued to have to do with all the crown lands and the development of the natural resources of this area, such as forests, water power and the like, which were under the control of the federal government as well as with land settlement and immigration. But with the creation of the western provinces and the transfer to those provinces of their natural resources, and to British Columbia of the railway belt and the Peace River block, the relative importance of the Department of the Interior became less and less, and it was found possible to carry on the present activities of the department with a staff reduced from 2,500 to approximately nine hundred.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

After confederation the administration of Indian Affairs, which previously had been under the management of the several provinces came under the control of the dominion. From that time until 1873 Indian Affairs was attached to the department of the Secretary of State. In 1873 it became associated with the Department of the Interior. That association will continue under the consolidation about to be effected.

From Confederation until 1892 matters relating to Immigration were under the control of the department of Agriculture. From that year till 1917 they formed a branch of the department of the Interior. In the earlier years of this country immigration had an importance much greater federally than it has to-day. What has now become of increasing significance relatively is the work of colonization as between different parts of our own country. It has been felt that that work relates itself very closely to the development of our resources, and might very well be brought under the purview of the minister who has charge of this particular field.

The Department of Mines was created in 1907. From its inception it has been under the minister of some other department of the government. Though a separate and distinct department of government it has never had a minister of its own. However, with time the development of the mining resources of Canada has been such that this industry has come to have a place second to none in importance in the economic activities of the country. The government has felt that the present day relative importance of the industry in relation to the other departments with which it will be associated will be well brought out if in the name of the new department special mention is made of mines as a part of the new organization.

I shall have to leave until the bill itself is introduced an account of the particular organization it seeks to effect. Hon. members will see that to best advantage in the bill itself. At the moment, however, I should like to indicate some of the economies which it is hoped may be effected by this consolidation. It is not possible to do this by way of a definite statement, but in a general way economies will be apparent. In the four departments there are at the present time three deputy ministers and one deputy superintendent general, three assistant deputy ministers and one assistant deputy superintendent general, four legal advisers, two editorial staffs, three publicity staffs, four translation staffs, two architects' offices, four sets of secretarial and stenographic and other staffs, purchasing agents, four officers engaged in accounting for revenue and expenditure, three photographic establishments, three departments in which land business is carried on and four in which surveying is carried on; doctors are employed by two departments; welfare of natives is a concern of two departments, maps are prepared in two departments At the present time there are eighteen branches all told in these four departments. Under the proposed legislation the number of branches will be limited to eight. Another direction in which considerable economy should be effected is in the housing of these various departments. We hope before very long, it will become possible to bring the various units together, into a single building where staffs will be more immediately under the supervision of those who are at the head of the different branches and of the department as a whole. At the present time the four departments are housed in twenty-four buildings throughout Ottawa. More than half of the office space now rented is in privately owned buildings, and the yearly rent exceeds $215,000. The consolidation will reduce the office space required and eliminate the time and expense of communication between the different branches.

The law officers are of the opinion that the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act is not sufficiently comprehensive to permit of the consolidation of these various departments, and they advise that to achieve that end new legislation is necessary. This, apart from other considerations, is the reason why the government has thought it well to introduce special legislation to effect the amalgamations contemplated.

In conclusion may I add, it is hoped the proposed designation of the new department may serve to emphasize the place it will hold in the national economy. In selecting a title the government has sought to look to the future more than to the past. We have sought not so much to enumerate departments to be administered as to express those activities which are likely to contribute to the future development of the Dominion. By placing mines as the first unit in the designation of the new department, emphasis is being given to the importance the administration attaches to that branch of the public service.

It is thought that the term "resources" is sufficiently comprehensive to cover all the resources of the crown under the control and management of the present Department of the Interior, including the Northwest Territories, the Yukon territory and all Crown lands, and to include all that is being done by the government in the administration of crown lands, forests, water powers, parks, geodetic and geological surveys, and work of the kind. With respect to colonization, emphasis will be given to a greater national development in which more attention than formerly will be paid to the movement of people within our own country, while permitting sufficient attention to be paid to what may be needed when the time again arrives to encourage immigration. It will, I believe, be agreed by all that the public interest will be well served by bringing into one department of government these various public services which require uniform and correlated administration.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the proceedings it would seem unnecessary to say much about the resolution; full discussion will be more appropriate later. May I assure the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that he could not be more anxious than hon. members on this side of the house for economies in the public service, nor can he be more anxious than we were when in office.

In the list of ministers my right hon. friend has included four of us who did not receive salaries, and when he included us I do not think he helped his argument. It is true that he did reduce from seventeen to fifteen the number of ministers with portfolios, and speaking only for myself I would say that he has taken a step in the right direction. We will learn more about the economies effected as time goes on. There was a time when the Prime Minister said he was going to appoint under-secretaries. If he makes those appointments I doubt very much whether he will effect much economy. However the measure has not yet been introduced, and perhaps never will be. I think possibly it will not be introduced but if so we shall have something to say about it when the time comes.

May I suggest that the name of the new department is too long and cumbersome. It is to be known as the Department of Mines, Resources and Colonization, but I believe the Prime Minister will agree that results are more satisfactory if we have shorter names for departments. Persons who come to Ottawa to interview ministers are not at all likely to remember departments with names as long as the one proposed in this measure. They find difficulty in knowing where to go, and I suggest that the name be shortened.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is my right hon. friend's suggestion?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think "Department of Mines and Resources" would be sufficient. The Prime Minister has left out the Departments of the Interior and Indian Affairs, and to those deletions I do not object.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And Immigration.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes; but from my point of view a short title is better than a long one. I wonder if he could not give the matter further consideration, and whether he would consider it advisable to have the department known as the Department of Mines and Resources.

The proposal is to bring four departments under one minister. As the Prime Minister has said, the Department of the Interior used to do extensive work, but the scope of its operations was narrowed and the size of the department reduced accordingly. Under present conditions it is true that the mines activities will be of greatest importance, and in my judgment the government is acting properly in having mines mentioned first in the title.

The Prime Minister has stated that the four departments in question are housed in twenty-four buildings, half of which are privately owned. I agree with him entirely when he says that another office building should be erected by the government to house this department. I believe that in renting large numbers of buildings we are making a great mistake. From experience I have learned that even for me, one who has lived in Ottawa all his life, it is difficult to find the particular section of a department with which I may wish to get into communication. For these reasons I am entirely in agreement with the idea of bringing the different departmental branches together in such a way that they may be more easily controlled and supervised, and more closely in touch with the minister in charge.

My right hon. friend has said that the legal department has advised him the general act providing for the transfer of duties from one department to another is not sufficient to effect the desired end. I do not know anything about that phase of the matter, but whether or not it is sufficient I believe he is taking a proper course when he brings in new legislation. In my opinion it would not have been wise to rely on a general act to effect changes of such magnitude as are indicated in this measure.

I believe I have said all that I wish to say at this stage. When we have seen the bill and know more about it we shall be able to discuss it with greater intelligence and understanding. I hope the details of the bill will be such as to commend themselves to hon. members. With these few observations I am content to let the resolution pass so that the bill may be before us and be considered in the regular course, to-morrow or the next day.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. CAHAN: Would the Prime Minister feel at liberty to indicate more in detail the nature of the organization which is proposed under the bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was hoping that the committee would prefer to wait until the bill was introduced before discussing the proposed organization in detail. I might leave it to my colleague the minister who is at present administering the department to say a word or two on this subject, if the committee so desires, as he is more familiar with all the details of the measure.

Mr. CRERAR: Broadly speaking, Mr. Chairman, the objective is to have one deputy minister and the work of all these departments arranged probably under eight directors. The precise manner of the classification of the work in the existing departments has not yet been completely worked out, and it is possible that we might be able to effect it with seven directorships, and then work through the directorships down.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does not the bill state how many directors there are to be?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, not more than eight. I might add what I am sure is perfectly obvious to the committee from the remarks of the Prime Minister in introducing the resolution, that there is to-day in these departments a very considerable amount of duplication. My theory of efficient administration rests largely on the importance of having competent men in the responsible positions, and in the carrying out of the work of reorganization that will be our aim. I feel quite certain from the survey I have been able to make of these departments that a very considerable economy can be effected in the course of time, and probably the efficiency of many branches of the departments increased.

The Prime Minister has touched on one point which to my mind is a very important one. It is extremely difficult to get economy and complete efficiency in administration when the units of your departments are scattered throughout more than a score of office buildings in the city. It makes for loss of time and a lack of actual contact in the direction of affairs, and undoubtedly adds to the expenses of administration.

I shall be very glad, Mr. Chairman, to supply any further details that may be required when the bill is before the committee.

Mr. BARBER: The soldier settlement board is not mentioned here. Will it come under this new department?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. The soldier settlement administration, which is a separate administration, will be under the combined department.

Mr. CHURCH: I fail to see, Mr. Chairman, what is going to be effected by this particular measure. True, it may affect some official salaries, but a country with the natural resources of Canada, with our magnificent products of the sea, of the forest, of the soil and of the mine, with our immense water powers, a potential forty-two million of horse-power and only seven million or one-sixth, developed, deserves something better. I doubt whether this country could have existed through the last five or six years had it been less bountifully endowed with natural resources. But how have we been conserving and using these natural resources? In the maritime provinces they gave away under successive governments for over thirty-two years the natural resources of the forest, of the soil and of the mine just like Santa Claus handing presents off a Christmas tree. To somebody was given a coal mine, and to somebody else fisheries and timber lands.

What did the Drury government do in the province of Ontario? I see my good friend from Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) is back in the house, and he will alter things, but he will probably not get the opportunity for a year or so. What did the so-called Farmer-Labour government in Ontario do? It gave to Backus, a multi-millionaire, a principality of timber limits half the size of Belgium.

Another thing that is affected in this amalgamation of departments is immigration, which is one of the three great problems of our empire to-day, trade, defence and migration. We are not able to provide work for our own people, let alone bringing in people from continental Europe and all over the world.

Another department that is to be included in this amalgamation is the Department of Mines. Was there ever a country, Mr. Chairman, with the natural resources of Canada that had its natural resources squandered to such an extent? Do you remember the Beauharnois? The Lord never intended the magnificent resources of the river St. Lawrence for the gentlemen on St. James street. He intended those natural resources for all his people. Why have we unemployment in this country to-day? Whenever we have a policy proposed in this house to cure unemployment, we have minister after minister getting up and saying, "I will study the question." Much study on the part of the cabinet I may say is a weariness to the flesh.

I fail to see, Mr. Chairman, what good is going to be effected by this measure, a glorified omnibus department. When everything is put in its pigeonhole—natural resources over here, mines over there—anybody can go to the cupboard and help himself as has been done so far. Immigration? Walk over to the deputy and get a permit. This parliament might as well close up, for all we have done this session for the benefit of the people. I am wondering what we have a parliament for. Our parliament is supposed to do something, and the goverment is supposed to carry out its pledges. What did this government say all over the province of Ontario they would do if they got into power? They were going to conserve our natural resources, but there has been no conservation at all. The question of the natural resources is one of the main issues across the border to-day. It was an issue in our election campaign last fall, and is going to be an issue in the future, and here is the government proposing to hand over our natural resources to a deputy minister and assistant deputy minister, and no doubt there will be a whole retinue of under-secretaries. Just wait till you see the list of under-secretaries. Every private member will be an under-secretary in this new omnibus department under the control of the Minister of the Interior. The hon. gentleman who did so much for the prairies and for the farmers on the prairies in free trade in wheat and grain is now to have delivered over to him a whole kingdom of natural resources. A horse, a horse, my kingdom for a horse! Mr. Backus got a whole kingdom of timber limits given to him, a principality half the size of Belgium, handed to him by the Drury government over the heads of the legislature. Is this parliament going to do something to help conserve our natural resources? I say this country will be bankrupt, Mr. Chairman, if we do not put on the brakes in the handing out of its resources in the way we have been doing. I say here and now that a country less abundantly endowed than Canada could not have existed in the past ten or fifteen years, the way we were handing out our natural resources. There will be economy in respect of a few clerks transferred here and a few deputy ministers transferred there, while one person will be grabbing another Beauharnois, somebody else will be grabbing timber limits, and so on. Under this new department our resources will be a happy hunting ground for American millionaires.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the directors provided for in this bill have access to the minister himself or only through the deputy?

Mr. CRERAR: So long as I have been in charge of any department it has always been the practice for the head of a branch or a subdepartment to have access to the minister. That I think has always been the practice and it will certainly be the practice here.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I would remind the minister that in the Department of National Revenue, to which the Prime Minister referred, there are three branches and they have no deputy. These three commissioners have each direct access to the minister and not through anyone else. If that is to be the case in this department I am wondering why there is a deputy minister at all. If the directors are to be in the same position as the commissioners are now in the Department of National Revenue, what will be the function of the deputy?

Mr. CRERAR: Of course, the two are not altogether analogous. I have already said to the committee that the legislation will provide for not more than eight directors; I think it quite likely that there will be at least seven. The purpose of having a deputy minister is to coordinate all the work; he is in a sense the general manager of the department.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Of all the branches.

Mr. CRERAR: Of all the branches, yes; and the work of coordination in a department of that size is very important. In the national revenue department, I understand that the present arrangement obtaining there has worked out very well. However, I have no hesitation, after studying the matter, in recommending that this department should have a deputy minister.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Of course, when the minister says that the position in the national revenue department is not analogous to the position here, I suggest there is much more reason why a deputy might be appointed to that department than to this proposed new department. After all, the Department of National Revenue has three branches all having to do with the collection of revenue, whereas in this new proposed department all the different branches have to do with entirely different subjects not in any way related one to the other. The mines branch and the branch with respect to Indian affairs are not related in any way. It seems to me much more difficult to coordinate seven or eight branches, all of which have to do with different subjects, than to coordinate the sections of the national revenue department. However, I will wait and see what reasons the minister has for having a different setup in this proposed new department than we have in the national revenue department. I submit that he ought to be able to give us better reasons than he has advanced this afternoon why this plan should be adopted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I drew the attention of the house to the organization which was effected in the Department of National Defence. In that department there is one division which has to do with the military forces, another which has to do with the naval service, and a third which has to do with the air force. The three main divisions or branches of the department are coordinated under one deputy minister of National Defence. I believe successive Ministers of National Defence have found that it facilitates the coordinating of the work to have one permanent head who has complete supervision over all parts. It serves to bring the minister himself and the permanent head of the department more immediately into touch with defence as a whole than would be the case if the minister were obliged separately to consult all the heads of branches. When it comes to the special work of any branch of the department, or to special spheres of activity, the minister will certainly wish to see individually the heads of the various branches; but for purposes of general administration, of keeping a survey over large staffs, of preventing duplication of services on the part of clerks and the like, the presence of one deputy head is obviously a great advantage.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does not the Prime Minister agree that the correlationship between the branches of the Department of National Defence is much closer than it could possibly be between the branches of this department, which covers so many varied fields of activity?

Mr MACKENZIE KING: I am inclined to think that, as in the case of the Department of National Defence, all branches or divisions have to do with defence, so in this department all branches and divisions have to do in the main with the development of the resources of the country which are under federal control—resources relating to mines, forests, lands, water powers, parks and certain classes of the population. Altogether, it is essentially a department concerned with such of the country's natural resources as are not already assigned to other departments of the government.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 79 respecting the Department of Mines, Resources and Colonization.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for a Department of Transport to comprise the present Department of Railways and Canals and the Department of Marine and the civil aviation branch of the Department of National Defence, for the organization of the department, and the appointment and transfer of the required officers and staff.

He said: The bill to be founded on this resolution is similar to the bill founded on the resolution which we have just been considering, in that it brings together under the direction of one minister three or more departments or branches of the public service which have hitherto been separately administered. In the present instance the intention is to bring into one department, to be known as the Department of Transport, the existing Departments of Railways and Canals and of Marine and also the civil aviation branch of the Department of National Defence. All of these departments are obviously concerned with transportation. The government believes that the public interest will be better served by having one department concerned with transport in a manner which will enable the minister and his staff to view the transportation problem as a whole, to think in terms of transport facilities and interests as a whole rather than to have them viewed, as is too often the case to-day, as individual services with rival and possibly conflicting interests, jurisdiction and regulation.

As hon. members well know, transportation is of importance in our national life and in foreign trade. There has been constant change in the methods of transport, which has now four important divisions. For a long time transportation by rail was considered of chief importance from a government standpoint. It was considered necessary, Canada being the size it is, to have a separate department to deal all but exclusively with railways. Some of the railways, as government owned, were in fact operated by a department of the government. Water transportation was considered of such importance as also to necessitate the existence of a separate department concerned specially with marine matters. In addition to transportation by rail and by water, transportation on highways, especially in the individual provinces, has come to have an importance which it did not have before, and to constitute a competitive element with both the railways and waterways. Finally there is transportation by air which is fast coming to be of equal if not in some particulars of greater importance than any of the other forms of transportation. There are the four kinds of transportation, being respectively railways, waterways, highways and airways. It is obviously necessary that the problem of transportation which thus presents itself should if possible be viewed as a whole. It is believed that, by consolidating the departments mentioned in the resolution that great objective will be served, as well as the aims of economy and efficiency, and the better regulation and control of transportation activities generally. The new act will place under common direction, as far as constitutional limits permit, all federal activities concerned with railways, waterways, highways and airways.

As to the selection of the name, here again, as with the department of mines and resources, it has been difficult to decide on a designation that would be as acceptable to some as it is to others. It has seemed to the government that the term "transport" would express better than any other the field we are endeavouring to bring under the purview of a single minister. It was suggested, I think by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) that "department of communications" might be a better title than "department of transport." When my right hon. friend came into office I spoke to him about the desirability of some departments being consolidated immediately if they ever were to be consolidated. I think at the time I suggested the wisdom of bringing together into a department of communications the different departments having to do with communication. However, after considering the matter more carefully, it has seemed that "communications" would more properly be related to those services which have to do with the carrying of information, either by postal services or by telegraph or telephone, while "transport" has rather to do with the carrying or transporting of commodities or persons from place to place. It is not possible to draw a sharp line between the two. The radio, for example, might seem to relate more appropriately to communication than to transportation. Radio, for the time being at least, will be one of the services to be included in the Department of Transport. It is desirable to have the radio linked up in an effective way with transportation services because of the many agencies it serves so well. The importance of the radio to civil aviation, the meteorological service and the like will be apparent. The government feels the more secure in suggesting the designation "Department of Transport" for the new consolidation in that this is the title which is used in Great Britain for the ministry which has to do with transportation affairs there. In 1919 the act to establish the Ministry of Transport and for purposes connected therewith was passed. A reference to the powers and duties assigned to the Ministry of Transport under the British Act will disclose that they are very similar to those which are being assigned to this new department in Canada.

The financial benefits to be derived from the merging of the Department of Railways and Canals and of Marine are impossible of precise estimate at this stage. Nevertheless, there are bound to be considerable savings. As will be indicated by the bill itself, there will be a single minister where formerly there were two, and one deputy minister where at the present time there are two. The administrative staff of the Department of Railways and Canals, at Ottawa, inside staff, numbers 88; of the Department of Marine, 256; and of civil aviation, 15, a total of 359. It is intended, of course, to effect such economies as may be possible without injury to the public service, and without unnecessary hardship, and at the same time to increase the efficiency of the service generally. In both respects this will be a gradual development which will require to be carefully worked out.

The set-up of the new Department of Transport, and the reorganization and classification of the staff, will afford opportunity for the coordination of a number of services. It will be possible, for instance, to bring the engineering and drafting forces together so that there may be no overlapping or duplication of engineering activities. This headquarters engineering service and advice will also be available for outside work within the scope of the National Harbours Board, where heretofore local engineering activities have had little or no relation to a general coordinated scheme of development.

In other directions as well there will be definite and distinct advantages. A single purchasing branch will be set up; one legal staff will be sufficient; stenographic services can be pooled and rendered more effective; records arrangements consolidated, systematized and brought up to date. In other words, a more efficient and compact departmental machine will in due course be evolved with a considerable saving in expenditure and an all-round increase in efficiency.

There are, of course, benefits and advantages not to be measured in dollars and cents. The chief will be as already mentioned those arising from the fact that all matters of transportation within the federal ambit will be under one department and the uniform direction of one minister, who will be able to think in terms of transportation interests as a whole rather than of individual services. Due provision will be made in the new department for the development and expansion of the latest form of transportation—the commercial air services. In addition to the inside service headquarters staff at Ottawa, both the departments of Railways and Canals and of Marine have large outside staffs which, as they are connected with navigation services, expand in summer and contract in winter. All of these services will come, like the inside service, under the direction of the Ministry of Transport.

I think I may assume that hon. members opposite and in all parts of the house will take towards the present measure the same attitude of general approval which was adopted by my right hon. friend the acting leader of the opposition towards the previous measure, and that the house will welcome a consolidation which obviously makes for better regulation, for control of transportation activities generally as well as for economy in the public service.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): All I wish to say at the moment is that this measure, when it comes before us, will receive our most careful consideration. I hope it will make for economy and for the better administration of the public service. As far as the name is concerned it is a matter of opinion. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) says he has given it careful consideration and in his opinion the title should be "Ministry of Transport." I know that my leader thinks "Ministry of Communications" would be a better name, and he will be here to speak for himself when the bill comes up on a later occasion. On that point I would submit only one thing to the Prime Minister, and that is that "transportation" sounds as if it had something to do with railways. The Canadian National railways are supposed and intended to be administered apart from the government and not by the Minister of Railways.

Mr. CAHAN: We are changing all that now.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, but the use of the word "transport" would lead people to think it was intended that this department really should have something to do with running the railways, so I think it would be wiser to use the word "communications." That is all I have to say at the moment, but I think the Prime Minister might consider that aspect of the question, since it will surely be brought up for discussion at a later stage.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In reply to what my right hon. friend said a moment ago as to the designation "transport" suggesting that the department would have something to do with railways, may I point out to the right hon. gentleman that at the present time we have a Department of Railways and Canals, which even more emphatically expressed the relationship of the government to the railways. Under the present consolidation it is not intended to do other than take over such functions with respect to the railways as at present are under the direction of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 80, respecting the Department of Transport.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 11, to amend the Customs Act.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I think the minister might make some explanation as to these amendments.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall be very glad to do so. Two words are changed, I think. On page 3, line 8, section 6, the word "person" is substituted for the word "party." Then at the top of page 4 there is a change in the arrangement of the words in a sentence, without changing the meaning. As originally framed the sentence read:

> Whenever information has been given under oath to any officer alleging conspiracy to defraud the revenue or that goods or things have been unlawfully imported or entered ...

This has been changed so that the words "has been given under oath to any officer" appear after the word "entered" instead of as they appeared originally. The changes made by the senate do not affect the meaning of the bill in any way; they are simply minor changes to improve the draftsmanship.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Are those the only two amendments?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What is the amendment on page 5?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the penalty section, which repeats the section on page 4.

Mr. CHURCH: These amendments by the Senate are not printed, and often they go through without the house knowing what they are. Then later we find that they lead to untold litigation. This is an important bill, and in this instance I think we should not proceed until these amendments have been inserted in the votes and proceedings, so that we may know what they are. These provisions in connection with territorial waters, set out in this bill which has been amended by the Senate, are leading to a great deal of friction, not only on the ocean but on the great lakes as well.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to point out that there is nothing at all in this bill about territorial waters.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Just on that point, these Senate amendments are usually printed in the votes and proceedings, and perhaps the minister could tell us when these particular amendments appeared.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the votes and proceedings of May 7.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT, 1934

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Dominion Franchise Act, 1934, with respect to by-elections and to make provision for the appointment of enumerators and other necessary officers and for the preparation and printing of voters lists and other necessary documents.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not move this resolution for the purpose of precipitating a full discussion of the matter but rather for the convenience of the house, in order to enable me to introduce the bill based on the resolution, which is a somewhat voluminous measure.

As hon. gentlemen will recall, in 1934 a measure was enacted under which lists were to be prepared throughout the dominion, such lists to be subject to annual revision. In the early days of this session the house passed a bill dispensing with the annual revision of the lists for the year 1936, but it was agreed at that time that later on we would introduce a bill to provide for the preparation of special lists in connection with by-elections. I desire to correct at once a wrong impression that has gone abroad in certain newspapers that this resolution and Bill No. 78 which was introduced last Friday have anything to do with the by-election in Victoria. Of course it would not have been possible to provide for the by-election in Victoria, which takes place on Monday, and I desire to add that even if the act of 1934 had not been amended the by-election in Victoria would have been based on the list as it stands at present, revised during the fall of last year. The special committee of the house which has dealt with electoral matters generally has recommended two measures: Bill No. 78, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1934, which is already on the order paper, and another bill which must be preceded by a resolution in that it provides for the appointment of enumerators and other necessary officers and for the preparation and printing of voters' lists. This is the bill I wish to introduce, if the house will agree to let this resolution pass at once. The special committee, rather than recommending a special revision of the list for by-elections, has recommended the preparation of new lists for that purpose. I commend these recommendations to the house, and I point out that inasmuch as it is now evident that there will not be a new electoral act and a new franchise act this session, and as there is a possibility that even at the next session of parliament the committee would not be prepared to make their full recommendation, it now becomes urgent that we have in the meantime measures to provide for lists in the case of by-elections. That is the purpose of these two bills.

As for the resolution, it is necessary only because of the expenditure involved for the appointment of enumerators and for the printing of forms, et cetera. Perhaps the house will be willing to let the resolution pass—I am sure it meets the desire of every hon. member—and allow me to introduce the bill, which can be considered later.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rinfret thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 81, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act (dominion by-elections).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Superintendent General of Indian Affairs) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 4, to amend the Indian Act.

He said: The amendment proposed to this bill in another place simply clarified the drafting of one clause of the bill as first introduced. Section 2 of the bill as originally introduced conferred certain powers upon the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs to bring into effect by proclamation as far as they might affect Indian reserves the laws or regulations existent in any province governing the destruction of insect pests or the spraying of fruit trees and that sort of thing. The amendment we are now considering states a little more clearly the objective to be attained, and I am advised, frees the section from the possibility of misinterpretation. That is really the effect of the amendment. I have discussed the matter with the Minister of Justice and he concurs in the proposed amendment, which describes more accurately the intention of the original bill. I therefore move concurrence.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give the wording as amended?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Perhaps the minister will give the date on which it appeared in votes and proceedings.

Mr. CRERAR: It appeared on May 6. In reply to the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) I should perhaps read section 69 of the Indian Act. It is as follows:

> The superintendent general may, from time to time, by public notice, declare that, on and after a day therein named, the laws respecting game in force in the province of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta, or the territories, or respecting such game as is specified in such notice, shall apply to Indians within the said province or territories, as the case may be, or to Indians in such parts thereof as to him seems expedient.

The amendment suggested in the bill as originally brought down added to the section I have just read the following subsections:

> (2) The superintendent general may from time to time by public notice declare that the regulations in force in any province for preventing the spread of any insect, pest, or disease destructive to vegetation, and all that such regulations may prescribe, shall apply to Indians and Indian reserves within such province or such parts thereof as to him seems expedient.

(3) The superintendent general may from time to time by public notice declare that the laws in force in any province with respect to the rate of speed of motor vehicles and the character of motor traffic on the highways shall apply to Indian reserves within such province or such parts thereof as to him seems expedient.

Under the amendment now proposed section 69 is repealed and the following is substituted as a new section 69:

69. (1) The superintendent general, subject to the approval of the governor in council, may, as in this section provided, make regulations which, upon publication thereof in the Canada Gazette, shall apply with the same force as if the terms of such regulations had been herein enacted.

(2) The regulations may provide for appropriate penalties, not exceeding, as to imprisonment, three months and not exceeding, as to fine, one hundred dollars, for violation or nonobservance of any provision of any regulation.

(3) Without restricting the generality of the provisions of subsection one of this section, the regulations may provide, inter alia, for the incorporation by reference, as part of such regulations, of any specific and indicated law or regulation of and in force within any province of Canada, and in particular, and whether or not by way of the incorporation by reference of provincial laws or regulations, such regulations may provide—

(a) with relation to Indians within the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta or within the Territories, as the case may be, or to Indians in such parts of such provinces and Territories as to him seems expedient, that laws either in the same terms as, or in like terms to, or in other terms than, those in force in such provinces and territories, respectively, with relation to game in general or to specific game, shall apply, upon publication thereof in the Canada Gazette, with the same force as if enacted in this act, to such Indians as such regulations shall prescribe;

(b) for the destruction of noxious weeds and the prevention of the breeding, spreading or prevalence of any insect, pest or disease which may or might be destructive of or injurious to vegetation on Indian reserves;

(c) governing the speed and operation of vehicles on highways within Indian reserves.

The purpose of this amendment is to make clearer the objects sought in the amendment to section 69 as first introduced to the house, and to make it clear that we are proceeding in a proper and legal fashion.

Mr. STIRLING: It is quite clear that paragraphs (b) and (c) apply to any province in Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): The amendment comes from the Senate, and perhaps it would not be expedient to ask for any further amendment at this time. However I should like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to one consideration. In a country like Canada, where diverse activities have to be dealt with by different departments, it is necessary that regulations be made by some competent authority from time to time. In times past the right hon. gentleman opposite has called attention to the fact that such regulations or by-laws partake of the nature of legislation. Many of them impose penalties and have the force of law, as if enacted by statute. Under the regulations persons may be charged with crime, found guilty and imprisoned. I am entirely in accord with the considerations which the Prime Minister has placed before parliament and the public on previous occasions to the effect that such subsidiary legislation under statutes enacted by parliament should be made by the governor in council and not by an officer of the government. In the present instance the regulations are to be made by the superintendent general. I believe it would be better for us to follow the precedents of the past. The governor in council is the sole legislative body which I for one am prepared to recognize as subsidiary to the legislative functions and authorities of the parliament of Canada. While I do not wish to press the objection, I do not think the superintendent general, even with the approval of the governor in council, should be authorized to make regulations to which penalties are attached, and under which criminal or quasi-criminal proceedings may be taken. When departments are drafting bills it would be well to keep that consideration in mind. The same objection has been made in the past and I am repeating it now as I am in thorough accord with the policy enunciated from time to time by the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George for what he has just said. I believe all members of the government agree with the views he has expressed. The particular clause to which he has referred indicates that there must be approval by the governor in council of any regulation made by the superintendent general. I have no hesitation in saying that, in agreeing to that clause, the superintendent general had in mind the authority the governor in council would most certainly exercise, and that otherwise he would not have allowed the section to appear.

I believe the hon. member is entirely correct in the statement that from the point of view of drafting, emphasis ought to be placed upon the governor in council rather than upon any officer of the state, wherever such regulation may affect the freedom, liberty and rights of any individual.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

BANK OF CANADA

MAJORITY CONTROL BY GOVERNMENT OF CAPITAL STOCK AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS

The house resumed from Monday, June 1, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Bank of Canada Act so as to increase the capital stock of the bank, to provide that certain shares thereof shall be purchased by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund in order to assure ownership of a majority of the shares by the government, to increase the number of directors, and to provide for election and appointment of directors in such manner as to assure voting control of the board by directors appointed by the government.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, at 10.57 last night I rose in my place to speak to this resolution, but I did not have time to do more than make some introductory observations. I pointed out the highlights of the resolution, indicating that all the government really require is to control by votes the council of the bank. In order to do this it found it expedient to spend $5,100,000 to purchase 51 per cent of the shares. As I said last night, that smacks of the cheap and nasty methods used by big business on too many occasions. I do not for one moment consider that the government is doing this purposely; it is simply following a common practice. But in so doing it is registering that practice on the minds of the people of Canada, and they will consider that the control by money of the shares and destinies of a company is not a matter to be impeached. It appears to me that when a government takes 11,021 shareholders into its confidence they should have some consideration. But that right of consideration existing in a limited manner for a few months is now to be denied, and denied, forsooth, by what I consider to be a dirty commercial trick. Big business makes use of these tricks for the purpose of overcoming the suckers among its employees and its shareholders, but there is to my mind absolutely no reason why the government should descend to this method of handling the Bank of Canada shares.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I go into the matter of the resolution to discover what other grounds there might be for this activity, and I can discover none. The qualifications of a director appear to be ten shares of the nominal par value of fifty dollars per share. That is to say, a director of the Bank of Canada need hold only $500 worth of the nominal value of the shares of the concern. He can be taken from any walk in life so long as he is not financially interested in the control of other banks. There are hundreds of thousands of citizens in Canada able to qualify as directors of the Bank of Canada. Consequently there is no reason for concern on that score.

We then must turn to the conditions of the Bank of Canada itself to find out precisely why this resolution should have been put before the house. I find that the shares of $50 each are authorized to a total of $5,000,000 capital. That $5,000,000 was in the hands of 11,021 shareholders at the end of December, 1935, but in going over the bank's report, the statement of assets and liabilities, and the profit and loss account of the institution, I can discover no reason why the bank should be considered to be short of capital. As a matter of fact, I can see no reason why we should imagine that the bank has had to use its $5,000,000 capital at all. We find that after ten months of business, ending December 31, 1935, the bank was holding a total of over $307,000,000 worth of gross assets. It had during that time sent to reserve fund three and a half per cent of its authorized capital and had given the dominion government seven per cent. It expended the equivalent of two per cent of its capital in visible assets, in bank premises, equipment and furnishings. It paid for all its organization expenses. It paid for its note issue, an entirely new note issue, at very considerable expense, and at very considerable expense it had laid aside a large reserve of notes for future use. It had moreover, lost a total of over nine and a half per cent of its paid up capital on the foolish silver policy to which it had been committed. I pause here to say that if silver buying is to be a part of the bank's business it should not have been condemned to that policy at this extraordinary stage of its existence. I cannot for the life of me see how the government can consider that the bank should speculate in silver at the present time. The effort that was made and the loss that was incurred should have been the responsibility of the government, and not of the Bank of Canada.

Coming again to the question whether we are justified in raising the capital of the Bank of Canada to $10,100,000, I want to bring before the notice of the committee the history of the Commonwealth Bank of Australia as set out in a book entitled Australia's Government Bank by Doctor L. C. Jauncey. I am reading from picked quotations commencing on page 63:

The act made provision for capital of one million pounds to be raised by sale and issue of debentures. The capital of the bank was to be available for all purposes of the bank. Under the proposal of the Brisbane conference, both the states and the commonwealth were to raise the capital of the bank, but with the states not participating in the formation of the bank the act allowed public subscription of debentures of £10 each.

Again:

The Prime Minister said of the provision re subscribed capital, "In my opinion a capital of £1,000,000 will not be required, but I think it is wise to make ample provision when we are setting out on a scheme of this kind."

Fortunately the opinion of Fisher (the Prime Minister) was correct. The bank has never used this provision, which could be the entering wedge for private control of the bank. In order to get the bank started the act authorized that:

"The treasurer may, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund which is hereby appropriated accordingly, make advances to the bank for the purpose of enabling it to defray any of the expenses incidental to the establishment of the bank, the opening of offices thereof for business, and the raising of sufficient capital for carrying on business.... Any moneys advanced in pursuance of this section shall be repaid to the treasurer by the bank, together with interest at the rate of 3½ per centum per annum."

The governor of the bank used this provision to the extent of £10,000.

That is roughly fifty thousand dollars. Again:

On July 15, 1912, with no subscribed capital and with assets of only £10,000 in the form of a loan from the commonwealth government, the bank opened its doors for business.

Again:

The Commonwealth Bank Act of 1924 provided that the bank should be managed by a board of directors composed of the governor of the bank and seven others, including the secretary of the treasury. Six other members were to be, or to have been connected with agriculture, commerce, finance, or industry. All directors under this act are appointed by the governor general. A director is forbidden to borrow money from the bank, but, of course, may borrow from a bank that in turn borrows from the Commonwealth Bank.

And lastly:

Although the Commonwealth Bank commenced operations with merely a loan of £10,000 from the commonwealth treasury, by June 30, 1915, three years after the commencement of the Commonwealth Bank, the initial deficit of the bank was entirely extinguished. Since that time profits of the bank, excluding those of the note issue department, have grown until the net amount at June 30, 1933, was £7,354,746 (roughly $36,500,000). The net profits of the note issue department at this date were £14,992,226 (roughly $74,000,000). Profits of this department, with the exception of £2,000,000 set aside for the capital account of the rural credits department, have gone to the treasury. Of the profits made by the other departments £4,000,000 was placed in 1924 to the capital account of the bank.

It paid for its own capital account.

Mr. DUNNING: Did I understand my hon. friend to say some time ago that the capital of the Australian Commonwealth bank was £1,000,000?

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): The authorized capital.

Mr. DUNNING: I have the statute before me and it says £20,000,000. I do not want my hon. friend to base an argument on a false premise. I can read the section if he likes.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I should like to have it read in view of the fact that this refers to 1912, when the Commonwealth bank was established.

Mr. DUNNING: I am reading from section 9 of the act:

The capital of the bank shall be £20,000,000 consisting of the following: The sum of £4,000,000 transferred to the capital fund from the bank reserve fund to the redemption fund in accordance with the next succeeding section.

(b) Such sum, not exceeding £6,000,000, as is granted to the bank by the commonwealth from moneys borrowed by the commonwealth in pursuance of this act; and

(c) Such sum, if any, as is raised by sale and issue of debentures in pursuance of part VI of the act.

I would say to my hon. friend that the act has been amended on several occasions, and the accuracy of current information is rather uncertain. If he is quoting from a book which was written without taking into account recent amendments, some of which were of great importance and took place during the time that Australia was adjusting her financial difficulties, he may draw wrong conclusions.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I do not think I am drawing any incorrect conclusion. The last paragraph I read affects the condition of the bank up to June, 1933, and it is from that statement that I am quoting.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot understand where the £1,000,000 comes from.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): The £1,000,000 was the authorized capital in 1912, at the time of the establishment of the bank.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): That is what I pointed out, reading from the conditions of the bank ab initio. Subsequently changes have been made, as the minister states, in the capital structure of the bank, and at June, 1933, the condition was established that up to that time the profits, excluding the profits of the note issue department, had reached approximately $36,500,000; the profits of the note issue department had reached $74,000,000; £2,000,000 had been set aside for capital account of the rural credits department, and all other profits had gone to the treasury of the country. I quote further from the same book:

> Of the profits made by the other departments £4,000,000 was placed in 1924 to the capital account of the bank, and £1,075,298 was handed over in 1928 to the Commonwealth Savings bank. £1,593,822 has been allotted to the reserve fund of the bank, and £370,962 has been placed at the disposal of the rural credits department. Between 1923 and January, 1933, the Commonwealth bank and the Commonwealth Savings bank contributed £2,712,818 to the national debt sinking fund. Total profits of the Commonwealth Savings bank on January 1, 1933, were £1,291,167.

All these conditions, and the internal conditions as exhibited by the Bank of Canada statement, go to show that the bank itself has not had occasion necessarily to use its capital account. I am not saying that they did not use it, but it must be remembered that the government handed over to the bank $118,000,000 of bonds due in 1940, on which the bank would receive nearly $3,500,000 interest per annum. That is a pretty good fund to start with, and the contra to that was the obligation of the bank to take care of the note issue of the country. So that the position which I desire to establish is quite firm—that the bank has already demonstrated its ability to make profits in an extraordinary manner. I am quite confident that, according to the statement of assets and liabilities, the governors have salted away in the nooks and crannies of the structure of that institution profits which will never come to life in its historical records. And rightly so. It is a good thing to have in the country a bank that can do this sort of thing and be a representative central bank. But I do contend that it is entirely bad business to spend $5,100,000 to buy 51 per cent of the shares when you can for the same money purchase the whole business outright without doing any harm to the shareholders. At present you take away from the shareholders all but the unction of a 4½ per cent investment in the Bank of Canada. You turn what would be silent partners into dumb partners, and again I say you put the conduct of public affairs on a par with the way in which much of the general business throughout the country is conducted, as everyone who considers what must be the decent way of doing things must admit. I strongly desire to urge the government to consider the position in which it is placing itself by perpetuating an obligation which some day must be redeemed at greater cost.

I should like to know what the other members on the opposite side of the house think of this resolution. It seems to me that after their talk up and down the country they cannot stand for the same conditions which the government now stands for, and I do hope that the Minister of Finance will find it possible to bring down a measure which will completely control the institution.

Mr. R. S. WHITE (St. Antoine-Westmount): As one who is open to reproach from some quarters as being orthodox in money matters I desire to say a few words respecting the resolution now under consideration. I do not intend to touch at all the point made by the hon. member for South York yesterday, namely, the apparent inconsistency of the government in the legislation which it is proposed to have passed. That is a matter which the father of the Liberal party, the Prime Minister of Canada, can settle with his own family. My own view is that the proposal of the government is worthy of commendation, and I for one give it my hearty approval.

I have not been a devotee of a central bank in Canada. Many a time in Montreal I have spoken publicly against the setting up of such an institution. I am not yet convinced that it is required in this country at this time. But I cannot fail to recognize the fact that the parliament of Canada has placed on the statute books a law setting up a central bank, that it is there for good or for ill, and that no hostile words or attitude on my part can in the slightest degree affect the situation. If hon. gentlemen who prate about the importance of complete ownership by the government of a national bank or central bank will reflect for a moment or two, I am satisfied they possess sufficient logical powers to realize that this very resolution, with the bill about to be introduced, gives the government of the country, not absolute ownership, it is true, but absolute control of that bank to as great a degree as if every share in it were the property of the crown. I am satisfied that the view taken by the electors of this country during the last two or three or more years when this matter has been under discussion was that the central bank would be a bank of discount, a bank to which individuals, business firms, commercial corporations could go and borrow money; in other words, a bank that would discharge the ordinary functions of a commercial bank. No advantage I can conceive of will accrue or could accrue to the people from the total possession of the share capital by the crown, that will not be extended by the measure now under consideration. I have always thought, and I always will believe, that most grave danger to the financial stability and the credit of this country would be caused if the central bank became a bank of ordinary commercial discount. It is said of Blücher after Waterloo, Mr. Chairman, as you will remember, that when visiting London and looking about, he exclaimed, "What a city to sack!" If we had in this country a central bank under the control of the government, engaged in the making of loans upon such paper as the manager might think sufficiently secure for the purpose of the loan, well might the politicians supporting the ministry of the day exclaim on the eve of an election, "What a magnificent bank to loot!"

A good deal has been said of a condemnatory character in criticism of our chartered banks. I am not here to defend them or to say other than that they have served this country well. Representations have been made that the chartered banks are or have been sweating the blood out of the people, that they have been making exorbitant profits by high rates of interest. Is it known to hon. gentlemen that the leading bank and the largest in this country, to wit the Bank of Montreal, in its last financial year, 1935, earned a bare four per cent upon the capital investment of the shareholders? I submit that no one can possibly claim that four per cent profit is an exorbitant rate for a bank to earn and pay its shareholders upon their invested capital.

The policy of the banks is said to have caused the debacle of 1929 and subsequent years. If any will take the trouble to look at the figures they will find that the decline in prices and the recession in trade preceded the reduction in loans, and that the revival in trade that has occurred in the last three years—not it is true to a very great extent, yet more or less substantial renewal—has occurred in the face of a further reduction in the commercial loans of the chartered banks. So I contend it is impossible to attribute to the withdrawal of credit by the banks the debacle in business, and certainly it cannot be contended that a revival of trade has been in any way retarded by lack of commercial credit extended by the banks. Certain members of the house, namely the group in the left corner, trot out from time to time, as a convincing argument for something, a statement said to have been made on one occasion by the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, an eminent public man in Great Britain in his day, and a very prominent banker whose opinion I dare not think is worthy of other than great respect, the statement of Mr. McKenna being that every loan is followed by or coincident with a deposit. A more unfounded statement than that could not possibly be made. I venture to say there is not an hon. member who is unaware of the fact that the proceeds of many loans obtained from banks on the discount of paper are carried out by the borrowers in their pockets, and never appear as deposits at all. Again—and see the absurdity of Mr. McKenna's statement—when you borrow from a bank you pay five per cent, six per cent or, as the rate was at one time, seven per cent. Call it five per cent, if you like.

Mr. McGEER: Why not call it twenty per cent?

Mr. WHITE: All right; call it twenty per cent. Is anyone idiot enough to deposit the proceeds of a note, upon which twenty per cent interest has been paid, in a bank that will give him three per cent interest? On its very face the thing is utterly ridiculous. Starting yesterday, as hon. gentlemen know, the rate of interest on deposits in chartered banks was reduced to 1½ per cent, a rate so low as to be unprecedented in this country.

There is no lack of bank funds. Revival of trade is not being halted through lack of credit or money in this country. The difficulty the banks encounter, and have encountered for the last three, four or five years, is a plethora of money for which they can find no profitable use, and that is why the rate of interest on deposits has been reduced to 1½ per cent. If hon. members will look at bank statements of recent months, they will find that the banks have invested in government bonds about a billion and a quarter dollars, obtaining on their investment a low rate of interest. But that is the only use to which they can put their surplus money. As of April 30 of this year, or about a month ago, the chartered banks had $2,157,927,000 of public deposits, and at the same time their commercial loans amounted to only $725,484,000. In other words they had nearly $1,400,000,000 of deposits in excess of their commercial loans. The difficulty, as I have said, is that the banks cannot find borrowers. It is true that there are thousands upon thousands of people in this dominion who are ready to walk into banks, give their notes of hand and take as much money as they can possibly get, but they have no security to back their notes. It is a trite saying, but it must be remembered that these deposits are not the property of the shareholders of the banks; not a dollar of the deposits is represented by the capital investment of shareholders. The banks are trustees for their depositors, and as trustees the banks must exercise the greatest care and the closest scrutiny in making loans. There is a new cult abroad in the land; I am not sure that I have not heard its echo within these walls. It holds that the borrower, rather than the lender, should determine the security. If credit is required to put this country on its feet in respect of its business—and we are moving forward; let no mistake be made about that—it is in the banks, available. All that is necessary is for the would-be borrower to go there with security that will warrant the trustees of the depositors in advancing the money to him.

I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that I am to some extent wandering from the subject matter of the resolution. In indicating some of the provisions of the bill to be based upon this resolution the Minister of Finance stated that one of the sections would provide for bilingual currency. Again, personally I approve that. At the present time we have bilingual postage stamps in Canada, though I doubt whether more than one person in fifty thousand in this country is aware of that fact. More than eighty years ago we had in the then province of Upper Canada notes issued in both English and French by the commonwealth at Kingston, and no one suffered. If there be a sound objection to the recognition of dual languages in connection with any documents of any kind issued by the government, that objection seems to me to weigh as strongly against bills printed some in French and some in English. We have them circulating to-day pretty much throughout the country. You may get one bill wholly in French; the next time you ask for money from a bank you may be handed a bill wholly in English. The dual bills involve added cost. What practical difference can it make to the individual if the two languages are on the one bill, and a saving made? More than that, how many people are there in this house or in this country who read either the lettering or the wording of the bank note.

Mr. DUNNING: Just the figures.

Mr. WHITE: That is all they are concerned with, nothing but the numerals. They want to know whether it is a one or a ten, and they are praying heaven it may be a ten. But beyond the numerals they do not give a hoot what appears on the bill, as long as they are satisfied that it is a bona fide bank note.

In connection with the setting up of the Bank of Canada, our central bank, it is of the highest consequence that that institution should continue to be a banker's bank and not a public bank. The credit of Canada is high, but it has recently had one or two shocks. Daniel Webster, speaking in the American senate eighty odd years ago in eulogy of that eminent American financier, Alexander Hamilton, one time secretary of the United States treasury, and father, I think, of the banking system as originally founded in the United States, said of him, "He laid his hand upon the dead corpse of public credit and it sprang upon its feet." There are dangers in this country through repudiation of contracts, through violation of solemn compacts. Instances have occurred in two provinces. If we are not careful we may find that not provinces only, but even the parliament of Canada, by misguided financial legislation, have laid their hand upon the public credit and the public credit has crumpled under its touch.

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): Mr. Chairman, it was once my pleasure to tell the hon. member who has just sat down that I would listen very carefully to advice which he might give me from time to time. But I regret to say on this matter I hold views exactly opposite to his. The resolution which is now before the committee is of such great importance to Canada that I feel it my duty to express my views. It is proposed to change the present set-up of the Bank of Canada. There must be a fundamental reason for desiring this change. It is realized that the functions of money affect fundamentally the life of every individual, because individuals must have money in order to survive, since money to-day means purchasing power, a claim on all and everything. Some say that we are here to govern the country; but that is not enough; it is not a common ground, since others will immediately reply that some of us serve only a portion of the country, namely finance, and attempt to govern the rest. There must be another reason, more basic than all others, which has brought us here. And there is. Within the breast of every living thing there is a common desire, a desire greater than all else, an instinct, an urge, that compels us to fight to the last breath, to cling to life. It is the desire to survive. A man will rob his neighbour; he will place the blood and flesh of his body in bondage; he will sell his immortal soul; he will grasp the last straw and cling to life until the last gasp. That desire may not always be floating on the surface of man's multitude of emotions where it is constantly in view, but no one will dare to deny that it is there. With this desire uppermost people become uneasy as they see and read of conditions existing not only round them but throughout the world, and all agree that money is the factor which is causing most of the trouble. They see a world filled with the necessities of life that they cannot obtain. Such a representative and reliable body as the London Chamber of Commerce had the following to say about our gold standard. I quote from the Times of Saturday, December 24, 1932, which printed the new monetary policy of the London Chamber of Commerce, and I refer particularly to the part entitled: Gold as a Regulator:

It is incredible that in a scientific age the nations should so long have been content to rely upon the fortuitous arrival and disappearance of gold as the regulator to determine when the currency should be expanded or contracted. Not only had this gold movement little if any connection with business activity within the country, but the methods employed to put additional currency into circulation and to withdraw it, were calculated to do the maximum amount of injury to the trade and industry of the country by causing wide fluctuations in the price level. To cause such fluctuations and consequent disorders was in fact a necessary feature of the system. Additional currency was not called out as required by industry and commerce; it suddenly became available owing to a fortuitous acquisition of gold by the Bank of England. As the joint stock banks could find, at that moment, no outlet in industry for the additional credit made available by the broadening of their cash base, it found its way into speculation in the stock and raw material markets. A boom having thus been created in these markets, industry began to feel the benefit of an increased demand for its products. The advances which had, in the first place, been made for speculative purposes, were then withdrawn by the banks in order to finance the industrial boom, so that before this was well under way a slump in stock and raw material markets had begun. This is the phenomenon spoken of as the "trade cycle"—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GRAY: What is the hon. gentleman quoting?

The CHAIRMAN: I was going to ask the hon. member what he is quoting.

Mr. PELLETIER: I stated at the beginning that I was quoting from a reprint from the London Times Trade and Engineering supplement dated Saturday, December 24, 1932. I simply want to point out the attitude which the London Chamber of Commerce took concerning gold as a regulator for currency. That attitude has been taken, I might say, not only by the gentlemen referred to by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White), but by the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna. The London Chamber of Commerce certainly includes men whose standing and authority in public life cannot be questioned. However, supposing that these authorities are not sufficient and cannot be accepted by this committee, I have collected other authorities who have had something to say upon our present monetary system. For example, there is James Madison, an eminent American, who said:

We are free to-day, substantially, but the day will come when our republic will be an impossibility, because wealth will be concentrated in the hands of a few. A republic cannot stand on bayonets, and when that day comes, when the wealth of the nation will be in the hands of a few, then we must rely on the wisdom of the best elements of the country to readjust the laws of the nation to changed conditions.

Then there is Justice Lurton, a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States from 1910 to 1914, who said:

The power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, is a prerogative of sovereignty and a power exclusively vested in the congress of the United States.

Another whom I would like to quote is Salmon P. Chase, and I might say in passing this is not Stuart Chase of whom we have heard recently; it is Salmon P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury in the United States from 1861 to 1864 and Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1864 to 1873. He said:

My agency in promoting the passage of the national bank act was the greatest financial mistake of my life. It has built up a monopoly which affects every interest in the country. It should be repealed. But before that can be accomplished the people will be arrayed on one side and the banks on the other in a contest such as we have never seen before in this country.

I could go on indefinitely quoting views of many people in public life, or those of practical economists, but that has been done so often that perhaps it may not be necessary at this time. However, for the benefit of certain hon. members with whom I am well acquainted, I should like to quote from one authority which I know they will not dispute. I have before me a book entitled: The Social Order, Its Reconstruction and Perfection, by His Holiness Pope Pius XI. It is a reprint of the Encyclical Quadragesimo Anno and at

This power becomes particularly irresistible when exercised by those who, because they hold and control money, are able also to govern credit and determine its allotment, for that reason supplying, so to speak, the life-blood to the entire economic body, and grasping, as it were, in their hands the very soul of production, so that no one dare breathe against their will.

Then, at page 51, I find the following remedy:

For it is rightly contended that certain forms of property must be reserved to the state, since they carry with them an opportunity of domination too great to be left to private individuals without injury to the community at large.

I quote these observations because at times the statement has been made that when anything of this kind is brought forward it must be communism or socialism, but that does not hold true in the present instance. As I said before, the authority to which I have referred is beyond question.

The point I wanted to make was that it was thought desirable to bring about monetary reform, and people throughout the world were very uneasy. They began to study matters, and to seek out causes. They tried to determine what the causes might be, and in their studies they ran across articles such as I shall read. A report from China states:

A terrible famine is now sweeping China, news dispatches tell us, and the estimated number of natives dead or facing death ranges from 10,000,000 to 30,000,000. It is appalling to think that number of lives can be wiped out in this age of modern efficiency. But the very dimensions of the disaster in China seem to blunt our appreciation of its gravity.

The final paragraph is as follows:

Whether the situation in China to-day is at all parallel we do not know, but the words of one dispatch at least hint that the famine is not altogether a matter of absence of food. These words are that "starving parents are selling their children to gain money for food." Apparently if you have money you do not have to starve.

Of course that is in China, and hon. members may say that it is a long way from us, and that we would never be subjected to the same conditions. But to show that these difficulties are not those which only we have to face, but are common to the world, I gathered some clippings from various parts of the world to indicate that these conditions exist not only in Canada but elsewhere. This is another article from outside which may be of interest to hon. members. I quote the following from the New Era of Sydney:

Helensburgh, N.S.W. miners will carry their own dead to the local cemetery. The little south coast mining community is impoverished. Helensburgh mine once supported 400 coal miners. There have been no earnings for some months, and the question of burial costs has become important. The miners' lodge has decided that a tradesman be commissioned to make coffins for them, as they are required. There will be no hearse; no plumes.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must remind the hon. member that what he has just been quoting has nothing to do with the resolution under discussion.

Mr. PELLETIER: I certainly must abide by your decision, Mr. Chairman, but the question before us has to do with monetary reform, and that may be considered in connection with banking. If we are to be prevented from expressing our views on the subject I do not know how we can cooperate in bettering financial conditions in Canada. I noticed yesterday that other hon. members were allowed a great deal of latitude, and I do not believe I should be discriminated against in that respect. However I wish simply to finish the quotation. It reads:

The miners will bear the caskets—

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must not proceed with the article.

Mr. PELLETIER: Then it will not be possible to continue quoting the articles I have before me. The point I wish to make is that I can gather information from around the world, not only from Canada, to show that the money question is at the bottom of our trouble. To come back to our own country, let me say that not long ago conditions in Canada became so bad that the people began to ask questions. The time arrived when they were expected to elect some representatives to the federal House of Commons in order to fight our battle for survival. During the campaign the people were given many promises by the various parties desiring to carry out the will of the people. For example, I have before me a pamphlet used in the provincial campaign, and headed: Alberta's Provincial Liberal Leader. There are some 644 promises contained in the pamphlet and it is hard to locate the one dealing with monetary reform, but here it is:

Usury once in control will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile.

Of course that is a Liberal platform. In order to prevent my being accused of bringing provincial matters into the debate I have carefully preserved another pamphlet headed: The Central Bank. It reads:

Where Liberalism stands as against the other political parties. Issued by the National Liberal Federation of Canada, 114 Wellington street, Ottawa.

This pamphlet deals entirely with the central bank, so in reading it I cannot possibly be out of order. After a full discussion of financial policies in Canada I find that the last sentence reads as follows:

Liberalism therefore stands for the public control of the issue of national currency and credit through a properly constituted national central bank that will issue currency and credit not for private gain but in terms of public need.

Of course that is a worthy procedure, and I would be prepared to support anything of the kind at any time.

The resolution before us to-day states:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Bank of Canada Act so as to increase the capital stock of the bank, to provide that certain shares thereof shall be purchased by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund in order to assure ownership of a majority of the shares by the government, to increase the number of directors, and to provide for election and appointment of directors in such manner as to assure voting control of the board by directors appointed by the government.

The resolution says nothing at all about the issue of "currency and credit not for private gain but in terms of public need." We know that throughout Canada one of the chief planks of the Liberal platform was the question of monetary reform. Throughout western Canada the utterances of certain members of the Liberal party were held up as an indication of what that party would do for the Canadian people. It has promised to fight international finance, to fight usury and to stop a condition whereby the wages of money are greater than the wages of man. The people placed the present government in office, and at the present time they have no opportunity of telling us how they feel about the matter. They cannot tell us the way they feel about the manner in which their hopes are being smashed. But we can get some idea of what is happening when we read what is written in some publications. In quoting from the Financial Post of March 21, 1936, I do not believe it can be urged that I am quoting from a social credit or communistic authority. It does not hold, represent or speak for radical views, but this is what it has to say:

With the announcement of the government's legislation to "nationalize" the Bank of Canada, all danger or any important change in the existing set-up of this institution evaporates.

The resolution closely follows forecasts made in The Post. The method of liquidating the Liberal party's campaign pledge to be followed is to increase the capital stock of the bank to a point where the government will own a majority of the shares. The present shareholders will not be disturbed and the only difference that will occur in the management will be the addition of government appointed directors.

To all practical purposes, the government's legislation is eye-wash, and it is a safe forecast that opposition groups in parliament who believe in outright nationalization will easily identify it as such.

I hope that members of the Liberal party who campaigned in western Canada on the platform of monetary reform will rise and protest against the government's present method of carrying out the promises which they made. There is the question as it is raised by the Financial Post.

We were criticized not very long ago for saying that there was no such thing as a money power, but as I listened to the Minister of Finance when bringing down the resolution, I heard him suggest that a money power certainly does exist, and that this legislation was one of the ways in which he meant to get control of that money power.

What do London financiers think of this proposal of the government? I quote from the Evening Citizen's London News Bureau, a dispatch from London, dated March 23, 1936:

Bankers and financiers in London express no anxiety at Premier Mackenzie King's proposal for state control of Canada's new central bank.

"It should not be assumed," says the financial editor of the Times, expressing the opinion of "The City," to-day, "that government ownership either in Canada or New Zealand will bring about any change of real importance. It is probably true that in neither country has the government any intention of making any revolutionary change in banking or monetary policy."

The Times financial editor, however, sees danger if at a future date a political party —obviously the social credit party is meant— should obtain power to "pursue some dangerous monetary experiment."

So the big financial people, those about whom we heard so much in the Liberal campaign in western Canada, have absolutely nothing to fear, according to their own expressed opinions, from this policy of the government.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) told us yesterday that he did not promise sweeping reforms to the people of Canada, and yet I hope I shall be allowed to offer him my sympathies for I realize how deeply hurt he must now feel knowing that the people of Canada expected more in the way of monetary reform than he is offering us in this legislation.

But if it is out of place for me to offer my sympathies I might be allowed, now that the time is ripe, to offer some constructive suggestions in relation to our attitude towards a central bank. But first it should be noted that monetary reform was before the Canadian people long before the elections of last October. It will be observed from newspaper reports, however, that at the recent convention of the Twentieth Century Liberal Association the subject of monetary reform was conspicuous by its absence. Perhaps that was not the time to talk monetary reform. I assume the time will be three or four years hence.

The social credit group in this house have claimed that the Bank of Canada should, apart from its other functions, be used to perform three things: First, to measure and report upon the national credit; second, to determine the amount of financial credit to be used for the just price discount; and, third, to issue a national dividend. The social credit group has been criticized considerably over the national dividend, and therefore I cannot lose this opportunity to explain to the committee how closely related a national dividend is to the Bank of Canada.

At the outset we say that the primary thing in the mind of every single individual, and of every member of this house, of everyone no matter who or where he is, is the desire to survive, and we know that survival to-day depends upon what we call purchasing power. If we place financial values higher than human values, we are refusing to recognize that inherent right of the individual. It is distasteful to be told that one places financial values above human values, but in the face of what we see we cannot say anything else. We must recognize that life is the primary thing; otherwise we must say that financial values are higher than human values.

What can be so wrong or unreasonable about this proposal and desire to guarantee a certain economic security to individuals? It seems to me that we are sent here for that very purpose, in order to give every individual in Canada a better chance to survive in this battle which they are fighting. It remains, then, only a question of technical details how this is to be done. Let us not lose sight of the main point, which is that we must guarantee to every individual that thing which life itself should be sufficient to guarantee to him.

First of all, we shall have to realize that the old idea of work and wages being sufficient to provide one with purchasing power and a livelihood is something of the past. That may sound humorous to certain hon. members who are laughing at the present time. It is quite easy to laugh when everybody else is laughing, but it might not be so easy when one is left laughing alone, and that day is certainly coming. It cannot much longer be put off from day to day. We seek to displace that purchasing power which we give out in the form of wages, so we must always recognize that the first claim upon goods is not work or worth or anything else but it is life. Money, after all, should be used simply as a method of distributing goods. Life has the first claim upon money. What is so wrong with proposing to give to all people, regardless of class or any other distinction, this guarantee which will mean economic independence to all our Canadian citizens? After all, economic independence is the one thing which must come. I do not see any reason why, simply because someone possesses money or holds the whip-hand over us, we should be made the slave of his will or desire in order to obtain that portion of purchasing power which is absolutely necessary in order to survive. Until the day comes when we recognize this claim of the individual as his human right we shall make little progress.

I was glad to see the Minister of Finance, when he brought down this resolution, do one thing which I am sure many people will thank him for. It has been the impression of a great many people in Canada that the Liberal party stood for monetary reform, but now those who expected any advance in monetary reform from the Liberal party will know they cannot expect it from that party, and the field of their search is correspondingly narrowed. They must be indebted to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. PELLETIER: Certainly.

Mr. DUNNING: A few minutes ago my hon. friend made what he called three constructive suggestions. He spoke very quickly and I did not catch their full purport, but I gather they were intended to be suggestions as to how the Bank of Canada as contemplated by this resolution should function. I wish he would develop and explain those three suggestions, showing how they would work and in what manner we should proceed to do in this parliament what he suggests.

Mr. PELLETIER: If I attempted to develop them and at the same time tried to keep myself to what the resolution proposes I would not get very far because the resolution does not propose very much.

Mr. DUNNING: There were three suggestions.

Mr. PELLETIER: I will go over them again. The first is to measure and report upon the national credit.

Mr. DUNNING: What is that?

Mr. PELLETIER: In passing, I may say that I have on the order paper a resolution which calls for the establishment in Canada of an agency which would measure the productive capacity of the country. That is what I am referring to—to measure and report upon the national credit in relation to the national productive capacity of the dominion as a whole. The second is to determine the amount of financial credit to be used for the just price discount.

Mr. DUNNING: What is that?

Mr. PELLETIER: If, after we have determined the total amount of production, it is found that we can consume only 75 per cent of production, we shall then declare a just price discount of 25 per cent in order to reduce the price of goods so that the money in existence can take care of the total amount of production in any one cycle. The third is the issue of the national dividend. I am sure that I shall not have an opportunity of developing the resolution I have on the order paper, and thereby going a long way towards explaining the points I have been making. The references I have given are available to all hon. members. In closing I want to make this point: Until we recognize that life is the primary consideration and has a claim upon us before money, I see little hope for improvement in Canada.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 40, respecting the St Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company—Mr. Chevrier (Stormont).

Bill No. 41, respecting the Ottawa and New York Railway Company—Mr. Chevrier (Stormont).

THOUSAND ISLANDS BRIDGE COMPANY

The house again in committee on Bill No. 59, respecting Thousand Islands Bridge Company—Mr. Stewart—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On the preamble.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Consideration of this bill in committee was postponed at the request of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps). He subsequently expressed himself as quite satisfied with regard to the point he raised, and withdrew his objection.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

PROVISIONS GOVERNING TRIAL OF YOUNG PERSONS

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of Bill No. 60, to amend the Criminal Code (trial of young persons).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this being near the end of the session, five minute speeches from now on would be, I think, in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CHURCH: I hope that it will come by the end of next week. Recommendations on behalf of this bill have been made by judicial officers. The bill relates to the trial of young persons. Under the Juvenile Delinquents Act the parents have to be notified, and the magistrate or the judge has a procedure to go through prior to and after the trial of the delinquents. My proposal is to extend these provisions, the wisdom of which in times like these has been demonstrated, to those under nineteen years of age. As I stated in moving the first reading of this bill, many people who are in trouble—some among the most dangerous criminals we have—are of about that age. The class I have in mind, however, is the high school element that are out of work through no fault of their own, and many of whose parents are on relief. As a result they go to new Ontario, where, having no references, they cannot get a job. I have before me a letter from a commercial traveller who lives in the riding of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey). My correspondent, who is a reputable commercial man, upon a recent trip through new Ontario visited Sudbury, Kirkland Lake, Timmins and other mining centres. "At Kirkland Lake," he states, "twenty Canadian young men were locked up and given eight days in gaol on vagrancy charges. These boys were only looking for work. And we call this a free country. Let any young Canadian go to one of the ore mining centres and seek work and see what he will get."

Many children who are to-day in factories should be in school, and nearly all the young offenders come from poverty stricken homes, where the father is out of work. They have never had a real chance. Many of them are handicapped since birth through insufficient food and clothing; too often, when the father is on relief, the eldest boy leaves home and goes to new Ontario or other places, and the only charge that can be laid against him is that he cannot get work. Section 238, the vagrancy section of the criminal code, states:

> Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant who,—
> (a) not having any visible means of subsistence, is found wandering abroad or lodging in any barn or outhouse, et cetera.

Lads like these are the forgotten element under the constitution.

By this bill I do not intend to place any additional expense upon the public. As I said in moving first reading, in the larger cities there are many bodies such as the Lions Club, the Big Brother movement, the Big Sister movement and so on, all engaged in helping in this work and willing to help still more. Right here in the city of Ottawa we have the Lions Club, which has been helping in this work for some time past. I repeat that the parents or other next of kin should be notified. When these children get into trouble they do not want their parents notified, and in many cases as a result wind up serving a term in gaol, and come out with that stigma attached to them. I do not want to criticize the magistrates, but only a couple of weeks ago two of these young fellows were arrested in New Toronto. They were eighteen years of age, and when the magistrate said, "Supposing I give you three months in the reformatory," one of them replied, "It doesn't matter to me." The magistrate said: "So you've reached the indifferent stage. I don't wonder at it. Where is your home?" The boys replied that their home originally had been in Winnipeg but that they had been just roaming around for the last four years. Accepting their statement that they had never been in trouble before, the magistrate gave them ten days each. The only complaint against them was that they were trying to get work, and that is the sort of thing that goes on. Many of these people are sent down without even being heard. It is not the fault of the magistrates; it is the system that is to blame. All I ask is that when the minister considers the amendments to the criminal code he should also consider extending the provisions of the Juvenile Delinquents Act to those under nineteen years of age, especially those of the high school population. Only the other day at the Union station in Toronto —and I saw this myself when the train was about to leave for Ottawa in the morning— twenty-one of these young people were brought back from new Ontario, some of them were charged with vagrancy and all being brought to the Guelph reformatory because there was no room for them in the gaols in northern Ontario. Their only crime was that they could not find jobs. After checking up on the stories of some of these cases of young people the police often find that they had never been in trouble before, but they simply could not get work.

I do not ask anything out of the way. I believe this problem should be dealt with as it is in England to-day, where many of the prisons have been closed. This problem has been brought about very largely by the depression. I have before me the blue book of the Inspector of Prisons for the province of Ontario which shows that these conditions are largely due to the depression, and when the depression is over no doubt they will vanish. But the state has a duty to give these youths a fair trial, and if they are not represented by counsel there are in the large centres service clubs that could take care of such matters. Many lawyers are doing such work for nothing, and I only ask the minister to look into this matter. If he can give it any attention when the criminal code is being amended I hope he will do so, because I know some of these high school children of the city of Toronto who have got into trouble through no fault of their own; they were only looking for work in new Ontario and other places.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has suggested that this matter should be considered and a decision rendered before the introduction of the general bill concerning the criminal code, but only this afternoon I heard him complain that we were asking too much when we took time to study things and did not reach decisions. I have reached a decision as far as this bill is concerned; I am compelled to oppose it and to ask that it should not pass.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the provisions of the Juvenile Delinquents Act are the result of very careful work and deliberations on the part of the child welfare council, which is composed of philanthropic people all over Canada who are deeply interested in the work. Some of the members of that council are magistrates who have had long experience with regard to the procedure concerning children. I was minister in charge of the act when it was put through some years ago, after a meeting of that council, and I would hesitate to change some of the important provisions of that act merely because my hon. friend thinks they should be changed. According to this act a child is defined as follows:

"Child" means any boy or girl apparently or actually under the age of sixteen years: provided, that in any province or provinces as to which the governor in council by proclamation has directed or may hereafter direct, "child" means any boy or girl apparently or actually under the age of eighteen years: provided further, that any such proclamation may apply either to boys only or to girls only or to both boys and girls.

Three provinces, British Columbia, Manitoba and Alberta, by resolution of their governments have asked that the governor in council should raise the age to eighteen, so in those provinces when boys or girls under eighteen years of age are arrested they are classed as juvenile delinquents under the act and treated in that special way. This request has not been made by the other provinces; indeed, in at least one province the lieutenant governor in council has asked that there should be no change as far as that province is concerned. Various bodies in some of the provinces have asked that the age should be raised to eighteen, but the federal government has always required that this request should be made by the governmental authorities of the province, by the lieutenant governor in council. So in three of the provinces at least the notices, which my hon. friend would require to be given to the parents, are given as far as children under eighteen years of age are concerned.

My hon. friend wants the provisions of section 10 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which requires notice to be given to the parents or to friends of the parents before a juvenile delinquent is tried, to apply to children between the ages of sixteen and nineteen, and in the second place his bill demands that counsel should be appointed by the court to defend such juvenile delinquents. As I have said, with respect to the first provision, in three provinces it would not be needed, because there the age has been raised to eighteen. As far as the other provinces are concerned I believe this would have the effect of delaying the trials of those nineteen years of age or under, especially when there are no relatives in the city or town where they have been arrested and where their trial will be held. If notice should be sent to relatives elsewhere and an investigation should be carried on to find them, I do not think it would be in the interests of justice or even of the boys themselves that their trial should be delayed as long as would be required for that purpose. When the relatives are in the city where the trial takes place it must be exceptional if they do not know of or are not made acquainted with the troubles in which their children are involved.

I do not agree with the statement of my hon. friend, which is also in the explanatory note attached to his bill, that many young people are being sent to gaol in a mechanical way. I think that is a terrible indictment of Canadian courts, and one that is neither fair nor justified. It is certainly not in accordance with any reports received by the Department of Justice. On the contrary I believe that our judges everywhere take special care when the delinquents who are brought before them are young people. Surely my hon. friend could not substantiate that charge against the courts of Canada, that they are simply throwing away boys and girls, sending them to gaol mechanically without proper trial.

If we are to raise the age under which boys and girls are to be considered as children and come under the provisions of the Juvenile Delinquents Act I think this should be done with the cooperation of the provinces. The provinces are more directly interested in this matter. The age limit as at present set is the limit asked for by the child welfare council, and before any change is made I would like to have their views about it, as well as the views of the provinces.

With regard to the proposal that counsel should be supplied for the defence of juvenile delinquents, and even those who are no longer juvenile but under the age of nineteen, that would constitute a considerable change and, if it were made, surely a demand would follow that this should be done in all cases. If it is the provinces that would have to pay for the defending counsel we should at least consult with them before putting that provision into our statutes. The administration of justice is under provincial jurisdiction. If my hon. friend has in mind that this should be an expense of the dominion government, that might be considered, but I think his bill would be ultra vires as far as that goes because it would be a charge on the treasury of the country and so my hon. friend would have no right to introduce such a bill.

On the whole, in spite of all that is said and suggested in the introduction of this bill, I think Canadian justice is not so bad, and many things that have been said are not justified. The courts of the country take great care when it comes to the trial of young people. I do not think the change suggested by this bill is necessitated by any condition which exists at the present time. Therefore, as I said, I am sorry, but I do not feel justified in accepting this bill, and I oppose its second reading.

Motion (Mr. Church) negatived on division.

BANK OF CANADA

MAJORITY CONTROL BY GOVERNMENT OF CAPITAL STOCK AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS

The house resumed consideration in committee of the proposed resolution with respect to the Bank of Canada—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Chairman, before I proceed to a discussion of the features of the resolution of which I wish to speak, I want to correct some statements that were made this afternoon by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White). If I recall his remarks correctly he suggested, first, that there is an abundance of money available and that there is no shortage of funds for all proper needs of the public. In support of that extraordinary statement he suggested as evidence the fact that there is something over $2,000,000,000 of bank deposits and less than $1,000,000,000 of current loans, and while he did not say so, the inference was left that apparently there are bank deposits available for financing Canadian activities to the extent of roughly $1,500,000,000.

May I place on record the actual facts as at the end of 1935. Our bank deposits consisted of the following items: Deposits in foreign countries, $348,000,000; current accounts, that is accounts on which cheques may be drawn every day in the transaction of the commerce of the country and upon which the banks do not pay any interest because they do not treat them as loanable deposits, $568,000,000; time or savings accounts, which are withdrawable only on notice to the banks, and upon which the banks pay interest, $1,445,000,000. As against those savings bank deposits the banks had out current loans of $828,000,000, and in addition to that they had advanced on account of national, provincial, municipal, railway loans and other public securities the sum of $1,175,000,000. Besides that there were call loans outstanding totalling $82,000,000, making a total of investments by the banks in Canada of $2,085,000,000. If we subtract these savings deposits from the amount the banks had actually invested in that type of security we find that the banks had invested $640,000,000 more than the total of savings deposits.

But that does not tell the whole story. In addition to the $2,085,000,000 invested in the type of loan and security I have mentioned, the other investments of the chartered banks totalled $900,000,000. As a matter of fact, to-day the total volume of our bank credit currency, our bank note currency, our Bank of Canada currency and our metal currency is roughly about 50 per cent below where it would be had the same ratio of advancement been sustained from 1915 to 1935 that had obtained from 1867 to 1915. Since 1918 there has been a steady decrease in the total volume of money available for the Canadian people. The hon. member went a little further and suggested that when Reginald McKenna, not only a banker but a man who for many years was one of the most distinguished chancellors of the exchequer who had ever graced the British House of Commons, said that the banks make deposits by calling bank loans deposits he was talking utter nonsense. Not only has that distinguished statesman and banker in England made that statement, but it is recorded as the unanimous conclusion of the British Macmillan commission, the report of which has been properly described by Sir Josiah Stamp as the outstanding book on modern practical monetary and political economy. Not only have the Macmillan commission confirmed the statement, but similar statements have been made by Carl Snyder possibly one of the most distinguished economists and statisticians in the employ of the federal reserve banking system. It has recently been made definitely by one who graces the high position of chairman of the board of governors of the federal reserve system of the United States, Mr. Marriner Eccles. In addition to that group of distinguished authorities, the facts speak for themselves.

I have pointed out to the committee that to-day there are so-called bank deposits in Canada totalling $2,361,000,000, and deducting the amount of foreign deposits, or deposits in branches of Canadian banks operating abroad, the amount is something over $2,000,000,000. How much money have we in Canada? We have created by law under the Currency Act metal coin to the value of $39,000,000. We have bills issued by the Bank of Canada under the authority of the Bank of Canada Act, amounting to $99,000,000; we have bank bills, issued under the Bank Act by chartered banks, amounting to $135,000,000, and we have foreign currency in the possession of our Canadian banks, totalling $21,000,000. In all, the entire money wealth of Canada is $294,000,000. If we take that $294,000,000 from the $2,361,000,000 the bankers claim they have on deposit, we have the amount of bank deposits in excess of the total money in issue and in circulation in this dominion.

In other words the bankers have created, in excess of the money that exists in the dominion, bank deposits to a total of $2,067,000,000. How was that money created? It was created by the simple process which modern banking practice has adopted of substituting bank credit created by a bookkeeping system, and issued as money fictitiously called bank deposits—mere statements of accounts which are promises to pay, money which does not exist in the country and which the banker cannot meet if he is ever called upon to meet it. I do not know if anybody else can do that kind of thing without going to the penitentiary. I challenge the government or the Department of Justice to find in our currency or banking legislation a single authority or provision which sanctions the principle that our chartered banks are following, namely that of trading short in money. I am inclined to the opinion—and I speak not only as a member of parliament but as a lawyer who has given some little time and thought to this subject—that this is the greatest unchallenged swindle and vicious exploitation of the egregious principle of trading short that is to be found in any department of the mad activities inspired by the pursuit of profit. I was amused when the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount spoke sympathetically about the capacity of banking institutions to earn profits. I have checked the figures and I find that in 1934, on a capital investment of $144,000,000, the banks made an actual profit of $18,000,000 which figures out roughly to 12 per cent—not bad for a depression year. But that was not all. That profit was paid out by the Bank of Montreal at the rate of 8 per cent, a decrease from 1930 when they paid 14 per cent. The other banks ranged from 6 per cent to 12 per cent, but the average stood at about 12 per cent; then they put aside as rest account an amount almost as great. Last year, in 1935, their profits were a little better, and the preliminary dividend paid by the Bank of Montreal in the first quarter of this year, 1936, is, I believe, four per cent, indicating that the depression is not going to put our banks out of business so far as taking care of themselves is concerned, because with that profit and with the reduction in the interest rate on deposits probably we shall see our banks weather the storm.

I am sorry that I was not in the house yesterday to listen to the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), but I should like to put part of his statement on the record to interpret what I think this resolution really means. As reported at page 3257 of Hansard, he said:

> I should like now to discuss the factors which have led the government to propose amendments to the constitution of the bank providing for a predominant interest by the public in the ownership and also voting control of the bank. In the first place, the fundamental consideration is that the primary function of a central bank is to regulate the volume of currency and credit in use, and this is so vital a national function that it should not be left to the control of private interests. The issue of currency has always been regarded as a prerogative of the crown. It ic true that in all modern countries during the growth and development of banking practice, the use of bank notes, and particularly of cheques drawn against bank deposits, has come largely to supplant in the business world the use of hand to hand currencies. The significance of this amazing development of bank credits as the chief form of purchasing power was not at first perceived, and it is only in comparatively recent times that governmental authorities and monetary experts—and indeed central bankers themselves—have come to realize that the primary function of a central bank was not to make loans to a necessitous government or to provide other banking services but rather to control the volume of credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation.

Well, if that is the power of the central bank it means that in that bank's authority is the right to control the economic progress of the people of the nation, which means that in that bank is vested control over the government's right to set and maintain an advancing standard of living for the people. The hon. Minister of Finance went on:

Mr. DUNNING: Consciously.

Mr. McGEER: Consciously, not conscientiously. I am glad to have that correction because I am sure they would not do it conscientiously. I do not blame the minister for correcting that slip. He went on:

> —and which therefore will consciously and deliberately set influences to work which will affect the price level as well as the level of production, trade and employment. Surely this is too vital a function to leave in the hands of a privately controlled institution.

Well, it has been there for some time, and we know something about the state of the price level and about trade and economic conditions and the state of unemployment in the nation. He went on:

> If this function is to be performed at all it should only be by an institution under adequate government control. This is my main point, Mr. Chairman; in fact it is the sum and substance of the whole matter.

A little later on, carrying the same line of reasoning right to the issue of national policy, he quoted with approval the expressions of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in this wise:

I am however, discussing the question of control of policy, and I do say that with respect to policies, whether they relate to trade, to shipping, to marketing, to finance, to defence, or to any other phase of a country's economy, those policies, if they are the expression of view of a government representative of the people, should be capable of being carried out without interference from any institution whatever.

Then in the course of the debate, as reported at page 3298 of Hansard, this quotation from the Prime Minister was read:

The Liberal party believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need. A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people; and also to deal with problems of international commerce and exchange.

And this discussion followed:

Mr. Mackenzie King: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Douglas: There is nothing wrong with it. What we are asking for now is legislation to implement that.

Mr. Dunning: It is before the committee.

If that is true, no one can have any fault to find with the proposed resolution, but I cannot bring myself to believe that the adoption of the principle of a partly privately owned, partly publicly owned, Bank of Canada is in conformity with the declared acknowledgment that the bank controls the economic life of the nation and has the power to regulate its currency and credit, or that it is not vesting in this Bank of Canada a power which will enable it, if it wills, to interfere with the government in matters of national policy.

Let me put the matter to the committee on a plain, simple arithmetical basis. We now meet a situation where it is proposed to continue five million dollars' worth of shareholders in the Bank of Canada. They are to have the right to vote seven votes, through their representatives on the board of directors. The government vests its authority in a governor and deputy governor and gives four of its directors double voting power, or eight votes. Very well. Let us assume that three of the directors appointed by the government decide to vote with the seven directors representing the shareholders, and who can guarantee in face of the argument presented by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe) for the removal of the Canadian National Railway trustees, that the appointees of this government are going to conform with the wishes of the government and that they are not going to conform with the wishes of five million dollars' worth of shareholders?

How far then are we going to carry out the promises that were made, absolutely, not assurances that were given as a mere idle message to the people in the heat of a campaign, but promises that were recorded upon the pages of parliamentary history in the House of Commons by the Liberal party as it made its stand before it went to the last election in its appeal to the electorate? Of course, I feel strongly on this issue. I may have been over-optimistic; I may have been unwarrantably enthusiastic in my conclusion that Liberalism was going to establish, over the oligarchy of money power that long had ruled this and other countries, the supreme sovereignty of parliament and of democracy by restoring to parliament the constitutional right, yes, may I go further and say, the constitutional duty to create the currency and credit media of exchange which were necessary to sustain government and the progress of humanity. I may have been over-optimistic in my belief that the day was going to dawn when Liberalism would usher in an era when mankind in this country would be emancipated from the slavery of debt and from the bondage of usury. And I do not believe that that promise is being fulfilled.

Now, may I say a word by way of reminder, because I want to warn the government and the Liberal party to-day that if I am right in my conclusions as to the way in which the public has interpreted these promises that were made while the government was in opposition, and that were made as a pledge before the election, if they are not fulfilled then it may be that the Liberal party is placing its footsteps on that trail of broken promises which leads not only through the valley of humiliation but down deep into the abysmal depths of eternal oblivion.

Now I may be pardoned if for a moment I refer to a distinguished chancellor of the exchequer who went through the experience of restoring the gold standard money system to Great Britain. When the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, standing in his place as Chancellor of the British Exchequer in 1925, recommended the restoration of the very kind of system which the Bank of Canada Act has adopted, and promised the people of Great Britain the security which it offered, on the assurance that every expert commission and every authoritative source of administration worth listening to had declared for the necessity of returning to the gold standard, he did, of course, enter the valley of oblivion and, in his case, not without very much humiliation, because he bobbed up in the British House of Commons in 1936 with probably one of the most profound acknowledgments of imperfect action, which had been corrected by time, that had ever been made. In 1936 he says:

Great Britain has shaken herself free from the Gladstonian structure and tradition of finance. Now, he said, we are a protectionist nation with a substantial tariff, which we should no doubt raise higher as the years go by. The gold standard was not only dead, but had been relegated for a long period to purgatory. We have no sinking fund except a small fortuitous balance of the last year's surplus. We have dealt with the American debt liability in a manner which nobody would have tolerated in the years when I was chancellor.

A significant feature of Mr. Churchill's address will be found, I think, in the fact that he acknowledges that under the direction of the classical economy and orthodox finance of the nineteenth century his 1925 policy of deflation, which I venture to say is being more or less carried out by this type of legislation and by our own budget this year, a budget balanced through reduction in public expenditure and increased taxation, brought England to disaster. To save herself she was compelled to resort to managed currency, industrial bonuses, protection of home industry, regulation of trade and commerce, public works and social services; and in fact, on his authority—and no one is in a better position to speak than he is—the way to recovery is to be found, first, in the abandonment of the classical, orthodox school of economy and finance of the Victorian era, and, second, in the adoption of a policy based upon all that has been denounced in the past as unsound. He added this touch, which I think is interesting: After relegating the gold standard and orthodox, classical economists to the place in hell from which they came, and wholly justifying the complete repudiation of the ideas of that classical, orthodox economy and finance, which he formerly championed, he said:

All those rules by which chancellors of every party, except in war time, were rigidly bound, have now been swept away. How former chancellors would stare, if what has been done could all be explained to them, he said, as he blandly referred to himself as "the last orthodox chancellor of the Victorian epoch." Amidst cheers and laughter he appealed to the committee "to recognize me as the last of the Mohicans."

I am afraid that Mr. Churchill cannot have that privilege, because apparently the effect of the retreats in the Ottawa valley, which I believe was not altogether a land of the Mohicans but rather a land of the Iroquois, has been to produce another chancellor, a chancellor of the Canadian exchequer, who has really stuck solidly by the thing which brought Churchill to disaster in 1925.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will permit me to say that I have not at any time advocated what Mr. Churchill did in 1925, which was to return to the old gold standard. My hon. friend should not accuse me of that. I have never been guilty of it on any occasion, for I do not believe it would be a good policy.

Mr. McGEER: I am glad to have my hon. friend's explanation of that.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not an explanation; it is a straight denial which I expect my hon. friend to accept.

Mr. McGEER: No, because Churchill never advocated a return to the old-fashioned gold standard. He put Great Britain upon exactly the same basis that the Bank of Canada Act has placed the Dominion of Canada to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. McGEER: Read your Bank of Canada Act. Let us see what Churchill said in 1925. I expected this. He said:

During the late administration, late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Snowden) appointed a committee of experts and high authorities to examine into the question of the amalgamation of the treasury and the Bank of England note issues.

He goes over the list of these experts and says that His Majesty's government intends to follow the report of the committee.

We thus resume our international position as a gold standard country. That is an important event, but I hasten to add a qualification. Returning to the international gold standard does not mean that we are going to issue gold coinage. That is quite unnecessary for the purpose of the gold standard, and is out of the question in present circumstances. It would be an unwarrantable extravagance which our present financial stringency by no means allows us to indulge in. Indeed, I must appeal to all classes in the public interest to continue to use notes and to make no change in the habits and practices they have become used to for the last ten years. The practice of the last ten years has protected the Bank of England and other banks against any appreciable demand for sovereigns or half sovereigns. But now that we are returning publicly to the gold standard in international matters with a free export gold, I feel that it will be better for us to regularize what has been our practice by legislation. I shall therefore propose to introduce a bill which, among other things, will provide the following:

First. That until otherwise provided by proclamation the Bank of England and treasury notes will be convertible into coin only at the option of the Bank of England.

Secondly. That the right to tender bullion to the mint to be coined shall be confined in the future by law, as it has long been confined in practice, to the Bank of England.

With these qualifications our standard under the Bank of Canada Act is identical.

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all.

Mr. MeGEER: Parliament has, of course, by legislation suspended, under the sanctions which are contained in the Bank of Canada Act, formerly contained in the Finance Act, the right of people to secure gold without a licence. Parliament has also denied the right to hold gold as a private privilege in Canada. But neither of these rights existed in 1925 or during Mr. Churchill's tenure of office as Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right to export gold was lost in 1914. The right to demand gold was lost in 1914, and no provision was ever brought back that established that right as an inherent privilege.

BANK OF CANADA

MAJORITY CONTROL BY GOVERNMENT OF CAPITAL STOCK AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS

The house resumed consideration in committee of the proposed resolution with respect to the Bank of Canada—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. McGEER: The main point the committee is considering is not merely a change in the form of ownership of the stock of the Bank of Canada. That is simply incidental to the establishment of control over the creation and issue of the currency needs of both government and people in the Dominion of Canada. The issue that came up in the last election campaign, and that I think was stressed more than anything else, was a plain and simple one: Shall parliament delegate its power to create by law and put into circulation the currency and credit which constitute the media of the exchange needs of both government and people, and issue the currency and credit media of exchange in terms of public need, or shall they be subject to the limitation of being issued in terms of private gain. That issue is fundamental to the establishment of a new era of ordered progress. If we fail to meet our promise to the electors of Canada in that regard we shall fail to fulfil a promise which amounted to a guarantee to bring about a fundamental change in the practical political economy that governed parliament in the past, under which social and economic security disappeared and poverty and destitution became the order of the day after education and science had created circumstances under which we should have looked forward to unbounded progress and prosperity.

I do not know that there is any need to hurry with a matter so fundamentally important to the well-being of future generations. To-day we are carrying a debt load of nine and a half billion dollars created under the private money system which has persistently issued currency and credit in terms of private gain. If we are going to make a change that is going to save humanity from an appalling calamity, then we as a parliament should take time to give full and mature consideration to this matter. I am going to suggest to the government that it is unfortunate that a measure of such great importance should have been introduced in what are now recognized as the closing days of this session of parliament, and I am going to ask the government to accept the following amendment, which is moved by myself and seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens):

That this resolution be referred to a select committee of parliament consisting of six members of the senate and seven members of the House of Commons, and that such committee shall be empowered to investigate all matters relating to currency and credit, banking, finance and commerce and to prepare and present to parliament for its consideration at its next sitting a bill that will bring about the establishment of a properly constituted central bank through which shall be performed the functions of rediscount and the control of currency issue in terms of public need, not possible private gain, and through which the supply of currency and credit shall be determined in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people.

Of course I know it is easy to say that in connection with these issues one should appreciate the plight of the government; that public opinion is not prepared for fundamental changes; that there may be difficulties in the Senate and even in the House of Commons. But one thing is certain; it is that the Liberal members of this house and the electorate throughout the Dominion of Canada have a right to know why the fulsome promises made by the then opposition when it opposed this Bank of Canada Act, and made to the electorate in connection with the establishment of a national central bank, properly constituted, that would be publicly owned and publicly operated, are now to be altered to mean a central bank partly owned by the public and partly owned privately, under which a hundred thousand $50 subscribers are given a preferred security at the rate of 4½ per cent. By this resolution we tell these shareholders: We do not need your money and we will not let you have a voice in the management of the bank. Therefore all this resolution is doing, so far as the privately owned part of that banking institution is concerned, is creating a preference for a few on a 4½ per cent investment basis, and establishing a power and an authority that may be in a position to frustrate the government in the establishment and maintenance of national policy.

Believing as I sincerely do that this measure does not fulfil the fundamental promise that was made and that this government and the Liberal members of the house were elected to fulfil, I think time for consideration would be advisable, and I am sure that after due and proper consideration a greater change would be brought about in the right of the nation to control the issue of currency and credit than is contemplated in the legislation to be founded on this resolution.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not know whether I should raise a point of order, but I would like to call to your attention, Mr. Chairman, the fact that this resolution is now being considered in committee of the whole. We are not sitting as the house; we are a delegated body of the house. I do not believe that the committee of the whole, or any committee for that matter, can delegate to another committee any matter which has been sent to it for its consideration.

Mr. STEVENS: On the point of order; it is quite competent for the house sitting in committee of the whole to make amendments to resolutions or bills. Then the committee of the whole reports to the house, and it is then in the hands of the house to accept or reject the report. That is done constantly. During the last five weeks the Minister of Finance has sat in his seat and handed to his colleagues I venture to say at least twenty-five amendments to resolutions.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But not appointing another committee.

Mr. STEVENS: I am talking about amendments to resolutions.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I grant that, but that is not the question I raised.

Mr. STEVENS: What I have indicated is done constantly. In this committee, sitting as a committee of the whole house, an amendment is offered; it is referred to the house as a whole for adoption or rejection. In my opinion that is in order. Of course it is easy to raise a point of order and laugh the matter off.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend has raised many in his parliamentary career, to my knowledge.

Mr. STEVENS: These are serious matters, affecting the interests of this country. The views I hold may be all wrong, but that is not the point. The point is: Is this to be a free forum or is it not? I listened last night, as I have done, to the Prime Minister speaking in the most eloquent terms of the freedom and rights of parliament, and I endorse his views on that. But the tendency to raise points of order on everything when, in fact, the control of the whole situation is in the hands of the government, is not upholding the freedom of the house. If the government do not want to accept the amendment, there is a way, the parliamentary way, the recognized way, of deciding the question, and that is to vote down the amendment. The Minister of Justice is an authority on parliamentary procedure, but he cites no rule, gives no authority, simply says that the amendment is out of order, and the chairman is then supposed to rule it out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no debate on this.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite in order. I say that this is not sound parliamentary practice. If there is a violation of a rule, let us know what the rule is; let the rule be quoted. A point of order should be based upon a rule. I protest against this method of lightly disposing of amendments which are offered in sincerity. I submit that the amendment is in order.

Mr. McGEER: The only thing that would have been necessary to meet the point suggested by the Minister of Justice would be to make the resolution read:

> That this committee recommend to the house that the bill be not introduced now but be referred to a committee of parliament.

But I appreciate the suggestion. I have said what I wanted to say about the question. If the government are not disposed to give this matter the consideration that it should receive I am not going to stand on a point of order. I put it forward with a request that the government consider its expediency. Probably the worst thing that could happen would be to have a resolution forced on the government that they were not willing to accept and then have the kind of committee that would bring in the most devastating or disastrous report.

However, what I wanted to do was to place my position on record. That is what I think should be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, may I say to the hon. member that if he had really desired the government to give this matter consideration he would have shown to the government the ordinary courtesy which every hon. member usually does when he has in mind bringing forward a motion intended for the consideration of the government, namely have said something about it in advance to some member of the government. This amendment has been proposed, at this moment, without any notification, that I am aware of, to a member of the government. The hon. member now says that his great desire is to have the government give the matter very careful consideration. I wonder if hon. members realize that this amendment is a suggestion to refer the question of the constitution of the Bank of Canada away from the consideration of the House of Commons, which it is now receiving to a select committee of parliament to be composed to begin with of six members of the Senate. If hon. members of the House of Commons wish to support a proposal of that kind I think if it is in order they should be given the opportunity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. STEVENS: Before the question is put I wish to say just a very few words. As intimated last night, it is my intention to reserve my full discussion of this matter until a later stage, that is if this amendment is not carried. In the meantime I should like to make a few remarks on the resolution as amended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point of order should be disposed of first.

Mr. STEVENS: I beg pardon; I thought it had been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN: I think it is a well known principle that the committee of the whole cannot delegate its responsibility or functions to a special committee of the house or to a standing committee of the house. I think the authority, Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure at page 529, fourth edition, covers that very well.

The committee of the whole have no power to refer a resolution to a special committee. Its functions consist in either reporting the resolution or refusing to report it. Special committees cannot accept references from the committee of the whole. For these reasons I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. STEVENS: Now, Mr. Chairman, we are back on all fours again.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is not so light as the hon. member suggested.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not suggesting that it is a light matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member did.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): The Minister of Justice a little while ago treated it as a frivolous matter. Now that we are back to the resolution I wish to make a very few observations.

It is frequently stated that the present or existing system of banking and finance, in this instance the Bank of Canada or the general banking system or the financial system of the country, is to all intents and purposes a perfect system. That is, no suggestion of change should be entertained. But I have before me a brochure issued by the bankers' association in 1923, which contains some interesting matter. It will be recalled by the committee that in 1923 or 1924, I have forgotten which year, parliament amended the Bank Act so as to inaugurate a system of inspection of banks, and for the last twelve or thirteen years a system has been in operation which is and for many years has been recognized as a highly successful one. In the utterances of the bankers' association in 1923 I find these words:

> Of all the proposed amendments to the Bank Act a system of government inspection will least stand the test of experience elsewhere and of common sense, and the plan is objectionable not from the standpoint of bankers and shareholders but of depositors who would inevitably be lulled into a false sense of security with a resultant demand upon the government when disaster occurs.

I cite that to indicate how futile and foolish is the tendency to pooh-pooh and ridicule any suggestion for change or progress. Here were the bankers who quite seriously, no doubt, declared that the proposal for bank inspection would not stand the test of experience or common sense. I was reminded of our venerable and very much beloved member from St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White) who this afternoon described as idiots those who hold that bank loans create bank deposits. He used the expression, "Who is there who would entertain such an idiotic idea?" Well, in the same brochure I find these words:

> Nearly all loans are made by credits entered upon the books of the bank, or by cheques or drafts or acceptances, and these pass into the general clearing of the community of which only resulting balances are settled in money.

As far back as 1923 we find the bankers' association giving expression to the very suggestion that some people in this session of parliament regard as foolish and idiotic.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) so ably disclosed in his observations, it is the creation of credits by the banks which in large measure account for the rise in the deposits. There is nothing fictitious, nothing mysterious about the matter. A man may go to a bank and borrow $1,000 on his own note of hand. The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount said that he might take the money and walk out. That is true; but quite likely he would pay it to some one for goods or services, and in that way the money would immediately return to the bank as deposits. What usually occurs is that the banker simply enters a credit to the individual borrowing, or if he secures his loan by the discounting of paper such as bills of exchange, notes of hand and so on, they are simply entered to his credit in the bank, and cheques issued against them.

I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that we might very well have a new column in bank annual or monthly statements showing the extent to which general deposits are accountable by loans. As a matter of fact a very substantial portion of general bank deposits—I am not speaking of savings deposits —are created in that way. There is no question about it. I remember reading a speech of one of the—

Mr. DUNNING: I never denied it.

Mr. STEVENS: It was denied this afternoon, and ridiculed. We were asked who would be such idiots as to believe it.

Mr. DUNNING: I thought the hon. member was referring to something I had said.

Mr. STEVENS: No; I do not think the minister would make such a statement. I cite that because what I am seeking to impress upon the committee is this: The fact that we are asking for progress and for changes in the law does not indicate any disregard for stability. There is too great a tendency to suggest that any proposal of the kind is an invasion of the stability of our banking or financial system. I do not intend to proceed at greater length this evening, because when the bill is introduced I shall deal with the matter more generally and at greater length.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Chairman, as I said a few days ago, it is all very well for us to call this a free parliament, but unless a member is permitted to speak upon a resolution and if necessary to divide the house, parliament is not free and shows the need of constitutional and parliamentary reform. The present resolution is just what I would expect from the present government. From Vancouver to Halifax they have expressed different policies concerning the Bank of Canada. We know and have heard what the government's policy was in the Pacific province. A few days ago we heard what it was in Quebec and the maritimes, and notwithstanding what the Prime Minister may say I can tell the committee what it was in Ontario. In that province the policy of the government was one of straight public ownership; there is no doubt about that. They were going to get money from the bank to build breakwaters and harbours at the city of Toronto and elsewhere. Members of the Senate and House of Commons came to that city and indicated that they were going to use the Bank of Canada not only for ordinary banking purposes but for many other purposes. As I have said, the policy in each province was different. If I were asked my opinion I would say that the last state of the Bank of Canada is going to be worse than the first under this government. To-day the people of Canada are wondering what is going to become of the Bank of Canada. We spent a large amount of money on a royal commission in 1933, but before the bank has been functioning a year we turn the whole thing upside down and go back to where we were. I say, "God save the bank from its friends." In my humble opinion it will be a glorified Home Bank. As I said before, the government has got us into hot water in connection with the British North America Act, and I suggest that it would have been much better to leave the bank alone for a year or two in order to see how it would function.

A royal commission was appointed, but this resolution turns the report upside down. After the report was presented to parliament an act of parliament, being chapter 43 of the statutes of 1934, was enacted. I should like to point out the difference between the functions of the bank as indicated in the statute and the proposed new functions as indicated in the resolution, because they are as far apart as the poles. Yesterday, when it was indicated that the Prime Minister had stood for public ownership, he said that the interpretation was not a proper one, and explained that he wanted control, but not necessarily government ownership.

We have heard a great deal of talk about government control. When and where has it existed in Canada? Has it existed in connection with the railways? When was there a time when we had government control over anything or the tariff or the bankers' association, when has it existed since we have been a country? This resolution interferes with the whole scope of the Macmillan report. The Macmillan commission was appointed on July 31, 1933, to make an exhaustive inquiry as to whether we should have a central bank, and if so, whether it should be publicly or privately owned, or a combination of private and public ownership with the banks having representation. Of the thirty-six countries that have central banks six countries, and some of the largest, have public ownership the Liberals were to pattern the Bank of Canada after the hydro-electric enterprise in Ontario; that was the shining example which Liberal candidates held up before the people in the last election—it was done here in Ontario—and they said that the Bank of Canada was to be a straight public ownership institution of that sort. Seventeen other countries have a central bank under private ownership. Eight countries have the ownership divided fifty-fifty between private and public ownership. There are a few others, mainly in Latin America, where the bank is partly privately and partly publicly owned, with the chartered banks having representation on the board.

Legislation was enacted on the basis of this Macmillan report. The chairman of the commission was the Right Hon. Lord Macmillan, and the commissioners were Sir Charles Stewart Addis, of London, England, Sir Thomas White, of Toronto, the Hon. J. E. Brownlee, of the province of Alberta, and Mr. Beaudry Leman, of the city of Montreal. As a result of the report of this commission parliament passed the Bank of Canada Act of 1934. The report of the Macmillan commission points out that the functions of a central bank are to regulate credit and currency; to regulate foreign exchange; to mitigate fluctuations in the level of production, trade, employment and prices as far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and to give expert financial advice to the government of the day. But what this resolution proposes is the direct opposite of what is proposed in the Macmillan report. The commission points out that the central bank should be a ready source of skilled and impartial financial advice at the disposal of the administration of the day. But this government does not want any technical advice.

This resolution is partly political and partly economic, and in the main, as I see it, it is political. At page 63 the Macmillan report says:

> In return for the privileges which the state confers upon it—

That is, upon a central bank.

> —the bank should use its store of experience in the service of the community without the desire or the need to make profit a primary consideration.

I quote again from page 63:

> The regulation of the quantity of credit is effected by the action of the central bank on the reserves of the commercial banks. By increasing or diminishing these reserves, or by increasing the cost of securing them, there is set in motion a process of expansion or contraction through the ordinary channels of banking. A central bank is thus not a competitor with the commercial banks. Its functions are regulatory and indirect.

That was the report of the commission, and the bank was created and opened its doors with a capital of $5,000,000, divided into $50 shares, which were offered for public subscription by the Minister of Finance on September 17, 1934. The offering was largely oversubscribed. The maximum allotment to any one individual or corporation was fifty shares. Shares of the bank may be held only by British subjects ordinarily resident in Canada, or by corporations controlled by British subjects ordinarily resident in Canada. The maximum holding permitted one person is fifty shares.

The bank is authorized to pay cumulative dividends of 4½ per cent per annum on its profits, the remaining surplus to be paid, after making provision for bad and doubtful debts, depreciation in assets, pension fund and all such matters that are properly provided for by banks, into the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

The bank may buy and sell securities of the dominion and the provinces. It may also buy and sell gold and silver, and may deal in foreign exchange.

The bank has assumed liability for dominion notes outstanding and is replacing them with its own notes in denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500 and $1,000. The chartered banks are required to reduce the issue of their own bank notes to 25 per cent of their paid-up capital during the next ten years.

The Bank of Canada must retain a reserve of gold equal to not less than 25 per cent of its total note and deposit liabilities in Canada.

The bank has an obligation to sell gold in the form of bars on demand.

The chartered banks are required to maintain a reserve of not less than five per cent of their deposit liabilities within Canada in the form of deposits with and notes of the bank.

The central bank acts as the fiscal agent of the Dominion of Canada and may by agreement act as banker or fiscal agent of any province. The bank must not accept deposits from individuals, and thus cannot compete with the chartered banks in commercial banking fields.

The governor of the bank is its chief executive officer, and he is assisted by a deputy governor and an assistant deputy governor. The first governors were appointed by the government and are as follows: Governor G. F. Towers, and the government were very lucky to get a man of his great ability, integrity and capacity. The deputy governor is J. A. C. Osborne, and the assistant deputy governor, L. P. St-Amour, good men. Subsequent appointments are to be made by the board of directors of the bank subject to the approval of the governor in council.

At the first meeting of the shareholders on January 23, 1935, seven directors were elected for terms to run as follows, one until the third annual general meeting, two until the fourth, two until the fifth, and two until the sixth annual general meeting. Directors must hold at least ten shares of the capital stock of the bank, must be British subjects ordinarily resident in Canada, must not receive remuneration out of public funds in any capacity, and must have no connection with a chartered bank.

There is also an executive committee of the board of directors consisting of the governor, deputy governor, and one member of the board, which must meet once a week. The board itself must meet at least four times a year. The Deputy Minister of Finance is ex-officio a member of the board of directors and of the executive committee, but is without a vote.

The bank commenced business on March 11, 1935, think of it, just a little over a year ago, and has had no time yet to even function. A statement is required of the assets and liabilities of the bank as at the close of business on each Wednesday.

Those are the functions, broadly speaking, of the Bank of Canada, which began to function just a little over a year ago, and it has functioned well, I believe, considering the turmoil and stress which a general election causes all over Canada, and in view of the clamour and agitation there was throughout this country for a change in our banking and monetary system. Our banking system has come down from confederation, down through the dark days of the past five years, and has stood fast against clamour and agitation to change the monetary system. I think the government would have been well advised to give the Bank of Canada one or two more years in which to function, and I believe the people of Canada would prefer that, leaving changes to come about gradually to meet changing conditions in our economic and financial life.

By the resolution now before the committee the government proposes to amend the Bank of Canada Act, and to make it a government ownership institution to the extent of fifty-one per cent. As you know, Mr. Chairman, the Bank of Canada started with a very low capitalization, only $5,000,000, a very small capital indeed, out of which the bank provided for its salaries and kept going. Now the government comes along and says: We are going to go into government ownership, but we are going to have, not one hundred per cent government ownership of the bank as we promised the electors, but only fifty-one per cent. The government says that in this way it will have some control over the Bank of Canada. But what control did it have over the Home Bank? It proposes government ownership to the extent of only fifty-one per cent instead of one hundred per cent. Is there any control over the chartered banks? Let hon. members attend the sittings of the banking and commerce committee and see how much the high court of parliament has to do with the chartered banks and the way they function. The powers of the chartered banks are prescribed by the Bank Act, but the Bank Act is being violated in many spheres of activity.

The Macmillan report at page 98 says that it is not necessary for a central bank to have much capital to start with. This resolution calls for government ownership only in name, and in my opinion it will be found that the directors will be selected in the same way that the employment commission were selected, in the same way that the railway commission and the members of the tariff board were selected. I remember that ten years ago, when I first came into the house, this matter came up, and Mr. Fielding discussed it. I refer to this because of a remark that was made yesterday. The minister distinctly called the attention of the committee to the resolution before the chair, proposing government control to the extent of fifty-one per cent, and he indicated the kind of control. That is a matter which will have to be discussed when the bill is in committee and therefore I shall not refer to it on this occasion.

I shall, however, refer to the statement of the minister that in future there will be bilingual notes instead of some being in English and some in French. I would point out that this upsets the whole practice from confederation to the present time, for Sir John Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding opposed it, and bilingual currency. Why? Because it is inconvenient, and what is more it is not desired by the banking people or by the taxpayers and is against the spirit and letter of the British North America Act. They do not want to have notes of that description going all over the world. I can remember when this matter was discussed in the committee on banking and commerce fourteen years ago. I was not a member of the committee, but in the house I heard section 133 of the British North America Act quoted with reference to the use of French and English in Canada. Are you going to have a note, one side of which will be printed in French and the other in English? The thing would be simply intolerable; it could not be carried out in practice. If French branches of banks in Quebec wished to have some notes in French, a certain number of bills are distributed to the banks as demanded in actual practice but not by statute, for convenience only as now given them, but it has to be left to the good judgment of the banking institutions. This note circulation clause of the Bank of Canada Act is copied from section 60 of the consolidated act of 1934 regarding banks and banking. The principle of that section is copied into the Bank of Canada Act. This matter was not discussed in the election campaign in Ontario because such a change in the note issue in Canada is something which every government since confederation has opposed. Every government in Canada has been opposed to having notes issued in two languages and bilingual currency. I wish to protest against it on behalf of the people whom I represent. I am not speaking for all the people of Ontario but I certainly am speaking for my own constituents. As I say, Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding as well opposed this proposal in the past. Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance rose in his place in the banking and commerce committee and said that the government would not have it; he said that the matter should be left where it was since 1867. When bills printed in French were necessary in practice a few would be printed, he said, but this should not be put into the law. When this provision of the bill comes up in committee I intend to take strong ground against this proposal.

We do not know what is going to become of the Bank of Canada. There is a division among the members supporting the government, and I submit that the resolution ought to be withdrawn and held over until next year. I see there is a suggestion that we should come back in the fall. Well, if the government should leave this matter over for a year, it should be left over until next year or the year after, along with other bills with which the government is not yet ready to deal. It would be better to have a Bank of Canada constituted along the lines suggested by the commission of experts who went into the whole situation and that it be given a five year break, one or two of whom submitted a dissenting report. In years to come there may be necessity for a change, but I do not think that time will come in the next five or ten years. I hope the government will give this resolution further consideration and let it stand over. We know what to expect if this is to be anything like the proposal in connection with the British North America Act; we know what the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) said in that regard. I predict the same thing with respect to this resolution, and I am sure the people of Canada will protest against this proposal with regard to bilingual notes. If the proposal were submitted to the people of Ontario the government would not have five members from that province sitting on the treasury benches.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): The majority of the members of this house as well as the majority of the people of Canada are fully convinced that monetary reform is essential if we are to have a permanent solution of the economic problem. I would point out that the government will be judged, not on the number of shares they happen to own in the central bank but on the policy which they put into operation. The ownership of the central bank will undoubtedly be a step forward, a step that has been a long time coming, and one that is important, inasmuch as it gives the government control over the issue of credit. Just as the people of Canada expected to have control of credit through parliament, the people of the provinces expect to have control of their credit through provincial banks. I realize that, when reforms in our social and economic life are being discussed or attempted to be made, constitutional difficulties may arise, and it is the duty of the provincial governments and the federal government to cooperate to the limit to bring about these necessary reforms. I suggest to the government that they give authority to the provincial governments to have their own banks in order to make available to the people of the provinces the credit necessary to handle purely provincial matters, so that industry may be assisted in the provinces, prices regulated, and the economic security of the people guaranteed in so far as the provinces are able to guarantee them. I believe that with the government owned central bank and with provincially owned banks in the various provinces cooperating, economic security for the people of Canada can be effected.

Much has been said in favour of 100 per cent ownership of the national bank, and I believe it should be so. I do not think any small percentage of the people should have a special privilege in relation to the credit of the dominion. I do not believe that they would be left out of the picture when we consider the benefits which will accrue to them as well as to all other citizens of Canada from a properly constituted central bank. They would benefit as well as the rest, and I do not feel that they should have any special privileges granted them, such as 4½ per cent, in connection with which we might effect a considerable saving.

References have been made to credit—how it has been created and how it should be manipulated, whether the granting of loans creates deposits and the repayment of loans destroys them. We have heard a good deal about this lately. But wherever money is created it should be created in sufficient quantities, I submit, actually to reflect our real ability to create and distribute wealth. We should see that that is the case in the Dominion of Canada. If we do not have sufficient, or if there is too much, that can be regulated. One hon. member suggested this afternoon that there is more credit available than the dominion can possibly use. He mentioned the figure of $1,400,000,000, and he said that there is not sufficient security behind the people who desire money to-day. We believe that there is sufficient security. We believe that the natural resources of the Dominion of Canada and the willingness of people to apply themselves to those natural resources should be sufficient credit. I do not blame men who to-day, under the system of private control of credit, refuse to grant to industry the money necessary for development. Knowing the position of the markets in this country at the present time, I would not condemn the man who would hesitate to invest his capital in the coal mines of western Canada, where we have fourteen per cent of the entire coal deposits of the world, along with many thousands of people without sufficient coal to keep themselves warm in winter time. But because those people have not the purchasing power to buy coal after it is produced, I would not blame anyone for not investing in projects of coal development.

So this question of credit and of its control is very important. The question whether it should be controlled absolutely by the federal government or whether it should be decentralized to allow the provinces to have control of their own credit for purely provincial matters is one that should be considered, and I am disappointed that the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) was not accepted. I believe that the whole matter of money and credit should be discussed, so that there will be no more mystery in the public mind about it. These doctrines and ideas that are circulating in Canada should be thoroughly analyzed and the truth made known to the people, and I feel sure that until that is done these matters will continue to be seriously debated in this house.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 82, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Judges Act to provide salaries for the Ontario appeal and high court judges as presently constituted; and further provide that when a vacancy occurs in the office of chief justice in appeal the office shall be abolished and the court shall thereafter consist of a chief justice and seven other judges.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Far be it from me to try to interfere with the progress of business, but I think it would be better to suspend consideration of this resolution until the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is in the house, as he understands much more about it than any of the rest of us.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my right hon. friend will allow the resolution to go into committee, I will move that the committee rise until the leader of the opposition is back.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Certainly.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does my right hon. friend wish that this should be postponed? It is merely to give effect to a law of Ontario constituting the courts of Ontario.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If the hon. minister would be good enough to do that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Very well.

Progress reported.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 76, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions, et cetera.

Mr. LAWSON: I should like to ask the minister a question applying to this bill generally, if this is the time to do it. Is this a consolidation?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. LAWSON: Merely the amendments of this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. DUNNING: There are very few administrative changes. In the main they are the resolutions which passed the committee of ways and means consequent on the budget. My hon. friend remembers the procedure.

Mr. LAWSON: It seems to me that there are a good many more provisions in this bill than were covered by the resolutions which came before the committee of ways and means.

Mr. DUNNING: Very few. It takes quite a large bill to cover the resolutions.

Mr. STIRLING: Turning the pages over rather rapidly, I am confused as between sections 2 and 3. Has part VII, on page 2 of the bill, been before the committee of ways and means?

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 2 of the bill is the amendment of the whole of part VII.

Mr. DUNNING: Carried by the committee of ways and means.

Mr. STIRLING: All that new material on page 2?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 2 begins at the bottom of page 1, carries over on to page 2 and includes page 3 and part of page 4.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I should like to ask in a general way if this bill follows the resolutions passed in committee of ways and means.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, it does, and where administrative changes are being made they will be indicated by the minister as we reach them. The only exceptions to the ways and means resolutions are a few minor administrative changes which will be indicated by the Minister of National Revenue as we go along.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Quite so. Then this section 2, with regard to stock taxes and so on, is exactly as it was passed by the committee of ways and means?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: I am sorry if I appear to be dense, but I have no recollection of any change having been made in the transfer tax on bonds, stocks and share certificates in the committee of ways and means this year.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will remember that in the budget speech and subsequently in committee of ways and means I referred to a means of taxing a group of companies—I forget the official description of the group—having a type of interest which did not come within the definitions previously contained in the act. That is the only change in this section.

Mr. LAWSON: So really we are not changing the rates of the transfer tax but merely making a change to clarify some situation which was not clarified under the previous act?

Mr. DUNNING: Quite right, and to do so it was necessary to rewrite the whole section.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Consumption or sales tax of eight per cent.

Mr. LAWSON: The only change there is to substitute the eight per cent sales tax for the six per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: And the proviso on the next page, which is indicated by the black line and which was covered in the resolution.

Section agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Licensee to give security.

Mr. DUNNING: That is an administrative change.

Mr. ILSLEY: The explanation of this change is as follows: Licensed wholesalers are permitted to purchase and import merchandise without the payment of sales tax, and they account for the tax at the time of the sale. However, several such licensed wholesalers have failed and the guarantors who have supplied security for the payment of the sales tax have claimed that the security given under the former section did not extend to the liquidator or trustee. The result has been that the department has been unable to collect the taxes due on the values as provided under the act. The present section is for the purpose of requiring that the security be extended to cover the operations of the trustee or liquidator, in order to protect the revenues.

The explanation of subsection 3 is this: In view of the increase in the rate of sales tax in 1932 and again at the present time, it is considered that the security of $15,000 is not enough in some cases, and this change is to provide greater security for payment of the tax.

Mr. LAWSON: As a result of this amendment will the government secure any greater priority for their tax in any case of bankruptcy or liquidation to which it applies than they already have under the Bankruptcy Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. LAWSON: You have the same priority, but this provides for security for the tax itself?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Regulations.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is an administrative change. There are certain declarations required in connection with refund claims and the like, as well as those required on the returns made by taxpayers. It has been held that the previous authority in the act was not broad enough to cover the different declarations required. This resulted in taxpayers being put to the expense and inconvenience of making declarations before notaries public and commissioners for taking oaths. This amendment is to enable departmental officers to administer such oaths and declarations where possible.

Mr. LAWSON: As a lawyer I suggest to the minister that there is a danger in that unless he is very careful as to who are authorized to administer such oaths.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Monthly returns of taxable sales.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is an administrative change, but it is very minor. Certain words are being left out because of the enactment of the previous section. They are no longer necessary.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Procedure.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is an administrative change. This section is designed to make it incumbent upon persons who receive assignments of book debts or trade papers, which include sales tax, to pay the amount of such tax to the public revenues. In the past there has been no authority in the act to collect the tax in such cases, and if the taxpayer were in a precarious financial position or about to go into liquidation the amounts represented by the tax were collected by the person holding the collateral for his own account, and became a non-collectable account as far as the public revenues were concerned.

Mr. FACTOR: Does that include banks as well?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Additional penalties.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is also an administrative change. It has been found that in some cases taxpayers were judgment proof and continued operating in business without accounting for the tax for which they were liable, often selling their goods below the prices of their competitors. While penalties have been imposed upon them, such penalties, like the taxes, are uncollectable. This section is designed to impose terms of imprisonment in lieu of the payment of penalties. This is deemed necessary to deal with certain extraordinary cases.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Officers who may make inquiry.

Mr. ILSLEY: It occasionally becomes necessary for inquiries to be made on short notice, and by naming certain officers in the act as commissioners for the purpose of part I of the Inquiries Act it is considered that time can be saved and possibly moneys recovered which might be lost if the inquiry were delayed.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Action against officers in the exercise of their duties.

Mr. ILSLEY: This section is not new in the revenue statutes. It is designed to protect officers in the performance of their duties in connection with the collection of the public revenues, and is merely extending to this act the principle of protection of such officers that is already in the Customs Act and the Excise Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—French version corrected.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is merely a change in the French version.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Schedule I amended.

Mr. DUNNING: A ways and means item entirely.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Schedule II amended.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There is a part at the bottom of page 10 on which we ought to have some explanation. That is not in the ways and means resolution?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes, absolutely. It is the automobile item. It is new so far as this act is concerned, but the new part inserted is the part carried in committee of ways and means relating to automobiles.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Schedule III repealed and reenacted.

Mr. DUNNING: This is the schedule of exemptions.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This is all following the ways and means resolution?

Mr. DUNNING: It is a rewriting of all the exemptions, including those provided for in this year's ways and means resolutions, and with no other change.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Schedule V repealed and reenacted.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly the same explanation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Has the minister explained the administrative changes?

Mr. DUNNING: Each one as it came.

Section agreed to.

Sections 19 and 20 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. STIRLING: Will a consolidation of this special War Revenue Act be printed forthwith?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is consolidated every year, that is for office use and for the use of members. I hold in my hand the 1934 consolidation, but I think there is a 1935 one. It is not reenacted; we do not put another act through.

Mr. STIRLING: But it will be a complete consolidation of the Special War Revenue Act as amended?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: It is so inconvenient having the last year's one and having to look up all these amendments. Will the minister see that the members receive a copy?

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly shall. I have had the same trouble.

Mr. LAWSON: Referring to clause 17, which covers the exemptions, I notice there is nothing to indicate any additions made to the exemptions this year. Am I overlooking them? My recollection is that were were one or two additions to the exemptions.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, there were.

Mr. ILSLEY: In schedule III there are a few changes. They are not black-marked.

Mr. LAWSON: Could the minister indicate them by reference to the numbers of paragraphs?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member can get them out of the votes and proceedings.

Mr. ILSLEY: On page 12 at the end of the third complete paragraph, will be found these words:

Crushed stone or crushed gravel to be used exclusively in the building or maintenance of provincial, county, municipal or township roads.

The word "municipal" was added. Then at the beginning of the last paragraph the words—

Liver extract for use exclusively in the treatment of anaemia.

—are added. On page 13, line 5 the words—

Printing paper and printing ink for use exclusively in producing quarterly, bi-monthly, monthly and semi-monthly magazines and weekly literary papers unbound.

—are added. Then, towards the bottom of page 13, just above the title, "Goods enumerated in customs tariff items," these words have been added as an additional paragraph:

Materials, not to include lubricating or fuel oils or plant equipment, consumed in the process of the manufacture or production of taxable goods.

On page 17, in tariff item 695b, there have been added the words beginning "handmade drawings"; that whole paragraph has been added.

Further down on the same page item 696a has been added. And at the top of page 18 the $100 exemption section has been added. Those are the words that have been added.

Mr. STEWART: Before the committee rises, would the minister be good enough to return to page 7 of the bill, the section in which a penalty is imposed:

And in default of payment of the said penalties, to imprisonment for a term of not less than three months and not more than twelve months.

It says that this is applicable to taxes imposed by parts IV to XIII inclusive. Could the minister tell us in a general way what those taxes are?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are all the excise taxes imposed under the Special War Revenue Act.

Mr. STEWART: Then it means that a person in default of payment of any excise taxes may be imprisoned?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: That is a new penalty, is it not?

Mr. LAWSON: It is adopting a new principle, imprisonment for debt, surely.

Mr. STEWART: I do not recall that that was discussed.

Mr. DUNNING: Only in extraordinary cases, of course.

Mr. STEWART: Are we now going to impose a penalty of a term of imprisonment upon any person who neglects to pay taxes he owes to the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are other similar sections in the act. For instance, under section 118, everyone who wilfully attempts in any manner to evade or defeat—

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Oh, that is quite different—wilful attempts to evade.

Mr. STEWART: The section reads:

Every person who, being thereto liable, neglects, omits or refuses to pay any tax imposed by Parts IV to XIII inclusive, of this act, in addition to any other penalty to which he is subject for any such offence, shall be liable on summary conviction, to a penalty of not less than fifty dollars and not exceeding one thousand dollars and to a further penalty equal to double the amount of the tax properly payable, and in default of payment of the said penalties, to imprisonment for a term of not less than three months and not more than twelve months.

The part that is added is that in default of payment of the penalty, imprisonment is imposed. We did not discuss that matter thoroughly in committee of the whole, if it was discussed at all. It is well to understand what we are doing, namely that any person in default of payment of income tax, in addition to a penalty which may be imposed upon him for non-payment of the tax—

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not income tax.

Mr. STEWART: I was asking that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was referring to the Special War Revenue Act.

Mr. STEWART: Does it refer to sales tax and excise tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: Any other taxes? What about the stamp tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; I counted twenty-eight of them.

Mr. NEILL: Is there any precedent for this in other legislation?

Mr. ILSLEY: After due consideration I am inclined to believe that the provision is severe, and if there is going to be any dispute I shall not press it further.

Mr. DUNNING: It will be deleted, and the subsequent sections renumbered.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I point out that the deletion will not do away with the possibility of imprisonment, because by the section as it stands a defaulting taxpayer is subject to penalty on summary conviction of a sum not less than $50 and not exceeding $1,000. There is a provision in the criminal code whereby imprisonment may be imposed to enforce a penalty.

Mr. NEILL: That is under the criminal code.

Mr. STEWART: And a different matter altogether.

[Sir George Perley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: If any hon. member thinks imprisonment cannot be imposed upon a person refusing to pay a fine imposed by the preceding part of the section, he is under a misapprehension.

Mr. NEILL: Is not the minister referring to an offence under the criminal code?

Mr. ILSLEY: They would be prosecutions under part XV of the criminal code.

Mr. LAWSON: How could there be prosecutions under the criminal code for breach of the Special War Revenue Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: The whole procedure is under the code. If I am not greatly mistaken, an information is laid. It is all set out under part XV.

Mr. LAWSON: The procedure as to how one proceeds in order to charge a subject before a court is set out in the criminal code, but one could not be said to be prosecuted for an offence under the code when, as a matter of fact, he is being tried to ascertain whether or not he is guilty of a breach of the Special War Revenue Act, or some provision of it.

Mr. STEWART: It seems to me that in order to render a person liable to imprisonment there would have to be a special prosecution under a provision of the criminal code. In the present instance it would seem inevitably to follow that if there is a default and a conviction the magistrate would be bound to impose imprisonment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That section 11 of the bill be deleted and the subsequent sections renumbered.

Motion agreed to.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Section 12 seems to involve an administrative change. Have all other administrative changes been explained and discussed?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Section 11 having been struck out, if the ministers of the crown wish to be consistent they must observe that that portion of section 2 which is numbered 62 provides a penalty more drastic than the one which has been struck out. Under section 11 imprisonment became applicable only when a person convicted refused to pay the fine, but under the section I have indicated, subsection 3, a person is liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding $500 and not less than $50, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months and not less than one month, or to both fine and imprisonment. The additional words are underlined at the top of page 4 of the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: The penalty in this instance is for failure to maintain books and records. Before the change was made there was a penalty for refusing to produce books, but no penalty for refusing to keep them, which was ridiculous and inconsistent. Subsection 3 is brought in line with subsection 2.

Mr. LAWSON: If the minister gives consideration to the matter I am sure he will agree there is a difference. If a man is in business and an inspector from the government comes along and says, "You owe the government money; you have books, and we want those books to find out how much you owe," and the man replies, "I refuse to give them to you," he has committed a wilful misdemeanour. On the other hand, I have known men in this country who did quite a large amount of business without actually keeping books, and they did not keep books in some cases not because of any ulterior motive or purpose. It is the government's responsibility if they want to make this an offence punishable by imprisonment, but I can only say that it strikes me as being a very unusual attitude for a Liberal government, judging by what I have heard of them in the past.

Mr. JACOBS: Do you expect them to be any better than your government?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the preamble carry?

Mr. LAWSON: You have not carried section 20, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, that was carried.

Mr. LAWSON: I can only say this to the minister, that if he takes that attitude, then the next time that a purely administrative bill comes before us we shall see that it does not carry if we have to stay on our feet all night until we get the information we require. Someone called "carried" to section 20. The chairman may have said "carried," and—

The CHAIRMAN: The chairman did say "carried," and no member of the committee objected.

Mr. LAWSON: Then I can only request you, Mr. Chairman, not to go so rapidly, because I had in mind something I wanted to ask on section 20.

Mr. DUNNING: I was not desiring to stop discussion at all; I was simply pointing out that to revert to a section which was carried some time ago would be out of order.

Mr. LAWSON: It is out of order, I quite agree.

Mr. DUNNING: Section 20, which is really a formal section of the bill was called "carried," but if it is desired to hold it we shall do so.

Mr. LAWSON: I want to ask for just one piece of information.

Mr. DUNNING: By all means.

Mr. LAWSON: Section 20 provides that section 4 of this bill shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of June, 1936. The other sections of the bill, I assume, come into effect either on the date the bill receives royal assent or on the date the Finance minister read the budget.

Mr. DUNNING: The previous section deals with that.

Mr. LAWSON: Why is section 4 different from the others?

Mr. ILSLEY: It deals with two classes of persons, commercial artists and packers of olives, and it was not deemed just to make the provisions with respect to them retroactive.

Mr. LAWSON: Is there some reason for that?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the preamble carry?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: We are trying to make headway with the bill, and you must give us a little leeway, Mr. Chairman, or we shall discuss it in some form or another. Regarding the penalty for failure to maintain records, which is dealt with on page 4 of the bill, I listened to the explanation of the minister, and what I dislike about this provision is that the man would be liable to imprisonment although he had not wilfully done anything. Subsection 3 of section 62, at the top of page 4 provides that if any person liable to maintain records and books of account fails to maintain them, the minister may assess the tax payable by such person and the tax so assessed shall be deemed to be due and payable forthwith; then, further, if the man does not pay the tax he has to go to gaol. I think something should be inserted there to show that the man has wilfully done something.

Mr. ILSLEY: The gaol sentence is not for refusing to pay his tax.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is the way I read the subsection.

Mr. ILSLEY: I respectfully differ from the hon. gentleman. It says:

If any person liable to maintain records and books of account for the purposes of this part has, in the opinion of the minister, failed to maintain adequate records and books of account, the minister may assess the tax payable by such person under this part, and the taxes so assessed shall be deemed to be due and payable forthwith. Such person shall also be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars—

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: A summary conviction for what?

Mr. ILSLEY: For not maintaining the records and books which he was liable to maintain.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Quite so. I know plenty of people who carry on quite a lot of business and never keep any books. It would take a good while to bring this new rule into force, and does the minister think that a man who offends in ignorance, not wilfully, should not only be assessed by the minister but also be liable to imprisonment? I do not think he does.

Mr. LAWSON: I would point out that the subsection provides:

If any person liable to maintain records and books of account for the purposes of this part has, in the opinion of the minister—

Then here is the gravamen—has what?

—failed to maintain adequate records and books of account.

If he has failed to do so in the opinion of the minister, the minister may assess the tax payable. So, according to this section, the Minister of National Revenue determines whether the man is guilty of the offence of not keeping adequate books, and if the minister, not the courts, decides against him, the man becomes guilty of an offence, and of an offence which is punishable by imprisonment. I only say that if the government wants to pass that kind of legislation, it is on their doorstep.

Mr. ILSLEY: The language objected to by the hon. gentleman is not new.

Mr. LAWSON: The prison penalty is new.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is new.

Mr. LAWSON: That is the whole gravamen.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: There must be some penalty imposed upon persons who will not keep books they are required to keep.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I suggest to the minister that the present law as it stands is quite sufficient in its penalties, because the minister has power to assess the tax payable, and the minister can assess it as he thinks best.

Mr. ILSLEY: But if there are no books, he has nothing to go on. That is the very trouble. How can our auditor tell how much is due if he goes to one of these establishments and there are no books? There may be thousands of dollars due. Without books we do not know, and the man can snap his fingers at the department. We have no sanctions.

Mr. LAWSON: Oh, no, he cannot, because the Minister of National Revenue may then impose an arbitrary assessment, and under the law the taxpayer becomes liable to pay that arbitrary assessment no matter how unreasonable it may be, unless he can produce books and satisfy the minister that his arbitrary assessment should be reduced. That is the whole idea of arbitrary assessments in income tax and everything else with which the minister has to deal.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I suggest that the minister might drop this last provision the same as he did in the other section, and let the bill go through in that way.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot agree to that. It is unreasonable to expect it. Just think of the position my hon. friends are in. They suggest that we make an arbitrary assessment, which might be a most unjust assessment, which is the most undesirable thing that can be suggested. There is no power, under this section, to make an arbitrary assessment. The minister may assess the taxes that are due, but if he has nothing to go on, what can he do?

Mr. LAWSON: All his predecessors in office have made assessments. As a matter of fact, the routine is that the minister never sees or hears about them because these income tax assessments are made by the income tax commissioner and go out under the minister's signature, and if the taxpayer does not like it he has the right of appeal to the minister. But the minister seldom hears of these cases until they come before him in the form of an appeal. Always the minister has had the power to make an assessment. I put in the word "arbitrary" to indicate that it might be an assessment not based upon any particular calculation. By this act not only can the minister make an assessment where, in his opinion, he thinks adequate records and books have not been kept, but he can go further and take action whereby the man can be put into gaol. Surely the exercise of that discretion should be in the courts, and not in the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the preamble carry?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Has the minister given this provision his personal consideration? Is he prepared to insist himself that this shall go through or has this just come down to him from the officers of the department?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have given it some consideration; I have given it further consideration to-night, listening to the discussion, and certainly I have not been convinced that the provision should be withdrawn. I cannot agree to that. I agreed, however, to withdraw the other one.

Preamble stands.

2. If so, by whom was he recommended?
3. Has he been dismissed, and for what cause?
4. If dismissed, who has been appointed in his place, and on whose recommendation?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Yes, as a temporary fishery guardian.
2. He was appointed by the minister under the authority of the Fisheries Act.
3. Yes. Not satisfactory for the work.
4. Herbert Corbin. Appointed by the minister as in No. 2.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—$60,000,000 LOAN

Mr. POULIOT:

From what department or departments, and when, did the Department of the Secretary of State receive the correspondence contained in sessional paper No. 150-E, tabled on March 19, 1934, in accordance with an order of the House of Commons, dated February 12, 1934, for a copy of all correspondence interchanged between the government of Canada, or one or any of its members, and one or any of the Canadian banks, in connection with the guarantee given by the government for the loan of $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. RINFRET:

The documents contained in the return tabled in the House of Commons on the 19th March, 1934, were not received in the Department of the Secretary of State. The return was tabled by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister.

*MURDER OF CONSTABLE JOHN LEWIS AT SARNIA

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will anything be done by the government (a) to grant a pension to the family of the late constable John Lewis, murdered on Saturday, May 23rd, at Sarnia, Ontario, while in the discharge of his duty in the interests of peace, order and good government in Canada; and (b) to lay down a definite policy for Canada towards police constables generally who die while in similar action in protecting life and property, and lose their lives for the protection of society?
2. Will the government confer with the attorneys-general of the provinces in the matter with a view of a suitable and adequate federal pension being granted all families who suffer such great loss, or by granting a pension in conjunction with provincial and municipal authority?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Numerous representations are coming to the government from various sources along the line suggested in this question, more particularly from the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray), in whose constituency this event occurred. I may say first that the administration of justice, both civil and criminal, is under provincial jurisdiction, and the provincial authorities are responsible. But it is represented that in this case there is some degree of responsibility on the federal authority by reason of the fact that the person who was responsible for what happened was a prisoner who had been released under the Ticket of Leave Act and had been favoured with the exercise of the prerogative of clemency on the part of the crown. Of course it never was contemplated under the Ticket of Leave Act that the crown should be responsible for any actions of those who benefited by the exercise of clemency on the part of the crown. To accede to the requests that are being made would involve the whole policy underlying the Ticket of Leave Act and the exercise of the prerogative of mercy and clemency by the crown. Everybody will agree that under such circumstances the matter will require the most serious consideration.

Mr. CHURCH: May I just say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: Don't you think a policeman who protects free federal property all over Canada deserves a pension? It is just passing the buck.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—EMPLOYMENT AND WAGES

Mr. STEVENS:

1. How many engineers, conductors, firemen and trainmen in Canada have been paid for working more than the recognized equivalent of 26 days of 8 hours each a month, during the first quarter of 1936 (a) on the Canadian National Railways, and (b) on the Canadian Pacific Railway?
2. How many days of eight hours each would the excess time put in by these men be equivalent to (a) in the case of the Canadian National Railways, and (b) in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway?
3. How many former employees with experience in the classes of work indicated in No. 1 were unemployed during the first quarter of 1936 (a) by the Canadian National Railways, and (b) by the Canadian Pacific Railway?
4. How many employees with experience in the classes of work indicated in No. 1 were employed only part time during the first quarter of 1936 (a) by the Canadian National Railways, and (b) by the Canadian Pacific Railway?
5. Has a referendum vote of employees in these classes of service been taken to ascertain if the majority of them would be satisfied with the recognized equivalent of not more than 26 days, of 8 hours each, a month?

Mr. HOWE: The subject matter of this question relates to the internal management of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways. The government has no information on the subject, and cannot properly ask either railway for the information.

*CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ZONE ACCOUNTING SYSTEM

Mr. STEVENS:

1. To what extent has the "zone accounting system" been adopted by the Canadian National Railways?
2. What saving, if any, has been made in payroll expenses thereby?

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

3. What is the cost per year of the rental of accounting machines used in this system, and what amount has been expended in the purchase of machines in connection therewith?
4. What is the cost of the stationery required for "zone accounting" over and above the cost of stationery used in this connection prior to the adoption of the system?
5. How many employees have been dismissed from the service as a result of the adoption of the system?

Mr. HOWE: The same answer applies to this as to the previous question.

*CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—FREDERICTON, N.B., BRIDGE

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Will the government reconstruct the railway bridge, at Fredericton, which was destroyed by the spring freshets of 1936?
2. If so, will an appropriation be made for this purpose during the present session of parliament?

Mr. HOWE: This question relates to a railway bridge which is the property of the Canadian National Railways. I understand the question of reconstruction is under consideration by the Canadian National Railways, but it is not a matter for the government directly.

NATIONAL PARKS

Mr. PURDY:

1. What are the names and locations of the national parks in Canada?
2. What amount has been expended on each of them to March 31, 1936?

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—$60,000,000 LOAN

Mr. POULIOT:

1. From May 31, 1933, inclusive, until February 13, 1934, was a copy of the letter of guarantee, dated May 31, 1933, signed by the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister, and addressed to Sir Charles Gordon, president of the Bank of Montreal, about the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, forwarded, (a) to the Department of Finance; (b) to the Department of Railways and Canals, and (c) to any other department of the government?
2. If so, by whom, to whom and on what date or dates?

Mr. POULIOT:

In the office of the Prime Minister or in any other department, is there a copy of the memorandum presented by Sir E. W. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister, about the dominion guarantee of the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and referred to by the latter in his evidence before the select standing committee of banking and commerce during the year 1934, at page 194 of the report?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle):

For a copy of all papers or documents, including correspondence, letters, telegrams, resolutions and recommendations between individuals and creditor companies, or their representatives and between individuals or creditor companies and the government of the Dominion of Canada, relating to the dismissal, removal or appointments of officials appointed under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in the province of Saskatchewan; also copy of any telegrams or other correspondence between the chairman of the review board and the dominion government with respect to his retirement or resignation, prior to the first of June, 1936.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—$60,000,000 LOAN

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Minister of Finance, from May 31, 1933, to October 23, 1935, and one or any of the Canadian banks or any railway company, in connection with the guarantee given by the government for the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Minister of Railways and Canals, from May 31, 1933, to October 23, 1935, and one or any of the Canadian banks or any railway company, in connection with the guarantee given by the government for the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of memorandum presented by Sir E. W. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister, about the dominion guarantee of the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and referred to by the latter in his evidence before the select standing committee on banking and commerce during the year 1934, at page 194 of the report.

Mr. POULIOT:

For a photostat copy of the original copy of the letter of guarantee, dated May 31, 1933, signed by the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, then Prime Minister, and addressed to Sir Charles Gordon, president of the Bank of Montreal, about the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, a typewritten copy of which has been tabled in sessional paper No. 150-E on March 19, 1934.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not in a position to raise a question about the motion, but I must say this establishes a precedent of such far-reaching consequence that I direct the attention of the government to it. It involves a photostatic copy of communications which in their very essence are privileged so far as the files of the privy council are concerned. A copy of the letter was produced before the committee, and if a photostatic copy of every document is to be produced it raises another issue in this chamber which I never have heard raised before.

Mr. POULIOT: If the right hon. gentleman quotes a rule to the house by virtue of which we cannot have a photostatic copy of the letter, I will abide by any ruling to that effect; but there is no rule to that effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must say that the request of the hon. member (Mr. Pouliot) for a photostatic copy of a typewritten communication which has already been placed before the house does seem to reflect upon the government which brought down the document. I do not think the hon. member could have had any such intention. I am sure he feels that any typewritten copy which has been tabled is a true copy of the original document, and there could not be any intention to imply that it was not such. However the hon. member may have reasons for assuming that the typewritten copy tabled is not an accurate copy of the original communication, and if there are such reasons and he will state them I should be prepared to have the house decide whether or not the order should be granted. Unless he has some special reason for his request, I suggest the motion should be dropped.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the right hon. gentleman for what he has just said; he must know my intentions are always pure. But the reason I ask for a photostatic copy of the letter is that on the copy on record there are no initials of any minister besides the signature of the right hon. gentleman, and in order to do justice to the leader of the opposition, as I have heard that some of his ministers initialed the letter I wonder if the same initials were put on the copy. That is why I ask for a photostatic copy of the letter; it is only to render justice to the leader of the opposition. Once more I am defending him against himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there is a question of the copy not being a true one I see no reason why the order should not pass.

Motion agreed to.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 76, to amend the Special War Revenue Act—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Members of the committee will understand that all sections of the bill, with the exception of the preamble and title, were passed last night.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Chairman, while that is true, I believe it is a fact that when we adjourned we were considering subsection 3 of section 62. I have given careful consideration to the objections raised by certain members, and to some extent I believe they are well founded. For these reasons I move:

That section 2 of Bill 76, an act to Amend the Special War Revenue Act, be amended by striking out of subsection 3 of section 62 of the said act, as set out in the said section, all the words following the word "forthwith" in the sixth line of the said subsection, and by adding to the aforesaid section 62 the following subsection:

"(4) Every person who having been notified by the minister in writing to keep records and books of account as provided in this part, neglects or refuses to keep such records or books of account shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding $500 and not less than $50, and in default of payment of such penalty to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months and not less than one month."

Mr. LAWSON: I congratulate the minister upon his reconsideration of the provision. It seems to me perfectly proper to impose a gaol sentence where an offence is wilfully committed and as I interpret the minister's proposed amending section it would apply only in cases of wilfulness. To that I have no objection.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 2 as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

On section 20—Coming into force of section 4.

Mr. STEWART: I understood that section 20 was not finally passed.

Mr. DUNNING: It was.

Mr. STEWART: I should like to know why the provision is made that section 4 shall be deemed to come into effect on June 1, and not on the earlier date at which the other sections become effective.

Mr. ILSLEY: I made a brief explanation last night. The change in the definition of "producer or manufacturer" extends the definition to "any packer of olives and any commercial artist," and it is not deemed just to make the extension retroactive. From June 1 last it will apply to these two classes of persons.

On the preamble.

Mr. LAWSON: I was wondering if the minister would have any objection to a motion to revert to section 13 of this bill. The minister will remember that last night we went through the bill more or less hurriedly on the assurance that it contained merely the provisions of the budget, plus some administrative changes. I suggest to the minister that section 13 creates an entirely new situation so far as the enforcement officers of the department are concerned, and there are one or two phases of that amending section to which I should like to call the minister's attention.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think I can refuse to accede to the hon. gentleman's request if he has anything he would like to say.

Mr. LAWSON: Then, in order to regularize the matter, I would move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee revert to section 13 of the bill which is before the committee.

Motion agreed to.

On section 13—Action against officers in the exercise of their duties.

Mr. LAWSON: What I wish to call to the attention of the minister is the following. This section is designed apparently to confer protection upon enforcement officers of the department who commit certain acts in the course of their duty, or ostensibly in the course of their duty. The amendment comprises an addition to the Special War Revenue Act of sections 120A, 120B, 120C and 120D.

With respect to section 120A I raise no question except that the minister will observe that subsection 1 of section 120A provides for the requisite notice to be served, and subsection 2 starts off by requiring that there be in the notice something which is not specified in the subsection dealing with the notice. For the purpose of clarity I suggest to the minister that section 120A, subsection 1, be amended so as to make it clear that what is required in the notice is not merely a statement of the cause of action and the name and place of abode of the person who intends to bring such action, and the name of his attorney, solicitor or agent, but also such evidence as that person proposes to adduce in support of his cause of action, because that is apparently what is intended by the first part of subsection 2.

Mr. ILSLEY: The evidence does not have to be stated.

Mr. LAWSON: Then what is intended by the words in subsection 2, "No evidence of any cause of action shall be produced except of such as shall be stated in such notice?" Except of such what?

Mr. ILSLEY: Of such cause of action.

Mr. LAWSON: Oh, yes. If that is clear, I would say that I have no suggestion with reference to section 120A, but it was not very clear to me. Section 120B, subsection 3, however, goes much further, I think, than any law upon our statute books, in giving protection to judicial, magisterial and police officers. Subsection 3 provides:

If the plaintiff is non-suited, or discontinues the action, or if, upon demurrer or otherwise, judgment is given against the plaintiff, the defendant shall recover costs, and have such remedy for the same as any defendant has in other cases where costs are given.

I call to the attention of the minister that costs are always a matter in the discretion of the court, and the proposed subsection is going very far in providing protection for enforcement officers in this connection. In view of the fact that failure to give notice, the giving of which is now being made a statutory requisite, will defeat the cause of action, even though it might be a perfectly good cause of action, the costs should be a matter in the discretion of the court as in all other cases, and not arbitrarily fixed by statute.

Mr. ILSLEY: This provision simply follows the provision in the Customs Act, section 158, subsection 3, which reads as follows:

In such case, or if the plaintiff becomes non-suited, or discontinues his action, or judgment is given for the defendant upon demurrer or otherwise, such defendant shall be entitled to full costs of defence.

Mr. LAWSON: But is notice a prerequisite of action under the Customs Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; by section 157 notice is a prerequisite of action. In fact, these sections follow very closely the sections in the Customs Act. They introduce no new principle.

Mr. CAHAN: But in this it is stated that the "defendant shall recover costs," while in the other, if I heard the quotation correctly, it is provided that the "defendant shall be entitled to costs."

Mr. ILSLEY: Is there any difference?

Mr. CAHAN: I think there is a very great difference.

Mr. ILSLEY: The words are these:

The defendant shall recover costs, and have such remedy for the same as any defendant—

And so forth.

Mr. CAHAN: I think in the first place the word "shall" should be "may." As my hon. friend from York South (Mr. Lawson) has stated, he should recover costs only if he is entitled to costs.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would make a change in the whole policy in these acts. The Excise Act, section 83, contains this provision:

And in such case or in case the plaintiff is non-suited or discontinues his action, or judgment is given for the defendant upon demurrer or otherwise, such defendant shall be entitled to the like costs as he would have been entitled to in case he had pleaded the general issue only.

Mr. CAHAN: Why not use the same language?

Mr. ILSLEY: The language is slightly different in each of these acts.

Mr. BENNETT: The action has to be brought within three calendar months, and nothing can be done until one calendar month after notice. That means that the cause of action has to be considered and action taken in practically two months.

Another point is this, that instead of the giving of notice being set up as a plea, there is put upon the plaintiff the onus of proving that notice has been given, which is not usual.

Lastly, there has been a great change in procedure since the Customs Act was passed, and demurrers as such do not at present prevail in many of the provinces in Canada. The action is dismissed merely because no cause of action has been established. Setting down actions on demurrer is something that, under the Judicature Act of England, which is in force in most of the provinces, no longer prevails. What you do is to set down a point of law, which is the old principle of the demurrer, to be considered by the court before the action is tried, and if the action is dismissed, as contemplated in this case, because no cause of action has been established or for other reasons, the defendant may recover his costs, but I should not think it desirable to say that he "shall" recover them.

The reason I mention this point is that I remember distinctly an action that was brought against the Department of Agriculture many, many years ago. It will be recalled that in the case against one of the members of the government of British Columbia the privy council decided that an action could properly be brought against him for failure to do his statutory duty and damages recovered, and after that it was not unusual for actions to be brought against officers of departments. The action I have in mind was brought against officials in the Department of Agriculture. No notice of the action had been given, and it was held that under the provisions of the law it was a good defence to say that he was a public officer and that no notice had been given. In some of the provinces we have provisions that all public officers and those holding public positions can be sued only if an action is brought against them. There is a direct conflict here between property and civil rights and the exercise of our exclusive powers under section 91. Property and civil rights has been held to be a matter solely within provincial jurisdiction. I am not at all clear that this is a matter which, because of its nature, enables us to legislate in connection with the statute of limitations with reference to bringing actions against individuals. In any event, I submit that three months is too short a time. In many of these cases a man will find that more than three months have gone before he has an opportunity of ascertaining the facts. He has to give notice after thirty days and it is quite clear that three months is not long enough. I think in some municipalities in western Canada the period is one year, while in others it is six months. To say that an action of this kind against an individual shall not be brought unless within three months, is an invitation in some instances to exercise powers which are beyond the jurisdiction of those exercising them.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the objection raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), I would be reluctant to make the period any more than three months. Three months is the period specified in the Customs Act and the Excise Act, and it seems to have been there for a long time.

Mr. BENNETT: Those are widely different powers.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Not very much. They are all based upon the same principle that considerable protection must be given to officers who are performing an invidious task, that of entering upon premises, looking at books and so on. I do not know what justification there could be for making an exception in the case of the Special War Revenue Act. The Excise Act is a very old act and as this section appears to have been taken from the revised statutes, I have no doubt it goes back a considerable length of time. The three month period is also to be found in the Customs Act. I do not know just what reason I could give for agreeing to the lengthening of that period in the Special War Revenue Act. With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson), I have not any strong feeling as to the necessity of having the word "shall" in the section. I would be willing to substitute the word "may," if it is thought that that would be more just. The court could then decide who would pay the costs, and perhaps that would be preferable.

Mr. CAHAN: Why not use the same words as are in section 83 of the Excise Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: I submit that those words could not be used because they refer to a system of pleading which, it seems to me, is not in use in many of the provinces. The wording is:

> Such defendant shall be entitled to the like costs as he would have been entitled to in case he had pleaded the general issue only.

The hon. gentleman knows better than I that I would not know just what that means. Does it mean a denial of all the facts stated in the statement of claim?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, not guilty by statute.

Mr. CAHAN: You use here the same terms, "The defendant may plead the general issue."

Mr. BENNETT: The second subsection of section 120 B reads:

> The defendant may plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence.

I think the whole section is obsolete.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think if the word "may" is substituted it will cover the situation. I would move that in line 15 on page 8 of the bill the word "shall" be struck out and the word "may" be inserted in its place.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question with reference to these actions against the officers in his department. I may say that I think these officers are doing their duty faithfully and they should be given protection against these damage suits which are being brought in the courts. An officer of this department is a great asset in collecting revenue, but sometimes he may feel that he cannot do his whole duty because he does not receive the same protection as is given other officers under the justice of the peace acts in the different provinces. Just recently huge frauds were disclosed at Washington in connection with the collections of customs and income taxes. Some of our officers may be a little timid because if they are sued in court they may have to pay costs equal, in some cases, to three or four months' pay.

The records in these cases should be public property as that is the only way in which the public can know who is defrauding the government in connection with customs and income taxes. In my opinion the minister should take up this matter during the recess. In the recent investigation at Washington it was found that Mr. Pierpont Morgan had never paid a cent of income tax. It was found also that smuggling of articles from all over the world was going on. I think the minister should consider during the recess whether in the public interest there should not be a registration system in each revenue district in Canada, which register would be open to the public, on payment of adequate fees of inspection as is done at the registry office. Case after case has been heard in the police court at Toronto and a record should be kept. The public never hears of the frauds which are being worked on the Canadian government, unless through these actions or suits. We know what the frauds are but unfortunately we cannot get the proper evidence. The minister and his department are doing good work against offenders; the officers of the department are faithful in their duty and they should have legal protection against the heavy costs which may be involved. If we are to have an active and militant force to collect the revenues under this act, then the government of the day should see that these officers are protected. They should have the same protection as is given many provincial officers under the departments of the attorneys general.

The recent mass buying and price spreads inquiry showed the huge frauds which are being worked. Look at what happened to some of the smugglers. They had to go down to Washington to settle their cases. Enormous whisky shipments were made across the lakes and these people had to go to a foreign government and pay $3,000,000 for the smuggling of whisky into the United States. We should conduct in Canada an investigation similar to that before the United States senate. If that were done we might be able to reduce the income tax, the sales tax and many other taxes which have become a burden on the people.

I contend that there should be a public register. Now we have to have a statement of claim, a statement of defence, an examination for discovery and a prosecution in the high court or the police court before the public can get any evidence of the frauds on the government. Then all they see is a paragraph in the daily press. We all know how much attention the daily press pays to this parliament. The papers do not bother with what is happening here or report the proceedings as formerly; they leave it all to the Canadian press. They give only about one-tenth of what is said here and sometimes that is not, in some cases, entirely correct. However, they are doing good, faithful work and they deserve a great deal of credit for the way in which they assist parliament.

I contend that if we have registers in the municipalities and provinces for real estate transactions, chattel mortgages, bills of sale, bills of lading, lien notes and all that kind of thing, it is time we made public the frauds being committed against the government by establishing a public register open to inspection for federal affairs I have named. You can go to the city clerk's office in any city or town in Canada, look up the roll and ascertain what a man is paying on income and business; but when it comes to federal affairs we have made no progress since confederation towards establishing a registry system whereby we can find out what the chisellers who are beating the government in customs duties and income tax as shown in the customs inquiry, are doing. It is not the small salaried man; it is not the consumer; he has to pay five or ten times over because of frauds against the government. We have seen the revelations at Washington and in the senate there, and we know what happened before the mass buying and price spreads commission in Canada. Anybody can go to Osgoode Hall and look up the statement of claim and the defence in the suits against our officers under this bill. The case comes up before the county court or the supreme court or the police court and you can get the evidence on payment of a small fee and a stamp tax in the court offices. Look at the way in which they are dealing with frauds in the old country, even where members of the House of Commons are concerned. There they enforce the law. I venture to say that if there were a federal register along the lines I propose it would work satisfactorily, because anyone could go to a district office and by paying a small tax get the necessary information without inconvenience. Anybody who wanted information would have to pay for it; there would be a stamp tax of twenty-five or fifty cents, and no one would abuse the right. Moreover, that stamp tax would pay for the labour involved, giving a few extra men jobs. I am simply astonished at what has been going on, without any questions being asked in the House of Commons. People have been beating the regulations on both sides of the border in connection with customs and income tax. We find for years armed Canadian vessels on the great lakes, vessels loaded with smuggled whisky supplies bound for the United States, in violation, on the lakes, of the Rush-Bagot treaty, and they get away with it. And yet we are supposed to have an embassy at Washington, the result of our magnificent dream of separatism. Over the heads of the Canadian government these smugglers a month ago went to Washington and settled there with the United States government, a friendly power, for all this and for beating the regulations, and how they get away with it I do not know. We are away behind the times in the matter of law reform as regards income tax and customs law enforcement.

How will these officers be treated under section 13? Some man may have been beating the regulations, and if an officer takes any steps to cope with him he is threatened with a lawsuit. The consequence is that these officers may be intimidated by threats of suit; they are men receiving small salaries and under such circumstances they cannot be expected to do their duty properly. There are many people in Canada who are not paying income tax on millions of dollars of income from tax free bonds. No wonder they have been able to do so with impunity, and no wonder there is dissension in the country among the working classes, who have to pay heavy taxes—for everything is passed along to the consumer. The working people are getting sick of this sort of thing. They have come to the conclusion that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor in these revenue matters; that the small man must pay while the rich man can get away with it in the way I have indicated.

I do not blame the present minister; I do not blame the present government, far from it. I submit, however, that the government should look into this matter very carefully and appoint a committee of the house on investigation. Certainly this state of the law regarding litigation is not fair to the poor officers of the department. As I say, they receive small salaries and there is no reason why they should be faced with litigation and the necessity of engaging counsel to defend them for doing their duty to the government. Sometimes the costs are against the plaintiff, but in any event the officer will be put to a good deal of expense. The time has come when the whole policy should be changed. There should be some sort of system whereby those who want information may be able to obtain it, and a stop should be put to the frauds that are being committed by big business as has been shown in our mass buying committee and at Washington.

Mr. BENNETT: Notwithstanding what the minister has said, the distinction between this measure and action taken under either the Customs Act or the Excise Act is very clear. This statute came into force only after the war, and it deals with conditions that are not contemplated in either the Customs Act or the Excise Act. The powers given the officers are far greater and they are more difficult to ascertain. For reasons which the hon. gentleman knows, in connection with the collection of income tax and matters of that sort, it was necessary to clothe the officers with wide authority in dealing with such questions. I am dealing only with the question with respect to the Special War Revenue Act. If the minister would be good enough to observe, first of all the general issue may be pleaded, which means that the defendant may give special matter in evidence, pleading not guilty by statute, and setting out in the margin the number of the statute. The second provision is to enable action to be brought even within three months; then notice has to be given within one of these three months, and he has thirty days after notice has been given to make amends. If notice is given so that the thirty day period expires towards the end of the three months, then obviously the exercise of the thirty day right with respect to making amends could not be within the three month period, because the action itself has to be brought within three months. Further, it is provided that the defendant shall be entitled to "the like costs"—in section 120C, the same as in the preceding one—which probably in that case will not do very much harm. In view of the amendment made by substituting the word "may" for the word "shall" that difficulty may be overcome. But when you come to section 120D, you have an entirely new principle. I do not know whether it is in the old Customs Act, but if it is, it is not satisfactory. This provision reads:

If, in any such action, the court or judge before whom the action is tried certifies that the defendant or defendants in such action acted upon probable cause, the plaintiff in such action shall not be entitled to more than twenty cents damages, nor to any costs of suit.

The rule is, reasonable and probable cause; and the House of Lords having decided that action would lie against a corporation in connection with actions of malicious prosecution, great importance attaches to the use of the words "reasonable and probable cause." The minister will find that the words "upon probable cause" are not the words that have received judicial interpretation in the courts of the country; those words are "reasonable and probable cause." I do not know what the old Customs Act says; it may say "probable cause." But certainly that statute is a very old one; we have made a great many changes and much progress since then. It might be well, therefore, to keep that in mind, if we are to apply the general principles and not deprive a man of the fruits of his victory. That is to say, a man goes into court, brings action and succeeds in proving damages. The court enters judgment for him for, we will say for the sake of argument, $500. But if the judge certifies that he had probable cause for bringing his action, then the result is that he gets twenty cents damages and no costs. The rule, I submit, is reasonable and probable cause, because probable cause is one thing and reasonable cause is another. There must be a combination of both reasonable cause and probable cause, in the cases that have received consideration by the courts of the country, to enable certain actions to be properly maintained. Are we not going too far when we say that probable cause entitles a successful plaintiff to twenty cents only, and no costs, without adding reasonable cause? For, as I say, a man may have a reasonable cause though it is not a probable cause. He may have probable cause which is not reasonable. I think the combination of words on which the decisions have been given make it necessary that similar words should be added to a statute such as this to enable the situation to be dealt with in the light of the decisions of the courts.

Mr. ILSLEY: The words "probable cause" are used in both the Excise Act and the Customs Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Conditions have changed a great deal since those acts were drafted.

Mr. ILSLEY: The phrase "reasonable and probable cause" is a very old one; it is one of the questions which arise in every action for malicious prosecution. That is the type of action in which it arises. There may be a difference between reasonable cause and probable cause, but probably that point has been considered by the courts; I am not sure whether or not it has. I do not think in committee of the whole we should depart from the old language of these acts unless we know exactly what we are doing. It may be that the words "probable cause" as used in the Customs Act and the Excise Act have received judicial interpretation on many occasions, and if in a hasty way we were to adopt the language that is applicable to actions for malicious prosecution and put it into this one act, out of the three, we might be doing something that would prove to be very embarrassing. I would prefer to adhere to the language which has been used in similar acts in the past and which, as far as I know, always has been in these acts.

Mr. BENNETT: Far be it from me to press the matter further than to direct attention to it, but I have never seen a more obsolete statute than the one we are now passing. The old statute is obsolete; it is perfectly useless. When you talk about pleading the general issue and demurrers, I fancy that when my hon. friend was a law student the law had made such progress that he was not even compelled to learn what the general issue meant in pleading to an action, and actions on the case and trespass were long since forgotten. Statements of claim became merely concise statements of the circumstances upon which the right to recover were based. Here we are still adhering to the time-worn, obsolete provisions which were first put upon our statute books in 1868 or 1870, I think, and which have come down through the years. Now we are enacting something, but instead of making it modern we say; All right; the Customs Act had it for fifty years; the Excise Act had it for fifty years; so let us copy it. I am sure that cannot be sound.

Mr. ILSLEY: The statute of frauds has had substantially the same wording since the time of Charles II.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. It has been reenacted in practically every country in the world, and the reasons given for that have been excellent. One judge said that every word in that statute cost a subsidy, as I am sure the hon. gentleman will recall.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what I am afraid of in this instance.

Mr. BENNETT: The most reactionary Tory could hardly desire any stronger statement of reactionary principles than to say: Well, these things are old; they are all right, so let us stick to them. That is not the way in which progress is made. I say to the minister that this provision is unworkable and obsolete in this act as well as in the Customs Act and the Excise Act. I can tell the minister more. I am not busily engaged in practising my profession, but certainly if I had someone consult me in respect to this I would not pay much attention to it. I do not think we have considered it at all in the light of the decisions as to the power of this parliament to deal with matters of this kind, where property and civil rights are affected. We enacted that statute a very long time ago, and I say that if we are going to reenact a principle and insert it in a statute we should do so according to our conceptions of modern conditions rather than blindly follow something that is fifty years old and that we know is no good. The minister himself says that he would not be concerned about the general issue.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was set right on that, and I think pretty effectively, by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I was told what the general issue meant by both the right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, but that does not get away from the fact that we have this difficulty, and in a modern statute we are perpetuating the provisions of a statute passed half a century ago. However, I am quite content now that I have directed attention to the point.

Mr. LAWSON: Even though this may be a repetition of some wording that appears in other acts I am not going to give my approval to something with which I entirely disagree, and I promise my hon. friend the minister that if I get a chance to say something against this provision as it appears in the Customs Act or any other act, I shall do so.

Under section 120D I think you are taking away something from the very people you want to help. Let me illustrate that. The minister referred to an action for malicious prosecution. I quite agree that that is the sort of action in which this language would be brought before the courts. My hon. friend will remember that when you go before a court in an action for malicious prosecution, if you are for the plaintiff you have to do two things. First, you have to satisfy the judge that there was no reasonable and probable cause or you do not get to the jury at all, assuming that you have a jury trial. Then, the judge having found a lack of reasonable and probable cause, you are allowed to go to the jury, where you have to establish the further factor called malice. All right. Let us take a customs officer going into court as defendant in an action for malicious prosecution. Before a verdict can be obtained by the plaintiff the judge has to find that there was lack of reasonable and probable cause. Under this section, however, the judge has to make a much stronger finding in favour of the customs officer. He must find affirmatively that there was probable cause. It seems to me that in this section, though you may be repeating the words that appear in the Customs Act, you are not conferring any more protection or any greater right on your customs officer but you are introducing into present day legislation terms which, as far as I know, have not been defined or interpreted by the courts, when at the same time you have terms available that have been interpreted almost as extensively as the old 13 Elizabeth section of the statute of frauds.

I suggest to the minister that he reconsider the wording of this section. I should like to point out something else to the committee, in connection with section 120C, to show the effect this provision may have, as I see it. Under section 120C a plaintiff brings an action. We will assume, first, that he thinks he has a cause of action. He does not go to a lawyer for two or three weeks; these people do not always rush off to some lawyer the next morning. In this case the lawyer looks up the provisions of the law and tells this man, "We will have to serve a notice." After he serves the notice he cannot do anything for a month, so there is a month and three weeks gone by. He also remembers that he has only three months within which to issue his writ so, being a prudent and discreet lawyer, within at least a week after the notice has expired he issues the writ. In other words he has issued his writ two months after the cause of action. Then the customs officer comes along with a notice in which he tenders some amends. Now the writ has been issued.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That is within the calendar month after the notice.

Mr. LAWSON: Yes, within a month after the officer receives the notice he tenders some amends. Under the ordinary law these amends would be in mitigation of damages. Under this section it is in complete bar of damages. If that were all it would not be so bad, but the plaintiff, having issued his writ before he got the amends, even if he accepts the amends and discontinues his action, is still liable to pay costs, in an action under which he could not do other than issue the writ, because section 120C says:

—and in such case, or in case the plaintiff ... discontinues his action, ... such defendant shall be entitled to the like costs as he would have been entitled to in case he had pleaded the general issue only:

I suggest that my hon. friend consider both those phases of the matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend is wrong about the sequence of events. The tender of amends is not within a month after the action is brought; it is within a month after the notice is given.

Mr. LAWSON: Quite right, but a condition might arise where, for the plaintiff to maintain his right of action, he would have to issue his writ before the officer is required to make the amends. Take a concrete case. Say alleged offence is committed to-day. Say the plaintiff's solicitor does not serve the notice until two months less one day after the commission of the offence. He would have to be within that time, or his action is barred. He has to issue his writ on the last day of the third month, in that event. Well, if the customs officer can tender the amends within one month after the notice is served, obviously he is not going to tender the amends the very day he gets the notice. Consequently the customs officer might tender the amends any time within one month less one day after the writ was issued, in which event the plaintiff must, under section 120C, pay the costs of issuing the writ. I am anxious to protect officers, but we should not put unreasonable things on our statutes.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 2, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

That it is expedient to amend the Judges Act to provide salaries for the Ontario appeal and high court judges as presently constituted; and further provide that when a vacancy occurs in the office of chief justice in appeal the office shall be abolished and the court shall thereafter consist of a chief justice and seven other judges.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The object of this resolution and of the bill which will follow its adoption is to give effect to amendments which have been made to the Ontario judicature act by the legislature of Ontario, first in 1931, and in 1936 at the last session. In 1931 the legislature of Ontario provided for a reduction in the court of appeal from ten members to eight, by providing that when vacancies occur they be not filled. But at the same time the legislature increased the high court trial division by two members, providing that when vacancies occurred in the appeal court the appointments would be made to the trial division instead of to the appeal court.

Mr. BENNETT: It did not increase the total number?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It did not increase the total number. This legislation is to give effect to this change in the constitution of the court, plus an addition of two judges. The purpose of the bill is in reality to add two judges to the trial division of the high court of Ontario. The reason for it, as has been represented by the provincial authorities, is the increase of legal business in the province, and more particularly the fact that two of the judges of the trial division have to devote their activities to other work. One has to devote all his time to bankruptcy matters, and another at the present time is engaged in the work coming to him under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. The result is that on many occasions it has been impossible to have a judge of the high court at the county seat at the usual terms. The representations made were found sufficient by the legislature of Ontario, and when they were made to this government we thought we should give effect to the intention of the legislature. Under the constitution the province creates the courts and the federal parliament provides for appointment and salaries of the judges.

Mr. BENNETT: As I read the resolution it seems to me to be couched in unusual language to accomplish the end in view. The resolution reads:

That it is expedient to amend the Judges Act to provide salaries for the Ontario appeal and high court judges as presently constituted ...

Does it contemplate any change in salaries?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No. The apparent ambiguity struck me too, but the law officer who drafted it represented to me, and I accepted his explanation, that the term "as presently constituted" means as constituted by the Judicature Act of the province of Ontario. It is constituted, though effect has not been given here.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; that is, it is constituted by statute of 1936.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: A statute of the Ontario legislature was passed last session, and the effect of it is to increase by two the number of high court judges.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And with the aid of the statute of 1931 to bring about a reduction in the court of appeal from twelve to ten judges—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I forgot to say that one of the chief justices will disappear.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And when he vacates his office he will be replaced by an ordinary judge.

Mr. BENNETT: There will be seven other judges.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: There were ten originally.

Mr. BENNETT: But as a result of the action of the legislature the court of appeal consists of the chief justice and seven other judges.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: This would seem to be the proper time to make some general observations in this connection, in view of the fact that the minister and I were the subject matter of some discussion at the last meeting of the Canadian Bar Association. I do not think either the minister or myself has anything to withdraw. I can speak only for myself as to what has been said on previous occasions with respect to the judiciary.

Recently in England a commission was appointed to investigate the whole matter of the age of retirement of judges, and although I have not the information before me, and am trusting to my memory—I had not prepared to speak to the matter to-day—I believe the limit was placed at seventy-three. Does the minister remember the official recommendation? Can he say whether it was seventy-three or seventy-five?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I thought it was seventy-five, but my right hon. friend may be right.

Mr. BENNETT: At present there is a conflict in my memory between seventy-three and seventy-five, and I do not wish to express a certain opinion as to which it was.

Mr. FACTOR: Seventy-five.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. BENNETT: In respect of our federal courts—the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court of Canada—and the county courts, we have provided a retiring age of seventy-five years. There is not much doubt that starting at one end of Canada and travelling to the other one may find large numbers of men endeavouring to discharge judicial functions who are physically unable to bear the strain of work and continuous effort necessary in the discharge of those duties. One makes that statement with great hesitancy, but it is a fact. It was so much so that at one time when the minister was in office he found it essential to enact legislation to enable him to deal with the difficulty. That legislation was severely challenged at the last meeting of the Canadian Bar Association. We introduced legislation to go a step farther and provide for retirement at seventy-five years. That, too, was challenged as being very unsatisfactory and as something which would impair the position of the judges.

For a moment let us examine the situation. I think the minister will agree it is time we were doing so. If all judges in Ontario were physically fit to discharge their judicial duties there would be no necessity of increasing the number by two. I believe that is so obvious that it needs only to be mentioned. There are other provinces in the confederation in which exactly the same difficulty prevails. Whether or not it is wise to discuss them in detail I have not yet made up my mind, but when the bill is introduced and has reached the committee stage I shall determine what course of action to pursue.

This is the principle which I submit should govern parliament in dealing with matters of this kind. First, if a man holds himself out as being qualified by training to occupy any position requiring the services of an expert—whether it be judge, doctor, dentist or engineer; it matters not—unless he has the proper qualifications he should not be appointed to the position, whatever it may be. Second, when he ceases to possess those qualifications he should no longer continue in office. Is there any possibility of getting away from the second proposition? We endeavour to have some regard, in a small way, for the first one. But the second, which is a corollary of the first, has been the very foundation of the impartial administration of justice, namely that when men hold themselves out as being sufficiently trained in the law to enable them to undertake judicial duties, and when by reason of impairment of physical or mental capacity they are no longer able to give concentrated attention for periods extending over seven, eight or nine hours a day, obviously they are no longer qualified for the positions they hold. It is an implied condition of the contract they make with the state that they will be able to discharge those duties and give the services indicated, and when they have reached the stage where they can no longer do so, it seems to me they should be content to retire. That is the position I have taken in the matter. It is not a new one to-day, nor was it new during the last parliament; it dates back farther than that. My personal conviction is that that is the only way we can get satisfactory service. Whether or not we should assert our views in the manner in which we endeavoured to do, and failed to succeed in doing, is still open for discussion and comment.

Mr. FACTOR: Does not the British North America Act provide life appointment for judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, but there is an implied condition that a man who undertakes to hold a position for life is qualified to do it; otherwise what have we?

Mr. FACTOR: I agree.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the result? If we were to rely altogether upon the provisions of the British North America Act whereby the judge may hold office during life and good behaviour, all we could do would be to appoint, and that would settle the matter; although the appointee might be an invalid, until an address were passed by both houses of parliament he could continue to occupy his position. It was that position that the present Minister of Justice had to meet on a previous occasion. The statute, it is true, was not originated by him, but when it was finally settled by the government of the day it provided for judicial inquiry as to physical or mental fitness, and if it was found as a result of inquiry that the occupant of a judicial position by impairment of either physical or mental health was unfit to discharge his duties, he could be retired, and the terms of retirement were provided in the act.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But it is a difficult thing to do.

Mr. BENNETT: Very. Judicial duties are always difficult to discharge; we know that. They involve the exercise of the highest qualities of which the human mind is capable, because justice is an attribute of the godhead, and frail humanity can only approximate an administration of justice as it should be administered. Failure to realize that is responsible for many of our difficulties.

The point I make is this: In any appointment where special knowledge is required, whether it be engineering or of some other professional kind, is it not an implied condition that with the payment of the salary there must be a maintenance of the special qualities upon which such payment is predicated? If there is a departure from that condition by reason of physical or mental incapacity, then obviously the right of the state to pay should also be terminated. For instance, if a judge is so deaf that he cannot hear the evidence, I suggest the matter is tremendously serious. What about the rights of those who stand in the dock before a judge who cannot hear and clearly appreciate the evidence of witnesses? Yet it is a condition that obtains at this time in more than one province. In the court of appeal it is not so difficult, yet it is a very unsound condition if the judge cannot hear what is said by counsel. Again, if a man has reached an age where concentration of effort has become practically impossible, is it quite right to say that litigants should have to defer to such a judge or that the state under such conditions should continue to pay, pay, pay?

These are problems to which I think we shall have to direct our attention, and they are not easy problems to deal with. By the time the bill is introduced I hope to have concluded whether it will serve a useful public purpose to deal with these problems one after the other and point out what the actual situation is, and the ages the judges have reached. It is not so much a question of age. For instance, I know of a case in which the appointee was not old but developed a condition which made it impossible for him satisfactorily to discharge judicial functions; he could not give concentrated attention to problems over a period of five or six hours a day, and that situation when it is known is one that should be dealt with. In England, where they have so magnificent a judicial system, they found it necessary to appoint a commission a few months ago to deal with the problem and make a report, which I shall endeavour to secure before we reach the bill, and if that is so in a country like England, where the appointments have no political flavour as they very often have in this country, it becomes tremendously important, it seems to me, that we should have a clear understanding of what the implied conditions are when one is appointed to the bench.

Undoubtedly, ever since the Act of Settlement, judges have held office during life and good behaviour and can be removed only on the petition of both houses of parliament, assigning the cause and affording an opportunity to be heard. But I contend that in all judicial appointments there is an implied condition that the one who accepts them has at least the expert qualities that would be required of one who was appointed, say to the position of engineer. The reason why a lawyer is appointed to the bench to discharge judicial duties is that he is supposed to be trained in the law, and the implied condition is that he is fit to discharge the duties of the office to which he is appointed. If he no longer is able to do so, then clearly the obligation of the state should no longer continue. I think one is complementary to the other; the holding of office during life means during the lifetime of usefulness of the appointee. By "usefulness" I mean that he possess the physical and mental equipment necessary to enable him to discharge judicial functions, which means work for six, seven, eight, and perhaps more hours than that a day during the time his court is sitting. That is so at least in most countries, and it has been the principle that has governed judges in their attitude towards continuance in office. If we pay salaries so wholly inadequate that, with the increased costs and burdens that have been placed upon them for income tax and other matters, what was once ample compensation to secure judicial services of the highest quality is no longer sufficient to make them available and the salaries are out of proportion to the responsibilities involved, the situation is serious; and with the increased cost of living and heavier taxation many would—they have told me so—retire because their conscience tells them they are no longer fit to discharge to the full the duties of their office, but they are compelled to remain in office in order that they may care for themselves and their families and their homes. It is a serious situation.

When the committee was appointed during my hon. friend's former administration I then said what I still say, that you will never get a committee of this house to improve judicial salaries because the least effective and efficient will be most vocal in their demands for increased emoluments, and the result was as I think most of us anticipated. The minister endeavoured to do his best, but it was impossible in view of the turn which things took in a committee of this house to get any further than we did. On the other hand, it is clear that if we are to give effect to the views which the minister entertains as to the importance of the court of last resort in Canada being as strong as possible, we must commence to pay adequate compensation to the members of that court. Having regard to the tremendous responsibilities they have one can only observe that in the United States they have found it necessary to increase the salaries and emoluments of their judges in their court of last resort, so that their chief justice now receives, I think, $25,000. He always received a slightly higher salary than the puisne members of the court. When one thinks of the implications of the decisions of that court, one realizes that their responsibilities are very great, and while in this country they could not under any circumstances be so great, nevertheless they are very great in themselves.

We might start with our court of last resort, and from that possibly proceed further, but it would have to be, in my judgment, on the condition that there is a recognition on the part of all of the implied condition of service which I do not think any judge will successfully contend does not attach, because he has to hear cases from time to time of men who bring actions to recover fees for professional services, and if an engineer of great repute were to go into court and claim that he was entitled to recover $25,000 per annum over a given period of time because he had a retainer from a company, and the company pleaded that his physical and mental condition was such that he could not possibly do the work which devolved upon him by virtue of that retainer, I do not think any judge I know of would hesitate very long to declare that he could not recover. And yet they assert, and did at the bar association, a principle which is just the opposite of that, and the negation of the application of the doctrine of implied fitness for the position to which they have been appointed.

Mr. MacLENNAN: Who is to decide as to their physical and mental fitness?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLennan) has raised the question, who is to determine their fitness? The statute which was passed under the aegis of the present Minister of Justice makes provision for that. It provides that his fellow judges, not necessarily in the province in which he lives, but members of the judiciary, are to decide that question, and it is a pretty difficult thing to place that burden upon them. In connection with county court judges, of course, we do appoint commissions of inquiry, and we have the power of removal, and on two occasions that power has been exercised in the last fifteen years. It was exercised by my friend the Minister of Justice during his former administration, and it was exercised by a government in the early nineteen hundreds. In all these cases judicial inquiries were held; the fitness of the judge was reported to the executive, and the executive took the appropriate action. To have a commission of judges appointed to inquire into the mental equipment and physical condition of judges is very difficult and is the reason why this parliament fixed an age limit with respect to the federal and county courts.

The difficulty in connection with the county courts is that if one of seventy years of age were appointed to the county court tomorrow he would retire at seventy-five years on full pay. That is the reason why we have the unwritten rule that a man over sixty years of age should not be appointed to the bench. This has been sometimes disregarded, but in the main it is observed. I can recall the efforts I made when I was first a member of this house to secure the appointment to the bench of a gentleman who was perhaps better qualified than any other man in Alberta, but as his age was something like sixty-five years the late Judge Doherty said he could not appoint him. That general rule has prevailed. If fifteen is added to sixty it makes seventy-five, and that is the age at which a county court judge retires. That has been the general rule, but there have been exceptions with respect to the higher courts.

I bring this matter to the attention of the minister because I have frequently discussed it with him and I know how concerned he is about it. I still have the perhaps antiquated and old fashioned view that of the three branches of our polity, the legislative, the executive and the judicial, the judicial is the one in which we must place the greatest reliance. Although the judicial branch has not the same powers as it has in the great republic to the south, nevertheless its powers are tremendous. Being what they are, it devolves upon us to take every step possible to obviate dissatisfaction on the part of the public, on the one hand, with the service they receive, and those who give themselves to judicial office, on the other hand, from having any possible thought that they have been unfairly treated by parliament, which is just another way of saying that the people have treated them unfairly. There should be a measure of obligation on the part of the one fully as great as there is on the part of the other. There should be an obligation on the part of the people to pay the sums fixed by parliament and, in my judgment, there should be an obligation on the part of those who receive payment to take it only so long as they are fit physically and mentally to discharge the implied obligations of their office, namely, to give that continuous attention to judicial work which was an essential condition of their being appointed.

So far as Ontario is concerned, it is quite obvious to anyone who knows the facts—whether or not they will be stated at length I shall have to leave to my own judgment later on—that these two appointments would not be necessary were it not for the age conditions that prevail. That is known to everyone familiar with the situation. The judges are doing bankruptcy work in all the provinces, but the work under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act will slacken instead of increase. Probably it will have run itself out and be disposed of before long. That could not be made the reason for the appointment of two additional judges if the judges of the high court and the court of appeal were of an age where they could concentrate their physical energies and mental abilities upon the discharge of their judicial functions. Two or three hours a day is all that some of them are able to give in concentrated form to the problems of their courts. When one has reached a certain age it is not to be expected that he can go out to county towns to hold assizes with any degree of satisfaction to himself, or, shall I say, to those who have litigation in the courts over which he presides.

I do not envy the minister the difficulties of his position, but difficulties must be faced in dealing with matters of this kind. I think it is very unfair to impose upon the Canadian people the salaries of two additional high court judges in the province of Ontario when the necessity for so doing is attributable to conditions which have nothing to do with increased litigation or increased population, but arises out of the unfortunate circumstances to which I have alluded, and which I say again are not confined to the one province in this confederation.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, on previous occasions I have differed from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) with regard to the age of retirement for judges. I think a great injustice is sometimes done and the public interest sometimes suffers by prescribing a certain age for the retirement of either judicial officers or of officers of the civil service. Each case should be decided upon its own merits. On a previous occasion I called attention to the age of eminent judges serving in Great Britain and the United States who had reached an age far beyond the limit of seventy-five years fixed by the statute introduced by the Minister of Justice as the age of retirement of judges of the federal and county courts. Without wanting in respect, I do say that a difficulty has arisen in Canada because of the lack of moral courage on the part of successive ministers of justice in the various adminstrations. I think section 28 of the Judges act was passed in 1922 and since then no minister of justice has had the courage to take the necessary measures prescribed by statute for the retirement of judges who have lost their capacity and efficiency. The statute to which I refer is chapter 105 of the revised statutes of Canada. Section 28 reads as follows:

28. (1) Any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any superior court in Canada, or any local judge in admiralty of the Exchequer Court of Canada or any judge of a county court, who is found by the governor in council, upon report of the Minister of Justice, to have become, by reason of age or infirmity, incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of his office, shall, notwithstanding anything in this act contained, cease to be paid or to receive or to be entitled to receive any further salary, if the facts respecting the incapacity or disability are first made the subject of inquiry and report in the manner hereinafter provided, and the judge is given reasonable notice of the time and place appointed for the inquiry and is afforded an opportunity by himself or his counsel of being heard thereat and of cross-examination of witnesses and of adducing evidence on his own behalf.

The next subsection reads:

(2) The governor in council may, for the purpose of making inquiry into the facts respecting the incapacity or disability of any such judge, issue a commission of inquiry to one or more judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, or of the Exchequer Court of Canada, or to one or more judges of any superior court in Canada, empowering him or them to make such inquiry and report,—

There is a reasonable provision for inquiry into the capacity of any judge holding an appointment to either of the courts mentioned, but the fact is that except in respect of county court judges this statutory power has not been exercised. I think it is due to a lack of moral courage on the part of the successive members of government holding the office of Minister of Justice. That office requires certain qualities and capacities greater than are vested in the ordinary member of parliament or in the ordinary member of government. In England the Lord High Chancellor does not fail, when called upon to exercise very great powers, by reason of his personal relations to those who have been appointed to and are sitting on the bench. When the Minister of Justice sees that a judge is apparently lacking in capacity or is disabled by reason of age or infirmity, or otherwise incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of his office, it is his moral and statutory duty, I submit, to provide for an inquiry and, if the report upon inquiry sustains retirement, to report to council accordingly and have the judge retired. The Minister of Justice should act in accordance with the responsibilities of his office—and I am not making any special reflections on the present minister. But if he would do that, as I think he is bound to do in the exercise of the duties and responsibilities of his high office, we would avoid these scandals which we see every day when the courts are in session, in almost every province in Canada.

Mr. CHURCH: The province of Ontario is empowered by the British North America Act to look after the constitution of the law courts in the province. I can see very little reason for this increase. This parliament, which provides the judges' salaries, should have some say before acts are passed by the Ontario legislature, when we are required to pay the salaries. There is no doubt that a good many of the supreme court judges are overworked, particularly those who go out on circuit. But take the votes in connection with the judges in Ontario. There is the Chief Justice of Ontario, whose salary is $10,000; Chief Justice in Appeal, $10,000; Chief Justice of the High Court of Justice, $10,000; salaries of six justices of appeal, at $9,000; salaries of ten judges of the high court, $90,000; and salaries of sixty-five county court judges at $5,000, together with travelling expenses, amounting in all to $400,000 a year. As was pointed out in the committee that sat in the session of 1929-30, in this province we have nearly as many judges as there are in England, with a population of 47 millions. I am not here to say anything against the splendid work done by the fine gentlemen who comprise the Supreme Court of Ontario, and as I say a great many of them are overworked. There is no doubt that this parliament, by delegating to them appeals in criminal cases and divorce legislation have added considerably to the work of certain judges. But on the other hand there is a good deal of work which, formerly performed by the supreme court, now goes to the county court. I would refer to Judge Morson, of the county court, who has retired on pension. In the first and tenth division courts of Toronto he did the work which is now being done by three judges. When you consider that there are sixty-five county and junior judges in the counties of Ontario, the vote is a large one for that province. I was asking a prominent member of the bar the other day his opinion of this particular bill so far as Ontario is concerned, and he said he was very much opposed to it. I saw in the newspapers the pictures of two gentlemen who are said to have been selected.

I think there should be a survey of this whole situation, and I suggest that the bill stand over until next year. I approve of an addition to the number of circuit judges, because when one of these judges is taken ill it is difficult to get someone to take his place. I understand that a recommendation was made this or last year that, in addition to the present list of supreme court circuit judges, there should be a special judge who would be available if relief were necessary along the lines I suggest, at Osgoode Hall. I know a great many of the judges and I know that they work very hard and are worn out by the time the long vacation comes. But in Ontario, not satisfied with having passed the act to which the Minister of Justice has referred in this resolution, they have upset the whole jurisdiction of the magistrates' courts throughout the province. Magistrates from York county have been transferred to Oakville, Milton, and other places all over the province, though they were appointed, in the first instance, for the county of York.

In my opinion a committee of the house should be appointed to study this question with regard to the judges, and the whole question of law reform, and in particular I would suggest a rearrangement of the work of the judges in view of the acts that have been already passed by the province, removing from the high court certain jurisdiction and placing it in the county court. This bill should be laid over for a year. We are getting law reform by means of two or three haphazard bills introduced during the course of the session, whereas in my opinion the whole problem of law reform should be carefully studied as it was in England with a view to reducing the cost of the administration of justice, and increasing the efficiency of justice in this country. There is need for such law reform. I have the highest respect for the able, hard working and most admirable body of men who have served the country on the bench of Ontario, not only in the court of appeal but in the supreme court and county courts and in the magistrates' courts as well. The administration of justice in this country has reflected the greatest credit on those in charge of it.

I believe there is a great deal in what the leader of the opposition has said. Day after day on the streets of the city I come from I meet some of the judges, some of whom I know are very much overworked, while others may not be doing as much work. In 1929-30 it was found that three high court judges had left the bench to engage in a federal political inquiry—the late Mr. Robb used to call it the whisky inquiry, into customs and smuggling. Two or three judges, including one from Regina, left the bench for a year to carry on extra work, for which they got extra pay amounting to a large sum of money in addition to federal pay as judges, which others did their work. Judges should not be used for political investigations and inquiries; they have enough hard work as it is without being loaded up with all these extra duties. Much extra work has been placed on the supreme court judges, as well as other judges, by the Ontario legislature as well as federal authority. The lists of divorce cases at the non-jury sittings throughout this province have become appalling, just as was expected when we divested ourselves of this power and turned it over to the courts. The number of divorces is multiplying by two or three, and they are being made easier to obtain by the mistakes of this parliament. There are appeals, now also in criminal cases and every session adds to the work of our judges, and the pay is inadequate.

I believe it would be better if the minister would consider appointing a committee of the House of Commons or of both houses of parliament on law reform to go into the whole question of our judges and of law reform as they did in England. Let us have something concrete; let us bring the law up to date. As far as this measure goes, I believe we do need one additional judge for circuit work or so in Ontario, but the problem should be taken up in a larger way in order to consolidate the work, improve the efficiency of the law courts and prevent delays. I know one chief justice whom I saw on the street-car just the other day, who had been out on circuit hearing a very important case on constitutional questions. He has been overworked so much that he is ill. I was not speaking to him about this matter, but he certainly has been working very hard, hearing heavy cases that the newer younger judges are not given as yet. I must say that in my opinion recent appointments to the bench of younger men have been exceedingly well made, and these new judges in the supreme court are doing excellent work out on circuit that is a credit to the bench and the administration of justice which stands so high in Canada and is most creditable to the country.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I should like to say just a word with regard to the suggestion of the right hon. leader of the opposition that some means be provided for retiring judges who have ceased to be physically or mentally fit to discharge their duties. I lived for some years in a city where the judge suffered, unfortunately, from periodic attacks of amnesia. The result was that over quite a period of time some very unfortunate decisions were handed down. There were two results. One was that the attitude towards the law in that particular community was one of ridicule; the second was that practically every decision had to be appealed. Many of the decisions were reversed and practically all were modified to some extent. I appreciate that this would be a delicate matter to deal with, but surely it ought to be possible to enact legislation which would permit of the retirement of men no longer able to discharge their duties efficiently. The authority of the law can be maintained, it would seem to me, only if the men sitting on the bench inspire confidence rather than ridicule.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I shall reserve my remarks until the bill is under consideration.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 83, to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR EXPENDITURE, INDEBTEDNESS AND THE REFUNDING OF MATURING OBLIGATIONS

The house resumed from Thursday, April 23, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting the Canadian National Railways, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1936, and to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, when this resolution was before the committee previously it was indicated that the standing committee on railways and shipping had not at that time finished its consideration of the estimates of the Canadian National Railways, and therefore the committee of the whole rose without completing its work. Since then the standing committee of the house dealing with these matters has completed its work and reported on this particular phase of the matter, as will be seen by reference to the votes and proceedings of April 30. I think, therefore, that any objection to the introduction of the bill has been met by what has happened since. I propose now, if the committee agrees to the resolution, just to introduce the bill; I do not expect it to be read the second time to-day, of course.

Mr. BENNETT: There is only one observation that I desire to make. It is this: In view of the evidence given before the special committee it does appear to me that there is not sufficient money provided for the deficit that inevitably must result.

Mr. DUNNING: This does not deal with the deficit.

Mr. BENNETT: But it deals with the amount that has to be provided for this calendar year.

Mr. DUNNING: This is for capital requirements only.

Mr. BENNETT: Only capital requirements?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, capital requirements and refunding.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to say with respect to the other matter that it was quite apparent that operations for the first three months, owing to extraordinary conditions, had been somewhat unsatisfactory.

Mr. DUNNING: The second three months are showing up better.

Mr. BENNETT: But not sufficiently to meet the contemplated shortage of revenue. However, since this deals only with capital expenditures and refunding I have nothing further to say.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 84, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1936.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR ADMINISTRATION BY BOARD OF DIRECTORS APPOINTED BY GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 21, to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definition of trustees.

Mr. CAHAN: Have we had any clear statement by the minister as to the purpose of this substitution? Why would it not be quite sufficient for all practical purposes if the number of trustees were enlarged, and they were left vested with the duties that now appertain to the trustees? Why are directors presumed to be more efficient than trustees? What is the real purpose behind it? To me—and I say it with all due respect to the minister—the chief purpose of this bill is to place the entire management of the Canadian National Railways under political control, and if it is so placed I fear it is opening the way to political patronage and graft to an extent utterly unknown in Canada in the management of railways in which the government has a vested interest. We thought we were getting free from that. Whatever may be said about the existing trustees, I congratulate them upon this one thing: I think that since the board of trustees under Mr. Fullerton took control there has been less corruption and graft in the management of the Canadian National Railways than had existed in a number of previous years. That is one fact that Mr. Fullerton and those associated with him may be congratulated upon—the honesty and integrity which they have displayed since the board of trustees was created.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me that the change in name from trustees to directors can have all the detrimental effect suggested by my hon. friend. We believe the set-up of a board of trustees is unsuitable to the operation of the property, and more particularly that section which vests the power of veto in the chairman. Simply enlarging the number of trustees and leaving that veto power with the chairman would, we believe, be quite inconsistent with the purposes we are attempting to achieve. So that while this board could be called a board of seven trustees, my thought is that the term "trustees" suggests trustees in bankruptcy, trustees operating a bankrupt concern, whereas we think it is better policy at this time to appoint seven directors and operate the railway as a business concern. It is a matter of policy.

As to the suggestion that this change is going to introduce graft and corruption, I really cannot see the basis for it. I thought that in drafting this act we had blocked all the old avenues by which people used to approach the Canadian National Railways. I do not know that I should suggest what those ways were; we all know, but I think if my hon. friend will examine the legislation he will see that every one of them is closed. Instead of entrusting the direction of the railway to three men we are entrusting it to seven men. We believe that in doing so we cannot only get seven men of as great integrity as that of the present trustees—and I have no criticism whatever to make of the integrity of the men comprising the trustee board—but I think we can get men of equal integrity and of greater business experience, and perhaps men whose associations with the industrial life of Canada will enable them to contribute more to the prosperity of the railway than can the present trustees.

Mr. BENNETT: Will they be full time men?

Mr. HOWE: No. We hope to have them do the work of the ordinary executive committee, that is, be available to meet at least once a week. They must be men close enough to the headquarters of the railway to take an active part in the management. As far as the connection between the government and the railway is concerned, it is just as remote under this bill—perhaps more so; I am not so sure of that—as it is under the present trustees.

Mr. BENNETT: It could not be more so.

Mr. HOWE: My very short experience in politics has not led me to believe that a board given full control, such as the present trustees, is so vastly more impregnable to political influence than a board that has contact through a responsible minister. The minister has no powers in connection with the board of directors that he has not under the other board. The minister has no power to do with the railway as he likes. Large matters, matters of importance, arise almost every week which necessitate discussion between someone in authority in the railway and someone in authority in the government. For instance the government is still the trustee of a great deal of railway property that is operated as part of the Canadian National system, and the Canadian National Railways are operating steamships which the government owns. Matters of that kind require conferences between the two bodies. These conferences are held between the responsible minister and the chairman of the board or someone who has the authority to represent the railway. That is the only connection that is provided between the government and the board of management. In other days we used to have a representative of the minister on the board. That has been changed, for just the reason my hon. friend suggests, that such connection might be used to influence the board in respect of matters on which the government should have no say, matters purely relative to the railway. All that is done away with. But as regards matters concerning which the government must confer with the railway and the railway with the government there is provision for such conferences between the head of the railway and the head of the department at Ottawa, that is, between the Minister of Railways and the chairman of the board. I think that is the only proper contact, and as such it is provided for.

How my hon. friend can say that this is going to lead to graft and corruption on a scale never before known in Canada I cannot understand. It is assuming that you have a very corrupt minister of railways and a very corrupt chairman of the board of directors. It must be so, because these two provide the only contact between the railway and the government. They must both be corrupt and not one alone, if graft and corruption are to exist. It seems to me that my hon. friend used rather strong language in that connection.

Mr. CAHAN: I trust the minister has all the virtues. Undoubtedly his past life discloses that he is a man of high character and very considerable experience, but he has never been subjected to the political influences emanating from 170 or 180 members of parliament, each of whom is anxious to obtain some advantage for his constituency. The other day the minister professed that he did not understand very much about the exercise of political influence upon governments and ministers in the administration of public properties, but I suggest to him that when two years hence he comes back to meet us his eyes will have been opened, and he will know something more about practical politics as accepted in the public life of Canada.

In one respect I cannot see very much change. It is true that instead of trustees we are to have a board of governors. This board is not to give its whole time to the administration; one director of the national company is appointed chairman of the board of directors. I assume he would be chairman of the board of directors of the national company. It was suggested that Mr. Fullerton, as chairman, had certain veto powers, but this gentleman who is to be appointed chairman has practically all the powers of the board. He will be there all the time. He will be on the job, and the others will not be on the job a sufficient length of time to find out what is being done, or to advise as to how it should be done.

But that is not the point I wished to make when I said the bill opened the way to political influence. In 1933, after comparatively slight criticism, a bill was passed by a very large majority, and was passed unanimously in another place. That measure solemnly declared that for a certain length of time the board of trustees should be constituted and, except under certain prescribed methods, parliament relieved itself of the responsibility of changing that board. The present bill is a complete repudiation of what parliament did in 1933. It is a violation of the solemn pledge of parliament to these men to the effect that in their appointment as trustees they would be retained for a certain length of time without interference. It is a repudiation of the very platform upon which they were appointed, whereby they were to be relieved completely from political pressure, placed in a position where they would be above political influence and capable of administering the railways in the interests of all the people of Canada without fear or favour of any political party. The present measure repudiates that pledge. It starts out by saying that we are to repeal the act of 1933 in so far as it appointed these trustees to act as a board of management. We are to repudiate the pledges under which they were appointed. We are to remove them from office because we do not like the complexion of their faces or the colour of their hair. Possibly some of them had been associated with those of another political stripe. The government is inviting subsequent parliaments, for the same political purposes and with the same view and scope of information, to repudiate the act in order that others who may be more acceptable to a later administration may be appointed in their place. That sort of action is unworthy of parliament. It is impossible for the directors who are to be appointed to assume that they are to be above political influence and control. When I say that I refer to political influence and control of a very reprehensible character, such as we have found in the administration of public bodies in Canada in times past. That is my objection; I can see no sign of improvement in the changes the minister now proposes.

Mr. HEAPS: Before the section is agreed to there are one or two observations I should like to make. I hope that future parliaments will not get into the habit of changing the set-up of the Canadian National Railways management every time there is a change in the complexion of the House of Commons. It is a dangerous procedure. About 1932 we changed the set-up of the management, and now that there has been a change in government we are to have another change in the management of the Canadian National Railways. Nothing could be more inimical to the management of the railway and the confidence of the people in the Canadian National system than to have a management in which parliament and the people have lost confidence. I believe any government would find it very difficult to obtain the services of the most efficient men to handle the Canadian National Railways if those men thought their positions would be insecure and that they would not be retained if there were a change of government.

The three trustees are in a position where they are asked to resign and to a certain extent their usefulness has been impaired. I cannot see how logically they could remain in office and give the service required of them. But if under the present measure it is intended to appoint a committee of seven to handle the affairs of the railway I suggest that such committee should be appointed by the House of Commons at large rather than by the government. If that were done we would have at least something in the way of permanency of the men in office. I do not know whether the government has considered the suggestion, but I put it to the minister in the hope that it may be helpful. If the leaders of the different parties could get together and decide upon a committee of seven, the men to be appointed would have a greater degree of security than they could have if after a change of government they should find themselves in the position of the present trustees. That is one of the most unfortunate features of the present bill. It dispenses with the services of men, rightly or wrongly, and makes the position insecure. I offer the suggestion to the minister in the hope that he will give it careful consideration and that when a new board of directors is under consideration he will at least consult leaders of other groups in the house, in an effort to appoint a board which will have the full confidence of the House of Commons and the people of Canada.

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Chairman, the committee is dealing with the administration of the most important asset under the control of parliament, namely the Canadian National Railways. It is an asset which represents an enormous investment, an asset which if properly administered and properly developed will make an excellent contribution to the future development of Canada. The people of Canada have invested in this undertaking such an enormous sum of money that anything which relates to its administration should receive the most careful and serious consideration of the House of Commons and of the people of the dominion.

Conditions were such that it was deemed advisable to appoint a royal commission to investigate and consider the administration of the Canadian National Railways. The commission was one that commanded, I think, the confidence of the Canadian people. It undertook the task imposed upon it, and at great length and after the expenditure of an enormous sum of money made a report. That report indicated that the method of control or administration of the railways in the past had not been entirely satisfactory, and in pursuance and in keeping with the recommendations of that report a new method of control was devised. It was given the careful consideration of parliament, and that method of control by a board of trustees has been in force now for a little over two years.

The special committee set up to consider the administration of the Canadian National Railways has just completed its work, and the chairman of the board of trustees has made to that committee a statement which the minister has commended as a fair, reasonable and moderate one. That statement is not yet available to the members of this house, but it will be printed, I assume, in the votes and proceedings, and I suggest to every member of this committee to read it carefully and seriously. If that is done, then I am of the opinion that the members of this committee will come to the conclusion that the administration of the Canadian National Railways by this board of trustees has been successful; that it has under very difficult and trying conditions accomplished in large measure, so far as the circumstances permitted, the objects which it set out to accomplish; that economies have been made; that improvements in administration have taken place, and that policies have been initiated which, if pursued to their conclusion, will result to the advantage of the railways and of this dominion.

I submit that with that record behind us, with the reasons advanced for a change in the method of administration, and with the fact that we have set up a new organization which has been functioning for so short a time, yet even within which it has been able to demonstrate its value, we ought not now to return to what is to a large extent the form of administration which existed prior to the appointment of this board of trustees. As I understand this bill, that is largely what it is; we are in large measure returning to the same old method, control and administration by appointees of the government as we had prior to the investigation by the commission. Results cannot be secured in a short period of time, in the administration of an enormous undertaking like the Canadian National Railways, and I submit that it would be just as sound for a man to plant a tree and in a few months pull it up by the roots to see if it was going to grow as for the minister to make this change at this time. If he will consider the situation he must agree that the board of trustees has not given a sufficient length of time in the control and administration of this road to demonstrate whether the present method is more successful than the old except in so far as the results already indicate that some progress has been made, and I submit that they should have an opportunity to demonstrate over a sufficient period of time their capacity to administer the affairs of the road.

The minister in introducing the bill gave some reasons why these changes should be made. I think the reasons he gave have been answered to a large extent by the statement of the chairman of the board of trustees. I submit that the proposed action of the minister under this bill is not in the public interest; that the board of trustees has not been given a sufficient opportunity, and that these changes are not in the interests of the Canadian National Railways or of the people of the Dominion of Canada. If there is one thing that is required it is a continuity of policy, and a change in the method of administration having been made as a result of an investigation by the commission, we ought to have an ample opportunity to test it out to see if it will produce the results which it was hoped it would, especially as there are already indications that good results have followed upon this change in the method of administration.

I submit, finally, that this whole proposition of the minister is a retrograde step; that we are going back to a condition of affairs which was condemned, which was not in the interests of the Canadian National or of its employees or of the people of this dominion, and I fear that the results will be disappointing both to the minister and to the people of Canada as a whole.

Mr. HOWE: In reply, Mr. Chairman, I think we are all agreed that the Duff report made some very sound recommendations, but whether in appointing the board of trustees the recommendations of the Duff report were followed as exactly as will be the case in the appointment of the seven directors proposed by this bill is a matter for argument. True, the set-up of the board of trustees was the set-up proposed by the Duff commission, but the personnel, as I stated in my opening remarks, hardly followed the recommendations of that report. This type of management was a very unusual one for a commercial corporation as far-flung as the national railways, and under this bill we are going back to the usual business organization. The entire set-up as proposed under this bill is usual in railways, directors being appointed for a three year term, one-third retiring annually, and with a chairman at the head who is an experienced railway man. I think this is the proper time to make the change. At the end of this year one of the trustees retires. I might say that the trustees themselves are quite emphatic in stating that the present system is not a proper one, and that the veto power given the chairman is not a proper power for federal trustees. If we wanted to replace a trustee whose term was up, I do not know where we could find a man of the calibre and background of experience necessary to fill the position. I doubt whether we could fill the position satisfactorily and I think this is the proper time to do what we are doing.

Mr. STEWART: Does the minister think a board of seven directors will be more likely than three trustees to carry out the recommendations of the Duff commission? What particular advantage would such a board have over the three trustees? The minister says that some of the provisions of the act are unsatisfactory, but is not the answer to that, amend the act?

Mr. HOWE: We are doing that.

Mr. STEWART: You are doing more than amending it; you are wiping it out altogether. It is not an amendment of the act; you are putting in a different set-up. The minister might just as well admit that now as at any other time. The minister states that there are certain defects in the present set-up, but I submit to him that he should amend the act rather than wipe it out altogether. When a house needs repairs it is not necessary to tear it all down. If a roof is leaking, repair the roof; if there is a defect in the plumbing, repair it. You do not need to build a new house in order to correct some defects in the old one.

Mr. JACOBS: What happens when the house is suffering from dry rot?

Mr. STEWART: A house two years old could hardly have any dry rot. Like my hon. friend, it would not be old enough.

Mr. CAHAN: You have got rid of the old roof; that is my chief objection. The Prime Minister is in the chamber and I should like to have his attention for a moment. The government is now purporting by this bill to repeal some very important provisions of an act passed in 1933 known as the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933. Section 7 of that act, which is now being repealed, reads:

No trustee shall be removed from office, nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

There may be differences of opinion with regard to a pledge contained in a statute passed by the House of Commons and Senate of Canada; there may be differences of opinion with regard to the terms of such pledge when it was under consideration when passing both houses of parliament; but I ask the Prime Minister, even although differences of opinion prevailed at the session of 1933 when the act was passed, is not some consideration to be given to the terms of a pledge which parliament made? Provisions were being made for the appointment of three trustees to very high and important positions. Those appointments were similar to appointments to a court of appeal or a court of justice where the term was expressed in clear language, with the further provision that no one should be removed from office or suffer a reduction in salary, during the term for which he was appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada. If that provision is to be wiped out by this bill, what confidence can hereafter be placed in the honour and integrity of a parliament that makes such a pledge and then two or three years later repudiates it by allowing the trustees to be removed without assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada after full consideration of the merits or demerits of the charges made against them? That was not a party pledge; it was a pledge contained in a statute passed by a majority of both houses. It declared that the men who were appointed and whose term of office was fixed should not be removed from office except for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada. Such removal as is contemplated by this bill is not in accordance with the pledge. While I dislike to use strong terms, I think opprobrium, if not dishonour, is placed upon the parliament that refuses to carry out a pledge so made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, may I say to my hon. friend that if at the time that particular clause was inserted there had not been very strong exception taken to it by the then Liberal opposition, I would say he was entirely right in what he is now saying. But one has to consider not only the opposition which was made at the time, but the grounds for it and the nature of it. It was stated very clearly, by the then Liberal opposition, that the particular plan adopted, of having these gentlemen removable only by address of both houses was a Conservative or Tory device to tie the hands of a Liberal administration should we come into office at any future time. I think it was stated very plainly that if that clause did carry, every effort would be made to see that the House of Commons, which was the representative of the people as a whole, would not have its hands tied with respect to the control of any industrial activity for which it might be held responsible.

My hon. friend speaks about the courts of the land and the tenure of office of judges and the grounds on which they are appointed, but this presents no parallel. A judicial position is an entirely different position to that of a director of a company. When a government is held responsible for the success or failure of a great industrial enterprise, it surely should have the right to have as directors of that enterprise persons in whom it has confidence. Otherwise, we would not have responsible government in a true sense.

I wish to repeat that the linking up of the Senate with the House of Commons in the control of everything which relates fundamentally to the finances of the country is a wrong principle and has always been recognized as such. My hon. friend may argue that the Senate was made a party to any dismissal of these gentlemen in order that their tenure of office might be secured, but he overlooks the fact that the House of Commons is the one body responsible for the administration of the different departments of government, that the government of the day has to take responsibility, and that any government returned by the people should, with respect to matters which relate to the finances of the country, be free to deal with those finances as its members think best.

For this reason I believe there is every justification for this particular clause being removed from the act. There is no ground for contending that this implies any breach of faith or trust on the part of the present administration. As I said, it was made perfectly plain, when we were in opposition, that if we could possibly avoid it we did not propose to have our own and future parliaments bound in a manner which would hold them responsible for the administration of public affairs and yet deny them the right of having in charge of those affairs persons in whom they had confidence.

Mr. CAHAN: Just one word. The right hon. gentleman has laid down this principle, that minority in the House of Commons who oppose any public bill are to be at liberty thereafter, should that minority become the majority, to repudiate any promise or pledge which parliament as a whole has given to particular individuals in their official capacity. He further introduces this suggestion. It has not been stated that the trustees are not prepared to cooperate fully with the government of the day; that suggestion has not been made. But the Prime Minister goes further and says; We are now making the Canadian National Railways the football of politics.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. CAHAN: That is the only inference, that each successive government will be free to do what it pleases with regard to the provision for the organization and administration of that board, and a new government coming in, which does not like the colour of hair of these directors, or the colour of their eyes, or the particular smile which they bear upon their faces, is at liberty to put them out of office forthwith. Therefore no future tenure of office of directors or trustees of the Canadian National Railways can be regarded as secure. When that principle is once admitted and when parliament, in repudiation of its previous pledges, is prepared to carry out such a policy as that, does it not clearly mean and indicate that the administration of these great railways is to become purely a matter of party politics; that the door is wide open to the return of the system of corruption which we have had in times past in dealing with government railways? That is the precedent which, it seems to me, the right hon. gentleman is establishing. I am discussing this matter apart from his personality; I am not casting reflections upon him. But I do say this, that I do not know of a man in his government —and he has in it many members for whom I have high personal respect—there is not one of them, not even himself, who if placed in the position of Minister of Railways in charge of this can be expected to stand between his political party, demanding office and demanding consideration, demanding this contract and that contract, between that horde, who are looking for patronage, and the public service, the public interest, which alone should command the care and attention of the government of which the right hon. gentleman is Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has just said that I am seeking to lay down the principle that a minority must control the majority—

Mr. CAHAN: No; I said a minority in a previous parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The principle I am laying down is that there is no minority which is superior to the majority when that majority is the people of the country as a whole; and the people of the country as a whole have sent this present House of Commons to legislate with respect to the Canadian National Railways as it thinks right and proper. The whole question of a new enactment with respect to the Canadian National Railways was presented to the people in the last general election. It was one of the policies on which the Liberal opposition took a very strong and positive stand, and it was returned to power in virtue of it and the other policies it outlined. The authority of the present administration in this matter is an authority which has been derived from the people of Canada as a whole, and in no unmistaken voice or way; and we intend to exercise that authority in the light of the responsibility so placed upon us. I wish to take very strong exception to the assumption that just because a director is to be appointed by a Liberal administration he will be thoroughly corrupt in the carrying out of his obligations, whereas a trustee appointed by a Tory administration is always to be above criticism. That is a new doctrine, a principle that does not apply. The only principle that can govern in these matters of the administration of public affairs is the principle of ministerial responsibility. The ministry will be responsible for those whom they appoint as directors. If a mistake is made in the appointment, or if mistakes are made by their appointees, the members of the ministry will be answerable to their masters. But their masters will not be the Tory party but the people of Canada as a whole. That is the essence of the situation. No one knows better than my hon. friend, unless it is his leader, that in most of the legislation which was introduced having to do with financial matters, an effort was made by the previous administration to tie the hands of an incoming administration, to tie future parliaments in such a way that they would be bound, not to policies to which they were committed, but to Tory policies which they believed to be inimical to the country's interests. This is one case in point, and it is not by any means the only one. Certainly, however, so far as the present administration is concerned, it is prepared, in so far as it is able, to secure the necessary power and authority to take full responsibility for the legislation it proposes. It is not going to be tied, with respect to what it deems to be necessary and in the public interest, by any clause in any act or agreement which says that with respect to great transactions involving the finances of this country—and that is what is always put up in connection with the Canadian National Railways, that it is a big financial problem—this House of Commons is to be controlled by the other house of parliament. It will in so far as that is possible be controlled solely by its own members, in the exercise of full ministerial responsibility.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED BRANCH LINE FROM SENNETERRE TO ROUYN, QUEBEC

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the construction, prior to the 31st day of December, 1939, of the following Canadian National Railways branch line:—

From Senneterre to Rouyn in the province of Quebec—estimated mileage, 99 miles; average expenditure per mile, $60,000; estimated cost, $5,940,000.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT HOLIDAYS

EFFECT UPON MEN EMPLOYED ON DAY LABOUR BASIS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on June 1 the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked if the government would consider the advisability, in making proclamation of a holiday for any purpose, of providing that such holiday shall be with pay. I replied at the time that the government had not had an opportunity to give special attention to the question beyond that which it had received at different times, but that we would give further consideration to it.

My reply to-day is that the government is advised that under the constitution the jurisdiction of parliament to legislate generally in respect of holidays does not enable parliament to impose upon employers liability to pay wages to persons employed on a day labour basis at an hourly rate of payment, in respect of holidays observed as such by the employees. The legislative power possessed by parliament to permit or require a day to be observed as a holiday does not include the power to legislate respecting the terms of contracts of employment on that day. Legislation so requiring wages to be paid would relate essentially to property and civil rights in the province, falling exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, and any such legislation passed by parliament would constitute a colourable attempt to invade the provincial field of legislative power.

Mr. HEAPS: Arising out of the Prime Minister's answer may I ask whether the government would not be prepared to set an example by paying its employees who suffer the loss of a day's pay when a proclamation is made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So far as the payment of civil servants is concerned, there is already provision for the payment of civil servants and the holidays to which they are entitled. I believe it is all part of the one measure.

CUSTOMS DUTIES EXEMPTIONS

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING PROVISION FOR FREE ENTRY OF GOODS TO VALUE OF $100

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. WILTON (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). Would he supply me, by mail if it is more convenient, with a list of the Hamilton business concerns which sent him letters of recommendation or commendation in connection with the $100 exemption on United States goods? At the same time I should like to have a list of firms from the same city who communicated with him protesting against the introduction of the item. Would he be prepared to lay on the table of the house the letters or copies thereof?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I shall gladly give consideration to the hon. member's request.

OTTAWA RESTAURANT EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) stated that certain restaurants located in the city of Ottawa, whose employees up to the present have enjoyed one day off per week, have advised their employees that, with no increase in wages, they will be required to work seven days a week, with one day off every two weeks. He asked if the matter could be investigated by the federal Department of Labour, and should it be found that such a condition actually exists, if the department could take action to remedy the situation.

Pending a decision as to the validity of dominion legislation now before the supreme court, the subject matter of this question is one coming wholly within provincial jurisdiction. There are several provincial statutes which might have a bearing on the matter, such as The One Day's Rest in Seven Act, passed in 1922; the Ontario Factory, Shop and Office Building Act, 1932, and the Minimum Wages Act, 1920. There is, however, no action which can be taken by the federal Department of Labour regarding the complaint other than to bring it to the attention of the provincial authorities. This has been done.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO PROVISIONS OF SECTION 98

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) how soon we may expect legislation with respect to the repeal of section 98 of the criminal code.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): A bill to amend the criminal code will be introduced next week.

PUBLIC SERVICE—DISMISSALS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, some time ago an order was passed for a return showing the number of dismissals in the public service since last November. Many days have passed, and so far as I have been able to learn the order has not been complied with.

Mr. GRAY: They are waiting for the one I asked for.

Mr. BENNETT: Why should it wait for yours?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I made inquiries about these returns, and I understand they will be available within a few days.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no reason why a return covering a few months should wait for one covering several years.

Mr. RINFRET: I cannot make a reply now, further than the one I have given.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Lambton West has made the reply.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR ADMINISTRATION BY BOARD OF DIRECTORS APPOINTED BY GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933—Mr. Howe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

[Mr. Rogers.]

On section 2—Definition of trustees.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Chairman, before the section is agreed to may I say that I was not in the house when it was previously discussed, due to the fact that I was serving on a committee. My reason for rising to-day is to answer some of the criticisms and statements made by hon. members to the effect that it is the intention of the Liberal party through the present measure to come back to a system of political patronage. Many hon. members who spoke yesterday, including the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) viewed with alarm the bill now before the committee, and I felt I could not allow some of the statements to pass which left the impression that the Liberal party was allied with the Canadian National Railways so far as patronage is concerned. Nothing has been said about the other railway in Canada. Nothing has been said about the political patronage exercised by the Canadian Pacific Railway among hon. members of this chamber. As a matter of fact, for many years pressure has been brought to bear by the Canadian Pacific Railway upon hon. members. Even as late as this year it might interest the committee to know that that railway company were much interested in the personnel of the special railway committee which was to be set up.

I am going to mention one instance of political patronage exercised by that railway company among members of parliament. When I introduced my freight rates bill in 1932 I was approached by a high official of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company who, if I interpreted his remarks rightly, threatened me with political death if I dared to proceed with my bill. He pointed out to me what a large concern he represented, and indicated that if I proceeded with my bill I was going to make an enemy for life of this great company. It is just about time the country was made aware of the outside pressure brought to bear upon members of parliament by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it might be of interest to find out how many friends of that railway have been approached in the House of Commons. After listening to speeches which were intended to leave the impression that the Liberal party and the Canadian National Railways are close together in matters of patronage, I felt it was about time someone spoke about the other angle of the matter. I am of the opinion that of the two methods, shall I say, which seem to be in existence, the one under which the Canadian Pacific Railway approaches the members of this house is far more serious and dangerous than that under which any member of parliament approaches any official of the Canadian National Railways.

But the chief reason I rise, Mr. Chairman, is not altogther on that account. I have a suggestion to make which I think would be helpful in the solution of this great railway problem, and it is one which has not been touched on either in this debate or in any other debate in this house to which I have listened.

Every member of parliament is aware of the heavy load which the country is carrying and the heavy interest charges which have to be met each year on the Canadian National Railways, and in all our deliberations with a view to finding a solution of the problem, no one seems to have put his finger on the one spot which, if properly taken care of, might lead to a betterment of conditions and the bringing of our railways up to date. I speak of the labour element. Every attempt that has been made by either of the railways to amalgamate services has brought numerous telegrams and representations from every labour organization in the country, and rightly so, because they fear the dismissal of the railwaymen. If more serious note were taken of this labour aspect of the question, and an investigation made into it as was done in the United States, where there is provision in all their railway mergers for compensating by way of pension the employees dismissed, if we similarly made provision or set up a commission to take care of the men dismissed in any amalgamation or merger of the railways, I believe we might find a solution of this great railway problem. But that aspect of the situation has never been touched. It is true the financial aspect looms largest in the minds of most hon. members. Nevertheless, every time we approach this problem we are met with the question: What shall we do with the men who are dismissed? I am strongly of the opinion that if we set up a commission to look into the possibility of taking care of the men so displaced, we might bring about a solution of our railway situation. I know that this question has been gone into in the United States and some such plan is afoot there.

Many changes could, of course, be made. In my opinion our whole railway system would have to be brought up to date and modernized. Also there is a lot of material, shall I say, sitting in the various offices of the railways which should be overhauled. Let me give only one instance to illustrate what takes place when a change is made to bring about a betterment in some part of our railway system. In 1934 we noticed as we travelled on the trains that there was introduced on the menu of the railway dining cars a fifty cent meal at noon and a seventy-five cent or one dollar meal in the evening, but coming to Ottawa this year I noticed that the dining car had reverted to the old charges. On making inquiries I received this explanation as to why they went back to the old prices, and I mention it as an illustration of what takes place when any move is made to bring about betterment in some part of the system. They said that the office staff in Winnipeg objected very strongly to the great number who were dining in the dining car, they were more interested in making two or three hundred per cent profit, irrespective of how small was the number of meals served, than in having a large number of people frequent the dining cars. One could mention dozens of instances of this kind. So long as there are men in the railway offices who are simply dealing with cold figures, so long shall we be disappointed in our efforts to grapple successfully with this railway problem.

To summarize, Mr. Chairman, the two chief points I want to emphasize are: first, the point I made regarding political interference, not in respect of the Canadian National Railways alone, but in regard also to the Canadian Pacific, which occupies a dominant position and takes an active interest in political affairs in this country; and, second, I offer as a contribution toward the solution of the problem the suggestion that we endeavour to devise some scheme of taking care of railway labour that is displaced in any merger. If that question were gone into and some satisfactory arrangement made, as I believe could be done, I think it would lead to placing our railways in a far better position.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the number of the clause we are considering, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 2—definition of trustees.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): This is the clause which repeals the section of the old act which provides for the appointment of trustees, and it is the clause upon which I think one may appropriately make general observations with regard to the bill.

I believe that this measure and the bill dealing with the Bank of Canada Act are the two most important pieces of legislation which have come before the house this session. They are both significant and undoubtedly will be most important and, I think, vital in their ultimate effects. It is generally recognized that the railway problem is a vital one, and that we ought to give to the railway situation the fullest and most exhaustive study. Inasmuch as this bill is the only measure before parliament, so far as I can recall, under which one can do so, I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to discuss the question briefly.

Does this bill, providing for the abolition of the system of operation under trustees and reverting to the system of operation by a board of directors, offer an adequate or reasonable solution of the railway problem of Canada? I fear, sir, we have to answer that it does not; in fact I cannot help feeling that it may prove to be a boomerang. In saying this I do not wish to give the impression that I am trying to belittle the bill, but I do think it has in it all the elements of, shall I say, an effect adverse to that which it is expected the bill will bring about.

Studying the situation as far as I have been able to do so, I believe that the trustees have given to this country reasonably good service. We cannot expect them, being human beings, to accomplish superhuman results. This railway system is a huge undertaking. I wonder sometimes whether we appreciate the tremendous magnitude of this railway system, not only its importance in the congested centres of the two great industrial provinces of eastern Canada but its extension to the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts, constituting a railway system that I venture to say is perhaps the greatest in the world to-day. In mileage it almost equals the total of Russia's railway system, although Russia has extended her railways in the last few years; but certainly it equals Russia's railway mileage of a few years ago. It is a tremendous system, and to expect that a new method of management, that which was proposed in 1933 for the appointment of trustees, could show the maximum of results by this time is, I think, asking more than could possibly be expected. But I think it advisable to impress upon the committee this fact: According to the reports, as I study them, reasonable results have been achieved under the most difficult circumstances.

Another point I wish to emphasize is that I do not believe the principle of the original act, namely that of providing every means of cooperation between the two great systems, has had a fair trial. In the first place, I do not think there has been time for a fair trial, and in the second place a systematic attack has been made upon the Canadian National Railways throughout the country during the last four or five years, which unquestionably has been a serious handicap to the management of the road. I do not believe parliament can ignore that fact. That there has been, first, a very serious depressed condition, and, second, a continuous attack from the outside to which the railway as a publicly owned body have had little opportunity or no liberty to reply, has constituted a handicap which is unreasonable and unfair. As a result of that, or perhaps I should say in spite of it, the measure of progress achieved by the trustees deserves commendation rather than condemnation.

If I understand the views of the minister who introduced the bill, he contends that the system of trustee management is such that there cannot be achieved the maximum of efficiency. The matter is referred to in the speech from the throne in these terms:

> You will be asked to consider amendments to existing legislation respecting the Canadian National Railways, which will serve to afford a greater measure of governmental authority and responsibility to parliament.

Those are broad and general terms which mean little to those not acquainted with parliamentary language. But to me they are an insinuation or suggestion that there has been a lack of a sense of responsibility to parliament during the time the trustees have been in charge, and it is suggested that a reversion to a board of directors form of control will result in a larger measure of sense of responsibility to parliament and a larger measure of control by parliament over the road. That is a distinct challenge to parliament. It is a definite charge against the system of trustee management. I do not think the facts as disclosed in the annual report of the railway as laid before the committee of parliament on Canadian National Railways and Canadian National shipping will justify any such charge.

I feel it would have been better had this bill been left with the committee, dealt with there and returned to the house with the report of the committee, not only upon the bill itself but upon the report of the railway, which is studied in that committee from year to year. Since that has not been done, all we can do is apply to the study of this bill the information which was disclosed in the hearings of the committee dealing with the management of the road. I have not been a member of that committee for some years, although I was a member some time ago, but I have attended some of its meetings and have read some of the evidence given before it. I am convinced that in the examination by the committee of the officers of the Canadian National Railways or in the report of the Canadian National Railways there is no justification for the charge, the statement, or the allegation, whatever you choose to call it, that the system of management under a board of trustees has been lacking in efficiency or in a sense of responsibility to parliament. That being my conviction, I find it extremely difficult to agree to the cancellation of that system, which is the purpose of the section immediately before us. I regret to place myself in the position of differing from the Minister of Railways, but I cannot help that.

The argument that government ownership is always inefficient has been made so often during the last few years that the public has subconsciously absorbed that conviction. We hear this argument everywhere. I saw it in an editorial in one of the leading dailies only a day or two ago—government ownership is in its essence inefficient. A casual comparison of the results of government ownership with the results of private ownership, as disclosed by the difficulties of the last six years, will, I think, persuade anyone that while government ownership may be attended by certain inefficiencies, private ownership is not free from similar inefficiencies. How often do we see a reference to that great hole in the centre of the city of Montreal as indicating the inefficiency of this road. I was in Montreal the other day and I walked across the viaduct. I must confess it shocks one to see that ghastly excavation which was to be the site of the foundation of a great terminal structure. However, as I stood there I looked to my left and I saw a magnificent building which at a cost of some $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 was erected by one of the most efficient financial organizations in this country. This great organization undoubtedly has men of the highest ability managing its affairs, yet will any one say that that great structure, which is only partly occupied, was a wise expenditure of that concern's money? The two stand there side by side. One is the evidence of perhaps too great optimism on the part of those who headed the national railways a few years ago, while the other is evidence of the superoptimism of private enterprise.

If we are going to compare the efficiency of government ownership with that of private ownership, we must go right down the line. For instance, it is said that we are overbuilt in railways in Canada. So we are. There is no use in attempting to disguise that fact; we might as well meet it frankly. The railways have been built; they are here; yet I notice that the great competitor of this national road is attempting to get into the mining areas north of the National Transcontinental line. No one can deny that we have been greatly worried during the last twenty years because of the building of the Transcontinental. That line has been the occasion of rebuke to those who originated it, but it has since been found that it opened up one of the richest mining areas in the world. During the last few years, perhaps more this year than any other, we have begun to realize the value of this area as a source of wealth for Canada. A railroad which is now government owned opened up that area, but there is keen competition on the part of the other railway, which is under private ownership, to go in there to tap some of these rich areas. I am not for a moment discussing the claims of the two—that comes under another bill—but I am pointing out that while for many years the Transcontinental was looked upon as an example of colossal folly in government projection of railway construction, we are now coming to realize that it did open up vast riches in this country.

And so one might go on with many other illustrations. For instance, it is said that the Canadian National has paralleled the Canadian Pacific. Well, if that is true it is also true that the Canadian Pacific paralleled the Canadian National, or the old Grand Trunk in Ontario and the Grand Trunk Pacific on the prairies. So that both systems have perhaps equal responsibility in the matter of overconstruction, but the tendency is always to put the blame on the Canadian National or the government owned system. I think it is wise for parliament to pause and weigh carefully the measure of responsibility. Though that may be now an unprofitable use of time, nevertheless it is advisable to do it if we are to have a proper idea of the responsibility of the government owned system as against the privately owned railway. I will not pursue the comparison further, but I do suggest that it is worthy of very close scrutiny and examination.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) a moment ago referred to the question of the rights of employees, and I wish to supplement his observations by emphasizing the fact that the employees of this great system certainly have rights. And those rights were recognized by the chairman of the system in his address to the committee the other day. I should like to read two brief extracts from that address. I do so because I think the whole statement should be carefully considered, but these particular extracts are applicable to the rights of employees and will serve to bring them home more definitely than any language of mine could. In this statement Judge Fullerton says:

> When we took office, admittedly the morale of the men was low. They had seen their numbers reduced from 111,383 to 70,625 and their total compensation reduced from $176,000,000 to $95,000,000. Those whose seniority had so far protected them were uncertain as to the future, their opportunities for promotion slight and their chances of demotion real. They were fearful of proposals for amalgamation and unification, both of which in their view meant disturbance, less work and less pay. I consider it essential in the interests of the railway itself that the conditions of service should be such as to offer at least as much security of employment as do other professions and occupations.

I pause here to emphasize that principle which Mr. Justice Fullerton in his statement has laid down—that the men are entitled to a sense of security in employment. And by the way, this parliament is charged with responsibility not only for the reducing of deficits but for preserving in equity the welfare of its citizens; and in this instance the welfare of these men, their livelihood, their very existence is in our custody in a very direct way. Mr. Fullerton goes on to say:

It seems to have been overlooked that the joint advantage can be secured only by transferring the burden to labour.

I would emphasize that point. That, sir, is one of the principal grievances of workingmen in this and other countries, that as efficiency advances in mechanical development and in other ways, the full burden or almost the full burden of loss is borne by labour. That is inequitable; it is an unfair situation. It is one of the things that civilized countries must face, and we ought to face it in connection with this bill and in connection with the proposals now before us. He says further:

A more equitable arrangement with labour appears to be required and should be provided. If this were done, one great preliminary step towards the accomplishment of any radical changes which might displace labour would be made.

And later on he makes a definite suggestion which I commend to the government and to this committee:

An agreement has been reached between the railway executives and organized labour in the United States providing for the payment of a measure of compensation to employees thrown out of work by consolidation of railway facilities, and I understand that the British railways also made some provision for employees displaced as a result of the amalgamation of British railways into four systems. I have reached the conclusion that the government, the railways and the representatives of railway labour should discuss this matter together with a view to the adoption of some arrangement for the two Canadian railroads as will afford reasonable protection against hardship on the part of those employees who may be displaced by the adoption of cooperative measures.

I listened to Judge Fullerton as he read his statement to the committee, and no one could help being impressed with the serious nature of this problem as he viewed it. I think that this house ought to pause in the passing of this measure and in the consideration of this whole question so as to ensure that, whatever steps are taken, this phase of the subject will be adequately safeguarded.

Another question impresses itself on my mind. Behind this bill, behind all the discussion, there looms constantly the question of unification or amalgamation. I do not think parliament can disregard it. It might be argued that I am trespassing at the moment upon the rules of the house in introducing that question; but we must not lose sight of the fact that, in the clause immediately before us, we are repealing the section that provides for the present system of management by trustees. That system was inaugurated in this country for the purpose of bringing about ultimately cooperation between the two railways.

One cannot have read the public utterances of persons in high authority on the competing line in recent years without being impressed with this thought—and I am not criticizing Sir Edward Beatty in this matter at all; I think he has a right to his views and it is his duty to those whom he serves to express those views. But we must look at this matter from the standpoint of the welfare, first, of the country as a whole and secondly of the Canadian National system. I have been impressed with this thought, that altogether too much emphasis has been placed by Sir Edward Beatty upon the problem of unification or amalgamation and not sufficient attention has been paid to genuine cooperation with the national system. It may be argued that I am unjust to Sir Edward Beatty in that regard. If I am I regret it, because I hold him in the highest esteem. I repeat that I am not criticizing him for taking any stand he thinks fit to take, but I hold that we as members of parliament should review all sides of the question, and if we differ from him we are bound to give expression to our views. Officials of the Canadian National Railways are prevented from making reply in kind to that sort of argument. For instance, Judge Fullerton or the president of the railway cannot go on the public platform and argue with perfect freedom what he believes to be the best policy; he can speak only guardedly, with reserve and after due consideration of what may be the views of the government—perhaps it would be more correct to say that these officials as such are bound to leave to the government itself declarations of large policy. So they are handicapped, and in the meantime there is growing up or being built up in the country a definite body of public opinion which, according to my view, is unfair to the national railways in that it does less than justice to that great system.

So I raise the question of unification and amalgamation, and I ask, is it the only solution? It is cited by many as the only solution of the problem. I do not think it is. Parliament and the people dare not forget that in the Canadian National railway system we have a magnificent asset, and one of stupendous value. True, there are losses. True, we have had every year a cash deficit. But look out over the world, and particularly over the United States; what railway over there but has a deficit? What systems over there, some of them operating in the most densely populated districts of the country, but have received aid from the federal government in the last few years? So, Mr. Chairman, I think above all things we should fix in our minds the fact that we have in this railway a magnificent asset.

The second thing I want to suggest is—and this is a definitely business suggestion—that one should never surrender an asset at the bottom of the market. There has never been a time in the last fifteen years when it was less advisable than it is now to consider any suggestion for the disposal of this system, unless it was in 1933, when things were a little worse than they are to-day. This is no time to tolerate propaganda of any kind for the disposal of what is known as the Canadian National Railways, the property of the people of this country. I am assuming for the sake of my argument and as a reflection of my own views that we ought not to consider unification,—a term, of course, so broad that you can attach to it almost any meaning you like, though I choose to give it the meaning that I think most people do, that it is merely the modern rendition of "amalgamation."

If there is not to be amalgamation or unification, and in my opinion there should not be at this time, what other things can we do, and does this bill offer any new way of dealing with the problem? In the first place I believe, as I indicated at the opening of my remarks, that this bill will be a retrograde step, because under the trustee system of management it would have been easier than it will be under a board of directors to put into effect some suggestions I am about to make.

Here are some things we can do. I admit none of them are new, and I do not pretend to bring under review all the proposals that one might make. There is the matter of the modernization of the service. I have in my hand an extract from the Wall Street Journal of May 23, 1936. It is headed: Pennsylvania Railroad Speeds Freight Deliveries, and I would ask the committee to give heed to it, because, in my opinion, if more time were spent in studying practical solutions instead of reaching out for the moon we should make much better progress towards the settlement of our railway problem. The article states:

> Simultaneously with the inauguration on Monday of system-wide store door pick-up and delivery of less than carload freight at regular station to station rates, the Pennsylvania railroad will extend the range of its overnight merchandise freight deliveries to include hauls of 400 miles and, in many cases, still greater distances. In numerous instances, second morning delivery will be advanced to first morning, reducing the time in transit by a full day. Later and more convenient closing hours for the acceptance of shipments will also be instituted at many points.

That is a statement of what the Pennsylvania Railway is doing in this one rather limited sphere. That road is recognized as one of the most efficient railways and perhaps one of the wealthiest organizations of its kind on the continent. It is progressive and up to date; perhaps more than any other system in the United States it is giving leadership in the modernizing of methods of handling not only freight but passengers and other traffic. But what does this mean? We have had constant complaints during the last ten years about the competition of trucks; it is a real competition and one that is very difficult to meet. The Pennsylvania railroad, I believe, has met that competition. In part, but only in part, the Canadian railways are doing the same thing. A system-wide store door pick-up: that is one thing. Going right to the place of origin of the freight, picking it up, taking it to the railway, transmitting it by fast freight to the point of delivery and delivering it to the door of the person or the firm to whom it is consigned: that is one element of the Pennsylvania system. The second point is that they give a fast and assured delivery. If Canadian railways, particularly in the congested industrial and commercial areas of eastern Canada, would do the same, they would render a great service to their systems and in large measure would meet the competition of the trucks. The last point is that although this railroad has already given a very generous time allowance for the delivery of freight, it has extended that allowance by careful study and good executive management. I cite this merely as an illustration of what is practicable. It is being done; it is nothing new; and certainly it is something that could be followed in this country with substantial advantage to the railway.

The next point has to do with passenger rates. Within the last two years or more, and particularly within the last twelve months, it has become the practice of the two Canadian railways to give cheap passenger excursion rates. I think that could well be extended. I am not prepared to go into details of schedules and passenger rates, but only yesterday my attention was brought to the fact that the cost of travelling to Ottawa, Montreal or Toronto from some intermediate points is such that it would really be a large outlay to the average citizen, particularly in the small towns and rural districts. And the trains are running nearly empty. Stand on the driveway any morning—as I often do, because I make it a habit to walk along about the time these trains go out—and what do you see? A great engine capable of hauling fourteen or fifteen cars, pulling out with only four or five—a baggage and express car, a mail car, a coach or two and a chair car. You can watch the trains go by day after day, month after month and year after year, and you see in them just a handful of people; yet it costs as much to haul that train empty as full. A real and definite lowering of passenger rates would fill up those trains. I wonder whether it ever occurred to the railways that if this were done the movement of package freight might be definitely stimulated, because if people move about by hundreds and thousands it leads to a certain amount of purchasing, which means a larger movement of freight. These are little things, perhaps, but they would contribute to the solution of the problem. I suggest they could be considered with profit.

Then there is the question of carload lots in freight. The present limits are in my estimation altogether too high. Again I am not going to produce data and statistics, but I assert definitely that the minimum car lot is generally speaking too high. Go to any freight yard and watch the loading of the cars; you see a great freight car with a tare of 36,000 or 37,000 pounds and you see loaded into that car five or ten tons of freight. Dozens of cars go out only partly loaded; or, if they are held to complete the load, the freight that is put in in small lots is delayed and delivery is slow compared with the fast delivery I mentioned a moment ago. Why is it not possible and desirable for the railways to agree to a ten ton minimum carload, thus assuring rapid movement of that freight?

Another thing that should be studied is the whole question of railway equipment. I have watched these cars for forty years; the only difference between the freight car of to-day and that of forty years ago is that the car of to-day has a capacity of fifty tons, or sometimes more, whereas thirty or forty years ago I fancy the capacity was twenty or twenty-five tons. It means heavier, costlier, more imposing equipment, but certainly it has not brought about a larger net freight result.

Turning to passenger equipment, we know what has happened in Europe and in the United States in the last two or three years. Railway engineering experts the world over declare that the error of the last two decades has been that railway equipment ran to weight, whereas science called for a lessening of weight. Now they are addressing themselves to the task. Here again is a subject which might well receive the attention of the two great railway systems. A complete renovation of railway equipment would probably take ten years and might well be started now; it would give a large amount of employment. Cost—yes; it would cost a good deal, but in net results in the long run it would pay.

All these things could be done, and many others that I have not time to mention, without any conflict of opinion between the roads. It is not a question of amalgamation and unification. Cooperation in the elimination of competing services is sound provided that those who are displaced are reasonably well cared for. But these other matters would increase the efficiency of the roads, would not reduce employment at all, in fact would lead to an increase of employment. In the long run they would tend to increase the returns to and the efficiency of the roads, and they are not subjects which could possibly be looked upon as controversial as between the two railways.

This bill touches only the form or type of management; it does not offer any solution of the railway problem. I think the whole matter could be summed up with this observation; what the railways need is traffic, and what will create traffic? You cannot have traffic if people cannot buy, and people cannot buy goods if they have not purchasing power. That is why I couple this bill with the Bank of Canada Act amendment, because both measures lead us to a consideration of the same subject, namely, the fundamental economic problem of an equitable adjustment of our economic structure so that there may be a larger measure of purchasing power in the hands of the great body of people. Some have expressed it in this way: that out of the consumer's dollar a larger portion may go to the primary producers, who after all outnumber by long odds the rest of the population. If their purchasing power could be raised—and I believe it can be—increased traffic would result and the railway problem would be solved.

I conclude by saying, regretfully, that I see no forward step in this proposal. Indeed, as I said at the outset, the repeal of section 3 of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act of 1933, which is the section that inaugurated the system of trustee management, is a retrograde step.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): With the latter part of the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) I am in complete agreement. The railway problem, I need not say, is one of our major problems if not the outstanding problem with which parliament has to deal, and as such it should receive major consideration from the government. The present bill is not such as to lead me to believe that the problem has received major consideration. I need not delve into the history of our railways; that history has been placed on Hansard many times and is there for all to read. I should like to emphasize, however, this fact, that it is a problem which is far too serious to be treated as a political issue. In an address before the Toronto board of trade the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) suggested that the railway problem, more than any other, threatens our national life, and in a recent editorial the Montreal Daily Star suggested that the Canadian railway problem is as an octopus slowly and surely sapping the lifeblood of our country.

There is no question that the railway problem is a very involved one. The point uppermost in my mind is whether or not it is too seriously involved to be capable of solution by any one political party. I am convinced, and I believe many other hon. members feel the same way, that this is a major problem requiring the united action of all Canadians regardless of political affiliation. When I entered parliament at the beginning of this session I had hoped that a problem such as this would receive consideration regardless of political affiliations, but in that respect I have been disappointed.

I should like to amplify certain observations which have been made with regard to railway employees. I have a deep interest in the human aspect of the problem. We must remember that when we are considering a system of this magnitude, when we are dealing with an industry giving employment in Canada to 119,357 persons, the human element is of great importance. The Canadian National Railways employ 65,712 persons, and when we look at these large figures we have a clear understanding of the magnitude of the system and how it must affect our population. We must remember that many of the railway employees support families, in certain districts large families. When we suggest innovations and changes we must remember that the human element, the employee, is becoming uneasy and uncertain as to the future. We are causing a certain amount of unrest among the employees not only of the Canadian National but of the Canadian Pacific and of other railway systems in Canada. My view is that whatever change we may make in the national system indirectly affects every system in Canada.

At the present time unemployment exists to a considerable degree. A move in the railway field is likely to increase the number of unemployed unless we give careful consideration to the human element involved in the proposed change. I regret very much that so soon after taking office the government elected last October has seen fit to cause unrest among railway employees, who, I suggest, do not deserve that kind of treatment. In such a short space of time the government could not have given adequate consideration to proposals involving the radical changes indicated in the measure before the committee. I agree with the statement made by Judge Fullerton in the report he presented before the committee on railways and shipping on Tuesday morning. He used these words:

> Further I cannot conceive of anything more likely to have an unsettling effect upon those engaged in operating the railways than public argument centered on the system, and that whatever satisfaction one might obtain from such controversies they cannot in the end be of benefit to the railways over which I have been placed.

I charge the government with causing a certain degree of unrest and dissatisfaction among railway employees in Canada. They have not acted fairly towards those men and women, and in centres where the people are dependent upon railway employment there is great disappointment with the attitude the government has taken on this major question.

The statement has been made that we are overdeveloped in the matter of railways. With that statement we must all agree, and I need not quote figures to prove its accuracy. In passing, however, I should like to pay tribute to those great men of the past who have made possible our railway systems. We must not forget that the large mileage we criticize to-day was developed in the past by men of vision, men who conceived what Canada would be in the future. Those men deserve our tribute, not our criticism. They builded better than they knew.

I look at the railway system as it is centred around Montreal and I think of the tunnel constructed many years ago through Mount Royal. This afternoon there has been reference to a hole in the ground, which is a recent development of the tunnel. Was it as a result of an accident that the tunnel happened to come into Montreal through Mount Royal at the same level as the tracks going into Bonaventure station and over the Victoria bridge? No, it was not. The man who conceived the idea of building a tunnel and approaching the centre of Montreal from the north also appreciated the level of the Victoria bridge and Bonaventure station. He had a vision of the possible development of railway facilities on the island of Montreal, with the result that in the centre of Montreal we have an approach that can be used by any or all railways coming into that city. No, it was not any happy accident that took place in connection with the building of the tunnel. Like all railway developments in Canada, it was the result of broad vision on the part of the men who conceived it.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has made slighting references to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I hold no brief for that company, but I do not believe they deserve the harsh criticism to which they have been so unfairly subjected this afternoon. That railway has made the Dominion of Canada possible as a nation. Why should we criticize it as it was criticized this afternoon? It has made a great contribution to our national development and should not be subjected to unfair treatment. The hon. member for New Westminster was not fair in his observations. I do not believe Sir Edward Beatty or any of his officials would connive at an act such as was suggested this afternoon. I do not agree with the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) in the suggestion that unification is but another application of the term amalgamation. It is not so. Unification is an altogether different term from amalgamation. My friend from one of the western constituencies invited a definition of unification and amalgamation. I gave him a definition of the term, and I thought I had made my definition quite clear and distinct. I always try to do that, but evidently I failed, or else his failure to comprehend a clear-cut definition fell short of my anticipations. The next morning I was greeted with the suggestion that he appreciated my definition for he would find it of tremendous value to him when he sought reelection in his district the next time an election was held. I deprecate, Mr. Chairman, lowering the discussion of such an important problem as this to the level of the election possibilities of one or two members of the house.

I have suggested that we have been overdeveloped in our railways, and I could quote figures in support of that. We have in this country a population of 225 per mile of railway, and in the United States the figure is 500 per mile. It is my opinion that our railways will never reach a state of efficiency until our population reaches approximately 25,000,000.

In the railway and shipping committee we discussed railway costs and the losses sustained by the Canadian National Railways. It was my intention to place certain figures on Hansard this afternoon, but I shall refrain from doing so. Anything I say in connection with the Canadian National Railways I do not say in order to knock or in any way to lower the prestige of that railway, because I am just as much convinced as is the hon. member for Kootenay East that the Canadian National Railways has an important part to play in our national development, and as such, as the railway in which we are vitally interested, it should have fair and reasonable consideration. Any figures I give which might be to the detriment of that railway I give only to show that the low figures that obtained under the board of directors prior to 1933 have been improved since the board of trustees came into office.

Previous to 1933 we had a board of directors, very similar to the board of directors now proposed by the government. When the board of directors was in office previously, we recognized the fact that they were struggling against tremendous difficulties, that deficits were increasing to such an extent that they became alarming. The situation was such that on July 16, 1931 the standing committee on railways and shipping passed the following resolution:

> Your committee desire to call the attention of the house to the proposal made by Sir Henry Thornton at one of the sessions of the committee. He referred to the serious position of the transportation business generally and recommended that a commission be appointed for the purpose of considering the whole question of Canadian transportation.

That suggestion was adopted, with the result that the Duff commission was appointed. We have heard a great deal about the Duff commission. I just wish that every member of the house was as familiar with that commission's report as I have tried to make myself during the past few weeks. It is a concise statement of conditions as the commission found them during the course of their investigation. Prior to 1933 there had been a board of directors, and the commission was critical of that system of operating the railway. This is what they had to say in connection with the operation of the Canadian National Railways under a board of directors similar to the board of directors advocated at this time by the present government. In paragraph 33, page 13, we find these words:

Running through its administrative practices, however, has been the red thread of extravagance. The disciplinary check upon undue expenditure, inherent in private corporations because of their limited financial resources, has not been in evidence. Requisitions of the management have been endorsed by governments, and successive parliaments have voted money freely, if not lavishly.

Again, in paragraph 34, on the same page, we find these words:

Within the railway organization there has been freedom in expenditure and encouragement in plans for expansion and extension of services which were inconsistent with prudent administrative practices. The administration failed to realize that this country, with the greatest railway mileage in the world in relation to population, could not afford further capital and maintenance expenditures for unwarranted branch lines, for de luxe services, for unrequired hotels, for the building of ships in competitive service to be shortly abandoned; and, generally, for costly adventures in competitive railways out of proportion to the needs of the country.

Again, in paragraph 142, the Duff report goes on to say:

The conduct of the affairs of the national railway has been subjected in the past to political and public pressure.

Again, in paragraph 145:

Under the circumstances, the directors' functions have been in practice nothing more than advisory. It would seem that they generally gave formal approval to programs of expenditures which they appeared to regard as the main concern of the president and the government. This left the railway open to political influence and to public pressure exerted by communities and by associations of business and labour interests.

Again, in paragraph 146:

Of direct political interference by ministers and members of parliament in the detail operations of the railway, we were assured by the officials there was little or none. It was in the larger sphere of policy that political considerations led to unwise and unnecessary capital expenditures, the result of which was to create an atmosphere in which the ordinary principles of commercial operation of the railway were lost sight of.

There was the condition brought out in the Duff report. That report, which was produced at great cost to the country, and tabled in the house, represented the consensus of able men appointed to study a particular problem, and to-day despite that report, despite its recommendations, the government proposes to go back to the very things that were strongly condemned in that report. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, and through you the other members of this committee: is it fair to the people of Canada to institute a commission of that kind, with all the expenses involved, and then disregard its report? Is it any wonder that Judge Fullerton, emphasizing these particular things, uses these words:

These were the fundamental defects which the Duff commission believed could be remedied by a trustee system of direction. I wish to say most emphatically that we have exerted every effort to vindicate the hopes of the commission, and to add with some pride that, having regard to the brief time so far elapsed, we have achieved a substantial measure of success. So far as I have ever heard, there has not even been an allegation that the board of trustees has been influenced in the slightest degree by any political consideration at any time. The board has acted at all times, or endeavoured to act, as business men of broad and far-reaching responsibilities would act.

That is his opinion after two and one-half years experience as chairman of the board of trustees. Despite that experience, despite his considered opinion and despite the Duff report, we have before us a measure which will revert back to the conditions prevailing prior to 1933. I do not think it is fair to parliament or to the people to ask for consideration of a measure such as this. In his remarks yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested that the government had a mandate from the people, but the people gave no mandate to disregard a report for which they paid a considerable amount of money, a report based on considered information and supported by subsequent events. I do not think the government has any right to suggest that the people have had the opportunity to pass on legislation of this kind.

In my opinion this bill will restore political influence in connection with the management of the Canadian National system. There is every evidence of the possibility of government interference and political control. I have only to refer to the remarks of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe) during the course of a speech delivered in Toronto, not months after his taking office, not a year after, but just a few weeks. The Toronto Daily Star of December 9, 1935, gives his considered opinion on this question of major importance. He said:

The 1933 legislation which abolished the board of directors and substituted the trustee form of direction removed control of this directing agency from the hands of the government and placed it in the hands of parliament, the Commons and the Senate, though the latter might not be in any sense representative of public opinion as expressed in the election of the representative chamber. It went further. The act provided that the person with the titular rank of president shall report and be responsible to the trustees and them alone. Thus the government representing the owners, has, under the present legislation, no control whatever.

That is the statement of the minister, made less than two months after taking office. He was going to abolish the present system and take control to himself or to his department. He seeks to get the direction of the Canadian National Railways. He assumes that that direction has been lost. One of the presumptions of the Duff report was that it had been lost to political influence, and the minister now seeks to bring it back under that political influence. It was established by witnesses who appeared before the Duff commission that it was detrimental to the railway to be under political influence, and yet the Minister of Railways has introduced legislation to bring that very condition back into the system. I have talked to railway employees and they deprecate such a move. They are entirely opposed to anything that savours of political influence in connection with the operation of the Canadian National Railways. I hope the minister will take cognizance of their objections and of the other objections which have no doubt been voiced throughout the country. The minister continued:

> The purpose of the trustee form of management was to take the railway act out of politics. I wish this were possible. As Minister of Railways, I have no desire to interfere with the expert management of the road. My concern is the reverse, which is interference by the railroad management with the expressed policies of the government. We cannot escape the fact that the railway is owned by the people of Canada, that taxes collected from the people pay its deficits and that the prosperity of every citizen in thousands of communities from coast to coast can be affected by its managerial policies. Mine is a railroad riding—

Mr. HOWE: I may say that I never made that statement. It was taken inadvertently from a manuscript from which it was not struck out. I may say the manuscript was prepared by others and that statement was struck out of the copies that went to most of the papers. I never made the statement and it was quoted inadvertently in the Toronto Star.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is frank, anyway.

Mr. HOWE: I believe other people have been misquoted.

[Mr. Walsh.]

Mr. WALSH: I accept the minister's statement. I thought I was perfectly safe in quoting from the Toronto Star rather than from the Mail and Empire. Is the remainder of the quotation incorrect?

Mr. HOWE: The whole thing was struck out.

Mr. WALSH: From the minister's statement we can assume it was written for him to give as an example of what might be done by a railroad governed by trustees. It might interfere with the election of certain candidates in certain ridings.

Mr. HOWE: Just what is my hon. friend referring to? Is he referring to the sentence which I said I did not speak?

Mr. WALSH: I take it for granted that the minister did not say it.

Mr. HOWE: Why refer to it?

Mr. WALSH: I am not referring to it.

Mr. HOWE: I said I did not say it; let us drop it. On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; the hon. member is reading something that I did not say.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Howe) has denied that he said what the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) quoted him as saying. The hon. member would be out of order in continuing to refer to that.

Mr. WALSH: I ceased to read. I accepted the statement of the minister that it had been prepared and written for him, but that he had not actually said it.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the matter is closed.

Mr. WALSH: Anything I have said that casts any reflection upon the minister, I happily withdraw, because I would not like to do anything of that sort.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member is referring to what somebody other than the minister said, and he has a right to do that.

Mr. WALSH: I was referring to the situation that existed prior to 1933. This situation which was recognized by everyone had been brought about through the operation of the Canadian National Railways by a board of directors. It could be clearly inferred from the Duff report that that method of management had given rise to a considerable amount of political interference in connection with the operation of the railway. The point I am trying to make is that all this was done away with by the board of trustees. We now have a measure to reestablish that influence in connection with our Canadian National system.

I commenced by suggesting that this was a major problem, one that was beyond the ability of any one party to solve. I feel that that is so. This problem should be over and above all political parties. As one newspaper suggests, if we do not solve it, chaos will result. I urge the solution from that point of view. What the government has brought down is no solution; it will never alleviate the distress caused by the deficits that are piling up at the present time. This year we have $115,000,000 to pay out of our treasury in connection with the Canadian National Railways. How much longer can this country continue to pay amounts equal to that without going under? I leave it to the imagination of hon. members. How much longer can the people of Canada supply through taxes the deficits that are being piled up by the Canadian National Railways? I say again, as I said before, that anything that affects the Canadian National Railways indirectly affects our other great railway system, the Canadian Pacific. I wish therefore to urge the considered opinion of this house with respect to this question, an unbiased opinion. I want to see the question raised above the political issue. I should prefer to see the minister strike out this clause and continue with the board of trustees, who have been in office only since December, 1933. They have been in office just long enough to get the idea of what a railway is, and they are producing results; the reports this year show that the system is improving. If that is so—and we assume it is, according to the reports before us—why change something that is improving a bad condition? Why not continue the board in office for a certain period in order to give the trustees an opportunity to work out their policy? Raise it above political party.

The other evening I read an article from which I should like to quote:

> But what have we done at the instance of this government to solve the problem involved in the net loss of $115,000,000 in the railways last year?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member will be good enough to state what the article is from which he is quoting.

Mr. WALSH: I am quoting from a newspaper report of a speech delivered in this house by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, leader of the opposition. It appeared in the Montreal Star on May 6, 1936.

Mr. HOWE: Is it in order to read from a newspaper report of a speech delivered in the House of Commons? I am merely asking a question; I do not know.

Mr. BENNETT: It is frequently done but should not be done.

The CHAIRMAN: It is really out of order; I think the leader of the opposition will agree with me.

Mr. BENNETT: Unfortunately you cannot say it is out of order in this particular case when it has been regarded as being in order in the last two or three months. The difficulty is that we have been quoting from newspapers, a practice which is frowned upon in the imperial parliament, being regarded as unsound, but which here we have followed constantly. The hon. member can easily quote from Hansard instead of reading from the newspaper report, for the speech to which he refers was in the debate on this particular bill. That is what he is proposing to read from, so that he is in order inasmuch as he is not quoting from a previous debate—it is all part of the discussion on this bill. Our difficulty however lies in applying the rule to one speaker and one newspaper at one time, whereas we have generally followed another course.

The CHAIRMAN: I may say to the leader of the opposition that the rule was quoted the other day in his absence. It is rule 306 in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting upon proceedings within the house.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, I submit that that rule does not apply in this instance. The hon. member was not quoting from anything said by any person outside this house, nor was he commenting upon or criticizing anything done in the house. He was merely reading from the report of a speech delivered in this house. I suggest that it would be necessary to invoke some other rule; but I may add to what my leader has said in that regard, with respect to the rule about not quoting from articles, that it has been more honoured in the breach than in the observance.

Mr. BENNETT: On the question of order, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that what you have just read is paragraph 306 of Beauchesne's volume, and it is not a rule. Some years ago we made the mistake, in quoting from Beauchesne, of citing paragraphs as rules. The rules of this house are the standing rules of the house, and parliamentary practice is the practice that has developed under the rules; and Mr. Beauchesne, in this admirable book, quotes Bourinot at page 336 as authority for his summary or précis of the law. Unfortunately however it is not a rule; it is simply a summary of Bourinot's book at page 336. You will recall the time at which that error was made; it was in connection with the question whether or not a member was bound to vote if he remained in the house. Reference was made to what was called a rule but it turned out to be a paragraph not founded upon a rule. As a matter of fact it was then determined that a member might remain in the house and not vote, when the suggestion was made that he was obliged to vote if he remained in the house. I daresay you recall the circumstances, Mr. Chairman. It is easy to see why it was referred to as a rule—I think I did myself refer to it at that particular time as a rule, but my attention was directed to the fact that it was not. I do wish we had a universal rule with respect to the reading of newspaper articles, because there are 245 members in the house, and when someone else, a 246th member, is quoted because he happens to be a particular person, we are likely to get into great difficulties. I once heard a distinguished jurist, a Lord Chancellor, say, when reference was made to Berriedale-Keith's eminent work, "Who is he?" As a matter of fact, quotations from living authors are usually not used in courts of law. There are one or two great exceptions, Benjamin on Sales, and likewise Buckley on Companies. Generally speaking, however, the practice is not sound. If the rule were laid down from the Chair it would expedite the conduct of business. In the meantime the hon. member has Hansard, so that the difficulty is avoided.

Mr. WALSH: May I continue, then, quoting from Hansard—

The CHAIRMAN: I have before me Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, at page 336—

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the reference is to.

The CHAIRMAN: I quote:

> Neither is it regular for a member to read a paper which he is asking the house to order to be produced. Nor is it in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or other communications, whether printed or written, emanating from persons outside the house, and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member, or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I am quite aware that 306 is not a rule, as the leader of the opposition has said, though he did quote it as a rule at one time.

Mr. BENNETT: Not that one.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not very often quoted, but I think there are instances in which it is. I would ask the hon. member for Mount Royal not to continue reading the article.

Mr. WALSH: I am about to read from Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is not going to quote from Hansard from a previous debate at this session?

Mr. BENNETT: It is the same debate.

Mr. WALSH: It was on the first reading of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN: This year?

Mr. WALSH: Yes, May 5, 1936.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a nice point as to whether the discussion on the first reading was a previous debate. Personally I take the view that the debate on the measure is virtually continuous, but I cannot cite any authority. I think the hon. member is quite in order in quoting from Hansard as he proposes to do.

Mr. BENNETT: Discussion from the time a resolution emerges until the third reading of the bill founded upon it is said, somewhere, to be one debate. I do not know whether it is on this occasion or not.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) may continue.

Mr. WALSH: I quote from Hansard of May 5, 1936, at page 2525 where the leader of the opposition is reported as saying:

> But what have we done, sir, at the instance of this government, to solve the problem involved in the net loss of $115,000,000 in the railways last year? That is the problem. In view of the protestations and promises made from this side of the house by hon. gentlemen opposite when we were in office, I had expected that some legislation, worthy at least of the name, would be introduced to deal with the problem. But instead of that the major part of the existing legislation is left alone, while there will be substituted seven directors for the three trustees, ultimately, the minister says, largely for the purpose of getting rid of the chairman of the board. Is that the government's conception of its responsibility to the Canadian people in that regard? If it is, let it be known; let it be understood, for this is not something that is the accumulation of years but something that took place last year, 1935. I put that question to the government and to those who support them.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member for Mount Royal, but he has already exceeded his time, and has had credit for the time spent on the point of order.

Mr. WALSH: I am about to finish the quotation:

> They have the majority, they have the power, and I trust they have the inclination. Let them proceed to give effect to their inclination and they will receive the support of those members of the house who are interested in the solution of this problem.

I desire to leave the problem on that high level, the utterance of a statesman who is recognized as such throughout this country, and to ask that the government give the matter consideration in the spirit of that pronouncement.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): In speaking on this very important bill, I wish to be brief, recognizing that we expect to complete in short order the remaining work of the session. At the outset I thank the hon. minister for the manner in which he has brought this matter to the attention of the House of Commons and the country as a whole. Certainly no one on either side of the house can accuse him of partisanship in his method of presentation of the bill; he dealt with it in that businesslike way which befits a matter so important to the people of this dominion, and one in which every citizen is greatly interested. It is not my intention to go over ground that has been covered by previous speakers in the presentation of figures regarding the railways of this country. We all know that our railway systems are very important and very expensive. Nevertheless, in dealing with this subject we must keep an open mind, realizing that when the fathers of confederation and those who pioneered in new inventions fostered the development of our railway transportation services, no one dreamed of the changes that have taken place in these latter years and which have to some extent replaced those services. Even members of parliament may sometimes feel a little astonished at this phase of our progress when dealing with certain of the items of the federal administration, for instance, the Post Office Department. Some now are dreaming of the day when our postal service will in the main be conducted by air. No one will criticize this progress and development, for after all we must be on the march if we are to keep abreast of civilization.

But there is one factor we cannot avoid in discussing railway questions in this country, namely, that unlike some sections of the United States or some countries on other continents we shall always need railway facilities, at least during certain times of the year. No one will challenge this statement, that no matter what we may do with our trans-Canada highway, which is going to parallel our present railway system from coast to coast, in the winter months we shall require our railway facilities, not only in the northern sections of Canada but in the southern ones as well. In dealing with this matter, therefore, we must apply our minds to this consideration, that no matter how much we deplore the deficits on the Canadian National Railways and the burden that is thereby laid on the shoulders of every taxpayer of this country, we must deal with the question in a way that will not jeopardize the services to which our people are entitled during every month of the year, and more particularly in the winter. If there is one suggestion I would particularly like to commend to the present government, it is that they should appoint a transportation department, with which it may be found possible for the various provinces to be associated, and with only one head of the transportation system we have in this country, so as to have uniform transportation regulations. There is no evading the fact that we are going to have deficits. Everyone will have been struck with the inroads that have been made into railway business by the bus and truck services of this dominion, and those inroads are going to be deeper and deeper unless we find it possible to put the two systems on an even keel, where we shall have uniform legislation and regulations, and where one will compete with the other with an equal chance of success, and with definite fields of action. I fully understand that this is very dangerous ground. No doubt these questions have been mooted at provincial conferences held in Ottawa. I also readily recognize that for sentimental reasons, if for no others, the various provinces wish to have the full say so far as truck and bus services are concerned. But I believe the situation is so serious, and that fact is so fully appreciated by the provinces, that the time will soon be ripe for the creation of a centralized service, a central department that will look at transportation from all angles and will function along the line of definite activities emanating from the central government.

Speakers on behalf of the opposition would have us believe that politics have been injected into the consideration of this problem and this bill, but I believe implicitly in any new measure which will improve, in my opinion, the position of our railways, and I surely hold that the Montreal Star is not being fair to the Canadian National railway system or to Canada as a whole when it deals in a biassed way and with far-fetched criticism with the operations of that system. As has been said by a previous speaker, no one will deny that the Canadian National Railway is a wonderful asset to this country. I admit that in certain features of administration it has sinned, and sinned grievously, but surely we shall take note of the mistakes of the past and thereby benefit in future as far as that great system is concerned.

In this discussion frequent reference has been made to the human factor. That is one which no person can wish to ignore, and it seems to me that in the so-called cooperation upon principles of economy which has been applied for the last five years in the Canadian National system, the little fellow, the working man, the one that sweats and toils, has been neglected in a good many cases in contrast with the treatment which has been enjoyed by higher officials. I do not pretend to be a railway man, but when I see a man working on a section of track getting $2.40 a day, while at the same time some high officials of the system are receiving tens of thousands of dollars a year, I can understand the agitation which is going on in some sections of the dominion. More than that, when one sees that only two men are engaged on twelve miles of railway, and have to keep that track in good condition—which I maintain is absolutely impossible—while at the same time high officials of the system are travelling over the country in palatial coaches, enjoying the finest possible service, one may have to admit that it is less important that officials should have these luxuries than that better provision of necessities should be extended to the working man. The human factor has received consideration so far as the higher officials are concerned, but the men working on the sections or in the shops have not for the last five years received from the administration of the Canadian National Railways the consideration to which they were entitled. I believe that talent and experience should receive a fair recompense. On the other hand labour men have to work under all climatic conditions; I have known them to work ten consecutive hours in a great downpour of rain and at the end of the day get $2.40, and I say that is not fair and not conducive to the esprit de corps that should mark such an organization. I have taken up the cudgels for these men in the past and I am going to continue doing so. The minimum wage law should be applied on the Canadian National system. Two section men to twelve miles of main line railway is not sufficient. Some day there may be an accident resulting in heavy loss or grievous bodily harm, and the blame should be put where it properly belongs. I do not want to go into that situation at length, but the Canadian National system should realize the competition they have to meet. I have not yet heard of the president or directors of some bus or truck company having a special bus to travel in over the country. Such companies do not have the administration overhead that prevails in the Canadian National Railways.

There is another factor I wish to mention. Take my own section. A young man doing office work or any railway work there has no chance whatever of advancement. It seems to be a kind of family compact; the bigger positions go to men in the bigger centres. Surely, in the smaller places young men of experience, with years of service, should have opportunities of promotion. But this is never the case. I do not want to criticize the appointments that took place in my own section, but local men who know all the conditions should receive consideration. Nevertheless men from Montreal, or Quebec, or Toronto, or Winnipeg were placed over men in our section who had years of service and seniority.

There is one section of the Canadian National Railways which has never received proper attention from any government. I am absolutely at ease in speaking about that matter because I have done so every session for the last ten years. That section is the transcontinental link of the Canadian National Railways. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had the great dream that some day a major portion of passenger and freight traffic would go over that section. Perhaps now, through lack of maintenance, the road-bed is not too good and the service would not compare with some other services, but the fact remains that that section has never received the attention it deserves. According to the Duff report, on more than eight hundred miles of main line of the Canadian National system the commissioners did not find it possible to spend a single hour during their inquiry. Every one knows that progress in Canada at the present time is northward and westward. Anyone who knows the mining history of this country knows that progress is being made mostly in the northern sections, especially of Ontario and Quebec. What happened in 1931? Without our section of the population ever being consulted the daily train service we had from Montreal and Quebec via Cochrane to Winnipeg was cut off. To-day there are 400,000 people in that area who have been deprived of direct communication with western Canada. Is this fair? It is not. There is only fifteen miles' difference between the route through my section and the routing at present followed by the Canadian National. I am practical enough to realize that it would not be fair to ask the same kind of palatial trains that we had prior to 1931. Often I criticized the luxurious equipment they had. But this is a fact in which every hon. member is directly interested, that there are at present 400,000 Canadian people deprived of direct communication with the west. If I want to travel from my own home town to Winnipeg I have to go 255 miles out of my way to North Bay. It is true there are local trains twice a week, but will anyone travel on a mixed train the schedule of which is so uncertain that he may reach Winnipeg in a week or it may be two? One of the main reasons I am speaking here now is to make an appeal to the Minister of Railways and to the House of Commons to give a proper train service to a pioneer section of the country, a section the population of which is increasing at the rate of 5,000 a month, and is going to continue to increase. In my own riding I have at present 100,000 people; it is part of a riding which was one riding fifteen years ago, and which is now divided into four. This shows the unfair treatment we receive from an institution that is supposed to give us service; it forgets the human factor. I have been told by some high officials of the Canadian National Railways that they cannot make time on our section. I know they cannot, but there is a very good reason, namely that they have neglected the roadbed. I said that there are only two section men to twelve miles of railway. I am begging this committee, not only the minister but every hon. member present, to study the situation. I do not believe in deficits, but at the same time this country owes something to its population. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) said that the Canadian National Railways is a wonderful asset. He also mentioned the fact that we are spending tens of millions of dollars for war pensions, and I never heard a word of criticism of that from any section of the house. These are liabilities, contracts, for which the dominion carries a certain responsibility.

It is not my intention to deal with this matter at any greater length now; I hope other opportunities will be given me, either before the department or the management of the Canadian National system, to state my case. I hold that under the new board of directors for which the minister is making provision it should be possible to decrease interest rates on the Canadian National bonds. No one will challenge the statement that when the people invested in those bonds years ago the situation was different from what it is at the present time. If interest rates were reduced fifty per cent that would practically wipe out the deficit. I hope the minister will look into that question. I know it has been given attention by previous administrations.

As far as I am concerned I never had any quarrel with the Canadian Pacific railway; everyone realizes the good it has done this country and the great part it has played in its development, but the same principle should apply, as forcibly or more so, to the Canadian National Railways. A previous speaker mentioned the Duff report. We see from that report how many roads were unloaded on the Canadian National system. In a good many cases they were unloaded by provincial governments, and those amalgamations were compulsorily loaded on the Canadian National Railways. We cannot expect the Canadian National system to carry all these roads. I make this fervent plea to the minister. I have confidence in his ability; I say this sincerely and I am seldom inclined to praise, but since he has been minister all the presentations he has made in the house have been made in a businesslike way, and I have implicit faith that he will be successful in eliminating some of the troubles that at present face our railway system.

I have been elected to the federal parliament to help every section of Canada, and we must face problems in a national way. Parochialism has never been and never will be my weakness. When I say that at the present time we have not the passenger accommodation between east and west to which we are entitled, I am speaking not politically, but in a national way. I am not fighting only for my constituents; I am speaking for 400,000 people in northern Ontario and northern Quebec, and voicing the sentiment, I believe, of every hon. member and citizen in Canada. An improvement and the reestablishment of the above passenger service would be beneficial not only to the section in which I am most interested, but to the whole of Canada.

Mr. H. E. WILTON (Hamilton West): Several years ago I was employed as a railway telegrapher. At that time I worked on what was known as the "7/12/365/40-system, without." That meant seven days a week, twelve hours a day, three hundred and sixty-five days a year and forty dollars a month without vacation. Due to the improved intelligence of railway officials and to an increased realization of the value of railway telegraphers the situation has been improved. To-day they are in a much better position.

Much has been said in connection with the higher points of railway administration. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) referred to the habit of reaching for the moon. I believe that sometimes in the discussion of great and important questions there is a tendency to think of the higher-ups and overlook the ones at the bottom. As the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) stated, the human interest element must enter into the successful operation of a railway company. While that element may seem to be of minor importance, in my view it is of great importance because it may reflect either for or against the standing of a railway company.

May I call the attention of the minister and of the board of railway commissioners, if possible, to the situation existing in connection with a service which is only of minor importance so far as railway administration is concerned, but of greater importance as it affects the public. I refer to the railway depot service given by red caps. Some hon. members may smile; when we refer to people at the bottom it is sometimes easy to smile. I must say, however, that the situation with respect to this particular service does not commend itself to the respect of the public.

Let me illustrate. There are about sixty red caps in the union depot at Toronto, only ten of whom receive wages, and small wages, at that. The other fifty are thrown on to the generosity of the public with the result that a government owned railway is encouraging the vicious system of tipping. In other words these boys—we refer to them as boys, but most of them are young married men, some of whom have families—are forced to make their living by receiving tips from the public. In many cases those young married men are receiving such small amounts of money each day that the city of Toronto through its welfare and relief department must subsidize their receipts so that they may live. It is a sad situation when a government owned railway retains employees who render a first-class service to the public, but at the same time pays so little for that service that the workers have to rely upon municipal assistance. The situation I have described applies in other cities where there are union depots.

There is this further point to be considered: The last speaker mentioned that only two men are used to work a twelve mile section. When I worked for the railway a section was five miles long, and five men worked on it.

[Mr. Wilton.]

I do not know what the situation is in Ontario with respect to the numbers employed on sections, but any person using the sleeping cars between Ottawa and Toronto will readily realize that there are certain spots so rough that one almost needs to be fastened into the berth for fear of rolling out. It is evident that an insufficient number of men are being used to patrol the tracks and to keep them in satisfactory condition.

I have referred to these two human interest points, namely the employment of more men on track work and the placing of red caps on a basis whereby they may live without receiving help from municipalities. The giving of assistance simply places another burden on municipalities already overburdened.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Chairman, we are discussing section 2 of the bill which has to do with the definition of the term "trustees." This section stands as the basis for the whole bill. I suggest that the act passed in 1933 known as the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act was of a judicial nature, because it was based upon the findings of the Duff commission. Each railway was to appoint an arbitral tribunal, the functions of which were to be judicial. It was never intended that the tribunal should be in politics. The gentlemen who formed the tribunal were to perform certain duties as set forth at page 66 of the Duff report, paragraphs 215, 216, 217, 218 and 219.

Hon. members will notice the provision appearing in paragraph 218 of the Duff report on the functions of this joint tribunal.

> There shall be no appeal to any court in Canada from any decision of the arbitral tribunal on any question of law or fact; except as to a question of law if it is one involving a question of jurisdiction, in which case there should be an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, by leave of a judge of that court.

In the present instance the trustees are to be known as directors; in that regard we are becoming more like the Canadian Pacific Railway every day in our "me too" political policy. We should never have moved the head office of the Canadian National Railways from Toronto to Montreal. I have every respect for the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe). I realize that he is a new minister, but the longer he stays in Ottawa the more he will realize that it is politics, politics, all politics all the time.

May I say that the three gentlemen who served on the board set up by the act of 1933 rendered a good service, one of them without salary, Mr. F. K. Morrow of Toronto, a brilliant young Canadian. They effected economies, and we have but to look at the railway report and examine the operating ratio set out in the Duff report to realize the good work they have done. They have struck off huge maintenance charges, and I must say that the work of the Bennett board was wonderful and satisfactory. In the present instance we are to substitute for that board of three trustees a board of sevenfold amen board of directors.

The employment commission was selected along political lines, and I must say that that is a step in the wrong direction. The same practice will be followed in the present instance of a sevenfold amen board of directors for three trustees a difference without a distinction. Without any notice in votes and proceedings the minister had a committee appointed, violating every rule of parliament, immediately preceding one of the holidays and without any notice whatever they got away with it. No one knew anything about it. It was not on the order paper; no notice was given. It was the only opportunity we had to discuss this most important question of the national railways, involving such huge deficits that it will be an old man of the sea on the backs of the next generation.

The very object of passing this Bill No. 21 is set out in section 2, which is the gist of the whole bill. All the rest of the clauses are merely subsidiary and are built round section 2. Section 2 deals with the definition of the new trustees, who will be a lot of useless figureheads, and their duties. The duties of the board of trustees which were set out in the statute of 1933 were derived from the Duff commission's report. What were those duties? The board of trustees was to get together regarding the joint use of terminals; running rights and joint use of tracks; control and prohibition in respect of the construction of new lines, and provision of facilities and additional services; the joint use of facilities where this would promote economy or permit the elimination of duplicating or unremunerative services or facilities; abandonment of lines, services or facilities; pooling of any part or parts of freight or passenger traffic; things necessarily incidental to the above enumerated matters.

The very next clause of the Duff commission's report, which was signed by Right Hon. Chief Justice Duff, sets out the jurisdiction of the board of trustees. There is no appeal to any court of law. The Duff commission's report at pages 50 and 51 gives the reasons for the board's recommendations which were incorporated in the statute of 1933, chapter 33. That whole act was built on the Duff report. Now we are asked by Bill No. 21 to turn that act of 1933 upside down founded as it was on fact and destroy all the good work that has been done under the administration of the board of trustees during the last three years. The board of three trustees was an economic, useful and nationally efficient judicial body, and it is to be replaced by a board of seven directors of no experience with different functions and political powers, and the railway is to be run from the political and not the economic aspect. At page 50 of their report the Duff commission gives the operating ratios of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, from which I will quote a few figures, as follows, to show the necessity of running the road outside the small realm of politics from the commercial aspect. This railway will be an old man of the sea on the backs of our poor taxpayers for twenty-five to fifty years. This table shows it:

Operating Ratios

Year:	Canadian National per cent	Canadian Pacific per cent
1923..	91·8	81·0
1924..	92·5	80·5
1925..	86·7	77·3
1930..	91·4	78·4
1931..	99·8	80·3

The Duff commisison gave these reasons above why the new board of trustees which it recommended should be freed from political and public pressure. They called in the presidents of the two railways, Sir Edward Beatty and Sir Henry Thornton, and got their views on this subject, and the commission would not have recommended a board of trustees had it not been for the evidence that was given by the president of the Canadian National Railways and of the Canadian Pacific Railway on political influence and its baneful effects which is cited on page 51 of the Duff report. Sir Henry Thornton said:

> The leaders of all political parties and the people of Canada as a whole are a unit in their desire to prevent political invasion of the Canadian National Railway.

That was his very first statement. The report goes on to say that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway appeared to be more concerned over the activities of what he termed "politically-minded" executives of the publicly owned railway than he was over straight political pressure for definite ends. Sir Edward Beatty said:

> We talk a great deal about political interference being damaging to railway operations, and we know that that is true, generally speaking. But when we say it we seem to think the only political influence is that exercised by a government, or a member of government, or a member of parliament. To my mind the worst kind comes from the political attitude of men in publicly-owned institutions. Possibly they are not conscious of it, but they become politically-minded; their policies and actions have a political tinge, and that, from my standpoint, is more serious as representing the attitude of the corporation than the isolated act of a member of parliament who tries to get a man employed.

Years ago the ability of privately-owned railway companies to withstand political pressure was somewhat limited. To-day it is nothing like it was, because we can say "no" to that kind of pressure. But the politics that develop inside an organization because it is publicly-owned, and not privately-owned, is a serious thing.

We are going to upset all the good work that the board of trustees, appointed in pursuance of the Duff report, has done. Liberal newspapers, such as the Toronto Globe, for instance, are taking a great interest in this question of public ownership. I am for public ownership, but I am not out for the kind of public ownership that we see in the Canadian National Railways. There never was and never will be public ownership in the Canadian National Railways because the present system is but the leavings of a lot of privately owned roads, and it is bankrupting the country. The Toronto Globe takes very strong ground on the method, as proposed in this bill, of selecting the railway directors, and it has a great deal to say in praise of the three trustees who are to be removed for this "sevenfold amen" directorate, and particularly in praise of Mr. F. K. Morrow, for what he has done in eliminating what has been termed this reckless and criminal waste of public funds.

We find that the Drayton-Acworth commission in 1917 made parallel recommendations to those made by the Duff commission, namely, that there should be a joint arbitral tribunal working not from any political aspect but solely from the commercial aspect. In the early days of public ownership in your constituency, Mr. Chairman, this very same issue came up, whether there should be political influence in the public ownership of heat, light and power in the hydro development. The Drayton-Acworth report is founded upon the parallel principle of that hydro system that we find in the Duff commission's report, of a publicly owned utility being operated not from a political standpoint but commercially. That is what the Duff and Drayton commission in 1917 recommended should obtain in connection with the board of trustees that was appointed to operate this public utility. The board of three trustees, from 1933 to 1936, has not had a chance in the two or three years of its existence to show what it could do, and I am sorry to see this change being made. Mistakes have been made in the past, and they are well known to parliament. Parliament has practically no control over the Canadian National Railways. If you ask the Minister of Railways, a new minister, a question about the Canadian National Railways, he replies that he cannot say anything about it because it is a matter for the railway.

It was always intended that any member of parliament could attend the committee on railways and shipping, and ask questions, but members have not yet received the reports of the committee except Nos. 1 to 6. This Bill No. 21, which is now before us, is nothing but a political bill, and the Canadian National Railways will not have a chance under the board of directors which the bill proposes to appoint. The minister should give some evidence as to whom the government is going to appoint. The newspapers seem to know ahead who the seven directors are going to be. All is politics and the games of the ins and outs, that is all Bill No. 21 is. We all remember the board which had control under the Liberal administration. We remember the conditions under which officials did not even have to put in vouchers for expenditures. We remember how $350,000 was spent for advertising and editorials in newspapers to boost the president and certain directors. We remember how branch lines were built to the sun, to the moon and to the stars. We remember the Cook's tour of a small standing army of officials that travelled all over Europe. Evidence of this disgraceful expenditure is to be found in the 1932-33, 600-page book of the select committee on railways and shipping, and bills from the different hotels throughout Europe. All this was done at the expense of the people of Canada and these officials were exempted from ever putting in any vouchers for these hundreds of thousands of dollars of corrupt and dishonest expenses as set out in the committee's reports.

Are we going back to the conditions which existed in those days? Are we going to build more golf courses, hotels, useless branch lines, and a thousand other things and have deficits all along the line? Are we going back to the building of branch lines, referred to in the Duff report? We have 44,000 miles of single track railway with a population of only nine or ten millions. Our railway mileage equals that of France, Germany and the United Kingdom, with total populations of 47,000,000, 46,000,000 and 45,000,000. Expenditures on branch lines in Saskatchewan amounted to $30,000,000; in Manitoba the total expenditure was $9,862,000; in British Columbia, $5,210,000, and in Alberta, $8,600,000 These branch lines were constructed over the head of parliament in an absurd way with useless duplication and waste. All this money was spent by the old board whom Bill No. 21 now reestablishes, and the old order is back on us. Whenever we asked for information we were told that we could not get it. The province of Ontario and Quebec, where 80 per cent of our cash revenues come from, got little or nothing under the political management to which the Drayton and Duff reports referred. This is to be found in the Duff report commencing at page 50. That report suggests that a non-political board should be appointed.

The central provinces have to pay the deficits. Only a small percentage of the necessary money will come from the workers in the other provinces. Central Canada has to make up these deficits through income and sales taxes and other taxes of that kind. Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to the rights of the majority, but this is the first time I ever knew of a majority having any rights in Canada. The taxpayers of Ontario and Quebec pay eighty per cent of the taxes. The Prime Minister said that he had a mandate from the people, but he never received a mandate to change the management of this railway. The head office was moved from Toronto to Montreal, and it should be moved back to Toronto, the home of public ownership. The national railways should be given a chance to rid itself of the grafters in its make-up and management and organization. A large residence in the city of Montreal was bought for the former president. These new trustees most likely will come from St. James street too, and I should like to know if new houses will be bought for the new president and his sevenfold amen crew of directors.

These new trustees will have their hands tied under section 2. This section is an antithesis to the recommendations of the Duff report. As I say, I have great respect for the minister. I knew him years ago when he was a very likeable, able and capable civil engineer of good repute. Under this bill, neither he nor any other living man will be able to rid this railway of political influence in its administration, that type of influence which has been a curse since confederation in this country. There will be no freedom under this bill. There is no longer any freedom in this parliament, in the press, the pulpit or the universities in this country. There is no freedom I say in the press in this country as its members refuse to have anything to do with reporting the proceedings of this house except what the government cares to have the union press publish. There is no freedom in the pulpit and there is no freedom in our legislatures. We are going back to where we were before the days of responsible government.

Hundreds of millions of dollars were spent without the authority of parliament. I can remember one time when I wanted certain information from the board of directors and the minister told me that he had nothing to do with the matter. He refused to give me a detailed statement of $400,000 which had been spent on paid editorials in the newspapers of this dominion in an effort to boom the president of the Canadian National Railways. Money was spent over the head of this parliament and when we asked for information, the minister told us that he had nothing to do with the matter. If the hydro, that great public enterprise in the province of Ontario, in which tens of millions of the people's money has been invested, had been conducted in the same way as this railway was conducted, that enterprise would have been bankrupt and the province would have been bankrupt. We are going back to the dark days which existed when I first came into this house.

I give a great deal of credit to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and to that other faithful follower of his, the former lovable member for Muskoka, Mr. McGibbon. The latter is a very sick man to-day, the press say, nearly at death's door, but he did a great national work in connection with this railway as a real public ownership man. The people of Canada owe him a great debt of gratitude for the way in which he explored and disclosed the rotten state of affairs that existed in the administration of this railway under the old board of directors. He performed a duty to the people of this country. The Duff report says that this old board acted only in an advisory capacity. They loafed round their offices in Montreal and did nothing. They appeared before the committees here and they sat up in the galleries while the debates were going on, and smoked cigars. They had a good time all over Canada.

I can remember when I tried to start my national coal supply policy in 1923 and to get this railway to adopt a proper national policy in connection with the carriage of coal from the maritime provinces and the western provinces to central Canada. The former board of trustees were absolutely opposed to this, Sir Henry Thornton said I wanted a lunch counter system of freight rates for coal and steel and iron, yet under a system brought about by the former government along these lines of my coal bill of 1923 to 1930, over 2,800,000 tons of coal were moved economically last year to central Canada and the head of the lakes. This movement has been of great benefit to the maritime provnces and Alberta. Yet the old political crowd in the Canadian National Railways ridiculed it, although it is law to-day.

The government might as well appoint seven directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway to operate the Canadian National system, for they know more about the system than members of parliament do and will know all that the new seven under Bill 21 know. When we asked for information from the old board, under the political administration, we could not get it; a member of parliament could not find out anything about the Canadian National Railways. But the head office of the Canadian Pacific Railway knew everything that was going on. That was proved by evidence given here in 1932 before the railway committee, evidence covering nearly four or five hundred pages in the 1932 report on railways and shipping. Do we want to go back to that state of affairs? Yes, and Bill 21 brings us back to the old big I days of 1923 to 1930.

I have never faltered in my support of public ownership, but we have never had public ownership in the National railways, only a name. The present situation has been advertised all over the United States as an evidence of the failure of public ownership, but as I say we have never had public ownership. If the government want to hand over the whole system to private interests, then they are doing the right thing in appointing seven directors. We are simply imitating the Canadian Pacific in referring to the trustees as directors. These directors, I assume, will have private cars and will travel round the country. King Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like the former president and those under him from 1923-1930. There was never anything like it except in the United States. The sections that constitute the backbone of this bill are political in their implications. In Cleveland they have the headquarters of a four billion dollar railway like this under Mr. Van Sweringein comprising twenty corporations, the whole system having been built up on credit, and we all know what revelations have been made regarding that system in Washington into Wall Street, all the errors that have crept into it, political interference, and so on. One has only to read the report of proceedings in the United States senate to see what has been done over there, and we are imitating them.

[Mr. Church.]

Where does the taxpayer come in? We sit here as members of parliament and we have no more to say about the railway department than has the man in the moon. Over the head of parliament a committee was appointed. I attended one or two sessions to see what was going on; thinking a member of parliament might reasonably ask for a copy of the report in the committee of railways and shipping, I applied for one, and a gentleman named Thompson of the Canadian National Railways, who was one of the old regime chiefs of staff and splendour, refused to let me have it. Well, I do not want any favours; I know enough about the way in which the railway has been administered.

I contend that the present government has no mandate from the Canadian people to return to the old state of affairs in connection with the national railways. It was not the government's election platform that returned them to power, for they had a different platform in every province. The reason they were returned to power was not the reason given by the Prime Minister yesterday; it was as a fact the deep resentment which the people of the world had felt against all governments then in power the world over, a resentment which they shared with people throughout the world against all governments. And I submit that the people of Canada removed from office a government which had received cold storage of justice and regard from the electorate. If the government insists on our going back to the old condition of things, at any rate let them not call it public ownership; let them call it Canadian Pacific ownership, because that is all it has ever been. Under Sir Henry Thornton the management was one of the most politically-minded the world has ever seen, and one of the most inefficient and useless in Canada.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I have not the time to discuss the broad issue of the Canadian National Railways; everyone agrees as to its importance. I would, however, crave the indulgence of the committee while I read a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Bonaventure county council held in New Carlisle, Quebec, on March 9, 1932. This resolution will indicate the feeling of the people of that district with respect to the way in which the Gaspé railway has been administered under the present regime, and the hope which they cherish that a change will be made under the new system which is about to be inaugurated. I could take up a good deal of the time of the committee covering the whole history of the railway, but in this resolution I find a concise statement of the facts. The resolution reads:

Whereas the federal government has purchased and taken over the railway known as the Gaspé branch lines and has made said branch lines a part of the Canadian National Railways; and

Whereas since acquiring said branch lines, the railway management has undertaken to remove from Gaspé, New Carlisle and Matapedia, all repair shops and terminal operations, and to establish said repair shops and terminal operations in the town of Campbellton, in the province of New Brunswick, to the great detriment of Gaspé, New Carlisle and Matapedia, and to the people in general in the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure, and especially to those whose means of livelihood have been taken away by the removal of said repair shops and terminals; and

Whereas the reasons given by the railway management for these changes are economy and efficiency; and

Whereas after several meetings between the management and interested parties, the reasons given by the management were not substantiated but rather were shown to be without foundation; and

Whereas a meeting was held in Montreal, on May 15, 1931, where Sir Henry Thornton, president of the Canadian National Railways, gave definite assurance to a representative delegation along with federal members of parliament for the province of Quebec that these changes would not be made; and

Whereas four months after this assurance was given the terminal at Matapedia was closed without previous notice and terminal operations transferred to Campbellton, N.B., with a gradual removal of all repair shops and other works from New Carlisle and Gaspé to Campbellton, N.B.;

Therefore be it resolved that we, mayors from every municipality in the county of Bonaventure composing the county council, protest against these changes for the following reasons:

1st. That removal of repair shops and terminals do not make for efficiency or economy but rather for less efficiency and certainly greater cost in operations;

2nd. That removal of these repair shops and terminals from the province of Quebec to the province of New Brunswick is a serious infringement of the rights of this province, which has made valuable contributions in both lands and money for the construction of these lines, with the just expectation that all reasonable benefits obtained in the operation of said lines should be for the people of this province;

3rd. That the removal of these works and terminals is a direct violation of the tacit understanding and promise arrived at with Sir Henry Thornton, and shows a serious disregard for the rights of the people in the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure, and disrespect for the chosen representatives of the people of this province with whom said understanding was arrived at;

Therefore be it further resolved that we, the members of this county council for the county of Bonaventure, in regular session at New Carlisle, and representing the divers interests in every municipality throughout the county, place ourselves on record as being opposed to the removal from this county and province of the railway repair shops at New Carlisle and terminal operations at Matapedia or anything else the removal of which would be detrimental to our communities, county and province, and do hereby urge upon the railway management the necessity of reestablishing as soon as possible all works and terminal operations that have been removed;

And be it further resolved that a copy of this resolution be sent to: The Honourable the Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways, Sir Henry Thornton, Honourable Doctor E. Paquet, Lucien Moraud, K.C., Henri Larue, M.P., and Mr. Beaudry Leman and Hon. Charles Marcil, M.P. of Bonaventure county, and E. A. D. Morgan, K.C.

Mr. Morgan was the Conservative candidate in 1930. Nothing has been done since the passing of this resolution except that the western terminus of Matapedia has been removed from the place where it has been located for forty years into the province of New Brunswick, so that the railway has to go thirteen miles backwards to reach Campbellton, to the great dissatisfaction of the community. I congratulate the Minister of Railways on bringing about this change, so that that part of the province of Quebec, one of the oldest parts of Canada, may obtain that fair treatment to which it is entitled.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): I have listened with care and attention to what the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has just said. If I have gathered correctly what is contained in that memorandum, I think it is a very poor reason indeed for any changes to be made. The railways cannot be efficiently administered in a national sense if local considerations are always to have preference; you will have what may be called a patchwork railway across the whole dominion. I realize the hardships, speaking in a local sense, that may accrue to some part of the country when a transfer is made of certain shops from one place to another. But the question where those shops should be located is not a matter for local determination; it must always be one of which the directors or the board of trustees and the administrative officials should be practically the sole judges. I feel sorry in one way for the position in which the hon. member for Bonaventure and certain of his constituents find themselves, but that in itself is not a condemnation of what has been done either by the existing board of trustees or by the previous management of the Canadian National Railways. It is quite conceivable that from time to time, due to adjustments which must be made in the administration of the railways, hardships will be inflicted upon certain communities. From that point of view every member of the house, I think, feels a certain sense of regret and commiseration for those so affected, but they may have to suffer in the interest of the general benefit accruing to the railway system as a whole. What the hon. member for Bonaventure has said is true regarding not only the Canadian National system but the privately owned railways, and that condition will continue to arise from time to time when changes are necessary to bring about a fairly efficient management of the railroads of Canada.

It appears to me that in the course of discussion this afternoon we have been going, somewhat like the song, round and round. On this clause we have discussed virtually the whole railway situation as it affects the country at this time. Remarks of a general nature have been made with regard to how the railway should be run, the kind of equipment it should have, and so on. I believe that every one of the problems raised on the floor of the house this afternoon has also been raised from time to time in the committee which has been studying the railway question. I do not think this parliament or this committee as a whole is more competent in that regard than is the management of the two railroads or, specifically, of the Canadian National Railways. We have listened also to a great deal of talk about politics. That is quite the usual thing in this chamber when we discuss railways. I remember very well just a few years ago, when the former government took action which resulted in the dismissal of the late Sir Henry Thornton, and when the new set-up of the railways was made, we had the cry of political interference with the Canadian National Railways. To-day, with the situation reversed, we have it again. I do not believe that in the proposed new set-up, about which I am not in the least enthusiastic, we shall have any more political interference than we have had during the last five or six years. Last evening some fairly harsh things were said, particularly by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), predicting political interference with the national railways as a result of the proposed new scheme. I do not share in that regard the fears of my hon. friend, but I take some exception to the government's action, and I do so on the ground I indicated last night when I spoke on this question for a minute or two.

When the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) discussed this clause of the bill he confused two aspects of the question, the first being its political significance, and the second, the personnel. To my mind the two are entirely separate. I quite agree with the Prime Minister in his statement that the section contained in the act which this bill seeks to amend did convey to the existing board of trustees a power greater perhaps, than they should have had, because in case there was dissatisfaction in this house with the activities of the board it would have been a very difficult thing to remove them from office. It may be that far more powers were given to them than could be justified, or were contained in previous acts of parliament. On the other hand, the extent of the powers conferred by the act has really nothing to do with the personnel of the commission, and the objection I take at this time is to the very dangerous principle, which may become a bad precedent for future years, that whenever we have a change in the political complexion of parliament we are to have, or are likely to have, a new board of trustees. I very strongly object to that. As has been pointed out, I believe by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh), there is a great deal of dissatisfaction among the employees of the railway at the action this parliament is taking. Similar dissatisfaction was expressed when, in 1933, a similar bill was before the house. Now, three years later, we hear the same rumblings from the employees of the Canadian National system because of the changes that are being introduced in this house. I see, Mr. Chairman, that it is six o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member has about half a minute more.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, you have become so exacting in looking at the clock that I think, if you will now give another look at it, you will probably say that it is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HEAPS: At half a minute to six o'clock when I asked for the recess I was discussing certain aspects of this question. I never knew that half a minute was quite so valuable. I know it is valuable when you have to catch a train; I know also many a half hour has gone without much serious work being done in this chamber. However I want to discuss one or two aspects of the clause at present before the committee. I hope that when the appointments to the directorate are made by the government, they will obtain the very best men, irrespective of previous political convictions. It has, perhaps, been a weakness in former appointments that the political relationship of the appointees was a factor in making the selection. I hope on this occasion the only thing that will be taken into consideration will be the fitness of the men for the very responsible positions they will assume. I also ask that there be appointed from among the railway workers some man who has a practical knowledge of the railway men's side of the situation. I would prefer that the railway men themselves should have an opportunity of nominating either one man or a slate of three or four from which the government might make the appointment.

That brings me to the other question, which I suggested yesterday evening. If the government follows the practice of previous governments in choosing the men, it is quite likely that if at the next election there is a change of government the men now appointed to the responsible position of directors of the national railway system will be supplanted. I think that should be obviated. When a man has served a term as director or trustee he has gained experience which ought to be of value in the performance of his duty. If such a person has given good service it is a pity that the value of that experience should be lost. As the government insist on obtaining control of the Canadian National Railway system they should have adopted the same policy in this matter that they are following in connection with the Bank of Canada. To gain control of the bank directorate they are acquiring fifty-one per cent of the shares. It might have been a good precedent if in this case the government had nominated four new directors to be added to the three already occupying the position. However, as the government have thought otherwise, and the resignations of the chairman and board of trustees have been requested, I assume it is the intention of the government to appoint seven new men. I should like to hear from the minister his opinion of the suggestion I made last night, that there should be some agreement between the leaders of the different groups in this house as to the men to compose the new board of directors, so that there would be at least some assurance of permanency to them once they are appointed. I make that suggestion in all seriousness. There is nothing new in it; it has been adopted in many other spheres of public activity in this country, and there is no good reason why it should not be followed on this occasion. I do not say that the nominations should be made from the floor of this chamber, but I would like to have the leaders or representatives of the various groups get together and see if they could not agree on seven suitable men to direct the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. That, I think, would be far preferable to the government having to assume the whole responsibility for the appointments. If the appointments were made in that manner we should be likely to get a better type of men for the position, as they would have some assurance of permanency.

During the afternoon some allusions were made to the matter of pensions or retiring allowances for the men who, through coordination of services, might lose their positions. The same question was raised in this house in 1933 when the act now being amended was before us. The former government declined at that time to accede to that request. I am glad to see that on this occasion there are members of the Conservative party who favour such a proposal. When we come to discuss section 4 of the present bill I intend to move the same amendment as I did three years ago, asking for some form of compensation to be awarded to employees who lose their positions as a result of cooperation between the railways. I hope that when that time comes the proposals I make will receive the same sympathetic consideration by hon. members who spoke this afternoon. Good reason has already been given why such a proposal should receive sympathetic consideration. I think when the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe) was before the railway committee on Tuesday morning, he said that when the present chairman of the board of trustees was asked to resign provision was to be made for a retiring allowance to him. If that can be done for the chairman of the board of trustees there is no reason why similar action should not be taken in regard to men who suffer the loss of their employment as a result of the present legislation. In the United States an agreement has recently been reached between the railways and the employees whereby those who lose their employment as a result of coordination of services in that country receive compensation. That was a voluntary arrangement entered into between the unions and the managements of the roads. But that voluntary arrangement was brought about by the fact that in the United States congress legislation was pending which would make such compensation compulsory for the men who would lose their positions as a result of a process of amalgamation of services. So I hope that when the time comes in this chamber for us to discuss the matter, both the government and the house will be sympathetic towards such a proposal, and that compensation will be provided for the men who lose their positions as a result of legislation such as that which we are now considering. There is a very good reason why we should do this. The men who may be affected by the legislation will lose their jobs because of an act of parliament. From the very nature of the legislation we must assume a certain responsibility for those men who might lose their jobs as a result of our legislative action. Personally I would oppose any legislation which had not within it certain provisions that would provide for the men under the contingencies I have mentioned.

At this time I should like the minister to state whether the government would be agreeable to a proposal to the effect that the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways would be jointly appointed or agreed to by the various groups in the house. If that were done it would create a favourable impression not only on the board appointed but among people throughout the dominion.

Mr. HOWE: In reply to the hon. member's question may I say that the government will make the appointments and will accept full responsibility for so doing. In British parliamentary institutions it is an established practice that the government must take responsibility for its actions. I cannot think who would take the responsibility if three groups undertook to share it. It does not seem to me that such action would be fair to the people of Canada. I assure the hon. member that when appointments are made they will be made by the government.

As to compensation for dislocation may I say that in the present circumstances we find an extraordinary situation. On the one hand we are taking the railways from the government. We say that the government must not have anything to do with them in any shape or form, and must turn them over to trustees to operate. I understand that attitude perfectly. Since I have held office I have taken that attitude. Yet the same people who take that position come to the government and say: You must make agreements between the management and the men. Why? Eighteen months ago I attended a luncheon in Toronto at which the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway expounded the principle that compensation payments should be made to men displaced. At that time he was talking about unification, and spoke of that factor as an aid to such unification. Two or three days ago we went into committee and heard the statement of the chairman of the board of trustees of the Canadian National Railways, when he suddenly discovered the reason he had not made progress in two and a half years of cooperation was that no provision had been made for taking care of the men displaced.

Mr. STEWART: The minister is not justified in saying that that was the reason given by the chairman for not making progress. He said that they had made substantial progress, but he threw that out as a suggestion.

Mr. HOWE: Why did he not have such provision made? Who was to do it, if it was not the chairman of the board of trustees? He is the man vested with supreme authority over the railroad. This agreement has been made in the United States, how? It has been made not by legislation, but by agreement between the managements and the men. Every phase of relations between managements and men has been worked out by committees of the two. That is the proper way to do this. In a measure of this kind, which sets up a management of railways to operate independently of the government, why attempt to make the government responsible for the negotiation of labour agreements between the railways and the men? That is not consistent with the purpose behind the legislation.

Mr. HEAPS: May I answer the minister briefly as to why the government should interfere in a question of this kind. By the very nature of this legislation we are interfering with the two railways. I say that through the legislation we are going to compel cooperation, and when you have a certain amount of cooperation of services of the two railways, as a result of such legislation we automatically displace men who have given long years of service to the railways. In other words, as a result of the legislative action of this body men will lose their position.

In regard to the position in the United States, it was the government of that country which practically compelled the railway companies to negotiate an agreement with the men, and the threat was held over the heads of those companies that unless an agreement was arrived at a bill would be passed whereby such compensation would be made compulsory. Had there been no legislation introduced into congress it is quite likely that today there would be no voluntary agreement between the railways and the employees. Those are the simple facts. If the government is not prepared to insert in the bill a clause along the lines I have indicated, would it not do the same thing as was done in the United States, namely compel the railways and the employees to come together and by voluntary agreement provide such compensation as might be determined by a board.

Mr. HOWE: I have tried to sort out the ideas of hon. members, and I should like to ask the hon. member who has just spoken if, under the present trustees set-up, or under the new set-up, it would be a proper function of government to interfere between the management and the men. In other words, should we tell the management what to do with their men? I would like to know that.

Mr. HEAPS: We are doing it, as a result of this legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. HOWE: No; the legislation does not change the cooperative clause, in any way. That was passed in 1933, and is still in the statute. This enacts only the clause which has to do with the set-up of the management.

Mr. HEAPS: Quite right. This is practically the act of 1933, and in 1933—

Mr. HOWE: No; it is nothing of the kind. It is a bill amending the measure of 1933 in certain particulars.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, quite right. May I say to the Minister of Railways that in 1933 we moved an amendment to the bill along those lines. I notice the Minister of National Defence shakes his head in disapproval of what I am saying.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Hear, hear.

Mr. HEAPS: He did not speak in that way in 1933 when he sat on this side of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am just reading what I said.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister should read Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am reading it now.

Mr. HEAPS: Of 1933?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have it before me.

Mr. HEAPS: I suggest that the minister should read Hansard of April 7, 1933, and see what he said at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The same thing; quote it.

Mr. HEAPS: I say—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the hon. member please quote it?

Mr. HEAPS: At that time the minister was speaking to a point of order, and dealt with an amendment before the house. He spoke in favour of the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Preserving the order of the house.

Mr. HEAPS: But when it came to a vote, he voted for the amendment being put.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To allow discussion; that is all.

Mr. HEAPS: We know what that means; it is more or less of a subterfuge.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Order.

Mr. HEAPS: I should not have used that term.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a point of order. The hon. member should not impute his own particular qualities to other members.

Mr. HEAPS: He was using that as a means of giving his real views to the house.

Mr. DUNNING: That is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member withdraw?

Mr. HEAPS: I withdraw the first statement; I think the second one is quite in order. I was saying that at that time a good deal of sympathy was expressed by hon. members of the Liberal party, as it has been expressed to-day on both sides of the house, in favour of compensation for the men affected. I am not asking for anything new. It is only to give compensation to the men who will be affected. What is wrong with the principle? The only thing which I find the minister states is wrong with it is that we cannot compel an agreement between the railway company and its employees. We may not be able to compel it, but we can put such a clause in the legislation and make it effective. We have compensation for workmen who are injured in industry, and why should not men be compensated when they lose their positions by an act of parliament, for that is really what is happening? The act of 1933 was an act to provide for cooperation between the two railways, and if I remember aright—and I hope the minister will tell me if I am wrong—when he introduced the present bill he said that one of the reasons for the changes proposed was that there had not been sufficient cooperation between the two railways.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member asked me to correct him if he were wrong, and I shall be glad to do so. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. HEAPS: Then I apologize to the minister, and I shall probably look up Hansard to see what he did say, I do not want to do him any injustice. I was saying that no new principle is involved in what I propose. These men are to lose their positions as a result of legislation put on the statute books of this country, and I think the least that parliament can do in a case of that kind is to see that the men are reasonably compensated for the positions they are about to lose.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A question has arisen with regard to the agreement recently secured by the railway people in the United States. I hold in my hand a Labour paper, entitled Labour, under date of May 26, in which the agreement is given in full. I do not want to burden the committee by reading any lengthy extracts, but I notice that the agreement conforms to the statement of my colleague (Mr. Heaps). I quote from the article:

> Senator Burton K. Wheeler of Montana, and Congressman "Bob" Crosser of Ohio, who were ready to push railroad workers' protective legislation through congress if no agreement had been reached, emphatically expressed their satisfaction over the signing of the pact.
> President Roosevelt beamed with delight when the tired, but happy, railroad labour chieftains filed into the White House along with the carriers' committee, to report that the pact had been signed.

Then is given a brief summary of the agreement.

> Carriers are required to give ninety days' written notice to employees who will be affected by consolidations, and within thirty days after the notice conferences must be held between representatives of the men and the management. Machinery is also set up to handle any disputes regarding the displacement of employees.
>
> No employees' wages will be reduced if, as the result of a consolidation, he is placed on a job paying a lower rate.
> Displaced employees will be paid coordination allowances—

Mr. HOWE: I would raise the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that this has nothing to do with the section under discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order raised by the minister is whether the article which the hon. member is reading has anything to do with the item under discussion—

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, it has, most decidedly. This is an agreement recently secured in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The committee is still on clause 2, dealing with the definition of trustees, and I do not see that the article the hon. member is reading has any bearing on clause 2.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, the discussion on this point has gone on for some time. My colleague was speaking on this question just a few minutes ago, and it has been discussed backwards and forwards. There has been a general discussion on this clause relative to the reorganization of the board, and I respectfully submit that I am in order in referring to this arrangement that has recently been secured in the United States, and I hope that I may be permitted to read a paragraph or so.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member would perhaps not be very much out of order if he would make a reference to it rather than read the whole article.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The reference has already been made, Mr. Chairman, and it was in order to substantiate a statement made by my colleague that I wanted to quote a paragraph or so from this paper, which summarizes the arrangement made in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, surely the hon. member is within the rules in view of the discussion which has taken place in this chamber in the last three hours, and it would be most unjust, I think, to limit him in view of the extent to which this discussion has gone. As you will recall, Mr. Chairman, on this clause we are discussing the general principle of the legislation; it has been discussed from every angle by almost every member of the committee who has spoken, and to limit the discussion now would seem to be unfair. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that you quite caught the words which the hon. member was using because there was a noise at the moment. What he said was that he proposed to read from the article to remove any doubt as to the nature of the arrangement which had been made in another country, and if he is promoting a particular view I think it would be quite within the general rules of discussion in this house for him to do so, in order to make his reference exact. If one refers to the speeches made the other day and the extracts made from books on central banks one can readily understand what I mean. This business of quoting from articles and papers and books has reached a point in the house as a whole where it seems to me to be quite unfair to endeavour to limit it in committee. I say that, Mr. Chairman, with deference, because I realize that we desire to limit the quotations which are made, but in view of the wide extent of the present discussion I think surely the hon. member is in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understood that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) intended to move a specific amendment embodying his views.

Mr. HEAPS: To clause 4, where I think it would be more applicable.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then surely, Mr. Chairman, the discussion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) would come more appropriately on clause 4 than on the present section.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My colleague was allowed to introduce the question, and the discussion has covered a very wide range. My colleague emphasized a point that had been made by a Liberal member, and I am just seeking to give a brief résumé of what actually took place in the United States. It is only two or three paragraphs, and, as the leader of the opposition has stated, is quite in keeping with the discussion which has taken place. I cannot see that I should be suddenly choked off at this stage of the discussion.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should explain why I raised the point of order. The previous discussion had something to do with management, which is what was under discussion. My hon. friend's remarks have to do with legislation in another country, which has nothing to do with management so far as I can see.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is not, strictly speaking, legislation; it is an arrangement under which certain agreements were arrived at between the employees and the railway companies.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member will permit me, paragraph 306 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, page 101, which was referred to this afternoon, states:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member—

And so on. It is the first part of the paragraph to which I direct attention. I want to say this to the hon. member who has the floor. I have no desire to curb any discussion with regard to this bill; that is not my intention. I think a very wide latitude has been allowed to members of this committee speaking this afternoon on the bill. Railway matters were gone into quite thoroughly, and I think most hon. members of the committee, on both government and opposition benches, who spoke this afternoon were out of order if the rules were enforced strictly. I have no desire that that should be done and I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to be as brief as possible and curtail his remarks as much as he can.

Mr. BENNETT: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I should like to direct your attention to a slight error into which you fell a moment ago. You will observe that the word "and" is used. Paragraph 306 reads:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

You, sir, read it as though it were divided into two sections. It is not. This error has been made before; the conjunction "and" is used. There must be a communication emanating from persons outside the house and it must refer to, or comment, on, or deny something said by a member. This point of order does not fall within that rule.

The CHAIRMAN: The right hon. leader of the opposition is correct. The other part of the rule does not bear on this point of order; it is only the first part. It was to that part of the paragraph I was referring.

Mr. BENNETT: It cannot be separated. The conjunction "and" joins two things; it is not an alernative. That is the point to which I was directing your attention.

The CHAIRMAN: I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to endeavour to keep within the rules of the house and not to read the whole article in the paper.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not reading the whole article.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): On the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I am not pressing it, but I should like to remind hon. members who were in the last parliament that we were always prevented by the Deputy Speaker from reading any article in a newspaper. My right hon. friend unfortunately sided with the Deputy Speaker of that period and I was many times a victim of the ruling.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope this manifestation of applause is not indicative of the state of mind that it would seem to indicate is possessed by those who are guilty of it. May I remind the hon. member that he was not in the house this afternoon. If he had been he would have heard the discussion which took place. I have always contended that the reading of newspaper articles in the house is an unsound exercise of privilege by hon. members.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I heard that before.

Mr. BENNETT: But the house has adopted the other rule. During the last five years extracts from every paper in the world were read continuously from this side of the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We were prevented.

Mr. BENNETT: I can recall vividly one extract read by the hon. member who now has the floor. That was from a leading Canadian journal and I recall it vividly. That would have fallen within the rule which was enforced by previous speakers, namely, a statement by someone outside the house reflecting upon someone within the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Any newspaper article.

Mr. BENNETT: I was unable to carry that view. That is my view still, and I told the chairman so this afternoon. This paragraph 306 is not an alternative. There must be two things. First, there must be a reading from an article and, second, it must refer adversely to someone in the house or deny some statement made. That is the matter under discussion and it also came up this afternoon. It is not conducive to the conduct of the house according to the rules if we depart continuously from the line of action that has been laid down. In the early stages of this session I directed attention to this fact, that the house has continuously violated the rule and permitted extracts to be read from newspapers and the views of persons other than hon. members to be referred to in this chamber. I have accepted that as the established rule. I pointed out this afternoon that as we have accepted that as the rule which is to govern, we must treat everyone with the same measure of consideration. When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was stopped from reading, I pointed out to the Chairman that however much we might agree with him, and had in times past endeavoured to promote that view, since the beginning of this session we had followed another view.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We are more lenient than you were.

Mr. BENNETT: You are more careless of the rules that govern the conduct of the business of the house. That is the proper way to put it, but it is not my duty to see that the rules are enforced. I endeavour from my place as a member, in the position which I occupy, to see that everyone receives the same consideration. I am bound to say that you, Mr. Chairman, afforded the widest latitude this afternoon to every hon. member to go into every detailed phase of this railway problem. The hon. member now having the floor (Mr. Woodsworth) was reading an extract from a paper published in the United States to indicate how they had dealt with the problem and to remove doubts as to the correctness of a summary given by the preceding speaker. He was stopped from reading this extract and it was then I intervened, not for the purpose of questioning the observations made by you, sir, but for the purpose of pointing out that in the hurried reading of the paragraph you had overlooked the conjunction "and" and had treated the paragraph as being an alternative rather than in the sense in which it is used

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think that was the point of order raised. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) referred to the question of compensation and informed the committee that when we reached clause 4 he intended to raise that question specifically. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) now seeks to continue a discussion on a question which his colleague said he was going to submit to the committee when clause 4 was reached. I submit that it is out of order for the hon. member to proceed under clause 2, but he would be quite in order under clause 4.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are we on the point of order? If we are, I should like to say that there have been two points of order raised. The first is as to the discussion, whether or not I am in order in introducing the question of compensation. I may say that the minister made certain statements with regard to the situation in the United States. I did not think these statements were altogether fair and I was seeking to answer them. This question had already been taken up in the committee. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has said, hitherto there has been a wide open discussion upon this bill. The Chairman himself has said that he considers that the greatest part of the discussion this afternoon was out of order. Personally, I object to discussion being allowed to go on which the Chairman himself considers to be out of order and then when I get up to speak find that I am ruled out of order on the same kind of discussion that has been regarded as being in order. That is one point.

The other point has already been referred to by the leader of the opposition. Under our rules, the reading from a newspaper is out of order if the article expresses an opinion on a matter at issue. I am not reading from an article that expresses an opinion; I was simply attempting to read a paragraph which gives a summary of an agreement that has been recently arrived at in the United States. This paragraph expresses no opinion; it simply gives the facts in the case. I was doing this to illustrate my point. This matter has been discussed already on the floor of this committee, but hitherto I have not had the opportunity of speaking. I claim I am quite in order.

The CHAIRMAN: In order to clarify the whole situation, let me say that I consider the point of order raised by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to be well taken. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) was confining his remarks mainly to the question of compensation. It is true that the minister referred to compensation, but he did so in answering a question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps). The hon. member intimated that he was going to move an amendment when we reached clause 4. This amendment would have reference to compensation, and there is nothing about compensation in clause 2. Therefore I rule on the point of order raised by the Minister of National Defence. May I say to the hon. member who has the floor that if he wants to talk about compensation he will have to wait until we reach clause 4.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am talking of compensation only as it is related to the reorganization scheme.

The CHAIRMAN: I have given my ruling.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I appeal against your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I think we have reached the stage where some of us, if we are to be choked off in this fashion, might simply go home. I appeal against your ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: I have no desire to "choke off" any hon. member.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The record speaks for itself.

The CHAIRMAN: I have given my ruling.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And I have appealed against your ruling.

Mr. Speaker having resumed the chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the course of discussion on clause 2 of the bill, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) began to speak on the question of compensation, which is dealt with in clause 4. The Chairman ruled that the discussion was out of order and the question now is whether the ruling of the Chair shall be sustained.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is that statement correct?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. LAWSON: The statement of the ruling is not correct.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is the statement as submitted to me.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not correct for the reason that I understood you, Mr. Speaker, to read that the question of compensation is dealt with in clause 4 of the bill. I have just read clause 4 and I can see there nothing in the nature of compensation mentioned in the reference to you.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Chairman ruled that the question could not be discussed under clause 2. The question now is whether the ruling of the Chair shall be sustained. Those in favour of the ruling of the Chair being sustained will say aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed to the ruling will say nay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the ruling of the Chairman confirmed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On division.

And the house having resumed in committee,

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I am in order in speaking, I wish to suggest that when the minister introduced this legislation he stated very clearly the main reason for which the 1933 legislation was to be amended. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, in bringing down this measure I feel I am sponsoring a most important and necessary piece of legislation. It is common knowledge that the three directors to whom the direction of the railways was entrusted as a result of the 1933 act have made no real progress toward the improvement of our railway situation. To date they have failed to achieve any substantial cooperative economies, to secure which was the principal object of their appointment and the outstanding feature of the 1933 legislation. Not only have they failed to secure any substantial results to date, but on their own published statements, the prospect of future results from cooperative measures, plans and arrangements is not bright. Nor have they been able to reduce to any great extent Canadian National operating costs, due to the fact that that avenue had been so thoroughly explored by the previous boards of directors.

Here, then, we have a statement from the minister as to the underlying reason for the legislation which is before us. The old board had not been able to make any substantial progress in securing economies under a co-operative scheme. This board, if we make the new set-up, will no doubt be expected to travel a little bit faster in the way of co-operation and the securing of economies under these cooperative schemes. As we in this corner pointed out when the 1933 legislation was introduced, the wage bill occupies a very prominent place in the expenditures of the railways, and if we are to economize through cooperation the chief economies, or at any rate some of the main economies, must result from the cutting down of the wage bill. Another would come through the abandonment of some of the branch lines which are to-day serving the public. We tried at that time to establish the principle that the interests of the public and the welfare of the employees of the road should have prior consideration, should take precedence over the interests of the bondholders. For it will be remembered that the present leader of the opposition, then Prime Minister, said that in reality the road was owned not by the people of Canada but by the bondholders; that the road to-day was almost, as it were, in the hands of the receivers, some such phrase as that.

The point which my colleague was trying to emphasize a few minutes ago is that if employees of the railroads are to be turned off to effect economies under the new set-up they may suffer a great deal of hardship. We are trying to insist that those who in consequence of this change will suffer loss shall be recompensed. I think that is a reasonable proposal, and one that should be advanced at this stage of the bill. The principle of compensation has been recognized in other spheres of business. The state has interfered in a great many ways between employer and employee, seeking to safeguard the interests of the employed; and what I was trying to point out was that even in a country, namely the United States, where perhaps we think lower standards prevail, this principle has been recognized. That is all I want to urge at this stage. I am not advocating any particular methods by which that principle might be put into effect. In the United States it was done through an agreement. In this country, as my colleague has shown, the necessity for some protection of the employees has resulted directly from legislation introduced into this parliament. The minister, when my colleague made that statement, objected to it. He pointed out that we were not altering a great many things in the act of 1933. That is true. But the act of 1933 was brought in specifically to secure certain economies. Those economies could be obtained only as wages were cut down or as certain employees were laid off. Under those circumstances we tried to introduce the principle of compensation. The situation has now changed to this extent, that the board now being set up is replacing the old board for the very purpose of more effectively securing the economies which, the minister states, the old board failed to achieve. For this reason, since the government seems to be intent on economies, we believe it is all the more necessary that the proper claims of employees should be recognized.

One of the railroads is a government concern. Surely all along we have recognized certain special responsibilities of parliament towards the Canadian National Railways. We have paid the deficits of that railway, and we have done so in order to help the bondholders. Some of us take the position that, if it is necessary for this parliament to come to the aid of the bondholders, it is surely just as necessary that it should come to the help of the railway employees, more especially as the legislation is put on the statute books to help the bondholders. Should provision for compensation be put on the statute books? Well, if we are to provide certain safeguards for bondholders there is no reason why we should not, at the same time and in the same instrument, provide for the interests of the employees. That is the reason I introduced the matter a little while ago. I pointed out that in the United States the principle of compensation was now very clearly recognized. If it had not been arrived at through voluntary agreement between the railways and the employees undoubtedly legislation would have been introduced. But the minister must admit that the situation in the United States is vastly different from that in Canada. In the United States the railroads were privately owned, and there had been no drastic legislation enforcing anything in the form of cooperation or consolidation. In this country one at least of the roads is a government road, for which we have very heavy responsibilities, and it is the action of this government itself that is leading to a measure of cooperation or consolidation. I think, then, we are quite right in urging upon the minister the necessity of incorporating in the bill provisions of this kind. No such provisions are now contained in it. I can quite conceive that, on any particular clause of the bill where we attempted to introduce anything of this kind, the Chairman would again rule us out of order. That is the one reason why we wanted to introduce it when we were discussing the whole set-up. I would ask the minister again, as my colleague has done, whether he can give any assurance to this committee that he will take into serious consideration the inclusion in this legislation of some sort of compensation clause which will ensure that, if in the process of carrying out these principles of so-called "cooperation" employees are dismissed or are forced to take lower positions, their interests will be safeguarded. I would urge the minister to give us some assurance that he will include in this bill a provision of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 2 carried.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has the minister no answer to that request? He might at least show us the courtesy of saying that he refuses to consider it.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 2 is carried. Section 3, Part I.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: We are now at section 3.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member was on his feet.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 3.

Mr. FINN: I took my seat in order that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) should not be interrupted by me; and in the meantime I have not had an opportunity. Subject to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I was going to ask a question of the chair, and it is this: It seems to me—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn), I think, seems not to have heard what I said. I said that section 2 was carried, and he was quite in order to discuss section 3.

Mr. FINN: Yes, but, Mr. Chairman, I said that I was on my feet before the Chairman made the ruling that carried section 2. I have no disposition to prolong or extend the debate in connection with this bill. It is a most important bill, one that affects every part of Canada. It affects particularly the maritime provinces, and it seems to me, from the ruling of the Chairman as to all hon. gentlemen who spoke on both sides of the house this afternoon and this evening, one does not just know how far he is permitted to go in the discussion of the general principles involved in this measure, or whether one is absolutely tied down as a finality to the section under consideration, namely section 2. Surely within the confines of this bill there must be—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must draw to the attention of the hon. member for Halifax that he is under a misapprehension if he says that the committee is on section 2. Section 2 is carried, and we are now on section 3.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 3; it is broader than section 2.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Much broader.

Mr. DUNNING: You have plenty of room under section 3.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 3 is broader than section 2.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): My hon. friend the Minister of Finance tells me there is plenty of room under section 3; I hope there is. I have not had a chance to look at it. When I do I shall know better whether he is speaking as a layman or as one of the learned profession. This bill, it seems to me, is a desirable measure. If one goes back over all the legislation that has been brought down in this house by Liberal governments or Conservative governments, including the late government led by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), it will be seen that they were all in accord on the fact that this railway belongs to the Canadian people and that it is in the interests of Canada that there should be a board of directors on which the various provinces would have direct representation, and which, independent of hon. members of this house, would look after the interests of the various provinces and of the dominion as a whole. If that policy was good and was believed in and lived up to; if that was the policy of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden when he was Prime Minister; if it was right when the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was Prime Minister, who enunciated that policy when he was in opposition, I cannot see why the legislation of 1933 which is now being repealed was brought down in this house by the late prime minister. I had not an opportunity of hearing the reasons given by the present leader of the opposition for the legislation of that day, but by it three gentlemen, called trustees for whom I have great respect, were given charge of 25,000 miles of railway in this country, including the Canadian government railways and the Intercolonial railway which under section 145 of the British North America Act belongs to the crown. The Intercolonial railway by one stroke of the pen was taken from the people of the maritime provinces and placed under a board of management on which the people of the maritime provinces had no representation and were practically not consulted. I was astounded to learn in the railway committee that in the last annual statement brought down by the present board of trustees they showed a deficit of $5,265,373 on the eastern lines, a deficit of $360,334 on the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminal, and a deficit of $41,791,000 on the system. During the time I had the honour of sitting in parliament from 1922 to 1925, it was arranged after representation to the late Sir Henry Thornton and the board, that there would be regions established, and regions were established. Members from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island represented to Sir Henry Thornton and the board of directors, on which sat the then Deputy Minister of Railways, the reasons why we in the east should have an Atlantic division. That Atlantic region was set up, but we were given only the brain and the body; its legs were cut off; the region stopped at Rivière du Loup instead of continuing on to Montreal, which was the western terminus of the Intercolonial railway. In the statutes to-day the provision is that the Intercolonial railway consists of the line from Halifax through to Ste. Rosalie or Diamond junction.

From 1867 for forty-three years we had "arbitraries" on that road, to use the terms of the Minister of Inland Revenue of a former government. He called them, in relation to income tax, "arbitraries," why? Because they were not rates based upon any scientific system of railway rates but rates made in order to permit us to get into the market of central Canada and take our place industrially in this dominion. That was the reason the Atlantic division was set up. But that Atlantic division was a disappointment; it is a disappointment to-day, and we insist that that Atlantic region shall extend from Halifax to Montreal. Leave it as the late Hon. Mr. Blair made it and Hon. Mr. Emmerson left it, a road that we were proud of, started in the early days of confederation and pushing on towards the great centres that developed rapidly in central Canada, as compared with us in the maritime provinces with a small territory and a country closed against us to the south by a high tariff and where so many of our people went to live. We started out with a great disadvantage; we are under that disadvantage to-day, and unless something is done to remove it I say with all sincerity that the consequences may be serious. I may not live to see them; I expect my life is not going to be so long, but other men will see what will happen unless the government afford us some relief. I speak in criticism of the government of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and I think we may well bury the differences that may have existed. At this session of parliament we may well set ourselves to the task of righting the wrong that has been done, and we should attempt to place the maritime provinces in a position in relation to the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec as favourable as that in which the western provinces are to the centre of the dominion. All hon. members know the Drummond county railway was leased by the Intercolonial under the authority of the parliament of Canada and that afterwards it was purchased. In time we saw the trains leaving the city of Halifax and travelling through to Montreal. Later we saw the shadow of a great wrong coming down upon us, and the train was cut in two at Rivière du Loup. The feet were taken off the head and body, and the train crews had to sleep in cars at Rivière du Loup, so as to pick up the train at that point returning to Halifax. They did not go through to Montreal, as they had done formerly.

We in the maritime provinces have some rights. I stated once before in this chamber, and I repeat to-night that we were the hewers of wood and the drawers of water. The men who made Canada what it is to-day came from the east because there was no west in their day. If the brains of the east made Canada what it is, surely we are entitled to some consideration. Our little province by the sounding sea, the province with a magnificent maritime frontage and the harbour with which God and nature endowed us, should be given what it deserves, what is its right. If, when we entered confederation, we gave all these advantages to round out and to make Canada the nation she is, surely at this late date we are not to be told that we cannot participate in her development from the province of Quebec through to the great Pacific ocean. Surely we in the maritime provinces are not gradually to recede as does the tide and die of ennui; surely we are to be given our proper place in the dominion, and surely industries in the maritimes which could compete with those in the central and prairie provinces, but are prevented from so doing by excessive freight rates and indifference to transportation needs, should be permitted to exist.

I say to the leader of the opposition that I never before in my life read a statute which within its four corners was so completely imperialistic, and I do not use the word in a sense of empire, but in a sense of might. Napoleon said that military genius was the thing which ruled the world. The statutes of 1933 made provision for the appointment of three trustees who would have supreme control over 25,000 miles of railway. They would be responsible to parliament and to the Minister of Railways only in so far as the making of reports and voting of moneys for capital expenditures were concerned. Beyond that they would sit on their thrones, but to-day those thrones are tottering. They were placed in a position even higher than that of the chief justice and judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, our final court of appeal, who can be removed only through the passing of an address by both houses of parliament. Our judges are placed in that high position because we want to have them removed from the man on the street. They are placed in that high position because they have to deal not only with property but with the lives of individuals governed by the laws of Canada. Therefore they should not feel that they are under the control of the people or of parliament.

Such conditions, however, do not apply to the board of trustees, and when the leader of the opposition placed them in a position equal to that occupied by the supreme court judges, I strongly suggest that he was going too far. The people of Canada who are paying through the nose for these 25,000 miles of railway have no right to speak or to whisper into the ears of the management of the national lines to-day. I do not believe in the patronage system as it existed in the early days, and I think we have developed to a point where such a system in its entirety could not exist. When men are placed in public positions, mind their own business and do their duty they should be protected. I have always taken that attitude, and I take it here to-night.

I must say, however, that I am in favour of the repeal of the 1933 legislation for the reasons I have indicated. In giving my opinion I do not have to appeal to the judgment of the Prime Minister, or to that of the Minister of Railways and Canals or to that of the Bennett government who were responsible for the legislation. I ask the leader of the opposition only to read the reasons given by Sir Robert Borden and those which were given by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen when prime minister to the effect that under no organization other than a board of directors representative of the whole of Canada would it be possible to maintain a railway system in the interests of the people as a whole.

Some of the wrongs that have been done by the act of 1933 cannot be righted. When we are talking about amalgamation between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways, I would ask Sir Edward Beatty and his board of directors what action they took in connection with the Crowsnest Pass Rate Act of 1897, and why the rate applied only as far as Mégantic in the province of Quebec and was not extended to the port of Saint John, which was the eastern terminus of the then Canadian Pacific railway which was then being operated from Vancouver to that port. This rate, if fixed to Saint John, would be met by the Canadian National Railways over their line to the port of Halifax and both ports would then come into their own in eastern ports.

If amalgamation is in the air, it will stay in the air. It will never come down to mother earth because there is no honest, sincere intention—I am not speaking now as to personal integrity—of doing anything at all to help the people of the maritime provinces on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but rather they wish to help themselves. They took advantage of the fact that as Megantic was the last point in eastern Canadian territory in the province of Quebec, before running across the state of Maine, they would not have to give the through rate which the Crowsnest pass agreement required. The railway as it existed and was operated in 1897—and they were operating in 1897 from Vancouver to Saint John—cut us off at Megantic, and they will as occasion requires cut us off at any other point. These great corporations have received much at the hands of Canada. A few millions of people have undertaken tremendous financial obligations, and in the words of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada in 1925, Sir Lyman Duff: This question was one that should be considered by itself on application to the court because it was not one of the questions for presentation to the supreme court at that time and therefore they were unable to pass upon it. But in the statutes to-day there is a provision sufficiently large.

There are 470 million bushels of wheat grown in our western country, and I would ask how many hundred millions of bushels of that wheat come through to the maritime ports in winter, either to Saint John or to Halifax. It goes to Montreal and Quebec and is taken down the mighty St. Lawrence, and then when providence closes that great river by ice, where do these millions of bushels go? They go to United States ports, to be handled by the labourers and stevedores and agents in those ports, while the people who have spent almost their life-blood in order to survive and keep Canada together have to sit back and see their eastern gateways receiving nothing, practically doing nothing, and the port of Saint John would not be receiving what it is to-day if it were not for the fact that it is what you might call the half-time servant of a half-time corporation, the Canadian Pacific Railway, in this country.

Look back over what Canada has given the Canadian Pacific Railway, what wealth of money and wealth of soil; compare that with what the Canadian Pacific Railway is giving us, and then consider whether or not a few hundred thousand dollars thrown at the people of the maritime provinces is sufficient. It is like giving a milk bottle to a baby to keep it from crying when people are around and do not want to hear the noise, but when they go away the milk bottle is taken away and the baby can cry as long as it likes. We are not babies in the maritime provinces. We do not cry. We stand on our own ground, equal in status in Nova Scotia with the people of every other province of Canada, equal in status as completely and as securely as is Canada in the commonwealth of nations, under the act that my right hon. friend recommended in England be placed on the statute books there, the statute of Westminster, which makes all dominions of the empire equal in status. When we in Canada get that idea of the smaller eastern provinces having their rightful place and their proper share in the production and distribution of the products of this dominion, then we shall begin to feel that we are coming into our own, and tardy though it may be it is not yet too late.

I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways, and the government on the step they have taken in this legislation. In the province in which I had the honour to be a candidate of the party supporting the right hon. the Prime Minister, one of the issues was the taking away of the power given to the board of trustees under chapter 33 of the statutes of 1933, the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, and putting it back where it rightfully belongs, in a board of directors to be appointed by the governor in council, which exists through the authority of the people.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister was a bit too modest while speaking yesterday afternoon. In that great city of Toronto from where my hon. friend, the ex-mayor of Toronto, comes who spoke this afternoon (Mr. Church), where, it seems, there is neither liberty of thought nor liberty of action nor liberty in religion, no liberty perhaps in anything at all, the present Prime Minister, leader of the Liberal party, during the election campaign made this statement: "I desire the people of Canada to know that if I come into power—and I ask for a majority sufficient to give me a mandate to meet the senate which is overwhelmingly Conservative, so that they dare not touch legislation passed by the House of Commons of Canada through the people's will—I propose to repeal the 1933 act and go back to the system that we had before." That voice was heard clearly from one end of Canada to the other, and what was the answer? The answer is in this chamber to-night; it is in the representation behind the Prime Minister in this chamber to-night, the greatest representation ever given to a public man in Canada since Canada became a confederation in 1867. If my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition feels that he is being criticized inferentially through the repeal of the 1933 legislation, it is the will of the people as spoken at the polls as clearly as the voice of the right hon. gentleman or of the Prime Minister is heard in this house when they speak on questions of importance and on matters involving the future prosperity of this country.

Let me say further, Mr. Chairman, that before the railway committee I asked a question or two. I said: I notice that in your annual statement you have "eastern lines." There are not any. I asked: Is that the Atlantic division or region? The answer was, no. I said, " What does it include?" They told me that it included the road through to Ste Rosalie, outside Montreal and two pieces of railway in Quebec, one 180 miles long and the other 110 miles. I was told that that together with what is known as the Intercolonial railway makes up what they call the eastern lines on which they say there was $5,265,373.20 of a deficit. I asked if they would give me—this was on the order of the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugène Fiset)—the receipts and expenditures on the Atlantic division as it existed to-day. Mr. Fairweather, who is in charge of the finances and economics of the road, said that it would cost too much to get that statement ready to let the people of the maritimes and of this country know how much it was costing to run the Atlantic division and how much was being received in return. I want to be fair to Mr. Fairweather, to the president, Mr. Hungerford, and to the board of directors, but the fact remains that when the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) asked a question with reference to the deficit of some $383,000 on the Prince Edward Island ferry, in the twinkling of an eye, not waiting for the last trump or the last trumpet, they had the number of cars carried, the number of passengers carried and the cost of operating the nine miles of railway in Prince Edward Island. But they had no information to give the committee or parliament as to the cost of operating the Atlantic division, or how much of that deficit of over five million dollars belonged to the Atlantic region and how much belonged to what is known as the eastern lines of the Canadian National Railways.

In answer to an order of the chairman of the committee, Mr. Fairweather addressed to me a letter which speaks for itself. If an hon. member of this house is not entitled to information upon the order of a chairman of the committee so that he may deal intelligently with the question involved, then responsible government is gone. This is the first reason why the board of trustees should go. These officials have done as they pleased and they give just what information they want to give. You cannot find out what salaries they receive as it is shown in a lump sum. They are like certain other people; they go aside and they divide the loaves and the fishes. This is the letter I received. It is on the letter head of the Canadian National Railways, Bureau of Economics, Montreal, Quebec. It is dated May 8, 1936, and is addressed to me. This letter reads:

I did not have the opportunity of seeing you before leaving Ottawa. I recalled having promised to prepare a statement—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not like to interdupt the hon. member, but he has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. FINN: I am sorry my forty minutes are up, but I am glad there are other sections.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Chairman, I was hoping the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would be in the chamber to-night. In connection with an answer which he made to me yesterday afternoon, I have gone into the record more carefully. The right hon. gentleman was referring to 1933 when section 7 of the existing act, which it is proposed to repeal, was under discussion. He stated:

I think it was stated very plainly that if that clause did carry, every effort would be made to see that the House of Commons, which was the representative of the people as a whole, would not have its hands tied with respect to the control of any industrial activity for which it might be held responsible.

I have looked very carefully through the debates. I may have overlooked something but I cannot find anything which fully substantiates that remark of the Prime Minister But I should like to call attention to something that I did find. I refer hon. members to page 4583 of the Hansard of May 4, 1933. At that time the leader of the opposition of that day, the present Prime Minister, proposed that certain words in section 7 of the bill then under discussion should be struck out. This section reads:

No trustee shall be removed from office, nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

The record shows that the present Prime Minister was then proposing to strike out from this section the words, "and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada." The section would then have read:

No trustee shall be removed from office, nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause.

In moving that amendment the right hon. gentleman said:

—if at any time a Liberal administration should be returned to power and I had anything to do with it, my last desire would be to remove any trustees appointed by the present government provided they were performing their duties impartially, fairly and well.

In reply to that statement, the then Prime Minister, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), is reported on page 4585 of Hansard as follows:

When we say that good cause must be assigned for their removal or dismissal I am glad to hear the right hon. gentleman say that he thinks that is fair.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I agree with that entirely.

I was intending to call the attention of the Prime Minister to those remarks. At that time he gave what was practically a pledge to the House of Commons that no trustees would be removed except for cause assigned. That statement "for cause assigned" has a very clear and specific meaning. If that pledge is to be carried out in its entirety, as I think it should be, the present trustees should not be removed except for cause assigned, at least for cause assigned to this House of Commons or to a committee of this House of Commons, so that the trustees who are about to be removed might have ample opportunity to vindicate their position. I regretted very much, on reading the report of the standing committee on railways and shipping, which is now on the table of the house and therefore may be referred to by members, to learn that before that committee full opportunity was not given to its members to elicit the actual facts with regard to the proposed removal of the trustees, which was then under consideration.

With regard to the report made by Mr. Fullerton in reply to certain statements which have been made in the house by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe)—I believe it was on the second reading of this bill—Mr. Fullerton said:

> I wish to say most emphatically that we have exerted every effort to vindicate the hopes of the commission, and to add with some pride that, having regard to the brief time so far elapsed, we have achieved a substantial measure of success. So far as I have ever heard, there has not even been an allegation that the board of trustees has been influenced in the slightest degree by any political consideration at any time. The board has acted at all times, or endeavoured to act, as business men of broad and far-reaching responsibilities would act.
> When we entered into office there had already been some years of the depression, and already great and needed economies had been put into effect, but under the management of the trustees these economies, in spite of obvious difficulties, were augmented, and to-day, when all the factors affecting the railway are taken into consideration, it is my confident claim that the railway is more economically operated, that its efficiency as a transportation system is greater, and that it is better equipped, from the viewpoint of prospective profit, to deal with business expansion than it ever was before. The proof of these claims will be found in the public records of the company.

I have been reading from page 216 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence before the standing committee on railways and shipping. I wish to do full justice to the Minister of Railways, for before the committee he stated very clearly, as reported at page 228:

> I am willing to grant all that Judge Fullerton says about economies. I think the road has been carefully operated....

And so on. It seems to me under the circumstances that the pledge—because I think it was a pledge—made by the present Prime Minister when the original bill was under discussion, that none of these trustees would be removed from office by any government with which he was connected, unless for cause assigned, demands that before this bill finally passes there should be an opportunity for this committee of the House of Commons and for the House of Commons as a whole to ascertain definitely in what respect these trustees have been delinquent in regard to the duties imposed upon them; otherwise they should not be removed. This house should be fully informed. Mr. Fullerton declared that in no case had any suggestion been made of any partisan action on their part, and I think that is entirely in accordance with the facts. He also stated that in dealing with the administration the commission had always sought what they believed to be the promotion of the best interests of the railway and of the public service as a whole. I think, therefore, that this house is entitled not only to have a cause assigned but to have full access to the evidence on which any complaint against these commissioners is based, so that the house itself, irrespective of any action that may be taken in another place, can fully and fairly consider whether these commissioners have been so delinquent in the administration of their office as to be subject to summary removal, as is proposed in this bill.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to add only one or two words to what has been said by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I would point out first that it is now quite clear, from the statements made by the Minister of Railways, that this legislation is introduced into this house for the purpose of dispensing with the services of the present trustees. In his initial statement the minister made that fairly clear. If that statement is supplemented by the statements which he made in the committee, the evidence now being tabled in this house, it is quite clear that this measure is attributable to the fact that the trustees did not resign, as suggested.

The second point to which I desire to direct attention is that the minister aparently discussed with the chairman the conditions under which he might resign. Either the minister misunderstood the chairman or the chairman misunderstood him, for I assure him there was no discussion as to the chairman being appointed to any office under the late government in the event of his terminating his services. He took his superannuation allowance; before he took over the duties of chairman the order in council was passed by which he became a superannuated judge, and the question of appointing him to any position on the bench was never discussed as a possibility, although it is just possible there may have been some laughing reference to the fact that he was giving up his position in the railway commission to the uncertainties of what might transpire in the event of there being a change of government. But no discussion ever took place looking towards his appointment to the bench, my personal view being that a superannuated judge was not eligible for reappointment to the bench, having regard to the custom and practice under the constitution.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Was he appointed a judge under the old law prior to 1920?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He had a right to superannuation after fifteen years.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, quite so. Now, I do not think the minister discussed this with his law officers or he would realize the implications of any discussion of the kind to which reference was made in the testimony adduced before the select committee. It is a well known fact that the decisions of the courts in that regard are very, very striking. In Britain a public office is a public trust. The holder of that office cannot agree to terms under which he will accept resignation and have any claim in consequence of that contract vindicated or made good in any court of justice. I looked up roughly, in view of the statement made by the minister, one or two decisions. One of them was the case of a gentleman who possessed an office of importance in a dockyard. His friend suggested to him that he should accept his superannuation and retire on the usual pension, and in that case the friend would succeed him and allow him a certain annual share of the profits of the office. This agreement was carried out up to the point of there being a superannuation and an appointment, but after the friend received the appointment he was not disposed to pay the money. Thereupon the former officer brought his action, but the court held that he could not succeed; that an action could not be maintained on an agreement such as that, because a public office was a public trust, and that it was against public policy for any such action as that to be taken. Now, Judge Fullerton is an eminent judge and a very able lawyer, and I assume he knows the law far better than I do. But when I read the statement made by the minister in the committee I realized that possibly he had not consulted his law officers or he would have been advised as to what the position is. That is the second point to which I desire to direct attention.

I am not going to amplify the third point, because it has been so fully dealt with by my hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) who has just spoken. He has gone with care over the records of Hansard. It will be observed that there was common ground between the then opposition and the government that these trustees should be appointed for long terms and that the office would be vacated only for cause assigned. "Cause assigned," as the hon. member who has just spoken points out, is a cause given and stated by the person exercising the dismissing power. But that is not sufficient. Those of us who as students of our constitution recall the earliest cases to which attention was directed remember that an eminent judge in one of the colonies got into financial difficulties and was unable to pay his obligations. He gave promissory notes, which were very frequently renewed, and as a matter of fact, when he was sued on his notes, there was difficulty in connection with the carrying on of the proceedings in his court. Thereupon he was dismissed. My hon. friend from Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. Cameron) remembers the case of Graham v. Laffitte. The privy council held that Graham was properly dismissed in so far as there was ample cause to justify his dismissal, but that the dismissal was illegal, and he recovered. He succeeded in his action, why? Because he had not had an opportunity to be heard. When a man is appointed a judge for life his position is terminable only on address of both houses of parliament. That, at least, is the method adopted. He must have an opportunity to be heard. He must meet the assigned cause, and, meeting the assigned cause, he must be in a position to give his answer. If the answer is adequate, the cause is not sufficient; if the answer is inadequate, then of course the power is properly exercised. In this case, to my surprise, in view of the discussion which took place in this house at the very inception of this legislation, when I stated that I thought the chairman should have a chance to be heard and that that chance would come only when the committee met, I find the chairman taking the view that he should not be heard at all. Finally, however, it was arranged that he should make a statement. He made a statement in writing. Thereupon the minister of the day made the observation to which my friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has referred. On that statement, clearly, the chairman could not be dismissed. In other words, he has stated how he discharged his duties, and the minister has indicated that he has accepted that statement. The other two were not afforded an opportunity to be heard in the sense—

Mr. HOWE: They refused.

Mr. BENNETT: Allow me to finish—in the sense of having charges alleged or causes assigned to which they could direct an answer. It is a fundamental principle that where office is held for a term which is terminable only for cause assigned, there must be the formal proceedings for which the law provides if there is the termination of that employment by the employer. And as I have pointed out, the law goes so far as to provide that, a public office being a public trust, it is not competent to negotiate legally with that person for what sums of money he will accept the termination of his employment, but that matter must be dealt with under another branch of law.

That establishes clearly, and without any question, I think, that by this legislation an attempt is being made to railroad the trustees out of their office by an enactment which is certainly at variance with the fixed principles upon which the legislatures have heretofore proceeded. In the Reilly case it was held, following an old decision, that those who hold office, civil or military, under the crown, hold office during pleasure, and the crown may terminate their employment, but there were special circumstances referred to in the case, which came up from Australia and has been frequently cited since, to the effect that if a contractual relation exists between the parties then the power to terminate at pleasure is gone. Here not only had we the contractual relation established, for a term of years, but we had the then leader of the opposition making a statement, which the then leader of the government said he regarded as a fair statement, indicating that the good faith and the high honour of parliament, at least as represented by the House of Commons, had been pledged to that course of action being pursued, namely assigned cause, which involves the opportunity of being heard, which in turn involves the cause being mentioned, for it must be assigned against him. And it is no good to deal in innuendoes, or in insinuations, or in inferences; you must deal with direct statements which constitute assigned cause in order that the action shall be taken.

So we have here, Mr. Chairman, a situation that I regard as one to which the law officers of the crown should direct very careful consideration and attention. The basis of this legislation fails. Its foundation has been destroyed by the minister in his first statement and in the statement he subsequently made in the committee, and, based upon our conception of British fair play, we are indebted for its application to this case to the pertinacity of my colleague the member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), who succeeded in overcoming the attitude of the chairman and others that he should not be heard, and who deprecated the discussions that did take place. Therefore this must be regarded as the position: By common consent the trustees could be removed only for cause assigned; no cause has been assigned, and to the extent that there has been any discussion that discussion resulted in the alleged cause being held by the representative of the employers to be wholly inadequate. That is the position. On that state of affairs we are asked to repeal the legislation that appointed the trustees; we are asked to terminate their office without any suggestion of compensation; we are asked, without cause assigned, without an opportunity being given them to be heard, against their will to terminate their employment and dismiss them from the service of the country. Stripped of incidentals that is the case. I cannot add to the strength of what has been said by my colleague the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, but I hesitate to believe that a Canadian parliament is to set up this precedent. I hesitate to believe that when there was a consensus of opinion between the then leader of the opposition, now the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and the then leader of the government who now stands here, as to the fairness of the attitude taken in the legislation, this parliament is to create such a precedent.

I quite understand the argument made yesterday by the Prime Minister as to the senate not being concerned. But the answer to it is one that perhaps does not suggest itself to the layman at first; it is this, that when we say that a man shall be removed from office on an address of parliament, that means both houses of parliament, because parliament does not consist of the House of Commons; it consists of the House of Commons and the Senate and the crown in parliament assembled. That is the reason our legislation runs in the terms that it does. The senate is introduced into the legislation by name because the senate house of parliament is a constituent house of parliament, this being the commons house of parliament, and the two houses together make up the parliament of Canada. That is why the legislation is drawn in the terms in which it is. The argument that was made by the Prime Minister respecting the right of the senate to deal with matters affecting taxation is, of course, rather an old argument and is based upon the sound principle, by analogy, that the House of Lords in Great Britain has not the right to deal with matters affecting taxation and revenues, money bills as it is put. But the late Senator Ross was of the opinion, after a careful review of the authorities, that that power was possessed by the Senate of Canada. That is not a matter which need concern us at the moment; it is sufficient for my purpose to point out that the reason reference is made to the senate in the section which is to be repealed is that the senate is a constituent house of the parliament of Canada, and that reference is generally made to addresses being made by both houses of parliament rather than by one.

So far as this legislation being conceived as a Tory plan, if hon. members read again the words of the Prime Minister to which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George referred, I think they will realize that at that time the Prime Minister did not so consider the legislation. Although many things were said about it, and will continue to be, the fact is that in that instance there was apparently a common understanding. I said that I thought the statement he made was a fair one, and I repeat that I think it was a fair one.

The question of minorities and majorities was raised. Of course changes of government have always brought about difficulties. Where those who formerly sat in opposition are in office and those who were in office are in opposition, there is a tendency on the part of the new government to try to make good the position they took in opposition. But there have been exceptions to that rule. The law and the custom of the constitution are predicated upon an entirely different conception of the situation. If hon. members read the parliamentary history of Great Britain they will find successive governments under Mr. Gladstone continuing to maintain legislation which was passed by their Conservative predecessors. It will be recalled that with respect to reform measures, to the corn laws, to much other legislation, notably the unemployment insurance act in recent times, new governments have maintained the legislation of their predecessors. Frequently they have made changes and additions for the purpose of making it more in accordance with their conception of its usefulness, but they have maintained it. Here we have an illustration of a situation that has grown up markedly since my hon. friends assumed office. Men were appointed to positions for a period of five years. Then they were told that they held office during pleasure, and were dismissed. Of course I would say that that question may have to be settled ultimately by a court. The judgment in the Reilly case makes it quite clear that if the court should find that there is a contract, then the rule with respect to service to the crown, whether military or civil, being service during pleasure would not prevail; the ordinary rule of contractual liability on the part of those who without cause terminate an agreement of service or of hiring would prevail, and damages would be recoverable. In the Reilly case the court took the view that as the man could no longer offer himself for the discharge of his duties because the office no longer existed, he could not recover damages, and they avoided determining the question whether or not a contract existed.

I submit to this committee that, by the course the government propose to follow, we shall be creating a very dangerous precedent. It is a course of legislation which is at variance with all our precedents, and is in my judgment wholly unworthy of this house or of the government of the day. I mention it only in this sense because, when I read the statement made by the chairman of the trustee board, Judge Fullerton, and the statement made by the minister, added to what he said on a previous occasion, I realized that this is what has sometimes been described in the courts as mere brute force. It is a case of abolishing a position for the purpose of getting rid of the present incumbents. I submit that is not a proper course to follow and cannot but be injurious to the well-being of this country.

One word more upon the other questions discussed this afternoon. I am wholly in accord with the minister if he says that in his judgment as the new minister it is desirable to remove the veto power of the chairman. I am not going to quarrel with that, if the minister says that he considers it desirable in his interest to have that veto power done away with. It was inserted in the act because the commission thought it desirable that it should be there. The question of continuity, the question of permanency, the question of creating a policy and outlining a policy—all these are matters with which the commission dealt, and I have referred to them in previous statements to the house. I shall not weary the committee by making further reference to them, more than to say that they constitute the causes which led up to the recommendations for the legislation.

Without going into the matter in detail may I say that if the minister, especially one who has accepted great responsibility, thought it desirable to improve or make more workable some condition, or to bring about a more direct relationship between the government and the commission, I could quite understand his introducing such legislation. But when the avowed design of the legislation is to get rid of three men who occupy positions as trustees, and to substitute for them men called directors, with all the difficulties to which the commission has pointed out directors are subject, I suggest that this is not a proper course to take. I say that, when I remember what directors have brought upon us in almost all parts of the country, whether it be in connection with the Vermont Central, with the Grand Trunk Western, with steamships or with some part of the country. No matter whether it was in Montreal or elsewhere, we had difficulties come to us by reason of the appointment and operations of directors. The reason was obvious, wholly obvious. I have heard nothing from the minister to indicate that those reasons will not continue. On the contrary, our old friend, one of the venerable and venerated members of this house (Mr. Marcil) only this afternoon read a petition in which he pointed out that in the interests of efficiency and economy certain changes were made with respect to railway workshops at a point where repairs were carried on. "In the interests of economy and efficiency" were the words used. A change was made from one point to another, namely from point A to point B, in other words to Campbellton rather than elsewhere. Just imagine the pressure that will be heaped up against these directors! This is a fair warning. Can the directors resist the power of 170 odd members of parliament? If the minister means what his words would seem to indicate, he is not going to have anything to do with the operation of the railways; that is going to be done by the president and directors. I may say that if an examination were conducted on cause assigned I have no doubt the minister would discover many things he ought to know, because inevitably where you have a combination of both systems there are difficulties. The late Sir Henry Thornton found difficulties but he brought them into a harmonious whole. Now and then we find the assertion of this or that right on the part of the old road or one of the other roads, and the difficulty of creating harmonious operation of the system is very, very great.

In his statement Mr. Fullerton referred to that difficulty. But when there is a great depression and a lessening of traffic and revenue, with a consequent laying off of men, the human factor enters into the problem, and the consideration of that human factor involves many questions to which references have been made to-day. The essential point it seems to me we cannot get away from is that the very feature contained in the address made this afternoon in connection with the acquisition of branch lines, and other properties, in a constituency represented by a member on the government side of the house represents an effort which must and will be made to secure a recognition of local communities for local purposes as against efficiency and economy, which were the grounds put forward by the late Sir Henry Thornton as the reasons for actions which were taken. That condition is going to be intensified one hundredfold. It will be intensified one hundredfold, under a board of directors.

The whole purpose of the Duff commission was to create a body just the opposite of a directorate. Why? Because this was a publicly owned property in connection with which the House of Commons had undertaken to represent the shareholders, and a property which, as I pointed out, if the ordinary rules of law were to prevail, would have been in the hands of receivers long since, and would have been operated for the benefit of those who held the securities. In order that we might avoid that, trustees were appointed. They were free from political consideration, and Judge Fullerton has accentuated that point in the statement he made. Others have done the same thing.

I know about all the complaints; I know about the complaints made. I know it was complained that these men would not take a political outlook. Do I not know, sir, the extent to which the late government suffered? Do I not know about the appeals that were made? Do I not know about the votes that were lost? Do I not know about the successful effort made to create poisoned ideas and views in the minds of Canadian National employees? Have I forgotten? I have not. I have not forgotten the propaganda and the efforts that were made. Are we to return to that? If we are not, then all I can say is that the minister must either yield or leave; no alternative is left, because of the very action that has been taken ever since the trustees took office.

In the very nature of things we must be sincere, whether we like it or not. In connection with this matter we must be sincere. and I cannot but think that hon. members of the committee must realize that the substitution of directors for trustees will bring about an inevitable recurrence of the difficulties to which reference has been made, and which were accentuated this afternoon by the observations of the hon. member for Bonaventure, when he indicated his position.

The statement of the summary of the Duff commission made by Judge Fullerton is so ample that I think not even the hardest cynic could object to its fairness. This is the last opportunity afforded in committee to raise our voices against the repeal of a statute which entrusted to a body of three trustees the administration of the greatest property the Canadian people own. If the minister is dissatisfied with the trustees I have no doubt methods could be devised by which they could be replaced. To do it in this indirect manner is bad enough, but when for the trustees he substitutes directors, the very persons against whom the Duff commission reported, those persons because of whom the red line of extravagance was running through the whole operation of the system, then I say that he has invited the very criticism which has been made in this committee, namely that the action is taken for the purpose of restoring those days, with all the sad effects they have had upon the Canadian taxpayer.

That is the reason—I know it is too late—why I appeal to the minister to think carefully; I appeal to the Minister of Justice, too, to consider the precedent we are establishing with respect to the disposition of the trustees, realizing that a public office is a public trust. The approach which was made to the matter was unfortunate; I do not blame the Minister of Railways for that, because he is not a lawyer. But it is quite obvious that had he had brought to his attention the decisions of the courts with respect to the position in which Judge Fullerton would have placed himself had he yielded to any suggestions that he be provided with this or that office, with this or that position or with a sum of money, unless it be a sum placed in the estimates, the minister would run counter to this. He would have had regard for that great line of decisions which, strange as it may sound, began as far back as 1551, when a statute was passed in Great Britain. It has brought about other statutes and decisions since that time, and that is the reason why in Great Britain they could not possibly submit to parliament a measure such as this. It would fill British legislators with a sense of horror to have submitted to them a statute that proposed, without conferring an opportunity to answer to an assigned cause, to wipe out trustees in the method which is being followed in this bill.

I can only make this final suggestion—it will do no good, of course—as to the desirability of the government reconsidering the matter from the other angle which apparently they had not thought of at all until the statements made by Judge Fullerton and by the minister appeared. But now that they do appear, it seems to me that we have in the printed word reasons which should influence this committee, and the government first of all, to hesitate to ask the members to follow a course, pursue a policy, and create a precedent which is without parallel, so far as I know, in the whole British empire, and which does violence to every settled and established rule dealing with the relations between the crown and its servants. For while Judge Fullerton and the trustees were paid by the railway company, they were appointed by the crown in the exercise of the power conferred by parliament, and when a contract such as that is made by the crown with its servants, to suggest that those servants should be treated in this way is, I say, doing violence to every established precedent. But worse than that, it creates a sense of unfairness and of injustice which, while it might meet with temporary cheers and approval, cannot in any sense be divested of its real quality if sufficient examination and analysis are given to the statute under which that power is to be exercised.

This section repeals the existing law. The government, I can readily understand, desire to make modifications and changes in this law as they have in other statutes, but so far as the general principle is concerned I hope that on reconsideration, and especially in view of what has taken place in the committee, the government will realize the desirability of not departing from known pathways of conduct and will not endeavour to establish a precedent that, in my judgment, will react some day or another, I do not know when, upon the heads of those who are responsible for it.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Part I.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have an amendment, Mr. Chairman, to section 3, as follows:

That all the words after the word "council" in the third line on page six of the bill down to and including the word "approve" in the sixth line, on page six of the bill, be struck out.

Mr. BENNETT: These are separate sections, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. HOWE: I might explain that. Section 3 says:

Part I of the said acts is repealed and the following substituted therefor.

It so happens that the first paragraph of part I of the said act that is amended is paragraph 4, and all the succeeding paragraphs up to and including paragraph 15 on page 7 of the bill are part of section 3 of this bill. There are only five sections to this bill. Section 3 is on the first page, and section 4 is on the eighth page of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to suggest to the minister, although of course it is not for me to say, that these paragraphs 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and so on down to 15, should have been designated by different figures because they are not sections; they are really paragraphs, and might be designated a, b, c, and so on. The section is 3, but these paragraphs 4, 5, 6, and so forth appear in the bill as if they were separate sections.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, and I thought it well to direct attention to that. I think we should certainly consider section 3 paragraph by paragraph, because in the act they will be separate sections.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister has stated it exactly. This section 3 repeals a whole part, consisting of several sections of the existing act.

Mr. HOWE: Quite so.

Mr. CAHAN: The proper way, I submit, to have done it would have been to repeal the old act section by section and substitute the new sections. This may have the same effect, but in consolidating the act later for office purposes these paragraphs 4, 5, 6, and so forth, must appear as sections of the new act.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is quite correct. We could have repealed it paragraph by paragraph, but the draftsmen have in fact repealed all of part I.

Mr. BENNETT: That is clear, and the following are substituted therefor. The question is how they shall be numbered.

Mr. CAHAN: Of course, we have been discussing section 3 of the bill. Section 3 is practically the whole bill, and therefore we were entitled to roam from Dan to Beersheba.

Mr. HOWE: The discussion took place on section 2.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, perhaps so. Now the minister proposes that we shall proceed with what are to be the new sections of part I, and that we proceed section by section. Is that the intention?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: I think there is no objection to that.

Mr. HOWE: The amendment is to section 3.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is with reference to page 6.

Mr. STEVENS: Could we have the amendment read again, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is on paragraph 4 of clause 3, appearing on page 2 of the bill.

[Mr. Bennett.]

On section 3, paragraph 4—Board of directors.

Mr. STEWART: I submit at least, Mr. Chairman, that we might have the marginal note read.

The CHAIRMAN: The marginal note reads, "Board of directors."

Paragraph 4 agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph 5—Remuneration of directors.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister any statement to make as to the salaries it is proposed to pay the directors?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know that that has been considered. We propose to put this pretty much on the basis of national service, and not attempt to pay the class of men we hope to get for the actual time they spend. But I suppose quite a small sum, perhaps three or four thousand dollars.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the minister think he can get competent railway directors for three or four thousand dollars?

Mr. HOWE: I think we can get men of the right type, anxious to do national service, who will put service above the actual remuneration.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister think it would be possible to get that type of man able to divorce himself from his own business to the extent of being able to meet with the board of directors once a week for the purpose of doing railway business?

Mr. HOWE: I feel that we can. When I said three or four thousand dollars, I would not like to be tied to that, for it might be five or six thousand dollars; I would say not more than six thousand dollars, but that is a situation we have to meet when we come to discuss it with the men we hope to get. I do not think any man that we might hope to get will discuss salary until after he has decided whether or not he will accept the position.

Mr. FINN: The board of directors as suggested by the minister is to consist of seven members?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FINN: One of whom will be the chairman?

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Mr. FINN: In the appointment of these directors is it the intention to carry out the principle and appoint a board of directors representative of the different parts of Canada? I do not know whether the government has definitely made up its mind in this connection and if the minister cannot answer me to-night, I shall be quite satisfied to have his answer later before the bill is finally dealt with.

Mr. HOWE: We shall decide what directors we shall get when the bill passes.

Mr. FINN: I must take issue with the minister. There is a principle involved in this change. A few moments ago I referred to the remarks of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen and the reasons he gave for appointing such a board of directors. He contended that politics would be removed and the board would be representative of the different parts of Canada; that they would know the local conditions and needs, the same as a doctor does when he visits the bedside of a patient. I am speaking only for my own province of Nova Scotia and hon. gentlemen who represent Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick can speak for themselves. I should like to know if this board of directors is to be representative of all the provinces of Canada. The minister now tells me that a statement will be made after the bill is passed and the stable door is locked. I think this committee is entitled to this information. We should know the type of man to be selected and whether territorial limits will be taken into consideration in the appointments.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall paragraph 5 carry?

Mr. FINN: I think I am entitled to an answer from the minister, and if I am not to get one, I should like him to say so. I want to be fair, but I shall not, without uttering my protest, permit legislation, whether it be introduced by the government or otherwise, to pass that might be subversive to the best interests of the province which I have the honour to represent. I think, before this legislation leaves the committee, every hon. member present is entitled to receive the information he desires.

Mr. HOWE: I want to give my hon. friend the fullest possible information, but I thought I made it quite clear that the government have not gone as far with the selection of directors as my hon. friend seems to think. They hope to get six men and a chairman who will be of the greatest value to the property. I can assure my hon. friend that when the time comes the considerations he mentions will be weighed very carefully, but surely he should not ask me at this time as to the policy of the government with reference to these directors who have not been definitely chosen.

Mr. FINN: Perhaps the minister has misunderstood me. I did not ask him who the directors were to be; I asked him whether in the selection of these directors the question of territorial limits would be considered.

Mr. HOWE: I can assure my hon. friend that territorial considerations will be carefully weighed when the time comes.

Mr. BENNETT: Will they weigh enough?

Paragraph 5 agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph 6—Tenure.

Mr. STEVENS: How does the minister propose to assure these directors that they will have continuity of office. Three of the original directors are to be appointed for three years; two are to be appointed for two years, and two for one year; then the succeeding directors are to be appointed for periods of three years. The present board of trustees were assured by statute of a term of five years. They have been in office a little more than two years and now they are being simply legislated out; the statute means nothing. What confidence can be placed in this statutory assurance of three year appointments?

Mr. HOWE: I may say that I do not consider that of the highest importance since the men who will be chosen will be selected because they feel they can make a contribution to their country. I believe that should there be a change of government and it is intimated to these men that they have not the confidence of the government, they will retire promptly. I would expect that men of the calibre we hope to get would do that, and I would be disappointed if they did not. In the meantime, they are to be appointed for three years, and one-third of the board retires each year. In other words, the board of directors faces its shareholders every three years just as is the case in many private corporations. I think that is a very proper thing and I would not care to do anything to tie the hands of the next parliament from reorganizing this board as they see fit.

Mr. STEVENS: I am referring to this revision to the old system. It means that these directors are being appointed for the term of office of the existing government; that is the effect of the minister's observations. In other words, we are declaring to the country that in so far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned, its policy of operation, its policy of administration must be attuned to the policy of the government that happens to be in office. I think it is important that this fact should be recognized in passing this legislation. In my opinion, it is possible to change that. Would the minister consider the suggestion of having these directors appointed by parliament itself, thus ensuring at least before any change is made, a full discussion by parliament acting as shareholders of the railway? For if the theory just expounded by the minister is to be the doctrine which will govern us, it really means that we are creating a partisan board of directors; that is what it amounts to. Altogether apart from what is in the minister's mind at the moment, this legislation as such will amount to a partisan appointment of directors. The minister has emphasized twice already, I believe, in the last few minutes, his hope of getting men who will serve the country and accept this office as a national service. That is fine, and I shall not, in anticipation, cast reflections upon these gentlemen; I have no doubt that very worthy gentlemen will be chosen. But the point is that behind it all we are adopting a system which will grow into and be perpetuated as a partisan administration of the railways. That is exactly what was intended to be overcome by means of the trustee system. I confess that when the legislation was first brought down, after the Duff commission had reported, for the appointment of trustees, I considered that that phase of the matter required a great deal of thought if its value was to be appreciated. But having seen it put into operation I have come to the conclusion that it was sound, not only as a method of getting away from the partisan element which inevitably creeps in, but in addition to that for the reason that the trustee system clothed the administration of the railways with authority in connection with dealing with the competing railway, which I think is impossible in connection with a board of directors. Well, I will not say impossible—that is going too far—but it could not be done with the same efficiency by a board of directors as by a board of trustees. In my opinion the minister should give this paragraph further consideration.

I would suggest that parliament might well consider now, if we are going to depart from the system of trustees, whether or not the directors should be appointed by parliament itself. That is a thought which has been in my mind many times in the past when this subject of the national railways has been before parliament. I have long had the view that it might be advisable—that is, when the railway was under a board of directors—that parliament might at some period of the session sit as shareholders of the railway. We might constitute the house in committee of the whole as a meeting of shareholders for the purpose of appointing directors, receiving the annual statement and dispatching business of that kind. Parliament as a committee of the whole might sit as shareholders of the railway.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no provision anywhere for parliament sitting as a committee of the whole.

Mr. STEVENS: No, but there is no reason why parliament should not pass legislation for the introduction of that system.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think it could constitutionally. Parliament is composed of two bodies functioning separately, each within its own orbit.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no reason in the world, however, why parliament could not pass a statute. I am not saying that my idea is the wisest; I am merely offering it as an opinion. There is no reason why parliament should not pass a statute providing that in so far as the national railways are concerned an annual meeting might be held which would be attended by all the elected members of parliament as representing the people, who are the owners of the property. As the company operates to-day, or as it will operate under this bill, it will be administered by a board of directors, and the only body above the board of directors will be the executive, namely, the cabinet or the government of the country. As a matter of fact, every citizen or taxpayer in Canada is a shareholder of the railway, but it is obvious that you could not have a meeting representing the shareholders as an ordinary shareholders' meeting is held. We could, however, enlarge the number by constituting parliament itself as representing the shareholders for the purpose of appointing directors and performing other limited duties. About three years ago, in 1933, we passed a statute which provided that the trustees should be appointed for a term of five years. They have been in office for something like two or two and a half years, and now by legislation we are removing them without any cause assigned. There has been no complaint; there cannot be any reasonable complaint sufficient to warrant their removal. We are declaring in this bill that the directors shall hold office for three years. But there is no guarantee whatever that these directors will hold their office for three years.

Mr. BAKER: Why not say for the duration of this parliament?

Mr. STEVENS: That would be a much more frank way of putting it, because that is what it means. For hon. gentlemen at present on the government benches cannot now take an action that nullifies the action of parliament three years ago and say: We are so much superior to those who preceded us that any action we may take will stand and these directors will remain in office for the full term of three years. The government must expect that, once having established this precedent in connection with the national railways, other governments will be inclined to follow in their footsteps, and they would have abundant excuse for doing so. Personally I should like to see in this bill something repudiating the idea of interference with these appointees, once appointed, except for dereliction of duty or incapacity or untrustworthiness or something of that sort. That is the only reason why a man should be removed. I offer these suggestions for what they are worth.

Mr. BENNETT: We are providing in this measure that the governor in council shall be a shareholder of the company for all purposes under the railway act. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has referred to members of parliament, the senate and the commons, voting as shareholders. It is quite competent for us to pass a statute to that effect. I at one time had a plan by which all the members of the local legislatures and of parliament, the senate and the commons, should cast a ballot for the election of the directors of this road, and should be authorized by parliament to act as shareholders for that purpose.

Mr. DUNNING: I should be interested to know the reason my right hon. friend abandoned the idea, to see whether it is the same reason that actuated me in abandoning a similar plan.

Mr. BENNETT: I abandoned it because it did not appeal to those to whom I suggested it. I am going to be perfectly frank about the matter, because the minister was very frank this afternoon about his speech. I might say that the plan did not seem to win commendation from anybody.

Mr. DUNNING: I had the same experience.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a fair statement of the situation. On the other hand the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has put his finger upon it. What this government says is this: "We found a man who had a right to a job for five years, who was given that job by an act of the parliament of Canada; we wiped it out, and we are going to make the appointment for three years"—which makes it a joke. Why not say, "shall hold office during the lifetime of the present government," or "unless they change their mind," or "as long as their present state of mind continues?" Having said that there is no value to a written contract; that an act of parliament is a worthless scrap of paper, why not be consistent and put it in the statute? That is the position. The minister should be consistent about it. He has declared that a former act of parliament is a piece of waste paper. That act gave one man a position for five years, and others for a less time; one expires in December next. Why not say in this section, "They shall hold office as long as we think they should, and no longer," "we" meaning the present government? That would be better than coming down to this parliament and repudiating a statute. It would be much better to indulge in an act of acquiescence rather than in an act of repudiation, and simply to say, "We acquiesce in the position which we have taken and are going to embody in this statute a provision that hereafter no man may be appointed for three, four, five, six, eight, or ten years—that doesn't mean anything to us—but, so long as we feel he is satisfactory to us." It sounds so much better than to go through all these formalities about equity and fair dealing and doing justice and loving mercy, and the other clause that I shall leave unsaid. Why not do what I suggest? I am very serious about it. Having repudiated all these provisions of last year in the section, why not now say, "We will save parliament trouble by saying that the term shall be three years or such time as to the governor in council may seem satisfactory?" In other words, as long as the pressure from without is sufficient to enable them to discharge their duties to the satisfaction of the members of the House of Commons who sit to the right of the Speaker, it is all right. I suggest seriously to the government that they should put that on the statute book.

Mr. HOWE: I may say, Mr. Chairman, that in 1933 for the first time legislation was passed which attempted to tie the hands of an incoming government beyond peradventure, by making a change of personnel possible only by means of a joint address of the Senate and the House of Commons. The present government is not perpetuating that method.

Mr. CAHAN: This bill can pass only with the consent of both houses of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: You are in no worse position now than you would be under any circumstances in which you wish to repeal an act constituting the national railway board. You must now go to the other house and secure their consent to the bill which is at present before the committee. There can be no legislative measure without the consent, direct or indirect, of both houses of parliament, and when it is suggested that the address should be concurred in by the Senate and the House of Commons, that is the form provided by the rules of this house for every address which is to receive the approval of parliament for any purpose whatsoever.

Mr. BENNETT: Petitions have to go to both houses.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister allow me to ask a question regarding a paragraph that has already passed? Paragraph 5 of section 3 provides that the directors shall not be entitled to receive any other recompense of emolument from the Canadian National Railways or any company of which they form a part. Would it not be a good idea to provide that they should not receive any recompense or other emolument from any other railway company?

Mr. HOWE: I think the hon. member can leave it to the good judgment of the government not to appoint directors or employees of other railway companies.

Mr. NEILL: I do not mean directors or employees; I mean people who are under an obligation, possibly pensioners, or who are closely allied with them by way of having large business dealings with them and things like that. If it is desirable that they should be absolutely clear from the Canadian National Railways, it is ten times more so that they should have no connection, direct or indirect, open or concealed, with any other railway.

Mr. BENNETT: Will this be paid by the railway or by the crown?

Mr. HOWE: By the railway. The purpose of paragraph 5 is merely to provide that they will not get two or three emoluments from serving on different boards of the railways, of which there are so many boards. They are to be paid one fee by the railways.

Mr. STEWART: The minister persists in stating or insinuating or suggesting that the object behind the fixing of the period of office of the trusteees was a political one; that it was done for the purpose of tying the hands of a succeeding government.

Mr. HOWE: So it was.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. BENNETT: The minister was not in the house at the time.

Mr. STEWART: I ask the minister to read the report of the Duff commission and to study the reason why that commission recommended the appointment of a board of trustees and recommended also that it be given permanence.

Mr. BENNETT: And the length of time.

Mr. STEWART: And the length of time.

Mr. HOWE: Did my hon. friends opposite adopt the length of time?

Mr. STEWART: I do not know that we adopted the report in every detail. There were reasons given by the commission why trustees should be appointed and the desirability of their having a secure tenure of office, in order that one of the troubles which was referred to in the report might not occur again.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, June 5, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SICK LEAVE FOR TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on March 24, about two months ago, the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) was kind enough to say that in a short time he hoped to be able to report favourably on the passage of an order in council granting sick leave to government servants who, although not qualified as employees under the civil service commission, had been many years in the government service but who, upon losing a half day's time, are docked for it.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): The hon. member raised the point previously in the session. I regret to report that it may not be possible to do exactly what the hon. member has mentioned, but we are now considering whether or not we might substitute an alternative provision which would partly meet the views he has expressed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR ADMINISTRATION BY BOARD OF DIRECTORS APPOINTED BY GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

The house resumed from Thursday, June 4, consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933.—Mr. Howe.—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 3, paragraph 6—Tenure.

Mr. STEWART: When the house adjourned last night I was discusing with the minister a certain provision of this bill, and calling attention to the fact that he had at different times in the course of the discussion stated that the object of the previous government in appointing trustees for a fixed term was to tie the hands of a succeeding government, and when I made that statement the minister replied, "So it was," as will be found at page 3422 of Hansard. Then I said:

I ask the minister to read the report of the Duff commission and to study the reason why that commission recommended the appointment of a board of trustees and recommended also that it be given permanence.

At the time I did not have before me the report of the Duff commission, and I now call the minister's attention to clause 204 of that report, which says in part:

One of the trustees should be named as chairman at the date of his appointment with tenure of office seven years.

The minister surely does not think that away back behind the report of this commission the government set out with or was able to impose upon that commission a desire to tie the hands of its successor. In answer to the request of the minister as to why the recommendation of the Duff commission as to the length of tenure of office was not followed, I said I was not sure. The appointment of the chairman was made for a term of five years instead of seven, again disclosing an absence of all desire on the part of the previous government to tie the hands of a succeeding government for any particular period of time. The report of the commission discloses certain conditions with which the minister is familiar, political interference in the management of the road and extravagance in its management, all of which is specifically set out in the report, and has been referred to at different times in this debate.

I really think, Mr. Chairman, that the minister ought to withdraw the statement that it was the intention of the government to tie the hands of its successor, when the fact is that an honest and sincere effort was made to carry out the recommendation of this very important, impartial and capable commission, and that was all that was behind the appointment of the board of trustees. I would ask the minister if he still persists in the statement that the object of the government was to tie the hands of its successors.

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry to have to differ from my hon. friend. I do not think I can withdraw my statement. It seems to me that when the term of office was being considered and a change was being made from the recommendation of the Duff report, it could have been for a term within the life of the parliament then sitting. I think that would have been wiser. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is quite obvious that the term was to preserve continuity, for one of the trustees was to leave office next fall, another next year, and in two years more the chairman would retire; but it was thought that seven years was too long, and so the term was made five years. In the debate which took place it was quite clear that the whole bill was framed on the Duff report, and for the minister to suggest improper motives is not only contravening the rules of the house but is not in accordance with the facts. The term of office was lessened for the very purpose of meeting unfair criticism that the hands of the next parliament were being tied by the then parliament. When a grant was being given to the federal commission of this city I argued that we should not go beyond the life of a particular parliament, but the Prime Minister took the other view.

Public interest is not always synonymous with pure partyism. It does not mean that, and if it is impossible for hon. gentlemen opposite to conceive of other people having an honest desire to carry into effect the report of the Duff commission, merely because they want now to remove the trustees who were promised a certain term of office, they have no right to attribute improper motives to those who sincerely endeavoured to give effect to the recommendations of the commission appointed, not at the instance of any one railway, but at the instance of both, because both railways thought it desirable in the public interest that such a report should be made.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph 7—Provincial companies reincorporated.

Mr. CAHAN: May I ask if the minister would be so kind as to give us a clear statement as to the differences between the powers of the board of directors as proposed under this bill and the powers of the trustees created by the act of 1933? I have puzzled my brain over it but I cannot see very much difference between the powers of the directors as stated in these sections and the powers of the trustees as they were created by the act of 1933.

Mr. HOWE: I thought my hon. friend saw a very decided difference, because he claimed that one made for an improvement all round and the other led to unlimited graft and corruption.

Mr. CAHAN: I still adhere to that opinion.

Mr. HOWE: There is a difference, and I will try to explain it. First there is no difference in this principle, that the management of the internal affairs of the Canadian National Railways is now vested in the hands of the trustees, and under this bill will be vested in the hands of the board of directors. But at the present time those powers are vested in one man, who must agree to every action that is taken respecting the internal affairs of the Canadian National Railways—one man in charge of a property far-flung from coast to coast, and of the magnitude of the Canadian National Railways. In addition, that one man is operating some eight departments of the railway directly. In other words, he is not only running all the affairs of the railway personally but he is acting as the manager of eight departments of the railway. He has two co-trustees, neither of whom can carry out anything that is suggested unless the chairman agrees, and always one must agree with the chairman to make a particular act effective. That is the present set-up.

Under the new set-up we have a chairman. He is one member of the board of directors, and he will have six other directors with him of the type described in the Duff commission's report, if it is possible to get them—and I am satisfied that it is—men of experience in financial matters and with a background in the industrial life of Canada which will permit them to make an important contribution to the affairs of the railway. We have in this case a full time chairman as was the case with the board of trustees. The chairman of the board of trustees was assisted by two part time directors; in this case, by six. When the seven sit around the table each will have an equal vote in deciding any matter of policy coming before the board. That is the main difference.

There is no difference so far as outside control goes. The present board of trustees have to go to the government with respect to certain matters in which the government and railroad are so interlocked that it is impossible for one to act without the other. The new board will be in the same position, and the contact will be between a practical railway man as chairman and the Minister of Railways. The contact at present is between the chairman of the board of trustees, who is not a railroad man at all, and who must necessarily bring an adviser with him. Present discussions between the Minister of Railways and any practical railway man is conducted through a third party, who has no first hand knowledge of most matters under discussion but who must convey the views of the practical railway man to the government. Those are the main differences, and I think they are very important.

Mr. CAHAN: But what supervision will the Minister of Railways have over the proceedings of the directors? I do not think, simply because the chairman of trustees had supervision over several departments of the railway, that that is altogether a crime, as the extravagance and emphasis of the language of the minister would seem to indicate. When the new Department of Transport is set up I assume the hon. gentleman will preside over it. He will then have the supervision and direction of several departments or branches. If the employees in that new department are to be appointed outside of the civil service, he will have a direct voice in the appointment of more persons than any previous minister has had in the history of Canada. If he considers himself qualified for the supervision of so many branches, I cannot understand why he should think the chairman of trustees is so absolutely disqualified. He has admitted himself that he has been unable to find any serious error of act or judgment which could be charged against the present board of trustees or the chairman of the board. The hon. gentleman has put himself out of court by admitting that he can find no real cause for criticism.

He has suggested that Mr. Fullerton is disqualified because he was not trained as a railway man. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that he himself is not a railway man. The other great competing railroad is in charge of a gentleman of high qualifications and large experience, but he was not originally a railway man. I could take the minister to many of the leading corporations in the United States where the great executive heads are not trained in the mechanical operations which are carried on by the particular corporation over which they preside. A gentleman with whom I have been intimate since his youth is the executive head of the General Electric Company of the United States. He is merely a lawyer; he never was a railway man or a manufacturer. It is quite possible for a man who is not a railway man to act as chairman of the board of trustees and supervise and direct affairs in such a manner as to preserve and maintain the best interests of the public service over which he is placed. Are the members of this new board of directors to be railway men? Are they to be selected because of their railroading experience?

Except in one instance, the hon. gentleman has not been able to indicate any difference between the powers and responsibilities of these directors and the powers and responsibilities of the trustees. The chairman of the board of trustees had to have the concurrence of one of the other two trustees, and the other two could not carry out matters of policy except with the consent of the chairman. The so-called departments over which the chairman had supervision were not departments connected with the actual running and operation of the railway system. The more I think of this the more I am driven to the conclusion that the purport of the bill is to change by statute a board of trustees into a board of directors, the appointment to which will rest with the hon. gentleman and depend upon his recommendation and selection. I am driven to the conclusion that the whole purpose of the bill is to obtain for the minister political control over the management, maintenance and operation of every department of the railway.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member referred to supervision by the chairman over certain departments. The fact is that the chairman is operating manager of seven or eight departments, in addition to running the whole show as chairman. I want to make that clear, because there is a slight difference. The hon. gentleman said that my department would be the largest in Canada, but I ask him to compare it with the Canadian National Railways. When this new department is formed there will be some 5,000 employees in it, but there are over 75,000 in the Canadian National Railways. I will be in charge of property valued at only one-twenty-fifth or one-thirtieth the value of the property of the Canadian National Railways. I admit I have a very difficult task; it is perhaps an open question whether too much work will not be connected with this department, but the hon. member was comparing two totally dissimilar things. It might be true to say that the chairman, not being a qualified railway man, has a task somewhat beyond his capacity, and that I, not being a qualified railway man, have a task somewhat beyond mine, but it would not be for the same reason.

I think we had better straighten out the question as to what this government is trying to do. The impression has been created that we are passing this bill to dismiss three trustees.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what you said.

Mr. HOWE: We are passing this legislation to get a better set-up for the Canadian National Railway. When I first took office I talked with the trustees individually and each told me that the present set-up is bad. I talked with my predecessor in office, and he said it was bad. I heard the views of other people who had had close experience with the situation, and they felt it was impossible. Just how far should the personality of the chairman be allowed to intrude into this matter? I think it has gone rather a long way. A few days ago in the committee on railways and shipping the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) demanded that the chairman be given the privilege of making a statement. Objection was raised because this bill was not before the committee, but I took the view that I should like to see the chairman have his day in court if he so desired. I saw nothing behind it at all; I thought it was only fair that he should be given this opportunity. He came before the committee and made his statement. I thought it was a very fair statement, and I made some rather flattering remarks about it. But what happened? A beautiful document—I understand it has been published both in English and in French—is being flooded over the country, being a reprint of the chairman's statement.

Mr. CAHAN: What statement is that?

Mr. HOWE: The statement made by Mr. Fullerton before the committee, which statement was out of order.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not out of order; it was very much in order.

Mr. HOWE: I question to what extent a member of parliament was justified in pressing a thing like that if he knew how it was going to to used. After all, this bill is before parliament and I think it can be considered on the basis of statements made in parliament, rather than on the basis of statements made outside and broadcast throughout the country. That is all I care to say. We believe that in the interests of the railway a change should be made.

If there should be any hardship imposed upon the chairman by this change, I am quite prepared to see that he does not suffer financially. There is nothing personal in the relations existing between the chairman and myself. The chairman happens to be involved in this change, and I am sorry. I did my best to see that his personality would not be involved when the time for reorganization came, but the fact remains that I believe it is necessary in the interests of the railway to change this system of management. That is the view of the government. Why pound away on the individuality of a man who happens to be chairman of the board?

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman has disclosed one matter which I think is of the utmost importance and should receive the consideration of this committee. If the hon. gentleman received gossip from this man or that man, from some of the officials of his department, to the effect that the present administration was not competent and was not effective, why in the world has he not brought that evidence before a committee of this house where the house would be able to cross-examine witnesses and ascertain the import and accuracy of the statements made? I tell the hon. gentleman, I think it is a gross error of judgment on his part that he should attempt to dominate the will of parliament and to secure the passage—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHAN: —yes, to dominate the will of parliament—I use the word parliament—as expressed in the statute of 1933, without giving the real source of his information, but by retailing a lot of gossip which has come to his ears.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHAN: That is exactly what it is. He had not the courage—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: He had not the courage when he stood in that committee—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: —to call in question a single statement which had been made in the report of the trustees which was then under consideration. He has simply shrugged his shoulders and said, in effect, that he had to admit that there had been an economical and careful administration. He was not able to indicate a single default on the part of the trustees. Treatment of this kind is, I think, unprecedented in the history of government in this country; and it is unprecedented in parliamentary affairs that a minister should rely on a bit of gossip, without producing any evidence in support of it, as the ground for asking parliament to repeal an act which received the consent of a majority of both houses of parliament so recently as 1933.

Mr. DUNNING: It is rather difficult to ascertain the cause of so much heat on the part of my hon. friend. It appeared that my hon. friend accused the Minister of Railways of attempting to dominate parliament, and when we try to discover what parliament we find it was the last parliament. That is the whole point. The last parliament was supreme so long as it was in office—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And still tries to be.

Mr. DUNNING: This parliament is now supreme. The Minister of Railways and the government of the day are responsible to this parliament and to the people of this country in precisely the same manner as their predecessors were to that parliament and to the people of Canada. We are exercising our judgment on this problem with the same motives, I hope, as those which actuated our predecessors in exercising their judgment upon it.

Mr. BENNETT: According to the Minister of Railways they are pretty bad.

Mr. DUNNING: I am trying to credit my hon. friend with higher motives than the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) attributed to the Minister of Railways a little while ago.

Mr. BENNETT: The motives were attributed by the Minister of Railways.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: This noise won't pass the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: On no occasion in my hearing did the Minister of Railways refer to his views on this matter as being predicated on gossip.

Mr. BENNETT: But he did attribute motives.

Mr. DUNNING: I heard no attributing of motives.

Mr. CAHAN: He referred to reports that had been made to him orally. What is that but gossip?

Mr. DUNNING: He sought the advice of responsible men, and Hansard will show that he considered the views of his predecessor in office with respect to the matter. It is not possible for the head of a great business to determine in the manner of a court of trial the qualifications for executive positions of those conducting that business. Matters of judgment cannot be dealt with by question and answer in the manner in which a lawyer would conduct a trial. The head of a great organization must make up his mind, with respect to the executive capacity of those charged with responsibility, by a variety of methods; and I suggest that what the minister said this afternoon with regard to the confirmation of his own view was not petty gossip but the kind of thing which one would expect a man taking over such responsibilities to pay attention to. The whole point is that with the best of motives, and without attributing any to our predecessors, we believe that we have a mandate from the people of Canada to change the system which the previous administration put into effect.

Mr. BENNETT: Forty-six per cent of the votes.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, as to the percentage of votes, my hon. friend is a constitutionalist; I have not heard of him as an advocate of proportional representation. Why talk about the percentage of the votes? He was quite satisfied with a majority of the members in the last parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: He is yet.

Mr. DUNNING: Why not this one?

Mr. BENNETT: He is quite satisfied with it yet.

Mr. DUNNING: I believe my hon. friend is; I am quite sure he would be. So are we.

Mr. STEWART: The Minister of Finance has just referred to the questioning of motives, and I do not think he could have been in the house when I read a statement which the Minister of Railways made last night in answer to one that I had made. I said:

> The minister persists in stating or insinuating or suggesting that the object behind the fixing of the period of office of the trustees was a political one; that it was done for the purpose of tying the hands of a succeeding government.

The reply of the minister was:

> So it was.

Now is not that a questioning of motives?

Mr. BENNETT: I should say so.

Mr. STEWART: This comes from the Minister of Railways and it comes after long consideration, and is repeated; this is the second or third time he has made that statement. I ask the Minister of Finance, who is questioning motives? I referred to the record and showed that the recommendations of the Duff commission embodied the appointment of a board of trustees for a longer period of office than the one for which they were appointed. Surely therefore that destroys entirely the contention, oft repeated in this house by the Minister of Railways, that the motive of the former government was to tie the hands of a succeeding government. I asked the minister to withdraw it but he declined to do so. So he reaffirms it. The record is against him. Not only is the record against him on that, but it is against him on other matters he has stated to-day. He says that the chairman of the board of trustees took over the charge of operating departments of the road.

Mr. HOWE: Operating the several departments.

Mr. STEWART: The minister said operating departments. I think Hansard will prove that. What does the chairman of the board of trustees say about this in his statement? He refers on page 218 of the proceedings of the railways and shipping committee—

An hon. MEMBER: Which was out of order.

Mr. STEWART: It was perfectly in order. When in the world did it become out of order for the chairman of any organization in charge of the national railways to make a statement in explanation of his conduct or in justification of it? Whenever did it become out of order? It never has been, and, I hope, never will be. However, here is what the chairman said:

> I now turn to the departments which came under my direct management. Section 10 of the 1933 act provides:—
> "The trustees shall appoint, on terms to be fixed by them, and with the titular rank of president, a person other than one of themselves to execute and perform, under and in consultation with them, the powers, authorities and duties of chief operating officer of national railways, as such powers, authorities and duties shall be from time to time defined by by-law or resolution of the trustees and committed for execution and performance. The president shall report and be responsible to the trustees and to them alone."

That is in a statute passed by this parliament. The chairman continues:

> It is my view that the person who fills this position has a task requiring not only high technical skill, but demanding his full time and attention. On January 31, 1934, the trustees appointed Mr. S. J. Hungerford as chief operating officer. In arranging the division of departments between the president and myself I took over those departments which were not connected with the actual operation of the railway. Those connected with the operation of the railway proper were assigned to the president, and I have never at any time interfered in their operation, although I recognize that the ultimate responsibility for the efficiency of those operations rests with the board. The working out of this arrangement has been harmonious and I have never heard of any complaint from any railway officer.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask whether my hon. friend agrees that these departments—the legal, the accounting, the publicity and so on—have no relation to the operating of the railway?

Mr. STEWART: He does not say that.

Mr. HOWE: Read it again.

Mr. STEWART: He says that these assignments were made with the approval of the operating officer, Mr. Hungerford—

Mr. HOWE: Ridiculous.

Mr. STEWART: They were made after consultation with and obtaining the approval of the chief operating officer.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend agrees with that statement entirely? That is his statement, is it?

Mr. STEWART: I will make my own statement, and the minister can agree with it or not. To proceed a little further, there was no questioning of the chairman of the board as to his statement. If there was any doubt about the accuracy of it, the opportunity was there. I desired to ask him a few questions upon it, but it was ruled out of order. Now the minister says that this is a personal matter on the part of the opposition, arising from personal interest in the chairman of the board of trustees. I say that such is not the case. We are more concerned with the successful operation and the efficiency of the Canadian National Railways than we are in any person or any number of persons, but we do contend that the chairman of the board should have had an opportunity of answering any charges that were made against him, that the charges, if there were any, should have been preferred under the statute, and he should have had an opportunity of answering them.

The minister refers to certain changes, and declares that the chairman of the board of trustees had too much power. Again I point out to him that all that is needed is an amendment of the existing act. It is not necessary to destroy the present set-up of the board of trustees, based on the recommendation of the Duff commission. The duties of the trustees might be enlarged, varied or otherwise changed by amendment of the existing statute. But that is not what the minister wants. That is not what his government wants. They simply want to wipe out this organization that was established as the result of an investigation instituted in an honest and sincere endeavour to place the Canadian National Railways on a sound basis, to put its administration above political interference; and the minister, although he has on record the warning of this commission, the finding that such practice was disastrous to the Canadian National Railways, now openly avows that he is going to return to it. That is all there is in this legislation.

Mr. HOWE: Just one word on that. There is something else this government wants. As long as this government is responsible for the Canadian National Railways and its operation it wants a management at the head that is loyal to this government. Now I can tell the hon. gentleman what he very well knows, that since this government took office the chairman of the railway has spent more time in Ottawa in the offices of members of the late government than he has in the offices of the present government.

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Railways is making a charge. At last he has come out into the open and made a charge against the chairman of the board of trustees. I know the minister has a sense of British fair play, and the chairman ought to have an opportunity of answering that before this bill passes.

Mr. BENNETT: The statement made by the minister that the chairman has been frequenting the offices of the members of the late government is not true as far as I am concerned. I have had no discussion with him, except that I just met him casually on a Sunday, and I have had no talk with him other than on that one occasion. I have not seen him, nor has he called upon me. It may interest the Minister of Railways to know that I believe he has not called on any members of the late government, and that his sole purpose so far as we could see, judging from the attitude which was taken by him, was to obtain the good opinion of the present minister.

The minister has made a very serious charge. It would not occur to hon. gentleman behind him that it was at all serious—I should not expect it would; it would be very odd if it did. But the issue is a serious one. To hon. gentlemen behind the minister I simply say, do not for a single minute think you are assisting the passage of this measure by the attitude you are adopting this afternoon. We understand what our duties are, and we propose to discharge them. It may take the rest of the summer to get to the bottom of this matter, but we shall get to the bottom of it. The minister has charged the chairman with disloyalty to the government and with frequenting the offices of members of the late administration. Of the late administration there are present the former Secretary of State, my right hon. friend Sir George Perley, the former Minister of Public Works, and myself. The former Minister of National Revenue is absent, and the minister without portfolio, and the Minister of National Defence is here to-day. Those who are present can speak for themselves.

An hon. MEMBER: Ex-ministers.

Mr. BENNETT: They can each speak for themselves so far as that is concerned. But a charge such as that should not be permitted, merely by the cheers of a tyrannous majority, to be regarded as correct. I challenge it.

An hon. MEMBER: Another Mussolini.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has said that the former Minister of Railways had reflected upon the statute and the set-up. I should like further evidence of that statement. The minister may have made observations respecting the chairman, but in common with those who sit with me I should like to know what Doctor Manion said with respect to this measure. If conversations are thus to be retailed, not in the committee where the chairman could be heard, but in the house, and therefore in his absence, and are to be treated as evidence upon which to frame policies, then I recommend that the Minister of Railways should take an elementary course in the conduct of parliamentary procedure.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I recommend to him. Judge Fullerton is to be removed from his office. He has had an honourable career at the bar. He was a judge and was highly regarded; at least the Minister of Railways has said so. He was chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. For over two years he has held the high and responsible position of chairman of the board of trustees of the Canadian National Railways. But, though it was pointed out during the debate in the committee that that would be his only opportunity to be heard, it required great effort on the part of my colleague from Leeds to secure for Judge Fullerton the opportunity of presenting his statement. It may amaze this committee to know that the former Minister of Public Works had not held any conversation with Judge Fullerton of any kind, form or description with reference to the matter, and when in the committee it was suggested that he might consult him with respect to the matter it will be recalled what the chairman said. It was because we on this side of the house believe that it is an elementary rule, under this form of government, that when a man is being removed from office by statute he should have an opportunity to be heard, that we took the course we did. The section provides:

No trustee shall be removed from office, nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was that done with regard to the federal appeal court?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Provision was made for them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They were not heard before the positions were abolished.

Mr. BENNETT: Those positions were abolished by law, but there was no such provision as this in the statute, namely "for assigned cause."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There was a definite contract for a term of years.

Mr. BENNETT: The privy council may not have known, but it said not, distinctly and positively, in the Reilly case, and they based their judgment upon one fact only, that the office had been abolished, which parliament can always do. But there was no provision such as there is here, for assigned cause. That is not a matter of form; that is a matter that comes distinctly within the provisions of the statute having to do with the appointment of judges.

The position is this, Mr. Chairman, that with much difficulty Judge Fullerton was permitted to present a statement. Then when an effort was made to examine upon it the chairman called it out of order, and the government supporters immediately raised the question as to its being in order, as the record shows. That was the issue. Surely there is an elementary rule that when the house is investigating the annual accounts and the operation of the company and the chairman is delivering his last statement, he has a right to make a statement. The minister himself says he attended upon him soon after his appointment as minister for the purpose of securing his resignation, but we are leaving all that out for the moment.

This afternoon the minister has said that this government must have a board that is loyal to the government, and that the chairman was not loyal to the government for he spent more time in Ottawa in the offices of members of the former government than in the offices of members of the present administration. I can only speak for myself, but I say he has never been in my office, as far as I know; at least I have not seen him in my office, since I have been here. I saw him once in the hotel during the time he was in Ottawa, and that is all; that, I should say, was for a few moments only. That is the position. I believe he was present at a public dinner which I attended, and I shook hands with him on that occasion. That is the only time I have seen Judge Fullerton to speak to him since the last election, at a public dinner or dinners, once or twice, and I saw him at the hotel. Those have been the only occasions. I desire to make that perfectly clear, and I am not sure that I saw him at more than one dinner. I did see him at the dinner of the Commercial Travellers' Association in Montreal, but I cannot recollect whether or not he was present at another dinner. My colleagues who are here can speak for themselves, and the hon. member for York South, who is not here, will be able to speak for himself at another time.

So far as the circulation of the statement made by Judge Fullerton is concerned, I had not the slightest idea that it was being circulated until the minister said so. I do not know what is meant by that, but presumably it is a public document and might be sent anywhere. The minister says it is being sent broadcast throughout the country. I do not know to whom or why or by whom, except that it is a report made by the chairman of the board who is being legislated out of office. as to the manner in which he has discharged his duties. That is all. I think the minister must realize that, after all, the fact that he is minister does not warrant his making attacks upon a public official when that official is not afforded an opportunity to defend himself. Then when he does attempt to present a defence he is told that he is out of order, and by every means within their power the supporters of the administration endeavour to prevent him from defending himself by making a statement. The minister makes a statement and there the matter ends; the chairman says, "This must be out of order, the bill not having been referred to this committee." That surely is not necessary to enable the operations of the system to be discussed. That is the whole purpose of setting up the committee, and certainly this was one of the most important matters to be considered, the conduct and operation of the road by the board during the period the chairman has been in office, which office, of course, he still holds.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. STEWART: I think I should be the first to assure the Minister of Railways that since the defeat of the former government I have never spoken, written to or communicated with Judge Fullerton in any way, until I saw him in the special committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. Not only that: I did not speak to him there on the matter of the investigation. Members of the committee will recall the surprise that Mr. Fullerton expressed when I suggested that he should make a statement. He said it had not been conveyed to him that he would be expected to do so, which was perfectly true. I say that I had not spoken to him before I saw him in the special committee. I do not think I have spoken to him since his appointment, certainly not since the defeat of the government. In that committee it was suggested that the method by which he should reply to the statements made by the minister in this house, which reflected on his administration, was through the press, if you please; that he should take advantage of the press to reply to the statements of the Minister of Railways which I called to his attention.

Mr. HOWE: Would you read that statement, please?

Mr. STEWART: What statement?

Mr. HOWE: The statement you say somebody made, as to replying through the press.

Mr. STEWART: I say the chairman made that statement, that he might reply through the press.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I think you had better peruse the evidence and the proceedings. You will find nothing like that said by me.

Mr. STEWART: I think it is in the records, and if I had a little time I believe I could turn it up. However, I objected to that at the time. I asked since when it was right that the head of the Canadian National Railways should have to defend himself through the press.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I think the hon. gentleman had better peruse the proceedings of the committee; I do not think he will find any word of mine that advised Judge Fullerton that his only recourse was through the public press. I never made such a statement.

Mr. STEWART: That is my recollection, and it is very clear. We will just have to take a little time to look through the records, and if I am wrong I will gladly withdraw any statements I have made. In any case that is my recollection. I do not know just who did say it, whether it was the chairman or somebody else, but as I have said, according to my recollection it was the chairman.

Well, that is the situation as far as I am concerned with the chairman of the board of trustees. As I have said, I am not interested in him personally at all; all I am interested in is the proper and efficient management of the affairs of the Canadian National Railways.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I should like to say that I never had any conversation with Mr. Fullerton since the election last fall. I saw him one day in the Rideau club, but we did nothing but pass the time of day. I shook hands with him on that occasion.

Mr. CAHAN: I can say I have not had any conversation with Mr. Fullerton since his appointment in Ottawa. I cannot recollect having a single word of conversation with him since his appointment to office. I believe on one occasion about a year ago some complaint was made to me as Secretary of State in connection with a certain widow who thought she had a claim for damages. I enclosed her letter and sent it to Judge Fullerton as the head of the Canadian National Railways, acting in a purely formal manner. Outside of that I have had no communication with him, orally or in writing. On the same day—at least I believe it was the same day—to which the right hon. member for Argenteuil referred, I came out of the dining room of the club, and nodded my head to him as he passed by, but not a word was spoken between us. I am glad that the matter has been brought up because it indicates the sort of perversion of justice which is being committed in dealing with the chairman of the board of trustees, through pure gossip.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Next, next.

Mr. STIRLING: As one of those to whom the minister has referred it is incumbent upon me to say that I have had no communications at all with Judge Fullerton. It would be more to the point if the minister would be good enough to amplify and substantiate his statement.

Paragraph 7 agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph 8—On appointment of directors, direction and control vested in board of directors.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will observe that in subparagraph 3 of paragraph 8 a substantial change is made. May I point out that subparagraph 2 of paragraph 7 creates a situation of some difficulty, and one to which the law officers of the crown might give their attention. However, in view of the observations which have been made I shall not do more than direct the attention of the minister to it.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a reenactment.

Mr. BENNETT: Part of it is, but there is some little change as between the two.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not amended.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 7 is new, eliminating that part which deals with the removal of the trustees from office. Then, subparagraph 3 of section 8 is corollary to part of section 7. It reads:

> 3. At the same time, by the same force and without more, the directors and the chairman of the board of directors shall become and be respectively the directors and the chairman of the board of directors in the place and stead of and in succession to the directors or trustees and the chairman of the board of directors or of the trustees of every other company in Canada comprised in National railways and they may and shall, thereafter, subject to the provisions of this act, have and exercise with relation to such companies, respectively, the like powers—

And so on. I think some questions might arise there. Then we come to the proviso which states:

> ... such directors shall elect from among themselves the number of directors which they are entitled to elect to the board of directors of such company.

The difference between the old act and the new to which the minister did not refer is the method to be adopted for the purpose of electing or selecting a temporary chairman in the absence of the chairman, for cause or reason. The government is carrying out its view that the governor in council shall do it. The exchequer court was to do it, under certain circumstances. The minister did not refer to that point, but he will remember it. That provision is wiped out, and it has a material bearing on other sections which follow. If, however, the principle is to be maintained as the minister suggested it, there is no point in discussing the matter beyond pointing out these differences, and whether or not it is competent to effect the purpose mentioned in paragraph 8 by the method indicated. I am not going to express an opinion upon it, but I think there is some doubt.

Paragraph 8 agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph 9—Approval of governor in council instead of shareholders.

Mr. BENNETT: Paragraph 9 makes the shareholders of the company the governor in council and the governor in council the shareholders of the company for all purposes that may require the consent of the shareholders. That is, where under any statute, including the railway act or the railway commission act, it is necessary for the consent of shareholders to be given, the governor in council acts as such shareholders. That of course is a wide extension of the powers which have heretofore been exercised in that regard. I suppose yesterday when dealing with this matter the minister intended to point out what successive ministers have pointed out, namely that here we have a system which, if it were a private one, would be in the hands of receivers. There can be no argument as to their having defaulted in payment of interest on their securities, and under those circumstances a receiver would be appointed by the courts and the lines would be operated by the receivers. It is conceivable that a possible difficulty might arise. For instance, Canadian Northern British Columbia bonds are guaranteed by the province of British Columbia. If we did not pay interest on those bonds, the province of British Columbia could not do it. The same is true with respect to Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The same is also true in connection with the Halifax and Southwestern railway in Nova Scotia. These facts have a pertinent bearing upon the whole situation. I have expressed and do now express surprise that the minister is not dealing with that phase of it. It was that which influenced the commission in support of the judgment which I read when I spoke in the debate on second reading. If this were a private enterprise it would be operated by receivers, and they would issue receivers' certificates which they would sell for the purpose of obtaining fresh capital, in the meantime not paying any interest upon the securities, but rather accumulating against the day of reorganization. Under those circumstances the trustees were appointed, and those trustees to which the minister referred yesterday, because of the financial position of the railways, occupied a very special position. To substitute directors must have the effect to which attention has so often been directed in this chamber, and which I shall not deal with at this time.

Now we come to the finding of fresh capital. The old act provided that that principle should be maintained and that the government would find fresh capital. Why? Because the property being in the condition in which it is, fresh capital must be found or it will not be found at all. For it they obtained receivers' certificates in the form of securities of the railway itself. That is, I assume the securities of the railways are being accumulated from one security payment, one promise to pay. The commission recommended that instead of issuing securities of the railways guaranteed by the government, thereafter the security should be issued by the government and the money loaned by the government to the railways. So that part of the debt that has been accumulated over the last five years, I think something like twenty per cent of the whole, is Canadian National debt. Under preceding administrations that was not so; the debt was the debt of the Canadian National, guaranteed by the country, and the securities were securities sold by the railway company. The change was for one purpose, to effect economy, and to bring home to the people the realities of the situation. It was believed by the Duff commission, and especially by those who had to do with the financial side of the railway, that if parliament had from year to year to find the money and make it a direct charge against the people themselves they would be more interested in the enterprise; the principle of the enterprise that was unable to meet its fixed charges would be maintained right through the whole administrative process, namely, trustees, capital provided by the government, not at the will of the trustees but at the will of the government, and if they did not think the case made out by the trustees was sufficient they would not, as investors would not in the case of a company in the hands of a receiver, advance the money for capital expenditures. But the deficit, and that is where the whole point comes in, would have to be paid by the people. Why? Because default in the payment of interest on a guaranteed security has the same effect upon the credit of this country as failure to pay interest on its direct obligations. That is what differentiates this whole enterprise from an ordinary enterprise that is failing to pay its fixed charges. If it were not for that, the situation would be very simple; but once we put our guarantee behind all these securities we must pay them or default, and if we default our credit is gone, alike with respect to direct and indirect obligations.

Now we have said that where the assent of the shareholders is required, and it will be recalled that for purposes of borrowing the consent of the shareholders is sometimes required to be expressed in a given way, that shall be done by the governor in council. I suppose that is the easiest and simplest way in which the matter can be done, but it involves the acceptance of a very strange principle by those who formerly so vigorously opposed such powers being conferred upon the governor in council. The real difficulty we have always had in this and other countries is to know who will represent the shareholders in a publicly owned enterprise. Yesterday the Minister of Finance was stating he had some plans in his mind as to how to select the directors. I have gone over the matter on several occasions in various ways, hoping to bring a sense of responsibility more directly home to the people, but we have not done it.

The government of the country cannot say that it represents the shareholders, because the shareholders are all the people in all the provinces, and of all shades of political opinion. It may well be that the heaviest shareholders, being those who pay the largest taxes, by reason of conditions, may not be interested in any political party at all. Under these circumstances the powers conferred are very great, but I suppose the answer the minister will give is that this is the simplest way in which to deal with it. It is always simple, I suppose; but I used to be told in this house in days gone by that to confer powers of this kind upon the executive was a departure from the well established rules of constitutional government. Be that as it may, what we are doing here is to say that wherever under the provisions of the railway act or any other statute approval by the shareholders has to be given under the law, and there are numerous cases once you take away the trustees, in all such cases "with respect to any company to which the next preceding section applies, such approval, sanction or confirmation may be given by the governor in council." That means all the subsidiaries, 139 in number, because it will be found in the letter that was signed by Mr. Liddy that the Canadian National comprises 139 companies, as stated in evidence; the Canadian Pacific conducts its own affiliated operations through approximately the same number of companies, and in the case of all these 139 subsidiaries the shareholders will find themselves in the position of votes being given by the governor in council exercising shareholders' rights, and they are not all of them companies of which we are the complete owners. But we are providing that all these affiliated companies shall be represented by the governor in council regardless of whether they have provincial or federal incorporation. I question the legality of it, to start with, and in the second place I think it is an unprecedented exercise of executive authority. It confers on the governor in council power to represent shareholders in provincial companies, whether the shareholders are in complete control of the road or not. For instance, the Central Vermont Railway is a road in which the Canadian National has a very large interest. We were told at one time we would not incur any responsibility in the rehabilitation of that system. What happened was that it issued its securities, which were put in the treasury of the Canadian National, and then this country guaranteed the bonds of the Canadian National Railway which were sold on the markets of the world and provided the money. So we have a vital interest in that system. The Canadian National, I understand, has a substantial holding in that road. The Central Vermont would probably not come within the operation of this section because it does not run into Canada, but there is a road that crosses the boundary and runs partly into Canada as a continuous line, namely, the Grand Trunk Western, which crosses via the St. Clair tunnel under the river, running on the rails of the tunnel company, the tunnel company being a separate company, with part of the tunnel in the United States and part of it in Canada. All these are matters of such importance that it is a very serious matter to declare that regardless of every other consideration the governor in council shall represent the shareholders of all these companies whenever approval has to be given, or in the language of the section:

> Whenever under the provisions of the Railway Act or any other statute or law the approval, sanction or confirmation by shareholders is required with respect to any company to which the next preceding section applies,—

That is, any one of the affiliated companies.

> —such approval, sanction or confirmation may be given by the governor in council.

This bill declares that the present officers are relieved of their duties and the new directors shall be the directors of the enterprise, and it is provided in the preceding section that:

> The National Act and all statutes, charters, letters patent and orders in council of Canada which relate to any of such companies in Canada shall, in so far as they may be inconsistent with the provisions of this section, be read in the light hereof and be construed so as to conform herewith.

Not only is this an extraordinary power, but I greatly fear it is a wholly illegal power applied to some at least of the companies in question.

Mr. HOWE: The wording of this is exactly the same as the language of the Canadian National Railway Act of 1919.

Mr. BENNETT: But there is a difference in the preceding section.

Mr. HOWE: Under the trustees no approval of the shareholders was required. In other words, the trustees acted entirely independently of the shareholders, but now we are returning the power of the shareholders, to be exercised by the governor in council, on the theory that we are not operating the road as a bankrupt concern. Whether it is or not, we are operating it as a going concern, and we believe that where the approval of the shareholders is required it can best be expressed by the governor in council, who are the elected representatives of the shareholders. This does not apply to subsidiaries within the United States. As far as subsidiaries within Canada are concerned, it will be noticed that another section incorporates them as dominion companies.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I had reference to. Read alone the preceding section might not be important, but when this section and later sections are read with it, they certainly confer wider powers than we have ever undertaken to confer in this country. Paragraph 9 reads:

> Whenever under the provisions of the Railway Act or any other statute or law the approval, sanction or confirmation by shareholders is required with respect to any company to which the next preceding section applies, such approval, sanction or confirmation may be given by the governor in council.

What we have done is to take the provincial companies and make them into federal incorporations willy-nilly. Then we have said that the new directors shall become directors of those companies willy-nilly. Then we have said that if there are more than seven, a certain method is to be followed for the purpose of selecting them. Then we say that any statute, charter, lease or whatever it may be that is inconsistent with the provisions of the section, shall be read in the light thereof and be construed so as to conform therewith. That in itself is a tremendous exercise of power. In the main, that power was conferred by the act we are amending, but in that case the trustees represented the shareholders as well as the security holders. That was the whole basis of the report made by the commission, and it was for that very reason that they went so carefully into the financial set-up of the enterprise. The minute we earn enough money to pay the interest on the securities, it is quite clear that the statute would be amended, but as long as the conditions exist to which reference has been made, there will be a situation entirely different from the one the minister contemplates.

What he now says is that they are going to treat this company as a company which is meeting the obligations of its fixed charges from year to year. Treating it as such, the governor in council becomes a shareholder, not only for the purposes of the company but for the purposes of the subsidiaries as well. That is an entirely different thing from what prevailed in the case of the trustees. They represented the shareholders. As the minister knows, in an ordinary legal proceeding receivers are officers of the court, and the trustees were officers of the high court of parliament. The shareholders have no longer anything to say when receivers are appointed, and will not have anything to say until the system is reorganized and they once more come into the authority of their position. What we are doing by this legislation is to say that the company no longer occupies that position, whereas we are to deal with legislation at this very session which indicates that we shall have to raise from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 to pay the interest upon the securities. There is a contradiction between the two. The one is logical and consistent, the other is illogical and inconsistent; the one is contradictory and the other is self-explanatory. That is the real truth about it. I direct attention to it, but I know there is no likelihood of its being changed.

Mr. CAHAN: I have sent for a copy of the act which contains as a schedule a list of the subsidiaries of the Canadian National Railways. My memory is that a number of the subsidiary companies mentioned in that schedule are provincial incorporations.

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and it seems to me that the statements that have been made during the second reading of this bill were made by hon. gentlemen opposite in an effort to show that the Canadian National Railways is not worth a cent to this country which is burdened down with debt. An effort has been made to show a conflict between the act of 1919, the act incorporating the various companies that go to make up the Canadian National system, the trustee act of 1933 and the present bill as introduced by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Howe). I desire to state as emphatically as I can that if there is connected with the Canadian National railway system any piece of road which is not paying—I refer particularly to the Canadian Northern—it was placed in the system by whom? Was it by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)? Was it by his late lamented leader, Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier? No, it was by a fellow Nova Scotian, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Laird Borden. He took over the Canadian Northern to save the Bank of Commerce. He gave them $40,000,000 for the Canadian Northern and then appointed a commission to find out the amount of the equity of redemption of Mackenzie and Mann. This royal commission found they were entitled to receive $10,000,000. At the very inception of this system the country was saddled with a piece of railway which should have been put up for sale under the hammer. This was a private corporation and it should have been sold for what it was worth to any one who desired to buy it.

The leader of the opposition referred to the Halifax and Southwestern Railway. As the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has just indicated, that railroad was built under a provincial charter. The province paid subsidies of $3,400 per mile. This railroad was taken into the Canadian National system. I cannot lay my hand upon it at the moment, but the previous government, I believe in 1932, stated that the Intercolonial Railway should consist of those roads in Nova Scotia which belonged to Mackenzie and Mann and that the Halifax and Southwestern should become part of the Intercolonial system, as it was known up to the time it was handed over under the legislation of Sir Robert Laird Borden. Under the legislation of 1919, which came into effect in 1922, the Grand Trunk in the United States and in Canada became part of the Canadian National Railway. The Intercolonial, which was owned by the government as trustees for the people and which was built as a term of confederation, as covered by section 145 of the British North America Act, was also brought into the system.

The leader of the opposition, the former Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), who came from Nova Scotia and now lives in Montreal, and other hon. gentlemen opposite, have testified that they had no relationship with Mr. Fullerton or the other directors. One by one they have come and told us that: I met him in the rotunda of the hotel and I bowed to him, but that was all. I suppose if he stays long enough they will be able to turn things over in their minds and discover whether or not he winked at them. The leader of the opposition, and the gentlemen who support him in this house are doing everything they can to frustrate the policies of this government and of the people with respect to the operation of the Canadian National system, and when you begin to raise doubts in the minds of the people that the securities that are outstanding are securities that may not be worth the paper they are written on, notwithstanding that the railways to-day are owned by the people and have the people behind them, it is just another evidence of the campaign of propaganda that started somewhere in the city of Montreal and has been pursued every week, in leaflet and in pamphlet, in reference to the management and the condition of the system. And that has been carried on—I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to refute this—for no other purpose than to hand over the Canadian National system to Sir Edward Beatty and the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Let us have a clear understanding of this matter. I speak not only as a member of this house but as one who has had some experience in the public life of the country and of his own province, and I say this afternoon that my whole life as a public man has been devoted to the best interests of the people and of their future. As I said in the house last night, I may not live long—I do not expect to—but I think it is the first duty of every hon. gentleman, including the leader of the opposition, with the power and knowledge that he possesses, to support the will of the people and to assist rather than oppose the government in the tremendous task which they have to perform with respect to our national railways. If the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier had taken over the system the responsibility would be upon this side of the house to-day; if the present Prime Minister had taken it over, the responsibility would be his. But when I look opposite I see sitting there to-day hon. gentlemen who were in this house when that legislation was passed in the days of Sir Robert Laird Borden and of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. I wonder whether my hon. friends ever stop to think that if the Canadian National system is in the condition in which it is said to be—and I do not know exactly what that condition is—the condition is due absolutely to the fact that the Conservative government of Sir Robert Borden took over the railways. And I speak of Sir Robert Borden with great respect, for he comes from my own province; indeed, I studied law in the same city with him and was often in his office in the days when I was beginning to take up the profession. It is not fair to place the responsibility upon the present Minister of Railways or upon the Prime Minister of the day.

The point I want to make quite clear is that legislation will have to be brought down—and this is a suggestion to the government made in the open—not at this session but after they have had an opportunity of looking into the matter and have obtained advice from their legal advisers, to deal satisfactorily with the Intercolonial railway, so that the Intercolonial shall remain as it was when it was completed under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, with the various branches that were built up as subsidiaries. To-day we find the Halifax and Southwestern, which belonged to the Canadian Northern and in which we put $3,400 a mile, as part of the Intercolonial railway, though it has no more right to be a part of the Intercolonial railway than I can claim to belong to the country from which Haile Selassie had to flee, seeking protection as a guest of the people of England. I say to the leader of the opposition that these are matters of great importance. The Grand Trunk Pacific was built under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and so was the Transcontinental—for what purpose? It was for the purpose of bringing the maritime provinces closer to the great centres of Canada. It was built at a time when everyone believed that the twentieth century belonged to Canada. But a great war broke out, a war in which Canada took part, in which her noble sons fought and died that civilization might continue and that we might have the liberties that we have always enjoyed under the great British constitution. Following that came the great slump of 1929, from which Canada has not yet recovered. Immigration had to stop. But such were the knowledge and the vision of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his cabinet in days gone by that if their intentions had been carried out, and if the war had not taken place, if the great depression of 1929 had not overtaken us, our Canadian west to-day would be filled and there would probably be a population of twenty or twenty-five million people in this country. Unfortunately however these vast areas in the west are not being tilled to the extent to which they might be, and ten million people have to carry the tremendous financial responsibility.

In these circumstances it seems to me hon. gentlemen opposite do not offer to the government even constructive criticism; their criticism is all destructive. They do not support the government in the task which it has to perform. I have no doubt that we all love our country; I do not believe that love of country is all on this side of the house; there is as much over there as there is here. But there seems to be some sinister motive on the outside, as evidenced in these pamphlets and in the propaganda that is being carried on and is seeping through the cracks and crevices of this chamber, to discourage the people of Canada with respect to the Canadian National Railways. The Prime Minister and his cabinet have undertaken to restore to the system a board of directors such as Sir Robert Borden provided for as the proper method of managing the railways. As the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen said in this house, there is no other system, no other management in connection with the Canadian National Railways than a board of directors; for, as he pointed out, the interests of the country are diversified and what is suitable to one section does not suit another. Therefore, in order to keep the system as far as possible out of politics, Sir Robert Borden provided for a board possessing a knowledge of the varied interests with which they were concerned, a board made up of gentlemen who understood the conditions that existed in the different parts of the country from which they came. Was Sir Robert Laird Borden wrong? Was the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen wrong? And is the only man who is right on this great question to-day the present leader of the opposition? If that is so he is at opposite points to his predecessors in office and to the very honourable gentlemen who gave this system, not as it is to-day, but largely so, to the country, to be brought to fruition through the years. I have none but the friendliest feeling towards hon. gentlemen opposite, and I think that when in their quiet moments they sit down and reflect upon their position they will realize that what was perhaps the hardest fought campaign the Conservative party ever contested in this country was lost from the beginning, that the leader of the opposition knew he was fighting a losing battle, and though he put his best foot forward, defeat perched on his banner; but on that account they need not despair; they need despair only if hon. gentlemen continue in a carping way to belittle the purposes of the present government in trying to put this Canadian National Railway system on its feet, and to refuse the support that is due to the Prime Minister, or if not to the Prime Minister, to the government, or if not to the government and the hon. gentlemen who sit on this side of the house, to the people of this country.

My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition and those associated with him represent a large number of electors. To them I say, in concluding my observations at this time, that under the trustee act as introduced by my right hon. friend in 1933 it was evident that he cared not for the rights of anybody in this country except three classes enumerated in the statute who might possibly succeed in obtaining damages by virtue of their relationship to the Canadian National Railways. But in reference to every other statute, to every other right, to everything that was sacred because it was the property of the people, that legislation was seriously defective. Why, sir, there is contained in that statute a clause to the effect that the railways may, if they so desire, tear up the tracks, cease to operate the trains, and do away with roads that the people have paid for—all subject only to the railway commission of Canada. Is that commission the last word in this country? Is it the only body that can decide these things? Is it the body that should have the right to tell the people of Canada and this parliament and this government: You have nothing in the world to do with the railways? There was placed on the statute books of this country, when my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition was Prime Minister, the clause which enabled either privately owned or publicly owned companies to tear up their tracks and stop the use of their roads for public purposes if the railway commission of Canada permitted them so to do. Are the hands of this parliament tied with reference to the matter of who should be the manager of this road? This government is taking a leaf out of the book of Sir Robert Laird Borden and the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who said that for the Canadian National Railways the directorate system was the proper one, the system best suited to the needs of this great country, extending as it does from the Atlantic to the Pacific, including nine provinces with differing aspirations, but desiring only one object, the success of this vast confederation. These distinguished men having said that the directorate system was the best, and my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition having said, in the act of 1933, that it was not, he will have to go into the house of his friends and settle that question with them, not with hon. members who sit on this side of the house and who have a direct mandate from the people to place upon the statute books a measure returning to the system of directorates, and to give a fair trial to the new administration in its endeavour to make that railway what the people of Canada desire it to be, a railway that will conduce to the prosperity of all parts of the dominion, and make happy and contented those who will come after us, if not we ourselves. In my humble opinion these are the considerations that should actuate criticism on the part of the right hon. leader of the opposition and his supporters, and which require that it should be constructive.

Midway between his assumption of office as Prime Minister and his exit from the political stage in that capacity, he placed upon the statute books in 1933 the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act. That, to use his own words, was rather telling, rather significant, and I ask him now why it was, when he was going to do away with the president and the board of directors and substitute a board of trustees, he did not do that by itself as a distinct piece of legislation rather than mix it up in a conglomeration of paragraphs that occupy many pages of the statute books, between the railway commission, the Canadian National, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk, and the Intercolonial Railway provisions. Those things are all intermixed in that statute of 1933, although it was the right and the privilege of the leader of the opposition to have remedied that state of things if in his judgment it was the proper thing to do. It should have been distinct and apart from other ramifications in reference to very many matters that have no direct relationship to the question of the board of trustees and its management of the Canadian National railway system.

Under the act of 1933, and dealing with the subparagraph of which the leader of the opposition has been speaking, I cannot for the life of me see why it was that they were so determined not only to nail their party interests to the cross, but the people of Canada also, who have to carry the financial burdens. I do not understand why they made it so hard for the present government, representatives of the people, with the largest majority ever given to any party since Canada became a confederation. The Prime Minister of to-day, then leader of the opposition, said in the city of Toronto that he wanted a verdict from the people, he wanted a clear mandate, he wanted them to understand that if he came back to office this act of 1933 must go by the board and a new system of management and control of the Canadian National Railways must come into effect. I heard his voice over the radio in the city of Halifax, when he spoke to that vast audience in Massey Hall, Toronto. Surely if he was fair enough, and, as he always has been, honourable enough, to make known to the people of this country what his policy was going to be, after it has been endorsed so unmistakably there should be no question about our putting through this measure. The people have endorsed that policy so strongly that there is not room on this side of the house for all hon. members who support the Prime Minister. Some of them have to sit on the other side and associate with the right hon. leader of the opposition; sometimes people think they belong to his party, but they do not.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I say the mandate of the people comes ahead of the statute of 1933 and it is the duty of parliament and the government to implement the pledges then given to the people of this country. That is what has been done, in bringing down this legislation and placing the control of the Canadian National Railways back in the hands of the people through a board of directors subject to the control of parliament, the representatives of the people. Surely no one can say that is not standing behind constitutional government and the very finest conceptions of democracy. President Wilson wanted to make the world safe for democracy. It seems to me that the harder the right hon. Prime Minister tried to make Canada safe for democracy the more hon. gentlemen opposite, led by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, try to remove the foundations of our democratic thought, our democratic principles, our constitutional ideas, which have been behind England's success through the years and which have built up the British empire which to-day is as free as the sun and which will remain free as long as the people live within the law and the proper authorities place that law upon the statute books in the various countries.

I make this statement, Mr. Chairman, only because I feel that the people of Canada should know that this propaganda has succeeded in getting into this very chamber. Last night my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George said there was another chamber making up this parliament, namely the senate, and we had to deal with them. I should like nothing better than to go to the people of my own constituency—and I would do it to-morrow—if the senate dared to turn down this legislation as it has been introduced in this house and as it will be passed by this house, representing the will of the people. If that is done, some day in the near future they will find that the door will be locked and they will not be able to get in. I remember that the ex-Minister of Finance, who I regret is ill, locked the door on the legislative council in the province of Nova Scotia, and said, "You have no rights or privileges. Go home and attend to your business, but keep away from here." Did they talk about indemnities, those people who were appointed for life? No, sir, they did not.

But those are not democratic ways of doing things; they are autocratic; they seem to be the ways of some hon. gentlemen who sit opposite. They are not followed by the present Prime Minister, who is simple in his love for Canada, who carries nothing but the best thoughts for everyone. If I had any criticism of the right hon. gentleman at all it would be that he is too generous, too kind. He has too broad an outlook as to the future of this country, and his main desire is to see that the policies he believes best are carried out so that the people of Canada may have at least a little time in which to go ahead and enjoy more of the prosperity that ceased when the bell rang in 1911 on reciprocity. Then we heard "no truck or trade with the Yankees," but a few years later we saw hon. gentlemen opposite, when in power, taking a different view and going off to Washington in an endeavour to negotiate a reciprocity pact. It is a good thing that ex-President Taft of the United States was not alive and in office at that time, or my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition might have been asked to withdraw the statement made by his party that they would have no truck or trade with the Yankees. He might have been told, "Take your bag home; carry it yourself. There is nothing to be put in it."

Ah, Mr. Chairman, these are the things for the public to remember. These are the things that sink deep into the hearts of men. The position taken by the Prime Minister is the sort of thing that makes for better government and for better relationship between the different parties in this house. That is not done by creating in the public mind a feeling of unrest with regard to this national railway system. We have this system; we have to deal with it, and we are going to keep it, in spite of Sir Edward Beatty's public statement in Canada and in London that, notwithstanding the parliament of Canada and the will of the people, within three years the Canadian National would be associated with the Canadian Pacific, of which he is the president. Whoever gave him the right to make that statement? He must have had someone standing nearby who gave him the impression that there was some possibility of bringing about such a thing. He has a great railway system. In the early days his company received the very best soil in our Canadian west, and the people of this country contributed large sums of money for the construction of that road. To-day they, or those they have brought to this country, are in possession of that land, and the Canadian Pacific is receiving thousands and thousands of dollars from the grants of land and as a result of the financial support given that company by the parliament of Canada in the early days of confederation. I say to Sir Edward Beatty that if he will attend to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Prime Minister, the government, this house and the people of Canada will attend to the Canadian National system. It belongs to the people, not to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

May I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is a very nice compliment to me that, when I am speaking in the interests of the people of this country, the hon. member for St.

Lawrence-St. George should leave the chamber and the right hon. leader of the opposition should cross the floor to enter into a discussion wi'h the Minister of Justice, because he cannot stand the gaff. It is a sort of left-handed compliment to the senior or junior—I don't know which I am—member for Halifax. I want to say to him that he has been handed so many left-handed compliments by the people of Canada that it does not hurt him to hand him one more. I shall close my eyes as if in oblivion to his passing from that side to this, because I believe in my heart he likes this side better than that. If there is any enjoyment in what he has done I am pleased; I am made very happy. With that I shall stop before the gong rings.

Paragraph 9 agreed to.

Mr. STEWART: May I have permission to clear up a matter about which there was some difficulty this afternoon. I now have before me the proceedings of the standing committee on railways and shipping. At page 208 I find the following:

Hon. Mr. Howe: I might say, Mr. Stewart, that the trustees have already made two annual statements. No one is preventing them from making any statement at any time or in any place they like. Why insist that they make a statement before this particular committee to which this bill has not been referred? They can make a statement in the newspapers if they want to.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I say that this is the proper place to investigate matters relating to the Canadian National Railways. The press is not the place. This committee should be the place in which to get the facts.

It was a statement by the minister, not by the chairman of the committee.

On section 3, paragraph 10—appointment of president.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is an amendment before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, there is an amendment to subparagraph 2 of paragraph 10, section 3, as follows:

That subparagraph 2 of paragraph 10 of section 3 be amended by striking out all the words after the word "council" in the third line on page 6 of the bill down to and including the word "approve" in the sixth line of the same page.

Mr. BENNETT: Why is that done?

Mr. HOWE: Paragraph 10 provides a salary for the president when he acts as chief executive officer. This was to take care of providing a salary for the chairman and president. A careful reading suggests that it might be interpreted that he was being paid two salaries, one as chief executive officer and the other as president. We find that without these words he will be sure of his salary, and for these reasons they are superfluous.

Mr. BENNETT: Speaking to the amendment and to the section I suppose the minister will agree that to no inconsiderable extent success or failure will be determined by the president of the system. The hon. gentleman will recall that it was because of difficulties in connection with that situation that this country sought a president from outside Canada. He will also recall that the London and North Eastern Railway sought and obtained a chief executive officer in the United States, in the person of the late Sir Henry Thornton. In my judgment the whole question as to the present situation of the Canadian National Railways requires immediate attention. If the minister had known, perhaps he would not have used the terms he did as to the possibility of trustees being in conference with me with respect to administration.

Mr. HOWE: I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: Because I have differed materially about some things. However, that is not the issue. There is in the Canadian National at Montreal in my judgment—and I say this with great hesitancy, and am giving my opinion—a clique—and I do not use the word in an offensive sense—that makes it impossible to accomplish certain things which must be accomplished, if the system is to succeed as it should. This section deals with that phase of the situation.

There is no use having an acquiescent president whose principal quality is his generous spirit and fairmindedness, unless you add to it a grim determination to carry through matters that may be entrusted to him for consideration.

Mr. FINN: Louder.

Mr. BENNETT: Judging from the hon. member's recent observations regarding the views of the leader of the opposition I should think it would be quite indifferent to him as to whether he heard or not. I mention that simply in passing.

Mr. FINN: I did not say that, but if my right hon. friend wants it that way, I will leave it.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister should give consideration to this matter from the angles I suggest. I am now giving him the benefit of my not inconsiderable observations and experience in the matter. Of course I would hesitate in a committee of the house to name a man, but the qualities required in an executive officer capable of discharging the duties which fall upon him are those not possessed by every man one meets. If you trust the operation of the system to an experienced railroad executive he must have knowledge of many things beyond the mere intricacies of the machine he is administering. For instance, the president of one of the great American railways is a Yale graduate whose knowledge of railroading might be less than that of a dozen men under him. But he has the qualities, vision, firmness and the ability to conceive and carry out plans of far-reaching consequence. Therefore he is highly prized by the shareholders and directors. Perhaps the minister will recall that when Mr. Harriman consolidated his great roads, he took a lawyer from Texas and made him head of his system. The quality which makes a successful operating official is not the quality which makes him a successful executive. It will be recalled that the Canadian Pacific Railway was favoured with a rare combination in the presence on the board of directors of the late Sir William Van Horne and the late Lord Shaughnessy. The two working together, one complementing the other, made a tremendous success of the administration of that property.

Mr. FINN: Were they college graduates?

Mr. BENNETT: I was not suggesting that they were graduates from anything other than the great school of experience and university of hard knocks. But since those days conditions have changed to a certain extent in connection with the administration of properties. I am not in any sense suggesting the desirability of or necessity for an appointee being a college graduate; that was not the point at all. My point was that in the realm of economics and theories we encounter conditions that are not of a practical kind, and if you entrust your fortunes ostensibly and openly to a skilled railway operator, and he commits his fortunes to the academic economist and theorist, you find yourself in a position not unlike that of the minister, himself, who found it desirable to eliminate from his speech certain sections that had been prepared for him by others who thought they knew more about the matter than he did. That is an apt illustration of what I desire to say. I have hesitated a great deal whether I should say as much as I have on this section. I have hesitated more as to whether I should not have said more because I realize perhaps to a greater degree than any other of this committee just what is involved in that section. I would like to see certain reforms effected, and I say to the minister frankly that they would have been effected along that very line whether he were in his present position or not. He will find that the same circumstances which developed, what some people call esprit de corps, in connection with the head office, but which those who know it more intimately would designate by another name, have led great railway corporations into taking most drastic action in England, the United States, and almost every country in the world, in dealing with their problems. That is the reason I have ventured to say what I have, believing the minister will recognize that I have done so only because of my deep conviction as to the necessity of there being concentrated effort, on the one hand, and firm and determined will, on the other, and a determination which will not be baulked by mere internal opposition or resistance. In giving effect to this section very great care will have to be exercised.

There is another section, Mr. Chairman, to which I might also refer without mentioning it by number, because it touches this only by way of argument. We talk of cooperation, and it will be remembered that we propose to continue cooperation between the two systems. No change has been made in that regard in this bill. We know now in the light of two years' experience the difficulties that have been encountered and the lack of really effective results.

It will be recalled that the report of the managers indicated a saving amounting to $1,000,000 in one year, which is a substantial sum of money, and a little less, I think, in another year. That is excellent, but we know, and the late government knew, the continued discussions, the continued negotiations, the continued meetings which were held, extending over weeks and months until finally the year came and went, and that was all. The minister must know by this time that for the last two years that has been going on, but there never was during all that time any suggestion that the arbitral tribunal should act. When I say suggestion, there may have been suggestions in discussion. I will put it in another way. There never was an appeal to the arbitral tribunal appointed under the act. Now the whole theory of the Duff report was that cooperation might bring a measure of success to both properties in which the country had a deep and abiding interest, owning the one and having a great stake in the other, not a financial stake in the same sense as it has in the Canadian National, but a national stake in the success of the other road. We know that these negotiations failed of result in the large sense that the Duff commission had in mind.

I put to the minister this: Does he think we ever can get anywhere with negotiations being carried on by representatives of the roads if in the midst of the meeting someone says: I must refer that to Ottawa? And then the minister becomes an absent negotiator, for he is not sitting at the table; he is having someone there representing his views. That was not the intention. The whole purpose was to try to create in this country as much as possible an independent body that would deal with another independent body subject to the restrictions imposed upon them by the statute. Responsibility must be accepted, and decisiveness must be evidenced by action. That has been the difficulty, and the minister knows that as well as I.

Mr. HOWE: I do not quite understand the reference to cooperative efforts being referred to Ottawa. They have not been while I have been Minister of Railways.

Mr. BENNETT: The officials of the railways have been meeting together since October. I am advised that they have not ceased to meet.

Mr. HOWE: But the cooperative efforts have not been referred to Ottawa.

Mr. BENNETT: But the negotiations never reached finality. That is my point, and the reason given in one case why finality is not reached is: Oh, well, I cannot go any further in that matter; I shall have to see what Ottawa thinks.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is not what Judge Fullerton says in his report. If I may be permitted, he said that the cooperating board of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway was composed of officials of the railways, and that they were more scared of competition than concerned with the public interest.

Mr. BENNETT: But they were representatives of the railways, and the difficulty is that as representatives of the national railways, on the one hand they were thinking, as the hon. gentleman has said, in terms of fear of their competitors overreaching them, which is always a dangerous way of approach in negotiations, and, on the other they were wondering what the government thinks or will think of this. If one can get out of his mind that it is necessary to wonder what the government thinks or does not think, then one can begin to deal effectively in matters of administration, and can get results. That is the reason I make the suggestion. We had some experience two years ago, and one of the reasons I deprecate changes being made in this way is that I had hoped there might be an improvement which would warrant the expectations that were entertained by the members of the Duff commission, and it is too bad in that sense that you have the termination of an arrangement which gave some hopeful signs of success. That is as far as I shall go. While those efforts have not been ended but are being continued under this legislation, the effect of this legislation is to leave them in an entirely different position from what they were under the former act, and my only suggestion to the minister is to make it clear to whoever is appointed under this section that there must be a sense of decisiveness, of reality and of finality that will make possible the attainment of results, instead of merely the continuation of negotiations over months reaching into years on matters which might have been quickly disposed of.

I shall give an illustration, and as it is a reflection upon the late government it cannot be said to be political. The representatives of the two companies met together and dealt with two problems, one express, and the other telegraphs, and they made recommendations. They had not concluded their final determination of the issues raised when they thought it desirable that legislation should be enacted of a permissive nature, only permissive, not representing an accomplished fact, but that would be available in the event of conclusions being reached. What happened? The government had courage enough to put the measure on the order paper, but that is as far as it ever went, and if the hon. gentleman seeks the reason all he needs to do, in the words on the monument to Sir Christopher Wren, is to look about him. He will look behind and in front, but however determined he may be he will not be able to carry his views into effect. In the essence, government is compromise; it is the surrender of your views to the views entertained by your colleagues. For instance, however strong my views may have been, those views could not prevail. It is idle to say that it is possible for the arbitrary will of any one man to be decisive with respect to matters over which he has no jurisdiction and which he must discuss with his colleagues and arrive at a middle course. The result was that the notice which appeared on the order paper never went any further. If the hon. gentleman is desirous of knowing how those who now sit about him felt about the matter, he will have no difficulty in ascertaining that. It was at once the subject of correspondence and public attacks and propaganda in the press in connection with loss of employment, whereas we were assured that that would not follow.

The matter was never completed, but I say to the minister that he will have to deal with it in the next few months. Therefore, it becomes of great importance that this section should be carried into effect in such a manner as will ensure the realization of the hopes of those who know, as I do, that in all these matters there is the personal equation which in the end determines to no inconsiderable extent the success or failure of your effort. You may have the highest minded industrialists in Canada sitting on your board, but in the end the success of this venture, as it is now provided for by this legislation, will depend upon the one or two or three entrusted with the power and authority to carry these views into effect. If the minister is to have in this venture the part that is contemplated by this legislation, I can only suggest to him the desirability of exercising the greatest care when the governor in council gives approval to some of the appointments that must be made.

I suggest to him, in all good will, that he will find that there has grown up in this corporation a situation not unlike that which has been known to exist in other great corporations. This is not unlike the so-called family compact, although it has nothing to do with family except as it is concerned with the law of self-preservation. I am suggesting to him what is known to every man who carefully observes and is willing to express an opinion. When the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) was discussing this matter—

Mr. FINN: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not necessary to say "hear, hear"; that is quite apparent; it is "there, there," that I am thinking of. When the hon. member suggests that we are merely critical, I assure the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, that we have been something more than merely critical. I am grimly opposed—"grimly" is the right word—to the methods that have been adopted to accomplish the ends which the minister admits are aimed at. However, if we leave that out, the rest of the matter becomes a question of experience and observation, and of suggestion in the light of that experience and observation. He would be a very poor man indeed who had occupied any position in the public life of this country during the last four or five years, who could not make some suggestions that would be of value to those who have succeeded him. The suggestions might not be, and probably would not be, well received, but, on the other hand, the duty rests upon us to make suggestions, whether they are well received or not.

[Mr. Bennett.]

In all sincerity, and in the light of my own observations and experience, I say to the minister that there is a situation existing which I had made up my mind, and which I am sure he with his technical and professional experience will make up his mind, should be cured. This can be cured only in a manner that will be as ruthless as it will be efficient. When I say "ruthless," I mean that there must be no consideration of sentiment or of past services or of pleasing personalities; these factors must not stand in the way of the public interest. When I say "as ruthless as it will be efficient," I mean just what I say. When that power is exercised the efficiency will be increased many fold. I am not unmindful of the fact that the observations which I make will be misconstrued. That is not a matter of great importance to me because they are not difficult of understanding by those who wish to understand.

I do say—it has never been more apparent than just recently—that a condition exists which some would call intrigue, and which others would call something else. Stripped of everything, it is a combination of interests that aims to accomplish certain purposes. Despite what may be said, the fact is that the investigation which took place some years ago in the United States in connection with the transportation systems, and the investigation that took place in connection with the insurance companies, would make one realize how easy it is, even in this country, for efficiency to be restricted and lessened, not by conspiracy, far from it, but by those friendly understandings which are based upon a mutual desire to assist and are bottomed sometimes upon generous instincts of the human mind, which, nevertheless, in the end, operate very seriously against the success of the enterprise.

I say what I have to say on this section because I am greatly concerned with the whole situation. My experience and my observations lead me to make the remarks I have made. Possibly some members of the committee may think I should be more exact, but I prefer not to mention names. I leave it to the minister himself and to those who will be associated with him to ascertain just what reforms are necessary for the purpose of effecting the success of the operation of the undertaking in question.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has pointed out a situation of which we are all aware. I may say that I agree with a great many of the things he has said, as I usually do when he adopts his more constructive line. The new set-up will stand or fall on the appointment of the chairman or, if the office is divided, on the appointment of the chairman and the president. We have left ourselves some latitude, as my right hon. friend will see; we can combine or divide the office. I assure him that every effort will be made to get the sort of head who will do whatever is needed to bring about definite results in the higher circles of the railway. He is quite right when he says that recourse has not been had to the arbitration section, but we are reenacting it and I venture to suggest that within a few months we may call upon it.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct attention to a misprint at the end of line 13 on page 6.

The CHAIRMAN: What paragraph is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Subparagraph 3 of paragraph 10, on page 6, line 12. The word "comprised" is misspelled.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. FINN: I wish to say just one word in reply to the leader of the opposition. We must all remember one thing. He says that there has been a lack of cooperation between the two systems, as provided for in the act, but I would call his attention to this fact. In my own province we are struggling to live. In the old days the Dominion and Atlantic Railway was owned in England and was operated by Mr. Campbell and later by Mr. Gifkins. One day it became the property of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. First, they had it declared to be a road for the general advantage of Canada and then they purchased it, or at least they secured a majority of the common stock, which gave them control. They came down and rented at a high rate to the Dominion and Atlantic Railway cars that were as old-fashioned as the chariots in which Caesar rode in Rome. Canadian Pacific officials came down later on, when these cars were still there, took off the letters "D.A.R." and substituted "C.P.R.," and they ripped off the "D.A.R." buttons from the coats of the officials and put on "C.P.R." buttons. They also changed the stationery. That was the first evidence of good will to the people of Nova Scotia. I am not complaining particularly of that, but what happened? It was the beginning of a movement to destroy the esprit de corps of which the leader of the opposition has spoken this afternoon. To make matters worse they removed the auditing branch from Nova Scotia to Montreal, throwing people out of work in our province.

> No more, there is no more
> To live for now.
> My king is false,
> My hope betrayed;
> My father, O! the worth,
> The gloriousness and the loveliness
> Has passed away from earth.

Then they issued an order that all car repairs were to be made in Montreal, the engines to be taken out of Nova Scotia to that city for overhauling, so that by degrees they closed the machine shops in Nova Scotia, there being but a limited number of men there to-day. But did they stop there? No. There is a rumour, which I believe to be true, that the general manager of the line is to be retired on pension and that the operation of that railway is to be from Montreal and not in Nova Scotia. By degrees they have sucked the very life-blood of that little line in my province in order to bolster up their assets, taking the property of the "D.A.R.", as it is called, and making it a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway so as to make a favourable annual statement. Not only that; I believe it is the intention to have merely a sort of superintendent and to have the "D.A.R." go through that lovely land of Evangeline from Halifax to Yarmouth. We are inviting tourists to our province though the hearts of our people are heavy, for these people have been thrown out of employment in order that the work they were doing should now be carried on in Montreal. In this respect the little province of Nova Scotia, the province next to New Brunswick in which my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition was born, is being discriminated against. Can we have any prosperity under these conditions, far removed as we are from the centre of things, with a high tariff wall against us in the United States, though it is true that wall has been somewhat lowered? With proper transportation facilities we might have gone into the New England market, but we have been cut off by a high tariff wall, and the general freight structure has operated against us, with the result that our industrial activities have been dwindling. It is fortunate that we have had some men—perhaps I may be pardoned if I say that I am one of them—who have been instrumental in saving one or two industries in the province, including the Acadia Sugar Refinery, which gives employment to some 400 people. In all, about 2,500 people would have been seriously affected if the rates had not been fixed so as to permit this industry to operate.

Sir Edward Beatty may be a graduate of McGill; he may be a man of high social standing; he may be the essence and indeed the quintessence of higher society in this country. But I want to say to my right hon. friend that if that ruthlessness to which he has referred is to be applied in the same way to the man who takes his cocktail in the club as to the man who wears overalls, then it is all right. Otherwise it is wrong, and the people of Canada will ever remember the statement the right hon. gentleman made in the house this afternoon in that regard. Sir Edward Beatty sent down the late Mr. Grant Hall, the vice-president, to a meeting of the Eastern Steamship company, putting Canadian money into an American concern. The steamers Prince Arthur, Prince George and Prince Edward, built by the Dominion and Atlantic Railway, had proved satisfactory on the route between Yarmouth and Boston, but what did Sir Edward Beatty do? He entered into an arrangement with this American concern, the Eastern Steamship company, with the result that on that trade route on which ships flying the British flag had operated, and on which Nova Scotians had been engaged, from captains down to sailors, the Eastern Steamship company took over the business at the instance of Sir Edward Beatty and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he is out of order and I would ask him to confine his remarks to clause 3, paragraph 10.

Mr. FINN: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I would point this out. The leader of the opposition dealt with the question of cooperation, urging that in order to secure the necessary esprit de corps and fairness, even ruthless methods should be resorted to. Surely if he could elaborate on that I have a right to point out that the very essence of that cooperation is lacking as between that part of our transportation system owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the part owned by the people. I am arguing that the rights and privileges of the people of Nova Scotia in this connection should not be handed over to the people to the south of us. I am sure that, upon reflection, the chairman will realize that I do not desire to transgress the rules. Although I will bow to his ruling, I do not believe I am without the rule; I believe I am within it. Perhaps I may be permitted to continue hewing close to the line, in the direction I am going. I shall be through in five minutes, and there will be no more "Order," and, I hope, no more disorder.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the hon. member finished?

Mr. FINN: No. The Chairman evidently did not hear me; I am sorry. I do not want to repeat my remarks, but I should like to know whether the chairman heard what I said; if he did, whether or not there was a transgression of the rule on the part of the right hon. leader of the opposition, and if there was, and he was allowed to go ahead, why I am to suffer. I am prepared to do so, but I should like to know the reason why.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not hear all the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax, but I did hear him say that he would finish in five minutes, and if so, I am quite in accord.

Mr. FINN: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, it will take me only five minutes; when I return to that little province by the sea it will be known that I have been permitted to go on if I shall confine my remarks to five minutes, and they will see the hard-heartedness of this chairman and his strict administration and interpretation of the rules as applied to one of the members for Halifax as against the right hon. leader of the opposition. My only object in desiring to be heard is that some benefits may come to the people of a province that I love, as I love also the rest of Canada, and want to see all the dominion develop equally, so that we shall not lag so far behind. It was in reference to that I was speaking of the Yarmouth Steamship Company, started by a Nova Scotian, L. E. Baker, who put everything he had into it, desiring its development and prosperity, and who died practically without anything. Then came the Dominion Atlantic Railway Steamship Company, then the Canadian Pacific Railway control and management; then followed the disappearance of the Dominion Atlantic Railway Steamship Company and the arrival of the Eastern Steampship company's boats, the Evangeline, the Yarmouth, the Acadia, and the Saint John, four boats, with a bonus of forty per cent by the American government, a sixty per cent loan on which they have not paid interest, and a subsidy of $500,000 for carrying the mails in the winter across the Bay of Fundy.

The word from Washington under the late President Hoover was that the coastal trade of the United States must be built up, and they built it up with the resources of 130 millions of people. Our relationships with the people of that country are splendid, but if things are to be done in that way we in the province of Nova Scotia might as well know it, and the sooner the message of sudden death is pronounced the more quickly we shall realize our position. The statements I make cannot be controverted. To-day the Eastern Steamship company, at the solicitation of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who are owners of stock in the American company, are running between Boston and Yarmouth. What has been the result? Our captains, chief officers and second officers, born in Nova Scotia, took up residence in Boston, became American citizens, took their examinations, became masters and mates under the American flag, and returned on the bridge and on the deck of those ships to Yarmouth, leaving Yarmouth as Nova Scotians and coming back as aliens. Is this the evidence of the policy of cooperation of which the leader of the opposition speaks? I bring this to his attention. Are Sir Edward Beatty, the Canadian Pacific Railway and its management, the brains behind this? The right hon. gentleman differentiates between Lord Shaughnessy and Sir William Van Horne, and Mr. Beatty because times are different. Times may change, but hearts and minds do not, and I state to my right hon. friend that, while I want to see this road a success, I desire also to see placed in charge men who have hearts as well as minds, and that the man who wears the overalls shall not be ruthlessly removed while those in the higher-up sections of their company are continued in office. How is it possible for us in Nova Scotia to have faith in Sir Edward Beatty and his management? I should like to ask the right hon. leader of the opposition the question: Is he in agreement with Sir Edward Beatty in the handing over of that trade route between Yarmouth and Boston to the Eastern Steamship company and the American flag and making Americans of Nova Scotians? Is he in favour of that or is he not? I await his answer.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member will keep on waiting.

Mr. FINN: Ah, yes. And that is the reason the people are going to keep him waiting where he is, even if he remains there. I am glad I have accomplished my purpose. My five minutes may not be up, but I have had an answer that will go out to the people. Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your indulgence.

Mr. BENNETT: The observation I made as to ruthless action creating efficiency had reference to the head office of the railway. That is where, I said, it would have to be exercised—and not with the frills which the hon. member has added. He is a past master at that sort of thing. I take this opportunity to state that I made it clear that I meant the head office, and I have nothing to retract in that regard.

Mr. FINN: All I say, Mr. Chairman, is that the answer speaks for itself.

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver) agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph 11—Meetings.

Mr. BENNETT: As we deal with that I have only this to say. To provide that a mere four of seven directors can sign a minute, without any provision that it shall be incorporated in the minutes of the corporation, is unsound. The original section in the old act was not as full as it should have been; I saw that when, unfortunately, it was too late. There should be a provision that a minute which is unanimously agreed upon, as evidenced by the writing of all the members who are expressing their acquiescence, should be incorporated in the minute book of the corporation. That is a matter which experience has shown to be highly desirable. I think the section should be amended in that regard. The minister can speak to the leader of the senate with respect to the matter. To leave it as it is now is rather a dangerous procedure. There is nothing, as the minister sees, that contemplates a minute thus arrived at finding its place in the minute book of the corporation, and with his experience of companies he knows, perhaps, that the court of appeal in England decided many years ago that although a director might be in the room and two others just outside, and a quorum present, they were not present unless they were in the same room. This is in derogation of the common law provision; it provides that a minute signed by all shall have the same force and effect as though it were passed at a meeting, but there is nothing to provide that it shall be entered in the minute book as part of the proceedings of the corporation. Perhaps this paragraph might stand and the minister can speak to his leader in the senate who has the bill in charge there. I have no desire to hold up this paragraph, but certainly as it stands now it is not very satisfactory.

Mr. HOWE: I will see that this is gone into.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph 12—Annual budget.

Mr. BENNETT: This has to do with the budget, and I have before me a notation as to a suggestion I should like to make. I assume that the minister is anxious to get this bill to the other house, but this paragraph provides that the budget shall be submitted to the Minister of Transport, while the next paragraph provides that the annual report shall be submitted to parliament also through the Minister of Transport. The minister will perhaps recall that as the law now stands the budget has to be submitted to the Minister of Finance, and with all deference I suggest to the minister who is in charge of the bill that the Minister of Finance is the person to whom the budget should go, for he is responsible for finding the money. There was some discussion about this matter when the other bill was under consideration, and the general view was that the Minister of Finance as distinguished from the Minister of Railways should receive the budget for the purpose of submitting it to his colleagues in council. He must consider it first of all from the standpoint of his ability to raise the money required by the railway company. I do not know whether or not there is any reason behind this change, but I suggest that it would be better to retain the supremacy of the Minister of Finance over the budget as it reaches council. It is only a question of how it shall reach council, whether through the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Transport, but I submit that the Minister of Finance would be the proper person. That is what we have in the old act, and perhaps this change was made inadvertently. I do not think it serves any useful purpose.

Mr. HOWE: The change was made quite deliberately, as a matter of fact. The difficulty is that in everything else the trustees write to the Minister of Railways, whereas in this case they write to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance immediately has to write to the Minister of Railways, asking him to please check the budget and return it.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. HOWE: That is what happens in practice. This year we went into the budget exhaustively in our office before we returned it to the Minister of Finance, and we thought the channel for all communications between the government and the railway should be the Minister of Transport, fully understanding that the Minister of Finance would have to pass the budget and deal with the matter before council.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. CAHAN: If I might revert for a moment to paragraph 11, all that would have to be done would be to add the following words, "and entered in the minute book of the board." It would then read:

> The board of directors or a majority thereof may without meeting decide or act by way of a written minute or concurrence signed by the directors or a majority of them and entered in the minute book of the board.

I think it would be far better to make an amendment such as that.

Mr. BENNETT: I was against this being done by a majority of the members of the board, because three of them might not know what was going on.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to look into the matter. It is practically six o'clock now, and I am afraid we shall hardly finish this bill by that time, so after dinner I shall bring in an amendment to that paragraph.

Mr. BENNETT: May I point out what I have just said to my colleague. I think it highly undesirable that a minute of that kind, signed by a majority and never communicated to the minority, should have the force of a binding minute, because the other three members might never have heard of it. In practice my view has been that a minute signed by all the directors should have the force of a minute passed by the majority and entered in the minute book. If the minute is signed by all of them—one might be in Saskatoon, another in Halifax and a third somewhere else; sometimes you telegraph the substance of the minute to them and they telegraph their consent before it is signed—it should have the force of a minute, but as the paragraph reads, it is provided that a majority may sign that minute and give it the power and authority of a minute passed at a meeting held by the directors where the pros and cons could be considered. As the paragraph now reads, only four need sign and the other three might know nothing about the minute. They might have great opposition to it, such opposition as might prevent its being passed if the meeting were held. That is the point I was endeavouring to make.

Mr. HOWE: I shall consider that.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROPOSED APPLICATION OF PROVISIONS TO OATS, BARLEY, RYE AND FLAX PRODUCED IN WESTERN PROVINCES

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Perley (Qu'Appelle):—That, in the opinion of this house, the provisions of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, should forthwith be made applicable to oats, barley, rye and flax produced in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I should like to have order No. 44 on the order paper withdrawn or struck out.

Mr. SPEAKER: By consent of the house order No. 44 in the name of Mr. Perley (Qu'Appelle) will be withdrawn.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR ADMINISTRATION BY BOARD OF DIRECTORS APPOINTED BY GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933—Mr. Howe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Paragraph 12 agreed to.

Paragraph 13 agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph 11.—Meetings.

Mr. STIRLING: Did the minister give consideration to the point raised by the leader of the opposition?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): Yes; I had hoped the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George would be in their seats. I believe we have found the solution to the objection raised to paragraph 11. I propose to ask my colleague to move this amendment:

That clause 3 be amended by adding after "them" in line 42, page 6, the following:

"A note of such written minute or concurrence shall, at the first meeting thereafter of the board of directors, be entered in the minute book of the board, provided that a majority decision or action by way of a written minute or concurrence shall not be valid unless or until all directors have had notice of the subject matter thereof."

Mr. DUNNING: I so move.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to allow paragraph 11 to stand for a few minutes.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be very glad to. Possibly that would be the best solution of the matter.

Paragraph 11 stands.

Paragraphs 14 and 15 agreed to.

Section 3 stands.

On section 4—Duty of C.N.R. and C.P.R. to meet by their proper officers and endeavour to arrange for cooperation.

Mr. HEAPS: On this clause I should like to move an addition. Yesterday I indicated that I would move an amendment to clause 4 in connection with the pay of employees dismissed from the service as a result of cooperation between the two railways. At that time the suggestion was made that this was the proper point at which to move the amendment. I made the statement yesterday that in 1933 the main purpose behind the measure was to provide a certain amount of cooperation between the two railways, and I stated that this bill is a further step in the same direction. When the minister spoke upon introducing the amendments to the 1933 legislation he claimed that one of the reasons for the changes set out in the present bill was that there were not sufficient cooperative measures instituted between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. When I made that statement yesterday the minister said that I had misquoted him, and as a result of his observations I withdrew my statement. These are the words I used:

The act of 1933 was an act to provide for cooperation between the two railways, and if I remember aright—and I hope the minister will tell me if I am wrong—when he introduced the present bill he said that one of the reasons for the changes proposed was that there had not been sufficient cooperation between the two railways.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member asked me to correct him if he were wrong, and I shall be glad to do so. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. Heaps: Then I apologize to the minister.

Then I did apologize. May I proceed to quote what the Minister of Railways said. Upon introducing the bill on April 27, he is reported at page 2178 of Hansard as follows:

To date they have failed to achieve any substantial cooperative economies, to secure which was the principal object of their appointment and the outstanding feature of the 1933 legislation. Not only have they failed to secure any substantial results to date, but on their own published statements, the prospect of future results from cooperative measures, plans and arrangements is not bright.

Then, as reported on the following page, he made this statement:

Two annual reports from the Canadian National trustees, but one continuous recitation of apologies for lack of success in applying the cooperative provisions of the 1933 act under which they were appointed.

I take it that in itself is sufficient indication of the purposes underlying the introduction of the present measure. While I withdrew any statement I made with regard to the minister, after he denied having made such observations, I somehow feel that my withdrawal of the statement I made in committee yesterday was not entirely warranted.

I made the claim yesterday that employees of the railways find themselves in a different position from that enjoyed by men working for private companies, when such companies voluntarily arrange to amalgamate and thereby save expenses by way of reduction in either labour or overhead. In the present instance we have a government owned utility. We have another utility which is under government regulation. Now we bring in legislation compelling the two railway companies to do certain things. One thing we compel them to do is to cooperate their services and thereby bring about certain economies in costs of operation. It has been stated often that the large amount of economies to be effected as a result of cooperation of the services will be at the expense of those who are employed on the railways. In other words, the working men will be the main sufferers as a result of the legislation. May I quote what Mr. Justice Fullerton said to the committee on Tuesday:

Perhaps the greatest difficulty in the way of expediting further extensive economies concerns labour. To reduce expenses on any large scale men must be displaced, and if serious hardship and unrest are to be avoided, some form of dismissal pay or compensation should be considered. It is my personal view that a great deal more progress might be made in cooperative measures for economy, as well as in other economy measures, if some plan for employee dismissal compensation were worked out, and adopted. I believe it to be a fact that the officials of the railroad, contemplating changes designed to secure economy but which involve putting men out of work with little hope of reemployment,—

I want that to be borne in mind by the members of this committee, that there is little hope of reemployment.

—are influenced by humanitarian feelings, and naturally the men resist all such measures to the limit. It does not seem unreasonable to urge that part of the advantage to the employers should be shared with labour, rather than that the whole burden should be borne by labour. The Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act requires that both the burden and the advantage should be shared by the two companies. It seems to have been overlooked that the joint advantage can be secured only by transferring the burden to labour. A more equitable arrangement with labour appear to be required and should be provided. If this were done, one great preliminary step towards the accomplishment of any radical changes which might displace labour would be made.

[Mr. Heaps.]

A little further down, on the same page, Mr. Justice Fullerton said:

Nevertheless, I am convinced that the greatest obstacle to cooperative measures is consideration for the men who would be displaced by their adoption. An agreement has been reached between the railway executives and organized labour in the United States providing for the payment of a measure of compensation to employees thrown out of work by consolidation of railway facilities, and I understand that the British railways also made some provision for employes displaced as a result of the amalgamation of British railways into four systems.

I have reached the conclusion that the government, the railways, and the representatives of railway labour—

May I point out to the minister that Mr. Justice Fullerton, chairman of the board of trustees, places a responsibility here upon the government as well as upon the railway companies.

—should discuss this matter together with a view to the adoption of some arrangement for the two Canadian railroads as will afford reasonable protection against hardship on the part of these employees who, after long years of service, may be displaced by the adoption of cooperative methods.

May I point out the anomalous position in which the railways of this country and their employees might find themselves? Both the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway have large interests in the United States. The Canadian National Railways own quite a valuable piece of railway, I understand, between Detroit and Chicago, and they have also large interests in the Central Vermont railway, which was referred to this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). The Canadian Pacific Railway have also interests in railway lines in the United States. Yet, Mr. Chairman, the employees in the United States of these two railways, if cooperative measures are adopted there, will become the beneficiaries of certain agreements arrived at with the railway companies while the employees in this country of these two roads will not be eligible for the same benefits. I think that is most unfair. I noticed the other day when the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr.

Mackenzie King) introduced a measure for the amalgamation of various departments, he stated that there would be no dismissals of employees in the various services of the government; in other words, the employees were to be protected. I am simply asking this committee to give in this legislation the same consideration to the employees of both the government owned road and the privately owned road. I think that is not an unfair request to make. In the United States the railway companies and their employees have arrived at a basis of understanding by which dismissal pay is going to be given to the men who will be displaced as a result of the amalgamation of services. Why cannot we do the same thing in this country? If the government are not willing to introduce legislation along that line, at least let them take the same stand that has been taken in the United States.

I do not have to go into the whole question why men are entitled to compensation upon being dismissed after long years of service on behalf of the railways because that question has been gone into in years gone by, and even during this session it has been spoken to by many members on both sides of the house. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am going to move that the following be added to section 4 on page 8 of Bill No. 21 now before us:

An employee of the railway companies affected by this act who as a result of cooperation of services between the railways loses his or her employment shall be entitled to compensation, and the amount of such compensation shall be determined by a board of three to be appointed, one by the employees, one by the railways, and a third who shall be chairman of the board to be selected by the two representatives already appointed.

In the event of failure to select a third member of the board, such appointment shall be made by the Minister of Labour.

The funds for such compensation awards and expenses in connection therewith shall be derived from a levy on the gross receipts of the two railways, and the award of the board shall in all cases be final.

I know that I may be met with some difficulties from the Chair. I anticipate that, for I remember that when I moved an almost identical motion in 1933, different only in phraseology, the point was raised that the amendment was out of order, and the Chair ruled my motion out of order on grounds that I could not understand. I was extremely honoured, however, to have on my side at that time members of the Liberal party who were then in the house, supporting my contention that the motion was perfectly in order. I hope they will be just as anxious to support this present motion of mine as they were in 1933. I know they do not sit on the same side of the house now, and a great deal depends upon which side of the Speaker one sits as to the viewpoint one will take on particular questions. But the point I want to emphasize in arguing that this amendment is perfectly in order is the fact that its final clause provides that:

The funds for such compensation awards and expenses in connection therewith shall be derived from a levy on the gross receipts of the two railways, and the award of the board shall in all cases be final.

In other words, it is a fund which is to be created by the two railways themselves, and is not money which is voted by parliament out of taxation raised in the dominion. Under those circumstances I think the amendment is perfectly in order. But, assuming for the sake of argument that a private member is not allowed to move such an amendment, and I have a very strong suspicion, Mr. Chairman, which way your ruling is going to be—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: That is perfectly in order. I have an intelligent anticipation of the chairman's ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You know you are wrong.

Mr. HEAPS: I say that if a private member cannot move such an amendment the government should be prepared to adopt it in principle and bring down an amendment accordingly, because the fundamental principle underlying this amendment cannot be ignored or swept to one side on the ground that through some technicality it is out of order. When this parliament by the legislation it is enacting is making itself responsible, either directly or indirectly, for the displacement of large numbers of men at present employed, I think the least we can do is to make provision for these men for whose position we shall be in some degree responsible, and therefore, Mr. Chairman, I now move the amendment which I have put into your hands.

The CHAIRMAN: I am in the judgment of the committee, but I think in order to keep the record clear we should deal first with the amendment to paragraph 11. It has been moved by Mr. Dunning:

That clause 3 be amended by adding after "them" in line 42, page 6, the following:

"A note of such written minute or concurrence shall, at the first meeting thereafter of the board of directors, be entered in the minute book of the board, provided that a majority decision or action by way of a written minute or concurrence shall not be valid unless or until all directors have had notice of the subject matter thereof."

Mr. BENNETT: In a general way that meets with the views which I suggested to the committee just before we rose at six o'clock, although I would have used a little different language. But that is not a matter of importance as I think the idea is adequately expressed. The point is this—and I think the minister will at once realize the effect of it—that a unanimous minute signed by all without discussion or meeting shall be regarded as the equivalent of a majority decision after discussion at a meeting of the board. I think that is a salutary and sound rule in view of the decisions that there is no valid meeting of the board called to consider a subject matter unless the members are present in the room. That is, you cannot have one member in one room, another in another room and then say that they were both present and that a decision was arrived at after discussion. Unanimity would seem to be desirable, but that was not the purpose the minister had in mind in drafting the amendment. He contemplates the possibility of a majority decision and it seems to me that he has safeguarded the matter by saying that notice of the subject matter shall be given to all directors. If one or two directors telegraphed and said that they were opposed to a certain matter, it is not probable that the other directors would sign a minute unless there was a formal meeting with discussion.

Amendment (Mr. Dunning) agreed to.

Paragraph 11 as amended agreed to.

Section 3 as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Duty of C.N.R. and C.P.R. to meet by their proper officers and endeavour to arrange for cooperation.

The CHAIRMAN: On this section, the following amendment is moved by Mr. Heaps:

> Any employee of the railway companies affected by this act who as a result of cooperation of services between the railways loses his or her employment shall be entitled to compensation, and the amount of such compensation shall be determined by a board of three to be appointed; one by the employees, one by the railways, and a third who shall be chairman of the board to be selected by the two representatives already appointed.
>
> In the event of failure to select a third member of the board, such appointment shall be made by the Minister of Labour.
>
> The funds for such compensation awards and expenses in connection therewith shall be derived from a levy on the gross receipts of the two railways and the award of the board shall in all cases be final.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to point out that practically the same amendment was moved by the hon. member on April 7, 1933. At that time a point of order was raised by the then Minister of Railways, Mr. Manion. I spoke on the point of order as follows:

> Speaking to the point of order, as this bill removes entirely from parliament the control of the expenditures of the Canadian National Railways, I do not think the point of order is well taken, because the levy proposed is upon an industry which by the terms of this legislation is no longer within the purview of the minister or of parliament. If it were otherwise, the point of order raised by the minister would be well taken.

I submit that under the legislation now before the committee, all the revenues of the Canadian National Railways will be under the control of the minister and of parliament, and therefore the point of order raised on April 7, 1933, by the former Minister of Railways and Canals would be quite valid with reference to this amendment. The hon. member moved a further amendment on May 9 of that year, and another amendment was moved on May 9 by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The latter amendment was ruled out of order by the Speaker. The hon. member's amendment read:

> That the said bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that the following clause be inserted:
> "That the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railway Company shall provide compensation to those whose services will be dispensed with as a result of the operation of any of the provisions of this act."

This amendment was ruled out of order, which ruling was sustained on division. On three separate occasions during the debate of 1933 the same point of order was raised and was sustained each time by the house. While I do not believe that the fears of my hon. friend have any justification, he knows as well as I do that it is not within the purview of a private member to move such an amendment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order. I think the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) is stretching the point considerably when he ventures to say that under this proposed set-up all the expenditures of the Canadian National Railways will be under the control of this parliament. As a matter of fact, I do not think anyone could argue that seriously. It is quite true that under this legislation there will be a little more immediate responsibility to parliament, but the railway will still have a large measure of discretion in regard to its expenditures. The proposed amendment is that such compensation awards and expenses in connection therewith shall be derived from a levy on the gross receipts of the two railways, and the award of the board shall in all cases be final. That cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be called taxation. In the strict sense of the word, the gross receipts of the railways are not government moneys. There is not any added expenditure proposed, and it is not in any sense taxation. Hence, I do not think the minister can say that the situation is radically different from what it was when we proposed this amendment in 1933. As a matter of fact, I think that whatever change there is comes largely because of the changed position of the minister, who now is sitting to the right of the Speaker instead of to the left.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was quoting my own former statement in justification of my present stand.

Mr. HEAPS: If I may speak on the point of order, the whole question is as to whether this involves taxation or expenditures from the supply granted to His Majesty. This amendment asks that the revenues of the two railways, derived from the various services which they render to the public of this country, shall be utilized to provide a fund out of which compensation shall be paid to the employees of the roads. I do not think it can be argued that the question of taxation enters into the matter. The point might be stretched to the extent of saying that the government might have to pay the deficit of the Canadian National Railways, and there might be something in the argument if it were said that the government was to be directly responsible for such compensation awards. But we are not asking the government to be responsible; we are asking that the railways themselves be responsible by a levy on their gross receipts to provide a fund from which the men affected may receive compensation. For that reason I believe the amendment is perfectly in order.

Mr. DUNNING: Before you give your ruling, Mr. Chairman, may I call attention to the fact that in vote 426 of the special supplementary estimates now before the house provision is made for the deficit of the Canadian National Railways in the amount of $39,900,000, representing the amount by which the gross revenues of the railway system fall short of its operating expenses and—

Mr. HEAPS: Not operating.

Mr. DUNNING: —fixed charges.

Mr. HEAPS: Did my hon. friend say operating expenses?

Mr. DUNNING: I said operating expenses and fixed charges. Any levy on the gross revenues of the railway must, therefore, operate directly to increase the amount which must be voted by this parliament. I do not think I need amplify that.

The CHAIRMAN: I quote paragraph 562 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the governor general in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

This amendment has for its purpose the appropriation of public funds and therefore I rule it out of order.

Mr. HEAPS: It goes to show that my intelligent anticipation was quite correct.

Mr. NEILL: Is there any reason why the minister should not accept the amendment on its merits? Is there any reason why he should not adopt it himself?

Mr. HOWE: I heard Sir Edward Beatty express the opinion that this was a proper thing to do; Judge Fullerton has stated that it is right; I think most of us believe that it is. But this is the wrong way to do it. I happened to be in Washington during the Easter recess and I went to the hearing on the bill that was then before the United States congress. It was quite obvious to me from the discussion which I heard on that bill that it suited neither the employers nor the employees; it was not a workable bill. What happened was this: Employers and employees got together through the regular channels—and they are well established there as between the railway system and the men—and worked out a practicable scheme.

Mr. HEAPS: Independently of the government?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, by mutual arrangement. This amendment proposes that any employee affected by this bill may ask for a board. He appoints a man; the railway appoints a man, and the two men appoint a third. If that method were adopted, how many boards would there be in the course of a year? There might be hundreds. The fact is that people who do not understand railway practice and the relations between railways and railway labour will sit down hurriedly and draft legislation with respect to a complicated matter. In Canada we have the most advanced laws with respect to railway labour of any country on the north American continent, this being the only country which has a complete pension system for employees. That was not the result of legislation but was worked out by mutual arrangement between the railways and their employees. The United States government a year ago adopted a compulsory pension scheme for railway employees, but it has not been made operative. On most of the railways in the United States we find that there is no pension scheme or, if there is, it is only on a small scale, not on the scale that we have in Canada. This question will be worked out in the not too far distant future by the railways and their employees, but it is significant that as Minister of Railways I have received no formal application from either the railways or their employees to take an active part in this matter.

Mr. HEAPS: I thank the minister for the pretty compliment he paid me. I may tell him that I belonged to the railway trade union in this country more than a quarter of a century ago, but that is by the way. The minister entirely misunderstands the drafting of a very simple motion because this motion, if he will only read it, is not open to the interpretation he has put upon it. No one but the minister would put that interpretation on it. It is quite obvious—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: It is obvious, I say, that what is intended is not a separate board for every employee who wants a board.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I have already given my ruling on the question and the amendment is therefore disposed of.

Mr. HEAPS: But why did you not stop the minister when he spoke? Will you have one law for the right and another for the left? I do not intend to continue along that line, but if you call one member to order you should give equal treatment to all.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is entirely wrong. The minister was replying to a question put to him by an hon. member.

Mr. HEAPS: But he answered the question by quoting from an amendment that had been ruled out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: We are now on clause 4.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HEAPS: It is the easiest thing in the world for hon. members to shout "order." Anyone can do that; it does not require brains to do that. As a rule I do not stray very far from the proper procedure. I try to conduct myself with decorum and in keeping with the rules of the house and I do not attempt to shout anyone down. I have enough confidence in the Chair to adhere to the proper procedure. I thought, however, that when the Minister of Railways had referred, not altogether in any complimentary way, to the resolution I had proposed, the least I could do was to say a word in reply. The minister has expressed sympathy with the men who may be affected by the provisions of this clause. A good deal of sympathy has been expressed in various quarters in that connection, and the minister cited what has been done in the United States. I think it is a fact, however, that what happened in the United States was due to legislation which was pending. I hold that had no legislation been pending in the United States there would have been no agreement with respect to paying anything to the men who were dismissed as a result of the amalgamation of services there. I do not think the minister would care to deny that statement. It was because legislation was pending, because the president of the United States had himself taken an interest in the matter and was convinced that something should be done for the railway men so affected, that the employers took action and reached an agreement with the men. The minister is not less sympathetic than officials in the United States, and there is a great deal of sympathy all round for the men in this country. But I submit that unless this parliament takes concrete action, all the sympathy in the world will be of little avail so far as the men themselves are concerned. All I plead for this evening is that consideration be given these men, who have a right to expect protection from this committee. They have a right to expect protection from this committee and they are not receiving it. All the minister says is that we should not interfere between the railway companies and the men. We are not interfering, in the sense that is implied, between the railway companies and the men. But may I point out that every piece of legislation we put on the statute books of this country is interference with somebody, in some way, shape or form. I know what this legislation involves. Through it we are threatening the livelihood of many thousands of railway employees in the dominion, and we are making no provision for the men so affected. The government tell us that by this legislation they are going to solve in some degree our unemployment problem. I venture to say that by this legislation they are going to aggravate the existing unemployment problem without making provision for those affected, and all I suggest to the government, the minister and those associated with him is that they take some definite action so that the men who may be thus affected will be properly and adequately protected.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I speak to the point out of some experience as a former Minister of Railways, not for the purpose of creating dissension, but out of some knowledge of the complicated structure of agreements which exist between recognized representatives of railway men in this country and the two great railway corporations. There is no better organized class of men in Canada than our railway employees, and I think I can say that no trades union organizations are better led than those representing our transportation employees. By this action of my hon. friends, which admittedly is not at the request of the men's organizations, nor at the request of the two great employers of railway labour in this country, the idea is that, in spite of the relations existing to which I have referred, this parliament should come along with some arbitrary method whereby an adjustment between the railways and their employees shall take place. From experience I can say that in the past the railway unions always asked me as Minister of Railways to leave them free to negotiate with the management of the railroad with respect to any matter affecting the welfare of the employees. That is the basic principle upon which the organizations have operated for many years, and in the main, I believe, successfully. There is no doubt at all that this problem must be faced. There is no opposition to the idea, which my hon. friend seeks to convey, from the employers, as was I believe the case in the United States. In this country, instead of having a great number of railway companies we have just the two great railway corporations and a few smaller ones which in practice always follow along in connection with agreements between employer and employee. The heads of both these two great systems recognize in principle that this problem must be met and must be negotiated to a satisfactory conclusion. That being the case, I submit, with all deference to my hon. friend, who I know speaks in a political capacity for labour, that on this occasion he is not speaking for the organized bodies directly interested in the matter. If he is, I am very much surprised, because it represents a completely new departure by the organized workers in the railway service for them to take an action at this time without having first approached their employers through the medium of their own organizations, under the terms of their own agreements, and endeavoured to work out a solution.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, will the present Minister of Railways state that the standard railway organizations have not approached him with requests for legislation along this line?

Mr. HOWE: I can say that it was mentioned at a general discussion, I believe some month or six weeks ago. The matter was brought forward and I was shown what was being done in the United States. At that time the legislation of which I spoke was pending. I was very much interested in the subject, and I took occasion when I was passing through Washington to spend two days there, hear part of the debate in committee, and also had a talk with the federal co-ordinator of transportation of the United States. I also had conversations with three or four railway presidents who were in Washington at that time. I went into the matter very fully, and I came to the conclusion that we should be very foolish to rush into legislation until we knew more about the matter. Nothing more occurred.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But there have been, from the standpoint of the railway organizations, suggested drafts of amendments to this very bill?

Mr. HOWE: I have not seen them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The former Minister of Railways would give us to understand that the unions have not made requests of this kind. This is not my information. I have had in my own possession some of the drafts which have been prepared. It is quite true we are following independent lines with—

Mr. HOWE: I may say that I have never seen those drafts. If the hon. member has them, his knowledge is confined to himself. I have never seen them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have seen them, and we have had numerous requests from employees. Be that as it may—

Mr. HOWE: May I ask the hon. gentleman what organizations have requested him to press this matter? What is the name of one organization? There are official organizations that are the links between Ottawa and the men. I would like to know the names.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall be prepared to bring certain information to the minister.

Mr. HOWE: I say that there are certain official links between the government, the men and the railway. If any of them have prepared drafts, what are they? I should like to know.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not any under my hand to-day. I did not know I should be required to produce those, but I believe that there have been prepared—

An hon. MEMBER: You "believe" so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —by certain of the standard railway organizations amendments along the line suggested. We were not following those amendments. My colleague used almost the exact wording of the amendment we made three years ago. But I have had scores of telegrams and letters with regard to this bill from different locals all over the country.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) tell the committee the name of one official railway organization that has taken this matter up with him? I should like to know, because I am surprised that it has not been taken up with me. I should like to know the name of one of these organizations.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With regard to compensation?

Mr. DUNNING: The name?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no documents with me. One organization that has made protests against "cooperation" is the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees. They have not asked for compensation, though. They have taken the line that this is a weakening of the position against amalgamation that has been held in the past, but while they are heartily in favour of compensation if coordination is to go on, they oppose coordination.

Mr. HOWE: I think I can take it that the hon. gentleman is speaking for himself and not for the railway organizations of Canada at this time.

Mr. HEAPS: I can give the minister the names of the Winnipeg locals of the running trades. They sent me a resolution.

Mr. WOODSDORTH: Nearly all of us, as labour representatives here, have constant communications from the locals of the various railway organizations. I am not prepared at this moment to say which they are, but I do say that I have been in frequent communication with some of them. In my own city we have hundreds of railway people who are vitally affected by this kind of legislation. This is one of the big questions which were to the fore at the time of the general election, and let me say to my Liberal friends that, just as the general impression was that we were to have a thoroughgoing national central bank owned and controlled by the government, just as strongly there was the impression spread among all railway organizations across the country that we would have no more "cooperation" of this kind, no amalgamation.

An hon. MEMBER: There was not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No amalgamation, and that was interpreted to mean, no further extension of cooperation.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, it was.

An hon. MEMBER: No unification.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And if this bill is held over, I shall be very glad to produce, from the replies made to inquiries sent out by railway organizations, sufficient evidence of this, I believe, to satisfy fully the Minister of Railways. I, as a candidate, was requested to give some definite information as to my stand with regard to this so-called cooperation. The railway organizations asked me that, not only in my own city of Winnipeg but wherever I campaigned as leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and those who ran as Liberals were asked that question as well. The men who are in this house gave their replies, and if the minister wishes and the opportunity occurs later on I can collect many of those replies. I have not resorted to this kind of politics in this house in the fifteen years I have been here, but if the minister insists that we produce certain documents showing the position of labour in this matter and the replies of men who were elected on the ground that we would have no more of cooperation, then I shall be willing to produce some of those replies for his benefit. But I do not want to go into that any further; I shall content myself with the general statement. There is no doubt that right across this country tens of thousands of labour men were induced to vote Liberal because they believed the Liberals were absolutely opposed to amalgamation in any form.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, in any form, and this kind of cooperation is looking in that direction.

Mr. HOWE: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, this statement has been made three, four or five times. It has been said that this bill provides for cooperation and consolidation. It does nothing of the kind. It does not change any existing legislation one iota in regard to cooperation, so why keep repeating that statement? It has been said seven or eight times from that corner.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In the side note of the very clause we are discussing, I read this:

Duty of C.N.R. and C.P.R. to meet by their proper officers and endeavour to arrange for cooperation.

That is the interpretation of the clause.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a reproduction of the old section, with the substitution of "directors" for "trustees."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so. That is the purpose. I take the minister's own statement when he introduced this bill; I read it the other night and I shall read it again:

Mr. Speaker, in bringing down this measure I feel I am sponsoring a most important and necessary piece of legislation. It is common knowledge that the three directors to whom the direction of the railways was entrusted as a result of the 1933 act have made no real progress toward the improvement of our railway situation. To date they have failed to achieve any substantial cooperative economies, to secure which was the principal object of their appointment and the outstanding feature of the 1933 legislation.

The minister introduces this legislation in order that we might have more thoroughgoing cooperation and might be able to arrange a set-up under which economies along these lines may be effected. I simply cannot understand the minister when he says—

Mr. HOWE: I did not say that; that is what the hon. gentleman is saying. I said that the trustee set-up could not reach the objectives mentioned in the Duff report, and therefore the set-up should be changed. I said nothing about extending cooperative arrangements in any manner; my hon. friend is reading that into what I said. Let him find one place where I say cooperation is going to be carried on at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I have already read it. I shall continue:

Not only have they failed to secure any substantial results to date, but on their own published statements, the prospect of future results from cooperative measures, plans and arrangements is not bright.

So we are to have a new set-up in order that these cooperative economies may be effected. Surely that is the inference.

Mr. HOWE: I did not say that. I wish the hon. member would try to keep within reason on this matter. He objects to being called to order, but he never sticks to a point, as far as I have been able to hear, and I have listened to him carefully since I have been in this house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is no point of order in that, of course, but I think hon. gentlemen will hardly say that I do not stick to my point. My understanding of the minister's words is as I have given it. If the minister undertakes to give another meaning to those words I hope he will tell us very clearly their real meaning and the real purpose of bringing in this bill.

Now I should like to refer to another statement made by the minister. He says that this matter could be best arranged by some agreement which he thinks might be made quite independently of legislation. Let me point out that in this country the Canadian National is a national system. A few minutes ago, though in one sense we represent the shareholders of the system, we were not permitted to pass regulations with regard to these railways because they came directly under the government. The government have thought it desirable to introduce pension schemes in connection with the civil service. If the argument advanced by the minister has any validity at all, the railway employees are coming very close to the point where they will be directly under government control, and in that case surely there cannot be any very great objection to this government instituting something analogous to provisions it makes for its own employees.

Now I come to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), I think it was, that even though the Chair has ruled that we cannot introduce a motion providing for compensation, it would be quite proper for the government to give serious consideration to bringing in an arrangement by which compensation might be given railway employees for loss of work caused by legislation of this kind. Last night when we were on section 2 I was prevented from reading the arrangements that are now in effect in the United States. Perhaps I might now be given an opportunity to read two or three paragraphs summarizing those arrangements. I quote from Labour of May 26:

No employee's wages will be reduced if, as the result of a consolidation, he is placed on a job paying a lower rate.

Displaced employees will be paid coordination allowances ranging from sixty per cent of their wages for five years for men in the fifteen year service list down to a "grub stake" of two months' full wages for men with less than twelve months' service. These men will hold reemployment, free transportation, hospitalization and other rights.

At the option of the employee, a cash lump sum settlement may be paid to him and he gives up all rights to reemployment, etc. Under this plan men with five to fifteen years' service can get immediate cash equal to one year's full pay.

In the three to five year service group the cash allowance is nine months' pay. Two to three year men can get six months' pay in cash. Those in the one to two year class get six months' wages if they take the dismissal allowance instead of coordination benefits. If the men with less than one year's service want immediate cash they can get it on the basis of five days' pay for each month they have worked.

Moving expenses and property losses of transferred employees will be paid.

Railroads which are parties to the agreement agree not to coordinate with any carrier which has not signed the agreement until the latter provides the same protection guaranteed by the signatory roads.

I have read an outline of the agreement recently brought into existence in the United States. It seems to me that some similar provision and some method acceptable to the government ought to be introduced to safeguard the rights of our Canadian railway workers. Let me point out that if workers on the Canadian National Railways went on strike there would be an immediate outcry across Canada that those men were operating a government railway. I would be one of the first to protest against that interpretation of their position, but there is no doubt that there would be a great outcry to the effect that those men are in a position of responsibility. The statement would be made that they are operating a government railway and ought not to go on strike. Any really effective movement of that kind which might be made in an attempt to force the hands of the employers would immediately bring down the condemnation of the government; I have no doubt of that.

We are attempting to adopt a method by which the rights of the men may be safeguarded peaceably and without any dislocation. I should like to say, however, that when we introduced a similar amendment three years ago, the Minister of Railways and Canals in the late administration suggested that it would be a good thing to do this a little later on, when any employees were adversely affected. These last three years have demonstrated that many employees have been adversely affected. I said upon that occasion that I thought the time to introduce measures of this kind was at the time legislation was being set up, and I still think so. We now take this opportunity to place this proposal before the government, in the hope that it may be included in the bill.

In closing, may I say that while I cannot argue against economies of any kind, from what I have read I am firmly convinced that the economies contemplated are nothing like as great as they are made out to be. Mr. Beatty himself has been unable to point to just where the great economies may be secured. In my view the pleas for economy have not been sustained by the facts. If we are going to put the whole transportation system under the government, I, with a socialist viewpoint, would say that might be a proper procedure, although I should hate to have the whole system placed under the present government. But under a socialist régime we might very well have coordination of all transportation and communication facilities. I say, however, that under present circumstances we in the labour movement are opposed to chiselling in, in such a way that under the name of "cooperation" we get a very large measure of amalgamation. Any economies are being made at the expense of the employee for the sake of the bondholders; that is the trouble.

What have we in the way of cooperation today? Yesterday in the Quebec legislature a bill was passed by which the Canadian Pacific Railway will go into a territory which all along has been supposed to be that of the Canadian National Railways. Is that cooperation? Now we have a bill introduced in this house the effect of which will be to send a branch line of the Canadian National Railways into that territory. That is not cooperation. If the Canadian Pacific Railway wanted to take action along the lines of the legislation secured in the provincial legislature they ought first to have gone to the board of railway commissioners and inquired about the situation. They should have come to this parliament and submitted their bill. We cannot have cooperation which simply means that employees are ground down and dismissed to effect economies, when at the same time, if they take the notion, the railways may spend tens of millions of dollars to carry through undertakings completely out of harmony with the spirit of cooperation. These are matters which must be considered.

Hence I would urge upon the minister that the new board should not be instructed in any way to foster cooperation of the kind we have had in the past. If the new board is to be more directly amenable to the government, the government which to a great extent won its majority in railway districts on the understanding that the Liberal party was opposed to amalgamation, that government I would hope would instruct the new board of directors and the new management to halt the progress of "cooperation," in so far as it is more or less a disguised step towards amalgamation.

Mr. HOWE: A while ago I said that only one representation had been made to me about this matter, and that it had been oral. I now find written confirmation of the oral representations made at our interview. It is signed by the secretary-treasurer of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and the secretary of the dominion joint legislation committee.

Mr. HEAPS: What date?

Mr. HOWE: It is dated April 27, and a draft amendment is submitted with the letter. I shall not read it because it is long, but I can say that it has no relation to the amendment proposed at this session, either in subject matter, form or anything else. I replied to the communication that we had taken on all the work we could complete at this session of parliament, and in our conference I think we agreed that a tremendous amount of study would have to be given the matter before a proper amendment could be drafted. I think I can say it is mutually agreed that they were satisfied with my expression, which I repeat here, that the government looks with a good deal of favour upon an agreement of that kind, and that if the situation seems to require it a year from now, we shall go into the matter more seriously with the thought of presenting an amendment to the house.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not get the full explanation of what was contained in the memorandum of April 27. Do I understand that in the memorandum submitted to the minister there is a request for compensation for employees dismissed as a result of cooperation in regard to services?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say that. This is a confirmation of the discussion we had. The copy I have is not signed, as a matter of fact, but I believe I may say that there is complete understanding between the parties that signed and myself that negotiations should probably be conducted first with the management, and in the event of no satisfactory result being obtained, we shall look into the matter again next year.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister suggests that representatives of railway employees should first approach the management, and if they get no satisfaction from the management they will then come to the government. I assume there must be some understanding of the purposes for which they would go to the management. I assume their only reason for approaching the management would be arising out of the legislation which we have before us to-night. I have no idea of what is contained in the memorandum in the minister's possession, and he has not read it, although I believe the rules of the house provide for the reading of it. However I shall not ask him to put it on Hansard, if there is an understanding that it should not go there. I believe some kind of negotiation is to be undertaken with the management of the railways, and if the representatives of the men do not receive what they want they may come to the government one year hence. The only point is that none of us has any idea of what they are going to the management for, unless it would be in connection with matters arising out of the legislation now before the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Am I right in understanding that the minister is sympathetically inclined towards the idea that the men and the railway companies should get together, and that if they agree he would be favourable to dismissal compensation?

Mr. HOWE: That is the situation, yes.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Thank you, very much. Then, in view of the reasons annexed to the setting aside of the amendment, will the government take steps to prevent the railway companies from levying funds for the purpose of making dismissal compensation?

Mr. HOWE: On what section is the hon. member speaking?

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am asking this question: In view of the reasons annexed by the chairman for the turning down of the amendment offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, will the government take into consideration the fact that these levies by the railway companies for the purpose of satisfying the claims of dismissed men will affect government funds, and will they step in to prevent these levies being made?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot understand the hon. member's question. All this talk in parliament about agreements between the railways and the men I think will be resented equally by the men and the railways, and quite properly. I claim that in Canada we have the finest channels in the world between the men and their employers so far as railway labour is concerned. They work together with a minimum of friction, and I have every reason to believe that if parliament will allow this matter to take its natural course there will be no serious complaints. It seems to me that for hon. members to rise in their places on their own responsibility and ask questions of the government about matters relating to involved arrangements between railways and railway employees, is going a little too far.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): If the government is not permitting the amendment on the ground that it interferes with government funds, I would point out that any arrangement made between the government and its employees would also affect government funds. I want the assurance of the minister that he will not interfere if the railway companies make these arrangements and pay out of their funds dismissal pay in compensation to those who lose their positions through cooperation.

Mr. DUNNING: If there is no legislation interfering at all, it is quite obvious that agreements between the employees and the employer can be undertaken within the ambit of the authority of both as it at present exists. That is the best answer one can make. Certainly the government will not interfere or prevent the management of the railway from reaching an agreement with its employees. I do not think any government of Canada ever has done so, and certainly this one will not.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Thank you very much, but you realize the implications attaching to the decision of the chairman.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not realize any implications at all.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): It strikes me that there is involved in the question of compensation something which has so far been a hindrance to the carrying out of the principle of cooperation. That seems to be evident from the statement of the chairman of the board of trustees and also from the statement of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) as it is published in the proceedings of the committee.

I think perhaps the best friends of the railway organizations would be well advised if they accepted the word of the government and the suggestion of the minister of transport that in the matter of cooperation provision would be made for compensation. I believe it would not be wise to have that provision made in this bill. Nevertheless, in view of the fact that the chairman of the board of trustees made it perfectly clear that one hindrance to further cooperation was the fact that the burden of it would of necessity have been transferred to labour, the whole situation becomes important when we consider any further cooperation between the two great systems. I do not believe that the directors will succeed in further cooperation unless the board feels itself able to meet the question of compensation with a reasonably free hand. The president of the Canadian Pacific Railway has on more than one occasion, according to reports in the press, made it clear that he did not want cooperation if it meant employees of the railway losing their positions. That statement has been made by advocates of cooperation in this house during this session of parliament, and it is tacitly made by the present minister in his reply before the railway committee to the chairman of the board of trustees. It seems to me that there should be a fairly definite understanding in order that the men in the employ of both companies may feel assured that the process of cooperation, however far it may go, will not have the effect of placing their positions or their earnings in jeopardy.

Of course, as I understand this whole problem, there is a far greater scope for the management of both roads, particularly the management of the public road, in broadening out its sphere of activities, enlarging the scope of action of the board of directors, reaching out for new business and bringing in a return which will, in the words of the minister, ultimately wipe out the huge deficit we have to face each year. If we succeed in doing that, that is the real purpose of the legislation before this committee, not ascribing motives such as have been mentioned during the discussion this afternoon, yesterday and on other occasions when this matter has been before us. I hope to see this legislation bear fruit such as the minister of transport has suggested it is likely to do, and I believe it will if all parties in this chamber forget the ascribing of unworthy motives to one another, unite with the common purpose of trying to salvage what may be salvaged from this splendid asset and give this dominion an up to date system of transportation which will meet the needs of the various portions of this dominion, and meet particularly the needs of industry, which I am satisfied it is not doing at the present time.

Section 5 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. BENNETT: I observe the "Minister of Transport" is used in two cases on page 7 of the bill, although there is no minister of transport yet. That is no reason why the bill should be held up, but the situation is unusual.

Mr. HOWE: The bill providing for a minister of transport has been introduced, and I find that we cannot use here the same clause that was used in the harbour boards bill.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the minister has to be named.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. HOWE: With the consent of the house, I should like to move the third reading now as we are anxious to get this bill to the other chamber.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Fruit, including grant of $4,750 to Canadian Horticultural Council, $460,200.

Mr. PELLETIER: Will the minister explain the decrease in this vote?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Perhaps that question could best be answered by giving the different items in the vote and showing where there are increases and decreases. In travelling expenses of head office staff, $8,000 was expended in 1935-36; the estimate for 1936-37 is $9,000, or an increase of $1,000. Outside administration, salaries and expenses: 1935-36, $222,790.48; 1936-37, $225,407, an increase of $2,616.52. Rental of offices and railway spur: $1,393 in 1935-36 and $1,535 for 1936-37, an increase of $142. Shipping point and export inspection, salaries and expenses: 1935-36, $187,322.50; 1936-37, $174,090, a decrease of $13,232.50. Operation of onion warehouses: 1935-36, $1,500; 1936-37, $200, a decrease of $1,300. car precooling: $1,500 in 1935-36; $1,000 for 1936-37, a decrease of $500. There is an item covering exhibitions which has been taken over by the publicity and extension branch. The amount expended in 1935-36 was $3,500, so there is a decrease of that amount in this branch, but there is not a decrease in the total expenditures. Extending markets, test shipments: 1935-36, $2,000; 1936-37, $2,000, no increase or decrease. The amounts are the same for equipment and repairs of onion warehouses, $800 for each year. The amount for technical instruments, transportation and warehouses is the same for each year, $500. Publications and bulletins: $3,500 for each year. Crop and market reports, telegrams, et cetera: $12,000 for each year. Office supplies, stationery, forms, equipment, et cetera: 1935-36, $15,800; 1936-37, $16,800, an increase of $1,000. Apple maggot survey, eastern provinces: 1935-36, $8,000; 1936-37, $6,000, a decrease of $2,000. The amount for legal services is the same for each year, $1,500. Repairs to departmental cars: $1,000 for each year. Grant to horticultural council: 1935-36, $4,500; estimated for this year, $4,750, an increase of $250.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the increase for?

Mr. GARDINER: The original grant of $5,000 was reduced by ten per cent, and the reduction this year is only five per cent. Unforeseen expenses: 1935-36, $254.50; 1936-37, $118, a decrease of $136.50. When the decreases and increases are totalled up, it will be found that the total decrease is $15,660.48.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister mentioned an amount of something like $3,500 for advertising. Is this the total amount expended to advertise Canada's fruit crops?

Mr. GARDINER: That item is for publications and bulletins. It is not advertising; it is largely information furnished to people who are growing fruit.

Mr. PELLETIER: Is there any amount under any other heading for advertising the fruit production of Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: There is nothing provided at the moment for that purpose.

Mr. BARBER: The minister mentioned an amount of $225,407 for outside salaries. Would that be for inspectors?

Mr. GARDINER: That is mostly for inspection services throughout the country.

Mr. BARBER: Would that include experimental farms?

Mr. GARDINER: No; it has nothing to do with the experimental farms. This is inspection work throughout the country in connection with fruit growing, fruit grading and the general administration of the fruit act.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): What is the difference in the grants this year and last year to the seed fairs?

Mr. GARDINER: That would come under the next item.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I understood that the item had been passed. Was the grant last year the same?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a slight decrease I gave all the particulars. It is $15,660.48 less on the total vote.

Item agreed to.

Seed, feed and fertilizer control, including grants to seed fairs, et cetera, also grant of $18,900 to Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $407,200.

Mr. GARDINER: On February 28 we covered this entire vote and all explanations were given. Eleven o'clock came before the item could carry. The information will be found in Hansard of that day.

Mr. PELLETIER: Does this include the funds required for freight charges on seed grain shipped to farmers from seed cleaning establishments?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Entomology, including investigations and inspections relating to destructive insects and pests, $400,100.

Mr. GARDINER: This item was called earlier in the session, but the leader of the opposition asked to have it stand because some members were not present.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): What work is carried on at Indian Head with regard to cutworms and grasshoppers?

Mr. GARDINER: The entomological work is not done at experimental farms. There are two different branches, the experimental farm branch and this particular branch. A certain amount of research work is done in connection with insects and other pests at different experimental farms throughout the country. One of the pests in the west is the cutworm and another is the wheat stem sawfly. Most of the work done at the entomological laboratory at Indian Head is in connection with pests of that kind, and information is given the farmers from time to time as to how to deal with them.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the minister give us information with regard to cooperation with the provinces? The act with regard to insects and pests is under the administration of the dominion government, but in connection with certain work—for instance in the fire blight experiments, though I am not quite sure whether that comes under this item—operations are carried on by both the province and the dominion, in British Columbia and possibly in other provinces.

Mr. GARDINER: There is cooperation between the provinces and the dominion. It will be understood, of course, that when an insect of any kind attacks, say spruce trees or any other forest trees, it does not stop its operations at provincial boundaries but extends from one province into another. This is true of grasshoppers and other insect pests. It is necessary, therefore, to have the greater part of the work done by the dominion. The provinces cooperate to the fullest extent whenever any pest is being attacked. We have the fullest cooperation from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec in fighting certain pests in the east; we have cooperation in British Columbia, and we have cooperation in the prairie provinces in connection with insects that attack the grain crops.

Mr. STIRLING: Was this cooperation a matter particularly under discussion at the dominion-provincial conference?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; it was discussed in a general way though there was no detailed discussion. The question of overlapping was discussed and it was decided that there had been the fullest cooperation in this regard.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Does the department contemplate any action in connection with the wireworm, in the way of cooperation with the provincial departments?

Mr. GARDINER: An experiment is being carried on at Swift Current for the purpose of providing the best information available with regard to attacking the wireworm.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder whether the minister would see to it that someone from the experimental farm inspects the small trees and vegetation roundabout these premises. I was looking at them the other day. They are being attacked, not by the fire blight but by something worse. The trouble will spread and valuable trees will be destroyed. I meant to telephone the Department of Agriculture but I did not know whom to get in touch with. Someone should be responsible because it is a very bad condition. It is at the back of this building, and the rapidity with which the destruction is going on is such that I should like to see it attended to at once. I bring it to the minister's attention in the hope that someone will look after it.

Mr. GARDINER: I am pleased that the leader of the opposition has called attention to it. Whenever the attention of the department is drawn to matters of this sort it has always been the practice to have an investigation made.

Mr. BENNETT: Who makes it?

Mr. GARDINER: It is made by this particular branch of the department.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Have there been any successful experiments in connection with the distribution by airplane of powder for the destruction of insects in western Canada this year?

Mr. GARDINER: Some preliminary work has been done particularly for forest insects, but it has been found expensive to do it in that way; there are less expensive ways for field crop insects.

Item agreed to.

Salaries, $798,997.75; contingencies, $77,200.

Mr. GARDINER: There are three main reasons for the difference shown. The 1935-36 item for salaries is $711,334.25.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister give particulars of how this item is made up?

Mr. GARDINER: In a moment. First, I will give the main reasons for the difference and then I shall give the items, if necessary, from the itemized account. For 1936-37, the estimate is $798,997.75. There is an increase there of $87,663.50. If members of the committee will look at the next item, contingencies, it will be noted that the 1935-36 item is $114,200; the 1936-37 item is $77,200; that is a decrease of $37,000. That decrease will be accounted for largely in the increase of $87,663 in the item for salaries. It is a transfer of salaries from contingencies into the civil government list.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): There is still an increase of over $50,000.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall come to that in a moment. It is largely due to temporaries made permanent.

Mr. SENN: Was that $114,200 for contingencies all taken up last year?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; it was all taken up last year. In addition to that there is the five per cent as compared with the former ten per cent deduction in salaries; there is five per cent added there. The balance is due to transfers of salaries from the branch votes to civil government.

Mr. SENN: Do I understand the minister to say that there have been no additions during the year to the staff of the Department of Agriculture; that none of this extra amount that is being voted is to be for new help?

Mr. STIRLING: There are twelve new stenographers.

Mr. GARDINER: There have been three new positions provided, but two of those are modified old ones. This does not mean the putting on of three individuals, but it is the creation of three new positions, two of them being modified old positions that were in existence before.

Mr. SENN: Will the minister say what those are?

Mr. GARDINER: The three of them are: the general executive assistant; that position has not been filled; it was created some time last year but it has not yet been filled; then there is the chief, fruit and vegetable field service, and the dominion agricultural chemist. The latter two were just modifications of previous positions.

Mr. STIRLING: And are they filled?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; the latter two are filled.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Markets and transportation: two additions there, assistant chiefs.

Mr. GARDINER: Do I understand the hon. member to ask if those positions were in markets and transportation before?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): No; are there not now two chief assistants in the markets and transportation branch?

Mr. GARDINER: In the fruit branch?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: The matter of appointments is under consideration.

Mr. STIRLING: They are provided for but not filled. At the bottom of page 70 of the estimates two of them are mentioned.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Field services, the same? The salaries are provided for.

Mr. GARDINER: They will be found all through the list. These were all in the branch votes. They were taken out of the branch votes and put into civil government this year. That is the only change there. If hon. members go over the items on pages 70, 71 and 72 of the estimates, they will find that this is shown there as an increase in civil government. That is the reason there are more of these employees.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): An increase of fifty-four new employees?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but they are not new employees. They are simply taken out of the branch votes we have already passed and put under civil government.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): All except three.

Mr. GARDINER: All except three.

Mr. STIRLING: For instance, as regards the four senior fruit and vegetable inspectors, they are not new creations? They are people whose salaries previously have been paid out of the particular vote?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; that is my information.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Where does the increase of the $50,000 come from?

Mr. GARDINER: That increase is as shown. Part of it is due to the five per cent difference in salary deduction, and part of it is due to transfers from the branch votes into this vote for civil government. The $50,000 increase in the civil government vote is made up in that way, but it does not increase the total vote of the department by that amount.

Mr. STIRLING: Does it amount to this? At the top of page 71 of the estimates is one assistant chief, field services. I do not know if that is for fruit. Is it?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: His salary added to those of the four senior fruit and vegetable inspectors, makes $11,800, and that, I take it, if I understand the minister aright, is a set-up against the $15,600 deduction in the fruit vote.

Mr. GARDINER: In part it will be. There are other reasons, as I mentioned.

Mr. SENN: I note also that there is a chief canning inspector whose office is being done away with at the present time. Perhaps I am going a little far afield in asking this question, though it has to do with the canning of fruits and vegetables. I understand that there is to be some change in the regulations respecting containers; that regulations are being prepared at the present time to standardize containers of fruits and vegetables after they are canned. Is such in contemplation? Are these regulations nearing completion? And what are they?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that in 1933 the government established the practice whereby when a position was vacated it was allowed to lapse along with the vacation of the position. That move was made, I think, to cut down staffs in certain departments. It has been found necessary from time to time to reestablish some of these positions. This position went out of existence in that way, and will probably have to be reestablished to take care of the very matter that the hon. member has spoken of.

Mr. SENN: Yes, but I should like the minister to give us the information for which I asked, regarding a change in the regulations for the standardization of containers for canned goods.

Mr. GARDINER: Really there has not been any change up to date other than this, that I think it will be found that in the bill before the house there is a provision for a change in containers for cheese, packages for cheese, and in connection with fruits. The matter of containers is under consideration as a result of the report made last year by the price spreads committee. The idea that at the moment is seemingly most acceptable to the department is that we might be well advised to depart from insistence upon certain weights in connection with canned fruits, accept the idea of volume and take pints, quarts, gallons and so on rather than deal with weights in the set-up of the packages. But the matter has not yet been fully decided, and no change has been definitely decided upon in connection with it.

Mr. SENN: May I ask the minister if the department has received any representations from the canning industry as a whole, or from any of the larger concerns which are interested in canning, to the effect that they would rather have the net weight as the standard than the size of the container in quarts or pints or multiples of quarts or pints? I understand that they feel quite strongly on this matter, and that they are of the opinion that it is more in the interests of the canning industry, of the fruit farmer and of the vegetable farmer, that containers shall have the net weight marked distinctly on the package, so that the housewife may know what she is going to get. I should like to know if any representations have been made and any conferences held with respect to the matter.

Mr. GARDINER: Meetings and conferences have been held in that connection. I understand that one of the companies has expressed strong views with regard to the matter, believing that the net weight method is fairer than any other of providing containers. I believe that the other companies have open minds on the matter, some of them being favourable to containers in accordance with the view I expressed a moment ago, based upon pints and quarts and multiples of pints and quarts rather than upon weight.

Mr. SENN: I understand that one of the objections raised by one of the larger companies mentioned by the minister is that a certain quantity of goods is canned for export, and it has to conform to the regulations of the country to which it is to be exported. It is very difficult, of course, for these companies to estimate just how much they are going to be able to export, and if they overstep the mark and can a larger quantity than they are able to sell, in sizes that are required by the regulations of these foreign countries, a regulation which sets the size of the container in pints, quarts or multiples thereof would make it impossible for the company to dispose in the domestic market of any goods which it was not able to export. I should like to ask the minister if all the companies have been consulted and if any conferences have been held.

Mr. GARDINER: Conferences have been held and, of course, all the companies will be consulted before anything final is done. The matter is under consideration at the moment, and the point raised by the hon. gentleman has been considered in a partial way but not finally determined. Nothing will be done that will interfere in any way with trade into any other country. We shall attempt to arrive at a conclusion that will make that kind of trade possible.

Mr. STIRLING: I think that is one instance where the Canadian Horticultural Council has demonstrated its usefulness.

Mr. BENNETT: I think in the main import countries require net weight to be shown. Within the British empire the standard is universal, but on the continent the metric system prevails, and there is some difficulty about weights. That is my information. I think the Department of Trade and Commerce should be consulted about this matter with a great deal of care, in relation to the reports from their trade commissioners. My information is that in the British empire we have a net weight standard, because we all have sixteen ounces to the pound. But once you get on the continent of Europe you have the metric system; the weight is indicated in grams and the volume in litres, which is an entirely different proposition. I should not think it would be a change for the better to provide quarts, pints and gallons as the standard to show the net amount the housewife is purchasing. I say that only because of some investigations I made in that connection in one of the large stores in London that dealt very largely with Canadian products. A standard which is known to be standard throughout the empire is one from which I think we should not depart unless we have the very best reasons for doing so.

Mr. BARBER: I should like to draw the minister's attention to the fact that apparently about twelve extra stenographers have been taken on. Would the minister say that they were all taken from the temporary staff which he had last year?

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed that there is very little variation, if any, in the stenographic staff. Changes are made back and forth between the different branches; there may be a cutting down in one and an increase in another, but as far as the total staff is concerned I am informed that it is practically the same as last year.

Mr. BARBER: On page 72 of the estimates I see an increase from sixty to seventy-two stenographers under one item and from nineteen to twenty under another.

Mr. GARDINER: They are all covered by the explanation I gave a few moments ago. These are largely changes from the temporary staff to the permanent staff and from branch votes to the civil government vote. They are not increases in the number of individuals in the service.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): That is with the exception of the three new positions, which have not been filled yet as I understand the situation.

Mr. GARDINER: No; they were on the staff and they have been transferred from one vote to another.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): All but three?

Mr. GARDINER: There are just the three new positions.

Mr. TUSTIN: I understood the minister to say that consideration was being given a question of changing containers for fruit. I should like to ask if the same consideration is being given containers for canned vegetables.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. All the questions raised in connection with the price spreads investigation are being given consideration at the present time. There is only one on which we have reached a final decision, and that is still to be dealt with by the house in the legislation having to do with butter and cheese.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister explain just what are the duties to be performed by the general executive assistant?

Mr. GARDINER: That position was created before I took over the department, and whoever was appointed was supposed to give general assistance to the executive in administering the affairs of the department. I have not found use for such an appointment up to date and I do not know that I shall, but we are making the vote now until the matter is finally determined.

Mr. BENNETT: Do not mention that; it might turn out to be another assistant chief electoral officer.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): On page 71 of the estimates provision is made for a chief seed grader. What are his duties and does he work in the west or in the east?

Mr. GARDINER: He is in the executive office, the central office at Ottawa, but I am not in a position to give his duties in detail except that he will have charge over those who are grading seeds.

Mr. PELLETIER: Before this item passes I should like to bring a certain condition to the attention of the minister, and I think it might come under the miscellaneous item. It has been the practice of the Department of Agriculture, in order to encourage and promote the distribution of pure seed, to pay the freight on all shipments of registered or certified seed made before March 2 of this year, under certain conditions which are set out. There have been brought to my attention certain cases in which it was impossible for the department to have the seed cleaned and ready for shipment before that date. When this matter was taken up with one of the seed stations the reply was that it was impossible to get the seed out under the free freight rate because it would not be ready for shipment by that date. In this particular instance the money for the seed grain had been sent to this station and was there for some time before the date fixed. The point is that the seed could not be shipped under free freight after that date, because it was not possible for the government to have it ready at that time, and also because the money was not voted for the following year to take care of this situation. I was wondering whether the minister would not consider what I have said when he is drawing up future estimates. That is to say, those who cannot take advantage of the free freight simply because of the inability of the department to have the seed ready in time are subjected to extra expense. I believe it is unfair to ask the farmer to bear that extra cost. It would be good policy for the government to set aside a very small sum—it would not need to be large—to take care of these cases, and I believe it would be easy for the department to find out how many such cases there have been in the last few years and to base their estimates upon the facts as they have gathered them. I speak to the point because some farmers obtain the benefit of the free freight rate, while others, through no fault of their own, but because the government cannot get the seed out in time, are forced to pay freight. Between the free freight date and the time new moneys are voted to provide for the item in the next year, I suggest that some provision should be made to take care of the farmers who do not receive the free freight rate.

Mr. GARDINER: The letter sent out may be open to a wrong interpretation. It is generally known that the end of the financial years is on March 31. These votes cover the year from April 1 until March 31 of the following year. Most farmers who are laying in seed for the spring have obtained it before the end of March. That is the common practice throughout Canada and the practice of those who are providing themselves with the amount of seed indicated in the vote. There have been cases where people have not had their applications in sufficiently early. If the applications were not in about the middle of February it is possible that delivery of the seed could not be made in sufficient time to get it out before the vote lapses. But in actual practice most of those accounts have been paid. All those cases are subject to review, and when the new votes come in on April 1, the moneys are used to take care of cases which have been carried over from the previous year. However, in order to protect themselves against conditions which might arise, officials of the department necessarily send out orders from year to year to get applications sufficiently early to make it possible for delivery early in the month of March. I believe the letter could be interpreted as more or less a warning to a man to get his order in earlier next year.

Mr. PELLETIER: The seed growers' association and organization take the responsibility for sending out advice of this kind to the farmers, and perhaps when they are notifying farmers of seed price lists they could send a notice to the effect that it would be much better for them if they had their orders in before a certain date. If February 1 is a date satisfactory to all concerned I believe it would be a good idea to include that information in the pamphlets sent out.

Mr. GARDINER: We shall consider the suggestion.

Mr. DOUGLAS: When the minister replied to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) stating the reason for the increase in salaries, he said that it was due partly to transfers from the temporary to the permanent list, and partly to statutory increases. It would seem that $37,000 would refer to transfers, and we would assume that $50,000 was required to cover statutory increases.

Mr. GARDINER: Some of the $50,000 is paid in connection with the transfer of individuals from one vote to another, as well as from contingencies, in addition to the amount which would be necessary to pay the statutory increases.

Mr. SENN: I do not wish to transgress the rules of the house, but I think the minister will recall that when one of the first votes was passed I asked that one vote be left so that anything concerning the estimates might be discussed. May I ask the minister if the government has made a final decision against bonusing cheese this year?

Mr. GARDINER: That would come under the next item.

Item agreed to.

Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, $106,600.

Mr. GARDINER: Last year there was a vote of $1,545,500, and this year the vote is $106,600. The difference in the two items is due to the cheese bonus and the amount expended last year in connection with the export marketing of butter. As was announced, the government has decided not to pay the cheese bonus this year.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In connection with the marketing of our natural products there are some observations I should like to make to the minister. I realize that perhaps one of the most serious problems which will face us within the next years is that of marketing our natural products, and particularly our agricultural products. I have no use for finding fault without offering some kind of solution. Where the difficulty is obvious to everyone, and no solution is offered, discussion seems idle, but I believe what I have to say might help at least to some degree to solve the problem we must face. It is recognized that agriculture must continue as Canada's basic industry, and it is also recognized that that industry is suffering. There are many causes for anxiety; for example, a large crop of wheat, an overproduction of meat products, or of butter, or of potatoes, may cause us great concern, and sooner or later we must find a solution for our difficulty. We are attempting to solve the problem. This item for the bonusing of cheese is a good example of that. We are pegging prices for wheat and we shall peg other prices, I fancy. We have a marketing act now before the courts, and I am quite sure that we shall put through another marketing act if the present one is not upheld by the courts. We have a Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which is a most excellent one, and for which I desire to commend everyone who had any part in bringing it in. It will be followed by others of its kind, I assume.

There are two problems, however, to which I think we have not thus far given sufficient attention in Canada, and the time is now ripe to give attention to them. One is the maintenance of soil fertility. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act attempted something along that line, glancing at the soil drifting difficulties which have arisen in different parts of Canada. We have another serious question which we must face before long, and that is the problem of the economic use of irrigated land. I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the committee, but I wish all members of the committee could be out for a little while in the constituency I represent. There are four distinct irrigation projects there, and they are, to use the fine description which the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) applied to the Canadian National Railways, a magnificent asset. I feel that one is perfectly justified in applying that term to them, and it is an asset whose value I believe can be greatly increased to the great advantage of this country. But before that can be done we must look to the economic use of these projects or we shall have a magnificent asset turning, because we misuse it, to our disadvantage.

Having said this much, I wish now to direct the attention of the minister to the condition of the beet sugar industry in Canada. I would ask all members of this committee to give their earnest consideration to the condition of the beet sugar industry because there are at present many misunderstandings and misconceptions about it, and it is very easy to make a grave mistake in connection with it. The minister might possibly have overlooked some facts in connection with this industry which, I think, should be brought to his attention, and by the way may I say without his feeling that I am endeavouring to flatter him that I have a very high opinion of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I feel that he is the right man in the right place, but with the multiplicity of his duties it would be an easy matter for him not to have given a matter of this kind particular attention. There are also, I believe, many members of this committee who, because they do not come from territory similar to that in my constituency do not realize what irrigation project districts are like, just as I myself, when I had occasion to go through part of Quebec a little while ago, found that I could never have imagined what the actual conditions were like in that province without going there. I am quite sure that some members of this committee cannot imagine what conditions are like in the irrigated regions without going there and seeing for themselves, and I should like to help them see something of the nature of these projects.

The problem of the beet sugar industry is a difficult one, much more difficult than most people in this country realize. We are at the present time placing a levy on the beet sugar industry. We are bonusing wheat, bonusing cheese, and aiding in various ways a good many other industries in Canada, but on the beet sugar industry we are placing a handicap, and this will show how serious that handicap is: The government tax, the one cent levy on each pound of sugar produced, was so grievous that it amounted in 1935 to 54·7 per cent of the gross returns to the farmer. I do not believe anyone could have imagined that the government got 54·7 per cent of what the farmer got for every ton of beets delivered to the factory. That is an unjust situation, I am sure. Again, the government, through this levy, received 66 per cent more than the labourers received who did the work on the beets.

Mr. GARDINER: That would cover all the municipal, provincial and federal taxes?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No; that is just the dominion tax. I wish, Mr. Chairman, with your permission to put on Hansard some figures which are right up to date and have come from the Raymond sugar factory, which is a very accurate one, to illustrate the handicap under which the beet sugar industry carries on. The government is receiving so much money from the beet sugar industry that it receives on an average, clear, 13·6 times as much money as the farmer receives on an average, clear, per ton of beets. This is an almost inconceivable, an almost unbelievable situation; yet it is borne out by the figures I shall presently put on Hansard.

There is another point, and that is that Canada is, so far as I have been able to learn, the only country in which there is not definite assistance given to the sugar beet industry. Canada, on the contrary, actually places a handicap on that industry.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If it does not require me to digress too much.

Mr. STIRLING: I wonder whether the hon. member would amplify his statement that the dominion government receives thirteen times as much as the sugar beet farmer.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am going to put on Hansard figures which will bear that out. I am dealing with the 1935 crop, and particularly with the Raymond sugar factory, which is in my own constituency. I was really astounded to find out how bad the situation is. We are levying in Canada a duty of one cent a pound on sugar produced in this country. That is a very unjust tax in view of the facts I have presented.

Another factor which makes the whole question serious is that we have a great national need of the beet sugar industry in Canada because of the conditions which I indicated a few moments ago, and which I shall now develop.

In the first place we are, all of us, at our wits' end to know what to do about unemployment. Now there is hardly anything into which we could go in this dominion which would give more employment than the beet sugar industry, as will be borne out by the figures I am going to give, but first I shall put on Hansard, as the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) would like to have them, these figures which were sent to me by W. F. Russell, secretary of the Alberta Cooperative Beet Growers, in a letter dated Lethbridge, March 13, 1936. They are taken from a report that was drawn up by the agricultural superintendent of the Canadian Sugar Factories, and approved by the Alberta Cooperative Beet Growers.

The total number of farmers growing beets in 1935 for the Raymond sugar factory was 797. The number of acres planted was 14,109, and the average acreage per farmer, 17·64. The total tons of beets harvested was 138,809. The estimated price of beets per ton was $5.85, and the estimated total price, $812,032.65. The quantity of sugar produced in pounds was 44,450,900.

Right at this point, Mr. Chairman, we should pay close attention to the costs to the farmer who is producing these beets. They are as follows:

Cost of Producing 1935 Crop of Beets

Land preparation	$ 43,737 90
Beet seed for 14,109 acres	46,559 70
Planting	10,581 75
Commercial fertilizer	36,683 40
Cultivating	28,218 00
Irrigating	28,218 00
Lifting	28,218 00
Loading	28,218 00
Hauling	84,654 00
Irrigation rates	28,218 00
Taxes	7,054 50
Interest on land	35,272 50
Depreciation and maintenance of equipment	42,327 00
Hand labour	268,071 00
Soil improvement	56,436 00
Incidentals	7,054 50
Total	$779,522 25

The total price paid to farmers amounted to $812,032.65, less cost of producing beets, $779,522.25. The net profit to 797 growers was $32,510.40. The total government tax was $444,509; the cost of collecting tax was $600, which left a total of $445,109. The average amount of government tax per grower is the startling sum of $558.48.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the government tax?

Mr. BLACKMORE: One cent per pound excise tax. The gross average amount received per grower was $1,018.86, and the gross average cost of production per grower was $978.07 The net average profit per grower was $40.79

Mr. BARBER: Do the growers pay this one cent tax? The consumers claim that they pay it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad that point has been brought up.

Mr. BARBER: The consumers claim that they would be able to get sugar one cent per pound cheaper if it were not for this tax.

Mr. BLACKMORE: When the farmer delivers his beets to the sugar company they tell him that they would be able to pay more if they did not have to pay this tax.

Mr. BARBER: They charge the tax.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In any case the farmer has to pay the tax. We shall go on. The average amount of the government tax per grower is $558.48. For every dollar paid out in labour during the beet crop, the government receives $1.66. I have not the time, nor would it be fair to take up the time to go into these figures, but I think it worth while to put them on Hansard so that hon. members who are interested can study them. One or two hon. members would seem to be inclined to scoff just a little, but I think it would be well if they would consider these figures very carefully before they say much. Otherwise, they might not feel very proud of what they do say.

I should like to draw to the attention of the committee the national need of a beet sugar industry at the present time. Unemployment is our most serious difficulty, but it has been estimated in the United States that for every factory of 1,200 tons' capacity, 10,000 people would be employed. That is a surprising estimate and I should like to read something to bear it out. Let me quote from a pamphlet entitled, Why Canada Needs Sugar Beets, by the joint sugar beet development committee, Lethbridge, Alberta. I read from page 16:

> It has been estimated in the United States that one factory of from 1,000 to 1,200 daily capacity will, directly and indirectly, give a living to 10,000 people—men, women, and children.

There is another statement which appears on page 19 of the same pamphlet:

> Mr. Charles H. Houston, president of the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company, when appearing as a witness before the select standing committee of the Canadian House of Commons inquiring into the beet sugar industry, made the following significant statement: "I will say this, that the beet sugar industry employs a tremendous amount of labour. There is no other industry that I know that takes care of as much labour as the beet industry."

I should like to quote from an article by S. P. Grounds which appeared in the October, 1931, number of Empire Production, published in London, England, as follows:

> It is undoubtedly in the direction of increasing home supplies of sugar that the industry in Canada will continue to develop. The prairie provinces themselves have been computed to import sugar worth $10,000,000 every year. This might well be supplied by six or seven more factories like that at Raymond, cultivating 60,000 to 75,000 acres, giving employment to 5,000 farmers, 8,000 hand labourers and 2,000 factory workers, and utilizing each year 125,000 tons of coal, 1,500,000 sugar bags, 30,000 tons of limerock, 3,000 tons of coke, 200 tons of soda ash, and large supplies of other materials.

I direct the attention of hon. members of the committee to the number of acres which could be taken out of wheat production. This article indicates the possibilities in the beet sugar industry, but I am afraid that so far these have been neglected in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: Might I ask a question of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would ask hon. members kindly to jot down any questions they want to ask. I am ready to answer any question, but if a question is worth asking, it is worth noting down. I wish hon. members would do that as I am not as used to this sort of thing as they are. We need the development of this industry to protect our irrigation projects. In Alberta we have $35,000,000 invested in such projects. Is this investment to be lost or are we going to develop it into a magnificent asset? This investment will be lost unless an economical use is made of these projects. This will be the result for reasons which I have not the time to discuss but which I shall be ready to discuss in answer to questions by hon. members. I should like to quote again from the pamphlet, Why Canada Needs Sugar Beets, at page 13, as follows:

> The irrigation projects in Alberta represent an investment of over $35,000,000. The future of southern Alberta depends largely on the success of these projects, and the expansion of the sugar beet industry is essential if disaster is to be avoided.

I quote again from page 9 of the same pamphlet:

The importance of the industry in relation to successful irrigation farming is fully appreciated by the federal United States government. The reclamation bureau considers the sugar beet industry second only to good land and a dependable water supply in assuring the success of any major irrigation enterprise.

In my constituency I may say that we have good land and an abundance of water. We also have a wonderful climate as far as sunny warm weather is concerned. All this is necessary to the successful production of sugar beets. I continue:

The sugar industry is protected by a high tariff scale. The following table shows the changes that have been made from time to time in the tariff scale on raw sugar imports of 96 degrees polariscopic test and where it stands at present:

1907—Full duty,	1·685	cents	per	pound
1913—Full duty,	1·256	cents	per	pound
1921—Full duty,	2·00	cents	per	pound
1922—Full duty,	2·206	cents	per	pound
1930—Full duty,	2·50	cents	per	pound

Hon. members will note that there has been no change in the Canadian duty. The United States has seen fit to protect more and more its beet sugar industry. What can be the very good reasons why Canada has failed to take similar action? So far, these reasons have not been brought forward. I have not yet seen these reasons brought forward. We have, in addition to what is now under irrigation, a great area of land in Alberta and Saskatchewan that could be irrigated.

It is important to us nationally that we should have a sugar supply. I do not wish to stress this too much, but I hope that hon. members will not neglect this matter until it is too late. In the event of war we would have fourteen per cent of our sugar supply. We would have no sugar whatever for the manufacture of munitions, and while there are many people who are inclined to scoff at the possibility of Canada ever again being at war, I think it would be wise for us to keep our feet on the ground so far as that is concerned. Canada could easily produce her full requirements of sugar and, besides that, produce some for export, which she could use for the manufacturing of munitions, should that necessity arise. We are leaving this matter entirely neglected.

I come now to our trade balance. I do not think I shall ever forget the words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) when he pointed out the seriousness of running up an adverse trade balance; I shall worry about that as long as I have anything to do with public life in this country. Everything we can do to produce the things we need ourselves we ought to do, for that is a sound policy according to the best thought of to-day. And through sugar we could do much with respect to the trade balance. Well, perhaps I had better not read what I was going to give the committee in that regard. I have some striking material that shows what we could do in this connection, but I shall let it go.

There is another important matter and that is the question of agricultural stability. I drew to the attention of the committee some time ago this fact, drawn from Economic Changes in the United States, a book quoted by Stuart Chase, that in the United States in 1927 the farmers as a class lost $1,717,000,000. The condition is, I believe, quite as serious in Canada. We are facing a time of great stress for farmers and we must do that which will stabilize the farming industry. And there is nothing that will stabilize the industry so well as the growing of sugar beets. Let me quote an example to show how it affects mixed farming. I quote from page 13 of the pamphlet to which I have referred:

The sugar beet is the only crop for which we have an established market, and then only to a very limited extent. This crop fulfils all the requirements as the basis of a rotation, and with the beet tops, molasses and pulp as byproducts, it forms the cornerstone of mixed farming. It has a beneficial result on all other farming operations, and with its guaranteed price, through the contract system, gives a stability of income that in itself is of inestimable value to the economic well-being and morale of the farmer. It also means balanced farms, stable rural communities and the making of the real homes that only come with the feeling of security. The influence of the industry on agriculture in general is tremendous. To quote from the report of the "Sugar Beet Industry at Home and Abroad," issued by the British Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, page 51, paragraph 129—

May I pause here to make these observations. As regards the statement that the guaranteed price gives a stability of income that in itself is of inestimable value to the well-being and morale of the farmer, I can testify from my personal experience with these men that this is absolutely true. I would point out that several times since I have come to the house I have heard hon. members referring to the British way of doing things. Well, this is what they are doing with respect to the sugar beet industry:

The introduction of roots into the economy of the farm about the middle of the eighteenth century was an important factor in the agricultural revolution which began about that time. Its most important effect was to provide a crop, the cultivation of which enabled the land to be cleaned and to a large extent replaced the frequent bare-fallowing previously practised; at the same time it provided a feeding stuff which enabled a large head of stock to be carried. In this country, when root crops were first introduced, the crop employed was the turnip, and later the mangold; on the continent where the root shift in the rotation was much slower in taking hold, the sugar beet was largely employed. The advantage of this crop was that the root provided an immediate cash return, whilst the leaves and crowns, together with the dried or wet pulp returned by the factory, provided food for cattle. At the same time, the deep-rooting habit of the sugar beet and the intensive cultivation and manuring required made it an excellent crop for improving the land. At present, the sugar beet is regarded, wherever it is cultivated, as one of the most important factors in maintaining the general level of efficiency in agriculture.

I believe there are several other matters which it would be well to bring to the attention of the committee. I dislike occupying the time, but there are one or two questions that are very serious. Many times we have droughts in the west and we have them alternating with exceedingly good years. Frequently when the droughts come along we are in a bad condition with respect to feeding stock. The beet pulp coming from the Raymond sugar factory has saved the situation time and again over a wide area in Alberta, and if we had six times as many factories as we have we could save the situation as far east as Manitoba with beet pulp. A man never knows how good it is for stock until he has tried it, and then he is simply astonished. Beets are practically a certain crop. Hail does not destroy them; frost rarely does them harm, and drought very rarely affects them, so that we do not have to worry about drought if we have irrigation. And it is a cash crop for which there is a sure market.

One other point I would call attention to. There is a great possibility of development in connection with beets. Alberta alone has 200,000 acres which could be rendered good beet land. Canada could produce all her sugar supply. May I quote in this connection section 37 of a brief submitted to the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation in Canada in 1927:

> It would be quite possible, so far as suitability of soil and climatic conditions are concerned, to produce the entire quantity needed in Canada. Half of the present consumption of Canada could be supplied from an acreage of 180,000 or less than the present area under cultivation to sugar beets in Great Britain.

What would this mean to Canada? We are at present taking one cent a pound on sugar produced in this country. This has been suggested, and I do not urge that the minister accept it; I merely offer it as one possible suggestion: The farmers all through the beet areas believe that if the government were to refund that one cent—the government would not need to raise the tariff at all or to affect the marketing of sugar—and give it to the farmer, the farmer would divide it between himself and the labourer. I wish to say a word about the beet labourer because there are a number of these men in my constituency. The beet labourer is a specialist; he could not stand the strain if he were not. The beet labourer could not do his work well unless he were a specialist. A good man can take care of ten acres in a year. Manifestly if he gets only $20 an acre he has only $200 at the end of the year. It was not a serious matter so long as these men could get other work on the side, but the rapid increase in unemployment has made it almost impossible for them to obtain that supplementary work and they are obliged to engage in strikes for higher pay per acre, as they have done. Now that the situation has been cleared up in Raymond and they are getting $20 an acre, they are receiving little enough. They must depend upon what they can raise in other ways to supplement that income. If the farmers divided that one cent with them, taking a part for themselves, this would solve their problem because it would mean about $3 a ton. I ask: What would that mean to Canada?

The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) gave his imagination generous scope the other day when he attacked what I said with regard to sugar beets. I just mentioned sugar beets, but he made the extravagant statement that I was proposing something which would cost Canada between $16,000,000 and $20,000,000. That is absolutely preposterous, and indicates that there is something seriously wrong with the hon. member for Huron North. I wish he were here so that I could tell him this to his face. The cost to the dominion would be this: In 1933 Canada must have raised $1,313,925.01, if she had one cent on every pound of sugar produced in beet sugar factories. In 1934 she must have raised $1,140,029.50. I have before me figures which indicate that the average excise on sugar beet sugar in this country during the last two or three years has been $1,160,000. I have not as yet been able to determine wherein the discrepancy lies, but these figures are dependable, and I assume the others are, so there must be an explanation somewhere. Thus apparently the Dominion of Canada is getting only $1,160,000 a year from the beet sugar industry, and in so doing is committing a shameful injustice upon the farmers, as I have already outlined. I think we shall all readily agree that if she returned that $1,160,000 she would not be doing anything that would seriously disrupt matters. I submit that is one solution of the problem, and I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity of drawing it to the attention of the minister.

Mr. McKENZIE (Lambton): I speak very seldom in committee, and I crave your indulgence, Mr. Chairman, for probably five or ten minutes. I have the honour to represent what is probably the largest district devoted to the beet growing industry in Ontario, and I feel I would be remiss in my duty if I did not for a moment or two speak on this subject. Since I came to Ottawa I have probably heard more talk about the tariff on sugar, and the protection given beets destroying the potato industry in the maritime provinces, than anything else. I wondered whether that was the case. I found that Canada has a trade agreement with Great Britain, and with the British West Indies, which is a British possession, as regards a duty on sugar.

Mr. BENNETT: They are separate. The treaty with the West Indies was long prior to the 1932 agreement.

Mr. McKENZIE (Lambton): At the present time there is a stated duty which, I believe, cannot be changed before 1937, and even then not without twelve months' notice. About that time, in 1931 or 1932—

Mr. BENNETT: No; it was prior to that. The agreement was made not under the late government, but under the government that preceded it.

Mr. McKENZIE (Lambton): About 1932 I believe that very cheap sugar was being dumped into Canada. At that time a dump duty was put on refined sugar coming into this country. It was imposed at the request not of the beet-growing industry, but, probably, of the sugar refineries; possibly the competition was unfair; I do not know.

Mr. BENNETT: It was Cuban sugar that came in.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Lambton): Cuba is not in quite the same position to-day. Because of a special trade agreement with the United States, that island is selling two-thirds of her products to the United States at what is, for sugar, a very fair price. The other one-third she is dumping, mostly into Great Britain, at a very cheap rate. Great Britain has imposed or is about to impose a dump duty upon all sugar that is selling below $1.75 per hundredweight. The sugar beet industry and the consumption of beet sugar have increased marvellously during the last few years. Fifty years ago not more than ten per cent of the world's sugar was beet sugar. To-day almost forty per cent of the world's consumption of sugar is of beet sugar. Great Britain and the United States, which have been large importers of sugar, are to-day growing from twenty to twenty-five per cent of their own sugar as beet sugar.

In 1903 or about that time the beet sugar industry was started in Canada. It made fairly rapid progress until about 1920, when the great sugar debacle of that year ruined a great many of the organizations that were insecurely grounded. Now, in 1936, we have again some thriving sugar beet factories. In the riding I represent, at Wallaceburg they are refining beet sugar at the rate of a hundred tons of raw pulp an hour, or twenty-four hundred tons a day.

Mr. BENNETT: For how many months?

Mr. McKENZIE (Lambton): For probably three months.

Mr. BENNETT: The important thing is the number of months.

Mr. McKENZIE (Lambton): In spite of that dump duty Canada imports approximately eighty-four per cent of the sugar she consumes. The average consumption of sugar in this country is quite heavy. I think it is ninety pounds per capita or more.

Mr. MARTIN: Eighty pounds.

Mr. McKENZIE (Lambton): It varies from one year to another. The amount of excise that is collected on sugar has already been mentioned by my hon. friend. I got it from the bureau of statistics, and I assume it is correct. The excise collected on sugar for the year 1934-35 was $11,037,278. Import duties collected on the sugar we imported for the fiscal year were: not above Dutch standard, $3,433,000; sugar above Dutch standard, $1,373,000, or a total duty, collected on sugar we imported, of approximately $4,807,000, which, added to excise of $11,037,278, makes a total levy of $15,844,322 on sugar consumed in Canada. In spite of that heavy tax on sugar, this product is selling more cheaply to-day than at any time in our history. I was passing through London a week or two ago when sugar was retailing at $4.80 a hundred pounds. Take off your excise, which surely has nothing to do with the cost, and you have sugar selling to-day on the market at $3.80 per hundred pounds.

Mr. BENNETT: The duty was reduced last year to one cent a pound.

Mr. McKENZIE (Lambton): That is what I say; take off the one cent per pound and your sugar costs the consumer to-day, without that tax, $3.80 a hundred pounds.

An hon. MEMBER: Retail.

Mr. McKENZIE (Lambton): Retail, yes. It retails at $4.80, and taking off the excise it is really retailing at $3.80, the cheapest price at which sugar has been sold in the history of Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: Those figures are computed on the two cent basis, rather than, as the right hon. gentleman points out, one cent.

Mr. McKENZIE (Lambton): No, they are not. I took the one cent rate. There is nothing new about the sugar industry. Hon. members who sat here in 1932 and 1933 can remember that, on February 24, 1932, after an exhaustive and careful investigation of the situation, the select committee on agriculture and colonization submitted this report:

> Your committee, therefore, recommends that in view of the existing tariff on sugar and in consideration of the substantial payments being made to agriculture and labour by the beet sugar factories at present in operation, the cane sugar refineries should undertake to provide for a gradual increase of factory facilities for the refining of beet sugar in Canada, and that with the additional advantages in freight rates to points in the middle west, heretofore described, factory facilities should now be steadily increased in western areas where beets are grown, and thereby make it possible to produce from beets a more substantial percentage of the sugar consumption of Canada.

There is something further I should like to say that should be rather interesting, for I cannot help thinking that these countries which produce beet sugar cannot all be wrong. I believe beet sugar has a future in Canada. M. Golodetz, an authority on sugar, writing in the weekly Sugar Market Review of recent date, says that existing rates of duty on raw and refined sugar offer very inadequate protection to the sugar beet industry, particularly when we bear in mind that the cane production has been and is very substantially subsidized. Nearly all of what is known as the world's production is protected. He points out that over ninety per cent of the sugar for the world's sugar market is produced and marketed under various forms of state protection. Moreover, cane is produced under labour conditions that do not bear comparison with those of Canadian labour. Sufficient it is to say that as a Canadian people we cannot entertain the lowering of the present level of labour but should rather strive to raise the present standard.

The other day in this house we spent a good deal of time in discussing the possibilities and the future of the soya bean industry in Canada. The farmers of this country have a great deal of money invested in beet sugar equipment. They have imported trained men from other countries who have become naturalized Canadians, and I think it would be a mistake to have the beet sugar industry forced out of business. I feel sure that if that result were brought about the companies which are subsidized would raise the price of sugar once they got rid of that competition, so in the long run we would have to pay more for our sugar. I do not want our friends from the maritime provinces to think we are trying to steal their markets. I believe there is a place for both beets and potatoes in this dominion, and I think we would do well to devote a great deal of study to this question, because Canada with its great resources will support a very much larger beet sugar industry than we have at the present. Certainly I have no hesitation in urging that the one cent tax in so far as beet sugar is concerned should be removed.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to ask the minister a question, but first I should like to compliment the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) on the interesting address he gave us. It was one of the most instructive and practical speeches I have heard from his group. I can understand the hon. gentleman far better when he talks about beets and acres and cents than when he talks about just prices and dividends. I hope he will enlarge his activities along the line he took to-night; I am sure we would all profit by it.

This vote shows, according to the minister, a large reduction due to our ceasing to bonus cheese. Could the minister indicate why that has been done? Was it not satisfactory or have conditions so changed as to render it no longer necessary?

Mr. GARDINER: The bonus on cheese last year was 1½ cents per pound, and in round figures about $1,100,000 was paid out under that vote, but the increase in the production of cheese was very slight. The greater part of that increase took place at the latter end of the year, in November and December, from which certain conclusions might be drawn as to whether or not it was due to farmers using their milk for the production of cheese instead of butter, which was the original intention when the bonus was put in effect. As I understand the matter, the idea at the time was that butter was out of line with world prices, because of certain policies which were being followed, and as a result a greater percentage of milk was being used in the production of butter. Gradually the output of butter increased until it began to enter into the export trade and, of course, when it enters into the export trade, if it is allowed to run its course it eventually gets down to the world price. It was thought at the time that if milk could be diverted from the production of butter to the production of cheese both the butter producer and the cheese producer might be helped. That was the intention, but experience has shown that this was not the result achieved. Butter production has continued to increase, while cheese production has increased very slightly and at a time of year which would indicate that it probably was due to milking cows for a longer period of time rather than to taking milk from the production of butter and using it for the production of cheese.

That, of course, is only one side of the picture. There has been a marked change in conditions during the first four months of this year as compared with the first four months of last year. Part of that change is due to the fact that there has been a very large exportation of cheese to the United States as compared with a year ago. I think the figures are about $13,000 for the first four months of last year and about $350,000 for the first four months of this year.

Mr. BENNETT: That would seem to be temporary.

Mr. GARDINER: It may be temporary, but these figures can hardly be explained in that way. There is another reason; the price is very much better at the present time than it was a year ago. Not only is it better in the United States market; it is better in the British market as well. Then there are understandings in connection with trade treaties with different countries that may be interfered with by the payment of bonuses. We in Canada as a people took exception to certain activities in countries such as Australia in connection with state encouragement of the production of butter. Probably we might expect other countries to take the same exception to similar action on our part if we have trade arrangements with them.

Mr. BENNETT: No exception was taken by any country, was it?

Mr. GARDINER: Not directly, but there was an indication that some exception might be taken. Questions were asked with regard to the matter.

Mr. NEILL: Would not the United States automatically increase the duty by the amount of the bonus?

Mr. GARDINER: They have not said so, but there have been inquiries as to what were our intentions. Those came after we had made our decision, as a matter of fact; the decision was not the result of any threats or anything like that, but such inquiries have been made. All matters having been taken into consideration, we are of opinion that we can benefit both the butter industry and the cheese industry in Canada to a greater extent by providing markets and assisting in the maintenance and further development of those markets rather than by encouraging a greater production without any special market being provided for it. We think probably more can be done in the way I have mentioned, and I believe our experience in regard to the United States trade treaty indicates our view to be sound. Our greater exportations of cheese to the United States and Great Britain have had something to do with the better price that we are getting for cheese at the present time, and as compared with last year that price per pound is greater than the amount of the bonus that was being paid.

Mr. SENN: I should like to have something to say in regard to this matter—

The CHAIRMAN: Eleven o'clock.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROVISION FOR NATIONAL BROADCASTING SERVICE AND REPEAL OF ACT OF 1932

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the constitution of a corporation to be known as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the purpose of carrying on a national broadcasting service in Canada in the place and stead of the present Canadian radio broadcasting commission, to provide for honorariums, remuneration, salaries and other expenses incidental thereto, to authorize the governor in council to make certain advances for purposes therein mentioned, and to repeal the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act, 1932.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday the 10th instant and subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules provided for other days.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in giving notice of this motion I had in mind that it might be possible some hon. members would find it inconvenient to have the house sit on Wednesday evening of this week in which event I shall be pleased to amend the resolution to begin evening sittings on Wednesday, one week hence, which will be June 17. However, if it suits the general convenience of the house, I am prepared to move the resolution as it stands.

Mr. WHITE: What about morning sittings?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, prior to this notice appearing on the order paper I had made arrangements that would involve the absence from this chamber on Wednesday evening of this week of myself and all those who are associated with me. If this motion were amended to read Wednesday, June 17, it would be greatly appreciated. Had I known that it was proposed to make this motion I would have made other arrangements, and I greatly regret having made those that I did.

Mr. POULIOT: To those within sound of my voice it is abundantly clear that social entertainment interferes in no small degree with parliamentary duties. I would suggest to the right hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT:—either to cancel his engagement, postpone it, or remove himself gently from the picture in order that the session be prorogued to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take full responsibility for the motion in the form in which it appears. The leader of the opposition is I feel quite justified in asking that at least a week's latitude be allowed before beginning Wednesday evening sittings. I regret not having consulted him before placing the motion on the order paper. I would suggest that it be amended to read Wednesday, the 17th instant, and subsequent Wednesdays, and that it be passed in that form.

Mr. WHITE: What about morning sittings?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is perhaps a little too early to begin morning sittings. We hope to make progress by taking Wednesday nights.

Motion as amended agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MISS MACPHAIL

On the orders of the day:

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): I rise to a question of privilege. My attention has been called to a statement alleged to have been made—it is in quotations—by Premier Hepburn, appearing in the Ottawa Journal of June 2, at page 11, in which, discussing compensation for the family of Constable John Lewis, who was slain by Norman "Red" Ryan in Sarnia on May 23, Mr. Hepburn, the Premier of Ontario, is reported to have said:

> We are not involved in any way. He was let out of the penitentiary because he was the "pet" of R. B. Bennett, Senator Mullins and Miss Agnes Macphail. We had nothing to do with paroling the man.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Miss MACPHAIL: I do not believe that anyone really thinks this is funny, for it undoubtedly had most unfortunate consequences, resulting as it did in the death of Constable John Lewis. I have borne a good deal of adverse criticism about my activities in relation to penitentiaries, and in this matter I thought I ought to make it clear so far as I am concerned. I did not intercede on behalf of Norman "Red" Ryan. I asked Mr. Gallagher, chief of remission service, whether he would go through the files and give me a statement, which I should like to put on Hansard. I have received from him the following letter dated June 6, 1936:

> Dear Madam:
>
> Complying with your request, I have had the departmental records very carefully examined to ascertain whether you had, at any time, intervened, or asked for clemency on behalf of Norman, or "Red" Ryan.
>
> As a result of our diligent search, I may definitely assure you that we have found no trace whatever of any communication from you in this case.
>
> Yours respectfully,
> M. F. Gallagher,
> Chief of Remission Service.

I have no desire to blame anyone or to say anything further; I simply wish to make it perfectly clear to the house and the country that at no time did I intercede on behalf of Norman Ryan.

Mr. McIVOR: I would like to make this statement in this connection—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

BANK OF CANADA

MAJORITY CONTROL BY GOVERNMENT OF CAPITAL STOCK AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 82, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. DUNNING: The amendment proposed in this section is intended, as the explanation indicates, to remove the anomaly which now exists by reason of subsection 2 of section 5, under which subsection the Deputy Minister of Finance would be entitled to fees as a director. It is not and never was intended that that should be so.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it not be advisable, Mr. Chairman, in view of the importance of this act, to call out the paragraphs? We have not asked that they be read, although we have a right to. I direct the attention of the minister to the fact that a few days ago he was very positive in his assertion that as a result of this measure the government would have ten directors—

Mr. DUNNING: Votes.

Mr. BENNETT: Ten directors' votes as against seven which might possibly be the other way. I join issue with him. If he will look at the definition of the word "director" he will find it means a member of the board of directors other than the governor or deputy governor. So that seven that exist, together with the governor and the deputy governor, would mean nine votes as against eight if it happened that the governor and the deputy governor were not men that were influenced by political sympathies, and it is to be assumed that the governor and deputy governor are not holding their positions in any political capacity.

Mr. DUNNING: Nor the others, I hope.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, in what the minister said the other day the assumption was just that, and I directed attention to the fact that what has been added to it is nothing new. "Director" has always meant a member of the board of directors other than the governor or deputy governor. That is nothing new. Therefore, as far as we are concerned, if the seven directors are added to the two you have nine as against eight, assuming that the seven and the governor and the deputy governor entertain the same views with respect to the matter of policy. It is quite apparent from what has been said in this chamber that this method of dealing with the situation is one that does not make this a publicly owned institution in the sense in which those words were used last fall in this country from one end to the other.

Mr. DUNNING: I am having looked up the language that I used, but I did not intend the other day to convey the meaning my right hon. friend now indicates. What I intended to convey to the house was the number of votes on the new board which would be cast by government appointed members of the board as contrasted with the number of votes which would be cast throughout a period of years by those not appointed by the government. I have now my exact words:

Mr. BENNETT: The government does not appoint the governor. It only approves of him later.

Mr. DUNNING: It approves of his appointment later, which, I think, rather strengthens my point.

Mr. BENNETT: Weakens it, I should say.

Mr. DUNNING: The words I used the other day, page 3267 of Hansard, which relates I assume, to the same debate as that in which we are now engaged, were:

By the terms of the bill the relative voting strength on the board in each of the immediately succeeding years will be:

And then there are two columns headed "Government" and "Private shareholders." Obviously I was distinguishing between the number of votes on the board representing private shareholders and the number of those representing the government. And obviously the heading of the column, "private shareholders," is a clear indication of what I was attempting to convey to the house. Of course my right hon. friend is correct when he says that future governors must be appointed by the government on the recommendation of the board.

Mr. BENNETT: No, approved.

Mr. DUNNING: I beg the right hon. gentleman's pardon?

Mr. BENNETT: They approve the appointment.

Mr. DUNNING: They approve the appointment, and therefore, for the purposes of the argument I am making, the appointees may be considered as representative of the national policy for the time being expressed through the medium of the government; that is, the broad national policy of the bank. I am not now referring to what may be called the day to day operating of the bank, which obviously is a matter for the governor and the management, but rather those broad lines of national policy which, I intimated the other day in the address I made on introducing the resolution preceding the bill, should be followed.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry to say, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. gentleman has not dealt with the question. Neither the governor nor the deputy governor can be said to represent either public or private interests. They represent no interests. They are removed from the field and sphere of politics.

Mr. DUNNING: But they vote.

Mr. BENNETT: But they are not directors; that is the point I was trying to make.

Mr. DUNNING: They are members of the board.

Mr. BENNETT: That is another thing altogether. They never were directors. I was trying to point that out. And the reason for it was perfectly clear: we were following sound corporate organization. Seven of the directors were elected. I put this question to the minister, and it is a very vital one. Assuming the present government promulgates three years hence a policy to which the governor and the deputy governor agree, and it should result a short time after in their no longer holding office, you have the possibility of the eight votes to which reference has been made and the two votes to which the minister has referred nullifying any effort that may be made to modify that policy. That is a very real danger.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry that I cannot follow my right hon. friend at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the present government appoints four directors, and that gives them eight votes, and they promulgate a policy that meets with the approval of the existing governor and deputy governor: that gives them ten votes. But another administration holds an entirely different view.

Mr. DUNNING: Another government?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, another administration. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has formed a government, and it has an entirely different conception of the functions of the central bank. Then, obviously, the will of the people would be thwarted by this organization. The argument which was made the other day in connection with the national railways has far greater force if applied to this situation than it had with reference to the railway. You have here four men, with eight votes, plus the two that come to the governor and deputy governor as members of the board and not directors, making ten in all, as against a possible seven. Whereas the other side of the picture might be this, that the governor and the deputy governor together with the seven would make nine, as against eight. That position might easily arise because the present governor and the deputy governor are appointees of the government; in future the board of directors will elect their own governor, but his appointment is subject to the approval of the governor in council. Therefore, while in law the government does not appoint, in fact, by withholding approval until someone is elected by the directors of whom the government of the day approves, it does appoint. I am pointing out that the contingency which was indicated with such force the other day respecting the period during which men hold office in another branch of the public service has much greater strength when applied to this case, because the two who control are not directors but are members of the board; they have not votes as directors, but they have votes as nominees of the directors, and they are the governor and the deputy governor. So you have a contingency here on either side. You have either the combination of the governor and deputy governor with your seven private-interest directors, making nine in all, as against eight votes represented by the four government-named directors, or e converso, you have the two and the eight votes, making ten, that would thwart any effort made by those elected by the other shareholders to give effect to their policies. I submit that is not what the government intends, because it is the very negation of the plan that was unfolded by the minister, and it does not give that democratic control of the organization to which reference was made. In other words it permits, on the one hand, men to thwart the will of an incoming government, or it permits those who have been appointed to hold office to thwart the will of those who may be elected by private interests—if such it should be called—the seven elected by the shareholders.

Mr. DUNNING: I grasp clearly now what is in my right hon. friend's mind: I did not grasp it previously. After all the issue is a rather simple one. Pictured as my right hon. friend pictures it, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others sharing his views on monetary matters—I am not at all clear that they are revolutionary, but I am assuming my right hon. friend viewed the problem as involving a revolutionary change—

Mr. BENNETT: Not revolutionary.

Mr. DUNNING: In the sphere of monetary matters. I do use the word "revolutionary" not from the standpoint of force but in its economic sense; that, I believe, is what he has in mind.

The statement of the right hon. gentleman is that in such an event under the new set-up of the Bank of Canada it would be possible that the board of directors might be able to defy the government of the day. Of course there is only one answer to that argument, the answer I endeavoured to give the other day. The parliament of Canada, the House of Commons of Canada, must be supreme. Undoubtedly if such a contingency arose the government of the day, being unable to secure the carrying out of the policies which it believed it had a mandate from the people to carry out, would come before parliament and ask for such amendments to the law as would enable it to carry out its policies. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, they would have a perfect right to do so. The people of this country have a right, I believe, to get that which they vote for in the way of major policies of that description, and I would fully expect that if the bank as constituted at the time such a change in parliamentary representation took place was not responsive in broad, great matters, major matters of economic policy, to the will of the then existing parliament, the then existing government would come forward with proposals for the amendment of this law which would ensure the will of parliament being carried out.

I distinguish very carefully, Mr. Chairman, between that and the day to day conduct and functioning of the bank, which indeed is nine-tenths of its work. I do not assume that there will be a clear, marked division of view between one director and another because one happens to represent the shareholders and another happens to represent the government or between either of those two classes and the governor or deputy governor. I believe that in the day to day conduct of the business of the bank these men, being men of substance, men whom I believe to be as patriotic as any of the rest of us, will sit down together just as any other body of men would and endeavour so to administer the affairs of the bank as to give the maximum of service to the people of Canada, in accordance with the trust imposed upon them by this parliament. In practice I do not think they will be in those watertight compartments of divided view suggested by the right hon. leader of the opposition. After all, the discussion on this bill has had much more to do with what should be done with the bank than with the actual nature of the amendment itself. When I say what should be done with the bank perhaps even that is wrong; perhaps I should say what should be done by the bank in the exercise of that all important function to which I made reference in detail in introducing the financial resolution. Any differences of opinion that exist in this house are with respect to what are the proper and sound functions of the bank in relation to our economic set-up in Canada. That is the point, and that point, I anticipate, will bring about a divergence of view for many years to come.

Later on I shall expand a little on the views of the government with respect to bank policy, but I am sure no one here would expect me to indicate that the bank is going to inflate or that it is going to deflate. How would it be possible to carry on the regulatory functions if I were to make such an announcement? The announcement to-day of a policy of inflation inevitably would be followed by a degree of wild speculation which undoubtedly would leave ruin in its trail, which could not be prevented by any agency that I know of as long as people are free to buy from and sell to each other either commodities or securities. No, Mr. Chairman, the functioning of this bank is a matter of day to day regulation of the volume of cash and credit at the disposal of the Canadian people in order to enable them to discharge their ordinary trading functions with each other. To the extent that the amount of credit and cash is increased, to that extent money is made easier. To the extent to which it is decreased, to that extent money is made tighter. To those who say the bank has been following a policy of deflation I can only enter a complete denial. The facts and figures themselves absolutely prove that such is not the case. As we go along with the bill I shall present further details which I think will tend to prove my statements in this regard.

With regard to the board itself, and to come back to the point now before the committee, the government deems it of importance not merely that government policy, broadly speaking, should control the functioning of the bank. That we deem all important, but we also deem it important that there should be provision for voices, other than voices appointed by the government, to be heard in connection with the business of the bank. That really is the whole point. Shall there be any provision for other government appointees having any voice at all? We believe that to be all to the goods, and such experience of other central banks as I have been able to gather indicates that there is some merit in not relying completely upon a board composed solely of government appointees in connection with such an important function as the one we are now discussing. Government control is essential, in our view, but the voice of business generally, if you like, as represented in this case by the shareholders, is also of importance. It is not as though the shares could be monopolized by a few. That is not possible. The average holding, if my memory serves me aright, is only between nine and ten shares. Surely there is an advantage in bringing to the board a voice which is not the voice of the government, while at the same time retaining absolute control from the point of view of government policy. In spite of what the right hon. leader of the opposition says I firmly believe that that balance is brought about by what we have before the committee. After all the difference between us is very small. My right hon. friend does not regard the governor and the deputy governor as being directors within the meaning of this act.

Mr. BENNETT: The statute says they are not.

Mr. DUNNING: The statute says they are not. That is correct, but the statute also says that they vote at directors' meetings and it is in terms of votes that the will of the directors is expressed. While the statute may say that they are not directors, for my purpose if the statute says they vote that is quite sufficient, and in terms of the expression of view by way of votes the figures will be as I gave them the other day. At the outset there will be ten votes of government appointees as compared with seven votes of the elected members of the board, ultimately working out in 1940-41 and thereafter to six votes of government appointees and three votes of appointees by the shareholders. After all what we want to look to is the ultimate, and the six to three position is the one we will attain within a measurable time. Those six votes are composed of four directors appointed by the government of the day and the governor and deputy governor. Even taking my right hon. friend's measurement of the matter, by 1940-41 the permanent constitution of the bank will be four direct government appointees, apart from the governor and deputy governor, as against three appointed by the shareholders. In addition, however, on what might be called the government side of the fence are the governor and deputy governor, making up the total of six votes.

I have given a good deal of thought to the manner in which we may expect this set-up to work out within the limits I stated a few moments ago, of the policy of the government having absolute government control but with other voices being heard. I should like to be able to set this directorate upon a very high plane of public service. It would be my desire, and I know it would be the desire of the government, to make the directorate of this institution the blue ribbon of recognition in Canada of probity, character, sound judgment, and reputation. It ought to be one of the highest ambitions of a Canadian to become a director of the Bank of Canada and thus have a direct voice in the handling of that great function to which I referred in introducing the resolution, the function of regulating the volume of credit and currency in this country, in order that it may meet the public needs of Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: There was an old professor of philosophy who used to say to his pupils: "If you do not understand anything it is philosophy; if you feel that I do not understand anything it is metaphysics." Every piece of legislation drafted by the late government is impossible to understand, and I congratulate the Minister of Finance upon being able to understand some part of it. It is a discovery! Every piece of legislation—I emphasize the word "every"—that has been put on the statute books during the last five years is a maze and is amazing. It is amazing to think how obscure can be the mind of certain law makers. That is to be regretted; for every citizen of this country should know the law; no one is excused for ignorance of the law. The man who has no legal knowledge, the man on the street, looks at the shelves filled with these statute books and asks: What is that library? Is that the Eliot library? Is that an encyclopaedia? It is an encyclopaedia of half-baked knowledge. It is the statutory legislation of the late government.

Sir, first and always I have been opposed to a central bank. I said it at the time the legislation was enacted, but I accept the views of the majority of the members of my party; I stand by them. In my humble view the majority of the members should decide the policy of the party. But this does not prevent my saying that every piece of legislation passed by the late government was an obstacle in the way of progress. Why was it passed? Because the right hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Bennett) in spite of his knowledge from encyclopaedias, could not concentrate on finance and explain it in plain language to the house and to the country; and moreover each of his colleagues, from the oldest to the youngest, did not know a word about finance. They may be rich, but leaving their wealth aside who would go to them for advice?

Mr. SPENCE: Why not talk about the bill?

Mr. POULIOT: I am talking about the sponsors of the first bill, those who studied it in council but brought no illumination to the house, and who now make little distinctions about a word here and a word there. Sir, when you wear stockings, after a certain time they need to be mended. If you wear them longer they need more mending, until at last you give them to the poor. Here is need for a lot of mending. Why not give the Bank of Canada to the poor and dispense with the mending?

I have the highest regard for the Minister of Finance, who is much more experienced and has much more lucidity of mind than his predecessors in office during the last five years, including the fifth year. From confederation until a few years ago the Minister of Finance was the big boss of finance in this country. He could make the banks tremble. He was the guardian of the wealth of the country. But on account of the weakness of the late government it was decided by them to call for supermen to look after the finances of this country, and we had this central bank act. Sir, we must go back to fundamentals. We must have a simplification of the law in order that the law may be understood by everyone. The legislation should be just as clear to every citizen as the traffic regulations, with signs here and there to show the way, to indicate curves in the road. This legislation has been brought down on account of the incompetency of former ministers of finance who were afraid to take the responsibility for what they had to decide, and who practised inflation in no small degree when they increased the price of gold and passed legislation affecting the holdings of insurance companies. When we think of the way our finance has been in a mess during the last five years, the Minister of Finance deserves every good wish in his efforts to restore it, in spite of the bad legislation with which he has to deal in order to accomplish that purpose.

Will you, please, Mr. Chairman, tell the hon. member for Calgary West to keep his remarks to himself and let me proceed with my own? He is disturbing the order of this committee.

An hon. MEMBER: How about the bill?

Mr. POULIOT: Coming back to fundamentals, it has been shown during this session that the banks have deposits to the same amount as they had five years ago. Therefore there is as much money now as there was then. Why, then, does it not circulate? Because of the lack of confidence brought about by the previous administration. It is now improving. But what counts is not only the amount of currency kept as deposits in the banks, but also the clearings. When the former government came into power the clearings fell by $5,000,000,000 a year. Imagine, sir: in a small country like this the clearings of the banks in 1930 were $20,000,000,000, an amount two-thirds as large as the public debt of the United States, which is a richer country than ours and in which there are many more people. It means that the people of Canada were trading together. But after that administration came into power the amount fell by $5,000,000,000, due to the lack of confidence of the people in that government. That is a matter of public knowledge; it must be known to hon. gentlemen of the Tory party. Yet, sir, having destroyed confidence in the hearts and minds of Canadian citizens, they presume to instruct us! They say: There should be so many directors; the directors should do this and that, "according to my own knowledge." It is ridiculous. It is absurd. The first thing necessary to restore confidence is for those so-called geniuses to keep their mouths shut, and then remove themselves gently from the picture. Think of this, sir: those who enjoyed the protection of the late government, one of whom has now built a house outside of Canada, who was chairman of the investment committee of the Sun Life Assurance Company, and who, when his own bank refused to lend money to his companies, invested the money of the insurance company of which he was one of the leaders in his own business, and after everything went down in a mess, the late government gave a fictitious par value to all the stock that was held by that insurance company. That is what happened; it is known to every member of this house. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) must admit that I am speaking to the question now.

Mr. HEAPS: Now!

Mr. POULIOT: As I have done before. Mr. Chairman, I shall not insist upon it, but I stand by what I have said. The majority of my Liberal colleagues in this house have decided to support this legislation, and I am ready to stand by them. On the other hand, the present Minister of Finance occupied his present high position some years ago, and with success. He had a very pleasant budget to submit to the country at that time. I wonder why he should not be given the responsibility that he formerly had as minister in charge of the Department of Finance.

The hon. member for Calgary West has spoken about democratic control. If the Minister of Finance has the same authority and the same powers that he had five years ago under the statute in force at that time we would have real democratic control through the Minister of Finance. Because of these birds of prey that have caused so much damage in the banking business the Minister of Finance should be armed with the criminal code and should see to it that every one, no matter how highly he may be placed in our social life, should be treated according to his dealings. Then we would have democratic control. The present Minister of Finance is competent to accomplish these high functions, and in that way we would get rid of that mess of legislation which paralyzes the country, and at the same time confidence would be restored and the clearings would reach higher and higher levels. It is very simple. It may not be accepted because it is simple. Some people remind me of the fellow who put a riddle to another man. He said, "Tell me what looks like an egg, is round, contains a yelk and white, has a shell, and barks." The other fellow could not guess it, so the first one told him, "It is an egg." The other man said, "An egg does not bark." "No," said the other man, "that was to make the puzzle more difficult." Every piece of legislation of the previous government was like that. It was always to make the life of the country harder and more difficult, and I ask on behalf of my countrymen in all provinces of Canada that we may have a simplification of legislation in order that the Canadian people may understand something of the law of the land.

Mr. HEAPS: When the Minister of Finance introduced this measure he stated that changes would be made in the bill in the matter of electing the directors. I wonder if he could give the committee a little more information in that regard now.

Mr. DUNNING: The question is quite in order, Mr. Chairman, but not on the interpretation clause which we are now considering. There is a definite clause of the bill which bears directly on my hon. friend's question, and I suggest that he defer his question until we reach it.

Mr. TUCKER: My understanding of the resolution as it appeared on the order paper, and certainly it has been my understanding right along, was that the directors to be appointed by the government should have control of the board of directors. The resolution as it passed the house read in part:

> ... and to provide for election and appointment of directors in such manner as to assure voting control of the board by directors appointed by the government.

I certainly would urge and plead with the Minister of Finance that the act be brought into conformity with the resolution in that respect.

Mr. DUNNING: We are doing just that.

Mr. TUCKER: Even at the end of the time of expiration of the present directors' terms of office there will be six votes, as it were, of directors appointed by the government, including the governor and deputy governor, and three by directors representing the shareholders. The three votes, with those of the governor and deputy governor, make five, while the directors appointed by the government would only have four. On the other hand, however, if the governor and deputy governor were satisfied to vote with the directors representing the shareholders, we would have five votes on that side and the directors appointed by the government would have only four votes.

I now refer the committee to section 9. I understood the government was taking control so that it could determine the general long range policy of the bank. Section 9 provides that if the governor does not agree with the decision of the directors he can refer the matter to the government, which can either affirm or disallow the decision. Suppose the governor and the deputy governor, who will be elected for seven years, decide to throw in their lot for seven years with the directors representing the shareholders. That would mean that for seven years there would be no way in which the government could force the bank to carry out its wishes. The Minister of Finance has referred to parliament being supreme in these matters, but in matters of finance it seems to be that this house, and not parliament, which includes the senate, should be supreme.

If this administration decided on a certain line of policy in regard to the central bank, and the governor and the deputy governor appointed by the former government decided to take a contrary view, and could carry with them the directors appointed by the shareholders, the government would lose control over the financial policy of this country, and this house of parliament would lose control, and that is a very serious matter. The preamble of the Bank of Canada Act states that the purpose of the central bank is:

> ... to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation, to control and protect the external value of the national monetary unit, and to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action.

Suppose we pass the bill in this form; then if it should happen that the governor and the deputy governor lined up with the directors appointed by the private shareholders, we would be putting it in the power of the senate to decide what the financial policy of this country should be in regard to the operations of the central bank. I submit that since we are not taking over one hundred per cent ownership of the bank we should make very sure that we get one hundred per cent government control. When we provide that two people, appointed by the last administration, can thwart the expressed wishes of the government in regard to monetary policy by linking up with the private shareholders; when we provide that we cannot do anything about it unless we pass an amendment to the Bank Act which must pass the senate, then we are not taking over control of the Bank of Canada in the complete way we should.

I ask the government to give consideration to what I have said and bring the control of this bank strictly and fully within the resolution passed by this house so that there may be no doubt about the question of control. I plead with them to do that at this stage. If we intend to have control of the bank, let us make sure of having control. It would not do any harm to provide for the appointment by the government of another director so that we may be sure that the government, responsible as it is to the House of Commons, shall have control of the financial policy of the Bank of Canada, that important branch of the public service, without having to go over to the other house to get their consent. I submit that that is the important thing, and I do plead with the government to keep the matter of control by the government beyond doubt by providing for the appointment by the government of another director.

Mr. LEADER: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be raising points of order, but we are evidently going to have quite a long discussion on this bill and I wonder if the discussion could be kept relevant to the section before the committee. The section now before the committee has nothing to do with the question raised by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). If the discussion could be kept relevant to the particular section it would make it so much easier for me in handling the mass of material which I have relating to each section. Members of the committee expect me to answer all sorts of questions, but it is almost impossible for me to answer questions relating to sections which we have not yet reached. I ask that much consideration from the committee. I am not raising this as a point of order, although I think I could do it at this time.

Mr. LEADER: Mr. Chairman, I want to assist the minister in every possible way to get this measure passed, but I have one or two observations I should like to make on the bill, and if I make them now, it will not be necessary for me to make them later in the debate. My observations will not be too general. I should like to say a few words with regard to the ownership of the bank, its functions and its relation to the conversion of our bonded debt and to the lowering of interest rates in general. If the minister thinks I should do so, I will wait until a more opportune time.

Mr. DUNNING: There will be appropriate sections upon which those matters could be discussed.

Mr. LEADER: I must confess that I am not a lawyer and perhaps I am a long way from being a business man, but I have a few observations to make on this bill and if I could make them now, I would not need to make them later.

Mr. DUNNING: It is up to the committee. I am raising no point of order.

Mr. LEADER: With your permission, Mr. Chairman, and with the permission of the committee, I should like to make them now.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member who has the floor will permit, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has not raised a point of order, but I should like to quote paragraph 774 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, which reads:

> The bill is considered clause by clause. The Chairman usually calls out the number of each clause, and reads the marginal note but he should give the clause at length when it is demanded by the committee. Each clause is a distinct question and must be separately discussed. When a clause has been agreed to it is irregular to discuss it again on the consideration of another clause.

Of course, I am not making a ruling because no point of order has been raised, but I bring this paragraph to the attention of hon. members and ask them to confine their discussion to the clause before the committee.

Mr. LEADER: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that you allow me to proceed and when I am out of order, call me to order. I am sorry I have not the knowledge of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) who is a financial expert. Financial matters are usually so intricate and complex that the average layman, especially a farmer, has very little knowledge of them. That is the supposition, but I wish to present my views more along the lines of a business man or farmer than as an expert.

The bill before the committee has for its purpose the amending of the Bank of Canada Act, whereby the bank will be converted from a privately owned to a publicly owned and controlled bank. With that purpose I have no quarrel. I do say, however, that the method to be adopted, namely, to issue additional stock to the amount of $5,100,000 to be owned by the government, leaving the original stock of $5,000,000 in the hands of private interests, is not the proper method and is not what the public expected, based on the promises made prior to the last elections. I should like to read an extract from the Saskatchewan Farmer of May 28, as follows:

> In view of the disappointment manifest in Liberal ranks in Saskatchewan over the decision of the King government not to eliminate private shareholders from the Bank of Canada, but, instead, to take control of the bank by the issue of new majority stock to be owned by the government, it is of special interest to note that the new Labour government of New Zealand is following the other plan of buying out the shareholders,—the plan, which was thought, by the rank and file, would be followed in Canada. Newspaper correspondents show that the Labour government has given New Zealand the clearest possible proof that it means business. Its first legislative act has been to force through parliament in less than a week a reserve bank amendment bill vesting it with powers of control over currency, credit and banking such as are possessed by no other government in the empire, and by no foreign states except Russia, Germany and Italy.

The editorial goes on to say that perhaps the plan being adopted by that government is the proper one. I am not placing my views against the views of expert members of the government, especially the Minister of Finance. This procedure may be the proper procedure, and it may provide the results that we all desire. Recently the government of France decided to make the Bank of France a publicly owned and controlled institution. The editorial to which I have referred states that the government of France intends a reform of the statutes of the Bank of France to guarantee the preponderance of national interests. The bank at present is a private institution. I will not modify my previous statement because I believe it is the intention of the government of France to get control of the bank, allowing a certain amount of private interest, along, I presume, lines similar to those taken by the government in this country. It seems to me we should profit by the experience of other countries. New Zealand embarked upon a central bank about the same time as Canada did, and after their experience they decided that a bank half private and half public was not in the interests of the nation and so they determined to make it a purely national institution. I suggest that this government—perhaps they have done so—should seriously consider the action taken by other countries and profit by their experience.

In my opinion a central bank should have the sole right to issue currency and to regulate the nation's credit. It should also have the power to control the interest rates charged by financial institutions; if it cannot do that it will never justify its existence. The burden of excessive interest rates is the nation's greatest problem. If the central bank here would do what was done in England with the cooperation of the Bank of England, it would perform a useful function. In this connection I should like to read an extract from the Western Producer; to me it is the most comprehensible explanation of the action taken by Great Britain, which I at any rate have read. The title is The Refunding of Debt. I quote:

F. S. Wright, of the tax research bureau, in a recent letter to the press, gives us some information regarding the refunding in 1932 of the British war loan. Permit me, in supplement, to quote what A. W. Kiddy, financial writer, says on the same subject in the Spectator, most orthodox of London weeklies, in the issue of February 28 last.

"The amount of the proposed conversion was 2,000 million pounds sterling. The holders of the bonds were invited to convert, voluntarily, from the existing 5 per cent to 3½ per cent, and they were notified that all those who declined to convert would have their bonds paid off. Now the British government did not have the money to pay such a colossal sum. The transaction was only made possible by a potential creation of credit to the amount necessary. This was possible through the concurrence of the Bank of England. And Mr. Kiddy remarks that the creation was possible —though in fact it was not resorted to—"and because the investor knew that it would be possible and that the effect would be to make it impossible for this vast amount of money to be reinvested without occasioning a colossal rise in security prices, general consent was given to the conversion."

There are two points to be observed. First, that the so-called "voluntary" conversion was accompanied by a veiled threat which in effect made it compulsory; "either you will do this, or it will be the worse for you." And second it affords a striking illustration of the power of credit expansion where the will is there: as Mr. Kiddy says, it "was not actual credit expansion, but a powerful expression of potential power in that direction." The effect of the transaction was beneficial, enabling a considerable burden of debt to be lifted from the taxpayer.

If one calculates it at 1½ per cent, the amount saved to the English taxpayers on $10,000,000,000 is $150,000,000 per annum.

Now the only difference between this case and the recent experience in Alberta is that the Alberta government did not have the backing of the Bank of England. Could it have had the concurrence of the Bank of Canada if it had sought it? And the further reflection will occur to the student of finance, that if the British government had power to call two billions sterling "out of the vasty deep" of the national credit, for the purpose of debt conversion, why should it not have exercised this power for the purpose of extiction of the debt? Probably because that would not have suited the ends of the money kings. They live upon debt, lending is their business and if the British public had so simple a lesson in the possibility of wiping out of debt, the next step would have been payment of the whole of the national debt! Then what would become of the power of the Lords of Money?

This is a rather long quotation, and while perhaps my own views are not in accordance with the latter part of the statement, I have nevertheless given the whole of it, because I think that is only fair. Let us return now to Australia. Australia, realizing that it could not continue to pay high interest rates—I believe the government consulted the people but no results were obtained—took the matter into consideration, and the Prime Minister of Australia, in consultation with the premiers of the several states, decided to reduce the internal debt—that is, the interest—by 22½ per cent. This was made compulsory, being put upon the statute books. We have therefore lessons from other countries to guide us.

We must face this issue sooner or later. The longer we delay the conversion of the public debt and the lowering of the interest rate, the greater will be the difficulties the Canadian people will have to contend with. Action in this regard in a very short time is inevitable or the result will be chaos. While, I confess, I am not a financial expert, I think it worth while to give some extracts from the observations of men who have given this subject a great deal of attention, and who no doubt know what they are talking about. I wish to quote from a speech made by the Hon. W. D. Herridge at Hamilton recently. It is published under the title, Debt must be Faced. Mr. Herridge says:

> However that may be, the fact is that we are overborne by debt and that something must be done to free us from it. It cannot be absorbed by the golden rays of prosperity. It is beyond the curative powers of bigger and better business. It must be cut away. That means a serious operation. It involves more than a voluntary conversion of our national debt. It may require a revision of the whole range of vested claims. That is indeed a grave matter. But we must face it and face it without delay. We must resist the almost irresistible temptation to try by milder means to cure, in its secondary stages, that dread disease which ends in general bankruptcy. The orderly reconstruction of our undefaulted obligations upon a just and sustainable basis may well be looked upon as admirable. No one loses by it. And everyone knows that it is done pursuant only to our promise to do our best to pay.

And now I wish to quote from a speech made by the present Minister of National Defence, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), in 1935. At that time he was not giving the views of his party or those of the present government; he made it plain that he was expressing only his own views. This was what he said:

> Sixth, I suggest the reduction of rates of interest, on all outstanding obligations in the Dominion of Canada. Seventh, I suggest a national conversion scheme reducing the interest on all internal debt to two and a half per cent. Eighth, I advocate immediate negotiations with outside nations where our external bonds are held, for a mutually satisfactory scheme for the reduction of interest on external bonds.

These are the opinions of experts and as such should receive consideration.

In my opinion one of the duties of the central bank should be to call the bondholders together and inform them that the nation cannot continue to pay the present high rate of interest on outstanding bonds and ask for a voluntary conversion. I have sufficient faith in the Canadian people to believe that they would agree to this, but it will take a national move to bring this about. We have had provincial and municipal defaults and complaints from all over Canada, but the bondholders have merely said, "We cannot meet your wishes." But if the national government, with a united nation behind them, made that demand, the bondholders would come across and say "In the nation's interests we agree to have interest rates cut down." There is no doubt in the world about that. That is why I urge the present government, in the exercise of the power which they will have, to take the matter up with the bondholders and see whether we cannot secure a reduction in interest on government bonds.

An hon. MEMBER: Why the national government?

Mr. LEADER: Did I say "national" government? Well, federal government. The federal government should be a national government, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FINN: It is.

Mr. LEADER: I submit a nationally owned bank should have the power to regulate interest rates on all mortgages. I am deeply interested in this problem, for I know something about the real conditions. After one or more years of hardship and suffering in western Canada through crop failures, or because of crops produced at a loss, the people whom I represent in this parliament held a public meeting in the city of Portage la Prairie, and I was appointed the chairman. The object of the meeting was to impress upon the government the necessity of reducing the interest rates we had been paying, because we realized that in the end it would be impossible to meet the payments. The hall was full; we could have filled two or three halls of the same size. A committee was appointed to traverse the province of Manitoba and discuss this subject with all who would listen. I was a member of the committee. We had several meetings in various parts of the province. Finally we took the matter up through the United Farmers of Manitoba, and at their convention, held in Brandon, I suggested that a petition be circulated and presented to the Manitoba government asking them to reduce interest rates. A petition bearing thousands of names was sent to the government. They were sympathetic, but it appears that they had no power to reduce rates of interest. We did not get the reductions, but we got a debt adjustment act. I am very sorry it is necessary to have such legislation on the statute books of Canada, but so long as the present conditions continue we shall have debt adjustment acts and farmers creditors' arrangement acts and other legislation of a like kind to save people from eviction.

I wish to quote from Hansard of last year remarks made by a then member whose absence from this house is, I believe, a national calamity. I refer to Mr. Coote. I do not wish to say anything derogatory of his successor, but I knew Mr. Coote very well as one who was always fighting the battle for the common people, and I regard his absence from this house as a distinct loss to the nation. Mr. Coote told us what other countries have done with regard to reducing interest rates for farmers. He said:

> In Argentine the banks have agreed to reduce interest rates two per cent to farmers.

He went on to say:

> This rate is five per cent. A corresponding rate prevails on mortgages.
>
> South Africa in 1933. The government paid one and a half per cent on farm mortgages and the farmer three and a half per cent. Any mortgage company refusing to take five per cent, a tax is levied that takes all for the state above five per cent. The amount of this tax is paid to the farmers who have paid it to the mortgage company.
> New Zealand in 1932 passed the National Expenditure Act in which they reduced interest rates on farm mortgages to five per cent.

I believe that through a properly constituted central bank the government could very well compel our lending institutions to accept reasonable interest rates, the maximum of which should be, in my opinion, five per cent.

When the minister introduced his budget he told us that Canada's total investment in farm loan board loans amounted to $16,790,000. When one considers that the New Zealand government, whose population is probably less than one-third that of Canada, has $250,000,000 invested in farm loans, it must be admitted that Canada through its government has made but a very puny effort in the matter of lending money to the farmers at a low rate of interest. I believe the central bank should exercise sufficient power to lend millions upon millions of dollars at the rate of five per cent interest to farmers and others engaged in legitimate enterprise. I believe they can do it and it should be done, though only if the private lending institutions of this country refuse to do so. In my opinion all farm mortgages should be reduced to five per cent. In this connection I want to point out to the minister that farmers up until last year were paying interest at the rate of 6½ per cent on loans from the farm loan board. This has caused a great deal of dissatisfaction in view of the fact that the farmer who took out a loan only as recently as last year is not charged more than five per cent. I have had several letters on this subject. I think the government should consider the advisability of reducing all farm mortgages held under the board to the prevailing rate of five per cent. It would benefit not only the farmers but the government and the people in general.

I had intended to make some further observations, but the committee have been very patient in listening to my remarks and I am not going to delay them any longer. Neither from the government, the members of this house, nor the people I represent have I attempted to conceal my dissatisfaction with this proposed legislation. I believe we should have had a publicly owned and publicly controlled bank instead of the measure that has been presented to us. Nevertheless, believing as I do that the government and the Minister of Finance have the interests of our people at heart, I shall abide by their judgment and their decision and give this legislation my support.

Mr. BENNETT: Under existing conditions, having regard to the vast amount of unused money in the chartered banks, how is it possible for a central bank to regulate or control credit?

Mr. DUNNING: I spoke of it as a regulatory force. My right hon. friend, I know, has studied this matter, and it is a fundamental principle of the legislation which he himself introduced that by its operations in relation to the cash reserves of the chartered banks it would be able to increase or decrease the volume of money and credit available at any particular time.

Mr. CAHAN: It could increase it, but how could it decrease it?

Mr. DUNNING: By open market operations.

Mr. BENNETT: As my right hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George says, how can it decrease it?

Mr. DUNNING: It can increase, of course, by the purchase of securities in the open market, and it can decrease by selling them. That is fairly obvious. A decrease must be effected by the opposite method to that which is taken to bring about an increase.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh well, possibly.

Mr. DUNNING: No one knows better than the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St.

George that a great many factors present within and without the country have their bearing upon whether a given action will produce an identical result to-day with what the same action by the central bank would have produced even a month ago. One cannot but dogmatize with respect, for instance, to what the purchasing or the selling of securities by the bank will do, unless one takes into account all the other factors, both national and international, which are present at the time the transaction takes place. But partly, as I think my hon. friends recognize, that has a bearing on the bank's operations.

The CHAIRMAN: Is subsection 2 carried?

Mr. BENNETT: I understood that we were taking up these sections by the different headings.

Mr. DUNNING: I thought we were taking up each section as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN: That was my understanding also. Shall section 2 carry?

Mr. BENNETT: What is the reason for the amendment to paragraph (d)?

Mr. DUNNING: That is a matter of legal phraseology; it is really a legal amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: As the law stood dominion notes meant those that were payable to bearer on demand, issued and outstanding, which on the day on which the Bank of Canada was authorized to commence business constituted a direct liability of the Dominion of Canada. The old section provided that they were payable to bearer on demand on the day on which the Bank of Canada was authorized to commence business.

Mr. DUNNING: That was the whole point. As a matter of fact the liability in regard to the notes ceases when they pass out of existence. At the present time they do not remain a liability of the bank. The old section read "on and after the day on which the bank is authorized to commence business."

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. DUNNING: They have all been cleaned up, and the liability is gone.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point exactly; that is why I cannot understand why the amendment is being made. As a matter of fact the law properly stated it. The Bank of Canada has assumed liability for all outstanding Dominion of Canada notes on and after the day on which it began business. That was a steadily decreasing liability; as the notes were called in and cancelled the liability became less, and when the last note was cancelled there was no liability; that is the position exactly. They substituted the notes of the Bank of Canada as those old Dominion of Canada notes came in, and the liability as far as the country was concerned was lessened by that substitution. We undertook to care for our responsibilities in that direction by delivering to the Bank of Canada bonds of the dominion on which we are paying a rate of interest which enables the bank to pay a dividend.

Mr. DUNNING: This particular subsection, Mr. Chairman, is absolutely and completely a lawyers' subsection.

Mr. BENNETT: It looks like it.

Mr. DUNNING: Neither the original form nor the amended form means anything to me as Minister of Finance. The lawyers who confer about these things and draft these measures say that this clears up an ambiguity. If it does not it really makes no practical difference to me, and I should be quite content to have it struck out.

Mr. BENNETT: I always say that if the minister is advised that he should put this in, well and good, but I suppose it is sections like this that are responsible for the old maxim about lawyers differing. I cannot see just why this section should find a place here. The liability was a lessening one; as the Dominion of Canada notes came in and were cancelled by the Bank of Canada the liability of the country under those notes lessened until it finally disappeared altogether, and we had the new notes taking their place. With respect to indemnity we gave the Bank of Canada certain bonds of the dominion, so I cannot see the reason for this amendment. It may be that some better lawyer than I suggested it, so I will leave it at that.

Mr. CAHAN: But of course, Mr. Chairman, all the old dominion notes have not been redeemed at the present time. A large number of them must be outstanding and probably will be outstanding for years to come.

Mr. DUNNING: I suppose we will never know what has become of many of them.

Mr. CAHAN: I know that in connection with the chartered banks their notes are never fully redeemed; there is a certain small percentage that never comes in for redemption. I assume in connection with the old dominion notes a large number are outstanding, and they are continued as a liability.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Body politic and corporate.

Mr. DUNNING: The explanation speaks for itself.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. This is another wholly unnecessary amendment, I think.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Board of directors.

Mr. DUNNING: The change here is in the underlined words, and of course it is consequential upon what afterwards will develop in connection with the provision for the election and appointment of directors.

Mr. STEVENS: In a hasty reading of the notes on the opposite page I notice there is a reference to the deputy minister of finance which does not appear in this new section. Is there any change of policy there?

Mr. DUNNING: The deputy minister of finance will continue to sit on the board, but without a vote.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister will correct me if I am wrong because I have just glanced over it hastily, but in the clause being repealed definite provision is made for the deputy minister of finance to be on the board.

Mr. DUNNING: It is only subsection 1 that is being repealed.

Mr. STEVENS: That reads:

In addition to the other members of the board as constituted by subsection one of this section—

Mr. DUNNING: Subsection 2 still stands.

Mr. STEVENS: It appears here as though it were being repealed.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Persons disqualified for appointments.

Mr. DUNNING: The point here was that there seemed no reason why the governor, deputy governor and assistant deputy governor should be prohibited from holding stock in this bank. The intention was to prevent them from being interested in any way in any other bank but there does not appear to be any reason why they should not hold shares of the Bank of Canada if they desire to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: This is recognition of private rather than public control.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a matter of the freedom of individuals.

Mr. CAHAN: What is the meaning of the words "financial institution"? A director cannot hold a share in any other bank or financial institution. What is a financial institution?

[Mr. Cahan.]

Nearly every company incorporated under the Companies Act of Canada is in one sense or another a financial institution, and it strikes me that you would be able to procure very few candidates for directorships in this bank if those to be appointed are to be precluded from holding a share in any other financial institution. I could understand "bank," "trust company" or some similar terms being used to denote particular companies in which the prospective director should not hold shares.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not like to do it, Mr. Chairman, but I might suggest to my hon. friend that he could direct that question to himself and those sitting around him, because there is no change in that regard. That term was used in the bill as originally introduced by the former government. This is a qualification for governor, deputy governor or assistant deputy governor, and because this is a qualification for those offices only I do not think the restriction is too broad. It is only in connection with those three appointments, and because of that I have not suggested any change in the provision as it was in the act.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Directors.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose it is intended to vest these shares in the Minister of Finance?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this section declare that clearly?

Mr. DUNNING: I think that is covered in a succeeding section.

Mr. BENNETT: It must be. The shares are divided into two classes: "A," the existing shares; "B," the shares to be issued. The shares to be issued, the section states, are to be utilized for the purpose of enabling the registered owner, that is the holder, the Minister of Finance I take it, to appoint four directors. But that appointment is subject to the approval of the governor in council. In other words, the Minister of Finance makes the appointment in the first instance. I was wondering what reason there is for paragraph (ii) being in the terms in which it is, "four directors to be appointed by the holder of the class "B" shares." That is, whatever minister holds them makes the appointment.

Mr. DUNNING: But with the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I wondered why the paragraph was worded in that way rather than that the governor in council shall make the appointment, unless it be that the wording used was thought desirable because the registered holder of the shares will be the Minister of Finance.

Mr. DUNNING: That is covered by section 10.

Mr. BENNETT: But logically I would have thought that section 10 would have preceded section 9 of the act as amended.

Mr. CAHAN: It makes it very difficult to follow the meaning of the amendment to section 5 of the bill when the material provisions of the original section as it stands are not printed on the other side, in accordance with the rule. I am simply suggesting that in preparing these amendments we should follow the rules of the house. There was nothing by way of explanation to section 5 which would enable one to understand who were the persons disqualified for appointment.

Mr. DUNNING: In that case apparently the quotation from the old act was omitted. I apologize for that.

Mr. McGEER: Section 6 is the section that deals with the fundamental change proposed in the bill. By paragraph (i) the directors formerly existing, that is the representatives of the $5,000,000 of share capital, are continued as directors of the bank. To-day I am going to address myself to the question of what that means, and how it violates the spirit of our constitution, and perpetuates a system which, I believe, is directly responsible for the impotence of government, for the destitution that exists in the land, and for the deplorable conditions that obtain to-day and that are being intensified throughout the dominion. One cannot look at our municipal situation without grave fears and misgivings, with 253 municipalities now in default, with Alberta embarking, rightly or wrongly, upon a financial policy which only one province is prepared at the moment to adopt and which is directly in conflict with the established policy of the dominion government and with the conditions existing in the old-established province of Ontario where $120,000,000 of municipal obligations are in default, and the provincial government, facing unemployment as it has never faced it before, has been forced to order contractors, who were carrying on works which were giving needed employment to the people of that section, to discontinue those undertakings.

Mr. DUNNING: In Ontario?

Mr. McGEER: Ontario, I understand, has actually cut down some of its contracts in the northern area and men are out of employment, whereas, if needed works could be carried on employment could be found.

Mr. DUNNING: That is too important to let pass. I am quite sure the government of Ontario would regard that as a serious reflection on them. Whatever internal arrangements the government of Ontario may have in respect to their works, I do not know, but it is not correct for anyone to say or to imply that the Ontario government cannot secure funds to carry on works. It has been and is getting those funds. Before that statement goes out across this country I think I should correct it right away, because it is entirely wrong.

Mr. McGEER: One of the contractors was complaining to me yesterday about being unable to carry on because some work on which he was engaged had been suspended.

Mr. DUNNING: That may be, but not for the reason my hon. friend states. It is entirely wrong to state that the province of Ontario cannot get funds.

Mr. McGEER: All right; I accept that. But whether or not the province of Ontario can get funds, the fact is that there is an enormous amount of unemployment in Ontario and a great deal of work needing to be done there which is not being carried on. And across Ontario to-day steps are being taken to reduce unemployment relief, which steps are causing a general situation of unrest in that province.

Now, let me turn to Quebec. I suppose it can be said that that province is not without funds; that Montreal is not without funds. Nevertheless the fact remains that an unemployment situation exists in that city, and that the men responsible for the administration of Montreal and the men responsible for the administration of the affairs of the province of Quebec are at their wit's end to find some way to meet debt and public obligations of the city of Montreal. A great many people believe the reason for that is that we have failed properly to observe our constitution, have failed to exercise properly and wisely the powers which are, by our constitution exclusively reserved to the dominion parliament. A great many people still believe we should have a properly constituted central bank that would issue currency and credit in terms of public need, to satisfy the domestic, social and industrial needs of the Canadian people. Under our constitution there is a definite responsibility upon parliament to maintain peace, order and good government, and in order that parliament may fulfil that duty and that function, certain legislative powers are exclusively reserved to the national parliament. As provided by section 91, matters reserved to the dominion parliament include:

1. The public debt and property.
2. The regulation of trade and commerce.
3. The raising of money by any mode or system of taxation.
14. Currency and coinage.
15. Banking, incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money.

That is the section of the British North America Act with which we are dealing in this legislation. Savings banks, weights and measures, bills of exchange and promissory notes, interest, legal tender, bankruptcy and insolvency are, under this section, also reserved to the dominion. These powers place on parliament the constitutional duty of determining, creating, issuing and sustaining the circulation of the media of exchange that will provide both government and people with a continuous circulation of adequate volume of sound and uniform currency. For that reason parliament should: (1) define the units of exchange that constitute the nation's money; (2) create the money needed to maintain national security and ordered progress; (3) regulate the volume of money created and issued; (4) stabilize the value of the unit of exchange internally and externally; and (5) regulate the circulation of money by taxation and otherwise.

We hear a lot of talk about funny money, rubber money, sound money and boloney dollars. But I think it must be plain to any thinking man that parliament under a constitution which gives it the power to create money, to deal with every phase of law that has to do with the regulation of the monetary system, and which at the same time gives to that parliament the power to withdraw money from circulation by any mode or system of taxation, invests in that parliament the power to create and to maintain the circulation of a sufficient amount of money to preserve a decent measure of progress. Parliament can, by exercising its power to create and put into circulation money, along with its power to withdraw it from circulation, avoid all the evils, or at least all the disastrous evils, of too much or too little money in circulation. In other words, we have the constitutional power, and we should make the political attempt to avoid the evils of inflation and the disasters of deflation, which are just as bad.

Let me say that what we are doing in the matter of paper currency is in direct conflict with what parliament has already done in the matter of coin currency. Under the power to create money, which is given us by our constitution, we create money, not by any mysterious method, but by the enactment of four laws: the Currency Act, revised statutes of 1927, chapter 40; the Department of Finance and Treasury Act, revised statutes of 1927, chapter 71—and under the amendment of 1931 we have now made the mint a branch of the Department of Finance—the Bank of Canada Act which we are now amending, and which was passed in 1934; and the Bank Act, statutes of 1934, chapter 24. What did parliament do when it passed the Currency Act? It declared the thing that the people of Canada must use for money. By section 15 of that act parliament declared that where money is involved in public or private accounts, contracts, trade or other transactions Canadian legal tender must be used. By section 2 of that act parliament has declared that the denominations of money in the currency in Canada shall be dollars, cents and mills, the mill being one-tenth of a cent and one hundred cents being a dollar. By section 17 of chapter 48 of the statutes of 1931 we made the Royal Mint, as I said a moment ago, a branch of the Department of Finance. In the administration of the mint, which is subject to the regulations which parliament under section 20 of the Currency Act has authorized the governor in council to make, legal tender coin money by section 8 is defined as follows:

(a) in the case of gold coins, legal tender for any amount;
(b) in the case of silver coins, legal tender in payment for an amount not exceeding ten dollars;
(c) in the case of nickel coins, legal tender in payment for an amount not exceeding five dollars;
(d) in the case of bronze coins, legal tender in payment for an amount not exceeding twenty-five cents.

The point I wish to make is that out of what parliament has done with regard to coin money a policy has been developed which should be followed in the creation of paper currency money, because what we are doing in regard to our subsidiary coin, which is only partly legal tender money, we have more reason to do in regard to our paper currency, which is full legal tender money.

Under the provisions of section 24 of chapter 43 of the statutes of 1934, the Bank of Canada Act, Bank of Canada notes are made full legal tender money, and the Bank of Canada is authorized to create and issue these bank notes as such.

Under the powers of the Bank Act and the Currency Act we in parliament have created legal tender money.

Let me point out just how money is created, which seems to a great many people to be a mystery. Section 6 of the Currency Act provides that the Minister of Finance may from time to time use the consolidated revenue fund for the purpose of purchasing bullion to provide a supply of coin for the public service. That, surely, is creating money in terms of public need, and if hon. members follow me, they will see the distinction which exists in our attitude to coin money and in our attitude to bank note currency when we talk about issuing money in terms of public need and issuing money in terms of private gain.

Section 20 of the Currency Act gives to the governor in council the power to determine the dimensions and designs of coins and all other necessary regulatory powers. By section 4 of the Currency Act parliament has set the minimum of the purity of the gold and silver in such coins and the specific weight of all coins in a schedule, which I should like to put on Hansard:

Denomination of coin	Standard weight Grains	Least current weight Grains	Standing fineness
Gold:
Twenty dollar	516	513.42	Nine-tenths fine gold, one-tenth alloy; or millesimal fineness, 900.
Ten dollar	258	256.71
Five dollar	129	128.355
Two and one-half dollar	64.5	64.178
Silver:
One dollar	360	....	Eight-tenths fine silver two-tenths alloy; or millesimal fineness, 800.
Fifty cent	189	....
Twenty-five cent	90	....
Ten cent	36	....
Five cent	18	....
Bronze:
Cent	50	....	Mixed, metal copper, tin and zinc.
Nickel:
Five cent	70	....	Pure nickel.

What I want to point out to the committee is that in this creation of money parliament fixes the shape of the coin and the metal content, and if hon. members will make a comparison between the value of the metal content of the coin and the money value given to the coin by parliament, they will realize that it is parliament which creates our metal currency. There are 480 grains in an ounce of silver. The silver content of a silver dollar is 360 grains $\frac{6}{10}$ fine; that is, 360 grains less $\frac{2}{10}$, or a total of 288 grains of silver. The current price of silver is 44 cents an ounce; therefore, the value of the silver in a silver dollar is $\frac{288}{480}$ of 44 cents, or 26·4 cents. The silver dollar, with a metal value of 26·4 cents is given by the Currency Act a money value of 100 cents. That creates the money value in that connection; it is not the silver content which creates the money value.

Mr. KINLEY: It is restricted legal tender up to only a very small amount.

Mr. McGEER: These subsidiary coins have no legal tender value.

Mr. KINLEY: Paper money is legal tender to any amount; that is the difference.

Mr. McGEER: If my hon. friend, will follow me, when we come to paper money, which has full legal tender value, we find that it has far less value than the silver coins.

Mr. BENNETT: On the contrary, it has more.

Mr. McGEER: A five cent nickel coin containing seventy grains of nickel has a bullion value of about three mills, but by law it is given a money value of fifty mills. A one cent bronze coin has a bullion value of less than one mill, but parliament, by law, gives it a money value of ten mills. There is nothing behind or supporting the money value that the coin possesses, and it is not convertible into anything. Once a government issues it, it goes into circulation as the media of exchange of the nation and functions to serve all the purposes of money and all the purposes of legal tender money, up to the point it is made legal tender money.

Mr. CAHAN: But for petty cash only.

Mr. McGEER: It does not make any difference whether or not it is petty cash; if you had a million dollars worth of copper cents you would have a million dollars.

Mr. CAHAN: That is just where you are wrong; you would not.

Mr. McGEER: I would be very glad to take them from my hon. friend if he would give them to me. I would very soon convert the million dollars worth of copper coins in my possession into a million dollars worth of bank money.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member will find that the chartered banks of Canada possess today millions of dollars in silver and in copper coin, and they can do nothing with these coins except to keep them in their reserves for the possible use of those who come to the bank. There is no redemption of copper coinage and there is no redemption of silver coinage so far as I am aware. They are used simply as petty cash and one who has too many of them in his till can never obtain good, sound dollars for them.

Mr. McGEER: There are some people who never use any other money than petty cash. They are not all millionaires and they are not all accustomed to using $50 bills. The great majority of our people never get any money but copper, nickel and silver coins and bills of small denominations. The money of the great masses of our people consists of copper coins, nickel coins, silver money and bills of small denominations. That is the only money they ever use.

Parliament has established as Canadian legal tender subsidiary currency token coins of little or no actual value. I hope my hon. friend will follow me here. Parliament can and does create money as a profitable function of government. Through the mint, which is now a branch of the Department of Finance, the government creates and issues metal tokens as currency which take their money value from the law which parliament has passed. Therefore, parliament creates money by passing laws. More than that, parliament creates money as a highly profitable function of government when it mints metal coins. For example, the Minister of Finance can buy an ounce of silver at forty-four cents and it can be minted into coins having a value of $1.35, with sufficient left over to pay the cost of minting. Therefore, if the government gets value for its expenditures when such money is paid out to the civil service, to contractors, or for the purchase of governmental supplies, the government makes a profit of ninety-one cents.

Mr. DUNNING: Profit?

Mr. McGEER: A clear profit; it cannot make anything else.

Mr. DUNNING: Is not there some cost connected with building and operating the mint?

Mr. McGEER: Yes, there is, but if the minister had listened to me he would have heard me say that the government could create $1.35 worth of coins and have enough over to pay the cost of minting.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not agree.

[Mr. McGeer.]

Mr. McGEER: I do not suppose the minister has looked into the matter. The same thing applies proportionately to nickel and bronze coins. By making silver certificates legal tender and convertible into silver dollars, as has been done in the United States, the government can hold the silver coins in its vaults and issue convenient paper currency against them, get the same results and do away with the inconvenience of the carrying round of silver coins by the public.

My hon. friends talk rather glibly about the small change which they say is not important in the country, but let me give the value of that money which has actually been created by the government. Under the Currency Act and the Department of Finance, the government has created and issued silver coins up to the value of $34,210,267, nickel coins up to the value of $2,259,500, and bronze coins up to the value of $2,772,735. The total issue of subsidiary coins is valued at $39,242,502.

I should like to point out to hon. members of this committee that there has been a great change in the attitude of people and governments towards money. If we can do that with metal, we can do, and we are doing, the same thing with paper currency. I know men will say that you cannot create money without having something behind it; that you cannot create money without having a reserve into which it is convertible; that you cannot get something for nothing; there are a great many men in high positions of authority in the country who repeat these epigrams and think they are establishing a reputation of sophistication, but an examination of what this parliament is doing right now will prove otherwise.

This conclusion is confirmed by this particular bill under consideration. Section 24 of the Bank of Canada Act gives to the bank the sole right to issue Bank of Canada notes and makes them full legal tender. By the passage of the Bank of Canada Act provision was made for the repeal of chapter 41 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, the Dominion Notes Act, under which this parliament issued its own paper currency. In 1934 parliament transferred from the government to the Bank of Canada its constitutional obligation and constitutional right and duty to issue legal tender paper currency. Under section 26 of the Bank of Canada Act the gold reserves which the bank is required to hold is reduced to twenty-five per cent of the value of its notes in issue. Parliament has thus given to the Bank of Canada the power to expand $25 worth of gold into $100 worth of legal tender currency. In doing that, it does exactly what it does when it authorizes the mint to take 26·4 cents worth of silver and mint it into a dollar. The proportion of the money value of the silver dollar to the money value of the gold dollar is almost identical with the proportion of the money value of the gold bill to its gold reserve support.

Mr. KINLEY: Was it not the conference at the League of Nations that established that twenty-five per cent should be the minimum?

Mr. McGEER: It was not the League of Nations; it was the economic conference of 1933. If there is any other information that my hon. friend would like, I shall be very glad to give it to him.

In a word, parliament, by the enactment of the Bank of Canada Act, has given away its power to create and issue paper currency to the Bank of Canada. As a result, the Bank of Canada is able to print for every $100 worth of gold that it holds, $400 worth of legal tender Canadian cash with which it may purchase, among other assets, gold and interest bearing bonds printed and issued by the government. Thus we see parliament giving away its power and its constitutional duty to print paper currency to a corporation that now enjoys this power.

At the end of 1935 the government had authorized the issue of Bank of Canada bills in denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500 and $1,000, and the bank had printed them up to the value of $99,000,000. Here then we see the Bank of Canada printing paper currency of little or no value and issuing it with a money value given to it by parliament. The Bank of Canada thus performs with paper currency the same function that the mint performs with metal; it creates Canadian legal tender money. There are very great differences in the results which occur when the government uses the mint, as a branch of the Department of Finance, to create money, and when the government delegates to the Bank of Canada its power to issue paper currency. One difference is that in the case of the mint all profit on the minting and issuing of metal coins goes to the government, while in the case of the Bank of Canada the profit on the printing and issuing of paper currency is shared between the government and private shareholders who have invested some $5,000,000 in the bank. I would point out that no group of shareholders offering $5,000,000 to an institution that can make money offers any contribution either to the business or to the power of that bank. What does a bank, which has power to issue $99,000,000, and has issued $99,000,000, receive from a group of shareholders who have invested $5,000,0000 in shares? But that is not the worst part of it. I know that every man who takes the position which I am taking must perforce run counter to public opinion and must be prepared to stand in the condemnation of those who will adhere to the traditions and conventions of the past, not only long after they have been proven to be useless but long after they have been proven to be disastrous to the well-being and the progress of humanity. I am aware that when men talk of such legislation as we are dealing with to-day they say that it is dictated by the need of security and by the necessities of sound finance. But in my opinion the time is not far distant when laws that give away to a private monopoly the power to create money, laws whereby parliament shares, with men who invest for private profit, its sacred and conspicuous duty of providing the people with an adequate volume of sound and uniform currency, will be looked upon not only as improvident but as thoroughly unsound and bad in constitutional procedure.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend spoke of giving away something to a private monopoly. We are not doing anything of that sort in this bill.

Mr. McGEER: No, but what you are doing is this. You are—

Mr. DUNNING: That is what my hon. friend just a moment ago said that we were doing, if language means anything. Those were his exact words. Does he mean that?

Mr. McGEER: What I said was this, that by the Bank of Canada Act, which is under amendment now, we gave away to a private monopoly the right to print paper currency.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member did not say that.

Mr. McGEER: What I say now is that we are continuing that system, and I should like to deal with that feature of the bill, now that the minister has raised it, as to exactly what is taking place under the proposed amendment. I think the minister will agree with me when I say that under sections 13 and 14 of the Bank of Canada Act, which continue, the executive committee is an all powerful committee in control of the affairs of the Bank of Canada. Section 13 states that the business administration of the bank shall be under an executive committee which shall consist of the governor, the deputy governor and one shareholder as director. Therefore the governor and the deputy governor, both appointed by the government and, under the act, holding office for seven years, are under the control of parliament, and that executive committee can carry on and does carry on the business of the bank. All that it does to-day is to report what it has done to the board of directors at their next sitting. But it will be seen that the act gives that executive committee all the powers of a board of directors. Now the board of directors sits only casually. I was talking to one of them the other day and he said, "I was at the Bank of Canada." I said, "Are your duties merely formal?" And he answered, "I am a business man; I have not the time to run the affairs of the Bank of Canada. The executive committee runs the bank." Parliament did not leave it to the board of directors. They gave to that three-man committee the absolute power possessed by bank directors and then said that no decision or action of the board of directors shall have any effect unless concurred in by the governor of the bank. Now what are you saying? You are saying, "We are going to increase the government's representation upon a powerless board of directors"; and then you say that you are going to vest in the governor in council a power of veto on the decision of the governor of the bank. But it is not stated anywhere in the legislation that the government shall have the power to initiate any action on the part of the bank, either to reduce or to increase the volume of credit or currency in issue. In my opinion there is not a single change in reality in changing the control which existed under the old act; there is no change proposed in these amendments. Let me put that fairly before the committee. Under the old act, if the governor and the deputy governor, holding a majority position on the executive committee, which had all the powers of the directors and the power to administer the bank, did not conform to the will of the government or of parliament, parliament could convene and by legislation dismiss the governor and the deputy governor and authorize the appointment of men who would carry out the wishes of the government. The Bank of Canada was a privately owned bank, subject to public control. You have not changed that fundamental feature of control; and if, as the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) says, the governor and the deputy governor under the new amendment decided to go with the directors of the bank who are there representing the shareholders, the only control that parliament could exercise over them would be to convene and to dismiss the governor and the deputy governor of the bank. In no other way could control be asserted, and that is why I say that this proposed amendment does not change in one iota the control of the bank which the government had before the amendment was introduced. The situation is an anomalous one. We are a gold country, and I am informed that on the record up to date this nation will produce this year possibly $140,000,000 in gold. The irrefutable facts as they stand out to-day show that the parliament which created the Bank of Canada is woefully short of money, yet the Bank of Canada has far more money than it knows what to do with. Such a situation, if allowed to continue, is certain to wreck the nation, because it is reducing democracy to a ghastly farce.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not so.

Mr. McGEER: All right; let me put the facts.

Mr. DUNNING: The statement of fact is not so.

Mr. McGEER: I say the facts show it. I am not giving it as my statement; and I am going to ask the committee to decide on the facts. We have only $99,000,000 of currency in issue to-day. The Bank of Canada has on hand $181,000,000 in gold, and our gold production is increasing. Under the Bank of Canada Act the bank can, if it wishes, print and issue bank notes to four times the value of its gold reserve. Therefore parliament has authorized the bank to issue full legal tender currency to the value of $724,000,000, and it is using only $99,000,000. According to established current banking practice that amount of legal tender currency is sufficient to support at least $2,400,000,000 of bank credit. Surely, in the face of those facts no one can deny that, if currency and credit were issued to the extent warranted, destitution would not be stalking the land, work crying to be done would not be neglected, and men in every walk of life anxious, ready and willing to go to work would not be denied work because the federal parliament, the federal government, provincial governments and municipal governments are all declaring: We have not the money to go on with the works that we need to carry out.

Mr. CAHAN: May I ask my hon. friend: Supposing he issued $720,000,000 of Canada bank bills—that is, to the extent he suggests—what would he do with it?

Mr. McGEER: What would I do with it?

Mr. CAHAN: Supposing the hon. member were Prime Minister; supposing he had complete control of the currency and were czar and dictator of Canada, what would he do with the money?

Mr. McGEER: I would put people to work.

Mr. CAHAN: With what?

Mr. McGEER: With that money.

Mr. CAHAN: You would pay out that money in wages? I am fully convinced that if you did what you had in mind—

Mr. McGEER: You would ruin the currency of the country?

Mr. CAHAN —your dollars would not be worth cents. That is the whole trouble.

Mr. McGEER: If my hon. friend will just bear with me I may have an answer to that. I am going to deal with that question in just a moment, and I am going to deal with it just as fully as the committee will permit me. I have not overlooked such a simple problem in currency management as that. I grant you there are a great many difficulties in stabilizing the value of money, but I want the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) to remember that there were men like him who stood up in their places in the House of Commons in Great Britain and declared that any such thing as the management of international money could never take place unless the free use of gold was available, and that they were just as positive and just as convinced that no other system than an international gold system would operate, as he is that nothing can be done.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. member allow me to reply to that? During that discussion there was no one in Great Britain, so far as I am aware, who made the contention of the hon. gentleman that you can create something of value out of nothing. The omnipotent creator is alleged to have that power, but I have never known a government or an individual to have it or to exercise it.

Mr. McGEER: I think that is a very glib statement. Being myself a lawyer, being a member of parliament, and knowing something about present methods of accumulating profit, I think it would be very unfortunate if things could not be created out of nothing, because if they could not, I believe most of the lawyers in the country would be in the poor-house.

Mr. CAHAN: That would apply to the hon. gentleman as well as to myself.

Mr. McGEER: Yes, of course it does. What I say is, it is not to be said that you are creating something out of nothing when you create by law something which is essentially a creature of law. There can be no money by any rule of nature. There can be money when people rise to the point that their intelligence will permit them to create laws by custom, or there may be such a thing as money when peoples rise to a standard of civilization where they can convene in parliaments for the purpose of enacting laws whereby collectively they can do for the people that which the people cannot do for themselves. My hon. friend should always keep in mind that money is only a simple tool of trade, created primarily to serve as a medium of exchange, created first by a law of custom to assist and advance commerce dependent upon barter, and now developed as the economic bloodstream of a civilization that is living for the first time when illiteracy has been eliminated and accountancy has come to be generally understood. That is why we have been able to abandon a money of fixed value based upon metal for a token currency whose value comes from law. That is why we are able to take a token currency in the form of paper money and print it upon a basis of twenty-five per cent, and vest in the government the power to withdraw that circulation—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I must draw to his attention that he has spoken for more than forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. McGEER: What I want to point out is this, that if there is one thing upon which this house could have spent a lot of time, and spent it to great advantage, not only to the house but to the whole of the people of Canada, it is that of finding some method to get our medium of exchange effectively into circulation. I venture to say that I have given this subject enough time and study to command the respect of some members of the House of Commons. I have not come to this house without having spent as much time as I could possibly give in the last five years to the study, not only of this particular legislation, but of the monetary system now in vogue throughout the world, the changes that have taken place in the management and control of money, the creation of currency and the credit medium of exchange during many hundred years. This is where I think parliament is making a great and fundamental mistake. We see parliament delegating to the Bank of Canada the identical power to create and issue money that the Department of Finance exercises through the mint. The difference is this, that in the case of the mint the profit from minting money goes to the government, and in the case of Bank of Canada bills it goes to others.

I have dealt with the way in which we create minted coins. I have dealt with the way in which we create Bank of Canada full legal tender money. That is not all the money created by parliament. Let me deal with section 60 of the Bank Act of 1934. Under that section parliament gives away the right to print as money bank note currency. To get a proper appreciation of what that section means the committee should understand that under our Companies Act a limited liability company is incorporated; it has, we shall say, a capital of $1,000,000. That capital is sold; when the capital is paid for, the money is in the treasury; that is the working capital of the company and the shareholders are liable to lose that much money. When you incorporate a bank for a million dollars, however, sell your stock and have a million dollars in the treasury, section 60 of the Bank Act gives the bank the power to print another million dollars in money, and there is no further security required. The only thing the Bank Act says is that where that power to double the capital is enjoyed the liability of the shareholders shall be in the same amount, which is not an additional security but merely an equitable and proper extension of the principle of limited liability which is involved in the Companies Act.

That is what we do when we give our banks the power to print paper money. They can and do buy government bonds with that money. They can and do advance bank loans with that money. They have created an amount of money as great as $140,000,000, and I think it is now somewhere in the vicinity of $118,000,000. I am not unmindful of the fact that under the Bank of Canada Act for five years that amount is to be reduced by five per cent and for another five years by ten per cent until the amount of bank note currency which the banks can issue is reduced to twenty-five per cent. On their present capital they will still be able to issue, free, $36,000,000 of money. Let me recapitulate those figures. At the end of the year 1935 the total money in existence in Canada consisted of:

(1) Gold coins	Nil
(2) Moneys minted and issued in pursuance to the provisions of the Currency Act, consisting of silver, nickel and bronze coins	$ 33,674,787
(3) Moneys issued by the Bank of Canada under the Bank of Canada Act	99,677,229
(4) Moneys issued under the Bank Act, chartered bank notes	118,928,662
	$252,280,678

There has been in the last year a drop of about $6,000,000 in the amount of silver, nickel and bronze coins, and another substantial drop in the total amount of money in issue. Thus we see that the Department of Finance, representing parliament, issues only $33,000,000 of the total of $252,000,000, in round figures, of token currency in circulation. Parliament creates thirteen per cent of the money and issues it for public use and in terms of public need, while giving away to bankers, who will issue not in terms of public need but only in terms of private gain, the right to issue eighty-seven per cent of the money now in use.

I ask the members of this committee to ponder the situation. In this dominion we have $252,000,000 of money; yet if we look up the records we find that our bank deposits total $2,400,000,000. We do not use either small change currency or large notes as the medium of exchange that carries on the business of this country to-day. The thing that has come to be the medium of exchange is a cheque transferring bank credit, which amounts to ten times the total money in issue in the dominion. I am aware of the fact that certain Canadian bankers have denied that they create money. It is true that they do not create money, but they do monetize credit and use it as a substitute for money, with a bookkeeping system. This is what a banker does when he wants a credit in a bank book, in order to finance a loan, in substitution for the old practice of taking his own capital or the capital that was left on deposit with him and appropriating it from himself or his depositors to a borrower; for that the banker substitutes the writing of a credit into a book, and in that way he just as effectively creates a medium of exchange as does the government when it mints silver coins, or as does the Bank of Canada when it prints bills, or as does a chartered bank when it prints bank note currency.

Let me show you how this works out. As I say, we had $39,000,000 of metal coins in 1934 and only $33,000,000 in 1935, but in Bank of Canada bills, bank notes and bank deposits we have $2,500,000,000. Thus we see that parliament creates only $33,000,000 out of a total of $2,600,000,000 of medium of exchange in common use, or 33/2600, which is just a little more than one per cent of our money in issue. It is true that those in industry and commerce through individual and collective effort can create wealth up to a point, but they cannot create the money which is necessary to permit a collective enterprise to be carried on in either the production or the distribution of wealth in human service. When we give away to a banking monopoly that is not responsible to parliament and to the government of the day the power to create money; when we set up in private hands, as we have done, our own Bank of Canada; when we give the chartered banks the power to create paper currency and statements of account which, when transferred by cheque, effectively serve as money, we place the issue of money in the control of those who will not put it into circulation other than under a contract which guarantess its return with interest. Consequently, instead of issuing currency out of the power of government, to advance a general program of progress and the well-being of the community, we find ourselves bogged down under a load of national debts, provincial debts, municipal debts, corporation debts and private debts, that there is nothing available with which to pay.

So what are we going to do? The taxpayers groan under the confiscation of their real estate, and often throw it back on the hands of the municipalities. Men flee from industry because they say that the risk is too great and the taxes are too high. Men actually leave one section of the country to go to another; they are leaving some of our overtaxed cities to-day and are actually leaving our country rather than submit to the confiscation of wealth by taxation which is still increasing. We have done some extraordinary things in this parliament. We have put on an eight per cent sales tax, the highest ever imposed in the Dominion of Canada, and in addition we have proposed to invite the nine provinces to levy additional sales taxes. Well, I speak with some little experience as a municipal administrator, and I say that you can do to investment in business in this country what has already been done to investment in real estate in Canada. You can destroy it by taxation.

This Bank of Canada does not provide, as I thought we promised, a properly constituted central bank which would issue currency and credit in terms of public need, not in terms of private gain. We are not doing that at all; we are perpetuating the worst kind of system, under which the sort of thing I have indicated is carried on, and I just want to draw the attention of hon. members to what it has cost this nation to carry on a system of that kind. These figures should make every hon. member think seriously before he votes for a system to continue the issue of currency and credit in terms of private gain. At the close of the war our national debt stood at $1,400,000,000. Since then we have paid out from consolidated revenue fund $2,200,000,000 on account of interest. We have paid on account of principal $275,000,000, or, since 1918 a debt cost of $2,475,000,000. Notwithstanding that enormous contribution our national debt in the same period of time has risen from $1,400,000,000 to $3,200,000,000. Taking the average of our deficits and interest charges as we now face them in 1936, averaging them back to 1931, we are going behind at the rate of $2,400,000,000 a decade. And that is only the federal account. The municipal account is just as bad; the provincial account is just as bad, and the load of corporation and personal debt is bringing disaster everywhere.

What has parliament done in the past? Influenced and directed by those who claim a special knowledge of political economy and monetary control, it has said that parliament cannot be trusted with the issue of money; that it would spend too much, and that, therefore, we must put the brakes on by borrowing at interest and have the taxpayer stand behind to defy governments and put them out if they dare to spend too much.

But that did not work. Parliament said: Let us throw the burden on posterity. We borrowed to build roads, to build railways, and to build bridges across the St. Lawrence, believing that posterity was to carry the load. But, unfortunately for this generation, we have caught up to posterity, and the load which we thought posterity was going to bear we find that we cannot carry ourselves. A debt system is not a sound money system. A debt claim system, under which men interested in interest bearing bonds control the issue of currency and credit, is not a safe system. If we are going to have progress financed and democracy maintained we must do what has been done with the post office, administer it as a public utility largely free from partisan influence. We must do with our money system what we have done with out customs' system, administer it as a public undertaking largely free from partisan influence, and build it up until it earns the respect of everyone. We must establish the Bank of Canada as the supreme court of finance in the dominion and have men in charge of it who will serve just as honestly and efficiently and effectively as the men in the supreme court of Canada. That is not an impossible proposal. The Minister of Finance will agree that the Commonwealth Bank of Australia has no capital stock at all, and this kind of institution should not have any stock.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is right, but it had an advance from the treasury.

Mr. McGEER: But no capital stock, and it is wholly publicly owned. I think the Minister of Finance will agree that the Bank of New Zealand has been changed from one in part publicly owned and in part privately owned to a wholly publicly owned bank.

Mr. BENNETT: The Bank of Australia was started as an ordinary chartered bank.

Mr. McGEER: But that has been wiped out. I am talking about the Commonwealth Bank of Australia which stands to-day as a publicly owned institution.

Mr. BENNETT: And does a banking business.

Mr. McGEER: Quite true, and is doing it very effectively. A gentleman stopped off in Alberta the other day who said that he came to look at the farmers of that province; he said that he thought they would be prosperous but he found they were not prosperous at all. It is impossible for them to carry their load of debt. In Australia, he said, we have plenty of money; we have reduced the debt load of the farmer; we have cut the interest and taken care of the sale of his commodities; we have spent £500,000,000 in building roads, eliminating unemployment, and we are infinitely better off and have done this very largely through the assistance of the commonwealth bank. That is the kind of banking business they are doing. That is banking business which is public and banking business which is private, and I do not want anyone to think that when I suggest the creation of a nationally owned and controlled Bank of Canada I have any intention of interfering improperly with the commercial banking system. But there is an answer to the question which the leader of the opposition put to the Minister of Finance earlier in this debate, and that is that the Bank of Canada should be given power to stop the chartered banks from inflating with bank money. It should be able to keep them under control and force them to deposit with the Bank of Canada the amount of deposits that should not be used, in order to avoid inflation if necessary. That authority should be exercised by the Bank of Canada, and that is one way by which the amount of credit and currency issued by the chartered banks can be effectively controlled. The idea of talking of open market operations or raising the rate of interest on $99,000,000 when you have a chartered bank system that operates with $2,400,000,000 of bank deposits! Everyone knows to-day that the old idea of regulating the flow and withdrawal of bank credit by the bank rate and open market operations is utter nonsense. It has been abandoned in Great Britain, Australia, Japan, France and the United States, and direct control by those responsible for the administration of public credit is now in operation not only in the banks but in the stock market.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Commercial intelligence service, including miscellaneous expenditure in connection with Canada's trade, $733,400.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister explain the reason for the increase?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The increase is accounted for by some increases in salaries and in travelling expenses.

Mr. HEAPS: There is one word I should like to say before this item passes, and it is more in the form of a question to the minister. I know it is the policy of the government to try to extend our trade as much as they possibly can; in fact, that is one of the methods they are adopting to bring about a better state of affairs in this country. Canada still has an embargo, I believe, on trade with Russia. Earlier in the session a question was put to the minister by my colleague from Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and at that time I think the minister's answer was that the matter was still under consideration. Personally I cannot see by what process of reasoning we still maintain an embargo on trade with Russia. It is true that politically we do not see eye to eye with her in respect to her institutions, but if that is going to be taken as the yardstick in judging what countries we shall trade with, we shall have to break off trading relations with many other countries of the world. We could very easily find an excuse, for example, for breaking off trade with Germany, for under its present regime it has committed more atrocities, I believe, than were committed in the last two hundred years in Russia, and yet we have never thought of breaking off trading relations with Germany. We have been compelled to apply sanctions to a certain extent to Italy, but we have not entirely broken off trading relations with her although she has violated world pacts. Japan is doing things in Manchuria and northern China which are in violation of international agreements, but so far from breaking off trading relations with Japan, the present government has entered into negotiations to ease our trading relations with that country. When those are the conditions prevailing I cannot see any logical reason why there should be an embargo, so far as Canada is concerned, on trading with Russia. I should like to know if the minister has had the matter under consideration, and, if so, what steps he or the department or the government intends to take in regard to the matter.

Mr. EULER: I think I might agree with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) that certainly it is not one of the considerations, so far as trading with Russia is concerned, that Russia has a different system of government from ours. That does not enter into the question at all.

Mr. BENNETT: It never did.

Mr. EULER: I am speaking just for this government.

Mr. BENNETT: The statute contains special provisions, and that was not a provision of the statute.

Mr. EULER: I made no reference to the statute.

Mr. BENNETT: I was referring to the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. HEAPS: I made no reference to any statute.

Mr. EULER: I am referring to the subject merely because my hon. friend has brought it up, and I am simply making that observation. I do not know that I can add a great deal to what I said some time ago when a similar question was asked. Perhaps I can only repeat that so far as the government is concerned we would like to do business with every country in the world if the conditions were right and proper, and so far as trading with Russia and the removal of the embargo are concerned, at the moment that is still a matter for consideration. That is as far as I can go at present.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister state the difficulties in the way of establishing an understanding so far as trading with Russia is concerned, in just the same way that Great Britain and the United States are now trading with her?

Mr. EULER: I am afraid that I could not say that there are any particular difficulties. I would perhaps satisfy my hon. friend if I asked him just to possess his soul in patience for some little time because the matter is receiving consideration.

Mr. HEAPS: I am a very patient soul, and I shall content myself in patience until another session comes round, by which time I trust that some progress will have been made in that direction.

Mr. BLAIR: For some time, Mr. Chairman, I have been worried over the price of Canadian bacon in Great Britain. I have before me quotations showing that Danish bacon brings two cents a pound more in Great Britain than does our Canadian bacon, and those who will take the trouble to look up prices will find that the Danish farmer receives 4·7 cents a pound more for his bacon than we do in Canada. There are complaints that the bales in which bacon is shipped out of this country are not put up uniformly; that a poor piece of bacon will be put with a good piece, and for many years the type of bacon going out of Canada has not been regulated. There are five grades of No. 1 Canadian bacon, and we think the grading of bacon that is shipped out of Canada would help a great deal in this situation. We also feel that if our bacon were of a uniform quality, this would help a great deal. I should be glad if the minister would tell us how many different grades of bacon there are in No. 1 that is shipped out of this country.

There is another angle to the question. Those who are best informed on the matter tell us that we have not the right type of bacon hog. We have reports from a friend of the minister, Mr. Schneider in Kitchener, and from Mr. J. S. McLean, of Canada Packers that it would mean twelve millions of dollars to Canada if we got a different type of pig, say the Danish pig. The Danes have specialized in bacon and dairying for the last seventy years, and have surpassed other nations in that field. The Danish pigs have proven themselves to be the best breeding stock. While the trade agreement helped to a certain extent, the fact remains that the Danes are pushing us right off the British market and getting a better price for their bacon. One of the reasons why we want the Danish pig in Canada is that at birth they are twice the size of the Yorkshire pig. They are much better mothers and have smaller shoulders and necks. They have larger hams which will grow faster and will weigh 225 pounds four weeks earlier than the Yorkshire pig. The Danish pig is wanted by the Canadian packer. This may not be interesting to some of the Toronto members, but it is interesting to the farmers who live north of Toronto, and it certainly is interesting to the people in my district. These people have been driven to extreme need, and it must not be forgotten that it is generally the pigs that pay the mortgage on the farm. Mr. J. S. McLean, President of Canada Packers Limited, has stated that if Canadian hogs had been as good as Danish hogs, during the last three years the Canadian farmer would have received $12,000,000 more for his hogs. That is a great deal of money, and I think attention should be directed to this statement.

For eight years I have tried to get the Danish hog into Canada, but there is an oligarchy in the Department of Agriculture past which it was impossible to get. There is a man in the department who occupies a room nearly as large as this chamber. Things have gone to his head and he believes he is Mussolini. I think it is time that the officials of this department should be told what they should do. Our ministers have had great difficulty. The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), when he was minister, tried to get the Danish pig into Canada, but he was not successful. The former Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Weir, tried to get them in. The department agreed to let in the landrace pig from Sweden, but they would not let in the Danish pig. The Swedish pig is much inferior, but the former minister had to abide by the ruling of the oligarchy. The present Minister (Mr. Gardiner) has told me, both publicly and privately, that he will help me to get the Danish pig in. I know he has his battles to fight and I know those in the animal husbandry division will try hard to see that he does not get the Danish pig in. Nevertheless he has given his promise and I rely on it. This would mean many millions of dollars to the people of Canada. I think this matter comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce as it really means trying to get as much as we can for the production of our farmers.

Mr. LEADER: Mr. Chairman, I want to draw just one matter to the attention of the minister. At one time we enjoyed a promising trade in pure bred cattle with New Zealand and Australia, but this trade has been lost. At the present time most of it is going to the United States. I take some farm papers and I am well aware of the fact that the United States are very proud that they have been able to get the representatives of the governments of Australia and New Zealand to purchase suitable pure bred stock in that country. We have trade commissioners in New Zealand and Australia, and I think they should be notified that there is in Canada pure bred stock which will compare very favourably with anything there is in the United States. When the governments of those two countries again send their representatives abroad to secure pure bred stock, our trade commissioners should invite them to come to this country. It might be asked if this stock can be obtained in Canada. I may say that within the last three weeks I have had the opportunity of visiting some herds in Ontario and I say most definitely and emphatically that we have some wonderful pure bred cattle. I am a practical man and I know what I am talking about. I have reared stock which was good enough to go to Australia and New Zealand. I urge the minister to take up this matter with the trade commissioners who should ask the representatives of the governments of these countries at least to visit Canada to see what they can get from their sister dominion.

Mr. BARBER: Is the Commercial Intelligence Journal included in this vote? If so, what was the cost of publication?

Mr. EULER: That would come under printing. The hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Blair) is interested in the breeding of Danish pigs, and he states that the Department of Trade and Commerce should attempt to promote the breeding of this particular type of animal. This department is always interested in the promotion of trade of all kinds with all countries, but I am afraid I am at a loss to answer any questions referring to the selection of any particular kind of pig as being the most suitable for production in this country. I think that would come under the live stock branch of the Department of Agriculture. With all respect to my hon. friend, perhaps he ought to make his representations to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). He stated that the exports of bacon to Great Britain had fallen off, while those from Denmark had increased.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the exact opposite.

Mr. EULER: As a matter of fact, our exports to Great Britain have increased in greater proportion than have the exports from Denmark. With regard to quality, I am sure the hon. member would be interested in knowing that in a recent competition held in London, England, a firm of packers in the well known city of Kitchener took first prize.

Mr. BLAIR: Would the minister permit a correction? Until the imperial agreements our bacon exports fell off.

Mr. EULER: That is just exactly what I was going to say. I am sure the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) would have said that himself in a few minutes if he intended to speak on this matter.

I have not a great deal of information with regard to the sale of pure bred cattle, but I can say that there is a preference for that particular kind of cattle from the British isles. The Australian government are granting loans for the purchase of pure bred cattle in the United Kingdom. Rightly or wrongly, Australia is embarking upon a definite policy of buying from those who buy from them. There is a very heavy balance in favour of Canada in our trade with Australia, but for the benefit of my hon. friend from Manitoba, I may say that this country hopes to negotiate a new agreement with Australia and his representations will be borne in mind when that time comes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is it a fact that the United States ship most of the hams entering England? Why is it that that country ships most of the hams to England while Canada ships few or none?

Mr. EULER: I have no information with regard to the matter.

Mr. STEVENS: There is a matter which I think should receive the minister's attention. The hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Blair) very properly raised the question of the sides from the number of grades of hogs that are included in what is known as grade A export bacon, but I did not notice that the minister referred to that question at all.

Mr. EULER: Because it does not come under this department.

Mr. STEVENS: In a way, yes. Probably it comes under no department, but certainly it should come under the Department of Trade and Commerce in conjunction with the Department of Agriculture. I know that the Department of Agriculture undertakes to handle all the grading of live stock and all that sort of thing so far as Canada is concerned, and when any action is necessary in connection with the export of live stock or the grading of live stock products the Department of Agriculture is usually consulted and I believe its views and expert advice largely dominate. But if any action is taken it must be taken through the Department of Trade and Commerce, that is, action definitely fixing the grade of export products. Now this is what was found in the investigation by the price spreads commission. I will read a part of the evidence which bears out what my hon. friend from Wellington North had to say on the subject. I shall quote two or three paragraphs because I think it is desirable that this matter should be taken into consideration and some definite policy adopted. I quote from page 171 of the report of the commission:

> Summing up, we feel that the system at present in vogue in handling Canadian bacon on the British market operates primarily to the advantage of the packer exporter and the distributor concerns on the British market, and that there is insufficient consideration given to the interest of the primary producer. If, however, as the president of Canada Packers has declared, the price of bacon in Great Britain fixes the price of hogs in Canada, it is obviously of vital importance to the producer of hogs that the marketing of Canadian bacon should be on a fair and equitable basis.
> Evidence given us has shown that it was possible to secure for high class Canadian bacon a price substantially in advance of the prevailing price and a figure practically equivalent to that of Danish bacon.

I pause here to emphasize this particular point. The minister a moment ago referred to the firm of Schneiders, though he modestly refrained from mentioning the name, inasmuch as the firm happens to be in his own riding. There is another firm, Dumarts, which has just as good a record, but it was Schneiders' bacon with which an interesting test was made in London. One of those who carried out the test was a gentleman named Percival, I believe, though I am not sure of this, one of the most prominent in the marketing of bacon in London, and with him were Miss Cora Hinds of the Winnipeg Free Press and a third person. They were to be the judges. They took bacon from some of Schneiders' export, and they also took Danish, Irish and Dutch bacon, all leading brands. These samples they took to an expert chef in one of the outstanding hotels and after he had cooked the bacon and served it in the ordinary way this committee, without knowing where any particular sample came from, passed upon the best type, and they all agreed on a certain selection which proved to be Schneiders' bacon.

Another evidence that we can do as well or nearly as well as the Danish producers is the experience of the Ontario Department of Agriculture with what is known as the Big "O" Brand. In this connection I wish to commend the present provincial Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Duncan Marshall, for having carried on that experiment—because it was largely an experiment. The abattoir that produced that brand, with the assistance of the Ontario government, took select bacon hogs for the purpose of making export bacon. I shall come to the significance of that in a moment, but for the purpose of this recital it is sufficient to refer to that in passing. They then exported their bacon to a committee of British distributors among whom,

I believe, are two agents of Canada Packers, that is, British firms who are agents of Canada Packers in Great Britain, and other distributors. They constitute a marketing committee in England, and every Thursday they sit and determine what is to be the price of bacon for the following week. In other words, the price of Canadian bacon is fixed by a committee of British distributors of bacon, not only Canadian but other bacon as well. The Big "O" Brand was exported independently of that committee and one outstanding firm—I will not mention the name because they have been penalized and forced to abandon the handling of that brand—secured a price which equalled the Danish price in several instances, exceeded it in one or two instances, and in other instances was slightly below, a mere shilling or two below, whereas the prevailing rate for Canadian bacon was eight, ten, and sometimes fourteen shillings below the Danish. As a rule it is substantially below the rate for Danish bacon. I do not have the record, though, under my hand. But the Big "O" Brand, shipment after shipment, secured that market on a parity, either slightly above or slightly below the Danish price. It is safe to say that it was virtually on a parity with the Danish price. This committee to which I have referred served notice on the British firm that was distributing the Big "O" Brand—I have seen the letters, but here again one cannot use these things because it only penalizes people—directing them to desist and come into the committee again. And they did. I have no means of ascertaining how the Big "O" Brand has been marketed during the past year. That is not within my knowledge and I cannot therefore deal with it. Now, why is it that Canadian bacon has received a lower price on the British market than Danish bacon? I can give the answer by quoting further from the report dealing with the evidence before the price spreads commission. I shall repeat a part of what I have already read:

> Evidence given us has shown that it was possible to secure for high-class Canadian bacon a price substantially in advance of the prevailing price and a figure practically equivalent to that of Danish bacon. This, however, was secured only through British marketing agencies other than those included in the British Bacon Committee. It was also pointed out that predatory action had been taken by the bacon committee to discourage independent dealers from handling Canadian bacon, such as the Big 'O' Brand at a price obove the "official" price.

These are the facts. There is no question about them. I want the minister to follow this very carefully:

> The packing companies include in grade A, bacon made from several classes of hogs, including selects, butcher, light, heavies—

And bacon. That is, five grades of hogs included in the production of what is known as grade A bacon. Your bacon hog fixes the price of hogs in Canada. Selects get $1 per hundred above the bacon price.

An hon. MEMBER: A dollar per hog.

Mr. STEVENS: A dollar per hog above the bacon price. The lights are penalized a dollar a hog; the heavies are penalized one and a half to two dollars a hog, and the butchers are penalized a dollar a hog in the market. Mr. McLean swore very positively—I have his evidence before me—that the price of all Canadian hogs was fixed by the price of bacon on the British market. The best price for Canadian hogs is for what is known as the bacon grade. He, however, who exports about eighty to ninety per cent of the bacon, included in the class of bacon that fixes the price in England five grades of hogs, including those three lower grades. It must be evident to anyone that the inclusion of those three lower grades in their grade A bacon, which determined the price of bacon in England, reacted adversely upon the price of hogs in Canada. One cannot escape that conclusion.

I turn now to a fact affecting interdepartmental officials. When I occupied the office which is now held by the minister, this question of the export of Canadian bacon was before me, and I may say to the minister that he has in Mr. Wilson an expert excellently versed in the marketing of farm products. Through Mr. Wilson and other sources we learn that the type of Canadian bacon which was going forward to Great Britain was inferior, and that if we were to raise the price of bacon on the British market we should have to improve the export standard. So I asked for a conference, and a conference was held between officials of the Department of Agriculture and the minister of that department, and officials of the Trade and Commerce department and myself. Present at that conference were two representatives of Canada Packers. One was Mr. Todd, who claims to be the representative of the packers, but who, as everyone is aware who knows his connections, represents Mr. McLean, and the other was a gentleman who is not with that company but who at that time was its sales manager. At that conference it was demonstrated, from advices we had in the department, that it was the inferior type of bacon going forward which was responsible for the low price we were receiving on the British market as contrasted with Danish bacon. My effort was to interest the Department of Agriculture in raising that standard, which could be done by eliminating the use in grade A of the three inferior grades of hogs and limiting it to bacon and select hogs. But at that conference the officials of the Department of Agriculture turned to Mr. Todd, and he it was who determined what the policy would be. His answer was along this line. He said, "There is a market in England for second bacon, and it is our opinion that it is better to export a substantial quantity of what might be determined second bacon, because there is a market for it." My argument was—and I believe that any expert in the Department of Trade and Commerce will endorse it—that if we were to raise the standard of our export bacon by including a larger proportion of select and bacon hogs in grade A or by limiting grade A to those two selections, we should raise the price of bacon in England and automatically raise the price of hogs in Canada, because, as Mr. McLean said, the price of hogs in Canada was fixed by the price of bacon in England. Do not let us forget that we export only about fifteen per cent and we consume in Canada eighty-five per cent. So that the price of hogs marketed in Canada as well as of those exported to Great Britain is fixed by British prices for our bacon.

It may and probably will be argued that there is not a sufficient quantity of select and bacon hogs in Canada to make this suggestion practicable. The evidence showed that about twenty per cent were selects and thirty per cent were bacon; in other words, about fifty per cent of the hogs marketed will grade bacon or select. So, as the total export is only about fifteen per cent, there is in Canada an abundant supply of high grade hogs to serve the market in Great Britain, the market we should most earnestly foster and develop, and yet to leave an adequate supply in this country for high class trade at home. But let us assume that the argument has some foundation, that there is not enough to supply our whole export requirements and attend to the demand in Canada. Then I submit—and this is what I rose to suggest to the minister—that there should be a definite regulation to limit the class of hogs used for the production of grade A bacon to selects and bacons; the others can go, if it is desired, into grade B bacon. But it is grade A bacon that fixes the price for Canada on the markets of Great Britain.

Let me read further from the report. After describing the types of hogs that go into the production of grade A bacon, the report continues:

> That the bacon committee in Great Britain is composed of British distributors who work in close collaboration with the Canadian packers, discloses, in our opinion, a condition in the marketing of Canadian bacon in Great Britain which demands the attention of an independent body with government authority in order that the producers' interests may be properly protected.

I think that is extremely important. They go on to say:

> We recommend that a board be set up to supervise the live stock and meat production industry. This board should, in our opinion—

I would say here, this board or some other body:

> —immediately on its appointment make a careful survey of the situation in the British market with a view to:
>
> (a) Ascertaining to what extent Canadian packers and the British bacon committee operate as a mutual body; and
>
> (b) To revise the grading of export bacon so as to ensure the highest possible price for Canadian selects and bacon hogs; and
> (c) To secure such a system of distribution as will satisfactorily meet the requirements of the British trade, while at the same time ensuring full and adequate protection to the producer of hogs in Canada.

As far as I know that has not been done. I am bringing it to the attention of the minister and of his colleague the Minister of Agriculture. I urge them to examine the report of the price spreads commission in this regard and to make a searching investigation of these facts, because the whole hog industry of Canada, that is the interests of the primary producers, is definitely adversely affected by the present method of marketing bacon in England. I had not any idea that this question would come up to-night, and I have not in my hand certain statistics, I will, however, quote from memory, and I am pretty sure that my memory will not be much astray. I believe the facts I am about to give will surprise the committee.

After this report was made I carried on some further investigations of my own to satisfy myself on this point because I believe that the price of hogs—and incidentally the price of cattle, though we are talking about bacon and hogs just now—is of tremendous importance not only to the farmer but also to the economic structure of Canada. I will tell the committee why I say so. One thing that is evident above everything else in our discussions of the monetary question, unemployment and so on is that there is a shortage of purchasing power in the country, particularly among the farmers. Inasmuch as the farming community constitutes nearly fifty per cent of our population it follows as day follows night that if you can raise the prices of their products you increase the purchasing power of the farmers. In raising the prices of hogs we would be making one of the major, underlying, fundamental contributions towards recovery in this dominion.

Mr. HANSON: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? I gather from his remarks that he thinks it would be necessary to import Danish hogs in order to produce English breakfast bacon in Canada. Is that my hon. friend's idea?

Mr. STEVENS: I was not talking about that.

Mr. HANSON: The hon. gentleman mentioned hogs being shipped in from Denmark.

Mr. STEVENS: I am entirely in favour of importing pure bred stock from either Denmark or Sweden, both of which are excellent types. I am entirely in favour of that being done in order to improve the stock in Canada, but I am trying to emphasize this: With the stock we have, without waiting for the improvement of the stock by the processes suggested, we can make a substantial contribution to the correction of this situation.

This is what I found, to which I was about to refer: I took Mr. McLean's statement that the price of Canadian hogs was fixed according to the price of bacon in the British market. Of course he went on to say that there were certain costs, spreads and so on which helped to determine the price, but the point was that it was the price we received on the British market which fixed the price of our hogs. Taking that as a basis I made an investigation; I said to myself: Well, if that applies to Canada it must apply also to Denmark and Holland, two of our chief competitors, and to other countries. I was able to get comparative figures from Denmark and Holland, and this is what I found: I have long sheets of these figures covering a period of two years, and the Danish farmer was receiving for his hogs about six, seven or eight cents a pound more than the Canadian farmer was receiving, using the same ratio in each case. The Dutch farmer received from three cents to five or six cents a pound more. The average for two years showed that these farmers received about 4½ cents per pound more for their hogs than did the Canadian farmer. There would have to be a slight deduction made in one case and an addition in another. In the case of Holland, which was the most comparable country with Canada, Holland was on a gold basis and there was the question of freight, but even if we make those allowances, it would vary only slightly the figure I gave a moment ago.

[Mr. Stevens.]

What I am coming to is this: Here in Canada we accept from the packers a dictum, if you like, a definite determining factor that fixes the price of hogs. It is not the government; it has nothing to do with the government. It is not parliament; parliament has nothing to do with it. The bare fact is that the price of bacon in England is so and so and the price of hogs in Canada will bear a certain relation to that price. Even accepting it on that basis we have a right to demand that the Canadian farmer should receive as fair a proportion of that British pound or dollar, as the case may be, as does the Dutch or Danish farmer, and that is not the case to-day.

I have gone into this matter in this way to demonstrate that in my opinion—and I have worked it out with the assistance of some very able statisticians—this runs into enormous sums of money. From memory I hesitate to intimate what the figures are, but they amount to millions and millions of dollars a year that I firmly believe the Canadian farmers at least are being deprived of, if not defrauded of, by the practice in force at the present time. In this report we have the finding, which as I recall it was fairly unanimous if not entirely so, that the government or some authority created by parliament should go into this whole question for the purpose of seeing that the Canadian farmer gets a fair price for his hogs. He is not receiving that fair price to-day. It is easy for statisticians representing the packers to say there is so much cost for this, so much for that and so much for the other thing, and then show a fraction of a cent a pound profit spread over all their operations. That is quite simple, but it is not the whole story. We have all the facts and figures in the report. Every table of statistics submitted shows that prices of farm products have dropped lower than those of any other major schedule. During the past six years, when the farmer has been subjected to the most difficult times of his history, the packers made more money than they ever did before. That is the point. Oh, I know the answer to that, that if you took all those profits and divided them among the millions of farmers, what would it amount to? That is not the point. On reflection we must always remember that when Canada Packers were organized in their present form they gathered in a number of independent packing concerns of which I think six were closed down, representing an investment of some millions of dollars. All that overhead is now taken out of the price of processing the hogs, but that plant is not operating.

Some of those great plants, which cost millions of dollars, such as the plant at Ingersoll, a portion of the Davis plant, and others of that kind, are used merely as storage yards. But the entire capital cost of the plants that were closed down remains in the capital structure, and the plants operating at present must provide through their processing charge the overhead for the whole structure.

In addition to that, the record shows that Canada Packers have created a reserve which in another five years will completely wipe out all the old investment, including that in the closed plants as well as the investment in the operating plants, as well as paying back dividends for some years, and of course they have also paid very handsome dividends and bonuses all through this period. Now I am not attacking a concern for being successful, but when that concern is so fabulously successful as it has been in the past five or six years during a time when the farmers suffered more than at any other time, that fact is worthy of consideration.

In the second place I say that they and they alone fix the price of hogs. No government body does it; the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the provincial governments, the dominion government—none of them has a word to say, but at ten o'clock every morning the price is fixed, fixed by virtually the one man, and fixed, as he says, on the basis of the price of bacon in England.

Mr. EULER: Is it really a fact that it is fixed on that basis?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, he swears to it. I have it before me somewhere. This is not the exact item I was going to quote, but this refers to it:

> Mr. McLean: You see if the British market advances the Canadian price here goes up immediately, and if the market declines, the Canadian price goes down immediately; and the hogs are bought on the basis of the English market practically all the time. Remember that is not an absolute rule, because there are a hundred variations to it. But the variation from the export basis is always small.

There is another quotation, which for the moment I cannot put my finger on, in which he makes it even more definite than that. However, I think that will serve the purpose for the moment.

Therefore I say in the second place, the price of hogs being fixed on the basis of the price of bacon in England is a very serious matter, but the most serious of all is the British bacon committee. That committee sits once a week and determines what the price of Canadian bacon on the British market shall be. There is no open market for Canadian bacon in Great Britain. Lest I should be misunderstood let me say at once that I do not wish to disparage the value of the British market to Canada; it is of tremendous importance, and we ought to cooperate with the British distributor in every possible way. I am not suggesting that we should do anything foolish or reckless, but I say that we have a right, in the interests of the producers of hogs in this country, whose price is subject to fixation in England, to have something to say on the fixing of that price. At the present time we have nothing to say. As is recommended in the report, the whole question should be carefully examined into. This should not be done in any reckless way; it should be done with great care. I understand that the minister is going over to England this year, and I think it is wise that he should. I suggest to him that while he is there he should look into this whole matter. He should not place himself wholly in the hands of the bacon committee; that might be more disastrous still. But if he goes over there suitably informed on the whole subject I believe that he will be able, with his well known sound common sense to see through the whole business.

I deprecate vigorously the restrictions that have been placed against independent exporters. I believe that there has been some improvement in that respect in the last year, but I am convinced that there is not the freedom of marketing which there ought to be. I believe that we should encourage exporters such as Schneider, Dumarts, and other smaller exporters, many of whom have established a reputation which we can well be proud of and whose bacon is equal to the best foreign bacon on that market.

Mr. EULER: Do they come under the control of that committee?

Mr. STEVENS: Speaking as to the past, I believe they were absolutely under its control. That statement may have to be modified as far as last year is concerned; I cannot speak as to that.

Mr. FAIR: I wish to endorse the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, having lived quite a number of years in the west where they raise hogs, and in a district which has done quite a lot to improve its breed of hogs in the past ten years, so much so that at the last Toronto Exhibition two of our boys took home the bacon for the swine judging competition. A few years ago I remember a number of my neighbours and myself taking hogs to the stockyards at Paradise Valley and selling them for 2¼ and 2½ cents a pound, the best hogs you could get. At the same time we learned that six executives of one packing plant were drawing $70,000 a year each yet we were told we were getting more than was coming to us. I think the matter raised by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) as to the grades permitted to be exported, that is bacon and selects, is a very good suggestion and should be followed up very carefully. If the proper officials will do their share to take the hogs out of the hog marketing business the farmers and those dependent upon them will be far more successful.

Mr. NEILL: Before this item carries I wish to raise what may be a point of order, but perhaps I might bring it within the ambit of the item under consideration by asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce how we come to be on estimates this evening in defiance of the announced program last Friday night. This is the program as announced:

> Mr. Bennett: What business will be taken up on Monday?
> Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver)—

Who apparently was leading the house for the government—

> —We are prepared to proceed with any of the bills on the order paper.

It is a well known rule, although I cannot point to any paragraph in Beauchesne or Bourinot, but a rule sanctioned by perhaps forty years of usage in this house, that the last thing at night the leader of the opposition asks what is to be the program for the next day, and is advised by the minister who is leading the house. A habit had grown up to some extent—it was worse in the last house and it is worse in this—of departing from that procedure and taking up any item which happens to be convenient. This is not the first or second or third time this session that either estimates have been taken up when none was foretold, or certain estimates have been taken up that were not mentioned. It is absolutely essential that there be some faith in these matters. It is impossible for 245 men to be in the house all the time; they must go and attend to their letters and other business; a half empty house often does more efficient work, because the men are there who are interested in the subject, and if we are all to sit here all the time this will make for a great deal of delay. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), in the midst of his very able remarks a few minutes ago, said that he had not the slightest idea that this was coming up to-night or he would have had his data ready. Are we all to sit here without the slightest idea whether an item is coming up, and bring our notes morning, noon and night in case it should? Does that make for cooperation? The government may say: Oh, well, we are going to do it and what are you going to do about it? But not a day passes without some member of the government having to ask the consent of the house—and that means unanimous consent—to pass a bill through some stage. The Minister of Finance did this on Friday night. Any one man can block it. I am not suggesting that as a threat or a hold-up or a filibuster, for I want to go home. But this is an illustration of the truth that we need cooperation; cooperation can be founded only upon good faith, and good faith I take to mean that when it is announced that the program will be so and so the announcement should be adhered to. I would suggest that whoever is leading the house for the government make a note of that, and that when a statement is made it be adhered to. If we are going to take estimates, say so; and if we are going to take estimates, indicate which estimates, and then adhere to that program.

Mr. EULER: I was not in the house the other night when the announcement was made, but perhaps I should take any responsibility for what may appear to my hon. friend as a breach of faith. Certainly there is no intention whatsoever of taking any advantage of the committee in bringing up these estimates to-night. The explanation, as a matter of fact, is very, very simple indeed. It may be known to my hon. friend that there is some intention on the part of some of us to proceed abroad during the summer; as it happens, one of the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce intends to proceed to Great Britain in the course of a very few days, and it was thought desirable, before he leaves, to take the estimates of the branch with which he is particularly concerned. That is the simple explanation. I would also say that if the committee feel that any advantage is being taken of hon. members and they prefer that we rise and report progress, I am quite willing to do so, but it never entered my mind that we were taking advantage of anyone in connection with the matter.

Mr. NEILL: I do not wish to push my objection to that extent, but the minister's explanation just illustrates the point I was making. Surely this gentleman knew on Friday night that he was going abroad. I do not wish to incur the odium of my fellow members by having the committee rise, but I say that the obligation is on the government to state their program at the adjournment and then adhere to that program. This is only one occasion. The gentleman in question has not been going abroad four times in the last three weeks, and yet this same thing has happened four times in three weeks, although not in connection with these estimates.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to delay matters unnecessarily, but the minister has been trying to get his estimates before the committee for some time. They have been announced repeatedly, at least on three former occasions, as coming up, but because of the length of the debate on some other matter it was quite impossible to bring on the estimates on the day arranged. Now it is getting to the time when it becomes almost imperative that something be done about the matter, and that is why these estimates were brought up to-night. If, however, the committee think there is any breach of faith, I do not wish to continue with these estimates to-night.

Mr. NEILL: It is the hon. gentlemen who have not come back from Toronto or elsewhere who would probably have more of a grievance.

Mr. BENNETT: Possibly, Mr. Chairman, we have overlooked the fact that the Prime Minister said the other evening that we should be prepared to take up any items on the order paper because we had reached that stage of the session. The other evening when the hon. gentleman who was leading the house said that we would take up any bills on the order paper I thought he had in mind anything on the order paper, as the Prime Minister had said on the previous evening, and this evening when it was mentioned to me that the discussion on the Bank of Canada Act was to be discontinued and Trade and Commerce estimates taken up, I am bound to say that I did not think this strange because when we are within perhaps two weeks or so of the end of the session the government usually says at the adjournment, when asked what will be the business of tomorrow: You must be prepared to take up any items on the order paper. I am sure that is what the minister leading the house the other evening had in mind when he said, "any bills on the order paper." We usually differentiate between estimates and bills, but in reality what we are now doing is preparing for the supply bill. If I had pressed the minister more closely the other evening he would no doubt have said that we must be prepared also to take up estimates, but that would not have answered the question of my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) as to what particular estimates.

Mr. NEILL: The right hon. gentleman may have known what was in the mind of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), but unfortunately I only know what he said, and if one looks at the Prime Minister's remarks the night before it will be seen that he said "any bills on the order paper." I would have been quite satisfied if he had said that they were going into estimates to-night. But why not say so?

Mr. McIVOR: I can see a redeeming feature in this, if it works from the other end and gives those members who do considerable talking better control of their terminals so that we can speed up the business of the house.

Mr. SPENCE: I would ask the minister how many trade commissioners we have, and what is the total cost, including office expenses and so on.

Mr. EULER: There are thirty-six trade commissioners' offices and thirty-five trade commissioners, at a total of $733,400.

Mr. SPENCE: I was wondering if there were not some more economical system that we could adopt. We have so many trade commissioners and trade commissioners' offices all over the world. Surely we could get some man over there of high integrity to whom independent packers could send their stuff in competition with the other big packers, and who would help them realize a better price. Competition is the life of trade. Perhaps we are confining our business too much to one line.

Mr. POULIOT: Why not have peddlers, to please the hon. gentleman?

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to disabuse the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) as to there being an embargo on Russian trade. Apparently the reiteration of what took place has no effect on him. The former Liberal administration, it will be recalled, terminated diplomatic relations with Russia, but they did not in any way deal with the trade situation. The late government passed a statute empowering the governor in council to prohibit importations from any country that had not been a party to the treaty of Versailles, having regard to the labour provisions of that treaty, and subsequently there was a prohibition by order in council on the importation into Canada of anthracite coal, pulpwood, certain kinds of furs, and one other item. The reasons were obvious. These goods were being dumped on this market. There is no reason why trade with Russia may not be carried on to-day just as with any other country, or why Russia could not carry on trade with Canada just as any other country trades with Canada, except with respect to the commodities I have mentioned. The reason for those items being dealt with as they were has been explained so frequently to the committee that I shall not bother restating it.

Mr. HEAPS: All I referred to was the embargo on trade. I made no further reference.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no embargo.

Mr. HEAPS: Then why are we not doing trade with Russia?

Mr. BENNETT: We are in certain commodities.

Mr. HEAPS: Then there is an embargo on other commodities. I did not say that there was an embargo on everything, but I say that the government, if they so desired, could remove the embargo which now exists. Now that the matter has been brought up again, perhaps the minister would inform the committee against what goods coming from Russia there is an embargo.

Mr. EULER: If you wish to call it an embargo, it is imposed against timber, asbestos, pulp and dressed furs.

Mr. BENNETT: Undressed furs.

Mr. EULER: Undressed furs come in. There have been serious protests from manufacturers in this country against dressed furs coming in.

Mr. BENNETT: Originally it was the whole class of dressed furs. Then there was a modification of it.

Mr. HEAPS: Have not the breaking off of diplomatic relations with Russia and the embargo, or call it what you will, had the effect of almost entirely disrupting trade between Canada and Russia?

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I could answer that by saying that the trade is not so large as it might be if the embargo, if you call it such, were not applied. There is a certain disruption of trade, but I cannot give any figures at the moment.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister any figures that would show the trade between this country and Russia in the last few years?

Mr. EULER: No, I have not.

Item agreed to.

An act to place Canadian coal used in the manufacture of iron and steel on a basis of equality with imported coal, administration of, $600.

Mr. MacNICOL: Could the minister give us an explanation of this item?

Mr. EULER: This is to cover administrative expenses.

Mr. MacNICOL: At head office?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

The Canada Grain Act, including management, operation and maintenance, also equipment of elevators, administration of, $1,927,200.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Could the minister give us some of the particulars with respect to the distribution of seed grain in Saskatchewan, such as the amount required by the provincial government last spring, the price at which No. 1 northern was distributed, and also the price of oats, barley and rye?

Mr. EULER: I think that would properly come under the Department of Agriculture. It has nothing to do with the administration of the grain act.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): As long as an item is kept open in the Department of Agriculture under which this could be discussed.

Mr. EULER: I would not object to discussing it, but I have no information.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics, $375,200.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the bureau of statistics still housed in that old saw mill?

Mr. EULER: It still is.

Mr. STEVENS: Some two years ago I remember that conditions in this building were investigated and I think it was generally accepted that new quarters should be provided as soon as possible. I know the conditions in that building are certainly not fit for continuous occupation as an office building. This is more a humane matter than anything else, and I think some action ought to be taken.

Mr. EULER: I quite agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Let us build the supreme court first.

Mr. BENNETT: A substantial sum of money was spent on improvements.

Mr. EULER: Yes, but conditions are pretty bad.

Item agreed to.

Exhibitions and fairs, $166,400.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does this item apply to work in connection with fairs in the old country?

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I could read my hon. friend a description of the work. This amount is required for shows and window displays when space has to be purchased in the British empire; for the purchase of goods in Canada for exhibition purposes; for the purchase of material used in the exhibition displays, including lumber, paint, oil, et cetera; for the removal of goods from Canada to London; for rentals, travelling expenses of staff, rental of sites for the exhibitions, warehouse and cold storage plants, and other expenses in connection with the operation of this branch. I might give some of the functions of the exhibition branch if the committee so desires.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister referred to the purchase of goods. Would that be manufactured goods, canned goods and things of that kind?

Mr. EULER: These goods are largely supplied by the manufacturers, but I think these purchases would cover mostly food products which are displayed in the windows of different stores throughout Great Britain.

Mr. MacNICOL: It applies also to fairs, such as the Glasgow fair? I visited that fair and I saw a large display of goods.

Mr. EULER: That would come under this vote.

Mr. BARBER: What amount was spent in Canada and in the British isles last year?

Mr. EULER: There would be administration expenses in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: There are also administration expenses in Great Britain.

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. BARBER: We have been spending $10,000 or $11,000 per annum in this country; how much do we spend in the British isles?

Mr. EULER: I regret to say that the amounts are not segregated. There is an item of $33,880 for personal services, but I cannot say how much of that was spent in Canada and how much elsewhere. The item includes: Ottawa office, sundry expenditures, $1,920; warehouse at St. Catharines, $1,200; purchase of new exhibits, including grains, grasses, fruits and so forth, $3,000; exhibitions in the British isles, $49,965.30; general expenses, rental, land rates, taxes, water, maintenance, building, freight, wages, $23,434.70; expansion of cooperative policy to other empire countries, $6,000; participation in 1936 fairs, $15,000; participation in empire exhibition at Johannesburg, $30,000. I might say that we propose to increase that in the supplementaries. Then there is participation in the British empire trade fair, Hongkong, $2,000.

Item agreed to.

Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, administration of, $750.

Mr. BENNETT: Could the minister give the licences outstanding for the export from Canada of electricity, and to what extent electricity is being exported under such licences?

Mr. STIRLING: Can electricity be exported from Canada through any other channel?

Mr. EULER: No; the federal government has complete control.

Mr. STIRLING: This would be the vehicle used?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Could the minister give us the names of the companies that have licences and what amounts they are authorized to export?

Mr. EULER: I give the following particulars for 1934-35 in connection with the Hydro Electric Power Commission.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be well to have them all on Hansard.

Mr. EULER: The following are the figures for the various companies mentioned:

No export.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the total amount of horse power exported?

Mr. EULER: The total amount exported is 1,391,883,980 kilowatt hours.

Mr. STEWART: Has the minister the horse power?

Mr. EULER: I do not have it before me.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the revenue?

Mr. EULER: The revenue is $305,709.67.

Mr. BENNETT: Are there any applications for licences now?

Mr. EULER: There are no new ones pending.

Item agreed to.

Electricity and gas inspection service, $220,300.

Mr. BENNETT: This is merely administrative. You collect the fees and this is advanced for it.

Mr. EULER: Yes. There is a considerable profit on the item, amounting to $115,000.

Item agreed to.

International customs tariffs bureau, $2,700.

Mr. DONNELLY: Will the minister explain this?

Mr. EULER: This is Canada's contribution to a bureau which is maintained at Brussels for providing information with regard to the tariffs of all countries.

Mr. BENNETT: Like the agricultural bureau at Rome?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Motion picture bureau, $40,800.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the department plan to extend the work done by the motion picture bureau?

Mr. EULER: Only in the matter of providing sound. There is an increase of $800.

Mr. MacNICOL: I went to the bureau where these pictures are being exhibited in Ottawa and it struck me that a great deal of good could be done if the pictures could be sent throughout the country. Many of them show the processing of various raw products from the very commencement. In the case of lumber, the process is shown from the log in the bush to the finished furniture. These pictures are not only very educative but indicate the wide diversity of activities in which the Canadian people are engaged in processing raw products of various kinds. What is the department doing to send these pictures all over the dominion?

Mr. EULER: These pictures go to practically all countries in the world, and perhaps the reason why they have not been seen more in our own picture houses in Canada is the fact that we did not have sound. Nowadays everything in connection with moving pictures is accompanied by sound, and we are correcting that defect.

Mr. MacNICOL: If there were some way of showing them in school houses, in small suburban communities or in small communities in the country, this would be of great benefit to the people. The sound would not be necessary. Electrical apparatus could be taken to show the pictures and this would give the people in the rural communities an idea of the great benefits that are derived from the urban centres where all these raw products are developed to the finished state for final sale.

Mr. EULER: We send them out for educational purposes, but precaution has to be taken to see that they are not admitted to places not properly protected as regards fire.

Mr. STEWART: Can the minister give a general statement of the scope of the activities which the department pursues in its work, particularly in connection with motion pictures?

Mrs. BLACK: One year the Canadian National gave me a dozen or fifteen moving pictures to take north. They included a great many scenes in the east: Nova Scotia during apple blossom time, New Brunswick hunting scenes, and various hunting and other scenes in Quebec. I had them shown in Mayo, White Horse and Dawson.

Mr. EULER: The organization and the functions of this branch are as follows: The branch was organized in 1917. The chief functions are: (1) to produce and circulate throughout the world motion pictures and pictorial material such as photographs, photographic enlargements, films and lantern slides, transparencies, et cetera, designed to disseminate information about Canada and to advertise the resources, industries, products, scenery, tourist attractions and other aspects of the dominion as a means of developing trade and tourist travel and to make Canada better known to people of other countries; (2) to operate as a central organization for the production of all kinds of motion pictures, photographic material and pictorial displays for all departments of the dominion government and allied organizations; (3) to act as technical consultants to all government departments and allied organizations in matters pertaining to motion pictures, photography and the purchase, use and upkeep of motion picture and photographic equipment; (4) to cooperate with the provincial governments, railways, steamship companies, tourist bureaux and similar organizations in the production and distribution of films and pictorial matter to be utilized for the development of trade, tourist travel, et cetera; (5) to furnish information to government departments on the motion picture industry and to cooperate with the motion picture industry in matters of mutual interest to the government, the industry and the general public.

Mr. STEWART: Just to complete that: through what channels are the distributions made?

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend desire the countries or territories?

Mr. STEWART: The channels through which the distribution is made. And while the minister is considering that, to what extent, if any, does this branch cooperate with the tourist branch in the attraction of tourists? The work which they carry on seems to a certain extent a duplication of this.

Mr. EULER: I cannot say that there is any particular relationship between the work of the tourist branch and this bureau.

Mr. BENNETT: There should be.

Mr. STEWART: I understood the minister to say that they cooperated with the tourist branch for the attraction of tourists, and I was just wondering through what channels they make distribution for that purpose.

Mr. EULER: We do, by supplying a number of films, certain films which they find useful.

Mr. STEWART: Supply the tourist branch?

Mr. EULER: So I believe. The territories in which films are in circulation are:

Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, 150.
Austria, Czechoslovakia and other central European countries, 84.
Belgium, 31.
Canada, 1,215.
China, 51.
France and Switzerland, 51.
Germany, 120.
Greece, Turkey and the Near East, 28.
Hawaiian Islands, 20.
Holland, 51.
Italy, 70.
Japan, 30.
Norway, Sweden, Finland, Denmark, 62.
South Africa, 39.
South America, 100.
Straits Settlements and Netherlands East Indies, 12.
United Kingdom, 387.
United States, 3,216.
West Indies and Cuba, 36.

Or a total of 5,773 films.

Mr. STEWART: As to the extent to which these films are distributed in these countries, has the minister any information as to the number of showings or the use that is made of the films? It is all right to distribute them if they are kept in active circulation. I cannot think of any better channel or method of advertising Canadian production, Canadian scenery and Canadian conditions if these films are actually circulated, if they are working.

Mr. EULER: I cannot, perhaps, give entirely complete information. The films are handed out to agencies. I do not suppose there is an accurate check-up as to just the number of times they are exhibited.

Mr. BENNETT: It is usual to check up the number of people who visit the theatres during the period films are shown. That is what commercial films do.

Mrs. BLACK: When I had the films I had to state exactly where they were shown and how many people were present. That was about eight years ago, I think.

Mr. EULER: I understand there is a record of that, but I do not have it before me.

Mr. STEWART: Do I understand the minister to say that as far as possible the distribution is made through the trade commissioners, say our trade commissioner in Australia?

Mr. EULER: All the trade commissioners have them.

Mr. STEWART: The films are distributed through them?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

National Research Council, $500,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What increases in salaries have there been in that department since the first of the year?

Mr. EULER: The increase in salaries, less the five per cent, accounts for $54,038.45.

Mr. BENNETT: How is that money distributed? I have had some complaints about the unevenness of the increases. That is the reason I ask.

Mr. EULER: Just the increases or the total of salaries?

Mr. BENNETT: The increases. I mean raises in salaries.

Mr. EULER: Does my right hon. friend desire the names?

Mr. BENNETT: It does not make any difference. Just describe the office.

Mr. EULER: The secretary treasurer goes from $4,620 to $5,070; the assistant secretary treasurer, from $3,480 to $3,690; the head clerk, from $1,525 to $2,520—apparently that is merely a provision; the position has not been filled—principal clerk, no increase; another principal clerk, from $2,220 to $2,340; still another, from $1,425 to $1,980; clerks, grade 4, $1,800 to $1,860, $1,800 to $1,860, $1,500 to $1,650, $1,380 to $1,410; stenographers, grade 3, $1,560 to $1,620, $1,500 to $1,560, $1,200 to $1,410; typist, grade 2, no increase; office appliance operator, grade 3, $1,260 to $1,320; clerk, grade 2, $990 to $1,155, $900 to $1,110; stenographers, grade 2, $1,200 to $1,260, $1,140 to $1,200, $1,012 to $1,110; office appliance operator, grade 2, $1,140 to $1,200.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister will say what is the total staff this year as compared with last year, the total personnel. I ask that because under civil government the particulars of this item are not shown.

Mr. EULER: Does my right hon. friend want the increases or just the total·

Mr. BENNETT: The total personnel.

Mr. EULER: It does not seem to be available just at the moment. Perhaps I might be allowed to place it on Hansard later.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like the personnel this year and last year and, of that number, how many received increases and how many did not.

Mr. EULER: The number on the staff of the National Research Council on April 1, 1935, was 126; the number on the staff on April 1, 1936, was 145. The number receiving increases, other than satutory increases, is thirty-three; and the additional number who will receive statutory increases this year is seventy-two. There are forty on the staff who will receive no increases this year.

Mr. HEAPS: I observe a reduction of some $22,000 in this item. I am not going to ask the minister why this reduction has been made, but I am interested in the general work and activities of our research bureau. I think we all realize the tremendous importance of the work that can be performed by an organization of this kind. Personally I am not very well acquainted with the work of the bureau, but I wonder if the minister is in a position to give this committee some information in a general way as to the work that is being done, what they have accomplished and what they are attempting to accomplish in the way of research work. I understand that changes were made in the staff last year, and I should like to know whether in the opinion of the minister we have the most capable staff we can get for the class of work they are asked to perform. If that is the case, can the minister give the committee such information as will give us at least some idea as to what progress is being made in the various researches which have been undertaken.

Mr. BENNETT: An excellent report was issued only a week or two ago.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend has anticipated what I was about to say. The work of the research council is fully described in the annual report; perhaps my hon. friend might take time to read that. Probably the hon. gentleman knows in a general way the purposes of the council: general investigation, scientific development, and so on. Manufacturers, industrialists, farmers and others are invited to bring their problems to the council for investigation and report. Perhaps I might give one instance of a valuable work that has been done by the council in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture. I am told that they have developed a rustless wheat which in the course of another year or two can be pretty fully supplied to the wheat growers of Canada. If that is the case and this rustless wheat is a success it will certainly result in the saving of a tremendous amount of money. Last year, I believe, if it had not been for rust we would have had perhaps 200,000,000 bushels more of wheat. I am not quite sure that that would have been an unmixed blessing, however, when we have so much to sell.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the minister if the research work carried on by the council in Ottawa is along the line of the research work carried on by the provincial bureaux. As the minister knows, we have in Toronto a large research bureau at Queen's Park, with a substantial staff, to which the manufacturers contribute large sums of money. I suppose they take some of their problems there and I assume they bring some of them here. I have gone down to the bureau here to make a survey of what is going on, just for my own satisfaction, for we vote a large sum of money each year for the upkeep of this bureau. I was greatly impressed with the work being done in Ottawa, but I wondered what was being done with the results of this research work. Is any effort made to encourage industry to apply those results? Is some group of capitalists invited to erect a plant to make use of what has been found here as a result of this work? I remember quite well when the research bureau in Toronto was established; I was then in business, and great things were predicted to the manufacturers when they were asked to contribute the initial $1,000,000 that was required in order to commence that work. I believe it was later when the bureau in Ottawa commenced operations.

Mr. EULER: No; I understand that Ottawa was first.

Mr. BENNETT: Work was commenced here but the building had not been constructed.

Mr. EULER: That is so.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to know if the country has obtained the real benefits from this research work that has been carried on. I am convinced that the bureau is doing splendid work and should be encouraged to go further, but I should like to know whether the greatest possible results as far as employment or the investment of capital are concerned are obtained from the good work that has been done by the bureau.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I cannot make any comparison between the results obtained by the provincial organization and those obtained by the federal bureau. I am not familiar with the work of the provincial organization, and really not as familiar with the bureau here as I should like to be, because of lack of time. I believe, however, the Ottawa bureau was established first. We did not have the new building, but research work has been carried on for many years, and I think my hon. friend will know the line of work that is done. I do not know that I can say that the bureau originates certain processes and then hands them over to people who might enter into certain lines of manufacture as a result of that work, but manufacturers are encouraged to bring their problems to the research council, and I think they have been of considerable assistance.

I may say also that I think there is a tremendous scope for an institution of this kind to do a great deal of good in this country. I think also it will be found that the results are approximately commensurate with the amount of money we are willing to spend. This item is slightly reduced this year, as one hon. member stated a moment ago. I can only say that this is in line with the policy of economy, if you like to call it that, of this government. We felt that we had to restrict ourselves to a certain expenditure for the year, and frankly speaking that is why this item has been slightly reduced. I know there are some countries in the world, perhaps more particularly Russia, where millions and millions of dollars have been spent on research work, for which I think in the future they will be very well repaid. I hope that later on this branch may be still further developed, because I think there is a great deal to be done in that direction.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to ask the minister to what extent rustless wheat was developed at Winnipeg. Where was the work done?

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I cannot answer that question. Perhaps my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture might give the answer.

Mr. GARDINER: Rust resisting wheat has been developed at Winnipeg, and the department hopes to distribute it next year. I have seen samples of it, which show up very much to advantage over marquis, reward and any other wheats that were grown.

Mr. BENNETT: Who developed it?

Mr. GARDINER: The development was started at the time the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) was Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. BENNETT: But I mean what scientist developed it?

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot give the name offhand. There are strains at Winnipeg, Brandon, Saskatchewan university. Different men have been working on the matter at different places.

Mr. BENNETT: Was it the research council of Canada that did the work?

Mr. GARDINER: I think the work was finally turned over to the research council after the vote had gone through the house and the laboratory was set up at Winnipeg through the activities of the Department of Agriculture.

Item agreed to.

Printing of departmental publications, $95,000.

Mr. BENNETT: How is the reduction brought about?

Mr. EULER: We felt that some of them might be eliminated in the interests of economy.

Mr. STIRLING: Does this apply to all departments?

Mr. EULER: Just the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Item agreed to.

Publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad, $54,100.

Mr. MacNICOL: If this applies to the advertising of the researches made by the department, then it would be along the line I had in mind a few minutes ago, of what the research department is doing to encourage the manufacture of new lines in Canada.

Mr. EULER: It is not.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is it for? I see no reason why the results of research should be published if not to induce investment or better manufacture.

Mr. EULER: This relates to the advertising in newspapers and journals for the development of trade.

Mr. MacNICOL: Advertising of what?

Mr. EULER: Advertising generally.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought we were on research.

Mr. EULER: No; we passed that; we are on item 276.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will remember that there was much discussion about this item. It was thought at one time that an appropriation of $100,000 was not sufficient for the purpose. If this covers the work of advertising abroad it is wholly inadequate, but I take it that this is in addition to the sum placed at the disposal of the high commissioner for advertising in Great Britain and Europe.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend is quite correct. There is a large sum, perhaps $200,000—I do not remember exactly—in the hands of the Canadian High Commissioner in London.

Item agreed to.

Weights and measures inspection service, $383,300.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Why the increase?

Mr. EULER: Because it is needed, and I may say that this branch produces a very handsome profit, a profit of $90,000. But the work has increased; that is why there is an increasing expenditure.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Is there a full staff of inspectors in all the different divisions?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): How are they appointed?

Mr. EULER: By the civil service commission.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister no doubt recalls that during the progress of the investigation by the price spreads committee and commission it was apparent that there had been considerable abuse, and it was intended to strengthen this service in order that there might not be a repetition of those offences against the act which were punished during the last twelve or fifteen months. To what extent has the work gone forward? The minister will remember that a question was put on the order paper yesterday with regard to the matter. Have additional inspectors been appointed, and to what extent are efforts being made to enforce the law? There were very bitter complaints consequent upon the revelations that took place a year ago in connection with short weight, and the type of scale being used in some cases. The minister's predecessor took certain steps looking towards the improvement of those conditions. There are few things that concern the people more vitally than this.

Mr. EULER: Some time ago in reply to a question in regard to prosecutions I gave some figures to the house. I do not know whether that might be regarded as an indication of the vigilance of the branch. Quite frequently I sign authorizations for prosecutions under the Weights and Measures Act. I do not know whether that is necessarily an indication—

Mr. BENNETT: No; the essence is prevention.

Mr. EULER: But I think prosecutions are a means of prevention.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree.

Mr. EULER: The more those who are in business know that violation will mean prosecution, the greater the likelihood that there will not be offences. Prosecutions are ordered as they seem to be needed. If it is a more or less trivial matter there is a warning, after that prosecution, and prosecution in every case where the offence seems to be flagrant.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a small fee collected for testing scales, is there not? There used to be.

Mr. EULER: There is still a fee.

Mr. BENNETT: To what extent is the branch self-sustaining?

Mr. EULER: As I said, there is a profit of something like $90,000.

Mr. BENNETT: It seems to me that great vigilance should be exercised in testing scales, because with the best intentions in the world men sometimes find themselves with scales that are inaccurate, and if the inspectors receive a small fee for testing once a year and locking or marking the scale, it seems to me very important that that work should be stimulated and maintained. The essence of the whole conduct of the Weights and Measures Act is that there should be inspection and that that inspection should be adequate, which means that the scales should be inspected at least once or twice a year.

Mr. EULER: They are inspected once a year.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Is any provision made by the department for furnishing public weigh scales in towns and municipalities?

Mr. EULER: No, not by the department.

Item agreed to.

Port of London authority, $2,233.82.

Mr. DONNELLY: Will the minister explain this?

Mr. EULER: It is the annual payment to the port of London authority for defrosting facilities at Surrey dock for the Canadian government, as approved by order in council P.C. 1544.

Mr. STIRLING: What do they defrost?

Mr. EULER: Beef and poultry.

Item agreed to.

International bureau of exhibitions, $1,200.

Mr. BENNETT: How was the minister able to reduce this item? I thought there was a fixed fee which countries of a certain class pay.

Mr. EULER: It is owing to a difference in exchange, I am informed.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—to provide for carrying into effect sections two and three of chapter 26 of the statutes of 1934, when the said sections came into force on August 1, 1935, the said statute being an act to amend the Canada Grain Act, whereby a statutory grade was established for Garnet wheat, and the statutory grade "No. 2 Manitoba Northern" was revised to exclude Garnet wheat by substituting "Marquis or equal to Marquis" for "red spring wheat of good milling quality" and to facilitate the efficient and orderly marketing of wheat now graded as No. 2 Manitoba Northern by providing that in respect of any such wheat which on the 31st July, 1935, was in elevators licensed under the Canada Grain Act, the governor in council may on the recommendation of the chairman of the board of grain commissioners indemnify any holder or owner thereof, for loss resulting directly from the revision of the statutory grade No. 2 Manitoba Northern aforesaid, $1,500,000.

Mr. EULER: This is a large sum which is payable under the statute. It is merely revoting an amount which was voted last year, which was not paid then but which should be paid this year, in connection with garnet wheat.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I think we should have some information on this. Is this the amount that was paid to reimburse the elevator companies for the garnet wheat they had in store?

Mr. EULER: If my hon. friend will look at the details, the whole explanation is given there better perhaps than I could give it. It is a revote from last year.

Mr. BENNETT: Have any sums been paid under it yet?

Mr. EULER: I think not yet.

Mr. BENNETT: Should not some sums have been paid under it?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Did the elevator companies ask for some adjustment on it?

Mr. EULER: I am informed that this wheat was scattered in many parts of the country and the board of grain commissioners had some difficulty in collecting the information necessary to enable them to make the payments, but they are still working on it.

Mr. BENNETT: What happened was that the board of grain commissioners came to Ottawa, and after certain action was taken with respect to garnet wheat, as indicated in the memorandum in the vote, they made a recommendation as to the appropriation by parliament of a sum of money to meet the situation that this memorandum discloses, but certainly I cannot understand why by this time nothing has been paid. If they furnished claims during 1935 there should be payments now arising out of that, because while wheat was scattered all over western Canada, as the minister says, it was shipped, and this was to be paid only in the event of a loss.

Mr. DUNNING: The loss has not yet been determined in many cases.

Mr. BENNETT: If the grain is shipped, surely the loss must be determined. The purpose was to maintain the standards of Canadian wheat abroad. The grain commission felt that we could not afford to take the risk of having the standards lowered, and they determined that this was the only way—perhaps other members of the committee are more familiar with the matter than I—by preventing this wheat being marketed, I shall not say under fase pretences, but under a misunderstanding. We made this appropriation accordingly, and what I cannot quite understand is how the crop year having ended July 31, 1935, and there having intervened the months since the first of August to the first of June of this year, we are still in the position of not having paid out anything under the vote. It may be that there was no loss; I cannot say as to that, but I certainly find it difficult to understand why the whole sum should be revoted.

Mr. EULER: The facts were not all ascertained, and the intention was to make settlement of all these claims at one and the same time. I can assure the right hon. gentleman that nothing will be paid out unless it is fully justified after careful investigation.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure of that, but the item reads:

—by providing that in respect of any such wheat which on the 31st July, 1935, was in elevators licensed under the Canada Grain Act, the governor in council may on the recommendation of the chairman of the board of grain commissioners indemnify any holder or owner thereof, for loss resulting directly from the revision of the statutory grade No. 2 Manitoba northern aforesaid.

Mr. DUNNING: It was moved out very slowly.

Mr. BENNETT: It would seem so, but whether or not that is a suggestion based upon knowledge I am not quite sure.

Mr. DUNNING: No; it is a very real problem getting rid of garnet wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: That was the only question I had in my mind, why no payment had already been paid.

Item agreed to.

Mr. REID: Has the minister any information to give the committee regarding the conference that was held in London recently, at which Canada was represented by Mr. Beatty and the Canadian High Commissioner? I noticed from the reports that it was the intention of the British government to help, if they could, by means of a subsidy for the all red route from the Pacific coast. Can the minister make any statement on that to the committee?

Mr. EULER: The conference has not yet been held, but it is to be held. I cannot give any information at the moment as to just what is to be done.

Mr. FINN: What is the amount of the subsidy paid to the Canadian Pacific on their Atlantic service from Saint John to Liverpool, calling at Halifax?

Mr. EULER: We propose this year for the Canada-United Kingdom service on the Atlantic a subsidy of $250,000.

Mr. FINN: Does that include a subsidy to the freight boats?

Mr. EULER: That includes the Empress of Australia, the Empress of Britain—

Mr. FINN: She goes around the world in winter.

Mr. EULER: Of course, she does not get a subsidy when she makes her world cruise.

Mr. FINN: Are they paid by the trip or for the year?

Mr. EULER: The service also includes five freight liners, but in the winter, of course, the service is out of Saint John and Halifax.

Mr. FINN: Out of Saint John practically.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister inform the committee if there is any general basis upon which these subsidies are granted?

Mr. EULER: It is usually a matter of negotiation. I do not know that I would care to say that there is any absolutely definite basis which would apply to all the services; I am sure there is not. Perhaps some of it is a matter of inheritance; they got such and such a subsidy last year. In some cases I have cut the subsidy down because I felt conditions justified this, while in other cases the representation may have been very strong to maintain the present subsidy; in some cases it has been reduced, and in some cases increased. The basis is just about the same as with freight rates. I remember very well one time asking the head of the freight rates department of a certain Canadian railway upon what they based their rates; was it according to service rendered? He said no, just what the traffic would bear.

Mr. HEAPS: Is this a case of what the government will bear?

Mr. EULER: Perhaps so.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. HEAPS: Is there not some way of arriving at an intelligent basis for granting these subsidies? We are granting a total of two million dollars in subsidies for this fiscal year, and I was wondering if the minister could tell us whether the individual subsidies were warranted by the actual amount of mail carried or other service rendered.

Mr. EULER: There are different factors entering into the matter, one of them, and a very important one, being the carriage of the mail. In other cases it may be that a service which is necessary could not be carried on at all except for this assistance obtained from the government. Various factors have to be taken into consideration in arriving at a figure. If the company is making a profit, the chances are that they would not get any subsidy at all. Very often the amount of the subsidy is based upon the returns received year to year from the steamship companies. They have to submit financial statements. For instance, the subsidies in a number of services were reduced. In one instance the reduction was substantial because the position of the company had improved materially during the year. In another case, where the competition had become extremely heavy and there was danger that the services would be discontinued, there was a slight increase. It is impossible to give my hon. friend any definite principle that would guide all along the line.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What does the government require from these steamship companies by way of a statement?

Mr. EULER: We receive audited statements.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do those statements show the profits of the corporations, the costs of running the services, and so on?

Mr. EULER: They show the operating receipts and expenditures. I think in all cases, the statements showed deficits. Some of the companies showed a material reduction in their deficits, and in those cases the subsidies have been reduced.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: According to the press, the Canadian Pacific states that it is running behind on its Pacific services and that there is very great danger they will have to give up unless further public assistance is received. What steps would the Canadian Pacific take to secure greater public assistance? What submissions are made to the government?

Mr. EULER: My predecessor in office will know that in many cases we are asked for an increased subsidy in the hope that it will be granted. This year there has been only one instance in which a substantial increase has been made. I think my hon. friend is referring to the rumours to the effect that the Canadian Pacific proposes to build two new vessels to operate from the west coast to New Zealand. This project is still in the air, to use that language, and I have no information to give with regard to it. Whether the company will come for a subsidy is on the knees of the gods, but when it does, whether a subsidy will be granted will have to be considered as a matter of policy.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the minister in a position to give us information with regard to the separate subsidy items? I take one at random from page 37 of the estimates, "Murray Bay and North Shore, winter service between, $40,000." I should like to know the services being performed by the company which receives this $40,000.

Mr. EULER: From December 1 to December 31, and from March 1 to March 31 in each year, two round trips each month between Murray Bay and Havre St. Pierre, calling at St. Simeon, Tadoussac, Les Escoumains, Baie des Cedres, Pentecost River, Clarke City, Rivière aux Graines, Thunder River, River St. Jean, Port Menier, Bersimis, Baie St. Nicholas, Comeau Bay, Godbout, Baie de la Trinite, Shelter Bay, Seven Islands, Sheldrake, Magpie, and Longue Point of Mingan, as weather and ice conditions permit. From January 1 to February 28, inclusive, in each year, a regular service consisting of two round trips per month between Murray Bay and Seven Islands, calling at a number of points and Anticosti, as weather and ice conditions permit. Steamer must call whenever possible at government wharves. Mails to be carried free.

Mr. HEAPS: How much material is carried for this $40,000?

Mr. EULER: In 1934-35 there were eight round trips; passengers carried, 1,064; tons of freight, 1,034; live stock, 183; bags of mail, 233 and sacks of mail, 2,217.

Mr. HANSON: Do these Pacific ocean subsidies refer to specific companies and specific ports? I notice in the case of the Canada-New Zealand service there has been an increase of $100,000. Is this for any particular steamship company or any particular port, or does it refer to British North American ports in general?

Mr. EULER: That is the subsidy to the Canadian Australasian line, half of which is owned by the Canadian Pacific and the other half by the Union Steamship Company.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. BENNETT: The Royal Mail, is it not?

Mr. STEVENS: The Union Steamship Company of New Zealand.

Mr. EULER: The ports of call are Vancouver, Victoria, Honolulu, Suva, and Auckland, New Zealand. Each voyage shall be extended to Sydney, Australia, without additional subsidy. The call at Suva is conditional upon the government of Fiji also continuing their contract for a like period and on the same terms as heretofore. The voyage to Auckland is not to exceed eighteen days, including one day at Honolulu.

Mr. HANSON: Is it so much a trip?

Mr. EULER: It is so much a year for thirteen trips a year.

Mr. HANSON: Do the Pacific ocean subsidies refer only to Vancouver or are other ports included?

Mr. EULER: Vancouver and Victoria.

Mr. HANSON: Is there no mention of Prince Rupert or New Westminster?

Mr. EULER: Not in this.

Mr. HANSON: Do other subsidies refer to other ports?

Mr. EULER: There may be calls at Prince Rupert in the British Columbia and China service.

Mr. HANSON: Just the China service?

Mr. EULER: But not the New Zealand.

Mr. NEILL: I did not quite catch the minister's explanation of the fifty per cent increase.

Mr. EULER: The statement was made by the ship owners that the competition from United States lines was becoming severe because of their better boats and also because of the fact that the United States government was subsidizing their vessels very heavily. I believe the Matson line is the one interested, and the Canadian company finds it very difficult to operate under these conditions.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister give us an idea of what subsidies the United States government are paying?

Mr. BENNETT: They pay on a speed basis.

Mr. EULER: The United States subsidies to the Matson line amount to $1,192,080.

Mr. HEAPS: To the one line only?

Mr. EULER: To the Matson line.

Mr. HEAPS: How many boats do they run between United States ports and the orient?

Mr. EULER: They run four.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Does the minister differentiate between ships of Canadian and ships of foreign registry in the granting of subsidies? I ask that question because when boats of foreign registry are chartered it is frequently agreed that they shall engage foreign masters and foreign crews, and if something could be done to secure ships of Canadian registry it would benefit Canadian trade and employment.

Mr. EULER: We do not discriminate with respect to registry. As a matter of fact there are not many vessels registered in Canada. The Canadian Pacific boats are registered in England. As regards the employment of men on boats, the matter was referred to a committee after the last occasion on which the estimates were under consideration, and the committee has not reported.

Mr. BENNETT: Has anything definite been arrived at yet as a result of the negotiations that have been going on for a faster service to Australia and New Zealand?

Mr. EULER: Not yet.

Mr. STEVENS: I suggest to the minister that the service between British Columbia Pacific ports and New Zealand and Australia is a very important one to Canada from the standpoint both of maintaining trade and of the mail service, and the subsidy which is paid is quite a modest one compared with the service that is involved. The vessels were excellent ten years ago but they are not now up to date; in fact they are obsolete. There is a good deal of business being lost to the Matson line. It is true that line receives a subsidy of over $1,000,000 and it has faster and more up to date vessels. The result is that Canada is losing business to that line. I have always had in mind that we should negotiate with the Union Steamship Company of New Zealand, of which the Canadian Pacific is now half-owner, for a faster and more efficient service with more modern vessels, even if it is necessary to increase the subsidy. Another factor that should be kept in mind with respect to these larger items is that these lines carry mail. I have figured it out on two or three occasions, and if we paid for the mail at the usual rate, so much per ton or hundredweight, or whatever the rate is, we should have to pay almost as much as many of these subsidies amount to. Therefore, when we discuss the question of subsidies we must remember that the service covers a very valuable mail service. I would suggest to the minister, now that he has increased the subsidy to $300,000, that a definite effort should be made to put on faster steamships and possibly to give a more frequent service. At any rate there should be faster and more modern ships. I certainly believe that the service is one which it is well worth sustaining. The minister himself referred to the pending negotiation for a revision of the trade treaty with Australia, which by the way has been a very valuable treaty to Canada, resulting in a considerable increase in business, and much in Canada's favour. All these matters ought to be safeguarded. But the question of subsidy should be considered in connection with these other points to which I have referred.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will recall that when we last discussed this item we spent some time going into the relative merits of the Matson boats and our own. The Matson boats have a 22 knot sea speed and receive the subsidy based upon speed, plus loans from the government, to enable them to build ships by paying an interest of 1½ per cent, in one case. The Royal Mail have indicated in their published statement that they have an interest with the Canadian Pacific in this line that runs from our Pacific coast to Australia and New Zealand, not the Union Steamship Company of New Zealand but the Royal Mail as the second partner. They purchased their interest from the Canadian Pacific for preference shares in the Canadian Pacific, and in their last annual statement they indicated that they had not received interest this last year or two in connection with the shares they thus acquired. I saw the other day that negotiations were pending between the Royal Mail and the Canadian Pacific, and the government of Australia, the government of New Zealand, the government of Canada, and possibly the Fiji Islands, through their appropriate representatives, looking towards a more speedy service that would be more comparable with the 22 knot sea speed service of the Matson line. The minister says that negotiations are still pending and that nothing has yet been definitely concluded, but it is quite obvious that a great deal of our mail which comes from England and which ordinarily would go through Vancouver has been diverted to boats at San Francisco for the purpose of finding speedy transport to Australia. Perhaps the minister will recall that when a former Prime Minister of Australia came to this country last he came to San Francisco because of difficulties of securing accommodation which would suit his plans at the time and because of the slow rate of speed at which he would travel as compared with the speed of the Matson line boats. If the minister is not in a position to say what negotiations have been carried on, or to what extent they have been proceeded with, I can quite understand his not having a statement to make. I may be wrong, but is it not the Royal Mail that has the interest to which I have referred?

Mr. EULER: I was going to correct my right hon. friend. The partnership exists between the Canadian Pacific and the Union Steamship Company of New Zealand. The Union Steamship Company, I am told, is owned by the P. & O.

Mr. BENNETT: P. & O. is what I meant to say, and not the Royal Mail. Mr. Shaw is chairman of the board.

Mr. EULER: All hon. members appreciate, and certainly the members of the government appreciate the extreme value of the service to Australia and New Zealand, largely because of the trade with those countries, which is very much in our favour. The boats which are now in the service, as the leader of the opposition says, are slower and more or less obsolete, and to my knowledge that is a matter of special concern to the owners. I cannot say anything more at the moment than that the situation is, to put it mildly, being explored thoroughly with the idea of putting on a better service. That is the position in which the matter stands now and I cannot give any other definite information at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: We have only two, sometimes three boats, and the Matson line has four.

Mr. HANSON: It is not necessary to remind the minister, because he is familiar with the fact, that we have a Pacific port which is served by the Canadian National Railways, the port of Prince Rupert. That port is equal to any on the Pacific coast, and when the question of subsidies is under consideration by this or any future government I think we should at least give some consideration to a port that is served by the nationally owned railway, a port that has facilities to carry Canadian trade and to bring back the products of other countries. I have no criticism to offer with regard to subsidies, but I would impress upon the minister that when the question is under consideration Vancouver and Victoria are not the only ports which should receive attention, because we have another port which, as I say, is served by the nationally owned railway. Moreover, behind that railway system we have hinterland which statesmen in past years have regarded as valuable enough to warrant development, and it is up to the statesmen of to-day and of the future to find out whether that opinion is really sound and, if it is, to do something to assist in the development of that hinterland in British Columbia. I ask the minister to make a special note of that and to realize that we have on the Pacific British North American coast a port which is served by a nationally owned railway.

Mr. EULER: I wish to congratulate my hon. friend upon the case he puts up for his good port of Prince Rupert. As he knows, we are not prone to make promises, except this, that we shall certainly give every consideration to his representations when the time comes.

Mr. HEAPS: I observe that the minister has cut off half the subsidy on the steamships between this country and Great Britain. Is that going to affect in any way the services between Canada and Great Britain?

Mr. EULER: No; it will not affect them at all. I think I gave the explanation before. The cut has been made because the statement of the companies showed that they had done substantially better last year than they did the year before. In fact, if my memory serves me aright, prior to 1930 they were not receiving any subsidy at all.

Mr. NEILL: I notice there are nine items on the Pacific ocean. Might I ask if they all include the free carriage of mail on the routes indicated?

Mr. EULER: I cannot give the number of them, but in some of them the Post Office Department contributes towards the subsidy.

Mr. NEILL: Which ones?

Mr. EULER: The Post Office Department contributes to these services: Vancouver and northern ports of British Columbia; Victoria, Vancouver, way ports and Skagway; and Victoria and west coast Vancouver island.

Mr. NEILL: Is that all?

Mr. EULER: That is all.

Mr. NEILL: They draw a subsidy under this item, a mail subsidy it is called, and then the post office pays as well for the carrying of mail. Is that not a unique situation?

Mr. EULER: The post office assists.

Mr. NEILL: And so they draw two subsidies. One is a mail subsidy, and they are paid for carrying the mail as well. Does the minister not think it should be either one or the other? If they get a mail subsidy for carrying the mail they should carry the mail, should they not? Or if they do not get the mail subsidy they are paid for carrying it according to weight and measurement. But apparently in these cases they get both subsidies. What is the explanation?

Mr. EULER: Nearly all subsidies are given not only for carrying the mail. That is merely a portion of the service which is rendered. We may say that, of a subsidy of $200,000 given a certain steamship company, $100,000 or $150,000 might fairly be for the carriage of the mails; the balance of it would be for the encouragement of the service itself, not necessarily having anything to do with the carriage of the mails. But in nearly all cases the total amount of the subsidy includes the cost of carrying the mails; over and beyond that it is for the service.

Mr. NEILL: I suppose the minister, not being connected with the department, would not have the amounts paid by the post office?

Mr. EULER: The Post Office Department would have to give that information.

Mr. MacNEIL: What is the total amount of the subsidy granted to the Union Steamship Company, Vancouver?

Mr. EULER: Eighteen thousand dollars.

Mr. FINN: I have a question to ask the minister. I notice that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in their annual report have incorporated both their steamships and their railways. They are two separate corporations. One is Canadian Pacific Ocean Steamships Limited and the other is the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is impossible from their report to tell whether they are making their profits out of the railways or out of the steamships. Under steamship depreciation, in their Canadian Pacific Railway Company report to their shareholders, they have taken out of their profit and loss account $3,550,996 for depreciation, and I also find that they have lumped the number of ships which they have both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. They start with their five freight boats of 10,000 tons dead weight capacity, called the Beaver boats: then they come to the Duchess boats; then they come to the Empress of Asia, the Empress of Australia, the Empress of Britain, the Empress of Canada, the Empress of Japan and the Empress of Russia; then they come to the Mont boats, the Montclair, the Montcalm and the Montrose. Some of these ships are operated on the Pacific. Five of them, freight ships, are operated from London, and the Duchess boats and the Mont boats are operated from Liverpool as passenger and freight boats. I should like to know whether the subsidy paid to the Canadian Pacific is paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway for their boats, or is it paid to the ocean steamship company?

Mr. EULER: The contract is with the railway company.

Mr. FINN: Well, Mr. Chairman, that seems to me to be a strange thing. They are two separate corporations. Sir George McL. Brown is in charge in London of the steamship service, and Sir Edward Beatty is in charge at Montreal of the railways. We pay $250,000 of a subsidy. Is that paid to the railway or is it paid to the ocean steamship company?

Mr. EULER: It is paid to the railway.

Mr. FINN: Well, I do not know of any railway in Canada that is subsidized.

Mr. POULIOT: Sixty millions to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. FINN: That is a small figure. They must have got on the inside. I am only asking for information as to what subsidy is paid to the Canadian Pacific Ocean Steamships Limited, which is a separate corporate entity, on their Atlantic service.

Mr. EULER: I am informed that they are the operating agents of the steamships for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that is why the money is paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. FINN: Well, then, I can quite understand why in their report in reference to railways they have written off as depreciation over three and a half million dollars on the ships, and some of their ships are practically new. The Beaver boats are the freight ships, 10,000 tons dead weight capacity, and practically new, about three years old. The Duchess boats are not very old. Only the Mont ships are old. The Empress of Britain is almost new. I find too that they transfer to income account what should go to profit and loss account, $2,832,183, and they do not pay any dividend; they say they need that as ready cash in respect of their railways in the United States. I should like to know what amount the department pays for the Atlantic service of the Canadian Pacific Railway and what it pays for the service on the Pacific? The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is correct when he says that the Matson Line is obsolete; they have obsolete boats.

Mr. STEVENS: No, no, not the Matson.

Mr. EULER: The Matson line is an American line.

Mr. FINN: I know, but the boats are obsolete.

Mr. BENNETT: No; they have new boats now.

Mr. FINN: Then I congratulate them. I think the two ships that are operated by the Canadian Pacific alternate; I believe they run one trip from Vancouver and the other trip from San Francisco. I think that is correct.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. FINN: Perhaps the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce can tell us that.

Mr. STEVENS: Both from Vancouver.

Mr. FINN: Does the Aorangi not go from San Francisco, and did the other one, that was lost, not also alternate with San Francisco?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. FINN: What ships go from San Francisco?

Mr. STEVENS: None of the ships involved in these subventions.

Mr. FINN: Then I should like to know the amount paid to the Canadian Pacific, whether it is to the ocean steamship company or to the railway company, for the Atlantic service. Is it or is it not $250,000?

Mr. EULER: We pay $250,000 to the Canadian Pacific for their Atlantic service.

Mr. FINN: And what about the service to Japan?

Mr. EULER: The service to Japan costs us $600,000, reduced from $749,000.

Mr. FINN: That is a total of $850,000?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. FINN: What is carried, the amount? I was going to suggest to the minister and the government that there is upon the statute books something we have been discussing lately. I refer to the Canadian Pacific-Canadian National act, which was passed in order to cut out duplication and pool interests. Why is it that the Canadian Pacific are not asked to have every alternate boat on their Atlantic service turn at Halifax and the other one turn at Saint John?

Mr. EULER: They all call there.

Mr. FINN: That is like knocking at a door and going away before the people can open the door and speak to you. The point is that if there is to be a pooling of interests it should be a genuine one. We are paying $250,000 for that service, and the freight boats go direct to Saint John. They are unloaded there, and remain in that port a week. Then they come around to Halifax, pick up the Canadian National freight there and go off to London. The passenger boats call at Halifax, land the mails and passengers, go around to Saint John, stay there a week, load up, come back to Halifax, pick up any Canadian National freight that may be there, and go off to Liverpool. I am suggesting that in the interests of the development of the two Atlantic ports, Saint John and Halifax, the boats should call at each port alternately. That is what they do at Montreal and Quebec. The Empress of Britain does not go to Montreal but goes only as far as Quebec. The other boats go to Montreal and then call at Quebec. Is there any sound reason why the boats should not alternate between the Atlantic ports and why the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the government should not take into consideration pooling these interests on the Atlantic coast? Prior to the retirement of Sir Henry Thornton an agreement was entered into and a subsidy was paid the Cunard-White Star line. They called at Halifax and worked up a freight business which inured to the benefit of the Canadian National system to the extent of four or five thousand tons of freight every week. Now that business is all lost. A great deal of money has been spent in the port of Halifax; I think when the right hon. leader of the opposition returned from England last year he opened a new pier costing $500,000, which is large enough to hold the Queen Mary and two or three other large ships at the same time. Here we are, paying subsidies of $250,000, and I do not think there should be any discrimination as between the two Atlantic ports, Saint John and Halifax, any more than there should be discrimination between Montreal and Quebec.

I should like to ask the minister whether, since he has been in office, he has discussed with the Canadian Pacific the possibility of having each alternate boat turn at Halifax. I am sure that if the subsidy of $250,000 were to be cut in two and one-half given the White Star line they would call at Halifax every week and the Canadian Pacific could call at Saint John, as they do now. Saint John is their terminus; Halifax is not. Halifax is just a port of call, in order to pick up what other ships do not take. I think the two ports should be on a parity, at least in regard to those lines that are subsidized by the government, particularly in view of the act providing for the pooling of interests. They pool on land but they do not seem to pool on sea, and after all that is the right sort of pooling. The water makes the pool there, whereas the only water you get on land is the water that goes into stocks. The minister may not be prepared to answer my question to-night. I do not desire to hold up the estimates or to delay the business of the house—

Mr. EULER: I shall be very glad to give consideration to the representations of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FINN: And to bring them to the attention of the government?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like to support my colleague from Halifax—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria has the floor.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I should like some information in regard to the service between Baddeck and Iona. Are there any ports of call stipulated in the contract, between these two ports?

Mr. EULER: The contract reads:

Baddeck, Iona or Shenacadie, and MacKay's Point; calling at Kempt Head on the western end of Boularderie island on trips from Baddeck to Iona; such calls to be made on only those days on which the subsidized steamer from Sydney to Whycocomagh makes her westbound trip from Sydney to Whycocomagh; and calling at Grand Narrows whenever there is a reasonable amount of freight or automobiles to put on or take off at that place.

(a) Provided, however, that if weather conditions prevent the steamer making a landing at Iona at any time, she shall, if possible, proceed to Shenacadie to land and take on passengers and freight.

Note: Connections at Iona: the steamer must make connections at Iona with the afternoon eastbound train from Halifax to Sydney from April 1st to November 30th, in each year.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like to support the suggestion of my hon. friend from Halifax in connection with the port of call of the Canadian Pacific ships. It is true that the subsidy was reduced last year from $500,000 to $250,000. The contract ran out, if I remember rightly, on March 31, 1936, so that it is not this year's but future contracts which I should like to have the minister bear in mind. I do not know whether there is a clause in the contract as to calling at any particular port or ports, but I think the matter should be seriously considered and a clause inserted, if necessary, to the effect that calls should be made at both Saint John and Halifax on the Atlantic coast with the same amount of time spent in each. As already pointed out by my colleague, a direct benefit is to be gained by the Atlantic ports the same as in regard to boats operating out of Vancouver, where a large amount, $600,000, is paid in subsidies. I support my colleague in his contention; it is something that the minister would be well advised to consider in the future.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I should like to direct the minister's attention to the item on page 38 of the estimates:

Sydney and Bras d'Or lake ports and west coast of Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island, service between, $22,500.

Who is operating that service now?

Mr. EULER: The contractors are the Straits Shipping and Contracting Company, Limited, of Sydney, Nova Scotia.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): When was this contract entered into?

Mr. EULER: August 1, 1935, and it runs to 1939.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Were any tenders called for?

Mr. EULER: No, no tenders.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): What was the term of the previous contract, or had there been any contract immediately prior to this one?

Mr. EULER: I do not have it before me, but I am informed that the terms were about the same as this one.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): As to the period or as to the amount?

Mr. EULER: From 1932 to 1934 the subsidy was $21,225. For 1934-35 it was $20,000; for 1935-36 it was $22,500, and for this year it will be $22,500.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): But was there a contract?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): For one season?

Mr. EULER: Apparently for two years, 1932 to 1934 at $21,225; then for one year, 1934-35, at $20,000, and then for one year, 1935-36 at $22,500.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Then in August, 1935, it was renewed for four years?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Without any competition?

Mr. EULER: There was no tender.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Had the previous contract expired when it was renewed?

Mr. EULER: Yes; I am informed that the old contract had expired at the end of the previous season.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): Then there was no contract. The previous contract expired at the end of the season of 1934?

Mr. EULER: Yes, when navigation closed.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): And there had been no new contract entered into?

Mr. EULER: The new contract was made August 1, 1935.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

TABLING OF RETURN WITH REFERENCE TO GUARANTEE OF $60,000,000 LOAN

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to parliamentary reference No. 169, moved for by Mr. Pouliot. This order was for a photostat copy of the original copy of the letter of guarantee, dated May 31, 1933, signed by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and addressed to Sir Charles Gordon, president of the Bank of Montreal, about the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Inquiries have been made in the Department of Finance, the Department of Railways and Canals, the Prime Minister's office and the privy council office, and the original copy of this letter could not be found in any of these departments.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

PRIVATE BILLS

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 105

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That for the remainder of the session all private bills when presented be read a first and second time and referred forthwith, and that standing order 105 respecting the posting of private bills be suspended.

This is the motion which it is customary to make about this time in the session.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 91, for the relief of Margery Brunhilde Morphy Dunton.

Bill No. 92, for the relief of Mania Leizerson Oberman.

Bill No. 93, for the relief of Milton Sandford Enoch Chase.

Bill No. 94, for the relief of Jessie Dansky Glazer, otherwise known as Jobeth Dansky Glazer.

Bill No. 95, for the relief of Mildred Eileen Champion Webster.

QUEBEC AND MONTMORENCY RAILWAY COMPANY

On the order:

First reading of Senate bills—Bill No. 88 (letter O2 of the Senate), intituled: "An Act to incorporate Quebec and Montmorency Railway Company."—Mr. Parent (Quebec West and South).

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): This bill, Mr. Speaker, is in the name of the hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent). I do not know exactly how to proceed; I am under instructions from the Chair. I should like to have the bill placed under my name and given first reading at this sitting in order that it may be taken up by the railway committee some time early next week.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Walsh moves that Bill No. 88, from the Senate, to incorporate Quebec and Montmorency Railway Company, be read the first time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. WALSH: The purpose of the bill is to divorce the railway operations of the Quebec Railway, Light and Power Company from the operations of the tramway lines operated in the city of Quebec. They are two separate and distinct enterprises owned by the same company. One operates as the result of a franchise from the city of Quebec and the other is a railway operating out of the city of Quebec for a distance of about thirty miles, the principal points on that line being Montmorency and Ste. Anne de Beaupré. The Canadian National Railways have rights over that line to connect with their line leading down to Murray Bay. The object of the bill is to separate these enterprises into two distinct entities, owing to the interest of the city of Quebec in the operation of the Quebec street railway, and enable the parent company to maintain financial control of the two separately and to better advantage.

Mr. POULIOT: Remove the watered stock and let the bill dry to death.

Mr. WALSH: Something has to be used to float it.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—MR. McIVOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): As a matter of privilege may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? I have here a telegram from two specialists in the medical profession in the city of Fort William, who specialize along lines that are important to the community. They have sent a challenge to our baseball team—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McIVOR: —and would like to know whether the minister is prepared to finance a team coming from Fort William.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED BRANCH LINE FROM SENNETERRE TO ROUYN, QUEBEC

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the construction, prior to the 31st day of December, 1939, of the following Canadian National Railways branch line:—

From Senneterre to Rouyn in the province of Quebec—estimated mileage, 99 miles; average expenditure per mile, $60,000; estimated cost, $5,940,000.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. STEWART: Will the minister give some particulars of the project and the reasons for undertaking it just now?

Mr. HOWE: This bill implements the application made by the Canadian National Railways to the Department of Railways for an appropriation to build a branch line from Rouyn, which as we know is the centre of Noranda activity to Senneterre, through an area which has to-day ten producing gold mines, two mines that will be in production within a month or two, and some thirty very promising prospects now under development.

The Canadian National Railways were the pioneers in this district, which first came into prominence ten years ago with the discovery of the Horne mine which is now the Noranda property. At that time those interested in Noranda applied to the railways for service to the area. I am informed that an application was first made to the Canadian Pacific Railway, which approached the area as closely as did the transcontinental. The Canadian Pacific Railway was not particularly interested at the time and application was then made to the Canadian National, and with the help of the province of Quebec and of the mining company a branch line was built into Rouyn through Taschereau on the transcontinental railway, which branch has been in operation since that time. The arrangement was that the operating deficit of the line was guaranteed by the province of Quebec up to $50,000 and by the mining company up to $20,000. Since that time there has been a very intensive mining development in that area. All these mines have been served by the National Transcontinental and they are all within thirty-five miles of that railway. They have been served by waterway down from the railway, by a highway that was built in the area, and by aeroplane. In any event the service there has been provided entirely from the Canadian National Railways. Recently two applications were made by private companies to the Quebec legislature for legislation permitting construction into this territory, one from a private company, controlled by private interests—called the Goldfields Company, I believe; however, that particular threat is not regarded very seriously. The other, a bill for the Temiskaming and Abitibi Company, is being sponsored by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That bill has passed the committee stage in the Quebec legislature. It was opposed by the Canadian National Railways, and it is to anticipate the construction of that line and to preserve territory which seems to be definitely the property of Canadian National Railways that the bill now before this committee is being hastened at the moment.

I have a long letter from Mr. Hungerford, the president of the railway, addressed to the chairman of the trustees, and I would be glad to put the entire letter on Hansard, but it is quite long.

I will quote this one paragraph:

The development of the territory has now reached a stage where it becomes attractive to private railway interests, and if the invasion by such interests is permitted, the people of Canada will be deprived of the benefits for which they have already paid in capital cost and operating deficits. Instead of reaping the reward of a development project, boldly conceived, the people of Canada will have to recognize the National Transcontinental Railway as a permanent drag upon the finances of the country.

In the same letter the president goes on to say that the management has for many years planned to build an extension of the Noranda branch easterly to a junction with the National Transcontinental at Senneterre, and that the main reason for withholding such a recommendation has been the period of financial distress which has required that this desirable project be deferred.

The earnings of the Canadian National which would be placed in jeopardy by the construction of the Canadian Pacific into this field are very considerable. Limiting the territory affected to that between Senneterre and Noranda, the railway revenues for even the last four years of the depression have increased from $1,367,000 in 1932 to $2,066,000 in 1935, and the earnings for the first four months of 1936 are at the rate of $2,300,000 per annum. It is estimated that the earnings, apart from Noranda, will, five years hence, be much greater than those indicated for 1936, and in the view of Mr. Hungerford may reach $5,000,000—that is in addition to the earnings from the present development. Due to the fact that these earnings accrue from mining development which would be immediately adjacent to the projected lines, the railway authorities estimate that revenues commencing at $1,100,000 per annum in the first year, and rising to $3,000,000 in the fifth year, would be diverted from the Canadian National lines, while it would not be possible for the management to reduce operating expenses by more than forty per cent for each dollar of diverted revenue, so that the net damage to the publicly owned system would, on the president's estimate, be $660,000 the first year of competitive and duplicative service, rising to $1,800,000 by the fifth year. That loss, of course, would add just that much to the total deficits of the Canadian National Railways, with respect to which in recent years the chief executive of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been expressing such great concern.

There is the added and desirable feature that the proposal on the part of the Canadian Pacific flies in the face of the co-operative features of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific legislation of 1933, under part III of which it is provided that there shall be arbitration in case of disagreement concerning railway plans and arrangements. For the purpose of this arbitration it is provided that an arbitral tribunal may be established whose power and jurisdiction should extend, among other things, to:

> Control and prohibition in respect of the construction of new lines and provision of facilities and additional services where no essential need of the public is involved, or where the result would be in the main the division of traffic already adequately provided for.

That provision of the 1933 act was intended to cover just such a case as the present, but the Canadian Pacific Railway, of course, escapes control by the act through recourse to a provincial government under the name of a subsidiary company.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that that covers the situation fairly well. I may say that when the Canadian National Railway built its line into Noranda it also took authority to build both east and west from Noranda. The line east from Noranda covers practically the territory in which it is proposed to build this line. The line west was taken by the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway Company, which built into Noranda shortly after the Canadian National Railways completed their connection.

The situation resolves itself into this. The Canadian government have built a line through northern Quebec which is intended as a development and colonization line, and now, after all the years in which it has been operating at a deficit and when this particular area promises to produce traffic which will in a measure justify that construction. I hardly think it can be conceived that this territory thirty-five miles from the National Transcontinental, and which is now being served by that line, and fairly well served, should be allowed to pass into the control of a competing railway.

Mr. STEWART: Can the minister inform the committee whether the application to the provincial government by the private company to which he has referred has been successful, and whether the bill in question has been passed? The minister has informed the committee that the Canadian National Railway management have been active in endeavouring to preserve this territory for the Canadian National Railways. Has this government made any representations to the Quebec government along the same lines?

Mr. HOWE: The only knowledge I have of the position at Quebec is obtained from the newspapers, from which I gather that the Temiskaming and Abitibi railway bill was referred to the railway committee of the legislature, where it passed with some amendment, and was referred back to the house.

I have not heard whether the house has since dealt with it. So far as representations from the dominion government are concerned, beyond advising the Quebec government that we had an application from the Canadian National Railways for a bill and that we proposed to present that application to parliament, no representations have been made by this government.

Mr. STEWART: Then I take it that this government has up to the present taken no active steps to oppose the granting of the charter in the Quebec legislature.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. PELLETIER: I understood the minister to say that this measure would justify the construction of a certain line that had previously been built for development and colonization purposes. Am I correct in understanding that this new line is going to help out what has already been done for development and colonization purposes?

Mr. HOWE: I referred to the fact that the National Transcontinental has built through northern Quebec from Montreal and Quebec westward, with the hope of aiding development and colonization in northern Ontario. Of course this branch line we are now discussing is to serve a definite traffic in an area where there happen to be more than forty active mining developments. That territory will be directly served by the line covered by this particular bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, the government is to be congratulated on bringing in a measure of this kind. The statement made by the minister, together with the letter from Mr. Hungerford, seem to me to make a very clear case indeed. We have heard so much about the deficits of the Canadian National Railways; we have been told that this system is a millstone hanging about the neck of Canada. Now it would appear that the great expenditures of the past may be justified, since this territory is beginning to develop. The public road has a perfect right to take advantage of that. When we hear so much about cooperation I do not see why the subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific should act as it has acted in this matter. This would seem to me to be a smart trick. The application was opposed by the Canadian National Railways, and I do not quite see why the government itself should have appeared earlier. The application was also opposed by the Ontario government. If the Canadian Pacific railway was sincere in its desire to cooperate the least it could have done was to bring the matter to the attention of the board of railway commissioners or before a tribunal such as is provided for, or to come to this house with a bill. When we are urged to adopt a policy of cooperation it seems ridiculous that the Canadian Pacific should now enter a territory which is generally recognized as belonging to the Canadian National. I do not quite see why there should have been two railways to serve that territory, yet now the Canadian Pacific want to get into the same territory. This goes on whilst in the west we have had tracks torn up and lines abandoned in order to promote some measure of cooperation. I think this proposal is very good business indeed from the standpoint of the people of Canada.

Mr. WALSH: May I ask the minister whether the measure now before the committee was brought to his attention prior to or subsequent to the introduction of the bill in the Quebec legislature?

Mr. HOWE: I will say at once that if the bill had not been introduced in Quebec this legislation would not have been introduced during this session. This matter was discussed last year with the executive, and my own feeling was that due to the position of the railways generally we should defer everything that possibly could be deferred, as we felt that we were giving reasonable service to this area as it was. I think next year in any event we would have applied for this power, but our hand is being forced at this time by the threat of a competing road to build into our territory.

Mr. WALSH: Was not the Canadian Pacific bill that was introduced in the Quebec legislature conceived on a much wider basis than the measure now before this committee? I understand that the Canadian Pacific bill dealt with a line of railway about twice the length of the one proposed here, running from the south to the north and covering a territory perhaps one hundred miles in length, through the Noranda district. That line, from seventy-six to one hundred miles in length, was to go through a colonization territory containing roughly seven thousand settlers, who would have been served by that branch line. Incidentally, the Canadian Pacific were going to extend eastward through the Noranda district in order to make the remainder of that line a paying proposition. As I understand it, these seven thousand settlers will not be served unless the Canadian Pacific get permission to build through the Noranda district. I am not encouraging the duplication of lines, by any means, but it seems to me, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested, that this is a splendid opportunity for cooperation rather than competition. If one company would construct a line and give the other company running rights over it I imagine the seven thousand settlers in that area to the south of the Noranda district would get the service they have been seeking for a considerable length of time.

Mr. HOWE: The Canadian Pacific application was for a line from Angliers to Rouyn, some sixty miles in length; then from Rouyn to Senneterre, some ninety-eight miles, then continuing into the Chibougamau district perhaps another seventy or eighty miles. But when they appeared before the railway committee in Quebec the Canadian Pacific immediately stated that at present they were not interested in building into the Chibougamau district. That reduced the line to the sixty miles to Noranda, in exactly the same territory to be covered by the line now proposed. I may say that, having developed that territory from the start and brought it along to its present state of productivity over a ten year period—that is, the territory between Rouyn and Senneterre—it is not the intention of the Canadian National Railways to divide it in any case.

Mr. STEWART: The only suggestion I have to put forward is that the minister should make the strongest possible representations to the Quebec government against granting that charter, which up to the present time they have not done.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): As a representative of the district that these projected lines are intended to serve probably I can throw a little light on the situation. As the minister has correctly stated, when the Noranda mine was first discovered and development took place there the Canadian Pacific line ran from Mattawa to Angliers, and Angliers was only sixty miles south of Noranda. At that time there was no railway communication whatever into the district. The opportunity was there at that time for the Canadian Pacific to construct a line. In their wisdom they did not consider it advisable to do so. As a result we had the line built from Taschereau down to Rouyn, financed, as the minister has said, by the Quebec government and the Noranda mine. Eventually the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario extended their line from the interprovincial boundary, from Cheminis into Noranda, though that was opposed by the Quebec government. The case was carried to the privy council, who decided that the T. & N.O. had the right to enter the Noranda district. Since then that district has been served by the two railways, the T. & N.O. connecting with their main line at Swastika and the branch line of the Canadian National to Taschereau.

The recent application of the Canadian Pacific for a provincial charter called for an extension from Angliers to Noranda, a distance of about sixty or seventy miles; a continuation eastward from Noranda to Senneterre, approximately a hundred miles, crossing the Canadian National main line there, and going northeasterly to the Chibougamau district. I had occasion to be present at the meeting of the railway committee in Quebec the week before last when the bill was under consideration. Having in mind the fact that the southern portion of Temiscamingue county from Angliers to Rouyn would be served by the construction of the Canadian Pacific, through a district now being settled under the Quebec colonization plan under which about fifteen thousand settlers have been placed within the last few years, and considering the necessity of providing markets for these people in that district, naturally I encouraged the projected construction of the Canadian Pacific line from Angliers to Rouyn. I also recognize the fact that once arrived at Noranda or Rouyn with permission to construct eastward, difficulty arises, inasmuch as the Canadian Pacific railway then infringes on what is presumed to be Canadian National territory. While I advocated the construction of this Canadian Pacific line from Angliers to Rouyn I suggested to the committee that, before proceeding any further, steps should be taken by the Temiskaming and Abitibi, which is really the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to get in contact with the Canadian National management and try to arrive at an agreement whereby only one road should be constructed through that district. It is a foregone conclusion that only one road there could be made to pay, but an agreement might be made for running rights or some such arrangement. The committee adjourned that day to take that suggestion into consideration. The Canadian Pacific proposal to pass through the district as far as Senneterre has been approved, but the extension from Senneterre eastward to Chibougamau has been eliminated. The bill has passed through the railway committee of the Quebec legislature but has not yet passed the legislature. What action will be taken there I am not in a position to say. That is the situation as it exists to-day.

Personally as member for the district I should like to have seen the Canadian Pacific build from Angliers to Rouyn. The vice-president of the company intimated to me very distinctly that if they were not given the charter from Noranda to Senneterre they would not consider building from Angliers to Rouyn.

An hon. MEMBER: They were not worrying about the settlers.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): They claimed that the development to-day is not such as to warrant the expenditure in building merely to Noranda, which is already served by two railways. Personally, having regard to the development of the district, I should like to see the line built from Angliers to Rouyn, and I am also interested in seeing this line built eastward, whether it be by the Canadian Pacific or by the Canadian National, from Noranda to Senneterre, because in recent years the development of that section of the country, from the point of view of mining, has been phenomenal. And not only that, but in colonization also; because the Quebec government are sending into that district thousands of settlers, and eventually I believe they will all be successful farmers, finding a good market there in the mining districts. The minister referred to the number of prospects in the district, and also the producing mines. As evidence of the growth and development that is taking place I might say that the town of Val d'Or, which two years ago was not in existence, to-day has a population of about 3,000. The growth of that town is justified by the development that has taken place in the immediate neighbourhood—not prospects only, but producing mines.

I find myself in a rather difficult position. I am interested in the construction of the road by the Canadian Pacific from Angliers to Rouyn. I am also interested in the construction from Noranda to Senneterre, let it be by the Canadian National or by the Canadian Pacific. The decision rests with this committee. In any case I hope that when all is done we shall have both railways.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): By the Canadian Pacific proposal we would have direct communication between Montreal and this northern region, which is in the province of Quebec but has no direct communication with Montreal. Has any attempt been made to have the construction proceeded with as a joint venture, so that there would be direct communication between Montreal and this district?

Mr. HOWE: The shortest and most direct line from the centre of this district to Montreal is via the National Transcontinental.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I was told that it is seventy-nine miles shorter between Noranda and Montreal than between Noranda going around by La Tuque.

Mr. HOWE: Possibly it is a trifle shorter, but I would not think it is seventy-nine miles shorter from Noranda. From the centre of this mining district it is a little shorter to Montreal via Senneterre and the transcontinental than by the Canadian Pacific, but the difference is so slight that I think the mileage would not affect the Montreal situation in the least.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I hope the government does not forget Montreal.

Mr. WALSH: I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. McDonald) on the lucid explanation he has given in connection with the actual situation in that district. May I ask the minister if it is the intention of the Canadian National Railways to proceed immediately with the construction of this ninety-nine miles, or is this merely a covering bill to keep the territory for the Canadian National?

Mr. HOWE: I think the bill, when it is before the house, will make that quite clear.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there no method by which it would be possible to bring about cooperation in this matter? I remember the representations to which the minister refers as to the desirability of making some connection between—I am not sure whether it was the city of Montreal, but that district and this mining area. I was hopeful that something might be done through the action of the government to bring about what the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. McDonald) described as the possible leasing of running rights. At any rate the construction of both roads would in my judgment be a calamity under present conditions, and if for traffic or other reasons the territory is entirely that of the Canadian National I think representations should be made to the Quebec government that it would be regarded as desirable not to charter the other road. If on the other hand it is possible to arrange running rights so that both roads might receive traffic which they justly believe to be their own, that might be worked out. I was struck by what the hon. member for Pontiac said in that regard.

Mr. HOWE: When this matter came to the attention of the Department of Railways, as minister I wrote to both railway companies urging that every attempt be made to reach common ground, but I am sorry to say I was definitely advised that this could not be done.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 90, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from Senneterre to Rouyn, in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 79, respecting the Department of Mines, Resources and Colonization.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Chairman, hon. members might find less difficulty in discussing the bill if I furnished some details supporting the reorganization of these several departments into one administrative unit. It will be observed that the purport of the bill is to combine the Departments of Interior, Mines, Immigration and Colonization and Indian Affairs, and also the work entailed in connection with the administration of the soldier settlement board.

The chief work of the Department of the Interior at this time relates to parks, to the Yukon territory and to that vast area now known as the Northwest Territories. It has also to do with national surveys, dominion forest service, scientific investigation into forest growth, methods of conservation of our forests and the like. It has also to do with matters relating to water power and hydrometric surveys. In addition there are scientific surveys which come under the direction of that department. They relate particularly to the dominion observatories at Ottawa and Victoria.

The whole range of administration of Indian affairs from the Atlantic to the Pacific comes under the Department of Indian Affairs. At present there are approximately 112,000 Indians in Canada, and it is estimated that they increase at the rate of about 1,000 per year. That is probably due to the fact that better care is given in matters of medical attention and hospitalization, as well as in the field of education. In connection with Indian administration we have not only problems of health, in which are involved hospitalization and medical care, but there is involved the administration of reserves, and the question of bringing the Indians as nearly as possible to a point where they may be self-supporting.

In connection with the Department of Mines, geological surveys of a general character have been made covering the whole of Canada. As I stated earlier in the session when estimates of the Department of Mines were before the committee of supply, federal authorities are responsible for the maintenance of geological surveys in the provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia. There is also the matter of the geology of the Yukon where in recent years substantial progress has been made in the development of gold mining. Connected with the administration of the Department of Mines are certain technical services performed in the city of Ottawa. Those involve examination of complex ores, and the like, to find ready and sufficient means of ascertaining their proper treatment.

The work of the Department of Immigration and Colonization has slackened in the last four or five years. Probably it reached its peak in the early years of the century. Last year the number of immigrants arriving in Canada was less than it had been in any previous year since confederation. While in the past the Department of Immigration and Colonization was charged with the task of popularizing Canada, and making facts about Canada known to the people of other countries, naturally in the course of time that work has greatly changed. To-day immigration services are restricted to the examination of people coming to our country, and supplying them with the necessary entry, in accordance with the regulations laid down in immigration legislation.

I sometimes make the statement, humorously, that the soldier settlement board is operating the largest mortgage business in Canada. I need not go over the history of the board, because I am certain it must be well known to hon. members. It was formed in 1919, immediately following the war, and up to this time something more than $150,000,000 has been turned into its administration. That figure includes the costs of administration. As hon. members are no doubt aware, there have been various reductions in the obligations of soldier settlers, but it is estimated that with those reductions there is still a residual value of approximately $50,000,000. That is a vast estate to be administered by the federal government. I am not making any prediction as to what ultimately may be realized, but I state these facts simply to impress the committee with the importance of that particular branch of the administration.

Mr. BENNETT: As it stands now, every dollar paid gets credit for two dollars?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. In discussing the need for reorganization I may be in a position to give hon. members useful information. As they are no doubt aware, in the departments indicated there are four deputy ministers with salaries ranging from $8,000 to $10,000 per year and four assistant deputy ministers. There are thirteen executives in classes with a maximum salary of over $5,000 per year, and thirty-one executives in classes which have a maximum salary of over $4,000 per year. In the immigration department there is a director of publicity with a staff of three; in the national parks branch there is a director of publicity with a staff of eleven, and there is also a large and well organized bureau in the Department of Mines for the dissemination of geological information. There are four legal officers, three in the Department of the Interior and one in the Department of Indian Affairs. In the four departments there are five editors and three assistant editors with the necessary clerical assistance. These staffs look after the publicity work in the different departments. In addition there are other officers who perform editorial work incidental to their regular functions.

There are twenty-three people in the staffs of the deputy ministers. There are ten people engaged wholly in work relating to personnel, and in addition part of the time of many of the executive officers is taken up with this feature. There are chiefs of records in each of the departments. Three of the departments have purchasing agents. The central purchasing office of the Department of the Interior has a staff of twelve; the Department of Indian Affairs has a staff of five and the Department of Mines has a staff of four. Supplies for the Department of Immigration are looked after by the staff handling the mail. There is an architect in the Department of Indian Affairs with an engineering assistant, draftsman and stenographer. In the parks branch there is an architect with an assistant architect, draftsman and stenographer. There are three survey units in the Department of the Interior: there is the geodetic survey, the international boundary survey and the topographical and air survey bureau. In the Department of Mines there are the surveys relating to the work of that department. In connection with the Northwest Territories, we have the Northwest Territories council that looks after and advises in connection with the administration of that vast area. There is also a council in the Yukon which has to do with that particular phase of the work of the department.

All this will give the committee some of the cogent reasons why the unification of these departments into one administrative unit should in the course of time effect very considerable economies in the cost of administration. I have further details which might be placed before the committee when we are giving consideration to the different sections of the bill.

So far as the organization of the new department is concerned, I am free to confess that I have not as yet had sufficient time at my disposal to analyze thoroughly the work of these departments and, in conjunction with the responsible officers of the departments, work out the most effective and economical method of administration.

I may say that this reorganization will follow broadly the lines of having one deputy minister, and a number of directorships. The bill provides for eight directorships but I have in mind at the present time just seven. Without committing myself definitely to the branches to be set up, I might place before the committee the suggestions I have to make in this regard. There will be a mines branch, an immigration branch, a lands and colonization branch which will include soldier settlement administration, a branch for Indian affairs, a branch for surveys, a national parks branch, and a forestry and water power branch. As to the extent to which the various branches to which I referred a moment ago may fall into these particular directorships, I am not at present in a position to say. I am sure hon. members of the committee will appreciate the fact that in reorganization covering so many departments with so many related branches, the greatest care and study should be given to the matter if the maximum results in economy, efficiency and operation are to be achieved.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the total number of the staff in the various departments?

Mr. CRERAR: The total number in the Department of the Interior is 1,162; in the Department of Immigration, 804; in the Soldier Settlement branch, 336; in the Mines department, 448, and in the Department of Indian Affairs, 1,095.

Mr. BENNETT: That would include both inside and outside?

Mr. CRERAR: That includes all branches of the service. The total is 3,845.

Mr. NEILL: Could the minister give an estimate of what reductions in staff will be made possible by this reorganization?

Mr. CRERAR: I would not attempt to do that at the moment, but I shall have a word or two to say on this phase a little later.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister suggest a twenty-five per cent cut?

Mr. CRERAR: I would suggest that ultimately it should be greater than that. Hon. members will appreciate that the readjustments which will be necessary cannot be made all at once. I am sure hon. members will also agree with me when I say that we must have regard to the positions of those already in the service. At this point I should like to pay tribute to many members of the service in these departments. There are many excellent civil servants in these departments, able and competent men.

Mr. BENNETT: And women.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, and women. I do not think we always appreciate fully the difficulties under which some of our civil servants work. At times their position is one of considerable delicacy and difficulty, but notwithstanding the cynical criticism that one hears from time to time, I do think it is possible in our civil service to have efficient and economical administration. That certainly is the goal in this reorganization. I am not boastful enough to say that this reorganization can be worked out by the minister who happens to be in charge of the department, but I do believe it can be worked out in cooperation with the officers of the different departments. So far as I have been able to gather any opinion from the staffs of the departments, I can say that they are just as anxious to secure efficiency and economy as are hon. members of this committee. I feel certain that I shall have their full and hearty cooperation in working to that end.

Just a word or two about the principle of the bill. There are only one or two features to which I desire to direct the attention of the committee. Under the Civil Service Act the reorganization of a department is a matter for the civil service commission, but under this bill we are departing somewhat from that procedure. It is not intended that the doors shall be opened for the entry of new people into the service, except in one particular. In the appointment of the directors we take the power under this bill to go outside the civil service. I wish to say frankly to the committee that at the present moment I have no intention of doing that so far as my information goes. What I do desire to secure is efficiency in the operating heads of these various branches. What little experience I have had in business administration has led me definitely to one conclusion, and that is that the success of your administration depends in the main on the ability and character of the men whom you have in the responsible positions; and that is what we certainly aim at securing in the reorganization of this department. So far as the other members of the staff of the new department are concerned, I am asking the committee and the house to give me the authority to reorganize the department in the first instance without necessary reference to the civil service commission. In the making of appointments they must be drawn from the existing personnel in the different departments. It is not intended that new members of the staff will be introduced from outside of the civil service.

Mr. BENNETT: Outside of the existing civil service.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. In the reorganization of the work of these four or five departments I flatter myself, without any disrespect to the civil service commission, that probably, in conjunction with the responsible officers of the department, we can make a better job of it than some representative whom the civil service commission might assign with the best will and intention in the world. I hope the committee will agree to the recommendations in the bill in that regard. I think that covers, briefly, what I have to say at this stage.

Reference was made the other day to the title as being too cumbersome and I think perhaps there was some foundation for the criticism. In that regard, therefore, we propose to shorten the title; and since the bill does not stand in my name but in the name of the Prime Minister I move, seconded by Mr. Lapointe, that section 1 be amended as follows: That the words, in line 5, "resources and colonization" be struck out, and that there be substituted therefor the words "and resources," and that the words "and resources" be substituted for the words "resources and colonization" wherever these words appear in the bill. The effect is to shorten the descriptive title from "Department of Mines, Resources and Colonization" to "Department of Mines and Resources."

Mr. BENNETT: In common with every other member of the committee, we feel grateful to the minister for the clear statement he has made regarding what he contemplates doing under the provisions of this measure. He probably does know that the former Minister of Labour and the Minister of the Interior worked out a plan together, and it fell by the wayside for one reason and one reason only. Under the existing economic conditions it would involve the release from employment of too many people. That is a pretty poor reason to give—in fact, it is not a pretty poor reason but a very poor reason—and yet, having regard to the conditions that prevail, it happens to be the real reason why it was impossible to carry it out. If the minister carries out the plans he has suggested to-day he will undoubtedly be compelled to release from employment a substantial number of people. If he retains them in the service he has accomplished no purpose.

Mr. CRERAR: Except in getting started in the right direction.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, but he is handicapped from the very start. That is one of the anomalies of our position and it is a real one. I wonder if the minister has taken the soldier settlement department as it stood. The former minister reduced the personnel by a very large number and created in it a measure of efficiency which I think the minister will agree is very striking. I think he will be certain on that point. But it created for the government a great deal of difficulty, and under the conditions that exist it was almost impossible to contemplate the release of large numbers from the public service. I wonder if the minister realizes that during the five years from 1930 to 1935 nearly 12,000 civil servants were released from their positions in this country. That is a terrible thing to say, and yet the service was more efficient by reason of it. And that is a still more terrible thing to say. Part of that—we must be frank—was at once attributable to the transfer of the resources to the western provinces. But when I heard the minister reading the familiar story to me of the editors and the architects and other officers in each of the several departments I could not help thinking of the effort that was made at one time by a very able man in the public service so to establish matters as to have under his direction a department of such a character that it would be a very powerful organization. When the transfer of the resources took place it became essential to cut down the numbers remaining in the federal service, and that created an exceedingly unhappy condition from which needless to say the government suffered very greatly. Nevertheless the work was done and the lessening of the numbers was by some 12,000 in those five years. I need not say that that made 12,000 potential if not real opponents of the administration.

As to the policy of a deputy minister and seven directors, I can only say that the plan that had been worked out by the Minister of Labour and the Minister of the Interior in the late administration contemplated a somewhat lesser number than that. The minister has said he may use only seven and possibly he may not find it necessary to have that number when he concludes operations. I judge from what he has said that he has reached no definite conclusion in his own mind as to the number. But dealing with the question of mines, for instance, it is quite clear that the only mineral territory over which the dominion has jurisdiction is in the Yukon and in the Northwest Territories. We have no jurisdiction now over mines as such except in those territories, but we are carrying on geological survey work, under our constitutional obligation, in Manitoba and British Columbia. Unfortunately, however, there has grown up in this country the idea that while we did have vast mineral areas under our control and jurisdiction we should have issued valuable pamphlets and maps which the provinces did not care, and in fact could not at that time be called upon, to publish. We to-day are doing an enormous amount of work which normally would be done by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The minister knows to what I refer—the detail work. In British Columbia, having a constitutional obligation to maintain a geological survey, I suppose we are bound to publish the result of our observations and work in that territory from year to year. That is expensive. These books we get out, illustrated as they are and carefully prepared as they are, are expensive books to publish; they are not cheap books by any means. Geological maps require very great care in their preparation, and in the Department of the Interior, for instance, we have a map designer who is responsible for the preparation of the map that we use in connection with our electoral lists and the maps delimiting the boundaries of our electoral districts. Formerly that was not so; an officer attached to one of the other departments did that work.

The Department of Mines, to get back to what I was speaking of, has at the present moment a staff of between three and four hundred.

Mr. STIRLING: Four hundred and forty-eight.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and it is difficult to justify that staff on the basis of our constitutional responsibility, having regard to the fact that we have parted with control over all our mining areas except in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

As to colonization and immigration, was I right in assuming the minister proposes that immigration shall be under the control of a director? I thought the statute made that clear.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Colonization deals only with soldier settlement, and I have already mentioned what has been done in that regard. With respect to immigration, it seemed to be the settled view of the Canadian people as indicated in this parliament that no effort should be made to bring people into this country during the period of economic stress. In fact, there were very strong protests from some quarters against the numbers that did come in, and the number that came in last year, as the minister says, was less than it had been in any previous year since confederation. The fifteen or eighteen months preceding the beginning of the economic stress in Canada saw substantial numbers coming into our country, and I am sorry to say that a very large number of them have been under the care of the city of Winnipeg and other communities for the last four years, of which the minister perhaps has a clearer appreciation than I.

The Department of Indian Affairs obviously must have a director of its own. It is a special branch of our work, and I think one can say with perfect frankness, without going out of one's way, that that department has been very well conducted. It perhaps is overburdened with staff in some cases, but that I suppose is inevitable having regard to the fact that you have to carry on farming operations in some of the reserves; you carry on ranching operations in some of the reserves; you carry on coal mining operations in some of the reserves, and in some of the reserves the Indians have to depend on their hunting ability and the general activity of the members of the band to support themselves outside of the moneys that are paid to them and the rations supplied to them by the crown. I agree with the minister that a director of Indian affairs is essential in that he will have, whoever he is, a very great deal of work to do. Since the establishment of a medical service amongst the Indians, which was begun by the Minister of the Interior under the Prime Minister's last administration, and which has been extended since, there has been, strange as it may sound, an increase in the number of Indians in this country. For a substantial period of time the Indians were gradually decreasing in number, as the minister knows, but owing to the steps that have been taken, sanitary and medical, there has been an increase in the number of Indians in this country. I was surprised to find from what the minister said that the increase now reaches one thousand per annum.

Mr. CRERAR: That is estimated.

Mr. BENNETT: The figure was somewhat larger than I had expected. I shall not traverse the ground the minister has so well covered, but I do suggest to him that he will have great difficulty—not that I desire to magnify his difficulties—in dealing with this general situation. If he feels there is incumbent upon him the responsibility of maintaining all these staffs in their entirety, it would be far better to pay the staffs than keep them in the service. That may seem a very strange statement, but it will militate against the efficiency of the department if it is overstaffed, and it will be overstaffed as it now stands, and it would be better to make some arrangement in the way of the payment of a lump sum or of an annuity for a period of years than to continue people in the service who have no work or not enough work to do. I agree with the minister when he says that the selection of the director will determine the efficiency of the branch, and there can be no real efficiency if the director finds himself handicapped from the start with a staff which he cannot control as to numbers. These are hard words. They are not intended in any sense to indicate an unkind attitude of mind towards this problem, but there has grown up in the public service of this country in many departments an overmanning and overstaffing that can be dealt with only by the method I have suggested, because you cannot wait for the cruel hand of death and the superannuation act to take care of them all. I make that statement to the minister because I am confident that if we live another year and he comes back and tells us frankly what the situation is, he will admit, unless he deals with the situation in that manner or in somewhat the same manner that he has indicated with respect to other branches, that he has found great difficulties. I think no man who has been in business as he has been knows that better than the minister himself.

As to the name of the department, my colleague from Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) the other day suggested what I feel, that the name is longer than it should be. In view of the fact that the government has committed itself to a name, and that it was intended to use the words "mines and resources," I think the compromise, if one might use that word, at which the government has arrived is a perfectly sound one. My preference—it is not a matter of importance now—is for Department of Internal Affairs. The Home Affairs department in Great Britain has been a distinctive branch of government for many years; it has been charged with responsibility for all home affairs as distinguished from foreign and other affairs, and it struck me, when I was giving some little attention to it, that as distinguished from external affairs you have here a department that has to do entirely with internal affairs—Indians and colonization, immigration, mines and minerals. It has to do with geology, with the observatory, with all the multifarious activities of the people under the control of governmental officers that might be summarized in the words "internal affairs."

I am not sure that the words "mines and resources" are sufficiently comprehensive as indicative of the range and activities of the new department. In fact to some extent they are words of limitation rather than of description, because in the very nature of things, having regard to the many activities with which the department has to deal in its seven or eight branches, it is quite clear that mines and resources is hardly indicative of the entire scope of those activities. In the Yukon and Northwest Territories the department is in a sense legislative; it creates a council which has power to enact ordinances, which ordinances, it is true, coming to the governor in council through the proper channels, have to be considered and dealt with; but in that case it has thrust upon it responsibility for the exercise of legislative powers. Then it has administrative powers. It has obligations with respect to education, obligations with respect to publicity. Above all else it has to do with an enormously important branch of our national life, namely our national parks, which in the redressing of an adverse trade balance have been singularly effective, inasmuch as every time a tourist tears from his cheque book a ten dollar banker's cheque he has contributed $10 to making up the adverse balance of trade between the United States and Canada, whatever it may be. That department of the public service is a branch that requires, shall I say, most painstaking effort and involves, I am sorry to say, the consideration of many problems that become too narrowly political. The minister will not misunderstand me, I am sure, when I say that success or failure, depending upon the factors to which I have alluded, will also depend to no small extent upon what I may call the purely political viewpoint. If in the selection of staff and in the administration which is proposed—not by the minister, because with the best intentions in the world these things will happen; not by the government, which with the best intentions in the world may find itself handicapped by pressure from without—that pressure is not withstood I am bound to say that I think the very conditions that have brought about the situation that now exists will continue to be imposed upon the administration with unfortunate results as far as the success of the effort is concerned.

I speak feelingly about that, because I do know whereof I speak. I could give striking illustrations that have come to my attention during the last three months. I do not think for a moment the minister desires that he should have a narrow political patronage viewpoint in connection with the administration of this great trust, but I am one of those who realize that no minister can get along at all unless he is aware that in the very nature of things his department and he personally represent a political party and that necessarily there must be some recognition of that fact. But if that becomes paramount to every other consideration the result is disastrous, and in many departments evidences are not lacking, which I could easily recall if it were thought desirable, that this pressure is becoming very great. In the very nature of things that was bound to be so. At another time this session I shall have something to say about that condition, which has manifested itself in many ways. Ever since 1896 we have had debates and discussions in this house about that matter, with efforts made to arrive at conclusions. We made a step forward in connection with our civil service commission and our merit plan in awarding positions to those who might be qualified, but of course there is still the difficulty as to who shall tender, who shall sell or who shall profit, and as long as human nature is as it is that is bound to continue. I only hope the minister will be able to resist it to the greatest possible extent. For instance, I could give an illustration in connection with insurance policies dealing with certain properties in this country, not under the minister. A notice is given terminating the insurance, with the short date return of premium. That means great loss. Instead of allowing the policy to run out, as it should, and then renewing it with your friends it is cancelled at once with the short date return of premium, with added cost to the country, or in this instance to a harbour commission, and the additional expenditure for premiums.

I mention these things because unfortunately I have been through that experience. I hope the minister will be able to achieve his expectations and realize his hopes; for from the frank statement he has given the committee I think he has a clear appreciation of his difficulties and a determined mind in regard to accomplishing the improvements that he has designated. As far as the civil service commission is concerned in matters of this kind, with the limitation that the minister has mentioned—that is, having limited his field of choice—I think he should be permitted to make the necessary organization within that limited personnel, rather than submit it to someone else. I quite concur in the view that he has presented. It is the view that I should like to feel was held by any minister undertaking the work, or by myself if I were undertaking it. I think the limitation that he has imposed upon himself, that is, that he will make his choice as far as staff is concerned within the staff as it now exists, because of their vested rights, fulfils all that he might be reasonably asked to do, and the government have done all that might be reasonably expected of any administration under present conditions.

Amendment (Mr. Crerar) agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 carry?

Mr. BENNETT: With the necessary changes.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment covers all the clauses, I think.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Chief officer.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister has given the figure of $8,000 to $10,000 as the salary of the deputy minister. What will be the approximate salaries of the proposed directors?

Mr. CRERAR: The salary of the deputy minister of course will remain at the level of the salaries of other deputy ministers. As far as the salaries of the directors of branches or divisions are concerned, at the moment I am not in a position to give the house that information. I should say at once that probably they will not all be uniform, because I think the degree of responsibility will vary. As my own opinion in the matter I may say simply that with regard to the directors of these branches it would be a mistake to limit their salaries too greatly and as a consequence possibly fail to retain the services of efficient men.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me that if we are to have the savings that the minister suggests, the directors would hardly receive the salary ordinarily received by deputy ministers.

Mr. CRERAR: No, they would not get the salary of a deputy minister.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then in determining the salary, or in advancing anyone from any other department of the civil service to the position of deputy, has the civil service commission anything to say?

Mr. CRERAR: Deputy ministers are appointed by the governor in council, not by the civil service commission.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understand that, but the directors of this new branch of the service I understand are not to be appointed by the governor in council.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, they are.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then will they be appointed on the recommendation of the civil service commission?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the civil service commission have anything to do with determining their salaries?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me that is rather a retrograde move, a breaking in on the work of the civil service commission.

Mr. BOULANGER: Hurrah!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) says "Hurrah!" He failed a little while ago with a particular bill, but I am well aware that he and a good many in this house would like to diminish the present work and importance of the civil service commission. This seems to me like another move by which that might be accomplished. I cannot see how efficiency can be maintained throughout the civil service if the higher positions are to be given to men or women from outside that service. If the civil service commission is to be relegated to the comparatively unimportant work of appointing junior clerks, we ought to know it. I cannot see how men of ability can be expected to enter the civil service and remain in it if they know that the higher positions are to be granted to people from outside. I refer to positions as higher in the sense of being of more influence and responsibility, and, what generally goes with that, commanding higher salaries. It is unfortunate if we are to put this new type of official designated "director" in such a position as that. The minister admits that there are too many people on the staff of these departments now and that the staff should be considerably reduced. I think that if it be at all possible, if there are competent men available in the service, men who have proved their efficiency in the service, they should be chosen for the positions now being created.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member surely could not have been in his seat when I made my statement—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I listened very attentively.

Mr. CRERAR: —because I definitely stated, or at any rate intended to, that that was precisely the intention of the administration in creating these positions. I said I did not wish to bind myself absolutely as far as the directorships were concerned, but I can say that I think the directorships can all be filled from the present staffs. And may I add a further word. My hon. friend probably has not had much experience in administration of this kind, but any minister, in a vast department such as this, would be very foolish if he did not seek to get experienced and efficient men at the head of the divisions and branches. If he should allow any other consideration than that to govern him he would be piling up trouble for himself. I can assure my hon. friend that I certainly do not want to do that. As I have already stated, in a reorganization of this large department there are bound to be some disappointments; that I think is inevitable. But I have already said, and I wish again to make it clear, that in the reclassification of these positions or the reorganization of the whole work of these five departments, or four departments and one branch, the aim will be to work as little hardship as possible. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was good enough to refer to that point. I am fully conscious of the difficulties in that regard. I do not expect that the economies that can finally be brought about by the reorganization that is to take place will be achieved in the course of a few months, possibly not in a year. Certainly there will be no additions in the departments. There is the lessening of numbers in the ordinary course; servants reach the retiring age and take their superannuation allowance; some resign to take better positions elsewhere, and lady members of the staff get married—all these causes in course of time will operate to reduce the staff. It may be, and I want to thank the leader of the opposition for his suggestion, that in certain cases special arrangements may have to be made so as not to work a hardship on any member of the staff. But I should like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to appreciate that as far as I am concerned we shall work this out with the minimum of hardship. I desire to get the highest degree of efficiency possible in the administration, and I must ask my hon. friend, whom I have known for a good many years, and who has known me, to accept that assurance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quite willing to accept the word of the minister; I have profound respect for his good intentions. But I want to be sure that the interests of the civil service are safeguarded, and I am always afraid when I see clauses introduced which contain the phrase, "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act." We are constantly creating new types of service and new branches, and very often people from outside the service are brought in. It seems to me that, having a department that is overstaffed like this, when new services are created there should be found in the existing departments persons who are qualified to take the new positions. That is what I want to emphasize. I do want to keep that aspect of the case before the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister has overlooked one thing. The minister of course holds office during pleasure, but it is not correct to say that the deputy minister and other employees hold office during pleasure; for they have acquired rights under the superannuation fund and the Civil Service Act. That was definitely dealt with in a case that came up from Australia, in which it was pointed out that all servants of the crown, military and civil, hold office only during pleasure; but where under the provisions of a civil service or other act they have acquired rights by reason of payments to a superannuation fund, they do not hold office during pleasure. The words "during pleasure" as applied to the deputy minister and the directors and others would be improperly used in this statute. I am certain that the Department of Justice will so advise, because already that question has come under consideration in connection with another matter. It was dealt with in the Reilly case, in which the privy council held
